Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, in the course of this debate hon. gentlemen have said many things to which one would naturally wish to reply, but it would be impossible for everyone to deal fully with the matters upon which he might desire to make comment. I am sure it will be generally conceded that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), in his presentation to the house some days ago of the economic condition of the country, discharged his duty in a highly creditable manner. It could not have been an altogether pleasant task to present to the house and to the people the condition in which Canada finds herself at the moment, nor do I imagine that the minister took any keen delight in announcing the new measures of taxation which he deemed necessary. However we may differ as regards the policies that have been pursued by the government, although we hold that the difficulties in which they are involved are largely of their own making, still we would be less than human if we did not manifest some sympathy for those who are now floundering in a morass. We can therefore very well afford, without relieving the government of any of its responsibilities, to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the manner—and I say only the manner—in which he discharged the very onerous duty that his position imposed upon him.

The discussion of the general financial condition of the country has already been dealt with from this side of the house by one more capable than I, and let me extend to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) my hearty congratulations for the manner in which he performed the duty that was laid upon him by his party. The special resolutions of the budget I think we can perhaps best deal with when the Speaker has left the chair and the house finds itself in committee of the whole. So far as the budget speech itself is concerned I shall content myself with referring to a few salient features which I think call for some comment, and perhaps it will be indicated in the course of my remarks that I heartily approve of the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. Before dealing with that phase of the subject I wish to take a few moments to discuss a matter which was referred to yesterday by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens).

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce undertook at one point to give us a lecture in the kindergarten of economics. He showed that the revenue of the country, collected as it is under our system by a series of indirect taxes, must necessarily reflect the condition of trade in the country. If he had left it at that he would have been wise, but after emphasizing that very elementary fact he went on and intimated that the members on this side of the house had frequently asserted that the true test of the burden laid upon the country was not the rate of taxation but the actual amount that was raised. He had listened to many speeches in the house, he said, in which that position was asserted.

Here are his own words:

> Mr. Stevens: If it were possible to do so briefly, and if I felt warranted in doing so, I might remind my hon. friends of how frequently in the past they measured the burden of taxation upon the people of Canada by the amount of revenue raised through taxation.
> Mr. Brown: Oh, no.
> Mr. Stevens: Oh, yes. When it suits their argument hon. gentlemen opposite frequently state that the rate of taxation is measured by the revenue produced or collected from the people. In my long experience in this house I recall having heard that argument frequently.
> Mr. Brown: That came from hon. gentlemen opposite.

With the Minister of Trade and Commerce I can say that in my long experience in this house I recall having heard that argument frequently, but invariably it was from those who now sit on the government side of the house and never from those on this side. Having made that statement, the obligation rests upon me to prove that what I say is true. I go to the Hansard of 1927, where at page 396 of Hansard I read these words of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who was then simply the member for West Calgary:

> But that is not all. Let us take the figures and consider them in the light of the statements made by the minister himself. In 1925-26 the Department of Finance shows that there was taken in customs duties as taxes from the people of this country the sum of $127,355,000 in round figures; this year the amount is $141,500,000—an increase of $14,144,000, or $1.50 for every man, woman and child in this country, which represents, Mr. Speaker, an average of $7.50 for every Canadian family. That is the reduction in taxation enunciated by the hon. Minister of Finance!
> But that is not all. With respect to excise duties as distinguished from excise taxes, we find that for the year ended March 31 last there was taken from the Canadian people for these duties $42,923,549.03, and this year there has been taken from them $47,500,000—an increase of $4,576,450.97, equivalent to practically 48 cents a head for every man, woman and child in Canada.

It was in vain the Finance minister of that day pointed to the large revenue which was flowing into the coffers of the dominion. The revenues were buoyant, he said, because trade was flourishing. In that same budget debate I felt it incumbent upon me to correct that fallacy of the hon. member for West Calgary. I said:

> I have been amazed at some of the fallacies—

I am not so easily amazed as I was then:

> —to which utterance has been given during the debate by some hon. members opposite, from the first hon. member who spoke, the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) almost down to the last. It was urged upon us that taxation had not been reduced, and elaborate figures were produced to show that such was the case.

I need not read all that I said on that occasion. I simply pointed out the very obvious truth which the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself pointed out yesterday.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) is the one who generally suffers from these references to the Hansard of old days. In his criticism of the budget of 1929 he said this:

> Now this is where the precise language in his budget speech fitted in so well. How careful he was when speaking on taxation to use these words:
> "The rate of taxation has been reduced."
> Well, even that statement was not true before Friday last, but who cares about the rate of taxation? The rate does not count. The only thing that counts in this world in regard to taxes is the burden of taxation.

Then he went on to quote Mr. Gladstone—not very pertinently I think, because Mr. Gladstone was speaking of an entirely different set of circumstances, and I think the hon. Minister of Justice misquoted from Mr. Gladstone.

May I also quote from my speech of last session when I said:

> Something else upon which I would congratulate the Minister of Finance is that he has evidently come to a recognition of the fact that the volume of revenue does not necessarily depend upon the rate of taxation, or at least that the rate of taxation is not the only factor in determining the volume of revenue.

Further on I said:

> As I have said, the Minister of Finance has evidently learned, speaking generally, that all he is able to do is to fix the rates of taxation, for the volume of taxation will be determined by the amount of business that is done when those different rates are in effect.

I trust now that we have heard the last of these very foolish arguments that we listened to in the last parliament, and I hope that when we have a government in power again with the revenues of the country buoyant, brought about by expanding trade, we shall not hear those foolish arguments from hon. gentlemen opposite.

In reference to the reduction in customs duties, the Finance minister in his budget speech the other day said that the customs duties had been reduced in the last fiscal year to $102,891,000, or about $29,000,000 less than in 1931, and $84,000,000 less than in the peak year of the last five years, in 1928-29. He said this was due in part to the encouragement given to the production of goods in Canada. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance holds the extreme views, I might almost say the fanatical views, of the Prime Minister in regard to protection. On two occasions I have asked the Prime Minister how certain changes he proposed to make in the tariff were going to affect revenue. His answer was something like this—quoting Henry George as authority: When it was a matter of protecting Canadian industries the question of revenue was not to be considered. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether in view of the reduction in customs receipts, brought about, as he himself has admitted, by the policy of protection, that is the policy of encouraging the production of goods in Canada, he is still prepared to ignore the question of revenue when he proposes increases in the tariffs. That he is not disposed to ignore the question is abundantly clear from the fact that he has added two per cent to import duties. Now, do not let us be confused as to what that tax really means. We call it an excise tax, but it is just as truly a custom tariff tax as the other twenty or thirty per cent. I should like him to explain how he expects to get more revenue from the two per cent additional tax when the hitherto existing tariff taxes have already resulted in a reduction of revenue. That is his own statement. It may be urged that that tax is not high enough to exclude goods that are now coming in under the free list. That may be true. But if it is true, as is the implication of his remarks, that goods are not coming into Canada because the tariff barriers have been raised against them, is it not just as likely that other goods will be added to that class which is now being excluded? So that as to there being any increase in revenue from this new tax that is being imposed, it is a question whether the Minister of Finance will get more than an even break. He may possibly get some increase on those goods that have been coming in on the free list or the one per cent duty of last year, but it is also possible that further goods will be excluded, and to that extent our revenue will be reduced. Certainly that will be the case if he allows his colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) to sit up night and day devising means whereby he can stop goods from entering Canada. I may remark that on a former occasion I mentioned the dilatory tactics of the government when it was a case of allowing some hay into southern Manitoba that the farmers there needed to feed their starving cattle; there was a delay of six months before any action was taken; but when it is a case of increasing the tariff to protect an industry that is manufacturing some trifling article, the government can take action overnight.

The Minister of Finance derives great satisfaction from the fact of a so-called balance of trade. That has been well dealt with by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, but I might repeat a few of the figures. It is said that the balance is now in our favour to the extent of $25,000,000, as opposed to a former unfavourable balance of $70,000,000. I suppose there is no more contentious subject than the true significance of the difference between imports and exports, the excess of one over the other. I do not think the Minister of Trade and Commerce did any credit to himself when he criticized the method by which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth emphasized the point. He ridiculed it by saying: "You should not say, 'Black is not white,' but you should say, 'White is not black,'" or something of that kind. But the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was trying to call attention to the fact that this so-called balance of trade was brought about not by increasing exports, but by decreasing imports. Of course, I know from the standpoint of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that that is good policy, because in one of his famous advertisements that he sent out to the papers he wanted to exclude $800,000,000 worth of imports of goods that he said could be manufactured in Canada. However, we cannot agree with that point of view. Certainly it may be doubted whether we have any reason to congratulate ourselves regarding this so-called favourable balance of trade when it is brought about by decreasing our total foreign trade by almost one third. These are the figures given by the Minister of Finance himself: For the eleven months ending February 28, 1931, $1,591,939,000; as against $1,067,602,000 for the same period ending February 29, 1932, or a total loss in our foreign trade during that period of $524,337,000.

The Minister of Finance stated there would be no major tariff changes pending the meeting of the imperial conference. I cannot say that we were surprised by the statement, for the farmers of the country have learned that so far as reducing the burden laid upon them by the tariff that this government has imposed is concerned, they have nothing to hope for. We have to content ourselves with the announcement that the last straw which was to break the camel's back, that is the imposition of a higher tariff on repairs for agricultural implements, has been deferred for another year. Let me say to those who represent farming constituencies in the west that they had better get busy during the next year and make representations to the Minister of Finance so that the application of that higher tariff will be postponed indefinitely. I suppose, however, it is a small measure of relief for which we must be thankful, but the Minister of Finance must not expect us to tumble over ourselves in our enthusiasm for his budget.

