It has been generally agreed across this country that Canada should play a peace keeping role. Certainly the Prime Minister has highlighted this fact over the years. We should have a peace keeping force that is mobile, integrated and able to travel to any part of the world, composed of men trained and equipped as well as any force in the world; but apparently this is not possible. Certainly we are not doing that. It is true that we have well trained personnel, but we do not have them in quantity to provide a peace keeping force. Because of the small foot we have in the door of NATO we have a few outdated ships, aircraft that are obsolete and early warning systems that are being closed down before we have paid for them.

In this country we really have not got any defence at all and the general public should be made aware of the fact. I am in complete agreement with the minister that he has done a number of worth-while things, but I am not convinced that integration, putting all service personnel into the same uniform, is the answer. I certainly think it is time that we did something about over-staffing at the top, and I think probably we should do a great deal more in that respect.

I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre who said that the minister is not a rubber stamp. It is also fair that we warn the minister that it is not good enough for him to look to the rabble behind him who thump their desks at every opportunity. It is unwise for the minister to seek support for the acceptance of his new policies in the fact that the service vote went mostly Liberal. I have a friend who was a scrutineer in connection with the service vote during the last election. It would be very interesting to have one or two of those scrutineers appear before a committee to find out exactly what happened with respect to the service vote. I suggest that the minister and a great many members of this house would probably be shocked as soon as this information came to light.

Mr. Nielsen: I doubt it.

Mr. Peters: I give a certain number of members credit for not knowing the facts in this regard. I am sure they would not respond to the minister's remarks in the way they do when he speaks about the morale of the services if they knew the facts. When you have a dictatorship and there is only one name on the ballot, if you are going to vote at all you vote for the person named. I do not think the minister should take too much credit or place too much reliance on that majority of Liberal servicemen's vote, when talking of the acceptance of his integration policy. He should not use that support in his attempt to obtain the leadership of the Liberal Party, which would probably mean the prime ministership of this country. I am inclined to believe that is exactly what he is trying to do.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Is he alleging that there was some irregularity in the taking of the service vote?

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am alleging that there was some irregularity.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the hon. member would give us some details of this irregularity, because that is a very serious charge.

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I could give some details but I suggest this is a matter to be brought before the defence committee when it holds its meetings. My information is that on most occasions when there had to be a write-in of candidates' names there was only one name written in, and the consensus of these scrutineers is that there was only one name or candidate for whom the people could vote.

Mr. Chairman, in my riding I am known to at least a few people. I have been around for quite a while and I am fairly closely connected with some of the Legion organizations. It is therefore surprising to me that the minister is not aware that the sons of men who have served in various forces have an affinity to those forces and are willing to serve them and their country.

It is surprising that the names of individuals running for election during the last election were not known to the sons of those people who had served, when they voted overseas. I think this whole situation should be investigated.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the minister or the government should rely too heavily on the service vote which was overwhelmingly in support of the Liberal party to back up the statement that the morale of Canadian service personnel is exceptionally high. I think they will be fooling themselves if they do so.

Mr. Hellyer: No one is saying that.

Mr. Nielsen: That is precisely what you have said.

Mr. Peters: The response you receive from your backbenchers would indicate that these people believe there is high morale in the service as supported by the overwhelming Liberal service vote. I think that is a false premise upon which to base the statement that the changes in the service are being worked out to their advantage.

I do not think the minister is well advised, in coming into the house during a debate of this nature to outline the national defence program of this country as it is taking place at this time, to state that the changes are being made because somebody else made a mistake or somebody else was at fault. Let us not fool ourselves: Most of the policies of the defence department taken over by the minister were policies which remained from the second world war when the Liberal Party was in power. In my experience the Conservative party when it was in power did not change the defence policy very quickly, or at all. I think that government was advised by the same people who are now advising the present government. The minister may smile, but I am sure he is aware of the fact that sitting up in the gallery are those people who really decide defence policy. I am sure they advised the Conservative party in exactly the same way they are advising the Liberal party now.

I do not believe there is much change taking place now which was not inevitable. I think it is unfair to use a political argument in respect of a decision to scrap the Bomarc, to support the changes being made. Why does the government not admit that the changes are being made because of poor advice received by the department from its advisers?

If the minister has truly changed the policy of national defence I think he should concentrate on that change, rather than lay the blame on others. I think Canadians are very interested in this suggested reduction in the expenditures of the Department of National Defence. The public I am sure is interested in the role that Canada is to play, having a mobile force that can be moved into trouble spots in the world. That is a role that can be of great credit to Canada, but I have not heard anything said which would indicate to me that this is being accomplished. When we want to send someone to a funeral half way across the world we try to hitch-hike a ride with United States services, because we do not have any equipment to fly him there before the burial takes place. This is only a newspaper headline but it is something we hear about every day.

It is perhaps possible that we have planes which are suitable for the military role, and I am sure we do not have to carry our peace keeping force around the world as fast as that. But the committee has not—I have not, at least—heard the minister really speak of the force in connection with which the Prime Minister won the Nobel Peace Prize. I refer to the role that Canada should be playing in the peace keeping field. If our efforts in this direction have been successful and the aims accomplished, I believe the minister has an obligation to say so. If we do not intend to carry out this role, we should also be told this.

That these exchanges and the reluctance to answer very simple questions lead to a great deal of extended debate that is not necessary. The minister should be fair enough to realize that many hon. members who have spoken in the last few days have probably, like myself, received reports from a number of acquaintances in the services who believe that morale is not high and who have reason for so believing. Many of them left the forces because they were not sure they were going to have a lifetime career in the service; they believed this was no longer possible. I believe these complaints are legitimate and I strongly suggest that the minister consider them with at least some degree of respect.

I do not wish to hold up these estimates any longer but I do believe the minister should tell the country whether we are equipping ourselves for the peace keeping role that we hope to fill or are doing exactly what the minister criticized the former government for, and for which they criticized their predecessors in government, namely being like the tail on the dog and being wagged by the joint chiefs of staff who had a pre-conceived idea in regard to wars that took place a long while ago, and were not really willing to make changes. If this is the situation, I wish the minister would tell the committee, and if it is not the situation I think the minister should tell us this also.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I think the type of forces being developed are just exactly those required to meet even more effectively in the future any commitments that might be made on them, ranging from the whole spectrum of reinforcing the central front to peace keeping activities. This is something that was brought out in our United Nations peace keeping activities in order to meet the requirements, whatever they were. These requirements have been different in every single case in which we have participated in United Nations peace keeping activities. The reason we have been able to carry them out so successfully is that we have such well balanced troops and equipment. The high mobility of our troops will enable us to carry out these activities on an even more effective basis.

I know it is ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman, but I wonder whether the committee would consider passing item 1 tonight on the understanding that when we reach item 15 I will answer any questions of concern to any individual member of the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote No. 1 carry?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Chairman. There is no great haste. The minister has brought this upon himself with his 45-minute speech tonight and his violent attack on the hon. member for Calgary North.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—MEDICARE—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all noted with interest this afternoon the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) that nothing would please him better than to be here at ten o'clock tonight. I understand that he is busy and not able to be here. I trust that the minister who will reply for him will be in a position to give a clear answer to the question which I have posed on two or three occasions.

The question I asked the Prime Minister last Thursday, which was not allowed on orders of the day and is therefore on the late show for tonight, had to do with the statement made on two or three occasions by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) to the effect that medicare payments would begin on July 1, 1967. In the light of that assertion by the minister, therefore, I have asked the government to give us an indication as to the date by which medicare legislation would have to be enacted in order to make this possible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me make quite clear what it is I am trying to get at. I am not posing a legal question or, as Mr. Speaker suggested last Thursday, seeking an interpretation of a statute. After all, there is no statute yet with respect to this matter. What I am trying to do, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare will not be surprised at my trying to do this, is to pin the government down as to when it is going to act on this important measure.

There is not the time to go over the history of the Liberal Party with regard to health insurance or medicare. It dates back to a period before the Minister of National Health and Welfare was born. In fact for 47 years we have been waiting for action on this matter. More particularly in the last few years the Liberal Party, under the present Prime Minister, has been talking very aggressively about medicare. Last July we had four pretty good principles laid down and we were told these would be the underlying principles of the medicare legislation to be introduced by this government. It was, of course, promised categorically in the last election campaign, and it was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne on January 18 of this year.

But in this session, when we have tried to get a clear statement from the Prime Minister or from the Minister of National Health and Welfare as to when this legislation is going to be before us, we have been given a very general kind of answer. We are told it is hoped it will be brought before us at this session. We are are told the government's position is still the same as it was in the Speech from the Throne, that it intends to go ahead with the legislation.

I see the Minister of National Health and Welfare is here. He knows that for the government's own sake this is not good enough. This kind of general promise that it will be done if possible, this general statement that we hope to have it done, that is the kind of thing that leads to one session after another going by without action taking place. The minister knows how difficult it was to get him to introduce the labour code. When he did bring it in there were two things omitted, the fair wages and hours of labour amendments and a safety code. He knows how difficult it was to get the government to bring forward the Canada Pension Plan. I submit that what we need from this government, for the sake of the people of Canada, what the government needs to do for its own sake, is to give us a timetable and tell us when it intends to put medicare on the order paper. The government should tell us whether it is its intention that this session shall continue until medicare legislation is enacted. If not, let us all know that it is just so much talk.

I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, when answering for the Prime Minister on this question, not to skirt around it, not to talk about the legal difficulties of fixing a date so many months ahead of July 1, 1967. I ask him to take this house, to take the country, into his confidence and tell us precisely what the government's plans are with respect to medicare. Surely the government itself must have a plan for getting it on the order paper some time in 1966 and for getting it passed by some specific date in 1966.

We hear a great deal from the government house leader about the desirability of planning the session and timetabling our work. The time to plan things and to timetable our work is not when we get into some crisis. The time to do it is in advance.

Therefore, I give the Minister of National Health and Welfare tonight a golden opportunity. I hope he will seize it and will tell us when medicare will be put on the order paper, and by what date the government feels it must be passed in order that the promise to have it in effect by July 1, 1967, can be implemented without fail.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to explain to the house and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the Prime Minister wishes to express his regret concerning his absence this evening. He had indicated earlier in the day that he would like to be here, but it is now impossible for him to be here to reply to the question directed to him by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

The hon. member asks the specific question, when it is expected the legislation on medicare from the federal point of view will be placed on the order paper. Naturally it would be impossible for me to make a clear declaration on that point this evening. Nor do I think it is a crucial question because it is the firm intention of the government to adhere to the four principles laid down by the Prime Minister last July at the federal-provincial conference.

The communiqué issued after the recent conference of federal-provincial ministers of health includes the following two paragraphs:

> In discussing medical care insurance, several provinces accepted the federal proposals and indicated their readiness to commence programs by July 1, 1967. Certain provinces, however, were unprepared to make definite commitments at this time.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare again expressed the adherence of the federal government to the announced four principles, and its objective to commence federal contributions to provincial medical care plans on a nation-wide basis by July 1, 1967.

That is the statement that I made at the federal-provincial conference, and it still represents the policy of the government.

While it would be desirable to get this legislation through the house as quickly as possible, it should be borne in mind that from the federal point of view the legislation affecting medicare will be relatively simple because it will take the form of enabling legislation providing for payments to provinces within the framework of the four principles which have been enunciated by the Prime Minister.

It would of course be satisfactory and desirable to have this legislation on the order paper and to get it passed—certainly it would be my wish—as quickly as possible. However, I have in mind that as Minister of National Health and Welfare I have certain prior commitments to the provinces with respect, first, to the Canadian assistance plan, which was targeted for April 1, 1966—

Mr. Knowles: We have not seen that yet either.

Mr. MacEachen: —and also with respect to the health resources fund payments, which are to extend back to January 1, 1966.

Mr. Knowles: We have not seen that either.

Mr. MacEachen: These are two health and welfare items of legislation which must come first in this session, as I regard them as important legislation which is to be undertaken in the field of health and welfare.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the minister that the time allotted to him has expired.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—WARNING ON PACKAGES OF CIGARETTES

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) to my proposal concerning the dangers of smoking.

On May 15, 1963, Doctor M. R. MacCharles stated at a convention of the Canadian Medical Association, that excessive smoking was the main cause of lung cancer and that this disease was incurable.

The committee made up of 17 doctors, including cancer specialists, unanimously agreed that the situation had reached such alarming proportions that a wide publicity campaign should be launched among the public.

In January 1964, Dr. Luther Terry, a well known American physician, published a report which had been prepared by a committee of experts and stated that there was a direct link between smoking, on the one hand, and lung diseases, respiratory ailments and heart troubles, on the other. The report further said that cigarette smoking was such a serious health hazard that it was the duty of the American government to take appropriate steps in that connection.

According to statistics, Mr. Speaker, each day, 450 boys and girls ranging from 11 to 17 years of age start smoking. We all know that when a child develops that habit, it cannot do without smoking after two years.

In 1963, lung cancer made 2,500 victims in Canada and that figure is increasing at a fantastic rate from year to year.

While medical science is waging a lost battle to save those lives, the tobacco companies spend millions of dollars a year to increase their sales among adults and to entice a new generation into acquiring the smoking habit.

Although over $150 million are spent yearly for publicity purposes in North America, a very meagre sum indeed is spent in Canada to protect the public against that danger.

If the situation continues, according to a Canadian Medical Association report, cigarettes will be responsible for the premature death of nearly 100,000 children now attending Canadian institutions.

No one wants to deprive anyone else of smoking pleasure, providing he is aware of the risk involved but when the risk is hidden as in the case of cigarettes, persons should be warned by positive measures as in the case of certain drugs labelled with the word "poison". I ask the government, in the interest of the nation's health, to require the tobacco companies to label cigarette packs with the words: "Beware. Smoking may be harmful to your health".

[English]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interest of the hon. member in this important subject, which has been a matter of continuing concern to the department and to the present minister.

The hon. member directs our attention to a practice established in the United States of placing a warning sign on cigarette packages saying that smoking may be a health hazard. He suggests that action be taken in this country to follow this practice in the United States. A great deal must be said for the desirability and the efficacy in reaching the intended objective suggested by the hon. member; however, the authority of the government to do this, and jurisdiction under which this legislative action might be taken, will have to be examined.

I can tell my hon. friend that this very matter has been the subject of discussions with the industry, and that it is presently receiving the attention of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The department will take whatever decision on the point may be appropriate.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—METHOD OF DEALING WITH INQUIRIES BY MEMBERS

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): This afternoon when I addressed my question to the minister I did so for the purpose of clarifying the policy of his department. I have received a letter from one of the pension advocates which is disturbing because it suggests that a procedure is now being followed completely different from the procedure followed in the past. I asked in my question this afternoon if there had been a change in the policy of the Department of Veterans Affairs, a change which the minister had failed to announce in the house.

I wish to be fair to the minister. This does concern only one particular case. However, I assume that if there has been a change in the policy followed, pension advocates are no longer able to answer the letters of members of parliament. If the minister has adopted such a practice he is preventing the efforts of members of parliament to obtain justice for veterans and their dependents, whether from their constituencies or elsewhere in Canada.

I wish to be brief. Did the minister, or someone else in authority, issue instructions to the pension advocates who are supposed to present cases on behalf of the veterans that they are not at any time to answer letters from members of parliament, but that they are to refer those letters to the deputy minister of the department, or to the departmental secretary? If so, what was the reason for issuing such a directive?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): My answer can be very brief. No such directive has been sent. Certainly none has been sent by me. I would like to know what particular case is involved here. I have no knowledge of any case where a pension advocate was told not to answer a letter from a member of parliament. If there is a case, I would like to know about it and if the hon. member would let me have the letter I would look into the matter and reply to him.

I am sorry I could not reply to his question today. I think he understands the situation; the question was ruled out of order. I would have been glad to answer it, though I could have done no more than I have done this evening. I hope this reply will satisfy the hon. member.

Mr. McIntosh: Did the minister instruct anyone in his department to give this directive?

Mr. Teillet: No, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

PRINTING OF OBJECTIONS IN SEPARATE BOOKLET

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, some 27 objections pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act which have been filed with me have been printed from time to time as appendices to Votes and Proceedings.

It has been suggested that the convenience of hon. members would be better served if these objections were brought together in one publication. If the house will agree I will make the necessary arrangements to have these objections printed as a separate booklet. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

TOBACCO RESTRAINT ACT

REQUIREMENT THAT HEALTH WARNING APPEAR ON CIGARETTE PACKAGES

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-130, to amend the Tobacco Restraint Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Yanakis: Mr. Speaker, I am introducing this bill to call the government's attention to the direct link between excessive cigarette smoking, which I consider to be a real social ill, and the causes of lung cancer, respiratory ailments and heart diseases, which are confirmed by specialists.

I think that in order to call the attention of smokers to that hazard and to warn the future generation of smokers, the government should urge the manufacturers to print on their packages of cigarettes: "Warning—Smoking a package of cigarettes can be dangerous".

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FIRE

QUEBEC—INVESTIGATION INTO THE FIRE THAT DESTROYED THE LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR'S RESIDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Has the Prime Minister during his private conversations with the Quebec premier yesterday, asked him for an investigation into the fire that destroyed the Lieutenant Governor's residence and has he offered the help and the co-operation of the federal government to hold this investigation?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no such request was made. I discussed with the Prime Minister of Quebec the question of the appointment of a successor to the late Lieutenant Governor, and at that time learned from the Prime Minister of Quebec something of the circumstances of the fire. He is going to report to me in greater detail. I agree with my hon. friend that the circumstances, in so far as I know them at present, would seem to warrant an investigation into the origin of the fire. I shall be glad to discuss this matter with the Prime Minister of Quebec.

FINANCE

PRIOR DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING APPLICATION OF U.S. MONETARY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. At a press conference last week United States Commerce Secretary Connor said that before imposing the United States guide lines the reaction of the Canadian government had been sought at a high level. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if there have been any discussions with him or with any of his ministers regarding this question, and if so, which ministers were consulted.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance has already indicated that discussions between the two countries took place last autumn, not only in respect of the guide lines but on other aspects of financial policy as well.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister if the United States Secretary of Commerce is correct in indicating that at that time there was no indication of any unfavourable reaction from the Canadian Government?

Mr. Pearson: I think the Minister of Finance who took part in these discussions, will deal with that question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I gave a full account of the discussions that took place between the Canadian government and the United States government at both the ministerial-secretarial level and at the official level. We made it quite plain to the United States government that we did not think that the guide lines on direct investment were in the interests of either Canada or the United States.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ACCEPTANCE BY QUEBEC OF PROPOSED MANPOWER POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Can he tell us whether or not an agreement has been reached with the Quebec Minister of Labour with regard to Quebec's withdrawal from the joint manpower development program?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, no agreement has been reached as there has not been any negotiation; there have been no problems other than those found in newspapers.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the minister. Can he tell us if the Quebec Minister of Labour has expressed the intention of withdrawing from that joint manpower development program?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I would have to know exactly what this joint manpower program really is, because I know of no plan or program by that name.

[English]

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, mine is a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. If the province of Quebec does not participate in the manpower policies of the federal government, as members of the Quebec legislature have indicated, will it be the intention of the federal government to give financial aid to the province of Quebec in lieu of its participation?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, we had a federal-provincial conference in January. At that time the province of Quebec agreed to participate in agreement No. 5 entered into under the vocational training act. They did accept, so I do not see the problem. I think the Minister of Labour was referring to the mobility program, which is strictly a federal act. That, of course, has been enacted very recently and I do not know what the actual attitude of Quebec will be.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REPORTED STATEMENTS BY PRESIDENT DE GAULLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made yesterday by the President of France, General de Gaulle, outlining a policy involving the removal in the near future of NATO forces from French soil, I would ask the right hon. gentleman whether he has received any communication from President de Gaulle or has there been any communication to the government of France from the Prime Minister in relation to this policy as it affects our armed forces in NATO?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): There has been no discussion between the two governments as such, though the Secretary of State for External Affairs did see the French ambassador yesterday morning and discussed with him the observations made by President de Gaulle. Those observations of the day before yesterday were made at a press conference, and they develop the same view which the General has expressed in previous press conferences. However, an important new feature was an indication that after 1969 there would be a change in the command arrangements applying to foreign military elements on French territory.

All General de Gaulle's observations were, however, expressed in general terms, and we would expect that in due course the French government would make precise proposals to which Canada and other NATO governments would respond. At that time we could discuss within NATO any precise proposals which might be made. Such discussion would be inevitable in any event, because in the North Atlantic Treaty there is provision for a re-examination of the basis of the North Atlantic agreement after 20 years, and that 20 year period ends in 1969.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, arising out of that question and the answer which has just been given, would the Prime Minister say what is the attitude of the Canadian government toward the suggestion attributed to General de Gaulle that in the first place the NATO mechanism is too rigid, too ponderous and too slow; and the General's view that troops on French soil would have to have French commanders? Can the Prime Minister give some indication of the view of the government on this, and also the suggestion attributed to the General that he would welcome a bilateral, direct alliance between France and the United States involving mutual assistance, defence and a "hot line" between Paris and Washington? Would the Prime Minister not say, in the light of the attitude reiterated by General de Gaulle, that the time has come for the fullest consideration to be given by the Atlantic countries to bringing about an Atlantic community?

Mr. Pearson: As far as the third question asked by the right hon. gentleman is concerned, I do not wish to comment on any reported statement which may have been made about arrangements between Paris and Washington in respect of a special alliance. I have heard nothing about that.

As far as the first question is concerned, let me say that I think the NATO collective security arrangements since they were drawn up have been of great value in the preservation of the security and freedom of western Europe and the Atlantic community. I do also feel, however, as I am sure the right hon. gentleman does, having followed these developments, that at the end of a 20 year period it is a good thing to re-examine the coalition and perhaps make changes, if changes should be made, in order to make the coalition more effective.

As a matter of fact when the organization met here a year or so ago I myself made a statement to this effect, and the Canadian government had already instituted a re-examination of the alliance pending the end of the 20 year period. But I think the organization has been effective, and I hope we can make it more effective. It is a coalition which involves questions of collective security, and Canadian troops are in Europe as our contribution to this collective agreement. That is the only reason they are in Europe. They are not under national command nor would they be under national command in the future. They are there as part of the NATO arrangement, just as French, British and Norwegian troops would be in Canada if the NATO allies agreed that this should be done. That is why we are in Europe, and that is why we should remain in Europe.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I largely agree with the general concept advanced by the Prime Minister, but I come back to the question of the view of the Canadian government in answer to the suggestion by General de Gaulle to the effect that rather than improvement in NATO there may actually be disintegration if not complete dissolution. What is his answer to the earlier question? Though making this examination of NATO, desirable as it is, as a consequence of General de Gaulle's very strong and definitely truculent views having been expressed in this connection, what is the general attitude of the Prime Minister toward negotiations or discussions being commenced now to bring about an Atlantic union?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe General de Gaulle meant his observations to be considered as either truculent or final, and we certainly do not consider them so. I do believe that a re-examination of the NATO alliance—indeed, we have been carrying on such a re-examination for some time—is desirable, and far from this re-examination resulting in the disintegration of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization I should think it would result in strengthening the alliance by making it, if possible, less of a military alliance and more of a political and economic alliance.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO GASPÉ-MATAPÉDIA SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Due to the callous attitude shown by the C.N.R. to some 200,000 people who may travel by rail between Gaspé and Matapédia, would the minister consider ordering an immediate inquiry into the situation?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to inquire into the matter.

AGRICULTURE

ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I am wondering whether over the week end he reconciled his differences with the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Alberta, and nas he now received an official request and will he give consideration to additional assistance for farmers in northwestern Alberta?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Well, Mr. Speaker, I have never had any differences with the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Alberta—

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): That isn't what he says.

Mr. Greene: —who is a most courteous and charming gentleman, but I will say, Mr. Speaker, that there have been no new requests. The original request was made last December for payments supplementing P.F.A.A. payments. I have already made my statement in this house with regard to the impropriety of preferring one P.F.A.A. area over another, and I do not believe there has been any change in this situation.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Then would the minister get in touch with the P.F.A.A. officials and try to speed up the issuance of cheques for inspections which were made last December, payments that have not yet been made in my area?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made his point with the minister.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTED STUDY BY PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a single question to the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

Is the federal government still considering the creation of an all-party parliamentary committee to study changes to our Canadian constitution and can we anticipate an answer in this connection in the near future?

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister has already answered that question by saying that the possible creation of a committee was under consideration.

FINANCE

REPORTED SPEECH BY IMMIGRATION MINISTER RESPECTING TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister advise the house whether the speech of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was reflecting government policy when he said higher taxes are inevitable and that a capital gains tax is on the way?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): That is the statement of my hon. friend which he has attributed to the minister, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister been correctly quoted when he is reported as having said he expects higher taxes and he is himself in favour of a capital gains tax?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I never said I would agree to increased taxes. When I was asked whether I would eventually object to them, I said that if higher taxes could be afforded, I would have no objection. This is a relative rather than an absolute position. As far as a capital gains tax is concerned, I said, pointing out that I was speaking for myself, that I was in favour of it. I have not changed my mind today.

[English]

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Is there now a government policy evolved by which ministers take on a Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde identity?

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Further to an answer on the order paper to the effect that family allowances had increased 9.4 per cent since 1945 and that the cost of living was up 87.7 per cent, is the right hon. Prime Minister considering increasing the rates of family allowances on the basis of the cost of living index?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question is of a general nature and could be placed on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED STATEMENTS BY U.S. SENATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the statement of Senator Fulbright, chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee in Washington, in which he announced his support for the position taken by Senator Robert Kennedy with regard to the inclusion of the Viet Cong in any negotiations and in any future interim government in Viet Nam, and if so is the Canadian government prepared to support Senators Fulbright and Kennedy in that position?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have to examine what both senators said.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING INDIAN AND ESKIMO RIGHTS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister who will become the minister of Indian affairs and northern affairs. Has the twelfth annual conference of the Indian and metis association communicated to him its resolution recommending the setting up of an Indian and Eskimo rights commission and, if so, what is the government's intention in this regard?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think I would prefer to take this question as notice.

AIR CANADA

WINNIPEG—REPORT OF INQUIRY RESPECTING MAINTENANCE BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the urgency to the city of Winnipeg, and since the previously indicated publication date of January 31 is some three weeks past, can the minister now say when the Thompson commission report on Winnipeg's aviation future will be published?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): As soon as it is available.

Mr. Churchill: You have said that for months.

Mr. Sherman: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. The answer "as soon as it is available" has been given in respect of frequent inquiries over the past eight months, and I request a more explicit and definite date if possible from the minister.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister be clear on one point; does he have possession of the report?

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

[Later:]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether the people of Winnipeg may assume that the Air Canada overhaul and maintenance base will be maintained there in full force and effect and with full employment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pickersgill: The undertaking given by the government with respect to the maintenance base in Winnipeg are being carried out and will continue to be carried out.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question?

Will the recommendations made by the commission appointed to look into the possibility of moving the Air Canada maintenance base to Montreal be implemented by Air Canada and the present goverment?

[English]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether we are engaging in a debate.

Mr. Knowles: We are trying to get an answer.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker—

The hon. member put a question and the minister has answered it after a fashion. The hon. member must be content with the answer he got.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—ARRANGEMENTS FOR MEETING RESPECTING SAFETY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to address a question to the Minister of Transport, and I hope I do not receive the same answer he just gave my colleague. Could the minister tell us what progress he is making in arranging for the meeting with the interested parties that he mentioned on February 17 with reference to safety on the St. Lawrence?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Very good progress, sir.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of an answer he gave recently to the hon. member for Kootenay East in respect of certain documents seized relating to the S.I.U. and the question of whether there will be a further indictable charge laid against Hal Banks. Has an application been made to obtain those exhibits from the supreme court so they may be examined to see whether another indictable offence can be laid against Hal Banks in view of the recent developments in the United States in respect of that gentleman?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): I have already stated that the documents have been released by the supreme court and are now being studied.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Can the minister inform the house whether this matter has been referred to the law officers of the crown in his department or whether it is the intention of the government to retain independent counsel, as was done previously, for the purpose of assessing the evidence?

Mr. Cardin: The investigation is not yet completed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CULTURAL EXCHANGES BETWEEN FRANCE AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Further to his statement that the Montreal Symphony Orchestra will go ahead as a cultural exchange between France and Canada, is the minister in a position to advise as to what artistic group France will be sending to Canada in exchange?

Mr. Speaker: This question is very important but I doubt whether it is so urgent as to preclude its being put on the order paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DEBATE ON THE ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as house leader. In view of the fact that the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act has been amended so as to extend to 45 days the time allowed to study the objections, does the minister intend to take advantage of that time to introduce, or have an hon. member introduce, a bill to abolish capital punishment?

Could he also tell the house if the meetings between the representatives of each political party have given any results to date?

[English]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the present plan for submitting business to the house is, first, to complete the estimates now before the house. Then, depending on what day of the week these are finished, we will call a supply motion for the purpose of entering the estimates of ten departments and referring them to the appropriate standing committees. This will be followed by a debate on the abolition of capital punishment, which will be presented in the form of a private member's measure. The government has indicated that it will make government time available for that debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works. Can he tell us if the representatives of each political party in this house are still meeting to elaborate the procedure which will be followed when the bill to abolish capital punishment is considered?

[English]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the precise form in which this business will be placed before the house has not yet been finally agreed upon. I do not think it would be helpful for me to say more than that about it at the moment.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, does the suggestion made by such a close supporter of the government indicate that the government is giving consideration to the opting out provision in so far as capital punishment is concerned?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN HOUSE OPENING ON FEBRUARY 24

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity of presenting this suggestion to the Prime Minister earlier this day, but some of my colleagues have suggested that I should ask whether, because many members of the house would like the opportunity to pay their last respects to one of our colleagues, the late Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, the Prime Minister could give consideration to having the house open on Thursday at 4.30 in the afternoon, enabling members to attend and be back to carry out their duties. This would also provide members generally with an opportunity of paying their respects to one who enjoyed the affection and admiration of us all.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think that is an admirable suggestion, which I am sure can be agreed upon.

PACIFIC GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY

PROPOSED PAYMENT OF FEDERAL SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Does the statement made by a Liberal member of the British Columbia legislature favouring federal subsidies for the Pacific Great Eastern Railway mean that this government is prepared to negotiate such a subsidy program with the government of British Columbia?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not even aware of the statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BOARD OF TRANSPORT COMMISSIONERS

CONSIDERATION OF APPLICATIONS FOR TELEPHONE RATE INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. During the consideration of his estimates the minister indicated that at an early date he would present to the house the findings of the Board of Transport Commissioners regarding the telephone rate increases it has been considering. Has the minister received that information as yet?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that I have not as yet received word from the Board of Transport Commissioners in this regard. I will get in touch with the chief commissioner again.

WINTER WORKS

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Labour.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Can the minister tell the house whether he has received any communications or telegrams from various municipalities asking for the extension of the winter works period in view of the temperature and the severe weather conditions experienced this winter, which delayed the carrying-out of those works?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, with all respect I think the question should have been addressed to my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I put my question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Would the hon. member be so kind as to repeat his question?

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Has the minister received, from different municipalities, communications asking for the extension of the winter works period in view of the delays brought about by severe weather conditions and inclement temperature which prevailed recently?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I have no information at this time, but I shall inquire of the department and give an answer a little later.

PENITENTIARIES

WARKWORTH—REPORTED EXPLOSION AND LOSS OF LIFE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lee Grills (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister received any information regarding a reported accident and serious explosion at the construction site of the Warkworth penitentiary this morning, which took the life of one man and injured several others?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This may be an important matter, but I suggest it is not the type of question that should be submitted at this time.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, with deference, I wonder whether Your Honour might allow the question asked by the hon. member for Hastings South, since there has been loss of life and since it is the responsibility of the Solicitor General to answer questions of this nature.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair must reach a decision each time a question is asked as to whether the question should be allowed and an answer given during the question period. Even though there may have been a loss of life my decision was based on the general principle that this was not a matter of national urgency. However, if it is the general feeling of the house that the matter should be considered at this time and the Solicitor General wants to reply to the question, I will allow him to do so.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the question was not addressed to me originally. I regret, however, that I am unable to help the house in this regard. I will make inquiries immediately and communicate with the hon. member.

[Later:]

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may expand on the reply I gave to the question asked by the hon. member for Hastings South. I have just been advised that a propane gas tank exploded at Warkworth, injuring one man and killing another. I have no more details, except to say that the control of this institution has not yet been turned over to the penitentiaries service.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF JOINT RESTAURANT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the house leader because of certain discontent in relation to the operation of the restaurant and other facilities of that type. Can the house leader inform the house when the restaurant committee is to be established?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell when that committee will be established, but a notice has been prepared and has gone forward today to be placed on the order paper.

REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF PARTICIPATION BY IRELAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. Régimbal (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There were several radio reports in Montreal during the past week end to the effect that Ireland had withdrawn its application to participate in Expo '67 because of the fact that some $1½ million worth of sweepstake tickets had been seized by the R.C.M.P. in recent weeks. My question is, has Ireland actually withdrawn its application to participate in Expo '67?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this question be placed on the order paper.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PAROLE SYSTEM REVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Solicitor General a question. A few weeks ago the minister in reply to a question said he would announce the policy of the government regarding parole prior to the vote on capital punishment. Can the minister tell the house when we may expect his announcement on this important matter?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I used the exact words quoted by the hon. member. I believe I said that the question he raised would be met during the course of the debate. However, I will take his question as notice now.

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLOCATION OF ROUTE BETWEEN TORONTO AND LOS ANGELES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the government yet reached a decision as to what air line will be permitted to fly the route between Toronto and Los Angeles?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No, sir.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May we assume that it will be Air Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman can make any assumptions he likes. The government will make the decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: The government or the minister?

An hon. Member: Liberal arrogance.

[Later:]

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It was intended to be supplementary to one already asked but Your Honour could not hear me a few questions ago. In view of the amazing statement the minister made a short while ago, that the government makes the decisions as to air routes, will the minister see about changing the DC-9 air routes so they stop in Regina and Saskatoon—

An hon. Member: And Halifax.

Mr. Brand: —and Halifax, as my hon. friend has said, since the minister apparently has this power?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the government has the responsibility given to it by parliament for deciding which route will be assigned to an air line, but it does not have the responsibility for deciding what kind of equipment the air line will use. That is a matter for the management of the air line.

Mr. Brand: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of that answer, and since apparently no decision will be made about the DC-9's at this time, would the minister consider allowing the C.P.R., or rather Canadian Pacific Airlines to fly these routes as well as Air Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the C.P.R. will be glad to learn it has one friend in the house.

An hon. Member: The question was about C.P.A.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING OF FUR SEAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, after that last reply I shall not address a question to the Minister of Transport but will try the Minister of Fisheries. I would like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he can give the house any report upon the proceedings of the North Pacific fur seal commission, which is meeting at the present time in Ottawa.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): This meeting started yesterday, Mr. Speaker. It is much too early for me to give a report. The meeting will proceed practically all week.

Mr. Barnett: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether it is the intention of the government to take advantage of the presence in Canada of representatives of Japan, the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.S.A.—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barnett: I mean the U.S.A. Is it the intention of the government to take advantage of the presence in Canada of these representatives to explore the possibility of extending this four power treaty arrangement to other areas of the Pacific fisheries?

Mr. Robichaud: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary, to the Minister of Fisheries. I am wondering whether the minister has received a brief from the fisheries delegation here and whether he has now studied it. I understand he is meeting them later tonight.

Mr. Robichaud: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received a brief and I will have a meeting with the delegates between five and six o'clock this evening.

Mr. Pugh: Has the minister already studied the brief? This is very important.

Mr. Robichaud: Yes, I have been studying the brief for some time as I received a letter from the secretary of the group advising me of the points that would be raised this evening.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as nearly all the subject matters in that brief have been pending for the last two years, I wonder whether the Minister of Fisheries would mind referring the matter to the decisive Minister of Transport so that we may get some decisions.

JUDGES ACT

INQUIRY AS TO PROCLAMATION OF AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, after the correction made by the hon. member for Timiskaming I have a non-shocking question for the Minister of Justice. Has the minister received a request from the Attorney General of Nova Scotia to proclaim amendments to the Judges Act, and if so what action is being taken?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this question is on the order paper, and it will be answered in due course.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of the blame placed on him by the Minister of National Defence with regard to supplying weather information at Rankin Inlet last December?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No, sir.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

1. Departmental administration, including grants to military associations, institutes and other organizations as detailed in the estimates and authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the Treasury Board, for total commitments of $2,560,-546,715 for the purposes of votes 1, 5, 15, 20, 25, 30, 35, 40 and 45 of this department regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,044,262,000 will come due for payment in future years) and authority to make recoverable advances under any of the said votes and, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to spend revenue received during the year in respect of assistance rendered to the United Nations, any party of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or any provincial or municipal government, $5,204,855.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, may I make a suggestion to the government house leader in view of the fact that the Minister of National Defence is not present for the consideration of his estimates this afternoon? I realize that he is expected to return but it is doubtful when he will arrive. May I suggest that the government consider standing the estimates of the Department of National Defence temporarily and perhaps we could go on with the Department of Justice. I know that the Prime Minister has been waiting to make the statement he promised to the house on the Spencer case. If this course were followed he might be released to attend to other pressing duties. Could we have agreement on that suggestion?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, we had expected the Minister of National Defence to be here by now. His plane must have been delayed.

Mr. Fairweather: It must be one of those F-5's.

Mr. McIlraith: The Minister of Justice is here and if this is the wish of the committee we are content. I am told that the Minister of National Defence is just arriving and I should like to check on that. Perhaps we could proceed for a few minutes.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to speak for very long, but I intend to take up the case of the volunteer militiaman and the local armouries. In the past these armouries have been training centres for the militia. Many of the militia units have been disbanded and the armouries have been closed. For example, the armouries in Napanee and Picton have been closed and are up for sale.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair has some difficulty in hearing what the hon. member is saying. Hon. members on both sides of the house should refrain from loud conversation and conduct their conversation in undertones.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As I was saying, many of these armouries which have been the headquarters for our volunteer militiamen in the past are being closed. Ever since confederation this country has depended on volunteers for defence. The policy of this government has been to adopt something untried, something I do not believe will serve us well in the future.

Since the minister adopted the policy of tearing down these local armouries he has built an elaborate, multi-million dollar armoury in Toronto. He would, of course, close and tear down the armouries in Picton and Napanee. I wonder what the reason for this is. The Prime Minister can go to Vancouver and very suddenly announce that he will give $2 million for a rink in that city. However, he has done nothing for the volunteer militia in the small towns of Ontario.

In perusing the minister's speech last night I noticed, and I want to bring this to the attention of all hon. members, that he did not say one word about the volunteer soldier, nor did he say one word about the volunteer units which have always been a part of the defence of this country. It seems to me ironic that in this very building, a part of which is dedicated to remembrance of those volunteers who have fallen in the defence of this country, and indeed within the shadows of those stones which are solemn to their memory we should be obliged to speak in defence of the principles for which these men stood and the facilities that made their service possible. We should recall that it was the local armoury that made the service of these volunteers possible. I believe it is as accurate a statement now as it has been for many years past that Canada's defence is based on the hypotheses of a small but intensively trained regular army to act as an instructional cadre for citizen soldiers forming a well trained and competent militia which can be brought quickly to full strength and training in time of war.

Modern weapons and their technology have complicated the soldier's equipment and his drill. Surely, however, the will and the skill to defend is still the most important defence and deterrent this nation possesses. How can we foster these talents without a continuous emphasis upon proper training of our youth within the various localities as a healthy and normal activity in conjunction with home and school? Surely we all agree that for many years past the local militia units and the armouries in which they have trained have stood for that will and that skill. Indeed, they have been the only means of implementing the nation's determination to act when faced with the hard shock of war.

In my own constituency the two militia units at Picton and Napanee have been disbanded and if I interpret the signs correctly the armouries are to be disposed of. In all likelihood these worthy buildings will be torn down. Is it true that these local units and their quarters are simply to disappear? It is well recognized and no one is going to take issue with the fact that militia reorganization is necessary from time to time. Some units must merge with others and their members must change from one corps to another and be assigned to other tasks. There would be no serious disruption if this were the case.

What has caused the storm of protest is the fact that not only have the units been disbanded but their armouries are to go as well. I have received 150 letters protesting this policy. I wonder whether the full implication of this policy is understood by everyone here? I wonder whether they really can appreciate what this means to small communities where communal activity of many kinds as well as military activity is centred around these historic buildings?

In the cities where a number of military formations exist, each with a headquarters, an armoury might be removed without greatly disturbing the overall efficiency of the unit. In a small, largely rural community like ours it is a disaster of no small consequence when these facilities are removed. We should remember that the rural communities contributed the greatest number of volunteer militiamen per capita in this country. People should fully realize that, no matter what conditions may exist or for what reason the decision is made, if an armoury is destroyed the military training associated with it and all that it means is forever destroyed in that community. It is a dead issue and cannot be revived. The minister never knows—no minister can know—the day upon which he may feel obliged to call for volunteer service in rural areas as well as urban areas throughout the country.

The most serious aspect of this matter is the fact that the tradition of voluntary military service vanishes with the discontinuance of the armouries. Make no mistake, Mr. Chairman, the voluntary participation by our young men in military service, the chief characteristic of Canadian defence, starts first in the armouries across the land. I would ask the minister where he would have these young men drill. On the market square? If voluntary participation does not commence when these boys are at school, then volunteers will not be available the day war is declared.

Coming back then to the young men now engaged in militia training I ask, what of their disposition if the present plans are carried out? On my last visit as a spectator on training night at the Napanee armoury I counted a total of 34 men of all ranks on parade on the drill floor. I have made some independent inquiries in several centres, regarding the number who turn out for training and I find that the figure I have quoted represents an exceptionally good turnout and indicates a healthy activity. Obviously this is not a unit existing only on paper. It is not a unit which can reasonably be discontinued and crossed off the list as is the case with many units in cities which, as we know, exist on paper only. This is a group of young men who have volunteered for military training, the youth that we are talking about and on whom Canada depends in the extremity of wartime need.

By what means did the Department of National Defence measure an effective unit when it decided to obliterate the unit I have described and to decline the service of these young men? What it amounts to, Mr. Chairman, is nothing less than an insult to these volunteer militiamen.

What makes their position even more critical is the fact that as soldiers in uniform they cannot make representations on their own behalf, as can individuals employed in a civilian capacity. These young men are soldiers and they must quietly accept any disposition made of them by a higher authority. Furthermore, many of them are quite young and the full implication of this action has probably not struck them yet and perhaps never will. All they know is that they like military training, and they are at an age when they can best receive and assimilate it. They are also acting in the tradition of their fathers and their grandfathers.

Let me tell you this, Mr. Chairman, with every moral certainty that it is the truth: Now is the time that these young men can best be moulded and directed. If you decline their service now you may never have them again except at disastrous cost, a cost too great for Canada to afford.

I have no way of knowing how many men have passed through the armouries I have mentioned both in peace and in war, but I do know that the number must be staggeringly large. I know that a respectable number of militiamen were under training in Napanee and Picton. I also know that in the past five years 100 youths have successfully completed the summer recruits training course in both these towns. I only wish we might all find as much enjoyment and enthusiasm in our work as my brief observation of these boys indicated to me that they have in theirs. If I can make any plea at all for these young men and for the young men who will follow them year by year, I will consider it a privilege to do so.

What possible invention could ever fill the need for men if our armouries are dispensed with? The answer is that nothing can replace them. As I asked the minister before, where are these young men going to train in case of necessity? On the market square or outside the town in a field?

Overcrowded schools and overburdened teachers have led to a rapid and dismaying decline in cadet training in our schools and with conditions as they are it is hardly likely that cadet training will reappear in any strength. Even at its best it was too brief and superficial to be of lasting use or interest. Therefore this lends strength to the case for volunteer training of adults past student and cadet age as soldiers. No, Mr. Chairman, there is no alternative to local militia training in a properly equipped and regulated local armoury. History has shown us that Canadian fighting men trained by this system have been the saviours of Canada.

I would remind the minister that it is the militia which fights the wars. The professional soldier trains the militiaman and it is he who fights the wars. The role of the permanent force is to train these militiamen. On behalf of the people of Prince Edward-Lennox, on behalf of the youths who are voluntarily training and their parents who know the worth of this training in ensuring the development of alert, strong young men and women with high morals and character, I strongly protest the nefarious and negative policy of the minister and his department of abandoning these volunteer units and closing and disposing of the venerable buildings in which these young people have trained.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate again in the discussion in committee but as I was not able to be here last evening I read with some interest the remarks made by the minister in which he purported to answer some of the questions asked during the course of the debate. It seems to me that he answered all the easy and superficial questions but completely ignored the more serious questions which were asked. I am going to ask him some of these questions once more in the hope that somehow he may be roused from the generalities in which he indulges so easily and persuaded to tell this committee some of the facts about what is being done by his department.

I asked him before and I ask him again, what force goals did Canada commit itself to in the recent discussions of the NATO council? Did these force goals involve the continued maintenance of the brigade group in the forward lines of NATO? Did the force goals to which we are committed involve the continuance of our obligation to maintain our strike reconnaissance force and, if so, for how long, one year or longer? Did the minister or any representative of Canada at any time during these discussions question the continued reliance of the NATO forces on a tactical nuclear response to any trouble which may emerge in Europe? Was there any discussion or suggestion on the part of Canada with regard to withdrawing our brigade group into a mobile reserve, a proposal made, I remind the minister, by the military commanders of NATO as long ago as 1960? Was this a part of these discussions or was it ignored?

Were any proposals made to end our reliance upon the tactical nuclear air strike forces in Europe and to substitute some other less vulnerable strike reconnaissance force? I appreciate the fact that the minister has told us in the White Paper that he proposes to phase Canada out of these operations or to see to it that we do not get involved in them again. Was there any question about the substitution of a less vulnerable response to deal with such a situation?

In short, Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to tell the committee frankly whether he or his government have done anything at all to carry out the pledge made by the Prime Minister before the election of 1963, or perhaps it was 1962, that Canada would negotiate out of the tactical nuclear role. Has any single step by way of notice, by way of discussion, by way of proposal in the NATO council to our NATO allies, been made to redeem this pledge? Or is it the fact that we are continuing precisely in the same roles that existed before this government took office? I suggest that instead of indulging in generalities such as, "We are in favour of a viable force," the minister should answer a few of the questions that have been asked him. When he says that at the NATO council we have realistic and attainable goals I hope that is correct. I hope they are realistic and attainable and, further, I hope it is not necessary to discuss that. But why must he tell us that "We are in favour of this" or "We are in favour of that" and other such meaningless generalities?

I suggest that if the house is to have any real knowledge or any real discussion as to where our defence policy is going members of the house require answers to questions that have been asked instead of being given the generalities that have been handed out. This is not the place for press releases.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: The House of Commons is the place for facts. Let us hear from the minister in regard to these matters.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, after reading what the hon. gentleman said there is one observation I might make. It is that I do not think he has recently read the white paper and therefore does not know what we are doing by way of policy in this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does that relieve you?

Mr. Hellyer: In so far as the specifics just raised are concerned, the agreement at the moment is that the country's annual return to the NATO inquiries will be the force goals, for this year. That is the situation. There are no commitments beyond that. In other words, at this moment there is no firm, hard commitment beyond the end of the year, although there are the realities of (a) requirements, (b) the equipments that we have and, (c) the deployment of those equipments and the training that has gone into them. To be more precise, this means that for this year the brigade remains in the forward position in the same role that it has had in the past few years and that the air division, including its headquarters, for this year remains in precisely the same role and precisely the same locations that it now has.

Further discussions by the council of ministers this year, which plans to meet at least two or three times because of the programs of inquiry that are necessary to consider what is best for future years, will include the question of the goals and what the Canadian contribution toward these goals will be for 1967 and for subsequent years.

Mr. Brewin: With all due respect I still do not understand. That is not clear.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, last night the house was treated to a spectacle. It was a performance by a minister such as I have never before seen in this house. It was a cheap, tawdry affair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert: It was quite unworthy of a minister of the crown.

Mr. Winkler: It was a real press show.

Mr. Lambert: The prepared speech, prepared in part perhaps by the minister, was, it seems to me, prepared merely to furbish the image that has been created at great effort and great expense of a boy wonder, of a sort of miracle man who is of clear eye and tight of rein at the helm of a new technique of defence.

Mr. Hellyer: Have you read the speech?

Mr. Lambert: I have only read parts of it. I have read those "flack" pieces that one sees in various publications in this country and abroad.

We heard a speech and, if it was not full of invective, full of boastfulness and little else, I do not know what it was full of. Frankly the house was expecting some hard facts and answers to very important questions. After all, the minister acknowledged that his department's estimates and his policies have not been discussed since 1964. Many important decisions have been taken in the interval. When we wish to examine them what do we get? We get a snide, scurrilous attack on the hon. member for Calgary North, a predecessor in office to the Minister of National Defence. I shall also refer generally to other ministers of defence almost all of whom were ministers of the Liberal party and to whose knees the present minister could not even aspire to come when one considers the decisions and contributions to this country made by those predecessors.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert: When the Minister of National Defence talks about rubberstamp ministers, does he refer to the Hon. Brooke Claxton? There has been a whole succession of ministers and surely he does not refer to them all as rubberstamps. I refer to Hon. Ralph Campney, Hon. George Pearkes—

Mr. Hellyer: You are misquoting.

Mr. Lambert: —and the hon. member for Calgary North. Were they all rubberstamps?

Mr. Hellyer: You are misquoting.

Mr. Lambert: What does the minister mean by that statement? Does he mean that the advisers to the Minister of National Defence have been so dominant that ministers have been subservient to them? That is the only interpretation I can get from the use of the word "rubberstamp". Does he mean that a minister's own advisers in the department have made recommendations and that the minister has supinely brought them before cabinet, the members of which then concurred? We are told that there was indecision, ineptitude and stupidity. Is this the way the minister thinks of those with whom he was first associated as parliamentary assistant?

I will mention some names. Was he referring to men like Air Marshal Slemon? After all, we know that Air Marshal Slemon was one of the chief advocates of the CF-104 and the Bomarc. Was this one of the stupid decisions? What about Air Marshal Campbell? Was he another one who was ineptly stupid? What about Air Marshal Dunlap who is now the Canadian representative at Colorado Springs? What about Lieutenant General Graham? What about Lieutenant General Charles Foulkes? What about Lieutenant General Walsh? What about Vice-Admiral deWolfe, and Vice-Admiral Rayner? Among these I have cited a number of men who have retired. What about the man who is presently chief of the defence forces, Air Chief Marshal Miller?

He was first a deputy minister and a most respected and trusted adviser. He then became chairman of the chiefs of staff committee. Again, he was a most senior adviser to the minister and to the government. Now he is the chief of the defence forces. When the minister says his predecessors were rubberstamps he indicates that these men whom I named dominated their ministers.

Then we come to this beautiful phrase written by somebody who had more invective in his soul than sense. I am reading from page 1567, quoting the minister as reported at the foot of the page, the second column:

> —in 1961 and 1962 when that hon. member was Minister of National Defence and when his government's defence policy was known only for its procrastination, indecision, ineptness and downright stupidity.

These were the men who were advising the government of that day. These were the men for whom the ministers were supposed to be rubberstamps. Now we have a bold, new approach. This minister is not going to be a rubberstamp. Does he mean then that he is rejecting the advice of these senior advisers, some of whom are still the minister's military advisers? If senior military advisers give advice which is concurred in by a minister and the minister can then be described as a rubberstamp, what does that make these men today when the present minister says: "I am not going to be a rubber stamp"? One might almost be tempted to say that the gold braid is about to adorn the corporal's stripes.

This speech, to me, was wrong. Certainly one can hit hard; one can criticize. But the hon. member for Calgary North, the former defence minister, did not indulge in personalities with regard to the present minister although the temptation must have been great. While I may be conducting a direct attack here I do so in defence of a well established practice, crying out against this form of attack.

The minister was living up to form when he was over here on this side of the house and was defence critic. We saw some ineptness then. There was that famous speech of his in 1960 or 1961 which was given to the press—a bold new defence policy. The speech was never delivered but it appeared in the press. This was the sort of non-stupidity to which we were to become accustomed.

I want to give one example of the so-called bold decision-making by this minister who charges others with indecision. It relates directly to the CF-5 aircraft. Late last fall and in the early winter kites were being flown to test opinion with regard to this new aircraft which was to be purchased. The minister visited the R.C.A.F. Association in Edmonton late in February and of course he was invited to speak. He told them about this great new plane which was to be bought. A decision, he said, was to be taken within the next few days. As a matter of fact, it was to be taken early in March.

I asked the minister about this when he came back. He said "Yes, we are going to take a decision soon, within the next few days". After some time had passed I asked the same question again. Again the reply was, "Soon". When was the decision made? Some time after parliament had been dissolved, in September when there was no chance to examine the decision. We know it was not so much the political advantage to be gained by announcing this purchase after parliament had been dissolved which motivated the minister and the government; it was the fact that they could not make up their minds about this aircraft.

Delay may be legitimate. This is a major step to take. There are many factors to be considered. But surely to goodness the minister also knows that on other occasions too there are many factors to be considered. I recall hearing in this house his extravagant phrases when he was in opposition. That is why I wish to nail down this speech of his for precisely what it is worth.

Why would we get such things as this in a newspaper report by some reporter who has not been present in the press gallery for any length of time? How did he get this copy in time to write this article for an early edition of the Globe and Mail? I wonder.

Mr. Churchill: Explain that.

Mr. Lambert: This is the opening paragraph:

> Defence Minister Hellyer turned on his critics last night and slapped them all round the ring.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert: When it comes to slapping critics around the ring the minister is indulging in a little toy game with toy soldiers. That is all. We have listened to a lot of the criticisms made by the minister in the past. "Slapping critics around the ring?" In this house? This minister?

We still want to get the answers and I suggest to the minister that it is far better for him to give them if he anticipates getting his estimates through. This is the sort of thing the minister wanted when he was sitting over here in the past. I did not question his motives when he wanted information then. Ultimately he got it. The hon. gentleman could be a little obstinate, a little difficult. That is why we are being a little difficult at the present time. We want this information. The minister is asking parliament to commit itself to a vast program of expenditure, a completely new program so far as the CF-5 is concerned and a completely new program so far as the destroyer escorts are concerned. As the hon. member for Greenwood said, we want an explanation. We do not want these glorious generalities.

Let the minister tell us what is in his mind with regard to all these matters. We are entitled to this information. The government's defence program must be assessed on the basis of the reasons, the rationale, advanced. He makes statements about the navy which none of us are prepared to accept merely on the strength of his say-so. Already he has obscured a number of factors. He has obscured the requirements of SACLANT. All these matters have been raised and the best course for the minister to follow is, I suggest, to take these questions seriously and give factual answers. Had he done so earlier we would have been through with this discussion a long time ago. I would have thought the minister had been around parliament long enough to know that the type of speech he made last night is not one calculated to get his estimates through with dispatch. He should know that, or is this part of the new boy-wonder conduct?

I am going to yield the floor to the minister to give him an opportunity to answer now about the mobile command. Let him give us the rationale for the CF-5 and not just simply say it is a cheap aircraft that might land on certain length runways. That may be the case but we have not seen it yet. There are some modifications to be made. It will not take to the air until next year. It will be quite some time before it comes into use.

We want to know the reason for the change to tactical air support for our ground forces. Why does this make our forces more mobile? It may add another arm to their effectiveness but we want to be able to judge that on the basis of the information and the reasons advanced by the minister.

We also want to know a great deal more about our performance so far as SACLANT is concerned and also about the reorganization of the Maritime command. A great deal of credit is claimed for the fact that this is all going to be under one man. Let the minister explain the reasons that he feels this should be so and not just give a mere statement that such steps are going to solve all our problems. On that basis I now invite the minister to give us the answers and then we can get on with his estimates.

Mr. Hellyer: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): No nonsense, now. Get down to earth.

Mr. Hellyer: Always. On item No. 1 it is quite appropriate to discuss general matters of policy and philosophy so far as defence is concerned and I am quite prepared to do that. But when it comes to matters of detail I think we should pass on to item 15 when I can have the officials before me and answer any specific questions hon. members would like to ask. The philosophy behind the mobile force is very simple. It is out in the white paper—

Mr. Lambert: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: I really believe hon. gentlemen should reread it because there is a lot of good information in it that is just as valid today as when it was written. The philosophy is that in the world of today the likelihood of limited conflagrations, riots, insurrections, small wars and the overthrow of civil governments will continue as has been the case for the last 20 years. These things can occur in any part of the world and from time to time it might be in the real interests of this country to send a force of some kind or to participate in either a United Nations force, a Commonwealth force or together with any other group of nations with like interests. Therefore it is the capability to do this, to have forces which are air portable, with equipment not just to training scale but to a scale for fighting if required, which we are planning.

Probably of equal importance to the equipment that such forces must have is the strategic mobility to get them to their destinations, both sea and air mobility, air mobility to transport a force or what part of it is required in the shortest possible time and then sea mobility to bring such heavy equipment and support as may be required if the particular operation or mission is of an extended nature.

This is the philosophy of mobile command and it is being organized in such a way that a single commander will have the responsibility for the whole mission, for the training of the group, for exercising them in different component blocks, for having with them the support elements which may be required to be extracted from time to time and made available for United Nations operations, for training them in such a way that they are ready to respond with the least delay, for having a ready force which is always available to go anywhere in a matter of hours' notice, a company at least with an almost instantaneous reaction time, a battalion with a very short reaction time and then an air portable brigade with a very fast reaction time.

This is the philosophy and this is the reason the force is being mobilized in this way. This is the reason that the force is being equipped because if we are going to maintain an army on the scale which I think is right under present circumstances, we believe that having learned the lessons of pre-world war I and pre-world war II it is right and correct to maintain a force in being of this modest size. And if it is worth keeping, if it is worth paying the cost of maintaining it, then certainly it is worth providing the equipment. Then, having done that, it is not effective at all unless it is possible in this modern world to take it where it is required and when it is required within a reasonable time frame.

This is not easy. My hon. friend was quite right when he said last night that this is not yet accomplished. No one claims it is accomplished. It has just been organized and now it is starting out on its task. When the Standing Committee on Defence meets I shall be glad to bring before it the officers who were responsible for evolving this particular organization who will explain in detail the units of which it will be composed, the reaction time which we hope to achieve, the equipments that are needed in order to make it effective, the whole concept of mobility, how these forces will be working together under one command and at the same time from which one can extract any block or unit which is required to meet special circumstances.

So far as my hon. friend's question about the tactical air force is concerned this is, as he suggested, an addition. This is another arm. This is extra firepower. This is more effectiveness because these airplanes can do things artillery cannot do. It is to round out the force and give it greater capability to operate under the various environments that we envisage. It does not increase its mobility. The object of the exercise, and this is all we intend to meet, is that the air arm will have as good and probably better mobility than the ground force it will support. That is all that is required for the concept we have in mind. We will be able to move the ground elements and the air support simultaneously so that they are ready to go into action in either peace keeping work or a limited engagement.

There is no guarantee for all time that it will not be necessary for our defence forces to engage in some limited emergency. If that is a possibility, even a remote possibility—my hon. friend will remember it has happened several times in the last half century—then the object of the exercise is to learn from the mistakes of the past.

Last night my hon. friend was interjecting things about Hong Kong and he also mentioned Sam Hughes. He might have mentioned the problem of the Ross rifle, the problem of training soldiers with broomsticks and a lot of other things which one can recall to mind.

Mr. Nielsen: Like horses on the payroll.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, horses on the payroll. That is right. There are a lot of things that could be recalled to mind, but surely there are some things that ought to be learned from the lessons of history. If my hon. friends opposite think they are the wrong lessons from history, then let them tell us.

Mr. Churchill: Will you answer a question, Mr. Minister?

Mr. Hellyer: Of course.

Mr. Churchill: Did you observe the fact that last night I pointed out that in 1954, which is a long time ago, I outlined the mobility required for a brigade in Europe? It is not a new idea on your part at all and yet you have not fulfilled that obligation.

Mr. Hellyer: I want to make it very clear that I do not claim credit for the idea.

Mr. Churchill: I am sorry, I thought you did. I beg your pardon.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not claim credit for the idea of tactical mobility and flexibility. I do not even claim credit for the idea of integration and unification or any of these things. Some of these ideas are 20 or 30 years old.

Mr. Churchill: This humility is refreshing.

Mr. Hellyer: But I do say that we might claim some credit for getting on with the job of accomplishing some of these things and in this area I think our record has been pretty good. The idea of integration of armed forces is 20 or 30 years old but only now for the first time is somebody seriously embarking on it. My hon. friend had a chance when he was minister—

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the minister permit a question in respect of unification? Would he answer the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre last night. What does he mean by unification? Does he mean one force, one uniform? Would he explain this more fully?

Mr. Hellyer: Unification means one force. I think this is understood.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): One uniform too?

Mr. Hellyer: I think my hon. friend will agree there can never be one uniform that would cover all situations.

Mr. MacEwan: The kilt?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, I could envisage no force without a kilt and I know my hon. friend would agree. I am quite happy to have the opportunity to answer hon. members' questions but, I would suggest that we might pass item one and get on with item 15.

Mr. Churchill: Why did you not come to the house in time today? Why were you in Toronto?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): There was the press release.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the house will have viewed with pleasure the change in attitude of the minister since last night. I have known the minister over the years. I have heard him make statements of various varieties but I doubt that at any time any minister has done a more thorough job of casting doubt on his administration than he did last night by the arrogance and insolence of some of his statements and by his aspersions on those who had served as successive ministers of defence, coupled with ridicule and contemptuous utterances. I cannot imagine anyone, no matter how much he might disagree, casting specious and contemptuous aspersions against ministers like General George R. Pearkes, V.C., C.B., D.S.O., M.C. Yet that minister, as well as some of his successors, was mentioned. Mention was made of Hon. Brooke Claxton, D.C.M. These ministers were rubberstamps; these ministers had no backbone; they had no appreciation of the needs. When one sets himself apart in that way as belonging to that select group who are certain that whatever viewpoint they hold is the right one, naturally a review of some of the statements made in the past by the hon. gentleman would not be remiss, because he was just as certain then as he is now.

The minister's attitude last night as I read Hansard, and I was not privileged to be here last evening, was that he would answer when he got to the standing committee. Mr. Chairman, he is going to answer here and now the questions of importance. If he has any idea of anything to the contrary, he will learn differently. His attitude toward this house and the committee was one of supercilious contempt. Today he has started to answer questions. If he follows that course, we at least will know what he stands for. His extramurally prepared document of last evening was not such as will commend itself to him, I am sure, in the years ahead. It certainly will not win the approbation of this house. Members endeavouring to obtain information were met by an attitude of pompous bluster. What does the minister say?

Mr. Hellyer: It is in the script.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Any time the minister wishes to interrupt I hope he will let me hear the interjection because I do not want to miss any of his words. I do not want to read his words in Hansard and not have the opportunity to answer.

I should like to deal with a situation at the moment which will commend itself to the Associate Minister of National Defence. It has to do with a serious situation in the area surrounding Valcartier. There is a village there by the name of Shannon which has been in existence for 100 years. The Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph and various people in this area have been in touch with me. I very seldom quote an editorial but I am going to quote this one in the issue of February 17:

> Some 100 residents of Shannon face the prospect of being dispersed to the four winds. This is a fact about which little has been said either here or in Ottawa. . . . Their land was needed for enlarging Camp Valcartier, they were told. About 25 families have been told their land is due for expropriation . . .
> Shannon's residents do not doubt they will be paid compensation. What they object to is being pushed around. They cannot understand why an army in peacetime, has to dispossess people in order to provide more room for itself. If this were a small country with space at a premium, such a procedure would perhaps be normal. But there's a lot of land in this country. Camp Valcartier could be extended in some other direction without having to disturb the lives of so many.

To Ottawa, the whole business becomes an impersonal operation. Leo Cadieux, associate minister of defence, even allows himself a grim little joke; he refers to the 10,000 acres of Shannon land that his government is planning to expropriate as the Shannon Corridor which the army must take.

This is not a joking matter. This is an attitude toward Canadians which cannot be justified. They have been living there for generations. Why are they to be shoved out finally?

The future is very dim for the 100 or so persons facing eviction. Many of them are too old to begin learning a trade. Others know nothing but farming. It is highly unlikely they will ever be able to buy enough land to settle down again as a community. . . . . Shannon is not just a matter of dollars and cents as the letters from Ottawa suggest. It is a human problem. The federal government is trying to work its Operation Shannon Corridor by remote control . . . . Surely, somebody at Ottawa, must care.

I ask the government to look into this further. There can be no justification for an Irish dispersal of this kind. There are other portions of Valcartier which could be used for the same purpose.

Surely those who opened up this country, the pioneers who have been there for generations and whose ancestors came even before the potato famine, are entitled to be treated in a way that has not been accorded them. I ask this government and particularly the associate minister not to make grim jokes about their situation by referring to it as the "Shannon corridor". These are human beings, they are Canadians and I hope this government will have some recognition of the inhumanity—of the "inhumanity" I repeat—that is inherent in a mass evacuation from an area when there is land available on either side which is not settled. I will say no more than that, but I am going to come back to the subject again tomorrow to find out from the minister what is going to be done for these voiceless Canadians. They suffer the indignity of a community being shoved and pushed about with no regard paid except a reference that can only be interpreted as not being in keeping with the seriousness of the matter. I want to deal with certain things now because the minister saw fit last night to give us what might be called in official language a tour d'horizon. He covered everything; he went back over nuclear weapons and Bomarcs and spoke as one who had always been blessed with that superior wisdom voiced by him last evening.

What did these former ministers know and who are these people? Mounted on his steed of knowledge, their problems are nothing to him. Let us look over the situation. There was petulance in his words and obvious contempt in his attitude. What has his record been. I am not going back to the time in 1960 when the house had the added advantage of being able to read his speech while he delivered it because he had turned it over to the press in advance, but at that time the minister did not get all that he thought he would get. He read his speech, and I remember how impressed we were with the emphasis on applause and one thing and another described in the account. It was tremendous, and the minister admits it, because never before had he ever received so much applause as he received then.

The minister went into a lot of detail last evening about the past but everything has changed now. Everything is "B.H.", before Hellyer, and "A.H.", after Hellyer. That was the story and I have read every line of his speech. I found it tremendously revealing. I would not say it was informative but it certainly was revealing as to the change of mind. Let us go back now and find out what he said with the same certainty in 1960 as he now reveals in 1966 but with a different amanuensis. This is more or less the prelude. On August 4, 1960, as recorded at page 7572 of Hansard the minister said:

If we believed for one moment that the Bomarcs provided any real protection, with or without nuclear warheads we would concur in their use, but we do not believe so.

You cannot get more authoritative words than those. He then said:

On the contrary, we think they are nothing but an added liability. We think they would put in jeopardy the survival of the people in the immediate area because they would in fact become one of the few priority targets in the country.

Six years ago they were targets, six years ago they were in danger areas. However, six years thereafter these missiles are in existence under the authority of this government.

I do not want to pick and choose but I want to keep the record straight in view of the fact that the minister has a mind with definite views. On September 13, 1961, the minister said, as found on page 8296 of Hansard:

A dozen Bomarc squadrons and a dozen squadrons of Voodoos would not begin to provide us with any protection.

Then he frightened everyone when he said:

As a matter of fact, the fall-out from these so-called defensive weapons alone, if they are equipped with nuclear warheads, would be sufficient to wreck tremendous havoc amongst our civilian population.

Was he speaking the truth then or was he merely talking? Let us carry on because we want to get the complete record. He said:

No, Mr. Chairman, we have no protection from these devices; we are as exposed as Babes in the Wood.

I remember him saying that and it was frightening. What a picture he created with all the certainty of his ideas as he presented them. Let us go on, because these are literary master-pieces. First he frightened us with fall-out and then he said they were no good; now he keeps them.

On September 15, 1961, as recorded at page 8431 of Hansard, he said:

It is our opinion, therefore, that it is not necessary to have two Bomarc squadrons, nor is it necessary to arm our defence squadrons with nuclear weapons.

At least then there was consistency, but suddenly he changed his mind. What did he say after three years of denunciation? On February 4, 1963, he said, as recorded at page 3429 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, as of this date, I have changed my mind.

What brought about that change, because there was a metamorphosis of that definite, knowledgeable mind? Let us read on because I know the minister is anxious to have the record of what others said about him after his change of view. I intend to place their views on the record.

Mr. Charles Lynch on July 14, 1965, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen, revealed what took place. He was referring at the time to the Heeney-Merchant doctrine that was enunciated, that Canada in relation to the United States should be seen and not heard. Certainly we have had some wonderful examples of that in connection with guide lines and the like in respect of which Canada did not speak out.

Dealing with the declaration of the former ambassador, Mr. Merchant, this is what Mr. Lynch said:

Mr. Merchant will claim that he had nothing up his sleeve and that he practised no sleight-of-hand on our Mr. Heeney. If Mr. Heeney's striped trousers are missing, Mr. Merchant will plead innocence. Just as he did when, years ago, he was secretly briefing members of the Ottawa press corps against the anti-nuclear-weapons policy of the then Diefenbaker government.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I wonder whether the minister was one of those students who received the inoculation that brought about the change of viewpoint and heart. I ask him to deny that and say he was not in touch with Mr. Merchant, the United States ambassador. He has every opportunity to deny it now but there will be no denial. Was he briefed on the manner in which to undermine the government because that government would not bow to the determination of another state?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Listen to this, Mr. Chairman:

Nobody who attended those basement sessions will ever forget his—

Mr. Merchant's.

—earnest logic and "good-sense" approach as he administered the hypodermic.

Certainly Mr. Lynch reveals that those who were of the elect were given instruction on how to answer the government of that day. And I have something more. There were meetings that took place in Ottawa in the offices of officials of the United States. At those meetings there was first the entertainment—they were given lunch and the like—and thereafter full instruction as to how to answer. That is why I gave the minister an opportunity earlier to deny that he had been in touch with Mr. Merchant.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: He wants to deny it now.

Mr. Hellyer: —I should like to deny it. I had not heard of it until I read of the dialogue between Mr. Charles Lynch and the right hon. gentleman. That was the first I heard of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not talking about the minister hearing dialogue; I am talking about his hearing what Mr. Merchant said.

Mr. Hellyer: I deny that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am pointing out the fact that it is a singular circumstance that the minister turned a complete flop from one stand he had adopted for a period of years and suddenly changed just at the time the American ambassador was giving Canada the hypodermic treatment on Canada's policy. Let me pursue that matter, Mr. Chairman. What do some of the followers of the hon. gentleman say? I have before me a few quotations that are of interest. They reveal that this was normal. I have before me the viewpoint expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister. This also was "B.H.", before Hellyer. Let me read what he said, because he has been promoted:

For a long time, it has been clear—

I am reading from Cité Libre of April, 1963, and this is the translation:

For a long time, it has been clear that the U.S.A. did not like Mr. Diefenbaker. From the beginning, he had proposed to strengthen the ties with the Commonwealth and decrease those with the U.S.A. . . . He had chosen an External Affairs minister who loved peace more than he loved the Americans. He was selling wheat to China . . . traded with Cuba . . .

Mr. Kennedy's hipsters could not tolerate this . . . The word was passed around, Diefenbaker must go.

These are not my words. These are the words of an hon. gentleman who today is in the shadow of the Prime Minister. I read on, Mr. Chairman, because these revelations are extremely interesting. They are honest revelations, because the hon. gentleman is just that. He said:

So it was easy for the Americans—

These are not my views; these are the views of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister of today:

So it was easy for the Americans to give a helping hand to defeat a government already wavering since the first day after the election.

The helping hand came from the Pentagon, and demanded that Mr. Pearson betray his party program—

Mr. Nielsen: Sold out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not utter those words. They were from a man who was brought in by this government. He is not the only one but I do not want to cover everything in one day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But, Mr. Chairman, I do want the record to be clear so there will be no misunderstanding. He said:

The helping hand came from the Pentagon, and demanded that Mr. Pearson betray his party program, along with the idealism with which he was identified. Funds were plentiful.

I did not say that. We knew it but we needed corroboration:

Funds were plentiful.

Mr. Nielsen: There is the reason.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a revealing thing, Mr. Chairman:

Gallup indicated that a pro-nuclear policy would not lose him the majority of electors. Power was within Mr. Pearson's reach—he had nothing to lose, except honour.

Mr. Chairman, those are the words of an acute observer. Then he ends by saying:

And he lost it—and his whole party lost it.

This is an amazing statement. Again, in the issue of April, 1963, we find these words:

Since I have observed politics, I do not remember ever having seen a more degrading spectacle than all those Liberals who became "turn-coats" with their Chief, when they saw a chance of regaining power... Once the leader had shown the way, the flock followed with the grace of animals headed for the feeding-trough.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is an amazing revelation but I do point out to some of the sycophants opposite that it indicates the way to power and position. I go on, Mr. Chairman, because there are others who made statements too. This is another one:

The events of the last month have at least one advantage.

This is again in April.

They allow us to observe very clearly the decline of Canadian political thinking.

The hon. gentleman was concerned with that too. He was one of those whose political thinking underwent that change that beggars description. Let us go on from there:

But what we have not realized is the degree of political decay we are headed for. So, Mr. Pearson and the Liberal party decided to show us; the most serious questions are only important to them in so far as the number of votes they will bring—

Mr. Monteith: Typical.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps the minister will explain that tremendous change in his thinking.

—and within that party there does not seem to be one man left for whom principles are more important than political power.

These are strong but honest words from an honest observer. Then he goes on to say:

The political philosophy of the Liberal party is simple: "Say anything, think anything: better still, think nothing, simply put us in power, for we can govern better".

This is an amazing revelation because it sets out what an honest observer concluded on the basis of things that have only been revealed in their entirety in consequence of statements that have recently been made. Then there is this:

I remember the federal Liberals of 1957. They were cynics who believed power was their right, and they had come within a hair's breadth of muzzling parliament. Six years in opposition should have had a purgatory effect on these Liberals, unfortunately the events of the last two months proved the contrary.

There is a great deal more in these quotations, Mr. Chairman, to which reference can be made on another occasion. But it is an amazing statement. We have the benefit in the House of Commons of a pundit in our midst.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, would the right hon. Leader of the Opposition permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: I seem to remember that some time in October the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, when he was asked about some of his straying ministers coming back to the fold, said to the press that the nuclear problem was no longer an issue at that time. I ask the Leader of the Opposition why he is raising this issue now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a perfectly good question, perfectly reasonable. He should have spoken to the minister who took this up last night. He took it up and he filled the record with a lot of stuff last night, so I am just clearing it up. I hope that the hon. gentleman will get in touch with the minister and just whisper in his ear quietly, because it must be done quietly, to take care where you lead us.

I go on from there because these new members certainly know their stuff. The hon. minister of manpower to be—he is not here now—

An hon. Member: Yes, he is.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes; he also took part in this testimony. This is a report in Le Devoir, and I am only going to give part of the quotation today because I want the hon. gentlemen to realize that these are just a few of the morsels that are available. What did this hon. gentleman say, because apparently the path of criticism leads to glory since the hon. gentleman has now become a minister? The article reads:

> Mr. Marchand deplored the extreme weakness and chronic instability displayed by the central power when the country needs a strong government capable of having a suitable dialogue with provincial authorities.
> The syndicate chief said that this weakness is taking on really disastrous proportions.

This statement was made last March. Certainly it is of interest to know his viewpoint. Then there is the hon. member for Hochelaga. I see he is not here. He is usually present so I shall reserve that quotation for another day. He dealt at length with this question. It is tremendously interesting, is it not, because none of these things would have come out if it had not been for the minister's decision last night to smear the opposition. All I am doing is getting the record clear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely no one will say anything to the contrary when I quote Liberal members of today, the reform group. I must make a reference to the hon. member for Hochelaga because he would object if he were not included. This statement was made in October, 1965, quite recently. This was a joint effort by the member for Hochelaga and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister:

> Without being alarmists . . . the undersigned nevertheless believe that there is a certain urgency in Canada. If federal affairs continue at the rate they are now going since the last two years, within a short time the results would be harmful to Canadian political unity.

Who was in office when they wrote that? Then, in 1963 the hon. member who daily excoriates members of this house and who sits in solitary splendor as he contemplates the failings of democracy and writes about them, said on August 17:

> Sam Lubell, political analyst, naively thought that once in power, a politician still owed a certain respect to logic and decency. He did not know Mr. Pearson; nor did he know us.

I have quite a number of further quotations and I will use them on the appropriate occasion, but I just wanted to lift the curtain a little so that the minister would know that when he attacked us last evening it made it possible to clear up the record, and not from the lips of those who sit in the opposition but those who are close to the powers that be.

After those few preliminary remarks I may say that I am going to reserve for later any attempt to deal with some of the matters to which the minister referred. I can just see him as he looked towards hon. members sitting in the opposition, whether within this opposition or those to the left, and said that morale was never higher in the armed forces. I say to the minister: If that be so, then why the letters that are received on every hand, why the fear in the hearts of people in the armed forces that unless they qualify to be kept they will be removed? The rules regarding removal are tremendously interesting.

I am going to ask the minister to table the rules and regulations that provide the basis for removing men and women from the armed forces. There is nothing in those rules that will do any harm to national security.

The members of the forces have had their hopes of having a career in the armed forces dimmed and frustrated because of the fear that, no matter how efficient they may become, the finger of the minister will be pointed to them and to their removal. They are frightened. On the one hand, the minister says that while we are not getting as many recruits as we did there are all kinds of explanations. When there was a suggestion that in order to bring back trained men and women fully able to carry out their responsibilities there should be some kind of bonus paid, the suggestion was ridiculed. Last September and October the minister ridiculed that suggestion, according to reports. Now he says he did not; he just gave an interview.

The Ottawa Journal of today seems to put the matter very well.

> The $50 million to be spent in re-engagement bonuses in the armed service in two years will not solve the basic problem . . .
> One common cause of discontent is the uncertainty caused by government policy. In the last 18 months servicemen have been encouraged to retire and paid grants to do so before their term of engagement expired. The total in the service has been cut about 15,000 in three years—and now there are not enough men, especially in categories of special skills.

Near the bottom of the article I read this:

> The re-engagement bonuses will not be enough to hold many of the most thoughtful and valuable servicemen.

• (4:50 p.m.)

I pointed out that we have had no answer from the minister regarding some of the criticisms in the Auditor General's report respecting periods of service. We would like to know who these gentlemen were who enlisted at nine years of age. That just shows, Mr. Chairman, the appeal that the minister has. According to page 55 of the Auditor General's report, during the year six cases were singled out in which officers and men were released on pension.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sure that the right hon. gentleman is not suggesting that I was minister when they enlisted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. But I ask the minister, does he seriously say that these people enlisted at the ages of nine and eleven? If he does, then there can only be one conclusion.

Mr. Nielsen: Present the facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; we are here to get information. The Auditor General's report says that these people had been credited with pensionable service dating in one case from the age of nine and in five other cases from the ages of 11 and 12. I want to know who these people are.

The report goes on:

> File documentation in respect of the early service was fragmentary, statutory declarations being accepted.

Was it under this minister that these statutory declarations were accepted in order to increase the amount of pension? I ask him again who these people are. Did these matters come to his attention?

Mr. Churchill: At least his Associate Minister should know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly. There is only one real minister now. The matter has come to his attention and there will certainly be no disagreement about that.

The report continues:

> In response to an Audit Office query about the officer whose service began at age nine, departmental officers replied that while enlistment at this age was contrary to regulations, the officer had not been discharged as being under age and consequently they were satisfied that he had served.

I want to hear something about this man, Mr. Chairman. This is an officer we want to hear about. Even the honorary colonel of the Essex Scottish is interested in that. Who are these people? Speaking seriously now, what nonsense is this? This is a matter about which we want to know.

Mr. Nielsen: Horses and children.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister, there being some retirements I do not understand, to give us a record of the number of officers in the three services who have been retired in the last three years and who received, first, $6,000 to $7,000 retirement allowance, second, $7,000 to $8,000 a year and, third, $8,000 to $10,000 a year. I want the names of those who were retired, their ranks and their ages.

Mr. Herridge: When they enlisted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think they come within this group of juveniles but I do want this information now instead of waiting for the defence committee to meet. The minister has brushed this off on other occasions; he has said: "Wait till we get to the defence committee". We want this information now and I would ask the minister to procure it.

These are just a few matters about which we want to know, Mr. Chairman. How many motor cars are there in Ottawa which were used by the defence department during each of the years 1963, 1964, 1965 and 1966 and who is it who uses them? Anyone living in this city knows that in the mornings cars flit here and there on unofficial business. We would like to have a record in this regard. The Canadian people want to know whether their defence dollar is bringing the greatest possible return. It is no wonder that the minister of manpower to be, said yesterday that he believes in a capital gains tax.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If hon. gentlemen opposite can win over the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, then they will have two of this belief.

Mr. Knowles: We will win him over to this side first.

Mr. Crouse: You have lost three already.

Mr. Diefenbaker: These are just a few matters about which I should like to know, as would the people, and I know the minister has the information available. Later we will get answers to these questions, and to other questions asked by hon. members which as yet have not been answered.

The hon. member for Greenwood pointed out with unusual clarity—I mean that; he is always clear but this time he made it pellucidly clear—that he wants information which all of us want. I would ask the minister to take off these cloaks and answer these questions. If there is one thing in military science that the hon. gentleman is qualified at, it is in creating a smokescreen to conceal facts. We want to remove that smokescreen and get the facts.

[Translation]

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Chairman, I will only say a few words at this time because the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) spoke a minute ago of the risks involved for the people of my riding affected by expropriations now under way for the expansion of Camp Valcartier.

I want to tell him that during the last election campaign, municipalities affected by the expropriations knew about this expansion project and supported me in a proportion of 9 to 1 as compared with the Conservative candidate.

There have never been any constituents without representation in the Quebec-Montmorency riding, now or at any time, and the editorial writer of the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph has only to inquire of the mayors of various municipalities who keep in constant touch with their representative to have their interests protected.

I merely wanted to point out to the Leader of the Opposition that, in my opinion, it is sheer play-acting and partisanship to refer to old churches when it is necessary to provide essential requirements to Camp Valcartier, an important military camp in the integration of our armed forces.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall vote No. 1 carry?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, before it carries I would have thought that the Minister of National Defence would answer some of the questions put forward by the Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps he is preparing these answers, in which case I can throw in a few more questions so that he can answer all the questions at the same time.

• (5:00 p.m.)

I think the member for Greenwood posed the real question which is that this house ought to be able to assess Canada's role with respect to nuclear arms. Where are we going?

The Minister of National Defence in his reply said that he could not see beyond this year. In other words, he knows where we are going this year. From there on he has not projected his vision, he has not looked into the crystal ball, or he dare not tell this house what he sees for the future. I think the question of nuclear arms is very important and certainly this house and this country should know what our role is. Are we going to continue to have a nuclear force? Are we to continue to have a nuclear role in NATO?

In yesterday's Journal there was an article to the effect that President de Gaulle will order everybody out of France or take over the forces. Surely this is not news to the Minister of National Defence. He has known of this for some time because I know that the members of the armed forces in Europe have known of it for some time. What decision is the department making on this matter and where are we going with our defence policy? In the January 1965, edition of Canadian Aviation the minister had this to say on the second page about Canada continuing a nuclear role:

> Speculation that the Canadian forces would continue to assume a nuclear role, despite the traditional Liberal government's opposition to this course, was heightened by Canada's support of the French position of maintaining an independent nuclear force. Questioned in the House of Commons, Defence Minister Paul Hellyer said government policy as outlined in the 1964 White Paper would be maintained "until some announcement is made to the contrary."

I want to know about the words "until some announcement is made to the contrary". The minister said today that he is not prepared to make an announcement to the contrary but he knows that we are only going to continue in our present role for this year. What is to happen beyond then?

In another edition of Canadian Aviation magazine, August, 1965, there is an interesting statement with regard to Canada's nuclear role. In his speech last night the minister spoke at great length about Canada's defence force having become a flexible, mobile unit designed to participate in keeping world peace. His speech on Friday dealt with the fact that he sees Canada's participation as being in keeping world peace. He does not think there is the slightest danger that Canada will find itself at war. We are to participate in a mobile force to keep peace in the smaller countries throughout the world.

I refer to the article by John Gellner in the August, 1965, edition of Canadian Aviation where he writes about the suitability of Canada's role in defence.

Nobody really believes any more that a limited nuclear war is possible.

The question before the defence committee some time ago was whether limited nuclear war was possible. I am sure that all members of that committee came to the conclusion that it certainly was not possible.

If we had been convinced in the first place through the warnings of those who did not believe, we could have saved upward of one billion dollars for the nuclear weapons systems Canada has in her arsenal.

What a huge amount of money we could have saved the taxpayers as far back at least as 1963 or perhaps as far back as 1961 if we could have foreseen that a limited nuclear war was not possible and that Canada had no place in any other type of nuclear war. The article goes on to say:

The wars that have been fought since 1945, that are being fought now, in Viet Nam, on the Malaysian-Indonesian borders, and in the Yemen, and that we have to be prepared to fight if we must, are conventional wars of all sizes and shades.

That certainly does not mean a nuclear war. If the minister is not prepared to answer this question now, I think it should be one of the initial questions that the Defence Committee should settle. I should like to have the minister tell the house now that this whole question of Canada's participation in a nuclear role of any description will be put on the doorstep of the defence committee and that he will say to the committee: This is your first problem.

Bring in the experts, call in whoever you like. Call in the military experts of any other country, but let us quit wasting money. Let us not waste again the $1 billion wasted in the past five or six years in the gathering together of the nuclear weapons systems that are in Canada's arsenal today. Surely we can decide this question rationally without further expenditure of the taxpayers' money.

I was interested last evening when the minister in his reply dealt with the CF-5. For a while he talked about the CF-5A and although he did not mention the CF-5M I gathered from his remarks that several modifications were to be made to that aircraft. The minister did not assure us that his cost estimate for the CF-5 would not escalate, as was the case with the Avro Arrow. I believe that in 1952 the Avro Arrow had a certain projected cost but I do not know the figure. However, that cost figure finally escalated into something like nine times the original estimate. The minister in his description of the CF-5 last night kept saying: "Well, with modifications and with the super-enlarged engine it will require a shorter takeoff run," and so on. I was disturbed by those remarks. Can the minister assure the house that there will not be an escalation in the cost of this aircraft, if he is prepared and determined to buy it?

I noted with interest that in talking about the CF-5 last night the minister kept saying "I have been informed" or "I have been so advised". He was describing the aircraft which he is purchasing. The minister has been bargaining for this aircraft and is spending something like $250 million but what I am really wondering is, did he buy the aircraft or was he sold it? This is the whole question. I should like to think that he made some attempt to buy it. All the evidence that I can gather, however, points to the fact that he was sold it. This aircraft is not new. It was first on the drafting board in 1955, 11 years ago. In the final result the United States government turned it down. Whom are we to believe, as the Ottawa Journal points out? Are we to believe the minister and his experts or the members of other parties who have stepped into this debate and who have their own sources of information?

As found in yesterday's Hansard, page 1566, the Minister of National Defence had this to say:

> Mr. Chairman, experience with the F-5 in Viet Nam indicated that the Canadian CF-5 will be absolutely first class in the ground support role.

What are the facts about this airplane? Something like ten countries have bought it. They include the Philippines, Spain, Norway, Canada, and South Viet Nam. What was the actual result of the experiment in South Viet Nam? To answer that may I quote from the August, 1965, edition of Canadian Aviation, page 16:

> The need became apparent for a supersonic aircraft that could operate from rough short fields, was undemanding in terms of manpower as well as of money, and was cheap to operate and maintain. This has revived hope for a U.S.A.F. order for the F-5.

The article continues:

> It was reported last month—

That would be in July:

> —that a special U.S.A.F. unit equipped with 18 of these aircraft is to be deployed in South Viet Nam this fall for combat evaluation. It is expected—

Here is the important point of this quotation:

> —that an initial U.S.A.F. order for about 200 of the improved F-5's will result.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Now we know the facts. What happened? The minister could not wait for the evaluation of this test. He could not wait to get exact results. The article states they were in use in South Viet Nam as early as July. The minister, as nearly as I can gather, announced his decision to buy the planes on October 19, 1965. What action did the government of the United States take? Did they go ahead and buy 200 of the improved F-5s, as this article suggests, because the 18 planes which were in Viet Nam were so successful? No. The United States government on June 24 passed sentence. In President Johnson's message to Congress sentence was passed on the F-5. Did this alter the position of the Minister of National Defence? He could not wait until January before buying these planes. He could not wait until a proper evaluation had been undertaken.

An hon. Member: He got a discount.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I think he was sold a bill of goods by Northrop Aviation. How good is this plane and can Canada use it? That is the question. The minister dealt at great length last night with the refueling equipment possessed by this aircraft. He told us how the F-5 could be refueled in the air. I suggest that this equipment had better be good and that we should be certain the plane can be refueled in the air because it has a combat range of only 300 miles according to the specifications set out in the August edition of Canadian Aviation. I would like to ask the minister to tell us how many times this plane has run out of gas and how many crashes have been caused because it could not get back to base and there was no other plane in the sky to refuel it. Surely before the minister plows ahead spending the taxpayers' money he should take a second look now that the United States has so coldly turned down this plane.

The article continues:

> There are of course some disadvantages. For example, the limited range of the F-5 is only partly compensated by inflight refueling facilities.

Remember, this is an article very much in favour of this plane, an article intended to convince the public that this is the plane Canada should be buying. Even so it contains an admission that there are some drawbacks. After listening to the minister's explanation last evening I suppose we should all be thoroughly convinced that this is the perfect plane in every way.

The second question which the defence committee should study is the whole matter of the purchase of these planes at a cost of some $215 million. We do not even know whether this will be the final price because the minister spoke of many modifications which would be incorporated during the manufacture of this aircraft. At no time did he say the cost would not escalate.

I should like the minister to tell us before this estimate passes that the whole nuclear question, in addition to the purchase of the F-5, will be referred to the Committee on Defence. We have seen in this country on past occasions vast expenditures incurred for military equipment only to find that a year or two later the equipment had to be scrapped and that the money had been wasted. This is precisely what is pointed out in the article I have before me. It says:

> The pocketbook of the longsuffering taxpayer who in the past has often shelled out money for military hardware of doubtful utility must be spared as much as possible when a modern weapons system is being purchased.

This is the whole basis of our argument with regard to this aircraft. This is why I say the minister should in fairness to himself and to the public allow the Defence Committee to study this question. The Defence Committee should call in experts from the United States

Air Force so they can explain why that plane did not suit them, why a plane which was not suitable for them in Viet Nam would nevertheless be suitable for the Canadian air force. The least the minister could do would be to refer these important questions to the Defence Committee which has been given such a high rating by many newspapermen as a body that is doing great work. If the committee were given these questions to consider it could, I am certain, do a lot of good for the Canadian taxpayer and perhaps in the long run for the defence of Canada as well.

Item agreed to.

Defence Services—

15. Operation and maintenance and construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment for the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army, and the Royal Canadian Air Force and $1,850,000 for grants to the town of Oromocto, $1,382,244,000.

Mr. Lambert: There are just a few remarks I should like to put on the record together with some figures in connection with purchases of major equipment and the funds provided for this purpose.

We have heard some stories about the trend in the procurement of major equipment for the forces. The minister has told us he is greatly worried about this trend. He is not the first minister to be concerned about it. As a matter of fact, when I went to the Department of National Defence in 1957 this question was exercising the minds of the then minister and of his advisers, the continuing fall in the percentage of moneys which could be allocated to the purchase of new equipment.

I believe the minister was a member of the Defence Committee in 1960 when the minister of defence of that day indicated that, if a sharp reversal did not take place in the foreseeable future, between 1970 and 1975 there would not be one dollar left with which to buy equipment. People worked on this problem. Any effort the minister can make toward this end will, of course, gain him the commendation of the house. But let us not leave anyone under the impression that this is a new-found principle.

Let us examine the figures. I base my comments on the items in the estimates of the present year and past years. In the year 1962-63 the sum of $309,581,627, was spent by the three services on construction and the procurement of major equipment. In 1963-64 the amount was $282,448,395. In the estimates for 1964-65, really the first estimates which the present minister has had completely under his control the amount available was down to $225,838,000.

In 1965-66, although the expenditure forecast was just under $140 million for the R.C.A.F. the amount actually spent was something less than $88 million, and while the total forecast expenditures amounted to $263,135,000 a study of the actual expenditures shows that only $211,146,000 was spent. The estimates for 1966-67—I beg the indulgence of the committee for going into the next estimates—show a forecast of $297,631,000.

These figures show that in 1962-63, when we had a dollar worth at least 10 per cent more than it is now, we spent more money on major procurement for the forces. By and large I would say that the construction side was about the same. I note there is some $26½ million in construction this year. The minister should tell us what the main projects are on which money has been or is being spent in the year 1965-66. The figures are $71,500,000 for the navy, $52,200,000 for the army and $87,446,000 for the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Hellyer: With respect to procurement for the navy some of the major equipment items involved the construction carried on of the Mackenzie class ships, the St. Laurent class conversions, the Restigouche class conversions, advance equipment for the refit of H.M.C.S. Bonaventure, conventional submarines, some advance expenditures on the DDH destroyer helicopters, drawings and engineering testing, mechanical and engineering equipment, some small boats and miscellaneous.

Mr. Lambert: With regard to aircraft there is $21 million listed.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes. That is practically all for helicopters, the CHSS-2 which is being operated from the ships and which is part of the weapons system.

Mr. Lambert: Does this represent the Voyageur or are the Voyageur and the Buffalo in the future?

Mr. Hellyer: This item does not include the Voyageur or the Buffalo.

Mr. McCleave: I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of extensive remarks he made regarding minesweeping, as recorded on pages 1562 and 1563 of yesterday's Hansard. I take it that what the minister was saying was that the minesweepers which the navy possesses would be too costly to refit for modern minesweeping due to the new type of mines being developed. I also gather from what he said that a Pearl Harbour type of war outbreak is considered unlikely by the department. At least, he stated:

> The probability of a conflict in which a potential enemy would mine Canadian coastal waters is extremely remote. Certainly a potential enemy would have to weigh the consequences of any such overt action and it seems very unlikely that he would risk all-out war through such an act.

One could debate that statement but all I wish to do is to ask whether there is any equipment available to the navy by which mines, if found, could be removed from coastal waters?

Mr. Hellyer: At the moment we do not have any minesweeping capability for the reasons I gave. It is true to say that conditions could arise where we might need minesweeping capability but the probability is extremely low. All of our expenditures and roles are chosen on the basis of probability. It is just like taking out insurance of any kind. You have to insure againt the greatest risk and this involves a matter of judgment. Although there is not unanimity, in the judgment of the majority of the people who have studied these matters the probability is rather low. The hon. gentleman is quite right that the ships we now have in reserve would require extensive alterations in order to sweep modern mines but it is not felt that the probability is sufficiently high to justify the expenditure.

As I indicated, we have asked for another study to make sure there is no significant change in thinking since that decision was made. For example, some experiments have been carried out in sweeping mines with helicopters. Is this a real possibility? I cannot tell my hon. friend whether or not it is effective because I have not got the information on which to base a reply. But I know some experiments were carried out and we are examining the matter to see what new techniques have been devised.

Mr. Crouse: I should like to direct a brief question to the minister. I am not certain if the subject comes under this item and if it does not perhaps he can direct me to the correct item. It deals with the movement of the Albro Lake signal station from Dartmouth to Mill Cove in Lunenburg County. When the Conservative government was in power it was decided to move this station due to the fact that there was too much interference with the signal in the Dartmouth area. In the past year progress has been rather slow in this matter and I would ask the minister whether the transfer has now been completed, what is the total amount of money his department intends to spend in this area, the approximate date when construction will be completed, and when the final movement will be made from Albro Lake to Mill Cove?

Mr. Hellyer: I shall try to get that information and give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Starr: Is the minister prepared to give answers to the questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to cars in Ottawa?

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: We are trying to get the information on that. The Leader of the Opposition also asked for the names of the servicemen who were retired and who were referred to in the Auditor General's report. These are Wing Commander W. G. Taylor, Flight Sergeant J. C. Baker, Lieutenant Colonel W. M. Alton, Major R. W. Hampton, Sergeant D. W. Hopkinson and Flight Sergeant C. F. Page. These six persons involved were recruited in the non-permanent active militia in the ranks between 1926 and 1933 when Kings Regulations and Orders for the Canadian Militia, 1926, authorized enlistment of boys between 14 and 18 years of age and in special cases at the age of 13. In the cases in question the fact that the men served in the militia during the periods claimed, in other words, that they were in fact enrolled under age, was supported by statutory declarations from the contributors themselves and in each case from independent persons who also signed statutory declarations to the same effect.

There is one other bit of information on this same subject. As hon. gentlemen probably know, until 1947 one-half of militia service could be counted for retirement purposes. The law was changed, I think in 1947, to reduce that to one-quarter of militia service that could be counted. The member of the armed forces might elect to count the service within one year of becoming a contributor under the Act.

Mr. Fairweather: In other words, what the minister is saying, on the basis of the Auditor General's report, is that some people whom he has named and whose names I will not repeat in effect have committed perjury. I am wondering whether procedures are going to be taken under the Criminal Code. Will action be taken against the persons involved?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, in fact these persons enlisted under age and they did serve and therefore they are entitled to the benefits under the law. I think if my hon. friend were to check the records of all the people who served in world war I and world war II and in between he would find a rather large number of people who enlisted under age by one means or another. Although one might raise a question in respect of this, I think it was almost common practice with young men who wanted to get into the services.

Mr. Fairweather: As one who enlisted at age 17, and there was some collusion about it, I know whereof the minister speaks but I did not attempt it at age 9, 10 or 11. That is what I am referring to. The Auditor General refers to people of that age. I do not think anyone worries about the year.

Mr. Hellyer: Did the hon. member get the point that at the time they were enlisted they were entitled to enlist at 13?

Mr. Fairweather: The Auditor General speaks of nine-year-olds. Some of us were fairly sizeable people at 13 but I am not sure how many people could serve Canada well at nine years of age.

Mr. Hellyer: I suspect, that like the hon. member and myself they must have been big boys.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I have a question I should like to ask the minister relating to the R.C.A.F. airbase at Penhold, Alberta. At present this base is being held on a maintenance status only until its role in the new training program is determined and it has been so held since the time of the actual abolition of the jet flying training program.

Can the minister inform us whether the department has decided to turn over the actual runways and related flying facilities to the Department of Transport, with the intention of providing much needed and urgently demanded municipal airport facilities? If this is so, until the negotiations between the city of Red Deer and the department are completed would it be possible to use the runways for civilian planes inasmuch as it will perhaps be some time before the negotiations between the Department of Transport and the city are completed.

Mr. Hellyer: I think the situation is that we would be willing to turn over the runways to either the Department of Transport or the city or the two together if they were interested in entering into some kind of joint arrangement. In so far as interim use is concerned between now and the time agreement can be reached, provided we still have personnel available there I would be willing to take this question as notice to see whether it would be possible to extend the use of the airfield for civilian purposes.

Mr. Thompson: The minister says he will be willing to turn over to either the Department of Transport or the local authorities the runways and facilities. Has there been any formal notice given to the Department of Transport of the department's willingness to do this?

Mr. Hellyer: I cannot say whether or not it is formal but certainly there have been informal discussions to this effect. I cannot say whether any paper has passed between the two departments but in fact the airfield is available to the Department of Transport if they wish to take over and operate it.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to return to the question of the six persons whom the minister named in response to the question concerning the Auditor General's report. Will the minister inform us as to the age on enlistment of each one of these persons and the length of their service in the militia and in the regular army?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not have that information readily available but I would be more than happy to provide it either at a later time or obtain it and make it available to my hon. friend if he would agree to that.

Mr. Churchill: Could we not have the name of the person whose enlistment dates back to age nine?

Mr. Hellyer: I am not sure which one it is offhand but I will find out.

Mr. Churchill: Why can we not find out right now? This was in the Auditor General's report and it appeared in the papers and was raised in the house several weeks ago. It was specifically asked for by the Leader of the Opposition. Surely we can have the answer immediately instead of being left with the answer that we will receive the information in some roundabout way at some indefinite time. Let us have the full facts instead of the flippant answer the minister gave the hon. member for Royal that perhaps some of them were big boys. Let us pin it down specifically. The Auditor General has specifically mentioned these persons. Are we to neglect his report? I say no. Let us have the information.

The Chairman: Shall item 15 carry?

Mr. Churchill: If we are not going to have the information I suggest that the item stand until we get the information.

Mr. Starr: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that surely the minister and those in the department, having read the Auditor General's report, would have looked up this particular case to satisfy themselves that the Auditor General had a case that was legitimate, because he did bring it out very forcefully. The minister cannot say that they do not have this information. If they do not have it then there certainly is some neglect on the part of somebody in not looking up this particular case to see whether the Auditor General's criticism is legitimate.

Mr. Hellyer: I think the information is available. We just do not happen to have it with us at the moment. The case was checked out, as my hon. friend would expect in the circumstances.

Mr. Starr: Then I would suggest in the circumstances that we stand the item and go on with others in the hope that before we pass the item the information will be forthcoming.

Mr. Hellyer: I would be agreeable, Mr. Chairman.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to support the remarks of the previous speaker. Strangely enough, this one item has captured the public's imagination more than information in respect of weapons and that sort of thing. This item is in the same category as horses on the payroll. I think we should stand this item so we can have an explanation placed on the record. This is a most intriguing thing.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister has agreed that this item should stand and that we go on to the others so that we can receive some information about this situation before passing the specific item.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to a matter which I believe comes under the purview of the Associate Minister rather than the minister and has to do with the land expropriation currently being carried out by the department in the vicinity of Camp Valcartier.

[Mr. Churchill.]

I raised this matter yesterday on the assumption that the minister or his associate would make at least some passing reference to it in reply. I note that the estimates allocate only $100,000 for the acquisition of real property so I assume there is no item in this year's estimates to cover the cost of this specific land acquisition. Nevertheless negotiations are now being carried on and this raises at least one or two questions which I think the minister should attempt to answer. First, is it absolutely necessary that the land of a large number of people be expropriated in order to expand the area of an army camp when there seems to be alternative unsettled land in close proximity to the army camp that could be utilized for this purpose? Apparently the area contemplated for expropriation includes a 150 year old village and a large number of residences.

The other specific point on which I should like the minister to comment has to do with the involvement of an army officer in the negotiations regarding the acquisition of this land. It seems very strange indeed that an army officer should be involved in something that is almost completely a matter for the civil authorities to look after. Would the minister make some comment in this regard?

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, this whole matter of expropriation under way at Valcartier has been considered at length, first by the civil personnel and later by the general manager of properties of the Department of National Defence.

There have been recommendations to expropriate an area of about 60 square miles. After the limits were considered, we received protests from this community called Shannon, which is described in our services not as a village but as a group of small properties comprising approximately 25 families. We considered, at that time, the possibility of doing without, if you want, that part of the land proposed in the acquisition. Once again, the general manager of properties went back to the site so as to conduct an investigation. Further to this investigation, we asked the military authorities to explain to us why this area should be included in the group of properties to be acquired. They explained to us that if those people—and that is when the phrase "Shannon Corridor" was used—it was not meant as a joke—

[English]

It was not meant as a joke.

—This was a military expression to show that if these people were not relocated, they would be in a danger zone when there was long-range mortar, arms and cannon fire practice.

Now, in accordance with the recommendations of civilian personnel and of the director general of properties, and after representations of our officers, we do not believe this community can be kept in that spot because it is dangerous.

On the other hand, we are ready to consider any suggestion.

When the hon. member says there are some lots near by that we could use, he forgets that in all this, the enlargement of Camp Valcartier must be so arranged as to form a whole area for practice and exercise of our soldiers with long-range arms.

I am sure that neither the minister nor I would be unwilling to consider any suggestion which might satisfy the people of Shannon.

As far as I remember, it is quite correct to say that to date, a preliminary investigation has been held and that following representations a second one was launched. During the second one, the military were asked to explain why they needed these pieces of land. It was then, perhaps, that the hon. member found that the military had inquired not into the advisability of expropriation, but into the necessity for them to include those grounds in the expropriated area because they lay within the danger zone.

I trust these explanations will satisfy the hon. members. I am sure no doors have been closed; in fact we are willing to consider any suggestion which might be made. I feel the crux of the matter lies in that it is dangerous for the people of Shannon to stay in the firing area.

I am willing to obtain once more detailed information and pass it on to the hon. member as soon as I have it. I am also willing to study how best we can reconcile the interests of the Department of National Defence and of the people concerned.

[English]

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I accept the minister's reply in the spirit in which it was offered but I have a specific follow-up question. Is it correct to say that negotiations are still continuing with the property holders in the area and that the land is still registered in their names, that is to say, that the land is not yet vested in the Crown?

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I understand that when expropriation was decided on, these properties were included in the expropriation and that, consequently, they are expropriated.

Negotiations are currently in progress between representatives of the Department of National Defence and the persons involved with a view to reaching an agreement and setting a price. I believe that is the situation.

[English]

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, that is a very interesting point. I am not sure what the past procedures are that have been followed by this department but I am disappointed that a procedure is not being followed by which negotiation with the owners as to price could take place first. Apparently the department has filed a plan of expropriation in the land titles office and subsequently commenced negotiations with these owners. It seems to me that a genuine attempt should have been made to negotiate price and reach a settlement before any resort to expropriation took place.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, that procedure is used for a very simple reason: in such cases, speculation must be avoided. If the Department of National Defence were to announce in advance that 60 square miles of land are to be expropriated and then tried to negotiate prices before filing its expropriation plan, prices would go up of course and expropriation would no longer be possible.

But I feel one must presume that the Department of National Defence is not out to rob property owners by offering unacceptable prices. That is the first thing one must accept, in my opinion.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask one or two questions on the same topic. For what type of range practice is this extra land required?

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I thought then that it was for the training of a battalion with long range modern equipment including long range mortars.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: Let us not talk about long-range equipment or long-range mortars. What is the range of these weapons? That is what I want to know. Give me the exact range.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: As my hon. friend well knows from having been minister of national defence at one time, the exact ranges of these weapons are not given.

Mr. Churchill: Then could we have the approximate range?

Mr. Hellyer: I think the hon. gentleman would have to be more specific. A wide range of equipment is used at Valcartier and would require different areas of territory. But the amount of land that has been acquired or is in the process of being acquired is adequate to provide battalion exercises, including those for armoured vehicles if required, and has ranges adequate for mortars and so on.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Springfield and others who have participated in the discussion have got the minister to indicate to us now that the land has already been expropriated and the question of the price people are to receive for their buildings and farms is under negotiation. We have had information that these 25 families have been informed they will be in a danger zone because long-range weapons of some sort or other are going to be used for practice purposes.

Therefore a shotgun has been placed at the heads of these people. They are told, "You are now in a danger zone; it is too bad but in order to protect your safety it would be advisable for you to move". This is a scandalous thing to do. Twenty-five families whose ancestors have been living in this area for 150 years are suddenly to be moved by arbitrary action on the part of the Department of National Defence.

I think this action should cease immediately and for several reasons. I shall give two. One is that Camp Valcartier has been in use ever since the days of Sir Sam Hughes whose actions are now being emulated by this minister. It was found to be satisfactory in the years of the first world war for the setting up of musketry ranges for the first contingent and ever since then it has been found to be suitable. If additional land is required for range practice for rifles, machine guns, mortars or artillery it should be found elsewhere and not at the expense of these 25 families. What is going on in this area? Why is there this disregard of families? There is a callous indifference on the part of these two ministers.

Neither of these two ministers has said he has visited the area. They have reported that an investigation was made by civilian personnel of the Department of National Defence and then the military side said, "Well, for range purposes the village and the farm homes will be in a danger area so you should do something about it". Consequently the families are now likely to be dispossessed.

I think this is a shocking piece of bungling on the part of the Department of National Defence. It just happens that most of these people are Irish. I am part Irish and I should like to say something for the Irish, as I did for the Toronto Irish militia regiment which was disbanded some time ago. What has the minister got against the Irish? They are the best fighters in the world, and he knows it.

In these circumstances we are going to dispossess people who have been established for 150 years in this area. The reason given is that more space is required for an army camp. If there is one country in the world that has a vast amount of uninhabited land suitable for army purposes it is Canada. The camps I have visited in this country have all been desert areas, sandy and bare, and there are hundreds more like them available.

If the minister wants the troops to try out long-range mortars, whose range he will not divulge because the Russians might find out, let him pick some other spot and let Valcartier be used as it has been over the years for basic training and musketry practice. Why dispossess 25 families in this way? This is a roundabout way of doing it. The department says, "You are now in a danger area; we are so sorry but you have to move". The property has already been expropriated. Why was this information not divulged earlier?

Where were the minister's study groups? Did he receive advice from his senior officers with regard to this matter or is this just another example of his autocratic methods? I say to the minister that he should cancel this program immediately and save these 25 families.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be vindictive in this matter but when the Associate Minister said the reason for expropriation action being taken first and negotiation coming next was the fear of speculation in land I feel this is a very common excuse given by governments when they resort to this kind of procedure in order to acquire properties. Provincial governments through the years have had to expropriate and acquire property for a variety of purposes. Until now the practice followed in most cases has been that they have attempted to acquire these properties through negotiation and only if negotiation reached stalemate did they resort to expropriation.

I suggest to the minister that the real reason they have acquired the property in this way is that it is more convenient from an administrative point of view. It is a rather sad commentary on the action of his department that they should have taken this rather highhanded approach in dealing with a number of small property holders in this particular area of the province of Quebec. I am not aware of any ethnic overtones to this problem but I suggest to the minister that in future when the department has to deal with a number of small property holders it should adopt an approach that is more considerate of the property rights of citizens of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I think the government should reconsider this matter. This is a totally unjustified action and has all the earmarks of administrative lawlessness and contempt for the rights of the individual. No amount of excuse can justify the situation created as the result of an arbitrary act by the Department of National Defence. I shall quote some of the observations made in respect of this matter. Is there no heart in the Department of National Defence? This particular area has been occupied for generations. Exception has been made in the case of two or three property owners in the area who have been advised that their property will not be expropriated. I want information on this question. Let me read from the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph, which is not a paper that indulges in sensationalism. This is a shocking disregard of individual rights. The article in the newspaper reads:

> The blow fell last autumn.
> An emissary of the federal government journeyed to Shannon where he calmly announced that the government had decided to annex most of Shannon —the 6th, 7th, and 8th concessions—to Camp Valcartier which now straddles the southeast corner of the village.
> Soon after, expropriation notices were posted. Some 10,000 acres are involved in the impending expropriation—
> Next came copies of a form letter which were pushed in mailboxes. They were signed by Brigadier R. H. Lahaie, commander, Eastern Quebec area.

What a nice cozy letter this is. Let me just read what it said:

> During the past two months you have read or heard of the plans for the enlargement of Camp Valcartier and it is natural that people who live in the area around the Camp or who own land in the vicinity will seek information on such matters as the need to move or reinvest their money in other lands or enterprises.

What a cozy, kind way to deal with this matter. The department said in effect, "You have been here for generations" and instead of saying that these people could get out in a certain way they said, "All we want is that you move".

• (6:00 p.m.)

> As a former holder of an interest in land and buildings, you will receive a sum of money—

Then the article continues:

> But this is cold comfort to the Mooneys, Conways, Bowleses, Griffins and Campbells who are now faced with the prospect of pulling up roots put down generations ago.

Then the article gives the observations of some of these people. Surely we are not going to have another Acadian exodus. This is utterly unjustified, and there is no suggestion it can be justified. What is going on here? What are the rights of the people? This great Department of National Defence says, "Get out of here". Families who have not got the best land in the world but have lived there for generations are to be uprooted.

Here are some of the observations of some of the people. John Griffin says:

> I quit school at 13 to help my parents on the farm. This is all the work I know. We made a comfortable enough living, but what shall I do now? Become a labourer?

Surely there is not an adamant attitude, a cold, aloof and unjust attitude in this department. The brigadier's letter simply says, "Begone". Let me read what John Griffin goes on to say:

> There are far worse cases. Most of the people who are going to be turned out are middle aged. They are too old to learn anything and the uprooting is bound to have a bad effect upon them.

The article continues:

> What amazes Griffin is that the federal government decided to take over their land in peacetime. He remembers the time—in 1914—when several families in Shannon were forced to leave their holdings. There was no protest then, for a war was on.
> But why in heaven's name do they want to push us around in peacetime, he asks?

The expression is certainly one that is understandable, pushing around Canadians simply because a group has decided that it is in their interests to secure this land. How many members of this house would stand for that?

The Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), Agriculture—Quebec suggestions on crop insurance; the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Schreyer), Labour Relations—Whiteshell, Man.—strike at nuclear research station; the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), Finance—U.S. tax on rapeseed oil and meal.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

INTERPROVINCIAL PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wahn for the second reading of Bill No. S-10, respecting Interprovincial Pipe Line Company.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, the last time this matter was before the house I was pointing out the problem members faced in dealing with this kind of amendment because of the information available to us as to the splitting of this stock. I should like to refer to several instances where something has been said about this stock on previous occasions. I had an opportunity of looking at the Financial Post survey of oil stocks for 1965. I find that this survey contains the history of this company. Briefly, the company was set up by an act of parliament in 1949 when it was established to transport oil. By 1964 the company had something like 3,475 miles of pipe line in its system. The history of the company indicates that the capital stock authorized was 40 million shares with a total issue value of $5,087,282 and a par value of $5 per share.

The original capitalization of this company in 1949, however, was on a $50 per share basis. In 1952 the shareholders approved a 10 for 1 split and the stock was changed from a par value of $50 to a par value of $5. It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that the reason for reducing the price of this stock is twofold. Mr. Burgess, Q.C., representing the company in the other place, outlined the two reasons. First, he said—

Mr. Choquette: Carried.

Mr. Peters: Where are you going to carry it? Since "carrying it" in a pipe line means moving it from one place to another, I suppose if the hon. member wants that to be considered as his contribution to this debate that is probably all right. I should like to quote what Mr. Burgess said before the Senate Committee:

> I think the primary consideration of the board of directors of a Canadian company of this nature is to broaden the base of their stockholdings, in particular to broaden the base of their stockholdings in Canada. This serves an extremely useful purpose in that for the benefit of your existing shareholders as well as for the benefit of others who might wish to buy into the company, you get a much narrower market on your stock.

This may be so.

> When your stock is at a price up in the eighties or nineties it is a rich man's stock and many investment syndicates and people like that buy it, but the man in the street is not going to buy very much. You get a buy order that can be a major investment fund or something of that nature, and the stock market accelerates because they are buying stock on what their financial experts have told them. They want the stock then; they buy it; and the price escalates.

He goes on later to point out the second reason, and it is of interest to note that the second reason has now become the prime reason for the stock split. The company is attempting to make this stock available to its employees. He goes on to say there has been a vote taken on this matter and that 90 per cent of the employees voted in favour of question No. 1 and 78.7 per cent voted in favour of the second question. The first question reads as follows:

> Would it be more attractive to you as an avenue of investment of your plan savings if the stock were subdivided on a 5 for 1 basis, so that each new share would have a market value of approximately $18?

The answer was yes by 90 per cent.

• (6:10 p.m.)

The second question was:

> If you presently allocate your plan savings to cash savings, or are contemplating doing so some time in the future, would the lower unit price of the Company stock encourage you to change your allocation from cash savings to the purchase of Company stock?

In answer to that question 78.7 per cent of the employees said yes, which indicates that the rest of them were really less interested in a change.

I have already pointed out that this company has a capitalization of 40 million shares. Only five million of these shares are presently on the market. Therefore the question immediately comes to my mind: What does this company want to do? Most companies would reply that they want to expand and need more capital. In this particular case it is my guess that the company does not want or need a capitalization of 200 million shares, which it has indicated the new split will create. For this reason I intend to move an amendment which I think will probably be acceptable, if I understand correctly the company's proposition; and I am sure that the sponsor of the bill will be willing to accept this suggestion.

There is a second consideration which must be raised at this time. If it is a good thing to bring the value of this stock down to $18 and if that is the purpose of the bill, I suggest it would be much better to bring the value down to $1.80. I can find many people in Canada who would be even more willing to buy the stock if it was 18 cents a share. I would suggest 18 cents is not unreasonable for a company with a capitalization of 200 million shares. This would still produce a very large sum of money. I think that this company is as phony as a $3 bill. This is the way the Imperial Oil Company writes off some of its expenditures and handles the distribution of its dividends.

Let those who deal on the stock market consider this proposition. In 1949 you buy a $50 share and all you do with it is collect the dividend. Last year you will find this company paying a dividend of $3.40 per share which on a $50 share would produce $34. I see people looking amazed but that is a fact. In 1953 this stock was split ten for one which would multiply your original investment by ten. Therefore, instead of receiving $3.40 you would receive $34 on your investment of $50. That is why I wonder that anybody wants to upset this balance. This stock is an excellent investment and continues to be so.

One of the questions for the shareholders is what the company will do with the stock left over in the treasury which in this case will amount to something like 175 million shares undistributed. Is some of that stock going to be distributed? If that is the case this will reduce the price and it will again become a good market proposition. If that is not the case it will mean that there will be a dividend of 70 cents on the stock next year. On a $50 investment this will produce $70 by way of dividend. That is a fairly substantial type of stock to purchase, I suggest.

I suggest that there would be something wrong with us if we passed this bill without giving a great deal of consideration to what stock splitting does in general and what it will do in this instance. I suggest that members of parliament should examine any proposition which will produce a larger dividend each year than the original investment. This is an exceptional sort of proposition. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott):

That clause 1 of Bill S-10 be amended by deleting in line 10 thereof the words "and unissued".

The clause would then read:

Notwithstanding anything contained in section 3 of chapter 34 of the statutes of 1949 (1st session), as amended by chapter 66 of the statutes of 1952-53, each of the issued shares of the capital stock of the Company of the par value of five dollars is hereby subdivided—

And so on. I would recommend—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

I am wondering whether any hon. members have any comments to make on this amendment. Perhaps it is unnecessary because the amendment is obviously out of order. If the hon. member will refer to citation 389 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, he will find the following:

A motion opposing the second reading of a Bill must not anticipate amendments which may be moved in Committee.

The hon. member may move an amendment relating to the principle of the bill before us but he cannot move an amendment which refers to a particular clause at this stage of the proceedings. So, with respect, I suggest to the hon. member that the amendment he proposes is premature and for this reason it cannot be accepted by the Chair.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I would rather you had ruled it out because I had not changed the principle. I was of the opinion that I was changing the principle of the bill.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I would say at the outset that this is not the first time this bill has been presented to the house.

An hon. Member: Nor the last.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): As someone says, perhaps it will not be the last; that may be true.

I would not want to be accused of holding up this matter. I am seeking only information and clarification. It is an interesting bill with an interesting principle involved, namely, the selling of shares and whether or not stock splitting really helps the small investor. The shares are selling at nearly $90 and the proposed split would bring the shares down to something in the neighbourhood of $18. We have recently been told that this will make shares much more readily available to small investors.

Yet when the question was asked some years ago before the Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines Committee how many shares are bought at one time, a representative of the company replied, "Well, perhaps 100 or maybe as low as 50". There is the crux of the matter. Anybody who is going to buy 100 shares of this company at $90 a share would have to have $9,000. Surely the stock exchange is geared to accept smaller amounts of money. Surely the stock exchange is geared to accept purchases of many fewer shares than 100 at one time. I suggest there is ample evidence which could be put before a committee or before this house that this is the fact. The stock exchange is geared to accept smaller amounts of money than $9,000 or $5,000; in fact, it will accept amounts as low as $1,000. One thousand dollars will buy in the neighbourhood of 50 shares.

I asked a number of questions of the president and chairman of the board of the company who appeared before the committee and I tried to ascertain whether the company had the interest of the small investor at heart or if it had the interest of the company and those who held large numbers of shares in it at heart. I am not anti-big business, Mr. Chairman. I am not anti-anything really.

An hon. Member: What about being anti-Liberal?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is a very difficult question to answer because I do not know where they stand on any subject.

What I am trying to project and work toward is the bettering of conditions for as many people as possible. This company is operating at nearly 100 per cent capacity. In other words, there is a transmission line from western to eastern Canada transporting oil under near monopoly conditions and at nearly 100 per cent capacity. It is an ideal company operating under ideal conditions.

The question is, where is the interest in the purchasing of this company's shares? That question was asked before the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. Much to my surprise the answer was, "Well, recent purchases of the company's shares have been by unions with a surplus of money, private pension plans with money to invest in a solid investment and organizations like that". There was no evidence before that committee that small investors wanted to buy the shares of this company. In fact, the evidence before the committee was that the opposite was true.

Unions and pension plans with large sums of money were looking for solid, sound investments and they chose this company. I say that the opposite is true with regard to the small investor who is looking for penny shares from which he hopes to make a fortune. In other words, the small investor is looking for a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. He is prepared to speculate with very little money in the hope that he will strike it rich. Persons investing in this compay are not of this type. This company, operating under a monopoly and with its transmission costs and transmission prices evaluated by the National Energy Board, is of such a nature that it does not make an exorbitant profit but on the other hand it does not lose money. In other words, this company has a sure thing. It is a solid investment. Any solid, sound investment has a tendency to entice large amounts of money from investors looking for a sure return.

I say, therefore, to the mover of the bill that whatever committee of the house this matter goes before, and I am not sure which committee it will be, the Interprovincial Pipe Line people should come before that committee prepared to support their claim that there is a real need to split these shares so as to allow the average or small Canadian investor to buy them. The words "average Canadian investors" were used in connection with this measure although two years ago I believe the words used were "small Canadian investors".

What are the facts about this particular company? Imperial Oil owns something like 25 per cent of it, and Shell and British American lesser amounts. We are told that wherever you have share splitting you have an increase in the number of shareholders. However, in 1952 or 1954, when shares of this company were around $30, the company had something like 8,000 shareholders. I recall these figures from evidence given before the committee. At the price of $30 a share, was there a tremendous influx of investors? The answer is no, Mr. Chairman. From where did the influx of money come? Again, large amounts of money were invested by oil companies, pipe line suppliers, union funds, pension plans and so on until there were something like 12,000 shareholders while today the number has increased to approximately 14,000.

There has been no overwhelming evidence to show that the small investor is being kept out. If he is being kept out today, apparently he was kept out when the share value was around the $30 mark because the small investor was not interested then either. This is the crux of the problem. What are the fears beside the fear that the small Canadian investor is being kept out? One of the fears I have is that where shares are split it is often done to enhance the value of existing shares and to increase shareholders' profits. This view may be unfounded. I know that big business splits shares all the time but it just happens that this company is in the unfortunate position of having to come to parliament for the privilege of splitting its shares.

This is a company which transmits oil across a provincial boundary. Therefore its application must come before parliament and it should come before parliament. It has been given a monopoly by parliament and it is only right it should explain to us whether it is trying to enhance its own position or whether it is allowing more Canadians to participate in its profits.

Consider the number of shares which have been issued. I understand that there are some 40 million shares in the treasury of which little more than 5 million have been issued. The sponsor of the bill can correct me if I am wrong; I speak from memory. Does the company intend to issue more shares? No. The intention is to keep 35 million shares in the treasury. They want to multiply these by five which will give them 175 million shares tucked away in a sock for a rainy day. This is how it appears to me as one who is perhaps an uneducated investor. I do not need to say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a nice reserve to have in case another transmission line should be built or in case we run out of oil in western Canada and can no longer transport any to eastern Canada through this line.

I support the idea which the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) sought to put forward in his proposed amendment. The company is asking for permission to split these shares. Why split the unissued shares? What is the necessity for that? The officials said when they appeared before the committee that they did not intend to issue any more shares. The only purpose which would be served by splitting the unissued shares would be, so far as I can see, to build up tremendous investment support.

Look at the issued shares. What happens to them? They are split five for one and their price goes down to $18. The thought is often expressed that in cases like this, when we are dealing with a guaranteed monopoly, a company operating at almost 100 per cent of capacity, the value of these shares will not remain at $18 for very long. They will start to climb. Who will benefit then? The present owners or shareholders. The president of the company has something like 3,500 shares in his personal account. That is a nice amount. If they go up $5 a share the expenses of putting this bill through parliament will have been paid.

Imperial Oil, which owns close to 25 per cent of the shares, would have no objection to splitting the stock because 25 per cent of 5 million shares would amount to 125,000 shares. There is something wrong with my arithmetic. It would amount to 1,250,000.

An hon. Member: What's a million?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It is a lot of money to me and I am sure Imperial Oil would be interested in it too. They would have no objection because any slight movement in the value of these shares would enhance their position tremendously. I am being frank in this regard. I do not doubt for one moment that the bill will go to the committee. I am putting my fears on record so that when we get to the committee the company can bring ample evidence to set my fears at rest. If they can convince me that my fears are unfounded, that Imperial Oil will not enhance its position, that the other big investing companies will not enhance their positions, I may take a different view.

We were told there were more than 37 shareholders holding more than 10,000 shares. But we were not told now many people hold fewer than 37 shares. This is the figure in which I am interested because the whole purpose of this move is surely to allow the small man, the average investor, to buy these shares. We should have been told how many little fellows hold shares in this company. Had this been done we would have been able to judge more easily whether or not by passing this bill the small investor would continue to be excluded from its benefits. This is evidence which I should like the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company to bring before the committee.

People have said to me: This is a common practice in big business, the bill should be passed rapidly, you are only showing your ignorance by attempting to get information about it. Well, I do not take my duties in this house so lightly. This company has a monopoly. I think parliament should examine this monopoly to see whether it is operating with the intent to benefit as many Canadians as possible.

It is all very well for the mover of the bill to say, as has been said on other occasions, that 80 per cent of the shares are held by Canadians. Again I am using a rough figure; I may be out by 10 per cent. But here is the point: The companies which own the shares are in effect United States companies. Imperial Oil is a United States company. Let us not fool ourselves. We call it "Imperial Oil of Canada" but the recent guide lines set by the United States demonstrate clearly just who owns the so-called Canadian companies. Parent companies restrict and control the so-called Canadian companies. So let us not be fooled by statements that 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the shares of this company are held by Canadian companies. It is not so. Imperial Oil, B.A. and Shell are particularly involved in this company. I think all of them are controlled by parent companies in the United States.

I am putting my fears before the house tonight. I hope that when the bill goes to the committee Interprovincial Pipe Line can bring evidence which will set these fears at rest. If they do I shall readily withdraw any objections I may have to the splitting of these shares.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) who has just concluded his remarks I find myself interested in the bill before us today. The hon. member spoke about dealing with this matter in committee. In this connection, while I do not quarrel with Your Honour's ruling with respect to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) I feel that the objective he sought to achieve had many laudable aspects. It is perhaps unfortunate that for technical reasons it could not be dealt with at this stage of the bill. Since the amendment could not be accepted, obviously we must deal with the bill as it has been presented to us.

• (6:40 p.m.)

I listened to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn) when he introduced the bill the other day and I was particularly interested in this statement, recorded on page 1263 of Hansard for February 15:

> The reasons for the stock split proposed are legitimate.

It has already become apparent that there are strong differences of view with respect to that statement. One of my colleagues suggest that if the hon. member had said the reasons were illegitimate it would have been a statement more closely in accord with the facts of the situation. However, we recognize the right of the hon. member to express his point of view and we have to assume that if he had not held that opinion he would not have introduced the bill. But if the hon. member has been deluded into thinking the reasons are legitimate there is no reason that the rest of us should accept his estimate of the situation. So far as I am concerned the reasons are completely illegitimate.

The purpose of this company in having this bill introduced, as has been the case in the past with this and other companies, is in effect an attempt to pull the wool over the eyes of members of the house and of the people of Canada with respect to the real purpose behind the idea of splitting the shares of its stock. In explaining the purpose of the bill the hon. member for St. Paul's said he would confine himself to a reference to the explanatory notes accompanying the bill. Therefore it is important that we consider exactly what those notes say. Reference has already been made to some portions of the explanatory notes, the first part of which reads:

> The purpose of this bill is to divide each of the 40,000,000 authorized shares of the par value of $5.00 each of the capital stock of the company into five shares of the par value of $1.00 each. This will not increase or alter the authorized capital of the company of two hundred million dollars.

From an examination of the bill I believe that first paragraph of the explanatory notes is a factual statement of what the bill in its detailed clauses seeks to accomplish. I have no quarrel with it up to that point. But then we come to the second paragraph where it says:

> The reason for the proposed subdivision is that the company considers it desirable that the average Canadian investor be encouraged and be given the maximum opportunity and incentive to invest in the equity of a successful and growing Canadian company.

Here we come to at least one point where the explanatory notes begin to depart from the real facts of the situation. The company may be successful in growing but the splitting of its shares will not give the maximum or any real opportunity to Canadian investors to invest in the company.

Reference has already been made to the fact that only a small proportion of the authorized shares has been issued. Reference has also been made to the fact that, unless there has been a change quite recently, the company has no intention of issuing additional shares in any substantial amount from its treasury. Reference has already been made to the fact that the bulk of the issued stock is held by certain large oil corporations.

In view of all this it becomes clear that the explanatory notes depart from the real facts of the situation. They go on to outline what is considered to be good, normal, corporate practice and the best principles with respect to share values. Then there is quite a long paragraph, in fact the most lengthy one in the notes, dealing with the company's generosity in providing an opportunity to its employees to acquire company stock.

When I read these explanatory notes I thought they had a very familiar ring. In fact I wonder whether somewhere somebody who is in the habit of drafting bills of this kind has a file labelled, "Explanatory Notes Re Pipe Line Company Shares." I say this because I recall that a number of years ago we had a similar bill dealing with the splitting of the shares of the Trans-Mountain Pipe Line Oil Company, with whose operations I am more familiar because its pipe line traverses part of the province in which I make my home. Unless I am very much mistaken the explanatory notes attached to that bill, which I believe was dealt with in 1955 or 1956, were identical in almost every respect with the explanatory notes attached to this bill.

With respect to that previous bill we discovered that the company had no intention of issuing any further shares from its treasury. In statements by the company they clearly said, "No, we have no such intention. We do not need capital for expansion raised by selling shares. We can do very nicely by the marketing of fixed interest bonds. We are quite happy to keep the share equity in the hands of those who now have the bulk of it. Not only from the point of view of the increase in dividends but from the point of view of the appreciated value of the stock we have no serious desire that our shares in any substantive number be spread among Canadian investors." As a matter of fact, during the particular session of which I am thinking Trans-Mountain was not allowed by parliament to split its shares, though it may have been able to do so successfully at a later date.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the reasons which were valid then against Trans-Mountain Pipeline Company splitting its shares apply with equal force to the proposal which Interprovincial Pipe Line Company is placing before us now. I think that the question of the validity of the arguments advanced for the splitting of shares in general has to be considered in a somewhat different light when we are considering a company which, as already has been pointed out, has in effect a form of transportation monopoly. We did have some discussion in the house recently on the question of the operation of another form of transportation monopoly which was granted certain special rights and privileges by parliament many years ago. I am referring, of course, to the privately owned Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I think that members who participated in that discussion and expressed concern about some of the activities of that corporation should perhaps bear that situation in mind when they consider the developing and increasingly important monopoly form of transportation that has come into being in more recent years in respect of the transportation of commodities by pipe lines.

The fact of the matter so far as I am concerned is that this form of transportation should be rightfully considered as a public utility for the movement of commodities which can be transported by this means to Canadian consumers at the least possible cost. We listened to the Minister of Transport outline in practical terms his concept of the important role that transportation plays in a country that extends for thousands of miles.

I submit that parliament committed a grievous error in allowing this kind of company to be incorporated as a private corporation in the first place and that there is no sense in our now compounding the original error of parliament by agreeing that these companies should be able by means of this kind successfully to exploit Canadians who are consumers of oil products to an even greater extent than they have been doing in the past.

I have listened to arguments which suggest that the pipe line companies are carriers. Some people argue they are public carriers. Some of them, I believe, are put in that classification officially and some of them may not be. The fact that the stock of this company was being quoted on the 12th of November at a market figure of $88 or $89 is an indication that under the terms and conditions under which this company has been allowed to operate its transportation monopoly its shares have risen and risen and risen and that the reason they have risen to this level is that this company and others like it in fact have been able to earn profits on a completely unrealistic and exorbitant basis in relation to services they are performing as a public utility.

I think these are the sort of considerations we should have in mind when companies like the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company, acting as fronts for the major foreign owners of oil interests in this country, come before parliament with these specious reasons and ask that their stocks be split.

It is, of course, legitimate for companies to be in a position where they earn fair and reasonable dividends on the risk capital they have put into a particular venture, but I submit that the members of this house, when this company was first incorporated, should have been, if they were not, fully aware of the fact that the risk capital involved in this company in the first place was not really being risked. In the second place, it represented only a fraction of the financing that was used and because of this situation this company ever since it came into being has been in a position to exploit the consuming public of Canada.

These are the considerations which some of us have in mind when we quarrel with the statement of the member who introduced this bill to the effect that the reasons proposed for splitting the shares of this company are legitimate. I say again, Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, that so far as I am concerned this proposal is not legitimate. It is phony and the house should refuse second reading of this bill without any further delay whatsoever. I feel that under the circumstances and in view of the —

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired and the hour assigned for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

The house will now resume the business interrupted at six o'clock.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

15. Operation and maintenance and construction or acquisition of building, works, land and major equipment for the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force and $1,850,000 for grants to the town of Oromocto, $1,382,244,000.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, we were expecting replies to some of the questions we asked with regard to the six cases in which men have been released on pension, and credited with full pensionable service with their enlistment ages put back to ages nine and, in five other cases, 11 and 12. I refer to the report of the Auditor General at pages 55 and 56. Perhaps the associate minister has that information for us now.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I do not have it; I presume the minister will be here any minute now.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I would object to the passing of this item before we receive this information. I had the opportunity, last Sunday, as I am sure other members of this house had, of watching a program which, incidentally, is not my favourite one, "This Hour Has 7 Days", but which presented a story of a woman whose husband, while in the process of his duty as a member of the armed forces making a trip between Ottawa and Toronto stopped to eat, as any sensible person might do, and was hit by a car and killed. This case has been before the pension board on many occasions during the past eight years. Yet that board in its wisdom, acting as my lawyer friends might do, has found reasons on every side of the argument to turn down an application for a pension. I find it difficult to understand how the pension board can be so tough in a case of that kind, while at the same time pensions are being given to people in the prime of their lives through the transparent gimmick of dating their enlistment ages as nine, 11 and 12. I am sure the minister with his tremendous staff could get information in respect of these retirement ages. If he cannot I suggest we ought not pass this item.

Now that the minister is here and before we pass this item I should like him to give this committee some information about the department's directorate of information services which, according to an answer given to a question posed by my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood, has a staff of 76. Why does the Department of National Defence need 76 people to staff the directorate of information services who are, in effect, public relations experts? Why does the department need public relations experts, other than for the obvious reason that the Minister of National Defence needs to build up his image so as to become the next leader of the Liberal party? He may be a very good leader of that party, but I do not think his ambitions in that regard should be assisted by the public treasury through the operation of this directorate of information services with a staff of 76. I think we should get some answers to the questions we have asked.

Mr. Woolliams: He has not answered any questions.

Mr. Orlikow: He has not answered any questions, that is true. We should also receive some information about these retirement ages and enlistments dating back to ages nine, 11 and 12. That certainly is a good trick if the minister can get away with it. Perhaps we could find other groups in the public service who could be retired in this same way.

An hon. Member: How about members of parliament?

Mr. Orlikow: Somebody suggests members of parliament, but I was thinking of some of those civil servants who were retired on pensions of less than $25 per month about which my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, has talked so often in this house. I should like an answer to my questions and an explanation about the directorate of information services, or the directorate of public relations or publicity, whatever it might be called. Surely we can expect an answer to these questions before we pass this item.

Mr. Hellyer: The directorate of information services is one of the first branches that was integrated after the bill was passed a year and a half ago. Formerly each of the three services had its own information service branch which provided information to the press and to interested citizens of all kinds. They also conducted tours and performed a number of tasks of this nature, including the publication of magazines. As hon. members will recall, each of the services had a magazine. There is now only one directorate of information services on behalf of the three armed forces. This was accomplished after the bill was passed and we reduced the number of personnel by 60 per cent. This represents one of the major savings accomplished at the outset of integration and amounted to over $1 million per year. It was also referred to by the Royal Commission on Government Organization. As a result of the law passed we were enabled to integrate our headquarters and reduce the number of personnel in this area by about 60 per cent, with a savings to the taxpayer of about $1 million per year.

Mr. Orlikow: That savings is all very well, but it seems to me from everything I have heard that each year our defence efforts cost more money while each year we have fewer people in the forces and spend less money on weapons and equipment. Perhaps in this same way we could reduce our expenditures by another half a million dollars or so. Surely we do not need public relations people in national defence. If we need armed forces at all it seems to me we need fighting men rather than public relations men. I am satisfied the fact is that we have cut our expenditures in the way the minister has suggested, but perhaps we should have cut them more.

Mr. Hellyer: The people employed at this time in the directorate of information services work very hard. It has small organizations in various parts of the country to which the press and other interested people have access for information, as incidents occur in the normal course of events; for feature articles on the service; and to keep the people abreast of service developments. This includes the overseas staff which is involved in this same kind of work. It also includes the staff who prepare the armed forces magazine, the Sentinel, as well as the people who perform this task for the Department of National Defence.

I can inform the hon. gentleman that the number of people employed in this branch is so small that they must work very hard indeed. I do not think it would be possible to cut the staff any further without reducing below a minimum level the services they provide to the Canadian public.

I would also like to say, because I think it is important, that the hon. member is doing these people an injustice if he thinks they are in any way involved in public relations on behalf of the minister. That is not so. This organization is under the direction of the deputy minister and provides information for the public, so far as the department is concerned, and the three armed forces. They are very careful not to get involved in those areas which my hon. friend knows would be outside the jurisdiction of public service.

Mr. Orlikow: It is very nice to know that the minister writes all his own speeches without any assistance from the personnel of his department, if that is true. I take the minister's word in that regard, of course. He is the first minister in any government at any level that I am aware of who does not receive that kind of assistance.

The minister did a tremendous job last night in attempting to destroy all the arguments and criticisms of the opposition. Perhaps he will reply to the criticism of his department by the Auditor General who certainly cannot be accused of being politically partisan. I refer particularly to the criticism in respect of the retirement of service personnel and the method which was used to give them full pensions by dating their enlistment ages as 9, 11 and 12. It seems to me that the minister has a duty to the country to explain his side, if he has one, in this regard.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I shall deal with that question later. In the meantime the Leader of the Opposition asked for information respecting the number of cars at the disposal of National Defence in Ottawa for each of the last three or four years. Cars on strength of the No. 9 transport company in 1963 were 37; in 1964, 37; in 1965, 37 and in 1966, 37.

In addition, there are three limousines on strength which are used to provide transportation for visiting heads of state and dignitaries.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, it is very instructive for the minister to indicate that certain economies have been made in, say, the information services and to claim that this has saved the Canadian taxpayer $1 million a year. But I think he should also disclose that in his own office the number of personnel has gone up from 630 to 703 and the additional salaries paid amount to $500,000 a year. This is just a little counterbalancing. May I say that some of these additional personnel are at very senior levels. I am referring to the reorganization in the minister's office. This matter falls under item 1, Mr. Chairman; I have gone back just by way of contrast. This is a fact and I think attention should be drawn to it.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the principal reason for this is the fact that the chief auditor on the civil side at headquarters has now assumed the internal auditing responsibility for the whole department. This increased staff was required by him.

Mr. Lambert: Are any of this additional staff service officers who have retired and taken on a civilian job? It is all very well to say that the headquarters personnel has been reduced in strength. The minister has claimed that this is one of the great economies that has been made. However, in so far as the exchequer is concerned, quite apart from the question of pay, it does not matter whether the man wears a service or a civilian hat, if he is still there, has a responsibility and is part of the administration at national defence headquarters.

Mr. Hellyer: If a service officer competes in a civil service examination and is successful, he is eligible for one of these jobs. In so far as the total number is concerned, if this was the point my hon. friend was trying to make, the figure I gave the other night of a reduction of over 1,000 so far was a composite one of headquarters civil and military staff.

The Chairman: Shall item 15 carry?

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, two questions I should like to raise concern the Associate Minister of National Defence more than the Minister of National Defence. They have to do with pension problems arising out of the program of integration which has led to certain confusion, as we have heard during this discussion, and it has resulted in one or two pension problems not clarified as to policy.

First of all, I understand that in cases of premature retirement, unless the serviceman concerned has accumulated 20 years post-war service he is not allowed to count his wartime service in calculating his pension. I do not know whether I have the details precisely accurate, but this is one of those problems that arises from time to time in other fields.

This problem with regard to pensions arises in public administration when a group falls outside the stipulated category and as a result there is considerable unfairness as far as pensions are concerned. This is particularly true in respect of those in the services who are not able to count their wartime service in their pension benefits.

The second problem also has to do with pensions. This is a long standing difficulty, and I know from past inquiries which I have made that consideration has been given to resolving this particular anomaly. I refer to the difficulty of retired military personnel of the rank of warrant officer and above who are not allowed to exceed a pay ceiling in pursuing a civilian occupation with some branch of the government service other than the military; that would be greater than the pay ceiling corresponding to that which they would have received in the equivalent rank. In other words, Mr. Chairman, they are on pension, and upon retirement are successful in finding employment in some branch of the civil service, and regardless of their qualifications—and there are very highly qualified people in the armed forces today, as we know —they must take an arbitrary cut in pay because of this arbitrary regulation.

Both these matters have to do with administrative procedures and I am sure the minister and the department could regularize them if they so desired. Has the minister any comment to make on those two points?

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I agree completely with the first point made by the hon. member and, like him, I deplore the fact that, in the case of some veterans, war service does not count for pension purposes.

That matter is now under consideration. We will make representations to the authorities concerned and we hope to win our case. I do not want to say more at this time. I know that it is a serious problem. I am aware of it and I share the hon. member's views.

With regard to the second question, I must give practically the same answer. An order was issued by the Treasury Board; definite representations have been made in that regard and we are also studying that problem in order to find an adequate and fair solution.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Do I conclude from the minister's statement that both these matters are under very active consideration?

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): That is the expression I used.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Very, very active consideration, I would trust.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the Associate Minister could say a further word as to what he meant when he said that the first of the matters just raised has been taken up with the appropriate authorities. The minister may or may not recall that I have had correspondence with him about this very matter, and I understood from the correspondence that he at least was sympathetic to making the necessary amendment to the legislation.

Is not the appropriate authority in this matter the cabinet, of which we have two distinguished members before us? Cannot they prevail upon this appropriate authority to take this action, since they now seem to agree with us?

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): If the hon. member can recall my letter, I think it told him that I would make a recommendation to my colleagues in the cabinet, but that I could not anticipate the decision that would be taken. That is precisely what I will do: make a recommendation.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I confirm that this is what the Associate Minister said to me in a letter. I just thought it should be clear here that these appropriate authorities were not some mysterious people in some other place but that they are the members of the cabinet.

• (7:20 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the matter of pensions and their relationship to the individual has been raised. I probably should know something about this question but I must confess that I am always at a loss to understand the relationship between service personnel, the pension board, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the war veterans allowance board. In regard to these bodies I do not know whether there is any relationship with service personnel. The hon. member for Winnipeg North mentioned a television program of the other night which dealt with a case in point. This ruling, I presume, was made since the war and therefore, in my opinion, the decision would not be made by the Canadian Pension Commission but would be made by some agency under the control of the Department of National Defence, I may be incorrect, but it seems to me this must be true. If it is true, I suggest the minister cannot hide behind the pension board by saying that the parties have a right of appeal. If I am wrong, and the parties do have this right, then I feel it is within the minister's jurisdiction to change that provision with regard to the discretionary powers of the Canadian Pension Commission, because obviously the commission has never used it.

On a number of occasions the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek has requested that these matters under dispute be referred to the courts for a final decision. In other words, the minister should waive the Queen's prerogative by allowing service personnel to sue in the courts for redress, rather than stopping at the Pension Commission. I may be wrong in saying such matters do not go to the Canadian Pension Commission but are handled through another agency under the Department of National Defence. However, I believe that since the question has been raised members of parliament are going to have to settle it now. They are going to have to settle it in the Department of Veterans Affairs or the Department of National Defence. The minister should be prepared to give us an assurance that he is willing to make that change which will allow service personnel to sue in the courts as a final appeal against a decision of the pension commission, a course that cannot be followed at the moment.

Mr. Hellyer: This act is administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs, so that I have no direct responsibility under it. I think the correct place to direct the question would be to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Peters: May I ask the minister under what regulation or in what manner we were able to bring service personnel under this section of the veterans affairs branch during peacetime? They are being treated in a completely different manner from the way in which they were treated previously when serving in a theatre of war. We are aware of no changes that have been made in the method of treatment, but there must have been some act or regulation passed which allowed the Department of National Defence to use some other agency for employee relationships. In other words, we were aware of the fact we had to pass special legislation to allow the Korean war veterans to receive pensions for war service. This was a special piece of legislation.

The minister is now saying really that he has been able to put all the service personnel under the veterans affairs branch. I have no objection to this, of course, except that it does not sound reasonable in the light of the experience I have had with a number of cases. Obviously, when service personnel were on duty 24 hours a day in Germany, they were on active duty. There was no period when they were on duty and when they were off duty. They were under the direction of the army.

I have one example in which I was particularly interested. An order was given by a commanding officer to have all the employees bring their families to the base for inoculation because there was an epidemic taking place in that town. The airman in question picked up his wife and young daughter and brought them to the base. They were inoculated by the air officer in charge and taken home. The airman had not completed his eight hour shift and he was on his way back to the air base when he was killed. The argument was used that there could be no compensation paid in this case because, while it was true the airman was under orders and his shift had not been completed, he was not acting in line of duty.

In the war, if you were killed it did not matter if you were asleep or awake, you were still on duty and you were covered by these provisions. I believe the problem raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North is a very important one. Every Canadian was shocked and embarrassed to realize that it made a difference whether you were going into the house when you got killed or whether you were coming out of the house. Veterans affairs do not usually play it that carefully; they are usually more lenient about these cases. The decision seems to hinge on the fact that we are not at war. Service personnel in peacetime are not really under the same restrictions as service personnel during a time of war, and this fact has been reflected in the treatment they have received. I think all Canadians were shocked to find that this was so. If it is so, we are going to have to cover them by an insurance policy or through some other method. We do believe that service personnel who may be killed, whether or not they are on duty, should be covered by some regulation or some act.

We had to pass some special legislation to bring the Korean war veterans under the Department of Veterans Affairs. I think the Canadian people are really interested in this question now and we should do something about it.

Mr. Churchill: In so far as the subject the hon. member for Timiskaming was discussing is concerned, the Minister of National Defence is quite correct in saying it comes properly under the Minister of Veterans Affairs. However, the Department of National Defence has an interest in this problem. I believe it is section 13(2) of the Pension Act, a very troublesome section in my opinion, which covers whether a man is on or off duty. I believe it has been very improperly interpreted over the years. I remember that during the time I was Minister of Veterans Affairs I tried to get this altered, but before that happened the public had different ideas about where I should sit in this house. The matter should be pursued through the Department of Veterans Affairs, and if a revision of the Pension Act comes up this year, then it should be dealt with. It is a very serious and important matter.

I agree with most of what the hon. member for Timiskaming has said. The Minister of National Defence, in this particular instance, is not responsible because it is not under his jurisdiction. There is a moral responsibility on the Department of National Defence to try to solve this problem.

Some years ago we tried to solve it by appointing a joint committee from Veterans Affairs and National Defence to see whether the insurance principle could be adopted, thus removing it from the Department of Veterans Affairs. That is the situation as it stands at the moment. Before this particular session ends I hope the house will make certain that that section is either removed from the act and responsibility placed on the Department of National Defence, or else it is so modified that there will be none of this disputation as to whether a man is on duty or off duty when he is obviously in uniform, under orders, and going from place A to place B. We could cite a dozen cases tonight—I have had them myself —where an injustice has been done to the survivors.

The Chairman: Order. The Chair has not intervened in the argument that has been going on for the last few minutes because it recognizes that there is a relationship between the Department of National Defence and the Canadian Pension Commission. While at this time I should not like to make a firm ruling, I would suggest to the committee that this item would be more properly discussed under the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to pursue the matter unduly, and I am not arguing that it does not come under the purview of the Canadian Pension Commission. I am wondering what the staff of the Department of National Defence has done and what they are prepared to do to see that this situation which has arisen is corrected.

I am quite willing to accept that it exists in some other departments, but this department is responsible for the service personnel of today. If we are not satisfied with the arrangements we make for them and we object strongly enough, then I think the situation will be changed. I am sure they have thought about this. In the case of peacetime personnel we are really buying service from the Department of Veterans Affairs. They cannot be veterans if they are providing service now, though they may be veterans through previous service. All the department is doing is subletting the responsibility it has to provide compensation for the injured and killed to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

I am sure the department must be aware that when the type of accident to which we have referred happens, everybody on the base knows that Mary Jane is left with no support, and that she is put into a position into which she would not be put, had her husband not been killed. On the other hand, if her husband had been working in Toronto and had slipped on a bar of soap in a washroom and broken his neck, he would get compensation. There was a case in the mines concerning someone working from collar to collar, although it did not involve taking a shower. However, in the ordinary case compensation would be provided.

I hope the minister will tell us what he is going to do about this. Surely his departmental officials have considered the alternative of providing compensation out of the government treasury under a compensation act. It is very easy to sublet this responsibility, but if this is done I think there is an obligation to see that the right type of service is provided. I suggest it is of prime importance to many people that this be done.

I am prepared to fight the Canadian Pension Commission and the veterans affairs legislation surrounding it over decisions which the commission make. I am also aware of the limitations of the legislation. But the fact is that we have service personnel who in my opinion are not getting proper coverage. I think the minister should be willing to tell us what he is going to do about this and whether he and his colleague will insist that the situation be corrected or an alternative suggested.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, in the case my hon. friend has described I can only say that I am surprised the situation was not covered. Perhaps he would be good enough to give me the details, and I can inquire into the matter, unless it has already been looked into. We certainly agree that we have a responsibility in these matters to make sure that justice, or more than justice, is done, and that there is the best possible arrangement made for the dependents of the men and women of the armed forces.

It might interest my hon. friend to know that we have extended the coverage to include United Nations operations, such as in Cyprus, where the risk principle applies. It has not been applied in all areas, such as in Europe and here at home, but we would certainly be willing to take this matter under consideration and see whether it would be possible to provide coverage.

Mr. Peters: The risk principle is not too well known to most people. How is this risk principle applied in Cyprus? It is also probably applied in the Gaza strip, in Israel, and in the Congo.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the hon. member mean, how do we select these areas?

Mr. Peters: Yes, how do you designate an area?

Mr. Hellyer: The extension of the insurance principle to these areas was done under the act by order in council, I think.

Mr. Peters: Is this insurance then paid to the other department? This principle implies a greater risk which cannot be covered in the normal fashion. Is there an interdepartmental accounting system which gives added protection for certain areas?

Mr. Hellyer: No. This is just changing the coverage provided by the act. The application is covered by law under the Canadian Pension Act. There are regulations under the act, and areas of coverage can be extended by regulation. You can extend the insurance principle, as is done in cases of active service, and this same principle would apply in Cyprus and in other areas where we are involved in United Nations operations.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister to clarify whose responsibility it is to assess an early retirement pension; and whose responsibility was it in the case of pensions based on service going back to the ages of 9, 11 and 12? Is this not the responsibility of the Department of National Defence, or are such cases passed over before retirement to the Department of Veterans Affairs for handling?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the responsibility for this is set by law. Also, what is received is determined by law. The law was merely applied in these cases as it existed, and was administered by the Department of National Defence.

I am now in a position to give the information which—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): If the minister does not mind I should like to follow up that question, instead of his referring to information he has had prepared for him by somebody else.

• (7:40 p.m.)

Since it is the administrative duty of the Department of National Defence to assess pensions in the cases of early retirement as indicated in the Auditor General's report—I refer to the cases which indicated an enlistment age of 9, 11 and 12—does the minister not feel with regard to men who are now in the forces that he has some responsibility toward servicemen who are killed while in uniform, or in any event while presently serving? I would appeal to him to take into consideration the case of Sergeant Hamood, who was killed in Germany while on his way to work in uniform with his commanding officer. His wife and children have been denied a pension because the Pension Commission insisted that he was not on duty, which is a ridiculous situation. If the minister is fully aware of the fact that he is in uniform, he is on duty.

Mr. Hellyer: This matter is governed by the Pension Act, Mr. Chairman. This department may make representations, but it does not administer the act.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Will the minister make representations on behalf of Sergeant Hamood who was killed while riding with his commanding officer.

Mr. Hellyer: We shall certainly be glad to look into this.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, would the minister care at this time to answer questions respecting the enlistment age of persons entitled to pensions, which was mentioned earlier. I am sure the members of the committee would be interested to have that statement.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, this is in respect of ages of people who were retired. May I read my information in order to put it on the record.

Wing Commander W. G. Taylor was nine years of age, almost ten, or within a few days of being ten, when he enlisted in the non-permanent active militia on the eighth day of the seventh month, 1927.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did he indicate that he was nine years old when he enlisted? What age did he give on enlistment.

Mr. Hellyer: I am afraid I shall have to ask my right hon. friend's indulgence in that. He left the non-permanent active militia on the fourteenth day of the sixth month, 1937.

Flight Sgt. J. C. Baker was 11 years old when he enlisted on the sixteenth day of the tenth month, 1926.

Mr. Herridge: With what regiment?

Mr. Hellyer: He left the non-permanent active militia on the seventh day of the second month, 1936. Apparently he rejoined the militia on the thirtieth day of the third month, 1936, and left again on the second day of the ninth month, 1939.

Lieut. Col. William Alton was aged 12—

Mr. Herridge: The church lads brigade.