Last year the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) when introducing his budget announced a five cent bonus on wheat. He said it was a compensating adjustment. He would not admit the tariff was a burden, but the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) has admitted it for him, for in his speech in the early part of this session he said something to this effect; that he had scanned the whole field for possible means of relief for the farmer from the burdens of the tariff, and this was the one that appealed to him. I wonder how the Minister of Agriculture feels now when that small measure of relief is absolutely withdrawn. Does he and do other members from the west representing farming communities feel satisfied with the tariff policy of the present government? I know they do not.

A few weeks ago the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) placed on the records of the house a well-reasoned and well-prepared statement of the investment of a farmer on a three hundred and twenty acre farm, including the equipment necessary to work it. I commend that statement to all members of the house. In the list he had one item of $2,500 for farm implements—a modest item for there is no notice taken there of threshing machines or of tractors. But yet the hon. member in the session of 1930, and again in the session of 1931, by his vote endorsed the government that had raised the tariff on farm implements from rates ranging from six to fifteen per cent up to a flat level of twenty-five per cent. Now it is twenty-eight per cent, for I insist again, Mr. Speaker, that that three per cent on all imports must be considered as an additional tariff tax. The biggest internal problem before us to-day is the rehabilitation of the farmer. One of the most prominent farm leaders a few days ago made a statement something like this. He said his father had pioneered on a bush farm in Ontario; he himself had operated the farm for a number of years after that, and now his son was on it, and he stated that the young man is having a harder time to make things go to-day than was the case with either his father or his grandfather.

The question confronting us is this: Are our farmers to be men living on and farming their own land, finding satisfaction in the work of the farm and yet capable of taking an interest in national and international affairs, of enjoying good literature and everything that ministers to the moral, the intellectual and the spiritual life of man, or are our farmers to sink to the status of peasants, operating rented farms, caring for nothing except the wresting of a bare living from the soil, becoming simply hewers of wood and drawers of water, men with weak heads and strong backs? It seems to me those are the alternatives presented to our farmers to-day, and I am afraid that present conditions will produce a tendency that is all in the latter direction. We hear a great deal said about having turned the corner. There can be no turning of the corner until the farmer gets a crop he can sell at a price that will leave him some measure of profit, and what is true of wheat, our main product in the west, is true of all agricultural products to-day. Every article produced on the farm is being produced at a loss, and there can be no turning of the corner until this is all changed.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it may be just at this point that the farmer is faced with his greatest danger. To-day there are many men still on farms simply because the mortgage companies or other creditors do not think it in their interest to put them off. There is no sale for land and it has no productive value. The danger is that with the first sign of returning prosperity the creditors will swoop down upon the farmer and strip him naked. The accumulated obligations of the last three years have become enormous. Even before that time the farmers incurred liabilities which, had prices prevailing at that time remained in effect, they might reasonably have expected to meet at maturity. The result of the drop in prices, as has been stated time and again in this house, has been simply to increase the burdens of the farmers threefold.

So to-day we have our western legislatures discussing the question of debt adjustment. I suppose under our constitution that is a question for the provincial legislatures rather than for this government, but that does not mean there is nothing this government can do. This government can do much to lift the burdens that have been placed upon the farmer, and everything possible should be done to make sure that his cost of production is reduced. I am not unmindful of the fact that Canada is one of the nations of the world, that to-day as never before the world has to be considered as a whole, and that if one nation suffers all nations suffer. It would have been well if hon. gentlemen opposite, during the election campaign of 1930, had kept in mind that fact which they now like to emphasize, instead of going through the country proclaiming that they of themselves were going to take steps which would bring prosperity to Canada. That is the obligation which rests upon this government and this parliament, to see that every possible step is taken to bring about the rehabilitation of the farmer.

I feel that I cannot close without commenting on the reference by the Minister of Finance to the coming imperial conference. His words will be found at page 1768 of Hansard:

> While the world is close knit to-day in matters of trade and finance as never before in its history—and we cannot expect normal or prosperous conditions apart from the general world trend—nevertheless some one nation, or group of nations, must assume the leadership and point the way. To that end an opportunity unique in history is afforded to the British nations, whose representatives will assemble in Ottawa at the Imperial economic conference in July next.
> If the delegates who assemble here meet in an atmosphere charged with determination to approach their deliberations from the viewpoint of mutual advantage, there will result measures which will give a marked stimulus to Empire trade.

Those are splendid sentiments, but my fear is that if hon. members opposite adhere to the policies they have followed hitherto those sentiments will evaporate into thin air. I said that I was in perfect accord with what the Minister of Finance said, but perhaps that is hardly correct. He referred to the opportunity as being unique. If by "unique" he meant that there never had been a similar opportunity, I disagree. A similar opportunity was afforded the Prime Minister and the government at the last imperial conference in 1930, but the result was absolute failure simply because of the truculant attitude of the right hon. gentleman. By the application of his blasting policy he led one of England's ministers to describe his propositions as humbug, and humbug they were. It is a tribute to the forbearance and the courtesy of the English people that someone did not say it sooner. That is a thought-provoking statement of the Minister of Finance:

> . . . nevertheless some one nation, or group of nations, must assume the leadership and point the way.

Some trivial circumstance has often changed the whole current of human history; it has been frequently given to nations to exercise an influence upon the affairs of mankind far out of proportion to the extent of their territory or the size of their population. Such was the case with Israel of old; such was the case with Greece. From the little island of Iona off the coast of Scotland, in the early centuries of the Christian era, radiated an influence that left its mark upon Great Britain and Ireland, and which still extends to the remotest corners of the earth. Canada has a vast stretch of territory. It is true that our population is comparatively small, but we would gladly believe that to-day we are exercising an influence upon the affairs of the world that is not measured by the number of our people. We could wish for no higher honour than that our country should give a lead to the British Empire and, through the British Empire, to the world in all those policies which make for peace, such as disarmament; the breaking down, so far as may be possible, of race and national prejudices; the removal of trade restrictions, the cessation of that insane policy that seeks higher and higher tariffs. Can anyone say that this was the course we pursued at the last imperial conference? Positively no, but the reverse. What was done there was not calculated to make for peace and harmony but for strife and discord.

An attempt has been made to cast ridicule upon the present leader of the opposition when as Prime Minister he expressed concern as to who should represent us at the imperial conference. The result of that conference showed that that concern was well founded. It is still a matter of concern to us, not as to who shall represent us, for we know that, but as to what policy shall be presented at that conference. Is the same course to be followed or is a different attitude to be taken? There is reason to hope, from the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that to some extent at least the government have seen the error of their ways. Let us hope that when the conference meets it will be in a spirit of good will.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth quoted the closing words of the budget speech of the Hon. Mr. Dunning. I quoted those words on every platform during the last Dominion election. They seemed to me to express, as well as language could express, the attitude which Canada ought to assume at the conference, and I believe that hon. members opposite upon whom the responsibility is cast should study these words and grasp the principles that were emphasized; and when they go to meet our fellow citizens from all parts of the empire I hope that they will go in a spirit of tolerance and good will, so that the result of this conference will bring good not only to Canada and to the British Empire but to the peoples of the world.

Then let us pray that come it may,
(As come it will for a' that.)

That Man to Man, the world o'er,
Shall brothers be for a' that.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. B. M. STITT (Nelson): May I begin by congratulating the Minister of Finance on the lucid manner in which he presented his budget to the house, faced with conditions such as have never existed in Canada before. May I also congratulate those hon. members who have preceded me upon the masterful manner in which they have advanced their arguments. I hope the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), who preceded me, will pardon me if I do not appear to follow him. I have come to the conclusion that the members of this house and indeed the people of Canada as a whole are tired of rehashed speeches, and I will attempt to develop my own material along far different lines, dealing particularly with my own constituency, and with matters which, while of importance to that constituency, are at the same time of great importance to the whole of the dominion and particularly of western Canada.

It is apparent, from the criticism that has been so far levelled at the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) and at his budget, that budgets can be criticized for what they omit as well as for what they contain. I have no objection to hon. members criticizing; we expect that it is their prerogative. But I will say this, let them criticize this government and the budget as they will, but one fact stands out, that the balancing of our trade and the bringing of the imperial conference to Canada this year are two of the outstanding achievements of the last quarter of a century. It is obvious, from the arguments to which we have listened, that in the minds of the masses there are two schools of thought. One is that the government in power should embark upon a broad program of public works, pledging the credit of the country to get the money and putting the unemployed to work. Those who take this view believe that such action would reflect prosperity in all departments of endeavour. There is the other school of thought—those who feel that the government should retrench as far as possible, pare its estimates, and sit out the depression. One seems to have about as many supporters as the other, judging by the arguments we hear from one end of the country to the other.

I was rather disappointed to hear the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) criticize the government for relief expenditures and for the loan of moneys to the western provinces. I am sure that all hon. members in this house, and especially the members from the west, realize the seriousness of the situation out there, the plight which these people find themselves in in these distressed areas. I am also quite sure that, when requested by the Minister of Labour last fall to make suggestions as to the public works that might be carried on in their constituencies which would furnish employment to those who needed it, there were very few hon. members who did not present a program of public works, including the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. If all of these projects had been carried out, as suggested by various members, I am informed that it would have taken something like a billion dollars to pay the bill. The government, of course, could not find that much money, and therefore had to go along and try to satisfy everyone as far as it was humanly possible to do so, to the extent of the money they had. I think that in that respect they have done very well indeed. As a matter of fact, if we believe some of the reports that have come in, this feeling is generally shared. The premier of Quebec, a man from whom we can accept criticism, said that he was well satisfied with the treatment his province had received and with the manner in which the relief situation had been handled by this government. That, I think, was one of the greatest compliments paid to the right hon. the Prime Minister in the conduct of this work. Retrenchment is the duty of the day and the hour; no one will deny that. It is a beautiful word. But governments must lead as well as save; they must march as well as fortify; and at the same time they must of necessity originate plans for the future while correcting errors of the past. Now, the question might reasonably be asked: What plans can we originate at the moment? First, to my mind, we must devise ways and means of stabilizing our basic industries. Agriculture, which leads the procession, must be placed on a paying basis. I do not think anyone can argue against that statement. To bring this about we must concern ourselves with finding broader and more profitable markets for the produce of our farms. At the same time we must concern ourselves with lower transportation costs to be brought about by the development of new and existing routes and outlets. In this connection I might refer to the Hudson Bay railway, which means a great deal to the farmers of western Canada, and to the Peace River outlet, which is badly needed and which would open up and develop a great empire. The mining industry, especially in connection with base metals, must be put upon its feet, as it has been hit just as hard as agriculture. Millions of dollars have been invested in Canada in this industry, upon which not one cent is being received in return. Some attention must be paid to the lumbering industry, with which is linked up the pulp and paper industries. All these industries are having a hard time and, as I said before, we must concern ourselves with finding more and profitable markets for their products. If we can solve the problems confronting these three major industries, the rest will follow; the railways will come into their own by virtue of an increased volume of business and the unemployed will be automatically absorbed.

The coming imperial conference may easily bring about the necessary changes. Let us hope that all the delegates to this conference will gather together realizing deep down in their hearts that the destiny of a great empire is in their hands. We are proud to be a part of that great empire and I am convinced that if all those taking part in the conference are prepared to give and take, which after all is of the essence of our federation, much good will come from their deliberations. It may be well for our delegates to realize that it may be necessary, in order to bring order out of chaos, to sacrifice, in part at least, some of our industries. They should enter the conference with that spirit. We all hope that these steps may not be necessary, but we cannot expect to get everything and give nothing in return. May I express the hope that the Most High in His infinite wisdom will so guide the deliberations of the conference that our dream of a united economic empire may be fully realized. Then and only then will sunshine come into the hearts of our people and confidence be restored in this great country.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Finance intimate that some further provision would be made for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. I do not need to elaborate on this project, as it has been before this house for many years; both governments have been committed to it and both governments have subscribed to it. While I am dealing with this matter I desire to take exception to the statement made this afternoon by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) when he said that the Liberal government had done practically all the work done on this road. As one who has lived in this north country for something like seventeen or eighteen years, as one who has seen the project develop from almost the time the first sod was turned by the Hon. George P. Graham, I desire to say that in 1911, when the Conservative government came into power, a contract was given to J. D. McArthur for the grading of this road. That winter the piers were put in for the bridge at the Pas and the following summer about 14 or 15 miles of grading was completed. From that time until 1918 or 1919 the Conservative government completed 356 miles of the road, as far as the Limestone river, including the necessary bridges. From that time, until the Liberal government came into power, the grading was completed into Port Nelson and finally the Hon. Mr. Dunning with great vision and courage changed the terminal from Port Nelson to Churchill. I am fair enough to give Mr. Dunning credit for taking that action; I think his move in that direction deserves the commendation of every hon. member and in fact of every man, woman and child in western Canada. The Liberal government completed the road up to mile 511 and started the harbour work. That government did a good deal of the underwater work at the docks, it let the contract for the elevator, did considerable back-filling in the yards and had made a good start towards the completion of the road when the government again changed. The present government completed the elevator, finished the yards and the docks and last fall was able to ship out two cargoes of grain. I should like to correct that statement made by the hon. member for Melville by saying that this road has been built by both governments on a fifty-fifty basis.

I had not intended to refer at this time to the Hudson Bay railway, but in view of certain articles which have appeared in the eastern press attacking this project I feel it my duty to take a few minutes of the time of the house in making a reply. I refer particularly to an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of February 15, 1932, under the heading "Speaking of Economy". It reads:

Six million dollars voted last year. Six million good dollars thrown after 46 million bad dollars. Some of our portentous politicians who are talking about economy would be a little more impressive if they hadn't talked just as eloquently for this Hudson Bay railway.

And again:

And to what end? Well, last fall Mr. Manion, Minister of Railways, informed western farmers that if they wished to have their grain shipped to the Churchill elevator they would be given free storage, and not a bushel was shipped. Not a pound. And this was the great grain route that was to put western Canada on the map.

The Minister of Railways did make such a proposition, but it was made to the grain men, the elevator men and the pool men, not to the farmers of western Canada. It would not have been possible for any farmer to make his individual shipment to that elevator because the facilities were not there to handle such shipments.

An article appeared in the Financial Post of February 13, under the heading "Hudson Bay Line Takes Interest Toll." After going into the financial aspects of this road, the question is asked: When is this road going to pay interest on this money invested? The same question could be asked in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway, the Montreal harbour, the Quebec harbour, the maritimes harbours, the Welland canal, upon which hundreds of millions have been spent, and the Canadian National Railways. It is rather unfair for such a paper as the Financial Post to pick out the Hudson Bay railway and to ask when it is going to pay interest, when in fact the road is not fully completed and in operation. I do think articles such as that will do very much to solidify Canada. This is another article appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of October 6, quoting a Quebec paper, L'Evenement:

To inaugurate a port at Churchill, the Canadian government has spent practically $150,000,000.

I do not need to take the time to read the rest of this article, but I should like to say that L'Evenement has multiplied by three the sum of money expended on this project, and it might at least be fair when using figures and discussing the project. I have under my hand another article, which is rather a rich one, in respect to the two grain boats that made the voyage in there last year:

Tyne vessel's pioneer voyage. First cargo to an ice-bound port. Saving of 6,000 miles.

Another gross exaggeration.

Another romantic page in the history of Tyne commerce will be written a fortnight hence, when a Newcastle steamer will drop anchor in the harbour of Port Churchill, the new port on the shores of Hudson bay, and embark the first cargo of grain sent overland across the Rockies from Vancouver.

Rather hard on Vancouver.

She is the Farnworth, owned by the Dalgleish Steam Shipping Company, of Newcastle. To the Farnworth will go the honour of loping 6,000 sea miles off the present-day route, and changing the whole trend of grain transhipment. Almost a month will be saved.

A strange and hazardous voyage lies ahead of the thirty-five Shields men who form the crew of the Farnworth.

Port Churchill is one of the loneliest outposts of civilization. There is no welcoming town, not even a village. Just a trapper or two, a few Eskimos, and eternal snow. For ten months out of twelve the approach to this little port is ice-bound.

The Farnworth will berth alongside a warehouse in which is stored the grain brought from the rail-head.

As soon as loading is completed she will steam back to England. The barren nature of this little town is illustrated by the fact that provisions and bunkers for the return journey are being taken on board while the vessel is lying at Harton Staiths, South Shields.

The nearest shops or cinema to Port Churchill are hundreds of miles away, and there is not a coaling station within a thousand miles.

Captain W. Mouat, of South Shields, is in command of the Farnworth.

The vessel is going in ballast to Port Churchill, and will bring back 7,000 tons of grain to the United Kingdom.

An immense field of stationary ice imprisons Port Churchill all the year round, with the exception of September and October. This autumn the Canadian government, in conjunction with the railway company, are trying the experiment of loading grain from Vancouver at Port Churchill, as an alternative to the sea route by way of the Panama canal.

I might tell hon. members that this is not from a Montreal paper, although the captain of that boat informed me he had heard around Montreal very much worse tales about Churchill than this paper reveals. This is from the Evening World of South Shields, Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, of August 26, 1931. These are some of the weird statements that are being made about this port that means so much to western Canada. In the west we had hoped we had heard the last of these venomous attacks on the part of the press which have no doubt been inspired by the same sources that have sought to destroy the project from its inception. I was of opinion that the demonstration of last September would be sufficient when the Farnworth and the Warkworth, two ordinary tramp steamers, not built with steel protected bows, as it was said they would have to be constructed in order to enter the strait or bay, made the trip from Churchill and Liverpool and Antwerp in fourteen days. In order that the value of this feat may be appreciated, I shall add four days for railroad transportation from Saskatoon or Regina; and thus it is evident that wheat or other products of the soil, or live stock, can be landed in British or other European ports within twenty days of the loading of cars at points in the Canadian west, and with only one handling. The better to illustrate the value of this feat, I might refer to two cars shipped from, say Saskatoon, one by the Churchill route and the other by the St. Lawrence route. The cars for the northern route can be unloaded into a ship at Churchill, which is at tidewater, as soon as and perhaps sooner than the contents of the second car can be unloaded into a ship at Fort William or Port Arthur. The two shipments thus start at Churchill and Fort William or Port Arthur at the same time. Which one reaches the European market first? The answer was always evident to those whose eyes were not blinded by prejudice, but it comes now in a form that cannot be challenged, because a boat can make any port in the British Isles as quickly from Churchill as from Montreal, and there are no marine handicaps; the route is safer and speedier than the St. Lawrence. It is true there are at present some artificial handicaps by way of arbitrary marine insurance rates imposed for the protection of vested interests threatened by the newer and cheaper route. If the underwriters have their way, they are going to plug this northern route effectively. While a hundred years ago all Canadian ports on the Atlantic suffered because of similar discrimination against them in favour of United States ports, it would appear now, judging from the extremely high rates set on shipments out of Churchill, that the same unenlightened policy is being applied in greater degree to this new port. The new route is now ready and equipped to do a magnificent service for Canada, and we must see that it is not hampered by restrictions imposed by interests outside of Canada which are not only indifferent but quite possibly hostile to its future development.