Mr. Hellyer: —when he enlisted on the twenty ninth day of the eleventh month, 1927. He retired from the militia on the eighteenth day of the seventh month, 1938. Major R. W. Hampton was 12 when he enlisted on the first day of the tenth month, 1926. He retired from the militia on the first day of the seventh month, 1931. Sergeant D. W. Hopkinson was aged 12 when he enlisted on the third day of the fifth month, 1933. He retired from the militia on the thirty first day of the eighth month, 1939.

Mr. Herridge: What was his rank on enlistment?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not know what it was officially called. I suspect it would be private, or perhaps boy or apprentice.

Flight Sgt. C.F. Page was aged 12 when he enlisted for the first time on the fifth day of the fourth month, 1933. He retired from the militia on the fifteenth day of the fourth month, 1936. He re-enlisted on the nineteenth day of the first month, 1939 and then retired from the militia on the thirty first day of the eighth month, 1939, about when the war broke out.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister whether the regimental records or the battalion records are available with respect to these enlistments?

An hon. Member: You had better explain what you mean.

Mr. Hellyer: The units are on the statutory declarations, but I do not have them here.

Mr. Herridge: Are the units that you mentioned on the statutory declarations? What I really meant was, are the records of these battalions still in existence?

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: That is rather unfortunate.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the minister owes to the committee and to the house a great deal more explanation than he has given. I know that in Winnipeg young people are joining the cadets, but I have not realized that the cadets or the militia permit people to join at ages of 9, 10, 11 or 12. I still do not believe that. I am rather skeptical about this report. I am sure the minister would not knowingly give wrong information to the house, but I want to say to him that I, for one, doubt every word in every illustration which he has given to the house. I think the house is entitled to an explanation which makes some sense, which the minister's statement certainly does not make to me.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, has the minister tabled the army regulations relating to dates of enlistment in the militia, of that time? They were in existence, I take it?

Mr. Hellyer: The regulations I quoted earlier, which applied, permitted enlistment at age 13 in special cases. Four of the men mentioned here were approaching their thirteenth birthday at the time they enlisted. One or two got in a little earlier than the others.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, last Friday I raised the question of the simulator for the CF-5. I pursue that again at this hour because we have not had any further comment about the simulator, other than at an earlier period both the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Defence Production had no knowledge that the simulator had been purchased in connection with the CF-5 program. I think that this might be quite true. I presume the reason for the specific lack of knowledge concerning the simulator arises from the fact that in the major purchase of any aircraft of this kind, the simulator automatically goes with the whole procedure. I presume that the reason why the simulator program was cancelled is because the United States armed forces are not going to buy the CF-5, and therefore it is not considered financially feasible for the Canadian armed forces to proceed with the simulator.

On the other hand the Associate Minister of National Defence has indicated that several other countries are going to purchase the CF-5. It seems to me that if we are to make the best possible job of what appears to be less than the best aircraft, we have to have the basis for sound training, and you cannot have sound training without the simulator or without a ground training device of some kind. Before any final decisions are made about this, and that is why I bring it up at the moment, Mr. Chairman, I think the minister would be well advised to review this decision. Obviously $50,000 has been invested in the simulator program already. It seems to me that we are not going to have adequate training unless we proceed with this ground trainer.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is correct when he says that normally a simulator is required. On this basis the technical branch of the forces sent notice to the Department of Defence Production that a simulator would probably be required, for information only. The Department of Defence Production on the basis of this probability decided that they might invest some money from their revolving fund in the development of a simulator, in order to gain some months lead in the development of it, with the hope that the department would be able to make sales probably to other countries, as well as making it available for the R.C.A.F. In December, and I am speaking from memory, the operators advised the technical branch that the simulator would not be required. This advice was sent immediately to the Department of Defence Production and the project was cancelled at once. It had no relationship whatsoever to any inclination or otherwise of the United States air force to acquire this aircraft.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is the minister saying that the CF-5 does not require this sort of device to assist in the training program? It would appear to me that this represents an extreme departure from the training procedures which have always been carried out in the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Hellyer: That is exactly what I am saying. According to the best advice available in the department the simulator is not required. We have a number of planes with dual controls and to the extent that training of this type is required it will be done in these aircraft. But it is felt that simulator time in addition to dual time is not necessary.

Mr. Hales: One brief observation before leaving this vote. I should like to direct the attention of the minister and of the committee to the observations made by the Auditor General when he called attention to the case of nine naval officers who left Halifax to go to Victoria on a course. They went in separate cars—nine men, nine cars. They travelled all the way to Victoria and back in connection with a course which lasted from January to May. Allowing for ferry services, meals and other travelling expenses it is estimated that this cost some $5,282, whereas had they travelled by a service aircraft their journey would have cost approximately $600.

We have heard today examples of every kind of extravagance in the minister's department. I realize the example I have just given may relate to an item in the former estimates but I am asking the minister whether he has re-evaluated the system of travel arrangements in his department in an effort to reduce this continual waste of the taxpayers' money—waste which is going on all the time. Every day, as has been pointed out, cars are running around on errands unconnected with official business. I trust the minister will be able to give us a good reason for all such journeys in future.

Mr. Hellyer: The regulations provide that the commanding officer may decide what means of travel is used by his personnel on official business. He is allowed to take into consideration a number of factors, including morale, the need to have a car at the other end of the journey, and so on. I think it is right that there should be a certain amount of delegation of authority. If there is any one thing which we tend to do in large organizations it is to centralize too much authority and require more decisions to be made at higher levels than is really justified.

Since this particular incident was brought to my notice, however, we have sent out instructions to the effect that commanding officers should be more careful to consider the relative cost of alternative means of transportation when they authorize travel.

Mr. Herridge: I am sorry to trouble the minister again but I wish to return to this intriguing episode of the enlistment of boys in short pants in the armed forces of Canada. I am sure the minister wishes to give us all the information he can. Would he agree to having all those persons mentioned by the Auditor General called before the defence committee so that they can explain in detail how these lads were enlisted at that time and in what circumstances; the regiments to which they belonged and the services which they performed before they reached the normal age of enlistment?

Mr. Hellyer: These gentlemen are all retired from the service now. But every case has already been thoroughly investigated. Our legal department has reached the conclusion that in all cases the evidence presented was valid—and the application of the law is based on valid evidence.

In these circumstances I think the only course open to the hon. gentleman, if he feels this practice should be ended, would be to introduce or support amendments to the law which would obviate these payments to people who serve at a certain age.

Mr. Herridge: In reply to the minister I would say that the first thing to do would be to move an amendment to the National Defence Act providing for the raising of the age of enlistment in the armed forces of Canada. It is not fair to have people of nine years of age enlisting in the army. It is going too far.

An hon. Member: How old were you?

Mr. Herridge: Eighteen. Would the committee not have the right to call these people to whom I have referred?

Mr. Churchill: It would be up to the committee.

Mr. Hellyer: I cannot answer that question offhand. I believe the standing committee would have the power to call witnesses if it wanted to. I think the relevant committee would be the Public Accounts Committee, because this affects an item which is now included in the Public Accounts.

Mr. Nielsen: I was interested in the minister's promise yesterday in reply to several questions put to him by members on this side of the house that he would explain to us the performance capabilities of the CF-5. I can recall in particular questions about the take-off run, the length of runway required, and this somewhat astounding capability of the CF-5 to land on grass. The minister was also talking about the ground support role which this aircraft could play.

Would he now fulfil his promise of yesterday and elaborate on these matters for the benefit of those of us in the opposition who are not quite so technically informed as is the minister?

Mr. Hellyer: If the hon. member would look at the record I think he will find I said that this information could best be given before the standing committee which will be meeting in a few days, and before which all this information can be given, such as take-off characteristics, performance at different altitudes under varying loads, and so on. This would involve more technical information than it would be appropriate to give before the committee of the whole house.

Mr. Nielsen: I think I recall the minister's promise last evening. He specifically mentioned vote 15 on which all this elaboration and enlightenment was to be forthcoming. Surely the minister can enlighten the committee this evening on all these matters, particularly in view of the lengthy and detailed statement in support of the aircraft he gave to us last night?

Mr. Hellyer: I think the hon. gentleman has juxtaposed two things in his mind. He could confirm this, I believe, by looking again at the record. In view of the fact that there are so many different conditions in respect of which he would, no doubt, want information concerning the performance of this plane, the best place to have an answer to these questions is in the standing committee, where officers could show charts and graphs of performance over a wide range.

Mr. Nielsen: I would be prepared to wait for the meetings of the committee if the minister was prepared to tell us this evening that because of his limited knowledge of the performance capabilities of this aircraft he is incapable of advising us with regard to them. Otherwise I think we should have an explanation tonight. If the minister would go so far as to admit this, I am prepared to be patient.

• (8:00 p.m.)

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister inform us as to the role of honorary colonels in the new integrated armed forces?

Mr. Hellyer: The answer to that question, Mr. Chairman, is too involved and too detailed for discussion at this moment, but I would be glad to take it up with my hon. friend some afternoon over a cup of tea.

Mr. Bigg: Would the minister look into the whole matter of consolidation of pensions with respect to armed forces personnel? I studied this subject in great detail. There are many anomalies in the services. People who were in the armed forces during world war II do not have their service counted when it comes to a matter of consolidating with civil service pensions or R.C.M.P. pensions. The minister, as the man intimately involved in this whole problem, should examine it carefully.

The minister is having great difficulty keeping personnel in the armed forces. One of the reasons is that they are not clear how long they are going to be able to serve, and what type of pension consolidation they will have if they join the civil service or mounted police. They do not know this either with respect to broken service. Private business is calling young men away from the forces to fly commercial aircraft, to work in the technical electronics field, and to work as mechanics, and these young men should know what their position is with respect to pensions.

While he is at it the minister should look into the pensions of those who served 20 and 30 years in the armed service, going back as far as the South African war. Some of these people are living on pitiful pensions. Having served in the armed forces myself, I know that those who are still in the forces are worrying about whether or not they will get a square deal from the department. If this matter does not come entirely under the minister's purview then the Cabinet, Treasury Board and the Pension Commission should get together on it and see that no matter what branch of the armed services, or of the public service a man is in, he should get the same kind of deal as people serving in another branch. If we can give pensions backdated to the age of 9, 10, 11 and 12 years, then men who have served from the age of 21 until retirement should have a living income.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I was trying to turn up the commitment which the minister made last night and I am satisfied my recollection is accurate that he said he would discuss these matters under vote 15 in committee. In the interval he has had the opportunity to refer to his experts, one of whom on his right I had the privilege of serving under in the air force. Surely these answers are available to him, in view of the fact that he has his officials before him.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I really do not think it is too helpful because there is such a wide variation of conditions that to start with just one or two figures would not be helpful. In view of the fact that the committee I was referring to, the standing committee, is going to be formed within a few days—I think the organization meeting is on Thursday and it will probably be starting its deliberations next week,—it could have full information on this subject and an opportunity could be provided to it to go into some considerable detail over the wide range of possibilities that would interest my hon. friend.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister made a very wide ranging speech last night. He went on for pages and pages in Hansard, dealing with the role of the CF-5. We are now on the vote that is going to authorize the expenditure of millions of dollars for an aircraft the role of which is in some doubt, the economics of which are in some doubt. The minister elaborated in some detail, but not sufficient in the view of many of us, on the role this aircraft would be playing in the defence fabric of the country. He stressed particularly the ground support role. It is my own view that this aircraft is unsuitable for a ground support role, and certainly this would appear to be the case according to the opinions of the experts I have read and spoken with.

The ground support role the minister was speaking of last night at such great length could at least be elaborated on this evening for members of the committee. I do not think we can simply gloss over it, in view of the millions of dollars to be spent on the aircraft. I believe it is only right that we, and the country at large, know precisely how this aircraft is going to be employed, and what justification the minister has, on the advice of his experts, for suggesting it is the most suitable aircraft to fulfil the role for which it is being purchased.

Mr. Hellyer: As I explained this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, the aircraft is an additional arm in support of the land forces. It is to provide additional firepower and air support. It will be formed in squadrons and in an air brigade under the command of mobile commander, to be used by him in support of the balance of his force in the way that any other arm would be used.

The techniques of supporting ground forces are well known to my hon. friend. There is nothing strange or mysterious about them, except that it has been a long while since the R.C.A.F. was involved in this particular role. It is one in which it excelled in world war II, and one which is becoming of increasing importance in view of the real strategic situation in the world today, with the likelihood of conflagrations involving active air defence or in which the use of the nuclear strike squadrons in Europe is diminishing, and where the likelihood of having to use something short of that, such as ground support aircraft in other parts of the world, is considerably greater so far as probability is concerned.

Therefore I think the role has been well established and I think the evidence will show that for the purposes we have in mind, for getting into the tactical aircraft business again, this is a good decision and it will be a first class aircraft for the particular task being assigned to it.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister mind answering one or two of my specific questions while he has his experts here? Can he tell me, for instance, what is the speed his experts feel advisable should be the capability of a pure jet aircraft such as the one under discussion in a ground support role, and what heights the minister, again on the advice of his experts, believes that ground support is necessary in which to employ the CF-5?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I think this is the kind of information that can much better be dealt with before the standing committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We want information. We want none of this evasion that went on last night. We want answers.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not want to enter into an argument with my right hon. friend—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hope not.

Mr. Hellyer: I don't want to do that, but he has had some problems with airplanes in his day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But I never used them during an election campaign to find out their practicability.

Mr. Churchill: What height were you flying at?

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: He started out with a high altitude interceptor and tried to make a low level bomber out of it. This is not too long ago, and when it comes to a choice of aircraft, and modification to make it suitable for a particular task, he is quite an expert, having gone through it once or twice himself. I think you will recall, because of this, probably just how complicated and difficult it is in the committee of the whole house to use figures in the circumstances which are meaningful enough to be helpful.

Mr. Nielsen: Will the minister say that he does not know?

Mr. Hellyer: No.

Mr. Nielsen: Then will the minister answer my questions; there are two very simple questions, questions which the minister should be able to answer with the officials he has before him. My own belief is that the aircraft does not have this performance capability that would allow it to be used in the role in which it is intended to employ it. Whether or not my view on the matter is correct, surely the minister is going to be gracious enough to allow the rest of us to share in this tremendous knowledge he has of these technical matters, and particularly when the two questions are so brief and simple.

Mr. Hellyer: I think I should refer my hon. friend to the interim reports on the Skoshi Tiger tests which were in the same kind of a ground support role, including interdiction, in the Viet Nam war, and where the airplane has performed admirably under those circumstances; where it was able to deliver on target a vast quantity of stores; where it was able to perform a very high number of sorties; where the cost of keeping it in operation, because of the low number of man-hours required per flight hour, was very low; where the attrition rate was very low, because this aircraft is less susceptible to ground fire than some of the other airplanes which my hon. friend might be thinking of; and where there were many other tests that it was subjected to in respect of which it performed admirably in the type of role that we would expect it to perform.

Mr. Churchill: What does that mean?

Mr. Nielsen: The minister has made a concerted effort to dazzle us with his footwork. The question I asked him remains unanswered. I remember that when the minister was on this side of the house in the opposition asking specific questions about specific weaponry of the then minister of national defence he was not satisfied until he got his answers, which usually were much more rapidly forthcoming than we are experiencing this evening. Surely, to these very simple and brief questions, the minister has an answer.

Mr. Hellyer: Certainly the altitudes required for ground support are not great, and this particular airplane has an exceptional performance up to 20,000 feet, below which it can cope with practically any aircraft you can name. It can excel in most cases. It can outfly the 104, for example, in that envelope; it has very fast acceleration, supersonic dash capability, a good turning radius, and a very good capability in respect of that envelope in which the plane is operating. I think this is the specific answer to my friend's question.

Mr. Nielsen: It is, within 20,000 feet; but I do not regard 20,000 feet as ground support, to revert to the technical role of this airplane to which the minister referred. Immediately after the last war, in a similar role, I think in terms of ground support as being at much less altitude than 20,000 feet. The minister and I may have a different concept of what ground support means. This just leaves the question hanging at 20,000 feet.

Mr. Hellyer: I think my hon. friend is trying to confuse the issue.

Mr. Nielsen: Let us get along to the question, which remains unanswered, and that is the question concerning its speed.

Mr. Hellyer: It has a top speed in the vicinity of 1,000 miles an hour, which is plenty fast enough to engage any target that might come within its envelope. The flying characteristics which I outlined are such that this aircraft can stand up admirably to anything that might attack it in the altitude envelope in which it would operate.

Mr. Nielsen: I may be a year or two or more removed from the modern concept of what ground support really means, but is the minister suggesting that 1,000 miles an hour at 20,000 feet is the modern concept of what ground support must be in this new role of the air force?

Mr. Hellyer: Most certainly not, Mr. Chairman, and I am shocked at the hon. gentleman's suggesting this. Ground support is subsonic on the deck; that is what the airplane would operate at in most cases. The advantage of having a supersonic dash capability is in case it is attacked from above by another airplane, in which case it can drop its stores and go supersonic if it wants to. That is the great advantage of this airplane over one or two others that were considered.

Mr. Nielsen: Do we understand then that the 1,000 miles per hour is the speed at which this aircraft is intended to be used in the ground support role; is that what we are to understand?

Mr. Hellyer: That is completely incorrect, Mr. Chairman, and the hon. gentleman knows it. This line of questioning just proves conclusively the suggestion I made earlier that it is futile under these circumstances to answer technical questions and that he should reserve his questions until he can put them in the Standing Committee on Defence to the air force officers who will be there.

Mr. Nielsen: I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, too that it is rather futile, because the period of almost an hour that the minister spent last evening ranging politically over the whole spectrum of defence in the bombastic way in which he did, and which has resulted in this additional questioning today and this evening, indicates to me he has no intention whatsoever of enlightening the members of this committee in respect of the questions asked yesterday and which he committed himself to answer today. There were many questions asked concerning the aircraft, and the minister did commit himself to give answers. In his own inimitable, exclusive and arrogant fashion he is simply refusing to answer the very questions he was asked to answer and which he committed himself to answer yesterday and last night.

The Chairman: Shall item 15 carry?

Mr. Forrestall: Just before we go on, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would explain to me whether we bought the old F-5, whether we bought the F-5A, which is a slight modification of it, whether we bought the F-5A15, or whether we bought the F-5N? On the basis of the answers to these questions will rest the validity of some of the answers to questions asked this afternoon and evening, and more particularly some of the answers that the hon. member for Yukon is attempting to get.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Hellyer: We did not buy any of those models, Mr. Chairman. We bought one which we have configured for our own requirements.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 15 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, there were one or two questions asked before the supper hour having to do with the expropriation of land near camp Valcartier and the dispossession of people who have been living there in a village and on farms which were pioneered by their ancestors 150 years ago. Has the minister had time now to consider these questions and will he indicate to the house that these expropriation actions will cease forthwith so that the 25 families who are now in a state of dismay may be assured that they will be allowed to remain in possession of their homes and property, just as other members of this house would like to be assured under similar circumstances? I am sure the members of this house would resist any expropriation such as this by the Department of National Defence for the purposes outlined to us in regard to the expansion of a military camp. What has the Minister or the Associate Minister to say to guide this house regarding this particular problem? I await their answers.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I said, before the adjournment I believe, that I was prepared to reconsider the whole matter with the parties concerned.

I reminded the hon. member that I had already spoken to these parties, that my officials had started negotiations with them and that, since that time, I had heard no more about the matter, but that I was willing to look into the whole matter once more with a view to finding an adequate solution—I even used the word equitable—for these people. I am most willing to start over again.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 15 carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, one must always examine carefully the words used by the associate minister. Before our supper hour he said he was willing to negotiate a just settlement with the people concerned. What I want to know is whether the whole operation will cease and whether the expropriation will be cancelled so that these people may be left where they are. What the associate minister is suggesting is that he will undertake to carry out negotiations with those people who object to the price they are being offered for their homes. That is not what we are talking about. We are talking about justice and equitable treatment for these people, leaving them where they are and establishing the mortar firing range somewhere else.

This afternoon the Minister of National Defence would not tell me the length of the range required for mortar firing. Apparently that information is so highly secret it should not be divulged. I wonder if perhaps Mr. Spencer has already obtained that information. Apparently the minister does not want the Russians to know the range of our mortar, but I doubt very much whether that is the kind of information which is not already accessible to any country in the world that has an interest.

I wanted an answer to that question in order to ascertain how much land is required. Why are there not other artillery ranges in existence that could be used for this purpose? It is a simple matter to have musketry ranges at army camps for rifle and machine gun fire; but in regard to mortar fire, as is the case with artillery fire, you must have a wider area for safety reasons. If this change at Valcartier is being made in order to set up a range for mortar fire, I suggest this reason could be better satisfied by using artillery ranges somewhere else, likely at a lesser cost.

May I ask the minister whether any part of the Valcartier camp—and I am not familiar with its state in recent years—is used for artillery practice. If the answer to that question is yes, then he already has in effect a mortar range there. If the answer is no, I would ask the minister why he does not shift this mortar practice to places where artillery ranges are already in operation. Will the minister tell me whether or not there is an artillery range in use at camp Valcartier?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, there is no artillery range at camp Valcartier. Indeed, there was nowhere near sufficient land, until this expropriation took place, to permit either mortar or artillery fire of any kind. The range that exists there is so limited and so congested with unexploded shells that practically no firing can be done. While it is true that units can be moved to other camps, as they are regularly during the summertime to camp Gagetown, for example, this involves a rather short period of time in which there are concentrated exercises, at a considerable transportation cost.

More important than that, Mr. Chairman, is the rather restricted training time in summer, which is not really adequate when one considers the opportunities available for year-round training which will be possible at this camp with the additional property. We will be permitted with this additional acreage to carry out a much wider variation of on-site training during a greater part of the year, which will in turn give us better and more effective use of training time for the troops who are normally stationed at that camp.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps the minister will indicate the number of troops that are stationed at that camp, the type of service for which they are enrolled and the amount of practice firing involved. Perhaps he could indicate how many mortar shells would be used in the course of a year. I might say that I am not entirely unfamiliar with this type of training, but I should like the minister to give us some information in this regard.

Mr. Hellyer: The normal complement at that camp is up to three battalions, plus support troops. The infantry has now placed some orders for mortars, but as my hon. friend must know, I cannot tell him the actual amount of firing that will take place. Perhaps at a later stage when the standing committee meets, the commander of Mobile Command, who is one of the individuals interested in this development, will be called to enlighten my hon. friend as to the exact plans he has in mind to best use the training facilities we have acquired.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister whether the three battalions there are resident throughout the year?

Mr. Hellyer: Three are resident, from time to time, although not at this moment.

Mr. Churchill: Does that mean they are rotated, with other battalions coming in to take their place?

Mr. Hellyer: Sometimes they are rotated overseas, as are other battalions.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps the minister could indicate the amount of mortar firing these units carry out in the course of a year, what proportion of the battalions use mortars, and the number of men involved?

Mr. Hellyer: As I indicated last night, Mr. Chairman, the amount of mortar fire has been severely restricted in recent years as a result of ammunition restrictions. One of the plans we have for re-equipping the armed forces involves the provision of more ammunition so that more live ammunition can be used in training.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I had the understanding that there was a restriction on mortar shells. Could the minister inform us as to the cost of a mortar shell?

Mr. Hellyer: There are many different types of mortar shells. Perhaps if the hon. member will give us the particular type, the mark number and the manufacturer we will be able to look up the cost for him.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I will give the minister that information if he will indicate the type of mortar and the mark number now being used by the battalion. If the minister will tell me the kind of equipment used by the infantry in respect of mortars I will tell him which one I have an interest in.

• (8:30 p.m.)

It is obvious that the minister does not know. It is quite obvious that Valcartier camp is not required for mortar training. There is not a sufficient number of mortar shells at the present time. They happen to be expensive, you know, much more expensive than a rifle cartridge; and they come in different sizes. Also, not all battalions use these sizes and there are not very many men in the mortar platoons or sections that would be using them; and the battalions rotate from camp to camp. I suggest that mortar training could be carried out elsewhere.

The minister is trying to cure a deficiency at Valcartier camp, and perhaps he would answer this question: Where are the mortar ranges for our troops now? That is something that should not be too difficult to answer.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Ask him about motorcycles.

Mr. Hellyer: Gagetown, Petawawa and Wainwright.

Mr. Churchill: And how many troops normally take part in exercises at Gagetown?

Mr. Hellyer: Last year I think the exercises were at brigade level, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Churchill: It is quite obvious that there is plenty of opportunity for the mortar sections and platoons in infantry regiments to be trained elsewhere than at Valcartier. I make a plea to the minister, just as the Leader of the Opposition did before supper, to show some kindness of heart for 25 families who are being dislodged from their homes.

I cannot understand this attitude on the part of the minister. The Prime Minister is here and I am very glad to see him. I understand, Mr. Prime Minister, that these people sent a message to you asking for your interest and your kindly assistance in having this decision of the Department of National Defence altered. Would you not, Mr. Prime Minister—I think you are part Irish, as I am—also take some interest in these descendants of the Irish who are living in this area?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether my hon. friend could give me a few more particulars about this message with which he seems to be so familiar?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I was going to make the appeal to the Prime Minister, too. We take such a great interest in peoples all over the world and yet right in our own country we have a situation that exists adjacent to Valcartier camp that just cannot be justified. I am not going into the detail at this moment, except to say that the hon. member for Québec-Montmorency said this afternoon, "All is well. I get the votes, and everybody is satisfied". Because of the desire of the Prime Minister to get the facts I am going to place them before him in abbreviated form and give him also the source of the information. I begin by referring to the issue of the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph of February 17.

Here is an area adjacent to Valcartier camp in which there are 25 families who have been there for several generations. They received peremptory notice within the last few months, and certainly it appears since the election when the hon. gentleman was able to get the votes, that this land was to be taken over by the Department of National Defence. The hon. member for Québec-Montmorency made the statement this afternoon that all was well and nobody was complaining. I have already placed on the record the views of certain of the people involved in this move. The Prime Minister was communicated with. These people gave up trying to soften the adamant attitude of the Minister of National Defence and the Associate Minister and made the appeal to the Prime Minister of Canada to look into this matter. A protest was organized in Shannon and a petition was sent to the Prime Minister. It was duly acknowledged. One of the letters was actually answered, this article says, by the Associate Minister and in part it read as follows—and this was a letter to Joseph Griffin:

> After the "most careful consideration" the department had come to the conclusion that there was no practical alternatives to the expropriation plan announced by the government.
> "The training exercises to be carried out in the enlarged camp", noted the minister's reply, "necessitate access to the area north of Pinky Mountain through what we might term "The Shannon Corridor".

That was a statement thoroughly resented in this area:

> No top level official of the defence ministry has bothered to go to Shannon to hear the views of those the government is planning to dispossess of a heritage.

These people are just being told, "Get out of here. Away with you. We are going to give you the proper value for your land". The associate minister today spoke as if something beneficent on the part of the government was going to be the result; the government was going to treat these people right in what they would pay them. That is not what they are asking for; they are asking to stay on their land. This article says that no top level official of the Department of National Defence has bothered to hear the views of those the government is planning to dispossess of a heritage. That is what it is, a heritage.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, in what other part of Canada where people have lived for generations would you get other than the strongest resentment when they were ordered to get out of the area because the army had decided they were going to save a few dollars on this program, and these particular 10,000 acres were to be taken over? This article continues:

> The people of Shannon know their village is doomed.

All I have to say is that they ought not to know that. They ought to know that the first responsibility of parliament is to preserve and protect the freedom and rights of individuals. That is what we are here for. Then the article says:

> But they are awaiting that doom with arms folded and in a mood of resignation.

The hon. member for Québec-Montmorency says, "I get the votes".

Mr. Laflamme: I never said that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is no answer to this question. These people as late as February 17 made a strong complaint about their treatment in this connection. The article says:

> They are prepared to fight for what they consider to be a wholly unwarranted and arrogant invasion of their rights.

I use their words and say that what has taken place is unbelievable, namely that we should be met by a solid wall of contemptuous silence toward a situation like this on the part of both these ministers. Further, Mr. Chairman, the article says:

> "Money", snorted one elderly Shannon resident. "What's money? My father lived here and his father before that. How can a few thousand dollars make up for the loss of all these memories!"

Then, as I said this afternoon, there is the editorial headed "Army Takeover Spells End For A Proud, Old Village". This editorial concludes with these words:

Surely, somebody at Ottawa must care.

I say, Mr. Chairman, surely they should. That is why I come to the Prime Minister and ask him this question. Over the years we have not always agreed on things, but we at least agree that when things are wrong they should be rectified. I cannot get anywhere and my hon. friend for Winnipeg South Centre cannot get anywhere with these ministers. These men just say, "This is what you are going to get," to these 25 Irish families, "because we decide it". I am making an appeal to the Prime Minister just as did the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. The matter is before the Prime Minister. Why should these pioneer Canadians whose families have been resident here for generations be told, "There you go. Out you go. Down you go. As far as we are concerned, we give you no consideration".

This situation cannot be allowed to continue. We want nothing excepting justice and fairness. I thought when we raised this matter we would immediately get results. All we hear from the associate minister is that these people will receive compensation. They are not seeking compensation; they are seeking justice and that is what we are asking for on their behalf. I make an appeal to the Prime Minister. I am not going to be brushed aside any longer by these obviously diaphanous undertakings. We want to know, as the Quebec Chronicle asks, if there is someone at Ottawa who cares.

I thought there may be some reason that we could not understand which might be advanced. The minister quite frankly gave his views and said there would be some little saving. We have never used this before for mortar purposes. I ask, then, why now? Last night the minister was casting aspersions on Sir Sam Hughes. I want to tell you that Sir Sam Hughes brought about the greatest congregation in Valcartier in 1914 that existed in any part of the empire in that day outside of the United Kingdom. They came from all parts of Canada, and they have been in Valcartier since. Surely, in 1966, these people are not to be treated as chattels, to be pushed around by ministers, departmental officials or army officers who place a higher value on saving a few dollars by moving a small number of these men who were in this camp.

I intend to find out whether or not human values take second place to administrative dictation, and that is what has happened here. Nobody goes to see them. They complain, they write letters and they receive no response except the kind of letter I quoted a moment ago. Nobody goes out to see them. After all, what are 25 families among 20 million people? Parliament cannot condone this kind of thing. I make an appeal to the Prime Minister because our concern all over the world is for every type of person who receives unjust consideration. Let us now, for once, give to Canadians the same consideration that we invariably evince for people in other parts of the world. These Canadians are entitled to consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I have right here the blues on my last statement—not the first, because I made one before we adjourned for dinner—in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill).

And I quote that statement literally:

I reminded the hon. member that I had already spoken to these parties, that my officials had started negotiations with them—

It is not true that no one went to see them.

—and that, since that time, I had heard no more about the matter, but that I was willing to look into the whole matter once more with a view to finding an adequate solution—

I even used the word "equitable"',

—for these people.

I am most willing to start over again.

Need I say more, Mr. Chairman, I wonder what those words mean. Is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) the only one really interested in the fate of those people? Do people think, for instance, that all those private property expropriations are made coldly, over the heads of everybody, without any consideration for special cases?

I have the greatest respect for the people of Shannon and what they stand for in Canada. They made representations to the department and we did everything in our power to try and comply with their legitimate wishes.

A new problem came up and, as I said, we are prepared to start all over again. What more can we do? I do not think anything more can be expected of a minister who administers his department in the best interest of the country and its people.

As I said earlier, I am ready to renegotiate with those people and their representatives and to re-examine the whole question, and we shall see then. I explained at the outset how the present situation came about. Unfortunately, those people live in what is considered a danger zone. That is why, at the time, we decided it might be better to expropriate them along with the others.

We have never closed the door on a reconsideration of the whole matter. But they did not come back to see us. I saw those people only once. I am willing to meet with them at any time to review the whole matter.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: If there are two more obstinate ministers in the commonwealth, I should like to meet them. We have here, in the Minister of National Defence and the Associate Minister, two gentlemen who stonewall everything we suggest. They just will not move. Now the associate minister is trying to assure us he is going to look after these people. He is willing to negotiate. He is willing to start all over again. Let us get this thing straightened out. Let the Associate Minister of National Defence answer this question: Is all the land which constitutes the territory of these 25 families already expropriated?

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): The information I gave the committee was with reservation. The military authorities who examined the site decided a cannon and long-range mortar shooting-range was needed in the area. I can go on further. I said that I went no further than that.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not negotiation they want.

Mr. Churchill: My second question is this: Have plans been made to establish a mortar range in or adjacent to the area that has been expropriated?

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): I think so, Mr. Chairman. Naturally, this question was brought up in the office a few months ago. I have not seen the file. This matter just cropped up this afternoon, but I think so.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: Well, that is established, that these plans are already under way for a range for long range mortars. My third question is: Have the people been notified that when the range has been established, they will then be in a danger area? This is a great lesson in how you do these things in an autocratic manner. You expropriate land, set up or prepare to set up a range in which dangerous weapons will be fired and shells exploded, then inform the people they will be in a danger zone. Then, what are you to do? If they have objections, you say: We are prepared to negotiate to see what we can do. This is a shocking example of autocracy in action, absolutely shocking. Yet, as the Leader of the Opposition has said we are very concerned, and rightly concerned, with regard to the people of the world who are not being treated justly. Let us start with our own people in our own country. I think this is unjust treatment of 25 Canadian families.

As an earlier hon. member pointed out, there was no need for a mortar range in order to practice our troops. Why cannot the minister, Prime Minister or Associate Minister of National Defence tell us that they will go right back to the beginning, cancel the expropriation proceedings and transfer the mortar range to some other area in which there are not any people living? Why can this range not be established at some other military camp at which there are artillery ranges, because that is where these mortar shells should be fired?

An hon. Member: Is that what you want?

Mr. Churchill: Well I am making suggestions. I did not get the significance of that remark.

Mr. Vincent: He is talking about votes.

Mr. Churchill: Well, let him worry about that part of it; I am trying to instil some reason into the heads of these ministers of defence. They know, as I know, that you do not fire many mortar shells in order to train people to fire them during the course of a year. They know, as I know, that battalions rotate from camp to camp. You can have your mortar training and fire live shells as you reach the appropriate camp. They know, as I know, that you are not firing off live ammunition every month of the year. They also know, as I know, that there is not a surplus of mortar shells at the present time. And they know, as I know, that they are expensive.

Now, where do we go from there? The whole idea is ridiculous, and the sorriest part of it all is the absolutely adamant attitude of these two ministers. How do you make a further appeal to them? There is plenty of land in Canada for the exercises they suggest. Is there some other reason behind this? That is what we should like to find out. I say let us cancel the whole operation and assure these people that they will not be dispossessed; and let us make other plans for the mortar range which apparently is required.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to see the Associate Minister of National Defence is now concerned about the problem which I raised yesterday and again this afternoon. When I put the matter to him initially he seemed quite unperturbed and undisturbed about it. I am sure that if I had not raised it again today he would have allowed the estimates to go through without making any comment upon it.

He now says he is concerned about the individuals who are being dispossessed in this area and that he will take whatever steps or action is possible in order to give them some sort of redress of grievance. They do have a real grievance, Mr. Chairman, because it seems to me wrong for government to use its powers of expropriation in the perverse kind of way it has used them in this particular instance. Why should government, when dealing with a relatively small number of little property holders, have to invoke the power of expropriation without at least attempting first of all to acquire this real property through the process of free negotiation? The minister made mention of the possibility of land speculators getting into the deal. I would say to him that the custom and practice in the provinces over the years has been to resort to negotiation as often as possible, and to resort to expropriation only after negotiation has broken down or ended in stalemate.

There is no great fear of speculation in the particular community involved here. It is not as though we were dealing with a suburban community in a large metropolitan complex. Perhaps there could be the problem of speculation there, but not, Mr. Chairman, in a rural community in Canada.

I submit to the associate minister that the reason he has given is really a poor excuse. I would suggest to him that if he searches for the real reason that expropriation was resorted to in this case he will find it was administrative convenience. It is certainly more convenient to the administration to acquire property in this way. All they have to do is simply to file a plan of expropriation at the land titles office, and that is all there is to it: the land is then vested in the Crown. Then they proceed to negotiate. But that kind of negotiation is, I suggest, spurious. No real bargaining or negotiation can take place. The individuals in this case have, in effect, been robbed of their property rights.

The minister said that having duly considered the matter in the past he came to the conclusion that this land really was necessary for the enlargement of camp Valcartier. However, when you read the excerpts which have appeared in the press from the letter written by the minister to some of the people in that area, you find he makes reference to this need in this particular area—by the way, he refers to it as the "Shannon corridor"—and says that this particular land is needed as a means of access to some government-owned land further north from camp Valcartier.

I would ask the minister whether this land actually was needed for training purposes, or was it needed in the department's opinion merely as a means of access to larger tracts of military training ground held or owned by the government further to the north?

I make no apologies for raising this matter. Someone asked me why it was necessary to raise this question in the House of Commons because, after all, this forum is supposed to deal with affairs and problems on a national scale. It has been suggested that only 25 families are involved here. When large bodies such as governments deal with holders of small plots of property and impinge on their rights, it is necessary to take as firm a stand as possible against any infractions by what the Leader of the Opposition called autocracy. I sincerely hope the minister or the associate minister will look at the file once again to see whether the course of action they have taken was necessary in the first place.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I think the question asked the minister and the associate minister is a very simple one. As has been said, they have expropriated this land by order in council and filed certain documents in connection therewith. The minister has referred to negotiation, but all he has really said to these people is: "We will negotiate with you people but you are going to leave. We will make it so tough that you will leave, but we will negotiate a fair, equitable price". In other words he is saying "We might offer you a few more dollars to get out".

The point which we are making tonight is this. Surely what hon. members are asking for is an undertaking from the minister or the associate minister that when they talk about negotiation they will go back to the cabinet and tell the cabinet they are going to rescind the order in council expropriating this property, and that they are going to take another look at this question and leave these people and their property rights alone. Property rights is one of the basic rights in this land.

I am glad to see the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources listening to this debate because I have had some experience with reference to his department in this regard. Therefore I might be able to kill two pigeons with one stone.

We know all about the sort of equitable negotiations which take place with departments or through ministers, so I think the minister should explain what he means by negotiations. Is he prepared to go back to cabinet and recommend that this order in council be rescinded? Is he prepared to say to these people who have traditionally held this land: "I am going to leave you here and will carry on this enterprise somewhere else without interference with property rights"? Before this item passes we want the minister to clarify exactly what he means.

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) will understand exactly what I mean when he reads in the official report the statement which I made and shall now repeat.

I said that I was ready to negotiate again with the people concerned. Not having heard from those people since the beginning of my correspondence with them, am I convinced and, in spite of that newspaper article, am I in fact certain that they still wish to remain in the expropriated area? I am not convinced of it. I say that I am ready to negotiate with them and to find out precisely what they want. I am ready to treat them equitably. I do not think one could ask for more.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Does the minister mean by that that if he does send an ambassador—I call him that—to find out whether the people concerned want to remain where they are, and if this ambassador who is an agent of the minister speaks to these people and they say to him, "We want to keep our traditional homes", he is going to go along with that request? That is the whole point of my question. Let us forget about the niceties of words; let us get down to brass tacks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is precisely the point.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, when I say I shall do everything in my power, I think that I cannot be asked for more. That is what I undertake to do.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I am not questioning the minister's integrity. He is going to do everything possible, but "possible" may be exactly what has happened to many other Canadians in this country, so far as expropriation proceedings are concerned. If the minister and the associate minister really want to do something to show the right spirit, in response to requests made from this side of the house—because this is an important matter and has been raised by other members in other parties—they must realize that if that type of ambassador is sent out, and if it is found that the people concerned wish to stay where they are, then the department should rescind the order in council and should start expropriation proceedings. When the minister can give that kind of undertaking, then I think we shall be prepared to let the matter pass.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently he says no to that.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask the associate minister if all 25 families are standing firm against this department, or have any of the 25 families shown that they want to compromise, or to negotiate the matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): As far as I can remember, Mr. Chairman, and I hope to be excused because I do not have the file with me, all the persons involved did not sign the petition. That may be due to the fact that the Department of National Defence has come to an agreement with them.

[English]

Mr. Schreyer: Would the minister say whether to the best of his knowledge the people concerned have already been given notice as to a date to vacate the premises?

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): As far as I can recall, no date was set for leaving the premises. On the contrary, those people were given to understand that it would probably take several years before the base was fully enlarged. That was one of the considerations.

It was felt that it would thus be easier for the Department of National Defence to make arrangements with each individual with regard to his relocation. That, I believe, was one of the considerations.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: I wonder if we could now ask the Minister of National Defence about what is really the crux of the matter, and that is the danger area to be established respecting the range for mortar firing. Will the Minister of National Defence inform the committee that a range for mortar firing is essential at Valcartier camp? Will the minister also tell us when he plans to have that range established, and when firing practice will probably begin?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, as I recall the requisition, in order to facilitate battalion training and to enable more realistic and varied exercises to be carried on, a tremendous amount of room is required for deployment and for manoeuvre under conditions of modern warfare. To use modern equipment requires a great deal of space.

In addition to this, it is anticipated that ranges will be required for a variety of weapons including antitank, mortar, and perhaps self-propelled artillery. It takes a lot of space to have these kinds of manoeuvres and exercises. The Associate Minister has already undertaken to take a look at the area again, to determine whether the area in question is an absolute requirement. I do not think he could give any more assurance tonight, because this is not just something that you can say without taking a harder look at, than we have been able to at this time.

Mr. Churchill: You can take a look right now. The minister has now extended his request. He now says that he requests ranges for a variety of weapons. Three or four hours ago it was for mortar fire. That was an undetermined range for an undetermined size of mortar. They are undetermined because these are secrets that he keeps to himself. Now he says that anti-tank weapons may be used and that self-propelled artillery may be used. Therefore he is getting up into the 75 millimeter class, and the 105 class, and I suppose that he will have howitzers and other artillery equipment. Does this mean artillery regiments are going to be shifted to Valcartier camp for their training? I ask the minister that.

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Chairman, certainly not necessarily. But what it will provide is adequate land to exercise whatever units are sent there in the normal course, and it has the facility and the flexibility which we think is essential, as part of our best deployment of the mobile force.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister where the artillery regiment, the anti-tank regiment, the self-propelled artillery, and in fact all the artillery regiments now get their live ammunition training on ranges?

Mr. Hellyer: I think, speaking from memory, that it is at Shilo, Wainwright and Petawawa.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister if during the course of the last 50 years, which is the time that Valcartier camp has been in operation as a military camp, it has been used for artillery purposes? If the minister has not the information on that, can he say anything with respect to the last ten years? Has the camp been used for that purpose within the last ten years?

Mr. Hellyer: I am not a military historian, Mr. Chairman. I cannot answer that question offhand.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he should be an historian.

Mr. Churchill: I think if the minister were to become a military historian that he would know something about warfare, which at the present time he does not. That is one of the greatest weaknesses in this minister. He does not know these things. Now he has been talking about establishing a larger area for training at Valcartier. First he is going to have a mortar range; then he extends it to an anti-tank range; then to self-propelled artillery. Is the minister aware that for 50 years the camp has been used for musketry purposes?

Mr. Hellyer: We are trying to get out of the musket age.

Mr. Churchill: I hope that the minister with his great interest in mobility will make arrangements to have a mobile casualty station out in the front of this building so that he and his associates can be treated for their wounds tonight, because they are suffering. They are gradually bleeding to death I think.

• (9:10 p.m.)

We want to get some satisfactory answers from the minister instead of these casual, flippant replies. Artillery training is carried out, as he mentioned, at three locations, possibly in others. This has been going on satisfactorily for years, throughout two great wars and the war in Korea. Why this great interest in Valcartier? Why dislodge 25 families? This is something the minister has not explained. If he would say right now: "We do not require a range at Valcartier camp for mortar fire, anti-tank fire and artillery fire", then the associate minister would have nothing to worry about, because those 25 families would not be in danger and need not be disturbed. That would settle it.

Mr. Pugh: If I understood the translation correctly—and the translation came through well—the Associate Minister said the department would renegotiate. I should like to know whether he meant it would renegotiate under the umbrella of expropriation. If this is the case, it would be very hollow renegotiation. The minister has been asked whether expropriation will take place. He has not answered that question. That is the whole point. It is a question which must be answered before this item passes.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne): Mr. Chairman, here is the situation. According to the information I have, the people of Shannon are in a danger zone because the camp at Valcartier is being enlarged.

I now commit myself to reexamine the situation with them. If, at that time, we reach the same conclusion, namely that they are in a danger zone and, therefore, that it is useful and even necessary to expropriate them as we did others, I am ready to discuss it with them. That is all I can say.

I did not decide to enlarge the camp at Valcartier. On the other hand, it is my duty to transact with the people concerned in those expropriations. I do so with the greatest honesty and objectivity possible. Needless to say that, in a case like this, the human factor will be taken into consideration with all the objectivity and understanding required.

Since this debate began, the Conservatives have paid tribute to the fact that I did consider the human factor when applying the regulations. Therefore, there is no reason to believe that, in the case of the citizens of Shannon, I will be different from the man I was when dealing with individual cases.

[English]

Mr. Pugh: I believe all of us in this committee know the many great human qualities of the minister who has just resumed his seat. He has told us in no uncertain terms that all his negotiating is based on the fact that the range is to be enlarged and that anybody who finds himself within the danger area will be told to get out.

Mr. Woolliams: Or have his head blown off.

Mr. Pugh: Nothing short of that. The minister says that he may renegotiate and give these people a few more dollars. The fact that they want to stay in the area has already been decided. They want to stay.

Now I wish to ask the minister a question I asked him earlier. Is it absolutely necessary for the safety of Canada and for the saving of a few dollars—if dollars are to be saved on this item— to go ahead and enlarge this camp so as to encompass a mortar range. That is the whole theme of the discussion which has taken place in this committee.

A good deal of opposition has been expressed with regard to taking over this area. I see the Prime Minister is just leaving. The Prime Minister, having just received a telegram on this subject can say: "I am sorry. I did not hear about it." Well, the telegram has been acknowledged. He has left the chamber without even listening to this discussion. My question to the minister is one which must be answered: Is it absolutely necessary to enlarge this camp to include a mortar range?

Mr. Hellyer: When one tries to define absolutes he is soon apt to run into difficulty. But after close examination over a number of years it was concluded that the expansion of this camp was essential in the national interest— that increased training facilities should be provided there and that a large area should be set aside for the training of a substantial proportion of the Canadian army which is stationed at this camp.

The area was laid out with these requirements in mind. One can always argue a little over where the boundaries must be. That is why I stated earlier that the associate minister would be glad to look at this question to see whether in fact the Shannon area is essential and whether or not it is a danger area. This is something which requires the most careful examination and I do not think we can give any absolute assurance, except to say to the hon. member that the expansion of this camp is definitely in the national interest.

Mr. Pugh: I think I must go further into this question. The minister has told us he will have inquiries made to determine whether it is essential that Shannon be taken over and the 25 families moved for their own safety. But surely, if appropriation proceedings have been taken to their present stage there must be an element of danger. Surely it is not intended to move a whole village if there is no element of danger.

Now I should like to ask the minister to tell us how many troops will be trained in mortar firing—how many will actually fire a mortar at Valcartier? What is his projection of the cost of training these troops there as against the cost of training them at Shilo or Gagetown or on any other range in Canada? Is it really necessary that there should be this extension to the range because of the need for firing mortars or other types of weapons?

I should like to know how many people are to be trained there. I see the higher paid help are talking it over carefully with the minister. Obviously he does not know much about it himself.

• (9:20 p.m.)

The Chairman: Shall item 15 carry?

Mr. Pugh: I think we are getting an answer to this. It may take a little while, but I will stand on my feet and it will save your asking that question again, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Churchill: Repeat the question. The minister may have forgotten it.

Mr. Pugh: If it is necessary to go through expropriation proceedings and move 25 families away from the village, then obviously a great deal of thought has been given by the minister to the type of training that is going to be carried out at Valcartier. He says it is absolutely necessary. I am asking, necessary for what? I am asking him how many men are going to be trained here? He could stand up and give us a brief rundown just exactly why it is necessary to have this as a mortar range. We could restrict it to a mortar range at present and then go on to deal with the other equipment.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I would like to give my hon. friend the information he requires, but as he would well know, the training requirements would fluctuate from time to time depending on the plans of the mobile commander. I am sure if I gave a figure now and it proved in actual practice to be higher or lower than that called for in the plans of the commander, the hon. member would accuse me of bad faith. I have no intention of pinning down figures on this at the moment. If he wants to ask the mobile commander what his plans are in a general way, then the hon. member could do that when the commander appears before the standing committee. But to try and say X number of men will be firing X number of rounds would not be helpful at the present time. I do not want to mislead the committee by giving figures which might not prove to be accurate later on.

Mr. Churchill: You just don't know.

Mr. Pugh: We still come back to the fact that a village is going to be expropriated and that 25 families who have been living there for a number of generations have been asked to leave. It seems to me we could hold item 15 until we get these answers. Surely they are not hard to find out. The minister, with all the high class weaponry he has been talking about, must know the state of training to which he must bring his troops so that they can use this weaponry.

My knowledge goes back to the actual use of a mortar, but possibly not the latest type of mortar he is talking about. However, I cannot see there is going to be all that number of rounds of mortar fired each and every year. It seems to me we must be able to get some sort of reasonable answer. Let us say that if there are few men who are being trained, then there is no use for the extension of Valcartier. Or let us say a great number of men are being trained, then within the reasonable bounds of expense other camps such as Gagetown or Shilo could be used for the same purpose. My hon. friend from Swift Current-Maple Creek mentions Wainwright.

Quebec is just one portion of Canada, and all of Canada has tremendous areas which can be used for training without the necessity of expropriation. I know the position of the associate minister who, as I said before, is an extraordinarily fair man, but he has been handed a mandate and the mandate is expropriation. It is nothing short of expropriation. He says he will renegotiate, but if expropriation is the aim, then nothing short of expropriation will be used in the case of this village and these 25 families. Surely to goodness the amount of training which requires this vast expansion of the camp must be known and should be told to the committee. I cannot see any reason why we cannot have a reasonable answer.

The minister mentioned that he did not want to mislead the committee, that we would damn him for giving an answer that is incorrect, but within reason surely he can tell us how many men are going to be trained in that place. I do not think we can pass this item because, if we do, then this thing goes by the board. If we let it go by and wait for the Standing Committee on Defence to get together to hear all these witnesses, at that stage the renegotiation will have taken place and, against the will of a number of people, the village of Shannon will have disappeared.

I must re-emphasize this point, that this is being done against the will of those who have been there for generations. I want to have a little more information on this project before I will let item 15 pass.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, as I already explained, there will be up to 3,000 men training at this camp. They will be training in all arms and using the materiel and equipment available to them.

Mr. Pugh: You say 3,000 men will be training in all arms. I would say that is just a trifle vague. If they are training in all arms, how many would be trained in the use of this particular type of mortar—not all mortars but this particular type which has made Valcartier unsafe for the 25 families?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't get in a rush, you fellows.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Any chance of getting a change of ministers?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pugh: The question was, how many of these 3,000 men will be trained to use this extension mortar?

Mr. Churchill: The old C.C.F. party would have been concerned about a thing like this.

Mr. Lewis: Don't you get so concerned about us.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pugh: We want the answer.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could have the committee proceed? It is very nice to look at the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary, but really there is no reason why he should make a farce of the committee. If he has any questions he wishes to discuss, they could be discussed or put; but just to take the floor, hold it, stand and refuse to speak, and refuse to sit down, obviously shows an intention to stall the committee. That is perfectly legitimate if that is what the opposition wishes. That is their choice, but we do have certain rules applicable to debates in the house and in committee, and, Mr. Chairman, I respectfully suggest they be observed. If the hon. member wishes to speak he may speak. If he does not wish to speak, then he should resume his seat and let the item proceed.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the words of a minister who has just arrived in the chamber. He apparently does not appreciate the situation that has arisen in the committee tonight. He says the hon. member refuses to speak. If he will examine Hansard tomorrow he will see that is not the case. It is the case of the minister refusing to answer.

I would say to the minister, who has tried to throw a castigation against me, that I am not standing here to be looked at. I am thinking of those people in that village who have asked parliament to do something about it, who have asked the Prime Minister to do something about it. The telegram which they sent to him was acknowledged by him. He was in the house and he was asked questions, but he did not answer. Now we are merely following through, and this is for the minister's ears who came in late and raised his voice in the middle of the debate. Procedurally I pay great respect to him, but when he comes in suddenly and says let us get on with this because of various and sundry, I do not agree with him one little bit.

Mr. Chairman, you know I have been asking a question which I feel deserves an answer. I have no wish to hold up this committee in any way, shape or form, but I do want to get an answer to this question. Furthermore the Minister of National Defence, who stands on his two feet at the drop of a hat and pretends to know everything that is going on in National Defence and in foreign affairs in this country, does not know the small things which go to make up morale and so on in the army, navy, air force or in any of our services. It seems to me, in a matter which is as important as this—the moving of 25 families who have been there for generations—there is no reason why he cannot tell us why the range must be taken over under expropriation.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make it clear that I am just as interested in these 25 families as is my hon. friend, but if he pursues his questioning, I am sure nature will make it 26 families before we are finished.

An hon. Member: Arrogant statement.

Mr. Churchill: Smart Aleck, flippant answer.

An hon. Member: Can we hear from the house leader now.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. We have heard from this minister a smart Aleck and flippant answer, which is typical of the minister and typical of this government.

Mr. Nielsen: Arrogant.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, it is arrogant. There are several ways out of this difficulty the government is in. I have pointed out two ways for the minister, and other members have mentioned the same—an order in council rescinding the earlier one, doing away with the expropriation. That settles the matter. If that cannot be done or if they do not want to do that, the second alternative is for the Minister of National Defence to declare that a mortar, anti-tank or artillery range which would put the 25 families in a dangerous position will not be established in the area. That is all he has to say.

So, there are those two courses which I say can be followed. Our duty here is to speak on behalf of those Canadian citizens who have put forward a legitimate grievance, have carried it as far as the Prime Minister, and still have not been satisfied. During the course of our discussion tonight we have found out that the Minister of National Defence does not know exactly what he wants at Valcartier camp; he does not know how many men would be trained there; he is not able to tell us how many regiments or battalions would be moved in and out of that camp during the course of a year. He has admitted there is a shortage of mortar ammunition. He is so ignorant of the problem that at one time he thought it was for a mortar range and then enlarged it to anti-tank, or self-propelled artillery, so the minister is in a state of confusion.

The Associate Minister of National Defence talks about negotiating with the people involved, but it has been pointed out time and time again that it is within the arbitration proceedings and that it is just then a matter of settling on how much time, what the price is, and things of that nature.

That is not what we are asking for. We say leave the people there. Valcartier camp has been used for over 50 years and this is the first time I have heard it is not adequate for the desired purpose. Since the second world war an enormous training area has been established in the Atlantic provinces in order that we could train a whole division, and this is where the troops go for their training. The smaller camps are not put under the same pressure. That was in days gone by; that was the whole purpose of camp Gagetown, and I was here in this house when it was debated and set up. There is where you have the adequate training area for large bodies of troops.

The minister has pointed out the areas which have been used for years for artillery and mortar purposes. Why is he trying to create another and do it at the expense of 25 families? I hope no one will say that 25 families are not important: They are very important.

An hon. Member: They are laughing at it over there.

Another hon. Member: Nobody said that.

Mr. Churchill: Particularly when the families have been settled there for a long time in that area, why should they be dislodged in peacetime? If it were wartime they would not object and no one here would object, if it was done in the national interest; but this happens to be peacetime and the army is training for peace keeping purposes. There has not been much emphasis by the Minister of National Defence in the last three years on training for war. He talks about training for peace keeping exercises. Our troops which have been used abroad in the last several years in these peace keeping operations never have had to use mortar shells, so why the insistence suddenly on having training in the firing of mortars? What is the minister planning for? Does he have some expedition overseas that he wants to train troops for? This does not fit in with his white paper on defence. There was nothing in the white paper on defence which indicated we would have to do intensive training with mortars. The emphasis in the white paper is on mobility and realities. The minister likes to talk about realities. The reality of the situation is that this is peacetime.

Canada's policy with regard to her armed forces is for peace keeping operations, where mortars are not required. Why then do we have to extend the military camp and have an enlarged artillery range and dispossess people, and then do it in this, what I call, underhand way—expropriate, set up an artillery range, and then tell the people they are in danger and must move out. I think that is a very poor method by which to deal with Canadian citizens. If I was one of those living there I would enter my protest as well; but I am doing it on their behalf. The Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph has taken up the cudgels on behalf of these people with a very strong editorial in the February 17 issue of that paper, asking parliament to look at this problem. Mr. Chairman, you know where we stand on it. If the minister will take either one of the two courses I have suggested, we could settle it tonight. He still has an opportunity.

If he is not going to take any action but is going to think about it overnight that is fine, because we are not going to be frightened by people on the other side of the house.

Mr. Woolliams: Nor by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Churchill: Nor will we be frightened by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Woolliams: He has now left the chamber.

Mr. Churchill: He came in and said this was a farce. Surely it is not a farce when we are dealing with 25 families of Canadian citizens who are being dispossessed. Even if they were not Canadian citizens it would be appropriate for us to deal with a matter like this here in this chamber. However, these are Canadians of the fifth generation and are members of one of the founding races of this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Now they are laughing at the Irish.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I call upon every member of parliament with Irish blood in his veins to recognize that fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: It is all right to laugh at the English or the Scots, but do not laugh at the Irish or you will be in trouble. The members on the other side of this house are making a joke of this situation, but it is no joke. These families are Canadians of the fifth generation and are now being dispossessed in the middle of the twentieth century. This is a shocking way in which to carry on. We often talk about human rights and are very often disturbed about people around the world who are attempting to gain their freedom and their liberty; yet this is the way Canada acts with regard to her own citizens.

Mr. Chairman, we have appealed to the two ministers involved and to the Prime Minister in regard to the crux of this matter; what more can we do?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Churchill: Some of the Grits over there say to sit down. They say let this pass. Those are the trained seals who take orders from above. Thank goodness there are some independents on this side of the house. Parliament exists for the purpose of defending these people.

Mr. Groos: Let us hear from some of the others.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member like to speak for himself and say something on behalf of these 25 families. I will relinquish the floor to him if he has the courage to get up and speak.

Mr. Groos: Certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to say that in considering the attitude taken by hon. members opposite when we were considering the Columbia river development proposals which required the dispossession of some 500 families in the national interest, I find that attitude in strange contrast now when we are talking about the same sort of thing but where only 25 families must have their land expropriated in the national interest. We are now being told that this is a terrible thing to have done.

Mr. Herridge: As a member of the group which first raised this issue, let me say that we are certainly behind these appeals to the minister to reconsider the welfare of these 25 families. Mr. Chairman, I cannot help but remember that there were 500 families in my area who were being treated worse as a result of the Columbia river proposal, but what did they do to defend those 500 families? I think we should be somewhat consistent in our approach to life. Our good friends in the Progressive Conservative party did nothing to defend the rights of those 500 families who may have their lands expropriated, some of which were third generation Canadians.

At least our good friends the Liberals have been consistent; they did nothing about those families and they are doing nothing about the 25 families who are being left to suffer the life to which the government of this country has condemned them.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I must say as a new member sitting here tonight I was amazed at the revelation of how the mood of the house can change so quickly in respect of what seemed to me a rather insignificant detail. Let me suggest that the expansion of this base involves more than 25 families, with all due respect to the hon. member for Kootenay West. However, with respect also to my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, exerting some of the independence that he counselled the other side of the house to have, and knowing that I have more Irish in my blood than a lot of people in Shannon, let alone the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre suggest that there is a third way out of this morass that we now find ourselves in, which I think would meet with the approval of some of the members in the back benches.

Perhaps the minister and his associate could assure the house that nothing further will be done in respect of this expropriation until the whole matter is considered and studied by the committee, which is where this matter should be examined in detail. With that type of assurance, that the merit of this proposed expansion and the dispossession or displacement of the 25 families will be studied by the committee, I think this whole matter could be settled. If that kind of assurance could be given, I suggest it would meet with the objections raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Yukon, so that we could study the suggestions and detail in committee and get on now with the debate.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I will give the undertaking that nothing will be done for several weeks and until the committee has had an opportunity to look at the situation, if that meets with the general wish of hon. members.

I must point, out, however, that as minister I have no control over the committee or the order of business it undertakes. We will undertake to make witnesses available on this subject as soon as the committee desires. On that basis we will be glad to give that undertaking.

Mr. Churchill: Will the minister go a little further and give us the assurance that nothing further will be done with regard to the 25 families involved in the camp Valcartier expansion until one year from today, and only then after the matter is brought again before the House of Commons for consideration?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre should take a lesson in moderation from his young colleague who is trying to be helpful and reasonable. Those are two qualities which my hon. friend could use in much greater abundance.

I have offered to meet the suggestion that was made by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings because I felt it was reasonable. I cannot agree with the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre because I feel it to be unreasonable. All night he has suggested that because for 50 years we have not needed a range capability at Valcartier there should be no change. As much as he would like me to say that the procedures of the last 50 years will not be changed for all time, I am not in a position to do so. As a matter of fact, there are changes that have to be made and I think that the expansion of the facilities at camp Valcartier to provide adequate training exercise ground for the units stationed there is essential in the interests of national defence.

An hon. Member: Why send this to a committee?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am not easily intimidated by the clacking of the other side of the house. I listened to the sage advice of the Minister of National Defence. The suggestion that this matter be referred to a committee is fine, but what will then happen when the committee brushes it aside or perhaps does not even consider it because, as the minister said, it might not come before that committee? The committee cannot make a decision. It can only talk about the situation, examine the facts and look at all the particulars, but it cannot make an effective decision. The decision can only be made by the minister and his cabinet, and that is why we are discussing the issue here rather than in a committee.

If the minister will promise that this matter after discussion in committee will be brought back into the house for the approval of the House of Commons, that might be a different thing. He did not suggest that. I think my suggestion to him that he postpone everything for one year makes sense.

An hon. Member: Rescind the order in council.

Mr. Churchill: To rescind the order in council would be the easy way out, and that should be done. The minister gets a great deal of satisfaction out of referring to "one your age", meaning me. The fact that I participated in the first world war seems to have disturbed him. I was also in the second world war. Then he talks about my historical outlook on life and thinks it is smart to say that because something has been done for 50 years it should not necessarily be changed for the future. This is, of course, just utter rot and nonsense.

If Valcartier camp and the other camps in this country have been found to be satisfactory for 50 years, I say to the minister, show cause why it should be changed. The cause that resulted in the establishment of Gagetown was that we did not have facilities to train large bodies of troops together. That change was made. But the minister cannot show cause why we need more mortar ranges in this country. I do not know whether he even knows what a mortar is, what type of shell is fired from a mortar or the effect of it. The minister has not shown cause why this change should be made; yet callously and indifferently he is willing to expropriate property and drive out of their homes 25 families.

This is not in the national interest when it comes to military matters. There is no similarity between this and other examples that were used tonight. This change is simply required for military purposes, for warlike purposes, and for this reason the minister is going to dispossess 25 families of their homes. This is what we are objecting to, Mr. Chairman. I will make one final suggestion to the minister. Let us stand item 15 and let him think it over tonight, and we might pass the other items that are before us in committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, may I put a question to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre?

Mr. Vincent: Since when are you the department's spokesman?

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): Never mind the department, you had your turn.

Could the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who stated many times, perhaps ten or twelve times, that Camp Valcartier, in the province of Quebec, has been a good training camp for the past 50 years, tell us tonight whether, according to him, there has been any change in the weapons made available to the Canadian Army in the past 50 years?

[English]

Mr. Vincent: That is the joke of the night.

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre would prefer me to put my question in English, as he is of Irish descent.

Mr. Churchill: If the colleagues of the hon. member would remain quiet, I could hear him; but they make so much noise that I cannot hear what is going on.

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): Since you are a former minister of national defence I suggest that you must be well aware of the fact that for the last 50 years there has been a great deal of change in weapons used by the Canadian army. If there has been such a change in weapons I suppose they need a different kind of camp in which to train the army. I ask the hon. member, is this possible?

Mr. Churchill: I do not know what my hon. friend's experience has been, but I know a fair bit about weapons and the changes in weapons over the years.

Mr. Langlois (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, about 12 times today the hon. member has spoken about musketry training at Valcartier and about moving these families from the area of the camp. Does the former minister suggest that instead of moving these 25 families from Valcartier we should close Valcartier and ship it out west, maybe?

Mr. MacEwan: That was a good maiden speech.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether by now the Minister of National Defence has been able to obtain a little more detail with regard to the 3,000 troops that are to be trained at Valcartier each year. How many of these troops will be trained in the use of long-range mortars?

The minister has made no attempt to answer my question. I wonder whether he would answer it now. He is so busy perhaps looking the question up that he has not been able to answer it. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I was wondering whether the minister could let us know now, with regard to the 3,000 troops who are being trained at Valcartier or will be trained there, how many will be trained in the use of long-range mortars such as he has been talking about? If the minister cannot give me the answer now, it being almost ten o'clock I wonder whether we could stand this item over until tomorrow, when I am sure his officials will be able to dig out the answer and let us have it. This is a matter of training in being at the present time or training projected, and if it is training projected this information should be as readily available as if it were training in being.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, will the minister say whether he will study this question overnight, it being ten o'clock now? I would like to have the answer. I believe we are entitled to know the use that is going to be made of this mortar range and how many troops will be trained on it. The minister probably has the answer now, if he would stop reading his last speech.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Item stands.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—QUEBEC SUGGESTIONS ON CROP INSURANCE

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, it is to the Minister of Agriculture that I am directing my question tonight with regard to the federal-provincial conference held a few days ago and concerning the Crop Insurance Act and its application to the province of Quebec and elsewhere.

During the last election campaign, we advocated the establishment of a dairy commission. We also advocated the establishment of a feed grain board for eastern Canada and British Columbia. We advocated amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act so as to include farmers. We also advocated making the Crop Insurance Act more flexible so that Quebec farmers might take advantage thereof.

Last year, the situation was disastrous for several farmers of the province of Quebec because the crops were poor. Thus, arose the necessity and urgency of extending the provisions of the Crop Insurance Act to farmers of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I shall point out, before putting more specifically the question that I wish to address to the Minister of Agriculture, that the problem of distribution will soon be before us; I want to mention the fact that, even if the new electoral distribution has become a demographic necessity, the voice of the farmer is nevertheless threatened by this redistribution problem. For instance, I am thinking of the fact that the constituency of Lotbinière, which is the one I represent and which is essentially rural, will become a mostly urban constituency.

This could also apply to the constituency of Bellechasse, in which the town of Montmagny will be integrated. It could apply to the constituency of Nicolet-Yamaska, which will be absorbed by that of Drummond.

Consequently, the voice of the farmer is threatened by the fact that members will no longer be interested in letting it be heard so loudly, since the constituencies will become more or less urban.

That is why, during this short debate, I take this opportunity to call attention to this situation which could be dangerous and to say, in my capacity of member for Lotbinière, that I shall make every effort, along with all my colleagues from rural constituencies, to have this threat removed.

I am asking the minister what are the results of the last federal-provincial conference on crop insurance.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, crop insurance, as the hon. member is no doubt aware, comes under provincial jurisdiction. The provinces are responsible for the organization and administration of these programs. The federal act provides that Canada may assist the provinces in implementing their crop insurance programs through contributions to administrative costs and payments necessary to make these programs self-supporting. In addition, Canada can agree to re-insure a substantial part of the risks the provinces incur under these plans.

Certain provinces were hesitant to establish crop insurance because their farmers stated the indemnities currently authorized under federal legislation are insufficient to be worth while. Some provinces, in addition, criticized federal legislation for not allowing Canadian contributions to insurance plans covering fodder crops.

Shortly after my appointment as Minister of Agriculture, I gave certain provincial authorities to understand that before making a final decision on the amendments to the federal act I would recommend during the current session, I would call a conference of provincial authorities to give them the opportunity to state the amendments they would suggest. Representatives from the ten provinces were in attendance at this conference held last Thursday.

The provinces of Ontario and Quebec have indicated that they were chiefly interested in establishing crop insurance schemes for fodder, especially for dairy cattle.

A great deal of the day was devoted to a discussion on that kind of crop insurance. The federal government is now aware of the views of the provinces and that will enable it to determine the type of changes that should be presented to parliament. It is my firm intention to do everything I can—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister, but his time is over.

LABOUR RELATIONS—WHITESHELL, MAN.—STRIKE AT NUCLEAR RESEARCH STATION

Mr. E. R. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, the strike of nuclear reactor operators at the Whiteshell nuclear research establishment has been on for a week now. Normally one would not raise a matter such as this in the House of Comons but would leave it to the process of collective bargaining. However, there are one or two aspects of Crown corporation or government policy connected with this labour dispute which deserve an airing here and an answer by the minister and his department.

Without going into the detail of the points in dispute between the striking workers and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, I can say that the main cause of the strike has to do with Atomic Energy of Canada rigidly insisting on maintaining an artificial wage differential as between its Chalk River establishment and its Pinawa establishment. Apparently the reason given for maintaining this differential is that the Pinawa area is in a low wage area of the country; therefore the corporation refuses to bring the wages up to parity with wages paid at Chalk River.

Mr. Speaker, this differential has no basis in economic fact, because research indicates pretty clearly that the prevailing rate of pay to similar employees working for Manitoba Hydro and for other corporations is actually above the rate paid to operators in Pinawa, and even at Chalk River. Therefore in that sense it is not a low wage area at all.

Furthermore it has been proven that the cost of living to the workers in the nuclear research establishment in Pinawa is actually higher than the cost of living encountered by the workers at the Chalk River establishment. The policy that is being maintained by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited in this regard is actually not proportionate to the cost of living, but is actually perverse, having regard to the cost of living. It is very difficult for the nuclear reactor operators to accept this policy. There is serious questioning of it.

Furthermore, allegations are made to the effect that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited in this regard is following cabinet directives. I should like to hear from the minister or from his parliamentary secretary some concrete comment about this, because if it is a fact that cabinet is issuing directives to Atomic Energy to maintain these wage differentials, it amounts to a serious kind of regional discrimination. I think not only the workers of that area, but the people of Manitoba have every right to demand that this policy be reversed.

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the member for Springfield (Mr. Schreyer) originally asked two basic questions. The first is, has the minister involved himself in any steps or taken any action to settle the strike at Whiteshell nuclear research establishment. The answer is no. However, the minister has been fully informed regarding the negotiations between Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

The second question is, has the minister or the government issued any directive to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited relative to wage levels and wage differentials to be paid as between the Chalk River plant and the Whiteshell plant. Again the answer is no.

However, it is common knowledge that different hourly rates are paid across the country for the same work having regard to the wage structure existing in different parts of Canada. It is also the practice of the federal civil service to pay prevailing rates to its hourly paid employees.

I should like to include a little background with these remarks. In February, 1965, the Canadian Union of Public Employees was certified by the Canada Labour Relations Board as bargaining agent for the hourly paid nuclear reactor operators employed by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited at its Whiteshell nuclear research establishment. There are currently about 28 in this classification, out of a total Whiteshell staff of 400.

Negotiations commenced in June, and before long a tentative agreement had been reached on a number of items. When the parties were unable to agree on the remaining items, including wages, a conciliation officer was appointed by the federal Department of Labour at the union's request, and subsequent meetings were held under his auspices.

During this period, A.E.C.L. was also negotiating with 15 other unions representing some 2,000 employees in various classifications at Chalk River and Ottawa. The first settlements came in August, when A.E.C.L. reached agreement at conciliation boards with 11 unions representing hourly-paid employees at Chalk River. Settlements were reached shortly thereafter with the five other unions at Chalk River and Ottawa, leaving the two Whiteshell unions outstanding.

Immediately following the Chalk River settlements, substantially improved offers, matching the increases accepted by the Chalk River and Ottawa unions, were made to the two Whiteshell unions, and rejected by them. As a conciliation board was being set up to consider similar questions between the company and the Whiteshell machinists union, A.E.C.L. and Canadian Union of Public Employees representatives agreed to suspend their discussions until that board had met and made its report.

The Conciliation Board met in October, and issued its report late in November. A settlement between A.E.C.L. and the Whiteshell machinists union based on this report was finally achieved, after further meetings, in January, 1966.

Negotiations between A.E.C.L. and the Canadian Union of Public Employees had meanwhile resumed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is with great regret that I must interrupt the hon. member's very interesting remarks, because unfortunately his time has expired.

FINANCE—U.S. TAX ON RAPESEED OIL AND MEAL

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Minister of Finance is not in his seat. However, I notice that his parliamentary secretary is, and I hope that he will transmit the remarks I have to make to the minister.

I welcome this opportunity to debate the question of tariffs and duties on edible oils. Canadian edible oils, particularly rapeseed, are subject to an import tax amounting to one cent per pound when imported into the United States though edible oils produced elsewhere can enter Canada duty free.

This is a question with which I have been concerned for some time. In January of 1962 I presented a brief to the Tariff Board —reference No. 131—when hearings took place here in Ottawa. I made a submission on behalf of the oil seed producers of Canada, but nothing was done; nothing came out of that hearing.

As you are probably aware, Mr. Speaker, rapeseed when processed is manufactured into an edible oil comparable to soybean oil, cottonseed oil, peanut oil or any other oil on the vegetable oil market. A by-product of processing is the meal which is used in the production of livestock and poultry feeds and concentrates.

At the present time our tariff structure allows soybean oil, the largest competitor to rapeseed oil, into Canada from the United States under a 20 per cent tariff. However, the soybeans themselves can be brought in duty free and so can other oil seeds.

These seeds and beans are transported into Canada and processed here. Then the processed oil is sold on the Canadian market. The Canadian processor may also ship the oil back into the United States duty free or export the oil and meal under the British preferential tariff, provided they contain 25 per cent Canadian content. Cottonseed oil, peanut oil and corn oil all enter Canada duty free.

On the other hand, while no tariff is placed against it, Canadian rapeseed sold in the United States is subject to an import tax of one cent per pound. Canadian rapeseed meal going into the United States bears a tariff of $6 per ton.

In addition to exports from the United States, rapeseed oil which originates in Sweden or West Germany can also be brought into this country free of duty, though our own oil must pay duties or tariffs if exported to those countries. This is a disgrace.

I have taken my present stand on many occasions and when I presented by brief to the Tariff Board exactly four years ago I thought some steps would be taken to correct this injustice. However, nothing has been done, and nothing is in the process of being done in connection with this matter.

I should like the Minister of Finance to look into this question and explain why the Tariff Board has not taken any steps to remedy this deplorable situation as far as Canadian edible oils are concerned. I should also like the Minister of Finance to take this matter into consideration when he prepares his budget.

Not long ago—last December, in fact—a symposium was held sponsored by the Department of Industry. I must congratulate the rapeseed industry, in particular, on the success of this symposium. Dr. Weinberg who was instrumental in arranging this gathering, as well as Dr. Rupert of the Department of Industry, have done wonderful work. The professors and scientists from all the universities of the prairies—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—took part in these discussions to promote the rapeseed industry and the edible oil industry in Canada.

Mr. Jean Chrétien (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I will bring to the attention of the minister the very interesting case he put before the house tonight, but I am glad to inform him that the Canadian tariff does provide free entry for rapeseed oil. For most uses rapeseed oil is subject to a duty into the United States.

The tariff board in its report on reference No. 131—oil seeds, vegetable oils and related products—proposed a rate of 10 per cent most favoured nation on crude rapeseed oil and 17.5 per cent most favoured nation on refined rapeseed oil. The board's recommendations are being given consideration.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

SHIPBUILDING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING SUBSIDIES

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) asked me the other day to table my correspondence with the premier of British Columbia concerning the shipbuilding subsidies program, and I am very glad to do this now.

PRIVILEGE

MISS LAMARSH—REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING CENTENNIAL ADVERTISING CONTRACTS

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege related to certain remarks reported to have been made in Toronto yesterday by one Jerry Goodis, president of the Toronto advertising firm of Goodis, Goldberg, Soren Limited.

As reported in the business section of this morning's Globe and Mail—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister. Notice was given to the Chair within a few minutes of two o'clock or around two o'clock that this question of privilege might be raised by the minister. However, as far as I know, no written notice was given as required by the rules, and I suggest in the circumstances that the minister cannot raise a question of privilege unless the house desires to allow the minister to make a statement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

Miss LaMarsh: I thank the house for its indulgence, Mr. Speaker.

As reported in the business section of this morning's Globe and Mail, Mr. Goodis has publicly accused me of what he calls partisan pork-barrelling in the allotment of what he refers to—

An hon. Member: What's wrong with that?

Miss LaMarsh: —as $5 million worth of centennial advertising and promotion.

If I might correct Mr. Goodis on one point of fact at the outset, I would point out that the $5 million figure referred to represents the total amount of advertising and promotion to be contracted by government agencies—and this includes the government travel bureau as well as the centennial commission—for the promotion inside Canada and without of our centennial celebrations.

Of that amount authorization has to date been finalized for only $1,260,000. This involves promotion and advertising inside Canada by the centennial commission. Within this amount three separate contracts have been awarded; one for English language advertising, one for French language advertising and one for the special promotion of the Canada Festival performing arts program. The award of a fourth, for public relations services, currently is under study.

As to the three that have been awarded, I wish to make it clear that these were matters initiated and decided by the centennial commission itself. The procedure followed by the commission in this regard was completely in line with that normally followed by all governments and private interests in this field. It was—and I have a statement from the general manager of this organization to confirm this—in line to the letter with the code of ethics laid down by the Institute of Canadian Advertising.

The commission, as is done in every other case, invited certain advertising and public relations agencies to bid for the contracts.

The number invited totalled not four, as was suggested by Mr. Goodis, but 15. The five agencies which were invited to bid for the major English advertising contract in particular account among them for 40 per cent of all the business done in this field in Canada. Rather than being the "pets" of any minister or government, they are acknowledged by both public and private interests to be the leading practitioners of their profession in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has great hesitation in interrupting the minister, particularly in view of the fact that she has received the consent or unanimous agreement of the house to make a statement at this time, presumably on the question of privilege. I have a very serious doubt as to whether it is a question of privilege at all. The minister is questioning the accuracy of statements made outside the house, and I suggest to her that perhaps another opportunity might be afforded to her to rectify the record, if she feels that the record ought to be rectified.

I submit with the greatest of deference to the minister that there is really no question of privilege. I have heard the substance of what she proposes to say at this time, and as I say I hesitate to interrupt her, but I would ask her not to pursue her statement and to bring it on at another occasion.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If you think there is no question of privilege in the statement being made by the minister, I think the matter should end right there.

Mr. Speaker: This, of course, is what the Chair is suggesting. However, there is nothing to prevent the minister from making a statement on another occasion, but not as a question of privilege.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it could be asked whether the minister will found a motion on the question of privilege. Is that not the test?

Mr. Speaker: The minister can make a motion if there is a prima facie question of privilege. The Chair is of the opinion that there is not.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

TABLING OF INSTRUMENTS ADOPTED AT FORTY NINTH CONFERENCE

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with article 19 of the constitution of the International Labour Organization I wish to table the texts in English and French of the instruments adopted at the forty ninth international labour conference held in Geneva, Switzerland, in June, 1965. The instruments consist of two international labour conventions and three recommendations.

The constitution of the I.L.O. requires a member state to bring conventions and recommendations "before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action". In the case of a federal state there is the further obligation on the part of the member state to refer instruments which are wholly or partially within provincial legislation jurisdiction to appropriate provincial authorities "for the enactment of legislation or other action", and to arrange for periodic consultations with a view to promoting co-ordinated action to give effect to the provisions of the instruments.

The opinion of the Minister of Justice, a copy of which I am also tabling, is that each of the five instruments adopted last July is partially within federal legislative jurisdiction and partially within provincial jurisdiction.

There has been considerable interest in recent months in the possibility of ratifying more I.L.O. conventions the subject matter of which falls wholly or partially within provincial jurisdiction. There has been correspondence with the provinces concerning a number of conventions, and the matter was discussed on January 14 at a federal-provincial conference of ministers of labour.

Of the five instruments adopted at last years' conference of the I.L.O., four concern underground employment in mines. There is a convention plus a supplementary recommendation on minimum age for such employment underground, a recommendation on medical examination of young persons employed underground and a recommendation on conditions of underground employment of young persons in mines.

As many hon. members are no doubt aware, there is no provision in the I.L.O. constitution for the ratification of recommendations, whose purpose is to serve as a guide to member governments as to desirable policy. Conventions on the other hand may be ratified if the legislation and policy in a country corresponds with the requirements of the instrument.

In the case of the conventions relating to young persons in mines, it appears that Canadian legislation and policy for the most part conforms with at least the major provisions of the I.L.O. instruments. Steps will therefore be taken to explore with the provinces whether further action is advisable to ensure full compliance with the instruments. If this can be achieved, the Canadian government would then be in a position to ratify the two conventions.

The fifth instrument is a recommendation concerning employment of women with family responsibilities. This recommendation is of considerable interest to us in Canada, because of the recent impressive increase in women's participation in the labour force. In the past the employment situation of male workers has provided the benchmark of labour force policies, but in light of the changing composition of the labour force there is increasingly urgent need to develop policies and services, which will assist women with family responsibilities to fulfil their dual role and at the same time safeguard their rights and status in employment.

The I.L.O. recommendation provides a useful guide for the development and adaptation of policies and services appropriate to their changing circumstances. It will be widely distributed among provincial and other authorities having responsibilities in this area.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS AND REPORT OF EDUCATION CONFERENCE

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): By leave of the house I should like to table copies in French and in English of a number of international agreements recently entered into by the government of Canada.

I should also like to table copies in French and English of the report of the third commonwealth education conference held in 1964.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent of the house?

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): No, not before it is read.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member does not have unanimous consent.

COST OF PROVIDING COLOUR TELEVISION

Question No. 107—Mr. Ormiston:

What is the estimated cost to the C.B.C. of putting colour production and transmission facilities in place to provide for limited network programming and for full network programming (English network), assuming the 1965 proportions of network programs originating from Toronto and from regional production centres are maintained?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): A. The estimated capital cost of C.B.C. colour production and transmission facilities to provide limited network colour programming in both languages is expected to be $15,000,000 by the beginning of 1967.

Questions

B. The estimated share of capital costs for full colour programming English network only, is of the order of $30,000,000. This is a planning figure only extended to 1971-72. It is necessarily a somewhat arbitrary estimate because most capital colour facilities will be shared by C.B.C.'s national, regional and local program services and by English and French services at some locations. The C.B.C. has not been authorized to enter colour to the foregoing extent but colour requirements have necessarily been estimated in all plans for consolidation and replacement of equipment. The English network's share of these proposals and of the $15,000,000 in A is included in the estimate.

EXPORTS OF SALMON EGGS TO JAPAN

Question No. 307—Mr. Howard:

1. Does the government have any knowledge as to whether or not salmon eggs are being shipped or exported to Japan, and if so, for each month during which such shipping or exporting has taken place within the past two years, what has been the volume thereof?

Exports of salmon eggs or roe are not listed specifically in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics' returns, but are included under classification number 4940—fish roe, fresh, frozen or cured. The largest percentage of exports under this classification are salmon roe. Such shipments to Japan during the calendar years 1963 and 1964 and the latest available returns, January-November 1965, are listed in the attachment. No export permits are required for the export of salmon eggs in the salmon roe or bait forms. Shipments of live salmon eggs for transplanting or scientific purposes are subject to license by the Minister of Fisheries. I am informed that no such shipments were made to Japan during the past three years.

2. Listing of the names and addresses of exporters of salmon roe would be in violation of the secrecy provisions of the Statistics Act.

TIGHT MONEY POLICY

Question No. 447—Mr. Crouse:

1. Within the last twelve months, has the government, or the Bank of Canada as fiscal agent and with the knowledge of the government, taken any action or initiated any policy having or intended to have the effect of tightening the money supply in Canada?

2. Has the government any information to indicate that Canadian chartered banks are refusing loans to traditional customers?

3. If so, was this action the intended and logical consequence of the policy and action referred to in part 1?

4. If the answer to part 1 is in the affirmative, will the government give consideration to arranging or discussing with the Bank of Canada an exemption from such policy for the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. The rate of change in the money supply (i.e. in the total of currency outside banks and chartered bank deposits) within the last twelve months has varied in accordance with the circumstances and the increase in the year ending January, 1966, has been $1,915,000,000 or 10.7 per cent.

2. While the government has no direct information on this subject, the demand for borrowed funds arising from the strong economic growth which has been taking place has been so intense that it is likely that some bank borrowers have been unable to secure as large loans as they would have liked. The chartered banks have tried to meet the normal borrowing needs of their traditional customers, particularly their smaller customers, and total chartered bank loans have increased by $1,690,000,000 or by 17.7 per cent during the year ending January, 1966.

3. Answered by 1 and 2.

4. Answered by 1.

DEATH OF DOUGLAS TURNER IN VIET NAM

Question No. 452—Mr. Fairweather:

1. What was the purpose of the flight in Viet Nam which resulted in the apparent death of Douglas Turner, an officer of the Department of External Affairs?

2. Upon what type of aircraft was the flight made?

3. How old was the aircraft?

4. What inspection and maintenance procedures were followed to ensure the safety and reliability of the aircraft and by whom were they carried out?

5. What steps have been taken to find the aircraft and its passengers?

6. Can it be assumed that Mr. Turner is dead or is there a possibility that he is a prisoner of the Viet Cong?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The flight of the courier aircraft of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Viet Nam, F-BELV, from Saigon to Hanoi, via Phnom Penh and Vientiane, was a routine authorized flight in accordance with the contract of the international commission in Viet Nam with the Compagnie Internationale des Transports Civil Aériens, the owners of the aircraft.

2. Boeing "Stratoliner".

3. The exact date of manufacture is unavailable; the manufacturer says all aircraft of this type were built in 1939 and 1940.

4. Normal inspection and maintenance procedures were followed by the Compagnie Internationale des Transports Civil Aériens, which held a certificate of air worthiness for the aircraft.

5. The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, in co-operation with the Laotian authorities and the Compagnie Internationale des Transports Civil Aériens, carried out an intensive aerial search along the flight route and in the adjoining area up to the international border of North Viet Nam from October 19 to November 20, 1965. The North Vietnamese authorities also informed the commission that they had searched for the missing aircraft along the air corridor in North Vietnamese territory. These efforts failed to reveal the fate of the missing aircraft.

6. The report of the ad hoc committee established by the international commission in Viet Nam, and including a Canadian representative, to inquire into the disappearance of the aircraft concludes that the aircraft "met with an accident after it left Vientiane airport at 15.05 hours on 18 October, 1965 and that all the passengers on board aircraft F-BELV are dead". This conclusion was accepted by a unanimous vote of the commission on January 20, 1966.

3. How many were established industries, but moved to the designated area in order to receive the benefits?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. The area development agency has been informed of 266 projects which when completed would appear to qualify for benefits under the area development program. These represent projects which are in various stages of completion in order to qualify for either the income tax exemption or the development grant.

2. Twenty projects are expansions of existing businesses and the remainder involve the establishment of new manufacturing or processing businesses.

3. Ten projects involve facilities which had been established elsewhere in Canada, and are being re-established in designated areas. Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): The corporation does not have any immediate plans for providing television service to the Grand Rapids and Norway House areas of Manitoba. Any future plans for extension and maintenance of service to these and other geographically remote areas would depend largely upon available financial resources at the time. Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. Yes, from Mr. R. B. Barrett of Fisher Branch, Manitoba, for the amount of $4,407.

*COURT CASES RESPECTING RESALE PRICE MAINTENANCE

Question No. 645—Mr. Starr:

1. Are there any cases at present being held by the Department of Justice similar to the case in which a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada recently upheld the legality of the section of the Combines Investigation Act forbidding resale price maintenance?

2. If so (a) how many and for how long have they been outstanding (b) what action does the minister contemplate with respect to them?

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): The answer to question No. 1 is no.

The answer to question No. 2 is as follows:

(a) There are four cases presently before the courts. In one case the trial has been held and judgment reserved pending the decision on the constitutional issue before the Supreme Court of Canada. In the remaining three cases the trials were postponed for the same reason. In these cases, counsel have been notified of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and instructed to take the necessary steps to bring them to trial. In cases where inquiries are being conducted by the director under the Combines Investigation Act, these have been proceeding in the normal manner.

(b) See 2(a).

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): This is a matter of government policy. Should a decision be taken to implement such a program, parliament will be informed in the usual manner.

*APPLICATION OF COMBINES LEGISLATION TO NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

Question No. 705—Mr. Fulton:

1. Does the government consider the field of professional sport to be outside the purview of the Combines Investigation Act?

2. If not, will the appropriate minister of the government refer to the director of investigation and research under the act, the question of whether the operations of the National Hockey League in Canada, especially with respect to its practices or rules which restrict the right to the extension of franchises to other Canadian cities, and related practices, are in contravention of any of the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): 1. Yes. The director under the Combines Investigation Act takes the position that the field of professional sport is outside the purview of the act.

2. See 1.

[Mr. Favreau.]

*GOVERNMENT PRINTING BUREAU—MONEY LENDERS SYNDICATE

Question No. 708—Mr. Irvine:

With reference to question No. 330 answered on January 27, 1966, does there exist or has there existed in the past three years a "money lenders syndicate" other than Caisse Populaire and, if so, what are the names of the principals of any such organizations?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): There are a number of Christmas funds organized and operated by several groups of employees of the Canadian government printing bureau to which employees make regular contributions throughout the year. Some of these do provide for loans to its members on request. At the end of the year, total contributions plus any interest earned is divided among the members. There are also a number of flower, gift and welfare funds. However, these types of mutually beneficial organizations are not considered as "money lenders syndicates" since their prime purpose is to encourage savings and also to avoid, in the case of flower and gift funds, the circulation of subscription lists among employees.

1. Did Mr. John Powell and Mr. Hugh Campbell recently appear on a C.B.C. television program concerning Viet Nam?

(b) Squadron Leader Campbell served chiefly as an officer at various team sites in Viet Nam. Mr. Powell served as a registry and accounts clerk in the Canadian headquarters in Saigon.

*REQUEST FOR ESCALATOR CLAUSE IN SUPERANNUATION ACT

Question No. 761—Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the Prime Minister received a letter from the president of the federal superannuates' national association asking that the Public Service Superannuation Act be amended so as to provide therein an escalator clause similar to that contained in the Canada Pension Plan and in the Old Age Security Act?

2. If so, what reply has the Prime Minister made thereto?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes.

The answer to the second part is as follows. The principal substance of the letter from Mr. Buckler comprised a number of specific points concerning pension provisions affecting public servants of other countries, the management of the public service superannuation fund, the relationship between the superannuation scheme and the Canada Pension Plan and between the funds associated with those plans, and my reply was intended to provide clarification on these matters.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion No. 71 is acceptable to the government. I ask that the remaining notices of motions stand.

[English]

EMPLOYMENT SERVICE—DISCRIMINATORY JOB ORDERS

Motion No. 71—Mr. Orlikow:

That an order of the house do issue for copies of any directive issued in the past two years by the National Employment Service or the Department of Labour to its staff directing them to refer discriminatory job orders to appropriate government departments and commissions—federal or provincial—for appropriate action in order to carry out the directives included in the legislation which prohibits the National Employment Service from filling discriminatory job orders.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I might say that I am informed that there were no such directives issued by the National Employment Service or by the department, and a nil return will have to be the answer.

Mr. Speaker: Is this notice of motion dropped?

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: Is the parliamentary secretary calling motion No. 71?

Mr. Béchard: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nicholson: As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, the return in this case would have to be a nil return as there have been no such directives. If the hon. member does not wish to withdraw the motion we will have to file such a return.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member consent to the withdrawal of this motion?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, if the minister is stating that the national employment service has not issued any such directives during this period of time to its employees, then I am content to withdraw the motion and discuss the matter when we reach consideration of the appropriate estimates. The minister has given exactly that information I wanted.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to allow the motion to be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

TRANSFER OF SASKAIR LTD.

Motion No. 92—Mr. Douglas:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of any correspondence or documents relating to the transfer of Saskair Limited to Norcanair Limited, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would be agreeable to having this material tabled except for those documents which disclose the financial condition of one of the companies concerned, as that material has always been regarded as confidential.

Mr. Douglas: That is satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker: There will be an order for the production of these documents subject to the reservations and limitation specified by the hon. member.

Motion agreed to.

ASSISTANCE TO PRINCE ALBERT PULP CO.

Motion No. 93—Mr. Douglas:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence and other documents relating to any request to grant financial assistance to the Prince Albert Pulp Company Limited under the terms of the Area Development Incentives Act.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. gentleman is agreeable to excepting from this motion documents emanating from the provincial government, with the exception of those in respect of which the government gives consent, as well as documents or correspondence the publication of which would likely cause damage to the competitive position of the company. However, with those two exceptions the motion is accepted.

Mr. Douglas: That is acceptable.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and limitations specified by the minister is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICARE—APPLICATION OF FEDERAL PLAN TO PROVINCIAL PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister, asking him whether, in view of the voluntary medicare plans approved by a number of provinces including Ontario and Alberta, the proposed compulsory medicare plan of the federal government can be made applicable to the voluntary plans of these provinces?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what has been said about this matter. We propose to proceed with our negotiations with the provinces on the basis of the compulsory medicare scheme.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister proceed with a plan if the provinces of Quebec and Ontario do not participate because it is so different from theirs it cannot be implemented?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that his question is out of order.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

ONTARIO—DEFERMENT APPLICATION BY AUTOMOTIVE TRANSPORT ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the widespread concern over the trucking strike in Ontario, and in view of the fact that a clarification with respect to part I of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code having to do with hours of work in the trucking industry might result in a settlement, I should like to ask the minister whether he would be prepared as soon as possible to make a statement about his decision regarding the application for a deferment under part I by the automotive transport association.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to give the suggestion consideration.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that one of the major points of dispute relates to the increasing numbers of owner-operators in the trucking industry, I should like to ask the minister whether he will consider an early amendment to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code to include owner-operators under the provisions of that act.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member is now asking a question of a very general nature which should not be asked at this time.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INQUIRY AS TO CO-ORDINATION OF EXHIBITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the minister inform us as to whether any plans are being made to co-ordinate such Canadian exhibitions as the Calgary stampede, the Pacific National Exhibition and the Canadian National exhibition with Expo '67 programs as they relate to the over-all picture of the country in the centennial year?

Mr. Speaker: That is a very interesting and important question which the hon. member may wish to place on the order paper.

COMBINES

EXTENSION OF LEGISLATION TO COVER PROFESSIONAL SPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in light of the reply given by the President of the Privy Council to starred question 705 to the effect that the government considers the operations of the National Hockey League to be outside the purview of the Combines Investigation Act, and in light of the size and scope of the operations of this organization and the interest of the people of Canada in it; and having in mind the obvious restrictive effects of present arrangements as to the extension of franchises and other related matters, will the government give immediate consideration to amending the act so as to bring such operations within its scope in the interests of the people of Canada?

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will remember the remarks he made before a parliamentary committee in relation to the fact that services are not presently covered by the Combines Investigation Act. However, I am pleased to advise him—and I do not want to refer to the National Hockey League or any other specific organization—that in relation to any service, the question as to whether and to what extent services may be included within the ambit of the act is presently under consideration.

Mr. Fulton: I have a supplementary question. Whatever may have been said in the past does not seem to me to apply now; but in respect of the question as to whether services were exempted—and I am not entering into an argument on that situation—surely the minister does not feel we have to go into the whole matter of whether a sport in this sense is a service. Does the minister not rather feel—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member now is submitting an argument rather than asking a question. I would suggest that he ask his question at this stage.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I admit I was establishing a precedent on which I shall not elaborate. Will the minister consider the question as to whether sports and operations of this size and nature do fall within the descriptive word "services"?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now asking for a legal opinion or interpretation of a statute and I suggest this cannot be done at this time.

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that I have filed a bill to amend the Combines Investigation Act to bring professional sports within the ambit of that act, will the minister consider giving the bill government support at the first reading stage?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MONTREAL—INVESTIGATION INTO DEATH OF LAWYER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns three ministers. It concerns the President of the Privy Council with regard to bankruptcies, and the Solicitor General with regard to the R.C.M.P., but I shall put my question to the Minister of Justice.

Could the Minister of Justice tell us if he intends to have a special inquiry made into the circumstances surrounding the death of François Payette, Montreal barrister and bankruptcy expert, who was murdered and whose body was found frozen in his car last night. We know barrister François Payette recently took part in an inquiry into bankruptcies.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not putting a question but rather submitting an allegation. His question is out of order.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, may I word my question differently?

[English]

[Later:]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General who, I believe, is charged with responsibility in this field. Is it the intention of the Solicitor General to ask for a special investigation into the circumstances surrounding the death of one François Payette, in Montreal, whose death has just been announced?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: It is very difficult, again, to know to what extent this question is urgent. A similar question was asked by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska, and it was argued by hon. members yesterday that whenever there was a violent death it should be automatically an urgent question, I cannot agree with this. I suggest to the hon. member that in the way the question is framed now it is not acceptable.

MILK—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PAYMENTS TO PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture?

In view of the importance of maintaining the milk production of this country to satisfy the demand—there will likely be a shortage of 400 or 500 million pounds of milk in Canada this year—can the minister tell the house whether farmers can expect $4.00 per cwt. for all manufactured milk?

Mr. Speaker: This is a question of a very general nature which cannot be accepted at this time.

[English]

INQUIRY AS TO EMBARGO ON CATTLE SHIPMENTS FROM FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I wonder if the minister could tell the house whether the government intends to place an embargo on the shipment of cattle into Canada from France due to the prevalence of foot and mouth disease in Europe?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the importation of cattle, if it should take place, would not take place until the fall. My department is watching the situation carefully, and if there is any danger in the fall the importation of cattle would then, of course, be proscribed.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

NEWFOUNDLAND—LOSS OF TRAWLER "BLUE MIST II"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister please advise the house what action has been taken by his department in the search to locate the missing Newfoundland trawler Blue Mist II and her crew of 13, 12 of whom I understand are family men.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this tragic situation which has affected particularly the constituency of my hon. friend for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) has been the occasion of a very careful, detailed and extensive search and rescue operation by the coast guard ships John A. Macdonald and Montcalm, the fisheries patrol vessel Cape Freels, four trawlers belonging to the same company as the missing ship and seven R.C.A.F. aircraft. As of this morning 16,700 square miles had been covered by aircraft. There has been no sign of survivors. It does appear that three of the dories have turned up, unfortunately without any survivors in them.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—INCREASE IN IMPORTS FROM U.S. DURING JANUARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. Can the minister provide the house with information showing the increase, if any, in the value of imports of automobile parts and automobiles from the United States during the month of January, 1966?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, those statistics are not yet ready—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression that this is a question which is not so urgent that it should be answered at this time. The hon. member may wish to place it on the order paper.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order and with great respect to Your Honour, I would agree with Your Honour that in ordinary circumstances information of this type should not be sought in the house on orders of the day.

However, in view of the fact that the whole question of the automobile parts treaty is a very current one, and the minister's estimates will be before the house very shortly, and further due to the fact that it is the general desire of the government and I think of everyone to have the study of the estimates completed very shortly, the question was asked because I feel it would greatly expedite the passage of the estimates of the minister's department if we had this information.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that if the estimates are to be considered by the house very shortly, that might be the time to ask the question of the minister.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED STEP TO PROVIDE GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In the preparation of his budget is the minister looking at the negative income tax as one means of providing a guaranteed annual income?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a proper question at this time and should not be received. The hon. member may wish to place it on the order paper or discuss it at a later hour.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

PUBLICITY PROMOTION IN CONNECTION WITH CENTENNIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jim McNulty (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works concerning the National Captial Commission and publicity for our nation's capital as Canada approaches its centennial. Will the minister inform the house whether the National Capital Commission intends to promote the capital across the nation? If so, how and how soon?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

VICTORIA, B.C.—REQUEST FOR SPECIAL CANCELLATION STAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. In order to promote tourism at a time when it is winter in the rest of Canada and spring in Victoria, British Columbia, would the Postmaster General give consideration to the request of the Victoria Chamber of Commerce to have our post office use the cancelling stamp "Spring Comes First To Victoria" prior to the Victoria spring flower festival commencing April 2?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CHANGE IN HOUR OF MEETING ON FEBRUARY 24

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the government house leader and ask what arrangements have been made with regard to the time of sitting of the house tomorrow, and in respect of the standing committees which are scheduled to meet tomorrow morning?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the government aircraft that is being provided tomorrow will arrive back in this city at 1.15 p.m., perhaps it would be agreeable that the house meet at three o'clock. If this is agreeable to all hon. members we could have it made an order of the house.

As for the meetings of the standing committees, I would be very glad to discuss that matter with the chairmen of the committees and perhaps something could be arranged so that most of them would not sit until either later in the day or the next day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it an order of the house that this house meet tomorrow afternoon at three o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

OLD AGE SECURITY

CONSIDERATION OF INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. I wonder if he can inform the house whether any decision has been reached with regard to an increase in old age pensions, or whether any alternate arrangement has been reached with the provinces.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter is still under consideration.

CROP INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the minister's statement last night on the outcome of the meeting last Thursday with the provinces, in which he said that Ontario and Quebec are in favour of a program to insure feed grain crops and dairy herds, and since the federal government pays 50 per cent of the administration of these programs, would the minister say whether he is in agreement with the provinces or whether he believes there should also be a government insurance program for cash crops?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question asks for a statement of policy, which I do not think should be given at this time.

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the government house leader, but since he has been called away he may wish to take it as notice. As the special committee on food and drugs was constituted 10 days ago, can he say how soon members will be named to that committee?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE OF PRESIDENT OF CHRYSLER CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Industry. Will the minister consider seeking for the Department of Industry the services of Mr. Ronald Todgham, president of Chrysler Corporation of Canada, with respect to obtaining advice on automotive safety devices?

Mr. Speaker: This question should be placed on the order paper, if it is in order.

WAR ON POVERTY

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION PROPOSED BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the executive director of the Canadian Welfare Council that because of the lack of massive federal programs to wage the urgent war on povety Canadians are shouting "phony war", would the Prime Minister indicate what immediate steps are planned to convert the phony war into a real one?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is not putting a question that can be asked in this form at this time. She is making allegations, and I suggest to the hon. member that the question cannot be put in the form in which it has just been submitted.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I have a question for the Minister of Finance which relates to the Canada Development Corporation. In view of the growing concern on the part of many in Canada in relation to this proposed legislation and the failure of the government to accede to requests that it be included in the program, can the minister tell us what the government's plans are in so far as introducing this legislation is concerned?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): The government has been quite forthright in its attitude. The Canada Development Corporation was included in the Speech from the Throne and on a number of occasions I have stated it is a part of our program. We will proceed as soon as the opposition gives us an opportunity to proceed with legislation.

COMBINES

AGRICULTURE CHEMICAL INDUSTRY—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE PROSECUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. R. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice or the President of the Privy Council, whoever is in charge of this matter. According to the last report of the restrictive trade practices commission, the agriculture chemical industry appears to be guilty of gross irregularities in its pricing policy—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Schreyer: My question is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot preface his question in the way he is doing, that is by making an allegation. This is highly irregular.

Mr. Schreyer: With your permission I will rephrase the question and ask the minister if, as a result of the tabling of the last report of the restrictive trade practices commission, he is contemplating taking any action under the Combines Investigation Act against certain firms in the agriculture chemical industry.

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): I first want to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to put this question. I may say that the report of the restrictive trade practices commission, together with the evidence that led to the report, are being referred to counsel to consider whether the evidence warrants proceedings.

PUBLIC WORKS

TORONTO—PLACING OF FILL IN LAKE ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister made such an effort to legalize the fill in lake Ontario south of Long Branch, placed there in contravention of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, that the Ontario provincial government is now considering a revision of the Territorial Division Act—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is not in order and cannot be asked at this time.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

NANAIMO, B.C.—REPORTED INTENTION TO CLOSE HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and arises from a letter I had from him today, for which I thank him, informing me of the intention to close the Nanaimo general hospital. My question is this. Before reaching that decision did the minister have an assurance from the B.C. hospital insurance services that adequate beds would be supplied in the regional general hospital to take up the slack?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My understanding is that consultations with the British Columbia authorities revealed that adequate service could be provided in other hospitals in the area. There would be no reduction in service as a result of the proposed closing of the hospital.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask a supplementary question. Do I understand the minister had that assurance from the B. C. hospital insurance service?

Mr. MacEachen: That is my understanding, but I shall be glad to check the matter further and make doubly sure.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister? Does he intend to act upon the suggestion made recently by the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) that out of the five main departments of the federal government, two should be headed by French Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Can he advise us of the order of the appearance of his colleagues on Pierre Berton's show so that we can ascertain the order of descent in respect of cabinet policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): If my hon. friend so desires, I am sure it would be easy for him to get an invitation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the newly appointed lieutenant governor of the province of Quebec is the former member for Lotbinière would the Prime Minister accept the tribute and the thanks of the people of Lotbinière?

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister whether there is any significance in the fact that the new Lieutenant Governor of Quebec comes from Lotbinière, whose present member is a Republican?

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

15. Operation and maintenance and construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment for the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Army and the Royal Canadian Air Force and $1,850,000 for grants to the town of Oromocto, $1,382,244,000.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I should like to ask the minister to explain a remark he made in answer to a question about Valcartier camp, and whether there was an artillery range there. I waited until I saw the report in Hansard before—

The Chairman: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but there is a little more noise than usual in the chamber and it is difficult for the Chair to hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Can the minister explain his reference to the fact that the range at Valcartier is congested with unexploded shells, and practically no firing can be done? Since there is no artillery or mortar range there can he explain why unexploded shells are congesting that range and how they got there?

Mr. Hellyer: Well, I understand there is a variety of shells of various kinds going back the whole 50 years since the camp was in operation, and that they are pretty well concentrated in one major hill which exists in the present camp.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I am sorry, but I could not hear the reply the minister has given.

The Chairman: Would the Minister of National Defence repeat the answer which he gave to that question?

Mr. Hellyer: I am sorry, did the hon. gentleman not hear the answer?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): No.

Mr. Hellyer: I said I understood there was a variety of shells, including mortar shells, going back for some years, all concentrated in one area, I think the Pinky Mountain area. It is a condition inside the camp which is extremely limited.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, yesterday I directed a question to the minister, as reported at page 1608 of Hansard, relative to the signal station which is now located at Albro Lake in Dartmouth and its relocation in Mill Cove in Lunenburg County. The minister indicated that he would reply to the question I asked, and I wonder whether he is prepared to do so at this time.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, this transfer is taking place. Did my hon. friend have a specific question with respect to it—I have forgotten? It is being transferred from Albro Lake to Blandford, as he suggested.

Mr. Crouse: I realize this, Mr. Minister, but the question I posed yesterday was whether you could give me some indication of the amount that your department intends to spend in this area, the approximate date when construction will be completed, and when the final move will be made from Albro Lake to Mill Cove.

Mr. Hellyer: I am advised, Mr. Chairman, that the approximate date of the move will be in the fall of 1967, and the approximate cost is of the order of $3 million.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, we had some discussion last night about the directorate of information services, and I should like to explore a different facet of this question with the committee. A fairly extensive advertising campaign is carried on by the department in connection with recruiting. Could the minister tell the members of the committee how much money is allotted in the estimates to the recruitment program by way of advertising, where the money is spent, which advertising agencies have been given this very important task, and how are they picked?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the figure for next year is of the order of $700,000 to $800,000. The advertising agency is Vickers and Benson, of Montreal and Toronto. This, I might say, is about the smallest advertising program for many years. The department's expenditures many years ago for recruiting ranged up as high as $2 million a year or more. The figure has now been very substantially reduced, perhaps to even a lower figure than it should be.

Mr. Orlikow: Could the minister tell the committee how the department picks the particular advertising agency? Does it call for tenders, does it ask agencies to submit ideas or programs? If so, how many agencies were contacted, or is this a particular agency with some special merit? If so, what is this special merit?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the department did place its advertising a year or two ago through, I think, four different agencies. At the time we introduced the bill in the house which embarked us upon the integration program, and subsequently, it was considered advisable to concentrate all of the advertising program in one agency. This was (a) because the amount involved was relatively small, and (b) because it would enable the agency to do more research and to provide better service at lower cost than would be the case with a multiplicity of agencies.

At the time some thought was given to the selection of agencies. I was advised that Vickers and Benson was an aggressive, dynamic agency, one of the better agencies in the country, and therefore that firm was selected by the department for this particular task.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: Order. This completes the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

The committee will now proceed to the estimates of the Department of Justice.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, before you start on the estimates of the Department of Justice I wonder whether I might express, on behalf of the associate minister and myself, our appreciation to the committee for the courtesy and co-operation which we have received during the study of these estimates.

Mr. Fairweather: Perhaps I might invite the minister to splice the mainbrace.

Legal and other services—

1. Administration, including the office of the superintendent of bankruptcy, grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates, gratuities to the widows or such dependents as may be approved by treasury board of judges who die while in office and authority to make recoverable advances for the administration of justice on behalf of the governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $2,504,300.

The Chairman: Order. Estimates of the Department of Justice, vote No. 1.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, in introducing the 1965-66 estimates I am well aware that members of the house are most anxious to debate certain specific questions relating to the Department of Justice, and I welcome the opportunity of stating my position on these matters. As was previously agreed upon, the Prime Minister will make a statement on the Spencer case as soon as I have finished a very short introductory statement. Although I propose to make a more complete statement in introducing the 1966-67 estimates, I wish to make a short statement concerning the division of responsibilities within the Department of Justice.

Important changes made in any long standing organization such as the Department of Justice give rise almost automatically to criticisms and complaints, particularly if the changes themselves and the reasons that compelled them have not been sufficiently explained. This is what I propose to do now very briefly.

In essence, these changes are designed to enable the Department of Justice to concentrate its full resources on those problems and tasks which, by the terms of the Department of Justice Act, 1868, were intended to fall within its purview. While the character of the department has not undergone any significant change since it came into being nearly a hundred years ago, the addition of other responsibilities—some closely related to its basic functions, others not so readily identifiable—has made it increasingly difficult for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada to perform his important duty as the principal law officer of the Crown.

This may have been the inevitable result of administrative and other pressures during the evolutionary period in our history as a nation, but I am convinced the time has come to take stock and redefine the functions of the department in relation to contemporary needs.

Over the years, the Department of Justice has been assigned responsibility for a variety of functions and services—among them combines investigation, the supervision of trustees in bankruptcy, the Canadian Penitentiary Service and the National Parole Board—which are not directly related to the fundamental duties of the law officers of the Crown. As hon. members know, the principal responsibilities of law officers of the Crown are to advise and assist in the preparation of new legislation, to provide such guidance on constitutional matters and questions of law as the governor in council and senior members of the public service may require to enable them to discharge their responsibilities, to undertake periodic revision of the statutes and to initiate such legal actions as may be in the public interest.

The very considerable administrative responsibilities associated with those other additional functions I have described have tended to involve the Minister of Justice and the legal officers of his department to such an extent that it has not been possible for them to devote as much time to their primary tasks as would have been, and is now, desirable. In addition, these changing times and the urgent need to maintain respect for law as the keystone of a democratic society require some rethinking of the practices and procedures of the Department of Justice, to ensure that in carrying out its basic tasks the department is keeping pace with new developments in our economic and social structure and in the international environment in which Canada must play its part.

As an example, revision of the statutes on a regular basis is essential to good administration and the public welfare generally. In the past, whenever a general review of the main body of our statute law has seemed desirable or necessary, this was accomplished outside the department at very high costs and the results at times left something to be desired. More recently ad hoc committees within the department dealt with the revision. Having regard to the heavy demands on the resources of the department, this method of revising the statutes has usually meant that legal officers whose services were urgently needed in other areas, had to be separated from their regular duties for lengthy periods. Such a revision of the statutes is now in progress and, as hon. members will appreciate, this is a demanding task. It is my hope, indeed it is my intention, that when the organization of the Department of Justice has been agreed upon a special division will be established within the department to hold a watching brief on all matters affecting the codification and revision of the statutes. This will ensure that the laws of Canada, reflecting the intent of parliament, are at all times consonant with the needs they were designed to meet. While there might have been some logic in the identification of responsibilities associated with the maintenance of good business practices with the Department of Justice in the past—an example would be the combines investigation branch as it now exists—these functions are, in fact, a part of the investigative and protective processes of public administration, and their transfer to other departments, while easing the work load within justice itself, will not prejudice or in any way interfere with the responsibility of the Minister of Justice to take such action as the results of these investigative and protective undertakings may require.

In respect of the prospect that our country may experience to an increasingly alarming degree the effects of the insidious spread of organized crime throughout North America—including the urgent problem of juvenile delinquency— and in the field of correctional services generally, there is need for a "new look" and greater co-ordination of effort than has been possible under the former departmental structure. Heretofore the responsible minister has been obliged to expend his energies in endeavouring to discharge his primary duty as the principal law officer of the crown, while maintaining control of a number of associated agencies, each of vital importance in its own sphere of operation. I submit that the concentration of responsibility for law enforcement and correctional services in the proposed new department of the Solicitor General is both a logical and a practical development.

At the same time, the nation must have assurance that adequate recognition has been given to the urgent problem of organized crime, the increasing incidence of juvenile delinquency and the need for more intensive and specialized studies in the related fields of correctional services and penal reform. The assignment of these tasks to the Solicitor General, and the erection of a new department to administer these responsibilities, represents a practical and necessary step in this direction. I want to make it clear, beyond any possibility of doubt, that the Minister of Justice must and will remain solely responsible for determining whether, as the result of any investigation made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or other agency charged with regulatory or investigative responsibilities under the law, there is a case for prosecution and, in the event of a positive determination to that effect, for initiating the prosecution in all instances where this action lies within federal jurisdiction. To this extent the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada will retain his traditional responsibility to ensure that the law is properly enforced. In fact, his position may be strengthened, to the benefit of the country, in that he will be able to devote his full attention to the important task of evaluating information supplied by the investigative agencies and deciding on appropriate courses of action.

Furthermore, the Minister of Justice will be freer to concentrate his efforts in trying to solve the increasingly difficult problem of drafting clearly and accurately the new and more complex legislation required by the economic, social and political evolution of a new and exciting century for Canada.

In this respect, it is my hope to be able to establish soon a separate division of the department to deal generally with legal research and law reform. I also propose for the sake of accuracy and clarity to take whatever steps are necessary to draft legislation in each of the two official languages in order to avoid the difficulty of interpreting translated law.

In order to remove from our statutes obsolete, inadequate and outdated laws and regulations as well as to keep up with the day to day activities of the department, not only was it necessary to reorganize the department as has been done, but the minister must be given parliamentary time to bring the required amendments before the house for enactment, and I sincerely hope that with the application of the new rules of the house this will be possible.

These briefly are some of the reasons behind the changed responsibilities in the Department of Justice. I want to assure hon. members that the decisions which have been taken are the result of an earnest desire on the part of the government to achieve purposes which, I am sure, will commend themselves to members of this house.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether I might ask the minister a question, to clarify his opening remarks, and whether I might do so before the Prime Minister makes a statement. I take it that the estimates we are now discussing were the estimates based on the department as it existed before any suggested change. I take it that we shall be discussing the department as it existed prior to any suggested change made by the minister?

Mr. Cardin: No, Mr. Chairman. The different matters coming under the estimates will be discussed by the minister who has the responsibility now. For instance, matters under penitentiaries and correctional institutions will be discussed by the Solicitor General. Those having to do with combine investigations will be discussed by the President of the Privy Council. The rest of the estimates coming under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice I shall discuss.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I know that it is not usual for the Prime Minister to follow immediately after the minister in opening the discussion of the estimates of his department, but the circumstances of the situation are themselves not usual, and they arise out of a question which was addressed to the Minister of Justice toward the end of January, which he answered on January 31. The question was whether there should be a special inquiry, and whether the government would not institute a special inquiry into the circumstances of the dismissal of one Victor Spencer from the public service. The Minister of Justice answered on January 31 at page 434 of Hansard. I quote the minister:

> Having studied all the facts of this case, I do not feel it is necessary or useful to initiate a judicial inquiry into this matter. The procedures that have been followed by the R.C.M.P. are exactly the same procedures that were followed when my right hon. friend was in the government.

I was asked at that time by, I believe, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and certainly by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam whether I would not re-examine this matter myself and give further consideration to it. I said at that time that when a request of that kind is made I will always do my best to accede to it. So I did.

I have examined this situation personally. I have studied all the reports, all the documents concerning this case. I have spent a good many hours, Mr. Chairman, in doing so, because I know that the issues involved are important and I know that they have aroused very real uneasiness in the minds of hon. members. Not only did I study the details of this case and discuss them again with my ministerial colleagues who were more particularly concerned, but I examined other security cases in the last ten years which might throw some light on the justifiability or otherwise of the procedure followed in this instance—certain cases which were of very direct and immediate concern to the government of the day, which was the government preceding this government. As a result of this study and these considerations I wish to confirm the view which has been given by the Minister of Justice that an inquiry into this matter is not necessary and would not be useful.

I should like to put before the committee very briefly the considerations which led me to this conclusion—in so far as I can do so without any violation of security—and I think this is quite possible in the present case.

In the first place, Mr. Spencer himself has admitted, voluntarily admitted, improper activities which in the view of the government made his dismissal from the Civil Service of Canada not only desirable but necessary. In this dismissal for misconduct, which was carried out pursuant to the Public Service Superannuation Act and to section 50 of the Civil Service Act, Mr. Spencer was in my view treated fairly. The fact that he personally has neither complained nor asked for any inquiry is, I believe, evidence of this fact.

[Mr. Pearson.]

In the second place it was Mr. Spencer himself who disclosed his identity as one of those referred to anonymously in the press release of last May dealing with certain espionage activities which resulted in the expulsion from this country of two intelligence officers of a foreign power. Mr. Spencer himself was never mentioned by name in this release or by any spokesman of the government. But he mentioned himself by name subsequently to the press.

Mr. Spencer was dismissed by virtue of a provision of the present Civil Service Act which was passed, I believe, in 1962—a provision which is essentially in the same form as that contained in the earlier act and under which security cases have been dealt with in the past by governments of this country, and under which they are expected to be dealt with in the future. That is section 50. There is no appeal against decisions made under this section of the act, as it was included in the Civil Service Act when it was passed after very careful examination by this house and by a committee of this house.

However, before a final decision was taken to dismiss Mr. Spencer he was given a hearing by a senior official of the Civil Service Commission, at which he had every opportunity to state his case. Neither at this hearing with a member of the Civil Service Commission present—and the Civil Service Commission has an interest in the protection of the rights of civil servants; this is the main responsibility of the commission—neither at this hearing nor at those held by Canadian security officers earlier did Mr. Spencer make any complaint over his dismissal or prospective dismissal, or any complaint about the treatment he had received.

The law officers of the Crown had advised against instituting criminal proceedings against Mr. Spencer and proceedings were not taken. The primary purpose of the investigations in which Mr. Spencer himself was involved—and he was certainly only one of the persons involved in those investigations—was to identify, if possible, and remove a threat to the national security. In this respect, and in the removal of this threat, important and successful results were achieved. Evidence which made this possible was secured by security procedures which were normal, but which would make much of the evidence inadmissable in a court of law. If these procedures could not be used in this way in appropriate circumstances, or if all the details arising out of them must be made public, and names made public, then the protection of our national security against subversive action would be greatly prejudiced if not made impossible.

The surveillance which has been exercised over Mr. Spencer in his own interest as well as in the public interest has been adapted to the requirements of this particular situation. After the study I have made of the evidence, and the discussions I have had—and I have taken this matter as seriously as I take any matter—I believe Mr. Spencer's dismissal and his loss of pension rights under the law was lawful and just. I do not believe his rights as a person or as a citizen have been violated. On the contrary, I believe he has been treated with scrupulous fairness.

Mr. Woolliams: We have had two reports this afternoon, one from the Minister of Justice and another from the Prime Minister. For the next few moments I intend to direct a few remarks to the report just made by the Prime Minister and to the Spencer case.

Since I may be somewhat critical, I would ask hon. members on the other side of the house to bear with me—I was advised only a short time ago that I would be asked to speak in reply to the statement which the right hon. gentleman has made affecting this nation and the rights of individuals. I mention this in passing because our leader, my right hon. friend from Prince Albert, is unavoidably absent today for reasons well known to the Prime Minister and members of his cabinet. It was the Leader of the Opposition who had been putting the questions and who had been most interested in the matter of civil rights so far as Spencer was concerned.

In starting out it might be well for me to review the Hansard record of May 11, 1965. On that day the Prime Minister gave a report to the House of Commons with respect to two members of the U.S.S.R. embassy who had been asked to leave this country for espionage reasons, and stated that certain members of the civil and public service had been connected with the affair. It might be interesting to put on record just what was said by the Prime Minister, and by the Leader of the Opposition who made our position very clear. At that time we asked for an inquiry. Today the Prime Minister has said that Mr. Spencer has been removed from the civil service, has been dismissed from his job and will not get his pension, and he feels in his opinion Spencer has been treated very justly and fairly because he did have a hearing before the Civil Service Commission, or before the body which deals with those matters.

At the outset I would point out Spencer never did have any hearing. He was never charged with any violation of the laws of Canada. He has never been charged with any offence and has not been found guilty of an offence. He has never been given a fair and just hearing so far as the courts of law are concerned. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, you will agree with that any hearing he may have had with respect to his employment, or with respect to the civil service, is an entirely different kind of hearing from what he might have received if he had been charged with an offence and was found innocent or guilty. The fact is that this man has not been charged with any offence, and in that way I say there has been a miscarriage of justice.

I am sure in some respect all of us are in sympathy with the government in dealing with matters relating to the security of the state and in dealing with spy cases. This is not the first such case and probably will not be the last, but it is always difficult for the government to handle a matter such as this.

Now, let us see what the Prime Minister said on May 11 last year:

> The information on which action was taken in this matter came to the security authorities not only from one of the Canadians approached, but also from other sources which I am sure the house will understand must be protected if our counter-espionage efforts are to continue to be successful, as they were in this instance. On security grounds it is not, therefore, in the public interest to give all the detailed information requested in the house yesterday.

I am in full accord with that. It is difficult in these cases to give that information. It probably should not be given at any stage, at this stage particularly, but that does not say we should not have had an inquiry in camera, a judicial inquiry or a royal commission which could have been held in camera to look into the situation to see if this individual's rights were usurped. After all, he has not been charged with any crime. He has not been brought before any court, judged by any judge or jury, and yet he is still under surveillance. What does surveillance mean? I took the time to look up the definition.

Surveillance may mean the same as the Supreme Court of Canada laid down in the famous Sankey case when it was dealing with the questioning of an accused by police officers as to the admissibility of statements made by accused persons to police officers, and the matter of whether he was under custody or not. Surveillance means, in the Oxford dictionary, supervision, close observation, investigation, not trusted to work or go about unwatched.

Today the Prime Minister said that the reason for refusing a hearing of any kind was to protect the individual himself. I might ask, how long will this surveillance go on? In that regard we have some sympathy with the government in reference to matters of security.

On May 11 last year the Prime Minister also said:

> In regard to the two individual cases mentioned in the press release, one Canadian mentioned cooperated conscientiously from the beginning with our security authorities. Far from being motivated by "illicit gain and greed", this conscientious and patriotic Canadian reported to our security authorities the very first approach made to him; and this information is not usually made public.

Well, if this is the conscientious and patriotic Canadian, he has now been fired from the public service of this country and has his pension cut off.

> In the other case mentioned in the communiqué the circumstances unfortunately were different. The person involved in this case is a civil servant in a very junior position in an non-sensitive department. His place of work is not in Ottawa. The person is at present on sick leave and is in fact gravely ill.

I pause there. The first time questions were put to the Minister of Justice and the government with reference to whether there would be a charge laid against Spencer, their answer was that he was very ill. But then for some strange reason, as we read from press reports, as I shall do in a few minutes, he miraculously recovered. Later when we questioned the Minister of Justice as to whether there was going to be a charge laid, or was the surveillance going to continue, the minister said there was no evidence. Well, if there is not evidence I would say if Spencer is under surveillance it is almost like being in custody. It is almost as the Supreme Court of Canada said in the Sankey case, that if the accused was not under arrest he was practically under arrest while being detained by police officers for questioning.

The question is: Is this individual free? Is he free to go about his work, to go about his way in society according to the rules laid down by the rule of law? Is this surveillance, as the Prime Minister said, solely for the protection of the individual, or to watch this individual so that he may not usurp the state's security? That is a question that has not been answered.

Mr. Pearson: I know my hon. friend does not wish to misquote what I said. I said that was one of the two reasons he was under surveillance. One was for his own interests, because he stated in November if he told what he knew both he and the reporter who heard him would shortly be assassinated. The other reason was the public interest.

Mr. Woolliams: I thank the Prime Minister for that interruption. I listened to him very carefully. That was one of the reasons given but it is a very weak reason. If that is a very weak reason then the main reason this man is under surveillance is because the government feels he might do something to the security of our nation, and if that is the kind of evidence they have then I say to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice—and I say it not in the tone of criticism that might be offered in this regard—it is time that a charge was laid, that this man be brought before the courts, that he be acquitted or found guilty, because it is too important a matter to be left up in the air.

What was the position we took at the time the Prime Minister made his statement on May 11? It is to be found at page 1141 of Hansard for that date, and it was set out very carefully by the Leader of the Opposition who said:

> Necessarily, as responsible Members of Parliament we do not want to do anything that will prejudice to the slightest degree the investigation that is being made. However, in view of the widespread nature of these activities, I feel that the government should have an investigation by a royal commission, to look into this whole question and ascertain the degree to which espionage is going on within our country. Such a royal commission would not necessarily have to meet in the open. Composed of judges, it could take secret evidence which otherwise ought not to be revealed.

Not only would a royal commission clear up this matter but it would clear up other matters that may be pending in reference to this situation.

Let us look at the facts in their very simple form before I take the position which I shall take, in that I feel this individual's civil rights are, to say the very least, being usurped. What about Spencer; who was he? Spencer was a postal clerk who revealed his identity apparently some months after the government announcement of May 8 that two Soviet embassy employees were being expelled. Spencer, according to statements made by the Prime Minister and according to our own press statements, was a civil servant who had co-operated with the police only after being confronted by them. Spencer's job was to provide information on the Trans Mountain Pipe Line, assist in the establishment of espionage activities in Canada and other countries, and perform economic and intelligence tasks.

The other unidentified person was paid, as was Spencer, thousands of dollars to provide technical information relating to defence, industry, and to compromise other Canadians including female employees of the government. He was given specialized training to familiarize himself with these tasks. The Prime Minister said Spencer was very ill. I would say now, from newspaper reports, that if he was ill recently he has miraculously recovered, or at least is not as ill as he was.

Then on February 2 the Prime Minister said he would consider the question of an inquiry. Earlier, in making statements to the press, Spencer said that if there was an inquiry, heads would roll. Now, the question I would like to ask is this—and I will read from the press reports in a few moments in this regard. I see the Prime Minister shaking his head. Allow me to build up my case, and then I will read from the press reports. I see the President of the Privy Council laughing. He is laughing at the method I am using, because he knows it is a very serious matter. As I said at the beginning, I have not had sufficient time to go into this thoroughly.

Spencer said heads would roll. I will ask this question: Whose heads would roll? Were they heads in high places; were they heads in the places where the investigation is done; were they heads in some service in Canada? Whose heads would roll?

Mr. Pearson: I never said that.

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody said he never said that.

An hon. Member: The Prime Minister said it.

Mr. Pearson: That is right; I said that.

Mr. Woolliams: I would like to put one or two of those backbenchers in the same position I am in, because I have not had more than half an hour to prepare this and I do not have a research group behind me. I have not always been the best behaved member of parliament.

Mr. Pearson: You are doing fine.

Mr. Woolliams: This is an important matter this afternoon and I would just ask that your group give me a fair hearing, because after all it is important and I want to put our position very clearly before the house.

I am going to read from the Toronto Daily Star of November 2, 1965. This is what the report said:

> 'Heads swim if I talk' spy suspect warns.
> Vancouver (CP-Special)— A spy suspect the government claimed was dying last May is alive in Vancouver and warns that if he ever talked "there would be some heads swimming in Canada and elsewhere", according to a report here.
> The Vancouver Province says the 57 year old man sometimes uses the name Wilson and works in the post office.
> "He readily agreed that he was the man whom members of the R.C.M.P. accused of supplying information on to a Russian spy network," the newspaper says.
> Two members of the Russian diplomatic service left Ottawa May 7 after being declared persona non grata.

If that statement is not correct, then would it not be better to have that kind of inquiry or that kind of commission in camera? Certainly the evidence produced should be made available to the privy councillors and the government for the security of our nation. But let us clear up what he means by "heads will roll". Maybe those heads which should roll are still in the kind of jobs where they might be dangerous and could undermine the nation at the present time.

I see the President of the Privy Council shake his head. But they do not know because they have not had that kind of inquiry—not that inquiry, anyway. The point I would like to make at the present time is that I want to talk about Mr. Spencer himself personally for a few moments. I realize the same as everybody in this house that the security of our nation is very important.

When we are dealing with a question of security sometimes there is a tendency to do what we might do in ordinary cases, and that is to run slipshod over those things which we call civil rights, liberty. After all we are governed by the rule of law in Canada. Let us, for a few moments, look at a definition, and this is in a speech made by Dean Cronkite of the University of Saskatchewan, former dean of law. At that time he was dealing with the spy case of 1945. The Prime Minister and his government will remember this, because at that time there was an inquiry to look into the manner in which those people who were arrested were treated and interrogated. There is a precedent for such an inquiry, and I am going to read this to show that there is such a precedent. We are talking about the freedom of the individual and sometimes it pays to be a little philosophical.

I know the Prime Minister can get that way, and when he does I enjoy it. Dean Cronkite said this in December of 1946, in The Law Society's Gazette.

> I take it that the liberty with which we are concerned today is the liberty of people living in society, that civil liberty is that which Montesquieu defined as the capacity to obey the laws. Back in the Maritimes we used to say that a person with a particular desire for liberty, come what might, was as independent as a hog on glare ice. We are not talking about that kind of unrestrained liberty. We are concerned with civil liberties,with liberties under the law, with the liberties of people living in organized society. That is quite a different thing from the liberty of the man unrestrained by laws, fearing not man, God nor the devil. But granting that we are talking about liberty under the law I doubt very much if the concept of civil liberties as such has ever been comprehensively defined or is capable of definition apart from the ideals of the time and place including the fundamental moral philosophy of the people subject to the laws.

It is just this simple. The reason any one of us as a citizen of this country has the right to assemble here or go to our homes, the reason any of our children have the right to land safely at school and return home, is that we are protected by the rule of law. The rule of law protects individuals; but when we assert civil rights as spelled out by the rule of law, then we are bringing about an understanding of civil liberties as we understand them in this nation.

I want to repeat that this man is under surveillance although he has never been charged. He cannot hold a job in the public service, he cannot obtain his pension and he cannot go anywhere unobserved because he is under observation. We do not know whether he is to be kept under surveillance for one year or for 20 years. In spite of this he has not been given a hearing.

The Prime Minister has stated that this man has not complained, but let me inform the Prime Minister that in my experience I have known of many individuals who have been incarcerated in jails in this country who have not complained. Do you know why they have not complained? It is because they were afraid to complain. Maybe this man is afraid to complain.

I repeat that we all realize the importance of security, particularly in respect of Canada, but we must always realize as well that this nation exists because of the freedom of the individual. Therein lies in a nutshell the weakness of the Minister of Justice and the weakness in the argument put forward by the Prime Minister and his government.

I should like to remind this government of something that was said by a former cabinet minister at the time the government of that day did something similar in reference to a spy case in 1945. I should like to put on record the words of Mr. Powers in regard to that case. Back in 1945 he referred to something that Mr. Cronkite dealt with, and he refers to arguments presented by A. L. Smith, Mr. Coldwell, C. G. Powers, Mr. Diefenbaker and others. This is what Mr. Powers said, as reported in the Saskatchewan Bar Review of December, 1946, at page 68:

> As for me, brought up in an atmosphere wherein a framed photograph of Magna Carta was on almost every wall, accompanied with a warrant for the execution of Charles I, and steeped through my reading in the traditions of the martyrs of liberty and freedom, I cannot wish to turn back the pages of history seven hundred years and repeal Magna Carta. I cannot by my silence appear to approve even tacitly what I believe to have been a great mistake on the part of the government. If this is to be the funeral of liberalism I do not desire to be even an honorary pall-bearer at the funeral, and I do not wish by not taking part in this debate to give silent approval to the procedure which has taken place.

I suggest that what has taken place as far as the Spencer case is concerned is on all fours with what took place in reference to that matter when people were being incarcerated, denied counsel and interrogated without knowing whether they were going to be charged or not. Some were charged and some were released without charges being laid. I do not know whether or not they are still under surveillance.

Perhaps the terms of Magna Carta should be repeated at this time, but I think the important thing is that most Canadians would rather have an ounce of freedom than a pound of security. Let me read the pertinent part of Magna Carta, which is:

> No freeman shall be arrested, imprisoned dispossessed, outlawed, banished, or hurt in his person or property, nor will we in person or through our officers lay hands upon him save by the lawful judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.

What is the situation in reference to Mr. Spencer? He is still under surveillance. Perhaps the Prime Minister will reconsider his position and allow this man an inquiry in camera so that he can set out the facts that he has not divulged as yet. Let him indicate who these people in high places are whose heads he says will roll. I know that the Prime Minister does not like to hear that statement but—

Mr. Favreau: He never said that heads would roll.

Mr. Pearson: I am only showing some emotion, Mr. Chairman, because, as the hon. member knows from reading the press statements, he did not say that heads will roll: He said heads will swim. Surely there is some difference between heads rolling and heads swimming.

Mr. Woolliams: I am glad the Prime Minister corrected me in that regard, but I think I have read something which indicated that he has said heads would roll. Perhaps the Prime Minister has a better idea of what he said as a result of reading all the pertinent reports, because he has more time than I have. Let us assume that he said heads would swim rather than that heads would roll. Surely we are not talking about physical swimming, and when an individual gets dizzy and excited it is usually because he is disturbed at being close to the hot seat, or close to the facts. This is a psychological factor, a part of human behaviour.

Surely this man should have an inquiry, even if it is held in camera. In this regard let us consider what the national newspapers have said. First let us look at the Gazette of February 2, 1966. In an editorial that appeared in that issue the following is stated:

> Prime Minister Pearson's decision to consider establishing a judicial inquiry in the alleged spy case involving George Victor Spencer is another example of the Government's tendency to reverse its stand.

Apparently a reversal of stand was anticipated. The editorial then continues as follows:

> The Government's actions in the Spencer case became, over the months, so peculiar that judicial investigation would ultimately be necessary to justify them. For here was the case of a young civil servant, working in a minor job in a post office, who was alleged to have been in some way involved with the attempts made by officials of the Russian Embassy in Ottawa to carry out espionage. The espionage activity of the Russian Embassy officials was considered to be sufficiently serious for the Government of Canada to insist on their expulsion from Canada.
> Mr. Pearson informed the House of Commons in the spring that the Russians had been in contact with three Canadians. Two of them had co-operated with the police and thereby played a valuable part in exposing the plot. The third Canadian had not been co-operative. Or as Mr. Pearson put it, in the case of this third Canadian "the circumstances unfortunately were different".

I assume that was in reference to the Spencer case. If the circumstances are different, why is he still under surveillance? The editorial then continues and states:

> The name of this third Canadian was not given. But he was later identified by a Vancouver newspaper as George Victor Spencer. And Spencer himself readily admitted that he was the one who had been mentioned in Parliament. He is alleged to have gone further and to have made the extraordinary statement that if he were to tell all he knew about Russian espionage operations, "heads would be rolling in Canada and elsewhere".

That is where I read the expression. I knew I had read it somewhere during lunch time, and apparently he made this statement on another occasion. The editorial then states:

> The Government, however, declined to take legal proceedings against Spencer. The grounds given were that the evidence was not of such a nature as would be likely to procure a conviction in court, and that such a trial would disclose too much of Canada's counter-espionage methods.
> Had the matter rested at this point, there might still have been questioning about the Government's decision.

Later in the editorial the following is stated:

> The different pieces of the Spencer case became harder and harder to reconcile. If the man was considered, after careful examination and an interview, to be unsuitable even as a 'junior civil servant' working outside Ottawa in a 'non-sensitive job,' his disqualifications must have been serious.

I agree with the Montreal Gazette in that regard. The editorial continues:

> If they were of a nature having nothing to do with his alleged involvement in the Russian espionage activity, his dismissal from his post should have taken place in the normal course of events—

This information should have been made public, but it has not been made public. The last paragraph of this editorial states:

> It is necessary that the assurance should be given, by means of a judicial inquiry, that what has been done in this strange case has been done on sufficient grounds.

That is the position taken by the Gazette. The Toronto Globe and Mail of November 27, 1965 had this to say about the Minister of Justice and his dealings in this case:

> In this case, there is not sufficient evidence of a legally admissible character to ensure reasonable likelihood of conviction.

That is reportedly a statement made by the Minister of Justice. I would like to hear the Minister of Justice explain this situation. Because some law officer's opinion is that there is not a likelihood of conviction, but because there is some evidence against Spencer he is fired from his position, his salary is cut off, his pension is cut off and he remains under surveillance, which means partly in custody.

Is this man free? Is he as free as any member of this House of Commons? The answer to those questions is obviously no, because he is under surveillance and I want to know why. I suggest that he should be given a hearing.

Mr. Churchill: Can he leave the country?

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, that is another good question. Somebody asked, could he leave the country? He probably cannot leave the place where he lives. This is what the Brandon Sun said in connection with the Spencer case:

> The man's reputation is ruined. He has been named. The Minister of Justice has stated that he gave information to the Russians. But the justice minister will not give him the satisfaction of having his case tried.

Those on the other side of the chamber talk about hearings. They went a long way in this regard at one time. I remember the Minister of Transport said when we were dealing with the Coyne affair that it was a terrible thing for Mr. Coyne, it was against the Bill of Rights, that he did not receive a hearing in the House of Commons, even if he had one in the Senate. If the law is to be applied for one person in Canada who holds a high position, is it right for Mr. Spencer to be denied the same privilege?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Bow River but the time allotted for his speech has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the Chair now understand that the hon. member should continue his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. This article in the Brandon Sun goes on to say:

> The man's reputation has been ruined, and for all anyone knows, he may not even have done what the justice minister says he did. And even if he did do it, the justice minister apparently feels that what he did was not serious enough to merit prosecution.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Then the writer of this newspaper article says:

> This is a ridiculous situation.

I say it is ridiculous and preposterous. The article continues:

> We have a man whose integrity is in question, who is being shadowed like a criminal, and yet who has done nothing, apparently, to merit prosecution under the Criminal Code. The worst that can be said is that he was guilty of poor taste and bad judgment for giving information to Soviet agents. And yet we do not even know that he did that! Has Mr. Cardin come down with a case of Favreauitis? Are incompetence and forgetfulness an occupational hazard of justice ministers? It would appear so, and that appearance will linger until all the facts are known.

That appearance will linger until this man has been given a hearing, even though it be in camera. Let us look at the Globe and Mail. They are just as critical. Similar articles appeared in all our national newspapers. They are critical because they realize, as I am sure the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice realize, that the most important civil right is liberty as I described it this afternoon in the definition given by Dean Cronkite, formerly of the University of Saskatchewan, and the words used by the Hon. Mr. Powers, former cabinet member at the time another spy case was being investigated.

The article in the Globe and Mail says:

> The justice minister at the same time said that Spencer would be kept under surveillance so long as he remained in Canada, which would seem to mean for the rest of his life, since he is a Canadian.

The question to be asked is, how long is this man to remain under surveillance? When will he be able to throw off the cloak and the umbrella, if ever? The article continues:

> He has been dismissed from his job in the post office, cut off from pension, without right of appeal.

I shall deal with that question once more. Surely the fact that he received a hearing before the Civil Service Commission has nothing to do with his rights as a citizen of this nation to have determined the question of whether he is guilty or innocent of the charge of espionage.

Mr. Douglas: He did not even have an appeal before the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. Woolliams: No, he had no appeal; and we never know what influence is used in that regard. The article in the Globe and Mail then says:

> That the surveillance, the dismissal from the job and the decision not to prosecute still stand, was confirmed in the house yesterday by Mr. Cardin.

This article appeared in the February 1, 1966, issue of the Globe and Mail and was written by Mr. George Bain. I think it should be placed on the record. It continues:

> Surveillance of a person believed to have formed an intention to commit a particular crime may be reasonable and essential to law enforcement, as the justice minister says. Never-ending surveillance to satisfy some generalized suspicion that a person might at some time commit some crime is a device of the police state.

Those are strong words. They are not my words; they are the words of the Globe and Mail, one of the leading national newspapers of this country, written by Mr. Bain. Then the article says:

> Mr. Cardin is on shaky ground—

Well, Mr. Chairman, I have often wondered about that but I shall not go into it now:

> —too, when he argues against even an in-camera hearing of Spencer's alleged offences on the ground that counter-espionage methods would be disclosed, and argues at the same time that the man got a fair shake in the firing proceedings because "the Civil Service Commission was asked to make a full examination of the case . . ."
> This suggests either that Mr. Cardin believes the Civil Service Commission can be entrusted with a matter which could not safely be entrusted to a judicial committee, or that the Civil Service Commission rendered its "independent and objective advice" on the basis of less-than-full knowledge of the case.

That is strong language but it is language I put to the government and ask them to reconsider their position. I ask the Prime Minister the same question. It is not the first time this government has had to retreat on matters. I am sure their pride will not be punctured if they have to retreat on this matter, because we are dealing with a question of civil rights. Then the article says:

> He was then accused—and from that, the natural processes of justice should follow, or should be altered only for some much better reason than the government has seen fit to offer.

I could go on reading these quotations, Mr. Chairman. Newspapers throughout the land take the same position. In 1945 a precedent was set when we had a spy case under investigation. I am speaking from memory now and my reading of some years ago, but I believe 11 people were involved in that case. I may have to correct that figure. A commission was set up because men like Mr. Diefenbaker, Mr. Coldwell and Mr. Powers set out the argument in favour of a commission far more ably than I can this afternoon.

A similar situation was being dealt with at that time and a hearing was held in the case. The Minister of Justice at that time is, as the Prime Minister knows, a very distinguished Canadian, Mr. St. Laurent. The precedent was set at that time. The Prime Minister said he has reviewed the cases in this respect. I am not being critical but I think he missed this particular case. There is precedent in this regard, and as there is precedent, and the argument advanced by the government, is that there is not, let us follow precedent and give this man a hearing. The Saskatchewan Bar Review of December, 1946, had this to say:

> It should further be noted that a commission composed of Justices Taschereau and Kellock was appointed under the Inquiries Act to investigate the ramifications of the alleged spy ring. Mr. E. K. Williams, K.C., President of the Canadian Bar Association, along with two other legal gentlemen, was appointed commission counsel. In mid-February the people of Canada first heard of the matter when the suspects were gathered in under rather dramatic circumstances, pursuant to the order in council just referred to. On February 15 the Prime Minister made a public statement and from then until parliament met on March 14 the newspapers and all the rest of us had a good time speculating and accusing.

That is what we are doing now, speculating and accusing Mr. Spencer. He is under surveillance for the rest of his life. Let us get off his back. Let us give him a hearing that the rule of law allows any citizen of Canada. I cannot make my point any clearer than that, Mr. Chairman.

I wish to digress from this subject for a few moments. When the estimates of the Department of Justice were placed before us the Minister of Justice made a statement. I would ask him how we are to handle the old estimates because there is now some confusion and a divisive element with regard to ministerial responsibility. We on this side of the chamber were not sure, when we prepared our remarks for these estimates, what branches some matters come under. I would ask the minister to reconsider his position in this regard because it seems to me this government has taken the position that when they appoint a minister in whom they have not absolute confidence they delegate part of his department to somebody else.

I will give the committee an illustration. Consider, for example, the positions of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Trade and Commerce lost responsibility for the Wheat Board and it was given to the Minister of Finance. Now we have a Minister of Justice half of whose work is given to the Solicitor General and some to the President of the Privy Council. We on this side of the chamber do not know what matters come under what department. I would point out to backbenchers opposite that there is hope for them; they will probably all be privy councillors eventually, in view of the fact that there is a high mortality rate among Liberal cabinet members.

Mr. Douglas: It is an understatement for me to say that I am deeply disappointed by the statement which has been made this afternoon by the Prime Minister. It seems to me a very serious matter when the head of the government of Canada rises in his place in this house to put his stamp of approval upon a situation in Canada where a man can be charged, without being given the opportunity to prove his innocence; where he can be punished without a trial and where he can be stigmatized without a hearing. This is exactly what has happened to Victor George Spencer.

I do not need to say that neither I nor any member of the party with which I am associated, nor any other member in this house, takes any exception to the government's using firm, stringent measures to deal with espionage. We take it for granted that this is the function of the government. I do not know Mr. Spencer. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East has him in his constituency and has known him for several years. He certainly does not gather the impression he is either a very dangerous or a very sinister figure.

But it seems to me to be elementary justice that if this man is a menace to the security of this nation, then he ought to be tried, found guilty and punished. Surely he has the right to be heard. Surely he has the right to his day in court. He has the right to be deemed innocent until he is proven guilty.

Let us look at what has happened. On May 8 the Department of External Affairs issued a statement in which they referred to two Canadians who had been allegedly engaged in espionage activities, one of whom co-operated with the R.C.M.P. and who, by the way, secured large sums of money apparently for the purpose of compromising female civil servants, which does not make a very pretty picture. The second, who did not co-operate but who was confronted and admitted some association with agents of the U.S.S.R., was described in these terms by a report of the Department of External Affairs:

> In one instance a Canadian civil servant was paid thousands of dollars to gather information and documentation in Canada, the purpose of which was to assist in the establishment of espionage activities in Canada and in other countries, and to perform economic intelligence tasks, including the provision of detailed information on the trans-mountain pipe line system in Western Canada.

The Prime Minister told us at that time that this second individual was gravely ill, but the impression was certainly given that in the event of his recovery he would be prosecuted. Well, from the newspapers I gather the man was gravely ill. I understand that last May he had a lung removed. But there was no prosecution when he recovered. Instead the Minister of Justice told the house there was not sufficient admissible evidence to warrant prosecution.

What has happened has been that the government has proceeded now to be the judge, the jury and the prosecuting attorney all rolled into one. The government had one or two alternatives which it could have taken. First of all, there has been set up by the government a senior civil servants committee on security. Hon. members will recall this committee was set up a couple of years ago largely because of a case which was brought to the attention of the house by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. This case concerned a young sailor who was discharged from the government on security grounds. It was discovered later this was a matter of mistaken identity. We pressed in the house for some appeal board to which persons in the government service or in the armed services might go if they were accused of being a bad security risk. At that time the Prime Minister agreed to set up such a committee. This man might have been given the opportunity to appear before it.

A few days ago the Prime Minister said it was not appropriate for Spencer to appear before this committee because he was not in a job that had to do with security. If he was not in a job that had to do with security, how does the government explain the fact that the Postmaster General said in his public statement the man was dismissed for security reasons? The Postmaster General says he is dismissed for security reasons, but the Prime Minister says this man cannot appear before a security committee because he was not in a job that had to do with security. He was ruled out of that possibility.

The next choice the government had was to dismiss Spencer in the normal course of events and allow him the right to appear before the Civil Service Commission. The government could have placed whatever evidence it had at its disposal before that body and Spencer could have appeared, I assume with counsel, and could have defended himself. But the government did not do this. Instead, the government dismissed him under section 50 of the Civil Service Act, which denies this man the right of appeal and cancels his pension.

The other day the Prime Minister said they sent someone out to see him. I understand from press reports it is true that Mr. J. A. Murray, the director of the appeals branch of the Civil Service Commission, went to Vancouver and interviewed Spencer. Does the Prime Minister think that constitutes a hearing, Mr. Chairman, that sending a civil servant to interview a man constitutes giving him a chance to prove his innocence? Is this individual, Mr. Murray, who interviewed him to be sole judge, jury and executioner? This is not a hearing before the Public Service Commission. This is an investigation before they dismissed him, and after having assured themselves that the Civil Service Commission were satisfied, and there would be no complaint from them, the government proceeded to fire him. I do not wonder that the postal employees union in Vancouver registered the strongest possible objection to this nefarious use of this vicious and dictatorial section in the Civil Service Act.

Now, the other thing the government did was to take Spencer's pension away from him. I gather from press reports that this man is 57 years of age. How is he supposed to live and maintain his family for the rest of his life? This man's pension is part of his deferred wages. The pension rights of an individual are earned over a period of years and the contributions which the government makes are one of the fringe benefits of his employment. By what right does the government take this money which belongs to this man? If this man lives his normal life expectancy, the amount of money which the government has taken from him amounts to several thousands of dollars. In other words, they have fined him.

Is the government now a court that can accuse a man, condemn him and fine him his life's pension without giving him a hearing or a trial, without giving him the opportunity to say what he has to say in his own defence? Surely this is a scandalous state of affairs. I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is a sad day for Canada when a man can be punished without trial, can be accused without being given a chance to appear in open court; when a man, whom the Minister of Justice says there is not enough evidence to prosecute, can be stigmatized, have his pension taken from him, be dismissed from his employment and placed under surveillance for the rest of his life, being fined thousands of dollars of pension money which is his by right.

The Prime Minister made a defence of the action taken by the government. First of all, he said that Spencer admitted improper conduct. How do we know that? How does the Prime Minister know it? Is he just relying on a report in a police file? Has this man ever said in court that he was guilty? And guilty of what? To what offence has he admitted being guilty of? Are people now to be condemned on the basis of a police report or on the transcription of an interview with some government official? We do not know that he has admitted improper conduct, and the Prime Minister does not know it except by accepting a document presented to him by some people in the government service.

The Prime Minister says that this man disclosed his identity. The government disclosed his identity the day they fired him. Every person at his place of employment knew that this man had been fired because he was associated with the charges, the public accusations, that had been made by the Department of External Affairs. As a matter of fact, this man did not identify himself; he was accosted by a newspaperman who said to him: "Are you the person who was referred to in the external affairs department release of May 8?" What was he supposed to do—lie? Was he supposed to perjure himself?

Why does the Prime Minister expect this man to join this general conspiracy of silence? If the man had nothing to be ashamed of, why would he not say, "Certainly I am the fellow who was mixed up in this mess; all I want now is a chance to tell my side of the story"?

It seems to me that the weakest argument put forth by the Prime Minister is when he says that we must protect our national security system, because if we do not it will be impossible to carry on proper counterespionage in this country. Not one member of this house, Mr. Chairman, I am sure, is asking that all the background information of the counterespionage system of this country should be laid open to the public. Of course that would be impossible. What we in the opposition parties have been asking for has been an in camera judicial inquiry. All we are asking is that a judge or a group of judges be constituted, before whom this man can appear with his counsel and tell his story, before whom documents can be examined and the whole case gone into. If the judicial inquiry tells us and the people of Canada that it is satisfied that this man has been properly, fairly and justly treated, then I for one will say no more about the matter.

But what are we given, Mr. Chairman? The Prime Minister stands up in his place and says: "I believe that this man's treatment has been lawful and just". I would tell the Prime Minister that there is a verse in the Bible which asks: Who made thee a judge in Israel? Since when has the Prime Minister become a court? I have great respect for the Prime Minister and I do not believe that he would willingly do an injustice to any person. But with the greatest possible respect I am not prepared to give to him or to any other person in Canada the power to condemn a man until he has been tried by the due process of law.

Mr. Fairweather: The new politics, they call it.

Mr. Douglas: The Prime Minister says that this man's human rights have not been impaired. The Prime Minister, Mr. Chairman, must surely have had his tongue in his cheek when he made that statement. This man has been stigmatized from one end of Canada to the other as one who was setting up espionage in this country. He is going to be kept under surveillance, the Minister of Justice tells us, for as long as he lives in Canada. Yet the Prime Minister says his human rights have not in any way been impaired.

What I should like to know, Mr. Chairman, is the real reason the government has refused to grant an in camera judicial inquiry. Whom are they trying to cover up for? Did the Department of External Affairs, in the anxiety of the minister to pose as the spy catcher of the age, make accusations which they could not substantiate? Did the Department of External Affairs go too far, and then the Department of Justice find that they really had not the grounds for the things they had been saying? What is the real story at the back of this? Is the government's refusal to have an inquiry an attempt to whitewash the ineptitude and the incompetence of some people within the government service? This is what we want to know.

The Canadian people will not be satisfied with having the Prime Minister rise in his place and say: "After carefully looking over all the files I am satisfied that this man has been treated justly and fairly". It is not enough for the Prime Minister to say that justice has been done. The Canadian people must be satisfied that justice has been done. Justice must seem to have been done; and I do not think that the Canadian people will be satisfied until the government gives this man a chance to appear, even behind closed doors, before a panel of judges who can hear all the facts and decide whether or not this man has been treated fairly before the law.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, if we are to survive as a free and democratic nation one thing we must preserve is the due process of law. As long as one citizen, humble though he may be, unimportant as he may seem to the government, is denied access to the courts and denied the due process of law, then something of our freedom in Canada has been diminished.

The Deputy Chairman: In order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business, it is my duty to rise, report certain resolutions, and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Resolution adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

• (5:00 p.m.)

EDUCATION

SUGGESTION TO ESTABLISH FEDERAL RESEARCH AND INFORMATION SERVICE

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the federal government should consider the creation of a federal office of education, the purpose of which would be to provide, in co-operation with the provinces, a clearing house for research and information concerning elementary and secondary education, the co-ordination of the present activities of the federal government in education, and to provide leadership in the general field of post-secondary education.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last week a somewhat similar resolution was presented by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) having to do with the involvement of the federal government in education. At that time members of this house were reminded, I think by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) that the hon. member for St. John's West ought to look at the British North America Act, sections 92 and 93, to see what they said concerning education. Of course I and the hon. member for St. John's West have always been aware what those two sections of the B.N.A. act said with reference to education. I submit that that is not the whole story, and that the federal government is involved, and quite properly involved, in certain aspects of education. Section 91 of the act gives the federal government responsibility for the Indians of Canada, and in carrying out that responsibility the government has established a system of Indian education in this country. That is a system of considerable size because I notice that the budget for Indian education in the year 1966-67 is $38 million.