First, the underwriters set rates so high as to prohibit ships from sailing into Churchill and then they blandly say: Once the safety of the route is proven we shall consider an adjustment. I do not wish to take up the time of the house, or for the next hour I could quote statements from sea captains and men who have sailed the seven seas, who know something about this route and whose statements cannot be challenged regarding its safety and usefulness. I might, however, in passing, refer briefly to a statement made by the captain of the Farnworth, the first boat to reach London dock from Churchill with the first cargo of wheat out of that new harbour. This is from the Manitoba Press Press of October 6 of last year:

Captain Mouat had an air of quiet satisfaction about him when he was encountered on the bridge of the steamer Farnworth to-day. The Farnworth arrived in London docks Sunday at the conclusion of a history-making voyage of 16 days from Churchill, Canada's newest seaport on the shore of Hudson bay, bringing a cargo of 277,000 bushels of grain over the new Hudson Bay northern route, which cuts one thousand miles off the journey from the prairies to Britain.

In the captain's view it was a most matter of fact achievement to navigate from Churchill through the Hudson straits. The spare-looking skipper could find few remarks to make about the voyage simply because it had been like so many others he had made.

Ice Proves No Difficulty

"Oh, there was no ice at all to bother anyone," he said.

"Was there any fog?"

"Well, we will call it a haze, but it was nothing to worry over," the captain replied. "In fact, I was surprised to find how easy things were. Everything possible had been done for us in advance, and the wireless gave us wonderful assistance. Without it we might have encountered some difficulties."

"Churchill is already well fitted with what ships like this need," Captain Mouat said. "The berthing is capital there already, and I see no reason whatever why this port should not be an excellent business proposition. Of course, this will be my only trip on this route in the present season."

Further, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) sent into Churchill this year the Canadian government steamship Acadia which cleared Churchill outbound on October 2, remaining in Hudson strait until October 22 when further work was abandoned on account of a shortage of coal. I talked to the captain of this ship who told me that had he had a supply of coal he could have remained in the strait well into December. Here is the testimony of another captain who is very well known, Captain W. J. Balcom, commander of the Canadian government icebreaker N. B. McLean. I quote from a Canadian Press despatch of October 31, 1931:

Shipping of grain and other cargoes through Hudson straits from Canada's new northern harbour, Fort Churchill, to European ports, is very feasible, according to Captain W. J. Balcom, commander of the Canadian government icebreaker, N. B. McLean, which returned to Quebec yesterday after spending three and a half months patrolling Hudson straits.

Captain Balcom said to-day that the two grain boats, the Farnworth with 7,410 tons of wheat and the Warkworth with 7,127 tons were both escorted through the strait from Cape Chidley to Coates Island at the eastern extremity of the straits on their trip to the old country. No trouble was experienced, and the owners of the two vessels had already signified their willingness to carry further cargoes from Churchill.

I have possibly fifty such opinions as that, Mr. Speaker, from such noted men as Captain Bernier and others who have sailed those northern waters, testfying that we have at least an average of eighteen weeks open navigation, which surely can be increased by modern ships with modern equipment, and our modern inventions such as direction-finding stations, and so forth. For two hundred and fifty years the Hudson's Bay Company carried their cargoes to and from Europe in and out of this bay, and for one hundred and fifty out of that two hundred and fifty years they used wooden sailing ships. It does not seem unreasonable, therefore, to suppose that modern ships, with modern equipment and modern ideas, should meet with a very much greater degree of success, provided of course that in the initial stages of development of this route every precaution is taken for the protection of the vessels using it—and I am happy to say that all precautions have been taken. Direction-finding stations have been located at four points in the straits which are in touch with the vessels using the straits at all times. When I say "the straits" I do not want hon. members to think of a narrow stretch of water running between high rocks, or anything of that kind, because the Hudson straits are 450 miles long, 65 miles wide at the narrowest point, with 500 fathoms of water and no obstructions from the time you pass out of the gap at the harbour, a quarter of a mile from the dock, until you arrive in the straits, which is a voyage of 450 miles. There is not a shoal of any kind in all that stretch. To all intents and purposes you are out on the ocean.

It may be said, and it is being said, that the Canadian government having provided the necessary facilities, it is now up to the shippers, the importers and the exporters, to make use of those facilities. But, Mr. Speaker, I hold that the government has a further duty. Canada has a large sum of money invested in this project. The present government has given its approval of the scheme. Advantages will certainly accrue to the farmers of the west from the development of this route. Because of those two circumstances alone the government owes it to the people of Canada in general and to the west in particular to take the initiative and lend every possible encouragement to the routing of traffic through this new port. Some may say that it is unfair for the government to attempt to divert traffic from the existing routes on the Atlantic and Pacific to the Hudson Bay route. But I say that it would be just as unfair to neglect it in its infancy. To do nothing to direct traffic into the channel which will be the most economical would be most unfair to those sections of Canada which it will immediately benefit; and after all, anything that will help the west will help the whole of Canada. I think all hon. gentlemen will agree that it is no time to talk of sectionalism in this country.

There is another important matter which I should like to mention, important judging from the number of resolutions that are being passed by boards of trade in the west in connection with the rates that apply to the Hudson Bay railway. The boards of trade in western Canada are desirous that the government publish at the earliest possible moment a tariff of rates applicable on the Hudson Bay railway. Shippers are ready to use this new route but find themselves unable to quote prices due to the fact that the tariff of rates is not published. It is true that the provisions of the Crowsnest pass rate structure apply to Churchill, but only in part. For some reason or other when the Crowsnest rate structure was applied to the Hudson Bay railway it was made applicable only to wheat. To such grains as barley, flax, oats, rye and so forth, as well as flour, it does not apply, although the Crowsnest pass rates apply to all these grains when they are billed to the head of the lakes. The people in western Canada who are supporting this route feel that this is rank discrimination and that it should be removed at the earliest possible moment.

Another matter that is giving them concern is the fact that the Crowsnest pass rates as applied to the Hudson Bay railway extend only as far south in Saskatchewan as Regina or Moose Jaw, or the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway. Now if this new route is going to serve the purpose for which it was intended, these rates should apply to all parts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba as well as to certain points in Alberta which hope to use it. This is particularly important because our neighbours to the south in the states of Dakota, Montana and Minnesota, expect to make use of this new grain route, but if they are to be penalized by having to pay the regular prairie schedule rates up as far as the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway—and the same applies to Manitoba south and east of Dauphin—I fear it will militate very strongly against the success of the route. I would ask the Minister of Railways to do his utmost to bring these adjustments about, because the people of the west feel very strongly about them, and there can be no question that it is discrimination of the rankest kind.

Before closing may I pay a tribute to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) and his staff for the able and efficient manner in which this work has been brought to a successful conclusion. I have watched this work very closely from its inception, and I feel quite safe in saying that this is one of the public works projects in Canada for which the people of Canada got value for every dollar expended. I pay that compliment to both governments because, as I said, both have contributed towards its construction about on a fifty-fifty basis.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be words of congratulation to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for the manner in which he delivered his budget. It, of course, was true to form. I was also pleased indeed to notice the most effective criticism which it received at the hands of my good friend the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). I have long since realized, Mr. Speaker, that honesty or purpose and sincerity of heart are among the greatest virtues of man. But, sir, as one who has largely expended the energies of life in and for the uplift of Canadian agriculture, I must confess that the prospects of farming to-day are less attractive than at any previous period of my life. Therefore I cannot allow this budget to pass without voicing my protest regarding the action of the government with respect to agricultural matters.

Experience has taught me that in order to accomplish anything in debate we must have some common standing ground, some platform, as it were, upon which the contestants at the outset can agree. That requirement the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and I most surely have. During his campaign in Calgary he said:

> Agriculture is the basic industry of Canada.

At Ormstown, Quebec, he said:

> Agriculture stands first in Canadian activities.

Meaning thereby that it should have first consideration at the hands of any Canadian government. At Woodstock, New Brunswick, he said:

> It shall be my great responsibility, if elected on the 28th of July, 1930, to see that the collective weight and power of the whole Dominion of Canada is placed behind agriculture. I would be lacking in the qualifications entitling me to head a Canadian government if I failed to do so.

Surely those expressions were such as to convince every farmer that the first consideration of this government would be the welfare of Canadian agriculture. Nevertheless from the moment of his election he and his government have subordinated the requirements of agriculture and of the general consumers of this country to those of his "special-interest" friends. Therefore my text to-night and wherever I go will be contained in these words: "If there be an inevitable conflict between agriculture and any other interest, that other interest must yield." In view of the commanding importance of a healthy and vigorous rural life, the welfare of Canadian agriculture must be preserved and stabilized if the national integrity is to be upheld.

Economically this country is in the most critical condition of its history; its situation is so critical that there is no time for anyone to talk cheap politics. Politics in the true sense of the term means the science of government, the government and regulation of a nation in order to ensure the liberty, security, and progress of its people. Canadian agriculture is to-day in the very trough of depression, in the midst of a world depression which is driving many people to a state of panic. But we must not forget that this condition is temporary, that agriculture will again become prosperous. Agriculture in Canada must become prosperous, but only if given its commercial freedom and if justly dealt with by and under governmental authority. It is acknowledged by all that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada, that the constant condition of agriculture is the real barometer of the trade of the country, and that without a dominant agriculture the whole national economic fabric will fall to pieces. Never has that fact been illustrated more clearly than to-day. For the past eighteen months business conditions in this country have been largely paralyzed. That state of affairs has been greatly intensified through the customs and tariff enactments of this government, preceding and following in the wake of the last Imperial conference. With trade falling off, revenues declining, transportation seriously restricted, national debt piling up, expenditures growing, immigration reduced to a minimum, and unemployment so rife that in the midst of bulging warehouses and overflowing elevators we see the lurid picture of thousands of destitute citizens living in semi-starvation and away over 530,000 idle working people.