Defence, of course, is also a federal responsibility, and under this heading a considerable amount of money is spent. There are service colleges for the training of officers. There are the ordinary elementary and secondary schools which the Department of National Defence operates in Canada and overseas for the children of men in the armed forces. I am afraid that I could not tell you what the figure is, because the amount spent for this purpose is not shown separately in the estimates.

The external aid office of the Department of External Affairs is also involved in giving educational assistance to developing countries in other continents. These are three activities with respect to education in which the federal government is quite properly involved, and which do not infringe upon the rights of the provinces in any way.

Apart from this the federal government has become concerned in recent years with other aspects of education. If hon. members look again at the estimates for 1966-67 they will see an amount of $186 million to be voted under the terms of the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act. As we all know these are moneys to assist in the building of technical and vocational schools in the provinces and, as I say, the amount of money there involved is $186 million.

Recently the Prime Minister announced an increase in aid to universities. The amount to be spent by the federal government, this year, for that purpose will be $100 million.

Adding up all the figures I have quoted, Mr. Speaker, you will see that they amount to somewhere around $240 million. This amount of money is quite apart from research grants made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and other federal government departments.

One can still look at the B.N.A. Act and argue that the federal government has no right in the field of higher education. Indeed the province of Quebec still takes that attitude. Quebec has received aid for its universities in a manner different from the other provinces, but I suggest that in the other provinces there is no real argument against this. Those other provinces quite willingly accept the money for technical and vocational schools, and quite willingly accept the money for their universities. More and more people in this country look upon section 92 as referring to elementary and secondary education which will remain within the jurisdiction of the provinces, but they look upon the whole field of higher education as something which the federal government is quite properly concerned with.

Mr. Speaker, I have already said that the federal government is operating schools and spending large amounts of money on education. However, these educational activities of the federal government are rather dispersed, and handled by quite a number of departments. The Department of Labour formerly handled the technical and vocational grants, which are now to be handled by the new Department of Manpower and Immigration. As I have mentioned, the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is involved in operating a whole educational system on its own. The Department of National Defence has a division which is concerned with education. The Department of Finance comes into the picture so far as the Canada student loans plan is concerned, and the Department of External Affairs through the external aid provisions is also involved with education.

I suggest that we ought to create a federal government agency—and I am not too concerned by what name it goes, whether you call it the federal office of education or the federal secretariat of education—into which all educational functions of the federal government will be brought, so that there may be some coherence to the whole program.

In addition to performing the functions which I have mentioned, of operating the schools of the federal government, consulting with the provinces and the universities concerning university and technical and vocational grants, I suggest that a federal office of education could serve as a clearing house of educational research in literature throughout Canada.

In the provinces in Canada co-ordination in educational research is going on, and new curricula as well as new teaching methods are being developed. However, there ought to be a clearing house where all these things can be brought together.

I should like to say a word about research. I have already said that in Canada some educational research is being carried on, although not nearly enough. We are behind many other countries in this respect. There was an organization in this country a few years ago known as the Canadian Council for Research in Education. This body was supported by several national organizations, including the Canadian Association of Professors of Education, the Canadian Association of School Superintendents and Inspectors, the Association Canadienne des Educateurs de Langue Française, the Canadian Education Association, the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation, and, as it was then called, the National Conference of Canadian Universities and Colleges.

In a brochure recently published by the associations I have mentioned, it was pointed out just how far behind other countries Canada is with respect to educational research. May I quote briefly from the brochure:

> But there is a growing concern in the educational world about the effectiveness and efficiency of our educational programs. One source of this concern is the increasing cost of education. Rising cost brings with it the inevitable question as to whether the two billion dollars Canadians are now spending on education are being put to the best possible use.

> However, a much more basic cause of our concern with efficiency is that we recognize that man's knowledge is accumulating at an accelerating pace. Thus the child of each succeeding generation must learn more and more rapidly, or he will become increasingly less capable of utilizing this accumulated knowledge. This acceleration in the child's learning will require a continuing improvement in the effectiveness of our school programs.

Speaking at a conference of the Canadian College of Teachers at Lac Beauport, Quebec, two years ago, Dr. Robinson of the Canadian Council for Research and Education expressed this opinion—and I am reading from a report by the Canadian Press:

> Many of the differences in education from province to province were not based on different philosophies, but simply on different rates of slowness in copying United States methods, he said.
> He quoted mathematics as a subject in which Canadian education is five years behind the U.S.
> We must, of course, profit where we can from American research,
> But if Canada is to pretend to have an educational system with unique goals—as we surely do—it must follow that we develop an independent research program.
> Otherwise, Canada confesses to being the intellectual beggar among the educationally advanced countries of the world.

I think there is ample evidence that educational research in Canada is behind that of the United States, and that we should be doing more than we are doing now in this field. The Canadian Council for Research in Education is, I am sure, performing a useful function. It is supported by the organizations which I mentioned a few minutes ago. I would suggest, however, that these are organizations with only limited funds at their disposal and that it would be fitting if an agency could be set up by the federal government which would recognize the importance of research in education, just as we recognize the importance of scientific research by the National Research Council.

I believe the federal government should recognize this and provide the financial support necessary to carry on the type of research into education which is really necessary in this country. I suggested earlier that there are educational activities in the educational field which are quite appropriate for the federal government. I suggested that a federal office of education should be established to handle those functions which pertain to the national defence schools, Indian schools, the granting of moneys for technical education, and so on. I am also suggesting that we should go further and set up an office for educational research. Whether the provinces wish to co-operate or not is, of course, up to them. It seems to me that education throughout Canada would profit from research into curricula, teaching methods and the psychology of learning. This information could be brought into one clearing house and then be made available to the whole country.

I realize that some agencies are trying to do this at the present time—the Council for Research in Education, the Canadian Teachers Association and, perhaps, the Canadian Home and School Association. Nevertheless it seems to me this work would be more efficiently done by one agency to which all this information could be sent—an agency with the funds available to stimulate further research.

The situation in Canada is not very different from the situation in the United States, as far as the constitution is concerned. Education there is the responsibility of the individual states. Yet for many years the United States has had a federal office of education—an agency in Washington. The states have throughout carried on their own educational systems—there are 50 states with 50 educational systems—but there is also a central agency which tries to co-ordinate the work as best it can.

This idea that there should be a federal office of education in Canada was presented to the Prime Minister by a delegation from the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation in 1963. At that time the following report appeared in one of our newspapers. I quote from a Canadian Press despatch.

> A parent-teacher delegation said Tuesday its proposal for a federal office of education has been endorsed in principle by Prime Minister Pearson.
> The prime minister told the group, however, that the department could be established only if all provinces agreed.
> The proposal was put to him by the 300,000 member Canadian Home and School Parent Federation, which also asked for federal-provincial co-operation in providing more resources for vocational guidance.

I would disagree with that statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). If the federal government wants to establish such an office to handle its own educational functions it has every right to do so. Whether or not the provinces wish to co-operate is another matter but I suggest many of them would wish to do so.

I think we should recognize the fact that the federal government is already deeply involved in education. When you spend more than $250 million a year in a particular field, you are involved in it. This involvement will grow in the course of the years. Certainly if the report of the Bladen Commission is carried out the federal government will be heavily involved in education. We might as well accept this situation and create an agency in Ottawa to carry out this function of the federal government as usefully and as efficiently as possible.

Mr. Aiken: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he see this office as a separate department or as a branch of the proposed Department of Manpower?

Mr. Prittie: I did not suggest that a separate department should be established. I am not much concerned about titles. I am more concerned about the functions to be performed. I think that initially this office would be a branch of another department—a secretariat of some sort.

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): During the debate on the Speech from the Throne I had an opportunity to speak briefly on the subject matter of the resolution before the house today. I supported the idea that an office of education should be formed within a department of the federal government and I urged the establishment of such an office. I was interested to note that during the same debate the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Dubé) also spoke on the subject and made what I thought was a substantial contribution toward an understanding of federal participation in education.

I rise today to support enthusiastically the principle of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie). My only reservation is that perhaps the motion is too restricted. I would hope and expect that a federal office of education would be more than a clearing exchange, and that its interest in research and information would not be restricted solely to elementary and secondary education. I would hope and expect, too, that such an office would stimulate more and better research in the whole spectrum of education which has too long been starved for lack of research in Canada. I would hope and expect, further, that such an office would provide leadership, not just in post-secondary education but, in co-operation with the provinces, in every aspect of education in which there is a national interest.

My hon. friend referred to the United States office of education. What he did not say, but what might be interesting to hon. members, is that the United States has had such an office of education since 1867. I suggest that by 1967 it will be high time Canada had such an office.

It might be instructive to quote from a document published by the Committee on Education and Labour, of the United States House of Representatives, in July 1963:

> Certainly education is a national concern. Undoubtedly, no democracy can long endure unless it develops a national policy regarding education. Even though the federal government has been interested in the growth and development of the schools of the nation, the major responsibility for the organization and financing of schools has been a state's function. In many instances the education system has become so decentralized that each school district has assumed major responsibility for the development of its schools. We have valued this decentralization, believing that it is important for every citizen in every community to be interested in the kind of schools his children attend. We have voted to tax ourselves at the state and local levels to maintain a high-level educational system and have been proud of the dedication shown by the lay boards of education who have given unselfishly that our American system might reach the level of its present accomplishments. Yet, at the same time we have been consciously aware of the fact that, with increased mobility of our nation's population and increased need for an enlightened citizenry, the federal government must play an increasing role in the further development of our educational opportunities.

I believe those words apply with equal force in Canada. We must recognize and respect the primacy of provincial jurisdiction in education. If Canadian education is to be effective, provincial education departments and powers must be strong. The alternative to that is surely an educational lag and a default of leadership, but the government should help, where help is wanted, by grants, information and advice. The federal government has a valid and vital interest of its own in education, a national interest in education.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce in its statement of policy for 1965-66, published last September, states at page 16 of that document:

While recognizing that educational institutions and their administration in Canada are under the specific jurisdiction of the provincial and local authorities, it is nevertheless asserted that education is and ought to be a matter of national concern and of direct interest to all Canadians.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) mentioned that parliament is now responsible for spending vast sums on education. I believe he mentioned an amount of some $250 million. However, according to Pierre O'Neil in La Presse, some $500 million is estimated to be the current federal expenditure on education.

Can the Canadian government or the provincial governments seriously talk of exclusivity in educational jurisdiction when education today involves this kind of public investment, this kind of involvement in every fibre of our society, our economy and our cultures? There is more than money at stake.

I believe that a federal office of education should co-ordinate the myriad federal programs in education, which the hon. member has mentioned. I believe it should make its facilities available to assist provinces to gather information and make it available for the advancement of education in all parts of Canada.

We must recognize that there is a national interest to be served in education which is not necessarily the sum of provincial interests or identical with any particular provincial interest. The Economic Council of Canada has made the message loud and clear that there is unquestionably a national interest in education from an economic standpoint. Perhaps, in fact, there is no more vital national interest.

The second annual review of the Economic Council of Canada points out that "education is a crucially important factor contributing to economic growth and to rising living standards". That would be reason enough to co-ordinate our attacks on this national problem, but there is more to education than economics. There are people, their lives and livelihoods, their contributions in human terms to their families, their communities and their country.

What should be our goals as a nation to meet their needs in education? What needs have the provinces been unable to meet, or cannot be expected to meet? I can think of a number of areas in which federal initiative could be taken in an office of education such as the motion suggests—pre-school preparation of economically and culturally deprived children, children of minority groups, children of immigrants; orientation of immigrants of all ages to school, to work, to our society; highly qualified in their own countries but restricted by educational or professional requirements here; training of language teachers to raise the level of bilingualism wherever local education authorities want to do so in any part of Canada; training and retraining Canadians of any age, wherever they live, so that they may make the fullest use of their talents for the benefit of themselves and of Canada; adult education which recognizes education as a continuous process, continuously enriching lives, communities, provinces, and most of all our country. Mobility of teachers and students, of knowledge and ideas, as well as of labour is surely desirable in Canada.

A nation's education cannot live and thrive in ten airtight compartments. It will suffocate in the grip of parochialism. It is suffocating, at least in so far as the national interest is concerned. I think it is time we faced facts as Canadians, as provincial governments and as a federal government. It is time we tossed out the old shibboleths which have hobbled Canadian education for 99 years. Perhaps up until now we could afford it; but today we have a different society, a different economy, and a different nation in a different world. Education itself is different, it is in ferment.

In today's Canada we cannot afford to have education walled up, no matter how good each provincial system may be. Let us knock down the bureaucratic walls which plague Canadian education today. We hear talk of jealousy of sovereignty. Are those authorities which are jealous of their sovereignty also jealous of poverty, ignorance, and lack of opportunity for full participation by every citizen in educational progress. I suggest there may be jealousy among governments in the field of education, but I suggest also that these governments ask their people about education.

I believe that the people of Canada are not interested in arguments about sovereignty; they are interested in obtaining the fullest possible opportunity for every Canadian to develop his talent to the fullest. If we fail to develop national goals in education, if we fail to make significant progress toward those goals, the result will be to the detriment of Canada as a nation. What has been good enough for Canada in the past 99 years is not good enough today. Balkanized education will not serve Canada's needs in its second century.

I appeal, Mr. Speaker, for a new awareness of the need for a national focus on education, respecting provincial jurisdiction and earning provincial co-operation in meeting the challenge. I favour a federal initiative in the establishment of an office of education and I join the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond in respectfully taking issue with the view expressed by the Prime Minister, that no initiative should be taken without the agreement of the provinces. I favour a federal initiative in the establishment of such an office.

I hope that the provinces will co-operate in a spirit of mutual good will and mutual interest, and make the fullest and most productive use of such an office for the benefit of their citizens, and in the national interest; but I urge the establishment of such an office even if such co-operation and such interest is not forthcoming, for the purpose of more effectively carrying out the established functions and responsibilities of the Government of Canada to the people of Canada in the field of education.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I will take only a few minutes because I know quite a number of hon. members are most interested in this particular subject. I will try to say what I wish to say in a vey few minutes.

I think the need for the establishment of an office such as is proposed is so obvious that we should hardly need to be debating it. I would go further and say that the re-organization of the government which the Prime Minister proposed very recently very easily could have included, in a branch of the manpower department, an office to co-ordinate these efforts.

I support absolutely the motion in its general intent. The federal government has engaged in an encroachment in the field of education in three main areas, the first of which is in the vocational schools program, which was not really an encroachment because it did not make any effort to teach, but rather to provide financial assistance. There was a large amount of federal money spent. Second, the university grants to the provinces have been increased from time to time and now are expected to be $5.00 per capita. This is a very large and substantial federal expenditure. The third is research, which reaches across the whole field of education. We are involved in education, particularly in these three very important fields.

I do not believe there has been any question of the constitutional grounds about these three fields. In two other fields a reasonable case can be made for federal involvement in education, and that is post-secondary education at the university and vocational levels—and also in the matter of standardization of grading in elementary and secondary schools in Canada. I think this is very badly needed.

Last year I proposed a confederation student exchange for the centennial year which had as its objective the exchange of students between different parts of Canada for a full term of study, particularly students taking education at the secondary level. The centennial commission has never fully adopted this idea, although it has received general interest and support by various people and organizations as well as the government. As a result, the student exchange program was stepped up, although it has not gone far enough. My complete plan was never put into effect.

When I did some research on this particular idea of student exchange I found a lack of standards in grading of elementary and secondary students across the country. In this regard I think the federal government could provide service by establishing an office to determine how best to standardize grading without in any way interfering with the rights of the provinces in the field of education. I see no reason why we could not provide some assistance in this way, particularly in view of the fact that with a constantly moving population, education in Canada is now a matter of national concern.

Mr. Speaker, I can foresee that part of the manpower requirement of this country will necessitate further federal involvement in this provincial field. However, in this regard we must be very careful, so long as the constitution remains as it is, not to go beyond what is strictly related to the federal field. Sometimes in our enthusiasm in relation to national co-ordination and effort we are inclined to step over the limits of what the constitution sets out as being federal jurisdiction. Our constitution still puts education under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and while we seem to be encroaching upon it from time to time as education becomes increasingly important and of national concern, we have to give due recognition to constitutional matters and should not go beyond them. I do not think that some system of grading in primary and secondary schools on a national level would be an encroachment. I do not think that any general effort related to manpower needs in Canada would be an encroachment on the provincial field.

Mr. Speaker, those are the few comments I wished to make. I hope the government will treat this as more than a routine motion and act on it post-haste.

[Translation]

Mr. Herman Laverdière (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) on his motion which reveals the interest he bears the great cause of education in Canada.

I suppose it is difficult, if not impossible, for one who has made a career of teaching, one who has devoted years to teaching, not to be, even as an M.P., interested to the highest degree in this worthy cause, and I congratulate the hon. member on his praiseworthy intentions in presenting this motion.

[Mr. Aiken.]

Indeed, it is necessary to co-ordinate efforts by setting up a national centre for the exchange of information. New teaching methods are being developed regularly and are being tried out with a view to giving our young people a better education and to giving the greatest possible number of them the opportunity to develop their talents.

Particularly on this last point, there is no doubt that thousands of our young people get discouraged and drop out after a few failures when, in many cases, they are not to blame for such failures.

I think especially of the many failures, and I do not believe they are restricted to some colleges I know. In many cases, the numerous failures in high school mathematics and in other subjects are disastrous because of the inevitable consequences they entail. Students who have failed lose heart and give up the studies they could have pursued if more appropriate methods had been used.

However, I fail to see the advisability or the necessity for the federal government itself to establish such a central co-ordination office. I agree that there should be a certain reorganization of the financing provided by various departments of the federal government, but as concerns this research centre, if I understood the hon. member correctly, it would be a sort of centre where the principal organizations, the principal associations, the principal institutions of the country could pool their findings and exchange and co-ordinate research on such findings. I agree that it should exist. But why should the government assume the responsibility for such a centre, when, if my information is correct, a Canada Council for research on education was established two or three years ago.

I think that the work of the Canada Council, which might be given a little more freedom, should have the kind of financing that would allow it to carry on with the work already under way.

I am of the opinion that this council, in co-operation with various teachers, parent-teachers and even students associations, with specialized professors in contact with the Quebec planning bureau or the Ontario institute for studies on education and other provincial organizations, could ensure co-ordination and enable everyone involved to get information.

I believe the federal government already has enough, if not too much authority, in the field of education. We could go on discussing and arguing for a long time on the constitutional aspects of education.

Nevertheless, specially for Quebec, I am convinced every possible effort should be continued to establish a system undergoing daily changes and Quebec's privileges should be jealously guarded, for they are largely the guarantee of the French Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Enns: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

• (5:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Laverdière: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Enns: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to the hon. member's remarks about the federal government entering the field of education. I am wondering whether the intent of the resolution really would harm provincial rights. I ask the hon. member whether the suggestion that the federal government establish a federal office of education and provide leadership in this field would not enhance the position of provincial governments with regard to education and would not really create any threat to the provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Laverdière: Mr. Speaker, to answer my hon. friend, I do not think it is necessary, in fact I would not say that I fear new interference from the federal government in the field of education, but I do not see why the central government should deal with a particular field when there already exist associations and organizations which can undertake the work apparently referred to in this motion.

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I see that I shall not have time to give my full views on the resolution put before the house, but I must say that I am opposed to the spirit and to a great deal of the letter of this motion.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

• (6:00 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to a certain bill:

An Act to extend the time for consideration of objections pursuant to section 20 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act with respect to the reports of commissions established for the decennial census taken in the year 1961.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if the house leader could tell us what department we will take up next if we were to finish Justice tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: I hope the hon. member meant the word "when" instead of "if", when he was asking the question. When the Justice estimates are finished, we would expect tomorrow to call the Departments of Fisheries and Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Knowles: The minister can hope.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GHANA—REPORTED OVERTHROW OF GOVERNMENT BY MILITARY FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was unable to communicate with the Prime Minister in this regard; I had no information on the matter until we arrived back here a few minutes ago. Has the Prime Minister anything to say regarding the coup in Ghana involving the overthrow of the Nkrumah administration; and what is the position in that country of the 100 or so Canadians who usually live there?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my right hon. friend knows I have had only a few moments to look at the overnight telegrams, but I did examine this particular one. While it is not definitive, in that there may have been developments since this message was sent, it did indicate that there was a military coup early in the morning; that there was some firing which went on for a comparatively short time, then Accra became calm.

What will be the further course of the move against the government, of course, I do not know at the present time. It seems to have been a military revolt against the existing government. The disturbances have been short and were reduced to a minimum, according to the message I received.

With regard to the position of the Canadians in Accra, we are told that at the present time there is no cause for anxiety. There are a good many Canadians there, but the information I have at the moment indicates that they were not in any danger of any kind. I will be glad to keep the house and my right hon. friend informed of events as they occur.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know the Prime Minister did not have time to look into this matter, Mr. Speaker, but at the same time I should like to ask a question which I think is uppermost in the minds of many Canadians, and it is this. What is the basis upon which recognition is granted of an insurgent group that takes over government in this way? What length of time is usually allowed to elapse before a government ceases to exist diplomatically, and recognition is given to an incoming government? Is this insurrection and the ousting of the Nkrumah government of such a nature that early recognition may be expected?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, it is not easy or wise to be dogmatic in regard to the conditions which warrant recognition after a government has been overthrown. It depends, of course, on circumstances. Sometimes the new government is given recognition very quickly, as in the case of Nigeria a few weeks ago. At other times we have waited. A most important consideration is whether the new regime seems to be in control of the country, a control which is at least tacitly admitted by the country's people in so far as this can be ascertained.

Another consideration is that we should get in touch at once with our friends, and especially with our friends in the commonwealth, to see if they have information that we have not got. Very often we act in concert in these matters.

I do not think I can add anything more at the present time, Mr. Speaker. There have been occasions, and I think that the instance of Nigeria was one of these occasions, when we in this country gave no formal recognition but just carried on under the assumption that there had been a change of government, there might not be the kind of revolution which required formal recognition.

I am not sure whether that is the situation which will apply to Ghana. In the Nigerian situation we acted in concert with other commonwealth governments, which took the same attitude we did, that no formal recognition of the new regime was required.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was the reason for the question. I wondered whether a new rule had evolved within the commonwealth by which, where an insurrection takes place and a change of government results, the course is no longer followed of recognizing the new regime but rather of regarding it merely as a continuation of the one that was in power at the time of the overthrow.

Mr. Pearson: Such a development, Mr. Speaker, might become a kind of normal attitude inside the commonwealth. It has not always been the case. I think in respect of Zanzibar there was formal recognition of the change. Whether that applies to Ghana I cannot say, because I think it is too soon after the event to know exactly what will happen.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister or to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask if there is any word about the situation in Uganda that might clear up rumours we have heard, and that might also clear up rumours relating to the well-being of Canadian citizens there.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has indicated the word we have received from our high commissioner is that according to present reports the safety of Canadians is not in question.

Some hon. Members: Uganda. The question was about Uganda.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. I thought the question was about the safety of Canadians—

Mr. Thompson: In Uganda, about which rumours are rampant today.

Mr. Churchill: That is a country in Africa.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think the wise course would be to wait and see whether those rumours have any foundation in fact.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the country of Ghana on the west coast of Africa. Would the minister inform us how many Canadian service personnel are in that country for the purpose of training the Ghanaian army, and whether or not these men might now be recalled?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are 19 personnel there; three R.C.A.F. officers, 14 army officers and two N.C.O.'s, who assist in a training program. In the formal agreement between Canada and Ghana which defines the functions of the team it is stipulated that the members of the team will in no circumstances, of course, become involved in operational roles of a police or military nature. We shall have to consider in the light of events whether or not they should be recalled.

[Later:]

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the situation now existing in Ghana have any fresh instructions been sent to the Canadian military personnel there, in particular as to whether they are to continue their normal training activities with the Ghanaian armed forces; or have they been instructed to suspend this in the meantime?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in the instructions they have received.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I should like to direct to the Minister of National Defence which is consequent upon the answer he gave to a question I asked a moment ago. Does he not think that it would be desirable to send instructions to the Canadian military personnel in Ghana to suspend their ordinary training duties in association with the Ghanaian forces until the present situation has cleared itself?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I think we should first find out what the facts are. As soon as we have received a report this will be discussed with the Department of External Affairs, which really is responsible for financing these training operations in countries other than NATO countries.

TRANSPORT

U.S. CUSTOMS REGULATIONS RESPECTING BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him whether there have been any recent changes in United States customs regulations which would further aggravate the present disparity between the large numbers of Canadian box cars in the United States compared with the numbers of United States box cars in Canada.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice of this question. Early last week I learned that the United States customs had approved the suspension until March 1 of normal customs duty requirements in the use of Canadian box cars for the handling of paper products originated by two shippers at Plattsburg, New York. I took immediate steps to draw the unfavourable aspects of this matter to the attention of the United States authorities, and I am very glad to say that this arrangement operated for only one day. I could give a more detailed answer, but I think that that perhaps might suffice.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether any representations are being made to the government of the United States to rectify the great disparity between the numbers of Canadian box cars in the United States and the numbers of United States box cars in Canada, which disparity for some time has been running at a ratio of almost three to one against Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the United States railways are not under the direct control of the United States government. I understand that constant conversations are going on about this between the Association of American Railroads, as I think they are called over there, and our railways. I may say that the American Association of Railroads itself took action against this suspension, which was applied for by one railroad in the United States.

WATER RESOURCES

GREAT LAKES—DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. RESPECTING ANTI-POLLUTION MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In the light of the announcement made yesterday evening by the President of the United States of a major anti-pollution campaign in that country, is the minister giving consideration to discussing immediately with the United States government co-operative measures to clean up the pollution of the great lakes with special reference to lake Erie, and accelerating action on this problem in relation to the program announced by the President of the United States yesterday.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think I dealt with part of this question some days ago when it was indicated that the International Joint Commission had made an interim report with regard to pollution particularly in lake Erie, and that the recommendations of the commission were now before the governments of the United States and Canada.

In this connection my colleague more particularly concerned with natural resources did make a statement in the house.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry; I did not hear that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With respect to the position the government of Canada would take, my colleague did make a statement in answer to a question put to him, I believe, by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Fulton: My question related primarily to the announcement reported last evening and in this morning's papers, the anti-pollution program announced by the President of the United States. What is the relationship between that program and the problem of pollution in the great lakes? Perhaps the minister concerned could tell us something about that.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I am meeting this afternoon with Mr. Heeney, the Canadian chairman of the International Joint Commission, and this subject will be brought up.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ONTARIO—LEVELS OF PESTICIDES IN MILK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a question either to the Minister of National Health and Welfare or to the Minister of Agriculture depending on which of them deals with this matter. I may say I gave both hon. gentlemen notice of this question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Has the minister concerned or his department received reports of surveys made to determine whether the level of dieldrin or other pesticides in milk supplies has reached dangerous proportions in certain areas of Ontario; and if so, have the contents of such reports been communicated to the Ontario Department of Health?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In a continuing survey of pesticide residues in food products, the laboratories of the food and drug directorate of my department have found detectable amounts of pesticides in milk from certain areas in Ontario. The levels are not, however, considered to be dangerous. The Ontario departments of health and agriculture have been consulted with regard to the results of these sample surveys.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED THREAT TO MEMBER AND BOMB SCARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of a report that a member of the House of Commons has been threatened, and in view of a report in the press of a bomb scare in the building this morning, may I ask whether the minister has been made aware of these things and whether he has taken appropriate action?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not been made aware of this. It is possible that investigations such as the one referred to by the hon. member would be carried out by the R.C.M.P., and this comes under the Solicitor General.

Mr. Winkler: As a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, may I place the question before the Solicitor General.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is hard to know what is the division of responsibility over there.

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed the rumour with officials of the R.C.M.P. and I am satisfied they will take the appropriate action.

MONTREAL—INVESTIGATION INTO DEATH OF LAWYER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice whose department, I think, deals with bankruptcy matters. Is his department prepared to ask for an investigation into the death of François Payette, who apparently is the eighth victim of gangland in reference to corrupt bankruptcies?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member is making an allegation of facts. This question was asked yesterday and it was considered it was not so urgent that it should not be placed on the order paper. In view of the fact that the estimates of the Department of Justice will be under consideration I shortly suggest we should do the same thing today.

Mr. Woolliams: Then may I put the question a little differently. I think it is a question of national importance when already eight Canadians have met their death—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not a matter of the importance of the question. It is the matter of urgency in putting the question at this time.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, surely the protection of the lives of Canadians is of national importance. We have already had eight murders in this country, and if this is not of national importance and urgency then there never was a question of importance and urgency.

Mr. Speaker: I agree with the hon. member that it is very important, but as I told him that is not the issue at all. It is a matter of the urgency in asking the question, and I suggest to the hon. member that this very important question could be asked in a regular way in a very few minutes during consideration of the departmental estimates. It would be a more appropriate time to ask it then.

Mr. Woolliams: Then I shall pose my question this way. Is the Minister of Justice prepared to have an investigation in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might ask that question a little later on. I do not want to obstruct this type of questioning but it seems to me, when the estimates of the department will be before the committee in just a few minutes, the question might be asked then. In fact I would ask the hon. member to put the question then.

Mr. Woolliams: I will.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HEALTH AND MORALE OF NAVAL PERSONNEL IN BRAZILIAN WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister give the house any information as to the conditions and situation on the R.C.N. vessel Cape Scott, now in Brazilian waters, about which there are reports that due to this vessel not being equipped for hot weather, temperatures below deck are 140 degrees, with consequent effects on the health and morale of the crew? At the same time could the minister inform us whether there have been any deaths on R.C.N. ships presently in the Brazilian area and, if so, what are the causes?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did have some information in respect to this matter the other day. I do not have it with me now, so perhaps I could take the question as notice or it could be put on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING RETIREMENT AGE IN INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. My question is based on a radio report given to the people of Kootenay East by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport. I am informed that the parliamentary secretary advocated that persons working in industry should have the opportunity to continue working until age 67. Would the minister inform the house if this represents government policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest this question might be placed on the order paper. I do not think it is the type of question that should be asked at this time.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN GUIDE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance with reference to the written answer given yesterday to the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard). In this study that is going on has the minister or the government considered putting out guide lines for Canadian businesses operating in the United States, and guide lines for subsidiaries of U.S. business operating in Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, all of these matters have been given very careful consideration. I am sure the hon. member wants me to go further than that, but at the present time I am not disposed to do so.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask a supplementary for clarification. The question I asked was, has the minister considered this? Could I get a yes or no answer?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, all these matters are receiving very careful consideration by the government.

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION

RESTRICTIONS ON CANADIAN WORKERS ENTERING U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question either to the Minister of External Affairs or the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I believe I shall ask the latter.

Has the minister received any correspondence from the American government concerning the new American restrictions and requirements with regard to Canadians who wish to go and work in the United States? If so, would the minister be willing to table that correspondence?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have received no correspondence from the American government, but have received some from the American consul here in Ottawa. It is true that since last December the American government requires employers to fill out a special form. I have no objection to tabling that correspondence and I shall surely do so.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR FARM SAFETY ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether there is any farm safety organization in Canada supported by the federal government.

Mr. Speaker: It is the opinion of the Chair that this question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Speaker, this is supplementary. I think this is an important question and we should have an answer to it.

Mr. Speaker: I realize it is important in the view of the hon. member, and if he thinks it is a matter of urgency he has the recourse of discussing it in the adjournment debate.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION TO FARM LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of urgency which I would like to direct to the Minister of Labour. I am informed by farmers and persons in agriculture that there is going to be a terrific shortage of farm labour this spring, and they attribute this to the fact that farm labour is not covered by unemployment insurance. Will the minister look into this serious problem?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I gave an answer to the question to the hon. gentleman a few weeks ago. The matter is still being studied and as soon as we have anything to announce, since it involves government policy, it will be announced.

Mr. Rapp: Will that be before spring?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ASSISTANCE IN VIRUS PNEUMONIA EPIDEMIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria (B.C.)): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Are the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare keeping a close watch on the virus pneumonia epidemic which has been assuming alarming proportions in British Columbia? Two more deaths among school children were announced today. Would the department look into this matter with a view to giving federal assistance, possibly in the form of a crash immunization program; or has the minister something to say on this?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to discuss the problem with my officials and give an answer to the hon. gentleman later.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ZAMBIA—SUGGESTED CANADIAN WITHDRAWAL FROM OIL AIRLIFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): In view of the substantial cost to Canadians of the oil lift into Zambia, and in view of the fact that the commonwealth committee studying these sanctions in London yesterday, or some of the countries on that committee, questioned the effectiveness of the oil sanctions, I would like to ask whether the Canadian government is considering withdrawing from this obligation; because at least in the minds of some countries it is a useless expense.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO SEND CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I presume the proper minister to whom I should direct this question would be the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would ask him whether he and the Prime Minister have received communications in the last couple of days from an organization in Toronto, which states it has national connections, asking what is the attitude of the government of Canada regarding the voluntary enlistment in Canada of a corps for service in Viet Nam, serving under the aegis of the United States and under United States regulations.

What is the attitude of the government of Canada toward such a proposition?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a Mr. Mitchell wrote to the Prime Minister and a Mr. Echlin to me about a month ago with regard to a proposition in the general terms stated by the Leader of the Opposition. We sought the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, who advised that under the Foreign Enlistment Act such a proposal would appear to be incompatible with the laws of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the minister or the Prime Minister have replied to the letter in question and advised this individual regarding the Foreign Enlistment Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think the reply on behalf of the Prime Minister was sent the day before yesterday and on behalf of myself yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another question arising out of the answer given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the formation of such a corps or body would be incompatible with the Foreign Enlistment Act, does the minister suggest that anyone so enlisting, in view of that incompatibility, would thereby lose his Canadian citizenship?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is asking for an interpretation of the statute.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I just speak to a point of order? The minister made reference to the Foreign Enlistment Act and said a legal opinion had been obtained, as I understand it, from the law officers of the crown. It is only because he advanced the concept of the law officers' opinion that was given that I asked what I believe to be a perfectly reasonable question. If it is merely incompatible and not inconsistent with Canadian citizenship, what authority has the government to step in?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, so there can be no doubt about this matter, let me say that the suggestion my right hon. friend made may involve a further argument justifying the legal opinion, but the fact is that the Foreign Enlistment Act does not deal with the question of citizenship at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The legal officers of the crown have advised that such a plan would appear to be contrary to the Foreign Enlistment Act. It may be that on examination of the citizenship act we would have a further argument in support of the position taken, but my impression is that the citizenship act does not necessarily deal with this situation.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to those asked on this subject which I wish to direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Justice. What is the present status of the many Canadians who are already serving with the United States armed forces, some of them in Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, this is a free country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought the Foreign Enlistment Act prevented that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

ESTABLISHMENT OF EASTERN FEED GRAIN AGENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene). Could the minister inform the house whether a feed grain board for eastern Canada has been or is being established in compliance with the request of eastern farmers?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think this question is so urgent as to preclude its being put on the order paper.

[English]

LABOUR RELATIONS

MEETING WITH DELEGATION FROM FISHERMEN AND ALLIED WORKERS UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister indicate whether he has met with the delegation of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers union which is currently in Ottawa to discuss those matters of public concern affecting that area of policy which falls within the responsibility of the Minister of Transport?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I have not met with them up to the present time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Barnett: Will the minister meet with that delegation of the fishermen's union while they are here in Ottawa?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am giving that consideration.

Mr. Barnett: I have a further supplementary question. In view of the fact that the delegation will not be remaining in Ottawa indefinitely, can the minister tell us when his consideration as to whether he will meet with them will be completed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question has already been put to the minister and answered.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF FINAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance asking him whether he has any information as to when the final payments through the wheat board will be announced, and what the amounts might be?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the order in council is being approved today and the announcement will be made tomorrow.

FARM MACHINERY

INCREASED PROFITS BY MASSEY-FERGUSON COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the announcement that accompanied the statement about increased profits by Massey-Ferguson Limited, to the effect that the company is forbidden by the securities and exchange commission in the United States to discuss reasons for the profit jump, prevent the agriculture committee from obtaining the full facts on farm machinery price increases when this matter is referred to that committee?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not in order.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL ASSISTANCE TO MARITIMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport with respect to the Atlantic Development Board. In view of the recently disclosed action regarding the exclusion of four cities from the industrial incentives plan, can the minister say whether this matter of additional assistance is officially before the Atlantic Development Board? If it is not, should the cities formally apply on their own behalf?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that that question is really capable of the kind of answer it would be in order to give on orders of the day, because it would involve a long and detailed statement. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could find some opportunity for discussion with me about it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I will try at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, because the government has been stalling long enough on this matter.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

CONSIDERATION BY COMMITTEE OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Prime Minister. Bearing in mind the number of bills and resolutions currently on the order paper relating to a reduction in the very heavy toll of deaths and property damage from traffic accidents, will the Prime Minister consider referring these proposals either to a special committee, as was done in the case of divorce proposals, or to the justice committee?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to consider that suggestion with the house leader.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house whether the opinion voiced last night, on the Pierre Burton program, by his Parliamentary Secretary, the hon. member for Mount Royal, against a special status for Quebec, represents his opinion?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, everything I hear affects my thoughts, but I did not hear this program.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question?

Could the right hon. Prime Minister tell us if the opinion expressed on this same program to the effect that the President of the Privy Council should leave the cabinet also reflects his way of thinking?

Mr. Speaker: That question is also out of order.

[English]

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO INCREASE ALLOWABLE INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Old Age Assistance Act states that to qualify for assistance the combined annual income of husband and wife must not exceed the sum of $2,220, assistance included. Will the government amend this act to increase the allowable income figure to a sum in keeping with the rapid rise in the cost of living?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is not in order.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING INDIAN AND ESKIMO RIGHTS COMMISSION

On the orders of the say:

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the hon. member for Yukon asked me a question as to our intentions with regard to a purported resolution of the Indian and Métis Association of Canada in annual convention. I have to tell the hon. member that as yet we have received no resolution from this organization.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he can tell us when he will be bringing down the budget?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it seems a little premature, in view of the progress that has been made in the house, for me to make a statement of that nature at this time. But may I say that I hope it will be earlier rather than later.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Earlier rather than later in what month?

WINTER WORKS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday, the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) asked me if I had received communications from various municipalities requesting an extension of the period during which winter projects may be carried out under the winter works legislation.

I wish to inform him that I did receive such requests.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Is it the minister's intention to accede to those requests by granting the extension asked by the municipalities?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the winter works program is being amended constantly in keeping with changing realities. Such requests will be taken into consideration in the study of that program.

[English]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. If the Canadian Expo was to be incorporated into a municipality, could it take advantage of the winter works program to assist it financially?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Legal and other services—

1. Administration including the office of the superintendent of bankruptcy, grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates, gratuities to the widows or such dependents as may be approved by treasury board of judges who die while in office and authority to make recoverable advances for the administration of justice on behalf of the governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $2,504,300.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply, estimates of the Department of Justice for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966, vote No. 1. Shall vote No. 1 carry?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I realize that another member has the floor, but if he would yield the floor and allow me merely to ask a question it might assist the hon. member in this debate.

Yesterday I asked the Minister of Justice whether when we were dealing with these estimates, because these are the old estimates, we could deal with all those matters that came within his jurisdiction. I have read what the minister said but we on this side of the chamber are in a quandary still because there seems to be some divisive confusion—I mean that in a nice way—in this respect. Because of the changes in the minister's department, can we now discuss all three branches of the department under these estimates?

Mr. Cardin: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Woolliams: That is what we want to clear up.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, while we were considering the estimates of the Department of Justice, I noted yesterday that the debate took a rather strange turn after the statement made by the Prime Minister about the Spencer case in Vancouver.

I do not really intend to go into that matter. It is a rather special case. I heard the argument made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), but all the evidence seemed based on newspaper articles. If that is enough to make a case stick, then I could spend half an hour reading newspaper articles to come to the conclusion that some Conservatives should be in a psychiatric ward. With newspaper articles one can prove anything. I also heard, on that matter, the statements made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), which had some rather pathetic overtones. I think that this man lived in his province. I wonder if efforts were made to meet him, to see him personally. There is something shameful about that matter.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) took the trouble of saying he had not met him but that he knew the member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) who knew Spencer, a little in the style of the man who saw the man who saw the bear; but there again that is not first hand information.

[The Chairman.]

In any event before committing ourselves in this connection, we would prefer additional information, provided of course the government had any to give. We would prefer to await further developments.

There is another point I would like to mention and draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice. During the last general election, it was alleged that the former member for Quebec-Montmorency had gone into a Montreal restaurant with two other individuals, purported to be R.C.M.P. officers, in order to extort from the owner affidavits and statements to the effect that a wealthy Newfoundland manufacturer had tried to bribe certain members of parliament.

At that time, I got in touch with the Minister of Justice and asked him whether it was a fact that two individuals had tried, under false representations or with R.C.M.P. identification cards, to obtain affidavits or statements from a Montreal restaurant owner.

I think that the minister made an investigation; I have not had the opportunity since then to ask him if he had any information to give us, but I would like to know if it is true that one of the two individuals with Dr. Marcoux in a restaurant was a former executive secretary of a former Conservative minister—it would be a former minister of justice—who would have had in his possession a card identifying him as a member of the R.C.M.P., although not a member of the R.C.M.P., and who would have used that card to get statements from a restaurant owner in Montreal, under false representations?

That is an answer I would like to get from the minister. Did he make an investigation in that case? Is it true that two individuals pretended to be members of the R.C.M.P., whereas they had no right to do that, since they were not members of the R.C.M.P.?

Second, was Dr. Marcoux present when those individuals appeared? We suspect that he was present. At that time, was he party to those false representations?

Could the minister also tell us how it is that an individual, a former executive secretary of a former Conservative minister of justice, had an R.C.M.P. identification card? Where did he get it? Who had given it to him? With whose collusion did he manage to have such a card?

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice will agree with me that if anyone can now obtain cards of the R.C.M.P.—which is nevertheless a respectable police corps—and can with the influence of a member of this police corps, attempt to browbeat a person into giving statements or affidavits, I think this is really a flagrant breach of R.C.M.P. regulations.

Has the minister launched an investigation in this connection? Can he tell us what action has been taken, if some people are responsible or guilty? Does the minister know who they are? Can he tell whether there are any accomplices? Can the minister tell us whether legal action was taken against these people? How could these people obtain R.C.M.P. cards?

I believe this is a series of questions I should like to ask and I hope the minister is in a position not only to make a statement but also supply the information.

Mr. Chairman, I will not labour the point.

I think if my questions are answered, the minister will have cleared the mystery by giving us the information we are seeking today.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before sitting down, there are other points on which I have a few words to say. I know that the question was asked on orders of the day, but it is more difficult for the minister to answer during question time than during the study of his estimates. That is why I wish to repeat the question: Would the Minister of Justice see whether the legislation on trusts and investments should not be revised so as to determine whether the owners of the National Hockey League did not infringe the law when they decided, somewhat arbitrarily, to extend their circuit and particularly in the way in which this was done. The minister said that the law does not apply in the field of services.

But let us not forget that it is not necessarily a service that is provided here, because the wage-earner is not paid by the public but by the club owner. The people pay, not to get a service, but an admission ticket. They pay for merchandise in the form of tickets. Then the club owners use the gate receipts to pay the players. It is not a case of players providing a service to spectators, but one where spectators pay an admission fee and, before a sum of money is paid to those who provide the service, that is the hockey players, there are people in between who pay, not commission, but salaries to the players.

I think the people of Canada would welcome an inquiry into this matter, because hockey has always been Canada's national sport; it is a favourite with the people and they would like to enjoy it as much as the Americans, but out of 12 N.H.L. clubs, ten are located in American cities.

The minister could also make a statement about that and clear the matter up. He could try to find out whether there is some legislation under which the new developments that took place recently in the N.H.L. could be reconsidered.

In any case I should like to have a definite answer on the question I raised a moment ago, as to whether it is true that two individuals used R.C.M.P. identification cards to make false representations. Who were the accomplices? Who provided the cards? Is the Department of Justice instituting proceedings? What action does the department consider taking in this case?

Does the Minister of Justice intend to reply?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I took due note of the hon. member's questions.

With regard to the first point he raised, an investigation has actually been conducted. I believe the inquiries were completed a few days ago. I am now looking into the findings of the investigation, and I should be in a position, during the study of my estimates, to make a complete report on the events mentioned by the hon. member.

As to the second matter he referred to, this problem comes under the jurisdiction of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Favreau). He is not here at the moment, but I will bring the grievances of the hon. member to his attention and I am sure he will want to reply.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, could the hon. Minister of Justice tell us whether one of the two individuals bearing R.C.M.P. cards, although they were not members of the force, was in fact a former executive secretary of a former minister of justice? Could he tell us who this former executive secretary was and for which minister he acted as executive secretary?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be better to make a complete and official statement after I have had time to refresh my memory and give as many details as possible in answer to the questions of the hon. member.

[English]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Bow River, who spoke first for our party yesterday, had not completed his general statement. I will have an opportunity to speak later.

Mr. Woolliams: I wish to thank the hon. member for Peace River and I hope that I am not being rude in asking for the floor. Yesterday, of course, we had two statements. We had a statement from the Minister of Justice and then we had a statement from the Prime Minister. I dealt yesterday particularly with the statement made by the Prime Minister. It did seem rather unusual that at the opening of discussion on these estimates we would have two statements, one from the Minister of Justice and one from the Prime Minister, and particularly that the Prime Minister should make a statement on these estimates.

We have dealt at some length with the Spencer case and I should now like to make a few general remarks with reference to the estimates. The first question has been answered with reference to the division of the department. We accept this fact but it has been somewhat difficult to determine who has jurisdiction over what. It does seem that under the present administration there has been, as I have already made reference, some divisive confusion about jurisdiction within the Department of Justice. I would hope that the minister will make a clear statement in that regard.

I would also say this. I wonder whether these hon. gentlemen have ever considered, since they feel there has to be legislation passed in order to set up the divisions, whether they really have the jurisdiction over certain matters which they claim to have. We would like to hear from the ministers, whether it be the Minister of Justice or the President of the Privy Council, under whose jurisdiction the administration of federal offences falls. I assume it would be the Minister of Justice. We should like to know also under whose jurisdiction the following items fall: National Parole Board, bankruptcy—I am going to have something to say about that in a few minutes—penitentiaries, the committee report on juvenile delinquency as well as the whole question of young offenders, and the Combines Investigation Act.

No one would underestimate the importance of the administration of justice. After all, the tentacles of justice must stretch into all federal departments to obtain good, sound, honest government with equitable administration.

Co-ordination has always been the important thing so far as I am concerned in the administration of justice. What we have in this administration, I repeat, is no co-ordination at all. What we have is divisive confusion. We on this side of the house do not know, parliament does not know, I do not think the government knows, nor do the people of Canada know, who is really Minister of Justice. As I say, there is divisive confusion. I have come to the conclusion that the Prime Minister, and I say this with respect, has run out of talent and is somewhat concerned, when he assigns a certain portfolio to a minister, whether he has confidence in him.

I used an illustration yesterday which I am going to use today, namely, the Canadian Wheat Board. This is an analogy which I shall come back to in so far as the Department of Justice is concerned. For years the Canadian Wheat Board was under the jurisdiction either of the Minister of Agriculture or of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When the Prime Minister had to look for a new Minister of Agriculture and when he appointed a new Minister of Trade and Commerce he must have looked at both of them and said to himself: Neither of you has any administrative ability so far as the Wheat Board is concerned so I will leave that with the new Minister of Finance because he is the only man who seems to know anything about it.

Exactly the same sort of thing has happened with the Department of Justice. The Prime Minister probably said to himself: The Minister of Justice is a fine fellow but I do not know whether he can handle this or that phase. As a result, Mr. Chairman, we have divisive confusion and we cannot get any answers at all.

Yesterday I asked a question—this is an example of divisive confusion and it is why the Speaker and I seem to be at odds—which was ruled out of order by the Speaker. I knew I would be in difficulty when I asked another question today. But if there is a matter of importance in the nation today it is the question of crime, crime in high places and crime in other places. Its tentacles are creeping all through our society. I have heard the leader of our party and the hon. member for Yukon both say on many occasions something with which I am in full accord, that we should have an investigaton into crime in this nation. A royal commission should be set up.

We have just heard the hon. member for Lapointe talk about the Marcoux investigation. During the election Dr. Marcoux alleged that six members of the Creditistes had said after the 1963 election that they were going to joint the Liberals and the Minister of Justice was asked to investigate the Dr. Marcoux affair. It was alleged, and I say alleged because I do not know the facts—

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, this matter is now sub judice. Therefore I do not think the hon. member for Bow River has the right to speak on it any more than anybody else in the house.

Mr. Woolliams: You know, Mr. Chairman, it is a funny thing to hear that voice coming from the background because the hon. member for Lapointe has just made a whole speech on the subject, and if he was out of order then his whole party was out of order.

An hon. Member: He is not even here now.

Mr. Woolliams: Of course not; he makes his speech and leaves. Well, I am not going to get into any argument; I am going to deal with the facts. What I was coming to, Mr. Chairman, was that certain charges were made by a former member of the House of Commons either during or before the last election. You will remember that parliament was dissolved because of an election, one which we did not call. I was always of the opinion that the reason parliament was dissolved was that the government were afraid to debate the report of the Dorion Commission. They called an election so they could sweep that under the carpet.

If I may return to the Marcoux matter, Mr. Chairman, Dr. Marcoux made some serious charges. He also made a serious charge against one of your own colleagues sitting on the front bench. But what did the Minister of Justice say? After all, he is Minister of Justice for the government. I am not saying that the decision he took was his personal decision; what I say is that it was the government's decision. I am also not making any personal attack on the minister. I know that he once made the same sort of attack on our leader but I am not going to attack him. Let me make it clear that I am attacking the administration of this department by the government.

When this matter was brought before the Minister of Justice he said that it was not a federal matter and swept it under the carpet. Surely when serious charges of bribery are made against members of parliament it is a matter for the federal government and the House of Commons.

Therefore I ask at the outset, what respect can the Canadian people or parliament have today for the administration of justice under a government which sweeps things like the Dr. Marcoux scandal under the carpet and which calls an election so that the matter cannot be debated? This affair is now a thing of the past. The government has also prevented debate on the Dorion report, which was a very serious report indeed.

What respect can the people of Canada have for the administration of justice when one considers the Rivard affair, how he escaped and how he was hustled off to the United States when finally found in Canada? We do not know whether a proper extradition hearing was held. What respect can the Canadian people have for the administration of justice in view of this kind of nonsense?

I would ask the Minister of Justice to walk along the streets and ask the people what they think of the administration of justice in this country. I tell the minister that respect has never been at a lower ebb at any previous period. Where are the Lapointes, the St. Laurents, the Fultons and the Flemings, men who gave respect to this department, men who were strong and could rise above political situations? What the government needs today is a Minister of Justice—again I say this not by way of criticism of the present minister—who can rise above narrow political expediency, one of the same class who have won respect in Great Britain and in our own country. We need a man who can make his own decisions respecting the administration of the law regardless of political expediency even though those decisions affect our Liberal friends, our Conservative friends or any friends we have.

I say that the administration of justice must rise above narrow parochialism and provincialism. But what respect for the administration of justice can the Canadian people have in view of the Marcoux affair, the Dorion report and the Rivard affair?

Let me come to another affair which almost adds comedy to the whole situation and which has reduced the administration of justice to its lowest level in our history. Let us consider the whole sordid affair in connection with Banks. He was charged and convicted. Then he was granted bail. The government said it was the judiciary who let him out on bail. Then for weeks we questioned the government regarding his whereabouts. But no one knew where he was. Today we pick up the newspapers and find him living in an apartment in New York. Many of us know that at the present time there is documentation and evidence sufficient probably to lay another charge of an indictable offence against the same Hal Banks, one for which he could be extradicted and brought back to this country to stand trial. This would put him back into the situation in which he was before he escaped by jumping bail.

What would be the practical result, Mr. Chairman? If he were brought back he would immediately be placed in the penitentiary until his appeal was heard, and the charge could be heard with respect to which evidence is now available so as to determine his guilt or innocence. But I ask, what respect have the Canadian people for justice with the whole sordid Banks mess once more out in the open?

That is why I say to the minister, with the greatest respect, that we have crime in high and low places and we have gangsterism throughout the whole stream of society today. That is why the Minister of Justice is now reading about the lawyer, François Payette, who is the sixth or eighth victim of gang law with respect to corrupt bankruptcies.

An hon. Member: The eighth victim.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you, the eighth victim with reference to corrupt bankruptcies. Let us have an investigation. Let us lay this thing out and find out what is going on in our nation. Let us set up a royal commission on crime to find out what is going on in the nation and clean up the whole mess. I repeat what respect can Canadians have for the administration of justice when all these things are analysed and taken together?

Mr. Lind: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: I always permit questions.

Mr. Lind: Would you include Atlantic Acceptance Corporation and British Mortgage and Trust in your investigation?

Mr. Woolliams: I would include everything. When we look into the administration of justice we find there is such a divisive state of confusion in the Department of Justice that we do not know where the responsibility for anything falls. We do not know whether a matter falls under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General, under that of the Minister of Justice or under that of the President of the Privy Council. Three ministers now answer to parliament. When members of the House of Commons rise to ask questions they are invariably confused as to which minister is responsible for what.

If it was the intention of the government to divide the Department of Justice, why was legislation not brought in at the proper time? Why was the matter not dealt with properly so that hon. members could debate, analyse and diagnose the whole situation to see whether the move was for the good of the administration of justice? Instead of going ahead and saying, look, we are going to do this first and then we are going to bring in legislation to make legal what has been illegal all the time, why was that not done? That is the position at the present time with respect to the administration of justice.

I shall now go back to where I was before I was interrupted to answer a question. The best that we have had out of the government is that the Prime Minister has written to members of his cabinet and has said: There has been a little difficulty and you fellows had better be honest; you have got to be truthful and you have got to be good. The Prime Minister issued a code of ethics. What happened after that? We had a whole flock of resignations of cabinet ministers. Yesterday I said that there never was such a mortality rate among Canadian cabinet ministers in Canadian history. In fact, I said that all those who are backbenchers will be members of the Privy Council if they stay for a few months. Their appointment is inevitable because the government is running out of people to appoint. That is the situation today. This may seem like a comedy; of course it is a comedy.

Next I mention Rivard. Do you know what the average Canadian now says about him? He is saying: Who is watering the rink in Bordeau jail this year now that Rivard has gone? Mr. Chairman, that is reducing this most important department to a laughing stock, to a comedy. The situation is extremely serious. Crime has crept through the whole fabric of government and society and the government must take the responsibility for this. The government is responsible for the Department of Justice working out the problem with the attorneys general of the various provinces. If I refer to the Minister of Justice, I want to make it clear that I am not dealing with his department's officials. I know something about the department's officials and I think we are very fortunate to have the kind of staff that exists in that department.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: The Minister of Justice has a good staff.

An hon. Member: He has got to use them.

Mr. Woolliams: Exactly. He has to use them to create the image and show that he means business. Then he will be able to clean up crime in this country. The whole administration is at a very low ebb. I hope the Minister of Justice will deal with the situation with responsibility and I hope he will deal with any irresponsibility which has been the cause of the situation for the last three years in the department.

Mr. Choquette: I have a short question. May I ask it?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly, if it is not going to be on the suggestion of a republic.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. President—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. President? This is not a republic.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the hon. member whether he is aware of the fact that Dr. Marcoux is not taken seriously anywhere and that Dr. Marcoux lost his deposit. Did the hon. member take note of that?

Mr. Woolliams: Is that not a wonderful question? Because a candidate loses his deposit he is never to be taken seriously. That means that we shall never take the Liberal party seriously again in western Canada because most of their candidates lost their deposits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: That was a wonderful interruption. The fact is that I did not know Dr. Marcoux, but I found out, as anyone can find out, that he was a very reasonable man.

Mr. Choquette: That is where you are wrong.

Mr. Woolliams: Let me finish. That is what I heard. You can make statements as to what you heard. I always thought that Dr. Marcoux was a man of integrity. I respected him while he was here although I did not always agree with him. If he made a charge he might be wrong. That is not the point. He might also be right. Let us have an investigation and get the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Choquette: Have you read his book?

Mr. Woolliams: I recall—

Mr. Choquette: Have you read his book? It is a stupid book.

Mr. Woolliams: I recall very well when reference was first made to the whole Dorion scandal. I might point out that I have just read Hansard in that regard and there is one word missing in connection with a question of privilege or point of order that I raised at that time. When the hon. member for Yukon said that there seemed to be a situation where men in high places might be involved in crime the then minister of justice used the word "liar". That word has not been recorded. He also used the word "coward" at that time and I raised a question of privilege. The Chairman and some others said they had not heard the second word.

An hon. Member: I heard it.

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly we heard it. The government's position was that there was to be a whitewash and that discussion was to be prevented. In fact, an election was called which cost the Canadian people between $6 million and $12 million so that the members of this house would not have an opportunity to debate the Dorion report at the proper time. That is why the election was called. It was not to get a majority but to get the Liberal party back in power before the Canadian people had really seen inside the covers of the Dorion report. That is the situation. As long as the government conducts its affairs in that way the Canadian people will not have respect for the administration of justice.

Think of Lapointe. Think of St. Laurent. Think of other Liberal Ministers of Justice who have sat in this house. Think of other ministers of justice. When my good friend from Kamloops was Minister of Justice and when the former member for Eglinton was minister of justice. When my good friend for law and order? The answer is no. During their tenures of office the people of this country had respect for law and order. It should be restored immediately.

An hon. Member: Drivel.

Mr. Woolliams: I think the minister should show strength. He should show that he is going to administer his department fearlessly and administer the law no matter what happens or on whom the brunt of the law may fall. Only in that way will the Canadian people again begin to respect law and order and only in that way will crime be stamped out in this nation.

Second, we should immediately have a royal commission to examine the extent of crime and its tentacles, to find out where they stretch, into what departments they stretch and into what high places they stretch. When one analyses all the deaths that have taken place, some in recent days, in relation to bankruptcy scandals one realizes that there must be some involvement of gang law. A lawyer was murdered recently and found in the trunk of his car. What about that situation, Mr. Chairman? I asked a question about it and I should like to hear the minister get up and say: We are going to have an investigation; we are going to stamp out crime.

I say to the hon. gentleman that he must be careful with regard to the appointment of judges. Our judiciary, and this is a most important thing, has always been independent. On the whole we have always respected our courts. I speak with great favour so far as the courts in my own province are concerned. But respect for the courts will not be maintained by the appointment of men such as Meunier who was subsequently incarcerated after having been charged with a criminal offence. It will not be enhanced by scandals such as the one concerning Landreville in Ontario. This will not promote respect for the judiciary. It will drag the courts down to the level to which I say this government has dragged the administration of justice.

There should be immediate implementation of the recommendations of the report on juvenile delinquency. I know that hon. members sitting opposite do not want to hear this. They do not want these affairs looked into. They do not want to fight another election on scandals because they are afraid of it.

I should like action to be taken on all these recommendations. I do not intend to deal with this subject at any length now because I shall have another opportunity. There is a bill, to which first reading has been given in my name on the order paper dealing with this subject. The commission's recommendations should be closely studied to see whether they are practical and will work effectively. After all, when young people run afoul of the law the sole question to be considered is that of rehabilitation and rehabilitation is impossible if young offenders are held in penitentiaries together with hardened criminals. I should like the government to take a serious and positive look at this question.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Last but not least, there should be a thorough review of our attitude toward penitentiaries so that the whole emphasis is laid not on punishment but on rehabilitation. This started under the leadership of the hon. member for Kamloops when he was Minister of Justice and I urge the government to get on with the projects he initiated at that time.

All our penitentiaries today are overcrowded. We cannot expect to rehabilitate people in conditions like these. I recognize the department is faced with many problems. There is a shortage of psychiatrists and psychologists to deal with inmates who are suffering from emotional troubles which very often have resulted in the offences that led to their confinement.

There is one further subject to which I would direct the attention of the department. I would ask the combines investigation branch to take a good look at one monopoly which affects most Canadians though in all probability they do not realize it exists. I refer to the monopoly in regard to casket manufacture. The cost of funerals today has reached an all-time high. Most people say it costs too much to die. I am led to believe there is a monopoly in relation to the hardware used in the manufacture of caskets. If there is such a monopoly, let the combines investigation branch go into the matter.

The undertakers of this country as a profession are not responsible for the high cost of funerals.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Let hon. members check the prices of caskets and find out what this monopoly means. I have referred to the monopoly on hardware, the handles and other ornamentation used on caskets. If a monopoly exists, as I suggest it does, let us have an investigation and a prosecution. Let us bring this thing to light.

These are some of the questions I wish to leave with the ministers concerned. Finally, I would say that we are still at a loss to understand the division in the jurisdiction of the department. There are three men looking after what used to be one job. I do not believe that under our law this division of jurisdiction is permissible. The ministers concerned are saying in effect: We shall, at the proper time, bring in legislation to make our powers retroactive. At the moment they are guilty of divisive confusion.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, I hope it is not unreasonable on my part to emphasize the fact that this is my first intervention in the debate from a new geographical position in the chamber. Since the traffic in party warfare does not appear to be as heavy or as loud as on other occasions I am tempted to seek the indulgence of the committee, which I understand is traditionally granted on the occasion of a maiden ministerial address, particularly when estimates are being dealt with. I ask to be allowed a little more leeway than perhaps is normal. On most occasions I attempt to address the house with few notes but since I am now dealing with estimates I ask the indulgence of the committee to refer to them in close detail.

The hon. member for Bow River raised a very fair question as to the division of responsibility between the Minister of Justice and myself. May I say to him, with great respect, that I believe the Prime Minister tabled orders in council under the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act under which certain responsibilities heretofore assigned to the Department of Justice, namely, the penitentiary service, the National Parole Board and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, have been assigned to the office of the Solicitor General. Hon. members will note that I used the word "office", not "department". The machinery necessary for that transformation has not yet been brought before this chamber.

Allow me to deal first of all with the penitentiary service. I wish to acknowledge with sincerity the creative plans and reforms designed by the previous administration. I am pleased to inform the house that there has been no slackening in the efforts to transform the penitentiary service into an effective and forward-looking organization which I hope will bring dividends to all of us.

Perhaps the house will allow me to strike a brief personal note. The nature of my professional life brought me in close contact with many young people who had run afoul of our criminal laws. It appeared to me at that time that penal reform should not be as difficult as some people suggested. I must candidly admit that things do not seem to me now as they seemed to me then. The reason can be explained in part by the fact that we are attempting to do two things which by their very nature appear to be in opposition to each other. In the first place, we are attempting to rehabilitate the offender so that he achieves a sense of self-respect for the rights of others. At the same time we are trying to protect society by dealing with the prisoner with a view to deterring him and others from repeating the same offence. It is almost like riding two horses at once, an accomplishment which, I am informed, requires great skill and patience.

The task is made tremendously more difficult by the size of our prison population, the overcrowding of our institutions and the need for more research in criminology and the problem of staff recruiting. Each year the penitentiary service receives more than 3,600 inmates from the courts. On the basis of a careful study of inmate population trends in the past it is estimated that the penitentiary population will be approximately 8,500 in 1967 and 10,500 in 1973. On December 31, 1965, there were 7,362 inmates in penitentiaries, and it is disappointing and disturbing to realize that on past performance approximately 40 per cent will return after release.

There is the other side of the coin. I am glad to say that the penitentiary service is making considerable progress with the building program. During the next eight months five new medium security institutions will be opened at Springhill, Cowansville, Warkworth, Drumheller and Matsqui, together with a start on a special correction unit at St. Vincent de Paul. The approximate cost of these institutions is $40 million.

Perhaps I should say a word about the special correctional unit under construction at St. Vincent de Paul, particularly as there has been some criticism. I should emphasize that the penitentiary service is pleased to have the views of the various associations and individuals who have an enlightened interest in this subject. The special correctional unit is not for the treatment of psychotic inmates. It is for hostile, aggressive and dangerous inmates who disrupt normal institutional programs. It is designed for a population that will not exceed 160 inmates. It incorporates training facilities with the very necessary degree of maximum security for the hostile and dangerous inmates who will be held there in detention. I am informed that the hostile type of inmate I am referring to comprises roughly 3 per cent of the present inmate population.

It is only fit and proper that I put on record that inmate training programs for the special correctional units and the design of the units were developed under the guidance of the director of inmate training, Mr. J. C. A. LaFerriere, who has had 15 years experience at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, and

Dr. Jean Garneau, an experienced psychologist, Dr. L. P. Gendreau, a psychiatrist of 18 years experience as a senior officer of the penitentiary service, and other senior officers with long experience.

Construction on three other proposed correctional units has been stayed pending the experience that will arise from the operation of the unit at St. Vincent de Paul. It is my earnest hope that the proposed joint committee on penitentiaries will be able to inspect this unit in the near future.

The program provides for the discontinuance of St. Vincent de Paul as a maximum security institution by 1970, by which time new facilities will have been built at St. Anne des Plaines. It will be a source of satisfaction to all hon. members to know that the "bucket wing" at St. Vincent de Paul will be closed in 1967.

Subject to the vicissitudes of the future, 20 new institutions will be completed to round out the 10 year plan of institutional development. The burden of success of a penal reform program rests substantially on staff. The penitentiary service is experiencing the same difficulties in recruiting as are being experienced by institutions, industries and businesses elsewhere. There is particular difficulty in recruiting psychologists and classification officers.

A survey of the penitentiary service system of pay classification by P. S. Ross and Company has been completed and is under study by the Treasury Board representatives. I am hoping that the results of this study will be made known very shortly.

Research in criminology is of prime importance, and the committee will be pleased to learn that an amount of $20,000 has been included in the budgetary estimates for the fiscal year 1966-67 to defray the cost of studies to be undertaken by the department of criminology of the University of Montreal for the benefit of the penitentiary service.

It is hoped to achieve by 1968 a universal system of custodial and training facilities in each of the four regions of Canada, so that every inmate can be kept in the degree of security he requires and can receive the training most appropriate to his needs. It is hoped that the policy that no institution should accommodate more than 450 inmates will be put in effect with the opening of five new institutions this year.

The program of penitentiary development for the fiscal year 1966-67 will see the commencement of construction of the new maximum security institution at St. Anne des Plaines which will reduce substantially the inmate population at St. Vincent de Paul, and the construction of a new maximum security institution at Millhaven near Kingston, which in turn will make it possible to reduce effectively the inmate population of Kingston penitentiary. At Millhaven the penitentiary service will also commence construction of a reception centre to serve the Ontario region.

In addition, the penitentiary service is establishing a community release centre for women in Kingston. Properties will be acquired in the cities of Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver that will serve as community release centres. At these centres, inmates who are within two months of expiration of sentence or of release on parole will be provided with shelter, food and counselling while they are finding employment and becoming adjusted again to living again in a free community.

During 1966-67 construction of a correctional staff college will be commenced at St. Vincent de Paul for the training, both basic and advanced, of penitentiary service officers. It will be comparable in size to the correctional staff college that was opened in Kingston in 1964 where facilities are available for training up to 100 officers at a time.

Over the past 10 years some 3,000 trainees have graduated from training courses in penitentiaries and have been released to society. Only 11 per cent of them were subsequently sentenced again to penitentiaries. This is encouraging in the face of the general average of penitentiary recidivism among inmates admitted to the penitentiary system in any year which, as I said earlier, is running at approximately 40 per cent.

There is no need for me to say that I have touched but lightly on this vast and very important subject. The picture that I should like to present to the committee is one of great pressure, but not one of crisis, of expansion and not complacency. However, before I leave this subject I should say I was gravely concerned upon assuming my new responsibilities to learn that juveniles continue to be held as inmates in our federal institutions, and I must say that the hon. member for Bow River first drew my attention to this very disturbing situation in a very admirable speech approximately two years ago. At the present time I understand that there are four 15 year-olds, all in the federal training centre at Laval City, a special institution for young offenders between the ages of 16 to 23.

There are 20 inmates 16 years of age and 73 inmates 17 years of age. Teenagers are incarcerated in penitentiaries because they have committed offences under the criminal law and have been sentenced to penitentiary terms by the courts. This is usually brought about because a case has been referred by the juvenile courts to the adult courts.

The report of the departmental committee on juvenile delinquency, which was initiated by the hon. member for Kamloops, is now receiving attention in the Department of Justice and in the office of the Solicitor General, and incarceration of juveniles in penitentiaries will be one of the matters receiving close attention.

I should say a word about the National Parole Board. The staff of the national parole service was increased during the present fiscal year, or is presently being increased, by the addition of 21 new parole officers. I hope that my words will not be construed as reflecting on the members of the National Parole Board who are doing an excellent job in a very difficult and trying position. But the fact of the matter is that at the present time only a small portion of penitentiary inmates qualify for parole. In the calendar year 1964, 650 inmates, or 18 per cent of the total of 3,617 released, were granted parole. It is encouraging to note that in 1965 the number of paroles increased to 1,040 inmates, representing 28 per cent of the 3,730 inmates released from federal institutions. In other words, the great majority of penitentiary inmates are not released on parole but on expiration of their time.

Many inmates do not wish to obtain parole because they do not wish to be under supervision. They prefer to stay longer in the penitentiary and obtain complete freedom than to be released earlier but under supervision for a much longer time.

The committee will be interested to learn that the Parole Act is under active study with a view to proposing amendments that will assist in increasing the opportunities for parole.

Finally, I turn to deal with the activities of the R.C.M.P. Hon. members may be interested to learn something of the volume of work required to be done by the force in discharging its various responsibilities. I am informed that during the fiscal year which ended on March 31, 1965, for example, charges were laid by officers of the force in respect of 41,031 offences against the Criminal Code. My information is that the total number of instances requiring investigation increased during the fiscal year 1964-65 by about 25 per cent over the previous fiscal year.

In addition to these activities the force rendered assistance to various other police forces throughout Canada in the investigation of a further 14,297 cases, most of which arose under the Criminal Code.

In general, the R.C.M.P. figures indicate that the force was called upon during the fiscal year 1964-65 to perform about 17 per cent more investigations, prosecutions and appearances than had been the case during the previous fiscal year. The figures for the fiscal year 1965-66 are not yet available but my information to this point certainly does not give any reason to believe that the work load of the force has decreased during the past 11 months.

It will be seen that the aggregate figure of $80,526,369, the estimated figure for the fiscal year 1965-66, represents an increase of $8,730,799 over the figure of $71,795,570 for 1964-65. This increase is attributable almost entirely to an increase in the amounts required to meet salaries, pay and allowances. About $1 million of this increase is attributable to an increase in the amount required for the acquisition of new equipment for the force.

The increased amount for pay and allowances for members of the force is attributable to two things: (a) pay increases for all members of the force; and (b) an increase in the approved total strength of the force of 426 persons, bringing the approved total strength from 9,130 for the fiscal year 1964-65 to 9,556 for the fiscal year under review. Hon. members will note that the total actual strength of the force of 9,547, including 7,255 regular uniformed members, is very close to the authorized strength.

Perhaps I might give a word of explanation concerning some of the other major items of expenditure. The figure given for "All other services", $8,561,500, is an increase in that category of about $588,000 over the previous year. This category relates to sundry expenses of investigation and the increase reflects accurately the increase in the total volume of work being done by the force.

The figure given for "Acquisition of equipment", $3,392,000, represents an increase in that category over the previous year of about $1,061,000. The principal sub-item of expenditure here is the purchase of 721 new automobiles to replace existing components of the force's automobile fleet and an additional 87 new automobiles designed to increase the size of that fleet. Hon. members may be interested to know that the R.C.M.P. is a highly mobile force possessing 2,042 vehicles of which 1,770 are automobiles, 219 are trucks, and the remainder consist of motorcycles, snowmobiles, ski-doos and tractors.

I hope the foregoing information will assist hon. members in their considerations of the estimates of the force, and I want to thank all hon. members for the courtesy and patience with which they have received my opening remarks.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Chairman, may I direct a question to the minister? I would be interested, and I think other members would be also, in having some further information with reference to investigations, charges and prosecutions. The minister noted the increase and I should like to know how many are attributable to the use of motor vehicles. I know statistics are kept and I am wondering how much of this represents automobile crime. It would be helpful if we could have information in respect of that proportion which has to do with the operation of motor vehicles and the traffic branch.

Mr. Pennell: I will endeavour before the estimates are concluded to obtain that information for the hon. member and I will relay the information to him.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the Solicitor General on his first presentation as minister and to say to him I believe all members of the house will wish to co-operate with him in the work he has undertaken and in bringing a progressive view into the administrative fields which are under his responsibility.

I do not intend to discuss, however, the items he has brought forward at this time. I intend to discuss what I regard as being a very grave matter affecting the administration of the Department of Justice and which in my view has constituted a major scandal. I should like to adopt the words used by the Globe and Mail of Toronto as long ago as June 14, 1963, when they referred to fraud in the field of bankruptcy as being twentieth century robbery on a grand scale.

The failure of the government of Canada and the Department of Justice in particular to pay attention to the repeated warnings they have received of the colossal scale of fraud in this field is a sorry record of laxity, inefficiency, inadequacy and neglect not only in the legislative field but also in the field of the administration of the law as it stands. Even to this day, as I propose to show, the Minister of Justice, who I know is fairly new at his job, still has failed to accept the full responsibility which lies upon him and his department. He is practising the usual buck-passing.

We want to ask him what his reasons are for inaction in this field. What are some of the facts? I intend to give them in some detail because they present a record which I think is no less than shocking, As long ago as 1961, and maybe it happened before this, the Canadian Lumbermen's Association submitted a brief to the then Minister of Justice, the present hon. member for Kamloops. It contained detailed suggestions relating to amendment of the Bankruptcy Act and pointed out that in the year 1960—this was in 1961—defaulted liabilities had increased by 55 per cent to the figure of $148 million. I am going to point out later that in this last year they are expected to exceed $500 million. So we are not speaking of a trivial matter. The increase in 1960 was an increase of 55 per cent. The Lumbermen's Association represents some 600 members doing business all over eastern Canada. I should like the committee to note the recommendations they made roughly five years ago to the effect that the government should give full publicity to firms going into bankruptcy, particularly fraudulent bankruptcy, and any trustee irregularities. They also urged the government to increase its staff of investigators and to hire chartered accountants. This was in 1961.

In February of 1962 another association of businessmen, the Canadian Construction Association, sent a brief to the then Minister of Justice who at that time was still the hon. member for Kamloops. This association has a membership of some 1,200 firms and 61 affiliated construction associations. They claimed in their brief, with some justice, to represent a cross-section of business and industry in Canada. They referred to the growing number of bankruptcies and the prevalence of fraud and premeditation in bankruptcies. This was in February of 1962. They urged full investigation by a court approved public accountant with a view to disclosing bankruptcy offences.

In March of 1962 the Canadian Credit Men's Association, which has some 4,200 members representing leading manufacturing, wholesale and distribution firms, sent another brief to the Minister of Justice. This brief was prepared about four years ago after consultation with the foremost bankruptcy lawyers in all parts of Canada. It refers to the large number of fraudulent bankruptcies. It recommends—I invite the attention of the committee to this—that to deal with the situation a special department should be established under the supervision of the superintendent of bankruptcy for the investigation and prosecution of bankruptcy offences. Has this suggestion been adopted? No.

After they sent it to the hon. member for Kamloops, the then Minister of Justice, and nothing happened they waited for a while and sent it in again to a later Minister of Justice, the present President of the Privy Council. Has any action been taken in respect of those suggestions? There has been no action taken as far as I can make out.

Then in October of 1963, which I point out is now two and half years ago at least, a most highly expert and qualified group made their submission to the then Minister of Justice, Hon. Lionel Chevrier. Perhaps they hoped that with a new administration action might be expected. But they were to be disappointed. This brief was submitted by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. They referred, as I have, to the description of bankruptcy frauds as "twentieth century highway robbery on a grand scale".

They then set out what the purpose of bankruptcy is and for the benefit of hon. members I should like to read what they say in that regard. It is:

> —the expeditious realization of a debtor's assets and the distribution of the proceeds among the creditors entitled to them in law—the punishment of the dishonest debtor—and the ultimate discharge of the debtor from bankruptcy and his integration into society once again freed from a crushing burden of debt.

Then they went on in their preface to the brief to say this, and this explains some of the reasons for the colossal scale of bankruptcy frauds:

> Early in the committee's study, it was realized that the sales and credit policies in our highly competitive economy fostered and even encouraged an over-extension of credit. Such credit policies were entirely innocent in most instances; in others, they bordered on exploitation. This economic atmosphere was ripe for the racketeer and his strategies. Furthermore, the ease with which corporations can be formed and transfers of interest made, has created an impersonal atmosphere in which the moral aspect of business can be easily forgotten. These facts, when examined in terms of the Bankruptcy Act, revealed that, while the Act needed certain amendments, one of the principal areas requiring corrective action was in the field of administration.

I emphasize that they suggest that action is required in the field of administration. They then summarized their proposals, which included legislative proposals, but I only want to read from the fourth suggestion in their summary where it is stated:

> Suggestions for the reorganization of the office of the superintendent of bankruptcy to assist the department in its supervision of bankrupt estates and the activities of licensed trustees.

They then went on to give detailed suggestions of some of the technical problems and legislative changes that are required. I do not intend to detain the committee by going into them. However, at page 25 they deal with a subject that I am concerned about, the subject of fraud. They quote a speech of Mr. W. J. McQuillan, Q.C. delivered on June 19, 1959 to the Eastern Credit and Financial Management Conference and state:

> My last comment will be on a subject on which any lawyer whose interests are normally identified with creditors feels very keenly. Some of you may know, having been victims, that in Montreal over the past few years, four or five organized gangs have been operating. The pattern is simple.

Then he goes on to describe the simple pattern in 1959 which he said was operating in the field of bankruptcy frauds. These remarks are quoted by the Institute of Chartered Accountants in their 1963 brief at page 26, and I invite the attention of the committee to this statement which shows the total breakdown of the administration of justice in this field. They state:

> Appropriate steps are seldom, if ever, taken to bring dishonest debtors and other parties involved to justice.

I emphasize that statement made by the Institute of Chartered Accountants. They say:

> Appropriate steps are seldom, if ever, taken to bring dishonest debtors and other parties involved to justice.

Then on page 27 they spell out in detail some of the things that ought to have been done and have not been done by this administration or its predecessor. They say:

> For many reasons this system is unsatisfactory as:—

They refer to the system in vogue as being unsatisfactory and then list reasons as follows:

> The superintendent of bankruptcy seldom takes part in investigations of alleged fraudulent actions relating to bankruptcies.

In fraudulent cases, one or a number of creditors may themselves be involved in the fraudulent action.

In fraudulent cases, by the time secured creditors are paid, there is often nothing left to finance an investigation and creditors are loathe to "throw good money after bad".

They then refer to some of the improper transaction and they state:

Deliberate omission of certain assets from the statement of affairs.

Admission by the trustee of improper claims of creditors.

Failure by the trustee to report improper acts and transactions by the bankrupt prior to bankruptcy proceedings.

Improper repossession of goods by certain creditors to the detriment of other creditors.

If all these things were known to the Institute of Chartered Accountants, what action if any has the superintendent of bankruptcy and the Department of Justice taken in respect of these matters? They then make several suggestions of things that should be done. These are in the form of recommendations and the first one is:

The position of superintendent of bankruptcy is of sufficient importance to justify the status of assistant deputy minister.

The staff of the superintendent should be strengthened by the appointment of three assistants whose duties would be to supervise:

Activities of registrars, official receivers and trustees; investigations of bankruptcy frauds; processing of trustees' statements.

Item 5 in their recommendations is:

The superintendent of bankruptcy should assume the responsibility, financial and otherwise, of conducting investigations where there is evidence of fraud.

I intend to point out later that this Minister of Justice, and perhaps he will deal with this later, has several times asserted that this is not the responsibility of his department.

In October of 1964 the government of the province of Quebec instituted an inquiry known as the Mercier inquiry which reported on July 30, 1965. This inquiry was largely concerned with loss of revenue to the provincial department of revenue in bankrupt estates, but the inquiry was expanded and found, and I invite the attention of the committee to this:

The inquiry directed by this commission revealed a very deplorable if not alarming situation which existed in bankruptcy and liquidation matters in Quebec.

Then on page 7 of the report it is stated that the inquiry demonstrated that dishonesty and fraud deeply penetrated in one way or another a large proportion of bankruptcies and liquidations. I invite the attention of the committee to these words to be found in the official report to the legislature and the government of the province of Quebec. It states that the underworld did at the same time a lucrative business to the detriment of honest creditors.

In October of 1965 the Canadian Lumbermen's Association returned to the attack. You will remember that they filed a brief pointing out all these things in 1961. Four years later they thought they might try again, and they stated that fraudulent bankruptcies in the lumber industry in Quebec alone amounted to some $46 million. They then added this view which is the result of an inquiry by their members over seven months through a special committee they had set up:

—this sordid situation has links with political campaign funds, narcotics peddling and arson swindlers.

That is not the view I express; it is a view put forward in a brief after investigation by this association of businessmen. Then the Globe and Mail in dealing with the submission of the Lumbermen's Association said, reporting the chairman of the committee:

It had been trying in vain for several years to get action from the federal and Quebec governments. It asked Prime Minister Pearson for a royal commission in February 1964.

The Globe and Mail then stated that Mr. Leblanc, who I assume was the chairman of the committee, had said:

We have the impression of watching a football game between federals and provincials, where the two teams are stalling the game and throwing on each other the responsibility for doing so.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Kierans, then the revenue minister for Quebec, did not agree with this description. In a speech to the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association in the fall of 1965 he accused the federal Department of Justice of hindering Quebec's war on the bankruptcy underworld. I should like to know whether Mr. Kierans was making a responsible or an irresponsible statement when he said that the federal Department of Justice was hindering Quebec's war on the bankruptcy underworld. I think a committee of this house should be interested in this matter too.

Mr. Kierans said that Quebec—he meant the government of Quebec—had complained to the federal department for years about laxity and loopholes in the Bankruptcy Act and was now insisting that Ottawa act. Those are the words he is quoted as having used. The present minister may say that he has only been in office for a short time and that he now proposes at long last, after these years of responsible demonstrations of a substantial scandal, to do something about it. But unfortunately he has been in office long enough to demonstrate a settled determination to avoid the issue.

I should like to quote what the minister is reported to have said. This is in the Heavy Construction News, a newspaper published by the construction industry, of September 24, 1965. If I am misquoting the minister I have no doubt he will correct me.

"The real complaint is that certain people are obtaining credit unscrupulously with no intention of or likelihood of meeting their debts after disposing of the goods they obtain." Cardin—

That is the familiar way in which they refer to the minister:

Cardin said: "Bankruptcy is the inevitable result but it usually is the consequence of what has been done, rather than a means in itself of defrauding creditors. The suppression of pre-bankruptcy fraud is the responsibility of the provincial authorities as a part of the administration of criminal justice by the provinces" he emphasized.

"The federal role, on the other hand, exercised through the superintendent of bankruptcy, has always been understood to be especially the supervision of the trustees".

In these words, as I read them, the Minister of Justice is rejecting the emphatic, documented, reasoned pleas of all the business organizations I have quoted, namely, that the superintendent of bankruptcy should take responsibility for the investigation and if not the detailed prosecution at least the preparation of the prosecution of these offences.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member wants to be fair and I believe it would be useful if I said something here, if he would permit me to do so. It is true that the federal government is responsible for the administration of bankruptcy. The superintendent can in fact initiate investigations; but the actual prosecution and investigation of any criminal activity in this field as in any other field and the administration of the Criminal Code are under the provincial authorities. This is all I meant to say in that statement.

We do not claim that we have no responsibility for the administration of bankruptcy. We claim that we do not have the responsibility for actually investigating and prosecuting criminal charges that might arise within a bankruptcy.

Mr. Brewin: I am glad to hear the minister's explanation but unfortunately it does not jibe with what he is alleged to have said; at least, I do not think it does. The Canadian Press in an article in the Globe and Mail of February 10 last quoted the minister in this way:

Justice Minister Lucien Cardin said such investigations—

Investigations into bankruptcy frauds.

—are a provincial matter. The federal government was responsible only for the supervision of bankruptcy trustees.

What I am trying to point out to the minister is that all these organizations, the Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Canadian Construction Association, the Canadian Lumbermen's Association, the Canadian Credit Men's Association, have for years been urging that the responsibility which is in the act be carried out by the superintendent of bankruptcy by setting up a staff adequate to deal with this colossal cancer on our society.

I suggest that instead of putting forward these evasive statements and shoving the responsibility off to the provinces, the minister should accept this responsibility and take steps to solve this very difficult situation. The minister does not have to tell me, because I happen to be a lawyer trained in this field and know it very well, that the prosecution of these matters rests with the provinces. I also know that in narcotics and combines cases the federal authorities provide counsel because they know these are difficult matters. They take their responsibility seriously in these cases. But these bankruptcy frauds are not being taken seriously.

I am not blaming the minister for this, but the miniscule staff available to deal with these situations is totally inadequate. They are not able to deal with racketeers of the type who are defrauding the Canadian public on a colossal scale year after year. Nothing is done by the government that is responsible for this matter. I say to you, Mr. Minister, through the Chairman that it is time we stopped using provincial responsibility as an excuse for inaction in this matter. The field of bankruptcy is clearly defined in section 91 of the British North America Act to be the responsibility of the federal government.

I hope we are not going to see more and more abandonment of federal responsibility in jurisdiction. That this matter should be dealt with adequately by the government and the Department of Justice is essential for the protection of businessmen across Canada. These gangsters or criminals are smart enough to use provincial boundaries in hopping from one place to another. We need a nationally effective administration, properly staffed with accountants and so on, to deal with this matter.

I hope we will never again hear in the house the statement by the responsible minister that these investigations are just a provincial matter and the federal government is only responsible for the supervision of bankruptcy trustees. I remind the minister, if the government is responsible for the supervision of bankruptcy trustees, that according to the Institute of Chartered Accountants in 1963 many of these trustees are themselves appointed by fraudulent creditors. Many of them do not do their jobs and supervision has been inadequate. We need an entirely different approach in this field to anything we have had in the past.

What does the minister do? He says we will have some amendments to the act. Well and good. Then four years later we are still told we are to have some amendments to the act and the question will be considered by a new group of lawyers. The Institute of Chartered Accountants and the construction industry consulted lawyers expert in this field four years ago. They could sit down with the officials of the department capable of understanding and explain the changes necessary in the law. I suggest also, Mr. Chairman, that this house contains enough competent people who could advise the government in this regard. Why appoint one lawyer in Montreal, one in Toronto and one in Ottawa? I do not know whether they are friends of the administration and need something to do but I do not believe it is necessary to put off these things in this way. There has been a terrible neglect in this field. Again I say that the minister should not bear the brunt of the blame for this situation; it has been happening for quite a long time.

I hope the amendments to the act will be referred to the Justice Committee and that the committee will take the responsibility not only of looking into the amendments proposed but inquiring into the administration, which the Institute of Chartered Accountants said was of crucial importance in this field.

I suggest that the tale of governmental and departmental waiting in this field requires a more searching scrutiny. What is wrong with the department? What is wrong with its administration? For five years they have been investigating this subject. For five years they have received a flood of complaints and detailed suggestions poured forth from responsible business organizations. I will never again complain that the Liberal government is too subservient to business interests because apparently they are prepared, at least if small businessmen are concerned, to ignore completely the very rational suggestions made to them. It is an unjust accusation for anybody to make that they pay any attention to the needs of business because apparently they do not.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, for five years they have heard these complaints and millions, indeed hundreds of millions, of dollars have been lost by these repeated frauds. The laws designed to protect honest debtors have been used as instruments of fraud. Thousands of businessmen all across Canada have lost legitimate payment for their goods. The need for action has been demonstrated time and again. The direction of the remedial action required has been clearly indicated but nothing has happened. There is something rotten here and if not rotten at least pitifully inept. In my view the committee should not only review changes in the legislation now proposed but should seek to find out why a whole succession of ministers of justice have been unable apparently to secure from the department the advice required to take the administrative and legislative steps needed to eradicate this crying scandal.

If by any chance this matter does not seem to be of great importance to this committee, and I hope it does, then the sort of headline we saw today should remind us of the gravity of the matter. When we allow criminals to get involved in matters like bankruptcy with great profit to themselves, then it follows as day follows night that honest men will find themselves shot because they had the guts to fight but did not have adequate help from the government in the past. I hope they will have that help in the future in dealing with this major injustice and fraud on the Canadian people.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity of addressing a few words to the committee in connection with the field of justice—or perhaps I should now say fields of justice, and the various components into which, I think regrettably, it is in the process of being divided. I want to make it clear that while I intend to confine myself to some fairly general remarks at this stage I do so only because it seems clear there will be other more appropriate opportunities to go into discussion in depth and in detail on other questions when the main estimates for 1966-67 are being considered. Nethertheless I have some observations which while of a general nature deal with matters of sufficient importance that it is desirable to make them at this time. I am not going to follow in detail the line of the hon. member who has just spoken, but I want to refer before I conclude to one aspect of bankruptcy.

The subject which concerns me most at the present time is the proposal to divide the responsibilities formerly discharged by the Department of Justice into three. I want to make it clear also that I make no criticism of the Solicitor General personally. I am sure we all appreciated the brief resumé he gave us this afternoon of the work he is undertaking and his approach to it. It is not with respect to his capabilities personally that I am concerned. I am sure we all look forward to the time, if the government's proposal is adopted, when he will bring his considerable and extensive capabilities to the discharge of his new responsibilities.

But I do not believe the responsibility should be divided. I assure you, sir, that I have attempted to keep an open mind, but I am satisfied on the basis of my own experience that it is a mistake to divide these functions as it is now proposed to divide them. I am sure of my ground when I say that what is needed in this field is not more division but more and better co-ordination. My view is that co-ordination will become more and more difficult, if not impossible, to achieve when you have this clear, sharp distinction which it is now proposed to create between the functions of the respective ministers amongst whom this work is to be divided.

I base my position on my own experience, the experience I had during the course of my administration of the department and upon the more recent experience of the present government. I do not want, sir, to claim any special farsightedness or any personal credit for the very good relationships which existed between the various branches, services and components of the Department of Justice that characterized the years between 1957 and 1963. But it was not accidental. I am not seeking to reflect on anybody. I am stating it as a fact that this condition was not in existence in June of 1957.

What we found then was that there was too great a tendency for the various services to operate without adequate knowledge of what the other services were doing. They would, therefore, frequently be working at cross-purposes. I am quite certain, Mr. Chairman, that in no field is it more important than in this field that there be co-ordination. You cannot have the enforcement section operating in a vacuum from the correction section, with policies not co-ordinated, and above all you cannot have the enforcement and correction branches operating in a vacuum and without co-ordination with the administrative and law-making functions. We initiated administrative procedures during those years which would make it certain that there was co-ordination, co-ordination with respect to administration, co-ordination with respect to the passage of information between the R.C.M.P., the penitentiaries service, the parole functions and the administrative and lawmaking functions, all of which came within the scope of the department and the Minister of Justice as he then exercised the responsibilities.

It was a very happy experience and I am satisfied I am stating the matter correctly when I say that the officers of the department who reported to the minister all appreciated the fact that there was this co-ordination. I leave that there, Mr. Chairman. I say next that I am quite satisfied that if there had continued to be that co-ordination, that exchange of information, some of the grievous, far-reaching mistakes that have characterized the administration of justice under the present government, especially in the years from 1963 to 1965, would not have happened because they could not have happened.

I do not want to rehearse all the difficulties surrounding the position of the President of the Privy Council and leading up to the Dorion Commission report, but I am as satisfied as if I had been there that the difficulties in which the then Minister of Justice found himself would not have arisen, the mistakes he made would not have been made, had there been the necessary co-ordination between the R.C.M.P. and the information they were bringing the minister on the one hand and the advice the officers of the Department of Justice were there to provide on the other hand.

It was simply because the officials of the Department of Justice did not have adequate information and access to the R.C.M.P. reports that that far-reaching and grievous mistake was made in a matter affecting the basic structure and functions of representative government itself. The report on these matters received from the R.C.M.P. was not reviewed as it should have been by officers of the Department of Justice who were there for that very purpose. So the minister in a matter of the gravest consequences, having far-reaching political consequences, placed himself in a position where he made a decision on his own without the advice which he should have taken and which would automatically have come had there been that system in effect which I have described.

I would have thought this government would have learned from its mistake. Instead, what do we see? We see a greater compartmentalization system being built up under which there will be less and less knowledge by the one hand of what is being done by the other.

I am satisfied now—and I became satisfied as a result of the experience I had—that it is not sufficient to leave this matter of co-ordination and co-operation between the various services which report to the one minister, to a matter of mere administrative arrangement within the ministers' office. My experience convinced me that something more formal was required, and so we were working on a proposal which would result in a formal recommendation for a departmental reorganization which would both reflect the need and ensure the fact of co-ordination and co-operation. I should like to summarize that proposal here.

In my view, what is required is that we should have three deputy ministers made responsible for these functions. They would continue to be under the responsibility of one minister but there should be three deputies: A deputy in charge of administration, a deputy in charge of enforcements and a deputy in charge of corrections, all three deputies reporting to the one minister. The situation then would be that there would be one minister who, with the advice and assistance of the deputy in charge of administration —who should be given the responsibility for co-ordinating and reporting on policy to the minister—would assume the over-all responsibility in the government for the co-ordination of that policy.

It may very well be asked of me, "Why didn't you do it"? I think the answer is clear. I said that I became satisfied that this question should not be left to a mere administrative arrangement carried on by individual ministers, but should be reflected in an arrangement which assured co-ordination and co-operation. However, political circumstances overtook us before it was possible to make a firm recommendation. Therefore I make no apology for saying this after the event.

I am making this suggestion now because the matter is of such importance that I hope the government will reconsider the organization of the work that we are discussing along those lines. Rather than bifurcating, or I think it is trifurcating the department—or as my hon. friend from Bow River has perhaps less euphemistically but more accurately described it, "creating divisive confusion"—I hope that the government will reconsider its proposals in this field and adopt a policy of co-ordination rather than division.

There are many other reasons for this suggestion apart from the obvious necessity of co-ordination and co-operation. After all, what do we see now? Apparently there is an intention to make the President of the Privy Council responsible for much, if not all, of the work in the constitutional field, at any rate as far as it lies within the sphere of dominion-provincial relations. But who is or should be the constitutional adviser to the government? Surely it is the Minister of Justice.

It is a mistake then, because of some temporary situation which may arise, some temporary difficulty in which the government finds itself, to take away these responsibilities and entrust them to others without really thinking of the over-all implications and where they will lead us in the long run.

Mr. Nielsen: Political expediency.

Mr. Fulton: Is the Minister of Justice to be no longer the constitutional adviser to the government? I would deplore such a development. I hope that the minister will tell us what is the ultimate intention. I hope the Minister of Justice will be able to tell us that not only will he continue in name to be constitutional adviser to the government but that he will continue in fact to be so. It is important to parliament that both this house and the country know where to look for authoritative statements on constitutional matters and know whom to hold responsible. Both functions are equally important.

Is the President of the Privy Council to continue to be in charge of dominion-provincial negotiations, with the Minister of Justice, who is or should be the constitutional adviser, having no hand in them, merely coming in when the fact is accomplished to pass some sort of ex post facto opinion whether or not the action proposed is constitutional? He cannot be the real constitutional adviser unless he takes the major responsibility for such negotiations.

Similarly, the Minister of Justice is surely the appropriate and obvious minister to deal with the Attorneys General, his counterparts in the provincial administrations in this field.

Mr. Nielsen: He is Attorney General of Canada too.

Mr. Fulton: As my hon. friend for Yukon reminds me, the Minister of Justice is also the Attorney General for Canada. Surely that function is not going to be removed from him by the process of erosion or osmosis that I am satisfied will set in under this proposed trifurcation.

If the Minister of Justice as Attorney General of Canada is the appropriate minister to deal with the provincial ministers in this field, then does it not follow that he should also deal with them in the immediately and closely related field of law enforcement? I should think the logic of the proposals—I hate to use that word because there is no logic in them—the logical outcome of the proposals which are now being put forward will be that more and more the Solicitor General will deal with matters of law enforcement and co-ordination. So apparently we are to have three different ministers dealing with the provinces, if these proposals go forward, in fields where the utmost co-ordination is again necessary, fields which should be dealt with and co-ordinated by one responsible minister, not by three.

I hope therefore that the government will give serious consideration to this matter, Mr. Chairman, and will ask themselves whether they are not indeed embarking on this course because of a fundamental error in policy. They should ask themselves whether this course, if pursued, will not lead to a compounding not only of the time that must pass by before these serious problems, which have been referred to by others today are dealt with but also a compounding of the difficulty of dealing with them at all effectively.

I wish to say no more on that subject at this time. I leave the matter with the government in the hope that it will give it that reconsideration. However, we will certainly have a great deal more to say on the matter if we find that when the legislation is introduced it reflects what we consider to be this fundamentally unsound policy.

I should like now to refer to some specific matters, but before going on I want to say a word or two on the question of bankruptcy which was dealt with in some detail by the hon. member for Greenwood. Again I do not intend to go into detail on this matter at this stage, if only for the very good reason that my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon, will be developing the subject in considerable detail on another occasion. But I want to deal with the one question of when the studies of bankruptcy commenced.

The hon. member for Greenwood is quite correct when he says that complaints began to come in as far back as 1961; they did. One very good reason is that we invited the submission of representations on the subject. I do not want to claim sole responsibilty for this; it was a matter of increasing concern. But I well recall making a speech on this question and asking interested professional and business organizations to give us the benefit of their experience and to let us have their views on how the weaknesses could be remedied.

We commenced a study in 1961 as a result of our concern, a concern which had led to representations being made by outside organizations. We soon found that the study we had started within the department, which we entrusted to the then superintendent of bankruptcy, was obviously of a nature and scope which it was not possible for that one official to handle alone. So it was not very long before we did in fact place that study in over-all charge of, and give over-all responsibility for its conduct to, an assistant deputy minister.

That was the situation when I ceased to be Minister of Justice. I just wanted to make this part of the record clear, that at least at the time when we had responsibility for the administration we did not fall nor were we pushed into a study of bankruptcy. We initiated it and invited outside representations and suggestions.

Among the other matters that should be considered urgently by the Minister of Justice, and upon which I hope we shall get some answers in the course of discussion of these estimates, is the question of co-ordination of law enforcement between the federal and provincial governments. I am quite sure that hon. members of the committee will agree with me when I say that some of the statements which have been made recently by the present Attorney General of Quebec are serious and far-reaching. His statements criticizing the co-operation between the two governments on the one hand and his statements critical of the work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on the other cannot and should not be left unanswered. I feel very strongly about this. I feel that they cannot and should not be left unchallenged, certainly in so far as the work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is concerned.

I must say that on the basis of my experience with that force when I was minister and on the basis of my impression of the work of that force today there is no foundation for the implications contained in the statements made by the Attorney General of Quebec in so far as the efficacy and the readiness to co-operate of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are concerned. Indeed, sir, I think that some questions should be raised as to the degree of co-operation forthcoming in the other direction.

I want to mention two specific fields. I should like the minister to tell us what is the situation, for instance, in the field of counterfeiting? How much actual co-operation is coming from provincial law enforcement agencies in this increasingly important field, a field where the activities of criminals mean a potential if not actual loss of many millions of dollars to the people of Canada, particularly of course through the watering down and dilution of the currency of Canada.

Counterfeiting is a crime under the Criminal Code. I want to know how many cases of counterfeiting have been prosecuted by provincial police and how many by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. How many cases were investigated by the provincial police, how many by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and what degree of co-operation is forthcoming in that respect?

An hon. Member: How many of those result in prosecutions?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. Perhaps I should ask how many investigations are initiated by provincial forces and how many of those result in prosecutions?

What about the field of illicit distilleries? It is true that this is a matter under the Excise Act and therefore there is a very primary federal responsibility. I make no complaint about the fact that the federal forces assume and are expected to assume primary responsibility for the investigations in this field; but it is also a matter of concern for provincial liquor commissions.

[Mr. Fulton.]

I should think that it would not take very much legal argument to convince anyone that the conduct of an illicit still is an offence under provincial legislation as well as under federal legislation. And I should be interested to know as well the degree of co-operation forthcoming from the provincial authorities in this matter. I think the situation in this and similar fields should be outlined by the Minister of Justice so that we shall have factual basis upon which to support the general statement that the criticism, actual and implied, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the field of co-operation is completely unwarranted and unjustified.

Then, sir, I should like to ask a question with respect to the proposed department of the Solicitor General in case I should be taken by implication as conceding that there should be a separate department. I do not so concede, but it would be interesting to know what it is in mind by way of organization of that department and what is in mind by way of ensuring that, if this wrong proposal is persisted in, at least we can have the maximum co-operation and co-ordination of policy between the various departments.

Then, with respect to penitentiaries I repeat that I appreciate the outline given by the Solicitor General. I do not propose to say a great deal here because of the fact that I hope we shall have the main estimates for 1966-67 before too long and because there is now on the order paper the motion to set up a special committee. Both of these will furnish us with more appropriate occasions to go into detail.

But I should like to say that I think it is a mistake to be setting up a special committee for the purpose of studying the penitentiary construction program. I hope that the minister will reconsider this matter also.

After all, not very long ago, as a result of a complete review of committee organization a standing committee of the house was set up, which I think is a good standing committee, to look into matters of justice and legal affairs. This committee, as I understand it, was set up for the very purposes, first, of considering the estimates of the department and, second, of considering such suggestions and problems as are now being proposed to be referred to the special committee. I am in favour of setting up standing committees covering most of the departments of government. But when we have done that, then surely it becomes a proliferation of committees to set up a special committee to study one of the very matters which should come before a standing committee.

We are all here to work. But it is obvious surely, that by and large the same people who are interested in the work of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will be interested in the work of the Special Committee on Penitentiaries. How can we man both? And are the officials of the Department of Justice to be bifurcated again? Do they have to attend two different committees? It does not seem sensible. Why should not the standing committee lay out a program and decide what it will do? Could it not deal with the estimates first, the private bills and legislation referred to it second, and third, the penitentiary situation? Of course the order could be changed.

I know, sir, that in respect of the work with regard to penitentiaries it is the desire that the other place should name members to join us. But I suggest to you that that does not justify a special committee. Surely if the government chose to it could refer this particular matter to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs along the lines of the motion now on the order paper, the terms of reference of the motion then to include a clause to the effect that, the Senate be invited to join this standing committee at the time it is undertaking its study of this subject.

There is no reason, just because we want the other place to join us, that we cannot make use of the standing committee of the house. I am confident we shall find great difficulty in manning and staffing these committees if a subject which comes under one of these standing committees is referred to a special committee instead.

Further, with regard to the matter of penitentiaries and the penitentiary program generally, I was naturally somewhat interested to hear the minister say that the program which was conceived as a result of the correctional reform committee's report in 1960 forms the basis of the present program. I have some reservations whether the program has in fact been speeded up or whether on the contrary it has been slowed down. I have indeed a very serious question to raise here. Whether it has been speeded up or slowed down, it remains a very heavy, important and far-reaching program.

The commissioner of penitentiaries in charge of that program has a very heavy responsibility. He has demonstrated his ability to carry it out. I am surprised therefore and disappointed that the commissioner of penitentiaries has not received the increase in salary which was received I think by practically all, if not all, the officers in the public service in positions comparable with his. I think that is something which ought to be rectified as quickly as possible.

The other question that I raise and will have more to say about later concerns what I regard as a serious departure from the program of construction and one which I think can only have the effect of delaying the most urgent area of all and that is in the construction of minimum and medium security institutions. I refer to the decision to build two Alcatraz-type prisons.

This is a matter which was reviewed at least twice, if not three times, when I had the responsibility for the administration. I felt then and I still feel that it would be a mistake to build more super fortresses at least until we have completed the re-organization which will make it possible to work on a regional basis of responsibility with a proper complex of institutions in each region. We have enough of these fortress-like maximum security institutions at the present time. Surely the concentration should be on building institutions which will make it possible to take men out of prisons like St. Vincent and Kingston in order that such places may be razed to the ground. Those old buildings cannot be made to serve the concept of any up to date correctional program. And so I regret very much we should be building more maximum security institutions before we have completed the other program.

I find in addition that there are at least two medium security institutions, one of them planned for the eastern townships and one of them a young offenders institution, which were in the program as we envisaged it but which do not appear at the present time. I shall have more to say about this in the appropriate committee. I was glad to hear the Solicitor General say it was expected to get 21 more people on the parole board. This work is surely fundamental to a correctional program. I know the board has been hampered in the past by lack of staff. I hope that when the newcomers are trained there will be a speeding up in the granting of releases from penitentiaries under parole supervision and that more prisoners will be let out under supervision instead of having to wait as is now the case until the completion of their sentences. Supervision is all important and it cannot be given unless the department has a good staff.

Finally, I wish to refer briefly to the Combines Investigation Act. I raised this matter by way of a question the other day. The President of the Privy Council replied in effect, it seemed to me, that the government regards professional hockey as a service. I do not see how anyone could possibly pretend that this profitable, highly organized, almost industrial activity—that is an exaggeration; but I do not see how this highly profitable, highly organized, closed corporation which now runs professional hockey in the senior league in Canada and the United States can be regarded as a service.

I do not say that at the moment it comes within the purview of the Combines Investigation Act. If it does not I think the act should be amended. But I would be reasonably satisfied that it could not be said that the reason it does not come under the Act is that it is a service. It is not a service. I suggest we need to look at this situation because it is one which gives grounds for concern. The President of the N.H.L. was perfectly candid about it when speaking on a C.B.C. television program the other night. He said, in effect: This is not a sport; it is a business and we are in this business for profit. That is what Mr. Clarence Campbell said. Let us not obscure the issue then by wondering whether hockey is a service.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time—

Mr. Fulton: I have concluded what I wanted to say, Mr. Chairman. I wish only to ask the government again to take a searching look at the policy it proposes to implement should it divide this department into three. I hope they will reach the conclusion that it would be a gravely mistaken policy.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I listened attentively and sympathetically to the righteous indignation of the hon. member for Greenwood. I am glad he is present in the committee at this moment. I think we are all stirred and disturbed about the bankruptcy situation. I think too that the hon. member would not mind if I were to continue along the line he took and point out that, although we are justified in being indignant about the situation, it is a situation which seems to me to have little application to the present Minister of Justice.

I am not one to defend ministers. I never was. I agree with what the hon. member had to say and with what was said in the briefs he read from the Lumbermen's Association, namely, that a great deal of the blame must fall on trustees, on creditors, and on lawyers, though they were never mentioned, as well as on fraudulent debtors.

If I heard him correctly, the hon. member said there was no reason in the world why inspectors on the staff of the federal government could not control these trustees. Let us carry this a step further. Let us suppose such control is exercised. There will be no need to go to Quebec or to British Columbia to find out what the reaction will be. It will be forthcoming right here in Ontario. What will the Law Society of Upper Canada have to say? What will the professional organization of the chartered accountants have to say? I think the idea is a fine one. I believe it has merit. But before results can be achieved there is an even greater problem to be solved. As the hon. member pointed out very well in a speech he made during a discussion on the constitution, this is the test, a test which should be applied now by the provinces in connection with co-operative federalism.

My remarks will be directed to many other fields connected with the whole concept of justice. Co-operation has to be established generally if we are to achieve anything as a result of the work of the department in criminal investigation and in the attack on organized crime.

I was not surprised to find some reaction to the proposal to split the department into two. I admire this move. I think this is reform because at least it is a change. I hope it is done properly. I am all for change. The minister would agree with me that change is one of the most difficult things to introduce, because all those who know and rely on the old establishment are enemies of change and doubtful about what their position will be under a new system.

Reform will have to come. Is there any doubt in anyone's mind today that we do have organized crime? I think the evidence suggests that crime has now entered into fields it has never entered before. It is mobile. It is international. Yet we are trying to deal with it on the basis of very old concepts of police work and law. This is why it will be necessary to introduce changes. We are going to see organized crime in the field of bankruptcy, as has been pointed out. There is some evidence of organized crime in the liquor business. We see it in the business of usury, in the traffic in narcotics. We see it in those elements of our business life which, though perhaps not strictly illegal, are quasi-moral. We are likely to find heavy pressure put on us to legalized sweepstakes. This will invite that element of society. We are going to have pressure brought to bear upon us to legalize the whole idea of birth control measures. Again, it does not take much to imagine where crime will move in that field and we shall have to come back forcefully with new techniques.

As the hon. member for Kamloops pointed out, we have a division between the local, provincial and federal police forces but with the multiplicity of crime today we need closer co-operation between those forces. We depend on the local police force to give us the immediate information and we need the centralized R.C.M.P. to exercise their administrative powers to provide greater co-operation.

We shall have to change laws and we shall have to accept such changes in laws. We shall have to accept changed techniques in police work and we shall have to adapt our laws to those new techniques. Privacy may be lost. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has been disturbed about incidents connected with a person's freedom but we will have to face this problem and deal with it in such a way that we preserve the individual's freedom while at the same time allowing new methods of police work.

We shall have to introduce new methods that will keep pace with the sophistication of crime because criminals are not slouches any more. They are very jet age and we cannot stop them with old theories and old techniques. The police may have to use listening and radio devices that will interfere with privacy.

We shall have to introduce legislation dealing with the fourth estate to prevent the press from publishing things damaging to the individual. We shall have to get accustomed to the idea that freedom will have to be protected in ways different from those used in another age.

Today there are about a dozen manufacturers of machines such as lie detectors. I am given to understand on good authority that using new techniques and equipment, including drugs, we can find out the truth or falsehood of any statement. This is a scientific fact but we still depend on 12 men serving as a jury to decide between truth and falsehood. Even 12 first class psychiatrists cannot do that as well as machines can; yet our laws prohibit the use of those machines.

We shall also need greater respect for police forces and police administrators, but that respect cannot be forced. It must come naturally. We can understand journalistic pride in stories appearing in the press but our police forces require good public relations. However, they do not employ even the semblance of public relations officers.

All this will be for nothing unless we seriously tackle the question of penal reform and rehabilitation. We are really doing nothing if 41 per cent are still repeaters, as pointed out by the Solicitor General. Today we spend more on shoes and boots for prisoners than we do on research and rehabilitation, and from what I understand the prisoners do not walk anywhere, except on the odd occasion.

We shall have to co-ordinate our efforts with those of the United States. There the position is no better. Just recently an article was published by two psychiatrists, a brother and sister team who, working at their own expense, found that they can predict criminal tendencies in children as young as seven and eight years. Their findings can be verified to an accuracy of almost 80 per cent. These two doctors have worked on their own and we do nothing to support them.

We shall have to co-ordinate all these efforts. We need qualified people. I think the minister is doing a fine job. I like him personally and I defend his position. I think we can trust him to do a good job.

Mr. Nielsen: He is too forgetful.

Mr. Otto: I have said I think he is a good minister. I trust and hope he will continue with his reformation despite all the objections that are going to come his way, and they will be many, in his efforts to bring the Department of Justice up to the reality of today's world.

Mr. Winkler: The hon. member referred to the responsibility of lawyers in the matter of fraudulent bankruptcies of companies. Would he make any reference to the responsibility of directors of companies?

Mr. Otto: Certainly, directors and lawyers. I still think that in most cases the shareholders, directors and other people involved are honest and that the bankruptcy is necessary but there are some cases of fraud.

Mr. Nielsen: Could the hon. member tell us about Kingsland Estates?

Mr. Otto: I thought that was coming, but if the hon. member for Yukon will just refresh his mind he will find that I stood in court demanding an inquiry on behalf of certain shareholders and gave evidence in connection with what I alleged to be fraud, and 30 lawyers representing creditors booed me because they wanted their money even if it was stolen. I asked the court as a friend of the court, an officer of the court, to initiate an investigation, and I must say that the Attorney General for the province of Ontario has not seemed to move at all in this matter. In fact—

ESTIMATES—ORDER OF CONSIDERATION

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I have a number of suggestions to make in order to expedite consideration of the estimates. My first suggestion to the house and to the government is that consideration of the estimates now before us, those of the Department of Justice, be suspended until tomorrow and that we also get agreement to forgo the private members' hour. Then we are prepared to consider National Revenue without debate, Privy Council without debate, Legislation without debate, and Post Office Department without debate.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Then we could proceed with the Department of Veterans Affairs. We are prepared to make one suggestion on the first item and then pass those estimates, also the Department of Fisheries with one suggestion and Forestry with one suggestion. There may be special inquiries in respect of the last three and some questions on certain items. In order to pass all these departments I suggest that we not pay any attention to the clock when it reaches the hour of ten and that we agree to sit to clean up these departments.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we would agree to what the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) has just proposed reasonably, that is to forgo the private members hour tonight and come back tomorrow to the estimates of the Department of Justice.

As for the estimates of the other departments mentioned, however, we would have a member speak on the Department of National Revenue. We are ready to pass without debate the estimates of the Privy Council, Legislation, Post Office, Veterans Affairs, as well as Fisheries. However, in connection with the Department of Forestry, and specifically as far as ARDA is concerned, we would have a few remarks to make, and perhaps two or three members of our party would be interested in speaking on those estimates.

I wonder whether the hon. member for Ontario would agree to an exchange: instead of speaking on Fisheries and Veterans Affairs, we would spend more time on the estimates of the Department of Forestry and ARDA.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this proposal does not take us by surprise; there have been some discussions on it. I may say we are in general agreement with it, although there are one or two points of detail about which I should make our position clear. The most serious proposal in the suggestion of the hon. member for Ontario is the inclusion of the Department of Fisheries. We have members who feel there must be a little more time spent on these estimates than is suggested. We would like that department deleted from the list for this evening.

We are prepared to waive the private members' hour and we are prepared to take up the other departments the hon. member mentioned. Although there may be some questions, we have no intention of carrying on an extended debate. We think if these adjustments are made the program outlined could be completed by ten o'clock and that it would not be necessary to go beyond that hour.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we believe the proposals which have been made by the hon. member for Ontario are reasonable and we do not raise any particular objection because, first of all, we soon will have before us the new estimates for the following year at which time we will be able to deal thoroughly with the various matters which are of concern to us. We recognize, of course, the fact that the Department of Fisheries is a very important department as is the Department of Veterans Affairs also. However, as I have said, in view of the fact that we will be moving on to the new estimates we are prepared to co-operate with the plan which has been suggested.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say another word? Because of the objection by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in respect of the Department of Fisheries, may I suggest that this department be left to the last and then if we are finished in time we can start on it in any event.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for his suggestion. It seems to be a very good one. If we agree to waive the private members' hour tonight that will be the first step and then we can call the departments indicated. I think I can undertake now that we would not call the Department of Fisheries tonight and we would revert, of course, to the Department of Justice tomorrow. If later in the evening there is some other department to be called in place of the Department of Fisheries, this would be done only after discussion with representatives of the other parties.

In respect of sitting beyond ten o'clock, I think it is better that we do not ask for any kind of formal order now. There seems to be a general consensus that we try to finish this program tonight and I hope this can be achieved.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I thank the hon. member for Ontario and the government house leader for agreeing to the slight amendments. May I assume from what the house leader has said that it also will be firm that we will revert to the Department of Justice tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I think emphasis should also be given to the remark of the hon. member for Fraser Valley to the effect that when the house is doing this we will be doing it in the light of the fact that we will be on the estimates for 1966-67 very shortly.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. It is the government's intention to submit a supply motion at the first opportunity when these estimates are concluded in order to have the new estimates brought before the house and referred to the appropriate standing committees.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is it my understanding of these discussions that there will be an order of the house for the suspension of the private members' hour?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), Family allowances—possible increase of allowances; the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. McNulty)—

[English]

National Capital Commission—Publicity promotion in connection with centennial; the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell), Atlantic Development Board—Inquiry as to additional assistance to maritimes.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock vote No. 1 of the Department of Justice was being considered. Is it agreed that vote No. 1 stand in accordance with the agreement reached when Mr. Speaker was in the chair?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

1. General administration, operation and maintenance including authority, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to spend revenue received during the year from firms and individuals requiring special services, $45,485,600.

The Chairman: Shall vote No. 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

[Translation]

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, we have a few remarks to make about item 1. I wonder if the Minister of National Revenue is in the house.

[English]

Mr. Pepin: He is here.

Mr. Knowles: He has been there for the last half hour.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: There he is, I see that he has been moved to another desk.

Mr. Chairman, it is a matter which we have been discussing for some time. The minister knows what it is. I only want the minister to tell me if he has taken steps to improve the situation within his department and I am talking about the famous receipts for charitable donations, a matter which creates numerous problems every year when the time comes to file income tax returns.

Again this year, instructions were given by the department to income tax collectors and inspectors to audit the books of parish priests and curates, all the books there might be in the rectories.

Unfortunately, consideration of the estimates of the Department of National Revenue started rather quickly and I did not have time to go to my office to pick up a letter sent to Quebec district parish priests by the Quebec taxation office. The letter states that parish priests must give full particulars of their bookkeeping if they want their receipts for charitable donations to be accepted. Furthermore, inspectors or assessors reserved the right to "cut down" charitable donations receipts as they see fit.

I want to point out to the minister that the situation we complained about last year, the year before and the year before that has not changed a bit. Taxpayers send their receipts, duly signed by their parish priests to the income tax office and inspectors, without making any inquiry—and this is the point I want to make—reduce the amounts of receipts at their discretion and according to their whims. And depending on whether or not they got out on the wrong side of the bed, they slash or cut down the receipts for charitable donations. There may be some abuse, but it is not up to me to look into each case. On the other hand, we wonder whether the Department of National Revenue, when the inspectors decide to reduce the amounts of the receipts, have the decency to look into the case and get in touch with the taxpayer.

At the present time, a general decision is applied. All receipts are shaded to the same amount: everyone's receipt is reduced to the same amount. There is no inquiry, no inspection, no checking. A dictatorial decision is made by income tax inspectors who decide to slash all receipts alike. This we must not tolerate. If the receipt is not acceptable, let there be an investigation with the taxpayer; let the parish priest be asked if his signature appears on the receipt, if the amount indicated has really been given. There is no need to check the bookkeeping or to set up a police system within the rectories. It is only a matter of inquiring of a taxpayer or at least of explaining to him why his charity receipt has been reduced.

At present, this is done in a uniform manner and without investigation. In order to solve the existing problem, I think the minister should adopt a new formula. We have already suggested a formula on this side of the house, and the minister said two years ago, and again last year, that he would take it into consideration. The minister has been saying, for as long as three years, that he would consider a new formula for charity receipts.

Let it be an automatic deduction or a percentage. We had suggested a deduction of 10 per cent for the first $3,000; of 7½ per cent for the additional or next $2,000 and 5 per cent for the rest, on an automatic basis, without requiring receipts, given automatically as a deduction. The minister was to study the matter and try to find a solution. I know it is a difficult problem, but I think a solution can be found or, at least, the inspectors and assessors should be asked not to be as arbitrary as they are today, deciding without checking and without investigating. They decide on their own and if the taxpayer is not satisfied, it is up to him to pay for an appeal from the civil servant's, the inspector's decision.

The department does not pay the costs when it contests a taxpayer's income tax return. The department decides on the changes, and the taxpayer is the one to pay the costs so as to prove that his income tax return was correct.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to linger on the subject any longer. I am sure the minister knows what we think; I feel that he has had enough time to find a solution to the problem and that he should be able to make a statement on this subject today.

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. minister for Lapointe has stated—

Mr. Grégoire: Later; in a couple of years but not yet.

Mr. Pepin: Perhaps in a couple of centuries.

Mr. Benson: I am not sure I will live that long. As my friend has said, there is a serious problem in regard to charitable donations which has been under consideration for a number of years. There have been instances in Canada, and I do not attach them to any area or charitable organization, where some abuses have occurred in the past. Over the past several years our department has tried in several ways to tighten up the administration so that people can claim the actual amount they contributed, no more and no less. There have been a few instances, as a matter of fact, where we have had to prosecute people for issuing fraudulent receipts.

Under the existing statute there is provision for allowing individuals to claim a deduction, a flat deduction of $100. There is also a provision which allows them to claim any amount of donations actually made up to 10 per cent. As my hon. friend knows, this is not an amount that is allowed in every case; it has to be substantiated. I should like to support my department by saying that in no instance have we disallowed receipts for charitable donations without having some basis on which to arrive at the conclusion that the receipts issued by certain charitable organizations recognized under the Income Tax Act have been in excess of the actual amount of money received.

In instances where we have disallowed claims for donations we have gone to the people who have issued the receipts and asked them on what basis the receipts were issued. When the answer had been that the receipts were issued on the basis of a taxpayer's statement that he had given that much money we have questioned this and asked whether the individual representing the recipient was willing to vouch for the fact that the taxpayer had actually given that amount of money. When the individual involved, the officer in charge of the recipient charitable organization, said he would not give that kind of confirmation because receipts may have been issued in excess of the amount received we have disallowed the claim. We have always considered each individual case on its own merits.

In cases where we have disallowed a taxpayer's claim we have taken the cases to the charitable organizations involved and asked whether they would agree that the amount of money claimed was actually donated. If confirmation is forthcoming we have allowed the complete claim for the donation.

The Carter commission, which has been studying taxation laws in Canada, has been looking into the matter of charitable donations in Canada. Perhaps as my hon. friend suggests it might be better that we have some sort of over-all amount beyond the $100 and allow taxpayers to claim that amount of money as charitable donations.

We shall probably have to wait until we receive the report of the Carter Commission containing their ideas in this regard. However, I should like to impress upon the hon. member for Lapointe that it is the duty of my department to administer the statute as it has been enacted by the Parliament of Canada. It is the duty of my department to make sure that people pay the taxes they are obliged to pay under the statutes and yet treat them as fairly as we can.

Over the past two years since I have been minister I have received many letters from the hon. member for Lapointe. I believe in every specific case the situation has been looked into and the solution which appeared proper has been arrived at. The situations that exist under the Income Tax Act is that it is up to the taxpayer to prove he has paid out a certain amount of money or has made specific donations. We have not in any case questioned the integrity of people except where we felt this was warranted.

If every charitable organization kept an up to date record of individual donations received from people and issued receipts at the end of the year, there would perhaps be no problem whatsoever with regard to charitable donations.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, it is precisely what the minister just said, if the organizations kept a detailed and accurate record of the donations they received, but that is not exactly the way things are done. If the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Pepin), who is now sitting beside the Minister of National Revenue, attends Sunday mass in his church and puts two dollars in the collection plate; he is not going to stop the priest or the churchwarden passing it to ask him for a receipt. And that priest or that churchwarden does not carry a ledger with him in which to write down the amount given by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I belong to a parish where envelopes are used and all this is done quite accurately.

Mr. Grégoire: I might add, Mr. Chairman, that we want to talk about that system of envelopes. Another system is to be adopted, and the Department of National Revenue is wishing it on us, on our churches. A system of envelopes is to be adopted and, assuming we are dealing with the member for Drummond-Arthabaska, his name, his address, his telephone number and a number to identify him correctly will be found on the envelope; we are being driven into making a classified thing out of charity. The name must be given, the telephone number and all. Why should the two thousand year old tradition, with regard to charity be changed, namely that the left hand should not know what the right hand gives?

That is in the Gospel, Mr. Chairman. And yet, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys seems to approve the change in the methods used. Mr. Chairman, everyone does not like those methods, or like that change. That is precisely the crux of the matter: in certain areas or provinces, the circumstances are not the same as elsewhere and this fact is being ignored.

Let us take another example. There are some community organizations with charitable purposes, such as assistance to needy children or others, for instance the Richelieu Club. How are contributions collected? Well, a person is fined $1.00, $2.00, $3.00, but the collector does not have any receipt book and does not give receipts for those amounts. But if you ask certain members of the Richelieu Club, they will tell you that they donate $50 or $60 every year for which they cannot produce a receipt. In some parishes, a parishioner may give $1.00 every Sunday and another member of his family may do likewise, but since no receipts are handed out and there is no system of envelopes, such as in the parish of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, then, it is another $50 or $60 for which the taxpayer has no charity receipt. How can you expect the parish priest to say or guarantee such a thing? These are the conditions that vary according to the areas, parishes or provinces. It is this difference in mentality between areas that should be recognized by the minister. And that is the reason why we are bringing up this problem in order that a solution may be found.

I admit that it is not easy and that the act is there. I cannot say I am in favour of this act that robs everyone through high taxes such as we have today. But the act is there and as long as the members do not change it, it is always there and the minister's responsibility is to enforce it. Just the same, he should not forget the considerations I have mentioned.

The minister was telling us a little earlier: if anyone can prove that he has subscribed to a charitable organization, we will accept that evidence. Is not a receipt issued by a parish enough? Then why do the income tax officials and inspectors insist on cutting down right across the board?

The minister tells us that an investigation is made in each case. Well, I can tell the minister—and I will do it when we consider his next estimates, which should not be so far off—that I will point out cases of parish priests who were never visited or taxpayers who were never investigated but whose receipts for charitable donations were cut down automatically, systematically, uniformly and dictatorially to such an amount. And that exists. I hope that the minister will take these remarks into consideration and not come to us with generalities and forget that differences might exist in the various provinces of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, you will not find my complaint in the gospel but you will find it in the Bill of Rights. I have risen to bring this matter once more to the minister's attention very briefly and ask for the assurance that something will be done to correct this situation in the near future. The question I raise affects the lives of some 2,000 people in my constituency. This problem has been created because of a conflict between the B.C. Hydro and Power Authority and the Income Tax Act and regulations. The minister has been most co-operative in this regard and I know he is having a study made in this matter. I wish to read briefly from a letter written to one of my constituents, the owner of a very excellent farm in the Arrow Lakes area, a first world war veteran who is now 83 years of age. The letter reads:

> Earlier this year you had some dealings with Mr. Ronald D. Grant and our Mr. T. G. Mead as a result of which we understand that you are not willing to allow the Authority to appraise your property unless you are provided with a breakdown of the appraisal. The provision of this would be contrary to our policy and inconsistent with the practice which we have followed in dealing with other owners in the area.
> We are therefore not willing to provide you with such a breakdown. As mentioned to you by Mr. Mead, we feel that our only course is to proceed with expropriation and, in view of our requiring your property in connection with the reservoir clearing scheduled for the spring of 1966, this file has been forwarded to the writer with instructions to proceed to expropriate pursuant to the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority Act, 1964.
> Yours very truly,
> J. N. Holmes
> Solicitor

I raise this matter briefly, Mr. Chairman, because a good number of people in the Arrow Lakes area are very concerned about it. Properties are now beginning to be expropriated and to date these people have refused to accept the appraisal figure because in some cases depreciation of barns, business premises and so on has been claimed. I appreciate what the minister has done to date but I do ask him to let these people have as soon as possible the instructions they should receive from his department because they are very concerned about the situation that exists at the present time.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kootenay West has raised this question with me and my department has tried to do everything possible in order to work out a solution. Of course, I cannot accept responsibility for the administration of B.C. Hydro.

Mr. Herridge: I hope not.

Mr. Benson: I am very pleased that I do not have that honour. However, I should like to assure my friend that we have no authority to force B.C. Hydro to put a valuation on property and the various components that they are expropriating. If they did this it would be much easier for the taxpayers to deal with the matter of receipts they have received and whether or not some part of them, in many cases a small part, would be taxable. My deputy minister has already been in touch with the taxation office in British Columbia with regard to this matter and has instructed them to give every assistance to the taxpayers involved.

If a breakdown between capital items and items which may involve income or recapture of capital cost allowance is not given by British Columbia Hydro we will in each instance try to work out a fair and sound basis as to the various parts of the receipts to be applied to various purposes. We will do this through appraisals or other methods which may be available to us.

5. General administration and district offices, $46,278,100.

Mr. Barnett: I have one or two questions I should like to address to the Minister of National Revenue arising from the fact that his department as of the first of this year assumed a very important new responsibility in the area of collecting contributions for the Canada Pension Plan. I realize that this administrative responsibility stretches across most of the country and involves people in a great many different occupational groups.

First of all, I should like to ask the minister whether, apart from the general information that has been issued in connection with the coming into effect of the Canada Pension Plan, his department has issued bulletins or informational documents dealing with the application of contributions according to any division of occupational groups which would provide definite information to these groups of their position under the plan?

Mr. Benson: Since my hon. friend comes from British Columbia I assume he is very much interested in the fishing industry. I should like to indicate that my department is continuing the work started last fall. Representatives of my department have visited many employers in Canada. I received a delegation from the fishing industry of British Columbia in my office the night before last. I offered to send someone to British Columbia within the next two weeks to look into the situation of the fishermen with regard to whether or not they are self-employed or employees under the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Barnett: The minister appears to be something of a mind reader. He is quite correct when he suggests that what I have in mind at this time particularly is the situation of the fishermen as an occupational group. The minister will recall that when the pension plan was under consideration I, along with other members of the house, suggested that so far as the Canada Pension Plan was concerned fishermen should be in approximately the same position under the plan as they are under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to launch into a debate with the minister on the question of whether or not the plan should be amended in the way I have suggested. I am glad to know the minister is taking steps to look into the situation of the fishermen of British Columbia. Since he has indicated he met some of the fishermen recently, he must be aware of the fact there is no very clear line of definition whether or not a fisherman is an employee within the terms of the act as it stands. I am glad to know that some steps are being taken to clarify this situation. I hope that the clarification of the existing Act will bring some results for the fishermen. Since the minister has given me this information, I will not pursue the matter any further at this time.

PRIVY COUNCIL

10. General administration, $1,098,400.

Mr. Nielsen: I have one quick question, Mr. Chairman, on vote No. 10. I have a motion for the production of papers on the Order Paper, No. 89, which calls for the production of copies of correspondence between the Prme Minister and any minister of the Crown and the Industrial Development Bank at Sudbury and Toronto and replies thereto. I wonder whether the minister can now give me an indication when I can expect production of these papers from the Prime Minister's office?

Mr. Favreau: If I am not mistaken, Mr. Chairman, this matter comes within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Nielsen: I agree that the Industrial Development Bank does but I am calling for the production of papers from the Prime Minister's office. The minister can give me some indication when I can expect this return.

Mr. Favreau: I undertake to take the question as notice and refer it to the Prime Minister.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Privy Council.

Mr. Favreau: I wish to thank hon. members for their co-operation.

LEGISLATION

5. General administration, $1,077,200.

Mr. Peters: It is unfortunate that we are not going to allow the Speaker to make a statement on this item tonight. However, I request that some consideration be given to a written report covering some of the things that are the responsibility of the Speaker and which have been discussed in the past by members of parliament.

• (6:40 p.m.)

I refer to one matter in particular, the arrangements concerning the law clerks which have been discussed in the past. Joint law clerks have not been provided for some time. There may be considerable discussion about this matter and the legislation surrounding it but I think that this and a number of other problems should be brought to our attention in some different way than is normally the case.

There have certainly been great changes here in the last year or two, some good some not so good. I think this matter could be discussed more intelligently by a committee, it being a field that I think members should take a more active part in than they have in the past. I suggest that a report be made to the house on some of the activities in this regard. It would not necessarily need to be discussed but could be dealt with in a different manner from that to which we have been accustomed.

As I say, some of the changes which have been made have been successful. There have been wide investigations and many studies made. Members are familiar in a very abstract way with some of the decisions that have been made. I think there is an interest in this question which could probably be satisfied by making an annual report.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of Legislation. The committee will now proceed to the discussion of the estimates of the Post Office Department.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

1. Postal services including Canada's share of the upkeep of the International Bureaux at Berne and Montevideo, $221,303,000.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask the minister for one assurance. In the Yukon prior to 1957 the Post Office Department's contracts for the movement of mail to and from various communities went to friends of the party which at that time formed the government. After the government changed in 1957 that situation was altered. When contracts for the transportation of mail expired, public tenders were called and the policy adopted was that the lowest tender obtained the contract. This resulted in every case in a saving to the taxpayer of Canada. It was at my urging that this was done.

This situation was carried through so far as I know until 1963-64. The minister will find that his files are well documented with correspondence from myself in which in several cases I decried the practice of patronage in the allotment of these contracts and insisted in all cases that they go out to public tender regardless of whether or not a potential contractor for the carriage of mail belonged to the Liberal party, the Conservative party or to any other political persuasion.

I should like the minister's assurance now, because I have some reason to believe that this may not now be the case, that this practice will be continued in the Yukon. The people there desire it and it is the fair thing to do. It also results in every case in a saving to the taxpayers of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that if there was any patronage within the Post Office Department in the past, it seems to have stopped a few years ago, particularly since I was appointed to that department. I intend to stamp out any patronage I ever discover within the department.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: I am very reassured to hear that statement by the minister. However, so far as the Yukon is concerned, and I speak for my constituency now, in every instance of a contract for the carriage of mail to and from any community will he assure me that in all such cases the contract will go out to public tender on its expiration?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Even if I thought a renewal would be the best thing would the hon. member like the contract to go out to tender?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I think I can assure the hon. member that for all contracts over $5,000, let us say, we have established the policy that they go out to tender. Perhaps instead of a four year term we may make it a five year term so that the contractor has a chance to recoup the money he has invested.

With regard to contracts below this amount, in many cases the contractors have earned their livelihood and have been in this business for 10 or 12 years and are not able to do anything else. If we put the contract out to tender in these cases, most of the time these people would have to underbid their previous price, which I do not think would be a big help to the department because the contracts might not be paying propositions. The tenders might be $200 or $300 below the previous bid and these people would have to struggle for a long time to try and make a living on the small amount earned. I am studying a policy to deal with this matter in a way not only for the good of the department but also for the good of the man who has the contract.

Mr. Nielsen: One final word in this regard, Mr. Chairman. I know it is difficult for the minister to conceive the situation in the Yukon 4,000 miles away. I know that his remarks just now were made in the light of this kind of contract on a national basis where transportation and economic difficulties may confront individuals with these contracts in other provinces and territories which do not confront the contractors in the Yukon. All I am directing my remarks to now is the situation in the Yukon where it is the opinion of the people generally that the only fair way to deal with the situation is to give the opportunity to every Canadian taxpayer to bid on these contracts. The minister will find on a review of the situation in the Yukon that in every case it saves money, the service is not impaired, and so far as I know the individuals never go bankrupt.

Mr. Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Chairman, I have a matter on which I want to speak very briefly. However, it is one which to my way of thinking is important. It is a purely local matter that concerns Hamilton. On three occasions now I have put a question on the order paper about mail delivery between Hamilton and Toronto, Hamilton being Canada's sixth largest city and Toronto being Canada's second largest city and being only 40 miles apart.

A mail service from Hamilton to Toronto takes place approximately eight times a day starting about 6.30 p.m., going through the night and ending at approximately ten minutes to eight in the morning. In other words, in the daytime there is no mail delivery from Hamilton to Toronto during business hours. In the same manner there is one delivery of mail during the daytime from Toronto to Hamilton. Apparently mail is picked up at the Toronto-Hamilton International Airport and stops are made at every small town in between which means that it takes approximately three hours for the run from Toronto to Hamilton.

This situation has caused me to receive a lot of mail in my office complaining about the lack of service between Hamilton and Toronto. Special delivery mail sent out during business hours arrives the next day and is very likely delayed because of the red tape that it goes through. It seems to me it would be of service to the people of Hamilton and Toronto if important documents such as legal documents and the like that normally go by special delivery were delivered during business hours in the daytime.

On inquiry I found that an autobus leaves Hamilton every hour on the half hour. It would seem convenient to have at least one or two deliveries a day of a bag of special delivery mail or even ordinary mail from Hamilton to Toronto. I am not as concerned about mail in the other direction. But I do think that there should be some service whereby special delivery mail from Toronto to Hamilton arrives during working hours.

This situation has been a constant cause for complaint for almost three years. I think the minister might take this into consideration to see if some change could be made in the present system.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I shall certainly do so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I want to raise one small matter on these estimates. It has bothered me for some time and I should like to draw it to the minister's attention. The matter I refer to relates to the low bid system for the carriage of rural mail.

In essence I have no objection to the system because I think it is the correct one and the best that can be devised. The difficulty that arises, arises after tenders are called for mail carriage on a rural route and one tender is so much lower than the others that it is quite obvious that something is wrong with the tender. When such a low tender is received either the person tendering does not know what he is doing and has no knowledge of estimating his costs or he is tendering purposely low in the hope of getting the contract and then applying to the department for an increase. These two situations cause difficulty.

With respect to the first situation where a man does not know what he is doing, I have had occasion in the past to point out several times to the Post Office Department that the low bidder could not do the job and that sooner or later he would either have to abandon his service or else operate such a poor service that the department would be forced to step in. The low bid system has resulted in the authorities saying, "Well, we are sorry but we have to accept the low bid tender. We do not see anything wrong with the man. Nobody knows of anything wrong with his character and therefore we shall have to assume that he knows what he is doing". I think in cases like that the department ought not only to look at the matter twice but the department should in some cases refuse to accept that low tender. I know of several instances where the department has accepted such a tender, the job has been poorly done and eventually the contractor has had to get out, with resultant bad service for a period of weeks or even months. One reason for such low tenders is bad estimating by the tenderer.

Second, sometimes when a person wants to get a contract he hopes he can carry it at a loss for two years, after which time he will apply to the department for an increase. In such cases the department often grants an increase. I think that the position of the department with respect to any contractor who receives a contract through unfair competition by bidding too low should be that such a person should not be given an increase for at least the full term of four years of his contract. I know that in some cases where an increase has been awarded after two years the result has been to the detriment of those people who made a bona fide bid on a fair estimate of the job, because the initial contractor making the low bid took a loss for two years and then was awarded the normal scale again.

I wish to point this out because in both cases I think a contract ought to be refused. It ought to be refused if one bid is a great deal lower than other bids. If in accordance with calculations it is shown that the bid is far too low, the contract should not be given to the tenderer making that low bid.

I have come across this situation several times and I want to draw it to the minister's attention as a policy matter that ought to be considered. Similar problems arise in the Department of Public Works but that is not the concern of this department. The same thing arises where an unreasonably low bidder gets a job. The result is a terribly poor job. It is exactly that sort of thing that happens in the Post Office Department.

I would urge the department to be more careful and to reject these unusually low bids that are obviously not well considered or not bona fide.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I do not usually speak on these estimates and my remarks will be quite short.

First of all, may I congratulate the minister and wish him well in his portfolio. I wish to bring to his attention a situation which has developed over the past two or three years. I refer to the tremendous discontent among postal employees, particularly in large areas across Canada. In many areas where the cost of living or standard of living is higher than in other areas the over-all adjustment of pay has not been sufficient to take care of the every-day needs of post office employees. I am particularly stressing those areas in large industrial centres where wages received by postal employees cannot compare with the wages of industrial employees in that city or area. Consequently there is a tremendous turnover in employment. No sooner has a man been trained as a postal clerk or letter carrier than he makes application to a neighbouring industry and he leaves for higher wages.

I think this matter should be looked into. I realize that His Honour Judge Montpetit is now looking into the various grievances and complaints which have been submitted to him but I do not know for certain whether this area of consideration has been submitted to His Honour for his consideration and recommendation.

I think that because of the tremendous turnover resulting from the dissatisfaction among postal employees something should be done in order to steady the level of employment in this department. If the minister did nothing else but put minds at ease and bring about a situation as close to complete satisfaction as possible for the employees, I think he would have achieved something worth while.

Mr. Flemming: I rise to speak very briefly. First, I wish to congratulate the Postmaster General on having been elevated to his present position and to wish him the good luck which I am sure his good judgment will bring to him.

Next I wish to draw attention to a rural route in my own constituency about which I have written him—the hon. gentleman had the courtesy to give me a nice reply—and to emphasize the fact that in this day and age service three times a week is not good enough for any part of this great country of ours. I thank the minister for his courteous reply and express the hope that this reply will be followed by suitable action.

Mr. McCutcheon: There is one small item which I wish to bring to the minister's attention. It has to do with the smaller post offices in rural areas—I think they are called revenue offices or something of that kind.

Since the new Labour (Standards) Code was brought in, the service at the wicket in many of these smaller places has been curtailed so that employees can enjoy the 40 hour week. In many cases this has meant the public being denied the service to which I believe they are entitled, even though they may be living in a small community. I hope the new Postmaster General, whom I congratulate, will take some steps to see that places such as I have mentioned will obtain an improved service.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Post Office Department for the year ending March 31, 1966.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): May I take this opportunity to thank all hon. members for the great courtesy they have shown during the consideration of my estimates and for the good wishes expressed toward me and my department.

The Chairman: The committee will now proceed to consider the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs, vote one, to be found on page 502 of the blue book.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

1. Departmental administration, $6,694,000.

Mr. Ormiston: I am sure the Minister of Veterans Affairs would like us to expedite consideration of his estimates, as has been done in the case of other departments, but we are dealing, here, with individuals —deserving individuals—and the estimates therefore deserve more than a cursory glance.

However, since the Committee on Veterans Affairs has been most careful in the scrutiny of estimates in the past—and I am sure they will carry out their duties in future in the same manner—I think my remarks can be brief. If the minister continues to adopt the attitude he took in the committee in 1964 when he stated that the Pension Act and the other acts affecting veterans would come up for review by that committee, I do not think he is likely to run into much trouble.

Having said this, I would remind him that the estimates of the department have, in fact, been subjected to very little examination, since no committee was formed in 1965. I would suggest therefore that the minister should reaffirm his earlier statement and assure us we shall have an opportunity to discuss these matters. Such an assurance would be greatly appreciated.

It should be pointed out that we passed the amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act very quickly only three days before the recess and that no groups or organizations were able to make representations concerning this measure. It would I am sure be appreciated if at the same time as they are making other pleas they could be allowed to make representations in connection with the War Veterans Allowance Act as well.

We appreciate some of the actions the minister has taken during the past year. I should like to pay tribute to the members of his staff. He has a wonderful staff not only here in Ottawa but across Canada. When one goes to them for assistance he finds them both competent and obliging. It is only right that these people who work so diligently should receive commendation.

We are sorry that the veterans pension was not raised by 20 per cent rather than 10 per cent, but we shall have another opportunity to discuss this at greater length. We appreciate the fact that a committee was set up to study the Canadian Pension Commission and its interpretation of the act. We realize this matter is more or less sub judice at the moment, but we will certainly welcome this report when it is published and we know the minister will treat its contents with that respect to which they are entitled.

As far as the investigation into the case of the Hong Kong veterans is concerned, I believe this was certainly a wise move. When this report is completed I am sure the minister will give it close scrutiny. This again is a subject which can be discussed in the committee when the minister has the time available.

I wish now to mention a few items which might be reconsidered when the Pension Act comes up for scrutiny. I enumerate them in order to give the minister an opportunity to examine them at his leisure. The first provision in the Pension Act which I would suggest revising is section 2(h). It is a definition of the phrase "dependent condition" and I think it should be reviewed as early as possible.

The next section which deserves scrutiny is section 13(2). We heard a great deal of comment during the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Defence concerning pensions to those who have died in service, and the interpretation which has been placed on the surrounding circumstances. I believe that an analysis of this situation by the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Veterans Affairs in co-operation would prove worth while and would yield beneficial results.

Section 14(4) is a touchy section. It has something to do with social diseases. While it might be indelicate to discuss this section now it is certainly one deserving further scrutiny.

Section 26(a) deals with pensionable children suffering from physical or mental infirmities and I suggest this might also be examined. In respect of any of these pensioners, payments are cut off when they reach the age of 21. For pensioners in the first of the two categories I have mentioned, this presents a difficulty should they be attending a university. It might be a good move to raise the age to 25 years.

Section 35 is one which is capable of misinterpretation. It concerns the estate of a veteran. If it were not for the broadminded interpretation which the commission has placed on this section many widows would be in difficulties. I think this section too would bear scrutiny.

Then there is the section which precludes a pension to a widow or mother on account of personal employment. As the minister probably knows, we have had a case where a widow applied for a pension, but because she was earning a certain amount of money she was ruled ineligible. She promptly quit her job, reapplied for the pension, got it, and went back to work afterwards. While we are certainly in sympathy with the widows of veterans we also have to consider the taxpayers and it might be well that this section be reviewed.

Section 70 is one which is most controversial. Possibly when the report of the committee which is studying the Pension Commission comes out, something will be done in that respect.

Finally, with respect to section 71, I think it is rather unjust for municipalities and provincial governments, when a veteran sometimes finds himself in the unfortunate position of having to receive relief, to try to retrieve the relief payments out of his pension. That is a little ridiculous in this day and age.

I just mention these matters briefly to give the minister an idea of some of the changes we would like to see in the Pension Act. We shall have a chance to examine it in the standing committee, and we shall await with anticipation to see what the minister is going to bring forth.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak briefly because we want to get the new estimates before the house and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. These are important estimates. Expenditures under them affect some four million Canadians composed of veterans, their dependents and relatives.

First I want to thank the minister for his courtesy and the consideration he gave to problems which I brought to his attention. As a Minister of Veterans Affairs we have got a real veteran. I also want to pay a tribute to the officials. In Ottawa, Vancouver, and in my district I have always found them willing to do what they can to assist veterans and their dependents, and advise them wherever possible. Our officials in this department have established a model which a good many welfare organizations would be wise to follow.

I want to make a special appeal to the director of the Veterans Land Act administration. I think I see him somewhere in the distance. I appeal to him to do all he can to protect the rights of veterans who are going to be flooded out owing to the dams being built as a result of the Columbia treaty. I also ask his assistance for veterans not directly his responsibility but who are willing to accept the advice of his officials.

I know of one case where the officials were very effective in assisting a veteran living at Renata. His property was not purchased under the V.L.A. but I got in touch with the minister's officials and they went out and advised this man. The B.C. Hydro Power Authority, which I always term the Hydra-headed monster of B.C., offered this man $14,000 for his property; but after V.L.A. officials visited him B.C. Hydro increased its offer by $4,500. This shows something can be done by advising veterans and discussing matters with other officials concerned.

I know the committee which is surveying the organization and work of the Canadian Pension Commission has not reported yet. I hope to be able to attend one of the committee meetings and make a few observations on the matters it is considering.

We have got the report of the Hong Kong veterans, and I know the government is considering it at present. We have also had the representations from the Royal Canadian Legion and other veterans organizations, representations which were submitted to the cabinet. I know the government is giving consideration to certain amendments to veterans legislation and I do not intend to say more at this time because we are anxious to pass these estimates so that the new ones can come before us and be referred to the standing committee. I hope that standing committee will get to work as soon as possible to hear representations from the veterans organizations, question the officials of the various branches of the department, and make recommendations to the government. I can say on the basis of my 20 years experience on that committee that it has always conducted its affairs in a strictly non-partisan manner.

Mr. Johnston: I wish to urge the minister to consider the whole matter of pensions carefully because we know that pensions awarded after both world war I and world war II are totally inadequate for today's standards. It is essential that some adjustment be made to all pensions. The report on the Hong Kong veterans has amply justified the claims repeatedly made by hon. members in this chamber that these people were worthy of special consideration because of the special nature of their wartime experiences.

Lastly, I would like to say something about those people who have been awarded what used to be called the "burnt out" pension. I realize the department has a euphemistic term for this subsistence pension. It has invariably been small. As these people grow older there builds up in their minds a feeling that once they reach the age of 70, or 69 as it now is, and begin to draw the old age pension, things will be a little easier for them.

It may be wishful thinking on their part but they feel one pension will augment the other. However, when they begin to draw the old age pension, the other pension which they have been receiving is regarded as overly generous and is removed, or reduced, and they find themselves no better off than they have been for many years.

We all realize the old age security pension is grossly inadequate for these people who, by the time they reach 69, are usually in extremely poor health, having existed for many years on the lowest of low incomes. Surely the amounts would not be that large that the two pensions could not be decked, at least until the time the government chooses to raise the old age security pension to the point where it would be more adequate than it is at present. When these veterans hear all the talk about decking other pensions it must be frustrating to them that theirs are not considered in that way. I urge the minister to give this matter serious consideration.

• (7:20 p.m.)

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise a grievance on behalf of one of my constituents, Jack D. Fraser. He was an air force man who was shot down over Germany, was taken prisoner in 1943 and remained so until 1945. After he returned to Canada there were some awards given for maltreatment of prisoners of war. However, he was one of the unfortunate ones and was out of the country at that time. When he returned he was informed that the time had expired in which application could be made. Therefore he did not receive this award. However, he applied to the Royal Canadian Legion and this is what they had to say:

> It is entirely possible that if you had applied to the War Claims Commission when the legislation was still active and the commission still in existence, that you might have had a valid claim to be considered for a prisoner of war compensation,—

I feel it is very unfortunate, as does Mr. Fraser, that circumstances at that time were such that he could not be here. However, not long ago the case of the war prisoners of Hong Kong was reviewed and they received additional benefits. This person was a prisoner of war who had been maltreated in Germany and who was one of the 400 on a forced march, about half of whom were shot down by our own air force.

I find it very difficult to understand why this case could not be reviewed and the circumstances under which he was refused adjusted so that he also would receive these awards which other prisoners of war have received.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Chairman, I have just a few observations I would like to make following the comments of the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke concerning pensions of veterans. We have had different discussions on this matter, we have made requests of the government at different times, and have heard the government talk about raising the old age pension and so on. One of the arguments which has always been brought forward is that it would be pretty expensive, that the government does not have the money to pay $100, and so on, in the form of an old age pension to everyone in this country. I would like the Minister of Veterans Affairs to pay particular attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke. I would like to add that today we have veterans who have served in the last two world wars, and I think if anybody needs consideration and special attention, they are the ones who need it at the moment.

I know that those who have pensions possibly have pensions which do not permit them to have an easy existence or at least they find themselves in the position where they have difficulty living with the pensions which they do obtain. But whether or not they have pensions, these people have served the country. Some of them were overseas for four or five years; they were the ones at that time who actually went over there and risked their skins for us. At that time we called them heroes and today we have a tendency to forget this. While they were overseas working for $1.40 or $2.00 a day, at that time we were here and perhaps had the privilege of taking the best war positions available at that time which paid very good salaries and had the opportunity to establish a future for ourselves—those who were here at that time.

While some of our colleagues, or brothers, and even sisters—but I am speaking particularly about the men—were out at the front, they were there defending their country. I think they have given us the service we had asked of them. We appreciated it at that time. It would be a mark of recognition if we return that service. I believe that one way of doing this would be what I would suggest to the minister today, and that is that, whether or not these people have a pension, they be eligible to obtain the old age pension at age 60 without a means test.

If they lost five years or so from their lives risking their own skins to defend our nation, I think we should do this for them; they are not a majority in the country. I think this would be well regarded by all citizens and that the nation might accept the idea of giving these people at least the benefit of the five years which they gave their country, in the best years of their lives. I would like the minister to take this suggestion under consideration.

I will not speak any longer on this subject during these estimates, but will wait for the new estimates. However, I would certainly appreciate it if the minister would give serious consideration to the suggestion that the government should not invoke the argument that we do not have the means to give everybody $100, and so on. Let us start at the moment by giving all the veterans who have reached age 60 their old age pension without a means test. You might say this is an exception to the rule. Yes, but they were the exception when they had to go over there in 1914-18 and 1939-45 to defend their country. They have done their share and it is up to us to defend them when they need it so much.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I will be brief. I brought up this matter last year in the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs and I rise again to remind the minister and the government regarding the same problem. This is on behalf of the widows of veterans who were less than 50 per cent disabled. Such a widow and her family, upon the death of that veteran husband and father, are immediately cut-off after his death. At the same time widows of veterans drawing more than a 50 per cent disability pension continue to draw this pension after the death of their husbands. Now, there is nothing fair about this. This has been going on too long here in Canada under all governments both Liberal and Conservative.

There is no reason that the widow of a veteran drawing less than 50 per cent disability pension should not continue to draw that small pension—and it is small, Mr. Chairman; I have known some to be as low as $20, $25 or $40 a month. It would be a great thing for those widows to continue to draw the pension, that small stipend, after the death of their husbands.

With the present day high cost of living and the rapid escalation of costs at this time there is a very heavy burden and financial handicap on these mothers and their families. The present policy of the immediate cessation of these veterans pensions upon their death is nothing less than an insult to these deceased men who so nobly served Canada. On behalf of these people I ask the minister of this department to please give early consideration to action in this matter so that the widows and families of men in this category can at least receive this small benefit which they deserve.

Item agreed to.

15. Other benefits including treatment and related allowances, burials and memorials, the training of certain pensioners under regulations approved by the Governor in Council and repayments under subsection (3) of section 12 of the Veterans' Rehabilitation Act in such amounts as the Minister of Veterans Affairs determines, not exceeding the whole of amounts equivalent to the compensating adjustments or payments made under that act, where the persons who made the compensating adjustments or payments received no benefits under the Veterans' Land Act, or where, having had financial assistance under the Veterans' Land Act, are deemed by the minister on termination of their Veterans' Land Act contracts or agreements to have derived thereunder either no benefits or benefits that are less than the amounts of the compensating adjustments or payments, $5,678,000.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word or two about this item in the way of a suggestion to the minister. In my experience I have found there are many veterans of world war II who enlisted in the service at about age 18 and served four or five years overseas, or practically the whole period of the war. Many of them were discharged as being fit at age 25 or 26. As a result of there being no medical disability recorded in their documents they are not eligible for pension or war veterans allowances.

In many cases these men are not and have not been able to cope with civilian life in that they are not properly trained to obtain jobs which would allow them to provide themselves and their families with a reasonable living. Much of this difficulty stems from the stress and strain they experienced during their service and, of course, from the fact that they were trained from a young age as soldiers and are not now properly trained to fit into the economy and re-establish themselves in our civilian way of life. I do not refer to people who have been assisted under the Veterans Land Act or who benefited from special considerations which allowed them to attend university or vocational schools. I refer to the group that did not benefit from any of these excellent schemes who now have difficulty obtaining suitable employment.

I suggest that some assistance should be given to this type of individual in the way of job procurement and guidance in obtaining suitable jobs. I do not suggest that they be given special financial assistance, but that they be helped in obtaining suitable employment through the Department of Veterans Affairs, as such, or in co-ordination with the efforts of the National Employment Service. While it is true that veterans have a preference in civil service competitions, many of these veterans do not wish to become civil servants or perhaps cannot qualify for the positions. They are anxious to obtain assistance in gaining employment in areas in which they live, and I think an effort along these lines would represent time and money well spent by the welfare branch of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Some of these individuals who are unable to cope with the economic problems of civilian life have applied for pensions and have been turned down. They have applied for war veterans allowances and have been turned down. This whole thing involves a long and slow process of appeal and re-appeal and these people become more and more frustrated. I suggest if they had been guided in obtaining suitable employment at an earlier stage, or trained or counselled for suitable employment, this problem might have been solved before it became a major problem from the point of view of these veterans.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item agreed to.

30. Operation and maintenance including authority, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to spend revenue received during the year for hospital, prosthetic and related services, $47,228,000.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, will the minister indicate when he expects the new hospital in Edmonton for chronically disabled patients, who are presently being taken care of at Government House, to be completed?

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Chairman, the most recent information I have in that regard is that it should be ready some time this fall. That seems to be a little early to me but the minister from Alberta indicates that this is quite possible.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That concludes our consideration of the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express my appreciation to this committee, and particularly to those members who congratulated the staff of the Department of Veterans Affairs. I assure them that I will convey those well deserved remarks to my staff. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY

1. Departmental administration, $1,027,500.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister intends to make a short statement in connection with this department before we consider his estimates. If he does intend to do that I will be glad to give way to him.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Mr. Sauvé: That was not my intention, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Flemming: In that event, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief remarks in connection with the estimates of this department. I am fully conscious of the fact that before too long we will have an opportunity to consider the estimates for the 1966-67 fiscal year. I am sure we will also have the opportunity of considering some items of legislation in connection with the ARDA program, during which time we will be allowed to express our opinions.

Let me emphasize the fact that this whole field of forestry receives a limited amount of attention in connection with the affairs of this country, considering its importance to our general economy. At the time of the formation of this department I am sure recognition was given to the fact that much of the activity of the department would be devoted to research and practical needs. I am sure that the federal authorities considered that much of the work of this department would be carried out in conjunction with efforts of the provincial governments, inasmuch as the provinces have control over much of the timberlands, by virtue of provincial control of natural resources. I am sure that the provincial governments have a great deal of indirect influence also, in respect of privately owned timberlands situated in the provinces. It was with that sort of conception that the department came into being, and with the additional knowledge that forestry land contributes raw material to a very large industry in this country, which in turn contributes to a very important extent to the general revenue of the nation.

I have always been amazed by the fact that the export of newsprint in dollars and cents represents one of our greatest single exports. So from the standpoint of preservation and conservation the federal government has naturally a very great interest in forestry. In consequence, Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister deserves and should receive a great deal of co-operation in connection with his most important duties. So far as I am concerned, to the extent of my capability I shall be glad to give him that co-operation at all times.

The ARDA program is also under the minister's control, as is forestry. There is a similarity perhaps in these two programs because in many instances the development of a good deal of the land in Canada is achieved by a crop of trees. Speaking generally about the forestry industry from one end of the country to the other, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, it makes a great contribution to direct employment, indirect employment and helping to solve our balance of payments problem by reason of the fact that we to a great extent export the products of the forest. All in all, Mr. Chairman, I believe these factors make this a most important department. For this reason I believe the minister is entitled to receive from everyone the greatest possible co-operation and assistance.

Looking at the items included in these estimates I find there is the question of forest research and forest products research. It is not my intention to try to elaborate on those subjects; I believe they are understood. I do wish to say, however—and I speak with a great deal of knowledge of this particular point—that I consider the officials of the forestry department at the federal level to be second to none. They are capable and dedicated and I found it a very pleasant duty to work with them. I know the minister is conscious of this fact but I should like to say that I have a great deal of respect for the deputy minister and all the officials of the forestry department.

I might mention at this time, Mr. Chairman, in a general way the programs which the federal government shares with the provinces. I believe they come under about five different headings. One of these programs is that concerned with securing and maintaining a forest inventory. I am quite sure all hon. members will agree with the proposition that to know what we have by way of acreage in forest lands is a very important thing, but I am sure we also need to know what is growing in these areas. In conjunction with the provinces the federal government is concerned with securing inventories and in this way the Department of Forestry is able to maintain up to date figures.

Another matter of concern to this department is that of reforestation, which is perhaps not so important in the province from which I come. It does not seem that reforestation there is necessary because natural reforestation will take care of the situation very well. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the question of forest fire protection because I believe we should protect to the greatest extent possible this most important asset which is essential to our economy. We must protect our forests from fires and, of course, from pests. The more effective control of pests is achieved through research. With regard to forest fire protection, we find that each year we make progress in this direction. We become more efficient in fighting and combatting forest fires for the simple reason that I believe people are becoming more and more conscious of the value of our forests.

The products of our forests are not only valuable to the lumberman but to people interested in wildlife, fishing and recreation. I cannot speak with stronger feelings about the need to preserve this great natural asset which is now under the control of the minister.

Another point I should like to bring to his attention concerns the question of access roads construction in the provinces. This program is carried on by the federal government in conjunction with the provincial governments. It is my opinion that greater publicity should be given to the access roads program and the fact that it is contributed to by the federal government. The purpose of this program is to make hitherto inaccessible areas accessible. When access roads are constructed it is possible to bring timber out to the pulp or lumber mills. However, Mr. Chairman, I believe that in a good many instances in a good many provinces it is not known to the industry in general that this program for the construction of access roads is available.

I would suggest to the minister that at the appropriate season of the year he urge the provincial governments to publicize to the industry in general the fact that a program of this nature is available, and people concerned in the forest industry should be asked to submit applications pointing out where roads might be constructed in order that timber might be made more accessible than heretofore. There are areas in which it is not economical to harvest the timber but if an access road were built, to which the federal government contributes 50 per cent of the cost, the operation might become economically feasible. I suggest that the minister consider this point.

Next I should like to deal briefly with the question of stand improvement. I believe stand improvement is most important because in so many instances—and I know something about this matter from personal knowledge—we need to weed out trees in much the same way as we need to weed out carrots in the garden in order to grow a large, full crop. This has to be done in connection with stand improvement and trees, just as it must be done in the garden but on a different scale. In my opinion programs of this type in regard to an industry which contributes and will continue to contribute to the economic life of this country are acknowledged by all of us to be very important.

As I said at the outset of these remarks, Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to speak at length at this time. When the minister's estimates for the next fiscal year come before us I shall then have the privilege of making some suggestions to him, which I hope he will consider.

So far as I am concerned, the minister has always been extremely kind, courteous and anxious to help. I appreciate the co-operation I have received from him. The minister has always been anxious to make a definite contribution in his official capacity and in his personal capacity. I believe other hon. members will deal with the ARDA program in a little more detail. I would point out to the minister that I have not dealt with the ARDA program at length not because I do not think it is important but simply because the question of ARDA will be brought to the minister's attention very forcibly by other hon. members before the evening is over. For this reason I decided to confine my remarks largely to the question of forestry.

• (7:50 p.m.)

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to answer the speech delivered on February 2 by the minister, when he replied to the one I had delivered the day before.

I always found it regrettable that the minister chose to speak during the last hour of the day, during the last part of the sitting, because I did not have the opportunity to answer immediately.

Since the hon. member who spoke before me referred to forestry, I shall deal with ARDA. I am sure that all those concerned consider that, ARDA although it is said to be a very small thing, should be a great project for the province of Quebec, a project which is considered by us as the department of eastern agriculture. That is what ARDA means to us, in Quebec. And that is the reason why we want to fight for this legislation introduced by the Conservative party and which we do not want defiled by the the Liberal party.

Mr. Chairman, on February 2, the minister proved that he had not understood my speech one bit. Of course, I have neither the sources of information nor the staff that are available to him to scrutinize speeches, nor the newspapers that have sold themselves to his party, nor television commentators to criticize. Therefore, I only want to take a few moments to tell the minister how sorry I am he has failed to understand me.

I merely want to draw the attention of the minister on a group of "provincialists" using ARDA for cheap politics. The Liberal party is allegedly promoting patronage, but it is a kind of shameless patronage the likes of which has never been seen in the province of Quebec. That is why I did not beat around the bush in my speech. I finally wanted the minister to see through that group which is trying to pull the wool over his eyes about what is going on in the province of Quebec. Unfortunately, the minister did not see my point. He accused me of being unfair to him, but I was not attacking him personally, I only wanted to protect him.

As he stated, the ARDA program comes in the first place under the provincial authorities. That I can understand, and I would not hold the minister responsible for this "provincialist" group. That is what I want to prevent.

I wish to tell him also that he did not disprove my statements. I do not know whether it is all by himself or with his whole group that he plays around to such an extent with the words and figures in my speech in order to criticize it. I accuse him of having made an unfair criticism of my speech. If it had been my first speech on ARDA, it would not be so bad, but I have made more than five, six, seven speeches on the subject, as he said himself.

I have always said, in my riding, that ARDA was first the responsibility of the provincial government. The federal legislation only gives a statutory grant as its contribution to the ARDA program.

As the Minister himself said in his speech, this is the first time I interfere, and my reason is that I did not want ARDA to take on just any project, but to begin with the first work to be done, that of draining and developing the land.

I have always felt that ARDA had been created to develop the farmlands. Is this true or not? Land is developed in order to improve farmlands, not Crown lands. For 40 years money has been spent on Crown lands while farmlands have been neglected. The grants are meant for farmlands. However, the farmers leave their land because the grants meant for them are used elsewhere.

I have been sincere, I have spoken frankly. I have not done any juggling. I simply wanted to draw the situation to the minister's attention. For instance, when I said to him that a sum of $50,000 had been voted, the minister accused me of exploiting the economic and social survey. What I said is this economic and social survey was exploited for political purposes. Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is what I said and I add that the minister and his group have not disproved anything contained in my speech. This $50,000 was given to the "C.E.R." I did not say that it was in my region, that it was his men or himself. I used the words: $50,000 was spent.

Under ARDA, political committees were formed such as that of the Mistassini valley, in which a sum of $50,000 was sunk—

Consequently, this $50,000 was not spent in Mistassini, but it was given to the "C.E.R." This $50,000 was used, as I say, for politicking. I am right once again and, in addition to being right, I have the proof here. This $50,000 is used for politicking purposes. I do not blame the minister for this but, once again, I want to make him aware of what is happening in the province of Quebec.

The "C.E.R." includes the four counties in our area. Back home, we paid—not that I am against it, mind you, Mr. Minister—$15 per day per person to make the survey. But let that be known. The investigators went from house to house saying: "I am doing this free of charge."

But I am going to prove to you there were quarrels, that some people were fired because of those investigations, because they made the investigations 10, 12 and 15 days before election day. That is the danger. And more than that, Mr. Minister, I am going to tell you that the one who was in charge of the survey was my political opponent. Did you know that?

He was my political opponent. I spoke about that with the secretaries and the presidents, especially with the secretary to the "C.E.R." Petitions were addressed twice to my opponent in order to get him to resign from the "C.E.R." because I did not want petty politics to be mingled with the "C.E.R." In fact, it is a too well organized board to be used against progress. I do not want any petty politics in the "C.E.R." Petitions were addressed to my Liberal political opponent in order to make him leave the "C.E.R.", to have him resign as director of the "C.E.R." and that was done as soon as he entered politics. That was normal, absolutely normal. As for me, when I entered the political field, I was asked to resign as chairman of the school board. I resigned willingly, as I did not want any conflict between the two.

He was asked to but did not resign. I knew he would never agree to resign, because I know him; he likes playing politics too much to get out of there.

Two petitions for his resignation failed to get him out of the "C.E.R.". The whole network of investigators was set up by him and it is nothing but a political outfit. And I can prove it. I went to my office to pick up letters. I will bring them to you if you wish; they contain bitter complaints about you. I told them the minister was not responsible for that; cheap and dirty local politicians were behind this.

This is what I wanted to bring to the minister's attention. Unfortunatley, you did not understand what I meant.

Then, after I referred to this door to door canvassing—as you know, they did not forget to canvass from door to door—you said I had mentioned 1,000 workers. They were political workers highly paid out of Liberal election funds. You are playing upon figures when you suggest that a thousand men could not be paid $15 per day with $50,000. There may be an omission in the reporting. Besides, I found two or three mistakes in that official report. To be tactful, I did not dare ask in the house to have a correction made. Anyway, the thousand workers were paid from Liberal party election funds. And you know that they do have an election fund. And do you know where it comes from? I hardly need to say more. The thousand people were paid after that survey. That is why I said it was simply unfair. The fact is that it is unfair and dishonest to proceed in this fashion whatever party is involved. That is why I say putting to such use a sum of $50,000 intended for a worthy purpose was a misuse of money.

So it is also in the blueberry fields. When I speak of the blueberry fields, do you think I am against them? However, I am against political patronage in the blueberry field business. They are all liberal contractors.

If you do not have "the grit label" you do not get in. This is what I am against. And the proof is that there is no more money to be made. Look at Mr. Belzile, he is no longer there, he is gone. All the others will go too. I shall give the names of all those "patronage boys"; I have them all.

That is why I tell you that the blueberry patches are doomed as long as they remain mixed up with politicking. That is all. This situation should be blown open. The farmers should be consulted. Do you think that this is how a blueberry patch is run, with so-called farmers? Ten farmers and 110 city folks are taken from a community and that is supposed to be a blueberry union. Those are blueberry growers' syndicates. Look at the lists. You have to pay $5, so that all the boys from the cities are in those syndicates. When there are ten Liberals in a parish, they take all ten of them and have them join the blueberry growers' syndicate.

I want to be frank. If you are honest, have an inquiry made into those famous blueberry bogs.

I wanted you to pay attention, because you seemed to be asleep. I made a seventh speech since, but no action was taken. You should have seen the crop last year: there were no blueberries last year. In addition to that, the "patronage boys", as we call them back home, were there, in the camps, waiting to see if there would be any customers so that they could ask 50c per basket from them. It was absolutely scandalous. We must put an end to that. ARDA has programs which would enable the farmers to raise their standard of living. But no, everything is taken away from them, they are poorer than ever. In fact, they are being deprived of their livelihood. City dwellers are moving in in droves. Imagine: doctors, notaries, at the head of blueberry pickers unions. Well, that is what we have back home. Come and see. And then people say: "Here now are the farmers". I say they are "would-be farmers".

Mr. Grégoire: It is the rural upheaval.

Mr. Gauthier: The rural upheaval. I wanted to call the minister's attention to the matter of the $50,000 and the 1,000 political workers.

Then, further on, you say in a somewhat angry tone that the hon. member for Roberval does not seem to know his own riding.

If there is anyone who knows something about the land, about farming, blueberries and our land resources it is your humble servant, as I have been head of an experimental farm for nine years. When you visit my riding, do not go and see the notaries or the doctors, but come and see me. I shall take you to see farm lots and farm lands. You shall see them; you shall see some. I will help you to work for the farmer, not petty politicians.

You make a mistake when you say that the member for Roberval does not know his own riding. You were not being very nice to me. I received several letters from people in my riding. They wanted me to give them to you but I threw them in the waste basket. You must not tell the people in my riding that I do not know my riding. You make a mistake when talking about blueberry farms you say:

> The crown land used for blueberry farms are, in most cases, low yield forests which offer very little farming possibilities. Let us take for instance the blueberry farm at St. Augustin in the riding of Roberval."

Well, Mr. Minister, I am sorry but St. Augustin is not in the riding of Roberval. That blueberry farm is not in the riding of Roberval. When I give figures, when I mention localities, they are in the riding of Roberval, because I know them. Now, when your so-called experts tell you:

"Those tracts of land have little value," you say here about them:

> A yield of only $8 to $10 per acre may be expected from those forests in their present condition, whereas turned into blueberry bogs, they could yield about $130 an acre.

You have certainly been misled because I visited those lots and some farmers there were aghast. They wondered how the government could allow such a waste of land.

When they talk about the yield per acre, they are laying waste forests 15, 16, 18 years old and in a forest of that age, cordwood of good quality can still be found. Up to 22 cords per acre have been obtained. And they are said to be lands worth $8 and $10 an acre. But now their value will come down to $8 an acre. As it is they will produce nothing; indeed, nothing will ever grow there, and you can be sure of that.

I just wanted to say this: when you talk to them, to those city people as they are called, you will simply tell them that the sort of fires which they have set in the woods make it impossible for blueberries to grow. Blueberries grow in the woods, there must be woods if there are to be blueberries, there must be trees if there are to be insects.

Further, there is a three-mile desert. The trees are burnt; nothing will grow there anymore. Not a single fly will be there and it is especially the fly, the insect, which helps to pollinate the blueberry flower. Not a single fly will be able to survive.

There will be blueberries for another two or three years, because things grow right after a fire. But come and see me in four or five years; there will be no blueberries at all then.

I was raised there and I know under which conditions blueberries will grow.

An hon. Member: Are they good blueberries?

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, they are, and if you want some you will have some, but you have to know how to make them grow.

Now, I shall not take up any more of your time. I have other things to say, but I shall wait until the next estimates. I merely wish to say I regret that you interpreted my remarks that way. I hope you will not bear me any grudge. As for me, I am not the grudge-bearing type at all. I think we shall get along fine together on this and continue to work for the future of our province.

• (8:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Chairman, I almost did not remain long enough to speak, because I got hungry for a good dish of blueberries. However, there is one matter that I feel I should raise at this time when these estimates are called, and that is the matter of ARDA.

ARDA is getting to be such a frequently used term, or word, that it is almost dangerous to bring it up, for fear that people will start yawning in your face. If there ever was a program that in the last few years has been oversold it is the ARDA program, not in the area so much of land reclamation or alternate land use but in an area that has received a great deal of publicity, and one that is extremely important in Canada today, that of community development.

I think for any members in the house who represent ridings that can be described as encompassing areas of rural poverty, ARDA must hold some singular and important hope because embodied in the ARDA concept, at least as it was originally envisaged by the Conservative government, is the belief that there are things that can be done of a constructive and progressive nature in rural areas to revive people in these depressed rural areas so that they may have reasonable hope.

I live in a constituency which, very soon after the introduction of ARDA, became concerned with this problem. As far back as two years ago, Prince county was declared a designated area for rural development. I think the minister knows this county. We have felt, particularly since that time, that we have good reason to hope that in the program of community development certain important things would happen.

I think, to be very honest, one of the things that has made it difficult for constructive things to happen in this area has been the great deal of fuzziness in negotiations between the federal and provincial governments; sometimes there has been some downright "buck passing." However, what concerns me most of all is twofold: First of all, I think we have waited far too long to define a clearcut policy of how community development is actually going to proceed at the very local level, with the people themselves. It seems that the whole concept of community development will never achieve very much unless communities that began to participate in this program have some idea of what kind of policy is in fact laid down by the federal authority.

Second, and equally important, and possibly even more unclear, is the problem of training competent people to carry out leadership in local areas. For quite a while now there has been talk about people designated as community development officers. It was only when we began to look around for people suitable for this job, that it was found they were an extremely rare animal. There are not many people in Canada today whom one could designate as being community development officers. In fact, I do not think that there are people being trained who would be suitable for that position.

In Prince Edward Island we have been very fortunate to have a man who could be called a pioneer, in the person of Mr. Rudy Dallenbach. He has had considerable experience, and I am happy to call him a personal friend. He has in his own very practical way begun to instil among the people of Prince Edward Island a certain confidence. That is the important thing, and the basic concept of community development. He had not any government policy to bring about this desired result.

One of the things that I feel is exceedingly dangerous, and which is increasing in the whole ARDA program, is that we are talking about bigger and bigger amounts of money. Almost one year ago now a new fund was envisaged euphemistically entitled FRED.

I hold no quarrel with $50 million, and certainly not when it is related to a province annually looking to the federal government for assistance. What I really mean to lead up to is this that we could so emphasize this large amount of money, and others like it, that we do not take the time and trouble to think seriously about how we are going to get the tens and hundreds of people in the field who will be community development officers.

We must assume that we have no institution in Canada at the moment that can reliably prepare anyone to be a Community Development officer. In all likelihood I do not think that there is a suitable institution in North America that can provide us with this kind of trained person. Therefore I think it is necessary at the earliest possible date that the Department of Forestry and the new department of forestry and rural development envision a program for the training of community development officers. Very little will happen in Prince Edward Island or anywhere across the country unless we are going to put trained and competent people in this field.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, my remarks to the minister will be focused on two major points. The first one is to deal with this question of rejection of projects. The minister has declared in the house on several occasions that all projects under ARDA have to be submitted by the provinces.

The inference is, of course, that the federal authorities have no initiative to make suggestions or to propose projects in any province. I believe that the minister has done this from a previous commitment to himself that he is a provincial righter. In fact, from the way the operations are going on today, unwittingly, the minister has made himself into, one of the most effective anti-provincial righters that we have seen. I put this criticism to him in a particularly constructive fashion, because I am sure that he would not willingly try to destroy the initiative of a province.

Yet what actually happens? When the provinces submit proposals to the minister at Ottawa they are then met with the suggestion that the federal government officials will examine the project under consideration to see if it fits into their criteria of what the federal government has already done, and how things should be done.

You have the situation where the government of one province, under its philosophy, comes in and is ready to do things. I do not want to talk about socialistic philosophy because that is the province's privilege if it wishes to do it that way.

Another province believes in doing things by enlisting the tremendous enterprise of the private individual, either in reform of an individual farmer or that of a businessman or groups of businessmen. The particular cases in point to which I refer are the provinces of Quebec and Manitoba. The province of Quebec at the present time, although this is a generalization and not true in all cases, tends to look on the government as the source of inspiration. That is their right. I would support the minister and defend his right to say that the province of Quebec should carry out these projects in the way it thinks best. Yet in Manitoba which is in a similar position to Quebec as far as wealth is concerned—slightly below the national average—when we try to express a philosophy in the interests of the business world as well as of the farmers on the basis of plans put forward by competent and aggressive civil servants, we find our proposals clamped into procedures established by officials here.

This criticism is not aimed just at this minister or this government. It has been applicable to all governments for many years. Over the years, as this country has grown and as government at both provincial and federal levels have moved increasingly into the affairs of the community, the federal government still acts as though all things had to be settled by officials here as if all wisdom was centred here in Ottawa. This attitude extends right from Treasury Board to the officials responsible for the ARDA program who are stultifying and limiting the rights of individual provinces to produce projects which will accomplish redevelopment in their own way.

By his continual statements that all projects must be proposed by the provinces the minister has unwittingly allowed a system to develop where all these proposals are put into a stereotyped form and under which the provinces are given no real freedom.

Let me go back to the original thinking which was demonstrated when I introduced the ARDA legislation. I emphasized on three occasions that the provinces were to be considered as the main proposers of projects, but that the federal government must always reserve its right to initiate projects. The reasoning is simple. We have a number of provinces which as far as I can see will not be generating many proposals of their own. The reason is twofold. First there is the lack of finance and, second, it is the custom of their civil services to wait until someone else has come along with proposals. For these reasons I believe that when it sees an opportunity to improve certain of these areas the federal government would be well within its rights to propose projects to this end as part of the federal-provincial co-operation which is envisaged.

I would ask the minister to think this matter over. If he is trying to strengthen the provinces, as I wish to do, he should allow them the privilege of putting their proposals forward and carrying them out in their own way. The limit of the federal government's control over the provinces should be on the financial side, which is set up according to a formula. The only other question is whether or not a project comes under the broad umbrella of ARDA development or rehabilitation in any sense. I think we can trust the provinces to act within such a framework. If they do not act within this framework then it could be said by the federal government at the end of the year: You have infringed the understanding you gave. Then the chalk should be put to any future developments of that kind.

We must seek to develop real provincial autonomy. Inadvertently, I think, this has been hindered by the insistence that the schemes should come from the provinces and then meet criteria set up by officials here. In cases where provinces are strong and aggressive they can fight back. But even when they are strong and aggressive, as Manitoba and Quebec are, the criterion should be whether their projects, however they may differ in direction, are designed to result in the development of their areas.

The second matter on which I intend to speak involves the question of funds. The minister announced about a year ago that he had available $100 million, I think it was, which was to be distributed in accordance with a certain formula and that he had $50 million in respect of which no formula would be applied. I would like to urge again that as far as this $50 million is concerned the federal government take the initiative and say to some of our provinces—I am thinking now of the four Atlantic provinces: In your case we are willing to pay 75 per cent, 80 per cent or even 90 per cent of the cost of projects of this type in your area. I am sure the provinces which are reasonably near the national level of prosperity, or above it—British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Ontario, for instance—would understand if the minister were to say to them: I should like to give to these other areas a disproportionate share of this money because they are the areas most in need of help from the ARDA program. I am bearing in mind that even though Quebec and Manitoba are below the national average as far as wealth is concerned they have aggressive governments and aggressive civil servants who are fighting on behalf of their people.

This type of approach would, I believe, be in the spirit of ARDA and would greatly help in developing programs in the areas to which I have referred. I say this to the four Atlantic provinces with respect. But I believe the federal initiative should be used there more widely than in any other region.

Mr. Loney: Unlike my colleague from Prince who spoke of larger and larger amounts expended in connection with the ARDA program I wish to speak briefly about what in my area appear to be smaller and smaller expenditures.

I do have a few words of appreciation to express to the minister on behalf of my constituency. I refer specifically to the ARDA program now being developed in Johnson's Harbour in St. Edmunds township. This envelops an area of approximately 13,000 acres and involves an expenditure of some $130,000. I must be somewhat cautious in my words of appreciation. I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that this development is in an area where the previous administration had planned to establish a national park involving an expenditure of approximately $5 million.

On behalf of the people living in the immediate area of St. Edmunds township there are one or two points I wish to draw to the attention of the minister. Where there are pockets of arable land which could be component parts of a viable unit I would urge that people now residing on these parcels of land be given every opportunity to remain. If they decide in the course of several years to remove themselves from the property and yield it to the program, the necessary arrangements should be phased over a period of years.

In the announcement from Ottawa concerning this project it was mentioned that some five area development officers would be employed. I would point out that there are people living in this immediate area who are very familiar with the geography and the physical components of the township and I would ask the minister to give every consideration to the employment of these people. I would also ask that where there are existing facilities and public transport these should be maintained over as long a period as possible and that some kind of reimbursement be given to the municipality in lieu of assessment.

• (8:30 p.m.)

We are well aware of the fact that over a period of years, as this program expands and the economy of the immediate area improves, this could be phased out, and I think the provincial authorities should take this under consideration.

Also when dealing with ARDA, on behalf of the ARDA group within the county, I would like to present the minister with these two petitions which I will read. The first states:

Since the development of water reservoirs through valley conservation authorities require 25 per cent of the funds to come from the municipalities where the reservoirs are located, the ratepayers in most cases do not have this extra money and the return in this investment is too far distant in the future to expect the ratepayers to make the initial investment. Therefore we, the ARDA Committee of Bruce County, request that funds be made available through ARDA to bear the cost of establishing water reservoirs in municipalities for recreation, conservation, ground water level improvement and general rural improvement.

This petition has been signed on behalf of the committee by John Black, Chairman, and G. R. Gear, Secretary.

The second petition is brief and I would also like to put it on the record. It reads:

We, the ARDA committee of Bruce County, request that some clearance be made re: designated area in Bruce County "tax concession to industry located within the area" and that it include all of Bruce County instead of just a portion.

That concludes my brief remarks, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to hear remarks being made about agriculture on the estimates of the Department of Forestry. The changes which have taken place in the responsibilities of this department indicate the lack of need for the development of the department in the first place. It has a number of buildings and has hired quite a large staff, but we hear very little from the forest industry about the federal department. That is probably only to be expected.

In my opinion ARDA should be returned to the Department of Agriculture. Its very name, Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development, gives an indication of its purpose. If it were forestry rehabilitation and development it might well come under the forestry department, but it is not.

I agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle in his assessment of the scope and role of ARDA. Though expenditure under the program jumps from $12 million to $16 this year, I believe the program really has not started yet, and under no circumstances has it really been made a national program. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle had something to do with the vision of ARDA, and many people believed it would be a long-range program that would solve some of the problems of rural development.

Many people believed that a survey would be made of agricultural lands across the nation, that a survey would indicate the type of land that should be reforested, the type that should be added to agricultural areas, and the type that should be put into other uses. The provinces are using ARDA for the development of parks, reclaiming marshland and improving marginal land, but no real national survey has been made.

The minister and his predecessor have considered ARDA as a give-away program, for providing money for the provinces, instead of a program for agriculture, for the proper use of agricultural land, and for the rural use of land. If the minister does not believe this, then he should return to the idea of a survey, cataloguing the land in various areas, and making suggestions to the provinces for its use. It is not good enough to say, "We will approve this project in Ontario, that one in Quebec, and another one in B.C." It is of vital importance to the agricultural industry that proper use be made of all agricultural land.

The federal department has a staff capable of assessing the potentialities of various areas and deciding on programs for their development. Far-ranging progress could be made that way, instead of through municipalities and small groups of people forwarding projects for approval by the department.

When the minister of the day was first outlining ARDA he said there were many areas near Ottawa where submarginal land could be catalogued and returned to forest production. He said this should be done on a large scale, that there would be mass displacement of people, that one man could look after several thousand acres of reforestation, that it would be a long-term project, and the outlay would be considerable. This was accepted as a good idea by the majority of people across Canada.

It was suggested that in other parts of Canada marginal land could be turned into wildlife parks. In western Canada large areas were to be amalgamated in blocks of land to provide grazing for cattle.

What happened to this project? I think the minister can be given a great deal of credit for the operations of his department, that they have stayed parochial and provincial, but even at that level it is difficult to find leaders for ARDA in rural areas, to find out the best use of a particular piece of land that is not producing suitable income for the families living on it, and how to return lands to production.

Mr. Chairman, if this is not the proposition, if ARDA really is not the long range solution for agriculture, then let us all sit down and design a new program that will provide the solution. I believe in the idea of ARDA; I believe in the concept that originated it, but I have heard some pretty crack-pot ideas come from some of the provinces. Once a project is approved in the province, automatically it is approved by Ottawa because Ottawa has no standard to put against it; either they agree with it or not, because Ottawa has not developed any projects of its own. They have depended on the provinces and even on the municipalities to do the deciding.

Agriculture, as we were told the other day by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, is in a time of crisis. I think this is true. I am not going to point out how many of the farmers are getting less than substandard wages. I think earlier the question was asked by the Minister of Finance whether he intended to go into the problem of the deficit income tax proposals. I do not know whether or not he thought about it, but certainly the Minister of Forestry, if he is going to administer ARDA, is going to have to think about it, because we have to do something for the farmers who are not able to move off the farm.

The average farmer in Canada is over 50 years of age and is not capable of being retrained, despite the fact that he violently opposes being retrained or moved out of his environment. For this reason, if the ARDA program is to be successful, it will have to provide a blueprint or a long range program which will give hope for the future of the agricultural industry and make possible the development of economic units in the agricultural areas so that it can re-use or redevelop all lands that are not capable of producing enough revenue to keep the farmer on the land. These lands will have to be handled in another way.

I do not know what the minister has in mind about this program; I do not know whether or not he has been interested in it. I hear that the minister is very progressive, but I have yet to see this. This is certainly the best field in which he could show that he is progressive, because I believe this is a field where there should be some development to help solve much of the problem we have in rural Canada. I think the machinery is here. There is no limit to the amount of money which can be paid under this type of scheme. I believe if the minister really looks at the number of farmers he has helped by the rehabilitation program we already have undertaken, he will see that the price is exceptionally high for the amount of rehabilitation he has been able to provide.

I think the minister also will see that we have been able to accomplish very little in terms of redevelopment of agricultural land by use of the projects which have been paid for under ARDA to date. If the minister wishes to be progressive, if he wants to show that he is one of those three leaders from the province of Quebec who wanted to join the N.D.P. because they did not think that party could be elected and therefore joined the Liberal party instead, if he wants to get into this class, then I would like to see him start showing it. I think this is an excellent place to do it and I say this sincerely. If he really believes agriculture can be helped, that agriculture can be changed, that the redevellopment of marginal farms can be accomplished without major dispersement of the agricultural communities, and if he wishes to find a way to help the farmer, I think he will have to think about what a farmer is, what the family farm is, and what the relationship is between those people who live in a rural and urban economy. He will have to understand why those who are in the rural area choose that environment.

Let us not kid ourselves. Many of us choose a rural environment although we are not farming. Most of the developments in the suburban areas are in areas which were rural a few years ago. The fact is that people moved into the suburbs because of a desire to be in that environment and the desire not to live in somebody's backyard; but it is not the desire to live like a farmer who gets up at six o'clock in the morning, milks the cows, cleans out the henhouse, gathers the eggs, and does the other menial tasks, and then finds he has not enough money to buy the kids' shoes. It is not the lack of income which the farmer likes and it is not the work the farmer likes, but rather the environment; and in my opinion this environment will have to be improved to provide people in Canada with the choice to live in a rural environment with an opportunity to have a decent standard of living.

The minister might consider this proposition in ARDA, because we have an opportunity there where we could take some of the people in the sub-marginal areas and apply a standard of living of $3,000 net for the farmer. If he does not earn that amount, when he files his income tax we pay him; if he makes more than that, we collect from him.

This would be much better than putting the farmer off the farm. You are putting him off the farm now, not through ARDA but because of the agricultural policies of the government; and you are putting him in the city and providing him with welfare. Every person connected with municipal councils will know that in the major cities, in Ontario at least, people who are living in the city have their welfare expenses charged back to the community from where they came. The solution is not simple; it is very complicated, but I do think the federal Department of Forestry, if it wants to administer ARDA, is going to have to work nationally toward a way to deal with this problem.

We have, in agriculture, to resolve the problem of the rehabilitation and redevelopment of agricultural lands into economic units. There may be projects of the federal government of this nature which might indicate that some progress has been made to develop programs; but I have had discussions with officials under a previous minister and I am of the opinion that there was no federal plan at all in any way, shape or form, except these projects which are originated in the provinces, if they look like they are doing anything in the agricultural field or in the field of rural environment, because you certainly could not call a swamp an agricultural potential. ARDA will go in and make a wildlife park out of the proposition.

[Mr. Peters.]

It is difficult for me to relate these things. This did not seem to bother anybody administering ARDA. I have not really been aware of any national projects they have engaged in to even set a pattern of how it was going to work. I listened with a great deal of interest years ago to the minister of agriculture who introduced this particular act. I felt at that time that his ideas were visionary and that some consideration should be given to them. I am sure the present minister will reply to the many statements of criticism that have been made in respect of the application of ARDA either during this debate or at some other appropriate time. I hope he will give us the assurance that if ARDA is to be continued it will not consist of handouts to the provinces, with handouts by the provinces in turn to the municipalities. I hope the program will be designed to fit into the redevelopment of the agricultural industry across Canada and provide some assistance to and solution for the problems of those provinces that have not yet considered the ARDA program in all its ramifications.

It is my hope that the minister will provide great leadership in this program of great potential to the agricultural communities across Canada. Surely we are aware of the problem this industry faces relating to the lack of money and the inability to establish economic units in this nation. I am sure some hon. members will disagree with me in this regard, but it seems to me that the inability of this nation to provide subsidies to agricultural producers in this country has left the majority of this portion of our population in an unattractive economic position. Surely this country should be able to provide the farmers of the nation with a reasonable standard of living equal to that enjoyed by their brothers living in urban society. This has not as yet been accomplished and can only be accomplished by a federally developed agricultural program that will make it possible for farmers to receive the greatest return possible for their efforts.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, the agricultural field is one which requires economic planning. Reforestation must be taken into consideration in the over-all agricultural picture, because this really could make a difference to the farmers. They do not really care much whether they are milking cows or cutting Christmas trees, as long as they are making a decent living. I hope the minister has given this whole subject sufficient consideration and will be able to come to the committee with plans for the future. Perhaps he will give us an added bonus by telling us whether he expects to remain with this Department of Forestry, or whether we should point our guns at another minister of another department who will in the end become responsible.

Mr. Webb: I wonder whether the hon. member who has just resumed his seat would permit a question?

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to rise on a point of order?

Mr. Webb: I should like to ask the hon. member who has just resumed his seat whether he would admit that the province of Saskatchewan, of which the leader of his party was premier for a number of years, is afflicted with the most serious agricultural problem existing in any province of Canada, and that the plight of the farmers there is worse than in any other province? Would the hon. member give us his reasons for this situation?

Mr. Peters: I appreciate the question and the preamble, Mr. Chairman, but I must disagree entirely with the conclusions drawn. I am sure the hon. member has many opportunities to speak with representatives from the province of Saskatchewan and should know that the agricultural commodity produced in Saskatchewan is not really related to the ARDA program. The product of Saskatchewan farms is largely related to grain and beef. I would suggest that the farmers of that province have benefited not only from farm assistance legislation introduced by the leader of my party when he was premier, but from favourable weather conditions in that province. However, if the farmers in Saskatchewan are in difficulties in respect of their beef and grain production the ARDA program is not in my opinion going to help.

In view of what the hon. member has suggested, I hope that he will carry on further discussions with some of the other members from his province in order to gain an appreciation of the large amount of revenue that has been received in that province from the agricultural field. I think he will agree then that we in the province of Ontario have a different problem from that mentioned by the hon. member. It was not my intention to present that problem to the Minister of Forestry.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 1 carry?

Mr. Webb: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. member if he will answer my question.

The Deputy Chairman: I recognize the hon. member for Mégantic.

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer the question by indicating that the province of Saskatchewan—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I have recognized the hon. member for Mégantic.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Chairman, after hearing all these questions and answers, I must say I feel this matter is almost as complicated as trying to find out who is in charge of the feed grain agency.

When you look into the matter, you almost have to look in a crystal ball in order to find out which department is responsible for it. I see here that it comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Forestry, under Item No. 10.

So, it is quite puzzling. When you want to discuss the Canadian Wheat Board, you must refer to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp). For the feed grain agency, one must speak to the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé), and when cultivation and agriculture are to be discussed, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) is the one to be consulted; although the two other matters concern agriculture.

It is somewhat confusing, but I hope that there will be no drastic or sudden change in the future, so that we may get used to that procedure.

I would like to make a few representations and put some questions to the minister, especially since there is nothing new about the matter. I have spoken several times about it and I think that the minister himself had the opportunity to give some explanations and even make a few corrections in the house.

We had the opportunity this week to meet the delegates of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I asked them if they had heard about the feed grain board. They had not. When the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Latulippe) put a question to the minister, the Chair ruled it out of order, stating that it was an important but not very urgent matter.

I should like to take this opportunity to make a few remarks to the minister regarding the livestock feed agency.

I have already expressed my views with regard to this livestock feed agency as well as about the way it could be constituted to best serve the farmers of eastern Canada and those of British Columbia if the latter are included.

Mr. Chairman, I asked the representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and I am also asking the hon. minister, if such a board or agency could secure feed directly from the Canadian Wheat Board or if it would have to go through the usual channels and buy them through wholesalers or brokers who belong to the grain exchange.

I do not see any use in creating such an agency to buy feed grain for the farmers, if it means going through the same channels that exist at the present time, and for the simple reason that it becomes an agency within an agency, which will solve nothing. Somebody else will reap the profits, but that is no solution.

It should be remembered that the Canadian Wheat Board was created in Western Canada, because of the corrupt practices of some brokers who made terrific profits, who wielded tremendous power, whether the crop was good or not. They had absolute control, wheat was bought at prices they indicated, until the farmers put such pressure on the government that it had to establish, in the general interest, the Canadian Wheat Board.

So those brokers were simply pushed back to the boundary or to the lakehead. On the other hand, the Board is now buying wheat from the farmers; its responsibility consists in finding outlets on the foreign market. One thing that intrigues me though is that the board does not resell directly on foreign markets.

I should like to say something about the feed grain agency. We may have to enact special legislation, enabling the agency to negotiate directly with the Canadian Wheat Board as regards direct purchasing, so as to prevent possible intermediates.

Mr. Chairman, at this stage, I am opening a parenthesis to say that we know how much western farmers received when they sold their wheat or when the board sold wheat to Russia, but we do not know how much the Russians paid for it per bushel, which is a different story. We know nothing about the price paid by Russia.

Why? Because brokers acted as go-betweens. As agents, it is necessarily their duty to negotiate those contracts on foreign markets and to look after the export of the grain.

In any event, we want the feed grain agency to negotiate directly with the Canadian Wheat Board so that the grain many be bought at the best possible price. Besides, the purpose of the Canadian Wheat Board is to see that western farmers do get a fair price for their grain.

However, it is also the responsibility of that agency to negotiate so that eastern farmers get full value in grain supplies and to see that they do not pay exorbitant prices, in brief that the transaction does not result in some speculation between western producers and eastern buyers.

I am therefore asking the minister what will be the exact duties and powers of this feed grain agency or board.

I see an amount of $19.5 million under item 10, so something must have been done in that connection; $705,000 have been paid out in salaries, so someone must have been paid. There has also been publicity; $66,000 were paid out for professional and special services, so something must have been done there too.

I would like more details from the minister before going on to another vote, before going any further. As a matter of fact, I wonder if he could not inform us of his views on grain storage in eastern Canada, for instance, in Halifax or Quebec city, where Americans now have reserved space for their domestic and foreign markets, due to the St. Lawrence seaway.

And in these warehouses, they have space reserved in advance. It is sometimes embarrassing for Canadians who do not have enough space and who are limited to a certain area, due to that situation.

All I can do in that connection is to remember what I heard in the committee on agriculture, when the Canadian wheat board representatives came to Ottawa quite some time ago. I should like the minister to give us some explanations in this regard, and if I am wrong I apologize. I think that he is more familiar than I am with this situation. Anyhow, I should like to know whether the United States still has reserved space in warehouses in Quebec or Halifax, for example. If I am right, they had almost 60 per cent of the space reserved for them, which caused difficulties in eastern Canada as regards storage facilities for eastern Canada grain requirements.

Those are about all the representations I had in mind and the questions I wanted to put to the Minister. In fact, I would like to know where we are concerning the feed grain agency, what will be exactly its duties and how it will negotiate the purchase and the sale of feed grain. Will it be its function to buy and sell? Will it be able to negotiate directly with the Canadian Wheat Board and thus prevent all possible speculations between the two? Will this agency be under joint federal-provincial control? Will it be under federal jurisdiction only? In short, how will it be administered? Will it carry out its duties for the benefit and the common good of all?

I would like to have explanations concerning this agency. I would also like the minister to give us a few details on the space now allocated for feed grain in the warehouses of eastern Canada.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Peters: No, Mr. Chairman. We have asked the minister to make a statement, and I presume that he will, because I and many members have not for some time had the opportunity of discussing the matter of ARDA. This is the first opportunity for the minister to give his impression of his department. I hope he avails himself of the opportunity before I feel compelled to make another 20-minute speech on the subject.

Mr. Nesbitt: That would be a calamity.

[Translation]

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, I think we will have the opportunity, during consideration in committee of the 1966-67 estimates, to consider in detail every point raised tonight.

However, I should not want to miss this opportunity of making a few comments on the remarks of the hon. members.

I want first of all to thank them for their interest in the activities of the department, in ARDA and in feed grain, and to point out also that most of their remarks were relevant, in that they referred to ARDA or to the ARDA agreements according to how they stood before their renewal in March last.

I shall deal with this matter, but allow me first of all to say how much I appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), who was the first incumbent of the Department of Forestry, which was set up by the previous administration. He left an excellent reputation within the department, he has also praised the deputy minister, Dr. Rousseau, and the departmental staff. I am in agreement with him. I think we have an unexcelled team of researchers and administrators.

The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) explained his speech of February 1, and I would be loath to come back to it. I think I can understand the meaning of his utterances. He has defined his thought and I will seek the information on the questions he raised tonight for it seems to me that attention should be paid to what he says, although, as he knows and stated himself tonight, the implementation of the ARDA projects are under sole provincial authority.

I would like to talk about the philosophy of ARDA and the way the department and I feel ARDA should be administered.

But before getting into this subject, allow me to say one thing about the remarks made by the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) concerning the livestock feed agency.

The Speech from the Throne mentioned that a bill would be introduced this session. Its drafting is almost completed and I hope to be able to put on the order paper, within a few weeks, the resolution that will allow the debate on that long-awaited bill.

I do not think that I can answer tonight the specific questions asked because it would be revealing the contents of the bill. I think that we will have to wait until we discuss it in committee section by section.

I can only say to the hon. member that he will be very happy with that bill.

With regard to the philosophy of ARDA, when that program was unanimously approved in this house in 1961, after the bill was introduced by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), who was then minister of agriculture, it was thought that ARDA would have repercussions mostly on farming and a lot was made, with good reason, I think, of the extraordinary possibilities offered by this legislation to solve a great number of problems in rural communities, especially those of marginal farmers.

That act is probably the only one, or one of the few which, over these last few years, has been unanimously approved by the house. I think that when the Prime Minister

(Mr. Pearson) entrusted me with the administration of that legislation, and I must add in passing, that I cannot reassure the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) about what will happen to the administration of ARDA; he would like the administration of this act to be entrusted again to the Minister of Agriculture, but that does not come under my jurisdiction. As far as I am concerned, I am very happy to be responsible for the administration of that act, and I will explain for why later.

In any case, when the legislation was approved, it was meant to deal exclusively with farming matters. When the Prime Minister asked me to assume the responsibility of administering ARDA—it will be two years in a few days—I tried to understand the spirit which had moved the then minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, and I even discussed that act with him.

Then I took it upon myself to visit each of the provinces of Canada to meet the responsible ministers. Subsequently, at the federal level of ARDA, we made a complete review of the act, with a view to make it not only an act of farming character, but also an act which would cover all the problems of the rural population, to the extent that these problems come under federal jurisdiction.

Now, we have developed a new concept of ARDA, following the federal-provincial conference held in Montreal in 1964 and the signing of the new agreement on economic redevelopment of rural regions, which came into force on April 1, 1965, and will expire on March 31, 1970.

The spirit of this new agreement is in line, in general, with what was said by the hon. members tonight, that is, on the one hand we must consider the rural problems in general, human and physical resources in general, not only agriculture, but also fishing, forestry, tourist industry, mines and the small business. On the other hand, we must continue to respect the spirit of those agreements, that is, initiative must originate in the provinces, and this does not prevent federal authorities from taking initiatives too.

When we negotiated the renewal of this agreement with the provinces, we specifically suggested to them that there should be a change in the spirit of the original agreement which seemed to give the provinces exclusive responsibility for proposing projects or programs, and that this should now be a joint federal-provincial program, and that we also had responsibilities, not only for financing the projects, but for suggesting what we thought should be done in certain areas, in certain provinces. And this is so true that the provinces agreed with our suggestion for the setting up of a $50 million special economic development fund, the proposal for which is now placed on the order paper and in which federal initiative is recognized.

And I believe that the hon. members, in a few months, will see that we have taken just those initiatives they have suggested to us tonight, that is we met with the authorities of certain provinces of the country, and we indicated to them that there were general problems in certain areas to be settled, that there was a low-income families situation and that a special effort was needed to raise the standard of living of those families, in those areas.

And very soon, I hope I will be pleased to announce to this house the signing of special projects on behalf of some areas of this country, when the hon. members will see that we have actually met their wishes by initiating some steps which are, furthermore, in accord with the agreements concluded between the Federal government and the provinces early in 1965.

Therefore, we are pioneering and, on the Federal level, we held conferences, we held meetings since the federal-provincial conference, specialized meetings on the problem of farm consolidation, on the problem of organization, of regional development, on organization with a view to perfecting development techniques. The particular case raised by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Loney), is very important. There have been, subsequent meetings which have not always been made public. Our officials met with provincial authorities. We have changed the regional administration of ARDA in order to make available to the provinces, officials which could assist the provincial authorities to carry out better the ARDA program. I think that we are on the right track.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle, this evening, believed that while respecting provincial initiative we would at the same time exercise too strict a control over the projects submitted to us. I do not know exactly to what projects he is referring, but section 5 of the new agreement provides, on the contrary—

[English]

Some hon. Members: Carried.

[Translation]

Mr. Sauvé: Then, Mr. Chairman, when we renewed the ARDA agreements, under section 5 we provided that at the beginning of each year, the provinces could agree with the federal government to propose for the whole year, an operation and activities program, without any need for the federal authority to control each and every one of those moves and projects.

I think that we are respecting both the spirit of the ARDA agreement, namely the responsibility of the provinces to propose projects and that spirit of initiative which is characteristic of the new concept of ARDA, at the federal level.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I sincerely regret the lack of courtesy shown by the Conservatives over in that corner who did not miss any opportunity to talk about useless things for several days. I realize it must be infuriating, after being glaringly impolite while the Minister of Forestry was making such interesting comments, to be told right to one's face about this lack of courtesy. Even if I heard them talking about filibuster or things like that, since they themselves spent days discussing useless matters, I think they should look at themselves first.

Mr. Lambert: While you were absent.

Mr. Grégoire: I think I am here more often than the hon. member.

Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to go back to item No. 1, but I should have liked the Minister of Forestry to deal with this item at greater length, for what he was saying was interesting. I am sorry he was unable to continue and I apologize for those members who were rude to him. Fortunately, they do not belong to our group and the minister knows very well to whom I refer.

I thought that the minister dealt rather quickly and superficially with the remarks made in this corner of the house about his Department. I think it would have been worthwhile to examine the remarks made by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier). He raised some important points.

There has been talk of patronage with regard to funds provided by the federal government. Even if the Minister himself, or the officials of his department were not directly involved, I feel that the Minister could have at least told the house that he would take steps to end this situation and see to it that this should not happen again. I think that the minister should reassure the house in that connection, because it should not be done at the farmers' expense.

The minister has pointed out quite often that his department did not necessarily initiate the plans, but left the task to the provincial governments and that the objective of the federal department was to pay half, or after having approved the projects pay 50 per cent of the cost. Then the Minister becomes more or less a rubber stamp, since all the work must be done by the provincial governments.

I am wondering if the minister is pleased to be in such a position.

Here is a minister full of imagination, resourcefulness and ambition who has original ideas, one must admit, and he would be delighted to have the opportunity to put such energy, ambition and imagination at the farmers' service. But his hands are tied. It is not up to him to express new ideas, to make the first move and to accomplish something in that field.

No. He has to sit at his desk and wait for the provinces to come along with projects. He then uses the rubber stamp, signs the cheques and that is the end of it. The Minister of Forestry said that French Canadians could take over important positions, but on the other hand those who already hold such positions are merely rubber stamp wielders. Indeed, that is the situation.

I wonder why. Are there two authorities in charge of ARDA? I should like the Minister of Forestry to tell us what he thinks about that. Does he not feel that when there are two authorities in a department such as that one, both are fettered, both have their hands tied? Neither can give ARDA the impetus they feel it should be given. The provincial government may set up programs, but it always needs the stamp of approval of the federal minister and it must get cheques for 50 per cent of the cost involved. The federal minister only has to wait. And so, the whole undertaking is at the mercy of two authorities, before the program can be implemented.

I would like the Minister to tell us what he thinks about that. Does this not slow down the work? Does it not allow the programs to be toned down in the process? Does it not reduce in some way the development that we would want for ARDA? Would it not be the cause of what seems to be the failure of ARDA, because if we are asked what it does, what it has done—at least in the province of Quebec—we do not know what to answer. Well, there have been studies made, boards of inquiry have been created and, as the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) said, there have been such appointments as notaries, and doctors in charge of the ARDA program. Some students in social sciences have gone to the Gaspe peninsula to make inquiries in the farming areas. It does not cost much. But what about real achievements? And would not all those difficulties stem from the fact that there are two authorities within ARDA and that, often, they are at cross-purpose?

Would it not be better to put the whole matter under a single authority? Would not decisions be arrived at more rapidly, if there was only one individual, either at the federal or provincial level, concerned with the matter and who could say: I am the one responsible for that. If things are not running smoothly, I will not blame the provincial government or the federal government, but if everything goes well, I will take the credit for it.

Which one of the two ministers could say that today?

The federal Minister is always telling us—and that is all he can say—that ARDA comes under the provincial jurisdiction. Could the Minister say anything else? If that is what is understood by federalism, it is a fetter that prevents both from making headway.

The Minister surely shows good will. I know he is a competent man and I know what he can do. But was he able to initiate such a plan? He has to wait for the advice of the provinces. So where goes his overflowing energy? He is waiting. It is a fact, the Minister cannot but agree with what I am now saying. The hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) is advocating federalism. If that is what he understands, by federalism, then it is that which prevents government from resorting to action and which is keeping the farming in a state of stagnation.

What accomplishments are there at present besides seminars? I believe that the minister should some day make a statement such as this: "This cannot go on; I administer, I approve, I control, but I cannot set something going." Then, it might be possible to induce the authorities to hand over the necessary funds to the provincial governments.

Today, as one considers supplies, it is easy to determine which grants go to the provinces. Before implementing their plans, the provinces have to submit them to Ottawa, but since changes are often made afterwards, the provinces are hampered and delayed in the implementation of the projects they want to get going.

Were it not for this procedural duplication, things would be done differently.

I think it would help ARDA and the farmers if all the members of the house were shown the situation in which the minister is. The minister cannot take any action, he can only wait; I feel sorry for him. I see him laughing. I am sorry for the new Minister of Forestry because he is young, full of energy and ambition. It is most unfortunate to see a man like him remain inactive for years because of the situation he is put into. How can he ever become a real man of action, if he does not acquire any experience at all?

I hope that the other ministers will see to it, at the next cabinet meeting, that responsibilities are entrusted to this minister. I can assure his colleagues that he will be able to assume the responsibilities entrusted to him. He has been asking for further duties for a long time and I think he is worthy of them.

Mr. Chairman, those were the few remarks I wanted to make. I know they were perhaps made in a humorous vein. The ministers and hon. members realize that my statements are actually accurate, at least as far as the present implementation of ARDA is concerned, in view of this dual authority which hampers the progress and the success of ARDA.

• (9:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in listening to the laudatory remarks made by the hon. member for Lapointe I was wondering if he was taking a short cut to an appointment in the other place. However, he kept flitting back and forth, so that it is debatable. It may not work a second time.

I was unhappy, Mr. Chairman, that the minister did not have an opportunity to outline his proposals in detail. I do appreciate the explanation that he has given, also his indication that he intends to maintain the responsibility for this particular aspect of agriculture in the forestry branch. The remarks that the minister made in my opinion indicate that he has not really considered—and that is the gist as I gather it of that particular representation—measures to provide for the types of problems that will be in the interests of rehabilitation of agricultural land on a national basis.

He has not indicated how he intends to negotiate with the provinces over various schemes that can be more in their interest than in the national interest. Unless my understanding is incorrect, it would seem that the amount of money being donated to the provinces, in relation to the amount of money being spent in other ways, has increased, but not to any degree that would indicate that the type of over-all project we are interested in is going to be developed.

I would not pursue this matter, except to say that if the federal government does not have the type of program we are discussing here, one in which it sincerely believes and is vitally interested in developing, then really there is no long range future for agricultural communities in many parts of Canada, no matter whether they are in the east, west, or in the central part of Canada.

If the government intends to pursue another program mentioned during the election, where it was intended to put the farmer off his farm, redevelop the farm and then return it to him, that I would suggest is the type of ARDA program that has to be carefully thought out because the treatment of the farmer would have to be envisaged on a generous scale.

I do not know at what point the minister is going to be able to bring the attention of the House of Commons to the over-all intention that the government now has with respect to ARDA. The house really has not had a review of ARDA since it was initially presented. As the minister stated at that time, it had the complete support of all members of parliament, for the simple reason that the program was visionary. Everyone realized that considerable problems had to be faced, that in the various aspects of the agricultural redevelopment program there would be something of benefit for each part of Canada, and that this would be a long-range program.

If what I have described is not the program that was envisioned, then I think we have to develop one that is. I think that there is an obligation on the part of the government to tell the country what it is doing.

As the hon. member for Lapointe mentioned, we are again faced with a situation where discussions are no longer conducted in parliament. Discussions take place in provincial and federal conferences where decisions are often made by officials of the provincial governments and then given to the federal officials as a ready-cut proposition to be either accepted or rejected. The hon. member for Lapointe indicated that all the minister did was to make out the cheques.

Irrespective of that, I think that provincial governments that have area development programs of their own, which are faced in different ways in different provinces, ought to refer them back to a central point. For instance, recently there has been talk of developing blueberry land. Everybody knows that blueberries can grow wild. They may appear in a field one year, be picked, but not appear the next year. In other words they are not farmed. Yet during the ARDA program there has been considerable development in this field in the maritimes, resulting in the production of a crop and resulting in a fairly substantial income per acre for the farmers in the growing communities. This type of industry which has obviously been newly developed could be related, by the national agency dealing with ARDA, to other parts of Canada which have similar growing potential as the area I referred to in the maritimes.

I do not intend to pursue this matter further. I know the committee is in a mood to get these estimates passed. Sometimes we are disgustingly fast in passing these things and at other times disgustingly slow. The public would agree that we were mostly disgusting at all times in our manner of handling them. If members do not believe that, they should read the newspapers. The newspapers agree that this is so.

An hon. Member: Sit down, then.

Mr. Peters: I had intended to sit down but a republican across the way said "Be reasonable and sit down". And I do not think that would be reasonable. If this question is not one of those referred for further discussion in committee, then it seems to me the minister will not be getting the benefit of a discussion which I believe should take place in some depth on this subject. I sincerely believe that ARDA is the only hope for a long range solution of many of the problems of our marginal areas. This view is shared by many of the farm organizations across Canada. If the program is not working—and I suggest it is not working now, in the main—we must take steps to correct the situation.

So far, I submit, the program has not taken any appreciable number of people off the farms and redeveloped the land in such a way that those remaining are able to make a reasonable living. This is one of the matters which should be discussed by the committee, since it is at the heart of the department's work—though I must say when you have feed grain assistance thrown into the responsibilities of a Department of Forestry, that really is for the birds.

I am pleased that the minister should seem more interested in explaining this subject than the committee is in listening to him. This will not always be the case, I am sure. But should there be a choice between the subjects to be sent to the committee I trust this one will be considered seriously as the theme of one of the major discussions of the present session.

Mr. Webb: I should like to ask the minister how many applications for ARDA assistance have been approved, and I should like to get this information by provinces.

Mr. Sauvé: I cannot give the hon. member this information offhand but I will provide it for him.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put just one question to the minister. Can he tell us whether he would confirm that what delays ARDA, what really prevents ARDA development, is the dual authority, one provincial and the other federal?

Will the minister comment on this?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that dual jurisdiction is delaying the projects. This act has been voted by Parliament five years ago; the implementation was rather slow at first, because the federal and the provincial administrations had to familiarize themselves with an operating system. On the whole, I am satisfied with the implementation. Naturally, there is always room for improvement. We could talk at length on this point.

When the bill to amend the ARDA Act is presented to the house—it is already on the order paper—we will have the opportunity to discuss again the whole concept behind ARDA. We shall be able to make changes then.

Mr. Grégoire: I should also like to ask whether ARDA, being a joint program, the provincial government could withdraw from it claiming fiscal compensation, as may be done in the case of other joint programs?

Mr. Sauvé: No, this program is not included among those from which the provincial governments have indicated that they would like to withdraw in some way.

Mr. Grégoire: None of them?

Mr. Sauvé: None.

Mr. Latulippe: I want to ask the minister a question.

Could he tell us whether, with the cooperation of the provincial governments, he intends to undertake development projects in each county of the province of Quebec and of all the other provinces, so that all counties may benefit somewhat from ARDA?

The people I represent often ask me what ARDA does and what is ARDA. I answer them as best I can, but they feel that ARDA is not doing much in a riding such as mine where many of them are having a hard time and farmers are leaving their farms.

If ARDA were to come and help them or give them some information, I suppose they might be able to keep their farms. But they leave them because they feel it takes too long. They cannot afford to wait any longer. The present system has put them to deeply into debt. So, people can no longer wait. They leave their farms at an alarming rate in my constituency. I would go as far as to say that approximately 60% of the farms have been left over the last two years. In a single parish, within a week, 13 farmers left. ARDA has certainly not been beneficial yet in that corner of the land and we do not know when ARDA will come our way.

I wish the minister would give some reply to that question.

Mr. Sauvé: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Item agreed to.

3. Construction of extension to research laboratory in Pointe Claire, Quebec, for use by the Pulp and Paper Research Institute of Canada, $1,700,000.

Mr. Barnett: There are some questions I should like to put to the minister. My colleague from Timiskaming suggested some time ago that the hon. gentleman was a progressive minister. I am not sure whether there was a certain question mark at the end of that remark or not.

This vote, as the committee will see, provides for the construction of an extension to a research laboratory in Pointe Claire for use by the Pulp and Paper Research Institute of Canada. We are referred to page 160 for the details. I find on looking at page 160 that the item referred to says: "Construction of extension to research laboratory in Pointe Claire, Quebec, for use by the Pulp and Paper Research Institute of Canada". The amount given is $1,700,000.

I am not blaming the minister for the fact that the details contain exactly the same words as the general item of the vote. I know this is the case with respect to a large number of the items before us. But I should like clarification on this point: Am I correct in my understanding that the Pulp and Paper Research Institute of Canada is a private organization established by the producing firms in this industry and that this is a capital grant to provide facilities to enable this body to carry on certain research work? I should like to know whether this is the case and whether the contribution by the federal government is limited to the provision of the plant.

Mr. Sauvé: In 1956 the federal government provided funds for the construction and equipment of a new laboratory at Pointe Claire, and the Pulp and Paper Institute pays for the research and personnel. We only provide the facilities, the buildings.

Mr. Barnett: Can the minister tell us something about the nature of the research program conducted in this institute?

Mr. Sauvé: The research is done by McGill University, in conjunction with the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, for the development of the pulp and paper industry. It is related exclusively to pulp and paper, nothing else. It is a venture which we find very profitable because we in the department do not have the means to do that research. It is done by the institute in conjunction with McGill University. The research has been going on since 1926, and the federal government only intervened in 1956 by providing funds for building purposes.

Mr. Barnett: Then I take it the research is basically on techniques and methods for improving the production of pulp and paper products. I am glad the minister refreshed my mind with the fact that it was in 1956 parliament first voted money for this purpose. At that time I raised the question of research into pollution of water and air by the pulp and paper industry, and I take it from what the minister has said that this project does not cover that area of activity.

Not too long ago I asked the minister about the activity of his department in this field, relating my question to the holding of a forestry conference in Montebello. He told me the responsibility lay within the jurisdiction of another department. In passing, Mr. Chairman, I may say I had an opportunity to meet some of the delegates to the Montebello conference, who were on parliament hill this afternoon, in company with a minister who comes from B.C., and I gather their conference was a most interesting and successful one.

I feel it is proper to ask on this item whether any portion of the funds we are voting is being directed toward research into the control of pollution. Much of our economic prosperity will derive from the better utilization of our forest products, but this industry is one of the greatest creators of pollution of our waters and air.

I am aware of the conference that is being arranged this fall under the auspices of the Council of Resource Ministers, which we all hope will produce fruitful results, but if we are providing this assistance for research it justifies the minister's directing, urging or demanding that the industry devote more time, energy and interest to the field of research in the control of pollution.

I represent a constituency where there have been great developments in the pulp and paper industry, where small-scale plants have become increasingly larger and where the level of pollution, as the industry expanded, has changed so much in degree that it has become something different in kind.

In this connection, I am thinking of the community of Port Alice on the north end of Vancouver Island where one of the earliest pulp and paper plants in the province of B.C. was established, where at one time the little company town community had green grass, flowers and trees planted in the townsite, but where now the level of pollution has reached the point that the grass has turned white, flowers will no longer grow, and water in the inlet on which the plant is located has become so polluted that people can no longer catch fresh salmon in it.

In the area where I make my home, which has a population of 20,000 to 25,000, it is not untrue to say that at present the whole community is up in arms on this pollution question. Over 6,300 people have signed a petition which they have taken to the provincial government in Victoria, asking for some legislation. They have held parades in the modern tradition of silent vigils in front of the industry plant.

I have some pictures here which give an idea of the conditions in which people are being asked to live and work, pictures which show the occasional snowfall on Vancouver Island, with the snow on the ground turned black with fall-out from the plant, pictures showing motor cars covered white, as if by snow, but it is not snow, just salt cake. I would be quite happy to send these pictures across to the minister and let him have a look at them. I also have a picture of a parade which took place recently in Alberni Valley.

I am only sorry I cannot ask leave of the house to have them reproduced as an appendix to Hansard because I am afraid the facilities of the Queen's Printer would not do adequate justice to them. However, the minister can pass them around and let other interested members see them.

I realize this matter is a very complex one and that all the answers cannot be found overnight. However, I would suggest to the minister, particularly in view of this vote, that as Minister of Forestry he has an important role to play in focusing the attention of industry on this problem and in focusing the attention of the rest of the Government of Canada on this problem. It is not something he should leave entirely in the hands of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Because of the fact that this forestry industry is so important to the economy of Canada, we as the people's representatives should be demanding now, and the minister should be giving a lead in demanding, that this industry develop itself and conduct itself in such a way that it is not going to become a hazard to the life, welfare and health of the people of the country, not only those immediately concerned with the industry, but also many others in adjacent regions.

Mr. Chairman, I hope one of the things the minister will agree to look into is the extent to which the Pulp and Paper Institute, which is receiving in this vote a fairly generous sum from the tax revenues of Canada, should be willing to undertake a research program in their particular aspect of the whole field of pollution control.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a short question. Is it possible to use the facilities of this research area to do research for the Department of Industry in the forest products field? I have in mind particularly the research that should be undertaken in the E. B. Eddy limits in the Elk Lake area in my riding where the Ontario government has given an ultimatum that a pulp and paper mill be constructed in the near future, or the limits will have to change hands. There is considerable research work which will have to be done before it is possible to tell what the size of the plant should be or whether there should be a kraft or sulphite plant in the area.

Mr. Sauvé: I shall find out.

Item agreed to.

5. Contributions to the provinces in the amounts and subject to the terms specified in the details of estimates, $7,910,000.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister a parochial question. In northern Ontario where and on how many roads is this construction work to be done under this item of $8 million?

Mr. Sauvé: I could not tell you offhand, but I will provide the answer.

10. Freight assistance on western feed grains including assistance in respect of grain storage costs in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council, $19,500,000.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Mégantic was quite insistent about this item. Did the minister suggest in his answer that this will also be referred to the committee when the feed grain legislation he spoke of is proposed? Will both of these be put together?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Chairman, I said that the bill would be introduced in the house at which time we will have an opportunity in committee to review this whole bill clause by clause.

Mr. Peters: The question I asked related to a discussion which took place in this committee during consideration of the matter of feed grain assistance under the control of a feed grain agency, if such an agency is established. Is that the intention of the government?

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This concludes our consideration of the estimates of the Department of Forestry. Shall we now proceed to a consideration of the estimates of the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Grégoire: It is ten o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, am I correct in understanding that members of the N.D.P. wish to call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, we had a certain understanding at six o'clock that we would try to get six departments through in four hours. We have done that. I think that is a good night's work.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—POSSIBLE INCREASE

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday, February 17, during the question period, I put the following question to the hon. Minister of Finance:

In view of the fact that no provision was made for this in the estimates, could the Minister tell the house whether he is considering the necessity of increasing family allowances, and will he inform us of his decision in his next budget?

Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate receiving tonight an answer from the Minister, after I have made the following comments for his information.

The estimates for the 1966-67 fiscal year were tabled recently by the Minister, and they do not indicate an early change in the family allowances pattern.

I understand that the minister has more than one string to his bow. He might very well, if he so decides with his other cabinet colleagues, take action in this field and reveal it to us in his forthcoming budget.

I hope this is one of the important and pleasant surprises he is keeping in store for all Canadians. I know that the minister practises the art of secrecy. But he could give us a ray of hope by recognizing the urgency of increasing family alowances.

Here is a social field that should be substantially reviewed. I do not intend to discuss tonight the question of which government has such a responsibility. I shall deal with this matter when the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare are considered.

I want briefly to demonstrate the necessity of an immediate increase in such allowances.

First, let us say that many provinces and citizens demand that allowances be geared to present needs. At the last meeting of Health and Welfare ministers in Ottawa, in January last, at least five provinces recognized that the family allowances program had to be changed. They are Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

The representative of Quebec, at this conference Mr. René Levesque, went so far as to say that if Ottawa failed to act, in view of the urgency of the problem, Quebec would shortly proceed to correct the current inadequacy of the family allowances.

No grudge should be held against provinces that take initiatives because of the inertia and apathy of the federal government.

Several members in this house as well as other Canadians say that the central government should be strong and powerful. Let the central government wake up. Let it take action. Otherwise dynamic provinces are justified in intervening and in going ahead with their projects.

Indeed, I doubt that the responsibility for family allowances constitutionally falls to Ottawa. The fact that Ottawa intervened in that field in 1944 does not mean that it had the right to do so. But let us set aside the legal aspect today. I shall return to it on another occasion.

I maintain that unless the government takes immediate action, unless it assumes all the responsibility and power which it claims, it will have to allow those provinces that wish to do so to deal with the urgent needs of Canadian families.

Within a few weeks, through his actions or inaction, the minister will be able to give a certain orientation to the improvement of family allowances.

I would surely like to have the minister's views on such a matter which has become urgent mainly because of increased family needs, the rise in the cost of living and the loss in value of our dollar since 1945.

In closing, I should like to remind the minister that between 1945 and 1965 the cost of living increased by 87.7 per cent, while family allowances have only been raised 9.4 per cent. Now is the time, more than ever, to fill the gap.

[English]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, for 22 years now Canada has operated a family allowance program for mothers and for all children up to the age of 16, provided the children are attending school. More recently, a special youth allowance was introduced for school children aged 16 and 17. The rates are $6, $8 and $10 per month, according to the age of the children. This program has undergone only minor changes in its period of existence of 22 years.

At the last meeting of provincial ministers of welfare with myself in Ottawa, considerable attention was directed to this program of family allowances. It was suggested, especially by the minister from the province of Quebec, that there existed a need for a very careful consideration of the rates of allowance and the children to whom the allowance ought to be paid. In making that suggestion, the minister was re-echoing comments which emanated from other responsible persons, especially students who have written extensively on this particular subject.

I was able to tell the conference something which I repeated later in the house, namely that the Department of National Health and Welfare is giving very careful study to this question of family allowances. It is a major program affecting the pattern of income of many hundreds of thousands of families and affecting their family budget, as well as assisting millions of children in the country. Any changes ought to be taken only after very careful consideration. Perhaps it is a fact that the amounts paid to each child need revision; perhaps the weighting by age or number of children needs altering and needs up-dating.

It should be borne in mind that these questions, and the determination of any changes in the family allowance program, must be considered in relation to the total social and economic policies of the government, the requirements for assistance of other groups in the community, including the older people and including the requirements of education.

Mr. Knowles: And medicare.

Mr. MacEachen: And medicare. It will be in this context that this particular program will be considered and decisions reached.

Mr. Knowles: And nothing done.

Mr. MacEachen: That is a very depressing postscript.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION—PUBLICITY PROMOTION IN CONNECTION WITH CENTENNIAL

• (10:20 p.m.)

Mr. Jim McNulty (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, the reason I brought this particular question before the minister was the great interest shown in the publicity given a National Capital Commission representative when he was in our area as well as in other areas of southern Ontario. There was publicity over television, radio and in the newspaper columns. I have a clipping from the St. Catharines Standard for Friday, December 10, 1965. This article reports an interview with Mr. J. Maurice Landry, the information director of the National Capital Commission. It goes on to explain that the National Capital Commission is interested in promoting the capital of Canada across the nation as a symbol of unity and a source of national pride.

Since the first part of January we have heard very little about this promotion of the capital of Canada, and I have had letters from teachers in the area and young people asking whether there is going to be any promotion of the nation's capital, particularly with our centennial year approaching.

I believe it is a fact that Canadians from British Columbia to Newfoundland are becoming more and more aware of their identity and of the need to find in things Canadian the common interests which will ensure unity and survival. With the approach of the centenary of confederation of Canada all Canadians should engage in a little soul searching in order to find within themselves the reasons that they must retain their identity and at the same time generate enthusiasm in the things which make them different from other nations.

Our national capital is one of the many things in which Canadians have a joint ownership. It can be a beautiful city and will be, I believe, thanks in large part to the efforts of the federal government, which has spent more than $150 million since early 1900 in Ottawa and its immediate area. I was on a tour last year which was organized by the N.C.C. and I did have the opportunity to see for myself the developments carried out by the National Capital Commission and their expectations for the future. One realizes on such a tour just how attractive and worthy of Canada a capital can become.

It is unfortunate to note how little Canadians know about their capital city. To many of my constituents Ottawa, the national capital, is relatively unknown. On the other hand I find much interest among the people, once they are made aware of the symbolic importance of the national capital. I receive many, many letters, particularly from young people, eager to know more about their capital, the nerve centre of the Canadian confederation. They want to be proud of Ottawa and proud in the knowledge of her institutions.

I believe Canada is in a state of flux today. It seems to me that we have neglected an important unifying factor in Canada by ignoring the national capital as a catalyst capable of generating and fusing Canadianism and national pride. The Americans have capitalized on love of country and respect for the flag with considerable success. We Canadians could profit by their experience in this respect.

What does the government intend to do to develop a sense of pride in the national capital, and at the same time cash in on the millions of dollars expended to create a capital worthy of Canada? I am informed by the Ottawa Tourist and Convention Bureau that some 10 million visitors will come to Ottawa in 1967. Statistics show that 750,000 tourists visited the parliament buildings in 1965. What is being done to greet the thousands of Canadians who will visit their capital city in the expectation of learning more about their capital and their country? Every Canadian who comes to Ottawa should leave it a stauncher citizen of Canada.

I believe it is also of the utmost importance that the national capital be publicized from one end of Canada to the other. Special attention must be paid to our school population; Canada may well stand or fall on the degree of patriotism we instil in our young people today.

Ottawa will be the most important city in Canada in 1967 because it is the heart of our confederation. Granted that it will never be the largest or the wealthiest, but as the seat of the federal government of Canada it enjoys greater prestige than any other city. I would think, because of its intimate knowledge of the national capital region, the National Capital Commission would be eminently qualified to talk about the capital and tell its story to Canadians from coast to coast. I wonder if money is being made available for this purpose? Will Canadians in 1967 be made aware of their national capital?

There is this particularly germane passage in the Speech from the Throne which reflects my thoughts on this matter.

> The approach of the centennial of Confederation makes it of the utmost importance that Canadians in all parts of the country should look to Ottawa as its true capital where they can feel at home.

What a tremendous national awareness would be created if thousands of Canadians, as a centennial observance, were to come to Ottawa to strengthen their patriotism. What a great impact we could make on Canadians of every race and creed with a properly organized information campaign on the capital of Canada. There is much latent patriotism in our country. It is up to this parliament to awaken it so that it can become a major force in keeping this nation united.

Today, a few short months before our great national birthday party, Ottawa, the capital of Canada, takes on greater importance than ever. If we have any satisfaction in being Canadians, then we must be proud of our national capital. We must publicize the visible signs of our nationhood.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the speech of the hon. member for Lincoln. I think he is to be congratulated on it, and I believe I express the opinion of all hon. members when I say that.

Mr. Fulton: What about when he raises a grievance?

Mr. McIlraith: The question which he posed is somewhat more restricted than the content of his speech, with which I am in complete and total accord. The question yesterday was this: Will the minister inform the house whether the National Capital Commission intends to promote the capital across the nation? If so, how and how soon?

The National Capital Commission is an agency established to make plans and assist in the development of the national capital region to make it a suitable place as a capital. This is a continuing job which has been carried on for over 60 years by this commission and its predecessors, since about 1897. Improvement and development of the capital is its main purpose. It can do certain other things only incidental to this main purpose. One of these incidental activities is informing the people of Canada about what it is doing to improve the capital. I believe it is that type of information service which the hon. member spoke about in the early part of his remarks.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would it not have helped for the hon. gentleman to have agreed to the appointment of a special committee of parliament, as was suggested from this side of the house?

Mr. McIlraith: I am afraid not, it would have been premature at this time.

Mr. Fulton: After 97 years?

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, information kits and articles are set out to newspapers across the country, the information staff give illustrated talks in various cities, films are shown and pamphlets and film strips are sent to schools. Also the Rotary Clubs of Canada are assisted in showing the capital to a selected group of high school students from across the country in May of each year; bus tours are provided for members of parliament so they can have an opportunity to see what the commission is doing, and the establishment and staffing of an information centre in Ottawa where visitors may get information about the commission's work. I refer there to the new information centre. All these activities are designed to explain what the National Capital Commission is doing to improve the capital.

The Commission is not empowered, fortunately or unfortunately—and in this case I think unfortunately—nor is it equipped to inform the public of Canada about all the functions and programs of the government and the capital generally, nor is it equipped to inform the public about parliament, the work and administration of the various departments and agencies of government, international activities involving embassies, and things of that nature.

The National Capital Act does not provide the commission with the power to carry on these activities. For the centennial of 1967 parliament has established the national centennial administration under the National Centennial Act and the commission is working with the centennial commission which is doing the job of providing over-all information about the centenary of confederation and other national capital activities connected with it.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL ASSISTANCE TO MARITIMES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): On the only other occasion when I used this procedural device to bring a question before the house, fairly good results were obtained. Hon. members may recall that I referred to the closing of McAvity's industrial plant in Saint John, and it was possible to avert this move.

The question I raise tonight has in it some of the same elements—loss of industry, loss of employment and an uninterested provincial government. I see a smiling Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) in his place at this late hour. He is relaxed and confident, now that his own estimates have gone through and he has really nothing to worry about now for the balance of the session.

I hope the minister can help me this evening. This question concerns the exclusion of Saint John, Fredericton, Dartmouth and Halifax from the Area Development Incentives Act. It goes back to 1963 under the old act when certain cities in the maritimes were excluded. Hope was held out that when the new act was introduced in 1965 the situation would be changed. But they were again excluded. My objection is that the mayors and others above been kept on a string; they have been hoodwinked into thinking there was some hope for them under the act. This is not the fault of the Minister of Transport. But it appears, now, that the answer will be a definite "no" and that there will not be an opportunity for the inclusion of the cities I have mentioned in the designated area plan.

We are now faced with the necessity of doing something for these cities in an equivalent way. Everyone knows that they are faced with unique problems in this regard. It appears that the Atlantic Development Board is being considered as one means of assisting them, but this has not been definitely stated. I think there is need for haste and that immediate efforts should be made to settle this problem.

Its effects have already been shown. Established industries in some of these cities are moving outside the perimeter of the excluded area. Saint John has already lost old established industries which have moved outside to nearby towns, in each case obtaining the grant which is available under the act. In the second place I understand, although I cannot prove this, that there are many industries which wanted to go to larger cities such as Halifax and Saint John—towns which have a labour surplus—but they have not even gone to the maritimes because those towns were not available to them under the terms of the act.

I suggest that the minister, as the minister responsible for the Atlantic Development Board, should direct the board to take this matter under advisement if it has not already done so. The board should be asked to look into it immediately, call for briefs if necessary from the cities and get right down to business. It is not the hon. gentleman's fault. The government could have avoided this situation by bringing these cities in earlier without any trouble. They have been playing around with the industrial future of these cities.

I think it is high time we had an answer to this question. If the minister wants an example of a method by which an equivalent amount could be given I suggest he take an amount of money and have it administered initially by the board. If necessary it could be channeled through the two agencies in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, Industrial Estates in Nova Scotia and the Productivity Council in New Brunswick, and let them deal with this matter, or at least be a party to advising where assistance can be given. I hope the minister will not think that some of the other benefits, some very good benefits, that are given to these particular cities—wharves, roads, harbour bridges—are part of it. There must be a fully equivalent benefit to the cities that have been forgotten and stalled by this government.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, one gets compliments only by indirection from the opposition, but the hon. gentleman has complimented the government in two respects. He has suggested we have a very good program for area development, but it does not extend quite widely enough. We are very glad he approves of this program and wants it extended.

He has also said that I must not use as an excuse in reply all the other good things the Atlantic Development Board is doing for Halifax, Saint John and the rest of the Atlantic area. I do not intend to do that at all. I know the hon. gentleman is almost as pleased about the harbour bridge as I am. I am also sure the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) is almost as pleased as I am about the considerable extension going to be made to the elevator in Halifax.

Mr. Forrestall: Unemployment is still 10.5 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: It should, of course, be remembered that unemployment is one of the criteria for the area development agency, and the only reason Halifax, Saint John and Fredericton are excluded is that unemployment in those places is less than it is elsewhere in the Atlantic region.

Mr. Forrestall: The four cities are improving—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. The Minister of Transport has the floor. He has only three minutes to reply and I think he should not be interrupted.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have great difficulty in making myself heard in the house. The Atlantic Development Board, ever since the area development program was established, particularly since the new criteria were established in the summer of last year, has been very conscious of the kind of incidental effects which they might have in the possible diversion of industrial prospects from Halifax or Saint John to other communities, something which I think is more likely than in the case of Fredericton, and is also conscious that their magnetic attraction might not be as great because of these incentives.

While it might be inconsistent to provide the same kind of incentives, if the government had intended to do that it should be done by the area development organization itself. The board is very much aware of the importance of not doing anything that is likely to be decisive in any specific case in order to make sure that an industry which may be wavering will in fact locate in these places.

I can assure the hon. gentleman, all other hon. members, and through the press everyone in Halifax, Saint John, Fredericton and the adjacent areas which are not covered by the area development incentive program that any concrete proposals for meeting any specific problem will certainly be welcomed indeed by the A.D.B. The general problem is under review at every meeting of the board, and constantly by the staff.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

INCREASED EXPORTS OF LEAD AND ZINC—STUDY OF SMELTER CONSTRUCTION

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the government has approved the export from Pine Point in the Northwest Territories of additional quantities of high grade lead-zinc ore and zinc concentrates during the next two and three year periods. The application by Pine Point Mines Limited reflects a firm market position in these metals over this time period. We have approved the export of 90,000 tons per year of zinc metal contained in concentrates for a period of three years and 60,000 tons per year of high grade direct shipping ore.

These shipments will go to smelters in the United States. In addition, an earlier authority by which the government approved the export of 50,000 tons per year of elemental lead in concentrates to Japan for a period of ten years has been modified to allow the diversion of up to 15,000 tons of this amount to other markets during the next four years.

The result of these permits will be a very large increase in lead and zinc production in the immediate future. Not only will this produce very appreciable foreign exchange for Canada; it will also increase the volume of ore and concentrates moved by the Great Slave Lake Railway to more than double that anticipated before the mine went into production. It will be recalled that the government of Canada advanced the capital to build this railway. It is most encouraging to see this facility utilized to this extent.

When consideration was given to the applications for export, equal attention was given to the feasibility of increasing smelting facilities within Canada and particularly in the Northwest Territories. It is government policy to encourage processing of raw materials in Canada. On the basis of available information the case for establishing a smelter at Pine Point cannot be determined with certainty. There does seem to be a reasonable possibility that given adequate reserves and a continuation of present firm markets, such a project might be realistic. The government is therefore engaging experienced consultants to undertake studies to determine the feasibility of the immediate construction of a smelter at Pine Point.

I am pleased to report that the mining company, Pine Point Mines Limited, and its parent organization, Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited, have given unqualified support to this approach and have agreed to co-operate by making available to the government's independent consultants, on a confidential basis, all information useful in such a study. Pyramid Mining Company Limited, which has recently announced development of lead-zinc ore reserves in the same region, and several other companies now exploring the area have also indicated their willingness to co-operate in the same way.

I shall not predict that a smelter can or will be built in the Pine Point area, but because of the tremendous significance such a development could have for the region, I wish to assure the house that the government intends to continue a very active role in this matter.

To carry out the study of the economic feasibility of a smelter at Pine Point, the government has decided to retain the internationally known firm of Canadian Bechtel Limited.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the minister that I very much appreciate the fact that I was made aware in advance of the announcement to be made by him.

That is a course that should be followed by ministers and that lends itself to more complete and intelligent comment.

I could not be happier over what has taken place with respect to the Pine Point Railway. You will recall, sir, that when we brought about the building of this railway, the northern vision was ridiculed. Indeed, this railway was described in words to the effect that what could happen might well be that there would be a couple of streaks of rust leading into northern areas.

• (11:10 a.m.)

An hon. Member: The Minister of Transport.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to designate any of the hon. gentlemen opposite because I do not want them to blush. They are now doing that which we said should be done.

I am very pleased that our initiative received honourable mention from the minister when he said the government of Canada provided the available capital. There is just one omission in that statement; it was the government of Canada of another day. I also think the proposal that an investigation be made to determine whether a smelter should be built is a good step forward. I suggest to the minister that this company might also be authorized to look into the tremendous potentialities for further expansion, and that a smelter in the Yukon would be but another step along that course toward northern development to which we gave our hopes and expectations and also action when we were in office.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I am sure all hon. members will be pleased with the minister's announcement to the effect that there is to be a considerable increase in the export of ores and concentrates from Pine Point in the Northwest Territories.

This, as the minister has said, will help to increase Canada's foreign exchange and we shall benefit to some extent as a result. However, I think the minister recognizes—and I hope the government recognizes—that the exporting of raw material is not going to make this country rich in the long run. In the extraction industries the amount of employment per unit of invested capital is relatively low. No country ever became rich by exporting its natural resources in their raw state. Employment and wealth come in the long run from the secondary and tertiary stages of development and manufacture.

I am sure the minister is to be congratulated when he says the government is looking into the feasibility of a smelter at Pine Point. I am glad to know that studies are to be made to determine the economic feasibility of this project. However, I would urge that the government give some thought to who will direct and operate the smelter. It seems to me this is an excellent opportunity for the Canada Development Corporation to undertake this project or to undertake it in partnership with a company which has the technical know-how.

Here Canada has an excellent opportunity to develop resources which belong to the crown in such a way that the Canadian people will reap the benefit not only from extracting the raw materials but from processing them here in Canada. I think it would be a great pity if the entire process of extraction and processing were turned over to private companies, particularly if they were private companies located outside Canada. I hope the government will take advantage of this excellent opportunity to develop Canadian resources by Canadians for the benefit of Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, we are indeed very pleased to see that a recently built railroad will be used in the development of our natural resources.

However, we object to this railroad being used precisely to ship our natural resources to other countries.

I therefore urge the minister and the government to consider the idea of a smelter being established as soon as possible, so that we can process our natural resources at home and give employment to our own workers.

We are, I repeat, very pleased with this development concerning our natural resources, but we would like them to be processed here first.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we too join in expressing our satisfaction at this announcement, particularly as it relates to the possible refining within Canada of the ores that form part of our natural resource wealth. It is not possible to comment on the announcement in any detail as I did not receive notice of it. I have just checked with my office, and I believe I did not have prior notice, as did the others.

However, I would make one comment to the minister with respect to our mineral resource wealth in northern Canada. I am speaking of the vast area adjacent to Pine Point which we know as Wood Buffalo national park, an area which has been designated as a national park but which has nothing to do with park purposes. We would hope the minister would also release this area for the development of its natural resources, some of which are very vital and important to our economy.

Again we express satisfaction that this step is being taken, and we hope it is just a beginning in the development of our northern natural resources.

REQUEST FOR LEAVE TO TABLE ORDER IN COUNCIL AND PRESS RELEASE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the house to table copies of order in council P.C 1966-347 dated February 24, relating to final payments by the Canadian Wheat Board with respect to the crop year 1964-65, and a copy of the press release being made by the wheat board today.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the documents to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Clancy: Read them.

Mr. Jorgenson: He is afraid to read them in the house.

Mr. Speaker: There seems to be some difficulty about the minister having obtained permission to table these documents. Suggestions are being made that there is not perhaps unanimous consent. Is it agreed that these documents be tabled?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be ones of consternation that the minister has chosen this course—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we have a slight difficulty at this point. There is no statement made by the minister under the terms of standing order 15(2a), and I wonder whether this would allow representatives or spokesmen for other parties in opposition to make statements at this time.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I may speak to that. Though strictly speaking I agree with the question you have raised, surely the result of following this through would be that if the government did not want anything discussed it would simply file a document containing all the information that the minister otherwise would have given, and the opposition would then be denied the opportunity of making any observations. I suggest that having followed the course of tabling these documents there should be available to the opposition the right to comment.

Mr. Speaker: The understanding of the Chair is that the document could not be filed because it is not a statutory document, and the only thing that could be done at this time is that the minister might table it by unanimous agreement. This is what the minister is doing. He is not making a statement under the terms of standing order 15(2a), and I suggest there should be no debate on this.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well then, Mr. Speaker, to be perfectly clear, there can be no consent to the tabling of a document like this because this deprives us of our rights—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and it is obviously—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there has been some misunderstanding. This is an order in council that the government is asking leave to table, an administrative act of government.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): What about the press release?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Medicine Hat.

• (11:20 a.m.)

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I think the house is entitled to ask the Minister of Finance for some kind of explanation for following this course in making the information available to the house and the Canadian people. I do not think there is any precedent for this. I am sure Your Honour's decision and apprehension about whether there should be a comment when no statement or motion has been made is a very valid position to take, but it seems to me this is a question on which we should have some explanation.

Mr. Speaker: The situation is a bit difficult, in as much as the minister had asked for leave and unanimous consent was given him for tabling—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: This is the understanding of the Chair and this is why, having heard some doubt expressed from the left of the Chair, I took it upon myself to ask again whether there is leave. Otherwise, if there is not agreement in the house in respect of the tabling of these documents, the minister would be in a position where he would have to make a motion and on the motion there would be a division.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I say just one word in explanation. I wish to make it quite clear that what I was tabling today was not a statement I was making, but rather was a statement by the Canadian Wheat Board in Winnipeg.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are doing by the back door what you are afraid to do by the front door.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia asked the minister whether he would let the house know when the payments by the Canadian Wheat Board would be announced, and the minister promised he would announce those payments to the house today.

Mr. Speaker: The matter is simple. If the minister does not have the consent of the house to table these documents and does not wish to make a motion, the documents will not be tabled.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say—

Mr. Speaker: Order. A point of order was raised, a decision has been rendered by the Chair, and the matter is closed.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West) moved that the first report of the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, presented to the house on Tuesday, February 22, 1966, be now concurred in.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I must object to the approval of this report which asks that the committee be allowed to sit while the house is in session. If I were to ask its chairman why he wants this permission, he would tell me it was just in case it was needed. This is something to which we always objected. I recall that when we were in the opposition, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) objected to the move, as did the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) and as I did myself. But we were always defeated.

I know also that several Conservative members who requested it then, admit today that they should not have done so.

I feel that the motion recommending that the committee be allowed to meet while the house is sitting should not have been presented and I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that it is not necessary. If the committee ever feels that it has to meet, it can always come back before the house and ask for leave to do so. We would examine the situation and find out the reason why the committee wants to meet. At present, nobody knows why. Some want to create a tradition which does not exist, and the proof that it does not exist is that we have the right to object when the motion is submitted.

That is why I object to the motion and ask the members of the house to go on record in this connection.

I think it is illogical that we should be obliged to miss the sittings of the house. We have work to do while the committee meets and if we grant the same privilege to all committees, then 22 committees will want to meet while the house is in session and there will be no members left to attend to the business of the house.

That is illogical and should not be allowed. I ask hon. members to reject this motion.

[English]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is so seldom I have the opportunity to support the hon. member for Hull I want to take advantage of it now. What he has said happens to be very correct indeed, because with the multiplicity of committees now set up, if they are all given permission to sit while the house is sitting we are going to be faced with a very difficult situation here in the chamber. We will hear complaints about members not being in attendance here, and the answer to those complaints will be that they are in attendance at committee meetings but that fact will not be obvious to observers and the general public.

I should also like to support the stand that was taken some years ago by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin). I did not understand the force of their arguments then but one can always learn, and I recognize now that they were very wise in the opposition they raised at that time. So, along with the member for Hull and the two hon. gentlemen I have mentioned I should like to add my name in support—

An hon. Member: And the house leader.

Mr. Churchill: Was the house leader there at that time as well? Mr. Speaker, I could not be in better company, and I want to add my support to the objection.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the question that arises in this particular case may not be thoroughly appreciated by the house. The committee on finance is asking for leave to sit while the house is sitting, having arranged for a considerable number of witnesses to appear before it on Tuesday of next week to give evidence relating to a private bill now before that committee.

Mr. Churchill: That is the argument I used a few years ago.

Mr. McIlraith: The question arises as to whether they will complete that evidence in the morning. Personally I hope they do, as I think all hon. members would, so the bill can be dealt with in the morning. However, it may be that they cannot complete that evidence until after 2.30 in the afternoon. In any event it would then be obvious whether they need leave, and the hon. member now making the motion could bring his motion forward when the house opens at 2.30. If it is evident that permission ought to be granted, perhaps we could grant it then. Bearing that in mind, I wonder if the hon. member would agree to let his motion stand on the order paper to be brought forward when it is clear that permission is necessary.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the debate on this motion should be adjourned?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

CANADA FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DISCRIMINATION IN HIRING OLDER WORKERS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-131, to amend the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act (age discrimination).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, the chief purpose of this bill is to prohibit discrimination that is rampant in the hiring, treatment and separation of many capable and experienced older workers between the ages of 40 and 45, in line with the report of the National Employment Service, which points out that one of the greatest barriers facing older people is the policy of many employers to refuse to hire persons of the older age group regardless of whether they are capable of doing an efficient job. I repeat, the purpose of this bill is to prohibit the practice of discrimination in the hiring of older workers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

• (11:30 a.m.)

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION TO PROFESSIONAL SPORTS

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-132, to amend the Combines Investigation Act (professional sports).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, as was made clear on Wednesday, the Combines Investigation Act does not apply to professional sports or, in particular, to the operation of the National Hockey League. This bill will amend the Combines Investigation Act to provide that those who conspire or combine together to limit or restrict the opportunity in Canada of persons to participate in or observe any professional sport and which operates against the public interest shall be guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment for two years.

While this amendment includes all professional sports it is immediately directed at the National Hockey League whose president, Mr. Clarence Campbell, has made it clear that its owners are interested only in their own welfare and not the public interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member to remind him that according to standing order 71(2) he is allowed to make a brief explanation of his bill and not a general explanation of the matter.

Mr. Basford: I respect your wishes, Mr. Speaker, and I think this explanation is brief. I have only one sentence left. This bill would make them—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Basford: —recognize their obligations to the public and to Canada whether they wanted to or not.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DIVORCE

MEASURE TO EXTEND GROUNDS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-133, to extend the grounds upon which courts now having jurisdiction to grant divorces a vinculo matrimonii may grant such relief.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, this bill is identical word for word with the bill introduced in the other place yesterday by the chairman of the divorce committee of the other place. It would extend the grounds for divorce to include desertion without cause for three years, cruelty and incurable insanity in those courts which now have jurisdiction to receive petitions for divorce.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE SENATE

ARE RECENT APPOINTMENTS DESIGNED TO BRING ABOUT REFORM?

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Acting Prime Minister whether Mr. Hazen Argue, who for years was engaged in advocating and supporting the abolition of the Senate before he received this appointment, made it clear that he intended to belong to the suicide squad in the Senate and do his part to abolish that institution; or has he changed his viewpoint in three years?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that this is not a proper question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I always try to ask proper questions. I then ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the appointees who have found their way into the Senate have agreed on reforming that body and thereby carry out the Liberal program in two elections in that regard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some very serious doubts about that question, too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

BREAD

INVESTIGATION UNDER COMBINES ACT INTO PRICE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all have some serious doubts about the reform of the other place, in view of recent happenings.

May I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the statement made by the premier of Saskatchewan in the legislature to the effect that he had been in touch with the President of the Privy Council and had received assurances that an inquiry would be made under the Combines Investigation Act into the increase in the price of bread, I would ask the President of the Privy Council whether he is contemplating such an inquiry and, if so, when it will begin.

Hon. Guy Favreau (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to repeat in this house what I said to the premier of Saskatchewan. This is verbatim what I told him over the telephone; that the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act is aware of the situation and the matter is under study.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the director of investigation is aware of the situation, may I ask whether he has been directed by the President of the Privy Council to immediately institute an inquiry and, if so, when it will begin.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will not mind if I speak in my own language; it is always easier to express oneself.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I discussed the matter with the director of investigation and research, who is now looking into the matter to determine whether or not an investigation is necessary in the circumstances.

GRAIN

METHOD OF ANNOUNCING FINAL PAYMENTS BY WHEAT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. My question involves the rights and privileges of the members of this house. I should like to ask the minister why he chose this method of informing the Canadian people with respect to payments made by the wheat board—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this is not the type of question that can be asked of the Minister of Finance. It seems to me that questions have to be asked of a minister, in this particular instance the Minister of Finance, in his capacity as minister. The question the hon. member is asking does not relate to the minister's functions in that particular capacity.

Mr. Olson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; the Prime Minister has stated in this house a number of times that the Minister of Finance is responsible to parliament for the Canadian Wheat Board, and members ought to have the right to ask this type of question involving that responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Certainly the hon. member has that right, but he is asking a question about the method of tabling documents, and that is not a question which can be accepted at this time.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. Some weeks ago in this house I asked a question of the Prime Minister on the same subject, pointing out that the Minister of Finance had on three occasions up to that time ignored the traditional rights of this house. I asked the Prime Minister whether this was the policy of the government. The words of the Prime Minister were that he would leave this question to you as Speaker.

I suggest that now is the time for Your Honour to take this matter under advisement and give us a ruling on this question, which affects the fundamental right of members of this house to hear reports concerning an agency of the government in the only way we can receive these reports, through the minister. We are not being afforded that right. I would ask on this point of order that the Prime Minister's statement that this question be left in Your Honour's hands be considered, and that Your Honour give us a ruling on this type of procedure.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Further on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Watson) yesterday asked whether the minister would be setting out the rates applicable to grain in the second payment of the wheat board. The wheat board is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance for the first time. Surely the Minister of Finance, who has jurisdiction over the wheat board, should answer the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member that the Minister of Finance has not been asked a question. A point of order or a question of privilege or a grievance has been raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, but he did not ask a question.

Mr. Woolliams: Then may I put a question to the minister, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister disclose to the house what is the price of grain in the second payment by the wheat board, as appears in the material which the minister tried to file this morning?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to do so. I thought it would have helped the house if it had accepted my tabling the documents.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There would have been no argument; that is what you wanted.

Mr. Sharp: The list of prices is several pages long. The statement made by the wheat board today is a public document. The wheat board is competent to issue its own statements in connection with its own operations. I thought it would help the house if we abandoned this procedure of my getting up and announcing what the wheat board has said.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, is the minister now saying that he is not going to answer the question put by the hon. member for Bow River? Instead of making an announcement is he going to leave the members of the house to wait until the newspapers come out in order to see what announcement has been made by the wheat board? Surely this is a completely improper procedure for a minister to adopt. It seems to me that the rules of the house are perfectly clear in this respect.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Douglas: Such a statement should be made in the house.

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the minister when he would be disclosing the final payments, and as reported at page 1708 of Hansard he said:

> Mr. Speaker, the order in council is being approved today and the announcement will be made tomorrow.

So far as procedure is concerned, I have in my hand the announcement that the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a year ago. It is a three page document which was disclosed to the house on motions. I can see no reason for denying the house the privilege of learning right now what is the final wheat payment. One sentence in the statement made last year is as follows, as reported at page 11870 of Hansard for March 2, 1965:

> Never before has so much wheat been handled and moved and sold so quickly and at such high prices.

I suspect that today the farmers have been denied these high prices, and that the minister is afraid to disclose this information.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question then and ask the Minister of Finance what are the prices, and whether they are comparable with last year's.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to answer these questions, and I am sorry the members of the opposition denied me the opportunity of tabling the figures previously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: I have not the slightest hesitation in announcing the prices or the payments, which under the circumstances are excellent. This is the second largest payment in the history of the Canadian Wheat Board. The total amount is $200,107,082. As I say, this is the second largest amount distributed by the wheat board in its history.

Mr. Woolliams: What is the price per bushel?

Mr. Sharp: The average price per bushel was 38.124 cents for wheat other than Durum. For Durum it was 39.579 cents. This is exceeded only by the payments made while this government has been in office, and exceeded only once by a very slight amount when the previous government was in office.

Mr. Starr: So that is why you did not want to tell us.

Mr. Hamilton: Would the minister confirm that the price for grades 3 and 4 last year was approximately 13 cents per bushel higher on both these crucial grades to western farmers?

Mr. Nielsen: He did not want to talk about that.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to answer any questions which hon. gentlemen put to me. I would be very happy to give comparisons not only with last year but with many years, if the house would bear with me.

Let me take, for example, the price of No. 1 northern. In the crop year I am reporting on the price was $1.89, approximately. The previous year it was $1.97; the year before that $1.87; the year before that $1.91. Then when we get back to the great years of the Conservative administration the price was $1.79 and $1.59.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the undertaking in regard to $2 wheat?

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, the contempt with which the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton: —has treated my question is evidenced by the fact that I asked for confirmation from him that the price of No. 3 and

No. 4 last year was 13 cents higher than the price for this year. He then proceeds to go back over the years and tell us about No. 1 wheat, which nobody asked about. I want the minister now to answer the question I asked. Is it true that the price of No. 3 and No. 4 is down approximately 13 cents a bushel this year over last year?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to give the figures for No. 3 northern; I have no hesitation at all. For the crop year 1964-65, upon which the wheat board has reported today, the price was $1.78; the previous year it was $1.91; the year before that $1.82; and the year before that $1.88. Then we get back those great years when it was $1.74 and $1.52.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, last year the minister in his announcement did not go into a preamble in quoting prices of $1.80 and $1.90; he gave us the figures for grades—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly put his question.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Last year the minister gave us the amount of the final payment on each grade. If he would do that today in plain, simple language it would do away with all this fuss which is going on now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, since Your Honour permitted the minister to say that he was sorry the opposition had not permitted him to table the document, I hope you will also permit me to say that I am sorry the minister did not make his announcement on motions in the proper manner, so that comments could have been made and we could have saved a great deal of time.

I want to ask the minister whether he will give us the comparative figures for No. 4 for this year and last year; and has he also a comparative figure of the average for all grades of wheat for this year and last year?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. First of all may I just raise a question of privilege. I really felt, and I have felt for a long time—I have always tried to do this while I have had responsibility for the wheat board—that I should attempt not to confuse the responsibilities of the minister with the responsibilities of the Canadian Wheat Board. I thought it would be a waste of the time of the house for me to read into the record the statement made today by the Canadian Wheat Board. I feel this ought to be the practice to be followed in the future. Therefore I felt the desirable course of action was to table the documents prepared by the Canadian Wheat Board at the same time as the order in council which set out the final prices.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, if the minister is going to debate this matter on a question of privilege, then the opposition have the right to know whether the minister takes the position that as minister responsible for the wheat board he has not the responsibility to make any announcements in this house regarding any statements being made by the wheat board.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam did ask a question, and I suggest that the minister reply to it.

An hon. Member: Try to answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked me about No. 4 northern. The prices for the year that I was making the announcement about are $1.72 approximately; the previous year $1.85; then $1.74, $1.82, back to $1.69 and then $1.47. These are the prices for the past six years.

Mr. Douglas: What is the average for all grades?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no information about this, but I ask the minister, in view of his statement as to the responsibilities of the minister, did he issue any press release today himself?

Mr. Sharp: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He did not? Then there is no foundation for that?

Mr. Sharp: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is fine.

Mr. Sharp: So that there is no misunderstanding, in Winnipeg today the wheat board published the statement that I endeavoured to table here today.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF SENATE ABOLITION LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works in his capacity as house leader. Would the minister consider making arrangements some time today for time to consider Bill C-15, so that we might finish the job on the Senate which the government did on it yesterday.

FISHERIES

IMPLEMENTATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING BASE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I wish to direct a question, Mr. Speaker, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On February 24 the Minister of Fisheries announced control measures to regulate sealing operations on the Atlantic coast, and the new regulations prohibited the taking or killing of hood seals in the entire gulf of St. Lawrence region. On May 20, 1964, the Secretary of State for External Affairs introduced Bill No. S-17 dealing with Canada's territorial waters. He said that when the bill comes into effect the governor in council will be authorized to draw straight base lines.

Since the announcement of the Minister of Fisheries states that a base line has been drawn from Channel Head near Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, to Scartarie light off the northeastern tip of Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, and no one can kill or take seals in this area—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is not properly put. I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps there is a question which should be asked which might be a matter of urgency but the hon. member is really prefacing the question by a rather lengthy argument.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I prefaced my remarks so the minister would understand what I was trying to bring before the house. The question is this. Does this drawing of base lines imply that the government is now ready to implement Bill No. S-17, defining via base lines the internal waters of Canada?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): That, of course, cannot be done, as my hon. friend I think will appreciate, until we have completed our negotiations with the other countries concerned. The straight base lines have to be drawn from points that are based in turn on an acceptance of the position Canada takes with regard to waters which come within Canadian jurisdiction.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NORTH PACIFIC—IMPROPER PRACTICES BY JAPANESE AND U.S. FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask him whether he has given consideration to that rather full and comprehensive brief of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union on the Pacific Coast. Is the minister in agreement with the allegation in that brief, for instance, that there has been a considerable reduction in the production of salmon and halibut because of most improper practices in deep sea fishing by Japanese and also by United States fishermen in the Alaska area? May I ask what the government intends to do in that connection?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this is a very long question. It would require a very long and detailed answer. I shall try to make the reply as brief as possible.

On Tuesday I had a meeting with the delegation which was here all week. We had a very profitable meeting, and I understand that the secretary of the group with which I met, issued yesterday a press release which deals thoroughly with the discussions that took place.

Having regard to the reduction in salmon and halibut production in the Pacific, I suggest that this is a matter presently being given serious consideration by those countries participating in the north Pacific treaty which is now under negotiation. Reference was made to the fact the U.S.S.R. should be invited to join this treaty, and I stated that personally I had no objection but that Canada would not take a unilateral position in this regard. The treaty is a tripartite treaty concerning all three countries, and if and when the U.S.S.R. is invited to join it will have to be done by the three nations which take part in this treaty.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister bring before the tripartite committee the suggestion that the U.S.S.R. be invited to join it?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which is being considered by the three nations which comprise the north Pacific treaty. As I suggested before in this house, the time may not be ripe to invite the U.S.S.R. because a principle of abstention is involved. Unless we can confirm that the U.S.S.R. is prepared to abide by this principle, then it would depend on Canada, United States and Japan to extend such an invitation. This is a matter under consideration, and when the three nations become convinced that the U.S.S.R. is accepting those principles then personally I will be prepared to state that it could be to the advantage of all countries concerned to have a four party treaty instead of a tripartite treaty.

[Later:]

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Public Works. It relates to an earlier question put to the Minister of Fisheries in connection with the delegation of west coast fishermen. Has the minister yet met this delegation, and if not would he consider meeting with them before they return?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether it is in order during the question period for hon. members to ask whether ministers have met delegations, or propose to meet delegations. I suggest this is not a matter of such urgency that the question should be allowed at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REPORTED STATEMENTS BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, this is a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question is, does Canada act as spokesman on behalf of India, Burma, Ceylon and Malaysia with respect to all matters concerning the current Viet Nam situation? Second, is it indeed the view of the government that the Viet Nam situation will soon be resolved into a state similar to the Cuban situation?

Mr. Speaker, I ask these questions in view of a statement reported in the Edmonton Journal of last Tuesday, alleged to have been made by the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister who was also formerly chairman of the external affairs committee of this house. The statement is alleged to have been made when speaking to students at the University of Alberta.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement to which my hon. friend draws attention. Canada, of course, does not speak for the countries he mentioned. India is a member of the commission, and while there are co-operative exchanges between members of the commission, this does not involve the adoption by one country of the foreign policy position of another. Likewise, Burma and Malaysia are independent countries, and as my hon. friend well knows are capable of expressing, and do express, their own independent positions.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister then answer my second question. Is it now the view of the government that the present Viet Nam situation will soon be resolved into a state similar to that of the Cuban situation.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I was wondering if the minister would simply state that the reported statement of the parliamentary secretary was completely inaccurate and wholly irresponsible.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend well knows that I will not do that. I have not seen the statement. When I do see the statement I shall be glad to give my judgment about its contents.

Mr. Nesbitt: I shall ask the question again.

[Later:]

Mr. Churchill: I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask him whether the statement made in Edmonton by the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Leeds, is an accurate representation of the views of the present government. His statement, in quotation marks, was "We have to stumble to a stalemate." Is this the course which the government is following not only with regard to South Viet Nam but with regard to other problems?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I were a politically minded man—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —I would say that the words used by my hon. friend apply precisely to the former administration.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ASSISTANCE IN VIRUS PNEUMONIA EPIDEMIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria, (B.C.)): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Health and Welfare to which perhaps his parliamentary secretary may wish to reply in his absence. I just wish to ask if there is a reply to the question which the minister took on notice yesterday.

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): In the absence of the minister I should like to say that officials of the department have been in direct contact with the United States public health service and with the provincial health department concerning the influenza outbreak in the United States and British Columbia.

We have received samples for examination from British Columbia, and we are prepared to offer every assistance in regard to a possible immunization program if considered advisable in consultation with British Columbia health officials.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

COMBINES

GASOLINE—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question to direct to the President of the Privy Council. I should like to ask him whether the director of research and investigation under the Combines Investigation Act is contemplating an investigation into retail gasoline prices and the control of such prices by the petroleum companies.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that the hon. member place this question on the order paper.

Mr. Lewis: With the greatest respect to Your Honour, it is not many minutes ago that a question was directed to the President of the Privy Council with regard to an investigation into the price of bread. It is probably my dullness, but I cannot see any difference in principle between the price of bread and the price of gasoline.

Mr. Speaker: But the Chair saw a difference between the price of bread and the price of gasoline. The Chair was under the impression, and still is, that the former question was more urgent; moreover, it was phrased in a way which conveyed a sense of immediate urgency. As to the second question, if the hon. member feels there is the same urgency attached to it he might ask that it be debated on the adjournment motion.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SPORTS

HOCKEY—SIGNING OF PLAYERS UNDER 18 YEARS OF AGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question is intended for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the current move by the Alberta legislature to make it illegal for the United States-oriented National Hockey League to sign a contract with any boy under 18 years of age, is the government intending to take similar action—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This does not appear to be a matter so urgent that it might not be placed on the order paper.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

RECOGNITION OF GOVERNMENTS FOLLOWING REVOLUTION OR REBELLION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In a radio broadcast last night the hon. gentleman indicated in connection with a reference to Ghana that the practice of the Canadian government in recognizing de facto regimes in commonwealth countries differed from the practice in recognizing countries which are not members of the commonwealth, and that Canada recognized in the commonwealth a de facto regime which seemed to be in control of affairs. Is there a difference between Ghana and Nigeria and Rhodesia in this regard?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This question was raised by the Leader of the Opposition on one recent occasion when he questioned whether it is customary to recognize new commonwealth governments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After revolutions and rebellions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): After revolutions. I pointed out at that time that this had not been the practice, but that the British government in the particular case had withheld recognition, later according it. The practice of recognition of governments of commonwealth countries is not precisely the same as in the case of countries outside the commonwealth. In many instances recognition is accorded automatically. In respect of cases such as that which occurred in Ghana yesterday, the practice is developing of carrying on with the government which has taken over, but according no formal act until some interval has elapsed. We shall carry on with the present arrangement for Ghana. Whether there will be any formal act will depend on information which is not now before us.

Mr. Lambert: Will this apply also to Rhodesia?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Rhodesia, of course, is a colony.

Mr. Lambert: What a fine distinction.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, it is a distinction.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs could answer the question I put to him yesterday relating to Uganda, in the light of what is taking place there at the present time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the case of Uganda there is, of course, a difference. There has been no coup d'état. The prime minister has taken over full powers of administration, the constitution has been suspended, and it is reported that Prime Minister Obote will carry on with an advisory council.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I have a question for the Minister of Transport arising out of the fact that there still exists a vacancy in the Senate from the province of Newfoundland. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he will meet the delegation from the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union before that vacancy has been filled.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There seems to be a non sequitur in this question.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could he tell us whether the Leader of the Opposition agrees with his friend, Mr. Daniel Johnson, who suggested that Mr. Hugues Lapointe was the last Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RIGHT OF MEMBER FOR MONTMAGNY-L'ISLET TO VOTE IN HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works as house leader.

I should like to ask him if he was informed that the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, Hon. Frédéric Dorion, has rendered judgment in the petition presented by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet and has recommended—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Yukon on this matter, and the Chair will be given an opportunity at the beginning of the week to express an opinion about it and invite the house to take whatever action it may wish to take.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rinfret in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Legal and other services—

1. Administration including the office of the superintendent of bankruptcy, grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates, gratuities to the widows or such dependents as may be approved by treasury board of judges who die while in office and authority to make recoverable advances for the administration of justice on behalf of the governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $2,504,300.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Estimates of the Department of Justice, vote No. 1. Shall vote No. 1 carry?

• (12:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, this has been an excellent debate so far although we are still waiting to hear from the government on some of the important issues that have been raised. I do not know whether I can take the debate to the same degree of rhetorical exuberance that it reached yesterday, but I do want to comment on an extraordinary statement made by the hon. member for York East. He said there were many serious problems in connection with the administration of justice in Canada and went on to say, as found on page 1730 of Hansard of February 24:

> I was not surprised to find some reaction to the proposal to split the department into two. I admire this move. I think this is reform because at least it is a change.

I know of nothing which indicates more the attitude of the government toward reform, namely, that all it needs to do is split departments into two.

During the course of the question period just ended I heard some comment about the government's stumbling and I think that is a pretty fair description. But even more than that, when the government has to face a problem it seems that its usual reaction is to fly into a fury of uncontrolled inaction and do nothing, something like a yo-yo, up and down, up and down but always in the same spot, never moving and never achieving any result.

I also heard the comments of the Minister of Justice concerning some of the serious questions raised respecting bankruptcy. The suggestion was made that this was a matter which could well be left to the provinces. I realize that so far as the Criminal Code is concerned—any member of the bar who has practised before the criminal courts will bear me out on this—by constitutional practice and by custom there is left to the provincial administrations acting through the various Attorneys General the prosecution of criminal cases, especially those arising under the Criminal Code. It is also a known fact, however, that with regard to matters coming under other federal statutes, for example, the Excise Act, the Narcotic Act and the Immigration Act, the almost invariable practice is for the Minister of Justice to appoint counsel who prepares these cases and prosecutes where necessary.

An examination of the Bankruptcy Act indicates that a large number of matters are referred to which constitute offences under that act, and the practice has been followed that such matters be referred to appropriate counsel. Those of us who were here in the last parliament know there are counsel appointed by the Minister of Justice. We all had a chance to examine a very interesting list which was prepared by another minister of the Crown who has since gone on to a higher position and we know that the list included the names of those who were agents of the Minister of Justice. Therefore I assume there are competent counsel in this country, and if there are offences under this act I suggest it is through the medium of the minister and his officials that these prosecutions should take place.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the utmost use will be made of the standing committee which has been set up. I am not referring to the select committee which the Solicitor General mentioned but the standing committee which will be dealing with various matters concerning the administration of justice, no matter under whose department they may fall.

There has been reluctance on the part of the Prime Minister to refer the matter of Mr. Spencer to a royal commission. I shall deal with that later. But even though I am not a member of the standing committee, although I hope to exercise my rights to appear before it from time to time and conduct certain examinations, I trust that the committee, if it sees its duty as I see it, will call Mr. Spencer before it, as it has every right to do, when it is examining the estimates of the department for the fiscal year 1966-67. I see no barrier to the committee calling Mr. Spencer before it and conducting a thorough and careful examination of all the facts about which hon. members, particularly members of the opposition, have shown such great concern.

If no other medium is established, I also hope the committee will call before it the superintendent of bankruptcy and such other officials as it sees fit. This is not a matter that needs to be referred to the committee by the house. As I understand the rules and practice under which these committees are constituted, there will be a mandatory reference of the estimates to the committee and during the process of examination of those estimates there are sure to be items under which it will be possible to call these people for that close and detailed examination which is so essential in order that the people of the country can be reassured, if it is possible to reassure them, about these serious matters that have come to light.

I now wish to talk about the Combines Investigation Act, which was discussed yesterday. I understand this is a matter which comes strictly within the purview of the President of the Privy Council.

During the time he was minister of justice I asked him one or two questions, both on estimates and orders of the day, which indicated that in my opinion, from an examination of the jurisprudence in this field, there was great doubt whether the constitutional practice of resting the operations of the Combines Investigation Act and the restrictive trade practices jurisdiction on the Criminal Code was satisfactory. True enough, I know that decisions of the past have suggested this may have been proper at that time, but my recollection is that the minister intimated to me that he and his officials were giving serious consideration to deciding whether or not the jurisdiction could be broadened by invoking the provisions of the B.N.A. Act, section 91, under the head, "the regulation of trade and commerce".

I do not know to what extent this has progressed, but from an examination of the decided cases and having in mind the purpose for which this legislation was designed I believe that it has failed to achieve what we set out to obtain many years ago when the legislation was first introduced.

In this connection an interesting article appeared in the last edition of the Alberta Law Quarterly. It is by Professor MacDonald, assistant professor of the faculty of law at Queens University. At page 67 of the Quarterly he deals at length with the question of criminality and the Canadian anticombines law. I shall not go into detail. He makes some very prudent observations, and an examination of the article supports the view I take that if we are going to use this type of measure effectively we will have to proceed on a much wider basis.

I am not here to suggest how this might be done. It may be essential to have consultation with the provincial governments to see whether or not the constitution is in fact a rigid barrier to the type of jurisdiction we need. There may have to be consultation with the provinces to see if they will lend their efforts and we might have some kind of joint program. I am inclined to think—and I mention this with diffidence because I dealt with the subject some few days ago—that it may be possible now.

• (12:20 p.m.)

I think it is a known fact that the Supreme Court is now the final arbiter in matters of constitutional practice in this country. As I understand the view expressed by some of the judges of the Supreme Court and the Privy Council, they are not necessarily bound by the decisions of the past. In other words, the principle of stare decisis is not a principle which should apply to constitutional matters. I should like to see the most careful review of the combines legislation to see whether it can be effective and to see whether there may be some measure of control without attaching the stigma of unreality in matters which involve decisions which have to be made by large corporations and which can have a very serious and detrimental effect on the people of this country.

I think the way we should approach it is to consider whether or not we should broaden the jurisdiction by invoking the trade and commerce section of the B.N.A. Act. Some time or other I would ask the President of the Privy Council to give us his view and indicate the extent to which the investigation by his officials, which he indicated to me would take place has progressed.

I should like to deal very briefly with one other matter before I revert to the Spencer case. During the course of the report of the Auditor General reference was made on several occasions by this official to the fact that in his opinion there had been a number of breaches of the Judges Act by reason of the practice which has grown up of providing for judges who are appointed to various tribunals a measure of financial consideration which is designated as being a cost of living allowance. As the ministers know, it is quite definite that the Judges Act provides that there shall be no remuneration given to an occupant of the bench over and above his salary. The Auditor General's opinion—he has had access to counsel in Toronto and in Montreal—is buttressed by the report he has received from these people, as well as by the recommendation of the Public Accounts Committee, to the effect that the payment of sums in the amount of say $100 a day contains an element of remuneration which is contrary and repugnant to the provisions of the Judges Act.

This may be a small issue, Mr. Chairman, but the government comes to the people in an effort to secure the greatest measure of law and order. It is for it to put its house in order in every way and certainly, sir, a suggestion which has been made on several occasions that judges occupying the positions they do have not been following the law because of this fact is, I think, something which should be considered by the department.

I should like to deal now with the Spencer case. I think it is a tremendous tribute to this parliament and to this country that this poor unfortunate individual, for whom I hold no brief, has had his case ventilated in the fullest detail or at least to some extent. As a result of a request made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and the members of the opposition the Prime Minister made a statement with regard to Mr. Spencer. It is a statement I do not accept, but at least he was compelled to make the statement. I already have suggested that in my opinion, inasmuch as the Prime Minister has indicated that no inquiry will be held, that we at least should have the benefit of Mr. Spencer's appearance before the standing committee. I see no reason that this should not be done and therefore I will reserve any further comments on the question of the rightness of the action taken in the hope, in which I hope I will be supported by members of the house, that he will be appearing before the committee.

I do want to say something with regard to what I think is a very serious by-product of this case. I have noted some of the interventions made during the course of this session in respect of the Spencer case. The first time it was brought up was on January 21 when the Leader of the Opposition asked the Minister of Justice to comment on it. At that time the minister made what I considered an extraordinary statement supporting and corroborating the position he had taken on a television broadcast, which might have been excused at that time under the circumstances that prevailed but which I hardly think could be excused when given calmly and deliberately in response to a question in the house. The minister said as found on page 85 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, there is no specific law or statute that covers the question of surveillance; it flows from the ordinary administration of the law by law enforcement officers.

Then the minister went on to deal further with this matter. I was prompted to ask the Prime Minister as a supplementary question whether he asserted on behalf of the government that a general right exists to scrutinize and keep under surveillance any citizen on the basis of what the government thinks that citizen may do in the future. This line of thought on the part of the government, which is clearly indicated and clearly delineated in those questions and answers was followed further by the Minister of Justice on January 31 as recorded on page 425 of Hansard where he made this statement:

> As to surveillance, I said, in the course of a television program, that there would be surveillance on this man as long as he remains in Canada. It would be irresponsible not to keep such a man under surveillance fitted to the needs of the case. As already mentioned, security operations are primarily preventive in nature and success must often depend on surveillance.

Further comments were then made. Again, Mr. Chairman, on February 8 the Minister of Justice, in response to a question by the right

hon. Leader of the Opposition, said—Hansard, page 876:

> I am not aware that Mr. Spencer has asked for a visa to leave Canada. As far as surveillance is concerned, as I have mentioned on several occasions surveillance is maintained on Mr. Spencer as the case requires. No decision has yet been made as to whether a judicial inquiry will be held in this case.

Again, on February 9 in response to a question again asked by the Leader of the Opposition the Minister of Justice said—Hansard, page 964:

> Mr. Speaker, I have no information concerning a visa being asked for by Mr. Spencer. I have never said Mr. Spencer was dangerous to the state.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister in making his statement on February 23 said —Hansard, page 1683:

> The surveillance which has been exercised over Mr. Spencer in his own interest as well as in the public interest has been adapted to the requirements of this particular situation.

In my opinion I consider that these statements taken together constitute an extraordinary approach on the part of the government to their rights. My considered opinion is that the type of surveillance envisaged in this case is just as much an infringement of liberty as it would be to take Mr. Spencer or anyone else and put him in jail. True enough, the jails are full of people but they are full of people who have been convicted of offences which this parliament and the legislatures of the ten provinces have decided were acts contrary to public interest and have so declared after debate in which all persons have had an opportunity to participate. They have become the law of the land and the people who are in jail are in jail because they have been convicted of an offence in that way.

• (12:30 p.m.)

A careful and detailed examination of the provisions of the Criminal Code and the Official Secrets Act indicates that there is the widest possible latitude on the part of the government and government officials if they see fit to take the steps necessary to prevent the commission of any criminal offence or threat of any offence recognized by and denoted under the Official Secrets Act. When I hear the Prime Minister of this country and the Minister of Justice indicate that in their view the executive has an inherent right to place any individual under continuous surveillance such as is envisaged here, I suggest it is high time that this parliament interested itself and sought from the Prime Minister and the minister some better answer than has been given today.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was the first reference made to the fact that this was being done for his own protection?

Mr. Baldwin: The question has been asked when the suggestion was first raised that this surveillance was being carried out for the protection of the individual. So far as my research has indicated, the first reference was made by the Prime Minister in his statement to the house the other day.

I suggest there are enough encroachments on individual liberties today. Some of them are essential, some of them are covered by legislation such as the Customs Act, the Excise Act, the Immigration Act, and the War Measures Act if it is ever invoked. However, these are all matters in respect of which parliament has spoken.

I should like the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice before this debate is concluded to indicate to the house whether it is their view that the executive of this country, represented by the cabinet and their appointed officials, have the right to place any individual under the type of surveillance that is envisaged here without going through the due process of law under the authority of a statute which this parliament has made. It might well be that I might choose to make an inflammatory speech in this house. Does that mean that I could be followed or placed under continuous surveillance? Hon. gentlemen may say that such an idea is farfetched. I do not think it is because the principle is precisely the same. I hope that before this debate is concluded we will be given a clear and precise answer with regard to this serious situation.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the house and the hon. gentleman who just rose in anticipation of being the next speaker that my remarks will be fairly brief. Not being a member of the legal profession I normally prefer, during the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Justice, to sit and listen to the members of the house who because of their vocations are necessarily much more familiar with the Department of Justice, the administration of justice and all the other legal involvements that are confusing to the average backbencher.

That does not mean, Mr. Chairman, that I have been unable to appreciate the debate thus far. I share the view of the hon. member who has just taken his seat that in general the calibre of speeches made since our consideration of the estimates of the Department of Justice began has been on a fairly high plane. I suppose they have been of interest to me because each and every speaker has added to my limited store of knowledge about the Department of Justice and the administration of justice in Canada. I must admit at the outset that I have a very limited knowledge of what is basically federal and what is basically provincial jurisdiction.

I was particularly impressed by the contribution of the hon. member for Kamloops, in fact, to the extent that I re-read his speech this morning. Not only did it reflect a thorough knowledge of the Department of Justice, not only did it contain what I thought were very objective criticisms of the department, but it could be considered as a lesson to the average member who wants to make an effective and objective contribution to the debate. I say this because there was a lot of meat in the speech made by that hon. member and because it was delivered without the belligerence that unfortunately a lot of us think is necessary to make a speech effective.

I cannot help but contrast the depth of the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops with the speech I was privileged to hear a little earlier delivered by the hon. member for Bow River, my old sparring partner of last session. I should like to refer to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops a little later in my speech if time permits.

I should like particularly to make reference to one paragraph which I think is valid in that it points out the dangers that may result from the exercise of legal authority within the Department of Justice. I intend to read that paragraph from Hansard because I think in it the hon. member for Kamloops implies very strongly that some of the problems that faced the former minister of justice leading to the Dorion inquiry could easily have been avoided had there been a form of mechanism within the department for the exchange of information, perhaps through joint meetings of the officers of the various branches that make up the ministry of justice.

This paragraph is very important so far as I am concerned because it explains to me why no action was taken against Hal Banks between the years 1958 and 1962. I do not suggest this in a sarcastic manner but rather objectively because although I am not a lawyer I realize there is a very sharp line of distinction between what is immoral and what is considered under the law to be illegal.

The hon. member for Peace River made a very excellent speech a few minutes ago regarding what is commonly referred to as the Spencer case. It contained much food for thought and emphasized what I have sought to emphasize when speaking in this House of Commons on occasion, the rights of individuals no matter how humble they may be. If a man like Spencer cannot have his case presented in the House of Commons, the highest court of the land, where can he turn for protection? If this high court becomes so callous that we are not interested in the rights of the individual it is time for us to sit back and take stock. The individual to whom I refer could be a Spencer or a Banks, and I am sure that the lawyers of this house, who are not as emotionally involved in personalities because of their background and training, can understand this point better than I.

Before I lose the trend of my thought I should like to make the original point I intended to make in this debate, and I draw it to the attention of the minister. I have had more than one constituent come to me with complaints of a similar nature, not because I am a lawyer but because I am a member of parliament like every other member of the house. I should like to give one example. Approximately three weeks ago a young man of 34 years of age, married and with three children, a man devoted to recreational activities in the community, active in one of our social welfare organizations, a man who has worked extremely hard for the company which employs him, suddenly realized that his hard work was to be recognized and that he was to be promoted from an average position to one of trust within his company.

He had worked for this company for 12 years and had an impeccable record. However, he found to his amazement that because of his new position of trust the company had gone back into his record—they felt this to be necessary despite his 12 years of service—and after a thorough investigation of this young man's past had discovered that at the age of 19 he had been arrested and convicted of a common assault which occurred outside a Montreal nightclub. At that time the young man served a few days in prison. That blot is still on his record 15 years after the offence. His crime against society is no greater than that.

Being a belligerent Irishman, Mr. Chairman, I can recall half a dozen occasions when but for the grace of God my name would also have been in the permanent files of the R.C.M.P. This man has not only been refused promotion but it has been suggested that in the opinion of the pompous board of directors he should find another position in the next 60 days. This is not an isolated case; this sort of situation has been brought to my attention on half a dozen occasions. This is not the case of a man who has broken the law two, three, four or five times thereby establishing a pattern or a tendency to become a criminal. It is the case of a man who has broken the law once and that once when he was a teen-ager.

When one inquires around parliament one is told that there may be a way in which his record can be cleansed. But is there a way? If there is a way, why do we have to be furtive about it? Why do we not amend the laws of the land to make some provision to cleanse the record of a young man or girl who after an offence has served society well for five or ten years and has not shown any tendency to repeat an act of violence or break the laws of the land? In those circumstances why cannot their criminal record be wiped out as is done in the case of juveniles? I am not a lawyer, Mr. Chairman, and cannot even offer a suggestion because I feel very inadequate at the moment.

I should like to refer to another case which came to my attention last Friday. This case affects me deeply. I arrived home as usual at 20 minutes to eight and as usual the telephone rang at 15 minutes to eight. A distraught mother had called to inform me that her young son had been arrested two hours earlier and she could not get sufficient information with regard to what would happen to her boy. So I went to the local police station and found that her son together with four other boys of my community had been detained or arrested, whichever is the correct word, for breaking into the local high school.

After breaking into the high school they had thrown school books around, stolen 92 cents and finally, very unfortunately, had set fire to a wing of the school. The fire resulted in considerable material damage. Certainly they should have been picked up and detained or arrested. But what concerns me more, and I have no answer for this problem, is that I found on investigating the matter with the police that this young man 15 years of age, who as far as I understand comes from a normal home and is one of three or four children, was first arrested or detained—I do not know the right word when talking about juveniles—in the community of Verdun at the age of 10 and was re-arrested at the age of 12 and again at the age of 14. At the time of this last offence he was 15.

Considered by themselves each of these charges was perhaps not too serious but I feel they denote a pattern of behaviour if this is the word to use. To a father of a boy of 12 who has just discovered "Treasure Island" or "Huckleberry Finn" it seems inconceivable that a youngster of 10 or 12 years of age can run afoul of the law. But it happens. What disturbs me more as a father is the fact that, this tendency to rebel against society having been discovered in this young man at the age of 10 or 12, nothing had been done about it. It is all very well to say it is the parents' fault, and perhaps it is. But it is also our fault because if young children of 10 or 12 commit this type of offence there should be some medium at our disposal whereby they can be helped. The medium may be either provincial or federal but something should be done to prevent this type of conduct in the future on the part of a young person and find out what is troubling him.

The thought went through my mind as I sat in that cold, dirty police station discussing this question that, if something is not done for this boy who is only 15 years of age, by the time he is 17, 19 or 21 he may be arrested on a charge of murder committed while holding up a drug store. It was at that moment I came to the conclusion that when we vote in this house on the question of capital punishment I shall vote for the abolition of the death sentence. I shall do this because somewhere along the line we have failed that young person of 10 or 12 years of age. Not only did his parents fail him but so did society.

I am not criticizing the social welfare courts of Quebec. I have a great deal to do with them as a private citizen looking after my constituents, more particularly as an alderman than as a member of the house. I have been filled with admiration for two judges whom I have no hesitation naming, Judge Long and Judge Nicholson. The last time I saw them they were working in cramped quarters; they were overworked, overburdened, overtaxed. They bear a heavy burden day in and day out because of problems such as this.

I say to the members of the legal profession in this house that there is something wrong when this sort of situation exists. There has to be a better way of dealing with a juvenile of 10, 12 or 13. Perhaps I have no right to raise this question or challenge the authorities to find an answer because I do not have any answer. I do not even know where to start. My contact with this segment of society is limited, unlike the contact of members of the legal profession.

I leave this matter with the ministers responsible as food for thought. It is time we developed a more acute conscience and stopped paying lip service to the problem by saying, "Let the schoolteachers rectify the situation" or "What do you expect? This boy comes from a broken home." The answer is not in building more penitentiaries, making them bigger, more spacious and mollycoddling a person aged 25 or 30 who is sent to penitentiary. The problem begins when a little boy of 10 is picked up for stealing a package of gum or because he showed his resentment of school by breaking into it, not breaking out of it.

I come back to the words of the hon. member for Kamloops who pointed out, I think quite reasonably and accurately, that whether we have one Minister of Justice or the jurisdiction is split into two or three fields the government and the ministers concerned must make certain that one hand knows what the other is doing. The hon. member stressed the point that the advisers of the department must know what the R.C.M.P. reports are all about. I will not read the passage at length. Hon. members can find the words at page 1725 of Hansard. I believe I have properly paraphrased the words used by the hon. member or he would have corrected me.

This brings me back to the Banks affair, to which the hon. member for Bow River likes to refer when he is running out of material of a more serious nature. As reported at page 11406 of Hansard for last year the then hon. member for Carleton, Mr. Francis, asked a series of questions about Hal Banks. There were eight questions in all. These eight questions established the fact that the insidious problem of the bully, Hal Banks, was apparent to the Department of Justice as early as 1958.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. Mackasey: I will at the end. Unlike the hon. member for Bow River, to whom words come easily, I want to continue my main thought, but I will be sitting down in a moment.

Mr. Woolliams: All right; I will ask my question at the end.

Mr. Mackasey: The point I tried to make earlier was that there is a distinction between having suspicions against a man and charging a man. The department must feel certain they can convict him, even though everyone in Canada knows that the man is morally irresponsible and morally guilty, before they charge him. I imagine there would be a distinction in the mind of the layman between being morally guilty and being suspected guilty, if my English explains my thought properly.

From listening to the hon. member for Kamloops yesterday I would say, though I am only guessing, that when he discussed the R.C.M.P. reports on Hal Banks between 1958 and 1962 he did so, as he said yesterday—I am not contradicting his words—with the senior officers of his department and came to the conclusion that no matter how advisable and wonderful it would be to bring Mr. Banks to justice and to prosecute him on the evidence then available, nevertheless in his opinion and in the opinion of the law officers of the land there was not sufficient evidence to do so.

I applaud the then Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Kamloops, for not bowing to public opinion and bringing Hal Banks before the courts of the land when in his opinion and in view of the advice which he sought and received there was not sufficient evidence to convict this man. That requires courage.

Mr. Fulton: That is why we appointed the royal commission.

Mr. Mackasey: I agree, and I am coming to that. That was in 1963, two months after we were elected.

Mr. Woolliams: No; it was appointed under the Conservatives.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Mackasey: It is not—

The Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member mind resuming his seat. The hon. member has 30 minutes allotted to him to make his speech. He has asked to finish his speech and if there is time at the end questions may be asked. The hon. member for Verdun has the floor.

Mr. Woolliams: Then let him set out the facts properly.

Mr. Mackasey: As usual the hon. member for Bow River has to have the last word and

I concede it to him. We are all friends here. If he wants me to criticize the speech he made yesterday I can do so effectively but it was not an important enough speech for me to devote my time to it. I am more interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Kamloops.

What I am trying to say is that it takes courage not to bow to political expediency. If it took four years for the Conservative government to set up a royal commission to investigate the affairs of Hal Banks, knowing the reputation of the then minister of justice I am sure there would have been no hesitation on his part in 1958, 1959, 1960 or 1961 to bring Hal Banks to justice if in his opinion there had been sufficient evidence upon which to do so. I am sure he felt in his own mind that morally the man was guilty of something but that to prove it was another matter. Therefore I commend his restraint in those days.

I think that is borne out by anyone who refers to the answers to the questions posed by the then member for Carleton. I do not want to take too much time on this matter but the first question he asked, as reported at page 11406 of Hansard for February 17, 1965, was:

Did the Department of Justice, in 1958, through the R.C.M.P., conduct an investigation to determine if Hal Banks had been employing intimidation and violence in the furtherance of union activities?

The answer was:

Yes. In November, 1958, the Minister of Justice instructed the R.C.M.P. to conduct an exploratory investigation—and so on and so forth.

The second question was:

Did the government on February 23, 1959, as a result of the aforementioned investigation, receive a full account of the conspiracy which resulted in the Walsh beatings?

The answer was:

The R.C.M.P. advise that on February 23, 1959, they forwarded a preliminary report to the Minister of Justice, under secret cover, outlining the findings of their investigation into the activities of Hal Banks, which included an account of the conspiracy to beat Captain Walsh.

The third question was:

Was any action taken by the government of that day to bring Banks to trial as a result of that evidence?

The simple answer was "No".

I come to another question:

Was another report, which included a further account of the Walsh conspiracy, sent on June 14, 1961, to the government by the Department of Justice?

[Mr. Mackasey.]

The answer was:

The R.C.M.P. advise that on June 14, 1961, they forwarded a further report to the Minister of Justice, under secret cover, which enlarged on their findings with respect to Hal Banks and the general picture of the S.I.U. activities, including further information with respect to the beating of Captain Walsh.

The rest of the questions go on to lead up to the establishement of the royal commission which investigated the disruption and problems of the waterfront. I find no fault with the fact that it took three or four years to establish the commission or that the minister of justice of that day did not feel the time for action was appropriate. But the hon. member for Bow River has constantly harped on Hal Banks and his relationship with the Liberal party, intimating to those who do not know differently that the Liberal government in some way conspired to keep Hal Banks in Canada.

The hon. member for Bow River will get up and say: "That is not my point at all. My point is, how did he get bail and then get out of the country?"

I say to the hon. member for Bow River that Hal Banks, regardless of who he was and regardless of his record, as an individual was entitled to the full protection of the law, as is Mr. Spencer with regard to whom the hon. member for Bow River made an eloquent and moving address two days ago. According to the judge who presided at the trial, Hal Banks was entitled to bail. I have only to quote once more the words of the hon. member for Bow River, words with which I agree—I agree with him more often than I disagree—in which he emphasized the importance of maintaining the independence of the judicial system in Canada. Yet he averred yesterday that the judge, through some devious means used by our party—the hon. member kept referring to shoving things under the rug—conspired to give this man not only bail but to see that after he got bail he left the country. However, the fact remains that Mr. Banks was entitled to bail. The judge was also entitled to set bail. Hal Banks was entitled to the same rights that Mr. Spencer should enjoy as an ordinary, common citizen of this country.

The hon. member referred yesterday to Dr. Marcoux and also to one of the ministers on the front bench. He might have gone all the way and said the present Minister of Transport. What are the facts? Hon. members want all the facts. They can read the speech made by the hon. member for Lapointe last night. The facts may be embarrassing not to this party but to the hon. gentleman's party. I thought that this was all part of good old electioneering and I was a little surprised when the hon. member brought the matter up in the house of Commons.

The fact remains that Dr. Marcoux made very serious allegations which should have been investigated.

Mr. Woolliams: Right.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member for Bow River, who is an excellent lawyer, says "Right". But he did not take the trouble to tell the house that these allegations were investigated by the present minister of justice for the province of Quebec, Mr. Claude Wagner, who, whether we like him or not, whether we consider him controversial or not, has the courage of his own convictions and does not give a damn—if I may use that expression in this house—whether he embarrasses Dr. Marcoux, his party, the Liberal party or any party for that matter.

When Dr. Marcoux went up and down the province of Quebec making these statements Mr. Wagner called him to his office, provided him with police protection and demanded and obtained a full investigation into the allegations which had been made by Dr. Marcoux. He came to the conclusion that there was no basis for prosecution and no basis for these allegations. You can turn around and tell me that the Minister of Justice for the Province of Quebec is incompetent, that he is dishonest, that his findings were politically inspired, but I do not share that view.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. At no time have I referred to the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec as being incompetent and not knowledgeable. The hon. member is misquoting what I said. I said that no inquiry had been made so far as the federal government and the federal Minister of Justice are concerned. I did not refer to the Minister of Justice of Quebec. I have a great deal of respect for him and at no time have I questioned his ability. The hon. member is putting words into my mouth and alleging things which are not so. He was asked by a certain member of his party to do a hatchet job and that is why he is saying these things.

Mr. Mackasey: Does the hon. member say that I was asked to do that by a certain member of my party?

Mr. Woolliams: I will name him if you like.

Mr. Mackasey: Does the hon. member mean that I was asked to do a hatchet job? Surely, with the talents of the hon. member for Bow River, one of the leading lawyers in the province of Alberta, he should know that I would be the last man to be singled out to do a hatchet job. If the hon. member is not inferring that the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec is incompetent, why is he now demanding a review? Either he is competent or he is not. If he is competent, that should be the end of the Marcoux case. That is my main point. I think the hon. member will realize that because he is particularly sharp both as a member and as a lawyer. Either the Minister of Justice of that province did his job in investigating the Marcoux case or he did not. If he did, then the members of this house have no right to ask the federal government or parliament to investigate again matters covered by the provincial Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: I am not a lawyer. Perhaps I am all wet.

Mr. Woolliams: I will agree with you on that.

Mr. Mackasey: I was referring to the hon. member's speech in Hansard. I wish I could find the place now to which I was referring. The hon. member started out by using words to this effect, "One thing we must not do is to interfere with our judges and the administration of justice; they must be above politics". Then in the next breath he intimated that the investigation by the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec was incomplete. I cannot reconcile those two positions. I may be wrong and perhaps the hon. member for Bow River is right.

Using his best Perry Mason manner the hon. member for Bow River asks, what is the use of pursuing the Rivard case? What are the facts? If the hon. member wishes to review his own words he will find that he intimated there was undue haste in getting Rivard out of the country and beyond the jurisdiction of our courts. Is that not the inference he wishes to be drawn against the Department of Justice of the province of Quebec? Does he not wish the inference to be drawn that the department hastened procedures to get Rivard out of the country for some particular reason? I am sure if I took the trouble I could quote the hon. member for Bow River who criticized this government for delaying extradition proceedings when Rivard was in jail. Now he is accusing the government for speeding up those proceedings. If I am a little confused it is not only because I might be a little stupid in not understanding this—

Mr. Woolliams: I must agree with you there.

Mr. Mackasey: —but because I might be excused for thinking that there is confusion between two conflicting positions. Perhaps I should conclude because I am afraid I am beginning to use the weapons that the hon. member for Bow River uses. I made a mental note not to do so. I have heard what he has had to say repeated in the past. I have always listened to my hon. friend and have tried to be here whenever I knew he was going to speak. My hon. friend has a stereotyped pattern of speaking. He gets up and says to the minister involved, "I don't want you to think that anything I say is a reflection on you personally. I am criticizing your department. There is nothing personal in this." Then he outlines positions taken by former federal ministers of justice. He does not refer only to the Department of Justice but to former ministers and talks about St. Laurent, Fulton, and Fleming. What else is that if it is not by inference an attack on the personality of the present minister?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret that the hon. member for Verdun has exhausted his time for his speech.

Mr. Woolliams: Can he not go on?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Has the hon. member for Verdun unanimous consent to finish his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Agreed.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I know that other and more eloquent members wish to follow who will contribute a great deal to this debate. However, I know that the hon. member for Bow River wishes to ask a question. Since I have unanimous consent to continue I think it is only fair to devote the time at my disposal to the answering of his question.

Mr. Woolliams: My question is very simple. What I wish to refer to I have heard on many occasions outside this house. It has to do with the question of why Hal Banks was not charged when the Conservative government was in office. I ask the hon. member, is it not a fact that the report of Mr. Justice Norris, the making of which was the reason for the commission, says that witnesses were afraid to come forward to give evidence because of the kind of violence surrounding this whole situation—let me finish—but that because of the nature of the royal commission where witnesses could be examined and cross-examined and because two men had the courage to speak, feeling that they had the necessary protection, the evidence was given which had not been available to the Department of Justice prior to that time? That is why the royal commission was set up. It was set up to obtain evidence so that Banks could be charged.

I ask the hon. member that question and also this one. Why did his government take so long after that report to charge Banks and why were there not terms in the bond of recognizance with respect to his leaving the country?

Mr. Mackasey: You are sure those are all your questions?

Mr. Woolliams: That is right.

Mr. Mackasey: Again, I am simply a layman. It seems inconceivable to me, with the spirit of justice that prevails in Canada, that there was such an intolerable situation between 1958 and 1962—

Mr. Woolliams: Read the Norris report.

Mr. Mackasey: You have asked a question. I have read the Norris report and I am trying to answer if you will let me. It seems inconceivable to me that between the years 1958 and 1962, when the Progressive Conservative party was in power and the hon. member for Kamloops was minister of justice, that there should have been any single Canadian who was afraid to appear before the courts of Canada to give evidence. This is an intolerable situation and this is just what you have with respect to the matter—

Mr. Starr: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me to say something?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Verdun has the floor to answer a question put by the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member for Bow River said that between the years 1958 and 1962 there were citizens of Canada who were afraid to exert their civil liberties and privileges and to testify in the courts of the land.

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly they were afraid.

Mr. Mackasey: We all know why they were afraid. They were afraid of being beaten up. Is it not the function of the Department of Justice to provide protection? By the hon. member's own words he admits that the Department of Justice did not provide protection between 1958 and 1962. People who were afraid then found the courage to appear before the commission after 1962 when we were in power. I am not going to insult anybody in this house by saying that since we have come to power everybody is free, because speaking as an individual I suggest that the Spencer case raises the question in my mind whether the rights of Canadian individuals are properly protected. Did not the hon. member for Bow River inquire whether the only reason that no action was taken against Hal Banks was that people were afraid to come forward and testify? If that is true, it is an indictment against the party in power at the time which could not provide protection to average Canadians who would have been willing to testify provided they would not be subjected to physical violence.

I would also say this in answer to my hon. friend's question. I feel more inclined to thing, after listening last night to the hon. member for Kamloops, that the reason Hal Banks was not brought to trial between 1958 and 1962 was the opinion of the Minister of Justice at that time, based on the co-operation which he believes is now non-existent between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and senior officers of the department, that regardless of whether Mr. Banks was guilty there was not sufficient evidence available to warrant his being brought to trial.

I agree with this. I think these are the true facts and I believe the hon. member for Kamloops is to be commended for not bowing to political expediency. It would have been the popular political thing to do. The hon. member for Bow River yielded to this temptation yesterday when he resurrected the Dorion brawl, the Rivard brawl, the Hal Banks brawl. He even sought to resurrect the old joke about watering the rink at Bordeaux jail. I thought the hon. member was more capable than that.

When the hon. member for Bow River seeks constantly to resurrect these things it is he who is following a course of political expediency, not the hon. member for Kamloops. It is difficult in matters like the Hal Banks case to remain objective. Nevertheless we must seek to do so. I appreciate the opportunity which the hon. member for Bow River has given me by his question to speak beyond the time allotted to me.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think I should say a word or two very briefly to clarify the situation which has just been the subject of discussion. I do not intend to take time which would otherwise be available for other hon. members to take part in these proceedings. Hon. members will realize that I have not had an opportunity to go back to my notes—

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member rising to put a question or to address the committee?

Mr. Fulton: I am asking for the right to address the committee in order to clarify the situation to which reference was made by the hon. member for Verdun. I wish to make a brief explanation, a statement of clarification.

Mr. Woolliams: Give him a chance. You want this to be a closed issue.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I was under the impression that the hon. member for Kamloops was rising to put a question to the hon. member for Verdun. I recognize the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, may I say that if the hon. member for Kamloops defines the word "brief" as the hon. member for Verdun defined it I will certainly be happy to be recognized. But if the hon. member for Kamloops is using the word "brief" in its literal sense I would be pleased, if it would meet with the approval of the Chair, to let him take two minutes for any explanation he may wish to make.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Is it agreed by the committee that we should now recognize the hon. member for Kamloops?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Leboe: On point of order, Mr. Chairman, I believe the committee would have no objection to allowing the hon. member for Kamloops to reply immediately so that when the discussion is read in Hansard it will be uninterrupted by references to other subjects and will make sense. The hon. member intends to speak very briefly and in the circumstances I believe the committee would certainly allow him to do so.

Mr. Lewis: That is why I was prepared to yield.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the hon. member for Kamloops should make his remarks at this time?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Aiken: A point of order has been raised. I think it has been traditional in this house and is even a requirement that a member who wishes to set the record straight must do so at the first opportunity and that the making of such an explanation does not interfere with the order of speakers. I know the hon. member for Kamloops does not insist on his right but it has always been considered a requisite when explanations are to be made.

The Deputy Chairman: I thank hon. members for enlightening me on this subject but it is the intention of the Chair to recognize the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: If the hon. member from Kamloops does not rise I will. I do not intend to follow the hon. member for Verdun who said he was not a lawyer and was therefore, "all wet". He is not. The hon. member also said in a moment of embarrassing modesty that he was "a little stupid". He is obviously not that. I must say I admire the hard and losing struggle he waged trying to be non-political.

I rise to deal fairly briefly with one matter, namely, the Spencer case. I rise because in my respectful submission the Prime Minister of this country made on Wednesday a statement which was not only astonishing but outrageous in its expression of disregard for basic principles of justice and civil liberty. I rise also because of a personal experience in connection with a client some years ago to which I wish to refer.

What the Prime Minister said in effect was that he had studied this case, looked into it, discussed it with his ministerial colleagues, given many hours to its consideration, and was therefore in a position to assure the house that Mr. Spencer was treated fairly. In fact, the Prime Minister says he was treated with scrupulous fairness.

What the Prime Minister is saying to the house and to the country is that when he, the Prime Minister, looks into a decision and decides it was a fair one that closes the matter. He arrogated to himself on Wednesday the attitude and the power of an unrivalled autocrat. He showed qualities of presumption and arrogance which make me sad as a Canadian, for no one person, no matter how high his estate in the country, has the right to say: I am the one, and when I tell you I have investigated a decision and it is just, you are to accept that it is just.

I have never in all my years of studying political science heard or read a statement so outrageous and so derisive of respect for civil liberties. In the area of civil liberties no one person can arrogate such powers to himself. I say, without apologizing for dragging it in, that one could be inclined to pay more attention to the assurances of the right hon. gentleman if one had not had experience of his bad judgment in previous affairs of this sort, experiences with the Liberal party in its behaviour toward the Japanese during the war and its behaviour in the Gouzenko investigation. If we had not had these experiences and the example disclosed yesterday of the unrivalled, unlimited and shabbiest use of pork barrel politics in appointments to the other place, we would be inclined to pay a little more attention to the statements of the right hon. gentleman.

Lest anyone misunderstand me let me say this: I assure the house that the other place is welcome to Mr. Hazen Argue, that discredited politician and anachronistic appendage of Parliament, as far as I am concerned. I would merely draw attention to the fact that we have made progress in our civilization. The thirty pieces of silver have now become half a million dollars, which is what Mr. Argue has been paid for being what he was.

The Chairman: Order. I would suggest to to the hon. member for York South that the remarks he is now making are entirely out of order.

• (1:20 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: May I proceed to deal with the subject of the Prime Minister's speech? First I want to analyse the reasons he gives for stating that we must accept his conclusion as being right. At page 1682 of Hansard for February 23 the Prime Minister stated:

> I should like to put before the committee very briefly the considerations which led me to this conclusion—

To the conclusion that an inquiry is not necessary. Then he gave three reasons. I have never, Mr. Chairman, in appearances before judges, before boards—indeed my memory goes back to my high school days and undergraduate days in university—heard more obviously invalid reasons in support of any conclusion. His first reason is:

> —Mr. Spencer himself has admitted, voluntarily admitted, improper activities—

Who knows that? How does the Prime Minister know it? Was he there? Did he hear the voluntary admission? To whom was that voluntary admission made? By what reason does the Prime Minister think that the members of the committee should accept that statement? Is it merely because he makes it?

He makes the statement obviously without any personal knowledge whatever, accepting some note given to him no doubt by some underling of the Minister of Justice. A more outrageous suggestion as a reason for accepting his conclusion is hardly imaginable.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not true.

Mr. Lewis: An hon. member says it is not true. I have not the faintest notion whether or not it is true but I do know that no responsible leader of this country should make such a statement when he was not present at the time the conversation took place and offer that statement as an excuse for parliament to accept his conclusion. Having made one spurious suggestion he goes on to another:

> In the second place it was Mr. Spencer himself who disclosed his identity—

Mr. Nielsen: That is not true.

Mr. Lewis: My leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, the other day punctured that unctuous inaccuracy, Mr. Chairman, and I choose my words carefully. Obviously the man was branded. He was fired. What more active part does the right hon. gentleman want to play in identifying Mr. Spencer? Does he want to make a trip to Vancouver and point him out to the R.C.M.P.? Is that the only way in which his government becomes involved? It is a gross misreading of the facts to make that statement. To cap it all, to cap this entire structure of disregard for the most elementary procedures of decent and civilized justice, the right hon. Prime Minister said:

> —before a final decision was taken to dismiss Mr. Spencer he was given a hearing—

Just listen to the use of that word "hearing".

> —by a senior official of the Civil Service Commission, at which he had every opportunity to state his case.

I challenge any hon. member, I challenge the Minister of Justice, I challenge the Solicitor General to give the committee another case of sheer, utter nonsense that compares with this statement in terms of any decent, legal inquiry. Some member of the Civil Service Commission met with Mr. Spencer, had some conversations with him and the right hon. gentleman calls that a hearing. What an outrageous use of words.

If the right hon. gentleman did not mean to mislead the committee, because he knew perfectly well hon. members could not be misled, in my respectful submission he could only have meant to mislead the people of Canada by using this kind of language to describe that kind of conversation between an official and Mr. Spencer.

Finally, having given these completely invalid, unacceptable explanations for his conclusion, the right hon. gentleman then misrepresented the request that was made of him. May I interject to say that in all my political activity I have always taken the position in speeches outside this country that, whatever party I belong to, the Prime Minister of this country is the leader of this country. It therefore hurts me beyond words to find the leader of this country behaving in the shabby way that the Prime Minister has done in the case of Mr. Spencer. I say "shabby" because after giving us these spurious reasons for rejecting it he misrepresents the request that was made of him.