There is a condition upon which no one wishes to dwell. Why is this so? Because the farmer is unable to sell the produce of his labour for the bare cost of production; as a consequence his purchasing power is largely destroyed; and so the whole national economic fabric is threatened. In the midst of such a condition last fall was it not a striking coincidence that the price of wheat should begin to rise, and almost at once, as if by magic, a buoyant, optimistic feeling took possession of the people? Does that experience not prove the force of my words, that the constant condition of agriculture is the real barometer of trade? Why, it represents the backbone of our whole national economic structure. And does not that fact prove the words of my text: If there be inevitable conflict between agriculture and any other interest, that other interest should yield? Agriculture must be preserved and stabilized if national integrity is to be upheld.

Wherein lies the remedy? Give to agriculture the wider and better markets which it demands and which it must have, and at the same time enable the farmers to obtain their requirements at prices somewhat on a parity with the prices which they must accept for their farm products. That is the crux of the whole situation. Give the farmers their requirements at prices equivalent to those which they must accept for their produce, and the way is largely open for a solution of the problem. But what does this government do? It tries to put this whole dominion into an hermetically sealed condition so far as trade is concerned, and so well has it succeeded that in the short space of eighteen months it has practically destroyed almost one half of our entire foreign trade. But not content with that condition this government, through the medium of the Finance minister in this budget, comes along again and places a further burden on agriculture in the shape of a two hundred per cent increase in the special excise tax upon all imports.

No nation can live unto itself. This world has become a family of interdependent nations which must work hand in hand and become mutually helpful. To accomplish this, if we could only cancel the war debts between the nations, stop the building of armaments, pull down these most obstructive tariff walls and allow the family of nations economic liberty, the problem would largely be solved. The way things are going at the present time, sir, it seems to me it might be a good plan to lock up some of the ministerial heads of this government in order to ensure the free flow of trade in its natural lines. Surely we have already had ample proof of the effect of the policies of this government on agriculture. To my mind the great reason why a policy such as I have suggested cannot be followed is that those who are in control in some of the leading nations of the world are afraid that by doing so they may lose that control when they next appeal to their electorates.

If further proof is needed of the way things are going in the economic life of the world to-day it is only necessary to consult the last report of the Basle committee, which called for adjustment of all reparations and other war debts to the troubled state of world finances, and warned the governments of the world that this must be done immediately if fresh disaster were to be averted. This report, adopted unanimously by the eleven financial experts and economists who composed the committee, was set out in full detail after the most exhaustive inquiry into the economic condition of Germany, and the report stated that action was urgently needed in a much wider field than Germany alone. When the Hoover moratorium ends in July, under the Young plan, Germany will be required to pay some $450,000,000 annually in gold to the allied countries, with the exception of the United States. Of this amount about $165,000,000 is unconditional, earmarked for the repair of war damage in France and Belgium, and according to the Young plan that payment cannot be postponed. All the financial and economic experts who have been studying this question have agreed unanimously that Germany is absolutely unable to pay the balance of $285,000,000 to the other countries. It so happens that European governments owe the United States about $250,000,000 annually, or only some $35,000,000 less than Germany's entire annual obligation.

The Basle committee, while unable to consider the matter of unconditional reparation annuities, stated in their report that they would not feel they had fully performed their task if they did not bring to the attention of the governments of the world the extreme gravity of the present situation, which undoubtedly has exceeded the relatively short depression envisaged in the Young plan, to meet which the safeguarding measures contained therein were designed. Speaking at Manchester on December 9 last Sir George Paish, eminent economist, who is in complete accord with the report of that committee, stated, "If my information is correct, and I think it is, nothing can prevent a complete world economic breakdown. Reparations should be cut off entirely or reduced to such a low figure that they would become negligible. Inter-allied debts should be written off entirely. World tariffs must come down." He said the most serious consequences were likely to result if the new British high tariff system were put into operation; he said it would cause world bankruptcy, and described it as the greatest folly that could be conceived. Commenting on this statement, according to the press the Prime Minister of Canada was so unimpressed that he merely said, "Mother Shipton predicted that the world would come to an end one hundred years ago." Mark you, this is the man who is empowered to speak for the Canadian people. I quote the following press report, dated St. John, New Brunswick, December 13, 1931:

> The prediction of Sir George Paish, British economist, regarding an early breakdown of the world's economic structure, has not impressed Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, Prime Minister of Canada, who was here fifteen minutes last night en route to Ottawa on his return from England.

No; he said, "Mother Shipton predicted that the world would come to an end one hundred years ago." I ask the Prime Minister if this press report is a fair summary of his opinion of the gravity of the present world economic condition, and I hope before this debate ends he will give this house a satisfactory reply.

No man was ever in a better position to make a name for himself and to place Canada on the highest pinnacle among the British commonwealth of nations, but let us pause for a moment to inquire what this government have done to solve these pressing problems with which we are faced, or I might put it the other way and ask what this government have done to place Canada in the desperate economic condition in which we find ourselves to-day, particularly with regard to agriculture. Twelve months ago I said this was practically a one man government, with a following so weak and submissive that you would almost think they were hibernating. After twelve months have passed who can say that this is other than a one man government?

I have outlined the course which I believe should be followed. Everyone realizes that agriculture is the backbone of our whole economic structure, and everyone realizes also that Canadian farmers must have access to wider and better markets, but it is a thoroughly sound economic maxim that if we are going to sell our goods to other countries we must buy goods from those countries in return. But what did the Prime Minister do? He increased the tariff at the special session and last session for the one purpose, so he said, of remedying an unfavourable trade balance. I do not believe that, and I propose to show by the words of the Prime Minister himself that I am right in my contention. If the Prime Minister will look at the Monetary Times of January 8 last he will find that in 1930 Canada borrowed from the United States some $393,632,000 whereas in the following year we borrowed only $155,920,000. That fact alone would decrease the imports from that country, and that result would have followed if the Prime Minister himself had gone into hibernation and remained there during the whole time. While the borrowings of Canada from the United States had decreased in that one year by $237,000,000, in the same year the imports from that country, as you would naturally expect, had declined by $259,000,000.

I have said that I propose to show from his own lips that he did not increase the tariff for the purpose of remedying an adverse trade balance. His very first expression on the floor of this house as Prime Minister of Canada was that so far as possible the requirements of ten million Canadian people must be produced at home, thereby showing at once that he did not wish to encourage the importation of any goods that could possibly be produced in this country, thus drying up the springs of trade and further paralyzing Canadian agricultural life. His very first expression, as I say, was this, as I have pointed out. Secondly, his next act, in amplification of that policy, was to jack up the Canadian tariff against the importation of British goods almost to the prohibitive point, practically wiping out the British preference before ever he went to the imperial conference, thus ejecting British goods at the toe of the boot from Canadian markets which they had enjoyed for a lifetime. Thirdly, his act was to pass some of the most diabolical customs legislation ever forced through the parliament of any country, legislation which has driven the people of Canada, to a status away back behind the days of Magna Charta, the day of the signing of the great charter of English liberty for the preservation of those liberties of the British people, which charter, amongst other things, stipulated that no taxes must be levied within the realm without the approval of parliament, and that foreign merchants should be allowed safe conduct to enter England and leave it, to buy and sell, without the obstruction of an evil toll.

Why were these safeguards to English liberty insisted upon in those early days? Simply to prevent exploitation of the people. But now we have a government who have passed this legislation, taking the right of taxation directly out of the hands of parliament, a right which had rested with the representatives of the people, under the terms of the British constitution, ever since the days of King John, and putting that power into the hands of one man, the Minister of National Revenue, to fix for duty purposes, whatever valuation he wished upon the importation of goods into Canada, regardless of what the cost price of such goods might be. If that is not an exhibition of high protection gone crazy and autocracy gone to seed, made legal in the face of the solemn protests of the Liberal party in this house, and under the threat of the Prime Minister that until it was passed he would refuse to leave Ottawa for the imperial conference, I do not know what you would call it. It has destroyed the stability of trade to such a degree that every prospective trader is afraid to launch out and do business, for he will never know the valuation upon which he will be required to pay duty. If anyone is engaged in the business of buying and importing goods, would common sense not tell him that the valuation on which he ought to pay duty would be the reasonable cost price of those goods? That is the valuation upon which any sensible individual would expect to pay duty. But now we have a government who have passed a law nullifying that sensible view and putting it in the power and at the whim of one man to fix whatever valuation he pleases without any regard whatever to the cost price of goods, and whenever he likes to take such action.

But of course this is in line with the whole fiscal policy of this government. The government do not wish to allow the importation into this country of any goods of a kind that is or can be produced in Canada, no matter how exorbitant a price the consumer may have to pay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): I know you would like me to stop but I am not through yet. Surprise has been expressed that there are no tariff changes in the budget. Why, Mr. Speaker, we do not need any; the Minister of National Revenue is making such changes regularly. Read Hansard of the special session of 1930, and you will see from the whole discussion that the Minister of National Revenue can make the entire tariff ten times higher than it now is if he so chooses, without ever consulting parliament at all. And through the medium of orders in council he is continually doing it. But of course, as I say, this is in line with the whole fiscal policy of this government.

This principle of one-way trade is no good. It is a policy of blind nationalism which should be stamped out. The endeavour to put Canada into a hermetically sealed compartment, so far as trade is concerned, is absurd and is becoming intolerable to the great masses of the people. Therefore I charge the Prime Minister, according to his own yard measure, with being entirely lacking in the qualifications that should entitle him to head the Canadian government in the measures so necessary for the salvation of Canadian agriculture. The longer he proceeds the worse the mess becomes. And further, Mr. Speaker, no one who will not observe the full meaning of these words: "If there be economic conflict between agriculture and any other interest, that other interest must yield," should be allowed to continue at the helm of Canadian public affairs.

Agriculture must be preserved and stabilized if national integrity is to be maintained. If the Prime Minister were only true to himself, he would see that such a policy was observed. Everyone knows that, as I have said, agriculture is the foundation and the backbone of our whole national economic structure. The condition of agriculture to-day is becoming too serious to be longer neglected.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Hon. members need not think that they can annoy me.

I see a lot of hon. members opposite who represent agricultural constituencies. Their actions show how much they care for agriculture, and that is why agriculture has received so little consideration and so little real sympathy on the floor of this house. If the government of Canada would only solve the problems of Canadian agriculture and put the farmers on a sound and healthy basis economically, the other economic problems would largely solve themselves. What surpasses my comprehension, something I cannot understand, is that type of mind, that peculiar mentality which enables its possessor boldly to announce that he will place the collective weight and power of his government behind agriculture, and in the same breath have the temerity to enact legislation which has the effect of so severely paralyzing Canadian agricultural life as to drive from it the last vestige of outstanding natural ability. It is worse than a crime upon the body politic, and tragic in the consequences which it will involve. We may well recall those memorable words of Goldsmith:

> Ill fares that land to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay:
> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade;
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, her country's pride,
> When once destroyed, can never be supplied.

It is the same type of mind which will enact legislation which will place the great body of the people under the iron heel of special privilege and then declare that there shall be no exploitation of the consumer. This government realizes that by its enactments it has placed the people at the mercy of the specially favoured interests; if this were not the case, nothing would be said about the exploitation of the people. Before the government talks about preventing exploitation under such circumstances, it should be able to assure us that it is possessed of that superhuman power which will enable it to reconstitute human nature. Unless the government can do this, such talk is the sheerest balderdash. It reminds me of the expression, "They might tell the truth to the people, before asserting that they can appreciate nothing in argument but fallacies and nothing in language but balderdash."

All these things which have proved to be to the detriment of Canadian agriculture were enacted before the Prime Minister and his colleagues went to the imperial conference. They have continued ever since with increasing force and to-day we are reaping the bitter effects of such disastrous legislation. Go into the towns, the villages and the cities, consult the bankers, businessmen or tradespeople, what do they say? Their constant prayer is: Lord, give us a policy which will help the farmer in his extremity and he will help us all. This government could begin at once one of the greatest developments in history right on the farms and in the farm houses of Canada, but it still persists in its immeasurable folly. The farmers of this country are just as anxious to have the comforts and conveniences of city life as are the townspeople, and there is no class of people in this country who, if they had the wherewithal, would spend more freely. If my hon. friends across the way would only drop party politics, I am convinced that they would support me in this matter.

An hon. MEMBER: Where has the hon. member been all his life?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): He has always been trying to do his part.

This government went to the imperial conference with the idea of blasting its way into the markets of the world. What has it accomplished? In a single twelvemonth its blasting folly has destroyed more than one-third of the entire foreign trade of Canada. How did it accomplish that result? It was accomplished by increasing the tariff and by peremptorily demanding that the British government impose a tax on foreign foodstuffs, thus identifying in the minds of millions of Britishers the once-honoured and respected name of Canada with the odious and much-feared policy of taxing the food of the British people. The Prime Minister then became wildly uproarious and left Great Britain with the veiled threat of economic separation simply because a British minister mildly designated his whole proceeding as "humbug." What has Professor Stephen Leacock to say on this point? He says that Right Hon. J. H. Thomas used the right word when he called Mr. Bennett's proposal "humbug." He continues:

> The Canadian tariff prefers British manufactured goods to American, but shuts them both out so far as they interfere with our own manufacturing system. A nation that blocks out everything with a tariff and produces vast quantities of goods which it cannot consume is working its own ruin.

I do not need to emphasize the fact that the whole proceedings at that conference were a dead failure as far as the welfare of Canada was concerned, and this is known to every real student of public affairs. Has that fact had any effect whatever in dissuading the Prime Minister from following the course which he has apparently mapped out, a course so ruinous to the interests of Canadian agriculture? None whatever, and that is the reason why I am impelled to say that according to his own yard measure he is entirely lacking in the qualifications which entitle him to lead a Canadian government in providing the measures so necessary for the salvation of Canadian agriculture.

I do not need to rehearse the proceedings of the last session of parliament. From beginning to end it was one continuous course of action—

Mr. GOTT: If the hon. member persists in reading his speech, I shall have to direct the attention of the Speaker to his conduct.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron):—as far as fiscal legislation was concerned, against the true interests of agriculture and the general consumer, and showed unmistakably that there had been no recanting whatever of his opinions previously expressed and acted upon.

On motion of Mr. Edwards (Waterloo) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 13, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald):

DAUGHTERS OF THE EMPIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). I should like to ask if he has given permission for the use of the Dominion archives building, which belongs to the Canadian people, by the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire for the holding of a reception in aid of the relief work carried on by the order, at which there will be dancing and bridge playing. I should like to ask also if the minister would condescend to do the same thing for the Native Sons of Canada should they desire to organize a charity ball or bridge party in aid of the civil servants or railway men, for instance, recently dismissed by the government.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I remember that I gave permission for a reception to be held, but whether or not that permission was given the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire I am not sure. It was not brought to my attention that there was to be dancing or bridge playing, or any other form of entertainment; I understood it was to be a reception, and I followed the precedent laid down by my predecessors.

If the Native Sons of Canada desire to hold a reception in the same building they should apply in the usual way and I will take the matter into consideration before giving an answer.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): In his concluding words the hon. gentleman spoke of railway men who had been dismissed by the government. I wish to say there have been no railway men dismissed by the government; any dismissal of railway men was done by the Canadian National Railways management.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. FRANKLIN AHEARN (Ottawa): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Will cheques be issued to the civil servants on April 15, and, if cheques are issued, will the ten per cent reduction be made?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): As to the first part of the question, the answer will depend upon the attitude of another chamber with respect to the supply bill now before it. As to the second part of the question I would anticipate that we would have a right to have regard to the legislation which has been advanced in this house almost to the final stage.

UNEMPLOYMENT ORDERS IN COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the suggestion I made a few days ago that the orders in council which are laid on the table from day to day with regard to unemployment and farm relief moneys be either printed in the votes and proceedings or made an appendix to Hansard. When only one copy is available it is a great inconvenience to members of parliament, and I wondered if the Prime Minister had been able to give the matter consideration and if he had come to a favourable decision.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Looking up the orders in council I find they are practically all the same, varying mainly in the amounts for the various provinces to which payments are made, and unless it becomes the general will of the house it is not at the moment regarded as wise that the additional expenditure should be incurred in printing orders in council of that character, which would involve a very large number of pages added either to the votes and proceedings or to the daily copy of Hansard.

Before we proceed with the next order I would like to point out to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough the fact that at page 246 of the votes and proceedings the orders in council tabled yesterday indicate to whom payments are to be made. I think perhaps in the first one the amount is mentioned, $2,000,000, and that succeeding orders in council might be amplified by stating the amount involved; then you would have the name of the province to which payment had been made, and the amount. If that would meet the hon. gentleman's wishes, I might give directions this afternoon that it be done.

Mr. DUFF: That is quite satisfactory, Mr. Speaker. I had intended to suggest it to the Prime Minister.

RACE TRACK EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): I should like to direct the attention of the government, and particularly of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) to the fact that a number of pari-mutuel operators working on race tracks in the southern United States have been dismissed for no other reason than that they are Canadian citizens. There are a large number of Americans who work on Canadian race tracks, and I would ask the minister to see how many Canadians have been dismissed from American tracks and try to prohibit the employment of Americans on Canadian race tracks during the race meetings this summer.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration): The matter to which the hon. member has made reference has been under consideration by the Department of Immigration for the past week or so. All the information we can secure is being assembled for the guidance of the officers of the department.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 12, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. A. M. EDWARDS (South Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all extend my congratulations to the architect of this budget, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). While it has in it many tax levies which possibly bear heavily on a certain portion of the community, still I feel that these levies have been placed upon those people best able to pay, and it is to be hoped that ere another year rolls around and another budget has to be prepared better times will prevail which will permit these taxes to be lowered.

I am not one of those who think that wealth should be conscripted for tax purposes. We depend on the circulation of capital for the development of our industries, and we usually find that those possessing wealth invest it in our industrial establishments. The levying of an excessive income tax seems to me to be a restriction on initiative, for it means that the man who goes out and makes good is penalized until in the higher categories he loses fifty per cent of his income. However, as I said before, perhaps an upturn in business before next session will enable the government to lessen these imposts.