At the bottom of the right hand column on page 1682 the Prime Minister said:

> If these procedures could not be used in this way in appropriate circumstances, or if all the details arising out of them must be made public, and names made public, then the protection of our national security against subversive action would be greatly prejudiced if not made impossible.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Lewis: This is right if it were true, but no one asked the right hon. gentleman for a public inquiry. The request of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and of the Leader of the Opposition was for an inquiry by a third party, if necessary in camera. No one requested that this inquiry be open to the public and the press. The request made of the government was for a hearing, as it were, before a third person, before a competent tribunal and in camera if necessary. No one is interested in hearing names as was suggested by the right hon. gentleman.

This brings me to an actual example I want to place before the committee. In my professional capacity as counsel for labour unions I happened to be involved in such a matter some years ago. I shall deliberately leave out names and make my references a little vague so that the person involved cannot be identified. An employee of one of the federal crown corporations in right of Canada was refused something to which he was entitled under the collective agreement on the express ground of security. We took the matter to arbitration under the collective agreement.

We could not get anywhere in arbitration because the lawyers for the crown corporation involved refused to give us any reasons.

They said, "Security reasons make it impossible for us to tell you why this person did not get what, under the collective agreement, he was entitled to."

With the assistance of the chairman of the board of arbitration we then saw the then minister of justice, the hon. member for Kamloops. He did, and I give him credit for doing so, precisely what we have not been able to persuade the government to do now. We persuaded him to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the facts of that case in camera.

The person appointed royal commissioner was the dean of law at the University of British Columbia. The accusers of my client—I will call him that—were not there when we were there nor were we there when they were there, but this entirely independent person who had no axe to grind, who could not be motivated by a desire to protect any underling who had gone wrong or to cover up anything else, who could be accepted as completely independent and disinterested, heard the other side and then, when I appeared with the employee, gave me information as to the facts he had received which in his view could be released to me.

He did not give me facts, if he had any—I do not know whether or not he had—which in his judgment it would not have been wise to give me from the point of view of Canada's security. However, my client felt he had a thoroughly good hearing because the commissioner gave him every chance to explain every question that was raised.

The result of that inquiry—I emphasize this and I ask the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to note it—was that the person involved was cleared by the dean of law of the University of British Columbia and compensated for his loss.

• (1:30 p.m.)

At that time the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and officers of the Department of Justice had reached the conclusion that the man was guilty. It was only this independent inquiry which removed that guilt. I ask, Mr. Chairman, what possible harm to the security of Canada could conceivably occur if the dean of the University of British Columbia or a member of the judiciary of Canada were given the information which the minister has, heard this information in camera, listened to Mr. Spencer and his counsel in camera, and then told the members of this house and people of Canada what his conclusions were. If that were done by a third, disinterested person, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, I am pretty sure, said on Wednesday, and we were told that Mr. Spencer was properly dismissed, then so far as we are concerned that would be the end of the matter.

I again appeal to the minister and the Solicitor General and through them to the right hon. Prime Minister to institute such an inquiry, because in civil liberties even more than anywhere else the appearance of justice and the fact of justice must coincide.

I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the most unfair part of the treatment of Mr. Spencer, so far as I have been able to see, is the fact that he has been deprived of his pension. His age, I understand, is 57. He has been dismissed from his job and his pension is taken from him.

As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam quite properly has said, the government is imposing a fine on this man without a trial. This should be looked into. In other words, I am suggesting there be an independent inquiry both in respect of whether or not this man is guilty, and second, in respect of whether or not even if he is, it is fair and just to deprive him of his pension. Dismissal is surely punishment enough and there is no need to add to that punishment by depriving him of what he has earned as he worked. I do not know the gentleman, but this action well may leave him in terrible penury.

I do not like to be sentimental about these things but I do remind hon. members, Mr. Chairman, if they need reminding—and I am sure they do not—that ever since the rights of individuals have been recognized by our society we have learned time and time again that the easiest thing in the world is to neglect those rights and to neglect them in unctuous self-righteousness. It is precisely those people who beat their breasts and say I have considered everything, I have looked at every angle, I have studied each word, I have gone into every detail and this is my conclusion—it is precisely those who make this kind of assertion who most easily ignore or innocently overlook the rights of people into whose lives they have so carefully looked.

We have also learned over the centuries that when civil liberties have been recognized in democratic countries the only way to make sure they are not eroded is to take a stand every time they are attacked. I submit that it is the high duty of the government and of the Prime Minister to make sure that they do not leave even a possibility of suspicion that injustice and unfairness have ruled in the Spencer case. I appeal, despite the decision the Prime Minister has announced, that he and his ministerial colleagues reconsider and accept the suggestion that a third person be appointed to make an in camera inquiry into this whole case.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks about fraudulent bankruptcies in Canada and in the province of Quebec in particular.

In 1962, I asked the Minister of Justice to make an investigation in that regard, but he did not do anything. I asked the same thing again in 1963 without any results. Bankruptcies kept on happening. The situation has not improved in the province of Quebec. It is a terrible disaster, especially with regard to the province of Quebec.

It is a very good year for those experts in fraudulent bankruptcies. Mr. Chairman, we must put a stop to the exploitation carried on by those crooks in the business world. The Minister of Justice must do something, because the situation is serious.

Several murders have been committed in the last five or six years; people have disappeared from the surface of the earth without leaving any trace. Several were shot to death by notorious bandits. The Department of Justice has got to do something.

Reference was made to the Spencer case. In my opinion, the case of the fraudulent bankruptcies is ten times worse and yet the Department of Justice has still not done anything in this matter.

The fraudulent bankruptcy racket is so widespread, so complex in its organization and so fantastically far-reaching in our part of the country that it could plunge all local business into the most complete anarchy. The damage caused by those bankruptcies has been tremendous, because when you are confronted by those gangsters you feel insignificant, quite small and lost. Many citizens, lawyers and legal practitioners do not even want to have anything to do with those fraudulent bankruptcies because they fear for their lives.

Business is overrun to an outrageous extent by these crooks who rob us, ruin us, push us around and crush us. The fellow who purchases goods for next to nothing in these illegal bankruptcies makes enormous profits because he can sell the goods at ridiculously low prices that defy competition. No store, no industry can compete against fraudulent bankruptcies.

The gang of crooks we think we know, Mr. Chairman, includes some respected and wealthy businessmen as well as professional crooks. They have found in this racket a unique opportunity to rob with maximum safety and respectability, because today fraudulent bankruptcies have become so perfect, so easy, I dare say even so legal, that one can emerge with barely a scratch.

Go out and see if you can find many fraudulent bankruptcy swindlers in prison; yet there are many in Canada. In my estimation, the bankruptcy racket is probably the safest and the most lucrative business at the present time.

They are definitely a gang of professionals familiar with every swindling trick. Most of them have a police record, and those who have not are no less dangerous; they may even be more dangerous because the police is not keeping as close a check on them as on the others and, consequently, they are more vulnerable.

They are wealthy; they own stores chocked full of goods from fraudulent bankruptcies. And their credit standing is good with all business and financial firms. They are shrewd; they belong to businessmen's organizations; they know a lot of people and have friends everywhere, even in clubs, hotels, credit offices, finance companies and banks.

They also have friends in the police force. They have legal advisers; they live in princely fashion in stylish apartments.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Latulippe: Businesses in a fix become the prey of those wise guys. They take advantage of it to make propositions to them. With their consent, they purchase those businesses and make them paying concerns within a few days. They deposit money in the bank, they pay cash for a certain time. Those people resort to every means to gain the confidence of manufacturers and suppliers.

Once the business has regained its good standing, they buy any type of merchandise and make it disappear at once. They build warehouses which burn down in a short time, and you can be sure, Mr. Chairman, that insurance companies have to pay tremendous amounts in insurance.

These people resort to all sorts of schemes. Their criminal minds make use of every imaginable means to fatten their fortunes.

I suppose the minister is beginning to realize that the Bankruptcy Act is a federal, not a provincial act. It is not up to the provincial government to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Does the present act allow a person to go into bankruptcy? It does, because under the present system, it is impossible for quite a number for businessmen to avoid bankruptcy.

The system under which we are operating is financial nonsense. Those who benefit under the present system do so at the expense of others.

Our financial system, Mr. Chairman, is basically wrong. I ask the Minister of Justice to do all that is humanly possible to improve our economy and to prevent the series of fraudulent bankruptcies. Mr. Chairman, fraudulent bankruptcies lead to many others. This has created a disturbing situation in the province of Quebec and even in the whole country. I am speaking of the province of Quebec because I know of several of these bankruptcies and frauds there. I also know about some losses and all sorts of goings on. Those are terrible things, Mr. Chairman.

Therefore, I ask the honourable minister of Justice to punish those citizens as others have been punished. I know people who were sentenced to six months and even a year in jail for stealing $5 or $10. On the other hand, there are people who stole millions of dollars and were sentenced only to two or six months in jail. A person who steals but a small amount is punished much more severely than if he had stolen millions of dollars.

So, Mr. Chairman, because of this deplorable situation, I ask the Minister of Justice or his department to make the Bankruptcy Act inoperative. I ask him to close the door to all bankruptcies at this time, because there is no legislation, there are no rules to protect our citizens adequately, even from the standpoint of finance and human life.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Minister of Justice to padlock the Bankruptcy Act. I ask him to take this Act under his jurisdiction immediately, in order to take over all bankruptcies, fraudulent or otherwise, existing in Canada at the present time.

What the Minister of Justice must do is to actually give justice. We want justice in this matter. In the past three years, the federal government has done nothing in this regard. It is up to the federal government to intervene in those cases of fraudulent bankruptcies. We must put an end to those things and the best way to do it is to make things secure by means of the padlock law, which has been used in many other circumstances. Let us use it with respect to the Bankruptcy Act and put some order in the economy of Canada and its provinces.

Let us give justice to families who have suffered from those murders. In the past five or six years, the criminals, the notorious bandits in question, have committed several murders for which we are indirectly responsible. It is time to settle this situation and I ask the Minister of Justice to restore some order in this field.

• (1:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes this afternoon to make some comments regarding the report of the justice committee on juvenile delinquency in Canada. This is a very important matter and up to this time an opportunity has not arisen for comment in connection with the recently released report of that committee. I intend to indicate how I believe the house and the department should act on this report and I hope the result will be speedy action.

It seems to me from reading the report, which is very lengthy and detailed running almost to 400 pages, that the committee has done a thorough and painstaking job regarding the methods of dealing with juvenile delinquency. Many of their suggestions are logical and could be put into effect quickly.

The report dealt particularly with methods of dealing with delinquency, which I believe that was the basic task of the committee. Certainly that is the major item covered by the committee's report. The committee did not attempt to deal with another aspect of delinquency relating to prevention and control, though it did make some suggestions as to what could be done along these lines.

I should like to mention some of the recommendations made by the committee as examples of the things that could be put into effect quickly without much difficulty to the department. The first is the suggestion that we set a minimum age of responsibility for juveniles at 10 or 12 years. This seems to be a logical and well-founded suggestion based on the evidence received by the committee. The committee recommends the establishment of a standard maximum age beyond which an individual is no longer considered a juvenile. The age suggested by the committee is 17, to be recognized across Canada. This also seems to be a logical and reasonable conclusion reached as a result of the committee's inquiries.

We now have an unfortunate situation because in some provinces people are considered to be juveniles at 16 and in others the age is 18. This recommendation should cause very little difficulty. There are other recommendations such as permitting news media to attend juvenile court hearings. I think this is a good suggestion. The committee deals with the mechanics of the Juvenile Delinquents Act and the method of dealing with juveniles themselves. The basic idea behind granting permission for news media to attend juvenile court hearings seems to be as much a case of providing a check on the juvenile court judges and the courts themselves as anything else. I think it is a very good idea.

The field of juvenile delinquency is one in which very few are expert and these judges are appointed from all walks of life. Various courts are conducted in very different ways. I believe that while privacy of hearing is good for the child to the extent that no publicity ought to be given thereto, it can be very bad when judges use their own procedures and methods of dealing with people who are not represented by counsel and in many cases have not been formally charged. Therefore I believe that the recommendation that news media, including television and radio, be present at juvenile court hearings is a good one so long as the names of juveniles are withheld.

Another recommendation which could easily be adopted is that with regard to changes in nomenclature. The committee suggests changes in the words "delinquency" and "juvenile delinquents" and prefers the description "young offenders". I do not know that it matters a great deal and I am not too impressed with the conclusion in this regard, but if this is a general feeling there is certainly no objection to it.

There are a number of other recommendations such as requiring the presence of a juvenile's parents at a hearing. This is a good suggestion. I believe that in many cases parents who do not take the trouble to go to court when their children have been charged are themselves blameworthy and the judge should have the opportunity of dealing with them directly by discussion at the trial.

I think the recommendation to limit very severely the right of juvenile courts to commit children to a training school is a good one, because in many cases it is too easy merely to get the child out of the way by sending him to a training school when you cannot think of any other solution. I believe the same situation exists in the adult courts and many people engaged in penology are now satisfied that too many people are committed and too little benefit comes from it.

The committee also investigated thoroughly the procedures which have grown up in the juvenile courts and I think they came to proper conclusions with regard to many of them. While the procedure in juvenile courts is of a very informal nature, judges are sometimes inclined to deal with the children who appear before them informally as well. By that I mean they often are inclined to assume children to be guilty until they prove themselves innocent.

Many of the suggestions the committee made were for the protection of the child in the juvenile court, making sure he is properly advised and represented, that any statements made are properly brought into evidence and that, while the penalty may not be too severe, before any conviction or finding of guilt is made it must be made on evidence. I think these suggestions are all valid.

There are some suggestions, however, that require more consideration. I should like to detail some of them and I think they should be considered by a committee and brought into effect as quickly as possible. The first recommendation that in my opinion causes some difficulty is the use of juvenile court records in adult courts and outside the courts. I believe the committee dealt with the question too loosely. It is my view that juvenlie court records should not be released to anyone except on the order of a judge who has already convicted a person in adult court. That is a matter of opinion but I believe it deserves consideration.

The committee suggested that a youth examiner system be investigated. They did not come to any conclusion in this respect. This system is in use in Israel and under it, instead of bringing young people into court as witnesses and in some cases even as defendants, a third person is entitled to discuss with the child the evidence he wishes to give and then give the evidence for the child. I believe this is an excellent suggestion and should be investigated. It has often been said that children are caused more harm than good in the courts, especially if they are very young and are submitted to examination and cross-examination at an early age when they cannot form firm opinions on the various subjects put to them.

There is another matter that a committee of the house or some other body might inquire into. This concerns taking basically welfare matters completely out of the Juvenile Delinquents Act and dealing with them under provincial legislation. I understand that discussions are even now under way with provincial authorities in regard to this matter. The problem of delinquency as related to crime and the federal government's responsibility in criminal matters was in question in early years. It was felt when the Juvenile Delinquents Act was introduced that if a child was not to be classed as a criminal perhaps he should be dealt with under provincial welfare legislation. However, it was confirmed in the courts that the Juvenile Delinquents Act is a valid federal statute relating to federal responsibility for criminal matters and it has been dealt with on that basis.

I think the committee has wisely suggested that the time has come when the fringe elements which have been drawn into the Juvenile Delinquents Act and the juvenile courts ought to be removed. These are elements in which only the question of welfare is involved and not the commission of an offence. This is also a good recommendation and deserves consideration.

I should now like to make some criticism of the report because, while it deals fully with the matter of handling juvenile delinquents, it has left virtually untouched a large field of problems concerning the prevention and control of juvenile delinquency. I do not say this in criticism of the committee because I do not believe it was set up to conduct an investigation into social welfare matters. The committee was made up of persons who basically were concerned with the methods rather than the social aspects of juvenile delinquency, and it recognized this in its report.

First, the committee found that statistics are not complete enough in order to come to conclusions on many of the social problems that are involved in juvenile delinquency and for that reason they were not able to come to such conclusions. Second, their second last recommendation suggested that demonstration projects under various aspects of delinquency prevention and control should be undertaken. I think that this was probably the most important recommendation of the whole report because, while methods of dealing with juveniles can be changed, approaches altered and courts made more formal or less formal, these changes do not purport to deal with the cause and effect of delinquency and its prevention and control. Therefore, I believe this aspect requires a good deal more consideration than that given by the committee.

I suggest that some excellent work is being done in Ottawa and in many other cities in Canada in the social and welfare aspects of juvenile delinquency. But much more work of a pilot project nature is still required. For example, we find that while delinquency can be examined and dealt with in court and delinquents sent to training schools, in many cases the delinquents of today are the adult criminals of tomorrow. The success of the juvenile courts in dealing with young people foreshadows what will happen in the adult courts.

In the result, I should like to suggest that the reasonable and logical recommendations of the committee should be put into effect as quickly as possible; I think there is no problem there. The recommendations which require further study should be given that study and then implemented as quickly as possible.

The money required for pilot projects in delinquency prevention and control should be provided. I think we would all agree that criminal instincts or tendencies develop in a person's early years. Our penitentiaries are full of people who might have been valuable members of society had they been properly dealt with when they were young.

The cost of the penitentiaries branch and its administration is tremendous, as we can see from the estimates. The costs of administration of justice which are costs of the provinces are very great. We lose all across the line when a person becomes first a delinquent and subsequently a criminal. Society loses both financially and from a manpower and social point of view.

The starting place, Mr. Chairman, for criminals in this country, except those criminals we import, is at the juvenile age. We have to start with these young people, and I think that the report of this committee provides a good foundation for this.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to urge that, regardless of the method by which the recommendations of the committee are dealt with, recommendation No. 99 concerning the immediate establishment of pilot projects in co-operation with the provincial authorities should be undertaken. Pilot projects are fairly easy to undertake, because they can be undertaken in a municipality or an area where real work is required and the results can be seen. Yesterday we saw that in the United States the administration is going to deal with the problem of water pollution by cleaning one river from source to mouth in one complete project. In that way they can eliminate everything which causes water pollution.

I should like to see this same approach to the problem of delinquency. I should like to see money put into certain areas to enable a complete job to be done which will also provide the foundation for similar work in other municipalities and areas of the country. I think that this recommendation is the most important one. The money used in implementing it will be well spent. It is only a drop in the bucket compared with what we spend in trying to apprehend, convict and incarcerate criminals in their later years. We have delayed too long.

The recommendations of the committee are not alarming. They find that the problem of juvenile gangs is not a serious one in Canada. They find that the main problem is damage to property, not damage to persons. They find that across the country many of the juveniles who are brought into court never return and that it is only the hard core cases which come back to the adult courts. For this reason I think we should make an immediate start to deal with our juvenile delinquents, and the best way to start is by employing the system of pilot projects recommended by the committee. I hope the government will give immediate consideration to setting up a pilot project or projects along this line and will either refer the remainder of the recommendations in the report to a parliamentary committee or take action on them in those fundamentals about which there is no disagreement.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in the discussion of these estimates, although I acknowledge that the Prime Minister himself remarked in his statement regarding the Spencer case that we could participate in a debate afterwards, I must emphasize that I rise in defence of civil liberties in this Canada of ours.

I have not been brought to my present convictions on the injustice that has been meted out to Mr. Victor Spencer in Vancouver during the past several months by speeches which have been made in this House of Commons during the past few days. I have had this conviction ever since the month of November when I was advised that the Department of Justice had acted as judge, jury and executioner in the case without a hearing—when I say "hearing" I mean hearing; I do not mean a conversation with a senior official of the Civil Service Commission —without a hearing at which he could face his accuser, a hearing at which he could retain counsel on his own behalf.

I submit when the rights of one man, of one Canadian citizen are trampled upon in this country, the rights of all are trampled upon. I will not sit idly by and watch it being done.

I have to say with a heavy heart that I heard the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac state that the question of bankruptcies in the business world of Canada was ten times more important than the Spencer case. It makes me sad to think that there are members of the Canadian House of Commons who would place material gain before the individual free rights of native born and naturalized Canadian citizens.

In presenting his statement on Wednesday, February 23, the Prime Minister made this comment, as found on page 1681 of Hansard:

> I know that the issues involved are important and I know that they have aroused very real uneasiness in the minds of hon. members.

I was very, very pleased to have the Prime Minister make this statement. He knows that it has aroused very real uneasiness in the minds of hon. members and I am one of those in whom very real uneasiness has been aroused.

On Wednesday night last we all had the opportunity of hearing the President of the United States in his 40 minute address discuss the problem of Viet Nam. It was a masterful presentation of the facts from his point of view. You may remember that during the course of his remarks he made an allusion to Macaulay who, when writing about Southey's "Colloquies", said "Men are never so likely to settle a question rightly as when they discuss it freely".

I should like to take part in a free discussion of the Spencer matter at this time.

Macaulay wrote and I repeat, "Men are never so likely to settle a question rightly as when they discuss it freely", and discussing it freely does not consist of having a senior official of the Civil Service Commission journey out to Vancouver and speak to a junior civil servant with regard to some accusations which were levelled against him by people who did not give him an opportunity to meet his accusers in the courts of the land.

I was first elected to this house in June of 1962. After ten months in opposition, following the 1963 election the Liberals took over the government seats. As I have listened to the inquiries being made of the cabinet whether or not a judicial inquiry had been authorized into this Spencer affair, as we have been calling it since November when the man was first identified by name, I began to wonder if this was not where I came in, in 1962. Everything seemed to be such a repetition of the answers that were given to the opposition in November of 1964 with regard to the Rivard affair, which was later investigated by Chief Justice Dorion of the Quebec Superior Court.

Over the past few weeks I have been reading all the Hansard transcripts of the discussions in this house dealing with the question of whether there should be an investigation into the 1964 allegations that employees in the federal government had been throwing offers of bribes round the halls of this building. The answers that were given at that time were the same as the answers being given with regard to this spencer matter when we ask, will there be a judicial investigation of the Spencer affair in order that the man may be able to clear his name before the Canadian public?

Last Wednesday we were told by the Prime Minister with regard to the Spencer affair that—and I quote:

> Having studied all the facts of this case, I do not feel it is necessary or useful to initiate a judicial inquiry into this matter. The procedures that have been followed by the R.C.M.P. are exactly the same procedures that were followed when my right hon. friend was in the government.

If you turn to page 10397 of Hansard for November 23, 1964, you will find that the then minister of justice, in answer to questions being asked of him by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the hon. member for the Yukon on the Rivard affair, said:

> An inquiry was made immediately, upon my recommendation, into all aspects of this matter. When the inquiry was completed, the R.C.M. Police felt there was not sufficient evidence to recommend a prosecution.

[Mr. Cowan.]

This is the former minister of justice talking on November 23, 1964. Does that not sound like:

> The procedures that have been followed by the R.C.M.P. are exactly the same procedures that were followed when my right hon. friend was in the government.

The then minister of justice continues on page 10379:

> It was our joint assessment of the evidence that there was no case for the laying of information on the state of the evidence obtained.

Then he goes on:

> As far as the minute details of the file, the names of witnesses and the persons interviewed are concerned, I am advised by the R.C.M. Police that this forms part of the contents of a report made by them which, as in the case of all reports of the R.C.M. Police to the minister, remains confidential in the public interest.

He then added:

> I think it is also my duty to repeat to the committee that there has been an inquiry, and that the R.C.M. Police, the commissioner and myself, on an assessment of the whole evidence, do not feel or believe that there is sufficient evidence to justify the laying of information in the present state of the material obtained.

Now I quote from the Prime Minister's statement of last Wednesday:

> However, before a final decision was taken to dismiss Mr. Spencer he was given a hearing by a senior official of the Civil Service Commission.

Then we are told:

> —neither at this hearing nor at those held by Canadian security officers—

That would be the R.C.M.P., of course.

Now we carry on to read the statement of the former minister of justice:

> —it is not the practice of the R.C.M. Police or the Minister of Justice to refer matters to the law officers of the crown for opinions unless (a) the matter is brought to the attention of the minister for that purpose or (b) he is satisfied that there is room for opinion. There has not been a formal submission to the law officers of the crown in this case.

He is referring to the fact that the R.C.M.P. had made a definite statement to him. According to this report there was not sufficient evidence to recommend prosecution in the Rivard matter. We were told in the statement by the Prime Minister last Wednesday that there was not sufficient evidence produced to justify a prosecution in the Spencer case. On November 23, 1964, page 10397, we were told:

> —it is not the practice of the R.C.M. Police or the Minister of Justice to refer matters to the law officers of the crown for opinions unless—there is room for opinion.

I do not know whether or not that means a difference of opinion. I continue quoting:

> —he is satisfied that there is room for opinion. There has not been a formal submission to the law officers of the crown in this case.

We are told in the matter of Spencer that the law officers of the Crown had advised against instituting criminal proceedings against Mr. Spencer and that proceedings were not taken. From that we can judge that there was room for a difference of opinion and that a reference was made to the law officers of the Crown. This is very interesting. I would like to see the papers on the matter. I took part, in opposition, in discussions on motions for production of papers with regard to the levy of tariffs by the former government. I was told that these papers are confidential.

• (2:20 p.m.)

It is interesting to find that in one case the former Minister of Justice tells us he did not refer the matter to the law officers of the Crown because he did not think there would be room for opinion. This time we find there has been such a reference and we were told no action would be taken in the form of a judicial inquiry. We know what happened in the previous case of 1964. There was a judicial inquiry and much came out of that inquiry which would never have been adduced if there had merely been acceptance of the statement of the then minister of justice. Why should we believe there is nothing to be brought forward in favour of Spencer at this time just because we are told it is not necessary or useful to initiate a judicial inquiry into this matter?

I would not be speaking this way with regard to civil liberties if I were not greatly upset by the fact that a minister of the Crown in a nation-wide television broadcast had named this man. If ever a man was accused without having an opportunity to speak on his own behalf, this was the occasion. They argue that his name was already known because he had disclosed it to a newspaper reporter who had interviewed him. But how could his name be kept unknown in the city in which he worked when it was realized he was no longer in the service of the Post Office Department where he had been employed for some time? His fellow workers were well aware he had been removed from his employment and they were naturally curious that a 57-year-old man should be removed. Without doubt there was talk in the Vancouver post office and in the city of Vancouver about this man's disappearance from the federal service. But it was altogether improper, unjust and indefensible for a minister of the Crown to go on the air over a national television network and name the man involved in the case even though he himself had said in a statement made in the fall of last year: "I must be the man involved".

This man is entitled to a full and complete hearing. If it must be held in camera I would have no objection. But to condemn him to a life under surveillance, to remove his pension rights and to fire him without due process of law is contrary to all the principles of—dare I say British justice or must I say "Canadian justice"? When the red ensign was hauled down in the spring of 1965 in this country we did not expect to see the enforcement of British principles of justice go out the window the following winter. I myself will fight for the maintenance of the great principles of British justice—I will call it Canadian justice if you wish—but if this man is not given a hearing I will not have much respect for Canadian justice. I will still fight for British justice.

He is entitled to a hearing. He is entitled to face his accusers personally. Whether or not such a hearing is held in public I do not care provided it is before a third party who is objective in every sense of the word. I do not believe that a man who has had an opportunity of speaking only to a senior officer of the Civil Service Commission and to Canadian security officers has been given a just and proper hearing or one which justifies removing him from his job.

I ask this question: Would they be able to separate this man from his income had he been working for anybody other than the federal government? What would his position have been had he been working in the mines or for the Pacific Great Eastern Railway or for some of the big fruit growing companies of British Columbia? I suggest it would not have been a simple matter to have separated him from his position in those circumstances, because he had never been tried or accused in open court. I say that the defence of the civil liberties of the individual is the first burden which should rest on every member of the House of Commons no matter on what side he sits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: There are some amazing coincidences in the cases of Rivard and Spencer. I referred to one of these the other day in conversation with an hon. member. It had to do with a discussion whether someone had said "heads will roll" or "heads will swim".

One hon. member read a newspaper clipping and it turned out that Mr. Spencer had said "Heads will swim". Now hon. members will find that very expression used as recorded in Hansard of November 23, 1964 at page 10387 at the bottom of the column. The hon. member for Yukon was speaking and he said:

> I feel that if such an offence had been made by anyone other than Mr. Denis, charges would have been laid so fast it would have made his head swim.

I do not know why these coincidences occur. I begin to think this is where I came in. When I hear of these objections to a judicial inquiry with regard to the Spencer affair, all I need do is change the name to Rivard in order to hear exactly the same record—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And change the Minister of Justice too. The same old tune.

Mr. Cowan: Anyway, what was done in this case was very different from the treatment handed out to Mr. Bélec and Mr. Poitras. These are two gentlemen from the city of Montreal who were employees of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. What happened in this case? We have not been given full official details of what occurred but from a press release we understand that certain moneys were unaccounted for and that these funds were under the control of the two men I have mentioned. A court was held to decide this matter. I say "a court" because under the appropriate act dealing with the R.C.M.P. this parliament has given authority to the R.C.M.P. to make certain arrangements to deal with internal discipline. A court was held to investigate the accusations brought against these two highly placed officers of the force. One of them, an inspector in the province of Quebec, is the only commissioned officer in the 98 years of history of the R.C.M.P. to be convicted of a crime in the R.C.M.P. courts.

The R.C.M.P. brought in one of its senior men from Edmonton and a just hearing was held. These two men were brought before the hearing. They then appealed the verdict handed down by this official from Edmonton. The appeal went before the commissioner and was referred to a review board. The appeal board gave its verdict and delivered it to the commissioner. We understand that the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. wished to dismiss summarily these two highly placed officers of the R.C.M.P. working in the province of Quebec in the city of Montreal.

What happened? The matter was referred to the cabinet before any such drastic step was taken. It affected pension rights. After many months of probing and inquiring we came up with the facts to which I have referred earlier in this house. I spoke on this question at some length on June 30, 1965. I have here copies of the orders in council in which these men who had been found guilty by a properly constituted court of failing to account properly for funds placed under their control were retired. They were anxious to retain their pension rights.

The cabinet goes to work and considers the many years of fine service these men gave up to the time the defalcations were discovered, and by special order in council Chief Superintendent René John Bélec was compulsorily retired from the R.C.M.P. on a pension of $6,624 per annum.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Where was Mr. Spencer then? He was a junior clerk in the Vancouver post office and had no access to secret or confidential papers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: Yet at the same time the Treasury Board, approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, recommended that:

> Sub-Inspector Joseph Hosanna Maurice Poitras, who was compulsorily retired from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force—
> Be paid a pension
> —at the rate of $1,526.80 per annum from December 9, 1964, until such date as he attains the age of 65 years and thereafter at the rate of $1,953.30 per annum.

These two men were given a trial by the properly constituted court of internal discipline of the R.C.M.P. They appealed and the verdict of the appeal court was referred to the cabinet with this result.

What about Mr. Spencer? We know he has had no open trial. We know he was not before any properly constituted court. Where is his pension? Gone with the wind. Where is his job? Gone with the wind. The man can whistle for his welfare and future so far as the Prime Minister's actions are concerned. I maintain that there has to be an investigation into the matters concerning this affair.

How can we say that two representatives of a great foreign power were engaged in certain espionage activities and therefore should be asked to leave the country and then turn around and say, "We cannot prove it with regard to the man they were supposed to be dealing with; there is not sufficient evidence on which to obtain a conviction"? If we cannot prove that the Canadian citizen was cooperating with these representatives of a foreign power, then the foreign power should be asked to send back its two representatives to Canada.

I say you cannot have it two ways. I say you cannot condemn people and tell them, "You must leave the country", and then say to our own citizen, "We cannot hang anything on you so we will just place you under surveillance, remove your pension rights, take you off your job, but we are not able to secure a conviction in open court. The security officials who have investigated the matter have said so".

We are trampling on the rights of every Canadian when we take that action with regard to this man Spencer in Vancouver, and I ask that we have a judicial investigation by a third party, in camera if you will but a third party who will enjoy the confidence of every member of the House of Commons.

Referring again to the opening days of the Rivard affair—I do not think I missed a moment in the House of Commons while the session was going on—on November 23, 1964, as recorded at page 10386 of Hansard, the then minister of justice said:

> The reason I personally have decided that until further evidence were obtained it would not be fair to lay a charge is only because the laying of charges in a case where one knows there is no chance of judicial success is an act of smear, a lack of charity and an injustice—
> If in the present case I had personally ordered the laying of a charge, I would have betrayed my conscience and acted against the principle that would govern an honest citizen, because I might have brought about the condemnation without trial . . . . of two young men whose future ought not to be placed in jeopardy—

The minister of justice of that day stated:

> If in the present case I had personally ordered the laying of a charge I would have betrayed my conscience and acted against the principle that would govern an honest citizen, because I might have brought about the condemnation without trial . . . . of two young men—

That being so, what does one say about a minister of justice who appears on a national television network and makes the statement, accusing a person who has had no opportunity of a legitimate trial, that he has been participating in espionage activities? I say, Mr. Chairman, you cannot have it two ways.

I have another interesting report, again one of these repetitious pieces that I would like to put on the record. In 1964, again on November 23, as recorded at page 10,391 of Hansard the then minister of justice stated:

> —A full report was made to me and discussed with the commissioner on September 18 of this year. I do not want to mislead the house and give the impression that the commissioner has made a decision. It was not up to the commissioner to decide. We discussed his views on the matter from the standpoint of police investigation and fact finding as a result of the investigation. With regard to any decision respecting the lodging of a complaint in the light of the report and that conversation, I, of course, must take responsibility because under the statute the legal adviser to the crown is the Minister of Justice, and not the commissioner of the R.C.M.P.—

In the statement made by the Prime Minister on Wednesday we are told that it is not necessary or useful to initiate a judicial inquiry.

> The procedures that have been followed by the R.C.M.P. are exactly the same procedures that were followed when my right hon. friend was in the government.

We are also told that Mr. Spencer did not protest at the hearing held by Canadian security officers, which would be the R.CM.P., and that the R.C.M.P. again advised the present Minister of Justice that an action for criminal proceedings would not bring a conviction. Speaking of the word "conviction", I have here in my hand a copy of the Official Secrets Act of the Dominion of Canada chapter 198 of the statutes. In section 14(1) we read:

> For the purposes of the trial of a person for an offence under this act—

Well, that is very nice. It says:

> For the purposes of the trial of a person for an offence under this act—

Suppose you do not have a trial under the act? I guess this would not apply but we are told Spencer was violating the Official Secrets Act. When this act was passed in 1939 it is a certainty that the government intended that anybody accused of an offence under it should get a trial. That is why it says:

> For the purposes of the trial—

It does not say trial by a representative of the Civil Service Commission or by a security officer of the crown.

Section 15(1) says:

> Where no specific penalty is provided in this act, any person who is guilty of an offence under this act shall be deemed to be guilty of an indictable offence and is, on conviction, punishable by imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years;—

I am not quarreling with the Official Secrets Act but I should like to see it enforced. I do not want to see it evaded because every evasion of the law of the land simply sets a precedent for further evasions in further aspects of the law. I quote again section 14(1) which says:

> For the purposes of the trial of a person for an offence under this act—

And section 15(1) which says:

> Where no specific penalty is provided in this act, any person who is guilty of an offence under this act shall be deemed to be guilty of an indictable offence and is, on conviction, punishable by imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

There has been no trial in the case of Spencer so how could there be a conviction?

I have been reading about the similarities between the Spencer affair and the Bélec and Poitras case because of the pension angle and because of the Rivard affair. Only yesterday I read the comments of the hon. member for Athabasca, as recorded at page 2562 of Hansard for June 17, 1965. He is a former member of the R.C.M.P. with 23 years service in the R.C.M.P. and the Canadian army and this is what he said on that occasion:

> The Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is in a very unenviable position. On the one hand, he is permitted to exercise almost unlimited discretion and in certain cases the government is willing to stake its reputation and its whole future on his judgment. On the other hand, other decisions made by the same man are either completely ignored or overridden. I suggest that you cannot have it both ways.

In the case of Bélec and Poitras the R.C.M.P. recommended that they be dismissed but these two men went to the cabinet and one of them was given a very handsome pension and the other a worth-while pension. In this case the R.C.M.P. report was overridden. In the case of the Rivard inquiry we were told that the R.C.M.P. maintained that no convictions could be obtained if charges were laid, but look at what the situation is today when this matter is pressed?

We are told again in the Spencer case that it would be impossible to convict Mr. Spencer if charges were laid on the present evidence. I say that Mr. Spencer must be given his day in court even if it is in camera before a judge of the highest courts of this land or before a small committee of the House of Commons. I do not object to the inquiry being in camera but I would like to see the judge a third party, not someone directly interested in this matter.

There is much that can be said about this matter. I could bring in the Landreville case.

• (2:40 p.m.)

People are running around telling us we must not condemn him without trial, this is not fair, this is against Canadian justice, people are making accusations against Mr. Justice Landreville and he has no opportunity to answer them. What about Mr. Spencer? He is just a little fellow from Vancouver but

Mr. Justice Landreville, in terms of the street, is a big shot. He was mayor of Sudbury. He has appealed his income tax assessments to the Tax Appeal Board because they were so heavy. He is a member of the Supreme Court of Ontario. We are told, do not pre-judge the case, apply British justice and fair play. I say if that is the argument they are going to use with Mr. Justice Landreville, and I believe in his being given justice and fair play—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The time allotted to the hon. member for York-Humber has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, before coming to the house in early January, I had, on many occasions and like most Canadians, read press reports about the Victor Spencer case. Since I have been sitting here, that is, since January 18, I have heard this name spoken much more frequently than that of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) or of the leader of the government (Mr. Pearson).

I have heard the name of Victor Spencer repeatedly, much more often than I heard members of the house propose pieces of legislation beneficial to the Canadian people.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that parliament is a place to speak one's mind and that the duty of an opposition is to oppose. However, I believe there are reasonable limits beyond which one cannot step without being discredited before the public opinion. In fact, I know that public opinion is getting fed up with these useless discussions that serve only to obstruct government business. Yet, the opposition continues to talk of the Spencer case with an enthusiasm worthy of the best causes.

I have the feeling that Mr. Spencer's defenders speak on his behalf with more ardour, conviction and devotion than they would to defend Her Majesty the Queen of England, the integrity of Canada or the freedom of a citizen wrongly imprisoned.

What is this all about? Involved is a citizen who, we have serious reasons to believe, took part in seditious or dangerous activities against this country, who acted treasonably toward his country in favour of a foreign power.

I realize that the opposition is entitled to ask questions, as I said before, but this has got to stop somewhere. The opposition is justified in suspecting that something fishy is going on in high places. I know that the opposition is justified, in each case, in invoking the rights of man.

What I do not understand is when members take advantage of this to keep harping on the Rivard case, Banks and Doctor Marcoux. All those things have been settled either by the courts or by inquiries. At any rate they were settled last year during the last election campaign, when the federal government had the opportunity to examine its conscience and consider the penance imposed by public opinion, since it was deprived of the strong majority it was seeking.

I think that these things should be considered settled and the Canadian people given the legislation for which they are waiting.

Let us return to the Spencer case. I think that the government must have found some extenuating circumstances to proceed as it did. Everyone knows that it is not always easy to establish legal evidence. But when national security is involved, the government is entitled to take certain precautions, because this becomes a matter of the public good.

When speaking of human rights, there is a distinction to be made, since public good has priority over private interest. This should be remembered in relation to the present case.

I am told that Mr. Spencer confessed. I agree with the opposition that the government should not have taken his pension away; in my opinion, the government should have given it back to him. It belongs to him; he must live, as well as his family, even if he took part in seditious activities.

I do not want to speak very long, Mr. Chairman, because it would be illogical. In view of the remarks I wanted to make, I would like to propose a compromise. Everything that is being said leads to what? Are we trying to make a martyr out of Mr. Spencer for his various supporters? That seems obvious to those who, like me, do not belong to any party.

What is being achieved? Parliament is paralysed, the people who are expecting a constructive legislative program are paying the price of that debate, and Mr. Spencer has been pilloried.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would like to propose a compromise: the government should, in the circumstances, agree to hold a judicial inquiry in camera as soon as possible, if the opposition will agree not to obstruct any longer business of the house by coming back all the time to the Rivard, Marcoux and Hal Banks cases.

We are considering estimates covering money already spent. We will have the opportunity to come back to those matters and we should try to come to a truce. A very successful effort was made last night, and I think the persons responsible for this deserve congratulations, so that the legislative program that the people are anxiously awaiting may finally be introduced.

Changes were made within the cabinet; the responsibilities of individual ministers were redistributed also. We know that the members of the cabinet are planning the legislative program that the people are clamouring for. If some people keep on staging filibusters on matters such as the Spencer case, we will never do any constructive work.

Let us not forget that there are more important matters than the Spencer case. The sick are waiting for the health insurance scheme; the unemployed are waiting for legislation to get work; in business men are waiting for the economy to improve; old people are waiting for a pension fund. And we spend weeks and weeks discussing matters already settled.

In spite of the importance of individual rights, I maintain that those matters are more important than the Spencer case.

I should like to suggest once again this compromise that should be acceptable both to the opposition and to the government: let the government, in a gesture of self-denial, agree to a confidential judicial inquiry, since state secrets and national security are involved to a certain extent, and let the opposition agree to stop harping on the same old stories, such as the Dorion inquiry, the Rivard case and so on. I am shocked to see the Prime Minister who, after all, with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Cardin) is responsible for the administration of the country, compelled to prevent a greater evil by setting up a surveillance such as the one to which was submitted this individual accused of spying.

I am surprised to see that the Prime Minister is being attacked not only by the members opposite but that even some of his friends are taking pot shots at him from the rear and compare cases in no way similar since the case of Mr. Belec of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has no point of comparison with Mr. Spencer's case. The latter is a traitor to his country whereas the former and his compatriot spent a lifetime defending their country. The charge laid against them was a very light one and if the government was harsh on them, it is because they were police officers who cannot be allowed even the smallest peccadillos.

The Canadian people will not be happy with the discussion going on around the name of Spencer. What is required is a legislative program to meet the needs of the people. They are fed up with these insignificant and endless discussions. As an independent member, wishing to take neither side, I would suggest that both sides meet half-way. Let the government immediately agree to this in camera judicial inquiry and let the opposition put an end to this nonsense and let us get on with constructive legislation.

• (2:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal very briefly with the Spencer case but before doing so I should like to inform the Minister of Justice that it is my intention to discuss bankruptcy frauds in general. I am going to leave specifics aside until question No. 577 on the order paper has been answered. It is one which sets forth some very pertinent questions to be answered by the ministry. If the Minister of Justice is prepared to answer those questions during the course of our consideration of his estimates on Monday I will be pleased to follow him in making my remarks about this subject. In any event, I want to have those answers before I engage in any specifics regarding bankruptcy frauds.

At this time I want to deal very briefly with the Prime Minister's statement of February 23 wherein he stated, as recorded at page 1682 of Hansard and as repeated by the hon. member for York-Humber this afternoon, that at no time did any spokesman of the government identify Spencer. That is simply not true. Mr. Spencer was approached by a Vancouver reporter, Tom Hazlitt of the Vancouver Province. Mr. Spencer identified himself to Mr. Hazlitt but Mr. Hazlitt kept that information in confidence. It was the Minister of Justice himself who on a television broadcast first mentioned the name of Mr. Spencer.

Mr. Cardin: That is not true.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sure the minister will recall that that is the case if he searches his memory carefully.

Mr. Cardin: That is not the case.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister will have to satisfy me and a good many other members of this house to the contrary. The hon. member for York-Humber put his finger on the situation and he is a member of the minister's own party. The leader of the New Democratic Party skirted the fringes of the real facts in this case. Whatever the minister says, the fact remains that Mr. Spencer's name was first mentioned by him to the public.

Mr. Cardin: That is not a fact.

Mr. Nielsen: He did so on a television broadcast. Before leaving that matter I join with those who demand that an in camera inquiry be held in order to determine whether or not there was sufficient evidence upon which Mr. Spencer was dismissed and denied his pension rights. The minister is following exactly the same wrong course followed by his predecessor, acting as the prosecutor—

Mr. McIlraith: That was the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nielsen: I will have something to say about the Leader of the Opposition vis-à-vis the Minister of Justice in a moment or so. The Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister have acted as chief prosecutor, judge and lord high executioner in the most arrogant and unjust way possible, in precisely the same way as the former minister of justice acted regarding other matters that have already been discussed in this house.

The Prime Minister in his statement of February 23 said:

> The law officers of the Crown had advised against instituting criminal proceedings against Mr. Spencer—

Why is that so? What is being covered up? Mr. Spencer said that heads will swim. Whose heads, and why will they swim? These are very pregnant questions which are being left unanswered. If proceedings should be taken against others, if there have been offences of which Mr. Spencer could inform us then these would come out before an independent judge or commissioner sitting to ascertain the facts, not only with regard to whether justice is being done in this case but in others as well.

If evidence does not exist upon which proceedings could be taken against Spencer then why was he dismissed and why was he denied pension rights? If evidence did exist upon which proceedings could be taken, why were they not taken? If, as the Prime Minister said in his statement, much of the evidence would be inadmissible in a court of law, what is the danger of taking proceedings, because that evidence would be inadmissible in any event? Who is the Prime Minister to set himself as the arbiter of what is or is not admissible evidence?

Members have already dealt with the Hal Banks case. The hon. member for Verdun in a posturing manner criticized the previous government for its conduct in dealing with the Banks matter. Last session when the Industrial Relations Committee was sitting I tried day after day to place evidence before that committee but I was prevented from doing so by a majority comprised of Liberal members, of which the present Minister of Agriculture was the chief spokesman.

That information was made available to law enforcement officers in this country and the books of the S.I.U. were seized. Unless I miss my guess, there will be sufficient evidence upon which to base extraditable charges against the elusive Mr. Banks. The Liberal Party had a majority on the Industrial Relations Committee the last time it sat and they were supported by our friends to the left. I am surprised to note that the hon. member for Winnipeg North has called for the production of the Norris working papers, because his party supported the Liberal objection to the introduction of this evidence before the Industrial Relations Committee the last time it sat.

Mr. Cashin: The Liberals did not have a majority.

Mr. Nielsen: They did when supported by our friends to the left, as they do today with that same support.

Mr. Cashin: I am just trying to help you get your facts straight.

Mr. Nielsen: My facts are usually borne out. We now have a Minister of Justice telling us, as he told us last fall and as he told the press when the matter of the Sefkind bankruptcy files came up, that he has no responsibility in this field. He invited the Leader of the Opposition to peruse those files but would have nothing to do with my request to look at them.

Mr. Cardin: That is right. You are not a privy councillor, are you?

Mr. Nielsen: He said there was no responsibility and it was not a federal matter at all.

Mr. Cardin: What are you quoting?

Mr. Nielsen: He said it was a matter that concerned only the province. He said that again in his own official press release of September 9, 1965, which has not yet been quoted verbatim to him.

It is of interest today to consider some of the words the Minister of Justice used in this press release which was issued by the minister in connection with accusations made by Mr. Kierans of Quebec when he was the revenue minister. He suggested that the federal Department of Justice was being negligent and indifferent in the administration of the Bankruptcy Act. Mr. Kierans charged the justice department with "considerably hindering" the Quebec war against the underworld and demanded that the new justice minister, the one who sits before the committee this afternoon, tighten up on bankruptcy controls in the light of the Mercier commission report made public last month.

• (3:00 p.m.)

What did the minister say in his press release of September 9, 1965?

> I was surprised and shocked to read the account in today's Gazette of Honourable Mr. Kierans' speech to the Canadian Paper Trade Association at the Seigniory Club yesterday. Mr. Kierans is reported to have accused the federal Department of Justice of negligence and indifference in its administration of the Bankruptcy Act and with "considerably hindering" Quebec's war against the underworld.

He said on page 2 of his release:

> In the first place there is, unfortunately, considerable confusion on the subject of "fraudulent bankruptcies"—

There certainly is and it has been magnified by the creation of—

Mr. Cardin: By you.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister says by me. He has not even heard me yet. I have said nothing about bankruptcies yet, but he is accusing me already—

Mr. Cardin: You said it last November.

Mr. Nielsen: —of confusing the issue. This confusion has been magnified by the creation by this government of a Cerebus ministry with three separate heads. This has confused the matter even worse. If this government ever expects to tackle organized crime in this country on an organized basis, it certainly will not be done by the disorganized decisions that have resulted in the trifurcation of the Department of Justice. The minister went on to say in his press release:

> —and it would frequently be more appropriate to talk about fraudulent credit rather than fraudulent bankruptcies.

That is wrong. The problem the government is confronted with in connection with bankruptcies is not fraudulent credit; it is fraudulent bankruptcy. That is the racket that is operating in this country. Then the minister said:

> The real complaint is frequently that certain people are obtaining credit unscrupulously with no intention or likelihood of meeting their debts after disposing of the goods they obtain.

What is the minister trying to do by using this kind of language in his press release, if it is not to minimize what has been referred to as a cancer on legitimate business in this country? The press release continues:

> Bankruptcy is the inevitable result but it is usually a consequence of what has been done rather than a means, in itself, of defrauding creditors.

Mr. Cardin: That is right.

Mr. Nielsen: How far can the minister go in minimizing the seriousness of what confronts his department and the government in these fraudulent bankruptcies? Bodies are being dug up all over the province of Quebec.

Mr. Cardin: Does the fact that bodies are being dug up all over Quebec or any other place mean it has something to do with bankruptcies?

Mr. Nielsen: Does the minister sit there and endeavour to suggest to me that the murder of Payette is not linked with fraudulent bankruptcies?

Mr. Cardin: Can you say that it is?

An hon. Member: He says anything.

Mr. Favreau: He says what he wants to say.

Mr. Nielsen: I will deal with that matter when the minister has answered the questions that I have placed on the order paper.

Mr. Favreau: How?

Mr. Nielsen: I could now name the five companies that this gentleman was connected with, but I am not going to do that. It will be done after the minister produces the answers to those questions.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, a threat.

Mr. Nielsen: No, it is no threat at all. The minister has an obligation to explain these matters and he is going to make those explanations. I for one am going to see that those explanations are forthcoming.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, so there will not be too much confusion could I ask, what explanations does the hon. member want me to give?

Mr. Nielsen: Obviously the minister has not read question 577 on the order paper. Those questions are specific; they were placed there two weeks ago.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Cardin: That is a question?

Mr. Nielsen: It is a series of questions and there are other questions I want to ask the minister about. But I suggest to him that he certainly cannot sit in his place today and deny what I put to him concerning the unfortunate demise of Mr. Payette.

Mr. Cashin: Anyway, Cowan stole your headlines today.

Mr. MacEwan: You know all about sewers.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister said:

> It has always been understood that the suppression of pre-bankruptcy fraud is the responsibility of the provincial authorities as a part of the administration of criminal justice by the provinces. The federal role, on the other hand, exercised through the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, has always been understood to be, essentially, the supervision of the trustees.

As long as the minister maintains that attitude so long will bankruptcy fraud flourish in this country.

Mr. Cardin: That is why I want a revision of the act.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister says he wants a revision of the act. Obviously he has not read the act, as he has not read my questions. Let us look at the act for a minute or two, if the minister thinks he is being curtailed by its limited provisions. Mr. Mercier did not think the minister was limited by the provisions of the act. The act says in section 3:

> The Superintendent shall, without limiting the authority conferred in subsection (2), from time to time make or cause to be made such inspection or investigation of estates as he may deem expedient—

Mr. Cardin: "Of estates", not of the frauds that precede the bankruptcy.

Mr. Nielsen: Who is talking about frauds that precede bankruptcies? We are speaking about bankruptcy frauds that have been flourishing and growing over the last three or four years. Repeated representations have been made, and recently, to the minister and his opposite number the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec. If there is any doubt about the fact that organized crime of which bankruptcy frauds are an essential ingredient flourish in this country, one has only to refer, if the minister has done so and I trust that he has, to the background paper that was presented to the last federal-provincial conference.

I believe the content of that paper deserves to be placed on Hansard so the general public of this country that does not see papers tabled in the House of Commons will have an insight into the seriousness of the situation that confronts the government and the country generally in this matter of organized crime.

The R.C.M.P. report very bluntly set out that since the elimination of the first syndicate in the middle-1950 period organized crime has been growing and flourishing in Quebec and elsewhere in the country. They say on page 2 of the paper:

> Since that time there has been a steady increase in the development of organized criminal groups in Canada, composed of both local criminals and of those foreign criminals who have managed to settle in this country.
> From Canada, these groups maintain a close working relationship and personal tie with many of the U.S.A. based syndicates, and it is significant that many of these U.S.A. groups have recently been labelled as "Mafia" by the U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Organized Crime. The Canadian groups also maintain connections with criminal elements in Southern Italy and Sicily, which the Italian authorities call "Mafiosa", and with criminals in other urban areas of Canada where the commercial development and high population density offers potentially fertile breeding grounds for development of lucrative crime.
> We find these groups at present centred mainly in the more densely populated commercially developed areas of Ontario and Quebec. Their criminal activities fluctuate into nearly all fields of lucrative crime. We find them active in such things as extortion rackets, stock frauds, gambling, labour racketeering, narcotics, counterfeiting, bankruptcy fraud, illicit liquor, arson fraud, business manipulation and other forms of racketeering.
> These groups have over the years developed a fairly efficient and well organized administrative system—

The paper explains that the group is broken down to levels such as directors, administrators, often called lieutenants, and labourers or the common criminals. It continues:

> Many pose and are accepted as members of the business world, or as members of reputable professional fields.
> We find these leaders posing behind pseudo-legitimate business fronts, such as construction firms—

• (3:10 p.m.)

I am sure the minister has heard of Scalia Development Incorporated, in Montreal, Quebec, and one of the principals involved in that firm. I am sure he has heard of his background.

Mr. Favreau: There is no mystery about that. That material has been tabled in the house.

Mr. Nielsen: Has it now? The only tabling of anything similar in the house which I know of was an answer by the Solicitor General last Monday to a question concerning Guiseppe Cotroni in Kingston. That is the only similarity I have seen so far. Then meat markets, real estate, export-import businesses, steel brokerages, labour consultants, law firms, and so on, are referred to. The report goes on to say:

> They evoke an air of respectability. They live in the best neighbourhoods. They contribute to church and charity and live quietly. They are good neighbours. They are affable to the general public.

I could go on and put the whole of this background paper on the record. On page 5 of the R.C.M.P. report appears the following:

> Therefore, to operate successfully and continually they must have two factors in their favour: inefficient enforcement of existing laws; immunity from prosecution and interference.

To both those statements I would ask the question: Why?

> The present division of jurisdiction and responsibility among the many police forces in Canada contributes—

The report uses the word "somewhat"; I would say "significantly"— > —to inefficient enforcement of existing laws, especially where the criminal group may conduct their activities simultaneously within the jurisdictional areas of several different police forces.

There is one national police force in this country. That police force must be encouraged to assume its full national role in the fight against organized crime. There must be obtained, from the provinces with regard to those areas where there is overlapping jurisdiction, agreement that the police force will be clothed with the undisputed authority to deal, and deal effectively, with organized crime. This is not going to happen if one province says "Out you go; we can look after our own business here". Organized crime must be fought on an organized basis, and you will not achieve that result either by a trifurcation in the Department of Justice or by having the R.C.M.P. pussyfooting in their investigative roles in the various provinces.

The report goes on:

> The second factor is of great importance to the group. To obtain immunity they must ingratiate or make "pay-off" to someone in authority—be it the police, civic authorities, politicians or influential members of the community. The by-product of this action is corruption—a breakdown in the administration of justice, of government function, and of the moral fibre of the community.

Then reading toward the bottom of the page:

> When the legitimate competition is eliminated—

Speaking about bankruptcy frauds.

> —they can then bilk the general public by exorbitant prices, unethical business operations, bankruptcy and fraud.

The Mercier report, quoted briefly by another participant in this debate, is one of the most condemning documents I have seen in a good long time. It stipulates that trustees appointed by the federal minister responsible—because therein lies the ultimate responsibility—are involved in these frauds. The Mercier report pointed out that notwithstanding this knowledge these trustees remained as trustees.

The minister knows that, notwithstanding evidence of fraud in the lumber business in his own province, these companies have been allowed to operate year after year with the same principals. I ask, why has nothing been done? Evidence has been submitted by a lumbermen's association which would justify proceedings under the Criminal Code or the Bankruptcy Act. Yet no action has been taken, and I ask why?

When I listened to the minister's interjections I was taken back to a speech he made in the House of Commons a few years ago. He now sets himself up as the Minister of Justice of this country whose only thought is to be pure and fair; who is always preoccupied with seeing that justice is preserved in its purest possible form. I sent up to my office for this speech of his, which was made on February 22, 1962.

Mr. Cardin: I hope you are going to quote it all.

Mr. Nielsen: If I were the minister I would be ashamed to ask that the whole thing be quoted. As reported at page 1141 of Hansard that day, he said:

> The Prime Minister must be reminded—

This was the time when the present Leader of the Opposition was Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice was sitting over here.

> —that in our democratic form of government the Prime Minister is not above the truth.

Then he went on to say:

> In deference to the Chair I will drop the phrase "above the truth". The Prime Minister's speeches in the house, which should set the note for useful and constructive debates, degenerate into criminal court debating tactics filled with personal insinuations, half truths and sophistry such as will not be found in the records of Hansard—

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Nielsen: I hear someone say "That is right". Hon. members will hear some more of this before I am through. The minister went on to say:

> While the Prime Minister is himself the greatest offender in the House of Commons in this respect, he accuses the opposition of lacking in political chivalry and of adopting smearing tactics, considering himself like Caesar's wife to be above reproach.

Then, as reported on the following page, he accused the Prime Minister of that day of toying with the truth, and went on in these words:

> From the first day the Leader of the Opposition was chosen head of the Liberal party the Prime Minister, by his cynical attitude, words and disparaging remarks about the Leader of the Opposition, has revealed that in the deep recesses of his soul there burn the envious fires of the little green-eyed monster.

Then he continued:

> But surely the Prime Minister betrays his greatest weakness by his continued disparaging, insulting and indeed inaccurate statements on the career, and indeed the reputation, of a great Canadian diplomat, who, by the way, has also become a great leader of the Liberal party.

The minister made a very impartial and fair speech. Was he toying with the truth again? The words with which he concluded his speech are words which I am going to throw right back to him:

> • (3:20 p.m.)
>
> To use the vocabulary of the Minister of Finance, that is a blatant lie; it is a nazi-like lie; it is a fascist lie with strong overtones of McCarthyism.

This is from page 1145 of Hansard of February 22, 1962.

An hon. Member: Somebody should read it for him.

Mr. Nielsen: That is the Minister of Justice today.

Mr. Cardin: I was quoting what I know.

Mr. Nielsen: You were wrong.

Mr. Cardin: I was quoting the words of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Nielsen: I was in the house when the minister made that speech.

Mr. Churchill: So was I.

Mr. Nielsen: I remember his using those words.

Mr. Cardin: I was quoting the Minister of Finance at that time.

Mr. Nielsen: Does the minister now say that the report is erroneous? The minister should have risen at the time to correct Hansard, if he did not like it.

What is the minister doing now with regard to the Spencer case, if it does not fit within the category within which he attempted to bracket the Prime Minister of that day.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but—

Mr. Favreau: Let him go on; let him go on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed unanimously?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Favreau: Let him go on.

An hon. Member: He has not said much; let him go on.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sure that the hon. member for Lapointe will be able to make a contribution to the debate. He usually makes his contributions from behind the curtains.

Mr. Chairman, if the minister is prepared now to rise and give me the answers to questions I placed on the order paper, I would be prepared to go into specifics.

Mr. Deachman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman: I did not consent to the hon. member's continuing. I do not see that his address warrants the time of the house.

Mr. Favreau: No, no; let him expose himself.

Mr. Deachman: We do not wish to listen to him any longer.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Churchill: Trained seal, sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair had the impression that there was unanimous consent to permit the hon. member for Yukon to continue his speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: The President of the Privy Council has made an observation which I am quite sure has been noted in Hansard, and which should not be allowed to remain unanswered. He says, "Let him expose himself".

Mr. Favreau: Yes.

Mr. Nielsen: "Let him expose himself." I say, let the government make some explanations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Supreme Court of Canada, indeed.

Mr. Nielsen: Let the government make the explanations it is obliged to make, and I shall be prepared to bring forward the company names which the minister already knows about, in any event.

An hon. Member: You are withholding information.

Mr. Nielsen: I am not withholding information. The government has an obligation to answer questions put on the order paper by members of the house. All that it is doing by its delay is attempting to gain some sort of position. Let me tell the government that it is not going to gain that position. Members of the government are going to answer questions, and they are going to answer them truthfully, because when I see the answers to these questions I will know whether they are truthful and whether they are fully answered. That is the reason I say, and feel, and have no hesitation in expressing, that you can only delay for so long.

Mr. Cardin: There is no delay, and we have already answered truthfully.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister knew his estimates were coming up. I will reserve my remarks until he has answered the question.

Mr. Cardin: Nobody is refusing you.

Mr. Nielsen: In so far as the interjection of the President of the Privy Council is concerned, he is an expert in the business of exposing one's self.

Mr. Monteith: He should know.

Mr. Favreau: I shall prove it, even when we are not under oath.

Mr. Nielsen: When I heard the rumour about the possibility of this gentleman's being appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, I wondered, Mr. Chairman—I wondered.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice knows that there is a serious situation confronting the government with respect to these bankruptcy problems. Indeed, the Minister of Justice in Quebec has informed the general public of Canada, through the press, that he does not expect these gangland slayings to stop where they have. Already eight people have been done away with. There have been press speculations, and indeed statements by the government in Quebec or government spokesmen in Quebec, that bankruptcy frauds and arson frauds are not connected. However, when one looks at the histories of the individuals who have been put out of the way he cannot help but conclude that there is a very positive connection indeed.

I should be very pleased to go into much more detail with respect to the companies concerned, and with respect to the principals in these companies. I urge the minister therefore to ask his officials to give urgent attention to the business of answering the questions I have asked, because they will give rise to others, as well. Particularly, I want a full answer as to the reasons for the change of superintendents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, could I put a question to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen)?

A few moments ago, the hon. member for Yukon referred to the Montreal lawyer who was murdered recently. Was it the hon. member's intention to say, in his words, that the murder or the death of this young Montreal lawyer would be, or is, related to the matter of fraudulent bankruptcies in Montreal?

Mr. Habel: No, that is what he intimated.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of Justice has the responsibility of answering that question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: No, Mr. Chairman, that was not my question. The point was not raised by the minister, but rather by the hon. member for Yukon, and I should like very much to get an answer from him, because he rises in his place and makes statements. But there are some who knew this lawyer Payette, of Montreal. Therefore, if the hon. member has a statement to make—

An hon. Member: Let him make it.

Mr. Grégoire: —let him make it, let him say it, let him make an assertion, for once.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: A good many people I am sure knew the deceased, Mr. Payette, including members of this house.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, that is not an answer. If the hon. member for Yukon does not want to answer, let him shut up.

Mr. Lambert: You have no right to answer.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Favreau: We will adjourn the court.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, with your permission, I should like to ask a question, if the hon. member for Leeds will allow me—

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member—

Mr. Grégoire: Just one question, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Will the hon. member for Lapointe please sit down.

The question is whether the hon. member—

[Mr. Nielsen.]

[English]

The hon. member for Yukon has had the unanimous consent of this house to continue his speech. Will the hon. member for Yukon permit the hon. member for Lapointe to ask him a question.

Mr. Nielsen: I have done that.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Yukon has been answering two or three questions, and the hon. member for Lapointe wishes to ask another question.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Grégoire: My question is the following: In the course of his remarks the hon. member for Yukon claimed it would be useful to have only one authority in this fight against crime in Canada. Was it his feeling that the provinces should withdraw from the authority they now have and let everything be done by the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Nielsen: I do not mind answering that question very briefly. My view is that the war against organized crime must be given national direction. This can only be done by clothing a national police force with the authority to operate in an organized way, and provincial authorities must co-operate to the extent necessary to make this possible.

Mr. Matheson: One of the matters which is of the greatest concern to us in these estimates is that raised by members of the Official Opposition and supported by members of the New Democratic party with respect to what is now called the Spencer case.

I believe one question which should be answered is this: Who dismissed Spencer? My understanding is that it was the Civil Service Commission, an agency not responsible to government. If Spencer has been deprived of his pension rights it is because the Civil Service Commission is convinced that, in light of all the circumstances, this is the proper course to take. If the commission was not satisfied after their inquiry, what about the 11,000 postal workers? They have not always been silent recently, but their silence in this particular case is eloquent. I submit that these loyal Canadians recognize subversion and dissociate themselves from it.

We should ask ourselves here—because the public may not be clear on this: What precisely are the provisions under which this man's employment was terminated? I refer hon. members to section 50 of the Civil Service Act which is as follows:

(1) The tenure of office of an employee is during the pleasure of Her Majesty, subject to the provisions of this and any other Act and the regulations thereunder, and unless some other period of employment is specified, for an indeterminate period.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to limit or affect the right or power of the Governor in Council to remove or dismiss any employee.

In case Canadians may wonder whether this is something weird and wonderful and new, I think it might be useful to refer to the debate which took place on September 19, 1961 concerning clause 50 which deals with tenure of office. I read from Hansard of that date at page 8576.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, clause 50 introduces something which is extremely peculiar. Section 50(1) reads as follows:

The tenure of office of an employee is during the pleasure of Her Majesty, subject to the provisions of this and any other act and the regulations thereunder, and, unless some other period of employment is specified, for an indeterminate period.

Later he says:

I therefore move that clause 50 be amended by the deletion of subclause (2).

The hon. member for Carleton, the responsible minister, made this contribution, in part:

This particular subclause is merely a preservation of the over-all prerogative of the crown. It is in the existing act and it was never repealed.

Later he went on to say:

I think it is significant that the maintenance in this bill of this particular subclause which the hon. member seeks to delete was approved by all three members of the civil service commission who appeared before the special committee as witnesses. It is also significant that no representations of any kind were made in relation to it by any of the civil service staff associations. I think the hon. member is well aware of how carefully in clause 60 new provisions have been set forth dealing with dismissals and the right of appeal. This particular provision merely preserves the over-all prerogative of the Crown, one which I am sure will not at any time be abused. In view of this I shall ask the committee to reject the amendment.

My hon. friend from Ottawa West, now Minister of Public Works and leader of the house, whom I acknowledge as one of the most competent, experienced and wise persons on matters of government from the opposition bench made this interjection:

The subclause as it now stands reads:

2. Nothing in this act shall be construed to limit or affect the right or power of the governor in council to remove or dismiss any employee.

This appears on first reading to be very wide in its language and undoubtedly it is but I do not see any way of restricting that right—

He is speaking of the right of the governor in council to dismiss on the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

It seems to me that a government has to be held responsible for the administration and the discharge of its duties and that in line with that responsibility there must be this power of dismissal.

Later, he added:

I recall a situation which developed in this country some 15 years ago in which this power was of real value to a government.

We all remember what happened 15 years earlier—the Gouzenko inquiry. I regard the exchange which I have just read as being one typical of two experienced lawyers, well versed in matters of parliament and with a thorough knowledge of the interests of the civil service. They are agreed that there must be some exceptions. I listened with interest to the speech made by the hon. member for York South. I am prepared to accept at its face value the observations made by the Prime Minister when he said:

I have examined this situation personally. I have studied all the reports, all the documents concerning this case. I have spent a good many hours, Mr. Chairman, in doing so because I know that the issues involved are important.

I accept what he says finally, by way of conclusion:

I believe Mr. Spencer's dismissal and his loss of pension rights under the law was lawful and just. I do not believe his rights as a person or as a citizen have been violated. On the contrary, I believe he has been treated with scrupulous fairness.

May I say with the utmost sincerity that had those words been spoken by the Leader of the Official Opposition or by any minister charged with this responsibility I would have accepted them as meaning precisely what they said.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he saying that section 50 of the Civil Service Act means that the governor in council has the right to dismiss arbitrarily without cause and without ever having to account for his actions?

Mr. Matheson: I think it is clear that section 50 provides no limitation to the right or power of the governor in council to remove or dismiss any employee. The usual dismissal section of the act is of course section 60 which provides for notice of dismissal, the right of appeal and so on. Subsection 4 provides for cases where there is an appeal.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Subsection 5, by way of conclusion, provides that the governor in council may dismiss an employee pursuant to a recommendation under this section. What I am saying is that section 50 is an extraordinary section. I believe section 50 is important for the security of Canada. I most seriously care about this matter and I believe the Prime Minister and those charged with the preservation of security in this country care about it too.

Mr. Lewis: So do all hon. members. Do not arrogate to yourself that monopoly.

Mr. Matheson: Perhaps by way of reply I might simply say that I have here an editorial which appeared in the Christian Century of February 22, 1933 under the heading, "Communism Knows There is a Revolution." I believe that what is said in that editorial spells out exactly what is happening today. It may be that my hon. friend from York South does not agree, but I believe that there is a great power contest in the world, and Canada would like to see this power contest cease. We would be very happy if the confrontation could be avoided. Obviously persons who are protagonists in it are good customers and we would like to have them as good friends. I am referring not only to the Russians but also to the Chinese, and I think our external, as well as trade and commerce policies must be directed towards the end of bridging divisions in every conceivable fashion. But we are not blind, we recognize there is an ideological contest of vast proportions and that Canada, by virtue of its friendly relationship to the United States is being subjected to the most powerful propaganda campaign at this particular time. Of course, as was said we had difficulties in 1946 and no doubt pressure will continue. It is the duty of the Minister of Justice, mindful of the great burden of preserving civil liberty, to be also mindful of the preservation and security of the nation; and that preservation and security is a first responsibility of government.

Since I became a member of the house in 1961, far too often have I heard the R.C.M.P. pulled down and derided by people in the house and outside it. I believe Canadians owe an enormous debt to these people who, in many instances, remain silent, do their work for the security of all of us, and oft times are underpaid and understaffed. This is a force the activities of which are spread over the saving of lives, maritime patrol, traffic control, surveillance over narcotics,—indeed, covering a very wide range of fields. The fact that with so little offence, they have been able to accomplish so much in the security field, when we are right in the centre of a confrontation between forces, communist and west, is quite remarkable.

Mr. Lewis: Would the hon. member be good enough to indicate how the security of Canada would be endangered if there were an inquiry into the matter, by a judge or some other person, held in camera, and the result of that inquiry presented to the house and the country?

Mr. Matheson: I think there are certain facts in this case not known to my hon. friend and not likely ever to be known.

Mr. Lewis: And which would not be known if the inquiry were held in camera.

Mr. Matheson: I do not want to dilate on this point at length. We have taken a position which can easily be characterized as unpopular. However, I think it has been a responsible decision after weighty consideration of all the facts. It is not a popular decision but I would like to think we will be supported in it, just as we would support the right hon. gentleman opposite if he were faced with this problem. I think there are more things in this chamber upon which to join forces than to cause differences.

I wish now to touch on the charge of bifurcation or trifurcation of the Department of Justice. I do so because, frankly, for years I have felt that the Department of Justice was a very overloaded portfolio in the Canadian government. This was a department that called for a variety of responsibilities, in some cases responsibilities which conflicted with each other.

May I briefly summarize some of the responsibilities of the Minister of Justice before the reorganization.

1. To administer a large department charged with the responsibility of advising all other departments of government.
2. To advise as to legislation.
3. To recommend as to judicial and quasi-legal appointments.
4. To advise as to constitutional change, and to advise concerning highly complex dominion-provincial relations.
5. To administer this vast quasi-military force, the R.C.M.P., with all its diverse duties, spread across 3,000 miles of country.
6. To administer the penitentiary service.
7. To administer the parole service.
8. To administer anti-combines legislation.

9. To administer bankruptcy legislation.

If we look at this work in comparison with Ontario or the United Kingdom it shows that what has been attempted in the past is far too much for any one minister. Duties which in England would be covered through the home office, the attorney general and the solicitor general were all combined under one minister in Canada. The province of Ontario has its attorney general, a minister of reform institutions and a provincial secretary. Indeed, Ontario is presently discussing appointment of a solicitor general. I cannot help feeling that no minister of justice, because of the weight and variety of his duties, has been able to give any substantial consideration to more than one or another of these many responsibilities.

I would point out these facts, that since the final tabling of the Fauteux committee report, which you will remember was the result of the efforts of Hon. Stuart Garson and his letter of December 11, 1953, the report being dated April 30, 1956, we had as minister of justice Hon. Stuart Garson for 417 days, Hon. Davie Fulton for 1,875 days, Hon. Donald Fleming for 257 days, Hon. Lionel Chevrier for 287 days, Hon. Guy Favreau for 513 days, and Hon. Lucien Cardin for 163 days.

The point I am making is that with the complexity of these responsibilities I do not believe we have ever had a minister of justice who truly got on top of the full variety of these responsibilities.

While it may not logically satisfy all requirements I think there is a certain harmony in putting the R.C.M.P., the penitentiary service and the parole service in one packet.

This is not inconsistent with the British experience and practice. I believe the splitting of the department shows serious evidence of the concern of the government with respect to all the problems we have heard discussed today, on the one hand problems of security, and on the other hand problems of economic supervision and control.

In this latter connection I am thinking of fraudulent bankruptcy and combines legislation—legislation which, in its character, is essentially economic—

• (3:50 p.m.)

One subject that is of most concern to me—and this is because of interests I have had over 15 or 20 years—is improvement and development with regard to the field of penology. I have read carefully, after hearing it, the address of the Solicitor General. It was modest, it was factual, and as usual for him gracious in all its utterances. But to me it is eloquent in what it does not say. As you will remember, the Solicitor General in reporting to this house spoke of the size of our prison population, the overcrowding of institutions, the great need for more research in criminology, and the problem of Staff recruitment. I was disappointed, if he will forgive me, in what he said in respect of the building program. Personally I have been anxious in respect of this building program. The minister told us that during the next eight months five new medium security institutions will be opened at Springhill, Cowansville, Warkworth, Drumheller and Matsqui, the costs of which would be $40 million. I can tell the Solicitor General that there are many people who are interested in criminology and penological science who are concerned about the character of some of these proposed buildings.

Personally I think we have made some serious mistakes. I think Matsqui is a gross mistake, but also that it is an honest mistake where Canada has attempted to do something. When I look over to my hon. friend for Bow River I think that Drumheller, for many reasons, is a mistake.

Mr. Woolliams: Have you ever been to Drumheller?

Mr. Matheson: No.

Mr. Woolliams: Then how can you say that it is a mistake?

Mr. Matheson: Because it is so hard to get there is one reason you should not put an institution in that place.

Mr. Woolliams: Hard to get there?

Mr. Matheson: Yes.

Mr. Woolliams: How silly can you get.

Mr. Matheson: May I make this observation that the penitentiary at Drumheller, Alberta is being built in an out of the way place.

Mr. Woolliams: You had better go to western Canada and stop being so parochial.

Mr. Matheson: It lacks proximity to medical, psychiatric and university facilities. Difficulties will arise in helping the offender avail himself of these services. Staff may become stagnant because of a lack of access to the academic world, consultative services and other community resources. I might tell my friend, who is snickering over there, that one of the concerns of the international penology group that met in Stockholm this summer was to site prisons in places where there would be a variety of such services. I think, for instance, of the complex which has developed around Kingston, which has excellent psychiatric and psychological assistance, good medical facilities, excellent facilities in the way of the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society, and a school of law. Because of the psychological care which has been available to many of these institutions they have been vastly improved. I can tell you that every one of the 60 students at Queen's Theological College is undergoing constant supervision and training in the various institutions in Kingston which include the Kingston maximum security penitentiary, Joyceville, Collin's Bay, and the prison for women.

I say that with the professional and expert assistance that is available, there is as much hope for the penitentiaries here. I am not impressed by the emphasis on architecture and the building program which will cost Canadians something like $110 million. Personally I hold the view that we have far too many people in Canada in prison.

Mr. Woolliams: There are a few people I would like to see in jail.

Mr. Matheson: Perhaps if the committee will bear with me I could refer to extracts from document No. 19 of Sunday, January 23, 1966, under the directorship of Ross McLean of the C.B.C. This is called "A Sense of Captivity". One inmate said:

> You don't have to think. Everything's done for you. You sit back and sink into the weeds, you might say, and become an automat.

I am concerned about the separation of many people whom I have known in penitentiaries which I have had occasion to visit, people who have had long separation from their wives and children.

Listen to this:

> In 1960 or 1959 I had a visit from my wife. At that time the visit was over, we were leaving the visit, and she was going out to North Gate. This working crew was coming in, and one of the men stepped out of the line to grab the baby, and the copper that was walking the men he yelled at him. I said it's all right. Anyways he took the baby and held it, held the child, the boy in his arms, and you'd have to see the expression on this man's face and how sad this was! And this guy bugged me for months after till I came over here, asking me, how was the kid? Could I have a picture of your child? And this man was no degenerate, it was a normal man. Just this craving to see a child or to be able to pick up a baby again.

[Mr. Matheson.]

I happen to know of two or three cases which fall into this category. I am concerned for instance even about the limitation on the correspondence of the inmate to his wife. Here another inmate is speaking of the homosexual problem:

> I don't know, it is hard to explain. Some person needs somebody else, because if you do not have somebody you fall apart yourself.

What does Mr. McGibbon, the commentator, say:

> A prison is all the things we deny those who have offended us . . . . is a hiding place for mistakes we've made . . . problems we couldn't solve . . . guilts we can't abide . . . is an institution of last resort. When all the other institutions . . . the homes, the schools, the churches, courts and counsellors . . . have failed. A prison is a state of mind where tensions you never quite walk off remain to (haunt) your dreams.

I am concerned too about some of the statistics we find in Canada. It is clear that many of the people at the present time are going to return. In fact some people say this figure is as high as 80 per cent. Ninety per cent of those in penitentiary will one day be released. If this is so, surely the great burden is to examine ways, means, and techniques to improve what I think in many respects is an ineffectual and ineffective prison system.

May I go on with some of the comments which we heard on this recent program. Again this is Mr. McGibbon:

> Our Canadian prisons today are the price we pay for thinking that if we forget the criminal, he will cease to exist. But he will not cease to exist until we admit that he does exist and until we make it possible for him to learn to exist as a man in our free communities.

Again Mr. McGibbon:

> —in prison the need for human dignity is such a shrieking thing.

Personally I do not believe we are making proper use of our prisons. I would like to see more of the special institutions. I am pressed in this direction by the fact that I had occasion during the war, early in 1940, to be involved with a group of 125 men released from Dorchester penitentiary. For a while I could not believe how these people who came from such a place really could be much use to their country. I did not think they knew very much. But it took me just a few weeks to develop a little humility and realize these were persons, just as myself, and maybe in some respects better than myself. When I look back over that group of 125 men, it seems to me we need more of the work camp approach as a technique of correction.

• (4:00 p.m.)

I am depressed by the fact that inmates in the Canadian penitentiaries are employed for very short periods of time, in many instances only two and a half or three hours a day. Often the work is demoralizing and unproductive. It was Agnes McPhail of the C.C.F. party who years ago complained about the lack of work for prisoners. If that sounds Dickensonian I invite hon. members to read her speeches to see how absolutely right she was. I see no lack of logic in the suggestion that we should develop techniques whereby prisoners are paid for work, to encourage them and to help them to maintain their dignity. Perhaps they should not be paid full wages, but at least a portion of a wage.

I should like to see methods developed in respect of parole allowing prisoners to work hard in their special skills or at hard labour in order to decrease their period of incarceration. I am convinced that this could be done.

A year or more ago I made a proposal to the effect that we could develop our waste lands in the north through the use of prisoners who are serving time. I think back to my experience with those 125 men who learned to soldier with the first division, and how magnificent they were. I am convinced that if we used the arctic and transport equipment developed by the army, we could put these people on islands in the Arctic to develop bases, docks, landing strips and other communication facilities. It is my belief that these men would pull themselves together under such conditions and become eligible for parole, and some of them might even wish to remain there.

Here in this lovely part of Ontario I have studied by cruiser the wonderful Rideau canal system, built many years ago by Colonel By and the Royal Engineers. It is being allowed to fall to pieces in certain spots. I am convinced that inmates could perform the masonry required to repair this canal system. Surely this would give people in penitentiaries some encouragement to rehabilitate themselves. This whole idea might sound fanciful and ridiculous, but I do not believe that it is.

Perhaps these ideas sound logical to me because of my regular participation in the deliberations of inmates, many of whom I find are not very different from the members of my own family and my friends. Some of them have had far less in the way of privileges, while some of them, I agree, are vicious, psychotic and dangerous requiring permanent custody. If we in Canada are deeply concerned about civil rights and the rights of individuals we should start by studying what is happening in our prisons.

I have been impressed by the work that Isabel Macneill has done at Kingston.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member's allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Matheson: I am very grateful to my hon. friends for permitting me to continue for a few minutes longer.

Isabel Macneill, as so many of you will remember, came from the maritimes from a fine old Halifax family. Many will remember that she commanded the Wrens during the war. What she has done in the area of penal reform has increased penological science. I should also like to refer to Rev. J. A. Nickels who stands high in the services being carried out at Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. Groos: Hear, hear.

Mr. Matheson: I note that my hon. friend remembers him as the padre of his frigate some years ago. These two fine individuals have done a great deal for the penitentiaries they have served. Let me quote what Isabel Macneill has said:

> Prison itself . . . is the punishment and everything that happens after admission . . . should be geared to re-education—

She has suggested that 60 per cent of the girls now in prison have been convicted under narcotics charges. Let me present very briefly the impressions of one or two of these inmates. One states:

> My first night here I couldn't even sleep because all I could see was the bars, you know the reflection of the bars on the wall and uh . . . it made me cry in fact I cried half the night.
> I don't think it could be described really. It's just three walls and the bars, a floor and ceiling and a bed.

Another inmate states:

> I'm in my 50's and there are other around in this age group, and I'm learning more about crime than I'll ever learn in my life. I don't know whether this is important for my rehabilitation.

I think it is about time we got some of those people out of those maximum security prisons into open prisons.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? I note that the hon. member for the Northwest Territories is in his seat, which prompts me to ask the hon. member for Leeds whether he has consulted with that hon. member about his idea to send these convicts to the north, and whether the hon. member for the Northwest Territories is in agreement.

Mr. Matheson: I have discussed this idea with several hon. members. I have discussed it with other people who have been involved in the exploration and development of the north. I am not suggesting that many inmates should be sent to the north. Perhaps I should explain my proposal. It is my belief that men who are physically fit should be allowed to volunteer as members of crews to be moved up to the north by aircraft—travelling with light equipment, sleeping in tents, in an effort to further develop these waste areas.

The men who could stick out this kind of existence would be far better off than living in a small cell. I have discussed this with other individuals and I am sure there are a lot of young men in our institutions in excellent physical condition who would be delighted to be given an opportunity to work amid the glories of our northland. I have had the opportunity of visiting the north, particularly during my university days. I am sure this program would give these men a challenge and would help them change their whole attitude.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say a good deal more about this subject, but I will not at this time as I am sure there are other members who wish to contribute to the debate. In concluding let me say that I do agree with what has been said by Alan Peyton, a prison superintendent. He said:

> An offender must be punished, I don't argue about that; but to punish and not restore, that is the greatest of all offences.

We are spending far too much money today to keep each man serving time in a penitentiary. I suggest the maintenance cost runs between $2,700 and $3,000 per year. To that figure one must add an additional $2,000 paid in support of many prisoners' families. I suggest if we have that kind of money to spend we should spend it in ways which will encourage these people to rehabilitate themselves. As Walter Scott said, "It's no fish ye're buying, it's men's lives". There are many fellow Canadians who are still obscurely fighting the last fight of virtue, still clinging to some rag of honour, the poor jewel of their souls. They need our help.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

I believe we have much to do and I am grateful that the Prime Minister has seen fit to reform and reconstruct the justice department in order that we should pay real attention to crime in all its aspects, including the rehabilitation of prisoners.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief this afternoon. I wish to refute the suggestions made by the hon. member for Leeds who recommends that dangerous convicts should be taken out of maximum security and set free in the north. I want to point out the folly in the hon. member's suggestion that we should use inmates in public works for the repair or construction of the Rideau canal and other projects in Canada. Public works should continue to be done on contract by the lowest bidder.

After listening to arguments about civil liberties and justice I want to point out a strange paradox that exists. The government is not inspiring confidence on the part of the public through their policies. According to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice this man Spencer is under continuous surveillance in spite of the fact there has been no trial or inquiry into his alleged actions. On the other hand, the inmates in our penal institutions who have been tried and convicted should be kept under surveillance and enforced security, yet this is not the case.

Therefore we may deduce that there are civil liberties and penal liberties, apparently. This situation should not exist in the sense that has recently been demonstrated. I refer to the recent prison break from Collin's Bay penitentiary. This break took place on Wednesday, February 9, when four dangerous men were successful in escaping from that institution. It has been said around Parliament Hill and the area from which I come that it is now easier to get out of a penitentiary than it is to get in.

My constituency is adjacent to Kingston and the institution there. The people in the area of Bay of Quinte, Kingston and the upper St. Lawrence are very concerned about these prison breaks and the security in our institutions. Security in our penal institutions should at all times be beyond criticism and must indeed be constant and rigidly enforced.

I would refer to the questions I placed on the order paper and point out that they have been there long enough for answers to be given. I waited a reasonable length of time after the recapture of these men before asking these questions. The first question is to be found on page 82 of the order paper and was lodged with the government on February 15:

Has there been a special inquiry into the factors and/or persons contributing to the prison break of three dangerous prisoners from Collin's Bay penitentiary on Wednesday, February 9, 1966, who were later captured near St. Catharines and, if so, will the government report to the house the findings resulting from this inquiry?

Until I get answers to these questions I must assume that the attitude of the government to this matter is negative. I understand that the prison staff were forewarned of this break. If this is so there is absolutely no excuse for this lack of security and carelessness.

The fact that vigilance was at the time not practised or performed by the guards closest to the escapees set off a chain of events that is most regrettable and in fact can never be corrected. I understand that most of these prisoners were nearing the date when they would be eligible for parole. What a sad case this is. Their action has terminated the chance of their ever being paroled. They have ruined their lives by their actions and will now serve the original sentences plus an additional, appropriate term for breaking out of prison. Moreover, they have grievously jeopardized and harmed the life of their innocent female victim. I refer to the woman they captured, robbed, tortured and in fact are alleged to have criminally assaulted. All this damage was done because security, vigilance and the action we require from guards in these circumstances was absent or was not performed. I understand that the rifle of one of the guards would not fire. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I would quote my question that appears on page 93 of the order paper. This question was lodged with the government on February 18:

With respect to the recent escape of prisoners of the Collin's Bay penitentiary, was the utilization of one of the rifles issued to a guard impeded by grease on the bolt?

This question concerns the public of this country who deserve and expect protection. My next question was:

Do guards at penitentiaries have daily inspection of their rifles and, if not, what is the reason?

Then I asked:

Is it mandatory that penitentiary guards shoot in order to prevent an escape of a prisoner or prisoners and, if not, what is the reason?

We were informed that one guard did not, would not or refused to shoot at the escapees. The question is, why? This is a very serious question, Mr. Chairman. We are dealing with the basic element, the real meaning of government, the protection of persons and property. I for one, and I believe all hon. members will not allow this principle to be weakened.

In summing up my point, Mr. Chairman, I would say it is evident to all hon. members that the level of security in this penal institution has been lowered or at least is of a variable nature. This has been demonstrated by the regrettable incident to which I have referred. I ask that this matter and all matters pertaining to penal security, the action of guards, the rules and the enforcement thereof in our penal institutions as they apply to vigilance and the full practice of strict enforcement of security, be referred to our standing committee on justice at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to preface my remarks by adding my congratulations to the Solicitor General upon his appointment to this portfolio and for his forward-looking approach with regard to penal problems and their solutions. I also extend my best wishes to the Minister of Justice in the difficult job he has ahead, and agree with the government that it was necessary to separate the numerous departments that were previously within the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. I thought that any remarks I made this afternoon would be anti-climactic to those of the hon. member for Yukon, but I notice he is adopting a legal ploy and is trying to get as much information as he can from the government before making a frontal attack.

I direct my remarks to the ever-increasing problem of bankruptcy and state categorically that the Canadian public and in particular the Canadian businessman is amazed and shocked at the inaction of government with regard to amendments to the Bankruptcy Act which are necessary to deal with fraudulent company and personal bankruptcies. There has been no revision of the act since 1949, in spite of active interest by concerned groups in the business community. My hon. friend the member for Greenwood the other day set forth the many organizations which have presented briefs to Ministers of Justice and in regard to which no action has been taken. For example, a very full brief from the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto was submitted in 1961 and in 1963 a full brief was submitted by the Institute of Chartered Accountants. Then in 1965 we had the Mercier report which dealt with fraudulent bankruptcies in Quebec as they affected the Department of Revenue of that province.

In addition to these briefs there have been numerous articles in periodicals and newspapers concerning the probems of bankruptcy. I refer to an article under the dateline Friday, February 4, which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star, written by Alastair Dow who reports a speech by Mr. Biddell, the President of Clarkson, Gordon and Company, one of Canada's largest firms of bankruptcy trustees. This article reads:

> Bankruptcies, he said, have grown from "a minor problem to a national disgrace" since the last time the Bankruptcy Act was revised, in 1949. He added that the tendency of government is to ignore the problem, to sweep it under the rug . . .
> Biddell came from a modest family, and he says it agitates him to rub shoulders every day with people who have taken a financial beating because of bankruptcy abuses. He has seized upon his mission also because of the inaction of government.

• (4:20 p.m.)

> "If there's anything that motivates me, it's people who won't move to solve a problem".
>
> The problem, as Biddell sees it, is far from insurmountable. "It wouldn't be difficult at all to revise the Bankruptcy Act.
> "This isn't going to be a one-shot war. You have to change laws to fill the loopholes as people get smarter, the way the Income Tax Act is frequently revised. It's about time we got started on the Bankruptcy Act".
> The day is long past when bankruptcies could be considered a private matter between debtors and creditors.

This indicates the attitude of the president of one of the largest firms of bankruptcy trustees in the country. Added to that is the growing number of bankruptcies that have taken place in the last two years. At page 27 of the brief submitted by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants in October 1963 the following statement appears:

> From the point of view of government responsibility, bankruptcy is big business. The administration of the Superintendent's Department in 1961 included the supervision of the administration of some 3,876 estates with estimated liabilities in excess of $157,000,000.

That was in 1961. In 1963, according to the January issue of the Canadian Credit Institute publication:

> The number of bankruptcies and resultant defaulted liabilities have been growing at an alarming rate and amounted to 3,677 commercial failures and $196 million in defaulted liabilities in 1963 compared with 1,303 and $25 million respectively in 1950.

According to Dun and Bradstreet, they have calculated that 2,597 businesses went broke in 1965, leaving a trail of debts totaling $175,855,000. So you can appreciate the growing increase in the number of bankruptcies from 1950 to the present day.

One might ask, why this great increase in the number of bankruptcies? I think it is the duty of members to find the reasons for this, and I hope to offer constructive criticism. I think we have to look at the classes of persons involved, and their attitudes, to determine just what are the reasons for these bankruptcies.

The first class of person, Mr. Chairman, would include the previous minister, and perhaps the present minister, and their attitude toward the conduct of bankruptcy matters. I think the attitude that suggests that the provincial government is primarily responsible for enforcement of the administration of justice in connection with criminal activities under the Bankruptcy Act, and that they only are responsible for the supervision of trustees, is a wrong attitude to take. I suggest that the problem should be tackled on the same level as we tackle problems under the Combines Investigation Act.

I suggest that we should set up a separate department to investigate these allegedly fraudulent bankruptcies, a department staffed by men with experience in accountancy and company law. I also suggest we retain special counsel to prosecute the cases. This is done in the case of combines investigation, and although there could be many criticisms of it I think that the same practice should be followed.

I am sure that the Minister of Justice would agree he is having difficulty in the province of Ontario persuading the Attorney General of the province to set up a separate department to investigate these bankruptcies. I understand there is reluctance on the part of the Attorney General to appoint someone separate and apart to investigate these allegedly fraudulent bankruptcies. At the moment, my only knowledge of any investigations in Toronto are those conducted by two members of the fraud squad of Metropolitan Toronto who are not experienced enough in corporate law relating to fraudulent bankruptcies to be very familiar with the subject. The crown attorney in Toronto, because of shortage of staff, is very reluctant to let one of his assistant crown counsel devote his full time to processing these fraudulent bankruptcy cases. It is public knowledge that these cases take a minimum of four to eight weeks to process.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gilbert: Certainly.

Mr. Nielsen: Is the hon. member aware of the provisions of section 3(5) of the Bankruptcy Act, which sets forth that the superintendent of bankruptcy, federal office, may engage such accountants or other persons as he may deem advisable to conduct any action outside of the office of the superintendent?

Mr. Gilbert: Yes, I am familiar with that provision. I am also familiar with the fact that the Minister of Justice has not taken appropriate action under that provision. I am just dealing with what happened in Toronto, Ontario, in regard to the fraudulent bankruptcies that occurred in that area. So here you have an Attorney General reluctant to appoint somebody to conduct an investigation. You also have two men on the fraud squad who are inexperienced in these intricate matters; and you have the crown attorney for the city of Toronto unable to let one of his assistants devote his full time to the subject.

I would agree with the hon. member for Yukon that what is really needed is an investigation of these bankruptcies on a national scale by the R.C.M.P. You need officers from the R.C.M.P. as well as accountants and lawyers familiar with company law. You need that type of person, rather than having to depend on various branches of provincial administration. That would be my respectful submission, Mr. Chairman, to the minister in connection with this problem. The second reason for the difficulties in bankruptcy has been the improper actions of the trustees. In some areas it would appear that competition between bankruptcies and proposals has brought about practices which involve virtual collusion between debtors and the trustees they employ, which is against the interests of the creditors. To strengthen that point I should like to read briefly from the Mercier report, wherein is set forth the actions of some of the trustees in Quebec. I would suggest that the same comments could be applied to the actions of some of the trustees in Ontario.

• (4:30 p.m.)

This is on page 11 of the Mercier report:

In virtue of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, the trustees represent the interests of the creditors and nearly all their powers are conditioned by the approval of the inspectors appointed by the creditors. It was shown that, in practice, certain trustees are the "potentates" of the quasi-totality of the bankruptcies which they administer. Because of their extensive knowledge in bankruptcy matters, they usually manoeuvre the unsuspecting inspectors as if they were puppets. In many instances, it was established that certain trustees had cleverly arranged the appointment of one or more of the inspectors. It is all so easy that the creditors and inspectors in good faith showed a disinterest that the Commission has already brought to light.

Amongst the many grievances lodged against the trustees during the inquiry, the Commission held the following: To begin with, there is the conflict of interest. On this point, it seems necessary to remember that in many instances of assignment or proposal, a conflict of interest is found between the trustee, who acts for the bankrupt and who is in fact his client, and the creditors whom he has the obligation to protect.

Then I continue:

In a number of cases, the trustee was paid his fees in advance from the bankrupt or obtained a bond; this situation presents itself particularly in summary matters where there are practically no assets. There is a real conflict since, for the trustee, it is no longer a question of protecting the creditors but of liberating a debtor.

The report goes on at page 12:

By incidence, it was noted that a number of trustees were more or less in the "business" of bankruptcy, and, in order to administer their offices with all the disbursements involved, they need a flow of bankruptcies. In order to effect this, many saw the advantage of maintaining good relations with the debtors rather than with the creditors.

On page 13 the report continues:

In many cases, it was noted that money, which was supposed to have been distributed to the creditors as dividends, was retained in the bank, without valid reason, for a considerable period after the settlement of certain bankruptcies.

Then the report takes a slash at some members of the legal profession. It says:

Testimonies, including one by a member of the bar, revealed that it is current practice, for certain trustees, to require and receive hush-money from lawyers representing the interests of secured creditors or of bidders promising in return not to oppose proceedings taken by the latter. It was also observed that certain representatives of trustees are using blackmail in order to obtain certain advantages or interest in the businesses which are operating under proposal.

These are some of the allegations which have been made against the conduct of trustees. I would ask the minister to strengthen the office of superintendent with regard to the issuance of licences and the conduct of these trustees.

The same comments could be applied to a third class, being the class of inspectors.

Again, the Mercier report sets forth the condemnation of the actions of inspectors, consisting in many cases almost of direct collusion or acquiescence in the actions of the trustees.

Another class which I think deserves criticism and reform is the class of finance companies. At page 16 of the Mercier report it says:

> We should mention that the practice of several finance companies, to realize their security without accounting to anyone, does not seem to satisfy the elementary exigencies of equity towards the creditors, specially after taking cognizance of the facts discovered by the Commission during the inquiry, when it has been established that the agent or mandatory of a finance company, charged with realizing the security, was none other than an individual of doubtful reputation having been involved in rings of fraudulent bankruptcies.

In order that bankruptcy companies should be brought to the attention of the minister—

Mr. Cardin: I am reluctant to interrupt the hon. member. I find his speech very interesting. I wonder whether the hon. member might be able to tell the committee what he has in mind when he speaks of fraudulent bankruptcies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister know?

Mr. Cardin: Yes, I know.

Mr. Gilbert: I appreciate the remarks of the minister. I would ask for his indulgence until I come to that. I shall reach that point in a very few minutes.

The fifth class with regard to problems concerning bankruptcies may be laid at the door of the superintendent's office. In the brief of the Institute of Chartered Accountants, at page 28, there is a short list of the criticisms that I would ask the minister to take into account. The brief says:

> The following alleged criticisms have been made covering the administration of the Superintendent's office:
> (i) There is undue delay in the approval of trustees' final statements which seriously delays the closing of estates and the distribution of dividends often urgently needed by creditors.
> (ii) The duty of the Superintendent to conduct investigations into fraudulent bankruptcies has not been carried out.
> (iii) Licences have been granted to trustees who have failed to administer bankrupt estates in the best interest of the creditors.
> (iv) It is the practice, in at least one major bankruptcy jurisdiction, for the official receiver to insist that he or a member of his own staff act as the chairman of every meeting of creditors. Many of these meetings are called at the same hour with the same chairman, thereby effectively denying creditors their due right to be heard.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

These are some criticisms that I think are valid. I would ask the minister to pay close attention to them.

Having dealt with certain classes of persons that I think are directly implicated in the administration of the Bankruptcy Act, I would now direct the Minister of Justice to some of the areas that have been neglected. The first area, as we are all aware, is the area of fraud. Fraud is a very complex matter, and at times it is very difficult to distinguish between fraud sufficient to warrant a criminal action, and fraud, which means unethical business operations. The brief of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants sets forth this problem, and sets forth some of the activities that the operators have conducted, with regard to their fraudulent activities which, in the majority of cases, have been with regard to corporate companies.

Doctor Galbraith, in his book "The Affluent Society" says "As more goods are produced and owned, the greater the opportunities for fraud and the more protection of property is required". If law enforcement services do not keep pace with this protection we may be certain of increased crime.

Coming directly under one of these problems with regard to fraud are transactions between persons or entities which do not deal with one another at arm's length. The present act does not generally deal with these problems. Legislation in 1949 was developed to serve the needs of unincorporated companies. However, we now recognize that most of the business in this regard is carried on by corporations.

The main problem in this connection is where a number of companies owned by one shareholder or by the same shareholders collaborate together in a business enterprise in such a manner that one of the companies acquires most of the liabilities and the other company in the group comes into possession of most of the assets. Then the company with the liabilities is allowed to go into bankrupt-the liabilities is allowed to go into bankruptcy.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The second situation occurs where the shareholders of the company withdraw their investment, either by the way of dividends, share redemptions, or repayment of loans, leaving creditors unpaid.

A third situation arises where creditors who do not deal at arm's length with the debtor legally establish substantial claims against the debtor and are in a position to enforce their wishes on the rest of the creditors either by bankruptcy proceedings or the appointment of inspectors, or in any proposal that may be made by the debtor.

So we are faced with three classes of problems.

Mr. Nielsen: That is only a partial list.

Mr. Gilbert: As the hon. member for Yukon has said, it may be only a partial list. However, I believe the institute has brought forward recommendations which are well worthy of consideration. One of them is that there should be an amendment of the act with regard to the definition of a related person. They recommend that we incorporate into the act the provisions set out in section 139 subsections (5) and (6) of the Income Tax Act to stop this practice of placing all the assets in one company and all the liabilities in another.

The second suggestion relating to persons who are not dealing at arm's length is that any conveyances to persons who are not dealing at arm's length with the debtor should be considered fraudulent if they are made within a period of 12 months rather than within a period of three months as set forth under the present act. The third recommendation relates to persons who are not dealing at arm's length being unable to vote with regard to a proposal set forth by the debtor, unless it is to vote against the acceptance of that proposal. These are all matters of which we should take immediate cognizance. Legislation should be brought down forthwith to amend the act accordingly.

The second area to be considered is the area of proposals which a debtor makes. In this field there have been many abuses. Those most frequently complained of by creditors are that many debtors lodge proposals with the trustee without the means or even the intention of carrying them out. It is alleged that in many instances the purpose of such frivolous proposals is merely to enable the debtor to use the stay of proceedings obtained thereby in order to dispose of his assets to the detriment of his creditors.

Many debtors are assisted in such a scheme by the absence of any direct responsibility on the trustee acting in the proposal to control the debtors' assets. Again, the brief sets forth methods whereby actions of this type could be controlled.

The third recommendation relates to the re-organization of the superintendent's office. Some of the recommendations set forth are as follows: 1. The appointment of an assistant deputy minister to the superintendent of bankruptcy. It is high time such an appointment was made. 2. The appointment of three assistants to the superintendent of bankruptcy whose duties would be to supervise the activities of registrars, official receivers and trustees; investigations of bankruptcy frauds and the processing of trustees' statements. I am sure the hon. member for Yukon would agree that in the past one of the problems has been that the burden of investigations has usually fallen upon the shoulders of the creditors rather than their being any active participation by the minister and his staff. This has been a most serious problem. Here again I agree with the hon. member that it will take a national force to combat the situation facing us today.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the hon. member permit a question? Again I would refer him to subsection 5 of section 3. The expense of paying accountants and other persons to engage in these investigations is payable from the appropriation of the office of the superintendent of bankruptcy. If the minister had been exercising the authority granted to him the cost would have been paid in this way and there would have been no need for it to fall on the shoulders of the creditors. That is, if the minister is doing his job.

Mr. Gilbert: I think the hon. member is again underlining the need for immediate action by the minister to advise the superintendent to look into these matters regardless of the expense, because he has the authority to do so under the act. I agree most heartily with that.

A final area in which this problem has arisen is that of personal bankruptcies. There has to be a new approach to the question of personal bankruptcy—a new attitude toward persons whose income is derived from salaries or wages, who have incurred large debts by overspending and who then find the present procedures an easy way in which to avoid the repayment of their debts. We must discover a method of ensuring an orderly payment of a bankrupt's debts, under budgetary control and supervision, in order that the debtor may repay his creditors 100 per cent. What I am saying is this: We need to take stronger action with regard to company bankruptcies, but we must also take a hard look at the activities of individuals who are taking advantage of the present provisions of the act in order to avoid the repayment of their debts. I believe the Canadian public and Canadian businessmen in particular demand immediate action for the protection of all Canadians to restore confidence in the business world and to give strength to the enforcement of the law.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the ten minutes or so remaining, it will be quite impossible to deal with the variety of subjects which warrant consideration. I have sat here throughout the debate waiting for the Minister of Justice, or one of the other ministers who now share the throne of justice, to rise and explain themselves with regard to the matters which have been referred to with such clarity again this afternoon, not only by members of the official opposition but by the hon. member for York-Humber who spoke as a Liberal supporting the government. His speech, I should have thought, would have been answered.

I wish to refer to the Spencer case. I was not here when this subject was discussed in the house the day before yesterday. But I say at once that the decision not to hold a judicial investigation into this matter is a gross perversion of the elementary principles of freedom. The excuse which is given, namely that the security of this nation would be interfered with, is simply a smokescreen, and nothing else.

This man has been pilloried before the Canadian people. He has been given no opportunity to answer. His name was spread across the nation by the minister, in a totally unjustified way, and it is now stated after all this cloak and dagger drama that he is not complaining. Well, that adds to questions that arise. Why? Across this nation people are beginning to wonder whether there is something behind this case that has not been revealed.

I do not have the time now to refer in detail to the press release of May 8, issued by the Department of External Affairs, but I shall do so on an appropriate occasion. It should be read and reread. It either meant something, or this particular case happened to arise at a time when something had to be brought up in order to cover up the revelations that were being made in the Rivard case.

From time to time it happens that security is undermined, but never before has a man been identified with a government failing to act. Why? Is there any reason to believe that if Spencer speaks his threat will be implemented to the effect that heads will roll, or heads will swim? If there is not, then why not an investigation by judges, in secret if you will, allowing them to make their report? Otherwise I can only say that the Bill of Rights has been entirely denied—every principle of it.

What is the government covering up? Nothing, the minister says. If it has nothing to cover up why not have a judicial inquiry into this matter? That is the same kind of answer as the hon. gentleman's predecessor gave on November 23, 1964 when the hon. member for Yukon was speaking, and the former minister of justice said, "It is lies," and then within an hour admitted that he knew previously, and it was true.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman can make his question of privilege afterwards, if he wants.

Mr. Favreau: I am not going to let the right hon. gentleman continue in the way which he has started now.

[Translation]

On November 23, 1964, when the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) rose to deal with a certain file that had been brought to his attention—

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this is not privilege. He is going to make the speech he ought to have made, and made over and over again.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I would ask the President of the Privy Council to make his point of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, my question of privilege is that I did not have to retract and what the hon. member for Yukon said then was inaccurate. I said he had lied when he said that one of the persons who had committed an offence against the Criminal Code was in my office. He was wrong.

[English]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I suggest to the President of the Privy Council that if he disagrees with the allegations being made at the present time by the Leader of the Opposition that he should have the opportunity to reply afterwards.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, we have been waiting for that explanation since November 1964, and I look forward to hearing the explanation because he said, "That is a lie."

Mr. Favreau: Well, it was.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And it was not, and the hon. gentleman at that time misled the house.

Mr. Favreau: That is a lie.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to be perfectly clear. Now we are again getting the same kind of answer in connection with Spencer. This afternoon the hon. member for York-Humber spoke the language of wisdom when he asked for action in this regard, but the government sits quiet. Why? Whose are the heads? Where are the heads that are going to fall or to swim? Spencer does not object. I would like to have the opportunity of examining Spencer and finding out what happened here, because it is a strange thing that he does not object. But he says if anybody dares do anything something is going to happen. I will come back to that next week. I thought this afternoon we would be able to get through, that the minister would get up and answer, but I can tell him and those associated with him that until this is answered we have a responsibility.

I now wish to deal with another matter in the few minutes remaining at my disposal. I have overwhelming respect for the R.C.M.P. I have said that before, and down through the years. I have known them since the days of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. But we have had the Rivard case, we have had the views expressed by the chief justice. If there is one thing above everything else that must be maintained it is that not even by way of suggestion may the mounted police, shall the mounted police, or dare the mounted police be used for anything that savours of the likelihood of politics, and they are being put in an impossible position by this government.

The commissioner of the mounted police ought not to be rushing into print. He ought not be the one who rises in defence of his force. That is the job of the minister. The commissioner ought not to be writing letters to the papers, and I am thinking of the letter that he wrote on November 25. No commissioner, however distinguished his record, in the past ever followed the course of writing the letter which the present one wrote because of an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of July 8, and which stated:

> The short, easy-going lawyer from Sorel, Quebec, moved smoothly and swiftly yesterday into the political hotseat of the Pearson administration, the justice portfolio.
> Without waiting for the official swearing-in ceremony, Canada's new justice minister, Lucien Cardin, set up a meeting with R.C.M.P. Commissioner George B. McClellan.

It went on to say:

> Commissioner McClellan and the force have been subjected to increasingly heavy public and private criticism in recent months, especially since the publication of the Dorion report which censured the R.C.M.P.'s handling of the investigation of charges of attempted bribery and influence-peddling in the Lucien Rivard affair.
> The two men met privately in Mr. Cardin's old office shortly after the former public works minister was sworn into his new job by Governor General George Vanier at Government House.
> Mr. Cardin described the meeting as informal. "I don't like formal meetings," he explained.

That was in July, and on November 25 a letter appeared from the commissioner. I am not admonishing for what was done. I am pointing out that this kind of thing will grow if a government does not scrupulously assure that the R.C.M.P. shall not be in any way held to come under the scrutiny of those who have political purposes in mind. The commissioner wrote this letter:

> I have listened with interest recently to your radio advertising campaign stressing the accuracy of Globe and Mail news coverage.
> In this atmosphere, you may wish to have a few words with the writer of the attached article (regarding an informal conference between Mr. McClellan and Lucien Cardin) which appeared in the Globe and Mail and which is completely false. No such meeting took place between the Minister of Justice and myself as described by your reporter.

And this is signed "George B. McClellan, Commissioner, R.C.M.P., Ottawa."

It ends up with an editorial note at the bottom saying:

> The source of the information in the article referred to was Mr. Lucien Cardin, the Minister of Justice.

I am simply pointing out that the mounted police must be preserved meticulously and courageously from the kind of thing that has been creeping in during the last couple of years, and it is on that I want to speak when the opportunity comes again.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Cardin: Would the Leader of the Opposition permit me to make one clarification?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Cardin: Shortly after the article had appeared in the Globe and Mail I telephoned the editor of the Globe and Mail to tell him there had been an error in the reporting of this incident.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My point is simply this; the commissioner should not have written this letter. It should have been your responsibility as minister. That is exactly the point.

Progress reported.

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS ON CUMULATED REGIONAL PRICE BASIS

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale) moved the second reading of Bill C-11, to amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act (Hog and Egg prices stabilized half-yearly and regionally).

He said: Mr. Speaker, my bill is not a bill in respect of which heads will roll, but instead where eggs are rolling. I think the bill as outlined is one by which, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to amending the Agricultural Stabilization Act to:

(1) provide deficiency payments for eggs, hogs, etc., on a cumulated regional price basis rather than on a national weighted average price;

(2) have these deficiency payments made semi-annually instead of annually as at the present time.

In the explanatory notes it is explained that the purpose of this bill is to provide that the Agricultural Stabilization Board shall establish the base prices for hogs and eggs at and for every half-year instead of every year. A second purpose is to provide that these prices shall be determined regionally instead of Canada-wide and applied within the appropriate region: that is, the Atlantic provinces, the central provinces, the prairie provinces and British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to introduce this resolution for debate. This is not the first time I have placed this resolution on the order paper. It had been debated before without result or action taken by the government, although it is of great importance to the egg producers and hog producers of Canada, particularly to the prairie provinces.

You will notice in the motion, Mr. Speaker, that it provides deficiency payments for eggs and hogs on a cumulated regional price basis rather than on a national weighted average price.

[Mr. Cardin.]

I suggest that these deficiency payments be made semi-annually instead of annually at the present time. This is very important to the egg producers in the three prairie provinces, because when the weighted average price in Canada is calculated, the producers never receive a deficiency payment that is anywhere in line with the over-all price plus the deficiency payments received in other areas of the country.

To justify my argument I should like to give hon. members an example of the year 1964-65. The statement was made that the price support for eggs will be continued another year at the present level, the federal agricultural department has announced. In the year ending next September 30, the Agricultural Stabilization Board will support the price of grade A large eggs by a deficiency payment program at a national weighted average of 34 cents a dozen to producers.

The statement goes on to say that in the 1963-64 period, the national average price amounted to 32 cents a dozen, resulting in a deficiency payment of .02 cents a dozen to producers. The maximum for a deficiency payment, according to the Agricultural Stabilization Board remains unchanged—4,000 per producer.

This covers grade A extra large, grade A large, and grade A medium sizes. The program this year, however, provides that payments shall not be made on quantities of eggs that would result in payments of less than $2.00 per individual. To be eligible for payment producers must be registered with the stabilization board and must have marketed their eggs either through registered grading stations or to retail outlets as producer-graders.

In 1965 during the month of May on the prairies the price received for grade A large eggs averaged 17 cents to 19 cents per dozen, but at the same time in the east the average price received by the producers during this period was 35 cents. In Victoria and Vancouver it was 31 cents to 32 cents, and in Toronto and other cities it was as high as 35 cents.

Also for the record I should like to give you an example of another year. In 1962 when the average price in Canada was 33 cents per dozen, at the end of the year the stabilization board calculated that the deficiency payments for that year would be one cent per dozen. One cent per dozen for grade

A large was received right across the country, but in Saskatchewan the average price for the year was only 28½ cents per dozen. If the price had been calculated on a regional basis, the producers on the prairies—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—would have received 5½ cents per dozen deficiency payment bringing the price up to 34 cents, which was the board price. Instead of that they received only one cent per dozen because the average national price was 33 cents.

This in my opinion was unjust as far as the producers in the three prairie provinces are concerned. It is my opinion that deficiency payments should be calculated on a regional basis, and I would establish the regions in this way: B.C. one area, the three prairie provinces another area, eastern Canada a third area and the maritime provinces a fourth area. Deficiency payments should be calculated on a semi-annual basis because there are times of the year when the production is very high and the prices are low. There are other seasons of the year when prices are high and production is low.

This same suggestion should be applied to deficiency payments on hogs. As far as hogs are concerned, this matter may be more important than it is in respect of eggs. Everyone knows that in the fall when the farmers bring their hogs to the market prices are usually down. The farmers who are able to market their hogs in the spring always get a little better price. If deficiency payments were made on a semi-annual basis it would mean that whatever deficiency payments were paid to the farmers who received low prices for their hogs in the fall would be cancelled out by the higher prices received in the spring.

This is a very important issue to the farmer. Promises were made by all parties during the election campaign that this matter would be looked into. Proposals have been advocated by farm organizations across the country and I think it is time that the government paid attention to this situation and amended the stabilization act.

At the present time the stabilization board makes these payments from October 1 to September 30. That is the year for the calculation of these deficiency payments and that is the year in which prices are averaged.

I am aware of the stand taken by the stabilization board. This is not the first time I have presented this case to the minister. In a memorandum issued by the stabilization board on regional price supports they argued that if deficiency payments were calculated on the basis of the difference between regional prices and regional support levels such a procedure would not provide over the years any significant benefit to the producer. They stated that, in general, regional support levels based on a ten year average for the regions would vary between regions during the support year. Thus payments would be essentially the same as those that might be made under a national program.

In addition the stabilization board suggested that such a policy would present many administrative difficulties, as it would doubtlessly lead to a proliferation of regions since our normal geographic and provincial boundaries do not, of necessity, coincide with marketing areas. It is my opinion that that is the biggest reason why the stabilization board is opposed to this idea. The problems associated with the selling in one region of commodities produced in another would make such a program almost unworkable, according to the board.

I cannot agree with this viewpoint. I think the administrative difficulties could be overcome and that the board's assumption that, under normal conditions, where prices are lowest costs are lowest, is not valid. The production cost to the egg producers on the prairies is the same as in other areas where prices are high. I do not think there is very much difference between the price of feed in the east and in the west. The cost of bringing the product to market areas is not very much higher in the east than it is on the prairies.

There are many other factors involved in producing hogs and eggs that are similar, but the prices for these products are much higher in the east than they are in the west. We in the west with our low prices are helping the producers of eggs and hogs in the east to qualify for higher deficiency payments.

I have brought this problem to the attention of the house on more than one occasion. Political parties when electioneering have told people that this problem needs to be solved, but when parliament assembles and the Throne Speech is read there is never any mention of proposed measures to alleviate this situation.

I note that the member on the other side of the house who intends to reply to my remarks is the same member who replied on other occasions. Perhaps that hon. member and I should get together to look at this problem from a reasonable point of view. I am sure he could be convinced that this bill deserves approval and that my proposals should be implemented at this time.

Mr. Patrick-T. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, a motion by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp) with respect to deficiency payments on an accumulated regional price basis was discussed once before in this house on May 27, 1964.

On that occasion the mover stated in support of his motion that had a regional support level been in effect for 1962 Saskatchewan producers would have received a deficiency payment of 5½ cents per dozen to bring them up to the 34 cent national support price, because the average price over the year in Saskatchewan was 28½ cents. This, of course, would be the case only if it is assumed that in a regional support system a deficiency payment represents the difference between the national support price and the regional average annual price. However, had a regional system of supports been in effect during 1962, the support price for Saskatchewan would have been developed on the ten year average base price in that province.

Records indicate that the support price on that basis in Saskatchewan would have been 29.5 cents, providing a deficiency payment of 1.5 cents per dozen because the annual average price for Saskatchewan in that year was 28 cents per dozen. This indicated that producers would have received one half a cent per dozen rather than 4½ cents per dozen more as suggested by the hon. member.

Page 3665 of Hansard of May 27, 1964 indicates that the hon. member when discussing hogs pointed out that hog prices are usually down in the fall when the farmers bring their hogs to market. It is true that the market price for hogs is usually lower in the fall than in the spring. This is so because such a large percentage of the hogs go to market at that time. The low price in the fall is simply a reflection of the fact that many small farmers produce and market hogs during a certain part of the year only.

The price received in the fall months is low because the supply of hogs marketed at that time is large. There must be a very good reason why farmers produce and market their hogs during certain months of the year. The fact would seem to be that mixed farmers have found it more economical to produce hogs during the summer and early fall than during the rest of the year. When hogs are produced in the summer, less labour and less elaborate building facilities are required. Besides it is in the summer that skim milk and whey are most likely to be available for hog feed.

The point is that if for reasons such as these, farmers can produce hogs more cheaply in the summer months, it follows that they should be prepared to take a somewhat lower selling price than other farmers who produce evenly in all seasons and at greater cost during certain periods.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Any steps taken which would deliberately encourage expansion or continuance of the present highly seasonal hog production could not help but be harmful to producers since storage costs, reduced consumption, etc., could lower over-all returns. Hogs must be produced and marketed more regularly if consumption is to be increased, processing costs lowered and producer returns increased. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics records indicate that during 1964 egg production on the prairies was 64 per cent greater than the per capita consumption and egg production in Ontario and Quebec was slightly below the per capita consumption.

It appears that many critics of the present deficiency payment program base their criticism on the lower prices received by western egg producers as compared with those received in the east. Because of these lower prices they feel it is necessary to provide greater assistance through regional and seasonal deficiency payments to the areas where market prices are lower.

However, this would eventually result in the subsidizing of regions which are less efficient in terms of rate of lay and which are burdened by the overproduction of a lower quality product. In the prairie provinces egg production far exceeds the needs of the market; eggs are produced by flocks which are small and many; egg quality is considerably lower than any other region of Canada; distribution is not efficient and transportation costs are high; production costs are generally lower due to the availability of lower priced feed. These many factors contribute to the lower price of eggs at prairie market centres.

Any steps taken to encourage further expansion of poultry production in the prairies would not be beneficial to the egg industry. Surplus production in that area reduces prices in other areas because shipments move to areas where production is scaled to demand. This of course distorts prices received in such regions. Egg production is characteristically seasonal in output. Although some provinces like British Columbia reveal only slight variations, others such as Saskatchewan reveal marked variations in marketings of eggs from one part of the year to the other. As a result of the variations in supply, prices react accordingly, with low prices generally prevailing in the December to May period and high prices from August to November.

Previous proponents of seasonal deficiency payments have suggested that the actual prices received during low price quarters be compared with the national prescribed price and the resultant deficiency be provided in the form of a payment to all producers. Since the actual market price is generally lower in the seasonally flush period of the year than the prescribed price, and higher than the prescribed price in the lower period of production, payments would generally be always made for the former period and not the latter.

This would have the undesirable effect of encouraging production and marketing during the flush period, in order to receive a payment, which would aggravate the seasonal swings in output creating greater seasonal discrepancies in marketings and in prices. Seasonal variations in marketings and the accompanying swings in prices tend to reduce consumption through consumer resistance to high prices and a concurrent switch to substitute products.

During the past several years the egg industry has come a long way in overcoming the seasonal patterns inherent in the industry. To change a seasonal deficiency payment scheme now would destroy years of painstaking evolution to a more even pattern of marketing. Price stability in the market for eggs and hogs is important. It is best achieved by allowing these products to flow freely to consumers in a nationally based market. In this manner the movement of commodities from surplus to deficit areas is made easier and prices tend to seek levels consistent with supplies in the immediate area, taking into account the cost of transportation to or from the market in question depending upon its position as a surplus or deficit area.

If artificial barriers are set up in Canada through the introduction of four separate regions of support, as suggested in the proposed amendment to the Agricultural Stabilization Act, the free flow of eggs and hogs will be restrained as producers seek to obtain the advantages of regional support and price fluctuations will become more marked from region to region as price levels tend to be dependent on regional supply conditions only. Thus price stability will suffer.

In addition, as I have indicated before, not only will there be greater disparity in prices from region to region but also the introduction of semi-annual deficiency payments will encourage the marketing of eggs and hogs in the low-priced six-month period when payments are most likely, aggravating seasonal price fluctuations from which the whole industry will suffer. Fair returns for labour investment cannot be maintained if prices are not stabilized.

Regional and semi-annual payments to egg producers may benefit initially the many small producers in western Canada but in the long run, as price differentials widen from region to region and seasonal swings increase, the small producer may not survive. In fact, while a Saskatchewan producer may become eligible for a larger payment than his Ontario counterpart, only a small proportion of the producers in this province will market sufficient eggs to claim the maximum benefit, while in Ontario the reverse is true. For example, in 1964 only 6.7 per cent of the 1,697 claimants in Saskatchewan claimed the maximum $80 payments while 27.6 per cent of the 12,383 Ontario claimants did so. It appears then, that only the large producers in the west will benefit from a regional scheme of payment.

As far as hogs are concerned, the calculation of regional and semi-annual prescribed prices in 1964 using the 1964 national percentage of the base price, that is 88.3 per cent, would provide no benefit to producers. In all parts of Canada the regional weighted average price remained above the regionally calculated prescribed price. Thus there is no benefit to be derived from such a scheme even in the short run.

It goes without saying that a plan involving the calculation of several separate base prices, several separate prescribed prices and the administration of several separate regions and seasons for payment will add tremendously to the government's cost of operation. If the benefits accruing from such a complicated method of stabilization outweigh the social costs involved in its administration, then the added burden to the taxpaying public may be justified; otherwise it is not justified.

In conclusion, if we implemented the proposal to change the present deficiency payment scheme for hogs and eggs to one on a regional and semi-annual basis it could, instead of being beneficial to the agricultural producers concerned, disrupt marketing patterns, cause greater price instability, discriminate among producers because of location, create consumer dissatisfaction in the product, undoubtedly affecting consumption, benefit the large scale producer in certain regions and discriminate unduly against small producers in other regions. In effect, there is nothing to be gained by either industry in changing to the regional and seasonal system of support.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak just briefly in support of the bill which has again this session been introduced by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp). There may be validity in some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Asselin), but even if these prices had been calculated regionally there would have been times when the deficiency payment would not in fact have been any higher than it was in some other specific year. We do not deny that. But the fact is that there were cases—and I think the hon. member who introduced this bill outlined them very well—when the total price in so far as producers in Saskatchewan were concerned did not come up to the national average because they received so much less in the marketplace during the course of the year.

Under the old price support policy for hogs a few years ago, I recall this was a continual source of irritation to hog producers in Alberta. For the most part, hogs produced in Alberta were consumed either in Alberta or shipped to the Vancouver area on the west coast. While this price support policy was in effect the support price was established by taking into account the base price in Toronto and then subtracting the cost of freight from Calgary or Edmonton. That was not satisfactory at all, and as far as we were concerned there was no justification for it.

As I said, almost all the hogs produced in Alberta—I presume the same is true for Saskatchewan—were consumed in the area. In other words, there was no direct relationship between the price paid in Toronto and the price paid in western markets because there was very little movement of that meat from the west to the Toronto market.

I also want to comment briefly on the question whether or not it would be beneficial to have a half-yearly calculation made, rather than an annual calculation as at the present time. I do not know how important this will be over a long period of time when one considers the ten-year average under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, but I believe there should be some detailed analysis made of the differences that may occur in the deficiency payments which have been made.

I noted when the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp) introduced his bill that he made some calculations, and the figures he produced indicated that at least in two or three instances there would have been an improvement in the deficiency payment made if it had been calculated on a half-yearly basis. Therefore, until the argument advanced by the hon. member in introducing this bill has been explained away or destroyed, in the interests of the producers of eggs and hogs in certain areas I think we have to accept this study of prices and that there has been some disadvantage to these producers because the figures were calculated on an annual basis rather than a semi-annual basis.

One of the interesting point made by the hon. member who introduced the bill is this. According to some of the figures he used, when some of the producers in Saskatchewan added up the total market price received for their eggs, plus the deficiency payment which they received later, they were still several cents per dozen below the national average of 34 cents per dozen. When a similar bill to this was introduced in 1957 and 1958, I think it was intended that there should be a floor price established for these products and that producers all across the country would be brought up to that floor price, which would be determined by a ten-year average. Yet in the practical application of the present system it simply does not turn out that way.

I just wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, that I support the hon. member's bill, at least in his attempt to correct some of the discrepancies he has described. As I said before, for the most part I believe that the eggs and hogs produced in the regions outlined by the hon. member in introducing the bill are consumed in those same areas. If that is the case there is surely no reason to penalize certain areas by taking into account prices in other areas when deficiency payments are established.

So, Mr. Speaker, I simply say that we should either accept this bill and amend the Agricultural Stabilization Act in accordance with the provisions of the bill, or else we should have a far more satisfactory and complete explanation from those in the government who are responsible for the administration of this act, indicating that no real injustice is being done to producers in certain areas of the country.

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I first want to congratulate my hon. friend, the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), for bringing this matter before the house once more for thorough discussion. I might even go along with him as far as the semi-annual payment is concerned.

He said in his opening remarks that this provision would be more beneficial to the prairie provinces. This is Canada, Mr. Speaker. We cannot look at the problem from a regional angle alone. Therefore I must take exception to this proposal of my hon. friend from a national point of view, and from a national point of view only.

I think we should start at the beginning. What we must decide is whether the changes my hon. friend has requested should be made; and, if they should, whether it is actually possible to make the changes. Let us consider these matters in turn.

First of all, we must examine the proposition that producers everywhere should receive the same unit of return from one coast to the other. The very suggestion that the return should be uniform implies that there is something radically wrong with a pricing system which results in produce being sold at different prices in different parts of the country. In this regard it seems desirable to note some of the regional price variations, and in particular to explain just why they exist.

Let us start in western Canada with Canadian western wheat, which moves eastward to the market. The price the farmer receives at the country elevator declines as the distance between him and Fort William increases. Farmers living in western Saskatchewan certainly receive considerably less than those in Manitoba. In each case the cost of transportation is deducted from the basic Fort William price to determine each farmer's return.

The same situation exists in Ontario and in Quebec with respect to potatoes grown in the Maritimes. Potatoes are grown in Ontario and in Quebec, and what has to be taken into consideration when considering potatoes from the Maritimes is transportation.

The same situation applies to fluid milk going to Toronto from producers in Ontario. Those producers that are closer to the main market receive more, because of lower transportation costs. The same general principle operates wherever products are sold competitively and production takes place at varying distances from a common market. This explains why prices quoted for cattle, hogs or eggs on western Canadian markets must always be somewhat lower than those quoted at Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, it also explains why farmers are willing to sell eggs right at home, right at the farm, for much less than they would accept if they took those articles to market. At the same time it does not necessarily follow that the difference between prices paid in varying places is simply the difference in cost of transportation. However, we know that that is not so. It has a great deal to do with whether there is a surplus, or a limited amount of the product to be sold at the time. All these things have to be taken into consideration. In fact unit prices and costs vary from region to region.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one question? Is that the reason why on the prairies we are getting perhaps 20 cents or 25 cents for our eggs, for which we have to pay 60 cents in stores? Is the difference in cost the added cost of transportation from Ontario, or some other place? It seems strange that our farmers get only 20 cents, and yet have to pay 60 cents in the stores.

Mr. Roxburgh: Mr. Speaker, answering my hon. friend's question, I did not know that there was a great shipment of eggs from Ontario to the western provinces.

Mr. Rapp: Well, there is.

Mr. Roxburgh. I think very definitely that transportation costs play some part. I am in the fruit business, and we are competing in our area with British Columbia apple growers. I think it costs something like $1 a box to bring B.C. apples to eastern Canada. I think transportation plays quite an important part.

May I continue with what I was about to say. Under a competitive situation such as we have in Canadian agriculture, farmers in western Canada could not keep selling livestock products at lower prices than obtained by Ontario or Quebec farmers, unless costs to western farmers were lower than those to farmers in central Canada by at least enough to cover the cost of moving their products eastward.

After all, Mr. Speaker, the real test of whether farmers in one region make as much profit as those in another is found in the extent of their willingness to continue producing. Under competitive conditions farm products do tend to be produced where they can be produced most efficiently. I think we all realize that.

If this government, or any government as far as that is concerned, agreed to pay transportation costs by varying the size of deficiency payments from region to region, in the manner suggested, I think that farmers would tend to produce more where costs, other than transportation costs, were low, in order to get a unit return equal to that of producers producing in higher cost regions.

In time, of course, actions of farmers producing in low cost production areas would tend to reduce the level of the nationally weighted average market price, and therefore would reduce the level of the support price which is closely related to that market price. In the meantime, however, the farm production pattern of the country would be seriously disrupted and the costs to the government would be tremendously increased.

In the few remarks that I have made I feel that I have shown that it would be undesirable to pay these costs. For one thing, the act of giving different sized payments to farmers in different regions would certainly cause dissension among those farmers. For example, if the government gave a large deficiency payment to producers in one region, and gave a very small payment or no payment to producers in another region, I suggest that farmers in the latter region would object strenuously. They would claim that the government, by providing farmers in the former regions with large payments, was providing them with a special subsidy and that this payment or subsidy would improve the competitive position of farmers in the former region as compared with themselves. In other words, farmers in the latter region, receiving no payment or very little payment, would feel that there has been gross discrimination against them.

In other words, those farmers would feel that there had been gross discrimination against them, enabling farmers in regions where they received subsidies to enrich themselves through unfair competition.

May I just add this: Boy, oh, boy, I should not like to be in the shoes of the member of parliament representing a region where small payments or no payments to producers were made. If this were so, and if I were depending on the farm vote, perhaps there would be one less member on this side of the house.

The next important factor to consider is that a regional type of program would tend to remove a producer's incentive to dispose of his products to the best possible advantage. Let me illustrate this: There is little doubt that if a farmer, say in Saskatchewan, knew that he was sure to get a deficiency payment equal to the difference between the market price for producer in his own region and the national support price, he would not very likely try hard to move his eggs or hogs or produce to a higher priced market. The cost of the support program to taxpayers would be increased to the extent that producers failed to get the highest possible market price for their produce.

It is well to note that this tendency for farmers to lose their marketing incentive exists wherever deficiency programs are administered on any kind of regional basis. I am going to give one little example. If farmers in Saskatchewan had a regionally guaranteed support price of 27 cents a dozen for eggs, they would not feel any great incentive to seek somewhat higher prices in other regions if they found the market price in Saskatchewan falling below the 27 cents level.

• (5:50 p.m.)

In connection with that type of regional program which farmers and their organizations have recommended, and which I think my hon. friend has also recommended, tending to give farmers everywhere the same total unit return, it would not make any difference where farming was carried on. It is necessary to recognize that all those who advocate this kind of program must assume that market prices in various regions will always be lower than the national support price. Any such assumption however is entirely invalid. The fact is that the regional market prices will actually be higher than the national support price whenever the supply in the various regions is limited in proportion to the demand—in other words, in short supply.

Assuming the number and location of the regions to have been agreed upon, the next problem would be to administer the program in such a way as to insure that all produce was actually sold in the same region in which it was produced. Let me point out that the cost of getting farm products to a considerably higher-priced market in an adjoining region may be no greater, or even less, than the cost of getting it to a lower-priced but equally distant market in their own region. Under a regionally administered program, however, it would presumably be considered quite unfair for any farmers to receive a larger deficiency payment because market prices in their own particular region were lower than in a neighbouring region in which they had actually done their selling.

At the same time it is obvious that any attempt to force all farmers to do their marketing within their own regional boundaries would not only involve a lot of expensive policing but would seriously interfere with market practices and marketing connections which have long been specially advantageous to the particular farmers concerned. Note that word "force". We are hearing a lot of that word these days, and I do not agree with it all, I can tell hon. members that much.

To get back to the policing question: I do not know about the feelings of any of the members across the way, or even on this side of the house, but we seem to have reached a state where an extra police force has to be set up to look after everything parliament does, whether it is in the field of income tax, pensions, or anything else. I can tell hon. members that the independent farmer is going down fighting. He will fight any suggestions that he should be forced to do something he does not want to do. From this angle alone I think we are dealing with a ticklish problem.

It would be exceedingly unpopular, partly because it would be interfering with the farmer's freedom. And, my God, these days it is only the farm people of Canada who appear to have a little freedom left. It would be unpopular because, as I said, it would interfere with the farmer's freedom to decide where to market and also because it would force him to shift from a higher priced to a lower priced market outlet. At the same time it would be uneconomic since it would prevent a considerable amount of produce from following normal marketing channels.

To sum up I should like to say this. From what has just been said it should be obvious that adoption of a regionally-based type of program would lead to some extremely difficult and unpopular if not absolutely impossible administrative situations. It should be equally clear that it would result in very serious confusion and misunderstanding in producer ranks generally.

If farmers find difficulty in understanding how a single standard yearly deficiency payment is calculated it would really be hard work explaining to them the variation in deficiency payments from region to region. I think that on a national basis the proposal is completely out of line.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): In the two minutes that are left this evening on the subject of this bill I should like to strike a blow for the city man. In my constituency we have one farm and that is the farm belonging to the university of British Columbia. Its area is gradually dwindling and it will soon be wiped out by the engineering department and other departments of that university. Then we shall be entirely a city constituency.

When I look at this proposal, a city man reading about this bill, I see it is intended to stabilize the prices of hogs and eggs. What it really proposes to do is to keep the prices of hogs and eggs up, and as a city fellow who must pay for hogs and eggs I am not necessarily interested in keeping those prices up.

Can hon. members recall a year or so ago when there was a disastrous earthquake in Peru? This country, like all good countries, went to the help of the Peruvians by shipping them aid. They needed bandages, iodine, medical supplies and things of that kind. What did we send them, sir? We sent them a shipload of luncheon meat. Why? We did it because it embarrasses us to have so much luncheon meat on hand. The price of hogs, the price of eggs and the price of butter are kept up at artificial levels until we have storehouses filled with these commodities. So when there is a disaster we use it as an opportunity to ship out of the country whatever stores are embarrassing us at the moment. That is why we shipped carloads of luncheon meat to the poor Peruvians who were looking for bandages.

There have been occasions when we have shipped butter to India. But butter is a product which the Indians do not even eat; they have to convert it into another product called ghee before they can use it.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Peters: On a point of order. I am sure we would be very happy to give the hon. member unanimous consent to continue this speech. It is most interesting from an agricultural point of view.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour for the consideration of private members' business is now expired.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 28, 1966

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FINANCE

TABLING OF VOLUME 2 OF TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON WIRE PRODUCTS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): On January 26 I tabled volume 1 of the Tariff Board report on reference 132 relating to wire and wire products. Volume 1 dealt with rod, wire and wire products of iron or steel. I am having tabled today copies in English and in French of volume 2 of this report.

Volume 2 relates to wire and wire cloth of non-ferrous metals. The Tariff Board's recommendations contained therein will receive most careful consideration by the government. I would also like to take this opportunity to invite interested parties to let me have any comments they may wish to make on this report.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN LOAN PROGRAM TO DEVELOP MINERAL RESOURCES

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I wish to announce the government's decision to recommend to the house the adoption of a new northern loan program as an incentive to develop the mineral resources in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Exploration expenditures in the north have been running at an annual rate of approximately twenty millions of dollars per year which, while gratifying in terms of the past, is still unsatisfactory as compared with the oil and gas exploration expenditures in southern Canada in the magnitude of $150 million per annum.

The government therefore believes it is desirable to encourage greater northern exploration for the purpose of realizing the mineral possibilities which exist in these territories. The federal government has a net expenditure in the north every year of over $50 million. Companies and individuals engaged in the oil and mineral business presently appear to have adequate incentives under the Income Tax Act for exploration expenditure. The government proposes, through a northern mineral development loan fund, to bring many of these same advantages to the ordinary Canadian investor and thereby considerably expand the funds available for such exploration.

The loan fund is for Canadians and Canadian-controlled companies only. While we welcome foreign capital in the north, we believe that Canadians should have a special incentive to invest in Canada's large northern potential of resources. Development in depth is one of our great challenges.

The loan fund will provide amounts of up to 40 per cent of approved exploratory expenditures to companies and individuals not eligible for the Income Tax Act charge-off incentive, and repayment will be required only if minerals are found in commercial quantities. The government will thereby assist with the high risks normally associated with northern resource exploration. The loan fund will be limited initially to $3 million per year, with possible increases in succeeding years after review of the program's success. An appropriate item will be included in estimates for the approval of the house.

In conclusion, I hope this loan fund will be instrumental in attracting major new exploration funds to the northern territories, and increasing the proportion of Canadian ownership in the non-renewable resources of the north.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, for the second time in two sitting days, for paying the opposition the courtesy of sending his announcement on motions across to us ahead of time, because this gives us an opportunity to prepare some form of constructive response to such announcements.

The first point I wish to make is that the announcement today recognizes something that has been a fact for a long time, namely that United States tax laws and Canadian tax laws work in a similar direction to encourage United States investment in Canada and to penalize Canadian investment in the Canadian mining and oil industries. This fact was pointed out very clearly by the Gordon royal commission and the Borden royal commission, and the proposal announced today is a method to try and equalize the scales.

The proposal suggests a 40 per cent loan, not repayable if there is no success in the exploration. The only thing I would like to suggest here is that since the government intends to collect back the 40 per cent loan in a case where there is success in locating new oil or minerals, why not go one step further and take a 40 per cent interest in equity ownership? This would be the next logical step.

The proposal announced today carries on the over-all idea of dynamic action by the federal government in the development of the resources of this country that we brought into effect in a major way in 1957-58.

I should also like to point out, with respect to the expenditure of federal moneys in development of the north that we have to keep the economics in mind. That is, we cannot spread such a program generally all over the north. It has to be concentrated in those areas where there is the best chance relating to marketing the product. Therefore it is sound to go into the north from the sea, as I know the minister is interested in doing, via Baffin Island, and also through the land mass of the four western provinces.

I would also suggest that while this loan program which will encourage money to be spent in the high risk enterprise of exploration, giving companies a write-off where a write-off is not available to them now because they have not got refineries or smelters, the minister can help even more by restoring the roads to resources program. The hopes for a smelter at Great Slave lake will help, but by building a road connection around Great Slave lake in a circle the rich area around Great Slave lake could be made available for development through this loan fund program.

I should like to conclude with one little statement to the house. In 1958 and 1959 we invested $2½ million in building three bridges in the Yukon over the Stewart, Pelly and Yukon rivers. Every two years since those three bridges were completed the federal government has received back $2½ million in direct taxes as a result of that investment. This type of thing announced by the minister will have a similar result.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I too desire to thank the minister for giving us notice of his intention to make this statement on motions. I am sure all hon. members will agree with the need for development in the north and the need for additional exploration and development of minerals. I am sure they will also agree that this is a high risk area.

I think the minister is to be commended for setting up this northern mineral development fund. However, I am somewhat perturbed at the proposal that a borrower may be able to borrow up to 40 per cent of the amount invested and need not repay this loan unless he discovers minerals in commercial quantities. It seems to me this is coming fairly close to a "heads you win, tails I lose" proposition.

I think the minister could accomplish what he has in mind by entering into an arrangement with these companies whereby, an additional royalty in addition to the normal royalty, or 40 per cent of the profits made would be payable to the government by the company; and of course if the company made no profits they would not have to make any repayment. But if they do make profits in developing these resources, which after all belong to the people of Canada, I see no reason why the people of Canada should not have a share of the profits which result therefrom.

I hope the minister will give this some consideration. Also I hope that after the passage of time the amount of $3 million will be greatly expanded, because larger amounts of capital will be needed if we are to develop the northern parts of this country.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I too appreciate the privilege of having been given prior notice ot this statement today as it relates to the assistance program for the development of our northern resources. I believe we share with all members of the house satisfaction in knowing that something is being done to assist in the exploration and survey development of the resources in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory.

As I listened to the announcement I found myself wondering whether this program could not have been developed through the Industrial Development Bank, or whether this is perhaps part of the legitimate area into which the Canadian Development Corporation could well reach when it is established. Certainly we are concerned at the multiplicity of funds in this regard. I would hope the government is making every effort to bring forward the Canadian Development Corporation legislation as quickly as possible.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, the amount mentioned is only the beginning. I believe also to follow up this policy there must be some policy in relation to the leasing of mineral rights and the sharing in the royalties so far as the Canadian people are concerned. I do not think this has to be done through governmental equity. I think the pattern already is established, that this can be done through leases, rentals, and also through royalties so that the real benefit of these resources which are developed as a result of the exploration can return to the people of Canada in their own time.

Again we express our satisfaction at this beginning in this very important area of resources development.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

VACATION PROVISIONS, POLYMER CORPORATION—AMPLIFICATION OF ANSWER TO WRITTEN QUESTION

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, on February 23, 1966, as shown at page 1658 of Hansard, I answered question No. 315 asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam concerning annual vacations for the employees of Polymer Corporation. The corporation has since furnished me with additional pertinent information.

In the reply shown in Hansard it was stated that there were 21 employees who did not receive the full annual vacation to which they were entitled in 1965. The vacation periods for these employees were set over into 1966 by mutual agreement because of sickness or their involvement in special assignments or projects.

I am now advised that, in addition, there are 28 new employees whose first year of employment with the company ended after July 1, 1965, and some as late as December, 1965, and who therefore become entitled to an additional week of vacation under the terms of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. Section 17(A) of the act requires that the vacation begin not later than ten months after completion of the year of employment and the additional week of vacation is being given in conformity with the act. Thus, although these employees will receive the full annual vacation to which they became entitled in 1965, the additional week was not, in fact, taken in the calendar year 1965.

Question of Privilege

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ELI LINDSAY, ARBORFIELD, SASK.—107 YEARS OLD TODAY

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to your attention and to the attention of the Prime Minister and hon. members a matter of great national interest. One of my constituents, Grandfather Eli Lindsay, of Arborfield, Saskatchewan, is celebrating his 107th birthday today. This morning I phoned Grandpa Lindsay to wish him good health. He seemed pleased with the call and thanked me for calling him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—RIGHT OF MEMBER FOR MONTMAGNY-L'ISLET TO VOTE IN HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to remind hon. members of a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) I believe some time last week, affecting the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Berger). I have given the matter serious consideration since that time and am now prepared to express an opinion or give a judgment on the question of privilege. However, I feel that perhaps it would be more in order to deliver my judgment when the hon. member for Yukon is in the house.

I notice that the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet is in his seat at this time, so perhaps I should bring to the attention of the house a judgment which has been brought to the attention of the Chair and the Clerk of the House. This judgment reads in part as follows:

[Translation]

We, the undersigned, Chief Justice of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec, sitting for the district of Quebec, on the applicant's petition, after having examined the facts alleged in the petition and the documents produced:

EXCUSE the applicant for failing to file his election expenses return;

AUTHORIZE the applicant to submit the said return within fifteen days from the date of the present ruling;

AUTHORIZE the applicant to act as if his return had been filed within the time limit prescribed by law.

[English]

Perhaps I should mention the fact that this does not necessarily close the matter in so far as the question of privilege is concerned but, if the house is in agreement, before rendering a judgment on the matter I suggest that we wait until both members are in their seats.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, could we have the date of that judgment or order?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Chair might be given an opportunity to consult with the chief justice to find out when this was delivered, because there is no apparent date of delivery. It does indicate that it was received by the chief electoral officer and the Clerk of the House of Commons on February 28. That is the only date on this judgment now before the Chair and the House.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Before going on to orders of the day, I wish to point out to hon. members that after looking more closely at the judgment delivered by the Chief Justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, I notice that the said judgment was delivered or is dated February 24, 1966.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLANNING COMMITTEE

Question No. 73—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Has the National Capital Commission appointed a national capital planning committee as provided for in section 9 (3) of the National Capital Act?

2. If so, who are the members of the committee and what powers and functions have been assigned to it?

3. If not, for what reason?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): 1, 2, 3. In 1946, the Federal District Commission established a national capital planning committee to draw up a master plan for the development, improvement, and beautification of the national capital district. The administrative staff serving the committee was provided by the Federal District Commission. The planning consultant was Mr. Jacques Greber, who was assisted by a Canadian staff called the national capital planning service.

The national capital committee held 22 meetings between October 30, 1946 and December 29, 1955. In 1954, the national capital planning service, which assisted Mr. Greber, and the national capital planning committee, was transferred to the Federal District Commission. Subsequently, the national capital planning committee met only four times; and the Federal District Commission, assisted by its staff and the advisory committees, carried out the work previously done by the national capital planning committee. Moreover, as the municipalities increased their own planning staffs, they required less assistance from the national capital planning committee.

The Federal District Commission Act was replaced by the National Capital Act, 1958, 7 Elizabeth II, Ch. 37. The National Capital Commission, whose responsibilities resemble those of the Federal District Commission, is assisted by the staff of the commission, the executive committee, the land committee, the advisory committee on design, the Gatineau Park advisory committee, the historical advisory committee, the information advisory committee, and by various consultants.

Given its modus operandi, the commission has not felt the need to make use of the authority conferred by the National Capital Act, s. 9(3), to appoint a national capital planning committee.

RECOMMENDATIONS ON PURCHASE OF C-5 FIGHTER BOMBER

Question No. 91—Mr. MacRae:

Did the Minister of National Defence reject the recommendation of any of his military advisers when he decided to purchase the American Northrop C-5 fighter bomber?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): The purchase of the CF-5, an improved version of the Northrop F-5, was one of a number of options presented for consideration by the minister and was the option selected after a careful assessment of all the factors, and recommended to the government for approval.

FORMATION OF UNIT OF MARINES

Question No. 93—Mr. MacRae:

Is it the intention to form a unit or units of the Canadian Armed Forces to be known as the Canadian Marines?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): As stated in the white paper in March 1964, the integration of the armed forces of Canada under a single chief of defence staff and a single defence staff was the first step toward a single unified defence force for Canada. Progress is being made in this direction and studies are continuing on such matters as the name of the force.

SASKATCHEWAN GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES WITH B AND B COMMISSION

Question No. 120—Mr. Ormiston:

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Listening to the translation, when a lot of statistical information is being given at the speed at which the Minister of National Revenue gave it I find that it leaves the translation service away behind. Perhaps copies might be sent direct to the translation service beforehand or the information should be read at a slower speed so that all hon. members may hear what the minister is saying.

C.B.C. EXPENDITURES ON COLOUR TELEVISION

Question No. 394—Mr. Simpson:

1. What is the extent of the authority which has been granted by the government to the C.B.C. in relation to colour television?

2. What amount of money has the C.B.C. been authorized to spend in this regard?

3. Was an order in council passed in this respect and, if so, on what date?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): 1. On June 15, 1965, the government announced its willingness to permit all broadcasters, C.B.C. and private, to apply for licences for colour transmission under the Radio Act. The house was also advised on that date that the first phase of the C.B.C. entry into colour would entail estimated expenditures of some $15,000,000 and that further development would await the broadcasting committee report. Expenditures to date by the corporation, as authorized by order in council, are well within that figure.

In brief, the government has authorized the C.B.C. to enter colour, subject to the necessary approval by order in council of items of expenditure in excess of $100,000; the limitations of the C.B.C. budget and within an over-all temporary limit on capital expenditures for colour of $15,000,000. Authorization has also been given C.B.C. for the provision of colour facilities at Expo '67 to serve all foreign and domestic broadcasters and for special centennial requirements.

2. $5,731,631.36, excluding Expo and the Centennial (see note).

3. Yes. P.C. 1965-2/1711, Sept. 22, 1965. P.C. 1965-3/1879, Oct. 25, 1965. P.C. 1965-4/1879, Oct. 25, 1965. P.C. 1965-1/2077, Nov. 24, 1965. P.C. 1965-11/2175, Dec. 8, 1965.

Note: P.C. 1965-11/2175 includes $74,032.80 for Expo equipment. This amount not included in (2) above. To service all broadcasters at Expo with colour will cost an estimated $1,000,000 more than for black and white. The planned Centennial colour coverage will cost some $1,500,000 additional.

No interchange at the junction of the Richmond Road and Western parkway is proposed because traffic and design factors do not warrant a second interchange a distance of one quarter of a mile from the interchange at Carling Avenue.

3. (a) The target date for the completion of the western parkway to Carling avenue is December 31, 1966.

Questions

IMMIGRANTS WITH FARM EXPERIENCE

Question No. 505—Mr. Watson (Assiniboia):

1. How many immigrants arrived in Canada in 1965?

2. How many of these had previous farm experience in their own country?

3. How many of these immigrants were required to work on farms, as a condition of entering Canada?

4. What countries did they come from, and how many from each?

5. Will there be an increase in the 1966 quota to take care of the shortage of farm labor?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. 146,758 immigrants arrived in Canada in 1965.

2. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration has no statistical data showing immigrants' previous occupational experience. However, all immigrants who are actually selected for migration, as opposed to those who were sponsored by close relatives, must satisfy the department that their training or experience is such as to enable them to become satisfactorily established in their intended occupation. In 1965, there were 1,179 such immigrants who listed their intended occupation as farmers or farm workers and it can safely be said that all of these had previous farm experience. In addition 1,183 sponsored immigrants indicated an intention to take up farm employment. Since occupational proficiency is not a determining factor in establishing admissibility in sponsored cases, such persons are not questioned on their previous experience. There is therefore no way of determining how many of the 1,183 had previously worked on farms.

3. None.

4. See attached list.

5. The immigration movement to Canada is not based on a quota system. While the department will continue its efforts to increase the movement of qualified persons to Canada, including farmers and farm workers, the number of persons who come forward will depend upon the demand in Canada and the number of qualified applicants overseas.

Note on country of origin of ships—All foreign ships sealing in the gulf of St. Lawrence (up to 1964 only) were Norwegian ships. All foreign ships sealing at the front in the period 1954-1965 were Norwegian, with the following exceptions: In 1960 to 1962 inclusive a single Norwegian sealer chartered by the Greenland administration of the Danish government sealed at the front. Catch results are officially known and are included in the totals given. In 1961 and 1963 single Russian icebreakers carried out experimental sealing at the front. Catch results are not known officially, but are believed to have been 17,000 seals in 1961 and 20,000 in 1963. These figures are included in the totals given for front catches.

*ASSISTANCE TO ONTARIO FARMERS

Question No. 521—Mr. Madill:

1. Has the government received a request from the Farmer's Union of Ontario for support for those farmers who received crop loss and damage in the fall of 1965?

2. Has a survey been taken to estimate their losses?

3. Will assistance be given to those who were unable to harvest their crops?

Questions

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, question 521 is divided into three parts. The answer to part 1 is deemed to include the answers to parts 2 and 3:

1. The government received requests from the Farmer's Union of Ontario and others for assistance in respect of crop losses due to drought and adverse weather at harvest. Last summer the government agreed to contribute one half the cost of a program in Ontario to assist cattle farmers seriously affected by drought. In the fall this agreement was extended to cover losses from adverse weather at harvest.

The program involved crop assessment by the province. Feed entitlement per animal unit was set at different levels per county in a manner to provide that production per county plus entitlement per animal unit would result in approximately the same over-all feed supply in each country. Twenby two counties were designated following the assessments, which indicates that the crop production per county in other counties was as high or higher than the over-all supply in each county assisted.

6. Has it been estimated how much surplus power could be sold to the United States?

7. Have inquiries or negotiations been carried on with potential American users as to the sale of surplus power from the Nelson river to the United States?

8. Has it been estimated at what price power from the Nelson river could be sold to the United States?

The Manitoba authorities will lease and operate these lines and will have an option to purchase them.

*LOBSTER TRAP LIMIT, P.E.I.

Question 565—Mr. McQuaid:

1. Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation which will make effective a trap limit within lobster fishing districts 7B and 8 in Prince Edward Island?

2. Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation limiting the operation of lobster fishing boats within the aforesaid districts to one boat in any one lobster fishing season in any one year?

3. If the answers to parts 1 and 2 above are affirmative, how soon may the introduction of this legislation be expected?

Mr. C. R. Granger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): The answer is as follows:

1. The whole problem of more effective economic management for the lobster fishery is under examination. No decision has yet been made concerning any proposed legislation to make effective such measures as limitation of numbers of traps within any lobster fishing district.

2. The reply to question No. 1 also applies. However, there is now, and has been for some time, a regulation which stipulates that except with the permission of the minister no person shall, during the open season for any year in a district, or portion of a district, use for lobster fishing any boat that has been used during that year for lobster fishing in any other district. This regulation exists by demand of the great majority of lobster fishermen. The minister permits exceptions only where a lobster fisherman may find himself without a lobster fishing boat through fire, shipwreck, or other mishap, and the only boat available to him for purchase may be one which has been used during the previous open season in another district during the year.

3. Not applicable.

GRAIN EXPORTS

Question No. 568—Mr. Schreyer:

1. What, in bushels and in dollars, was the total Canadian export of the following grain products in each of the last six crop years (a) wheat (b) barley (c) oats (d) rye (e) flax, and (f) rape seed?

2. What are the names of those countries that entered into negotiations with or expressed interest to the Canadian Wheat Board with a view to placing orders for Canadian grain in the current crop year?

3. Of the above countries, how many were turned away because of the inability of Canadian transportation to move the required volumes of grain?

4. What is the approximate loss of export sales owing to this turning away of import demand?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): 1. Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports the quantity and value of total Canadian export of the following grain products in each of the last six crop years (a) wheat (b) barley (c) oats (d) rye (e) flax, and (f) rape seed, are shown in table 1 attached.