May I say a word to my good friend who preceded me in this debate, the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). I have a very great respect for him. For several sessions I have listened to his views on the tariff question, unquestionably they do not change, and I think the hon. member has advanced them so often that he almost believes them himself. I wonder if hon. gentlemen who are constantly advocating a reduction in protection both for business and for industry have ever pictured to themselves what would have happened to this country if we had not had the tariff protection enacted in the special session of 1930. That measure was taken barely in time. We had the debacle of business in the United States, industrialists there selling their wares for almost anything they could get for them, not on any fair competitive basis by any means. Two years ago I cited an instance, and perhaps it will bear repetition now, with respect to the heavier lines of goods manufactured in different parts of the United States where freight rates are sufficiently low to offset the long haul, and where they have in operation what is known as a zoning system. The manufacturers of these heavier lines of goods in the New England states have a zone, we will say, as far west as Buffalo; the Buffalo zone extends to Toledo and Detroit; the Toledo and Detroit zone extends as far west as Chicago and Minneapolis, and from those points the zone extends to the Pacific coast. In normal times it is the understanding between those manufacturers that they shall market their goods within their respective zones, but when abnormal conditions arise, as was the case in 1930, this understanding is ignored and they have a free hand. The manufacturer of heavy ware in the eastern states will, for instance, market his goods as far west as Minneapolis or Chicago. He is not particular about the price he gets in that zone, but he is particular about the price in his own zone. In other words, he endeavours to hold up the market for his product in his own zone, and slaughter it in the other zone. Now, what happened on that occasion? Those goods were coming into Canada for a while, but, due to the vigilance of our National Revenue department, their entry was soon stopped. Those goods were valued for duty purposes at the prices at which they were sold in the slaughter zone, so our manufacturers were subjected to most unfair competition, no regard whatever being paid to cost or to distance of distribution; it was simply a matter of keeping their factories going, getting their prices in their own market and slaughtering them in the foreign market. That happened in various lines of industry. If in 1930 we had not taken means to protect ourselves, what would have happened? We would have been faced with an army of 120,000,000 people as against our small army of 10,000,000. As an inevitable result, our market would have been ruined, and there would be no business for our own industries. Therefore I most heartily commend, as do the people whom I have the honour to represent, the action taken by this government in 1930 to protect our home market.

Before I deal with the subject matter of my remarks, I desire to say a word with respect to the suggestion made yesterday by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), that mixed farming be encouraged by means of a cash bonus. While I am not in favour of such a proposal as a general rule, yet at the present time we have an emergency situation, a situation that must be dealt with, and if it is fair to grant a cash bonus of five cents a bushel on wheat, which benefits more particularly our western people—and it was right; I quite agree with it—then I think there is a reasonable argument in favour of giving similar assistance to our farmers in Ontario and Quebec, who to-day are suffering from a deflation of prices such as has never been known before. I am not a farmer and do not pretend to know very much about farming, and while I am not giving it as my considered opinion, still I think the proposal is worthy of consideration by the government, and I hope they will deal with it at the proper time.

With regard to industry in Canada: During the last two sessions we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite a great deal about the calamity that they prophesied as a result of the government's action in protecting our home market. To show what actually happened, I have secured data from the Bureau of Statistics with respect to the employment afforded by the 157 new concerns established in Canada since 1930. The first group includes the companies which furnish monthly data on employment. These number 58 and as of March 1, 1932, employed 2,124 people. These are new factories which have opened up since the imposition of the tariff in 1930. The next group includes firms whose products are manufactured in other factories. There are five companies in this group employing 317 people. The next group includes three companies whose business has been reorganized, employing a total of 172 people. There are other classifications for which the data is not given. There are fifty-two firms employing less than fifteen people. There are fourteen firms which although not operating at present will shortly commence to do so, while others have stated that they do not intend to open up in Canada. There are twenty-five firms from which no information was obtainable. This completes the total of 157 companies.

These companies are summarized according to their manufactures. There are nine producing vegetable products; six producing animal products outside of textiles; nine producing textiles; thirteen producing wood and paper products; forty producing iron products; twenty-eight producing non-ferrous metal products; six producing non-metallic mineral products; fifteen producing chemical and allied products; four producing mining and metallurgical products and eight producing miscellaneous products, etc. With the permission of the house I will place the details on Hansard:

I. Miscellaneous Industries—
1. Henry Pote of Canada, Ltd. ..... Cap de la Madeleine, Que.

The Mail and Empire of April 8 contains an article to the effect that the Dominion Foundries and Steel Company will open up a plant in Hamilton. The Montreal Gazette of April 1 gives a list of firms opening up branch factories in Montreal, including Prolac Limited, Asbestos Manufacturing Company Limited, Victor Hacksaw Manufacturing Company of Middletown, New York, and sixteen others which I shall not enumerate. A recent issue of the Border Cities Star—I assume this is with the authority of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott)—contained glaring head lines to the effect that the auto factories were awaiting a rush, that improvement was seen in the business as the new Fords were ready, that one billion dollars was invested in the industry, and that the number on the Ford pay-roll had risen from 70,000 to 100,000. Information from eastern Canada is to the effect that the Eastern Hosiery Mills Limited, the Eastern Hat and Cap Manufacturing Company Limited and Eastern Shirts Limited will open in Truro, Nova Scotia. There will be manufactured in this city those socks for which the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) was famous during the last elections.

Mr. YOUNG: How much will they cost then?

Mr. EDWARDS: They will cost $1.60 per dozen.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the quality?

Mr. EDWARDS: They will be manufactured of rayon and cotton and will be first quality, large size.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member has the wrong socks.

Mr. EDWARDS: These plants have not only taken the machinery from their old plants in the United States, but have purchased ten additional machines of the latest type from the W. J. Westaway Company of Hamilton, Ontario. Certain of the machines will be imported from the United States because no hosiery knitting machines of any description are manufactured in Canada. There are not only industries manufacturing new lines, but others are supplementing their regular lines in an effort to increase their business in Canada. Many of these products can be profitably manufactured in Canada, and there is a market here. It can be seen quite readily that the tariff of 1930 has been productive of very good results.

For several sessions I have spoken on behalf of the textile industry of Canada, and I have asked both the former and present governments to give some consideration to this industry. I am sure I have been and will be backed up in this connection by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard). I shall endeavour to give the house some idea of the extent of this industry, and I intend to devote myself more particularly to the woollen and worsted cloth branches, making some reference to knitted goods and silks. Ramifications of this industry are many and thousands of people are affected, both directly and indirectly, ranging all the way from the farmer who grows the wool to the man who produces the soap and chemicals used in the processing. This industry is second only to agriculture, and the number employed therein in normal times amounts to about one hundred thousand. The Textile Journal gives the number of employees in 1927 as 58,937 women on wages and salaries, and 41,497 men in the same category. It will be seen that this industry is a woman's industry. In those sections of the country where steel and iron or furniture industries are located, textile mills give employment to a number of the daughters of the men working in the other mills. It is essential to have these textile mills in order to have a balanced community. I think the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) will agree with me when I say that the constituencies which he and I represent in this house comprise about as nearly a balanced community as it is possible to get. It is estimated that about 95 per cent of the farm products of this county are consumed in the county. Therefore the textile mills which employ female labour are very necessary to help balance the labour in this community.

Prior to 1930, and while the King administration was in office, we had constant adjustments of the tariff; we had for instance, the tariff entirely removed from worsted yarn which was carrying a duty of 12½ per cent. What result did this have on our spinning mills? I am speaking now more particularly of the large mills that spin their yarn and weave it into cloth. One in Sherbrooke and another in Hespeler are two of the largest mills in Canada; they spin the worsted yarn from the raw wool and when this tariff was removed, the result was that worsted yarn was brought into this country free of duty and the spinning plants of these mills were closed down. I am not so sure of the one in Sherbrooke, but I know the one in my district was closed. Following this, yarn was brought in from Bradford, England, cheaper than it could be produced in Canada. When this government came into office a net duty of 9 per cent and 9 cents a pound was imposed, with the result that all these mills that had been standing idle are now working at full capacity and worsted yarn is being produced in Canada. Canadian wool in certain proportions is being used.

Mr. YOUNG: What proportion?

Mr. EDWARDS: A small proportion; it is not very large. It is mostly merino wool from Australia and New Zealand that is used, but if the wool in this country is protected and the farmers are given a chance, the proportion of Canadian wool used will be increased.

Mr. YOUNG: If the wool is protected from the weather, the hon. member means?

Mr. EDWARDS: You cannot produce fine merino wool in western Canada. There are two things necessary in producing wool: grazing and climate, and in the west you have neither for producing fine merino wool. But you have facilities for producing certain wools that can be used in Canada and I am of opinion that those classes that can be produced here should be taken care of and protected.

As I said, many plants were entirely closed down. What does this mean to Canada? Textile mills with few exceptions are located in the smaller communities. There are in this country fifty-six mills producing woollen and worsted cloth, and of these fourteen produce worsted cloth. To give the house a picture of what happens to this industry and the effect on the country generally, whether it is assisted or retarded, I may say that these fourteen mills are located as follows:

Locality	Number of mills
Huntingdon, Quebec	1
St. Johns, Quebec	1
Sherbrooke, Quebec	1
Kingston, Ontario	1
Almonte, Ontario	1
Peterborough, Ontario	1
Renfrew, Ontario	1
Toronto, Ontario	3
Hespeler, Ontario	1
Campbellford, Ontario	1
Milton, Ontario	1
Vancouver, British Columbia	1

Mr. RYERSON: There is one in Brantford.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend beside me says that there is one in Brantford. I do not have it listed.