2 and 3. As a matter of commercial practice it is not the policy of the Canadian Wheat Board to divulge information with respect to the current crop year's operations. The private grain trade on their own account and acting as agents of the Canadian Wheat Board are sellers of all the grains listed in question 1. The trade's operations are of a commercial nature and information concerning their negotiations with foreign buyers is not available to the government.

4. Canada is meeting all its export commitments including those to supply our traditional markets with their normal requirements. There is no doubt, however, that Canada has been unable to meet all demands for grain from foreign buyers for shipment during the current crop year. It is impossible to be definitive with respect to the actual quantity of grain involved. Both the private grain trade and the Canadian Wheat Board have had inquiries which could not be pursued, because Canada's grain handling and transportation facilities were extended to the limit to meet existing record commitments. Additionally, foreign buyers have been aware of these heavy commitments and some may have covered their immediate requirements elsewhere.

CANCELLATION OF C.P.R. PASSENGER SERVICE, TORONTO-OTTAWA

Question No. 622—Mr. Webb:

1. Did the Canadian Pacific railways make application to the board of transport commissioners to cancel passenger service between Toronto and Ottawa?

2. If so, on what date was the application received?

3. Who authorized the discontinuance of this service?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada advise as follows:

between Ottawa-Toronto. The board initiated conferences with the railways, with the object of improving the Ottawa-Toronto service. Canadian National proposed that Canadian National provide morning, afternoon and overnight service between Ottawa-Toronto, provided that Canadian Pacific withdraw from the Ottawa-Toronto and Montreal-Toronto service and give free running rights to Canadian National over Canadian Pacific trackage between Brockville-Smith's Falls. Canadian Pacific accepted Canadian National's proposal and informed the board to that effect.

*REQUEST FOR ESCALATOR CLAUSE IN SUPERANNUATION ACT

Question No. 810—Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the Prime Minister received a letter from the secretary-treasurer of the Federal Superannuates' National Association asking that the Public Service Superannuation Act be amended so as to provide therein an escalator clause similar to that contained in the Canada Pension Plan and in the Old Age Security Act?

2. If so, what reply has the Prime Minister made thereto?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The answer to the first part of the question is yes.

The answer to part 2 is as follows:

In my reply to this point raised by the secretary treasurer of the Federal Superannuates' National Association, I referred to the problem of financing increases in the pensions of federal superannuates, which would involve a charge on either general revenues or the superannuation account. I said that the government does not feel justified in granting, at the expense of the public generally, a special treatment which was not received by other retired Canadians, and that because the full amount of the credit of the superannuation account was needed to meet charges on the account on the existing basis, payment of increased pensions from the account would not be actuarily sound.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): At this point, Mr. Speaker, may I say that after the questions both oral and written have been answered today, there are some 75 questions remaining on the order paper which have been there for a month or more. I feel some of these questions could have been answered sooner, and I ask the Prime Minister if he will try to persuade his ministers to pay more attention to these written questions, thereby expediting the answers and cutting down on the number of questions asked orally.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CONSIDERATION OF ROYAL COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE ORGANIZED CRIME

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is giving consideration to the immediate appointment of a royal commission in connection with the infiltration of organized crime into various parts, if not all parts, of this nation. Has he noted the remarks of the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec, Hon. Mr. Wagner, to the effect that a state of emergency exists in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, I noted these remarks. I would remind my right hon. friend also that a federal-provincial conference has been dealing with this matter, which has set up certain machinery to pursue the investigations required. I shall be glad to look into the specific proposal made by my right hon. friend.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AIDE-MEMOIRE ON UNITED STATES GUIDE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Some time ago he promised to table the aide-memoire which the Canadian government sent to the United States government with regard to the guide lines imposed by that country. The minister has had adequate time to consult with his colleagues, and I wonder if he is now ready to table that aide-memoire?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): If my hon. friend will look at what I said about the aide-memoire I believe he will find it had to do with S.E.C. regulations. I said this would be tabled at the appropriate moment. The government, through some of its ministers, will be meeting opposite numbers in the government of the United States on Friday next in Washington, when this and other matters will be discussed. I believe it would not be in the public interest, before that meeting takes place, to have the aide-memoire tabled. I hope we can do so shortly thereafter, having in mind Canadian interests.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister appeared on national television and claimed that not only had Hon. Eric Kierans written to the United States government protesting the guide lines but that this government had also protested, did he have in mind the aide-memoire which referred only to the S.E.C. regulations, or was there another document?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I cannot remember what I said on television a long time ago, but I can remember what I said to my hon. friend in the house. I think if he looks at the exchange which took place on the day he asked the question and on the day after he will see that I set out the situation as I understood it to be, and as I think it had been lucidly stated the night before on television.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Since we are now considering the estimates of the Department of Justice and since question No. 577 now on the order paper seems to be quite important in the examination of those estimates, can the minister tell us if the officials of his department are giving that question all the necessary attention, so that an answer will be given to it before consideration of his estimates is completed?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I intend to discuss question No. 577 during the study of my estimates, probably this afternoon.

WATER RESOURCES

STUDY BY COMMISSION OF CONSERVATION AND FLOW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and follows up remarks attributed to him over the week end relating to the conservation of water resources in Canada. Does the minister anticipate in the immediate future the setting up of a commission to study the over-all picture of water conservation and flow, such as the commission already instituted by the premiers of the prairie provinces?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, this question very often comes up; when are we going to have a national water policy? It is quite difficult for me to answer this question, because everybody knows the provinces have a lot to do with natural resources; with water in particular.

I do not think hon. members should be pessimistic. A lot of good work is being done in this field at the moment. For example, a study has been started of the Ontario northern rivers. Another study is proceeding on water levels in the great lakes. About ten days ago the Minister of Agriculture and I were in Winnipeg discussing with representatives of the three prairie provinces the setting up of a board for the investigation of the Nelson and Saskatchewan basins. The conversation is going along very nicely and we are about to reach agreement in principle.

I would remind hon. members that although we do not have a sort of unitary water policy, we are nevertheless making great progress in federal-provincial relations in this field.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether study has been given to the recent legislation passed by the United States relating to the exchange of water in the river basins draining into lake Ontario, the St. Lawrence, Chesapeake bay and the Atlantic ocean; and what if any, in the opinion of the minister and his advisers, will be the further effect on the water levels in lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river? Will the minister say at the same time whether this legislation has been referred to the International Joint Commission for consideration?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, this is a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. But if you ask my opinion—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can think of nothing I want to hear more.

Mr. Pepin: Thank you very much. I have read the legislation mentioned and found out that it covers only studies; it refers to funds allocated in the United States for studies of this question of reservoirs and diversions. Consequently this matter does not come yet under the boundary treaty existing between the United States and Canada. If further to these studies diversion of waters should be considered, then we would expect the United States government to consult with us.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I intended to ask the minister a question on this subject. The minister did say he was optimistic by a good many of us on this side are a bit pessimistic regarding our water policy.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the apprehension felt by many Canadians and practically all members of the opposition in this house over recent statements made by the Prime Minister and the minister with respect to the international development of Canadian water resources, and in view of the legislation passed by the United States government which was mentioned by the Leader of the Official Opposition, will the minister—I heard his reply to me but it was not quite satisfactory—do what he can to promote an agreement between the provinces and the federal government so we can have an early announcement of what is our water policy in this country?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I have already given, in the short period of time which is allocated to us, three wide areas of federal-provincial co-operation on water supply and use. I could go on, but I do not think hon. members should be too pessimistic about this. As far as I am concerned I am giving the matter all my attention.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

U.S. MAIL OFFERING OBSCENE FILMS AND LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether he would investigate mailings from a firm in Winnetka, California, which sends unsolicited mail to many businesses and homes in southern Ontario, particularly in the Toronto and Oshawa areas, offering for sale obscene films and literature. Many residents are complaining about this, and I wonder whether the minister would investigate to see what can be done about halting the delivery of this mail.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Ontario has made a suggestion to the minister. I am sure the minister will take note of it, but this is not a question for this time of day.

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE

PETITION REQUESTING INCREASE TO $100 PER MONTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister receive a petition from the senior citizens from Spiritwood district in Saskatchewan requesting that the old age pension be increased to $100 a month? Does the government intend to take any action on the request of these pioneer citizens who are in great need at this time owing to the high cost of living?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister should let us know whether or not he has received such a petition.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that it is not in order at this time to ask whether the Prime Minister or any minister has received a petition or a letter. Many members receive petitions and letters every day, and if they were allowed at this time, during the short period available for questions, to ask members of the government whether such petitions, letters or requests had been received by them we should, I think, make very little progress. I suggest that the hon. member might wish to put his question on the order paper.

ENERGY

APPLICATION FOR SECOND GAS TRANSMISSION LINE THROUGH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister of mines or to the minister in his capacity as minister of resources, or I will address it to the Prime Minister.

May I preface my question with one sentence. There is an application pending before the National Energy Board at the moment for a permit to export six trillion cubic feet of Canadian natural gas from western Canada by pipe line. Does the minister and his government take the position that a second gas transmission pipe line can now be constructed from Caanda through the U.S.A. without referring the matter to parliament and getting parliament's approval of such an enterprise? Or has approval now been granted?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Certainly the first part of the question is not in order. The hon. member is making an argument and putting the question in such a way that it suggests its own answer, which is not in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Woolliams: Then may I put the question in this way. Has approval been given for the building of a second trans-Canada pipe line out of Canada through the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, this question is before both the United States federal power commission and the Canadian National Energy Board, so it would be improper for me to comment on the matter at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of an answer given by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys respecting export and import permits for the National Energy Board. Is the matter of building a second trans-Canada or pipe line before that board or is it before the government?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I understand this is the question that is before the board.

AGRICULTURE

SASKATCHEWAN—DELAY IN SUPPLEMENTARY CREAM PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Has Mrs. Lenore Andrews been authorized to speak for the Department of Agriculture with regard to difficulties in cream supplementary payments? Mrs. Andrews is a prominent Liberal in Prince Albert and is president of the Saskatchewan Women's Liberal Association.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question should seek information, not give information.

Mr. Nasserden: I was raising a serious matter, Mr. Speaker. The lady in question is faced with a real difficulty in connection with this payment—

Mr. Speaker: The question may be serious, but it should not be asked at this time. The hon. member might wish to place it on the order paper.

Mr. Nasserden: Could the Minister of Agriculture tell us the extent of the difficulties which have arisen with regard to supplementary cream payments in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member place his question on the order paper.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPORTED DISCOVERY OF OIL ON MELVILLE ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources or, if he is not the appropriate minister, for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Is there any information available about a recent important discovery of oil on Melville island in the Northwest Territories; and can the hon. gentleman tell us anything about the way in which this discovery was made?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This does not appear to be a question which should be asked at this time and I invite the hon. member to place it on the order paper.

Mr. Winkler: With all deference, Mr. Speaker, I suggest this is of great national and even international importance.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTED STUDY BY PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr Speaker, some weeks ago the Prime Minister informed the house that the government was seriously considering the establishment of an all-party parliamentary committee to study questions relating to the Canadian constitution. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether this matter is still receiving active consideration by the government and whether we can expect an announcement in this regard fairly soon.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but no decision has yet been reached. I hope one will be before long.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER AND VICTORIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is it correct that the Minister of Transport together with the Minister of Labour and the minister of northern affairs will be visiting the harbours of Vancouver and Victoria between March 4 and March 7? If it is correct, will the minister be making an announcement on his return concerning the development of Vancouver harbour and adjacent areas?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr Speaker, I hate to forecast announcements.

WATER RESOURCES

PEMBINA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I regret I was unable to discuss this matter which the Secretary of State for External Affairs before the house sat but I have a question to address to him which he would perhaps like to take as notice. Would the minister inquire when the government can expect a report from the International Joint Commission with regard to the development of the Pembina river project in North Dakota and Manitoba?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall make immediate inquiries and let the hon. member know tomorrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINDSOR—PROSPECTIVE LAY-OFF OF FORD WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry. It is with reference to a meeting held on Friday in Ottawa between representatives of the Department of Industry and representatives of local 200 of the United Automobile Workers, Windsor, regarding projected lay-offs of workers at the Ford Motor Company of Canada. I should like to ask the minister whether he gave the U.A.W. assurances that his departmental officials would make representation to the Ford Motor Company on behalf of the U.A.W. and, if so, what progress has been made with those representations?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I myself was not present at this meeting but I am advised—

Mr. Knowles: By whom?

Mr. Drury: —that the appropriate action was taken by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, assisted in this matter by my hon. friends from Essex East and Essex West.

Mr. Saltsman: Then may I direct my question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): As the hon. member mentioned, we met a delegation from local 200 of the United Automobile Workers. They stated their problems at length, more particularly the lay-offs and the exodus of certain tradesmen to the United States.

The Ministers of Industry, Labour and myself have agreed to co-operate in finding a solution to those problems and also to send someone there to check the facts on the spot, at the resquest of local 200 representatives.

[English]

Mr. Saltsman: Because of the urgency of this situation—these lay-offs are to occur on March 4—can the minister inform the house when he is likely to have an answer to this particular problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will inquire and possibly answer tomorrow on what may have been done.

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF SENATE RECOMMENDATIONS ON AGING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the light of assurances that consideration is being given by the government to recent proposals of the special committee of the Senate on aging, can the hon. gentleman advise us whether this subject might now be referred to the standing committee on health and welfare in order to give members of parliament from all parties an opportunity to make representations of a non-partisan nature, which will represent an effort by parliament as a whole to bring financial relief to our senior citizens?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF ROADS TO RESOURCES PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The announcement he made earlier today recognizes the potentialities of the north. Is the minister now in a position to invite the provinces to submit proposals for a new five year plan under the roads to resources program?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the best answer I could make to the hon. member would be to say that this section of my department was transferred to my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Korchinski: Then could I direct my question to the appropriate minister?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the roads to resources program was intended to last a certain period of time. I am told that some provinces have yet to complete their use of the program, and this has to be borne in mind as the government gives consideration to a possible extension of the program. The question is being studied.

Mr. Korchinski: Inasmuch as there have been ad hoc extensions of the original program, is the government now giving consideration to setting aside certain funds so that interested provinces can avail themselves of them as they see fit?

Mr. Pepin: I said a moment ago that we were now studying the effects of this program. Decisions for the future will be taken on the basis of this study.

LOANS TO PROSPECTORS FOR RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in relation to the announcement he made today concerning loans for the development of resources in the territories. Can he tell us whether money will be available from this fund for loans to individual prospectors to carry out the work they normally do?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, my answer to that would be that the advisability of making a loan will be judged on the basis of the individual application.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GHANA—INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN MILITARY TRAINING TEAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister now inform the house whether any official instructions have been sent to the Canadian military training team in Ghana and, particularly, whether there has been any change in its activities?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no change.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

ONTARIO—DEFERMENT APPLICATION BY AUTOMOTIVE TRANSPORT ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. On Wednesday last the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked the minister whether he would consider making a decision as soon as possible on the application for deferment of part 1 of the Canadian Labour Code by the Automotive Transport Association. The minister stated he would be glad to give consideration to this suggestion. May I ask the minister whether he has now given the matter his consideration and whether he can give an answer today in view of the fact that the truckers' strike is still continuing?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on the same day the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked his question I received a long letter on the subject from the hon. member who has just spoken, and I answered that letter at some length today.

I suggest he might consider it and renew the question tomorrow if he thinks it advisable.

Mr. Lewis: I shall live in anticipation until I read the letter.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—ARRANGEMENTS FOR MEETING RESPECTING SAFETY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Have arrangements been made yet for a meeting with the appropriately interested parties with respect to safety measures on the St. Lawrence river and seaway?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand such arrangements are being made.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CYPRUS—ROTATION OF CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will Canada continue to supply troops to the United Nations peace keeping force in Cyprus? If so, will the rotation take place in March and what units will replace the present ones?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the mandate will be extended. I shall take as notice the question regarding the actual rotation date and units.

FISHERIES

SEALS—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries possibly I should direct this question to the Prime Minister. It is of pressing importance because sealing operations, so far as individuals are concerned, open tomorrow.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Would the Prime Minister say whether there has been any effective change in the regulations so that Canadians may be assured that cruel and inhumane practices will end? I ask this in view of the fact that recent articles indicate that the regulations do not cover the situation and the inhumanity of the past will not be obviated unless there is unusual vigilance and action on the part of the Department of Fisheries.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know the minister has been concerning himself with this matter, especially in the light of certain reports that have appeared. He will be in his place tomorrow, and I shall ask him to deal with the question at that time.

LABOUR RELATIONS

SARNIA—REQUEST FOR CONCILIATION BOARD AT POLYMER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has any action been taken yet on the request for a conciliation board which I understand has been received from the president of the union at the Polymer Corporation in Sarnia?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that telegram was received only this morning. I hope to have the matter investigated and have something to report in a couple of days.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS WITH FAIR ASSOCIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he advise the house whether results can be expected as a consequence of recent meetings with representatives of fair associations and other interested persons?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The immediate urgency of this question is not apparent to the Chair. Perhaps the hon. member would put it on the order paper.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister say whether he has reinstated capital grants for class B fairs?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I would invite the hon. member to place that question also on the order paper.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MONTREAL—INVESTIGATION INTO DEATH OF LAWYER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

In view of Mr. Claude Wagner's statement to the effect that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was duty bound to tell the provincial police everything he knew concerning the death of Mr. Payette, the lawyer, could the minister tell the house whether he has learned anything from Mr. Wagner about steps taken by the hon. member for Yukon to inform the Quebec provincial authorities?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member for Lotbinière will take into account the fact that the estimates of the Minister of Justice are before the house and that this will give him an opportunity to ask him his question.

Mr. Knowles: As a supplementary question, has the minister made inquiries since last Tuesday to find out where the report is?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, sir.

Mr. Knowles: As a further supplementary question, can the minister tell us what he has learned as a result of such inquiries?

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall try to do so tomorrow, sir.

THE SENATE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE FOLLOWING APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the general interest in the Senate brought about by the recent appointments to that place, would the Prime Minister be prepared to table the large number of letters, telegrams and other missiles that his appointments have inspired?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

DIVORCE

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Recently the premier of Ontario said there ought to be a royal commission on divorce. Is the Prime Minister of the opinion that the standing committee on justice and legal affairs is competent to handle this matter without the establishment of a royal commission?

Mr. Speaker: This question is out of order.

Administration including the office of the superintendent of bankruptcy, grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates, gratuities to the widows or such dependents as may be approved by Treasury Board of judges who die while in office and authority to make recoverable advances for the administration of justice on behalf of the governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $2,504,300.

The Chairman: Shall vote No. 1 carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, naturally we are awaiting with bated interest the reply that will be given by the Minister of Justice to the various questions that have been propounded and are as yet unanswered. I intend to deal now with only two matters while awaiting the response of the minister regarding questions that are of pre-eminent importance.

During the question period I asked the Prime Minister whether his attention had been drawn to the views expressed over the week end by the minister of justice of the province of Quebec and what the government's stand would be respecting the convening of a royal commission to look fully into the whole field of crime. Canadians as a whole have been shocked, even dumbfounded by the revelations of the last year or so, and everywhere there is a demand that the situation be looked into to see whether the administration of justice has been subject to infiltration by gangs, thugs and Mafia dominated individuals. I think the demand for a royal commission which I had the honour to make months ago has been reinforced by events during the passing months.

Only on Friday the hon. member for Yukon again repeated that request. I cannot understand the government's position. The government has before it the facts revealed in the Dorion Commission inquiry and the complaints that have been made by the Ontario Crime Commission respecting the failure of the Department of Justice to reply to letters regarding international criminals. These things make one wonder why a royal commission representative not only of the federal government but the provinces should not be set up.

The division of responsibility in the administration of justice demands that there be representation from both jurisdictions on the commission. The Prime Minister stated today that this matter was before a dominion-provincial conference. That is no answer. More and more fields of endeavour that should be before the House of Commons are receiving the attention of dominion-provincial conferences and the House of Commons representing the people receives little or no information regarding these matters.

I would simply quote the words of the minister of justice of the province of Quebec who stated over the week end:

> Organized crime has created a "veritable state of emergency". . . . "It has become more and more evident that organized crime, not only in Quebec but in the whole of the country, has created a veritable state of emergency." . . .
> Mr. Wagner recalled that a royal commission investigation into crime is not a new idea—he had made the same suggestion when he was Crown Attorney and when he was a Judge of the court of sessions here.
> "What I had in mind then is precisely a commission of national scope which would bring witnesses from all corners of the country because it is now public knowledge that organized crime knows no provincial boundaries. A local inquiry would not uncover what a royal commission or what a national commission would reveal."

The support of the minister of justice of the province of Quebec, a man who has had experience both as a prosecutor and as a local judge, gives added emphasis to the need of action in this regard.

I am now going to refer to the Spencer case because I want the minister to know and the Prime Minister too that it is not a dead issue. We want the facts. More and more it is becoming a question of whether or not the government can stand against public opinion which generally has demanded an investigation into the circumstances, the strange, bizarre circumstances of the Spencer case. It is parliament's responsibility. It has been interesting to find that while up to very recently, outside of the press across Canada which is almost unanimous in a demand for action in this regard, we in the opposition had not been able to secure support from members sitting on the Liberal benches supporting the government, the other day there were revelations. One was by the hon. member for York-Humber in a most striking presentation. There was no evasion, there was a directness in the expression of his view which cannot be wiped aside.

Even in the mind of the hon. member for Verdun, who has a reputation for qualified viewpoints, suspicion is beginning to be aroused. He wants to know why no action has been taken. What action there has been, has been bureaucratic, dictatorial, and completely without precedent. This man was designated by the Minister of Justice. He found his way on to the television screens of this country and he designated this man and identified him. Earlier there had been some reference to him.

According to Lord Hewitt, "the only things that interfere with the absolute power of bureaucratic government are the sovereignty of parliament and the rule of law". If a poll were taken of members of the house, I think it would be overwhelmingly in favour of the need for investigation into this weird case. Let me point out how difficult it is to obtain information. The hon. member for Battle River-Camrose on January 21 placed the following questions on the order paper and they have hibernated there ever since:

1. Were alleged security or espionage offences committed by Victor G. Spencer, now of Vancouver and, if so, what were they and when did these alleged offences take place?

2. What year did he come to Canada, and from what country?

Who is hiding the facts here? Sir, is it not strange that questions like these remain on the order paper for a month and ten days without being answered. What are they hiding? What are they concealing? What are they afraid of? I realize that this government has established an international reputation as a bumbler. Indeed, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, speaking on international affairs the other day in Edmonton, said, "we have to stumble to a stalemate". That is what this government has done. That is its policy, its attitude; it refuses to face facts.

All across this nation there is a demand for action and the Prime Minister has intensified that demand by an explanation which certainly did not explain. Indeed, the Montreal Star, which never has been known as one of the government's most active critics, on February 25 said in an editorial headed "The Spencer Case Is Not Closed":

• (3:50 p.m.)

So far as Mr. Pearson is concerned the Spencer case is closed. The Prime Minister may be happy about it all, quite convinced that the interests of national security are not jeopardized, and that no injustice has been worked. No one else is so easily convinced and the suspicion will not down that in this, as in perhaps other cases, the government has something to hide. It has at any rate fumbled and can satisfy the public that justice has been done only by bringing Spencer to trial or instituting a judicial inquiry.

I immediately add that when the government says security procedures might be revealed I accept that explanation, but that does not justify the refusal to call together an inquiry presided over by a judge or judges sitting in camera. We want to know whether the rights of Canadians can be shamelessly swept aside.

The last paragraph of this article states:

Objections to the government's course of action in the Spencer case are not based on sympathy for Spencer. He himself created the publicity that now surrounds him by identifying himself in connection with the ousting of two Russian representatives. What gives cause for concern is the government's assumption that whenever it sees fit it can sidestep justice and deal with people as if we were living in a police state.

That is what has happened here. Surely the shades of 1945 and 1946 are not returning. I intend to ask questions to which we want answers. These are not questions that will interfere with national security but we want to know about a few of the things that have been hidden in fog, smokescreen and mystery to such an extent that people are beginning to wonder why the government has hidden them if there is nothing to hide.

Let us consider how the government started in this matter. It began by giving the explanation that Mr. Spencer had to be subjected to what one would call protective surveillance in order to protect the nation. Then the minister let the cat out of the bag when he said: We are not doing it for that reason because he never endangered the security of the state. The security of the state is not in jeopardy because he is wandering around wherever he may be.

Mr. Woolliams: The second explanation was that they were protecting him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was mention of previous cases. What was done in previous cases where complete secrecy was maintained? No names were given in those cases. Why is this man denied a hearing? What stage have we reached in this country when a Canadian, whatever his record may be, and apparently it cannot be very serious because the minister says that the security of the nation was never in danger, is told that he is out of a job but wherever he goes he is going to have somebody with him? If that is not a form of open arrest I do not know what else it is.

The government decided that the first explanation was not very good because it gave all the earmarks of a police state, and they altered it. What a tangled web of circumstances. The explanation was then given that he was being followed in order to provide protection of his own person, because they do not want him to be subjected to physical danger from the communists, but surely nobody believes that possible.

Surely no one could be gullible enough to accept the first theory that he was being followed to assure that he would do no wrong and then the amended form, that he is being followed for that purpose and also to preserve his precious being. Let us get the story straight. These people cannot have it both ways. In a democratic state there is certainly a difference between protection by law enforcement officers and surveillance of a person because he might commit a criminal offence. If it was intended for the sake of protection, all I say is that even a lawyer without experience would not have used the word "surveillance". I suggest these people changed their story to meet the criticism. There can be no justification for this nation putting anyone under protective custody or keeping him under open arrest in the circumstances that have been revealed so far.

I was not in the house at the time but I was amazed to know that the Prime Minister had said, as reported at page 1683 of Hansard for February 23:

> I do not believe his rights as a person or as a citizen have been violated.

I should like to ask at what stage he would consider rights to have been violated if this is not a violation. He said that Spencer had not complained. Have they interviewed him or have the R.C.M.P. interviewed him to find out whether he basks in the sunshine of notoriety with police officers on his trail wherever he goes? Has there been any correspondence with him? Surely it would not interfere with security of the state if this were revealed.

The explanation that has been given, the secondary revised version, is nothing but pharasaic cant and hypocrisy. The government started out by saying that this man was being followed and kept under surveillance. Surveillance means the following of a person for the purpose of assuring that he does not commit a crime or to ascertain whether or not evidence can be obtained against him regarding a crime.

Surely there can be no successful denial of this fair request for a judicial inquiry behind closed doors. Such an inquiry would permit a judicial declaration whether security would be harmed if this man were given his day in court. I hope never again will a royal commission be subjected to a suggestion by the Prime Minister or any other minister of the government to the effect that its findings do not meet the sensibilities of the Prime Minister or another minister and that the evidence given under oath should be changed and altered by an ex-parte statement not under oath. Surely that case of asking a judge to change his judgment after it had been delivered and tabled in parliament was the height of indiscretion and worse.

The Prime Minister laughs. He got in touch with the head of a royal commission and said: Your finding is not right.

The former minister of justice said, "That is what I said, but what I should have said when I did not say it was what I would have said if I had thought it over. This is what it will be." What nonsense is this? It was one of the most serious invasions of judicial independence that has ever been seen in this country. Yet they smile. One remembers the words of William Cullen Bryant which are as true today as when they were uttered, "O freedom, close not your eyes. Its opposition never sleeps." What we are asked to do in this case is say, "Begone, freedom. Exit the rights of individuals who only ask that they be tried for their alleged wrongs."

Why is no action being taken in the Spencer case? It is for the government to say. They have had to change their story as to the reason he is being followed. Why? Spencer said, "If they do anything with me, heads will swim". Whose heads? What heads? A little later, on December 26, Mr. Peter Trueman reported in his column that Spencer had said that if the federal government prosecuted him on espionage charges, high-ranking officials in Ottawa would suffer. Those are strong words. Who are these heads? The former minister of justice, with that urbanity he shows whenever justice is trampled on, smiles and sneers. I say to him: Who are these people?

There should be a royal commission, behind closed doors if necessary. I will go along with the government on that even though I do not like closed-door investigations. But under the circumstances an inquiry should be conducted by a judge if there is danger of the revelation of counter-espionage. A judge can hear, sift and conclude. Surely we have not come to the stage in this country where a person can be named, charged with a heinous crime, the most serious crime against the state, publicly branded and maintained in a state of continuing open arrest without a proper inquiry.

The excuse might be offered: Well, this man tried to undermine the state; therefore he should not have the rights of all other citizens. If that press release was based on fact, everything about his conduct was despicable and worthy of punishment. But to condone wrongdoing on the part of the state on the ground that the wrongdoing by the victim might reveal certain information is anything but what one should expect. Even at this late date there should be an inquiry into this matter. When I raised this question the Prime Minister at first said he would consider it even though the Minister of Justice had swept it aside. What a sinuous course the present Minister of Justice followed. When the election was on he said, "I am not looking into the case."

I will be very glad to quote the speech of the Minister of Justice in this regard because I always come with the necessary material. He said he was not looking into the case then. That is what he said and I shall quote from the speech in a moment. Then he left the impression that there would be an investigation along the line of a commission. Once the election was over and that sort of attitude had achieved its purpose, suddenly he changed his viewpoint.

I point out that across the country, as I said a moment ago, the press almost unanimously demands action. La Presse, the Globe and Mail, Le Devoir, the Montreal Star, the Gazette, the Toronto Telegram—everywhere, without regard to party considerations, there is a demand for action. But this government stands adamant. Why? Whose heads will roll? What revelations will be made? Sir, that is what parliament is for, to see that the nation's security shall be protected and the rights of the individual shall not be denied unnecessarily.

Even in the days of war, as the hon. member for York South said, a man had greater rights. During the days of World War II I sat on the committee considering the defence of Canada regulations. Many persons were interned because of the exigencies of war who later had to be released. In this case, sir, the Bill of Rights has been shockingly violated. There has been a gross perversion of the elementary principles of right. I say, on the basis of very full study, that what has been done to Spencer serves neither justice nor national security. He has been scourged by despotism. He has been denied human rights. The government that will not place him in the dock will place him forever in a pillory.

Surely ordinary justice demands that a man be judged according to law. This man has been judged outside the law. He has been convicted without evidence by the jury of public opinion. He has been punished without verdict. For the rest of his life he carries with him the stigma of a traitor to his country.

I have some questions I want answered, although on the basis of information to date it is with trepidation that I even advance them. I am going to read, because I think it should be on the record, the press release issued by the Department of External Affairs on May 8. Before I do, I ask the minister to reveal this fact; it cannot interfere with the security of the nation. Was it in the month of January or February or March or April that the first suspicions came to the attention of the Department of Justice regarding the proclivities of this man or did the wrongdoing only come to light a day or so prior to May 8?

This is very important. When this matter was revealed that great body of men, the R.C.M.P., was under attack in connection with the Dorion inquiry. How did it come about that the Spencer case, at that significant moment, should be brought to light? If the alleged offences took place in the month of April or early May it is understandable. When did these alleged offences take place?

They say they have no evidence. On more than one occasion wrongdoers, communists, who have come into Canada to undermine the state have been told to get out; they have been sent back. Indeed, the experience of our country, the United States and the United Kingdom has been that many of these people who come in under the guise of diplomacy use that as a camouflage for wrongdoing against the country to which they are accredited. Let us read what this press release says:

> The Department of External Affairs today announced that the ambassador of the Soviet Union was requested on May 4 to arrange for the departure from Canada of two members of his mission, Mr. A. E. Bytchkov, of the Commercial Section, and a Chancery clerk, Mr. V. N. Poluchkin.

I pause here to suggest that a man in the commercial section, who did not enjoy diplomatic immunity, was allowed to leave. I am talking about the commercial section.

> The Canadian government had learned that they had engaged in activities incompatible with their official status and had, therefore, found it necessary to declare them persona non grata. They left Canada on May 7.

Listen to this, and this is the Department of External Affairs speaking:

> In one instance a Canadian civil servant was paid thousands of dollars to gather information and documentation in Canada, the purpose of which was to assist in the establishment of espionage activities in Canada and other countries, and to perform economic intelligence tasks, including the provision of detailed information on the Transmountain pipe line system in western Canada.

The question I ask is this: Many thousands of dollars were paid to this man Spencer according to this record but today you say you have no evidence sufficient to convict. You issue this statement on the eighth day of May. In what other countries were these espionage establishments to be brought about? This information would not reveal anything of importance to our security. You have already said thousands of dollars were paid. We ask, how many? Let us see how big this is. How many individuals were approached by this man. How much was paid to him? You must have all this information. How many payments were made and over what period of time? Let us have that information. The security of this nation will not be undermined by this information.

Then, what about the naturalized Canadian citizen who was paid thousands of dollars to provide technical information? He is free because he assisted. Of what is he free? His name remains among the great incognitos of our country. What did he do? He endeavoured to compromise other Canadians, including female employees of the government, with the object of securing their assistance in obtaining access to classified information. The minister shakes his head in a horizontal motion, which means no. This is what it says in the press release from which I am reading issued by the Department of External Affairs. The Minister of Justice says there is nothing in that. What kind of press release is this to emanate from the Department of External Affairs containing information that is false?

The press release says this man was given specialized photographic training to assist him in his task. Is that true? This is true. Well, we are getting along. The minister says it is not true, he shook his head in a negative way, that this man tried to compromise female employees in an effort to obtain access to information. You see, the minister is very honest and straightforward about this. He says that is not a fact. What kind of reliance can you place on a press release issued by the minister of the Department of External Affairs—it would not be issued by him but by somebody there—when the Minister of Justice says it has no foundation? We are starting to get some information.

I quote again from the press release:

> The approaches made by the two members of the Soviet Embassy very shortly came to the attention of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. As a result of this co-operation by conscientious Canadians, the police were able to establish the improper intent of the Soviet approaches and to put an end to them before any damage was done to Canadian interests.

I ask, when was this? When did these things happen? I am amazed to have an admission from the Minister of Justice that the cornerstone upon which the government has founded this press release by the Department of External Affairs has cracks in it; parts of it are not true. This is a very serious matter. I know the minister will want to clear this matter up beyond peradventure. It is in that spirit that I appeal to him once more that action be taken in the interests of justice. The very fact he now admits part of the press release was without foundation indicates the need for a royal commission to go into this matter.

Let me go on from there. One man gets thousands of dollars. He obtained the money to begin with because they had to trust him first and then later, because of conscience, fear or whatever the reason, a change was brought about in his thinking. Do you not think a commission should have an opportunity of looking into this situation, because thousands of dollars are not paid by the Soviets just for the amusement of making payments? I have just been reading the papers of the Russian spy—his name has gone out of my mind for the moment but he was the Russian colonel who was executed—and they indicate that the results are not insignificant.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, in view of that admission by the Minister of Justice, which I am sure came as a surprise to the Prime Minister and the other ministers, there is no difficulty now in making a case for a commission. I do not in any way wish to see our security techniques revealed. On the other hand, the present state of indefiniteness, uncertainty and evasion in this matter, the foundation story now ceasing to exist with the admission by the minister that one portion of this press release is not factual, point to the need for action to be taken.

I am not going to press this case further at this time. However, the Minister of Justice mentioned a moment ago that one statement I had made was not quite correct. I have before me the file. So far as the R.C.M.P. is concerned, the commissioner received severe criticism in the Dorion report. The attitude taken toward two of the high officials of the R.C.M.P. by the judge before he published his report indicated that there would be criticism. When the Spencer case was first revealed the Dorion report was being written.

The minister indicated a moment ago—I want to be entirely fair about this report—that he went right after this as soon as he became Minister of Justice. I think fairness demands that I admit that. I admit—

Mr. Cardin: Would the right hon. gentleman explain what he means when he says that I went right after this? Right after what?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I would think that with that assiduity and energy that the hon. gentleman possesses in such abundant measure, as soon as the matter came into his hands—

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Cardin: What matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —he would have acted. And he did act. I was just going to pay a tribute to him for his action but I do not want to spoil the record. I have before me an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of July 8 written by Mr. Geoffrey Stevens in which the following appears:

> The short, easy-going lawyer from Sorel, Que., moved smoothly and swiftly yesterday into the political hot-seat . . . Without waiting for the official swearing-in ceremony, he set up a meeting—

Then the article goes on to say this, and it is a very striking statement for a minister who is just assuming the heavy responsibilities of Minister of Justice:

> —although he could not sympathize with the violent attacks made on the R.C.M.P. last week by the French-speaking members of the Social Credit Party and the Social Credit Rally, he felt there must be some basis for the M.P.'s complaints. "I feel there is nothing fundamentally wrong (with the R.C.M.P.) but I hope to get at the reason very quickly"—

That is why I mentioned, Mr. Chairman, he had moved forward with acceleration and dispatch. Then the article went on to say that the minister also had other hot potatoes to dispose of such as Adrien Meunier, Leo Landreville and so on. The hon. member for Hochelega also became involved in this and wrote an article in the Toronto Telegram dated August 24 in which he covered a lot of things. In his article he said:

> In his report published at the beginning of July, he criticized our federal police corps—

He is referring to Chief Justice Dorion.

> —so severely that many Canadians, including this columnist, are still wondering why nothing happened to Commissioner McLellan as a consequence of such a dressing down.

I did not hold that view, but this article was written by a very eminent publicist. However, he gets to the bottom of things because he went on to say:

> Not only did Chief Justice Dorion condemn the R.C.M.P. for its appalling lack of bilingualism, an aspect of the problem that could be deemed by many as not directly relevant to the case, but he also described the handling of the Rivard affair as a very poor performance by the force.
> It is now official, thanks to the report, that the R.C.M.P. went to work after a long delay that it could not explain; that the methods displayed by its men were unworthy of a responsible institution.

Then he goes on to say:

> The press was unanimous in demanding that Guy Favreau resign but to my knowledge, only one newspaper suggested that Commissioner McLellan was in the same situation.

That article indicates the opinion of a most outstanding publicist, now one of those who, having seen the light of day, sits on the thrones of the powerful.

Then we go on to follow the course through. I say advisedly that I am concerned about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police being placed in any invidious position which would result in the loss to any degree of the kind of prestige they have built up. I speak as one who, before I became a member of parliament, was in the courts and I met with them week after week in literally hundreds of cases. I relied upon them, and in all the times I appeared before the courts there were only two cases in which there was ever any evidence given by a mounted policeman which I had any reason to believe was not the truth and the whole truth.

However, in this case, strangely enough, they do have to start to produce an answer, which is a serious situation. That is why on Friday I mentioned the fact that the commissioner of the mounted police must keep out of participating in any way in the defence of his force, however strongly he may feel about the matter. That is a question for the minister. As soon as a person occupying the position of commissioner starts getting into that field, controversy takes place. Not everybody will accept the views expressed by him and the result is one not beneficial to the maintenance of that high degree of regard which the R.C.M.P. enjoys.

I am concerned about what has happened over the last couple of years. I will say no more at this time, but I do hope that never again will the commissioner get into a field of controversy. Let him talk about the work of the mounted police, give the benefit of his ideas and experiments and so on, but he must never be in the category of a protagonist for one side or another. The history of police forces stands out as a warning that to take such a course may lead to serious consequences.

I said the minister started right in. Then I said he decided to put off consideration of the case until after the election. on November 3, according to an article by David Scott, the Minister of Justice said that when he got the chance to study the report, the report on Spencer I take it, he would decide whether there was sufficient evidence. Then somebody said to him: "What about his statement 'Heads will swim'?" To this the minister replied that the man should tell his story to the police, whatever it was. He added: "The implications in the man's statement suggest he may have a political axe to grind."

I ask this question: Did the mounted police interview Spencer as to what he meant by this outrageous threat? Then the minister said, according to this report: "I don't know what it is he has to say but whatever it is, let him go ahead and say it. I would be very interested to see it myself." This commendable interest of the minister is widely shared by those of us who want to get the facts.

Then the minister gave an interview on November 5 to the Toronto Star in which he said he found the whole affair "pretty strange". I think there is agreement with that. The article states:

> In a telephone interview Mr. Cardin added that he understands the man told the newspaper that if he were able to do so he "would tell everything and that heads would swim."
> The Minister of Justice said he will deal further with the case on his return to Ottawa after the election.

Then I demanded a probe. I wanted information. We have not been able to get that information. But we were told the reason Spencer was not being prosecuted was that he was sick. I have a quotation to this effect if it is wanted. Hon. gentlemen opposite said, "If only this man was well". I recall the old saying: "When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be".

Now this man is well. The first excuse was: We cannot prosecute because he is under surgery. You know, the story as one unravels it makes me wonder. It is a difficult thing to follow. Finally there was the decision that in no circumstances would action be taken. I lay these quotations aside for use a little later. I simply rest my case here at this time. Try to unravel this tortuous course. There was the press statement which got headlines all over the world. Here was the R.C.M.P. finding this wrongdoer who would be undermining other countries by the setting up of espionage rings elsewhere. Out went the Russians. One of them did not have diplomatic protection but he was allowed to go home. Then the man was too sick for proceedings against him to be taken. Follow it through. I know the minister will straighten out this labyrinth when he speaks. We would be delighted to have an acceptable explanation though I doubt that his power of advocacy will be sufficient to assure this.

Sweeping everything aside, I now ask the government to have the fullest investigation. The people of Canada have the right to know what is what. The R.C.M.P. have the right to know. This man has the right to know. If this be not so, then any time when one would remove a person against whom there was not sufficient evidence one would do it simply by stating a fact, as was stated repeatedly in this press release, and when the press release, untrue and unjustified in part as the minister admits, had served its purpose no further action would be taken. I rest.

Mr. Cashin: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question? I believe I heard him correctly. He said that on two occasions he found that the R.C.M.P. were not up to par. I notice that speaking in the debate on October 25, 1963 on security matters he said, as found on page 4049 of Hansard.

> In the hundreds of cases in which I participated, only in one did I find on the part of any member of that force a departure from the elemental justice which has been characteristic of the force.

Are the right hon. gentleman's entire remarks equally inflated by 100 per cent?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman would not be able to see any difference between those two statements. One dealt with one matter. The matter I had to discuss today deals entirely with credibility. When the hon. member achieves that age of responsibility which allows him to differentiate, picayune interruptions of that kind will be banished from a quite able young man.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, members of this committee realize, I am sure, that security cases are for obvious reasons among the most difficult and delicate administrative problems of government, problems about which, unfortunately, very little can be said.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Those who have had responsibility for the administration of government or who have been in charge of the Department of Justice will perhaps feel and understand more keenly the difficulties involved in security cases. Indeed, while the Leader of the Opposition was prime minister security cases arose but questions let alone debates, about such cases were not accepted or answered on the ground that it would not be in the national interest to do so. We, then in opposition, accepted this attitude because, first, we knew and appreciated the inherent difficulties involved both nationally and internationally in dealing with security cases; second, because we realized the necessity of keeping secret the security procedures used by the police in these cases; third, because we had confidence in the competence, loyalty and integrity of the R.C.M.P. and in the effectiveness of their counter-espionage activities; fourth, because we trusted the accuracy and the wisdom of the legal officers of the Department of Justice and believed in the sense of responsibility of the government and the common sense of the minister of justice, whoever he might be.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that without this basic confidence and trust, not only in the competence and loyalty of the civil service but also in the good faith and sense of responsibility of government and individual ministers, parliament will not and cannot work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cardin: In recent times it has become dangerously easy to accuse and condemn by innuendos and insinuations without being called upon to substantiate charges. It may be considered politically expedient and even smart tactics, to create doubt and confusion in the house and among the public by asking questions and seeking information and explanations about this case, which is a bona fide security case, but I submit it is demagoguery for anyone to ask these questions knowing that the answers cannot and should not be given in public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cardin: In the field of national security and national security cases nothing has really changed since 1963. Security problems are as complex now as they were before 1963. Secrecy for security procedures is as essential now as it was then. The law officers of the Department of Justice are as knowledgeable and conscientious as they were in 1963. The integrity and competence of the R.C.M.P. have not diminished.

Then what is it in the Spencer case that has motivated the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and other members of the committee to demand a judicial inquiry into this case and into the whole field of security procedures?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The whole action of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The minister's conduct.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Cardin: Was the right hon. gentleman not satisfied with the security procedures when he was head of the government? If not, why did he not have a royal commission then? If he was satisfied then, why does he call for one now since the very same security procedures have been used in this case?

Is the right hon. gentleman complaining because I did not prosecute Spencer? If he is, is the right hon. gentleman saying that prosecutions were proceeded with in all security cases that came to his attention between 1957 and 1963? I am sure the right hon. gentleman is not saying that, and with reason.

Mr. Woolliams: How many were there?

Mr. Pearson: Quite a few.

Mr. Cardin: Is the right hon. gentleman questioning the validity and soundness of the recommendations of the law officers of the Crown that there was not sufficient admissible evidence to bring down a conviction against Spencer? If he is, then how can he reconcile this attitude with the severe criticism he addressed to my predecessor for not having sought the opinion of the legal officers of the Crown in the Denis case when these are the very same competent people? Is the right hon. gentleman suggesting that even though there was not a reasonable chance of bringing down a conviction I should have laid charges and prosecuted Spencer just the same and risk having disclosed the same security procedures about which his government question in the house on the grounds that it would not answer even the most benign was not in the public interest to do so?

With the experience that the right hon. gentleman has had in security matters when he was in office he must know or he can guess why prosecution did not take place in the Spencer case. If that is so, why is the right hon. gentleman acting as though he had never heard of security and intelligence procedures and why is he insinuating that the government has something to hide?

Is the right hon. gentleman condemning me because I advocated appropriate surveillance of a person who, of his own volition and without being forced to do so, admitted he was the man the R.C.M.P. were questioning in connection with espionage activities?

Mr. Diefenbaker: How could he deny it? Everybody knew it.

Mr. Cardin: Is the right hon. gentleman questioning the legality or propriety of the accepted procedure of surveillance? The right hon. gentleman has in fact severely criticized the government for not having maintained stricter surveillance over Hal Banks. Was the right hon. gentleman advocating an illegal procedure at that time?

Is the right hon. gentleman suggesting that surveillance can or should be applied only when a person has been charged or convicted? How then could the police carry out their responsibility in the field of prevention of crime?

The hon. member for Kamloops, for whom I have great esteem, is well acquainted with the difficulties involved in the handling of security cases and I am sure he will agree with me when I say that no minister of justice would have authorized a prosecution when his legal advisers had recommended that the evidence admissible in court could not and would not carry a conviction. I also feel quite sure that any minister of justice would be extremely sensitive to the possibility of divulging our counter-espionage activities.

If, Mr. Chairman, the security procedures applied by the R.C.M.P. in this case are the normal procedures always used, which have proven to be very effective in the past, if the rules and policy for the laying of charges and instituting of action are the same in this case as have been applied over the years, if surveillance by the police is a normal procedure for the prevention of crime, there can be and there is only one fact that is unprecedented in the Spencer case, something which the Leader of the Opposition and members of other political parties are scrupulously trying to ignore, forget, pass over and avoid mentioning, and that one unprecedented fact is that Spencer, not I, branded himself as a spy when he admitted he was the postal clerk involved in the espionage case.

Mr. Nielsen: You disclosed his name before the public.

Mr. Cardin: He had done that before me and, Mr. Chairman, because he did identify himself, after the government took all necessary precautions to safeguard his identity, am I being asked to prosecute him even though I know that I could not convict him and that I would risk compromising our security procedures? If Spencer had not identified himself as the man involved in espionage activity, would hon. members of the committee have insisted on a trial? No, Mr. Chairman, they would not have insisted any more in this case than they did in other security cases in the past.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was it that the minister revealed Spencer's name?

Mr. Cardin: We will go into that later, Mr. Chairman. I did not interrupt the right hon. gentleman and if he will allow me to finish my speech, I will deal with his question afterwards.

What is the difference between this security case and other cases if it is not the unprecedented fact that the person involved in this case actually identified himself and branded himself as a spy of his own free will? And because Spencer decided to identify himself, should I be asked to ignore the well established policy in prosecutions and prosecute him anyway?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Pearson: Big joke.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There were quite a number prosecuted in 1945-46.

Mr. Cardin: Are you saying that you prosecuted all the security cases which came before you when you were in office?

Mr. Nielsen: They were never identified by a Minister of Justice.

Mr. Pearson: They were not identified.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. May we let the Minister of Justice continue without interruption?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, the government is being asked to have a judicial inquiry into the Spencer case. I can assure the members of the committee that I believe in the principle behind the setting up of royal commissions of inquiry of any kind when they are warranted, but I do not believe royal commissions and judicial inquiries should replace the basic trust and confidence which are essential in any form of responsible government. Nor, Mr. Chairman, do I believe that royal commissions should be substituted for the normal administration of government and for the due processes of law.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no due process here.

Mr. Cardin: I do not believe either that a royal commission or inquiry should be set up every time the opposition asks for one in order to prove that the government did the right thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the press of Canada?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, this is exactly what we would be doing in this case.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, would the minister allow a question?

Mr. Cardin: I would be delighted to answer the question after I finish my speech.

Mr. Nielsen: After you finish reading it.

Mr. Cardin: I believe it would do a lot of good if the hon. member would write his own speeches. There would be a lot more logic in them than there is in the ones he has made here.

Mr. Starr: You are reading Favreau's writing.

Mr. Cardin: The question I should like to ask hon. members is, what exactly would the commission inquire into? Into the security procedures of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? Why? The Royal Mounted Police actually were successful in detecting this security case among others and did eliminate any potential danger to the security of Canada and, even though it may not be generally known in Canada, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police's record in the field of counter-espionage is second to that in no other country in the world and their procedure and discipline in security matters is recognized internationally as one of the best in the world. Is there justification here for a royal commission into the security procedures of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. Lewis: No one suggested that.

Mr. Cardin: Would the royal commission inquire into my decision not to prosecute Spencer? The basis of my decision is a long and well established practice applied by successive ministers of justice and, indeed, no other logical criteria could in fact be applied. Would this mean that a royal commission would be warranted to look into all future cases where prosecutions did not follow the investigation of security cases? Would the royal commission look into past cases under this or the previous government where prosecutions did not follow in similar investigations. If not, then why not? What difference is there? Where do you draw the line?

I might also ask whether we need a royal commission to tell us that surveillance is a normal and necessary procedure employed by police forces all over the world in carrying out their responsibility of maintaining order and preventing crime?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Protecting a man from danger.

Mr. Cardin: We will go into that, if you give me time. Do we need to have a royal commission to confirm that Spencer identified himself and branded himself as the spy that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were questioning when all the newspapers in Canada carried the story of Spencer's self-identification more than three weeks before I mentioned him on a television program?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, no. What is the date? That is what I asked a while ago.

Mr. Cardin: You will get the dates. Ask the hon. member for Bow River. He made my case the other day when he spoke.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are not making it, so you need help.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the hon. member for York South charge that Spencer is being discriminated against and unjustly treated because he was dismissed without pension and without appeal. Surely hon. members know that employment in the public service is during pleasure. This principle is applicable to all employees of the civil service including Spencer.

An hon. Member: What happened to the collective bargaining rights?

Mr. Lewis: You cannot fire anyone any time for any reason.

Mr. Cardin: For reason and for cause.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, order. May I ask hon. members to permit the Minister of Justice to make his speech? If some hon. members wish to interject certain opinions they certainly will have an opportunity to do so when their turn comes.

Mr. Cardin: Under the Public Service Superannuation Act pensions are paid to employees of the civil service as a right but under certain conditions. According to the Act an employee will be deprived of his pension if he is dismissed because of misconduct. This is applicable to all employees of the civil service and has been applied to other Canadian citizens in the public service. Why should it not apply to Spencer? Section 50 of the Civil Service Act, which was enacted in 1961 when the previous government was in office and after the Bill of Rights came into effect, does not provide for an appeal of the dismissal of an employee in certain cases. This law passed by the house was applied in the Spencer case.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, sure that hon. members will appreciate that in certain justified circumstances the government as an employer must take the hard decision to proceed under section 50 of the Civil Service Act and must take the responsibility for that decision. After a very painstaking examination of the whole situation, the government is satisfied as an employer that no injustice has been done and, Mr. Chairman, in clear conscience the government can assert that position.

• (5:00 p.m.)

No one member or group of members in this house has a monopoly on genuine concern for the civil rights and liberties of individuals. We are all dedicated to and have all sworn to defend and protect these rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cardin: We are also all dedicated to and have all sworn to safeguard our national security. The undeniable responsibility of the opposition to criticize constructively does not and cannot for obvious reasons always reflect the irreconcilable conflict which arises at times between these two fundamental principles to which we are all dedicated.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, the government in its undeniable responsibility to administer the country must take a decision, no matter how difficult that decision is or may be. As I have said, the government has done this and I am convinced that the decisions taken in this case were not only the right ones but the only ones that could responsibly be taken in the circumstances. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I do not believe that an inquiry into this matter is justified or warranted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I should now like to answer some of the questions raised by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. That right hon. gentleman spoke first of surveillance and the fact that we were maintaining surveillance of a man who had not been brought before the courts. He suggested that this was an injustice. Of course, there is some truth and some basis for an argument of that kind. However, I wonder what the hon. gentleman would have said had I not maintained surveillance of Mr. Spencer, knowing that he in fact had acted in a way which was not in the interests of our national security? I can imagine the type of speech the right hon. gentleman would have made under these circumstances.

I am sure the right hon. gentleman could, having a legal background in criminal law—he knows more about this than I do—in his mind conceive of surveillance which could at the same time protect an individual and prevent him from committing a crime. I am an amateur in law but there is no way in the world that I know of how the R.C.M.P. could at one time prevent a man who has been engaged in espionage activities from engaging further in them and at the same time protect him. As hon. members of the committee are aware, a statement was made by Mr. Spencer to the effect that he and the reporter could in fact be killed for what they were discussing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When did he say that?

Mr. Cardin: This is the information in a report and I will be glad to inform the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us get the facts rather than generalities.

Mr. Cardin: Some time ago—

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is just a sober second thought.

Mr. Pearson: You used the expression yourself.

Mr. Cardin: I think the right hon. gentleman could use some sober second thoughts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cardin: The right hon. gentleman also referred to an article written by Mr. Peter Newman. I hope I am not being unfair to Mr. Newman but if I understood the right hon. gentleman correctly—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I never referred to him.

An hon. Member: It was Trueman.

Mr. Cardin: I am sorry; it was an article by Mr. Trueman to the effect that Mr. Spencer had said that heads would roll in Ottawa and in high places. The right hon. gentleman then asked whether or not we had initiated an investigation by the R.C.M.P. into this situation. We did so and the outcome of that investigation was that Mr. Spencer stated: "Those newspapermen again".

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that?

Mr. Cardin: I am sure the hon. member could not give any credence to this type of story. Certainly he was not being misquoted in the newspapers.

Mr. Nielsen: You certainly were not misquoted on television.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister was not misquoted when he used Spencer's name on television.

Mr. Cardin: I used Spencer's name on television after he had identified himself. The right hon. gentleman asked several other questions. I have been considering whether or not I should answer him. He wanted to know something about the amounts of money that were involved. It is unusual to reveal this type of information but in order to prove to the right hon. gentleman that we are not trying to hide anything I intend to go perhaps farther in giving this information than anyone has gone before with the hope that the members of this committee will realize that we are not hiding anything. The amounts of money involved ranged between $3,000 and $4,000. It is difficult to find out the exact amounts because they were paid in the form of travelling and other expenses. As far as we were able to determine, those were the amounts involved in this case.

The right hon. gentleman also asked for the dates on which these alleged offences were supposed to have occurred and he suggested to the committee that by divulging this information we would not be doing any harm to our security.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just give us the months. That will be sufficient.

Mr. Cardin: I think the years also have some bearing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is fine.

Mr. Cardin: The alleged offences started to occur well before 1960. The more serious offences are alleged to have been committed in 1961 and 1962. There were no contacts made between 1963 and the time he was apprehended. As the right hon. gentleman knows, having experience in matters of this kind, the purpose of security and intelligence procedures is not necessarily to establish a charge or to prosecute one but rather to find out as much as possible from the individual in question. That was exactly the situation in this case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Were the two Russians in question in Canada in 1960?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, or their predecessors.

Mr. Cardin: Do not look so shocked. Do not put on an act. You are not impressing anybody.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They were not here.

Mr. Starr: You have been caught putting on an act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Your second act was interesting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Cardin: Then the right hon. gentleman made reference to a press release that was issued in May and stated that I had denied that something in the statement was correct. The right hon. gentleman knows that there were two people involved and one of them had co-operated with the police. He was referring, I think, to the activities of female employees in the civil service. I said no at the time for the simple reason that this had nothing at all to do with Spencer. I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman understood this. Anyway, I gave him the explanation. He asked for it and that is that. The other question—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Minister of Justice but the time alloted for his speech has elapsed.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Starr: We want to hear his alibis.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Is it agreed that the Minister of Justice may proceed with his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, there is only one other question that I should like to try to clarify if I may. That is the question, which has been repeated on many occasions, that the Prime Minister or somebody stated that we were not prosecuting Spencer because he was ill. It is true that Spencer was ill in May; he was very seriously ill at that time. The statement—any hon. member can look at the record of the statement that was made—was that he was ill and we were looking into whether there were reasons for prosecution. Someone might have interpreted that as meaning that we were not prosecuting Spencer because he was ill but that was never said, nor was it the intention.

The other matter that arises in this connection is the fact that it was very difficult indeed, when the man was actually very ill and in hospital, for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to carry on the inquiries and investigations that were needed at that time. I have given answers to the questions of the right hon. gentleman as best I can and I can assure him and the members of the committee that we have nothing to hide.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: Could I ask just one question of the minister, Mr. Chairman I should like an answer to a question asked by the minister of the Leader of the Official Opposition during the minister's speech. Did the former government prosecute all security risk cases during their term of office between 1957 and 1963? Could the minister answer that question which he asked the Leader of the Opposition? Did the former government proceed to prosecute in all security risk cases during their term of office?

Mr. Cardin: Perhaps the hon. gentleman might direct that question to the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Grégoire: Can the Minister of Justice give us the answer? The Leader of the Opposition does not want to give us the answer. Could we have the answer to this question from the minister?

Mr. Cardin: I do not think it would be in the public interest to do so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Grégoire: Do we assume that they did not ?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, when the history of the 60's is written the Spencer case, which will probably only appear as a footnote on one page, will not be a reference with regard to which historians of the future will give much credit to this government. We heard a great deal from the Minister of Justice today and the Prime Minister the other day about how for some peculiar reason it is only members of the opposition who are finding fault or asking questions about the Spencer case and the way in which the government has handled it.

I have not had an opportunity to see all the newspapers but I have had an opportunity to see some of the newspaper editorials written since the Prime Minister made his statement last week. I want to put on the record, because the Minister of Justice has perhaps been too busy preparing his case for the reason that it is a weak case, what these newspapers are saying. I shall quote only from Liberal newspapers to show the minister and the Prime Minister that the members of the opposition in this house are not alone in their questions and doubts about this case. Here is the Winnipeg Free Press of Friday, February 25:

> The Prime Minister's statement of Wednesday on the Spencer case, although an improvement on its predecessors, does not meet the central criticisms which have been levelled in parliament and in the newspapers against the government's handling of this serious matter—

There is no escaping the conclusion that the government, probably with the best of intentions, has acted as a court in the present case.

The Toronto Star of February 25 said:

In his statement in the House of Commons this week on the now notorious Spencer case, Prime Minister Lester Pearson declared: "I do not believe (Mr. Spencer's) rights as a person or as a citizen have been violated. On the contrary, I believe he has been treated with scrupulous fairness."

Few Canadians who have followed this case will agree with the Prime Minister—

The cabinet should do one of two things. Either it should lay charges against Victor Spencer (if necessary the case could be tried in camera to prevent disclosure of state secrets) or it should restore him his job and his pensions rights and take the Mounties off his doorstep.

The Montreal Star said on February 25:

So far as Mr. Pearson is concerned the Spencer case is closed. The Prime Minister may be happy about it all, quite convinced that the interests of national security are not jeapardized, and that no injustice has been worked. No one else is so easily convinced and the suspicion will not down that in this, as in perhaps other cases, the government has something to hide.

The minister today made a great deal of the fact that Mr. Spencer himself disclosed that he was involved. I want to tell the minister that Mr. Spencer did not have to identify himself. The press release issued by the Department of External Affairs was so specific that the postal workers in Vancouver knew that Mr. Spencer must be the person concerned. The press release mentioned that the person involved was sick and in hospital and these workers knew that Mr. Spencer was the person.

Apparently the government is satisfied with its handling of this case. The Prime Minister, of course, is very easily satisfied. It is a characteristic of the Prime Minister that he is easily satisfied. I should like to quote from the Prime Minister's speech of February 23:

—I believe Mr. Spencer's dismissal and his loss of pension rights under the law was lawful and just. I do not believe his rights as a person or as a citizen have been violated. On the contrary, I believe he has been treated with scrupulous fairness.

How was Mr. Spencer treated? In what way was Mr. Spencer heard? I quote again from the speech the Prime Minister made on February 23:

—he was given a hearing by a senior official of the Civil Service Commission, at which he had every opportunity to state his case. Neither at this hearing with a member of the Civil Service Commission present—and the Civil Service Commission has an interest in the protection of the rights of civil servants;—

Etc., etc.

—did Mr. Spencer make any complaint over his dismissal or prospective dismissal, or any complaint about the treatment he had received.

• (5:20 p.m.)

This is the report which the Prime Minister received from one person in the Civil Service Commission. In outlining procedures for the investigation of government employees accused of having violated security in 1963, the Prime Minister assured the house that procedures would be adopted whereby these employees would be permitted to have a hearing before an independent commission composed of people outside the government service. Mr. Spencer did not have this opportunity. Mr. Spencer had a hearing, if it could be called a hearing, by one member of the Civil Service Commission or one member of its staff.

Is that sufficient for a decision affecting the future life of a government employee? Does not the Minister of Justice, does not the Prime Minister—I see the Postmaster General is in his seat and it is a good thing he is. I should like to remind the Postmaster General—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I am always here.

Mr. Orlikow: —of a case where an employee of the Post Office Department was dismissed. He exercised his right of appeal, an appeal board was set up and the appeal board rendered a unanimous decision that the employee involved should not be dismissed. However, the Civil Service Commission exercised its judgment and decided that the person should be dismissed. He was dismissed. In that case, Mr. Chairman, it did not suit the government to take the advice of the appeal board. Its advice was ignored. In that case the Civil Service Commission gave the government the kind of advice it wanted so the government followed that advice.

I express no opinion about the guilt of Mr. Spencer. I do not have the evidence. It may be that Mr. Spencer is guilty, although I must express some doubt about the value of secret information which a postal employee could secure and whether or not it would be of real danger to the welfare of the people of Canada.

But I suggest, Mr. Chairman, regardless of what he did, there could be no reason for denying the suggestions which have come from members in every party, including the other side of the house, that a judicial inquiry be held in camera. I cannot believe for a moment, whatever Mr. Spencer is guilty of, that he was able to collect information of greater danger to the people of Canada than did the spies involved in the case which arose out of the disclosures by Igor Gouzenko. In that case the government convened a private judicial hearing. Witnesses were questioned before two judges who were aided by counsel acting for the commission. The judges made a report on the basis of which certain people were prosecuted. In that case information of tremendous importance was transmitted to countries outside of Canada. The government did not hesitate, even under those difficult circumstances, to have a judicial inquiry. There can be no reason, for now saying that we cannot have a hearing before a judge or several judges in camera. These judges may prosecute but certainly there would be no doubt about the guilt or otherwise of Mr. Spencer.

It is not my intention today to say anything further about how Mr. Spencer's rights as an individual were violated. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister is in his seat. In the years before he came to this house, when he was the publisher of a magazine called "Cité Libre", he had the courage to fight the repressive policies of the former premier of Quebec. I wonder what the Parliamentary Secretary, the hon. member for Mount Royal, would have said about this case if he were not here and were not sitting on the government benches? There is no question about how he handled things before he came here, how he felt about civil liberties.

Mr. Trudeau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: I am still concerned about this problem and I should like the hon. member to help me clarify that concern. I understand Mr. Spencer has not complained. He is a free man. He is at liberty and he probably has some right of civil action if he has been unjustly placed under surveillance. Why is the opposition complaining and not bringing forth any facts which might lead us to believe he has been unjustly treated? Mr. Spencer himself is not complaining.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not intend to do the kind of thing which has been done by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and others, that is, to say things about Mr. Spencer which I have heard about his health, both physical and mental, but the sources of which I cannot give. I think it is the responsibility of the government to make these inquiries. If I thought the Minister of Justice was really interested in getting the facts I would be more than happy—

An hon. Member: He is.

Mr. Orlikow: He and his department have acted as judge, prosecutor, jury and everything else. However, I would be very happy to tell the Minister of Justice a few things I have heard about this case which might create a good deal of doubt about it. I could tell them to the Parliamentary Secretary too in the hope he might act as he used to act.

Mr. Trudeau: If they appeal to my conscience, but I should like to know what Mr. Spencer is complaining about.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Orlikow: It is not a question of what Mr. Spencer is complaining about. Does an individual in this country have a right to a hearing? Does he have a right to be faced with the evidence against him and to make a defence if there is one? I submit this is something Mr. Spencer has never had.

It was not my intention to spend much time on this aspect of the matter because the hon. member for York South, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, the Leader of the Official Opposition and the hon. member for York-Humber, with whom I seldom agree, have all enunciated these principles about the rights of an individual well enough that they have convinced me and I suggest they would have convinced the hon. member for Mount Royal before he became Parliamentary Secretary. I want to deal with another matter about which the hon. member for Mount Royal has some knowledge. I am glad the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is here. We have heard a great deal from the other Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister about the virtues of Section 50 of the Civil Service Act. The Minister of Justice, who I am sure is no expert on trade unionists and their rights, also talked about section 50.

Section 50 of the Civil Service Act reads as follows:

(1) The tenure of office of an employee is during the pleasure of Her Majesty, subject to the provisions of this and any other Act and the regulations thereunder, and, unless some other period of employment is specified, for an indeterminate period.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to limit or affect the right or power of the Governor in Council to remove or dismiss any employee.

It was under this section and the sections of the Public Service Superannuation Act that Mr. Spencer was dismissed and his right to a pension taken away. We are now into 1966 and for more than two years the government has been promising to bring in legislation to guarantee to employees of the government the same right to belong to a union and to bargain collectively as now enjoyed by employees working for private industry.

I would ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who before he came to the house was a militant, aggressive trade union leader, to comment on what in these circumstances is left of collective bargaining rights. What is left of the right of employees to belong to a union if the government or any other employer has the right under a section in an act to dismiss an employee without cause or reason, with justification only to itself? I suggest this is completely contrary to the basic right of Canadian workers to belong to a trade union.

This is the government that has promised civil servants collective bargaining rights. I suggest that the pension rights of an employee are in effect a deferred wage payment. No government, private employer or anybody else has the moral right, even though there is such a right under legislation, to take away from an employee pension rights which he has built up over many years. I should like to hear from the Parliamentary Secretary, who I know has acted in negotiations for many trade unions, what he thinks about this position taken by the government. I should also like to hear from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Three officers of the Postal Workers Union today addressed a letter to the Prime Minister, copies of which went to the leaders of the other parties. I should like to place on record what they said. The sent me a copy because they know of my interest in this matter.

Mr. Matheson: What is the date of the letter?

Mr. Orlikow: It is dated today and is addressed to the Prime Minister. It reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

The National Executive Committee of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, at a meeting on January 28th, 1966, endorsed the following resolution:

"BE IT RESOLVED that this National Executive of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers goes on record as demanding the removal of Section 50 of the Civil Service Act on the grounds that it is totalitarian in concept."

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister said on Friday that he thought this was a pretty good Act. This is what the union concerned in this matter thinks of it.

Mr. Trudeau: Did you vote against it?

Mr. Orlikow: I was not here at the time and I would not have voted for it; nor would the hon. member before he tasted the fleshpots of victory. The letter continues:

The event prompting the adoption of the above resolution was the summary dismissal from the service of Mr. G. Victor Spencer for alleged spying activities. Invoking Section 50 of the Civil Service Act denied Mr. Spencer the right of appeal. It is our conviction that a breach of civil liberties was committed by denying an employee the right of an appeal.

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers is convinced that a second breach of rights occurred when Mr. Spencer was denied pension rights under the Public Service Superannuation Act. In the absence of proof of misconduct, an employee must have full rights to benefits of the Act.

We therefore request that you implement a judicial inquiry to either prove innocence or guilt of Mr. Spencer so that all federal civil servants can be confident that their civil liberties and rights under the Civil Service Act and Public Service Superannuation Act cannot be arbitrarily denied without appeal. We therefore request that your office take immediate steps to remove Section 50 from the Civil Service Act and allay the fears of our members.

That is signed by W. Kay, national president, R. Otto, executive vice president and J. E. J. G. Simard, general secretary treasurer.

Mr. Trudeau: Hear, hear.

Mr. Orlikow: It is nice to hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister applauding, but he is trying to sit on both sides of the fence. He should not be applauding but doing something practical about this matter. He should take the question up with his leader, the Prime Minister. This issue cannot be—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Orlikow: Certainly.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I should like to ask the hon. member whether this is a letter which was sent by Mr. Kay himself or was it sent with the consent of his executive committee?

Mr. Lewis: It was a resolution which was passed.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Yes, there was a resolution passed but I have here a press release which appeared in the Ottawa Journal stating that the union president, William Kay, said that "Spencer's firing was discussed at a union executive meeting this week and no executive action was recommended". That report was dated February 11, 1966.

Mr. Orlikow: The resolution was passed at a meeting on January 28, 1966.

Mr. Lessard: What hour?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, from the trained seals on the other side we get the kind of stupid remark which we have just heard from my hon. friend, who asked "what hour?". That is how seriously he takes this question. I suggest to members on the government side of the house that if they enter into collective bargaining with the degree of seriousness they have indicated in the Spencer case, with a lack of interest in the rights of employees to express opinions, to have their say and to make their defence whenever they think they have the right to do so, then the postal strike which we saw some months ago will look like a pink tea party before we have gone very far. I say this because you cannot grant collective bargaining with one hand and then take it away with the other hand as the government has done in this case.

I will be very happy to sit down, Mr. Chairman, if the Parliamentary Secretary and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration will tell the committee what they feel about what I and the postal workers consider to be very serious violations of the normal procedures followed between any employer and his employees when there is good faith present. Of course, I have not had the opportunity, and probably never will, to be appointed to the Privy Council so I do not have that club spirit which the Minister of Justice tried to create between himself and the Leader of the Official Opposition.

I am not trying to run down the R.C.M.P. and it is not my intention to debate how effective the R.C.M.P. has been. The force is made up of human beings and they have made mistakes.

I should like to remind the house of the case of one Mr. Petersen who, I presume on the basis of reports made by the R.C.M.P., was refused re-enlistment in the navy. Why? Because his uncle was supposed to be a member of the Communist party. Yet it was found out later that the person who was a member of the Communist party was not related to the man who was drummed out of the navy. The R.C.M.P. can make mistakes. The Civil Service Commission can make mistakes. The Prime Minister can make mistakes, except in the eyes of members on the other side of the house.

What is required is that the public should feel that the rights of every citizen will be protected. This has not been done in the case we are considering. I came to this parliament in 1962 with an image of the Prime Minister as one who was an intellectual, a liberal with a small "l", a decent person who would try to do the right thing.

An hon. Member: He still is.

Mr. Orlikow: An hon. member over there says "He still is". That is his opinion. In my opinion the Prime Minister has become the spokesman for the establishment, that little group of ministers and others of whom the Minister of Transport is such a good example, that group of senior civil servants, including probably the commissioner and the assistant commissioner of the R.C.M.P., who think they know everything and have the right to decide everything.

Like Moses when he brought down the ten commandments from on high, they thing no one has the right to question them and that the rest of the people of Canada, the peasants, should keep quiet and accept without question what is decided. I have said enough to indicate that the public are not satisfied. The Liberal newspapers are not satisfied. The trade unions are not satisfied.

Mr. Trudeau: But Mr. Spencer is satisfied.

Mr. Orlikow: The Parliamentary Secretary came to this house because he wanted to explain the legitimate aspirations of Quebec to the rest of Canada and the legitimate aspirations of English Canada to Quebec. If there is one thing which has been noticeable since he came here it is the fact that he has been silent. He has yet to my knowledge to say a single word in this house.

An hon. Member: He is wise.

Mr. Orlikow: I hope I have said enough to bring him to his feet. I should like to see him defend the government on the Spencer case. I should like to see him associate himself with the Prime Minister and the government in this matter because the day he does he will demonstrate conclusively and publicly to the many friends he had in all parties that the principles for which he spoke and wrote so eloquently for so many years have gone down the drain, that he is just another Liberal politician who will do or say nothing which might hinder his rise or his appointment to the cabinet.

Mr. Matheson: May I direct a question to the hon. member—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I recognize the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

[Translation]

Does the minister want to ask a question?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, since the hon. member put several questions to me in the course of his remarks, I should like to have the opportunity to answer him. This is simply an intervention because several questions have been put to me.

In the course of his remarks, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) attempted to bring out inconsistencies with our past. I simply want to try and give an explanation. The hon. member surely referred to a real problem when he mentioned the conciliation of a collective labour agreement with section 50 of the Civil Service Act.

This raises a fundamental problem and I think hon. members will have the opportunity to discuss it when the legislation is brought before the house. At that time, I think we shall be able to discuss the matter irrespective of the Spencer case.

There is no doubt that section 50 may, in certain circumstances, deprive civil servants of rights normally theirs under a collective labour agreement.

Another angle will require consideration. It is the procedure followed by the R.C.M.P. In such cases, it is hardly different from the procedure of the Intelligence Service in England, under a labour government, of the F.B.I. in the United States, under a democratic government. That is police procedure and it is not and cannot be democratic from the start. All this has to be conciliated and I think it is a problem. If the problem is raised—and I can state that we are just as aware of it as all hon. members opposite—we shall see how it can be solved.

As for the Spencer case, and this holds true within labour unions as it is here—I think it all comes back to the comments made by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau)—there is one basic thing in the labour field: he who has a grievance must state it and he who has a claim must seek the right to have his claim heard, which is not the case for Mr. Spencer.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: I have a question for the minister: the minister says that he who has a grievance must express it. How could Mr. Spencer express a grievance after he had been dismissed under a section of the act which does not permit of any discussion? He was dismissed and his pension rights were taken away. How could he ask his union to act for him even if he wanted to? I do not know whether or not he wanted to. But how could he make an application under a section which does not permit him the right of appeal?

Mr. Lewis: Perhaps I might be allowed to ask the minister a similar question though I may phrase it somewhat differently. Is the minister suggesting, first, that an employee must present a grievance even if there is no grievance procedure provided for him to follow? This is the case here, because Spencer had no right of appeal and he therefore had no grievance appeal procedure. Or is he suggesting that if there is a breach of a collective agreement and the employee concerned does not pursue it the matter should be ignored by the union as well despite the fact that the breach is of importance to all others who are subject to the agreement?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Chairman, when one wants to discuss a case in theory, when one knows that there is no collective agreement at this time between civil servants and the government, I suggest that one must not reason as if there were a collective agreement. There is none.

Mr. Lewis: There is only section 50.

Mr. Marchand: I repeat, there is no collective agreement; therefore, there is no grievance procedure.

I simply say that he did not present his request as he should; there is no question of a collective agreement, for this does not exist. When there is one—and perhaps it is neither for the hon. members of the opposition nor for those on the government side to decide whether the civil servants want a collective agreement—I think civil servants will handle that matter and it is up to them to settle this problem.

If you insist upon a collective agreement, I should think that we would agree to give it to them. But until they get such an agreement, you cannot berate us for the fact that there is no grievance procedure.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Then why did the minister refer to amendments? May I ask the minister another question?

The Deputy Chairman: There have been certain exchanges of opinion about this matter. If the hon. member wishes to contribute further to the debate he will have an opportunity to do so later.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, the estimates of the Department of Justice have been before the house for the past few days now and I should like to take this opportunity to make a few observations to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Cardin). I shall only deal briefly with the Spencer case.

I submit that the house wasted a lot of time—I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) who spoke a minute ago is not in his seat—concerning an oppressed individual who did not personally complain about anything. This is the fantastic part of it, which struck the imagination of the public.

I was in the marvellous Sherbrooke riding over the week-end and I talked about this to various people I met. No matter how some hon. members may try to twist the matter around, the plain folk cannot get over the fact that the Canadian involved has not himself voiced any complaint.

Are they not trying to indulge in partisanship or petty politics over the rights of an individual?

An hon. Member: That's right.

Mr. Allard: Well, Mr. Chairman, since the 23rd of last February, until now, I have carefully followed the discussions on the estimates of the Justice Department and I have tried to discover the complaints of this Canadian in all the interventions of the hon. members. Not one gave complaints coming directly from this individual.

As the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) said earlier, certain federal laws should be amended in order to establish the machinery of collective agreements; I believe all members agree.

However, that is not the problem. The fact is that we have wasted many hours on the estimates of a very important department.

In his opening speech, the minister listed the various matters which come under his department. In any case, on page 182 of the blue book now before us, the two main categories of matters under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice are plainly indicated:

1. Legal and other services; 2. Correctional services.

The department was created by special legislation in 1868 and, as the minister pointed out clearly, it has taken up many additional responsibilities since then.

Today, the duties of the Department of Justice cover a wide field. The minister mentioned among other things that he acts as the chief legal officer of the crown, that he must look after the combines investigations, the supervision of bankruptcy trustees, the penitentiaries service, the national parole board, the fight against organized crime, the problems raised by juvenile delinquency, correctional services in general, penal reform, court proceedings, law reform and constitutional matters.

That is a very important department, Mr. Chairman.

The Minister told us at some length about his intention of sharing his various responsibilities with the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Favreau).

I understand that the minister's remarks are preliminary but I am not convinced yet that this division has become necessary. I suppose the minister will have an opportunity to come back and explain to the house the need to divide those important responsibilities between three ministers.

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), with his well-known experience, suggested that all those responsibilities be left in the hands of one minister and that the administrative jurisdiction be divided between three deputy ministers, that is for administration, application and enforcement of legislation.

That is a very captivating subject with regard to the efficient administration of justice in this country and the future of the department.

I think the minister should take some time when we have completed consideration of item 1 to better explain his idea and show the need to divide between three ministers the various sections of his department. He still has to convince us that this is necessary.

Up to now, I feel that the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamloops is much more unified and co-ordinated, that is a single minister with three deputy ministers to co-ordinate the various activities in order to supply an element of efficiency and order, as well as co-ordination, in that very important department with social, judicial and constitutional ramifications in the whole country.

The minister spoke at length about administrative problems but, in the present circumstances and following all the crimes brought to light and the inquiries asked for, I would have liked him to explain the principles of his department's philosophy.

On what basis, on what ideas, on what philosophic concepts do the minister and his officials see the adoption of those laws, their enforcement, the reform of new laws, the maintenance of law and order in the country, in this year 1966.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the Department of Justice must anticipate, watch over, correct and serve justice.

[Translation]

The department must be extremely firm, objective and vigilant. Emanating as it does from that particular department, that justice cannot look with passivity, with listlessness upon the people's moral unrest and their behaviour. That justice must reflect the conscience of the best citizens, even if they are the minority, and it must at all times reflect a strict adherence to order, equality, authority and balance.

Its role is not limited solely to reprimanding; it must entice the citizens to reflection, to action and to regulation of their activities.

The justice which emanates from the Department of Justice must not be a time bomb nor a trap; it must be visible, ever-present, because justice, Mr. Chairman, commands respect.

It must not be sullied by insinuations, or used to political ends. Whoever he may be, every citizen must help justice. If there are members here in this house, regardless of their party affiliations, you know—

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock, in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business pursuant to standing order 15(3) it is my duty to leave the chair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), The Canadian Economy—suggested step to provide guaranteed annual income; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), Labour Conditions—reported statement respecting retirement age in industry; the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. Johnston), Farm Machinery—increased profits by Massey-Ferguson Company.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INHABITED AREAS—SUGGESTED PROVISION IN CONTRACTS FOR SIDEWALK CONSTRUCTION

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the advisability of inserting in every contract made under the authority of the Trans-Canada Highway Act, a clause to the effect that sidewalks or pedestrian paths be constructed along such highways passing through inhabited areas, so as to assure the protection of life and that the same principle should apply to existing trans-Canada highways.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today is one whose implementation I have considered over a period of years to be necessary to enable the completion of a highway system where the drivers of cars can proceed along the highway assured that no pedestrian or bicyclist will be a worry to them by occupying space on the route in close proximity to the traffic lanes and also to give the pedestrian the security he needs when walking along the highway. In this case I am addressing myself strictly to highways in Canada where the national government has an obligation in respect of the construction because of the grants or subsidies made available to help a province complete a highway within its borders and linking with highways of other neighbouring provinces and also because of the fact that the specifications for such construction are written by the national government.

In this sense this motion has reference only to the trans-Canada Highway. This highway is being completed across this country and although the largest percentage of it is built in areas far enough removed from the populated regions that it causes no worry to drivers and pedestrians because of the limited access roads to the highway and because of the fact that secondary roads provide the means for local traffic, yet there are areas in the country where the highway is being constructed or has been built and passes in close proximity to sparsely populated areas on the outskirts of more densely populated areas, and this warrants some protection for the bicyclist and the pedestrian.

Naturally I do not pretend to know the exact location of the trans-Canada highway throughout the country but I am sure the highway passes through areas where people live in close proximity to the highway and often have the necessity of visiting their neighbours. Very often this is done on foot. These are the areas which concern me, and I would hope that the government, when drawing up their specifications for acceptance by the provinces, would give serious consideration to having a clause inserted so that pedestrian paths or sidewalks will be an integral part of the contract.

I can think of some areas in the province of Quebec where this situation could well exist when the trans-Canada highway is completed, for example, from Levis and Rivière du Loup to Edmundston, where the present main artery will become a secondary road after the completion of the trans-Canada highway. As you often see when a new highway is built, the traffic pattern shifts to the new highway and in the inhabited areas communication with neighbours generally is done on foot by children visiting their friends or older persons keeping in contact with their neighbours.

I have admitted that this condition possibly is not general across the country, but in Quebec and other parts of eastern Canada where the farms normally are very narrow and consequently the residences are in close proximity, there is more communication on foot between neighbours than there is by transportation in vehicles.

What additional cost would this entail per mile of highway? Two alternatives can be considered. In the areas where these paths are required it could be done either by widening the shoulders of the highway by an extra six feet on each side and paving that section, which could be delineated by a solid line making it evident that this space is reserved for pedestrians and bicyclists, or you could construct the sidewalk along the limit line of the right of way. It is estimated this would cost in the vicinity of $15,000 or $18,000 per mile. What a small price to pay for the protection of life when we consider that in Canada, as shown by Dominion Bureau of Statistics report, catalogue No. 53206, motor vehicle traffic accidents, there were in Canada 1,132 pedestrians killed in 1963 and 1,195 killed in 1964 along the highway. The numbers in respect of bicyclists are 131 in 1963 and 116 in 1964. For motorcyclists and passengers the figures are 25 and 34.

When you consider that in the province of Quebec in this same period there were 488 pedestrians killed along the highway and in the following year 422—

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He has given figures in respect of casualties on the highways. Is the house to understand that these are casualties which occurred along the trans-Canada highway or on highways in general?

Mr. Keays: Mr. Speaker, I am bringing forward these figures in an endeavour to show that on the highways of Canada many pedestrians are being killed, and in the areas which I believe warrant sidewalks we know that accidents happen. In the rural areas —naturally the highways pass through the rural areas of Canada—we have figures which prove that for the same period in those areas alone there were 304 pedestrians killed in Canada as well as 39 bicyclists and 4 persons on motorcycles.

How do some of these accidents occur? There were 36 fatal accidents involving children playing on the roadway, 108 involving persons walking on rural highways, and others by reason of other causes. For the first nine months of 1965 the total figure for pedestrian fatalities in Canada is 858, of which 328 were in the province of Quebec and 259 in the province of Ontario.

• (6:10 p.m.)

May I also say that the statistics have not been reported for some areas such as the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Non-fatal injuries to pedestrians in the same year, 1965, without Quebec and Manitoba reporting and including statistics for only six months in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, amonuted to 8,423. These figures are rather alarming and, as I have suggested, if by the construction of sidewalks in certain inhabited or sparsely inhabited areas on the fringes of towns and cities we could save one life, the cost would be negligible.

The Canadian Automobile Association is conducting a pedestrian safety program to protect the lives of those who walk along the streets or highways. That association should be highly commended in this regard. Perhaps it would be possible where these highways pass through inhabited areas for the space necessary for the construction of paths to be provided by the two levels of government, provincial and federal. In these areas the responsibility for the construction of the pedestrian paths is now that of the municipalities. Perhaps this could be done when the rights of way for these paths are being fixed or defined.

Perhaps the municipalities could build these paths under the winter works program but I doubt that unless the law in this regard is amended. I believe it states that no government grant can be considered for a winter works project where the government has already provided funds for construction. If this cannot be done there are two alternatives, the insertion of a clause in the trans-Canada highway specifications providing for paths as an integral part of trans-Canada highway contracts or outright grants to municipalities to build these paths along the trans-Canada highway where that highway passes in close proximity to heavily or sparsely inhabited areas.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the motion now before the house has strong implications for the future of the trans-Canada highway. I understand the appealing reasons that persuaded the hon. member to move this motion. Consequently, I hope he will forgive me for saying immediately that it seems to me that to pass this motion when it is considered in the context of the developing concept of a highway across Canada would be to take a backward step and would even increase the dangers to which he referred so eloquently.

The Trans-Canada Highway Act was passed 16 years ago in 1949, but the idea of a road from east to west, from Atlantic to Pacific, is much older than that. That idea goes back at least as far as the introduction to Canada of the motorcar. At the turn of the century Sir Wilfrid Laurier was talking about building, as he said: " . . . roads across this Dominion so that the peoples of the East mingling with those of the West might together become one indivisible nation."

When the Canada Highway Association was formed in 1910 one of its main objectives was the construction of a highway from one ocean to the other. At its first convention, Mr. A. E. Todd—

[Mr. Keays.]

Mr. Grafftey: What has this got to do with the debate? Throw away your prepared speech.

Mr. Stewart: May I say to the hon. member who just intervened from his seat that my purpose is quite clear and would be clear to him—

Mr. Grafftey: I have never listened to such bunkum before.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. If the hon. member wishes to participate in the debate he will have an opportunity in due time to do so. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Words now has the floor.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, it is clear why the hon. gentleman does not understand the line of argument I intend to develop. I have not yet developed it. When I have developed it he may then understand what I have in mind.

An hon. Member: Let us hope so.

Mr. Stewart: It is quite possible he may not understand it even then, of course. At the first meeting of that association Mr. Todd presented a gold medal which was to be given by the association to the first person who travelled across Canada from coast to coast entirely by motorcar. It is notable that the medal went unawarded for 35 years. Only 20 years ago, in 1946, was the medal awarded to a gentleman who travelled from Louisburg in Nova Scotia to Victoria in British Columbia.

Mr. Grafftey: More bunkum.

Mr. Stewart: During the period after world war I—

Mr. Grafftey: Pure bunkum.

Mr. Stewart:—when there was a great expansion in motor vehicle registration in Canada, the demand for long distance highways was not great but there was a demand for the construction of local roads and inter-regional roads within provinces. The responsibility for the construction of these roads was primarily laid upon the municipalities. Provincial governments intervened. Recognizing the needs of the time, they intervened upon the independence of the municipalities with a program of provincial grants; and the result in most provinces was the development of a trunk highway system directly under provincial jurisdiction.

The parliament of Canada saw the value of these roads to Canada at large in that there were interprovincial connections and made grants to the provinces between 1919 and 1928 under the terms of the Canada Highway Act. In the 1930's grants for highways were continued under the statutes providing for unemployment relief. By the year 1939, the year in which the second world war broke out, both motor vehicles and highway construction techniques had come a long way so that short distance and medium distance trucking was presenting a very serious challenge to the railways as a means of national transportation, especially in central Canada. Yet it was not until after the second world war that parliament gave direct and explicit recognition to the need for a trans-Canada highway. In 1949 parliament took legislative action toward realizing the economic and political advantages of such a major highway from one extremity of the country to the other.

Mr. Grafftey: Sheer bunkum.

Mr. Stewart: The emphasis of federal assistance now shifted away from highway improvements in the provinces, with all the appurtenances that would be suitable to highways within provinces, to the construction of a great national highway.

Since 1949, when the Trans-Canada Highway Act was passed, the target date for the completion of the highway has been pushed forward again and again. The original target date was December 9, 1956, and the present target date is some time in 1970. Of course, the amount of money that the federal government was to contribute to this highway project has been increased again and again.

• (6:20 p.m.)

This change in the target date for the completion of the highway and the increases in the amount of federal contribution have had what some would argue is a beneficial effect upon the trans-Canada highway, because during those years the nature of the traffic was changing and construction techniques were advancing very rapidly. Moreover, the kind of equipment available to contractors was improving. There were, of course, reasons other than the shortage of money in some of the provinces for the highway not going ahead. Some of the provinces started off with comparatively backward provincial highway systems and the trans-Canada highway was intruded into a highway system which was costly even without the added expense to the province of the trans-Canada highway. We know that it was not until 1960 that the province of Quebec joined this national undertaking. During the 1930's—

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Keays) put a very serious question before the house. We have figures that tell us that between now and 1970, if nothing is done, one million Canadians will be injured—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that by now the hon. member would—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat.

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Would the hon. member state his point of order and not—

Mr. Grafftey: My point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Would the hon. member resume his seat. The hon. member is raising a point of order?

Mr. Grafftey: Very definitely.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Would the hon. member state his point of order without getting into an argument with the hon. member who has the floor?

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, it is incredible to me that with regard to the problem of highway safety per se, introduced sincerely by the hon. member for Gaspé and a question on which many members of all parties wish to speak, the hon. member who now has the floor should have been allowed such latitude. I fail to see how his remarks have been germane to the debate and it is incredible to me that he was not brought to order long ago.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): I thank the hon. member for his remarks. However, as hon. members know, the problem of traffic safety has a great many facets. If the hon. member wishes to participate in the debate he will be able to do so later.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I should like to press my point of order. We are not having a debate. The hon. member is reading to us documentation that has been put in his hands.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Grafftey: This increases the cynicism of the public toward parliament. It is a disgrace.

Mr. Stewart: During the 1930's at a time when the government of Canada was giving assistance to highway construction through "make work" programs and for a period after the second world war, many so-called "major" highways were built, not only to serve vehicles but also to service the immediately adjacent land. Generally these roads were located so as to pass through the central part of each town or city. Consequently, what has come to be called "strip development" occurred on each side of these highways, particularly those adjacent to urban areas or to what the hon member for Gaspé has called "settled areas".

As vehicular traffic and strip development increased, these roads became overcongested and no longer had the capacity to move traffic in sufficient volumes or at adequate speeds. As this happened, new roads were required. These were built away from the older highways and in many cases they bypassed urban centres and the strip development areas. These new highways are what are called arterials or freeways. On these highways traffic movement is the primary consideration, with local access a secondary consideration. Building development along the arterials is either prohibited or discouraged.

In the case of freeways passing through built-up areas and arterials passing through areas where land access to the road is required, service roads parallelling the main route are now often provided. The older highways, those with the strip development, have reverted to the status of what are now known as local or collector highways.

I am saying that the thinking of the hon. member for Gaspé focuses on these local or collector highways and not on what is called an arterial. I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the trans-Canada highway can now be classified as an arterial.

Mr. Keays: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a correction here. I was not referring to urban areas. I referred to rural areas and arterial roads to which the hon. member has referred, those roads which are built to pass through sparsely populated areas.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Stewart: The notion of an arterial road is that there should not be any secondary traffic on the right of way. That is inherent in the very nature of an arterial road. On these arterials vehicular traffic movement is of primary concern and access by people owning property or living immediately adjacent to the road is definitely secondary. Through or around heavily urbanized areas and in many rural areas where the traffic is heavy—

Mr. Grafftey: Tell this to the bereaved families.

Mr. Stewart: —the trans-Canada highway is designed to freeway standards with no access to adjacent land except at regularly spaced interchanges. We have illustrations such as the Ottawa Queensway, the Winnipeg by-pass and the trans-Canada highway through the city of Montreal. I could illustrate this by reading to the hon. member a description of the Ottawa Queensway.

Mr. Keays: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my motion refers to rural areas and this is the problem on which I should like an answer. I am not interested in urban areas, because they have limited access to the arterials of which the hon. member spoke. I am interested in rural areas and highways on the fringe of small towns.

Mr. Stewart: The trans-Canada highway is not yet completed in many of the provinces, for example, Nova Scotia, Quebec and Ontario. Where the trans-Canada highway does pass near or through these settled areas, even though they are not incorporated towns or cities, what I am saying applies, namely, that this is a limited access highway and secondary traffic on the roadway or on the shoulders is not expected and indeed may very well be prohibited.

Therefore my argument concerning an area such as the city of Ottawa is equally apt for one of these "settled areas". It is true that there are areas wherein the trans-Canada highway was built before this arterial concept came to be fully developed. Part of the hon. member's motion would apply to such reaches of highway; this is quite true. But surely the thing to do in those areas is to provide secondary roads with adequate pedestrian paths and sidewalks and gradually to eliminate this kind of secondary traffic on the shoulders where there is no adequate protection.

The hon. gentleman said he would allow pedestrians and bicyclists to move along on the paved shoulders. I wish to submit to him through you, Mr. Speaker, that this is really inviting the kind of danger that I am sure he wants to avoid. Here you have automobiles moving at a target speed of 60 miles per hour, and that may very well be the low point in the bracket rather than the high. Some of these automobiles will get over onto the shoulder. If you have children playing there, as children will if they are allowed there at all, and cyclists moving along there, they are going to be hit by these vehicles.

I think the hon. gentleman will have to face up to the fact that you cannot have an arterial highway and at the same time allow children to walk and play on the shoulder of that road, even if you do draw a white line down the edge of that road. You cannot have bicycles careening around there as the hon. member and I careened around on our bicycles. You cannot have that condition without inviting tragedy; and tragedy is precisely the sort of thing that must be avoided. You know, Mr. Speaker, there are members other than the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) who are concerned for the safety of the people of this country.

What I am arguing is that the hon. member has a very good motive but that the method he suggests for accomplishing it is one which might frustrate the purpose of the trans-Canada highway as it has developed over the years and which at the same time might frustrate the purpose set forth by the hon. member.

At the risk of being harangued by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi for being out of order, I want to suggest another problem that I feel is quite serious. I refer to the question of the constitutionality of the procedure that is being recommended. We must proceed within the context of the constitutional law as it now is. It may very well be that some alterations ought to be made in that constitutional law, but that is another question. We have to deal with the law as it now is. I am sure any gentleman learned in the law would insist that that is the realistic approach, at least in this debate.

You will notice, sir, that the motion would have the government take the initiative in introducing the requirement for sidewalks or pedestrian paths to be constructed alongside the trans-Canada highway where that highway passes through inhabited or built-up areas. I want to suggest to you, sir, that it is doubtful that this house has the constitutional right to prompt such an initiative. Transportation within a province is the responsibility of the provincial government, and it is exercised either directly or by delegation to incorporated towns, cities or other municipalities.

I am quite ready to contend that the trans-Canada highway as a whole is hardly a local work or undertaking, but it is notable that in the building of the highway proper the work of planning and construction has been left to the several provinces. It would strain credulity to the utmost to contend that sidewalk or pedestrian paths appropriately could be declared by this parliament to be works for the general advantage of Canada and thus fall into the category suggested by subsection 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Can he tell us what the federal government's contribution was to the trans-Canada highway? I think it is a shared cost basis. Just what proportion does this parliament pay?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can give some figures on that. As of February 25, 1966, the estimated value of the approved work was $992,418,300 and the share of the federal government of that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): May I remind the hon. member that in giving the amounts subscribed by the federal government or provincial governments he is straying from the main debate?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think that is quite right. I was just trying to respond to the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Reid: I do not think that is correct at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Stewart: Probably the contention was going to be, Your Honour, that this was a demand for more money from Ottawa for several provinces. Back in 1949, sir, when the Trans-Canada Highway Act was—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Keays: May I ask a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Does the house give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Gaspé to ask a question of the Parliamentary Secretary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Keays: I have been on an historic trip from the horse and buggy days to the day of the motor vehicle. I should like to ask the hon. member if he believes that the construction of pedestrian paths or sidewalks alongside the trans-Canada highway would be a retrograde measure? It seems to me that this was the inference he left. Does he consider that the safety of people, the safety of children, is a retrograde measure?

Mr. Stewart: I am glad to answer that question. If we are going to have a trans-Canada highway which is an arterial highway then the governments of the provinces, possibly with the assistance of the federal government, should be interested enough in the safety of the people of Canada to provide money for adequate alternative roads and highways to keep children and bicyclists off these arterial highways.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I join with the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Keays) in his desire to have a safe highway for people who may use the highway, but I have to agree with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) that an arterial highway is no place for people to be walking. I say that because in Alberta we have had some problems with development that has taken place along the edges of the trans-Canada highway since it was built. This development has almost destroyed the purpose for which the trans-Canada highway was built. In other words, if our concept of this highway was correct in the first instance, it was to be a high speed arterial highway along which motor vehicles could travel at near maximum highway speeds without having to slow down for small towns, villages or even cities. At the same time motor vehicles would be able to maintain this speed without endangering the life of anyone.

The notice of motion is somewhat ambiguous in that it calls for these walks or pedestrian paths to be constructed through inhabited areas. Does this mean inhabited areas such as hamlets, villages, towns and so on? Does it include going through the suburbs of certain cities? I know the hon. member for Gaspé suggested that was not what he had in mind because there was some control of pedestrians in those areas through limited access and so on. The hon. member indicated he was more concerned about the somewhat less inhabited or sparsely inhabited areas throughout the countryside.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret).]

I cannot agree that there should be any provision for pedestrian traffic alongside a high speed highway. The Trans-Canada Highway Act probably should have contained a provision that all other traffic, whether inter-city motor vehicle traffic or pedestrian traffic, should be completely removed from the trans-Canada highway. You do either one of two things; you either have a high speed arterial highway or you defeat the purpose of such a highway by creating serious hazards to life and limb to those people who are going on and off the highway. So I suggest that there really is not a valid case to be made for constructing pedestrian paths along the side of this highway.

That is one matter, Mr. Speaker. There is another great problem which also relates to amending the Trans-Canada Highway Act. Once the initial grant was made the federal government completely withdrew from any further participation in construction of the trans-Canada highway. The reason I say this is that, as the parliamentary secretary said, the completion date of the trans-Canada highway has been pushed forward. The percentage of federal participation has increased in many areas with the pushing forward of the completion date. The hon. member also suggested that the nature of the traffic using this highway is changing and therefore that would justify making some changes in the former arrangement.

This may apply to some provinces but it certainly has not applied to Alberta. Nor does it apply to any other province which has completed its section of the trans-Canada highway. Therefore I believe this suggestion is a fallacy. The original concept of the trans-Canada highway was to construct at least one major high speed arterial highway from one coast of Canada to the other. Surely we, as the federal parliament of the country, cannot now accept that specifications laid down in 1949, 1950, or whenever it was, are adequate for traffic needs in 1966.

One case in point is the inadequacy of the trans-Canada highway between Calgary and Banff. It was built as a two lane highway. Traffic has increased to such an extent that that 80-mile section now requires four lanes of traffic for the safety of the people using it.

Surely it is almost rank discrimination for the federal government to withdraw from the responsibility of maintaining a modern highway from one coast to the other in keeping with changing conditions in Canada. The Parliamentary Secretary knows very well that for the last two or three years the federal government has adamantly refused to participate, even on a fifty-fifty basis, in the modernization of sections of the highway which require modification to keep abreast of the standards required for present day needs.

I think this is the great inadequacy of the Trans-Canada Highway Act. It is not good enough for the federal government to make a one-shot contribution and then completely withdraw. This is not the case in areas where the highway is incomplete at the present time. The date has been moved forward and the federal government has increased participation to the extent of as much as 90 per cent of the cost of the most expensive sections. Yet those provinces with the initiative to build the highway quickly and which tried to meet the original completion date are penalized to the extent that, first of all, they get only 50 per cent of the cost and, second, they pay 100 per cent of the cost of future modernization, there being no federal contribution whatever. I think this is a violation perhaps not of the Trans-Canada Highway Act but certainly of the concept that there should be at least one modern high-speed highway from one coast to the other.

Whenever a province pleads with the federal government that what was good enough in the early fifties is not good enough now, that province is not listened to. They receive no consideration regarding maintenance of the highway, although that is understood, but they are even refused consideration of federal government participation in modifications to bring the highway up to the requirements of today. Surely the Parliamentary Secretary will realize that there are certain sections of Canada today which now require modern four lane highways if the safety factor necessary when taking into account traffic flow is going to be maintained.

Therefore I cannot honestly support the idea that there should be provision along these highways for pedestrian paths, because I do not think this is what the trans-Canada highway should have. However, I certainly think that the federal government has a responsibility to continue to particicpate in keeping this national arterial highway up to date.

The Parliamentary Secretary advanced the argument that there is some kind of constitutional problem over the federal government setting down specifications for this highway. Well, Mr. Speaker, whether or not two wrongs make a right I do not know but there is certainly a precedent here. The financial contribution of the federal government was contingent upon certain specifications being met. Therefore that precedent completely destroys the argument that there is a constitutional problem about the federal government suggesting in this case that certain specifications should be met.

Mr. Stewart: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does the hon. gentleman realize that in this instance, unlike the situation that prevailed between 1945 and 1949, no municipality or incorporated town or city and no province on its own behalf has come forward asking for pedestrian paths? That was not true with regard to the original construction of the highway.

Mr. Olson: If the Parliamentary Secretary says that is true and that they did not ask for pedestrian paths, then I accept it. But I suggest that that does not aid his argument that there is a constitutional question. If it was originally proper for the financial contribution of the federal government to be contingent upon specifications regarding the width of the road, the compaction and all the other things that go into the building of a road, then it must certainly be equally constitutionally proper, if that is the right word, for the federal government to include other specifications now if they so wish. Therefore I do not think it is a sound argument to say that the federal government would be violating some constitutional provision by including pedestrian paths or anything else in the specifications for the highway.

I know there are other members who want to speak but in closing may I say that I do not believe that the federal government is discharging its responsibility to fulfil the intention that there be at least one transcontinental arterial highway across Canada when it makes a one-shot payment and then withdraws from participating in any of the modifications and modernization which may be required to keep the highway up to the standards required in 1966.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for the very important initiative he has taken. The question of safety on our highways is one of compelling national urgency. I believe it is one too in which the dominion, as my hon. and learned friend mentioned has been the case before, must take the initiative. So what if the municipalities and provinces have not yet brought up this question? This is an opportunity for dominion initiative, as was the whole development of the trans-Canada highway. It goes way back to the days of Borden, though I do not want to run the risk of incurring the ire of my hon. friend by talking about what happened in those days.

I am impressed by the suggestion, somewhat negatively impressed, if I may say so, that the trans-Canada highway goes through remote areas where pedestrians should not be. There are certain ecological developments resulting in more and more people coming into the environs of the trans-Canada highway. In the province of Prince Edward Island this highway passes through the finest farms in the country and people are naturally moving closer to it.

• (6:50 p.m.)

It is essential to recognize that people other than those who are driving pell-mell out to Red Deer will be on that highway. We must think of those who use this highway for short trips. I believe the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Keays) has made an extremely important suggestion. Surely we have enough initiative to set out strips of these roads which would be of more practical use than mere portions over to the right. I believe the British have done good work in developing protective areas of this kind.

I wish I could speak at greater length on this subject because it is a compelling one. I hope the government will take note of this suggestion because it concerns a matter which is both urgent and important. I believe the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) is doing a wonderful thing in this country to dramatize the horrible statistics we are building up all over this nation. The role the federal government could play in a situation of national proportions cannot be too often underlined.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I was intrigued by the eloquence of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) in the latter part of his observations. I am not sure that they were germane to the resolution before us but I would be pleased to join with him on another occasion in calling for extended federal participation in a national highway program. I should like to say I thoroughly agree with the remarks he made at the outset of his speech, remarks which I believe are germane to the resolution. I am sure the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Keays) has the best of motives in putting this proposal before the house and I wish to thank him for turning our thoughts to this question. Since there is little time left to us I do not wish to make any prolonged comment on the subject but I should like to say that if the hon. member had put before the house a proposition which was the reverse of his present proposal, if he had suggested that there should be a clause in the specifications for the trans-Canada highway which would prohibit the construction of pedestrian walks or paths alongside that highway, I would be very happy indeed to support him in the interest of ensuring safety for both motorists and pedestrians.

I think this is the direction in which we must move. We must to ensure that pedestrians cannot get anywhere near this highway. The specifications should in fact provide for the construction of barriers or fences, for example, to make sure that pedestrians do not have access, thereby endangering their own lives and the lives of those who are travelling in motor vehicles.

Mr. Richard Cashin (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Keays) on bringing this matter to the attention of the house so that there can be some discussion of it but I must say I find the argument put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) much more germane than some hon. members would like to believe.

As to the constitutional question it seems to me there is a difference between bicyclists and pedestrians and other interprovincial traffic. I find this out of keeping with the remarks of the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) that we are not paying enough regard to the technicalities of the constitution. I do not believe the constitution would debar the federal government from doing something in this direction if the provinces and the municipalities were to make a request. I believe the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary regarding the development of the trans-Canada highway were sound, though I see the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) shaking his head.

In my opinion we are approaching this problem from the wrong direction. We should be concerned about the secondary roads in the provinces where there is more of the kind of traffic to which reference has been made. If this is a problem at all on the trans-Canada highway it is a much greater problem on the local roads. I think the provinces would be best advised to make arrangements for these local and secondary roads before turning their attention to the trans-Canada highway.

My concept of the trans-Canada highway is that it is not a road of the kind which would encourage pedestrian movement, cyclists and so on. It is true that because of local needs in certain rural areas in provinces such as Prince Edward Island the trans-Canada highway may perhaps cater to more local traffic than it does in provinces such as Alberta.

This brings me to an important point. It may be the weakness of many of our cost-sharing agreements with the provinces is that we seek to devise formulae which are applicable to all the provinces. I agree with the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) that pedestrian and other traffic may present a larger problem in his area than on the main arteries of Alberta. Perhaps we should recognize that this presents special difficulties for Prince Edward Island, and particular arrangements should therefore be made to deal with a situation which may not occur in other provinces such as Newfoundland, Alberta, British Columbia and so on.

Mr. Keays: I am sorry, there is no trans-Canada highway in our area but the federal government is building a highway in lieu of the railroad.

Mr. Cashin: That is an improvement on which I think the federal government should be congratulated. I am sure the hon. member will be a more effective representative as a result of this move by an enlightened government.

An hon. Member: You have just killed another pedestrian.

Mr. Cashin: There are comments from the other side. I agree with the principle of this motion but I think it is not the best way of dealing with the difficulty. We are not helping the area where the problem is greatest. Possibly the federal government in all its agreements with the provinces should pay more attention to local conditions. We do not have a trans-Canada highway in my constituency either. We do not have the same financial ability to build these highways as Alberta has. We should like to be able to enter into special agreements in respect of these roads just as the hon. member for Queens would like to ensure the safety of road users in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired. The house will revert to the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

• (7:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned the debate on justice estimates, at six o'clock, I was saying that the administration of justice deserves to be respected. It must not be sullied through insinuations nor used to political ends.

Every citizen, without exception, must help justice. If a member or members in this house know of crime or criminals in our ranks or in the ranks of provincial politicians, it is their bounden and pressing duty to denounce said crimes or criminals. Let them be denounced either openly here in the house or discreetly to the Minister of Justice. No member has the right, under the cover of his immunity or privileges, to tarnish our reputation as legislators and to sow in the mind of our population the seeds of doubt, contempt and derision.

If anyone has evidence, he should come forward and give it. Let there be no more scheming which, in some quarters, is developing into persecution or partisan contentment. Statements, either in the house or behind the scene, like "Liberals have seen nothing yet" or "Conservatives will also have a taste of it" or "Créditistes will fade away", should no longer be heard. If this is politics on a high level, then it is most depressing.

Mr. Chairman, the cards should be put on the table and wrongdoings, if any, laid bare, but for goodness' sake let there be no more negative cogitation and goading.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), whom I have heard speak in the house and whose speeches I have reread in Hansard, has developed a habit of making insinuations. They are probably well-founded—I do not know—but he is adopting the attitude of a citizen who is not trying to help the Department of Justice. If he knows the facts, the crimes, the criminals, let him expose them, and I shall be the first to support his charges. For instance, as reported on page 1814 of the official report, the hon. member for Yukon stated:

> Does the minister sit there and endeavour to suggest to me that the murder of Payette is not linked with fraudulent bankruptcies?

Mr. Chairman, is this not a far-reaching innuendo? He further said:

> I will deal with that matter when the minister has answered the questions that I have placed on the order paper.

The hon. member has put questions on the order paper which have not yet been answered. Those questions should be answered without delay, but since he has not yet obtained answers, I feel he is ill-advised to throw out, in the face of the Canadian people and of members of this house, innuendoes which reflect on the representatives of the people.

In view of previous events, among others, the Dorion report, the hon. member and other members were fully justified in demanding from the government an inquiry into this matter. The report not only indicated irregularities but implicated certain people. But today, if we are justified in asking and demanding an inquiry from the government and if the Minister of Justice does not seem to have such detailed information as some hon. members, I believe it is the duty of each of us to help justice and not hinder it, and to table the misdeeds some people are or would be accused of.

On the other hand, the minister should make up his mind to discharge his high responsibilities with firmness and dispatch. It is up to him to make the decisions and not always rely on civil servants. I hold the Minister of Justice in high esteem. To me, he is a most sympathetic member. But the minister seems prone to abstain from taking any initiative.

Some time ago, while asking a question in this house, I proposed the establishment of a constitutional court. The minister answered and commented on my question. Hon. members can read in this session's Hansard his statement to the effect that his officials have not decided yet on the advisability of convening the attorneys general of the various provinces to settle the matter. I suggest that this is not the democratic way of doing things. If it is not up to the people's representatives to decide but to civil servants or to bureaucracy, I feel we are heading for trouble.

I would ask the minister to take the initiative and give instructions to his officials in all matters concerning his department, and I know he can do it.

I support hon. members who requested an investigation on organized crime. In view of various happenings, and of all the insinuations we hear on all sides, the Canadian people have lost confidence in the administration of justice in this country. I am talking in particular about the average Canadian, about all our friends in each of our ridings, the people we know, the labourers, the farmers, and the white-collar worker who make up the majority of the people. In view of what has happened, in view of the insinuations which are increasing, people are worried. I say it frankly and without any political partisanship because, if there is a department where political partisanship must not exist, where political controversies must not be encouraged, it is the Department of Justice. We must go about it without prejudice, objectively.

I ask the minister to agree to the setting up of a national investigation on organized crime, something which was done in many countries. In the United States at the time of Kefauver, a very useful investigation informed not only the government but also the American people. In view of certain events, the government must agree to a national investigation. It must be made throughout the country. On the other hand, in view of the responsibilities entrusted to us as legislators, since we must pass the laws, I feel that the sittings should be held here in Parliament to enable us to question the witnesses which would be called.

I think the Canadian people would be in favour of such an initiative and that the government would have nothing to lose. On the contrary, it would increase in the minds of the people the importance and value of the Department of Justice. Numerous reports have informed us that crime has considerably increased in our country.

Some members gave statistics. Crime has increased by almost 10 per cent in Canada in 1964, as compared to the previous year, and by over 20 per cent compared to 1962. That is what the dominion bureau of statistics tells us. If you study the kinds of offenses, the picture becomes alarming, particularly with regard to serious offenses, those which put in danger the security of the citizen, his good faith, his desire to live in a free country, a nice country.

It is noted that capital murders increased from 148 in 1962 to 162 in 1964; that attempted murders increased from 83 in 1962 to 122 in 1964, while common assaults, except indecent assaults, reached 27,818 in 1962 and 40,460 in 1964. I could go on to about ten other fields and establish very easily, with the support of exact figures, that crime is increasing at a very fast pace and in an alarming way in Canada. There is no need to deal at length with the figures, because they are convincing and the situation is obvious.

The causes of this increased criminality should be investigated, the networks exposed and the underworld activities made known.

It is up to parliament, and especially to the government, to take the initiative and I think the government and the Department of Justice would thus greatly enhance their positions.

The Minister of Justice would surely increase his stature considerably if he remained aloof from the overly partisan attacks from the opposite side of the house and made a fine gesture, the gesture of a man aware of Canadian justice, and granted a national inquiry on criminality, its causes, its scope and on the remedial measures indicated, not only for juvenile delinquency but for all those groups of citizens. They are not numerous but rule in many areas that should be unmasked to improve the soundness and the decency of the whole country.

There is also within the Department of Justice the problem of police co-operation. We hear statements in the house to the effect that the R.C.M.P. is doing excellent work. I, for one, have no charge to bring against the R.C.M.P. and I am under the impression that it is a widely experienced police corps. But, the statements made by the Minister of Justice of Quebec are certainly not incongruous. For instance, he stated on January 14, 1966, that the R.C.M.P. refuse to provide the information requested by other police corps in the fight against organized crime. But that is a responsible man, the Quebec Minister of Justice. I am not ready to accept completely all his comments, but here is the statement of a responsible man which contradicts other statements made by the federal Minister of Justice and other members of the house.

I think that those controversies and disagreements should disappear in the interest of the administration of justice so that police forces throughout the country may co-operate more fully and exchange the information necessary for a joint and effective campaign against organized crime.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer briefly to fraudulent bankruptcies. To be quite frank, what we have been told in the Mercier report, which is a provincial report, or in statements made by other Canadians, in this house or elsewhere, is enough to make one's hair stand on end, even if one does not have much hair left. Looking across the country, it is especially in Ontario and Quebec that we find strongly organized networks and that we see numerous companies offhandedly sharing profits that should be distributed among honest people. Those are true facts which are substantiated in the Mercier report. Those are grievances recognized by the Department of Justice. The minister cannot look at all that with indifference and apathy. On the contrary, he must act with impartiality, firmness and foresight. It is up to him as Minister of Justice to take immediate action. And that is why I say that a national commission set up either outside the house or under the Senate, and which members of the Lower House could attend, appears absolutely necessary. When I say this, I am not necessarily supporting a political leader or a political party. I represent the average Canadians of my riding, my region or my province who believe that if the government ignored more the attacks of the opposition and if it raised itself—because the Department of Justice is a highly important field—above such partisan contingencies, it would exalt itself and win over the admiration of thousands of Canadians.

The Minister of Justice should take positive steps to establish law and order in the country so that we have a clear blue sky again.

That is what we expect from the hon. Minister of Justice. I am sure he will prove equal to the task but he must act and without delay.

Mr. Chairman, no amendment has been made to our federal Bankruptcy Act in the last 17 years.

The main purpose of the act is to help the bona fide debtors and protect the creditors, while allowing for the best disposal of the bankrupt's goods.

It reflects the old principle of free trade and is meant to encourage initiative and even daring in business.

The problem is serious. In November 1965, total losses attributed to bankruptcies amounted to $15,600 million. According to Dun & Bradstreet, 248 bankruptcies were registered in Canada, the highest number in 1965, except for the 274 bankruptcies reported in March of the same year.

It is noted that bankruptcies are increasing in Quebec, Manitoba and British Columbia. The largest increase in losses were registered in Quebec and British Columbia.

The tendency remains upwards: the office of the superintendent of bankruptcy entered the following number of bankruptcies: 1959, 3238; 1960, 3641; 1961, 3511; 1962, 4297; 1963, 5189.

The bankruptcies occur mainly in the following categories: primary industry, manufacturing industry, construction industry, transport and communications and other services, business bankruptcies, finance, insurance and real estate—

[English]

The Chairman: I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. There is no agreement that the hon. member continue.

Mr. Favreau: We would agree that the hon. member continue.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that the hon. member for Sherbrooke continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Then I conclude briefly, Mr. Chairman. I thank the hon. members for allowing me to conclude my remarks. I wish to suggest some amendments to the Bankruptcy Act, because we must not only criticize and demolish, but also correct the situation. I suggest certain amendments by which the situation can be improved.

• (7:20 p.m.)

First of all, it would be advisable to appoint in each judicial district competent, specialized and permanent officials. These new trustees, if they could be called that, well-paid, just like a clerk of the court, could settle without delay, as soon as possible and honestly, bankruptcies and liquidations coming under their jurisdiction.

Second, anyone filing a statement in bankruptcy should be automatically declared bankrupt, so that he might be the subject of a full investigation.

Third, a closer watch should be kept on the bankrupt who wants to get back into business because we have seen, for many years, people declare themselves bankrupt and two or three months later become the most prosperous people in the country, and often in the same sector of the industry or economy.

Fourth, it would be desirable to set forth clearly the responsibilities of the governments. We have heard various statements, which did not always agree, from the federal Minister of Justice and the Minister of Justice of the province of Quebec. I think that it would be advisable to set forth clearly the responsibilities of the federal and the provincial governments.

Personally, I understand that the Bankruptcy Act comes under the federal government, which is responsible for its administration, and that apparently the proceedings must be instituted by the provincial government.

But in their statements, the federal Minister of Justice and the Quebec Minister of Justice do not seem to agree on the responsibilities of each government.

In my opinion, everyone should agree so that this very important act, after some suitable amendments, will bring about the desired results.

Would it not be better to transfer to the provinces jurisdiction in the field of bankruptcies? It is not that I want to take this jurisdiction away from the central government, but since those problems are often local and regional and are often related to immediate problems, a provincial government might be able to keep a closer watch, with the help of other provincial laws, on the general progress of the regional business community. It might be advisable to examine the possibility of handing over to the provincial governments jurisdiction in the field of bankruptcy in order to increase efficiency.

[English]

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Chairman, I do not think anybody has to apologize for the disquiet there is in the house about the Spencer case. I intend to take only a minute or two to discuss some of the aspects of it which come to my mind, and the real reason why members —admittedly mostly in the opposition, although we have had very helpful evidence of disquiet from the government benches as well—are disillusioned about the government's handling of this case.

Let us review just a couple of things to put the matter in perspective. When the minister was asked about an investigation he very promptly said no. When the Prime Minister was asked about an investigation into this case he said maybe. That was his intervention, and some of us thought that, in a statement on government policy covering the aspects of this case and really all security cases, he would come forth with a policy or method for handling these difficult situations in a manner which would fit into the Prime Minister's philosophy, which he expounds as being new politics.

Of course finally the Prime Minister said no to the suggestion; and the minister today in what I have to call just a weak apologia, also said no. Let me review one or two other things that have served to disillusion members about the government's handling of this case. First of all there were the terms used by the Department of External Affairs when it made its announcement about the request for the recalling of the Russians in question. Any newspaperman, I suggest, who is worth his salary, would have had no difficulty in tracing Spencer from the evidence propounded in that press release by the Department of External Affairs. That is of course exactly what happened. An enterprising newspaperman traced Spencer because of that department's release.

There is another aspect that was unpleasant to me, relating to the use of quite an extraordinary term in contemporary Canadian history. That term which was used is "non-nationals of Canada". This was a discrimination, and when I asked the Prime Minister about it he said: Well, this is perhaps because these innocent people come to this country and are duped or something by lures of money. It remains however that the government used this quite unnecessary and unpleasant appellation.

In spite of all the speeches that have been made during this debate the minister has never really told us the story about his feature presentation on the program "This Hour has 7 Days". He has skirted this subject. Many of us who watched the minister that night, and who have been interested as this case has developed in parliament, have been waiting for his apology, if that is the word, about this extraordinary statement. One must remember that the minister is not a newspaperman. I have great respect for newspapermen. But the minister is a privy councillor charged with protecting the rights of citizens of this country, and he does not do anything privately in this or other areas of his ministerial responsibility. We call the minister to account today because he as the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General chose to use a very popular program on which to stigmatize Spencer. The Minister of Justice for Canada made this public identification on a program that has very wide popularity. I am told it has an audience of between two and a half and three million Canadians.

There are some people in this country who believe words, because they think words are precious things. Just because the Prime Minister of Canada does not lead the party to which I owe allegiance does not mean I do not pay some attention to what he says. I do not think this is a very startling revelation. When the Prime Minister of Canada discussed his new politics, I believed him. I thought, here is a man who believes what he says; he has had long experience in public life and perhaps in fact there is a new politics of Liberalism. Of course we have seen by this and other shoddy acts that those were just idle words.

I have not really any particular quarrel with the decision of the minister not to prosecute in the courts of the land. When I say that, Mr. Chairman, I would hope that this advice was taken after consultation with the law officers of the crown, which would be an innovation for this department in recent years. But I am assuming that this is now the custom in the department and the law officers have given this advice. I do not have too much quarrel with this. But surely the minister in accepting the recommendation that there be no prosecution is missing the point, the point being that the opposition has asked for a commission to judge the facts surrounding the public stigmatism of this man by the minister on a television program, and all the other events surrounding this matter.

There is one other matter which I should also like to clear up now. It was a rather extraordinary intervention by the member for Trois-Rivières and I think some public comment should be made about it. The member suggested, if I read his remarks correctly, that if the opposition would only keep quiet about the Spencer case, perhaps the government would give Mr. Spencer his day in court and then we could go on to other things. This was truly an extraordinary bargain in regard to a man's civil liberties. However, I leave the hon. member for Trois-Rivières to his independent status and hope that this advice will be taken only by himself, because that is about all it deserves.

When the minister made his statement today he used words that are familiar to all of us but they were quite out of fashion in the context in which he used them. I found them extraordinary because in turning down a request for a commission to investigate this matter he used the phrase "due process of law" and the expression "normal processes of government". Well, what are the normal processes of government? Of all the extraordinary gobbledegook, this—

Mr. Cardin: "Administration of government" was the expression I used.

Mr. Fairweather: I thank the minister for that correction. However, "normal administration of government" is still an elusive phrase in the context of a man's liberty. Then the minister finished with a ringing declaration that this decision was made on the basis of long established practice. It is my contention that the minister should be the one person in the cabinet, if the only person, who should be fighting tooth and nail to see that the rights of the citizen in this country remain inviolate. The Minister of Justice is the guardian of the individual in this respect. Surely more than anybody else in this nation he is the guardian of the rights of the citizen.

Instead of protecting these rights, he chooses to throw them away and smother up his action with phrases like "due process". This is a mockery of due process, of course, of "normal administration of government" and "long established practice". But there were brave men of his own party in this debate. They have been mentioned but I will remind the committee of them again. They were the hon. member for York-Humber and the hon. member for Verdun. There was one hon. member who was called in, or perhaps he volunteered. I refer to the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Leeds, who I regret is not present at the moment. I have had the privilege of sitting with this hon. member on various meetings of the Canadian Bar Association and on numerous occasions the hon. gentleman has taken part in panels on civil liberties. What an extraordinary apology he made for the actions of the government. Better his very constructive speech on penal reform had been his sole contribution to this debate.

We in the opposition have been blamed because we are spending some time on a person's rights. I think protecting the rights of a citizen justifies the existence of this institution, if nothing else. I believe it is a sorry day when we hear the Prime Minister of this country deny to a person a fundamental and basic privilege which should be that of all citizens. I have a little book here, Mr. Chairman, from which I should like to read two passages. Perhaps the minister would like to read it at the start of his career. Perhaps he has; perhaps he has not, too. His philosophy does not show that he has read very much of it. Sir Alfred Denning, now Lord Justice Denning, in the Hamlyn lectures published under the title "Freedom Under The Law" made the following comments that perhaps the minister would like to reflect upon:

> Whenever one of the King's judges takes his seat, there is one application which by long tradition has priority over all others. Counsel has but to say "My Lord, I have an application which concerns the liberty of the subject" and forthwith the judge will put all other matters aside and hear it.

We have an application that involves the liberty of the subject and we in the opposition ask this government to put all other matters aside and hear it. That is our request. It is a request that is founded in the best traditions of the common law. Then, in a dissent—but we in the opposition are used to dissent—Lord Atkin said in a dissenting judgment on a case of arising out of the War Measures Act of the United Kingdom, and I shall put this on the record because it is the philosophy of the minister that disturbs me, this pattern, this denial of ordinary justice:

> This power to imprison a man without trial, not for what he had already done, but for what he might hereafter do, was entrusted by parliament to the executive.

By the War Measures Act:

> It could not be reviewed by the ordinary courts of law.

The passage continues:

> Lord Atkin, in a great judgment, vigorously dissented from this view. He declared that: "In this country, amid the clash of arms, the laws are not silent. They may be changed, but they speak the same language in war as in peace. It has always been one of the pillars of freedom, one of the principles of liberty for which we are now fighting, that the judges are no respectors of persons and stand between the subject and any attempted encroachments on his liberty by the executive, alert to see that any coercive action is justified in law."

I suggest that the minister should be standing between this man Spencer and the actions of the executive of which the minister is a member. He should be the one who is championing a commission of inquiry, not standing up here with some apology for not having a commission examine this matter. The minister really gave us a pathetic example this afternoon. The claque behind him was saying "When was this done?" and he was saying, "Oh, it was done in 1960 or 1961". What a commentary on a very serious and important case.

I hope the minister before his estimates are finally approved will agree that in the case of Spencer an injustice has in fact been done. It is an unusual thing in this country that ministers are so bound by their colleagues, apparently. The minister, if he wants to make himself a hero, would call for a commission, and if the executive did not agree he would resign and we would think he was a real guardian of the citizen. Now we really do not know what to think of him.

• (7:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Laflamme: Mr. Chairman, before participating in the debate on the Department of Justice supply, I should first like to echo, up to a point, some of the words spoken a while ago by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather), the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), and those of the member who spoke before me.

Still, speaking quite candidly, I wonder if the house is really the place where the fundamentals of all matters related to the administration of justice should be discussed.

I suggest that, when dealing with such a vastly important question as respect and prestige of justice itself, it is necessary, in my opinion, to care about the role of a Minister of Justice. And, as the hon. member who has just resumed his seat at one time was attorney general of his province, he has with some restraint and very rightly, shown that the Minister of Justice or the one responsible, among the people, for administration of justice must do it with serenity and that, being bound by the laws, he has the responsibility and the duty to administer it in the interest of all citizens.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke, who, in a certain paper, is considered as a great constitutional adviser, should nevertheless refer to paragraph 14 of section 92 of the British North America Act, which, I would say, is quite fundamental:

The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

That comes under the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. And when I heard, a few moments ago, the hon. member for Sherbrooke asking for the establishment of a royal commission to investigate crime, I wondered if, within the framework of the constitution itself, this can be done with logic without the co-operation and the active participation of the various Departments of Justice of the ten Canadian provinces, in view of the fact that the administration of justice comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces. And this is so true, sir, that when a lawyer is designated or recommended by the federal Minister of Justice to plead a case in a provincial court, it is necessary for him, in order to be heard by the judge, to receive a precise and special mandate from the attorney general, or the Minister of Justice in the province in which the case is tried.

Well, I respectfully submit that this section is proof that, in this matter of administration of justice, active co-operation between the ten provincial governments and the central government is absolutely necessary and essential.

My hon. friend, the member for Sherbrooke, asked once again a few moments ago, that the federal government take the initiative in this field. I wonder how he can reconcile some of his constitutional opinions with those he expressed in certain other speeches he made, in which he advocated that all initiatives, in all fields and jurisdictions, should always remain with the various provincial governments.

Now, should the Minister of Justice be a police chief? Should he be a public prosecutor? I believe he should instead be responsible in this house for the orderly dispatch of matters relating to the application of the laws enacted by parliament.

I do not propose to discuss in detail all the speeches we heard about the respect of individual freedoms, because all members of this house agree on this point and moreover, it is one of the reasons why parliament exists. On the other hand, I would hope we would not hear in this house so many speeches on this subject and that we shall hear less perhaps than we did last week about the sacred rights of a small group of would-be Irishmen being expropriated, unfortunately, in the village of Shannon, which Montreal Star newspapermen looked for and failed to find, because there is no village of Shannon, either in Montmorency or in Portneuf ridings.

Mr. Chairman, I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice, and I think this falls under his jurisdiction, a most important point. I refer to the appointment of judges, under section 99 of B.N.A. Act which to my mind should be amended:

> The judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

I believe and respectfully submit that this section is obsolete, and that in this particular field, a more adequate method of going about it could be sought, for instance, through a petition or written request, signed by a majority of officers of the bar, countersigned by the chief justice assigned to the case, and then approved by Minister of Justice. I think this would meet the basic requirement to give complete freedom to a judge and would avoid a repetition of past difficulties.

Now, I respectfully submit that, in certain matters coming under exclusive federal jurisdiction, such as the Bankruptcy Act which has been so much in the news recently and which a number of members spoke of in the house, a great deal of statements often suggested the possibility that some people were or would eventually be involved.

To resort to such sensationalism in the house is to imitate the yellow press and to try to discredit the integrity and competence of the members of the house.

It would be more intelligent and fair toward all concerned to suggest useful amendments which would allow the Bankruptcy Act to be and to remain useful to a certain category of bankrupt taxpayers if they take the trouble to read it and to find out why it is not applied as it should be. If the creditors would merely take the trouble to do so at their meetings, it would be easy under the section of the Bankruptcy Act defining fraud to take the necessary steps to prevent the recurrence of frauds committed by a bankrupt.

To provide for a better application of the existing legislation, some of the bankrupts and also the inspectors appointed at the creditors' meeting, should be given additional powers. Direct assistance should also be provided, in my opinion, so that the onus of proceedings in cases of bankruptcy should not rest on the shoulders of creditors who stand to suffer heavy losses because of insolvent people who offer them nothing but a petition for bankruptcy.

Inspectors should have greater power to deal with a trustee, because they are the ones who must keep a check on bankruptcies. Unfortunately, such is often not the case.

There is also a useful change that could be suggested when the time comes to amend the act, that is to make it mandatory for the bankrupt to deposit the attachable part of his salary and also to keep on stipulating in the act that whoever, while bankrupt and still not liberated, is party to or takes part in a business transaction of any kind, commits a criminal offence.

Mr. Chairman, those are the few remarks I wished to make concerning the estimates of the Minister of Justice. In my opinion, it would be much more useful to make constructive suggestions with respect to the estimates of the Department of Justice generally than to keep on repeating the same speeches which, I admit, have a certain value. But when we talk about the freedom of private individuals, about everyone's right to a fair trial, and the same thing is repeated over and over again by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, in every possible way, while dealing with the principle involved in the Spencer case, I think we could go on to something else instead of hearing about the case of Mr. Spencer for several days more.

• (7:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to take part in the discussion of the Spencer case, except to say this. I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Royal and I was very impressed by it. I would say to the Minister of Justice that even if he discounts what many other hon. members have said as remarks of a partisan nature, he should listen particularly to the hon. member for Royal. He was for several years attorney general of a province, and more than that, he has felt free to criticize his own party, and criticize them severely, on many occasions. He has studied the question of civil rights at great length. His remarks were well-founded and, I thought, very much to the point. There is a case to be made for Mr. Spencer, and I think the hon. member for Royal did it as well as anyone.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to speak particularly about the estimates of the department in relation to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission and the combines investigation branch. I would not want the civil servants who worked so hard to prepare the annual reports of the Restrictive Trade Practice Commission and who put in their share of the work which goes into the annual report of the Department of Justice to feel that no one reads these reports.

There have not been too many speeches in this house on the question of combines investigation. The hon. member for Peace River referred to them briefly the other day, and I have spoken on the matter a number of times. I spoke in December of 1963, and on looking at the speech just recently I found I could really make the same speech tonight, because practically nothing has happened in the meantime.

I had another speech ready in November of 1964, but I did not give it because during the Justice estimates for that year the hon. member for Yukon got the discussion going in a different direction and the question did not seem appropriate at the time.

An hon. Member: Which direction was that?

Mr. Prittie: It had to do with skating rinks in Montreal, and all that sort of thing.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, very little has changed since this government came to power as far as combines investigation is concerned. I freely admit that my speech in 1963 was largely a review of a book published by two academics, Thorburn and Rosenbluth, entitled "Canadian Anti-Combines Administration, 1952-60". These two professors pointed out certain weaknesses in our combines legislation at that time and also in the administration of the act. In the meantime there has been no change made in the legislation.

However, in one respect there has been a change. These two professors criticized the amount of money being budgeted for combines investigation at that time, and I am pleased to say that there has been an increase over the last two years in money allocated for combines investigation work. In 1964-65 the two branches combined—the commission, and the office of investigation and research —had a budget of $729,000. In 1965-66 this was increased to $837,000; and I see the estimates for 1966-67 call for an amount of $903,200. So there is some improvement in that field in the budgetary aspect.

I have followed the ads which have been put out by the Civil Service Commission. There have been a number published in the past year and a half asking for personnel. I should like to hear from the minister at some time on the question of personnel and whether these branches are getting adequate staff. In the report of the Director of Investigation and Research for the year ending March 31, 1965, I notice this comment appearing at page 72:

> The shortage of staff for specific investigations has imposed an important limitation on the development of research studies. Efforts have been made to recruit senior research personnel but up to the present, these efforts have not succeeded in the appointment of qualified persons. In view of the difficulty experienced in recruiting senior research staff for career posts in the Branch, attention is being given to the possibility of having qualified research scholars in the universities accept temporary assignments to undertake particular research projects.

At some time I should like the minister responsible to disclose how successful the department has been in recruiting senior research personnel as well as more junior personnel to carry out investigation work.

The deficiencies in the law relating to mergers, Mr. Chairman, have been evident for many years. They were pointed up in 1960 in the decisions in the Canadian Breweries case and in the British Columbia Sugar Refineries case in the same year. The staff recognizes this problem and the weakness in the law relating to mergers. Successive ministers of justice have said they recognize the problems, but in nearly six years no legislation has been brought forward to change the law. I should like to ask why this is so and to hear an explanation of what is being done in this regard.

I notice again at page 18 of the report of the Director of Investigation and Research for the year ended March 31, 1965, a quotation from the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. They said:

> —It is our hope that in the near future the questions raised by these (Canadian Breweries and Western Sugar) decisions will be reviewed by appellate tribunals, more particularly by the Supreme Court of Canada, so that they may be definitely settled.

I should like to hear what is being done in the way of research or draft legislation to strengthen the merger provisions in our law.

The minister responsible for this branch—I believe it is the President of the Privy Council, who was formerly the Minister of Justice—has mentioned the difficulties of operating under the Criminal Code only. He has mentioned how difficult it is to prove conspiracy. He also referred to the fact that the department is exploring the possibility of non-criminal actions along the lines used by the federal trade commission in the United States.

• (8:00 p.m.)

That is all to the good. At some time, however, we should be told the results of these investigations. The minister has made statements about the need to change the law—the need to find other approaches. He did this in the course of a review of his department in the house on November 23, 1964 and in the speech he made at Montebello to the Association of Canadian General Counsel in October, 1964. At that time he said:

> I wish to pause here a second and note that one often feels uneasy at the thought that in Canada legislation dealing with combines or other types of restrictive trade practices has been found valid until now exclusively as being within the field of or in relation to criminal law which is one of the subject matters over which the parliament of Canada has legislative authority under section 92 of the British North America Act.
> It would seem that a new and hard look could be given at the present state of our legislation in this domain and that without repealing the present laws we may want seriously to inquire how far and to what extent additional provisions could be enacted under the federal jurisdiction to regulate trade and commerce.

That is an interesting approach. Those words were spoken some time ago, in October, 1964. I should like to hear what the studies made since that time have revealed as to the possibility of using the federal government's authority in the field of trade and commerce to regulate combines.

There is another aspect of combines which I have been raising in this house for nearly three years. I first called attention to this matter when the present government came to office in May, 1963 when Mr. Chevrier was Minister of Justice. I refer to the question of tied sales.

In 1956 an investigation was begun of what is generally known as tied sales—the practice of petroleum companies requiring service stations to buy tires, batteries and other accessories from designated suppliers. The oil companies then get kick-backs from these suppliers. An investigation was begun, I believe, in 1956. The Director of Investigations and Research reported to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission in November, 1960 and a report was published in April of 1962. Note, that was six years after the first complaint was filed. Since May, 1963, ministers of justice have come and gone. My hon. friend from New Westminster and I have asked repeated questions about this subject and we are always informed that the matter is under consideration. One of the replies I received was on February 16, 1965 in answer to question No. 2,634. I asked these questions and I got the following answers:

> 1. Has the interdepartmental committee which has been investigating the report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission concerning the practice of tied sales imposed by oil companies on service stations completed its studies yet?
> Answer: Yes.
> 2. Has the committee presented recommendations to the minister of Justice?
>
> Answer: Yes.
> 3. When will the minister present legislation on this subject to the house?
> Answer: The Minister of Justice, in reply to questions in the house on October 29 and November 26, 1964, stated that he had placed certain recommendations before the cabinet and expected to be in a position in the near future to make known the policy of the government with respect to the recommendations contained in the report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. Any decision in this respect will be made known in due course in the proper way.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman that "due course" has run its course. It is now ten years since this investigation began. I think we should have either a decision or an explanation why a decision has not been forthcoming.

I should like to mention in passing another continuing problem in the combines field. Every year we have passed legislation to exempt the British Columbia fishing industry from the scope of the Combines Investigation Act. Could we not have a progress report on this subject suggesting what kind of permanent arrangement could be made so that a threat is not held over the fishing industry each year?

There is one other item I should like to mention. As one who comes from the lower mainland of British Columbia I will be glad to support the bill introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard seeking to bring professional sport within the scope of the Combines Investigation Act. I am sure this proposal will find a great deal of support in British Columbia and perhaps in other parts of Canada.

Ever since the present government took office we have been promised changes in the combines legislation. Looking over my files and clippings I see this sort of thing—a newspaper heading in the Vancouver Sun for December 16, 1963: "Tougher Combines Measures Promised". The first paragraph of the report says:

> Justice Minister Lionel Chevrier has promised to consider putting "teeth" into federal anti-combines legislation to strike at companies guilty of collusion, mergers or monopolies.

I notice a heading on the article reporting the minister's speech at Montebello—"Favreau Favours Law Change on Mergers". Then in November, 1964, the heading on a Canadian Press dispatch reads "Seek Changes in Combines Legislation". So we have all the evidence that this question has been under study—that the ministers understand the problem very well. But there has been no action. There may be a reason for this inaction, but I think that somewhere along the line there should be an explanation.

It must be admitted that the Combines Investigation Act has not served us very well. It is not preventing mergers from taking place; it is not preventing mergers which lead to monopoly situations. A number of people say from time to time: "There is no reason for bigness. Bigness is not synonymous with badness. You should not keep talking about this question of monopolies." It may be true that bigness is not synonymous with badness, but bigness in the sence of monopoly control—and there is a great deal of this in Canada—does mean that a company or a few companies are in complete command of the price mechanism of an industry. In western Canada, for example, there is only one sugar company for the four western provinces from Manitoba to British Columbia. It is true the government did try a case on this but, as I mentioned, it failed because of the weakness of the merger sections of the act.

This is the situation which faces us. We find individual companies controlling the market. This can happen quite apart from the combines law. They can achieve this position without infringing any laws.

I suggest this is a problem we shall have to face up to because there is no public accountability by these companies. There are, however, several answers to this. One is public ownership, of which we have a great deal in Canada. The other is the method of the public utilities commission before which companies have to prove their case before price increases can be sanctioned.

But I suggest that the position of some of these companies is so powerful, and the effect they have on the economy is so great, that we need some type of public accountability which does not exist at the present time. I do not care whether it is a company which rules over the sugar market or has effective control of the steel market, the day will have to come when it will be accountable to a public body. There is not much use in having a body such as the Economic Council of Canada making recommendations concerning growth and price stability if companies, such as in the case of the steel companies last spring, pay no attention to the recommendations of that body.

I am only going to deal with this one aspect of the justice estimates, and to sum up I wish to say there have been no changes in combine laws since the government took office in April, 1963. These laws have apparently received a great deal of study because they have become deficient, and the public at large do not know how companies arrive at their decisions concerning prices. I hope very much that a responsible minister will answer some of these questions about combines legislation and the administration of combines law in Canada.

Mr. Cashin: Mr. Chairman, I rise, briefly I hope, to deal with one matter, namely the Spencer case. I have read the remarks made by certain opposition spokesmen, and I have listened in particular to those of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. I suggest that there is something of a hollow ring to these remarks because a study of this kind of situation over the past several years indicates no evidence that the present official opposition would have dealt with the matter differently had they been in office today. Substantially, the Spencer case has been handled in much the same way as were similar cases of this nature subsequent to world war II.

Indeed, if there have been any improvements in the handling of some of these cases it is because of a procedure announced in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister on October 25, 1963. On that day he publicly announced a change in policy adopted by the administration to cope with these security matters. This improvement was welcomed by the spokesmen for all opposition parties as a step forward and an improvement in the situation. But today we find the official opposition, particularly the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and some of his more vocal cohorts, disagreeing with this procedure, when in fact it goes further in protecting rights than the procedure followed by the previous administration. In fact, the particular section of the act that is causing trouble, section 50, was, as we know, introduced by the previous administration.

Mr. Orlikow: But that procedure was not followed in this case.

Mr. Cashin: I might say, making passing reference to the debate which took place at that time—and the hon. member for Winnipeg North might care to note this—that the only objection came from the Liberal member for Hull when discussing section 50. These were some of the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton on that subject, and I quote from page 8576 of Hansard for the 1960-61 session, volume 8:

I think it is significant that the maintenance in this bill of this particular subclause which the hon. member—

That is, the hon. member for Hull.

—seeks to delete was approved by all three members of the Civil Service Commission who appeared before the special committee as witnesses. It is also significant that no representations of any kind were made in relation to it by any of the civil service staff associations. I think the hon. member is well aware of how carefully in clause 60 new provisions have been set forth dealing with dismissals and the right of appeal. This particular provision merely preserves the over-all prerogative of the Crown, one which I am sure will not at any time be abused. In view of this I shall ask the committee to reject the amendment.

And it was rejected.

No member of the N.D.P. party spoke on that occasion.

In the debate on October 25, 1963, to which I have made reference, the Leader of the Opposition said, and I quote, from page 4049 of Hansard:

When the Minister of Justice says this just began with this administration, he forgets we worked on it for several years. We endeavoured to bring about a system which primarily would preserve to the highest degree possible the safety and security of the state while maintaining the rights of the individual.

In actual fact, while I do not doubt that the right hon. gentleman was concerned about this matter when he was Prime Minister, this procedure consisting of a board of review was given official sanction by the present Prime Minister in the Liberal administration.

At the present time the Leader of the Opposition is asking the government to make further changes in the procedures which govern security matters. In fact he is asking for changes which go beyond the procedure that was in vogue when he was prime minister. It would be difficult to convince me, at any rate, that there are a great many members in the Conservative party who do not actually approve of the procedure followed by the present administration in the Spencer case. It is substantially the same procedure that would have been followed by the previous administration, except perhaps for those changes introduced in 1963. In fact, I would like to quote further from the Leader of the Opposition as recorded at page 4050 of Hansard for October 25, 1963:

I feel, too, that in the measures announced the individual will have an opportunity of making known his defence. This step is taken officially that previously was followed unofficially. The individual has had that right, not in consequence of a declaration made in the House of Commons but as a result of its being a rule of practice, without which freedom might very well be denied to an individual. The review of the evidence by a separate body—

I should say within the civil service.

—with the individual having the right to give his side of the case, should go a long way to avoiding and preventing injustice. The setting up of a board of review taken from the membership of the security panel—as I understand the Prime Minister's statement—is a step forward;—

In all fairness to the Leader of the Opposition I must point out that at that time he also said:

—but I do not think it goes as far as it should:

And he advocated the setting up of a board of review presided over by a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, which is substantially the position he has taken in this debate.

However, I would like to remind the committee that during the five years the Leader of the Opposition was prime minister he did not do that and, in fact, he did not even give official sanction to the setting up of a board of review. This is yet another example of the Leader of the Opposition in effect saying what he would have done if he had his time over again, and had thought of it in time. I suggest to the committee that in actual fact there is no real difference between the attitude of the Conservative party and the attitude of the Liberal party in the handling of these security cases.

Mr. Knowles: This is the trouble.

Mr. Cashin: I am getting to that. This is substantiated by a review of the debates on this matter and also by the way these cases have been handled over the years.

At the present time the Leader of the Opposition is trying to make this a political and partisan issue. In other words, the Canadian public is being asked to believe that in this matter of civil liberties there is an official Liberal party view and an official Conservative party view. It seems more proper to say that there is an official government view, and a view that does not substantially change whether there is a Liberal or a Conservative administration in office. In fact, with one or two exceptions, I have not been very much impressed by the arguments brought forth by official opposition spokesmen on this matter, because I think basically the difficulties involved in this kind of case are well known to them, and when they were in office they had no choice but to act in the same way. Perhaps they may have been worried about such things, as anybody in a democracy is, because this is the kind of thing which is very difficult to handle in a democracy; and it is interesting to note that a former Conservative minister of justice to date has not commented on all of this.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, I am sure there are hon. members in all parties who share my concern about the general principle of doing things in this way, and I do not think that this is, therefore, in the ordinary sense a party view. The matter of civil liberties, it seems to me, must be determined by the individual himself, by his own conscience, his own philosophy and his own concepts of justice. It is totally unrealistic—and this is one of the weakenesses of the parliamentary system—to say that 131 Liberals on one given subject have one view and 27 Conservatives share the opposite view.

It seems to me, I think, to undermine the credibility of the institution itself and that we could discuss these matters with more regard to the fundamentals involved rather than with a regard to party position. This is a fundamental matter which goes to the roots of democracy and is much too vital to the well-being of the nation to be reduced to political expediency. I think this is an example of the weakness of our position. In this particular case I think the Prime Minister and the government have acted in good faith and that in the administration of justice today, so far as civil liberties are concerned, they are consistent with the Canadian way of doing these things.

I do question the fact that Mr. Spencer was unfairly treated. I accept therefore the words of the Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister, these men whose sense of fairness and justice is beyond question. I know that all of them, and anybody in any administration which has to deal with this kind of problem, must go through difficult moments. What in fact I disagree with is the Canadian way of handling these security cases. I have read very closely the words spoken in the house on October 25, 1963 by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Cashin: The hon. member for Winnipeg North had his chance to make a speech. I agree with the sentiment he expressed that he probably never would be a privy councillor; that was one of the most magnanimous statements I have heard in this House of Commons.

As I indicated at the beginning of these remarks the views of the Prime Minister represent a step forward.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question. Is he referring to the speech of the Prime Minister of October 25, 1963, when he promised that in cases such as this an employee would be given a full opportunity to resolve any doubt and also that there would be a second look taken by a separate body before dismissal was finally decided upon. Is that the speech to which the hon. member is referring? I hope his nod can be recorded on Hansard as a yes. If so, does he think that the conditions laid down by the Prime Minister have been met in the Spencer case?

Mr. Cashin: So far as I know I think they have been.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I ask another question. Would he tell us when the second look was taken at this case, by whom, and what was the separate body that took that look at it.

Mr. Cashin: The separate body to which the Prime Minister referred was a body within the administration itself. The point I have in mind is that in the future we should have a separate body which involves at least one judge outside the administration itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: That is our point.

Mr. Cashin: If the hon. gentleman would bear with me I think perhaps he might grasp the logic—if three is some, and I hope there is—behind what I say.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You had better stick to your notes.

Mr. Cashin: I see that the hon. member for Cape Breton South has made one of his highly irrelevant interruptions, and I would like to see it attributed to him, because I do not think anyone else would make a remark of equal inconsequence.

It has been impressed upon all of us, Mr. Chairman, how important secrecy is in all of these matters. I think the need for secrecy is apparent. I noted the words of the hon. member for Leeds when he said to the hon. member for York South that he did not know the facts and was never likely to know them. I think the main thing we must be sure of in all these cases is not only that justice is done but that it appears to be done.

I know—and I think before I go any further I should say this lest my remarks be misunderstood—that the remarks of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice concerning this particular case in question, the Spencer case, have received a lot of publicity. This has involved the ministers concerned and the Prime Minister taking a much closer look at this matter than might otherwise have been the case, and I am quite satisfied with the way this particular matter has been dealt with.

An hon. Member: It is of little comfort to us.

Mr. Cashin: The difficulty I think is that this is not a practical or desirable procedure to be carried on ad infinitum in the future as it has been carried on publicly in the past in this country. I am sure that the members of the opposition will agree with me when I say this procedure here is substantially the Canadian way of dealing with it; the same way basically that security matters were dealt with by Conservative and Liberal administrations. I think it is difficult to reconcile the nation's interests with the rights of the individual.

The point I am making is that now we have before us a discussion on this highly delicate but important matter, and surely it is time for those of us who have a very high regard for civil liberties—and this is something every Liberal feels at least equally—to discuss this, not in the light of the handling of the present case so that hon. gentlemen opposite may play politics with the civil liberties of a few people, but rather I think it is important that we consider that while in this particular case this may have been the only procedure we could have followed —perhaps that is not so, but it is the procedure which has been followed—I think what we must be concerned about now is to evolve a better procedure for the future; not for the man who will be known publicly as Spencer but for the anonymous Spencers whom we will not hear of in the years to come. These are the people who give concern to me and I am sure to all of us.

Mr. Lewis: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I ask this in all seriousness. Would he explain why his excellent suggestion in respect of what should happen in such cases should not be applied, to satisfy him and others that justice has been done, in the Spencer case; why not?

An hon. Member: Because the Prime Minister said no.

Mr. Cashin: I think the only thing that it would satisfy at the present time is perhaps a political motive. However, to answer that question, I would say that this is the procedure we followed for 20 years; but now in this particular case we have had a lot of public discussion about it and I am prepared to accept this on faith.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, may I—

Mr. Cashin: The member for Winnipeg North is so concerned about history that he is trying to make an attempt to get in the history books. In any event I do think that in the present case it has received the attention of the administration. What satisfies me and perhaps indeed all of the people is that although in the 20 years of experience we have had in these cases, even when the Leader of the Opposition was in office, there was little change, at least the Prime Minister's statement in this instance did result in an improvement in the situation.

What worries me is that in respect of situations that might arise in the future we might not have people with the same kind of attitudes that we have now in this House of Commons. There is a principle involved which may work in individual cases because of the calibre of the people in the administration dealing with it, but I do not feel this is something which ought to go unchanged. It seems to me this is a good opportunity now, when there is such a great deal of attention being paid to civil liberties, to talk about it.

• (8:30 p.m.)

As hon. gentlemen are quite aware the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond just gave a speech on a matter which concerned him. I think he was complaining that this matter had not received attention in a long time. Perhaps if there was a great controversy or public discussion about something that was bothering him, that would be a good time for him to make some speech about the direction in which the government must go in dealing with these matters. That is why I felt I ought to make these few comments about civil liberties. This is a matter that is of great importance to me as I am sure it is to all members of the house. I have now sort of—

An hon. Member: Run out.

Mr. Cashin: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a question perhaps he can go ahead and ask it now.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, there is a question I should like to ask the hon. member for St. John's West. When he was answering the hon. member for York South as to why the excellent principle he has enunciated should not be applied in this case, did I understand him correctly to say that the reason for not doing so now was that it would seem to be satisfying a political motive? At that point he gestured in the direction of the official opposition. Did he in fact say that the reason for not applying this excellent principle is that it would seem to be giving in to a demand from the opposition parties of this house? Is that the reason Mr. Spencer is to be denied the second look which the Prime Minister promised?

Mr. Cashin: Mr. Chairman, my answer is categorically no. I do not believe in changing a system to deal with one particular case. I am concerned primarily about the system which has been in effect for 20 years in this country. I do not suppose for one moment that I am now going to make a speech which will change that system here and now, making it retroactive. I am concerned with the situation 10 or 15 years from now and that which is involved in our approach. This sort of thing presents very difficult problems in a democracy.

It may well be, and I am prepared to admit this, Mr. Chairman, that the solution I have put forward, or attempted to put forward, is not the most practical. There may even be cases similar to this under the change I have proposed. I do not know that, but perhaps there are other members who could really answer that question better than I,—and they may be some of the members on the front benches over here or on the other side who have dealt with these things before. Perhaps they are more aware of the difficulties involved, but it seemed to me from a distance that it would be good to make a few comments in this regard.

I might also say, because I am one who speaks at this time from the back rows, that some of the real importance in a long term sense of civil liberties has been overlooked in this debate, which is strictly and purely one to satisfy political motivations. I am not strongly questioning the members of the New Democratic party, because I do not know how they would have acted had they been in office.

Mr. Grafftey: I wonder how this speech is going to look in Hansard?

Mr. Cashin: I can only assume that if they had been in office they would have carried out what they have said, in which case they probably would have acted differently from the Liberals or Conservatives. However, the point I really want to make is that in the past there has been no substantial difference between the attitudes of the two parties, and for the right hon. gentleman to suggest otherwise, that he would have dealt with this differently, is unrealistic.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the hon. member if he does not mind another interruption.

Mr. Cashin: I do not mind.

Mr. Fairweather: By this very moving account of the hon. member's belief in civil liberty, does he suggest there has been any equivalent experience in Canadian history where a minister of the Crown—the minister of justice for Canada—has gone on a national television program and stigmatized a citizen in an announcement such as that made by the present Minister of Justice? If so, what would my hon. friend do about this situation in the future?

Mr. Cashin: I do not accept the hon. member's premise. I saw a newspaper account, I believe in the Globe and Mail of November 4, regarding this subject. I believe the television interview to which the hon. member for Royal makes reference took place in the latter part of November. Therefore I cannot accept once again the comments of the hon. member for York South. I can only assume that he was misinformed when he cited to this house that the Minister of Justice first mentioned this man's name on television, even before newspaper reports. That is not the case. In view of that I think they have not given the full facts of the matter.

An hon. Member: Do not answer the question.

Mr. Cashin: Mr. Chairman, I have strayed from the subject as a result of questions asked by hon. members from different parts of the house. However, as was pointed out very ably today by the Leader of the Opposition, I am young and lack a considerable amount of experience. Perhaps I cannot field this kind of questioning as ably as others, but I know that the house will bear with me and have some sympathy for me in this matter until I find myself in a better position.

An hon. Member: You have dropped them all; you have not even got one.

Mr. Cashin: My suggestion, which I should like to see carried out in future cases of this kind, is that there should be more study given to these questions by the government, and a better approach taken to them, which could perhaps involve a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or the Exchequer Court of Canada, or perhaps a judge of a provincial supreme court who has experience in government administration. Members of the opposition might suggest that this would be distinguishing between one judge and another.

Mr. Woolliams: I think that it would be.

Mr. Cashin: We now hear from the hon. member for Bow River, that great legal authority who has supplanted the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Yukon, who are neck and neck in the battle for the booby prize, as the chief spokesman. I admire the styles of both these hon. gentlemen very much, although I think they have nevertheless—and this may be some source of regret to their master—fallen into insignificance in comparison with the masterful performer who has just intervened. As a young member of Parliament I might say that it is a great tragedy to me to know that at least in a mathematical sense I will perhaps be a member here in this house at some future date to see, sitting right opposite where the right hon. gentleman sits, some of those members like the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Bow River. At that time I will be happily able to look back over the years and think of the time when they had a really masterful and skilled politician at the helm.

An hon. Member: He is getting into high gear now.

Mr. Cashin: It has been a real pleasure to have been here for the past couple of years to witness that really masterful politician and his performance, and I am glad to have had the opportunity of questioning that master once in a while, particularly when his speech has not been up to par, so as to give him an opportunity to show his wit to a greater extent to further entertain the house. As a young member of parliament I do not regret one little bit being the straight-man for such a tremendous performer as the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Knowles: How could a Grit be straight?

Mr. Cashin: Now, gentleman, I shall return to this matter of civil liberty. It seems to me that the kind of thing we should consider in future cases of this kind is the kind of in camera hearing that people want today, presided over by either a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or a provincial justice who has had experience in government administration. Perhaps such a judge with this sort of qualification is the present chief justice of Nova Scotia. Perhaps that kind of a judge with particular experience in this kind of matter could be helpful in dealing with problems in this very difficult area.

There has been a lot of discussion to the effect that such an inquiry should take place in respect of the present case. As I said earlier, I am satisfied that this is not necessary in the present case. I am also prepared to admit that the procedure followed for some 20 years is perhaps not the right procedure. I am quite sure that the hon. member for York South, knowing of his record and having heard speeches he has made, does not agree with me. I am sure that he does not agree with the procedures that have been followed over the past 20 years; but he does not agree with much of anything. He just thinks this is a very bad situation. My point to him is that this procedure has been followed for 20 years. I do have some questions in my mind about it, but—

Mr. Orlikow: The procedures will be followed for another 20 years if it is left up to you.

Mr. Cashin: That is another interruption which will be recorded in the annals of the House of Commons history when the history of the sixties is written, as suggested by a member earlier tonight.

The point is that neither the hon. member for Winnipeg North, nor any of his party, is ever likely to be in a position to make this kind of decision. I think it is important that the two parties over there, who are apt to have a chance to make these decisions, however small it may be, should consider these matters. I believe there should be more public debate on matters of this kind.

One of the things that has always disturbed me, as well as many other Canadians, is the fact that there is a lack of real, open, public discussion on matters of this kind. We have had a great many situations in Canada which have been considered and discussed in secret. I think that points to the monolithic decisions we have seen from time to time which hamper the kind of public discussion on issues which could make our institution of parliament more credible to the public. No wonder the United States citizens can get so excited that it may seem irrational to us from time to time. In their system they can see the Senate on television debating publicly a matter such as the Viet Nam situation. We in this country do not have that kind of public debate or public expression not only on this subject but on a wide variety of subjects.

• (8:40 p.m.)

I certainly do not want to suggest that my rather insignificant interruption in the debate tonight—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cashin: —is going to do very much to further that proposition but I do think there should be more of it.

Mr. Knowles: You should be on television.

Mr. Cashin: I might say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—I think it was he who made a crack about television—that if I were he I would stay away from the camera altogether.

There are a number of other comments I should like to have made. I did not realize that members of the opposition would find my remarks so stimulating and refreshing that they would keep interrupting me at such great length. I hope that perhaps in a year's time, if we are all still here, when the estimates of the Department of Justice come before us we may have an opportunity again to discuss this matter and perhaps find the government in the position to advise us on the kind of policy to be adopted in future cases, a policy that would be more consistent with that which many of us would like to see adopted.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Cashin: Yes.

Mr. Brewin: I was very much impressed with the hon. member's tribute to the concern of himself for the other members of his party in regard to liberties in the future. Can the hon. member explain why he does not think these principles should be applied in the present case? Is this not like the expression, all is jam tomorrow but never jam today?

Mr. Cashin: I do not agree, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me the answer is that we do not change the procedure in the middle of a case. This procedure has been adopted for 20 years. This case has won a great deal of publicity; therefore the Minister of Justice, presumably the Solicitor General, and the Prime Minister have had an opportunity to look at this matter in more detail than ordinarily might be the case. I accept their judgment, as I might well have accepted the words of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition were he in the same position.

The point is this. I do not think it is acceptable as a general rule to have this kind of procedure over a long term. We have followed this procedure for 20 years; I would like to see it changed. I do not see the need to change it in the Spencer case but I should like to see it changed at the earliest possible date.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Knowles: Two of a kind.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, somebody said, "Two of a kind" but I have always known that other members have been a little jealous of those redheads. However, I must congratulate the hon. member for St. John's West upon his speech and I hope the Liberal party will call a caucus tomorrow. They surely do not have to wait until Wednesday, because the member who has just spoken seemed to answer a number of questions very honestly. He said he thought a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, or a trial judge of a high court should review a matter such as this. The hon. member said he did not think the holding of an inquiry should apply to Spencer, the reason being that it might be interpreted as having a political motive.

I think that was the whole crux of his argument, namely that such action might be interpreted as having a political motive. I believe if there are any political motives attached to this question they are held by the Liberal party because, as I said on Wednesday last and I repeat it now, the government has something to cover up; it has swept the matter under the carpet; it does not want to bring this question out into the open. That is exactly what the hon. member for St. John's West tried to say tonight, but he did not want to go too far in speaking of his own party.

We listened with great interest to the minister. I make a special appeal to him because as I understand it from reading something about the minister's background—and I think he will like what I am about to say—he comes from a very traditional and great family in his own province and in this nation. He is a lawyer; he has some great traditions arising out of his family's background and is able to appreciate the legal principles involved in this case, namely those which are wrapped up in the rights of the individual in respect of civil liberties.

I hope that with those traditions behind him, and as a new Minister of Justice who came in with a new brush, he will not be just a pawn in the hands of the Prime Minister. I hope that because the Prime Minister says "We do not want an investigation in this case" the Minister of Justice has not become a pawn and just says "We must not have an investigation in this case".

When you analyse the arguments put forward this afternoon by the Minister of Justice, and his reasons for not having an inquiry held in this matter, you find them very weak. I find them very political. I find that all the reasons he put forward this afternoon make a mockery of justice. If he is, as I suggest he is, steeped in the great legal traditions of a great family background, let him now measure up to those traditions and the responsibility of the portfolio he holds, one of the main portfolios in government. Let him measure up to those responsibilities and give this man his day in court. Let the minister hold an inquiry into this case, as was suggested by the hon. member for St. John's West.

Let us compare this case with similar cases in the past. Hon members opposite keep saying that this case is on all fours with cases of espionage that occurred when the Conservatives were in office or when the Liberals were formerly in office. The hon. member for St. John's West referred to this type of justice, as I understood it, being the Canadian way—not the Conservative way, the Liberal way or the New Democratic party way. There is a difference between this case and others in the past. The minister this afternoon said no, there was not; but he might reconsider his position when he sees the fine distinction that can be drawn between this case and others.

What is that fine distinction? Several other hon. members raised the matter by their questions of the previous speaker. The distinction is that no one has ever been named in this manner before. I am not concerned tonight with the narrow, political side of the question and whether the minister named this man or somebody else did it. I am concerned with the fact that he has been named and the minister named him over the national television network. Therein lies the difference.

Hon. members opposite have said that you cannot have that kind of inquiry in this kind of case because you cannot have a proper investigation of the facts if they are made public. Let us compare this case with the ordinary case where there is a reasonable belief that someone is guilty of a crime under the Criminal Code and the police go out, make an investigation, interrogate the accused and ascertain certain facts. In this case the facts were referred to the legal officers of the Department of Justice. The Minister of Justice seems to want to hide behind this fact, because he says the law officers of the crown said there was not enough evidence to warrant a prosecution. It is true enough that if the Attorney General or the Minister of Justice, as the case may be, is advised that in an ordinary case—I am dealing with the ordinary case at the moment—there is not enough evidence to substantiate a charge being laid, normally a charge is not laid.

However, Mr. Chairman, I ask the minister this question. The person being investigated by the authorities is known, but as soon as the legal officers have advised the minister, who has determined that a charge shall not be laid, the surveillance ends and the man is as free as any Canadian in this chamber; he may enjoy that freedom and liberty of the subject that is spelled out in our civil rights.

In an espionage case the individual is not normally named. Therein lies the difference. In this case the individual is known, he has been named; and because he has been named we ask, not that there be held an inquiry wherein all the facts would be made public and the security of the state might be threatened, but that the inquiry be held in camera. Nobody on this side of the chamber has gone as far as asking that this matter be inquired into in open court. The hon. member for St. John's West has said that this procedure should be adopted in the future, but not in this case because it would be giving in to the Conservatives. If it is giving in to the Conservatives it is because we stand for the protection of the civil rights of the individual. I believe that any fair, good-minded Liberal would be prepared to agree with this.

The difference between this case and another kind of spy case is, and I repeat it, that the individual in the other kind of case is not named. This is a different type of thing. Here, this person is named. They say he has had a hearing. I listened very carefully to what the Prime Minister said, and when I reread his words I find he said this man had been treated justly. Before I mention that, I want to say it is not only the individual Spencer with whom we are dealing. We are dealing with the civil rights of all Canadians. If it is right to debate this case tonight, it is right because we are dealing with the future justice, the future civil rights of all Canadians.

Now, the Prime Minister said this man was treated justly. As one hon. member pointed out, and it bears repeating, what kind of trial did this man have? He was tried by the Prime Minister; he was tried by the Minister of Justice; he was tried by the legal officers of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice. These people do not form an independent judiciary. They represent a political machine and they say: We are not going to give Spencer a fair trial, a fair hearing. What have you got to hide? What harm can come if he is given a hearing in camera? Therein, I say, lies the difference.

I am going to repeat what I said earlier, that I hoped this Minister of Justice, steeped in the traditions I mentioned at the outset, would be the kind of man who would say: I am going to stand on these principles; I am a member of the bar and I took a certain oath as a member of the bar and as a member of parliament. I hoped he would say: Since I took those oaths, since I am steeped in those principles, I am going to say to my Prime Minister that either this man gets fair treatment, the kind of treatment every Canadian expects, or I am going to resign my portfolio. I am not asking for your resignation, but I am saying this: Do not be a pawn in the hands of the Prime Minister. After listening to the minister this afternoon, sir, that is what he appeared to be.

Now, what did the minister say this afternoon? He said it seemed to be standard practice or a standard rule of law that where somebody was a squealer—I could tell you a story about that but I will not—then he is not charged, he does not have any punishment. I have never heard of a rule of law like that. I have heard of a case where a man is involved in a certain conspiracy, where people are conspiring to commit a crime, and gives information about the crime. However, this does not mean that a police officer says to him: Sure, as a Canadian, because you are a squealer, you are not going to be charged. This has never been a principle of law.

The principle of law is this: A man may stand charged, and even if there is a voluntary statement given to a police officer, then the proper rule of law is that the statement is admitted as evidence and may be used against that person at his trial. When it comes to punishment, then you decide on what kind of punishment to mete out to such a person, and mitigation is the letter of the law. If you say it is a standard principle of law in Canada that a squealer is not charged, then I am sure you are carrying the rule of law in a different direction than the one inculcated into the Minister of Justice when he graduated from law school and when he was steeped in the principles of a legal family.

The point I want to mention is that when the minister was asked a question he said he knew from facts that this man had done things or had said things—I think "done" was the word but I do not have an exact note of what was said—and was a danger to the state. The minister said that as this man was a danger to the state it was necessary to have him under some kind of surveillance. If this man has done things which have threatened the security of Canada, then I do not care what the legal officers have told the minister, he must take the responsibility. After all, his advisers are only his advisers. The minister has the last say and if he knows this man has done something to make him a danger to the security of Canada, then I say to the minister he appears to be guilty of an offence. Let that offence be charged. Is there any great harm in a man's being acquitted of some crime with which he is charged? I believe that tonight every Canadian would rather be charged with an offence, tried and acquitted than be like Spencer who has to go through the rest of his life under surveillance.

I hope that before the sitting concludes tonight the minister will say how long this man will be under surveillance. Will it be 20 years, 30 years? I want to hear him say it. I say to him, as I said at the beginning, that his argument was weak. It was a political argument, an argument he put forward as a pawn of the Prime Minister to cover up a decision that was made by the Prime Minister some time ago. Maybe the minister could tell us tonight when that decision was made. Was it made in May at the time the Dorion report was coming out? Why was it made at such an opportune time, if it was made at that time? Was it used as a smokescreen to cover something they wanted the public to forget? I ask this question because at that time we heard in the corridors the Prime Minister was going to dissolve parliament and hold an election. I think that great columnist Douglas Fisher was writing about an election at that time and he named the date several months ahead of time. He did not get the information as a result of a cabinet leak; he knew what was going to happen.

I say it was a very weak argument. The Prime Minister was guilty of tergiversation. He tergiversated in offering explanations about the holding of an inquiry, and I say that you are turning your back on the principles that you hold so dear or you should hold so dear. In my opinion this seems to be the very crux of the matter. We may say that this debate has gone on a long time. It is interesting to note, and I am going to direct your attention to it, Mr. Chairman, that not only have we spoken on this matter but there has been an equal number of speakers from the government side. This indicates the government is concerned. The hon. member for St. John's West has been thrown into the debate, and he is quite an able debater. It was hoped he would throw up another smokescreen, but the trouble was he went along with the Tories and let down the Grits. Nevertheless he was thrown into the debate. If the government wants to get these estimates through, and I am certainly one of those who would like to get them through and get on with the legislative program, then why does the Minister of Justice not say: Let us have an inquiry. Let us give this man a hearing, and let us give him the kind of hearing the Prime Minister said should be established under the new procedure to which the hon. member for St. John's West referred.

If that was to be the new procedure, why was it not adopted in this case? Why was a different procedure followed in contradiction of the policy outlined by the Prime Minister? These are questions I should like answered. I think the minister should answer all of these questions. I am going to repeat them. How long will this man be under surveillance? When did the minister first decide not to give him an inquiry? When was that decision made? Was it made on the spur of the moment in the house when he was asked questions on orders of the day or was careful consideration given to it by the cabinet? The Prime Minister said this man had been treated justly. Even if he has been fired from his job, even if he has lost his salary, even if he has lost his pension, the Prime Minister says it is just for him not to be given an inquiry.

I should have liked to hear some of the members of the Liberal party had they been sitting on this side of the house and we over there, if we had treated Spencer in the same manner. They would have rattled the benches; they would have rattled the electronic appliances. They would have said to us that we were nothing but dictators. I recall the Coyne affair, a man who increased his own pension. Today the minister said you only hold a job in the civil service at the will of the people.

Mr. Cashin: Will the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Woolliams: I will answer a question when I am finished, and I am just about finished.

An hon. Member: Tory arrogance.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: If that is arrogance, then I have a lot of friends with me and they are not all sitting on this side. When did you decide not to give him an inquiry? When did you decide to release his name? Was that a plan of the government before the minister went on television, or was it a slip of the tongue on his part? When did the two Russians who were connected with the case come to Canada? Were they in Canada before the minister's party was asked to form the government of this country? Let us hear answers to those questions.

I have watched the minister weigh his words. I do not say this unkindly to him, but he reads his speech because he wants it to read well in Hansard and does not want any mistakes. When the minister went on television he was told to release that name. This was a plan conceived by the Liberal party, a plan of the Liberal government, and that is the reason it was done.

Mr. Sharp: Why?

Mr. Woolliams: I will tell you why. You covered up the terms and conditions of the Dorion report, and swept it under the rug so that you would win the last election. I was asked for the reason and that is it.

Mr. Roxburgh: We do not take you too seriously.

Mr. Sharp: Just another fairy story.

Mr. Woolliams: The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that is another fairy story. I heard him admit on the radio that the Conservative party was right; and I use that in answer to him.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I did not say a word.

Mr. Woolliams: It was the Minister of Finance. I forgot there had been a substitution. It happens so often that it is hard to keep track. The Minister of Finance said that the Tory party was right, that the government or Canada could have sold far more grain, but that transportation under the Liberals broke down, and the western farmer has to pay the price. He has already made that admission on television.

Mr. Sharp: The railways lost confidence during the Conservative regime and they did not build the equipment.

Mr. Woolliams: I would have thought the Minister of Finance would be able to give a better retort than that. He said the railways broke down under the Conservative government. It seems to me that the C.P.R. run this government, but when we were the government we ran the country. That is the answer to that.

An hon. Member: Yes, ran it right into the ground.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I think we have a very good railway system in Canada, but we should resume consideration of our system of justice.

Mr. Woolliams: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I got derailed. Anyhow, they are certainly railroading Mr. Spencer. That is the point I really had in mind, and I knew I would be able to draw an analogy there.

When the minister was answering questions this afternoon he said that only $3,000 or $4,000 was paid over to provide travel warrants from here to there so that the boys could get certain information. However, when the communiqué was released on May 9, 1965 it said thousands of dollars had been spent.

I think the minister should have told us how much money was paid to the other people connected with this matter, if there were others, and how much money was paid in total. If that information can be made available when he speaks I think he should give the full information. He would not have been embarrassed this afternoon to give any of these answers, had he done what the Prime Minister wanted to do but refused to do in the matter, namely hold an inquiry in camera in order to give this man a fair hearing.

Let me conclude on this note. We are not concerned tonight with this one man. It may be sad for Mr. Spencer; I do not know. I do not know whether he is guilty or innocent. But the fact is that every minister of justice, as I suppose do the courts, can refer back to precedents, and tonight we will be establishing a precedent. If this case should become a precedent for this House of Commons or for future governments, it means this, Mr. Chairman, that in future every man who becomes connected with a similar set of circumstances as Mr. Spencer, even though he discloses the facts to the proper legal officers of the country, will then be put under surveillance for as long as he lives. He too may stand charged on the national television network of this country and have his name similarly disclosed. I suggest this would be a new form of trial by national television.

I listened to the hon. member for Royal who referred to a judgment which had been given. Sometimes when we get a little serious it often pays, as I said the other day, to get a little philosophical. The real question facing the western world today is the question of freedom. That is why we stand up against communism. We know they do not offer freedom to their citizens, and our ideas and ideals must be higher than theirs at all times if our way of life is going to survive.

Perhaps Byron made this point best in one of his sonnets, and I am going to close on these words:

> Eternal Spirit of the chainless Mind!
> Brightest in dungeons, Liberty, thou art,
> For there thy habitation is the heart—
> The heart which love of thee alone can bind;
> And when thy sons to fetters are consigned—
> To fetters, and the damp vault's dayless gloom—
> Their country conquers with their martyrdom,
> And Freedom's fame finds wings on every wind.
> Chillon! thy prison is a holy place,
> And thy sad floor an altar; for 'twas trod,
> Until his very steps have left a trace
> Worn, as if the cold pavement were a sod,
> By Bonnivard!—May none those marks efface!
> For they appeal from tyranny to God.

This, Mr. Chairman, is what Spencer is doing. He is appealing tonight, not to God, but to the Minister of Justice to give him a break so that every future Canadian will have the same break.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, the speech which we have just heard from the hon. member for Bow River has been, to me, a very moving one. I am grateful to him for his very flattering remarks in connection with my coming from a legal family. I cannot claim this honour to that exent.

I should also like to make it quite clear here and now that it was I who suggested to the Prime Minister that a judicial inquiry into this matter was neither necessary nor warranted, nor was it justified.

It has been suggested to me both by the hon. member for Bow River and by the hon. member for Royal that I could make a hero of myself by asking the Prime Minister and my colleagues to set up an inquiry into this matter. It would be very nice indeed to become a hero, and I guess there is nobody in this house who would not want to be one. But in this particular instance all I want to do is my job, and I want to do it well.

It is true that as a member of this house and as Minister of Justice I have a responsibility, as have all hon. members, to protect the rights of individuals and their liberties. But as Attorney General I also have the right and the responsibility to protect the national security system of this country.

• (9:10 p.m.)

One of the strangest things about this debate is that not one person, not one hon. member, has asked to know exactly what damage has been done by Spencer in his connection with espionage activities.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cardin: Everyone has spoken of civil rights. I agree with that. But it is also my responsibility as Attorney General to see that the security of the nation is guarded, and I intend to do this.

We have been speaking of justice, of principles, of righteousness. Well, there is a fundamental principle which applies in law, which applies in justice and which applies in parliament: That principle is the truth. I have been accused on I do not know how many occasions of having stigmatized Spencer on a television program. It has also been in all the newspapers. I have repeated on innumerable occasions that Spencer identified himself on the 4th, 5th and 6th of November and that I appeared on television on the 28th of November.

What is more, on that very program, "This Hour Has 7 Days", before I got on the air the reporter who had identified Spencer appeared and named Spencer about five minutes prior to my appearance. There is, as I say, this question of truth, and I did not see it being applied by hon. members opposite when they continued to insist that I had branded Spencer as a spy knowing full well, unless they do not read the newspapers, that he had identified himself at least three weeks previously. If hon. members opposite want to be righteous, I am all for it. At the same time, let them also be truthful.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be on another subject, but I should simply like to mention this before. As far as the Spencer case is concerned I have not yet been able to form an exact opinion about the situation, although I have some questions which normally or naturally come to the mind of one who has not yet formed an opinion.

The first would be the following: Did any person, any individual, any member of the opposition or of the party in power ever express the desire to meet this Mr. Spencer personally? Did those who made pompous speeches a few moments ago in defence of Spencer's rights—I refer to the hon. members for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) and Royal (Mr. Fairweather)—ever express the wish or tried to meet him, to have clear ideas about him? Were they prevented or forbidden to meet Spencer?

Is it true that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), when he went to British Columbia, tried to question Spencer? Was he prevented from doing so? Was he able to meet him?

Mr. Chairman, in another of his questions, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated that the treatment given Spencer violates his famous Canadian bill of rights.

Did anybody in opposition or the Leader of the Opposition himself put himself or offer to put himself at the disposal of Spencer to help him demand his rights, insist upon his rights, since such rights were recognized by Parliament?

To defend Spencer's rights. Did the right hon. Leader of the Opposition or the hon. members for Yukon, Bow River or Royal offer to take Spencer's case in their own hands to demand his rights before Parliament, under the Canadian bill of rights?

And if Spencer is not guilty, are there any lawyers within the Conservative party who offered to help him, legally speaking? If Spencer loses his pension rights and if he has a right to a pension, he therefore undergoes a damage which gives him recourse before civil courts.

Did the hon. member for Bow River, a brilliant lawyer, at least when there is no client, no accused and no accuser, at least in this House in short, when there are no cases entrusted to him, offer to take this case into his own hands and attempt to defend Spencer's rights to a pension before the courts?

Is there a lawyer within the Conservative party who offered his services to help Spencer?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes, here, in the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, should one of my rights be violated, I would at once bring the case before a Canadian court of law. I have enough trust in Canadian courts to know that if a Canadian is being denied his rights or privileges the courts of law will recognize the fact even against the government and the Minister of Justice.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) should know our justices and courts are impartial, that they follow long established procedures, and that we can trust our justice.

And yet where is the lawyer, if there be one, who is moved by Mr. Spencer's rights more than by vulgar demagogy? If there is one including the hon. member for York-South (Mr. Lewis) of the N.D.P., if there is one who is sincere about defending Mr. Spencer, why does he not rise and bring the courts of Canada to recognize Mr. Spencer's rights? What is keeping him from doing this? Nothing.

Mr. Lewis: The Supreme Court of Canada is here, this is the court of our land.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, we know that before going to the supreme court, you must start with the superior court, and the court of appeal; then you go to the supreme court. Everyone knows that prior to going before 265 judges in parliament, you go before a single judge of the superior court and before three judges of the court of appeal. But what are we looking for? What is being asked? An investigation? Justice, could be had before the Canadian courts.

Therefore, it is not for us to render justice but rather to see that justice is done in Canada. If an hon. member wants so badly to protect the rights of Mr. Spencer, he should get up and defend the rights of Mr. Spencer before the Canadian courts.

Moreover—and it is significant—how is it that that a former Minister of Justice in this house, who is aware of such cases of national security since some undoubtedly came up while he was in office, did not even deem it necessary to touch upon that subject when he took part in the debate on the estimates of the Department of Justice? How is it that he did not say a word about it? And yet, if there is in the Conservative party a member who would be qualified in that field, because he has been faced with similar situations, it is the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), a former Minister of Justice.

Why did he not say a word about it, Mr. Chairman? I admit, at first sight, that something might look surprising in this whole story.

If such a thing were done to one of my electors in the riding of Lapointe, I can assure you that I would see to it that it did not happen again and I would take the matter to court, where justice could be done, and not before the group of demagogues we have been hearing in this house in the last few days. The first thing I would do, Mr. Chairman, would be to go and see him. I would ask him questions, at least to know what I am talking about, because those who did not even take the trouble of seeing Spencer, the first one concerned, whether they come from British Columbia or Ontario—and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was there three weeks ago—do not have a very serious case. Indeed, when one wants to talk about something, one must first get some information. I heard the Leader of the Opposition, after a pathetic plea, say "I rest", as if he were before the court. "I rest" but he has not even met, not even seen and not even heard the defendant. Mr. Chairman, can you imagine a lawyer who would come before the courts and who, using legal terms, would say "I rest", without having seen, heard or spoken to his client. If a lawyer behaved like that, he would soon lose all his cases and all his clients. That is why we must question the sincerity and honesty of those famous lawyers who, in the last four or five days, have attempted to defend a client without even trying to meet him, to see him or to question him.

I have three questions to put to the Minister of Justice. But he could possibly answer this one: If another member of the house wanted to question Mr. Spencer, would the R.C.M.P. prevent him from doing so?

Mr. Cardin: No, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: Well then, Mr. Chairman, since the hon. member for Yukon was in British Columbia three weeks ago, did he not try to meet him?

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Was he prevented from meeting him? The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) lives not far—

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Too busy in Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Did the hon. member for Bow River who lives in a province not too remote from British Columbia try to meet him? The Minister of Justice stated that whoever wished to meet Mr. Spencer could do so.

If you want to defend a man, my friends, start by meeting your client and acquiring information, and then perhaps you will be less demagogic. Mr. Chairman, it is enough to make one question the sincerity and intellectual integrity of all these gentlemen who talk through their hat.

Mr. Chairman, my second question—my first one was answered rather promptly, I am glad to say—I asked this afternoon. I understand that perhaps the Minister of Justice does not wish to answer it; he may be right, but did not the same thing happen, did not similar events occur in the past, during the government of the present Leader of the Opposition, between 1957 and 1963? Did this happen before, were there similiar cases? Were today's puritans as puritan then?

When their party did it, did they show the same indignation? Has this ever happened?

Without mentioning particular cases or saying how many there were, without trying to identify anybody or anything, perhaps the minister could tell us whether that was done under the previous regime? The Minister of Justice could probably tell us that.

Third, Mr. Chairman—and I find that I have let myself get carried away from my subject—last week I put a series of questions to the Minister of Justice concerning the use of R.C.M.P membership cards by persons who did not belong to the mounted police. I think the minister said then that he would answer my questions, so I wonder whether he would now be ready to make a statement in that connection.

That is why I would like to afford him the opportunity to answer the questions I put to him the other day.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry if I cannot answer all his questions now, but here is the answer to a question put to me by the hon. member for Lapointe. The R.C.M.P. investigated the allegations that one or two persons had unlawfully identified themselves as members of the R.C.M.P. It was established that one of them had an identification card issued by the R.C.M.P. commissioner under section 8, chapter 54, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, 1959. The commissioner in question is now retired.

This identification card showed that the bearer was a member of the R.C.M.P. and an officer of the peace. That person had been the executive assistant to the last minister of justice in the former government.

That identification card has been withdrawn. There is no evidence that another person involved in that case had such a card.

I have a report from the R.C.M.P. and after consulting the legal officers of the department, I decided there was no reason to take the matter before the courts.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I have a further question with regard to the card which was withdrawn, I believe, after the former executive assistant had used it. In the present case, can the Minister of Justice tell us whether that former executive assistant was entitled to use that card when he did so, whether he was a member of the R.C.M.P., whether he had any reason to use it then, whether he used it with the permission of senior officers of the R.C.M.P., whether he still had the right at that time to keep that card and whether he used it within the operations of the R.C.M.P.?

Could the minister tell us also what other persons were involved with that former executive assistant? Were those other persons present when the former executive assistant produced that card? Did those other persons know that the former executive assistant was not a member of the R.C.M.P. and was not entitled to use that card?

Was it agreed that he should bring out this card although he was not entitled to it? Can the minister give the names of the three persons implicated in this affair?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, the series of questions from the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) can hardly be answered tonight. I do not remember exactly the names of the three persons involved. I hardly believe I should publish the names of persons following this kind of investigation.

As far as the identity card is concerned, the card proves that the bearer is in fact an agent of the R.C.M.P., a peace officer. For this reason it was not possible to prosecute him.

Now I do not believe the incumbent R.C.M.P. commissioner was aware that such a card existed. In fact, I am sure he was not aware this card was in circulation.

Mr. Grégoire: I do not at all wish to question the good faith of the commissioner, but did the former executive assistant still have the right and the permission to use this card at that time. Was he authorized to use it in this specific instance? Would the Minister of Justice perhaps answer these two questions tonight?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I have just said that the present commissioner did not know of the existence of the card and, consequently, I do not see how the person who had it could use it.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, does the Minister of Justice admit and recognize as normal that an individual should use an R.C.M.P. card without permission? Would the minister consider taking certain steps against the person who did this?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I have just answered this question. It is impossible to institute proceedings under the circumstances, because the card showed that he was an agent of the R.C.M.P. and an officer of the peace.

Mr. Grégoire: One last question, Mr. Chairman. Can the minister say whether there are many people in Canada who have cards like that one and without the R.C.M.P. commissioner knowing about it? Are there many people like that in Canada? For instance, could I have one?

Mr. Cardin: No, Mr. Chairman, there is not one card like that in circulation.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon we have been treated to some of the queerest expositions of the concepts of justice that I have heard in a long time. I know it is the habit of those opposite to laugh at anything that smacks of justice in Canada and justice in this house.

We have heard the hon. member for Lapointe, an expert on the subject, speak about demagoguery on this side of the house, and he provides us with the finest example of that. He speaks about parliament not being the place in which to discuss matters of the nature of the Spencer case, and yet he came whimpering to this house to discuss his own party's problems.

Mr. Starr: A stupid man.

Mr. Nielsen: He questioned, sir, the intellectual honesty of those who would raise the most important question of civil rights in this country. We question his intellectual capacity.

The Minister of Justice treated us to a whining discourse on the truth, and how important this is to parliament; and yet he forgets that when he was on this side of the house he was using words, on February 22, 1962 that will go down in infamy in the records of this house. He said that we must regard the truth: That is why we want an inquiry. He says we must trust the ministry. Is there any reason that we have to doubt the capability of this ministry in the administration of justice in this country? After the display that we were treated to in the last two years I say there should be grave doubt. Indeed there was doubt, as was displayed on November 8 last in the minds and hearts of all Canadians, as to the ability of these ministers to handle affairs concerning justice in this country.

The ex-minister of justice sitting beside the present Minister of Justice, on that day, November 23, when the matters giving rise to the issues in the Dorion inquiry were first raised, accused me of absolutely lying about the facts that I was presenting at that time, and still had the gall to sit there, as he did last Friday, and maintain the truth of those assertions, when they now have the full judicial arbitration of the commissioner appointed by himself.

Mr. Favreau: What I said is a lie, is a lie, and you know it.

Mr. Nielsen: Then I am in good company with Mr. Justice Dorion.

That gang on the treasury benches are up to their same old tricks; the green carpet gang, that is what they are. They are doing the same thing to Spencer as is their habit. He asks us, sir, to have faith and trust in a ministry that has shown itself incapable of appreciating the barest elementaries of the principles of justice. No wonder, sir, that we cannot have faith in this Minister of Justice or in any of his colleagues in any of the decisions affecting the affairs of justice in the country. He uses words like "innuendo", and the member for Lapointe describes our demands on this side of this house as demagoguery.

Did you notice, Mr. Chairman, that coincidental exchange between the member for Lapointe and the Minister of Justice who read from a prepared answer to the question put by the member for Lapointe.

An hon. Member: He asked him the other day.

Mr. Nielsen: They shouted "innuendo" in November; they shouted "McCarthyism"; they shouted "lies", and all these matters which have come to pass have shown just how wrong they were on that occasion; and yet they will not learn. They do not appreciate the distinction between acting as a chief prosecutor, judge, jury and executioner, and the principles on which the law officers in the Department of Justice operate. They rest their case on the fact that there is insufficient admissible evidence—I think those were the words used by the Minister of Justice—that could or should bring about a conviction. That is not his job. I said this to his predecessor and I say this to him—

Mr. Cardin: Whose job is it.

Mr. Nielsen: It is the job of the law officers of the Crown to consider whether or not there is sufficient there to lay an information, and then they go no further. It becomes the job of the judges of the courts of this country to determine whether or not there is sufficient evidence to obtain a conviction. That is the distinction that his predecessor missed and which got him into trouble—one of the factors—when he was minister, and it is precisely the same distinction which is being missed by the present minister.

Mr. Cardin: It was missed by your government.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen: If the President of the Privy Council does not agree with that interpretation and if the Minister of Justice does not agree with it, then do away with the courts, because there is no more use for them or for judges. For what other purpose are they put there than to determine whether or not there is sufficient evidence on which to base a conviction? That is what they are there for and that is what the courts of the country are there for. The Minister of Justice is not in his position to act as a judge. His law officers are not employed to act as judges. The law officers of the minister's department, as I have said, are there to determine whether or not there is evidence on which to base the laying of an information, and from there on this becomes the responsibility of the courts.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. With the new system we have in the house each time the hon. member for Yukon pounds his fingers on the table we get a noise in our ears.

An hon. Member: That is better than what you say normally.

Mr. Grégoire: I know it is not easy for the hon. member to remember not to hit his desk during arguments of this kind, but I would please ask him to not thump his fingers on the desk, because that is no use to us at all. It just makes a noise.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have always said that the hon. member for Lapointe needs a good thumping. I have listened in the house for several years now to the hon. member for Lapointe and I was delighted to hear his remarks this evening, because they indicate his flexibility and capacity with the English language, that other official language of this country.

Mr. Knowles: The thumping is bilingual.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister dealt at great length with the fact that Spencer admitted his identity. I ask him again to search his memory very carefully and to search his newspaper clippings on his files, and then reconsider what he has said in light of the record. He knows as well as I do about this business of the program, "This Hour Has 7 Days," and about the methods used by the C.B.C. He knows that they cut and splice and cut and splice.

Mr. Cardin: You can say that again.

Mr. Nielsen: I think the expert in this field is the Prime Minister himself, having regard to the famous Pearson film. There were more cuts and splices lying on the cutting room floor after that filming than ever before.

An hon. Member: Have you seen it?

Mr. Nielsen: The minister says that no member of the house has asked about the damage Spencer has done to national security, but what damage would it do to national security if the minister and the government were to accept the reasonable request of the opposition to hold an in camera inquiry? I suggest that not one scintilla of damage would be done to national security.

Mr. Cardin: Why should there be such an inquiry?

Mr. Nielsen: The minister asks why we want an in camera inquiry. We want one to satisfy precisely that attribute which the minister himself holds out as being the acme of parliamentary function and the function of justice in this country: To establish the truth, to establish whether or not the decisions that have been taken by the Prime Minister are good, and to establish whether or not the positions taken by the minister in pre-judgment and in convicting and sentencing Mr. Spencer were good.

Mr. Cardin: Are you going to do that in respect of every decision the government takes?

Mr. Nielsen: We only wish that procedure followed in respect of that one sort of action, and the manner in which that action is taken. We suggest that these matters should be submitted to an independent judicial assessment. As the hon. member for St. John's West—east, up, down or centre—has said, justice must not only be done, it must also appear to be done; and it does not appear to have been done under the present circumstances.

In the time left to me I should like to point out to the minister some remarks made by the Minister of Justice for the province of Quebec in commenting on this debate, as he is reported in the Montreal Star of February 26 last. In that article Mr. Wagner is quoted as having said:

> It has become more and more evident that organized crime, not only in Quebec but in the whole of the country, has created a veritable state of emergency.

Mr. Wagner went on to support the submissions of the opposition, that there be convened a royal commission on crime. I do not see how the minister can excuse any further delay in this matter. His own Prime Minister led the people of this country to believe precisely that which Mr. Wagner said, when he spoke to them last June 29. The impression that was left in the minds of all Canadians who saw and heard him was that government action was going to be taken in order to deal with the situation that Mr. Wagner has described as "a veritable state of emergency". That action can be taken by the convening of a royal commission on crime, and it would not be difficult to set one up.

Mr. Wagner indicated on February 26 that he is going to get this kind of co-operation from that provincial government, and that there is no reason to expect that there will not be the same kind of co-operation from the remainder of the attorneys general of the provinces. Therefore the minister can count on full co-operation in setting up a royal commission on organized criminal activities in this country. I had some doubt after the last federal-provincial conference that Mr. Wagner and the Quebec government would provide that degree of co-operation regarding a royal commission; but after the expression by Mr. Wagner, and the alternative to it of an interpol system, I am glad to know that he has come out in full support of the idea of a royal commission on crime. In this regard the minister need have no qualms that, in my view, the suggestion would meet with any thing but wholehearted acceptance, not only by the province of Quebec but by the others.

I was disappointed not to have received answers to the questions I have placed on the order paper. I should have liked to see those answers today; however, I can wait a little longer. In the interim I have one or two other questions I should like to ask dealing with specific companies and current matters, coincidentally, in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Favreau: Yes, coincidentally.

Mr. Nielsen: What does the President of the Privy Council say?

Mr. Favreau: I said, coincidentally in the province of Quebec. I do not know why you always insist on saying that.

Mr. Nielsen: The companies to which I have reference happen to be incorporated and operating in the province of Quebec. I am sure when the Minister of Justice answers the question I have on the order paper he will deal with those companies mentioned in Toronto, Hamilton, Edmonton and Vancouver, and that other names of companies and other material will then come to light.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

I should like to ask the minister to refer to his officials in order to obtain replies to my questions on the order paper, in so far as they relate to these companies in Montreal; Bercy Construction; Provost Construction, Omer Construction; Taillon Construction, and Deauville or Douville Construction. I mentioned last Friday the name of the Scalia Development Company. I think it is important that the minister refer these particular companies to his officials. I think it may be of importance for his officials perhaps to act in liaison with the Montreal police officials and the Quebec attorney general's department in so far as these companies are concerned.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Cardin: We may not be able to get that information for tomorrow.

Mr. Nielsen: I doubt very much that I will have the questions I have put on the order paper answered by tomorrow. But these are companies that figure in current events in the city of Montreal in the province of Quebec. I will let the matter rest there, in the hope that I can obtain from the minister answers in so far as they relate to these specific companies, and I would hope that when the questions are answered they will be fully and accurately answered in so far as the remainder of the companies and the trustees are concerned.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question? The Minister of Justice of Quebec, Mr. Wagner, said during the week end that if the hon. member for Yukon knows something about the fraudulent bankruptcies in the province of Quebec, it is his duty to give his information to the Minister of Justice of Quebec. Is the hon. member for Yukon ready to do that, or has he done it yet?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, let me say this in answer to my hon. friend's question. I am satisfied that I do not have any information that the Attorney General of Quebec does not have.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit me to also ask him a question? Does not the suggestion that a judicial inquiry be assembled to investigate this case, which is in the very sensitive area of national security, an area that I know is of great concern to every member of this house particularly as it seeks the fundamental objective of safeguarding the liberties of individuals, presuppose the condition that the aggrieved one should be seeking relief?

It is very easy to obtain this relief; this is a free country and it requires only one word to the press. But I notice that in this case the accused has been silent. I think this silence is significant. I should like to hear what the hon. member's views are in this respect.

Mr. Nielsen: Governments exist as an instrument for the people, and not vice-versa. If the Minister of Justice is prepared to stand up and say that Mr. Spencer has been approached and asked whether or not he wishes to have access to the courts, and if he is prepared to say that he wants nothing to do with access to the courts, then fine; I am prepared to accept the situation. But I believe that governments exist to see that justice is done, and we do not wait for this massive rejection of government action before governments act in matters such as this. It is the government's responsibility to see that justice is done to every individual or group however small it might be.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few more words on the case which we have discussed a great deal. I want to start by answering, if I may, in my own way the question which has just been asked and the question interjected by the hon. member for Mount Royal as well, namely as to whether or not Mr. Spencer has asked for relief. Let me ask the hon. gentleman this question. Suppose you have, as in my experience in labour relations I have frequently found, a man who is dealt with unfairly by his employer and he is one of those easy-going, quiet, reserved, timid people—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: Don't laugh. I happen to have made inquiries about Mr. Spencer, for the information of the hon. member for Lapointe, and I happen not to be able to find where Mr. Spencer is, for the information of the hon. member for Lapointe. If I knew where Mr. Spencer is I would find out exactly what he wants or what he does not want done in this case. But he has apparently disappeared and people do not know where he is; at least, those we are in touch with do not know.

I ask the hon. members who have asked this question: If you have a man to whom an injustice has been done by his employer, and he happens to be rather timid and does not raise objection—there are many people who do not fight for their rights themselves—does that make the injustice any the less important; does that make the principle of civil liberty any the less relevant; does that make the taking away of a man's civil right any the less significant—the fact that the man has not himself raised his voice?

The Minister of Justice says, why do we want a judicial inquiry? To answer this question I can use no better language than that of the Prime Minister. We want a judicial inquiry for the reasons the Prime Minister set out as reported in Hansard of 1963 at pages 4044 and 4045:

> The second new requirement is to ensure that a second look is always taken by a separate body before dismissal is finally decided upon. Once the individual is told of security doubts he will have the opportunity to give his side of the case. The employing agency will consider it, consult the staff of the government security panel, and arrive at a conclusion. It may be to accept the person as reliable, in which case no problem arises.

The right hon. gentleman went on:

> It may be to transfer him to a less sensitive employment, as has been the case certainly more than once in the past, where he would not have access to secret and confidential material. But if it is—

I ask the Minister of Justice to listen to the words of his and my Prime Minister:

> But if it is that his dismissal must be recommended, the individual will be given a second hearing, this time by the deputy minister or head of the agency. If that interview does not resolve the doubts, and if the agency head agrees with the view that dismissal is necessary, the whole case and the relevant information, including anything that the employee himself has submitted, will be submitted to a board of review.

This is the point we are making, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Groos: May I have a chance to reply to the question of the hon. gentleman?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Lewis: My question was not directed to the hon. member. I say to he Minister of Justice that there is no more than that in our request. I am not concerned with all the political stuff that has been thrown at the minister by other members; I am not concerned in any of the controversy about whether or not he revealed the name or somebody else revealed the name, and I am not concerned to go back to Dorion, November 8, or anything else. The New Democrats in this parliament, for whom I now speak, are concerned that this board of review mentioned by the Prime Minister conduct the necessary hearing. We call it a judicial inquiry.

We are concerned to make sure that this man does have the chance to have his say before a third party. We are concerned to make sure that this parliament and this country are convinced that justice has in fact been done. I am not questioning—I want to make this clear—the sincerity of the minister; I am not questioning the sincerity of the Prime Minister; I am not questioning the efficiency and the competence of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I am not questioning any of these things. I am saying to the minister that this man, dismissed under section 50 of the Civil Service Act, had no opportunity for an independent review and we are here, as members of parliament, his employer.

We are not asking that this matter be taken to a court, because no one is questioning the legality of the government's action under section 50 of the Civil Service Act; the words are clear. What we are questioning is the morality of the action. What we are questioning is the dismissal of an employee by an employer without the employee's voice being heard by an independent tribunal. It will do no harm to the government, it will do no harm to the security of Canada to have that kind of hearing. I still appeal to the minister to have this kind of appeal.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder whether the hon. member can envisage a situation in which section 50 would be pertinent; or does the hon. member allege that section 50 is redundant and should never be used?

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: First of all, if I had anything to do with it, section 50 would not be there because I do not think you need it. But let me say to the Minister of Agriculture, even though section 50 says you have a right to dismiss, I think the law would put into that the concept of dismissal for cause; our system of justice would put into the words the concept of a fair, impartial hearing, because those things are basic to our system of justice. No matter what language the section uses, if a man is dismissed without a hearing that, in my opinion, is contrary to our way of life.

Mr. Groos: Mr. Chairman, unless I misunderstood the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Groos: He did ask me a question, inasmuch as he asked if I could not consider the case of a shy, retiring person who would not bring forward any argument in his defence.

Mr. Lewis: I did not mean it as a question, but I do not mind it.

Mr. Groos: If I may make an observation, Mr. Chairman, I hardly think the actions of this man Spencer, who brought hinself to the attention—

The Chairman: Order, it being ten o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—SUGGESTED STEP TO PROVIDE GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday on the orders of the day, I put this question to the Minister of Finance: In the preparation of the budget, is the minister looking at the negative income tax as one means of providing a guaranteed annual income? His Honour the Speaker thought it was a question that would be more appropriately placed on the order paper or, to use his words, discussed at a later hour. Well, the later hour has now come.

My purpose in putting this question to the Minister of Finance is to try to get the government to consider what is, to many people, still a new idea. It is not exactly a brand new idea, but it is one about which not much has yet been done. I refer to the general concept of a guaranteed annual income.

As I am sure the minister is aware, much of the new or current thinking that is taking place among social workers and among some of our modern economists is in this very field. It is, of course, related to the tremendous technological changes which are taking place in our society. It is related to the fact that our whole way of life may well be changed by the modern developments that are taking place. The whole concept of our right to the enjoyment of goods and services being related to the number of hours of drudgery or other work which we do may in our time be replaced by the concept of a guaranteed annual income.

In fact, there are some very interesting books on this subject which I would be happy to recommend for the minister's bed-time reading while he is waiting for the Carter report. But all I wish to do at this point is simply to lay this basis for the specific question that I put to the minister.

When I speak, as others do, about a guaranteed annual income for all of our people, I have in mind that there are various ways of achieving it. Measures of social security are one of the ways in which it is done. An increase in the number of things, such as education and other services, which are provided free for all our people is another way to bring about a guaranteed annual income for our people. I hear some questioning in the background that I do not quite get, but I know there are some people who are afraid of this sort of thing and think it will do some damage to the human spirit. I think the very opposite. I believe that the more we free people from drudgery and insecurity, the better will our people respond.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention in a seven-minute overtime period to launch too deeply into the philosophy of the future. I simply wanted to lay this general basis for one of the ways which is being suggested for achieving a guaranteed annual income, and that is the negative income tax.

I notice that even Hansard did not put the phrase "negative income tax" into its heading. As a matter of fact, when I used the word in the house the other day Hansard had to send down to me to make sure that was the word I used. I guess it mystified some people. In fact, I was not really sure whether the minister himself was quite aware of what I was talking about.

The minister could look into the writings of Peter Newman, Mr. Speaker, and discover that he thinks the Liberals are looking at it. The minister will also find that there is some suggestion that it is being looked at by his opposite numbers in Washington. The idea involved in the negative income tax is that we set reasonable income tax exemption levels, and if they are going to be reasonable they should be higher than the ones which we have at the present time. Then we impose taxation above these levels, but in the case of people who earn less than those levels they receive a payment from the state to bring them up to those levels.

This device is thus a means, but only one means, of helping to achieve a guaranteed annual income. Just as today the Minister of National Revenue makes refunds to people who overpay their taxes, I believe the day will come when he will be making this other kind of payment, namely a negative income tax. I am sure that the minister does not want to be thought of only as an ogre who takes money away from people because they make too much of it. I am sure, as a person who has the kind of background I know he has, he would like the incomes of all our people to be brought up to a reasonable level. He would like to subscribe to the principle that no one in this country should fall below certain reasonable and dignified levels of income.

If this is to be accepted as a principle, then I suggest it be accepted more than as a matter of words. Our legislation should be based on it, and I would invite the minister, in the preparation of his budget this year, to take a good look at the negative income tax.

I should now like to ask him the question which I put to him last Wednesday. Is he looking at this matter in the preparation of this year's budget?

• (10:10 p.m.)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I can assure the hon. member that I understood very well the question he asked me the other day. The idea of a negative income tax did not take me by surprise. Indeed I have been interested in this idea for many years and I am very pleased that a member of the New Democratic party should finally become modern in his thinking. One of the problems about the N.D.P. is that they are so hopelessly old-fashioned. It is a hopeful sign that the hon. member's party is now looking at modern ideas in this field, as the Liberals have been doing for many years.

I can recall many years ago one of my friends and colleagues elaborating a complete system involving a guaranteed minimum income for all Canadians from the time they enter the labour force until they die, combined with a related tax structure—the most ingenious and on the whole, I think, the best system of its kind I have ever seen. Needless to say, it was very revolutionary.

May I also point out to the hon. member that the idea of a negative income tax was in fact incorporated into the family allowance legislation introduced by a Liberal government quite some time ago. The family allowance payments are really payments in respect of their children to those who do not have a taxable income. After all, a provision along the lines of a family allowance had been in the Income Tax Act for many years before the family allowance was introduced. The family allowance is really an extension of a payment with respect to children going below taxable income levels. It was the first implementation of this principle of a negative income tax by the Liberal government many years ago. At first family allowances were a substitution for deductions in relation to children. Later it got a little fuzzy in administration but the fundamental principle is still there—that you pay a family allowance to those who do not have income tax liability as well as to those who do.

I do not intend to predict what will be incorporated in the budget, which I hope to bring down reasonably soon. But I should like to assure the hon. member that I personally, and, I think the present Liberal government, believe that all public policy in Canada should be directed toward providing all citizens, regardless of their means of livelihood, or their condition, with an adequate income. I have some doubt whether the negative income tax method of approaching this question is the best in all the circumstances, but as the hon. member has said himself there are many other things which could be done, all directed to that same goal.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING RETIREMENT AGE IN INDUSTRY

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As one of those old-fashioned New Democratic Party members I was shocked and surprised when I received correspondence from trade unionists in Kootenay East who said they had listened to a radio report of an interview given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport with respect to the age up to which a person could work. They were disturbed about this, as I was, and they asked me to put a question in the house to the minister in order to find out whether this statement represented government policy.

On that account I asked the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration the following question on February 24, as recorded at page 1705 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. My question is based on a radio report given to the people of Kootenay East by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. I am informed that the Parliamentary Secretary advocated that persons working in industry should have the opportunity to continue working until age 67. Would the minister inform the house if this represents government policy?

It was at that point that Your Honour intimated this would be a better subject at this hour.

I was really surprised at this report because the Parliamentary Secretary has had long experience as a trade union member and trade union official. I am sure he knows of the efforts of organized labour to reduce the retirement age from 65 to 60, in order to meet the just aspirations of working people generally, and under present circumstances to do something to meet changing conditions due to the rapid development of automation, and so on.

So, Mr. Speaker, I address this question to the minister. I am very pleased to see that the Parliamentary Secretary is in his seat this evening, and no doubt he will give us an explanation of this rather strange report to the people of Kootenay East.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since the designate minister of manpower found it impossible to be in the house at this late hour he has asked me to reply to the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). Essentially, of course, I was speaking as a private member in an interview on a regular broadcast to the people of Kootenay East. Sometimes I have the pleasure and honour of addressing the people of West Kootenay. I believe the interview will also be carried into West Kootenay, and I make no apology for it.

The government, of course, does not determine the employment termination date in any union agreements or pension plans. This is a matter between the unions and employers. The hon. member for Kootenay West must know that the Canada Pension Plan, to which he heartily subscribes, provides that a person who desires to work beyond the age of 65 may do so and collect his pension at age 70, and at age 70 may continue to work while still receiving payments under the Canada Pension Plan.

This matter of retirement and the integration of older people into our society after retirement was of chief concern to the Senate committee which studied the problem. In the Senate committee report it is stated:

> One of the most serious and difficult problems faced by society in relation to old people is that of helping them maintain some satisfying foothold in the community and with it a sense of self-worth.

The report goes on to explain that arbitrarily cutting a man's income off at age 65 does not always work in his best interests and may be discriminatory. The very fact that we say "You are finished" when a person reaches 65 years can be harmful.

It is no surprise to my colleagues in the trade union movement that on occasion I have had to fight to keep members working after age 65, members who had little or no pension. I put up a terrific fight on their behalf, and I am thinking in particular of older people employed during the war and who did not have the opportunity to build up a pension fund. It is people like that I am concerned about, not those who are to some extent adequately cared for by present pension plans. I believe it is an arbitrary measure to say to a man, "You are finished as of your birth date."

I am sure the hon. member for Kootenay West agrees with me in practice if not in theory because, according to Hansard, on two occasions he announced his own retirement. Yet at the age of 71, which is not by any means a venerable age, he still graces the benches of this house.

Mr. Herridge: At the request of the people of Kootenay West.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order please.

Mr. Byrne: I am sure the hon. member will agree—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rinfret): Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Kootenay East replying to the hon. member for Kootenay West, but the time allotted him has expired.

Mr. Byrne: My apologies, Mr. Speaker.

FARM MACHINERY—INCREASED PROFITS BY MASSEY-FERGUSON COMPANY

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that many of the farmers in western Canada were reassured a few weeks ago when a statement was attributed to the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that there would be an investigation into the cost of farm machinery. Since then we have not heard too much about that subject. However, the other morning in reading the Globe and Mail I was a little disturbed by an article there headlined "Massey profit soars; SEC bars comment". I would like to quote briefly from that article:

> Massey-Ferguson Ltd., international farm implement maker, yesterday reported sharp gains in sales and profits for the first quarter ended Jan. 31, 1966. The company said, however, that it is forbidden by the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States to discuss reasons for the profit jump.
> Sales rose 29.3 per cent to $179,500,000 from $138,000,000 in the year-earlier period.

It states further:

> Sales gained in all major geographic areas of the company's operations except Australasia, where there has been severe drought. Largest sales gains were in North America (to $76,600,000 from $51,800,000).

Then there is this comment:

> The SEC will not permit comment on the profit rise because Massey has yet to give full details of a rights offering announced Feb. 16.

Then it goes on to say what Massey said, and we get a sort of inverse reasoning here, because a company can make an omission, or error, and then it would seem to be almost rewarded for it. I was concerned by this because I did expect that the minister was sincere in his intention to have an inquiry into the prices of farm machinery. I would like to ask, first of all, whether it is the intention of the minister to refer the subject of farm machinery prices to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I am sure the farmers in the western provinces in particular will be interested in obtaining reassurance that this investigation is going to go ahead.

In recent years there has been a feeling in western Canada that we pay a high subsidy in respect of farm machinery prices to manufacturers in central Canada. This is a matter which concerns British Columbia very much in the dairy industry, particularly where the costs of the sophisticated machinery used both in the production of the fluid milk and also in the harvesting of the forage crops is an increasingly important cost factor to those people.

We have just had a committee from the Federation of Agriculture present a brief and the most important point they made is that the dairy industry is in a state of crisis at the present time. I am sure they will be very interested in knowing what is the intention of the minister. If this inquiry is referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, can we be assured that that committee will be able to obtain all the facts, and the reasons for the profits and the profit increases in Canada?

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have grave doubts about the propriety of raising a question at ten o'clock which has been ruled out of order by Mr. Speaker. If the question had been ruled out of order for lack of urgency then the question could be properly brought before the house at this time. I would therefore respectfully request that Mr. Speaker take this question under advisement and, if it pleases His Honour, to render a decision at some future time.

I do not, however, wish to stand on a technicality. I want to make a brief reply to the question posed by the hon. member.

On April 30, 1965, as recorded at page 777 of Hansard the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) directed a question to the then minister of finance. I should like to quote that question and the reply which is as follows:

> I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the Minister tell the House if the Government intends to take any action on the Porter Commission recommendation concerning securities administration and control?

The finance minister replied as follows:

> The matter is under study and has been for some time, Mr. Speaker.

The action taken by the S.E.C. is quite proper. Any company which is listed on a foreign stock exchange is required, before making public its profit position, to clear this matter with the S.E.C. This is simply a means of protecting public investors. I am sure the hon. member will be pleased to know that the company in question has met this requirement, and yesterday or today made a statement of its financial position, indicating that it had met this requirement and was in a position to make public its profit position.

I think I would be at liberty to express to the hon. member the fact that in view of this transition there is nothing to prevent the agriculture committee from calling witnesses or dealing with any matter that might be referred to it. The matter of referring machinery prices to the agriculture committee is under study by the government. Whether or not it will be referred to that committee will be announced by the minister in due course.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—RIGHT OF MEMBER FOR MONTMAGNY-L'ISLET TO VOTE IN HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair made reference yesterday to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) some time ago, and indicated I would make a statement today, hoping both hon. members would be in their places. Today we have the opposite situation to that which obtained yesterday in that the hon. member for Yukon is in the house and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Berger) is not, but in view of the fact that notice was given by the Chair yesterday I propose to deliver an opinion about the matter at this time.

On February 21 last the hon. member for Yukon rose in the house on a matter of privilege as to the right of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet to have sat in the house and to have voted on three occasions, the dates of which were subsequent to the date on which the return of his election expenses should have been filed. The hon. member continued his presentation by stating that he simply wanted to draw my attention and that of hon. members to the possible breach of privilege that exists, and ended by seeking the Speaker's guidance in this connection.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) intervened to make the point that section 63 of the Canada Elections Act provides that if members fail to carry out the provisions of the act, there is a remedy provided in the courts, and that therefore this would be a matter for the courts to consider.

I have already brought to the attention of the house the terms of the judgment delivered on February 24 last by Chief Justice Dorion, and perhaps I should not repeat that at this time. I have looked into the matter raised by the hon. member for Yukon and, with a view to being of some assistance to the house, may I be permitted to submit the following comments.

In referring to page 60 of May's seventeenth edition it will be seen that one of the privileges of parliament is for each house to be the sole judge of the lawfulness, or the legality, of its own proceedings, and that:

> —this holds even where the procedure of a house or the right of its members or officers to take part in its proceedings is dependent on statute.

As will also be seen at page 61 of the same edition, Mr. Justice Stephen, in his judgment in the Bradlaugh case, defined the relation between the jurisdiction of the courts and that of the House of Commons, and is reported as follows:

> —I think that the House of Commons is not subject to the control of Her Majesty's court in its administration of that part of the statute-law which has relation to its own internal proceedings . . . It seems to follow that the House of Commons has the exclusive power of interpreting the statute, so far as the regulation of its own proceedings within its own walls is concerned;

And further on we read:

> —for the purpose of determining on a right to be exercised within the house itself, and in particular the right of sitting and voting, the house, and the house alone could interpret the statute but . . . as regarded rights to be exercised out of and independently of the house, such as the right of suing for a penalty for having sat and voted, the statute must be interpreted by this court independently of the house.

Bourinot's fourth edition, at page 390, reads as follows:

> If it should be decided that a member has no right to sit or vote in the house, the votes he may have given during the period of his disqualification will be struck off the Journals.

Dawson in his book "Procedure in the Canadian House" under the heading "The disallowance of votes" says at page 186:

> Occasionally it is necessary to strike out the vote of a member who has participated in a division. The rules surrounding this practice are not clear.

Later on, at pages 190 and 191, he again refers to the matter and says:

> A formal challenge of a vote by another member of the house must be done by a substantive motion that the vote be struck off the division list. This procedure was established in Canada in 1900 when the votes of three members were challenged. At that time the Speaker ruled that he himself had no authority to alter the division lists and that the only remedy was in the hands of the house; any member could make a motion to disallow a vote, the accused member should be heard, and the house could make its decision.

Question of Privilege

• (2:40 p.m.)

Perhaps at this point I should make passing reference to a precedent reported at page 260 of the Debates of the House of Commons for the 22nd of May, 1875, when the Speaker called attention to the fact that a member had taken his seat and voted without having subscribed to the role and taken the oath. The matter was subsequently referred to the committee on privileges and elections and as a result of the committee's report the member's vote was removed from the division list and Journals of the house.

From the references and precedents just quoted it would appear to me:

(a) That, even if there is a penalty provision in section 63 of the Canada Elections Act and whatever may be the terms of the order made by the judge pursuant to the said section in allowing an authorized excuse, the house is still the sole judge of its own proceedings, and for the purpose of determining on a right to be exercised within the house itself which, in this particular case, is the right of one hon. member to sit and to vote, the house alone can interpret the relevant statute.

(b) That the procedure followed in 1875 with regard to the precedent above referred to, which bears resemblance to the case before us, seems to me to indicate that the question was dealt with at the time as being of the nature of a prima facie case of a breach of privilege.

(c) That it is not within the competence of the Speaker to decide as to the question of substance or as to the disallowance of a vote, and that such decisions are to be made by the house itself.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I thank you for the ruling which you have given on the matter of privilege, and say that I would like to study it in more detail before deciding whether any further procedure should be taken.

TRADE

COPPER—CHANGES IN CONTROL OF ORE AND CONCENTRATE EXPORTS

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on January 31 I advised the house that in the interests of orderly marketing and domestic supply it had become necessary to make certain changes in export controls affecting copper scrap, copper alloy scrap and copper bearing scrap. For the same reasons I wish to announce changes in the control of exports of copper ores and concentrates.

The production of copper in Canada depends largely on supply of mine concentrates purchased from or processed for a large number of independent mines. If this supply should be interrupted or diverted elsewhere to any considerable extent it would affect the supply of copper available for use in Canada.

On November 22, when export controls were put on various forms of copper as a precautionary measure, a general export permit was issued for ores and concentrates moving to off-shore destinations. This general export permit is now being revoked and effective March 21 individual permits will be required for shipments to off-shore destinations. The advance notice will provide an opportunity for exporters to apply for permits where required under existing contracts.

It is not the purpose of this move to interfere with supplies moving to smelters abroad under contracts now existing. However, the individual permit requirement will enable the government to prevent diversion to off-shore destinations of ores and concentrates now under contract to Canadian smelters.

This action is also taken under the authority of the Export and Import Permits Act.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for providing us with his statement in advance. I think the house should have further information. This statement is rather general in form. The second last paragraph states that the individual permit requirement will enable the government to prevent diversion to off-shore destinations of ores and concentrates now under contract to Canadian smelters.

I think there should be an explanation in this regard. What companies actually are affected by this? What is being done that has made necessary these changes? Second, I would like to point out one fact; that once you establish the principle of individual permits being required, the great danger is that unless administratively carried out in fairness and equity the door is open to discrimination.

I would like the minister to give the house and the country some further information in this regard. Certainly the course being taken is of an extraordinary character in the light of recent circumstances; therefore, I think an explanation in greater detail should be given.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the minister for this announcement, and will reserve any statement as to our final position until we see what this really means. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and the government the fact that we feel more attention should be paid to an attempt to develop the processing side of the metal mining industry in Canada. It is very easy to understand, and you do not have to study too deeply to know, that in the metal mining industry the vast majority of jobs are in the processing rather than in the extraction of these minerals. I think the policy has existed far too long whereby, while extraction of our natural resources is done here, the great majority of jobs are available in the processing field in foreign countries. The government must realize and take the necessary steps to see that more of our resources are processed here in this country rather than elsewhere.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we have listened closely to the statement just made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) with regard to the control of copper exports.

I fully agree with the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) who said that the government should define more clearly its export policy in general, but, in this case, on copper.

I represent a copper producing area myself and we are all anxious to see the government take the responsibility of establishing secondary industries in our area, in order to process on the spot, here in Canada, metals such as copper.

Now, I believe that the statement of the minister is not very clear in the circumstances. Something is abolished, something else is added; other restructions are applied, while others no longer apply, and so on and so forth.

This is a hodgepodge the majority of Canadians will not understand. Consequently, the minister should be clearer and more precise in his statement and let us know what the government intends to do not only concerning the copper producers but also processing in this country, so that we can sell finished products outside Canada, because such exports would be profitable.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, speaking very briefly on the announcement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, let me say that we assume the situation that has necessitated these decisions regarding the export of copper relates to our own needs and the fact that copper is becoming less plentiful on the foreign markets than it has been.

I want to support the statement made by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin). The needs of the Canadian market and the Canadian people will never be met adequately until a greater degree of our natural resources, copper in this instance, are not only extracted but also processed and finished within this country.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REARRANGEMENT OF DEPARTMENTS TO BE CONSIDERED IN SUPPLY

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to make a short statement concerning the business of the house, which I believe will be of interest to hon. members and will give them information about the procedure we propose to follow when government orders are called today.

• (2:50 p.m.)

It will be recalled that on February 9 last the Prime Minister announced the meeting of the joint United States-Canadian ministerial committee on trade and economic affairs in Washington on March 4 and 5. That meeting necessitates the absence of five ministers from the house on Thursday and Friday, if they are to keep their commitments at that meeting. The ministers are the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Industry, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

It will be apparent to many hon. members that there might not be adequate time before Thursday to discuss the estimates of these departments, and in order that there should be an opportunity to deal with them before then the government proposes that when the house resolves itself into committee of supply today the estimates of these departments be called one after the other, not necessarily in the order I have indicated. We would postpone consideration of the estimates of the Department of Justice until the estimates of these five departments are completed, and would then immediately resume the estimates of the Department of Justice.

Business of the House

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, could the minister give us a general idea of the order in which these estimates will be called? What will be the first department and the second one?

Mr. McIlraith: If this is agreeable, Mr. Speaker, we would call finance, trade and commerce, industry, agriculture and then mines and technical surveys. I suggest that we forgo the private members' hour today and tomorrow in view of the fact that we have referred some 20 private members' bills to committees and have indicated that we will make government time available for private members' bills on capital punishment. If this arrangement is agreeable, Mr. Speaker, we would ask to have it made an order of the house now.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): That is agreeable to us, Mr. Speaker. The only undertaking we would like to have is that the forgoing of private members' hours will not mean that this time is lost entirely to private members but will be made available at some future date.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker; my suggestion was that it merely be postponed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to agree to the suggestions the government house leader has made. I should like to say that very clearly, because I thought from what I heard earlier there was something else in his mind, but he did not put that something else on the record so I do not have to be concerned about it. We are prepared to agree to the suspending of consideration of the estimates of the Department of Justice and to our taking up the estimates of the five departments the minister named. We are prepared to agree that the private members' hours of today and tomorrow be postponed until a later time; and we are prepared to try to get the estimates of these five departments through by tomorrow evening.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues has suggested that I add the words "provided the ministers co-operate".

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, we are happy to co-operate in the program as outlined by the minister.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Speaker: Shall it be an order of the house that private members' hours for today and tomorrow be postponed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRADE

COPPER—CHANGES IN CONTROL OF ORE AND CONCENTRATE EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I direct these questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the statement he made today. I would ask him to answer the two questions I raised during the course of my earlier remarks, and in addition these questions. Were the restrictions on copper exports, following upon similar restrictions imposed in the United States, undertaken at the request of the United States? To what countries and what regions has Canadian copper been diverted, and are any of the countries to which the diversion has taken place or is expected to take place behind the iron curtain or within the communist sphere of influence?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the action was not taken at the request of the United States. It was based on domestic policy in an endeavour to assure a supply of copper to the greatest extent possible for domestic use. There have been no diversions of concentrates or ores. This is just an attempt to get our house in order so that any contracts that might be on the verge of being terminated between the suppliers of concentrates and smelters will come before us for consideration before they are renewed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have a question with respect to the granting of individual permits. Will those permits be granted on the basis of equality and without any suggestion of discrimination as between applicants?

Mr. Winters: To the best of my ability that will be done, sir.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. As I understand it, scrap copper is not included in this order. My question is, why did the minister not include the export of scrap copper to the United States?

Mr. Winters: Controls were imposed on the export of scrap several weeks ago, but we still maintain the principle of open border between the United States and Canada which has prevailed for some time. To the best of my knowledge there is very little scrap moving back and forth across the border.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): In view of some of the remarks which were made on the minister's statement, which would indicate that the statement dealt with the export of copper, I would like a clarification. Am I correct in assuming that this is in regard to the export of concentrates and ores, and not finished copper?

Mr. Winters: That is exactly right. The whole object is to preserve the supply of copper in Canada for secondary producers of copper products.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

VICTOR GEORGE SPENCER—REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the concern which has been expressed on both sides of the house with reference to the case of Victor G. Spencer, I want to ask the Prime Minister if he would give consideration, between now and when the Justice estimates come back before the committee of supply, to reconsider his former decision and agree to an in camera hearing for Spencer before a properly constituted inquiry.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice set forth the position of the government in this matter yesterday, and I am glad to be able to confirm that position.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EDMONTON, ALTA.—NEW STATION POSTERS IN ENGLISH ONLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport?

The minister is no doubt aware of the new C.N.R. station in Edmonton, Alberta, but is he also aware of the fact that all the posters inside this huge railway station are unilingual and that they do not contain one word of French? Would the minister be prepared to see to it that bilingualism is respected in Alberta just as it is in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's representations have been placed before the minister, and as his question is not that urgent, I would suggest to the hon. member to place it on the order paper.

FIRE

INVESTIGATION INTO LOSS OF RESIDENCE OF QUEBEC LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister?

It has to do with the fire which destroyed the Quebec Lieutenant Governor's residence and is based on a reply the Prime Minister gave to the house last Tuesday when he said he had talked with the Quebec Premier about the details of the fire. He added that the Premier of Quebec was going to report to him in greater detail. Can the Prime Minister tell us if he has received a preliminary report on the causes of the fire and, if so, whether he intends to table that report?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the provincial government concerned made an inquiry into the origin of the fire. That report has already been made public. I should be glad to send a copy to my hon. friend. The report shows that in all probability the fire was due to a fault in the electric wiring.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question which also concerns the events that took place last week?

Could the Prime Minister tell us if the appointment of the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec was made on the recommendation of the premier of that province?

[English]

SHIPPING

PAUL HALL—POSSIBLE INTERFERENCE WITH CANADIAN OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Whereas Mr. Charles H. Millard, of the board of trustees of the Maritime Transportation Union, has deplored the cynical and irresponsible actions of men like Paul Hall and Hal C. Banks, would the minister inform the house if in view of the recent statements by Paul Hall, this man is in a position to interfere with the operation of Canadian ships.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RETENTION IN CUSTODY OF COMPANY FILES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and it becomes urgent in view of the fact that his estimates have been held up. Will the minister assure us that the files of the five companies, the names of which I placed on Hansard yesterday and the day before, have not been and will not be removed from official custody, and that proper measures are being taken to safeguard their continued existence intact?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has charges to make against that company or any company, against me, or against the government let him do so immediately and stop fooling around.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We heard that last year.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the minister is a little sensitive. He obviously did not hear my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: My question was, will the minister assure us that the files of the five companies, the names of which I placed on record yesterday and the day before have not been and will not be removed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister, as I gather, has replied. Order, please.

Mr. Starr: It was a stupid answer.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who asked the question may not be satisfied with the reply, but he knows that according to the rules he cannot insist on a reply at all, and when he does get a reply, even if he does not think it is adequate he has to accept it.

Mr. Nielsen: May I sir, ask the minister another question. Will the minister assure us that the files respecting the five companies that I have already mentioned have not been removed from official records, and that they will not be removed but will be maintained intact?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that I have to give the hon. member assurance for something that is normally done in the Department of Justice.

Mr. Nielsen: Whose responsibility is it, then?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GHANA—INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the financial crisis that faces the country of Ghana and the threat of famine which has been announced by the new head of state in that country, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us whether he has responded to the request for food aid which has been publicized today.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been no formal request to Canada for such aid.

ZAMBIA—SUGGESTED CANADIAN WITHDRAWAL FROM OIL AIRLIFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. May I ask him, in view of the cost to Canada of approximately $50,000 a day for the oil lift into Zambia, and reports coming in again today that Rhodesia is getting rather large quantities of oil, whether the government is looking into these reports to find out whether these expenditures on behalf of the Canadian government are ineffective and useless.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into this matter again since my hon. friend asked a question somewhat along these lines the other day. The government is of the opinion, as are other participating governments, that this is a desirable and necessary form of assistance at this time to bring about a realization of the objectives of sanctions.

[Later]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I should like the Secretary of State for External Affairs to inform the house whether or not the government is attempting to ascertain if Rhodesia is obtaining 75,000 gallons of gasoline per day from Portugal as well as other places such as South Africa so that we can find out whether the expense Canada is incurring is justified.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that some supplies have come from one or two countries. However, there has been some exaggeration in respect of the amount of the supplies which are reported to have come clandestinely from these particular nations. The commonwealth sanctions committee is reviewing this whole problem. The matter is under constant study and I am sure the actions taken, including that taken by the United States the day before yesterday, will have useful results for the program of sanctions.

INVESTIGATION BY U.S. GOVERNMENT OF REPORTED DANGER SPOTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether there is any foundation whatever for the allegations in the press, that are again repeated, that the United States government on direction of the Pentagon has sent out groups of professors for the purpose of looking into danger spots in various parts in the world, including Cuba, Yemen, the Congo and Canada. Did the government make any protest in regard thereto, because the statement goes into a great deal of detail and repeats what was said very recently.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is a starred question on the order paper, I think by the hon. member for Kamloops, asking for information on this particular point. A reply to that question is being prepared and will be given tomorrow.

[Later]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I revert to the question I asked a while ago, to which the Prime Minister replied that the hon. member for Kamloops had placed a similar question on the order paper. I take it he was referring to question No. 689, which reads:

> Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs or any official of the department had any communication with any official of the government of the United States concerning any proposed activities to be carried out in Canada by, or under the direction of, the special operations research office of American university—

And so on. That is not the question I asked at all. The question I asked had to do with an investigation by the Pentagon into alleged danger spots including Canada, a most unusual course for any foreign nation to take. When the Prime Minister's office was asked about this yesterday the answer was "We never heard of it". That is what the press reports.

I now ask the Prime Minister to given an answer to the question I asked, which is quite different from that asked by the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Pearson: There was another question on the order paper, question No. 590, on this specific point. I admit that question No. 689 might not have been exactly on the point raised by the right hon. gentleman. However, I do not mind answering a starred question at this time. We might be able to add something to the reply tomorrow, the answer is not finally prepared.

The answer is: There has been no communication with any official of the government of the United States about any proposed activities to be carried out in Canada by or under the direction of the special operations research office of American University, and inquiries I have made indicate that no official of my department has at any time received any proposal concerning such activities by American University from any official of the government of the United States. That is in answer to starred question No. 689.

Question No. 590 asks:

> 1. During the last few years, have socio-psychological investigations been conducted by or on behalf of the American military authorities in Canada?

The answer to that is, no. The question continues:

> 2. If such is the case, has the Canadian government been consulted or informed about them, or has it participated in these investigations?

The answer to that is "Answered by 1 above".

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the Prime Minister for that answer. I now ask the question directly; did the Pentagon at any time, or anyone on behalf of the Pentagon, or did Mr. McNamara, the United States Secretary of Defence, have any communication with the government of Canada regarding an investigation being conducted into certain parts of Canada designated by that investigation as danger spots?

Mr. Pearson: No. To my knowledge no such communication has been sent or received, but that is exactly what we are looking into to make sure that no official or no member of the administration has received any such request. I have no knowledge of it. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has received nothing. To the best of our knowledge no such request has been received.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Will the right hon. gentleman inform the house whether he is aware that such an investigation as was referred to by the Leader of the Opposition has been made by some Americans? Has the government investigated who has been making these inquiries and for what purpose?

Mr. Pearson: I do not know what Americans have investigated what. I am talking about official communications between the two governments.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member was making a statement rather than asking a question.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister whether there have been any communications on this matter from the government of Canada to Washington, regardless of whether or not communications have been received?

Mr. Pearson: To my knowledge, no; but if there is anything we can discover between now and tomorrow to add to what I have said, I will let hon. members know. We have no information about any such request or about any exchange of information between the two governments or between the Canadian government and the American University.

NATO—SWEDISH PROPOSAL RESPECTING NON-DISSEMINATION TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is Canada supporting the initiative of Mrs. Myrdal, the spokesman for Sweden at the 17-nation disarmament conference, in which she called on the nuclear powers to remove the major obstacle to a non-dissemination treaty, namely the proposals for nuclear sharing in NATO?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend for giving me notice of his question. As he knows, Canada has been considering the proposed non-proliferation agreement and we have supported the position taken by the western powers with regard to a non-proliferation treaty.

[Mr. Pearson.]

I have seen a report of the remarks attributed to Mrs. Myrdal, the representative of Sweden, and I am advised that the report is not an accurate one, that she did not say that the nuclear sharing arrangements of NATO necessarily stood in the way of such an agreement. My own view, in so far as any proposals for nuclear sharing in NATO are concerned, is that they do not in my judgment warrant the view that they prejudice the realization of a non-proliferation agreement.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION IN TRUCKING STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him what report he can now make of progress respecting the dispute of truckers in Ontario.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): It is not a very encouraging one, Mr. Speaker. As a result of some developments over the week end, negotiations which seemed to have been proceeding reasonably satisfactorily last week appear to have broken down. I am awaiting a further report which I have requested.

Mr. Starr: In view of this unsatisfactory progress, as the minister now admits, will he not lend his good offices to an endeavour to bring the disputing parties together and effect a settlement? I say that because of the fact that this strike has been so prolonged now, and strife is evident in many instances.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, this is a legal strike. It comes within the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. When I receive the report, then I will consider it. It is my responsibility under the act, and I still do not feel that it is appropriate to take action at this time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED STRIKE DEADLINE BY WRITERS AND PERFORMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State in her capacity as minister reporting for broadcasting in Canada. I see she is out of the house just now; perhaps her parliamentary secretary could take this as notice. Bearing in mind the reported two week strike deadline set by C.B.C. writers and performers, could the minister make a full statement with reference to this situation?

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall take the question as notice.

[English]

TRADE

MATTERS TO BE DISCUSSED AT CANADA-U.S. MINISTERIAL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct two questions to the Minister of Finance. Both deal with the agenda for the discussions in Washington on March 4 and 5 between representatives of Canada and the United States. The first has to do with the securities exchange commission. Is the question of the establishment of a national securities commission in Canada to be discussed with the United States in the light of the recommendations of the Porter commission? Second, does the agenda contemplate a discussion of the relationship between the national energy board and the federal power commission in the light of the obligation to move gas from western Canada to eastern Canada through the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I point out to the hon. member that the estimates of the Department of Finance will be considered later this afternoon and that the points raised in this question might be discussed at that time.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN CLASSIFICATION OF RADIO OPERATORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Having in mind the imminent danger of a staff shortage of radio operators would the minister impress on his colleague responsible for the Civil Service Commission the necessity for changing the structure of the class of the civil service commonly known as radio operators, this step having been delayed now for three years?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this question could be placed on the order paper.

FISHERIES

SEALS—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition addressed a question to the Prime Minister, asking whether there has been any effective change in the regulations so that Canadians may be assured that cruel and inhumane practices may end in the sealing industry.

As I have indicated in the house on previous occasions, there have been gross exaggerations in press articles referring to the inhumane killing of seals. With the advent of an air operation a few years ago, many persons who were inexperienced and new to the operation entered it and I have no doubt this could have resulted in some inhumane or improper practices. No experienced sealer would undertake to skin a live seal nor could it benefit him in any way to do so.

In this regard I have received in recent months a number of letters from S.P.C.A. officials, representatives of humane societies and others who have made a point of seeing for themselves the sealing operations in the gulf of St. Lawrence. All, almost without exception, have agreed that the Department of Fisheries has introduced effective changes in the regulations with a view to preventing any cruel and inhumane killing during the seal operation. It is also recognized that adequate measures have been introduced to preserve the seal herds for future profitable operations.

Only a few days ago I received a letter sent by the three major companies operating ships in the sealing industry in the Gulf area stating that a widely publicized film of sealing operations shows completely false scenes designed to create the impression that the sealing industry uses cruel and inhumane killing methods. Among the regulation amendments last year was a specific prohibition against skinning live seals. This regulation is, of course, continuing in effect during this year's operations. There are this year specific regulations designed to control killing methods.

In 1965 we had a specially selected team of fishery officers supervising the operation. Such a team will again be operating this year. Each sealing vessel will have an officer on board during the entire operation. Aircraft operations will be supervised by officers at land bases and on aircraft patrol. Representatives of conservation and humane societies will visit the site of sealing operations in the gulf of St. Lawrence, with the assistance of our patrol officers.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in commending the Minister of Fisheries for his very full report I suggest that he might look at the March 5 issue of Maclean's magazine, which carries an article dealing with the skinning of live seals. I would ask him to look at that; possibly he would then have further information in this connection.

Mr. Robichaud: I shall certainly do this, Mr. Speaker. Furthermore, I wish to inform the house that it is my intention on opening day, March 7, to be on the ice myself and see personally what is going on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Later:]

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and I regret I failed to get it in as a supplementary. What precautions are being taken to see that helicopters and planes do not fly over the seals while they are giving birth to their young?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, because of my deep concern for the welfare of the Minister of Fisheries, would he advise the house whether he intends to land on the iceflows and how long he intends to stay there?

ACTIVITIES OF PATROL BOAT IN BAY OF FUNDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries before he heads for the sealing grounds. I should like to have some information on a problem closer to his home and mine. In view of his recent announcement that a patrol boat is to be built at Meteghan for patrol duties in the waters of the Bay of Fundy, I would like to ask him whether the patrol boat is to keep New Brunswick fishermen away from Nova Scotia waters or to continue to keep Nova Scotia fishermen away from the New Brunswick shore?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, all four Atlantic provinces are part of Canada.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

WATER RESOURCES

PEMBINA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he now in a position to give me an answer to the question I asked yesterday with regard to the report of the International Joint Commission respecting development of the Pembina river project in Manitoba and North Dakota?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the International Joint Commission, through its chairman, has informed me the matter will be discussed at their meeting in Washington at the end of this month. At that time the commission expects to receive additional information to supplement the earlier report of the international Pembina river engineering board.

NATIONAL PARKS

REQUEST FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF RECREATIONAL PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Because of the growing pressure on our park resources, and particularly in the light of the current representations from the government of Alberta, would the minister use his good offices to encourage the government of Canada to implement the recreational park program that has been under consideration for the past four years?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to acknowledge the receipt of a brief from the province of Alberta in respect of the national parks in that province. It is too large a brief for me to make a detailed response today. I shall later, but I thought it was an unusual brief because I find that with respect to the total park space in the provinces, combined federal and provincial parks, the province of Alberta is in third position because it has not provided provincial parks to any degree whatsoever.

The matter that the hon. member raises will certainly be viewed in the light of the representations made by the province of Alberta.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE CRIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Particularly in view of the fact that consideration of his estimates has been adjourned, would he and the government be prepared to accept the suggestion of the minister of justice of the province of Quebec that the only way to find out the real leaders of crime in Canada is to set up a royal commission to investigate crime?

Mr. Pickersgill: What about Nielsen?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is a question which seems to be of a very general nature and not the type that should be allowed at this time.

Mr. Woolliams: Perhaps I can make it very specific. Is the minister prepared to set up a royal commission to investigate crime in this country?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, of course, knows that last autumn there was a federal-provincial conference of the attorneys general at which we discussed the whole question of crime. That conference is to resume later this year. But it may be significant to note that the attorney general of the province of Quebec did not mention anything about a royal commission at the meeting last autumn, and so far I have given no consideration to that suggestion.

[Translation]

[Later]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

Is the minister willing to consider the Quebec Justice Minister's suggestion concerning the establishment of a Canadian Interpol?

[English]

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, a committee was agreed upon at the federal-provincial conference to consider the question of Interpol and it is still meeting regularly.

AIR CANADA

WINNIPEG—REPORT OF INQUIRY RESPECTING MAINTENANCE BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can he do today what he said yesterday he would try to do today? Can he tell us where the Thompson report is?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Most of it has been completed and is being translated. I am informed the concluding sections are still being prepared but it is expected they will be ready very shortly and as soon as the document has been completely translated and printed it will be presented to the government. It is felt this is the wisest course to take because it is assumed there will be some general interest in the report. I might commend to other commissions the practice of having their documents translated as they go along.

Mr. Knowles: As a supplementary question, will it be tabled as soon as it has been presented to the government?

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course the commission is to report to the Governor in Council and I would think the Governor in Council should be allowed to exercise a certain measure of judgment and discretion in this matter. But in view of the avid interest of a great many people I would imagine it would be hard not to satisfy that interest.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister following his meeting with the Premier of New Brunswick in Toronto over the weekend. Could he tell the house whether he has promised to support New Brunswick's fight against poverty and to increase family allowances in the near future?

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO REFUNDS TO EMPLOYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. On February 15 I asked him what steps he was taking to have refunds made to employers who oversubscribed in their contributions to the Canada Pension Plan. Has the minister anything further to say in this regard? My question arises again because of the great number of representations received and in view of the fact that there is about $5 million involved.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, a method of making such refunds has not yet been found by my department. I think this does not indicate any laxity on our part, because in the United States they have been looking for 20 years for a method of making such refunds.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINDSOR—PROSPECTIVE LAY-OFF OF FORD WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman) put a question to me concerning lay-offs in Windsor.

I wish to inform him that two representatives of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Department of Industry are in Windsor at present. They were to meet both parties today; as a matter of fact, I believe they were to meet the officers of the company this morning and those of the union this afternoon. Those two representatives will submit a report without delay.

[English]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for his reply to the question I asked yesterday but I would ask him whether he can assure the house that no lay-offs will take place while negotiations are proceeding.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker. I am not in a position to give such an assurance to the house, because I have no authority to do so.

SHIPBUILDING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the right hon. the Prime Minister arising out of his tabling the other day of a letter which he wrote to the Premier of British Columbia concerning the shipbuilding subsidies on vessels constructed for the province's ferry services. In view of a reported suggestion of the Premier of British Columbia that his reply to the Prime Minister's letter should be tabled in the house, will the Prime Minister agree to do this and if he has written a reply to the reply would he also table that?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to do that.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—ARRANGEMENTS FOR MEETING RESPECTING SAFETY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Transport relating to the intended meeting regarding safety measures on the St. Lawrence river. Could I ask the minister whether arrangements definitely have been made for such a meeting, and whether the minister is going to attend?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, what is proposed is a series of meetings on various topics. The minister's attendance will depend on all the circumstances involved. Consultations are now going on with all interested parties, I am informed, in respect of the matter.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Am I to understand that the minister has not decided not to attend and that it is still an open question so far as he is concerned?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it is an open question. I doubt that the minister would be likely to attend all meetings.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ACCEPTANCE OF MAIL BEARING RHODESIAN STAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Can the minister tell the house whether the Canadian postal services are accepting mail bearing the stamps of the provisional or de facto government in Rhodesia?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, they are not.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture concerning the new dairy policy. As the new dairy year is starting in a few days, is the minister in a position to tell us where we stand in the count-down before the launching or the placing into orbit of the new dairy policy which is intended to guarantee Canadian milk producers a minimum price of $4 per hundredweight for industrial milk.

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West) moved that the first report of the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs presented to the house on Tuesday, February 22, 1966, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest to the house that this report be dealt with in a way that would make it apply only to today's sitting of the committee.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): That would be agreeable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gray: It is for the purpose of hearing witnesses who have come from some distance.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the hon. member shall have leave to amend the motion to apply to one day's sitting only?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion as amended?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Batten in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Administration—

1. Departmental administration including administration of the Guaranteed Loans Acts, the salaries and expenses of the inspector general of banks' office, and grants as detailed in the estimates, $3,862,800.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make any statement of substance at this time, but I thought as a means of expediting the work of the committee I should point out what is well known, I think, to most members and that is that I am the minister responsible for the Department of Finance and also the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. I suggest to the committee, in order to proceed in an orderly fashion, that perhaps we could deal with the items in the Department of Finance and then proceed with say the statutory item related to the temporary wheat reserves and there discuss the administration of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Starr: No, Mr. Chairman. I think we should proceed as we always do on these estimates, that is, take the first item and then proceed consecutively until we complete the department.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. member did not understand that under the finance estimates there is nothing dealing with the Canadian Wheat Board and I am suggesting I am quite ready, after dealing with the finance estimates, to proceed with some item which would enable us to discuss the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board. In the 1966-67 estimates there will be transferred to my administration certain statutory items which appear now under the Department of Trade and Commerce. I thought this might be an orderly way of dealing with the discussion. This was my only suggestion.

Mr. Nasserden: I think it would be desirable if we were allowed to discuss the Canadian Wheat Board on the first item of the Department of Finance as well because this is the minister who is responsible.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the difficulty is that this item is included in another department. This suggestion was made to the committee in an attempt to overcome this difficulty.

Mr. Nasserden: I suggest there is no use quibbling about it because we are going to discuss that aspect in any event. The responsible minister is here in the house so surely we should be given the opportunity to discuss the wheat board under the first item.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I made the suggestion only to be helpful to the hon. member for Rosthern, because the item before the committee does not relate to the subject at all. My suggestion would provide a formula which would give hon. members an opportunity to discuss the wheat board in this committee. That is what was being suggested.

The Chairman: Shall vote No. 1 carry?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to start with the Canadian Wheat Board as I know there is going to be discussion of this subject. I am quite happy to take part in that discussion and I have no objection to dealing with the Canadian Wheat Board at this time. If that is what we are going to do I should first like to make a brief statement.

The Chairman: Order, please. Does the committee agree that we should now discuss the wheat board?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, will it be necessary to call an item in the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce in order that this subject can properly be discussed?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the items relating to the Canadian Wheat Board which now come under my jurisdiction are statutory items. They are not callable in the ordinary sense but are subject to statutory approval. It was in an effort to help the committee in dealing with the estimates of the Department of Finance as such and the estimates of the Canadian Wheat Board later that I made my first suggestion. I have no objection to whichever way the committee wants to handle the matter but if we are going to deal with the Canadian Wheat Board under the first item, which is a possible way of dealing with it, I want to make a short statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I believe it would be more sensible for us to start with the finance estimates since they are the estimates under discussion. Later, I will have no objection to coming back to the Canadian Wheat Board estimates. I believe we should start with the estimates of the finance department.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, we are trying to expedite things and the minister has shown a very great willingness to have this question discussed under item No. 1. If other members want to discuss other subjects under item No. 1 there is no reason they cannot do so. I can see no objection to the procedure suggested. We are trying to co-operate in bringing about a reasonably early examination which will not be unnecessarily lengthened. For that reason I think there must be general agreement that the wheat board can be discussed under item No. 1.

[The Chairman.]

The Chairman: Does the committee now agree that the wheat board can be discussed under item No. 1?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal in this brief statement with the question of procedure raised the other day when I followed what I considered to be sound parliamentary practice in attempting on motions to table the order in council in which the government approved the final payment by the wheat board, and the press release made by the Canadian Wheat Board that day. Members of the opposition in remarks made outside the house accused me of arrogance, cowardice and some other attributes that I am a little too modest to recall at this time. May I be permitted to plead not guilty and to explain why I followed the procedure I did.

I followed this procedure for what I consider to be excellent reasons and reasons which I believe should appeal to the house. Since taking responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board in 1963 I have been very much concerned about establishing the respective responsibilities of the Canadian Wheat Board under the Canadian Wheat Board Act and the responsibilities of the minister who answers for the wheat board in this house.

Hon. members will perhaps recall that when I took over responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board I made a very significant change in the method of dealing with that board. Originally there had been a tendency, particularly under the previous administration, on the part of the minister which caused a good deal of confusion as to his responsibilities and the responsibilities of the Canadian Wheat Board. I was not here to listen to the statements but it is very difficult in reading what was said by the minister who was responsible at that time to determine whether he was boasting about the achievements of the Canadian Wheat Board or taking credit for them.

When I took office I decided I was going to attempt, if I could, to clarify this relationship in the minds of the farmers, members of parliament and the public at large. The form of the first announcement I made in this house relating to the wheat board was very different from any announcement made previously by any minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, and I went back through the records to see what the practice had been. In the first statement I made, and I have adhered to this form every since, I said that the Canadian Wheat Board was that day making a certain announcement in Winnipeg. In doing so I was very much influenced by the views of the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board.

The advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board is composed, as hon. members at least from the west know, of some of the most eminent leaders of the farming community in western Canada, as I recall it, the presidents of the three western wheat pools, the president of the United Grain Growers and representatives from farmers' unions.

I should like to state what those eminent gentlemen suggested because it is pertinent to the procedure I have been following consistently in this house. I am sorry I have not got the date of their suggestion but it was that when the board has any payments to make these announcements should be made by the board and not by the minister, the minister, because if the government makes the announcement the producers get the idea they are receiving government money. Therefore I have been very careful in all the statements I have made to make it clear to the western farmers that the Canadian Wheat Board is their agency responsible to them and that the minister does not interfere with the operations of that board.

On many, many occasions, Mr. Chairman, I have made that fact quite clear in this house. Indeed, hon. members will recall the first statement I made in the house when I announced the conclusion of the first agreement, made while this government has been in office, between the Canadian Wheat Board and Communist China. At that time I said the credit for this went to the wheat board and not to me. This caused a great deal of comment in western Canada to the effect that for the first time a minister responsible for the wheat board was giving full credit to the wheat board, which deserved the credit. This related to that first transaction and to the transaction which preceded it in respect of which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle made a trip to Hong Kong in an attempt to get in on some of the credit for that great transaction.

I therefore decided on this occasion to carry this process of administrative clarification one step further, because on the previous occasions when I had been making these announcements all I said was "the Canadian Wheat Board is today making the following announcement in Winnipeg". Therefore I decided that, rather than cause any further confusion as to the relationship between the minister and the board, the best thing, the sound parliamentary practice under the circumstances, was for me to table in the house the statement made by the Canadian Wheat Board that day. My reading it into Hansard made no difference to the statement and if I read it, it would appear that I was somehow taking responsibility for some announcement of government policy. There was no government policy involved. This was simply a statement by the Canadian Wheat Board of the results of their operations during the crop year 1964-65.

This was not arrogant nor was it intended to be arrogant; nor, may I say, have I any qualms at all about discussing this announcement on these estimates or at any other time. This is the time to discuss these things. I answered questions about the announcement in the house that day; I was ready to answer as many as were put to me.

May I say in conclusion that there is no suggestion that I was trying to duck any responsibility. That was the farthest thing from my mind. I think that in the very difficult circumstances that prevailed with respect to the marketing of the 1964-65 crop the Canadian Wheat Board did an excellent job.

Mr. Jorgenson: They did but you failed miserably in your responsibility.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, we all have some responsibility to get these estimates through in view of the impending end of the financial year. However, I must observe in all frankness that the minister's statement today indicates that he has no political judgment either out in the country or in handling the feelings of members of the house with regard to our responsibilities to the people of Canada.

The argument put forward by the minister today in his opening statement is nothing more nor less than a political argument that has been fought in western Canada since the change of government in April, 1963. We in western Canada gave our answer loud and clear last November 8 with regard to how we felt about the arguments of the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton: The minister has made two main points. One is that he has tried to establish in the minds of the public the respective responsibilities of the Canadian Wheat Board and the minister in charge of that board. All I can say in reply to that argument is that it goes back to the same sort of thing we had to endure from ministers of Liberal governments from 1945 right up to 1957.

I refer to the attitude that the Canadian Wheat Board is a separate power unto itself, that it has no responsibility to the people who set it up. This attitude is completely erroneous and morally wrong. The farmers have put their fate in the hands of the Canadian Wheat Board and the only place they have for their views to be represented effectively is this House of Commons. We do have an advisory committee but every member of that committee with one exception is a representative of the various organizations dealing with grain. The one exception is the man we always appoint as a matter of tradition, a farmers' union representative.

I point that out because the political issue raised by the Minister of Finance today must be given an answer once and for all. The people have accepted and like the idea of the wheat board marketing their grain. They recognize that it is a socialistic type of operation, they recognize that they have given up their freedom in this regard, but they do expect somebody and some organization to speak for them. This point has to be realized by the minister. This is where a previous minister and his deputy minister let us down. The actions of Mr. Howe, or his lack of action, were what destroyed not only Mr. Howe but Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. Sharp: I thought it was the pipe line.

Mr. Hamilton: If you go back and read Mr. Gardiner's statements made in the west during the five or six years before 1957, you will find that over and over again he begged his farm audiences not to blame him for what Mr. Howe was doing but to point the finger at Mr. Howe. I do not know what Mr. Howe's personal thoughts were. All I know is the end result of the type of action he carried out and that was a lack of interest on his part in the Canadian Wheat Board and a lack of defence of the farmers' interests.

To be precise, Mr. Chairman, what are the farmers' interests? Once you commit yourself to a controlled system of marketing grain such as we have under the Canadian Wheat Board there has to be a tremendous amount of constant, daily effort to see that the farmers' interests are not harmed. Let me give the minister a few examples. First of all I refer to the question of box cars. The wheat board has no power under any act to control the railways of this country. The wheat board has no power really under the act to control the grain companies, and in grain companies I include the pool and private elevator associations.

One of the first things we did as a government was to have a westerner, Mr. Bracken, look into the question of box car allotment. He made certain recommendations. I do not want to go into the details of box car allotment but I raise it as an example of the wheat board not having the power to deal with the problem, and this situation was responsible for the rising antagonism against them in 1956 and 1957. This was due to the indifference of Mr. Howe and all those around him, an indifference which was costing the farmers money.

Everybody knows that when the farmers tried to protest to Mr. Howe the only chance they got to do so was at public meetings. I am thinking, for example, of the meeting held in Manitoba when Mr. Howe poked a farmer in the stomach and said, "You don't look too badly fed". This was the type of attitude that set the west in rebellion. During the last few years this minister and his predecessors have been guilty of the same crime against western farmers and the wheat board as was Mr. Howe.

Let me give some examples, Mr. Chairman. Under the Canadian Wheat Board Act there is nothing—the minister is quite correct in this—that lays down what the minister shall do precisely. Really the minister has only to report to the house. The minister is quite right in interpreting the act in that way. But the way the matter has worked out is that the minister must take an interest in the Canadian Wheat Board; he must protect the interests of the farmers. The only way he can make the wheat board system work in a humane, non-discriminatory way is by cooperating with the wheat board on several intimate matters.

Here are two examples of the kind of thing in which the minister must take an active interest in his relationship with the Canadian Wheat Board. One is the domestic handling of grain. For many years there has obviously been a problem with regard to box cars. It is not a new problem. The wheat board has no power in this connection. All they can do is call in the representatives of the railways and terminal management and say to them, please do certain things and reach certain objectives, but they have no power. But if a minister of the crown is in attendance when the Canadian Wheat Board meets the representatives of the railways or the operators of the terminals and listens to the discussion and is prepared to act, you can get action.

No one wants to take on the power of the Canadian people even if he is running a railway or a grain terminal. I know how necessary it was to use the prestige of the people of Canada to get grain moving. It would not have moved if the laissez-faire, drifting policy of the minister had been followed.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. member a question? How much grain did he move in the greatest year?

Mr. Starr: You never moved any.

Mr. Hamilton: The minister will not learn anything. If the minister wants to learn something he should listen.

Mr. Sharp: I am listening.

Mr. Hamilton: The other day the minister was too frightened to stand up and take a two minute tongue lashing which he deserves. He ran away from that fight.

Mr. Sharp: I am quite happy.

Mr. Hamilton: I wish the minister would keep quiet and listen to me. It is about time somebody put him where he belongs. I was mentioning box cars. In 1961 I was advised by the Canadian Wheat Board, the terminals and the railways that we could not move enough grain through the western ports to handle the sale to China. This was the official advice which I received from everybody. I went to each one and in turn said, what is the reason? Each one blamed the other. This is a matter of tactics which has been developed over the years. When I was the minister I did not sit back and do nothing. I called the 17 organizations together in the early spring of 1961. We had a meeting and I made them voice their criticisms of each other face to face. For the first time the men working in the terminals and on the docks and their employers were able to see each other face to face. They gave their reasons and as a result of that meeting they were able to assure me that they could boost the capacity of the west coast ports by 33 per cent without spending a single dollar of their money or anyone else's.

Not only did they do that but in January, 1964, they moved 29 million bushels in one month through these ports. This shows what co-operation can do there. However, let me tell the minister that if it had not been for the minister of that time sitting right down with the railways and the terminal operators and listening to their discussions, there would not have been that co-operation. They did not want to take on the federal government.

In the year 1962 we had another problem with box cars. Once again the wheat board met, as it has to do, with the railways and tried to bring about movement of grain. They met again and I believe they met a third time. If my memory serves me correctly this third meeting was on a Wednesday. Then a telegram signed by the minister was sent to both railways, with a copy to the Canadian Wheat Board, saying, even though we are reluctant to set up a transport controller we will do so if you do not move the grain. The telegram was sent on Thursday and you never saw so many box cars in your life as had rolled into western Canada by the next Tuesday.

Mr. Sharp: There have been more since.

Mr. Hamilton: I am trying to get across to the minister, if he will only learn, that what the farmers expect from the minister now is action and not drift. They got box car movement then and they got the grain moved. I just use that as one example, Mr. Chairman. Let me give the minister a second one.

We had an innocent Minister of Agriculture stand up in this house two weeks ago and read a statement regarding quotas in western Canada. This is none of his business actually because the wheat board is under the Minister of Finance, but that poor sucker, if I may use that word, did not even know the significance of telling us that some farmers were on a one bushel quota and others were on six. This is a discrimination that the western farmer protested against from 1950 to 1957. We got rid of most of it but you cannot eliminate all of it. Now the criticism is rising to a new crescendo. What does it mean to most people to say that one farmer is on a one bushel quota and another farmer is on a six bushel quota? If you live in those areas you will learn what it means. The farmer living on one railway line who has a six bushel quota is able to deliver six times as much wheat as the farmer living on another railway line who has only a one bushel quota.

If you do not understand the pressure that arises because one farmer who has 600 acres is allowed to deliver only on a one bushel quota while another farmer who has the same number of acres can deliver on a six bushel quota, let me explain it. Just imagine the pressure from his creditors, just imagine the pressure from his wife. There is nothing so depressing as curtain lectures. I hope the minister is beginning to see that the farmers expect from him a day by day interest in these quotas and once again I put it to the minister that the wheat board cannot handle this matter alone. Can the wheat board call the President of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool or the presidents of the line elevator companies and say, your boys have not got their orders in for cars. The minister should know that the grain companies have an interest in keeping their granaries filled. He should know that somebody who has power has to call them on the telephone and say, look, on that line your orders are down; you are responsible, not the wheat board.

Another time you look at the situation and find that the railways have not been doing their job. Can the wheat board call up the heads of the C.P.R. or the C.N.R. and point out what is going on? Can the wheat board say, If action is not forthcoming we will be prepared to take action? The wheat board has no power. To be completely fair about it, the wheat board sometimes slips up in allocating shipping orders. I kept a chart in my offce showing the 1,900 shipping points in the west. I knew every day where there was discrimination and if it developed too much along one line there was action taken. Sixty per cent of my time as minister was spent working with the Canadian Wheat Board. In my time we reduced the number of criticisms of the Canadian Wheat Board in the form of phone calls and mail from hundreds to a trickle.

Now you go through western Canada and hear the criticism of the wheat board that has developed and you ask these farmers who is the best friend of the wheat board. If the minister does not take the blame the only person left to take the blame is the wheat board. The best feature about the wheat board system is the man who steps in the breach and takes all the blame. I took the blame as minister on many occasions for the Canadian Wheat Board and kept the pressure off them. I put the blame right on you, the minister, because you have not defended the wheat board on these matters of life and death to these farmers in their and their families' daily living.

I could speak for an hour on where the failures have occurred but this is enough as a domestic example. I have given some examples where the minister has to enter the picture, defend the wheat board, get action from the railways, get action from the grain companies, and make sure the grain is moving in the interests of the farmers.

Let us take another altogether different type of duty of the minister which is not in the act. The minister knows that we are a party to the International Wheat Agreement and he knows that every three years the agreement comes up for renewal. He knows that the principle is that when the price during the last part of the agreement has been near the top level or maximum you expect to negotiate the next minimum and maximum slightly higher to allow the law of supply and demand to work. Here we have a situation where the International Wheat Agreement ran out in 1964. It has been renewed on a one year basis three times since. Not one organized move has been made, so far as anyone in western Canada knows, by the Canadian government through the minister to gather information on the International Wheat Agreement and seek a new range of prices for the next three years.

We got the price up 12½ cents in U.S. funds both on the floor and on the ceiling after weeks of hard fighting. Finally we forced the United States authorities to agree. We asked for 25 cents and by sheer persistence we got 12½. When world demand was strong in the last three years, the prices should have been raised. In this respect the minister is responsible for taking the lead. This is one of the things not laid down in the act. Surely it is the responsibility of the minister to work in a way to help the nation.

In 1957 when the government changed the then prime minister went to Washington to meet with President Eisenhower. One of the main subjects of discussion was the effect of public law 480 of the United States government with respect to the sale of our wheat in commercial markets. President Eisenhower was appalled at what he thought his country was doing to an ally. At that time an agreement was made between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada to the effect that there would be no more cutting of each other country's throat in commercial markets of the world. In that respect a gentlemen's agreement was reached.

Pursuant to that gentleman's agreement quarterly meetings are held between United States officials and Canadian officials to clear away misunderstanding with regard to transactions or anything else of importance that may come up. When President Kennedy took over in 1961 that oral gentlemen's agreement between the head of a great state and the representative of the Canadian government was renewed.

That agreement worked well for us in 1962 when France moved 200 million bushels on to the world market at 25 cents below normal French prices. The United States reduced its price by 25 cents and the Canadian Wheat Board recommended that we follow suit. There is nothing in the act that allows a minister to interfere with the wheat board in setting prices but the minister knows as well as I do that I did not allow the wheat board to drop its price by 25 cents.

I asked the wheat board to hold up everything until I had talked with the responsible United States minister. After I finally reached him late on Sunday evening the price which had been reduced by 25 cents at the close of business on Friday was put back on Monday morning to where it had been. The Minister of Finance knows that the United States official in doing what he did not only was guilty of breaking a gentlemen's agreement between the heads of two governments but he also had run afoul of the decision made under the International Wheat Agreement and under GATT. I say that there is nothing in the act that states that the minister in charge of the wheat board has any power—

Mr. Sharp: May I ask a question for clarification?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. Sharp: Is the hon. member saying that this was in breach of the International Wheat Agreement? That was what I understood had been the point at the time.

Mr. Hamilton: I am suggesting that there were three grounds for my protest. The main protest was under the political agreement between the two governments, which had been breached. I am also suggesting that because of the extent of the drop in price by the United States that country had put itself in jeopardy with respect to having broken through the floor under the International Wheat Agreement. Another point which was not clear was that we had acted in a way which had infringed on GATT.

I make these points to illustrate that there is a job for the minister and that job is to protect the wheat board. A commissioner of the wheat board cannot approach the President of the United States or any one of his executives or ministers in his cabinet. Ministers of the government may do that. Ministers make the agreements and they have to honour them.

In concluding this part of my remarks may I say I know that the Canadian Wheat Board Act lays down none of the responsibilities I have talked about as being responsibilities or duties of the minister.

Today the minister began by saying that he had tried to make clear what the divisions of responsibilities were between the Canadian Wheat Board and the minister. I say that what he did was exactly nothing. He did nothing. The Canadian Wheat Board Act lays down no duties for the minister.

Mr. Sharp: But there are many duties.

Mr. Hamilton: What I have tried to do is show the contrast in the way the minister backed up the Canadian Wheat Board at the political level internationally and the way the minister backed up the wheat board at the domestic level thereby reducing complaints against it. I would suggest very strongly that the better friends of the Canadian Wheat Board were those who tried to make it work.

I have another example I wish to pass along. I want to conclude my preliminary remarks by talking about the sale to China. You can imagine Mr. Chairman, how tired one gets hearing a gramophone record saying over and over again that the Canadian Wheat Board sold wheat to China in 1961. How many times have I heard that either on radio, on television or in this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nobody believes that.

Mr. Hamilton: The farmers do not believe it.

Mr. Sharp: It is true.

Mr. Hamilton: The minister says that it is true.

Mr. Sharp: I know it is true.

Mr. Hamilton: I want to tell the minister the facts of life. Can this minister who knows everything and who learns nothing say that the Canadian Wheat Board can sell grain on credit? It cannot sell a single bushel on credit and he knows it.

Mr. Sharp: I did not say that.

Mr. Hamilton: When the wheat board went to Peking for the second sale members of the board telephoned me. They said, "The Chinese want to buy wheat but they have no money". Can the minister say that the wheat board could have done anything in those circumstances? I say it could have done nothing.

However, the negotiations were kept going for six long weeks. The members of the wheat board did not want to stay there particularly but nevertheless they stayed. It was my job as minister, as I saw it, and that of the cabinet to which I belonged to secure enough money to make credit sales possible. Not one bushel of wheat after the first cash sale could have been sold to China if we on this side of the house had not put our political life on the line and made available $100 million eventually in the form of a revolving credit.

Mr. Churchill: That is how the wheat was sold.

Mr. Hamilton: We were condemned for that sale over and over again by the Liberal party. That sale could not have been made without the tremendous experience and know-how of the officials of the Canadian Wheat Board. Over there there was no way for the minister to back them up. The minister had to go along with them and he had to be prepared to come into this house and take the abuse to which we on this side were then subjected.

When your son is called a communist because you are selling wheat to red China, when your party is castigated by the Liberal and Social Credit parties because you are selling wheat to China, when you are told by the then leader of the opposition who is now the Prime Minister that you are selling too much wheat to China on credit, it makes you think. I read speeches to this effect made in New Brunswick by-elections. I know the whisperings and rumours that went round Toronto and Montreal. The Liberal party ought to talk to the farmers with respect to the vile campaign of calumny in which the Liberals engaged. The farmers know something about this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton: Do not try to tell the western farmers who sold the wheat. The western farmers will simply say to you that the Chinese know who sold the wheat.

Mr. Sharp: It was the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Hamilton: There was a former line of kings known as the Bourbons who learned nothing and forgot nothing. C. D. Howe was a representative of the Bourbons and the minister is his successor.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

Mr. Sharp: And I am proud of it.

Mr. Hamilton: You are proud?

Mr. Sharp: You bet I am.

Mr. Hamilton: I know you are. You have ruined the Liberal party in western Canada for a generation to come. Jimmy Gardiner spent 40 years building up the most amazing political machine of force and inducement that Canada has ever known. The minister put that organization on the skids. The man who did more to destroy it than any other man is the Minister of Finance who is now in charge of the wheat board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton: I know they will blame the loss of the next election on the appointment of Mr. Argue to the Senate, but that will not be the real reason. The real reason will be that the minister refused to back up the Canadian Wheat Board at the international and domestic level when it needed his backing. I wish to conclude with a personal observation.

Mr. Sharp: These have all been personal observations.

Mr. Hamilton: I know the minister is very happy about these remarks. He would not take them on Friday because he was frightened.

Mr. Sharp: Don't be silly. They would have been out of order.

Mr. Hamilton: All right. The minister is happy with his announcement. I want to conclude with some personal observations with regard to the minister and myself. After the government changed in 1963 the minister imagined himself as a new type of political know-how man. He was going to show everyone how to win political support. He started out on a campaign in western Canada to cut the previous minister of agriculture down to size. I have noted the innuendos in all those speeches of his which have been acknowledged by the genteel clapping of all the gentlemen of the grain exchange who came to hear him. I have known of every snide remark he made. He featured himself as a great new type of political person. He sat in his place as Minister of Trade and Commerce and lectured the Conservative party on politics.

Then he went on the campaign in 1965. He said he was accepting the challenge in the west and was going to increase Liberal strength there; whether by six seats or 12 seats

I do not know. He went out there. He started to canvass and speak. The first thing we knew was that meetings had been cancelled and he had run back to Eglinton to save his own seat. He now thinks that having done such a wonderful job in the west for the Liberals he will start out to lose the cities for the Liberals too. The type of delusion from which the minister suffers is only matched by people who live sometimes in institutions.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Hamilton: There is something else—

Mr. Sharp: This is the non-personal remark, is it?

Mr. Hamilton: This is a personal one.

Mr. Sharp: The other one was not?

Mr. Hamilton: You have been very free in sneering at the efforts of the first government which did anything for the western farmers for years. You have been very free in trying to work up this alliance between the wealthy and the wise, in running down us poor prairie farmers—"cowboys", they call us. The minister has been very free with his superior intellect in slighting those of us who might have been green and awkward. At least we tried. I have listed two or three examples for the minister. If he does not want to accept these answers and wishes to continue this ping-pong battle about who is best for the west, I will yield, but I say to him: You are doing harm to more than the west; you are doing harm to all of Canada.

In 1963-64, according to the Canadian Wheat Board, we lost 100 million bushels in possible sales. Mr. Bentley of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said only last week that we could have sold 200 million more bushels this year. I will take the word of Mr. Bentley over and over again. Then last Friday we heard an announcement that the final price had dropped from that of last year. A year ago the minister said we would not notice the drop because we were selling so many millions of bushels. He does not seem aware of the fact that the price of wheat is the same today as it has been for 50 years though the price of machinery has jumped in the last two years to the highest level in our history. The minister stated the other night on television that the farmers would be paid such huge amounts that they would not really notice the drop in prices. But let me point out that 300 million bushels in lost sales at $2 a bushel represents $600 million to Canada. On top of this there is the $60 million or $80 million we lost in the price drop last year.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree that the hon. member may have permission to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton: I want to thank hon. members of the committee. I have hit as hard as I can today. This matter is very deep within me. I cannot defend myself except by saying that I am emotionally involved with these hundreds of thousands of people who found conditions very tough in the fifties. When I hear this talk about how wealthy the western farmers are and how we can take this loss of $70 million or $80 million and how we shall never miss this $600 million worth of lost sales I feel bound to protest. If the minister cannot be moved by my appeal to him on behalf of these people, he might consider what I have said as being for the good of the whole country.

Surely this amount of $700 million means something to the Minister of Finance whose greatest problem is the deficit in our international balance of payments. Surely $700 million in three years would make quite a difference in that deficit. Maybe in the interest of all the people of Canada, maybe in the interest of keeping prices down, maybe in the interest of raising the incomes of those who work in the steel plants or in the mines of the north he will reconsider his position and stand by and defend the wheat board both domestically and internationally and not leave the board alone and exposed as it is now. The minister says he has nothing to do with selling grain, that this is a matter for the board and that if mistakes are made there is no one to be blamed but the wheat board. We are trying to defend the wheat board system of marketing. Mistakes are bound to be made in such a complex operation and when they are made we think the minister should stand up and take the blame. Let him also stand up when sales are made and make the announcement. Surely hon. members have a right to be informed inside the house on these matters. They should not have to run to the press gallery to get information. Surely the House of Commons system means something to the minister.

I had no intention on Friday of saying anything like this on the minister's estimates but when the minister departed from the traditional procedure of making announcements I had no choice but to stand up and let him know that not only do we not like it in parliament but thousands of people across this country feel that a fair chance is not being given for the expression of their interests in this house.

Mr. Greene: Would the hon. member permit a question? I just want to be sure that the record is straight, as I know that the hon. member with his high reputation would want it to be clear that the whole and entire truth was on the record. Does the hon. member state that it was not the wheat board which sold wheat to China during his term of office but that it was he himself who effected the sale?

Mr. Hamilton: I will tell the Minister of Agriculture that as one who preceded him in office I have no choice but to support him in everything worth while that he does. I want to thank him for speaking up for the farmers on his trip west, but please do not get mixed up in something you do not know too much about.

Mr. Greene: I take it the hon. member does not wish to answer that question and I hope the record so indicates.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I would be surprised if this feud between the spokesmen for the Liberal and Conservative parties continued for a lengthy period. It has been going on for about two years but unfortunately it has resulted in no clarification. However, I hope that discussions such as this may lead to a review of the Act with a view to redefinition of the relationship between the wheat board and the government.

From a cursory reading of the legislation I understand the wheat board is a crown agency, autonomous in its day to day operations but subject to some degree of government policy direction. I believe there should be a redefinition because there is a great deal of misunderstanding and misapprehension in the minds of the public about the relationship of the board to the government. That should not be surprising since obviously there is misunderstanding among members of the committee.

The misunderstanding and misapprehension are so great that when some people, particularly urban dwellers, read about interim and final payments being made to wheat producers they think these payments are in the nature of a government subsidy. Why does this kind of misunderstanding arise? It must be because of misleading statements issued by the minister's office which are picked up by the press and headlined as final payments emanating from the government treasury. If the Minister of Finance has any desire to clarify the true relationship between the board and the government, and I believe he has, I wish him well in his task.

As its major function the wheat board has the task of selling wheat and other grain. How do the cabinet and the government enter into this function? It seems to me the board is entitled to assistance in arranging for long-term credits and things of that sort.

I find I must agree with the last speaker that up until 1960 or thereabouts Canadian governments were not prepared to back the wheat board substantially enough to provide long-term credit for prospective customers. That is why the board found it so difficult to carry out its work. To be fair and candid about the matter, I must give credit where it is due and it is due to the Conservative minister of agriculture and his colleagues in that as a matter of policy they arranged for long-term credit for prospective large customers such as China.

On the other hand, after giving such credit to the former minister I must say the impression left with western grain producers, I think almost deliberately, was that the sale to China was due entirely to the work of the Conservative government and in particular of its minister of agriculture. In fact, many people still hold that view, and I think it is noble of the present minister to avoid trying to take personal credit for any large scale sales. This is as it should be. But he should be frank and admit that prior to 1960 the board was not being given the kind of backing it needed at the highest political level in order to enable it to make sales.

I am sure the minister is aware that dissatisfaction among farmers in western Canada is due to the fact that prior to the 1962 election the minister's colleagues said it would be part of Liberal policy to ensure a $2 per bushel price for wheat. I am told the Prime Minister himself promised that, and I know that one person who has since been appointed to the other place made such a statement on more than one occasion. But when the Liberal government had an opportunity to fulfil that pledge it failed to do so and later the price fell.

In fact, we have the spectacle of a provincial leader of the Liberal party sponsoring a resolution in the provincial legislative assembly asking the provincial government to call on the federal government to honour its pledge of $2 per bushel for wheat. Naturally there is considerable dissatisfaction on that point because the promise was made and subsequently broken. Now the final price to the producer is several cents lower than it was in the preceding year and this too is causing dissatisfaction.

The cost-price squeeze is being accentuated. We talk about a war on poverty, land purchase, land resale and so on, but with the kind of pricing practice being followed it seems there will have to be many square miles and sections of land purchased in western Canada and resold for consolidation unless the government takes some action, perhaps through a two-price system, to increase returns to producers. If it does not, low incomes and poverty will be more widespread than they are at present.

The third cause for dissatisfaction among western producers is the fact that sales of over 100 million bushels of grain, if not 200 million bushels, have been lost because Canada's transportation facilities are inadequate to move any more grain to the ports.

Farm organizations talk about the need for maintaining an adequate price, the need for a two-price system and the need for parity prices. In the past they were told parity prices were not possible because of the great surplus problem faced at that time. The fact of the matter is that the so-called surplus problem in Canadian agriculture is fast becoming a thing of the past. In a few short years there will be no such thing as a surplus problem of any longlasting duration. Therefore I hope that, if nothing else, the inadequacy of our transportation facilities in this country will go to demonstrate that we should have sold a lot more than we did in the past year if only we could have marshalled the facilities to deliver what we had been able to produce.

I harbour no malice or ill will toward the present Minister of Finance, the man in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, but I do hope he will look seriously into the farm income problem even though he is not responsible for agriculture per se and then work together with the Canadian Wheat Board to see what can be done to raise grain prices to the western farmers.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, on item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Finance, I would like to raise today one of the most important problems affecting seriously the Canadian economy, not only at the national level, but also at the provincial and municipal levels—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Order. Would the hon. member resume his seat?

I understand that hon. members have now more or less agreed to discuss the Canadian Wheat Board. As this seems to be the understanding, I wonder if the hon. member for Lapointe could make his remarks later on when the house is considering other items pertaining to the Department of Finance.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, since we are now considering item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Finance, we may deal with the problems facing that department. This is precisely what I am doing.

At the outset, when it was decided to consider this department's estimates, we said that on item 1, all the problems related to the Department of Finance could be dealt with. If other members wanted to bring up several matters, such as the Canadian Wheat Board, they were free to do so, but according to the procedure, you know it as well as I do, Mr. Chairman, when we are considering the first item of a department, we may discuss any problem concerning that department. We do not have to agree to a different arrangement on that point.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) has something to say about the remarks of the hon. member for Lapointe.

[English]

Mr. Jorgenson: Mr. Chairman, in support of what the hon. member for Lapointe has said I should like to say that I think the understanding was that we would deal with item No. 1 in whatever way hon. members wished to deal with it and if some hon. members wished to talk about something other than the Canadian Wheat Board they would be at liberty to do so and those who wished to talk about the Canadian Wheat Board would also be at liberty to do so.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I believe that the hon. member for Lapointe and the hon. member for Provencher are certainly correct when they suggest that many other matters besides the Canadian Wheat Board can be discussed under item 1, but it seems to me there was general agreement that the Canadian Wheat Board would be considered under item No. 1 of the estimates of the Department of Finance as the first subject matter of discussion before going into other matters.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I think the agreement arrived at this afternoon between representatives of the various groups in the house was effectively that we should discuss item 1 of the Department of Finance and at the same time, those who wanted to discuss the Canadian Wheat Board could do so under item 1 of the Department of Finance.

So I believe the hon. member for Lapointe is in order in discussing the Department of Finance because the Wheat Board may be of interest to the people from the West but if we are to hear them for three days discussing this subject, there will be no time left for those who have other financial questions to discuss.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have no desire to delay the exchange of views on the estimates of the finance department but it was my understanding that it was the hon. members' wish to discuss first the estimates of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Therefore, I would ask the hon. member to co-operate and show the spirit which seemed to prevail in the house and discuss first all matters relating to the Canadian wheat board, and perhaps come back later to other matters related to the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Finance.

I am simply appealing to the spirit of co-operation which the hon. member for Lapointe has always shown in the past and I ask him to comply with the wishes of the house and the Chair.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, if you appeal to my heart, you can win me over, but although I want to co-operate with Your Honour acting with such efficiency and graciousness, I cannot co-operate in that respect. I do not intend to speak about wheat. I leave that to the westerners who do it so well, but when it is my turn to have the floor, I insist on taking advantage of it.

I wish to talk about what I feel is an important problem within the Department of Finance. Therefore, I ask hon. members to be kind enough to allow me to speak of the problem I want to bring up this afternoon. After that, I will let the others return to wheat.

I would like to deal with one of the most serious and most important problems facing the Canadian economy at the federal, provincial, municipal or educational level.

It is, Mr. Chairman, one of the largest expenditures of the Department of Finance and one of the largest in the Canadian budget, namely the interest paid by the government on the national debt.

If you study the details of estimates of the Department of Finance, you will see that the total expenditures for 1965-66 with regard to the interest on the public debt amount to $1,101,056,400 and for 1966-67, to $1,185,000,000. That is a lot of money, Mr. Chairman, $1,101,000,000 in interest only on the federal government's public debt.

With $1,101,000,000, we pay the interest only, not the principal. It makes you shudder to think that this huge amount is used solely to pay the interest on the public debt and for the federal government only. Our debt is astronomical.

This morning, in the finance committee, I had the opportunity to question the former governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. James Coyne, who was submitting a request for a chartered bank. I asked him this: "Mr. Coyne, when your bank loans money, it will inevitably intend to get it back. If it lends money to the Canadian government, when we know that the debt of the federal government is larger than all the money in circulation in Canada—the federal government alone owes more than all the money in circulation in Canada, legal money, scrip money, that is the whole of the money supply—it will therefore be physically impossible for it to reimburse its debt—is it a good risk for a bank to lend money to the federal government when it knows that the latter will never be able to pay it back, because it owes more than all the money in circulation in the country? Is it a good risk? Mr. Coyne answered: "The federal government, when it wants to pay it back, must borrow elsewhere."

Now, in order to pay back, it has to borrow and our debt increases constantly, as does the interest on that debt.

Four years ago, when we first came here, the interest on the debt was $820 million. In four years, that interest has increased by more than $400 million. We now pay $100 million more annually than we did four years ago; the interest will be $1,101 million this year, and $1,185 million next year, which means an increase of $85 million in one year.

Mr. Chairman, we are no longer able to pay back our debts; our liabilities are greater than our assets.

The Canadian government owes more money than there is in circulation in the country. Even if it dug into the pockets of every Canadian citizen, every company, every industry, every business and every member of parliament, it would not have enough to pay the Canadian government's debt. Is this not the brink of bankruptcy? And would this not be a fraudulent bankruptcy, when debts exceed the money in circulation?

The government has more liabilities than assets. Why? Because certain institutions are empowered to create money and lend it to the federal government. But although the bank creates money, it does not create the interest, and the government has to pay back not only the principal but also the interest. However, the amount required to pay the interest has not been created; only the capital has been created. Whenever interest is repaid, the capital remains the same, and this reduces the money supply so that one fine day, there is more indebtedness than money circulation. But there is not only the federal debt, there are also the provincial, municipal and school debts.

Interest is paid, and thus the money supply is reduced, but that interest has not been created and the capital is still due. Nowadays, the indebtedness is greater than the money supply. This is nonsensical. The situation has taken alarming proportions.

When one figures that the interest on the national debt is increasing at a frantic rate, one realizes that before long, that interest will exceed the national defence budget. At the rate things are going, within five years the interest charges on the federal government debt will have exceeded the national defense budget and have become the major item of government expenditure. Yet, this yields absolutely nothing to Canadians.

We will soon find ourselves in the same predicament as many municipalities, in Quebec at least, where 35, 40 and even 45 per cent of the municipal budget is used to pay interest on the municipal debt. The municipality taxes and overtaxes but when $100 have been paid off, $45 are used to pay the interest on the debt alone and not on the capital; these municipalities are left with $55 out of every $100 to undertake improvements and provide necessary services.

The situation has become alarming and the same situation exists in the case of provincial governments.

At the rate the province of Quebec is now running into debt, it will not be long before a great part of the budget of that province is spent to pay the interest on the debt of the Quebec government, just like the federal government is doing for its debt today. One billion 101 million dollars a year, compare that to family allowances. The latter did not increase, but the interest on the debt increases every year, to the point where it has become one of the most important and urgent questions to be settled in our economic system. Unless it is stopped by the Minister of Finance, future generations will be faced with economic and monetary disaster.

It was announced last September that Canada had loaned $5 million to Jamaica for the construction of a bridge and a sewage system in Kingston, and that the loan was interest-free. The Department of Finance of the federal government made a $5 million interest-free loan to Jamaica for 60 years. The Prime Minister will long be dead by that time, just like the Minister of Finance and myself too probably.

For 60 years, and without interest. Without interest. Meanwhile our federal government borrows money at a high rate of interest. We see the astronomical sums which are paid today as interest on the national debt.

This, Mr. Chairman, I repeat, is one of the most important and serious problems which the hon. Minister of Finance must solve. But this does not seem to worry him too much, or very little, because, paradoxically, this is one of the items in the estimates of the Department of National Defence which does not have to be voted. It is statutory. That is why it must be discussed on item No. 1; it is shrouded in silence and secrecy and cannot be discussed then. It is statutory. On the other hand, there is income tax to pay, because money is needed to pay the big financiers. But you have no right to discuss the matter or to talk about it—it is statutory. We should have an opportunity to deal with this, Mr. Chairman.

What is the solution? The solution is to have public debts—federal, provincial, municipal and school debts—financed by a public bank. Let private debts be financed by private banks.

Chartered banks are private institutions, so let them finance the private sector of the economy. But federal, provincial, municipal and school administrations are public bodies that ought to be financed by a public body, the Bank of Canada.

I cannot understand and cannot admit that Canada, if it is the sovereign country, the sovereign state it claims to be, should have to borrow from private institutions whose goal is to make a profit through the people's taxes. That is inadmissible. Let private banks finance private enterprise in our economy, but let the Bank of Canada finance our public services, road construction, bridges, hospitals, all public works, in short, all public expenditures. A public bank must do this and not a bank whose object is to make a profit; for it is inadmissible, anti-social to see private enterprise making astronomical profits—$1,101 million in the case of the federal government alone—from the government. The government can levy taxes, but it must not exist to make private enterprise such as chartered banks benefit therefrom.

It is all very well to continue having chartered banks, but let them operate for private enterprise and not in the field of public services. There lies the difference. As far as the public sector is concerned, the Bank of Canada, a public bank, should be used to finance not only Canada's debt, but also the debts of provinces, municipalities and school boards, and all projects essential to Canada, no matter at what level. Public works, for instance, should be financed interest-free by the Bank of Canada which is not in business for profits but to serve the Canadian people.

Therefore, public debts should be refinanced through the Bank of Canada. The government did not want to do this in the past, but a great deal of money would thus be saved.

I am convinced that if the Minister of Finance could allot $1,101 million more to the various departments, and then he could afford to increase family allowances, old age pensions and undertake various projects, and even reduce taxes.

One billion, 101 million. When one thinks that only $121 million are ear marked for the Department of Agriculture. And yet, all of it is not for the farmers. Most of it goes to pay for red tape and the cost of bureaucracy in the various departments.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

If only there were more to help the people and less for the financiers. And what about the fact that the interest on the public debt is twice the amount spent for family allowances distributed among all the Canadian children. The chartered banks of Canada get twice more in interest than the Canadian children receive in family allowances. This is what is unthinkable, Mr. Chairman.

Not only is the interest a cancer which eats away the federal, provincial, municipal and school budgets, but it must be realized that the chartered banks of Canada receive in interest twice the amount paid to all the Canadian children in family allowances.

Mr. Chairman, I say this constitutes an anti-social policy. We do not advocate reducing or abolishing debts, wiping them out or writing them off, no. But let us have these public debts refinanced by the Bank of Canada, which is a public bank.

Let the private banks remain in the private field but let the Bank of Canada handle the public field.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is one of the major problems we have to solve. The Minister of Finance, I know, does not seem to take this suggestion seriously; it seems to be over his depth. It seems to him something idealistic.

Mr. Guay: That is right.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lévis says that is right. But let the Minister of Finance beware lest he realize one day—because he has not yet consented to study the matter—that the interest on the debt is driving the country into a depression and that the national budget is being eroded by $1,101 million.

He should know that if the government had this sum of money, it would be used to help the children of his county and other counties by increasing family allowances.

If a private bank is able to finance public works, why could a public bank not do the same? Let the Minister of Finance tell us why the government gave the Bank of Canada that name, if not to finance such undertakings? And if it is a public bank, why should it not finance public works? Does the government lack the sovereignty and the power to control its own public financing organization?

Is this what—

Mr. Laniel: Is this what Mr. Bennett wanted to do with his Bank of British Columbia?

Mr. Grégoire: You will see, that might help him to finance some projects in his province.

I would like the Minister of Finance to tell us why the Bank of Canada could not play that part. One of the greatest attributes of its sovereignty is surely to be able to control its money. But the Canadian government is leaving that to capitalists and big financiers. The Canadian government is leaving that in the hands of a few big financiers who control credit in Canada, when it should take back that control for its own expenditures and stop filling the financiers' pockets through taxes paid by the people.

The aim of private institutions and chartered banks is to make profits. That is true. Then let them make those profits at the expense of the private sector of the economy and not at the expense of the public sector, which comes under public banks, the aim of which is not to make profits but to serve the people.

The Minister of Finance should start thinking about using the Bank of Canada; that is its purpose, it is a financial institution. And it is not being used, or rather, it was used once, when time came to lend $200 million to England, without interest; it served the purpose then, but when it comes to lending to Canadians, then things do not work out.

The member for Levis said a while ago that the Minister of Finance is an idealist. Let him explain then, why the Bank of Canada did this for England and why it does not do it for Canadians. If $5 million could be loaned to Jamaica, without interest, why can the Bank of Canada not do the same for Canadians and public organizations in Canada? That is what the Bank of Canada should be doing. But no, the present government, like those before it, has always preferred playing into the hands of international finance.

When you consider that the government dipped into the Canadian taxpayers' pockets and spent $1,101 million last year and $1,187 million this year to pay interest to those big international financiers who control our economy, then I say that the government does not play its proper role, does not do what it should do, that is serve the people and not a few big financiers.

The Minister of Finance should begin by studying seriously suggestions such as this one which are meant to serve the people and protect the money of the Canadian people rather than give it to the chartered banks or to big financiers.

Where did the chartered banks and the big financiers find money they loaned to the government? There is not even enough to pay all the debts in Canada. How is it that we owe them more than the money in circulation? Can the minister explain that? How is it that the debts of the federal, provincial, municipal governments and school boards are twice as large as the money in circulation? Where did the bankers get the difference which does not even exist? Can the minister tell us that? If the government wanted to repay the debt in full tomorrow, could he tell me if there would be enough money in the pockets of all the people, all the companies and all the businesses to pay back such a debt?

How can the minister explain such a situation when we owe more money than there is in circulation? Surely somebody loaned money that did not exist. Then, how did they do it and how could our Ministers of Finance let certain financial organizations lend money that did not exist and let us pay interest on it? Every year, we pay astronomical sums in interest; the situation is serious and important not only for the federal government but for the provinces, the municipalities and the school boards.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the minister should take that problem into serious consideration. The committee on finance, trade and economic affairs will soon meet to study the Bank Act; at that time, the Minister of Finance might suggest that the Bank of Canada should get a charter like the other banks but should use its privileges only to finance public works, in short that the Bank of Canada only be authorized to finance public bodies and governments and should leave to the private banks or other chartered banks the financing of private enterprise.

The minister might find his way to making such a suggestion to all levels of government, the federal, the provinces, the municipalities and the school boards. Large sums could then be included in the budgets of each of those governments and be earmarked for the carrying out of works or the performance of services for the Canadian people. It would no longer be necessary, as it is today, to pay interests to a few big financiers or a few big financial institutions who add billions to their wealth at the expense of the taxpayers.

Then, let the minister take this suggestion into consideration, submit it to the committee and have experts study it and he will realize that it is sound and likely to improve the economy of the country, while enabling the government to be really sovereign, self-governing and independent, instead of being the servant or the slave of high finance as it is today—

Mr. Guay: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Surely, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Guay: Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to say that my word seems to have been questioned a while ago when I said the system the hon. member was describing to us was idealistic. Not only is it idealistic, it is beyond understanding and, as was said during the last election campaign: "You don't have to understand. Vote Social Credit and it's all over."

The question I want to put to the hon. member is as follows: In other countries and in other provinces, is interest paid on the debt?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, to reply to the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) let me say: They have ears but they are deaf. He never wanted to understand and he never will, because if you want to understand, you must first eliminate prejudice, and the member for Lévis is unable to do that.

Mr. Guay: We shall have to change the teacher.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will not understand because he does not want to. Although other provinces and other countries pay interest, it should be recognized that, in British Columbia, the direct debt is paid directly. There are indirect debts Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Prittie: Many of them.

Mr. Grégoire: —owed by crown corporations with assets. For example, there is a railway company in British Columbia which is a crown corporation. It has assets and a debt guaranteed by the government. But, besides the debt, there are assets. Let the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) show me that the federal government has assets to support or guarantee its direct debt. The federal government's assets are made up of the home of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, the home of the hon. member for Lévis, the home of the Minister of Finance. Those are the assets of the citizens and the companies of Canada, not those of the Canadian government.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond should know that the direct debt of the federal government is supported by nothing at all, while the indirect debt of British Columbia is supported by assets and interests are paid with profits from those assets, not with taxes paid by the people of British Columbia. Surely the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond can see that there lies the difference.

[English]

Mr. Prittie: I simply tell the hon. member that the Pacific Great Eastern Railway, for example, does not have as many assets as it has charges against it.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I could say that the C.N.R. is in a worse situation even, but the interest on the debt owing by the British Columbia railway is not paid out of public taxes, but out of the railway's own profits. That is the difference, while this amount of $1.1 billion in these estimates comes from the taxpayer's pocket. That is the difference.

If a province or a country has indirect debts reflecting assets and if the interest on those debts are paid out of those assets, fine. I do not see any problem there.

But I do object when the federal government's debt and the interest thereon are guaranteed by the assets of the Canadian people, because the federal government has no collateral for its debt, except the people themselves and their assets. It is absolutely impossible for the federal government to pay its debt; it is impossible because there is not enough money in all Canada to do so. That is what is so serious. Why, the government is bankrupt.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Grégoire: Canada owes more than it has.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I was not out of order for I was replying to interruptions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Lapointe, but his time of speech is over.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to try to reply to the hon. member for Lapointe but I should like to tell him a story.

Mr. Grégoire: Will I understand?

Mr. Sharp: I should like to tell him a story about a previous encounter between the leader of the Social Credit party in the house at that time, Mr. Blackmore, and the governor of the Bank of Canada. Mr. Blackmore was urging the sort of proposals that the hon. member has been putting forward and Mr. Towers replied, "Mr. Blackmore, the financing of government expenditures by the issuance of currency is the second oldest profession in the world".

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I hope members of the house in all parties are now ready to pass the estimates for the fiscal year which is just coming to a close. In my remarks this afternoon I hope I will be in keeping with that general spirit. I am not going to get involved in the claims that have been made by the two old-line parties as to who should have credit for what the Canadian Wheat Board has been doing over the past number of years.

I suggest that whether the minister who reports to parliament for the wheat board likes it or not he must agree that there must be some way in which members of parliament can make inquiries about the operations of the board which was set up by this parliament. I certainly agree with him when he suggests that there should not be attempts to obtain a lot of political credit for the actions of the Canadian Wheat Board. At the same time I hope he does not carry this idea to the point where he will divorce himself of his responsibility for the Canadian Wheat Board to such an extent that we will be stymied in our attempts to inquire into the operations of the board.

I know that the minister's statement is in keeping with the plea made by the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board that something ought to be done to eliminate the misunderstanding on the part of the Canadian public that payments made by the Wheat Board to the farmers are some kind of government subsidy. Over the years this has been a real problem. Unjust criticism of the payments made and of the governments making them has been voiced in that it has been said that the government has been oversubsidizing Canadian wheat farmers. I have to agree with the minister that when political attempts were made to claim credit for these payments there was an undesirable side effect in urban areas and even in rural areas. Some people believed that these payments in fact were made out of the federal treasury. Of course, the minister and anyone else familiar with the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board know that this is simply not true. These payments are additional proceeds from the sales of wheat. It would be desirable if that were known and understood clearly by Canadians in all walks of life in all regions of Canada.

I do not believe that directing questions to the minister about the operations and results of the operations of the wheat board means interference by the minister in the operations of the wheat board. The minister happens to be responsible for the wheat board at this time. Surely, as I have said before, we must have some way of communicating our views to the Canadian Wheat Board respecting, first, complaints and, second, the results of the operations of the wheat board. I hope the minister will not carry the separation of his responsibilities and the responsibilities of Canadian Wheat Board officials so far that we will lose this means of communicating complaints.

I said I would be brief. I will now turn to one other matter. When the minister made his opening statement respecting the wheat board he said it had been doing a good job. I agree with his opinion. However, when we consider the whole operation with respect to sales of grain during the current crop year, I would not agree that everything is satisfactory. On the basis of all the investigations and statements which have been made across the country I am convinced that the railways, in particular the Canadian Pacific, have not performed their tasks satisfactorily. In fact, I think it is fair to say that shipments out of southern Alberta at least to the end of January, 1966, are probably the poorest in any crop year within the last six or seven years. I say that because a large number of shipping points in Alberta were still on two bushels per acre quotas at the end of January. The quota has not been that low—

An hon. Member: At the end of February too.

Mr. Olson:—for many years. What I cannot understand is why the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Transport continually defend the Canadian Pacific Railway in the face of its very poor performance, at least in some areas. The Minister of Finance has on several occasions said in the house that a very large amount of grain, in fact a larger amount than in almost any other year, has been moved out of the country elevators into an export position from the first of August until the fifteenth of February, let us say. I think the minister mentioned something over 300 million bushels. I should like to remind the Minister of Finance that early last fall an arrangement was made between the Canadian Wheat Board and the railways, an arrangement to which the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance were parties, that the railways would be completely free to haul as much grain as possible into export position as quickly as possible.

The result is that the railways have now hauled all of the short haul grain. If the grain has been hauled from the points closest to the west coast, surely it is normal to expect that the grain that is left is going to take more time to haul per car load or per train load, as the case may be, because the distances involved are greater. Looking at the over-all performance of the railways suggests to me that we are going to have a great deal of difficulty in meeting the commitment of some 600 million bushels for export by the end of this crop year. I say that in spite of the repeated hopes expressed in the house by the minister and expressed outside the house by the railway company officials with respect to meeting the target of 600 million bushels by the end of the crop year. The easiest part of the task of moving the grain has been done. Now the long haul grain remains to be shipped.

That is not the whole story. The fact is that there has been terrible discrimination with respect to equalizing quotas on the prairies. To say that what has been done has been done simply for the purpose of getting the largest total volume into export position in the shortest time is not a satisfactory answer. If that type of program had been followed, then since December 14 when the locks at Sault Ste. Marie were closed the greatest movement of grain into export position should have been from southern Alberta, the grain growing area nearest to Vancouver.

However, Mr. Chairman, there has not been a substantial increase in quotas in that area since the Great Lakes navigation season closed. I agree with the sentiment expressed by the Minister of Finance when he hopes that the grain will be moved and that the program will be carried out. However, when one looks at the over-all picture objectively, looks at the performance of the railways in the past, and notes what has happened in the last two and a half months it does not seem to appear that the Canadian Pacific is making great efforts to meet its commitments even in following the program it claims it is following.

[Mr. Olson.]

I think the Minister of Finance will have to agree that the wheat board has been under severe criticism by some farmers in western Canada with respect to the failure to meet quota targets. That is not the fault of the wheat board at all. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle mentioned a few minutes ago, the Canadian Wheat Board has no authority to direct the Canadian Pacific to set off railway cars at any specific shipping point. The wheat board may encourage the railway and the Board's officials may have meetings with the railway but there is no authority to give instructions to the railway to set off X number of cars at any particular shipping point.

I sincerely believe that the Canadian Wheat Board has been frustrated in its efforts to equalize quotas and to do justice to the low quota shipping points. I believe this situation has been brought about as a result of the failure of the railways to set off cars at particular points where the Canadian Wheat Board has placed shipping orders. I think that the minister would be doing a service not only to the Canadian farmers but also to the Canadian Wheat Board if he would state that the Canadian Wheat Board has no authority in this respect. I think it would also be helpful if there were a concerted effort by all ministers on the treasury benches, including the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Transport, to inform the railways that they were not satisfied with their performance to date. That seems to be the only kind of action that will produce the results needed.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, may I say that we have had enough of this buckpassing. I am not accusing the Minister of Finance but there has been buckpassing from the railway companies to the terminal elevators and to other people involved in the grain trade with regard to who is responsible for the situation. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that all these people ought to be called together to try to solve the problems and find the bottlenecks with respect to the grain trade is a good one.

The minister has stated that a co-ordinating committee was set up. I hope the committee has been doing good and useful work. Unfortunately no reports have been issued to the farmers of western Canada about what the committee has been doing and what it has found. Nobody knows anything about it. It would certainly help the morale of the farmers of western Canada, who have been almost completely without income in the last six or seven months, if they knew that somewhere, somebody, be it the Minister of Finance or this committee, was making a sincere and genuine effort to solve the problem of congestion.

I do not intend to comment on lost sales. It seems to me this is something we would not like to see happen again, if we indeed have lost opportunities to make large additional exports of wheat. But I shall not comment on that point at length for this reason. Even without these additional sales we have plenty of deliveries to meet in regard to sales already made. The greatest need at the moment is to deliver wheat to customers who have already bought it.

One suggestion made earlier in the house was that a traffic controller should be appointed to enable better co-ordination between the various agencies involved in moving the grain. If the present situation does not improve soon we should probably take a day to discuss this matter although, goodness knows, we are running short of time in which to carry out our normal work pertaining to estimates and other matters. But I think the situation is sufficiently serious for us to set up a traffic control officer and give him the support he needs.

It is not enough for the government to say: We intend to keep our hands off the wheat board; we intend to keep our hands off the railways. The performance has not been satisfactory. I would agree with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Transport that if everything was going along reasonably well it would be desirable that the government should leave the C.P.R., the wheat board, the terminal elevators and all others concerned to do the job as best they could. But we can point to hundreds of shipping points in western Canada where quotas and deliveries are lower than they have been at this date for many years past. This in itself is sufficient indication that the result of the whole operation is not satisfactory. I hope the minister will continue his efforts and that he will be a little firmer with the railroads. C.P.R. shipping points in particular show that the company has not been performing as well as we have a right to expect and certainly not up to the level of last year or the year before.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer to remarks made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, the former minister of agriculture, with regard to the shipping of grain. In a small way the question of grain shipments made an impact on me during the time he was minister and subsequently.

The present government was elected in April of 1963. At that time the port of Vancouver was blocked with vessels waiting to get to the grain jetties and load grain. There were between 13 and 15 vessels swinging at anchor in the harbour. They were there for everyone to see. In the latter days of that election compaign the concentration of these vessels had been building up and catching the attention of everyone in the city of Vancouver. This is a sight which no one in Vancouver can avoid seeing if he moves round the city at all.

A general uneasiness begins to take hold in the city as people watch this sight and ask: What is the trouble? Is it due to labour or to the grain elevators or to the harbours board? Just what is it that is causing this build-up and thwarting the efforts of Canadians to send their wheat to the markets they have secured?

We heard this afternoon from the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. He told us how he had gone to those responsible for the movement of grain in the port of Vancouver and discussed with them the means by which the harbour could be unplugged and these ships could be kept moving. He told us how he brought together these various agencies at a meeting and asked them what could be done about it.

When I came here in April, 1963, there fell into my hands a memorandum which the agencies in Vancouver had supplied to the hon. gentleman, the former minister of agriculture. It contained suggestions as to what could be done to improve grain traffic in the port of Vancouver. There were many suggestions made.

It was suggested, for example that the jetties should be lengthened to allow bigger ships and in some cases two ships at a time to dock. There were suggestions that the draft alongside various jetties be increased so that more ships could use these jetties. There were suggestions for improving the cleaning machinery, the drying machinery, the elevating machinery. All these suggestions were made to the minister in an effort to see what could be done to speed this trade. I am referring to the memorandum which was sent to him in 1961.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle had two years or more in which to do something about that memorandum before the government changed. What did he do about it? He filed it. Big smoke and no fire. I wish to refer now to the annual reports of the National Harbours Board for those years because hey give a good idea of what actually took place after the former minister took this matter in hand and urged all those concerned with moving grain at Vancouver to get along with the business of improving the port facilities so that the government of the day could move the grain more speedily.

I have before me the annual report for 1961 and I am looking at the page dealing with capital works in the harbour of Vancouver. They did build a cargo crane for the new centenary pier. They did some work on an overpass over some streets. They built a coffee shop on Granville Island. The total sum spent on capital works in that year amounted to $785,000. We find that provision was made for some flax cleaners at No. 3 elevator. We were not handling a great deal of flax. The movement of wheat, not flax, was our problem. So they put their money into providing some flax cleaners at No. 3 elevator. That was the extent of the implementation in that particular year of the memorandum to the hon. member on grain handling.

Meanwhile, what was he doing in Montreal? Capital works in that year in Montreal amounted to $15,322,793. That is what they thought about eastern port facilities as against the three quarters of a million dollars in improvements of all kinds at Vancouver, of which only a small fraction represented improved wheat moving facilities. What did they spend their money on in the city and port of Montreal? It was spent on the construction of grain elevator No. 4 and marine towers in section 56—

Mr. McIntosh: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deachman: When I am finished, sir. I now want to go on and look at the report for 1962. Perhaps the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was a little slow getting under way. Indeed, looking at the report for 1962 we find that the memorandum was catching up with him and something was happening. Capital expenditures in the port of Vancouver that year were $301,942. That is what the previous government thought of the port of Vancouver and improving the facilities there in a peak year for the movement of grain.

One item was the construction of the Heatley Avenue overpass. They were still worrying about that overpass. They also involved themselves in the installation of a partial dust control system and the replacement of car hauling machinery in No. 2 elevator. So they did put a little money into the elevators.

Meanwhile, at Montreal expenditures on capital account in that year amounted to over $10 million. That is where the funds of the previous government were being spent on harbours at that time. In spite of all he has told us this afternoon, the previous minister of agriculture in the Conservative government did not implement any of the recommendations that were made to him when he went to the city of Vancouver. That is why, when we were elected in April, 1963, vessels were swinging at anchor in the port of Vancouver waiting day after day for an opportunity to load, and we were getting ourselves into the position in which we find ourselves now.

The solutions for overcoming these problems involve enormous undertakings but they were never undertaken or ever dreamt of by the former minister of agriculture. He filed the memorandum. He was all smoke and no fire, and that is where his statement stands today.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, and it would be interesting to know what amounts have been spent on the port of Vancouver by the present government since it took office. Though there might be some political policy involved, all of us from the prairies are in sympathy with the hon. member in his efforts to get money allocated for the Pacific coast ports. We feel that the future of grain marketing from western Canada largely depends on the Pacific ports and they should receive more attention from governments than they have in the past.

We had quite a spectacle in the chamber today just as we had the other day in watching the Minister of Finance trying to justify the position of the government and his own position as minister responsible during the last three years for the Canadian Wheat Board. They have been an eventful three years but not because of the actions taken by the government or the minister. They have been years of panic and years of inaction so far as grain marketing is concerned. When I say that I give full marks to the government for the recurring wheat sale to China and the new sales made to the U.S.S.R., but I can remember that when we made the first sale to China the Prime Minister, who then sat in opposition, said that Canada was selling on credit to its enemies and at the same time selling for cash to its friends. He tried to discredit our government because of the tremendous wheat sale to China.

The minister has said that the past year has been a difficult one and that he is well satisfied with the results embodied in the final payment announced a few days ago. But I would remind him that this year's prices are from 9 to 17 cents per bushel less than those of the previous year, this in the face of rising costs for farm machinery, rising costs for labour and everything that goes into the cost of production, this in the face of the promise made by the Liberal party in two election campaigns to provide a guaranteed price of $2 per bushel for western grain producers. Instead of getting $2 per bushel western Canadian farmers received Hazen Argue as a senator, and when one considers the loss of 9 to 17 cents a bushel for that privilege I think the government owes the western farmers something over and above what they have received during the past three years.

Today the minister made much of the fact that the advisory board had said that producers were getting the idea they were receiving government money. If that is what I understood him to say, I find it very difficult to believe that the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board would make such a suggestion, because the people who have that kind of understanding are not the producers. They are people other than grain producers who think some of the payments represent government money.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member will accept my word, but he has only to speak to the members of the advisory committee to learn that they have become very concerned about the idea prevalent every time the government makes an announcement that somehow the government is distributing largesse to the western farmers. I know my hon. friend does not think this is so but many people had that misunderstanding and I am doing my best to clear it up.

Mr. Nasserden: If I heard him correctly the minister mentioned producers, and I am satisfied that the producers in western Canada know where the money is coming from in the sale of their grain. They do not think that any government is giving them anything, certainly not this government.

A number of things are responsibile for the amount of the final payment made this year. First, there was the serious situation with regard to the allocation and supply of box cars. I believe that situation was largely the result of the detached attitude taken by the minister with regard to all matters concerning the Canadian Wheat Board. He likes to tell us it is his job as minister to report on its operations to the House of Commons. We in western Canada, regardless of party, believe the minister has a greater responsibility with regard to the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, may I say the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that what I have said on so many occasions is that it is my job to support the Canadian Wheat Board and I repeat, to support it, not to report on it.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I say to the minister that he is doing a very poor job when he does not give them that support that will make their work just as effective as it can be. I was about to refer to the open barley quota that was put into effect last fall. Some farmers could deliver 17,000 bushels and others did not harvest a bushel. Elevators became congested and then there was a cut-off of box cars which meant that they could not make deliveries of the barley they had in stock. There has been an inequitable allocation of space to farmers in different areas of Canada and all because the minister wanted to do something during that period to indicate that grain was moving freely on the prairies under a Liberal government.

Another point with which I should like to deal is that I have heard nothing from the government or the minister about any machinery which has been set in motion to try to bring about some cohesive thinking on the part of the government as it prepares to embark upon the next International Wheat Agreement negotiations. That is something which should be receiving attention at the present time and which should have been receiving attention during the last year or more. It is one of the failures of the government that it has not given the leadership that is necessary in that respect.

I should like to refer also to the ports on the Pacific coast and support a couple of speeches which have been made in the house during this session with regard to the development of those ports. We on the prairies endorse the stand these members have taken that the government of Canada should allocate more money to the development and improvement of these ports. I know that criticism may be levelled against what has been done in the past, but let us go back and take a look at 1961, 1962 and 1963. The China wheat agreement had been signed and hon. gentlemen opposite, then in the opposition, questioned whether it was anything more than a one-time deal. What would they have said at that time had the government of the day embarked upon considerable and widespread development of the ports on the Pacific coast in the face of the assertions made by them during the course of the debate in those days—they even convinced me of the possibility—that perhaps the China wheat agreement might not be renewed, although in our hearts and minds we hoped that that agreement would pave the way for sales that would continue for many years to come?

The inaction, if there was any inaction at that particular time, is no excuse for the inaction since that time when the hon. gentlemen opposite have been in office and have had the assurance of recurring sales not only to China but to other nations across the Pacific.

Another matter which should be dealt with is the increase in the loss to farmers ranging from 9 cents to 17 cents a bushel. We all know how it started. It started when the minister panicked and did not support the Canadian Wheat Board the way he should have in the face of what he thought was competition from Australia, competition which has evaporated as a result of events which have taken place.

When you take a look at this whole situation and the grain which has moved in the markets of the world during the last two years you cannot come to any other conclusion but that price has not been a factor in the movement of grain during the entire period. The loss to Canadian farmers, ranging from 9 to 17 cents a bushel, is only part of the loss to Canada as a nation, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle outlined this afternoon, with regard to meeting the balance of payments situation that this country is faced with at the present time.

As these are the estimates of the Minister of Finance I should like to deal for a minute with the balance of payments situation. I wish to refer to an article in Business Week of February 19, 1966. The article is captioned "The Lessons of Power Politics":

> At first reading, the U.S. balance of payments figures for 1965 look impressive. They show that the deficit in this country's international transactions was cut to $1.3 billion last year, about half that of 1964 and the lowest deficit in eight years.

Quite a co-incidence when you take a look at the figures in the last eight years. A second look at the figures is anything but reassuring. The article goes on to say:

> —arguing that the U.S. should continue to run a deficit indefinitely to finance European expansion and international trade. . . . But in the world of international power politics every dollar that leaves the U.S. lessens our power and increases the hold that our creditors have on us.

That is the United States of America talking.

> The massive dollar balances now held by the Europeans can and will be used to force concessions from the U.S. not just in monetary affairs but in foreign policy.

Then they go on to say:

> As long as the U.S. has this fishhook planted in its gullet, those with whom we have to bargain always can jerk the line. The only way we can regain our freedom of action is to close the deficit before we weaken our position still further.

If that is true of what could happen in the United States, how much more true is it of Canada today with the alarming increase in the deficit in respect of our balance of payments? It is for the government of the day to try to protect against this problem. We on this side of the house have the satisfaction of knowing that our ministry and the prime minister of that day were able to make inroads into the problems which existed at that time. But some of the measures or policies that had been efficient were allowed to fly out the window by the panic and inaction of members opposite, particularly the Minister of Finance in respect of his attitude concerning grain sales.

The Chairman: Order. As it has been agreed that there will be no private members' hour today, I would ask the consent of hon. members to announce at this time the questions to be raised on the adjournment motion tonight without my leaving the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman), Labour conditions—Windsor—prospective lay-off of Ford workers; the hon.

member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent) —Agriculture—request for announcement of dairy policy.

Mr. Jorgenson: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to unduly prolong the debate but in view of the course of action that was followed by the minister on Friday in his refusal to face the House of Commons and allow comments to be made on the final price of wheat for the previous crop year I feel I must make a few remarks today. The minister offered a very vacuous excuse for deciding to table the order in council rather than read it as has been the practice in the past in the House of Commons so that opposition members would have an opportunity to comment either favourably or unfavourably on the contents of the particular order in council.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Everyone knows that the real reason the minister did not make a statement, as has been the custom, is that he refused to face up to his responsibilities as the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. The reason he gave us was that he was trying to cut short the amount of time he uses in the house. He was not worried about that last year when the final price was the highest on record. He was not worried about making a statement on behalf of the Canadian Wheat Board in respect of the Russian sale or the renewal of the China contract. He does not seem to be worried about taking the credit for those things that sound good.

The unhappy thing about the minister is that he refuses to take the responsibility for those things for which he is responsible and for those things which are not so good. He cannot have it both ways. He must either be the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, answer questions on behalf of that board and accept his responsibility or pass that responsibility on to someone else.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat, as near as I could follow him, suggested that the minister should take credit for all those things that are good but never take the blame for anything that is bad. I suggest that this is not the kind of attitude that we can stand for in this house.

The minister strove very valiantly to convince the house about the situation in respect of the price of wheat during the years 1957 to 1963 and I noticed that members opposite pounded their desks every time he referred to those years. However, I think it should be pointed out that when we assumed office in 1957 the price of wheat was $1.60 per bushel but as a result of the course of action followed by the party of which I am a member the price of wheat was gradually increased to $2 per bushel. That is what the price was when we left office in 1963. It did not appear to us during that time that there was any great difficulty in holding the price at that level in view of the markets that existed, the demand that had been created and the fact that our surplus had to all intents and purposes virtually disappeared.

What happened following that year? As was pointed out earlier by the hon. member for Rosthern, the government panicked and refused to assist the Canadian Wheat Board in dealing with the United States regarding the cut in prices. The minister has come to the house time and time again and said that he did not want to take credit but that the wheat board should have the credit. Yet at the same time he makes all the announcements. The only announcement he refused to make was that of last Friday, because he knew there would be criticism levelled as a result of his inaction and failure to support the Canadian Wheat Board which resulted in a drop in the price of wheat.

The very fact that the price of wheat is again climbing to the level it was in 1963 is all the proof needed to support the suggestion that the price should not have dropped in the first place. Just a little action on the part of the minister would have saved the farmers of western Canada some $70 to $80 million. Yet the minister had the stupid audacity to say: Well, they have enough money anyway.

Mr. Sharp: Who said that?

Mr. Jorgenson: The minister sits in his ivory tower on Bay street and tells the farmers that a drop in the price of wheat is not going to hurt them.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member a question. When did I make such a statement?

Mr. Hamilton: You made the statement in the house.

Mr. Jorgenson: Yes, you made that statement in the house.

Mr. Sharp: Would the hon. member care to quote it?

Mr. Jorgenson: I do not have the passage before me.

Mr. Sharp: You would not find it if you looked for it.

Mr. Jorgenson: You made a statement to the effect that because of the volume of sales the return was going to be the highest ever and therefore the farmers should be satisfied.

Mr. Sharp: I did not make such a statement and I should like the hon. member to quote the passage to which he refers.

Mr. Jorgenson: I do not have the quotation in front of me at this moment.

The Chairman: Order, please. The minister says he did not make that statement and I think his word must be accepted unless, of course, the hon. member is able—

Mr. Jorgenson: I do not intend to press this in any event, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order. One moment, please. The minister's word must be accepted unless the hon. member is able to produce the quotation.

Mr. McIntosh: Give us a little time. We are looking for it now.

Mr. Jorgenson: Mr. Chairman, I should again like to deal for a moment with the impression that the farmers in the west thave at this time so far as the Canadian Wheat Board is concerned. As the former minister of agriculture pointed out, prior to 1957 there was a great deal of dissatisfaction with the Canadian Wheat Board. The dissatisfaction arose because of the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in refusing to accept the responsibility that is theirs to answer to the House of Commons on behalf of that Crown agency. The fact is that the only way the Canadian Wheat Board has of reporting to parliament is through the minister and unless the minister is prepared to accept that responsibility the farmers are going to misunderstand what is the real problem.

We observed quite a spectacle in the house during the spring of the year in which the China grain sale was made. I do not intend to repeat all the statements that were made inside and outside the house in that regard at that time but I do wish to refer to the fact that the Prime Minister said in eastern Canada—I noticed he would not repeat this statement in western Canada—that the China wheat deal was not a good deal, that it was a hoax on the part of the hon. member for Assiniboia of that time. All the time the debate was going on in the house concerning the China grain deal the members of the government party, then on this side of the house, were nitpicking and attempting to find some obscure reason why the credit terms of the China wheat deal or the deal itself should not be accepted. In the meantime the farmers of western Canada were pocketing the money that resulted from that sale.

We in the west have had enough of this minister and his failure to do anything to support the Canadian Wheat Board. We have had enough of this rusty Rasputin and his ivory tower on Bay street. The Prime Minister should remove the Canadian Wheat Board from the responsibility of this minister and turn it over to the Secretary of State. She may not know anything about wheat or the wheat board either but at least she is not afraid to get out and attempt to do something.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take only a few minutes to put forward the three points I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. As a farmer, and I use myself as an example, I have not delivered enough wheat as of this moment to pay last year's fuel bills. One month from now we will be faced with seeding a new crop.

In my opinion this is not a matter of high finance; it should be very simple and there should be no argument about it whatsoever. I have listened to a great deal of talk in the house this afternoon and agree with most of it. I would not agree with one or two things the minister said or with the hon. member opposite who said that there was not time for this sort of thing. I think there is time. When a western Canadian farmer at this time of the year has not delivered enough wheat to pay for last years' fuel, I think it is high time something was done.

I should also like to point out what this situation means in our economy. I borrow money from the bank and pay interest on that money. The wheat board borrows money from the bank to make the initial payments and they pay interest on that money. The elevator companies in turn enjoy the revenue obtained from storage. All these costs are charged to the farmer's account, to my account. The farmer pays interest on the money he borrows, interest on the money the wheat board borrows and pays for the storage. I do not believe it is necessary to be Minister of Finance of a country to add up these costs and realize they take the cream off the crop.

Canadian farmers generally need consideration in this respect, not just western farmers. Western farmers are renowned for their ability to spend their money. Where do they spend it? It is spent in the rest of Canada, particularly in eastern Canada. Western farmers contribute to a very great extent in helping to solve our balance of payments problem.

I have one last point, Mr. Chairman. We do not only have to consider this situation and correct it or bring it to the point where it is acceptable but we have to go one step further and get out of the rut we are in. I say in all deference to the government that we have been in this rut for many, many years because we wait until someone says we can deliver wheat. In our part of the country the C.P.R. has a captive market. If they do not haul grain this month they can haul it next month. The elevator companies have a captive market in regard to storage. I believe we have to break this problem wide open. Hon. members have made suggestions in this regard but I say that to really improve this situation we have to deliver the crop after it is harvested or at least a good part of it. If we do that we will get rid of the three charges which I mentioned and which constitute the real cream of the crop. This would cost nobody anything. The farmer will have an improved price without costing anyone anything and he will have the price he rightly deserves. This can only be achieved through proper management. I submit this suggestion to the Minister of Finance and the other ministers concerned—I see the Minister of Agriculture is here— and I sincerely believe that farmers need this kind of consideration, not only wheat farmers in the west.

Item agreed to.

Administration—

1d. Departmental administration, and grants as detailed in the estimates, $15,000.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, there is one short question I should like to ask the minister. It has to do with the sales tax in relation to municipalities. Perhaps I should have asked it under vote No. 1 or maybe it should come under another item. However, perhaps you would guide me in this respect, Mr. Chairman, or the minister would allow me to ask my question.

The Chairman: It is quite all right for the hon. member to ask his question now.

Mr. Gundlock: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The question I wish to ask concerns the application of the sales tax to municipalities in their purchase of certain materials. It is my understanding that municipalities are not subject to the payment of sales tax in respect of certain materials. By way of explanation I would point out that irrigation companies are paying sales tax on culverts.

Hon. members will appreciate that culverts are important in the work carried on by irrigation companies. In our part of the country over 500,000 acres are under irrigation and there are some 22 irrigation companies which are paying sales tax on culverts. For this reason it is quite an important item and I wonder whether the minister will give me some explanation in this regard.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, the fact is that municipalities are not exempt from sales tax except on certain special equipment such as road graders, I think, and so on.

Mr. Gundlock: And culverts.

Mr. Sharp: And some things that are associated with the movement of water. I am not absolutely sure. Perhaps the Minister of National Revenue could answer this question if the hon. member would ask it when the minister's estimates are under consideration and the minister could give the details at that time. In general municipalities do pay sales tax except on items that are specifically exempted.

Mr. Gundlock: Perhaps by way of explanation I might point out that irrigation companies were, under the Department of Labour, defined as municipalities for the purpose of winter works. I think that definition should apply in this case. If I am not wrong about this, culverts are one of those items that are exempt. However, since the time irrigation companies were considered to be municipalities and therefore came under the winter works program they have been charged sales tax on culverts. I wish the minister would take this matter into serious consideration. It means a great deal to irrigation companies because culverts, as hon. members will realize, pass water under grades and over hollows and this constitutes a very considerable expense.

Mr. Sharp: I can assure the hon. member that I will look into this question. I will be preparing my budget and will take this as another recommendation.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I hope the few remarks I wish to make will not be deemed to be out of place under this item. Perhaps the provisions of item 1d may be extended a little so that my remarks may be in order. I was caught between my office and the chamber and am consequently a little late in speaking on this item.

There are a few points I should like to make to the minister on the first item of these estimates. I shall refer to them at this time and indicate that we want to hear a great deal more explanation and discussion of these matters during consideration of the subsequent estimates.

One question I wish to raise at this time is the matter of guide lines. The fact that the minister is going to the United States. I want to know whether he is proposing to meet the relevant officials of the American administration to discuss with them further and put before them the very strong resentment that exists in Canada with regard to the effect of these guide lines in this country. It is almost as though the American administration had taken a swipe at something and was unconscious of some of the side effects of its actions in dealing with a problem which we recognize.

We recognize that the United States has a problem in this regard but it must be remembered and re-emphasized, as has been said by my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland and others on this side of the house, and I am sure this concern is shared by the government, that there are certain considerations that apply to Canada in this connection. We are the best customers of the United States, and if the effect of these guide lines is to stultify the Canadian economy and make it much more difficult for our economy to maintain its progress, of course the Americans are only cutting off their nose to spite their face, although they may not recognize that fact. This is the point I want to emphasize.

Not only is there the question of the guide lines but also the action of the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States in their requirement that in Canadian companies where there is a 10 per cent shareholding, I believe it is, in the United States, these companies must make full disclosure as required by the American authorities. I believe this is going rather too far. It will only create resentment in this country. It is not that we have that many Canadian companies operating in the United States where the shareholdings by United States interests may amount to 10 per cent; yet we find Canadian companies are being asked to supply information as to their total operation. We might counter by saying that any United States corporations owned by 1 per cent, 10 per cent or 15 per cent Canadian interests must disclose to us all of their operations. I am sure that Washington would react very promptly and with a great deal of resentment if we did that. What is fair for them is fair for us. I believe that this action by the S.E.C. is totally uncalled for. It will be the duty of the Canadian government to make these views known to the United States government and to tell that government this is the type of action that is not calculated to improve relations between our countries.

So far as the guide lines themselves are concerned, I think I can only emphasize what has been said on this side of the house. I do not believe the guide lines are innocuous. I think the minister recognizes that perhaps his first indication was that he was taking it all too calmly; otherwise we would not have had the action taken by Mr. Kierans in the province of Quebec and others. Albeit they did use rather unorthodox means of getting their point across, yet they do have a point to get across. That is all I am going to say on this matter.

On February 2 the minister was good enough to file an answer to a question I put on the Order Paper, question No. 100, concerning the results under a supplementary agreement according to the provisions of the Established Programs Act. This was the 1964 Bill No. C-146 which, if I recall rightly, was going through some time in July or August of that year. I remember the hon. member for Davenport, who occupied the portfolio of the Minister of Finance, hailed this particular arrangement as one of the stars in the Liberal heaven.

This bill for the opting out of joint programs was going to be the solution for the relations between the federal government and the provinces in connection with such programs. At the time I indicated, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands indicated and so did some of my other colleagues that this bill was a hoax. There was nothing to it in so far as granting greater fiscal autonomy to the provinces was concerned. The Prime Minister paraded up and down the country saying that this was the new Liberalism. The then Minister of Finance did the same. The proof of the pudding is always in the eating and I am very interested to see that there was only one province that took advantage of the provisions of this bill. Yet it had been designed for the benefit of all Canada because dominion-provincial relations are not the private preserve of the government of Canada and one province. Dominion-provincial relations apply to all provinces, whether on the Atlantic coast, in central Canada or out west.

I assert that in this regard all provinces have their rights and their positions. They stand as equals in fiscal relations. Certainly as a representative from the western provinces in this house I doubly assert that. The detail of the answer given by the minister is immaterial in so far as the quantum of money that will be realized by the province of Quebec under the income tax abatement provided for under the supplementary agreement, but I must insist again on pointing out that as soon as the principal agreements terminate the supplementary agreement falls to the ground and unless there are renegotiations of the original agreement the abatement of income tax goes back to the government of Canada. This has not been a permanent abatement or assignment of these points. The law is patently clear and there is not much more freedom under Bill No. C-146 than there was heretofore. The Auditor General has access to the records of the provinces to the same extent as he had before. The government of Canada is entitled to the reimbursement of any funds in excess to costs. The government of Canada has the right to assess the validity of the cost under such joint programs just as it had before.

In the event that there is a deficiency between the cost and the revenues ascribed to that particular joint program, the province can come in for a special grant. But I would be the most surprised man in the world if the Treasury Board and the Auditor General did not insist upon a complete accounting of the cost of the programs administered by the province. Therefore I repeat what I said at that time, that this Bill No. C-146 was only brought before the house as a result of a deal for the 1963 election, one of those deals that we find so repugnant. The other provinces showed the back of their hands to this sort of thing because they realized that they were not receiving anything out of it. In so far as fiscal autonomy is concerned this is precisely what this bill meant. As of October 31 it became a dead letter in the realm of greater fiscal autonomy for the provinces because it was completely and utterly meaningless.

Then, on February 14 the minister replied to a question I had put with regard to the agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom for tax credits.

Mr. Sharp: What is the page number?

• (6:30 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert: Question No. 410, which is found on page 1146 of Hansard. He mentioned, as indicated, that a sort of interim agreement is applicable. One point, however, worries me, and that is the effect of British surtax and whether that is covered under this interim agreement. I should like to know whether Canadian investors in United Kingdom securities are in as good a position today as they were heretofore. The capital gains tax which has been implemented by the United Kingdom government must be considered.

I refer to the minister's answer to part 4 of the question, page 1146 of Hansard:

> An interim agreement referring to four classes of income was signed on December 6, 1965. It is expected that this will be replaced by a further agreement of broader application after the report of the royal commission on taxation has been considered.

I am concerned about the effect on Canadian investors in British securities as a result of what happened in 1964. Have Canadian investors been placed in a position inferior to that which they occupied prior to the expiration of the agreement? This is important, Mr. Chairman, because of the fact that British tax rates are rather serious and in some instances rather savage. It is important when one considers the effect upon dividends or income earned in the United Kingdom, which also may be subject to a certain degree of Canadian taxation.

I trust that we shall have some information on this. Personally I should be satisfied with an interim reply and with a further consideration in detail the next time we meet the minister.

I wish to refer to university grants. I know that this subject is covered in a later vote, but I do wish to make certain references to the recent grants made by the government of Canada to the various provinces. I find some difficulty and regret with respect to what appears to be the action taken by one province. I know that the door has not necessarily been closed because negotiations are going on. As a matter of general principle I accept that the government states that it has made grants unconditionally. What is somewhat surprising in this regard is that the government says it was following a precedent in this connection. I realize that the precedent, if one did exist, resulted in all the moneys made available to the Quebec administration of the day being turned over to the universities. Mr. Chairman, this is $17 million that the government of Canada has turned over to the province of Quebec to assist universities without any strings attached that the money should go to this area or that area, or this or that use, or that the universities shall bend their energies this way or that way. To this extent these moneys have always been unconditional and have been recognized by the majority of the Canadian people as such. However, I do find difficulty in accepting any justification that any of these moneys shall be turned to other uses. One could almost say:

[Translation]

To use the sentence, during an election year, the $8 million which makes the difference between $17 million and $9 million will be spent on the construction of sections of roads.

Mr. Grafftey: Prior to the election.

Mr. Lambert: Yes, obviously, during an election year; that is when sections of roads are built, and not only in the province of Quebec, but everywhere—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): In Alberta too.

Mr. Lambert: Yes, certainly, but there it is not only sections of roads, but long roads which are built. I wanted to say that I would find it abnormal and frankly immoral if that money were used for other purposes.

I claim that there is a question of morals involved. There is, if not a formal undertaking under an agreement, at least, the moral obligation to use those funds for the purposes set out by the federal government.

[English]

This is one point that I think the minister should clarify. He should clarify what representations have been made in this regard in view of events, or is it intended to await the ultimate solution of the difficulties now being discussed in the province of Quebec?

My last point is one that I shall wish to discuss with the minister at greater length on future occasions and it is the question of money grants in lieu of taxes by the government of Canada. This is a problem that exists not only as between the government of Canada and the municipalities but between provincial administrations and municipalities. Frankly, I find the activities of government, both federal and provincial, with respect to their powers of expropriation to direct government facilities, their relative freedom from town planning restrictions or, shall we say, their influence on town planning in various municipalities, and the predominant position inherent in the status of federal and provincial governments vis-à-vis the municipalities, places upon them a much greater responsibility than now assumed by the two senior levels of government with regard to the payment of grants in lieu of taxes for municipal services.

Some grants, in some instances, I would almost categorize as niggardly. Municipalities are called upon to assume greater responsibilities for streets, for public transportation, for schools and for all sorts of other things. Yet there is only a sort of nominal contribution to the municipalities. I think that is apparent here in Ottawa. I think it is apparent that there should be a complete review of the formula for the determination of municipal grants in lieu of taxes. This also applies in my own city of Edmonton which is a capital city. It has certain federal properties and it has a great number of provincial properties. I am sure that there could be worked out a much more equitable dealing for the municipalities in this regard.

I do not know that the federal government necessarily would be the loser because money for these things has to be found somehow. The municipalities must provide these services. I think it is much more honest and much more equitable for the municipalities to acquire these funds in a direct, appropriate manner rather than in a circuitous, ad hoc manner forcing them to come cap in hand, almost like beggars, to both provincial and federal administrations in order to get funds. They have to acquire funds properly to discharge responsibilities that are in many instances forced upon them by the activities of both senior levels of government.

I wish to discuss other points as we go along. However, I think that these brief remarks will indicate the general tenor of my comments at this time.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, my intervention in the discussion at this point will be brief. I have made an attempt to estimate the number of hours remaining to us until six o'clock on Friday evening when I believe we have the objective of passing all the estimates for the current fiscal year. On this basis it seems to me each member is entitled to four minutes. I shall therefore take approximately that amount of time.

On November 6, 1962, the colleagues of the Minister of Finance proclaimed themselves in favour of debt free money. I recall the fascinating speech made at that time by that intrepid financial figure, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday the minister, in a reply to a question I had on the order paper asking him whether the present government has taken any steps to bring about debt free money in the years between 1963 and 1966, said the answer was in the negative.

I should like to compliment him on returning his colleagues to fiscal orthodoxy and I should appreciate his assurance that he will see to it that what happened in 1962 will not happen again.

Item agreed to.

Subsidies and Other Payments to Provinces—

5. Payments, computed in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Governor in Council, to the government of each province, in respect of income tax paid by corporations whose main business is the distribution to or generation for distribution to the public of electrical energy, gas or steam; the said payments to be made in respect of such part of the income of the corporations for the taxation year ending in the calendar year 1963 (as determined under and for the purposes of the Income Tax Act) as is derived from the said distribution or generation in the province to which payment is made, $8,500,000.

Mr. Lambert: There is on this page a statutory item in respect of university grants. I think the minister should perhaps make some comment in reply to what I have said.

Mr. Sharp: May I comment briefly on two or three of the points made by the hon. member for Edmonton West?

First, as to his comments on the United States guide lines and the attempt to apply U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission regulations to Canada, I entirely agree with the position the hon. member has taken. It is one which I personally have taken and one which the government of Canada has taken and will continue to take with the United States government. We may even quote the hon. member for Edmonton West as an example of Canadian public opinion on these issues.

The hon. member referred to the Established Programs Act. I would point out that these are transitional measures. It is not expected that arrangements of the kind we have been describing will continue indefinitely. They are in the nature of transitional measures which will be replaced in due course by measures of indefinite duration. The comments he was making are, I think, quite accurate on the whole but they are not comments which would apply generally in future years when we have got through this transitional period.

The hon. member then talked about the United Kingdom taxation agreement. Like him I have had complaints from taxpayers who are caught by the new United Kingdom taxes and have not been able, because of the terms of the present tax agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, to get as much relief as they would like to have from the adverse effects of double taxation. We are very much aware of this situation. Had it not been for the fact that the Carter commission may be recommending some important changes in Canadian taxes—I have not had access to the report but I hear it is far-reaching—we would probably be engaged in negotiations with the United Kingdom to secure a more satisfactory agreement.

On the question of the university grants let me point out that these arrangements are for one year only. The Prime Minister has dealt with this matter. I do not think that in fact the province of Quebec has any greater freedom in the use of the total resources at its command than have the other provinces. As the Prime Minister has said, we set no conditions as to how the other provinces should use their money. So they are free to give as much or as little aid to the universities as they wish.

They could, for example, decide that they would not spend as much on the universities because we were helping the universities. Since this is for one year only, it is merely a transitional arrangement to be replaced by a more permanent arrangement when we have had the opportunity of discussing the whole question with the provinces at a conference. The hon. member will understand that we were not able to have a conference earlier and we had to make a decision because of the great need of the universities.

Mr. Lambert: Will this $17 million be a related item in the estimates or will it be included in this particular item? Will this $17 million be paid as a supplementary item to this particular item, item 5, which is headed "University Grants" or is it some related item? If the item under which this money will be paid has the appellation "University Grants" there is a moral obligation to spend the money as such.

Mr. Sharp: I will bear that in mind when we are preparing the supplementary estimate. I am sorry but I cannot answer the hon. member's question off the cuff. There were other questions which the hon. member raised but I do not think he would expect me to discuss them at this time.

Mr. Orlikow: I hope the minister would be able to say something more about university grants than he has said tonight. When the government announced an increase in per capita grants for the provinces from $2 to $5 in respect of universities it was said, as the minister has said tonight, that this was an interim and temporary payment. The provinces were, of course, happy to get assistance. An increase of roughly $60 million in one year from $40 to $100 million looks good until one considers the problems which our universities face.

The day after the Prime Minister made his announcement about the increase the Toronto Globe and Mail conducted a survey. I am sure it could not have been a complete survey in the time available but it did take account of the needs of all major Canadian universities in relation to the cost of their present building programs. They came up with a figure of $500 million.

Universities across Canada now have on the drawing boards or in their building programs provision for meeting the needs of students who are likely to enter universities during the next ten years, a period in which an increase of between 300 and 400 per cent has been estimated. The universities are moving as energetically as they can to meet the requirement but they are faced now with building costs of the order of $500 million.

The cost of building up a staff of professors and research workers to guide these universities is fantastic. Costs in every field are likely to double in the next ten years. Even the Maritime provinces which have a lower per capita income than the other provinces in Canada have done tremendously well in assisting the universities in the light of the many other calls on their services. The cost of education in every province today is probably twice as much as the total provincial budget in 1945. It is obvious that the provinces alone will not be able to meet the cost in the future.

They certainly cannot meet the needs expressed by the Economic Council in its second annual report, which pointed to the fact that there are twice as many young people of university age in the United States attending university as there are in Canada. It seems to me that what the federal government announced this year was just a beginning, just a small proportion of what is required, and I would hope the minister could tell the committee in greater detail what are the government's plans.

I am not too concerned about the details of how the money is paid out, whether directly to the universities or to the provincial governments. What is important is that the federal government recognize the fact that in the field of education the provinces face such tremendous problems that they simply cannot meet the needs by themselves. The federal government will have to co-operate with the provinces, and I would hope the minister would say more than he did when he stated that this was just a temporary measure this year and that the federal government will be discussing the matter further with the provinces.

We have had discussions on this matter for many years. Municipalities have made representations to provincial governments, provincial governments have made representations to the federal government, as have university organizations to both the federal and provincial governments. The Association of Canadian University Teachers has made representations to the federal and provincial governments and so have the medical research people. We have had lots of talk about these problems. I do not intend to put all these representations on record tonight, though I shall certainly do so at a more appropriate time, but I know the people vitally concerned about the educational problem would be very heartened if the minister could indicate in a broad, general way the basic principles which the government is thinking about in this field.

Item agreed to.

15s. Government's contribution to the superanuation account and the public service death benefit account, payments under earlier superannuation and retirement acts and under the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act, and gratuities to families of deceased employees, $61,882,600.

Mr. Lambert: Could the minister tell me what is the intention of the government with regard to the older superannuates? Representations have been made in this chamber and outside it by hon. members and interested bodies which indicate that the position of senior superannuates cannot continue. The last review was made in 1958, seven years ago. There is a large body of retired public servants whose pension rates are based on low earnings in years past.

Between 1958 and 1963 there was an increase of 1 to 2 per cent per year in the cost of living and since that time the cost of living has increased further. Indeed, it has gone up by 3 per cent in the last year. We have got to do something for these people. To say they are going to get additional old age pension or are going to qualify earlier for old age pension is not sufficient. Most of them are already getting old age security but so is everyone else.

The man who has been a spendthrift, who has been a ne'er-do-well is entitled to old age security and it is not sufficient to say these superannuates qualify for it. We have to update the level of pensions under the Superannuation Act. What I say here applies equally well to retired members of the R.C.M.P. Last year I met a retired R.C.M.P. corporal, who is between the age of 65 and 70, and after a whole lifetime of service he is getting the munificent sum of $68.70 a month. This is not good enough. To say to these people, "We are increasing the old age pension and making it available earlier" is in my opinion a contemptuous dismissal of a legitimate claim.

Royal Canadian Mint—

35. Administration, operation, and maintenance, $2,701,000.

Mr. More: Since commemorative coins will be struck for our 1967 centennial can the minister assure the committee that Canadian collectors will have preference in obtaining them and that the supply will be adequate? I understand United States collectors have preference for coin sets in their own country and I think the same should apply for Canadian investors in Canada.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to confirm that new coins are being struck for 1967. I saw the designs the other day and they have been approved. We are planning to issue the sets in boxes that are suitable for presentation and collection. We hope to make a little money out of this, apart from the ordinary seignorage, and I shall bear in mind the comments of the hon. gentleman to see if we can give some preference to Canadian collectors as against others, although perhaps fewer of the coins would be spent if they were owned by foreigners rather than Canadians.

Mr. More: I would not think so. I would not like the minister to get away with that comment because I think Canadian collectors do not spend such coins. We have had previous experience with United States collectors flooding the market seeking Canadian coins, which caused great worry for Canadian collectors, and I would not want to see that happen in 1967.

• (7:00 p.m.)

Mr. Howard: I understand from the press announcement made last fall that the set of coins for 1967 will contain all the decimal coin units from a penny to a dollar and in addition will contain a $20 gold piece. Is this still the procedure? Will that be the only set produced by the Royal Canadian Mint in 1967?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, those are the coins, the designs of which I have approved and which the government has approved—the penny, the five, the ten, the twenty five, the fifty, the one dollar, and then the twenty dollar gold piece.

Mr. Howard: What I sought to ask is, will that be the only set of coins produced by the mint for distribution in the form in which they will be distributed, or in addition will there be the proof-like sets which are produced and distributed now, namely the penny through the dollar; will there be two types of sets in 1967?

Mr. Sharp: Obviously I am not a collector like my hon. friend, and some of these terms are confusing to me. Perhaps I could answer this when we come to the estimates for 1966-67.

Mr. Howard: Yes. I understand it is illegal to be in possession of gold in the United States produced after some date; at least there was a time limit. If such is the case, if the United States still holds to that prohibition, and I understand that an announcement to this effect has been made, then it would be illegal for United States collectors or investors even to purchase the sets from our mint, which would perhaps satisfy the thought raised by the hon. member earlier.

Municipal Development and Loan Board—

45. Administration, $216,000.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, I think the importance of this particular vote is such that a few comments should be made in respect of it. We were pleased the other day when the minister announced his intention of extending the expiry date of the Municipal Development and Loan Board, because had he not I believe many municipalities in the country would have been in difficulty in respect of completing projects which had been started under the provisions of this particular facility. I think the minister and the government of the day should take a real hard look at this particular point before they go into the final decisions regarding the new budget. We regret that this particular loan development fund was not made the beginning of a new approach to the problem of municipal financing.

I note the arguments the minister has put up with regard to the fund; but I think this fund has justified itself by the degree of participation of the various municipalities. The question of municipal financing in this country is the most difficult single problem of public financing, simply because the municipal authorities in particular face an unequal struggle for the tax dollar in so far as being able to finance those services which it is their obligation to provide. It has been true down through the years that some permanent facility should have been established in this regard. If my memory serves me right, I believe it was in 1938 that the municipal development and loans act was passed and in the meantime nothing very much was done to act upon this authority.

Mr. Chairman, unless something is done to assist the cities, towns, counties, municipal districts and villages in meeting the tremendous problem they face in financing the public developments, which basically are those services which it is their responsibility to provide, then we are not going to be able to progress as we should.

I would urge upon the minister and upon the government the necessity of getting down to this particular level of financing so far as the governments of our country is concerned. How can municipalities contend with the demand for schools, the demand for hospitals, the demand for water and sewage facilities, for streets, parks and all the rest when repeatedly they themselves have to go out to the public market, or often to the United States, to borrow money at tremendous cost—a cost which is so great that by the time the payments are amortized the expenditure for the use of the money has at least doubled and sometimes trebled the cost of the project they are seeking to construct. It is in this area that the federal government could do more than in any other way toward helping the local governments.

We in the Social Credit party for years have recommended that this is the responsibility of public financing. This is not to pay for the services which should be paid for by the taxpayer's dollars, but it is money for the facility that provides those services. That money should be available at lesser cost, and through an easier means than is presently available.

This would tend to lessen the tax burden; it would tend to decrease the cost to the government and leave more money in the pockets of the taxpayers for the essential cost of government at other levels which cannot be provided for in this way. We recommend now that the minister very seriously consider, before we enter into another year, that a permanent municipal loan fund be set up, not as a board but as a separate bank. We have the Industrial Development Bank, a bank which has served a very legitimate purpose in our economy in the post-war years. A bank which originally was intended to provide capital for high risk development and industry which could not obtain capital through the normal channels of finance. This bank has functioned well. It has authority as part of the Bank of Canada to expand its own credit. I believe the record will show that the expansion of its reserves has rendered an effective service. I would suggest, in light of the present financial situation, that the minister would be well advised to take the Industrial Development Bank and transfer it as the municipal development bank so that its credit would be available to the municipal governments for their capital costs.

If the Industrial Development Bank can do what it has been doing in the private sector of the economy, there is no reason why the municipal development bank as part of the Bank of Canada could not render as good a service for public financing. I believe this is one of the greatest needs of our whole financial situation at the present time. It would lift the burden and ease the problem in respect of education. It is evident that in the next ten years we will need $10 billion for school expansion alone. This is the kind of service which could be rendered to the municipal and provincial governments. I would urge the government and the Minister of Finance to take this into serious consideration.

A little while ago the hon. member for Halifax made a sarcastic remark about the debt free money. During the war we were able to get money which was necessary to the country at cost, because of the national emergency. At one time Mr. Ilsley, the Minister of Finance, announced a bank loan for the financing of the war and someone asked how much it would cost. Mr. Ilsley replied that it would cost three quarters of 1 per cent. The hon. member then asked how he could get it at this when he personally had to pay 4 or 5 per cent, and the answer was simply that that represented the actual cost.

Perhaps you could not obtain money at the cost of three quarters of 1 per cent, but you could obtain it for less than 5, 6 or 7 per cent which is the price being paid for public developments. This is what we are referring to when we say that we should make special provision for another category of money, that for public financing. We do not refer to tax capital or private capital, which ought to come out of our own savings, but to public capital to provide for the tremendous financing need we have in this country for the facilities I have just mentioned.

One of the most important things the government ought to consider in the area of financing, aside from the expected reforms in the way of new legislation which must come in regard to the Bank Act, is the establishment of this new category. If the government gave consideration to the establishment of something of this kind, I believe it would provide a solution to one of our most difficult financing problems. I cannot urge or recommend in strong enough terms to the government that this be done. I am convinced that if some solution such as I have suggested was brought forward many of our financial problems would be solved. If the government does not wish to adopt my suggestion perhaps they could revert to the original 1938 legislation and put that into effect.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

1. Departmental administration including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates, $5,664,700.

Mr. Irvine: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask first of all whether, as is customary, the minister is going to make a statement at the present time?

Mr. Winters: No, Mr. Chairman, I did not plan to make a statement at this time, as these estimates are for the current fiscal year and I have not personally been identified with them. If there are any questions hon. members wish to ask I shall be glad to endeavour to answer them, but I do not intend to make a formal statement at this time.

Mr. Irvine: In that event, there are a few questions I should like to ask and a few statements I should like to make.

First of all I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether it is his intention to recall his trade commissioners to Canada for the purpose of attending a conference with Canadian businessmen so that they might renew their knowledge and energies and go out again into the world markets, with new vigour and sales know-how, to do something about the current deficit in our balance of payments and trade.

I have been connected with a number of businesses involved in selling. My experience is not as great as that of the minister, but it seems to me that sales organizations recall their representatives from time to time so that they can have a new look at their problems and survey the markets, before going out into the field again to make a concerted effort to increase their sales effectiveness. There is an old saying in the selling business, that when you review the things you think you know you get to know about the things you thought you knew.

I have an article in my hand from the London Free Press dated July 31, 1965 under the heading "Warning Signs Starting to Appear in Business Outlook, States Bank". The bank referred to is the Bank of Montreal. This item states in part:

> But the bank warns of uncertainty in the future of external trade, which had been one of the major sources of strength throughout the current business expansion. The review says there has been a growing gap between imports and exports in recent months.
> The bank said strong upward price pressures had appeared late in 1964 and, in the nine months to June, 1965, wholesale prices in Canada rose by more than 3 per cent. Consumer prices and most other prices also rose.

There must be a reason for that, Mr. Chairman.

In view of the statements that are alleged to have been made by the minister during the recent election campaign I wonder whether he is going to recommend the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on production machinery and building supplies. I understand that such a statement was made by him, although I stand to be corrected if I am wrong. To my way of thinking this 11 percent sales tax is an unfair tax which is putting many of our firms in what we might call an economic strait-jacket and is pricing them out of many foreign markets. Has the minister had any representations in this regard from two major groups in this country, and I refer to the Auto Parts Manufacturing Association and the Canadian Tooling Manufacturers Association? It is my understanding that if representations have not been made to the minister on behalf of Canada's eight major automobile manufacturers, they will be made very shortly.

I have in my hands another article which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on February 5, 1966 under the heading "Grain output below target set by Soviet". The article states in part:

> Soviet grain production last year fell short of government targets by 30 million tons, a state planning official said yesterday.

That was an article which appeared in the paper on February 5, 1966. By simple arithmetic that 30 million tons would amount to a billion bushels of wheat. Perhaps the Soviet Union had budgeted for a surplus of some kind to their needs. However, this is a market we should be after, and I am sure the minister is now giving consideration to it. Perhaps we cannot obtain the whole market, but if we were able to get part of it this would be a wonderful opportunity to sell more of our grain. I should like to know what the minister's plans are in this regard.

We in this country have a very favourable balance of payments position with some of our Far East customer nations. Sooner or later these nations are going to demand a greater portion of our import business, and when that time comes we are not going to be in a position to turn a deaf ear to their requests. However, we find ourselves in the position of putting all our eggs in one basket: We are now doing 75 per cent or 80 per cent of our import business with one nation, the United States. This creates another very important problem.

I know that all hon. members in this house and everybody in the country must be interested in the recent guide lines established by the United States government as they affect subsidiaries of American owned companies in Canada. This is a very serious problem and is something with which we have to deal. I should like to say that I do not believe these guide lines were aimed at us in the first place. The United States finds itself in a very poor position with regard to its balance of payments and laid out these guide lines for subsidiaries of American owned companies in all countries throughout the world. But it happens that we are the ones most seriously affected because we have a very, very poor balance of payments picture with regard to the United States.

In conference this week end I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce, together with the other ministers who are present, will arrive at some kind of agreement whereby we will be exempt as a country from those guide lines. Imagine reducing the amount of U.S. capital in Canada, returning larger dividends from these subsidiaries to the United States or decreasing Canadian exports to the United States. These are some of the guide lines that were imposed. Imagine also increasing United States exports to Canada. What position does this leave us in? These are matters that are very important to every Canadian taxpayer today, because they constitute a threat to our economic sovereignty.

This threat to our economic sovereignty comes about through strong controls of businesses operating in Canada. Further, Mr. Chairman, insisting that United States subsidiaries operate in Canada in such a manner as to increase our balance of payments deficit will have the effect of decreasing our competitiveness in world markets by increasing our costs of production. It would make it almost impossible for Canadian businesses to compete for Canadian capital. Where do we go from here? Perhaps this is the time to establish our own guide lines. We must do something to protect ourselves and Canadian business. We are in a vulnerable position because this year our balance of payments deficit amounts to approximately $1½ billion.

I remember reading in Hansard some time ago that a minister made the statement "What's a million?" I am wondering whether the present Minister of Trade and Commerce will increase that figure and say, "What's a billion?" This is a serious situation and is something we cannot put up with; something must be done in this regard.

I know this is a new portfolio for the minister. I also know it is the custom for a new broom to sweep clean. We certainly hope it does, because somehow or other something must be done to alleviate our balance of payments position, which is in a deplorable condition. No business can continue, no matter how big or how small, if it pays out more than it takes in. Nor can we do this with our trade and commerce accounts; it just cannot be done.

It is my feeling that some arrangement could be made this week end in the conference with the United States officials without necessarily affecting our relations with the United States, because certainly this would not be our desire. Our future is so closely interwoven with that country that we would not want to see this relationship harmed. They are a financial and industrial giant next door to us. Here we are, a somewhat larger nation with great natural resources but limited money with which to explore these things, and somehow something must be done about this problem. Mr. Minister, we depend on you.

In making such an arrangement we must at the same time preserve the great spirit of unity that exists between our two great countries. We cannot do this by handing over to the United States our economic freedom and perhaps our sovereignty as a nation. We must cling very jealously to our economic sovereignty, to our identity as a nation. Canada and the United states have lived side by side in peace and harmony for 150 years, with no guns, no forts. The entire world envies the association we have had together as nations with just an imaginary line between us. It is not a line to separate us, but rather to hold us together as two races of people with but one common purpose—life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, the dignity of the individual.

The United States of America owns at the present time 62 per cent of our petroleum industry. They also own or control over 50 per cent of our manufacturing industry. I believe it is about time we grew up as a nation. I should like to ask the minister a few questions. I shall not ask facetious questions because I do not believe in them; I am asking them in the interests of Canada, as a Canadian. What are the minister's plans? What is he going to do about the deficit in our balance of payments, or what is he going to attempt to do? We do not think, of course, that the minister will be a cure-all for every problem but I am sure all hon. members will go along with him as long as he is attempting to do those things that we consider to be in the best interests of Canada.

I should like to know what the minister's policy is going to be with regard to the Department of Trade and Commerce. I should also like to know—and I mentioned this before—what he is going to do about the 11 per cent tax on production machinery and building materials. Fourth, I should like to know, is he going to do everything in his power in an endeavour to protect our sovereignty, or is he going to permit us to become vassals of another country, friendly though it may be?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, it does seem somewhat unique that we have a minister who at the first opportunity in presenting his estimates refrains from outlining to the committee the plans he has in mind or what has been the situation during the past year. It sort of leaves one groping in the dark, as it were, about policy, about the attempts and accomplishments of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

The minister did say that he refrained from making what is called an opening statement because he is so newly attached to the department and most things happened under the wing of his predecessor, the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Finance. There could be some substance to this as a reason, but it seems rather incongruous when placed against the fact that the minister's press release people seem to be working overtime in churning out reams and reams of press statements, speeches, copies of speeches made by the minister, appointments and activities within the department since he took office.

It seems incongruous also that the minister would take up time during the Throne Speech debate to make a rather lengthy speech about the activities of his department. Now, are we to take that speech which was delivered on January 28 and substitute it for a statement which he might have made at this time? This is difficult to say. However, it does seem rather strange that the minister would adopt the course of being silent tonight and be desirous only to answer questions. So far as I am concerned, the ministerial position is not one solely of listening, not one simply of answering questions, but should be one primarily of enunciating and developing policy from time to time to parliament and the public. Then we in Canada would know what it is the minister and his government are trying to do. It is not possible to be in this position if the minister simply answers questions. In my opinion it was somewhat of an affront to the committee for the minister to say, so casually, that he was not interested in making any statement at this time, that he was not interested in laying before the committee some ideas with which the committee could agree or disagree. However, this is his decision and he has made it.

One of the minister's speeches, a copy of which we received by way of his public relations men, was of interest to me. I should like to quote just one or two sentences from it because I feel there is something extremely significant here in so far as the relationship of a public servant and a particular section of our country is concerned. This is a speech the minister made to the Board of Trade in metropolitan Toronto on January 24. I gather from reading it that it is a sort of coming back home speech. His comments were related to the fact that Ottawa is sort of removed from what he considered to be the centres of commerce of the nation. He said, and I quote:

—it is all the more important to make special efforts to maintain close liaison between the business community and those who are responsible for developing of economic policies for the country as a whole.

At another point, he said:

There is widespread desire on the part of business executives to be actively helpful to those who have the responsibility to govern the country.

I take it he means helpful at election time, to fill the coffers. This would be the type of help most sought after. I shall not read much more from this speech. Toward the conclusion of it however the minister said:

In any event, my training over the past eight years—

That is, his training in the business community.

—should better enable me to consider and weigh the impact on the business community and on the economy as a whole, of decisions that are contemplated in the national interest. In this, I am looking to you, the Canadian businessmen, for advice, guidance and support.

All through this particularly interesting and revealing speech, there was an indication that the minister thinks of himself as nothing more now than the business agent of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, not a minister of the crown ministering to the needs of the economy and the needs of the Canadian public. He seemed to be particularly oriented to one section of the economy, namely the business section. We all know that when businessmen have their way and their sway on such as the Minister of Trade and Commerce and others in the cabinet, the likelihood is that the public interest will come second. Even though the minister has resigned various directorships in companies, I think it is regrettable he sees fit to maintain this extremely intimate association with one group in the economy to such an extent that it may injure his impartiality and fairness of judgment in dealing with some matters that come within the scope of his department.

[Mr. Howard.]

Canada's primary role historically in world trade has been one of exporting what we loosely call the raw materials, and of importing the finished products. Because we have followed that course steadily over the years, we find ourselves in the position referred to by the hon. member for London, tighter and tighter in the grip of the nation to the south. We find ourselves in this position because of the prominent position of the United States in world affairs, because of the relative size of their population compared to ours, because of its proximity to us, because of the relative wealth of that nation as compared to Canada and because of some factors contained in domestic policy within Canada. Since we have been historically an exporter of raw materials, for which we receive a low return, and an importer of manufactured or finished products, for which we pay a higher amount, we find ourselves increasingly in an extremely awkward position.

The minister recognized this on January 28, at which time he said, and I quote from page 385 of Hansard—he was talking about the trading account, the current account, balance of payments and so on:

It is therefore important that all elements in this equation realize the circumstances and bend every effort to improve our exports, while at the same time keeping our imports within reasonable limits and financing in Canada as much of our development as possible.

If I may read between the lines there, I think the minister would not disagree if I were to suggest that when he was referring to improving our exports he meant improving our exports of manufactured goods as opposed to improving our exports of prime raw materials. I am sure he would not disagree with me, either, when I say that when he talks about improving or keeping our imports within reasonable limits, he is talking in terms of keeping our imports of finished products within reasonable limits so that there will not be this continual drain upon the wealth of this nation—since we find ourselves always in debt and on the wrong side of the balance.

I would have thought this would be one of the things about which the minister would feel glorious in telling us. We would be interested to know what it is that he and his government intend to do when they bend every effort to improve our exports and to keep our imports within reasonable bounds.

In my opinion, this is the crucial part of the speech he made on January 28. The reference is to the most important facet of our economic activity. I feel the minister owes the house and the country a complete, detailed explanation of the policies, attitudes and plans which exist in order that the government, as one part of this group, may bend every effort as the minister suggests. At some subsequent time in his estimates I am sure that we shall want the minister to give us in great detail what he is doing in that regard.

Even in light of the minister's remarks of January 28 and in light of some of the press releases that pour out of his department, and in light of statistics he has used, Canada cannot be said to have improved her position. It remains a fact that in the last ten years, ended in 1963, our exports, though to a large extent exports of raw materials, have grown more slowly than world exports generally. It remains a fact that our manufactured goods, which are of prime importance in these considerations, account for a smaller share of Canada's exports and for a larger share of Canada's imports than is the case within any other industrialized nation in the world. In other words, Canada is at the bottom of the list. Canada is in the position of being worse off than any other industrialized nation in the world, because Canadian manufactured goods comprise a much smaller share of exports than is the case with any other nation, and a much larger share of imports than any other nation.

If it is true, as the minister indicated in his speech of January 28, that we suffer by exporting raw materials and importing the finished products, then because of the fact that we are in the worst position, relatively speaking, of any industrialized nation in the world, it follows we are in the worst position of any industrialized nation in so far as the deficit of our balance of payments is concerned. Regardless of the blandishments issued from the minister's office, regardless of the phrases used, and the juggling of figures and statistics to show that we are doing this and that Canada's position is worsening. The fact of the matter is that we are and have been for many years getting into an increasingly worse position.

I think there is a sort of four fold blindness on the part of the government in this matter. It exists with respect to developing the economy of the nation, and with respect to our relationships with other countries in so far as trade barriers are concerned. One of the blindnesses I refer to is, in effect, that we place all our eggs in one basket. One form of blindness which was recognized by the minister, although nothing worth while was done about it, is as stated by the minister at page 383 of Hansard, where he says:

> Canada's exports to the United States have maintained a strong upward trend during this period—

He is talking about the past three years here. He continues:

> —having increased by 13 per cent in each of the past two years. Imports from the United States have also risen sharply and Canada's trade deficit with this country has been growing.

He went on to make other remarks about the situation respecting foreign ownership, and so on. The gist of the remarks with respect to the United States is that because of our import-export relationship, and because of the degree to which the United States controls and dominates industry in Canada, and perhaps not so much because of our own foolhardiness in permitting this, we are in an extremely vulnerable position.

The least little change in the economic climate of the United States affects us to a far greater degree than it does that country. If there is a decline in economic activity in the U.S. we feel it immediately. If there is a desire on the part of the United States government to curtail some activities of its companies in the United States, we feel the brunt of that through subsidiaries in Canada. By placing all our eggs in one basket, by continuing to feel an affinity because of closeness of language, and because of geography, and the desire to follow that affinity through so that it is reflected in our trade patterns, we are increasing our vulnerability. This was recognized for some years, and was recognized during the time the Conservatives were in office. I was interested in listening to the words of the hon. member from London with respect to this situation.

I point out to my hon. friend from London that during the time his colleagues were in office the only method of direction with respect to companies under foreign control was the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, if I remember correctly the title of the law, under which trade unions and companies were required to disclose to the dominion bureau of statistics the extent to which they were owned or controlled, or associated with foreign companies. Anything of substance there was not: anything concrete, that dealt with this question was pushed to one side, or forgotten. Therefore that was blindness then, just as much as it is now.

I think also that we are making ourselves more vulnerable by placing undue reliance on prospects of success in the Kennedy round of tariff negotiations. You may recall that I asked the minister if he wanted to report to the house about his meeting in Geneva with trade commissioners and other delegations with respect to the Kennedy round of tariffs. He said at that time that he was going to wait until the estimates of his department were before the committee. I thought this was one thing he would be champing at the bit to talk about. So far he has felt somewhat bashful about getting into this field.

If as we have done in the past, we place too much faith in the prospects of something worth while coming out of the Kennedy round of negotiations, and then find that such is not the case after they are completed, then again we shall be in a position of being more vulnerable, and we shall suffer more thereby.

Another area of blindness is that we have failed to recognize fully the impact that the growing and developing trade blocs will have on world trade patterns. Examples to which I refer are the European Common Market, the European Free Trade Association and like organizations. Relatively speaking we have remained aloof from these. We have maintained trade relationships only with our Commonwealth connections. We have not established connections, or have failed to maintain connections with others.

This I submit is a failure on our part. We should be searching diligently to find ways and means to increase our exports into areas such as the Common Market, and E.F.T.A., because in those are developing industrial nations that will require machinery and manufactured goods. I think it is well established that industrial nations tend to trade with each other on the basis of manufactured goods for manufactured goods. It is not a situation in which we export raw materials to a country which processes them into a finished product that we import back.

We have also failed to take firm steps to develop extensively our own secondary or manufacturing industries. In order that we should be able to increase our production of manufactured goods, and reduce or lower some of the tariffs or other barriers to international trade, we should be in a position to export finished products, thereby bettering our position vis-à-vis other nations.

[Mr. Howard.]

The European Economic Community, as an example of what could be done, is, I am told, by far the largest importer of goods in the world, accounting in 1963 for some $24.6 billions of goods. The other day the minister gloated over the fact that exports in Canada were pushing $1 billion, indicating that this was very big business indeed. It may be very big business indeed as far as Canada is concerned, but when the bulk of these exports are raw materials, just think what it would mean if we could take these materials, convert them here into manufactured articles and export those manufactured articles. Our exports might then be worth three or four times the figure the minister quoted. In Europe, as I have mentioned, we find a group of nations who are importing goods to the value of $24.6 billion. The figure for the Free Trade Association—the second largest importer in that area—is $19.3 billion. There is a tremendous market there and I think we should be searching out ways and means of getting into it.

We are seriously concerned about what the minister and his department are doing in a concrete and determined way to cope with these problems. You cannot cope with them by increasing your public relations staff or by churning out press releases day after day. I get more mail from the minister's department than I do from anybody else in Canada including the other government departments, all of it with a fine red banner on the top, all of it containing press releases about speeches the minister has made or trips he has taken or visits paid by manufacturers to other countries, or things they have sold, or how much business has been written up at some trade fair. My hon. friend here says the minister has some close competitors in the cabinet. I am probably not on the mailing list of his competitors, but I do get swamped by material of the public relations type from the minister's office. It is interesting. I like reading about the chit-chat he had with his old buddies back on Bay Street on January 24 when he said: Never worry; I am still with you; if there are any problems, call me at my office and I will fix them. Those are not the actual words he used but that is what he meant. We are more interested in hearing a detailed explanation of the plans the department has made and what it is doing.

It may be true that nothing can be done about the 12 months which have passed. They have gone by, as the minister has said. But there is another year ahead. Never mind waiting for the estimates of the next fiscal year. Tell us now. There is no better time. Let the minister follow the advice of his colleague the Minister of Labour. Why wait for spring? Tell us now what you are proposing to do.

There are one or two other matters on which I should like to comment. There is the possibility of exporting more goods from our secondary and manufacturing industries. I have been in some doubt whether this should be raised under the estimates of the minister's department or under those of the Department of Industry. I have read the relevant sections from the annual reports of each of these departments and, frankly, I am thoroughly confused, because the Department of Industry deals at length with questions involving exports and the balance of payments, questions in which I thought the hon. gentleman was involved, while the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce finds time to deal with a variety of other matters.

Mr. Winters: Industry.

Mr. Howard: I understand the minister to say it should be dealt with on the estimates of the Department of Industry. I hope this is not one of those situations when we find the Minister of Industry in turn telling us: You should take this question up with my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce who deals with this matter because he is so concerned about its effect on our balance of payments.

The revealing part of what the minister has just said is that there is conflict—and he knows it—between his department and the Department of Industry over who should be dealing with what. There is a misunderstanding about guide lines for operations in each of these departments. And within the departments themselves little kingdoms are growing up. The kings themselves are not interested in stepping out of their niches, or in relaxing their control over certain parts of the public service. As a result, the Canadian people suffer. Nevertheless, we can all fully understand the importance of the manufacturing and secondary industries and their relation to the work of the Department of Industry.

We should like to know from the minister how much Expo 67 is likely to cost the Canadian public,—not that we want to leave the impression that Expo 67 should fail or that it is in trouble or that difficulties are brewing. But we should like to know.

At the time of the establishment of the corporation an understanding was given to parliament that a certain maximum amount of money would be contributed out of the federal treasury. I think we have far overstepped the maximum set out in that statute by making payments in other ways. I ask the minister to set out in as much detail as he can figures showing how much Expo '67 is likely to cost the Canadian taxpayer by reason of the federal government's participation. I am sure the Canadian public, bearing in mind that Expo '67 will be commemorating our 100th birthday, something of which we shall be proud, will not mind knowing what the tax bill is likely to be. I am sure that the Canadian taxpayer, whether he lives in Quebec or anywhere else, is concerned that this trade fair should be a success, first because it is in Canada and next because it will take place at a time when we shall be celebrating our 100th birthday.

These are the questions I should like the minister to answer. The most important one is this: What is his department doing to increase our exports of manufactured products? What is he and this government doing to try to get through the trade barriers which other nations are erecting at this time. What is this government and this department doing to increase the strength of our secondary or manufacturing industries?

• (8:00 p.m.)

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, before this gets too far ahead of me I think I should comment on one or two of the points made, very good points indeed. There is very little in the speech of the hon. member for London with which I could disagree. He propounded a number of economic theories that are sound and with which I agree. We must generate a climate in this country even more than now that will be favourable to exports, to encourage secondary manufacturers to produce more goods of the kind that can find their way on to the markets of the world; and through the instrumentality of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and otherwise, we must see that the doors are open to the world markets. We are endeavouring to do that.

In the department I have found a corps of excellent trade commissioners. I had the opportunity of meeting 29 of them from 25 countries in Paris a few days ago. We spent a very good day going over the prospects for trade in the countries they represent. They expressed the desire that more Canadian businessmen should visit their areas so that there would be an opportunity for them to have more Canadian goods flow on to those markets, but always with the understanding that they must be competitive in price, quality, and service.

This is a fiercely competitive market but Canadian exports are growing in quite an encouraging way. There is a great deal of work to be done and we have to develop ways and means of getting the optimum benefit from our efforts. I have been in the department less than two months, but the officials of the department and I are planning programs to have the Canadian business community become more closely associated with the trade commissioners, so that they will know of the facilities offered by the trade commissioners, the opportunities available in the areas they represent, and so that the commissioners in turn can be more closely attuned to what is going on in Canada, so as to be fully familiar with the products that are available for export.

With respect to the very important matter of guide lines raised by the hon. member, we in Canada have been considerably concerned about the impact that any rulings made abroad might have on Canadian industry. The Minister of Finance has expressed his concern about the financial aspects of the guide lines.

As hon. members know from some of the press releases that have been referred to—I may say I have no public relations man at all in my office, and it is a matter of surprise to me that there is a flood of publicity material going out from my office because I have not seen it—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): You are not on the mailing list.

Mr. Winters: Yes, I might not be on the mailing list. Hon. members know we have consulted certain companies about the guide lines, and the answers we received from them are that, to date, the guide lines have made no impact on their financial programs, on their pattern of dividends, their pattern of payments to their parent companies, or their patterns of purchasing and exporting. Of course there is always the shadow of the guide lines hanging over us, and we intend to discuss this most seriously and searchingly in Washington this week end.

The majority of the companies in this country can protect themselves against the guide lines. They are good, corporate Canadian citizens and wish to remain so. The imminent danger, if there is one, is for the small companies who are apt to feel more quickly the impact of any financing problems that might arise in the country, and may also be less likely to know how to conduct themselves as good, corporate Canadian citizens within the framework of the Canadian economy. We are endeavouring to work out programs which will give these companies the guidance they might need as to how they should conduct themselves between the guidelines on the one hand, and what we regard to be good, corporate behavior on the other.

We in the department are prepared to offer as much guidance and advise as we can, and we shall establish codes of conduct that will enable them to conform to the best Canadian business ethics, as we understand them.

The hon. member for Skeena referred to my association with business and he thought I was a little one sided on this. He quoted my speech in Toronto as evidence of that fact but, Mr. Chairman, he quoted only a certain passage of it. I thought that at the same time I challenged the business community to conduct themselves so as to give expression to all aspects,—all the aims, and aspirations of the society they serve. I quote only from one page, page 4 of my speech, but there are other references I could give, because these are not the only remarks I have made on the subject:

> My own philosophy, however, is that the more good decisions that are made in board rooms, on the factory floor and across the negotiating table the fewer will have to be made in cabinet chambers——about the conduct of business.

> To the extent that the public mind is convinced of the basic strength and purpose of present day private enterprise and its concern for the welfare of the community as a whole there will be less call for measures which restrict or regulate.

I am glad to be able to say, from my modest association with the business community, that I believe most business executives of this country, and others I am sure, are fully impressed with the need to develop the kind of programs that provide the optimum benefits and security for the people within their employ. I think it is a fact too that within the framework of some large corporations in this country there are higher levels of welfare measures than the country as a whole provides. I believe there is a good trend in this country with respect to the responsibility of private enterprise, and what I said about it in that speech in Toronto reflects pretty much the attitude which businessmen take today toward the people for whom they are responsible.

Mr. Howard: Would the minister permit me one observation? He quoted from his speech at page 4, but he had some words inserted, and the insertion of those words alters the text I have here.

Mr. Winters: I do not understand why one text should be different from another, but I will see the hon. member gets the text with all the remarks I have made.

Mr. Howard: And I will give you a copy of this one so that you will see everything that goes on in your department.

Mr. Winters: Thank you. The hon. member talked about exports, and the desirability of stimulating manufacturing in this country and cutting down the gap between imports from the U.S. on the one hand and our exports on the other, with all of which I agree. We must make every effort to export from this country. To do that we have to keep our costs down.

The hon. member for London mentioned one item of costs, the 11 per cent sales tax. He asked what was my position on that. I remember making a statement on that subject in response to a question on the Saturday before the election. It was reported in the Globe and Mail and when I read it the next morning I was surprised how carefully I had chosen my words on that occasion. But I did say at that time I was in favour of the abolition of the 11 per cent sales tax—which, of course, I am—at the earliest possible moment, when the government could do this consistently with its requirement for revenues or if needed to stimulate the economy of the country. Nobody likes taxes of any kind. They add to costs, to the burden of doing business, and when they can be eliminated I am sure they will be eliminated by this government, or any other government that has tax problems confronting it.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister one question?

Mr. Winters: Certainly.

Mr. Churchill: I was interested in the minister's statement with regard to the 11 per cent sales tax and his wish that it be removed at the earliest possible moment. I hope that that will not be interpreted in the same way that the Prime Minister's promise to negotiate out of nuclear arms has been interpreted. That has gone on for three years. "At the earliest possible moment" in the words of the minister, means some time this year, right?

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Winters: Of course that is a matter for the Minister of Finance, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. Starr: Are you not going to ask him?

Mr. Winters: I have given you a little background history in this regard. This is one element of cost, and we must do everything we can to reduce cost in this country. The automobile pact is one of the best examples of where we can expand trade by getting the benefit of the long runs and mass production which are available to our competitors south of the border. Perhaps this can be carried into other fields.

We must become competitive. I think we must concentrate on those things we do best. It is difficult to pinpoint those commodities now, but I know that within good companies management seeks to do those things which they do best. I believe that in a country we must also seek to isolate the things we do best and concentrate on them. In this country we are blessed with abundant natural resources, more so than perhaps any other country in the world. It is natural and logical that the goods we produce should be related to our resource industries.

The country is growing and we are developing more secondary manufacturing. If the hon. member had read the speech I made in Paris, he would have noted that I advocated more production and more export of our manufactured goods. That would have been a good speech for the hon. member to quote.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Does the minister realize it is very difficult to keep up with these speeches, which have been coming very fast.

Mr. Winters: I have not been able to keep up with them either. The hon. member mentioned Expo, which is a project that should be supported by all Canadians and one in which we should take great pride. It will reflect the best of Canada to the eyes of the world. We have a great many things we can show with pride. This is a program which was embarked upon by the previous Progressive Conservative government, and I give them credit for that. However, at the same time once they embarked on that program they I am sure and the Canadian public must have recognized it was an expensive undertaking, if it is to be done well, and that is the only way it should be done.

It is quite apparent there will be a budgeted deficit. If everything goes in the best possible way and patrons flock to the gates of Expo, the deficit may be reduced or eliminated, although I doubt the latter. The last forecast is for a deficit of $61 million. In that kind of budgeting one can estimate the expenditures reasonably well; but it is almost impossible to estimate how many people will go through the turnstiles. So it is an estimate that may be increased or decreased. The budgets are being revised continuously and are being brought up to date at the present time. However, the secondary benefits will be very great. It is estimated that Expo will bring more than $1 billion into Canada, and one of the directors who now sits on the benches of the opposition estimated that figure to be well over $2 billion.

It is also estimated that the tax revenues from Expo that the federal and provincial governments together will receive will be more than the deficit is estimated to be. Those are estimates; but the fact of the matter is this is going to be a great institution. This will be the greatest exposition ever staged by any country in the world, and I can say that with confidence because there are many yardsticks to support the statement.

I refer to the number of countries already signed up, the number of tickets sold in advance, and other yardsticks. Based on and judged by the many yardsticks, Expo holds the promise of being the greatest exposition put on anywhere. It should be a matter of signal pride to Canadians and I urge everybody everywhere to get behind this great undertaking and support it in the best tradition of Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, no one will deny that, having been associated with various industries for the past several years, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has acquired a fairly complete experience in that field.

We have before us now the estimates of his department, one that will have cost the Canadian people $82,340,040 for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1966, that is at the end of this month.

Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the minister tell us how much he expects, for Canada, from the world fair which will show a deficit of something like $61 million but which, on the other hand, will bring billions of dollars to Canada and fill the coffers of the various governments—municipal, provincial and federal— with hundreds of thousands, even hundreds of millions of dollars.

That is probably why the minister hopes that the 11 per cent tax on building materials will eventually be abolished. We hope to make a profit with the world fair.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not be long but I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the balance of payments with the United States and urge him to try to find out why this balance shows a deficit.

The minister has his explanations, so has the government and so have we. We believe that the agencies of the department, which are scattered abroad to promote Canadian goods and products manufactured in Canada for export, do not give the results which we have the right to expect.

• (8:20 p.m.)

First of all our foreign trade or our sales to other countries seldom bring us any profits. We sell our products much below cost to the United States as well as to other countries. That is undoubtedly why our balance of payments shows a deficit or it might be because we owe more than is owed us especially by our neighbours to the south, the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the minister is undoubtedly aware that our trade with the United States boils down to selling them raw materials. We do not sell manufactured goods to the United States but raw materials, iron from the Ungava, water from British Columbia or any other natural resources; we sell our raw materials to the United States and at prices lower than production costs.

The United States process those materials and bring them back to Canada as manufactured goods.

A little earlier the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) mentioned it and rightly so. The minister said that was a problem for industry. Well, not primarily; it is definitely a matter related to our foreign trade because the minister undoubtedly knows that if we processed our raw materials in Canada, if we had more secondary industries, for instance in my own region, where we produce copper in large quantities, if we had secondary industries, not only gold, copper or zinc mines to process those materials, it seems to me that Canada would benefit from it.

It seems to me that we could sell at a better price to the United States and to other countries. Then, our people, our country, Canada, would benefit to a large extent.

I sincerely believe, Mr. Chairman, that Canada is being drained of raw materials by the United States. The United States have to get them here. They have to get iron here. They had to ask British Columbia and the Canadian government for water from the Columbia river. For instance, they will have to ask for water from James Bay and Hudson's Bay for the Great Lakes where the water level drops every year. As a matter of fact, they have already done so. The United States have to come to us.

It does not mean that we should take advantage of the situation, but it means, for instance, and very clearly, that we should at least take advantage of the privileged situation where we find ourselves. And there is no doubt that we are in that situation.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that an incentive to the establishment of secondary industries to process our raw production at home, would help considerably, and that the United States would nevertheless come and buy from us finished, or at least, semi-finished products which would yield millions and millions of dollars in profits to Canada instead of our having a balance of payments.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, the minister is very well aware of this. As I said a few moments ago, he has undeniable industrial experience. He knows very well that if we had secondary industries in this country, the Canadian people would derive profits from them. Then, we could perhaps consider lowering taxes, lowering the sales tax on building materials, etc.

I do not intend to speak very long on this vote No. 1 of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but I call the Minister's attention to the fact that it is important, and I believe in his good faith and his goodwill to stimulate the creation of secondary industries in this country, not only in Toronto or Montreal, but in other areas, and those areas where the raw materials exist, such a Rouyn-Noranda, or Val d'Or, where there is copper. And the same applies to eastern and northeastern Quebec and to Ungava, to northeastern Ontario, such as Timmins, Cochrane, Kirkland Lake. Everywhere, secondary industries could be created in order to industrialize the country to a greater extent. Such industries should be created as soon as possible to put to work all our labour force and all our skilled workers. The Canadian people would be the first to profit by this natural wealth by using it to their own advantage and by putting it at the disposal of other countries later.

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, on consideration of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, I wish to raise with the minister a problem of great concern to the constituents of the constituency of Sherbrooke, as well as to numerous Canadians. I refer to the recent U.S. decision to cut investments.

A few moments ago, the Minister referred to this in his short speech. I do not have to recall here the mechanism and the background of that decision of the United States which is to remain in force until February, 1967. They are well known.

However, I wish to reflect on what we are told and on what should be done to reduce as much as possible, its bad effects on our country.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce maintains that it is not proven that the American guide lines affect Canadian subsidiaries of American companies.

It should be noted, in the comments of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that this embarrassment was not openly shown until now, but the minister does not tell us in sufficient detail his concern for the days to come.

Mr. Charles Chartier, general delegate of the province of Quebec to New York, said that until now the measures taken by the United States do not unduly affect Canada and that, for the moment they only diminish temporarily the importance of New York as the capital of international finance.

But this general delegate of Quebec does not specify what present limited effect these measures have on Canada and what would be their future implications.

In an interview given on February 10, 1966 to the New York Times, the premier of Quebec, Mr. Jean Lesage, said that the measures taken by Washington would be harmful to the growth of the province of Quebec.

On the other hand, in addition to denouncing the direct intervention of Washington in the Canadian economy Hon. Eric Kierans, Quebec Minister of Health foresees serious consequences on the structure and organization of the Canadian economy. He foresees a harmful increase in our trade deficit with the United States, and lower profits for American subsidiaries in Canada. That is the opinion of a responsible man, which creates worry and disappointment.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Let us study briefly, Mr. Chairman, the concern expressed summarily by Hon. Eric Kierans. He states that the guideline was given by the Secretary to the U.S. Treasury, Mr. Henry Fowler. The American Congress did not study the matter, nor did it enact any law in this regard. American capitalism is controlled by a handful of men who try to achieve the political objectives of the country without consulting Congress.

Mr. Kierans still claims that the decision constitutes foreign meddling in Canadian business and keeps us from being masters in our own home. It is a violation of Canadian sovereignty.

Such decisions, adds the Quebec minister, affect our growth, our development. Before taking them Washington should consult its branch offices, Ottawa and Quebec.

It is clearly up to Ottawa to show all those companies, subsidiaries and others, what their responsibilities are as Canadian citizens, and those are to seek a higher rate of growth, increased efficiency and a more intensive use of our resources and skills. Ottawa is entitled to full explanations as regards changes in the distribution of dividends, in the investment policy and in the purchasing system. Ottawa should also ask for reports on transactions made between Canadian subsidiaries and their American parent companies.

According to the Quebec minister, the Companies Act should be amended in order to redefine the status of private companies. The majority of subsidiaries do not inform the public about their activities in Canada.

In Great Britain it appears that a company is not considered a private company, and therefore exempt from informing the public, if some of its shares or bonds are held by an incorporated company. Canadian-owned companies having to file financial reports are in an unfair position as compared to American subsidiaries which do not have to do so. Of course, this creates unfair competition, concludes the Quebec minister.

There you have, Mr. Chairman, the opinion of a responsible man creating concern and deception.

[Mr. Allard.]

As for the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Louis Rasminsky, he advises against raising prices and production costs without, however, intervening directly in the debate. The situation will be rosy: on the one hand, American investments are refused Canada and, on the other, Canadians will not obtain as much credit from the banks.

Mr. Chairman, the situation is serious, even alarming. What are the government and the minister doing at the beginning of this crisis? Very little, indeed.

We have already begun to feel all the ills we shall experience because of the decision of the United States and the apathy of our government. Allow me to list a few of those ills: hardening of Canada-U.S. relations; increased friction between federal and provincial governments; increase of our discount rate from 4½ to 4¾ per cent; postponement of many works; slowing down of our economic development; increased unemployment; higher prices and costs; increased trade imbalance with the United States; decrease of our exports; financial disturbances in Canada; decrease of fiscal receipts and of per capita income; increased poverty and destitution in Canada.

I admit, Mr. Chairman, that those prospects are not too bright, but it is better to face the situation squarely than to bury our head in the sand.

From the shades of meaning of the remarks made by Messrs. Chartier, Rasminsky, Lesage, Kierans and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) and in view of the events arising out of the American decision, three facts emerge: (1) Canada's economy, money and finance are too highly dependent upon the United States and to date, our country has not shown enough awareness and foresight in its policy, being often thrown off balance and surprised by decisions of our neighbours to the south.

(2) Our economic, financial and monetary policy lacks Canadian characteristics and a definite orientation.

(3) Confronted by policies initiated by other countries, including the United States, our government is timid, easy-going, if not altogether soft, ashamed to complain or to react.

It is not enough to record present and future inconveniences for Canada and to be satisfied with recriminations. The government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and the whole government must act together, with dispatch, and on several fronts simultaneously.

If the minister was unworried as to the consequences upon Canada of the recent American decision, I recommend that he immediately order a study in that connection and that he publish the report at the earliest possible moment. I am inclined to believe that the apprehensions of many Canadians are well founded.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I would not want to talk too long about a suggestion which seems reasonable to me. According to the president of the Royal Bank of Canada, Mr. W. E. McLaughlin, Canada should contemplate bringing to an end the agreement on our exchange reserves. That might increase slightly the cost of our loans, but we would have free access of the American market and would no longer have to hinder our monetary policy by maintaining our reserves at a pre-arranged level.

With regard to foreign investments, looking for new sources of capital would help us to maintain a better balance. We could go to other European countries who are anxious to invest abroad.

I hope that when he was in France recently, in Paris particularly, the minister had the opportunity to invite the French people and the French businessmen to invest more capital in Canada.

Why not create also in Canada a national investment board to better co-ordinate our long-term needs in capital and find the best places in Canada to use it? We are proceeding at random.

The Bank of Canada should play a more active role in the present economic circumstances by putting more money in circulation to meet additional needs.

Nothing would legally prevent the Bank of Canada from lending money to the provinces and the municipalities at low and preferred rates.

Chartered banks should agree to lending revolving funds to finance enterprises, which would enable them to use their own savings for investments.

If the maximum interest rates now set at 6 per cent were abolished and set up at a more reasonable level this would enable the banks to meet the competition they now face and would reduce the need for many Canadians to borrow from finance and personal loan companies often at excessive and prohibitive rates in some cases.

On the other hand, the government should accept at last to reduce taxes. It would be an encouragement to the taxpayers and the companies.

I would now like to draw the attention of hon. members to an article published in the last issue of The Monetary Times in which the assistant dean of the political science faculty at the Ottawa University invites the government to reduce taxes.

The government should promote personal savings, and in order to encourage Canadians to invest their savings, it would help if an amnesty were granted in the case of legal proceedings taken for money hidden in woollen socks, safety deposit boxes and other secret places.

The restrictions announced by the White House show that it would be advisable to set up an investment agency in Canada. The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) has made such a suggestion in the past. I think it deserves serious consideration and should not be brushed aside.

In my opinion, the federal government should take into consideration the suggestions of Hon. Eric Kierans to the effect that a full explanation should be demanded concerning the changes made in the distribution of dividends, the investment policy and the purchase system.

The federal government should redefine, in the light of the American decision, the status of private companies, so that the Canadian people may be informed about the whole financial and administrative setup of the companies established on their territory.

There is one sure thing, Mr. Chairman. Because of the problem raised by the American decision, Canada is faced with a positive challenge. Should we blissfully await the nefarious consequences of this event or should we, on the contrary, make the most of it to secure our economy, our financial system and our trade on a more solid and more flexible basis?

So I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to get together with the Minister of Finance and his other colleagues to study my comments and inform at the earliest possible moment, all Canadians who await his intents, his initiatives and those of the government.

[English]

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I know the minister will listen to a few words from a backbencher or at least a sidebencher in connection with the problem of export trade. I do not want to take up time to belabour the point that has been made time and time again that Canada has to export more manufactured products. I believe the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam once said that we no longer want to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. This is true; we want to export manufactured goods. So does every other country in the world, but with this difference today, Mr. Chairman, that at one time it was very difficult for a new country or for a poor country to acquire the capital with which to purchase equipment, machinery and so on. These capital goods are now readily available from Germany, France, and especially Germany on the never, never plan. We are therefore in very serious competition.

We have two ways of trying to promote an increase of export trade in manufactured goods. One of the ways was the way the present member for Northumberland, a former Minister of Trade and Commerce, expounded. This was by the hoopla method, the great trade fairs, gladhanding and going around the country stumping the idea that businessmen are lazy, that they need to get up and get going and sell. This is a rather archaic method today. Canadian businessmen are not lazy, they are hard working, and they are quite aware of their potential.

However, there are other problems which are difficult for Canadians to overcome. I have been in this business, probably longer than other members, and I have tried exporting. First, we are competing with nations which are well established in the export trade. They have had their export machinery established for 40 or 50 years. They know with whom they are dealing, where they are going to deal and the prices of the types of products. We do not. The establishment of a trade or export department is a very expensive business. Second, the financial set-up in these countries for export trade is much better than ours.

With all respect to GATT, there are countries today which will allow their exporters to sell their products without careful scrutiny, and on which financial institutions paid one hundred cents on the dollar for receivables. In other words, the governments of these countries are absorbing the total risk. We are not. Most important of all, many countries today are using very sophisticated methods of market research, the results of which become available to the exporter and manufacturer. We do not do this. The reason I am making these remarks now is that the minister, being a new minister and a reform minister, will want to hear what I say and ascertain whether or not it can be introduced by our government.

Let us consider my own case. When I was in business, I naturally went to the Department of Trade and Commerce to find out what the picture was in one of the South American countries. We had the normal statistics given to us, the currency exchange, tariffs, etc. Then of course the balance of the information was to be forthcoming from the trade commissioner when we got to that country. However, we found the trade commissioner, although working hard, did not really know what we were after, did not really know what was available in that country. He was more interested in transferring into the Department of External Affairs. This is another curious thing. When we are depending upon exports, the head of state in just about every country comes from the Department of External Affairs and not from the Department of Trade and Commerce. We have had occasions where a grade eight civil servant has been under the jurisdiction of a grade five civil servant who happens to be from the Department of External Affairs. In other words, there is not enough incentive to stay with the Department of Trade and Commerce. This is something for the minister to consider.

Let me give you an example of a very progressive country which has accepted the more sophisticated methods of market research and applies them to their export trade. I refer to Japan. Some hon. members will have heard of an establishment called JETRO, or Japanese Export Trade Research Organization.

Mr. Prittie: Will the hon. member permit an interjection? I think the minister might misunderstand his remarks. He said "head of state", when he meant head of mission. The hon. member is referring in that connection to the head of our mission in each country.

Mr. Otto: Whether it is the head of state or head of a mission, the point is that the chief man in that country is usually from the External Affairs Department and not from the Trade and Commerce Department.

In order to continue my illustration, I may say that the Japanese government pays for and obtains careful research for certain products. They find out what Canadians want.

They find out through private research organizations in Canada the types of goods that Canadians like; the colour; the weight. They find out the prices we are willing to pay. They go farther than that and they find out who buys the goods, to what clubs they belong and so on. One would be amazed at the detail in these reports. The result is that when a Japanese salesman or representative comes to Canada he knows exactly where to go to sell his goods. An example of this type of research is seen in the fact that Japan now controls 68 per cent of the stainless steelware market in Canada, when she started with only 18 per cent a few years ago. This is sophisticated marketing. If the Canadian manufacturer had this information he would be in a much better position. I would urge the minister therefore to introduce this idea, even if we have to get outside help to advise our trade department, so that we shall develop within our Department of Trade and Commerce an up to date market research branch.

I should also like the minister to consider that there are some fields in which we have an edge. We may not necessarily have to sell goods. Let me illustrate what I mean, for example. We have just about the world's supply of uranium. There are many countries in the world, and South America is a good example, where electric power is not available and will not be available for many years. We have the money, we have the uranium: Can the minister not imagine what we could do if we manufactured right here atomic electric units to provide electricity and then installed them in countries needing power? We do not have to sell this equipment. Even if it cost $10 million we could lease it to countries needing it, and charge so much per kilowatt. Eventually we should establish for ourselves a ready market, and help have-not nations, without a great expenditure of money. There is nothing wrong with the leasing business. I.B.M. made a fortune from the leasing of equipment.

We have the money. we have the men; we have the know-how. We need a new approach, and not necessarily that staid, solid approach which has been used for years and years in our trade relations. I trust that the minister will prove to be what I hope; I trust that he will guide his department into a completely new avenue of endeavour.

Mr. Churchill: He has a parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I only wish to detain the house for a few minutes. First of all I want to congratulate the minister on his appointment. I may say that if we had to have a Liberal appointed to that post, from that constituency, I am very pleased to see that he was the one to arrive here.

Mr. Chairman, I must admit before I proceed that I shall be speaking here under what I consider undue influence. I was talking to my wife before, and she said to me, "Mind you be careful about what you say, I am very fond of Mr. Winters." As you see, Mr. Chairman, I am rather restricted.

I do want to express my support for the policy announced by the members of this party in connection with this department. I support all efforts to promote greater manufacture from raw materials in Canada, to promote the development of secondary industry, particularly in smaller towns and communities under Canadian ownership. I support this program, which I believe can only be brought about as a result of co-operation between the minister, departmental officials, municipalities, trade unions, farm organizations and other community organizations. I am a great believer in getting the participation of as large a number of people as possible in the advancement of any program. I do suggest to the minister that it would be well worth his time and the time of his officials to promote this participation among the various groups I have mentioned. I also suggest that the minister should as much as possible visit not only the larger centres of Canada, but those centres that are not usually visited by members of the ministry or by his senior officials. People must understand programs that are being developed if they are to participate in those programs satisfactorily.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I extend a hearty invitation to the minister to visit the Kootenays at the first opportunity he has, because I know he will be well received and well listened to there.

Mr. Howard: Before the item passes, would the minister tell the committee what is the total amount of money it is expected the Canadian government will contribute toward Expo '67. The minister indicated that there was an estimated budgetary deficit of some $61 million. What I am talking of is the total amount of money that, in addition to the $61 million expected deficit, will be put into Expo '67.

Mr. Winters: I am sorry I cannot answer that fully, Mr. Chairman, because a great many departments including the Department of Public Works, the Department of Transport, and others, are building structures, works and facilities related to Expo. I can simply answer for Expo as such, and tell the hon. member that under the statute there was a grant of $20 million in the first instance. Over and above that there is provision in the statute for borrowing by Expo. That is how Expo is being financed.

Of the estimated deficit to which reference has been made, the federal government has the responsibility for half. I have not the figures before me of amounts spent by the other departments of government.

Mr. Howard: On page 398 of Hansard the minister said:

> The master plan last approved and announced in August, 1965, estimated a cost of $61.6 million.

I think what misled me at the outset was that the minister used the word "estimated" in relation to cost. I assumed that the same thing applied to the budgetary deficit which he now refers to. On page 389 the minister said:

> Under the tripartite agreement between the three participaitng partners, the federal government provides an underwriting of 50 per cent of the net cost, 37½ per cent going to Quebec and 12½ per cent to Montreal.

The important part is the 37½ per cent to Quebec and the 12½ per cent to Montreal. I was misled in my reading of that, but I see now that Quebec is responsible for 37½ per cent and the city of Montreal for 12 per cent, the government being responsible for the other 50 per cent.

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Howard: Will the minister glean from all the other departments their contributions to Expo, and will he undertake to correlate all this information, set it down in a letter and send it to me or make it public some time in the future, so that in one way or another we may be able to find out what amounts of money will be expended by the government of Canada on Expo '67.

Mr. Winters: I shall be glad to do that, Mr. Chairman. As a matter of fact on orders of the day under question No. 5 there is a question which seeks information very similar to that being asked under the name of the hon. member for Cumberland. It reads:

> What is the total amount of expenditure of the federal government made as of this date, or undertaken, or planned directly or indirectly, in connection with Expo '67?

[Mr. Howard.]

The Department of Trade and Commerce has submitted its material, and I presume that in a few days the question will be answered by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Howard: Could we ask the Secretary of State to make available this information, and to show what has been done in compiling it.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Churchill: I do not intend to delay these proceedings for more than two or three minutes. The hon. gentleman knows that the committee is always easy on a new minister. And he is new to this parliament, although he is still steeped in Liberal lore and tactics from days gone by when we were here together. But we will defer any remarks critical of the minister until his estimates come up the next time around.

We shall not remind him on this occasion of any speeches he has made, since he has been divorced from political matters for about eight years, though we may call to his attention some day a speech he made in 1962. We feel kindly disposed toward him because he is interested in the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax, and his phrase "at the earliest possible moment" means something, I think, to a man of his capacity who is accustomed to getting things done, not just talk about them. So we are resting our hopes on this minister.

I should like to commiserate with him on the situation with regard to his department, the Department of Trade and Commerce, which at one time was one of the largest and most important departments of government. But in his unfortunate absence this department has been emasculated and another department has been set up called the Department of Industry. The Department of Trade and Commerce has suffered accordingly. Now that the hon. gentleman is back in the house, with all his experience, I think the government might seriously consider transferring the Department of Industry back to where it belongs in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and restoring the Department of Trade and Commerce to the position it occupied only a few years ago.

I wish to ask the minister a question or two now with regard to the Export and Import Permits Act. If he is not in a position to answer them tonight he may do so later on. In any case this act comes up for review in June, when it lapses unless renewed.

My question relates to export and import permits as far as Southern Rhodesia is concerned. The Secretary of State for External Affairs relied on this act in order to impose those sanctions. May I ask the minister this: Under section 4 of that act has the governor in council published an order in council adding Southern Rhodesia to the area list, as should be done under this section of the act? Then I am wondering whether under section 3 of the act an order in council has been published establishing the list of goods which come under the export control list, over and above the ones which were on the list before it was decided to impose sanctions against Southern Rhodesia. Similarly, what is the situation with regard to imports from Southern Rhodesia? Have these steps been taken in order to support the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the application of sanctions?

Mr. Winters: I should like to be precise in my answer. Much of this action was taken before I became minister. I should like to take the question as notice and answer it later, if I may.

Mr. Churchill: That will be fine. The minister may find that some of his colleagues, without his sensible advice to assist them, may either have failed to take the steps they should have taken, or have taken the wrong ones.

Mr. McCutcheon: In the same vein, may I say I was interested in the announcement the minister made today. We know there are three main headings under which this could become operative. He could say that we were likely to become short of copper—he could give that as a reason. Is there a world shortage of copper?

Mr. Winters: Yes, there is a world shortage of copper, and it has taken on quite serious proportions. Several hon. members who have spoken this evening have quite properly referred to the advantage of processing our own copper in Canada. We have reached the stage where some processors have been unable to get the supplies they require. We therefore took the further step of restricting exports of scrap. As a result we find that scrap is now getting back to the domestic processors.

Some of the concentrate—the ore is a very small part of the picture—is able to find its way towards the London metal exchange. We want to be sure, without interfering at this stage with the normal flow of commerce, that we do have authority under the Export and Import Permits Act to review these contracts when they come up for renewal. We have extended the date until March 21 so that anybody who has a contract can have it appraised in the meantime. There is not much point plugging one gap if you fail to notice the others. Most of the concentrate produced in Canada does go to Canadian smelters, but some of it is shipped abroad, and some will continue to be shipped outside Canada for economic reasons—the inaccessibility of a smelter, for instance. But we think that in present circumstances this should be under control and review.

Mr. Hales: One further question on the copper situation. I compliment the minister on having placed scrap copper under export control. As I understand, about 7 per cent of our supply of copper comes from scrap. But why does the minister allow scrap copper to be exported to the United States where it can be made into finished products and then sold on the Canadian market in competition with Canadian producers? To my way of thinking control over exports of scrap copper should include scrap copper sent to the United States. I should like to hear the minister's reasoning.

Mr. Winters: Well, it has been traditional to have an open border policy with respect to scrap movements to the United States, and United States scrap coming here. If we found there was a significant volume moving we would have to do something about it; but there are no indications that there is very much, if any, copper scrap finding its way from Canada to the United States. Nevertheless we have this under consideration.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a few minutes to ask the hon. minister whether, during the year just ended, some companies asked his department for a licence to import butter into Canada?

Now, if the minister cannot answer me tonight, I should also like to know whether or not licences have been given to companies to import butter, and if so, what are the names of these companies? If butter was imported during the year which has just ended, how much was imported, from what country, to what region and for what purpose?

Would the hon. minister be able to tell me tonight whether Canada has imported butter or whether he expects such imports in the near future.

[English]

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Winters: I do not know of any butter that has actually been imported into Canada. There has been an application to import some into Canada on a re-export basis and on the grounds that there would be no net import of butter. There was an application to bring some in, process it into butter oil and re-export it, but I do not know what the status of that transaction is.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, can the minister tell us which is the company or corporation that asked to import this butter for re-exportation?

[English]

Mr. Winters: I wonder if I might get that information and provide it to the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, earlier today the minister made an announcement with respect to copper and exports of copper. In B.C. in recent years we have had extensive development in the mining industry, in the development of mineral claims and properties, development which hinged upon the interests of Japan, or upon mining and smelting interests in Japan. Coming into production in my constituency shortly will be Granisle Copper, a subsidiary of Granby Consolidated, but I understand all the concentrates from the mill will be exported to Japan, smelted there, presumably processed into a finished or semi-finished product which we will buy back again at a higher price than we received for the ore or concentrates themselves. As I understand the minister's statement today, it preserves that situation because presumably this is a contract which is currently in existence.

We also have iron ore prospects and mines in B.C., one of which is in the Queen Charlotte Islands, again a Granby Consolidated project, which is under contract to ship the iron ore to Japan. Japanese freighters call in at regular intervals at Jedway to carry the ore to Japan for smelting purposes. In recent years a large amount of our mining development in B.C. has rested upon the interests of a foreign country, namely Japan.

This was recognized not long ago by the Premier of B.C. when he visited Japan and made the comment that possibly B.C. has a greater attachment to Japan than it has to the eastern part of Canada. I am sure he meant by that, that B.C. in years past has suffered at the hands of selfish interests in eastern Canada, in Toronto in particular, selfish mining interests, who have always wanted to preserve their own position within the economy, wanted to exert their power and authority wherever possible and, as a result, whenever they have been successful, we in the western part of Canada have suffered.

Even though we desire smelters to be built in B.C., even though a smelter would advance us economically and put us in a position of being able to export materials at a higher price than we export our ore and concentrates, and even though moves have been afoot on a number of occasions in the past, dating back to the period just prior to the second world war, we have found those legitimate needs and desires frustrated at every turn because of the interests with which the minister is so intimately associated, the interests in Toronto who want to preserve their own position. Though the minister is shaking his head at what I say, this is the fact of the matter.

If the minister wants to go back to the period at the end of the second world war and make inquiries about the attitude within the department of finance in the province of B.C., when we were on the verge of establishing, or having established an iron smelting industry in B.C., he will find that project was killed before birth because of the interests in eastern Canada who wanted to preserve their position and did not want any upstart western province becoming an industrial section of the nation because they felt it would interfere with their monopoly position in this field.

The minister does not have to take my word for this. He can get this information by searching diligently in the files of his own department and the files of the Department of Finance, and seeing the correspondence which took place at that time with the province of B.C.

We are still in this position. We still have to export nearly all of our ore and ore concentrates to other countries, which puts us in a relatively bad position when we need to use structural steel, copper tubing, copper plate or copperware, or anything else of that sort, which is made from the minerals that exist in B.C.

When the minister made his statement today about the changes that are to take place with respect to the export of copper ores and concentrates he opened the door wide enough for us to be able to express concern tonight about the question of developing or promoting the development of smelting industries close to the sources of raw matrials.

It is a simple and historical fact that in the period prior to the start of the Second World War, prior to the bombing of Pearl Harbour, we in B.C. were shipping scrap-iron to Japan, at a time when people who were unemployed were standing around trying to buck the spare board on logshore work, in order to load some of that iron, which we ourselves could have made good use of had we the smelting facilities to do so and develop it into finished products.

We have not progressed a solitary inch from that position. There is still only one smelter in B.C., at Trail, one that has been there for some years. We still have not advanced anywhere in the direction of developing a smelting industry in B.C., yet the minister has it within his power or authority, in concert with the Minister of Industry, to take concrete steps to do something about that.

Earlier I asked the minister if he would outline to the committee in detail his plans and his ideas, and his government plans and policies to deal with the problems which he posed on January 28 in the Throne Speech debate. He did not say a single solitary word tonight about what his government intends to do to promote a greater degree of Canadian control of industry. He did not say a single solitary word about what he plans to do with respect to developing manufacturing and secondary industry. He did not make a single solitary comment, or even express a hope about what he or the government has in mind so far as planning, or about dealing with balance of payments questions. Yet these are extremely serious matters.

Our whole economic welfare is tied up in the answers the minister should be providing now. He may have been in that department as minister only for two months, but in the face of his experience in earlier years in the cabinet, and in the face of his past eight years experience in the business community in which I understand he was a really powerful figure, and one with a great deal of knowledge, greater than most other people in business, in the face of his experience in the business community and in the cabinet prior to that time, he cannot now rest his failure to say anything on the basis of ignorance of matters in his department. Certainly it is not intimate knowledge of his department which is necessary; but what is required is some policy decision. Is he not speaking to the Minister of Finance; cannot the Minister of Finance tell him what the government was planning to do while the Minister of Finance held the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce; does he not know what the cabinet or the government has been doing in respect of some of these important things?

It simply is not good enough for the minister to start off his estimates this evening by saying he has no comment to make but that he would be glad to answer questions. It is not good enough, when particular questions are posed to him asking about policy matters and the plans to cope with the matters which the minister himself outlined; it simply is not good enough for Canada, for the minister to take this sort of casual disinterest in the problem.

The minister remembers well his words of January 28 and I need not repeat them. He has made speeches all across the country. He has stated that he is not on the mailing list, but I am sure he knows about the problems confronting Canada and about the things which should be dealt with. I am sure he can recall some of these. Would he mind telling the committee about the specific detail or about the general plans the government has to deal with the problems which were outlined on January 28 in his Throne Speech?

Mr. Grills: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister one or two questions. We hear a great deal about free trade with our good neighbours to the south. I happen to come from the hub of the cheese industry of Ontario, the home of Black Diamond and other famous brands of cheese. Would the minister tell us whether there is any quota on United States imports of cheese into Canada comparable to our exports to the United States? As we all know, the United States of America has a population of somewhere in the neighbourhood of 200 million people and we have approximately 20 million, about ten to one. As I understand it, our quota on cheese imported into the United States of America is 600,000 pounds, a little over half a million pounds. I wonder whether the minister could tell us what the other quota is and how it compares? I say this because I think our good Canadian cheddar cheese holds the key to the balance in our dairy industry, and the surpluses of the dairy industry can be best turned into cheese.

In respect of the importation of butter, as previously referred to by my colleague from Quebec, is there any relationship between the stabilization board, of the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Trade and Commerce which I understand would grant these import permits; is there any relationship between the two so that the one knows what the other is doing.

Mr. Winters: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there is very close collaboration between the two departments; each knows what the other is doing. On the matter of cheese, the quota in the United States is a matter of considerable concern to us. It is something I would like to discuss in the meeting in Washington. I can assure the hon. member this matter is receiving very serious consideration.

Mr. Grills: Could you tell me what their quota is into Canada?

Mr. Winters: I do not have the information at the moment, but I might be able to obtain it for you this evening.

Mr. Keays: Mr. Chairman, I know the minister is very interested in promoting trade within Canada, and I would like him to have a look at a situation whereby copper concentrates from the east coast are going to Japan to be smelted. We are sure the Japanese have a cheap form of transportation, lower salaries and so on, and can overbid our Canadian companies for some of these concentrates. When we realize that the concentrates are going thousands and thousands of miles away and there is a smelter within 100 miles or so from the source of supply, it is rather difficult to understand why the Japanese can overbid some of our Canadians.

One reason may be the charges made by some of the departments of government. The excessive charges made by the Department of Transport may be one of the reasons the Japanese can overbid the Canadians for these products. It is very difficult to understand, especially when there is a smelter which at this moment possibly is operating only at about 80 per cent of its full capacity in respect of these products which should be processed and manufactured in Canada, why the concentrates cannot be obtained in the area in which there is a smelter.

I would like to impress upon the minister that when he has an opportunity he should urge upon some of the other departments of government that it sometimes is better to alleviate the charges which are being made against some of these services and thus allow our Canadian companies to compete for some of these Canadian products.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I still would like to get some answer from the minister in respect of what plan he has to deal with the important problems confronting Canada's trade and economic growth which the minister himself outlined in his Throne Speech of January 28.

Mr. Winters: Perhaps the hon. member was out when I spoke on the subject of trade promotion and mentioned the great importance the department, the government, and I particularly attach to the very important problem of increasing our trade. One development we attach a great deal importance is the Kennedy round of negotiations. Canada is in the forefront of the countries which are urging a successful conclusion to these negotiations. By the further reduction of tariffs and other impediments to our trade, we think Canadian industry can benefit substantially and that the flow of world trade can be greatly stimulated. This however is a very difficult exercise.

Recently I had the privilege of spending a day with our team at Geneva and was able to get a firsthand understanding, in so far as I was able to do so in that short time, of some of the severe problems involved; but I did tell our people there that Canada attaches a great deal of importance to these negotiations and that we want them pursued with all vigour. I had the opportunity of expressing my views in Paris to my opposite numbers in the French government.

• (9:30 p.m.)

I gained some understanding of the very severe problems that are confronting them in this area. I am hopeful that all the nations concerned will very soon come to the conference table at Geneva and negotiate in a very purposeful way toward the successful conclusion of what I regard as one of the most hopeful avenues for the development of Canadian and world trade. In other areas we do what we can on a bilateral basis to stimulate trade. As the hon. member knows, we have increased the number of trade missions we are sponsoring abroad; we are increasing the number of trade fairs; we are trying to stimulate Canadian businessmen into greater awareness of the export markets that the world provides at the present time. Generally we are making every effort to promote the volume of our exports abroad. I was told this morning, for example, that the total volume of trade sponsored under the Export Credits Insurance Corporation has reached the figure of $1.9 billion, which in itself is an indication of the importance that successive governments have attached to the various instrumentalities for stimulating trade by Canada.

The hon. member referred to the position of British Columbia in regard to smelting, and attributed the lack of a smelter to eastern interests. I shook my head because I am one of those who do not believe that the eastern financial interests have held up the development of British Columbia. As a matter of fact, I had the privilege of discussing this problem not long ago with some interested people and I think the hon. member can take it that when there is sufficient copper concentrate available in British Columbia serious consideration will be given to a new smelter. I know hon. members are aware that it takes a great deal of concentrate, indeed, to justify the construction of a smelter on an economic basis.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre:

That all the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, including all the supplementaries, be approved and do now pass.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret that the Chair cannot accept this motion because what is now before the house is item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I believe we should continue our consideration of that item. I do not believe the motion is relevant to item No. 1.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the concern of the hon. member for Oxford about proceeding as quickly as we can but I think—

An hon. Member: Sit down then.

Mr. Howard: I just heard someone say, sit down. If that is the only interest the hon. members in the Conservative party have in the question of our economic well-being—

An hon. Member: Please do not talk nonsense.

Mr. Howard: —then it is extremely revealing as to the degree of hypocrisy that exists within that party.

Mr. Fairweather: You are a prime example of hyprocrisy.

Mr. Nesbitt: Do you not want the bills paid?

Mr. Howard: The mouthy member for Oxford asks, do I not want the bills paid. Of course I want the bills paid; don't be so asinine. We want to deal as expeditiously as possible with these estimates, but we also want some answers as to what is likely to happen. We just cannot blandly go along and say we have no interest in what is likely to happen to the economic welfare of the nation.

I gather the crux of the minister's answer was that a great deal rests upon the success or otherwise of the so-called Kennedy round of tariff discussions or negotiations. I believe it is correct that if we can participate with other nations in effecting lower tariff barriers we can open up markets for commodities that these tariff barriers were associated with before. However, it seems to me that tariffs were instituted primarily to protect home industries and that their secondary effect was the provision of income to the government which imposed them. However, the tariffs were originally put into effect to preserve the economic positions of the industries associated with the tariff barriers, the feeling being that if the tariff was low enough the industry concerned would be driven out of business by the importation of lower priced articles.

Tariffs are imposed in respect of manufactured products rather than raw materials. If the government feels it has the degree of faith indicated by the minister in the forthcoming tariff negotiations, it should be doing something to bring about an agreement to lower tariffs, and should operate in concert and conjunction with the Department of Industry, and the entire cabinet, to promote as fast as possible the development of secondary manufacturing industries in Canada. If this is not done we will find ourselves very likely participating with other member countries of GATT in lowering tariff barriers, thereby opening up markets in other countries for those countries which are now highly industrialized. We will not be opening up markets for ourselves, because we will not be operating in the direction of developing secondary manufacturing industries here in Canada.

It seems to me that if the Minister rests his case and the solution to the problem on his statement of January 28 regarding the potential success of the tariff negotiations; and is hopeful that something worth while will come from those negotiations, he should be pressing just as hard as possible in the direction of building up secondary manufacturing industries in Canada, so that we will be in a better position to promote the export of those manufactured goods to those countries we hope will open their doors to us. To have faith in the one and not take some concrete steps to work toward the other seems to be nonsensical. Perhaps the minister will deal with this aspect of the situation. However, as he said earlier, perhaps he would like to leave this to the Department of Industry in so far as the responsibility for promoting the development of secondary industry is a concern of that department. On the other hand, the two seem to go hand in hand. This is one of the strange fields of government activity in respect of which one department cannot be divorced entirely from another. Each has to know what the other is doing because the decisions of one could very easily offset the efforts of the other.

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, I agree generally with the hon. member's premise, and the Minister of Industry has just said that I can assure the hon. member he has his full support.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 1 carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few remarks to make to the minister concerning the sales of uranium.

What does the minister think will be done to promote the sale of Canadian uranium to other countries? What kind of agreement do we have with the United States to sell them uranium? Are there other countries to which the federal government intends to sell uranium? What conditions does the federal government require of various countries before selling them uranium? What agreement has the federal government reached with France to sell it uranium?

Those are the few questions I wanted to ask the minister. Some people ask us questions about uranium and since, personally, I do not know much about the matter, I would appreciate it if the minister would give me that information.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, at the moment I do not believe any company in Canada is selling uranium to the United States. Sales at present are to the stockpile and for the balance of the United Kingdom contract. In selling uranium abroad the conditions are that the purchasing country must undertake to abide by the terms of bilateral agreements under which they must agree to use the uranium only for peaceful purposes and submit to inspection to ensure that this is so. There are no contracts with the French government and none are being negotiated at the present moment.

I believe the demand for uranium will increase. It has long been my view that as we go into the 1970's the demand around the world for uranium for peaceful purposes will increase considerably. The outlook for the uranium industry in Canada is a bright one.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I shall take up only a few seconds of the committee's time, to ask the minister to give us a few explanations on the administration in his department.

We are here as members of Parliament as representatives of our fellow-citizens, and we must scrutinize the minister's expenditures and find out from him how he spends his estimates.

If the minister cannot reply tonight, he might do so on another occasion. I wish to refer to pages 436 to 441 of the estimates. I note an extraordinary increase in personnel, in new employees in certain divisions. For instance, on page 436, in the category of employees earning from $12,000 to $14,000, there has been an increase from 0 to 41 employees; on page 437, I also note, under item 5, an increase of 0 to 32 in the number of employees earning from $10,000 to $14,000 annually?

The minister should give a little more information on these items which represent a rather large amount in salaries. The amount may be warranted, but somehow the increase seems considerable compared to last year.

The minister may answer tonight or later, but I think the house is entitled to be informed about this.

On behalf of my colleagues, I take this opportunity to offer the minister our best wishes for the success of Expo '67. And I think I am expressing here the feelings of all the members of our party and all the members of the house.

In the light of the information provided by the minister to the effect that quite a large total deficit is expected, I wonder whether he would accept a suggestion which could perhaps make up for a probable deficit? We all hope that there will be no deficit, but should there be one, I would have a suggestion to make to the minister.

My proposal is based on a precedent which took place in France around 1870-75, at the time of the first trade fair in France, which was financed by a specially-organized lottery to pay for the travel costs of persons who had to travel quite a long way to get to the fair.

I wonder if the minister could not suggest to his colleagues that the government advocate and pass special legislation to allow, during the world fair in Montreal, the holding of a lottery which would help make up for the deficit, so that the burden would not rest only on overtaxed Canadians. Thus, even visitors could, through their spending, contribute to a very large extent to reduce the Expo deficit. We all hope that there will be no deficit, but I wonder if the minister could not take this suggestion, as well as the questions I put to him previously, in consideration.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 1 carry?

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask the minister whether he will provide that information.

Mr. Winters: I would be very glad to provide that information at a later date, if that is agreeable to the hon. member. I could speak on this matter now but I understand the time is short.

Item agreed to.

15. Canadian Government Travel Bureau—to assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada including a grant of $37,000 to the Canadian Tourist Association, $6,290,600.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could just have one moment to leave a thought with the minister.

Mr. Fairweather: It will take you longer than a moment to leave a thought with anybody.

Mr. Howard: This is a plea in respect of a part of my own constituency. In northern B.C., in what is now loosely and I think improperly called a ghost town, is the community of Atlin. Atlin was a pretty important area in the gold rush days at the turn of the century. There are still there remnants of one of the communities that sprang up as a result of the discovery of gold. This community is just outside Atlin a mile or two away.

I would urge the minister to take some steps through the Canadian Government Travel Bureau to publicize the history of Atlin and the fact that it does exist. Driving along the Alaska highway this side of Whitehorse in the summertime there are hundreds upon hundreds of tourists, a great many of them being Americans, who are travelling through to Alaska, the Yukon and the north. All that exists in so far as an indication that Atlin is there is a weather-beaten sign. It is the usual sort of directional sign with an arrow indicating that Atlin is in that direction.

Mr. Nielsen: That is at Jake's Corners.

Mr. Howard: Yes. I think some work could be done by the Canadian Government Travel Bureau in promoting a visit not only to Atlin itself but to the area of British Columbia surrounding Atlin in order to view some of the history of the area and see some of the beauties that exist there. This is a matter that probably comes within the jurisdiction of the provincial government and I have been in contact with that government on numerous occasions in the past in order to try to get them to do something with Atlin in much the same way as was done with Barkerville in British Columbia. This could be done by depicting scenes from the old days and promoting this area as a tourist attraction. It would give recognition to that part of the country and would provide tourists with an opportunity to see a section of British Columbia that played such an important part during the gold rush days and also contributed somewhat to the difficulty we now have with respect to the location of the Alaska boundary. I do not expect any comment from the minister tonight, because of the time, but I merely wish to pose this question to him. Would he please look at it and see whether something could be done to build up some tourist attraction for this part of the province.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Winters: I found it a most intriguing place. They were still carrying on some gold operations when I was there a few years ago. I will bear this in mind.

Item agreed to.

1967 World Exhibition—

29. Canadian government participation in the 1967 world exhibition, Montreal, $9,540,500.

Mr. Irvine: A few moments ago the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre made mention of the fact that we had a new minister. Perhaps after tonight he will consider himself to be a used one. I think after the remarks made by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie with regard to Expo '67, it would be only proper for one of his brother Canadians, who does not have the ability to use the other official language of Canada, to say something on behalf of people in other parts of the country.

I know that I express the sentiments of this entire committee when I say we are very proud of this Expo '67. I should like to say too, on behalf of our party, that we are very proud that we laid the foundation for this exhibition. We are pleased to think that we picked out the site for it. We feel it was a proper site, in the largest city of this great country in which we are privileged to live. I hope too that every member in all parts of this house, every citizen of this great country of ours, will do everything he can to make sure that this is the finest exhibition that has ever been held in Canada.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This concludes consideration of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. The committee will now proceed to a consideration of the estimates of the Department of Defence Production.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, there are three departments or agencies concerned here, the Department of Defence Production, the Department of Industry and the National Research Council. I suggest that perhaps as we did last year it would be more convenient if we were to deal with each of these separately, since they are to some degree separate and distinct subjects. In order to save the time of the committee, I will not make a statement on any of these departments, but I would be most interested indeed in providing information or answers to questions in so far as I am able.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the committee shall proceed to the consideration of the Department of Defence Production?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

1. Departmental administration, including the care, maintenance and custody of standby defence plants, buildings, machine tools and production tooling and grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on Crown-owned defence plants operated by private contractors, $16,922,800.

Mr. Howard: I did not realize we were going into this department. I thought we were going into the industry section. There is one matter about which I should like to inquire which relates to the Department of Defence Production. I understand that some time ago, a year or two ago, the purchasing of materials for the Indian affairs branch was taken over by the Department of Defence Production. In talking with Indian affairs branch personnel in the field, in talking with local suppliers of goods and materials that are required by the Indian affairs branch, I have learned, to put it mildly, that they think this system leaves a great deal to be desired. They feel it allows for a great deal of inefficiency and increases the length of time it takes to make deliveries of orders compared with what it used to be under the Indian affairs branch.

In many instances local suppliers of materials are cut out of the picture because the Department of Defence Production has some relationship or liaison with the larger centres for distribution purposes. I do not want to document these instances, and I do not think they need documenting in any event. Some instances have been related to me of misunderstandings over orders which were given. In other instances the materials which are supplied are not the ones which were ordered. All of this leaves a great deal to be desired.

I seriously urge the minister, if he does not appreciate fully what is taking place here, to relinquish these activities by the Department of Defence Production for the purchase of materials for the Indian affairs branch and give those activities back to the proper minister who, in this instance, would be the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. These activities should be returned to the Indian affairs branch which is intimately involved in the ordering of the materials and which will have the greatest amount of control in the placement of these orders. This will overcome a great deal of the difficulty.

I can assure the minister there is a fair amount of dissatisfaction within the Indian affairs branch in connection with this operation. If the Minister of Industry would just lean over and consult with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources he would probably get confirmation of this dissatisfaction. I believe the minister should relinquish this activity because he has enough to do in this department without fiddling with the Indian affairs branch and causing a great deal of difficulty and inefficiency there.

Mr. Drury: I should like the hon. gentleman perhaps to try to accord us a little patience. It was not two years ago this activity was taken over. The functions are in the process of being taken over now. I can readily understand that there are, in the process of changing to new techniques, new personnel, new channels, certain transient dissatisfactions with decisions. I hope that, as the Department of Defence Production, which is being converted into the department of supply, becomes more skilled and more accustomed to this, the very substantial economies which are being realized in the expenditure of government funds would be coupled with a much higher degree of satisfaction to the ordering department.

Mr. Howard: In reply to the minister, I may say that I understand this may be a transitional period. I can quite understand the savings which could result from bulk purchases and the concentration of activity in one field if this is to be the purchasing department for all government services. I understand also the waste and inefficiency that can come from centralization. This is what I want to get at. In one sense, I really do not care who does the buying as long as it is done efficiently, and so long as you take into your confidence, perhaps even appoint as some of your agents, Indian affairs officers who work in the field, those who are in daily contact with the native people and know their requirements for housing, sewers, electrical facilities and many of the other things that are required. If you communicate with the local officials of the Indian affairs branch you will get along a lot better than you are by attempting to centralize these purchases within one department with its headquarters in Ottawa.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, because the Minister and the government has decided to take positive action in the standards branch of the department relating to the problems of highway deaths and injuries, I wish to make a few remarks relating to the general subject. May I again congratulate the minister and the government upon the positive action which has been taken. As the minister announced in the house a few days ago in answer to written questions that I put on the order paper, the government intends to draft in the standards section of the Department of Defence Production a relatively definitive code pertaining to the purchase of government automobiles and to the safety features that should be included in motor cars at the production stage. I think that the Canadian public will be glad to receive the good news the Department of Defence Production has announced, namely that it intends to draft three codes for the public relating to the driver, to the car, and to the highway. Those three factors are obviously involved in highway deaths and injuries.

I do not intend to go into the great detail that I covered in the debate on the Speech from the Throne, but may I clear up some misconceptions. Many spokesmen for the industry and for the automobile establishment, for highway safety leagues, have stated up to now that I have placed too much emphasis on the car and not enough on the driver and on the highway. I have said that we must educate people to become better drivers; that we must encourage drivers to be more safe; that we must encourage provincial governments to build safer highways, and that we must encourage provincial governments to make sure that motorcars are operational at all times.

As a federal legislator there are some things which I may suggest. As federal legislators we can do something about what most members recognize to be an epidemic of massive proportions which has to be cured by massive public interest and massive public funds. That is what I said in the house before.

Unless something is done immediately, unless something is done to check the numbers killed on our highways, unless something is done between now and 1970, over a million Canadians will be injured and between 35,000 and 40,000 killed on our highways. What can we as federal legislators do about this. We can make certain that when the Canadian public buys an automobile that automobile is the safest that can be produced.

I have been criticized by some persons who say that I place the emphasis in the wrong place. I admit that apart from mechanical failure it should be recognized that judgment errors on the part of individuals are invariably responsible for an accident. However, as I keep saying to the leaders of the industry that after I have driven 80,000 miles, and just because I make a judgment error at a speed under 45 miles an hour, and just because the industry has not produced a safe automobile, is no reason for me to die.

As federal legislators, Mr. Chairman, if we support the initiative taken by the Department of Defence Production in the announcement of its code, if we support this worthy cause, it is my firm belief—and I draw the attention of the house to this at this time, —that we shall cut down the toll of deaths and injuries by 50 per cent.

I pointed out in the debate in the Speech from the Throne that 87 per cent of all deaths and injury-producing accidents take place at speeds under 45 miles an hour. This, Mr. Chairman, is something that we, as federal legislators can do something about.

There are those who pretend that we have no authority over the policing of safe motor cars. I say that the federal government has authority. May I direct your attention, Mr. Chairman, and the attention of the house to the Food and Drug Act. May I refer to the case of Russell v. The Queen. May I refer to the fact that the federal government has jurisdiction to police the manufacturing of aeroplanes, of all rolling stock on our railways, of all ships, and safety features in them, at production levels.

I should like to thank most sincerely the officials of the Department of Transport who, with the concurrence of the minister, put this working paper in my hands. It clearly demonstrates how at the production level the federal government has this authority in relation to planes, rolling stock on railways and the construction of ships to make sure that safety features are included for the protection of the public. These modes of communication and travel fall under the rule of law. The automobile alone falls outside the rule of law, and in the light of the few statistics I have put before the committee tonight I think it is incumbent upon us in a bipartisan spirit to conquer this epidemic which has now reached major proportions.

Some people approached me a few days ago and said that those of us who are working in this direction must be pleased by the announcement the industry made last week in connection with brakes and steering columns. I do not want to be a killjoy and say that these innovations are insignificant per se, but I believe that until we have government specified codes by which to measure the value of these innovations we have no means of knowing how significant they are.

Would we permit the food industry to say: "We are going to be good boys; we have taken a little poison out of our food"? We should want to know how much poison there was in it in the past and how much was left. Until we have these codified standards set by the authority which should make them, the public will not be protected.

The real reason for my intervention this evening is to congratulate the minister on the initiative he has taken in the Department of Defence Production. It is only a beginning. I can visualize the possibility, when the codes come out, that we shall need to do more than hold them out to the automotive industry and say: "Be good boys; this is what we think you should do." We shall have to say: "We know these are scientific and proven safety features, and they must be in the cars within a definite period of time—or else."

Even if we do this we shall only be scratching the surface. The industry doubts whether we have authority to act in this field. It does not want to be policed. But if we are to do our duty to the public it will have to be policed. In the second place, the industry says we are setting back safety in general when we talk about the car and do not talk about the driver and the highway. I have already cleared up this point. The provincial governments have a definite role to play in helping to produce better drivers and in building safer highways. This does not mean we should avoid our responsibility at the federal level.

The third argument that is being presented by the industry over the past few weeks is that they say if those who seek the building of a safer automobile want just that, they will build us an ugly tank that can go at 15 miles an hour. I would like to show members of the committee pictures of a prototype safety car that is being produced as a result of a feasibility study in New York. This is a safe car and a good looking car. How about the Pina Farina that is coming from Europe this year, which includes many safety features upon which no research is required, as they are already in existence?

It is patently obvious that you can build a good looking car and have safety features in it at the same time, and I think the minister's code and investigation will prove that. The industry says it cannot build us a good looking car and a safe car at the same time. I ask the industry, since when would proper roll-over bars detract from beauty? Since when would properly recessed padded dash panels detract from the beauty of a car? Since when would integrating the seats of a car to the frame, so that they would not fly off at speeds under 45 miles an hour and cause great injury, detract from the beauty of a car? Since when would putting something stronger than cardboard between the rear end of a car and the valise, so that tools would not come in and cause injury and death, detract from the beauty of a car?

I put the following suggestions before the minister. First of all, I ask the minister would he plead with the automobile industry to forgo costly retooling costs for style changes in the next year, and devote that money to putting safety in their automobiles.

Second, I have already talked about the New York prototype safety study, and I would say the state of New York is more advanced than any governmental body in the western world in the completion of a real safety car. The state has spent $500,000 on a feasibility study. They need from $4 million to $6 million to complete the building of a prototype car. It is interesting that the feasibility study was done by the aircraft industry. It is the aircraft industry which has spent millions and billions of dollars on research, while almost less than nothing has been spent, on automobile safety research.

I put the following suggestion before the minister: First of all, I ask:

What happened at Ste. Thérèse two years ago? An aircraft crashed and the government spent millions of dollars putting that aircraft back, piece by piece, and spent months studying it. We tried to find out why that tragedy occurred in order that we could do something about it. But what happens when a car crashes? We lose over 100 people a week on the highways; but after an accident, within 10 to 20 minutes of the ambulance or morgue wagon leaving the scene, the car involved is brought to the dump and not one dollar is spent on research to discover the cause.

It is the aircraft industry that has researched safety in automobiles. Therefore I would like to recommend to the minister the possibility that Canada could reach across the border, break precedent in many regards, if you will, and participate in a financial way in the building of the New York prototype car.

Though we have not reached the National Research Council aspect of the minister's estimates, I do feel that it could have a part to play in offering know-how in the completion of this prototype car. This is one instance where Canada can take a real lead in getting something done. If Canada takes the lead with New York and California, and one other large state, the major part of this war can be won. Can we expect much from Washington? The automobile lobby in Washington is very large and, as the minister knows, the G.S.A. recommendations were watered down last year because of that lobby. Canada must play its part.

The last recommendation which I put before the minister is that I hope the government will encourage its members, and opposition members, to have the house committee on research and industry call before it responsible leaders of the industry and research safety experts, so that in a spirit of co-operation we can get something done. I regret very much the outcry from the industry against me last week. I will not reply in kind to the executive who spoke the way he did, because I think this is too important a subject to get into a shouting match about.

Let us not allocate blame. I blame legislators such as ourselves for the state of affairs that we are faced with today regarding the problem; I blame the public because they have been so apathetic in demanding safety, and I blame the automobile industry also for being delinquent in their social and economic responsibilities. But let us not allocate blame; the blame is collective. Let us get on with the job and produce results. The last misconception I would like to shoot down is with respect to the safety experts. I am not sure what a safety expert is, but I tell the people in the industry that you do not need to be an employee of the industry to be an expert. The industry builds automobiles for people who are not experts; the five thousand people who died on our highways in 1965 were not experts, they were amateurs. These people are driving automobiles and the automobiles should be designed in a safe way so that they are adapted to the human animal. We should stop putting emphasis on the human animal always being adapted to the automobile.

What I am talking about will do two things: If we live up to our responsibilities and make sure that all scientifically proven safety features are put in cars at the production level, we will not only reduce death-producing and injury-producing accidents by 50 per cent, but we will also avoid many accidents occurring in the first place. I refer especially to such things as driver fatigue, and the basic research being done by the aircraft industry, on pilot fatigue, easily could be transferred to the automobile industry.

Great research has been done by the aircraft industry in matters relating to proper vision and noise, research which could avoid accidents in the first place. I am not talking about only reducing injury and death once the accident takes place, but also about the possibility of reducing the occurrence of the accident in the first place. While I am sure all members would agree that things such as high speed and drinking, pure bad driving and bad manners on the road, often are the cause of accidents, I do not think these things in themselves are an excuse for us to let the automobile as a mode of transportation go unpoliced.

I repeat that the problem is too great for us to just shunt off our responsibilities in this manner. President Johnson a couple of weeks ago when referring to the matter in Washington said that the whole problem of highway death and injury, came second only to the problem of Viet Nam, and suggested that surely this means we have a role to play in overcoming the problem.

I would like to congratulate the minister for his initial thrust and initiative in tackling the problem, and I would like to ask all the members of the house to pledge their support to him when we move into this area.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I think all the members of the house will welcome the very evident sincerity and energy which the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi has put into this problem, which is a very serious and significant one for our country. I share his concern and I thank him for the kind remarks he has made. I will be delighted to consider all his recommendations.

The Chairman: The hon. member for London.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order; could we have some understanding about what we are doing. I can still see the clock, whether or not anyone else can. It seems to me we should not just go on as though there was no clock, without arriving at some understanding. It seems to me that in view of the unnecessary time that was taken on one department this afternoon some consideration should be given as to what the program is now to be.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. member will agree not to see the clock, in an effort to finish the estimates of the Department of Industry. I think everyone will agree that it is highly desirable that the ministers of the five departments mentioned today have their estimates completed in order that they may attend the joint United States-Canadian ministerial committee meeting on trade and economic affairs.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, we are prepared to sit until midnight to get some of this work done. We did not take up the time on the other department today; that time was largely consumed by members of other parties. We are quite content to sit until midnight.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I trust that the statement made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is not an order of the house. Could we have some indication as to how many speakers there may be on the estimates of this department. It seems to me that in view of the unnecessary argument that was started this afternoon by the Minister of Finance in introducing his estimates, and the time that was taken on the consideration of those estimates, there should be some mutually agreed to arrangement. We are prepared to attempt to get the estimates of this department through if it is clearly understood that there are not too many speakers who wish to speak on them, but to sit until midnight and then go on at length tomorrow we think is too much.

Mr. Grégoire: There are no speakers from this party.

An hon. Member: Are you speaking for the government?

Mr. Fairweather: Where is the hon. member for York-Humbug, he may have something to say?

An hon. Member: We sent him on another trip.

Mr. Irvine: Mr. Chairman, what I have to say I am sure will be of grave national import.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I am trying to be co-operative in not shouting that it is ten o'clock, but I do not think I should be fobbed off without any understanding as to what we are going to do.

Mr. McIlraith: I believe there are very few speakers on the estimates of this department. There are none as far as this side of the house is concerned, and I believe there are none in the Creditiste Party. I cannot speak for the Social Credit party or the official opposition, but they have made it quite clear they are anxious to co-operate and get these estimates through.

Mr. Churchill: We are prepared to consider the estimates of the Department of Agriculture as well.

Mr. McIlraith: The government is certainly most anxious to get the estimates through. We are anxious and willing to co-operate in every possible way with all hon. members in order to continue and complete our consideration of as many estimates as possible, for the reason I gave a few minutes ago and for the additional reason that within a very few days a very real difficulty will develop if we have not completed the estimates. We are now in the fifth week of the discussion of the estimates for the year just ending. I hope that we can see our way clear to continue to sit tonight and go as far as we possibly can to finish the estimates of this department, and possibly those of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I ask that there be some spirit of compromise. We will go part way but we ask the rest of the house to meet us part way. We are suggesting that we sit until we have completed the estimates of this department now before us, and at that point call it ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed?

Mr. Churchill: We are prepared to sit until midnight, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nielsen: Let us sit until midnight.

The Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, we should agree on something, or somewhere along the line those Tories who are so helpful now will become obstinate and we will then find ourselves in difficulty.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, would it be satisfactory if we finish the estimates of this department, assuming we can finish them in a few minutes, then discuss matters further, because we are certainly very much concerned that we get the next two departments through tomorrow afternoon. Even that leaves us with quite a heavy program for Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Churchill: We are ready to work tonight.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could raise the matter again if we are not making good progress at, say, eleven o'clock. Would that be agreeable?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, everybody knows from past experience that we would be much better off if we could clearly set out now what we intend to do. I suggest that it would be agreeable, without any difficulty, if we were to deal with the items for which the Minister of Industry is responsible and at that point call it ten o'clock, and then start tomorrow with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Grégoire: We approve of that course, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McIlraith: While it does seem to be the consensus of the committee that we go further tonight, if the hon. member feels strongly about it and in view of the fact that it is past ten o'clock—and we appreciate the fact that he did not see the clock—we could agree to finish the estimates of the Minister of Industry tonight. I would point out that it is hardly the consensus of the committee that we stop there; it is the wish of two hon. members.

Mr. Nielsen: Right.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, there is one further thing I think we should have clear in respect of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Skeena. It is that we are not going to have, say six half-hour speeches from members of the official opposition.

Mr. McIlraith: I must, Mr. Chairman, out of fairness say that the official opposition have been very co-operative today.

Mr. Churchill: There are 97 of us, too.

• (10:30 p.m.)

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps in view of the strong feelings of the hon. member for Skeena on the subject it will be agreeable if we finish the estimates of the Minister of Industry tonight and try to finish those of the other two departments tomorrow. Perhaps that is the most satisfactory course.

Mr. Churchill: We would like to sit until midnight, Mr. Chairman. This discussion is all out of order; we have lost 15 minutes because of it.

Mr. McIlraith: Certainly the government is prepared to sit until midnight.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre be allowed to stay here until midnight, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. Churchill: I will extend it to one o'clock.

Mr. Howard: I have a delightful way out of this impasse which will satisfy the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Howard: In this way the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre could stay here all night if he wishes. So far as this party is concerned, we are agreeable to dispensing at this juncture with any debate on the items of the Department of Industry, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. If the Conservative party will agree to this, we can pass all these item right now.

Mr. Nielsen: That is irresponsible.

Mr. Howard: Otherwise I suggest you call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Enns: Two minutes ago you spoke quite differently.

Mr. Howard: There is a choice before you.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 1 carry?

Mr. Howard: Carried.

Mr. Irvine: Mr. Chairman, had we proceeded some 15 minutes ago I would have finished my remarks by now. I think it is a well known fact that I have had many questions on the order paper with regard to the Canadian Government Printing Bureau. It is also a well known fact to me that I have received some very left-handed answers to these questions and there are some 20 question to which I have not yet received any answer.

I should like to say that I am not on a witch hunt; I am not seeking to aggravate French-English relations within the bureau, which I know personally to be on the most unhappy of all bases. In my opinion the situation within the government printing bureau warrants, indeed demands, a thoroughgoing public inquiry. I am deeply disturbed by the situation that I know to exist and I have reason to believe that the minister also is much more concerned than he will admit to this house.

I have had a whole series of questions on the order paper seeking to elicit detailed information on the bureau operation, employment practices and inventory procedures, all with a view to establishing the fact that the Canadian taxpayer is indeed getting value for his tax dollar. I have been bombarded with a mass of ministerial white paper which promises to tell much but which, in reality, discloses very little. I said, Mr. Chairman, that I was not engaged in a witch hunt and I meant precisely that. It matters not a whit to me whether anyone attributes the real situation that exists in the bureau to the years the present government has been in office or to any other administration. My own, fundamental concern is to eradicate from the bureau, which bears the proud title of the Queen's Printer, practices that I am fully convinced are mulcting the Canadian public of thousands and thousands of dollars annually.

My information is that over the years there have been illegitimate practices at the bureau involving shortages of stock, the use of or outright theft of bureau equipment and supplies for private gain of certain individuals. My information further is that within the internal operation of the bureau there has been rank discrimination against certain personnel. My inquiries have revealed the operation of an illicit lending agency, group or society or what you might wish to call a Caisse Populaire. I have heard this described as a loan shark business. I say to the minister, this is just not good enough. This is deplorable, and is a situation which cannot be tolerated within an agency of the Crown.

Proof that the case I am submitting to the committee is not a witch hunt, Mr. Chairman, is provided by acknowledgements from the minister himself in some replies to my questions to the effect that the R.C.M.P., and the Hull city police have been compelled to carry their investigations into the theft of television sets, radios, tape recorders or other equipment into the bureau itself. My information is also that the city police of Ottawa have had a hand in these investigations. Indeed, in one instance, they seized a television set in the possession of a bureau employee.

The minister's response to my series of questions was beyond criticism for volume, but left much to be desired in the way of providing specific answers to specific questions. I can only conclude that he does not provide these answers in detail because of the danger of embarrassing himself and the government.

It seems to be the custom of employees of the Canadian Government Printing Bureau to become connected with outside enterprises, the work of which is allied to their line of work in the bureau. I will cite three or four cases, but I am going to refrain from naming individuals in so far as I can do so. I am not interested in castigating anyone, only in protecting the rights of the Canadian taxpayer. My information indicates the existence of the following examples:

A man who is a full time photographer within the bureau operates his own photography business outside of the bureau and has access to equipment and supplies within the bureau.

The firm of Gasparo Limited, a commercial printing firm located in Hull, according to the answer given to question No. 329, is operated by at least a dozen employees of the bureau, three of whom are listed as directors of that company. The answer also relates that they have a 60 per cent interest in this business. I am further informed that 40 per cent is held in the name of a Hull businessman, as a front to keep the employees out of trouble.

I am further advised that this man either received a lump sum or an annual fee or dividend to protect these people.

It has also come to my attention that shortly after the first questions were asked, some of these people in the bureau worked long and hard removing equipment, etc. from these premises. I should think that an investigational committee would want to know what equipment was moved; where did it come from; where is it now? I am sure these answers would be very revealing.

I can also see two of these foremen, whom I could name, meeting in the Printing Bureau that evening, shaking hands and feeling that they have covered their tracks.

Further, No. 3, my impression of Accurate Printing, according to my informants, in spite of left-handed and evasive answers to question No. 327 is that one, Mr. A. R. Gentile was employed by the Printing Bureau until October 12, 1965, at which time he was a hand compositor. During this same period he operated a firm known as Accurate Printing, 12 Kevin Crescent, Ottawa. Further, I have documentary proof that he had a contract to print hundreds of voters lists and received the sum of $5,848.35 for this service.

I am informed that this work was done at the bureau, perhaps on bureau printing time, and perhaps using printing bureau equipment and material. This contract was given to this man while he was still an employee of the printing bureau. According to the answer to question No. 327(4) he retired on October 12, 1965. According to the Canada Elections Act, section 237, these lists must have been printed and ready for posting on October 13, 1965. Therefore they must have been printed while this man was still in the employ of the printing bureau.

Mr. Chairman, how can the minister justify the fact that an employee of his department was also doing a governmental printing contract, supposedly in his own personal plant at 12 Kevin Crescent. Were these voters lists—and I wish to ask the minister these questions, because I am sure that he is more interested than he appears to be—printed in the printing bureau? Were these voters lists printed on government equipment and supplies, on printing bureau time? I would think the minister would want to know the answers to these questions, and we certainly must have them.

To sum it all up, Mr. Chairman, my inquiries have revealed very definite wrongdoing in the Canadian Government Printing Bureau. First, there are three firms, all owned and operated by employees of the Canadian Government Printing Bureau, and interested in allied trades. These employees had access to equipment and supplies which could be used in their own, private business. Two of these firms have received government contracts.

Second, there is information that a money lending syndicate has operated and may still be operating within the bureau, and is doing business with the less fortunate at exorbitant interest rates in excess of 100 per cent.

Third, I have been informed that a ring has been operating in selling television, radios, tape recorders, etc., at ridiculously low prices at printing bureau premises to printing bureau employees. I am further informed that a television set was seized by Ottawa police from the home of a printing bureau employee and has not yet been returned.

How many other operations there are only a complete investigation would bring to light. I am informed that there are many.

• (10:40 p.m.)

Why, according to the answer to question No. 64, were the R.C.M.P. called in to investigate stolen goods at the Canadian Government Printing Bureau? Why were the Hull city police called in to investigate wrongdoing as detailed very evasively in answer to question No. 331, part D? Why were the Ottawa police brought into the picture supposedly to seize a television set sold to a printing bureau employee?

I should like to see a copy of the authorization dated July 12, 1962 which permitted the establishment of a credit union in the printing bureau. Why was there all the secrecy in answer to question No. 330?

I have grave fears that printing for outside interests has been going on in the printing bureau at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer.

In answer to question No. 327 it was disclosed there was a deletion of stores and equipment from the inventory, as detailed in board of survey No. 5, listed as obsolete and unserviceable items, in the amount of $123,-111.74.

I should like to know this, Mr. Chairman. What were those items in detail? Did they not have some salvage value? Why were they not turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation? Surely something could have been saved. Or was this representative of an inventory shortage; was this an attempt to cover up? What about other shortages in the inventory? Why could not the R.C.M.P. and the other police forces track some of this equipment down? Why is it that according to my information so many employees were intimidated as result of my questions on the order paper?

Mr. Chairman, I am not interested in ruining the career of any individual, hence my hesitation about mentioning names. But I am interested in protecting the Canadian taxpayer. I am not approaching this matter in a partisan way. I am happy to let the chips fall where they may. If part of this situation can be traced to the previous administration, so be it. We are interested only in seeing that this situation is cleared up.

The onus is directly on the minister. Nothing will satisfy me or the people of Canada short of a public inquiry. Or we might turn the whole messy business over to a parliamentary committee composed of representatives of all parties in the house. I would personally supply to such a committee a list of some 30 or 40 witnesses to be called.

Mr. Coates: At this late hour I do not intend to make any extensive comments. However, I do wish to make some reference to the Department of Industry more particularly in connection with the government's designated area policy.

First I think it is necessary to mention the historic apathy felt by the Liberal party toward policies relating to the Atlantic area. This is the basic problem as I see it. In the 22 years up to 1957 we in the Atlantic area were retarded because the government of the day did not appreciate the fact that special policies, and a special application of national policies had to be considered as far as the maritime provinces were concerned.

Because of this we were not able to move forward. When a Conservative government was elected in 1957 in Ottawa, consideration was given to the special problems of the Atlantic area, and legislation was passed which had an immediate impact, and continues to have an impact on the economy of the area.

The minister has indicated that the government will continue to look at the Atlantic area in just the same way as it looks at the province of Ontario or the province of Saskatchewan, with respect to the area development program and the selection of designated areas. Everybody who has an appreciation of the problems in the Atlantic area has requested the minister to designate the whole area, but he has continuously refused to do this and says the program will apply in the Atlantic provinces in the same way as in other parts of Canada.

One of the best examples why this does not work is to compare a designated area in Ontario, which is surrounded by non-designated areas. Immediately there is an attraction to it from the areas not designated, so that in a short time its designation can be removed, but it will still be able to attract industries from the surrounding areas. This does not happen to be the case in the Atlantic provinces.

In the Atlantic provinces we have three or four growth areas, the rest being designateed. Our problem is that we must first create the right kind of atmosphere in the areas of affluence, if one wishes to call them that, so that benefits will flow from those areas into the other surplus labour areas, and so that surplus labour may be attracted into the affluent areas.

The minister has adopted the attitude that he does not want any change made in his program. He says it is going to apply the same way in B.C. as in Newfoundland, but surely he is coming to realize that things are not the same in the Atlantic provinces? If he is not, then he should go beyond the borders of Quebec and get some appreciation of what our problems are.

Just a few days ago in the provincial legislature, Premier Stanfield condemned the federal government because it was not willing to listen to the proposal that the whole Atlantic area be designated, and the special assistance granted under it be made available no matter where an industry might wish to locate in the Atlantic provinces. If the Minister of Industry does not know now that Premier Stanfield has the best possible appreciation of how to improve the economic climate in Nova Scotia, he never will because, as he should be aware, this was one of the basic arguments in Nova Scotia during the federal election campaign.

• (10:50 p.m.)

The Minister of National Health and Welfare adopted the attitude he adopts in so far as the Atlantic provinces are concerned, adopted the attitude which his government adopts, and surely the result on November 8 is the best indication in the world of where the people of Nova Scotia put their confidence in so far as progress is concerned. There certainly are not many indications that it is with the present government which is in office.

Surely this government is interested in the seats in Nova Scotia, and is interested in improving their position there in the days ahead, because if redistribution comes into effect, under the existing conditions and the existing recommendations, the Liberal party as it stands at the present time is going to be left without one representative from that area, unless they are able to convince somebody in that province that they are realistic in their policies and that their policies are going to have some benefit.

In the Conservative party we even have taken the approach, if the minister cannot do what we ask within the confines of this legislation, that it should be done through the Atlantic Development Board, a board set up specifically to take into consideration situations such as this. But the Minister of Transport, who is answerable to the House of Commons for the Atlantic Development Board, certainly indicated in no uncertain terms to the member for Saint John-Albert that the Atlantic Development Board was not going to become involved in this matter, and that it is a matter which is being left at the door of the Minister of Industry.

I say to the Minister of Industry that his policy as it presently applies to the Atlantic provinces is not good enough; it is not good enough for the Premier of Nova Scotia, it is not good enough for the people of Nova Scotia, and I am sure that applies in any given area in the Atlantic region. I ask him again to re-consider a decision in respect of a policy which may be very satisfactory in some areas of Canada but is most unsatisfactory in the Atlantic area.

When you take a body like the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, which for years has been studying how to improve prospects with regard to the attraction of industry and the elimination of high unemployment, and which presently is very much in existence in our area, you will get some appreciation of the kind of policies which should apply. This body has been urging the minister and this government for some time to designate the whole of the Atlantic provinces, and not leave out Halifax, Dartmouth, Saint John and Frederiction, and make sure that we do nothing to hinder this kind of growth that is needed in this area so that we will be able to attract to the whole of the area, to any part of the area, the industry that we must have if we are to eradicate the high unemployment that is so very evident there at the present time.

I say to the minister, never mind being a bureaucrat, like he once was; never mind being so difficult that when he once has made a decision he will say it never can be changed. Just give the kind of consideration that will be of benefit to our area, through this program. If he will do this, I am sure he will get full marks for it. The first man who would commend the government for its action would be the Premier of Nova Scotia, who I believe stands second to none in his knowledge concerning how new industry best can be attracted to our area, the problems associated with high unemployment and how they can be eliminated.

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Chairman, I too, want to say a word or two about designated areas and the criteria used to set them up, as carried forward by the Department of Industry. I realize that time is quickly passing and I will not go into this whole subject of diversification and decentralization of industry, about which I have spoken on many other occasions. However, I feel this is very important to a young country such as Canada is today.

I think we in this country can profit by the experience of Japan and cities like London and New York, which have found that the building of metropolitan areas has drawbacks which lead to difficulties in society in relation to expensive programs for traffic control, policing, fire protection and so forth.

I am prompted to speak tonight on this question because of the fact that in my own area there was a meeting sponsored by the council of the town of Mount Forest, an area which one might call a slow growth area. Even though we in the province of Ontario may be the envy of the people of the maritimes, as my colleague the hon. member for Cumberland mentioned a moment ago, there are areas in the province of Ontario which have not profited or increased economically or in population as they should have, considering the tremendous expansion we have enjoyed in this province.

I feel that the criteria that have been set up in respect of designated areas are not fair and just. The unemployment figure in Ontario is now about 2½ to 3 per cent, so there are very few areas suffering an unemployment problem. I do maintain, however, that there are areas which have slow growth problems where the municipal officers, councillors, members of the chambers of commerce and wardens have done everything in their power to make their communities attractive, by providing the services to be found in larger and more industrialized centres, in the hope that industries could settle there and carry on their businesses at lower costs, providing employment. I suggest this is an advantage because many of these communities have high schools where vocational training is provided, and if there is employment the students graduating from these vocational schools can find jobs where they can use the skills they have been taught in their own communities.

The meeting held at Mount Forest on February 9 was prompted by a resolution passed by the council of the town. This resolution was circulated throughout the adjoining communities. This is the resolution that was passed and sponsored by this community:

> Whereas the present method of providing assistance to certain municipalities by means of designated areas of slow growth has created advantages to such municipalities in preference to neighbouring municipalities where similar, or in many cases more serious, problems of growth exist.
> And whereas it is felt that if assistance in its present form is considered to be necessary, and if it is to be rendered on an impartial basis.
> Now therefore be it resolved that in designating areas of slow growth it is recommended that total areas as opposed to individual municipalities be so designated and that all municipalities in such area shall be entitled to the same type of assistance, and in particular, that the area extending from Goderich to Orangeville, lying north of provincial highway number 9 and extending to Georgian Bay, be so designated.

This resolution was circulated throughout the area and prompted the meeting which brought together representatives from more than 34 communities in that area. I was rather surprised to find in the minutes of the meeting that representations had been made by two or three of the communities within that area, who had come to Ottawa asking that they might be included in this designation and participate in the special privileges given to communities within those areas. They were not too happy with the reception they were given and were sent home feeling there was just no hope for their ever being able to participate in this type of program.

I suggest to the Minister that once again a committee will be coming from that area to Ottawa asking that when the final reassessment is made of what are to be the criteria for designated areas, this formula perhaps should be changed and some consideration given to slow growth and to the young high school students in order that their names may be added to the number of people seeking work within that community, giving some hope that these areas will come within the special designation that is set up by the Department of Industry.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take a very few moments of the committee's time in regard to this question of designated areas. The minister knows of my interest; he knows the representations I have made; he knows of the group that, with me, saw him in this regard. I would add my voice to that of the people who at that time put up, in my humble opinion, a very good argument for the balance of the municipalities in the Georgian Bay economic region to be included in the designation of that area.

The minister replied to me personally at that time. I shall not go into the discussion that took place; the minister will recall it very well. But I would be remiss in my responsibilities if I did not bring to his attention the fact that I have had verified by the provincial government that the counties of Grey and Bruce are included in what is termed by the provincial government to be the Georgian Bay economic region. I asked the minister on that occasion, and I have asked him since, to include this area in the designation. His reply has been in the negative. I might say I was not particularly happy with the reception the delegation were given at the time they visited Ottawa. The minister himself was not present. We saw the Minister of Trade and Commerce of that day, who gave us a very reasonable reception. However, I feel that the officers of his department were extremely harsh in their view. I did not think they took into serious consideration the criteria that had been set up, particularly in regard to slow growth areas mentioned by the hon. member who preceded me.

This point was stressed by the Prime Minister when the legislation was introduced. I know that such legislation might well be termed discriminatory so far as the national picture is concerned because some will receive benefits and some will not. I am not saying that the people in the Georgian Bay area who are receiving the benefits of this designation are not in some way entitled ot it.

However, there is a tremendous differential between the municipalities who now have the benefit of this designation and those who do not. I ask the minister once again to recall that, from a provincial point of view, the entire counties of Grey and Bruce are considered as part of the Georgian Bay economic region. I request that they be considered as such when considering the extension of these designated areas. As the previous speaker mentioned: There is no question about it; there is no future in these areas for young people. We are exporters of our own youth, of our own product in education and in every field. Without these designations, there is no hope for future development such as the urban areas have. I hope at some time in the future the minister will see fit to give to the balance of Grey and Bruce counties the benefits of this legislation.

Mr. Nasserden: There is just one point I should like to make in connection with these designated areas, and it is with regard to the designation in the province of Saskatchewan. I have discussed the matter with the minister. I feel that the area from Saskatoon, north, between the South and North Saskatchewan rivers, should have been included in the designated area, and east from the South Saskatchewan river from Wakaw up to Melfort. Both the towns of Rosthern and Wakaw are on the outskirts of the designated area. The trade from the area around them is going to be funnelled into the city of Prince Albert and other places. I think the minister can understand what the people of both these towns think about that type of operation. I am not going to dwell any longer on it. I hope the minister will give some consideration to the matter in any plans he may have for the future.

Mr. Enns: I had not really intended to say anything. I can assure the committee I will be only a few minutes, but I should like to make some comment on the designated area program. As the minister already knows, I am personally interested in this and since other provinces have made some protest I felt Manitoba should have at least some slight voice in this discussion. I have met with the commissioner of the Area Development Agency, and I have been impressed with the difficulty of the administration of this program.

I merely want to say to the minister that I will follow up the pressure put forward by the province of Manitoba to have pretty well everything but the city of Winnipeg included in the area designation, and certainly the city of Portage la Prairie. The Chamber of Commerce of that city, the mayor and city council have put forward their views strongly in a previous presentation. I hope to see the minister to follow up this matter and will therefore not take up any further time of this committee.

Mr. Irvine: I should like to ask the minister if he is prepared to answer some of the questions that I posed, particularly the one with regard to the establishment of a parliamentary committee to check into the affairs of the printing bureau.

• (11:10 p.m.)

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the question of designated areas has been a difficult one. I think hon. members know the program was designed to provide, through industrialization, job opportunities in areas in which there is a long standing high rate of unemployment. It is only natural, of course, that because of the very substantial advantages accorded to areas designated, all of those on the periphery should be very conscious of the advantages on one side of the line and the lack of them on the other. The residents of those areas just on the perimeter of designated areas, whether they be in Nova Scotia, Ontario, Manitoba or Saskatchewan, feel that some slight modification of the boundaries could usefully be made which would make them very happy. I would agree with this. However, when one starts on this slippery trail there is perhaps no stopping.

I should like to say to the hon. member for Wellington-Huron and the hon. member for Grey-Bruce that a study in conjunction with the government of Ontario is being undertaken to determine what should be the economic region known as the Georgian Bay development area. As the hon. gentlemen know, there is some difference of administrative definition of boundaries in this region, as between the federal and provincial governments. Perhaps a closer look at the economics of the problem would be helpful. This is about to be undertaken.

Mr. Chairman, I was very distressed indeed to hear the remarks of the hon. member for London with respect to employees of the printing bureau. The hon. member appears to have been the victim of what I can only refer to as the most malicious kind of gossip. He has placed on the order paper 20 questions, 17 of which have been answered so fully that he finds the answers boring. An endeavour has been made to answer as fully as possible for a specific reason. The three outstanding questions are about one week old, and are now in the process of being answered.

The reason why answers have been fully given, or given in full, is that the printing bureau is quite naturally disturbed, as is the Department of Defence Production, at the insinuations carried in the questions themselves. I have personally indicated to the hon. member that I am prepared to provide any information that he wants from me. I share the interests of all members of the house in ensuring that the taxpayers of this country receive the full value for their dollars that they are entitled to. Personally I have absolute confidence in the head of the Canadian Government Printing Bureau. It is, I suggest, irresponsible, unfair, and unworthy of the conduct of a responsible member of this house to stand up and, in relation to a group of honest, hard-working civil servants, accuse them without any substantiation at all of bilking the public, of theft of government supplies, and of illicit operations in the Government Printing Bureau when, on the strength of the questions he has asked and had answered, there is no foundation whatsoever for any such charges.

I suggest the hon. member is being unworthy not only to himself but to this house in engaging in this kind of conduct. In one unanswered question he made references to a photographer in the Canadian Government Printing Bureau. That man was unnamed. It is a sly habit to refer to people who are easily identifiable, and in a holier than thou attitude not mention any names. The name of the man is contained in a question now on the order paper! Mr. Whelan. He was described by the hon. member as being a photographer in the Canadian Government Printing Bureau, a man who also operated his own photographic plant outside the printing bureau. The implication of this, the bland assumption by the hon. member, is that all government servants are dishonest—that in this case, because he has these two jobs he must be mulcting the public. Let the hon. member stand up and stake his seat on laying a charge.

[Mr. Drury.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: Are you laying a charge against a member of this house or are you talking about laying a charge against a civil servant.

Mr. Drury: A civil servant.

Mr. Starr: How do you, then, stake your seat?

Mr. Drury: I will answer by staking my seat. I am not afraid to do so. Let the hon. member make a specific charge and back his charges up with what he has here, if he is going to be a responsible member. I am sorry to say it has been a disappointment to me to be a member of a house where this kind of irresponsible behaviour—I should like to use stronger adjectives—is practiced.

Mr. Whelan is not employed as a photographer in the Canadian Government Printing Bureau. He is a clerk in the office there. He does have camera equipment of his own which he uses and from which I understand he makes money. A great many people in this country of ours do such things but if the hon. member is suggesting that no man in the employ of the government should have any kind of work for gain outside of his employ, then I suggest this will mean a new regime, a new dispensation for the civil service.

A fuller answer will be provided to this question which, as I say, is not yet seven days old, giving all the details. I am giving this example now, to indicate that a man whose name is now on the order paper was wrongly described. I regret to say the hon. member is either getting his misinformation from malicious sources or he is not taking the trouble to check it. This, I suggest, is unworthy of any member of this house. It is unworthy that he should take a chance of demeaning another man's name while relying on his parliamentary immunity in doing so. This is something about which I feel very strongly indeed.

As to the suggestion that on the strength of a series of imputations absolutely unsupported, indeed denied by the information he already has that this, as he calls it, stinking mess—and his charges are a stinking mess; that is a proper description—should be referred to a parliamentary committee and that the time of such a committee should be taken up by this kind of malicious gossip, I find that altogether unacceptable.

Mr. Irvine: I am indeed sorry to see the minister take such a view. I like to think of him as a minister of the Crown, a minister to be respected. I like to think of him addressing other members of the house in the manner in which one would expect a minister of the Crown to address them. We have listened to a verbal tirade but I do not think it was in keeping with what we expect to hear from a minister. He mentioned these questions. I have them here in front of me.

• (11:20 p.m.)

He says there are three questions. It is a matter of how you look at it. The questions are numbered 789, 790 and 791, but there is a complete total of 19 subquestions. I believe I made a mistake and said there were some 20 questions. I am sorry; I was one out. I did not count them that closely, but they are important, and if the minister is interested in the well-being of the people of Canada he should be interested in following up anything of this nature which has a solid foundation.

I purposely did not mention the names of individuals. I do not want to hurt any individual man. That is not my purpose but I am still convinced something should be done, and I am convinced the minister should appoint a parliamentary committee to look into the matter. I do not think there is any point in his being stubborn about it.

I would not bring this up if I did not think I was right. I have spent some two months checking a few things and, according to the information that I have, I stand on very solid ground. I do not want to have any feeling of animosity between the minister and myself but I do feel that the language he used was not right. It was not in keeping with a minister of the Crown. I think some of those things he said he would like to retract but, on the other hand, I am still sure we should have a parliamentary committee investigate the public printing bureau.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief in the remarks I have to make. They are generated only because of the minister's totally unwarranted reply to some legitimate questions that he had been asked by an hon. member.

Those opposite seem to be unduly sensitive about the endeavours of individual members of the opposition performing what is their responsibility in this chamber in exposing to public scrutiny, particularly in their function of examining the estimates, all facets of government spending, and all facets of the operations of government departments, bureaux, crown corporations and the like.

The minister has described the conduct of the hon. member who raised these questions as unfair, unworthy and irresponsible.

Mr. Starr: Dishonest.

Mr. Nielsen: And, indeed, he used the term dishonest. It is a member's responsibility in cpposition to endeavour to lay bare those areas of government spending which the opposition feels are deserving of public scrutiny; and a government, if it did not have its eyes closed by blind arrogance, a government that has in it a generous proportion of members who once sat in opposition—but apparently not long enough—would see that that is the responsibile function of the opposition.

The questions raised by the hon. member for London are legitimate. They are deserving of careful and responsible replies, which have not been forthcoming from the minister this evening. Instead of dealing in the invective which he has used with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for London, the minister could have answered the questions. He could have told members of the committee what were the results of the R.C.M.P. investigation. He could have explained the circumstances under which a member of the printing bureau was given a contract to print voters lists.

Mr. McIlraith: That is awarded by the electoral officer.

Mr. Nielsen: He has not done this. Instead he has challenged the hon. member for London to stake his seat in connection with it. The Minister of Public Works says this is wrong.

Mr. McIlraith: No, I did not say that. I pointed out to my colleague that the contracts for the printing of voters lists are not awarded by the government. They are awarded by the returning officers for the electoral districts. The returning office in such case has the exclusive responsibility for it and can not be interfered with.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, but let us face facts and not split hairs. The Minister of Public Works is a practising politician and he, as well as the rest of us, knows precisely how these voters lists get into the hands of printers for printing.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, but the electoral officer in the constituency of Carleton, who is notoriously well identified politically, is the one who gave this contract, and I am surprised any member of the official opposition would raise anything about the placing of this contract.

Mr. Nielsen: This is not the point. The Minister of Public Works, as usual, is appearing to drag red herrings across the trail. The point is this; if these circumstances are so, and if a government employee working on government time has been awarded a government contract paid for out of the taxpayer's money, surely these are circumstances which require a searching inquiry, as well as the other circumstances that have been raised. It would appear that the questions placed on the order paper by the hon. member for London are particularly with regard to the activities which apparently are transpiring in the printing bureau, or the activities regarding the disposal of alleged stolen goods which have been investigated by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. My recollection when I looked at those questions and answers very carefully, is that if it was serious enough to warrant investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, surely it is a reasonable request the member is making to have the matter referred to a parliamentary committee.

Perhaps it is possible to have the activities of the public printing bureau referred to the committee of the house which has been set up for the purpose of examining the minister's estimates. If that is so, instead of engaging in the kind of invective which the minister did, he could have told us that the activities of the bureau would be open to the fullest possible scrutiny and that any persons whom the members wished to have called would be called before the committee when his estimates are referred to this committee. That is what he might have told us at that time, and had he done so I am sure we would have been satisfied.

Were it not for the kind of inquiry the minister has asked for, we never would have discovered the horses on the payroll, but I will not mention that because I do not wish to engage in the same kind of politics that the minister has engaged in. However, certainly the request of the member is reasonable. The minister has referred to something the member did not say, a not uncommon practice in the heat of exchanges in this house. He referred to the member for London having called the situation in the printing bureau a stinking mess. I did not hear him say that. I am sure he did not, and I am sure the record will disclose that he did not say that.

I would ask the minister to give the committee an assurance that the printing bureau will be open to the fullest possible scrutiny when the estimates of his department come before the committee later, and that the printing bureau will be a part of the estimates to be examined by that committee.