Tariff item 554b covers both woollen and worsted cloth, and in September, 1930, this item was increased while at the same time, as I have explained, rates on worsted weaving yarns were also increased. These duties were imposed in order to provide employment for the spinning plants in Canada. At the time the change was made in 1930 it was pointed out that while the rates in item 554b would materially assist and improve the condition in the woollen cloth mills, there would be no particular benefit to the worsted mills. The reason is that worsted yarn is much lighter than woollen yarn and they had to absorb the increased duty on worsted yarn without any corresponding duty on the finished product. Let us see what result this had on production:

Woollen Cloth Produced in Canada

Year	Yards
1931	5,591,355

Or an increase under this protective tariff of 52·7 per cent. Worsteds and serges, as I have said, did not benefit by this tariff. Let us see what happened to them:

Worsteds and Serges produced in Canada

Year	Yards
1931	1,998,043

Or a decrease of 1·8 per cent. The increase in employment and production in woollen cloth mills was most satisfactory. Some of these mills are now running to full capacity. I could name one or two big mills with the best equipment in the world that formerly were running about two or three days a week on short time, that are now running to capacity on woollen cloths. I should like at this stage to distinguish between woollen and worsted cloth. Woollen cloths, as hon. members no doubt know, are represented by such materials as tweeds, overcoatings, blankets and that sort of thing. The worsted mills produce worsted cloths and serges. Therefore there is a very large difference in the two lines of cloth produced in the textile mills. That will give hon. members some idea of the different ramifications of the industry and the various lines produced.

The market in Canada in 1931 for worsteds and serges was handled as follows:

	Yards
From Canadian mills	1,998,043
From English mills	3,433,933
From Foreign mills	505,777
Total	5,937,753

It will be noted immediately that the Canadian worsted weaving mills are getting only one-third of the quantity of cloth consumed in Canada. If the position were bettered—and it would take very little to bring that about—and they could get two-thirds or 75 per cent of the Canadian consumption, they would be able very materially not only to increase their plants but to reduce their prices, because the whole thing revolves around production. It is a straight run through the machine and if you can produce in sufficient quantities you can certainly bring down the prices.

In one mill in my constituency, making worsted yarns, they increased their capacity in 1931 about 20 per cent over that over 1930.

Mr. HOWARD: What about their employees?

Mr. EDWARDS: They increased accordingly.

Mr. ST-PERE: What about salaries?

Mr. EDWARDS: The salaries are not too high.

Mr. ST-PERE: Oh, no.

Mr. EDWARDS: May I read from a bulletin issued by the Canadian Woollen and Knit Goods Manufacturers' Association, which says in part:

During the last three months, 1931, the share of the Canadian import market for woollen and worsted cloth supplied by English manufacturers has steadily increased, while the proportion supplied by the foreign manufacturers has decreased. This is the result of depreciated and appreciated currency legislation, combined with exchange, which favours the import of English cloth as against foreign cloth. The effect is cumulative, and as was to be expected, the full effect was not felt until December. The following table shows the percentage of imports for the three months in detail.

Then follows the table giving the imports, which perhaps you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, to put on record:

Percentage of Imports of Cloth in Quantities

Total Imports

	British	Foreign
Nine months ending December 1931	73%	27%
Last three months, 1931	75%	25%
December, 1931	81%	19%

	October, 1931		November, 1931		December, 1931
	British	Foreign	British	Foreign	British	Foreign
Flannels	65	35	75	25	100	—
Cut pile	52	48	87	13	89	11
Lightweights	61	39	59	41	71	29

Worsteds	77	23	85	15	87	13
Other cloths	54	46	62	38	62	38

Following are a few examples of the import figures in pounds:

	British		Foreign
	Oct., 1931	Dec., 1931	Oct., 1931	Dec., 1931
Lightweights	39,883	41,975	25,329	17,790

Worsteds	220,175	211,299	65,131	31,816
Flannels	2,333	5,212	1,260	——

Now I want to say a word regarding the knit goods branch of this industry. I am not going to say very much about it because I understand that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and one or two others are going to present the case for the knit goods industry.

All knit goods such as knitted outer-wear, sweaters, knitted dresses, underwear, bathing suits, knitted fabrics and so forth enter Canada under tariff item 568, with duties as follows: British preference, 22½ per cent net; treaty, 25 per cent; intermediate, 25 per cent; general, 45 per cent. There are 130 mills in Canada producing knit goods similar to those entering under tariff item 568. There is enough machinery in Canada to supply all the requirements of the market. The principal raw materials of this particular industry are wool yarns, artificial silk yarn and cotton yarns. Prior to the September, 1930, budget it was found that knit goods manufacturers could not obtain immediate tariff relief because the French treaty fixed the rate at 25 per cent. I understand that that treaty will expire in June. I wish to draw the attention of the government to the fact that in 1930 the tariff rate on wool yarns and artificial silk yarns was increased so that for fifteen months the industry has been operating with increased tariff rates on raw materials with no compensating duty on their finished product. It is to be hoped therefore that on the expiration of the French treaty in June next a complete survey will be made of the knit goods industry, and while I am not one of those who advocate high tariffs at all, if it is found that the knit goods industry requires assistance then I hope that that assistance will be given.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the duty on yarns?

Mr. EDWARDS: Nine per cent and nine cents per pound.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the duty on the finished product?

Mr. EDWARDS: It is 22½ per cent. The chief cost entering into the manufacture of these goods is labour and machinery. Just to show how the whole country is affected by this situation I would point out that the knit goods factories are distributed over Canada as follows:

Ontario	84
Quebec	29
Nova Scotia	3
New Brunswick	3
Alberta	1
Manitoba	7
Total	130

Those factories are distributed right across the country and it will therefore be seen at once how important it is that this industry should be given a chance to succeed. I should like to quote from the following bulletin issued by the Canadian Woollen and Knit Goods Manufacturers Association to show to what extent the British market has been protected. The bulletin says:

The extent of the home market for textiles in Great Britain which was protected by the three orders issued last November is not generally realized. Imports into Great Britain of textile goods covered by these orders in the first eleven months of 1931 amounted to £33,939,240, or approximately $160,000,000. Grouped, they were as follows:

Wool manufactures	£13,033,522
Clothing	5,805,932
Stockings and gloves	5,451,844
Linen	414,256
Cotton manufactures	7,034,647
Manufactures of jute, etc.	2,199,039

The export from Great Britain to Canada of similar goods during the same period is shown at £2,915,786; that is, the home market which has been protected for the English manufacturer is roughly eleven times greater than the export market for similar goods to Canada.

The effect in England of the new duties there are reflected in advertisements appearing in the trade journals. One reads: "Thousands of pieces of woollen goods are exported yearly from Poessneck in Thuerg (Germany) to England. Textile expert, experienced in all branches undertakes to manufacture these goods in England," etc., and etc. Another reads: "Manufacturer formerly using foreign mule spun yarn would like to get in communication with English spinner who can replace same," and still another: "Roubaix Spinner, previously spinning low and medium crossbred natural wool hosiery yarns for Nottingham and Leicester districts, is prepared to enter into negotiations with English spinners for sale of his machinery."

That is what is happening in England since they have had this protection. The German people are even offering to sell their machinery to manufacturers in England.

Now just a word about wool. I was very sorry that I was not present when the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston) introduced his resolution on wool. I think I can state pretty clearly the position of the manufacturers in my district, and it is this: I wish to make it clear that the Canadian woollen manufacturers with whom I have talked have raised no objection to a duty being placed on empire wools to protect the Canadian sheep grower provided compensating duties are placed on all customs items covering semi-manufactured or fully manufactured goods made from wool.

The branch of the wool industry which produces the greatest value of manufactures of wool is the knitting industry. The knit goods industry was not protected in 1930 or 1931, and in my opinion duties cannot be placed on wool effectively or without seriously affecting the knitting industry until the French treaty is out of the way and the knitting industry is protected.

In the riding of South Waterloo, which I have the honour to represent in this house, there are two large silk mills. Of course, there are many others in other parts of the country. I wish to take a few minutes of the time of the house to quote from two bulletins issued by the Silk Association of Canada, which very clearly set forth the position of this very important and ever growing industry. The Silk Association of Canada in its bulletin of January 13, 1932 says:

> Substantial increase in employment in the full fashioned hosiery mills in Canada in 1931 over 1930 is indicated by comparative production and sales figures now available. For seventeen out of the twenty-one mills in Canada the comparative figures for the nine months ending November, 1931, show an increase of 1,146,600 pairs over the same period in 1930, while the actual figures for hosiery shipped during the same nine months' periods are: 1931, 9,948,360 pairs; 1930, 8,787,156; increase in 1931 over 1930, 1,151,204 pairs. All full-fashioned hosiery now used in Canada is produced in Canada, the imports for the period in review of all classes of silk hosiery, men's and women's, circular and full fashioned, amounted to only 49,392 pairs. As Canada was machined to supply all requirements in normal times, there was no machinery expansion in 1931, present general conditions not warranting any increase.

In its bulletin of January 27, 1932, the Silk Association of Canada gives the number of broad silk looms in this country, with the number of yards produced. It says:

> Reports from individual mills indicate a substantial increase in production and employment in 1931 over 1930, particularly since last June when tariff changes were made. The effect of this change is strikingly shown by the import figures of silk fabrics, dyed and finished, for three-month periods during 1931.

Then it gives the figures by quarters, but as my time is nearly up I will simply say that the importations for 1931 declined steadily in each quarter, with a total importation for 1931 of 5,944,487 yards, valued at $3,031,738.

I listened very carefully during the debate on unemployment to hear if some solution would be presented that had not already been advanced by the government of Canada, and I heard none. I want to advance this suggestion, for whatever it may be worth. Prior to seven, eight or nine years ago it was customary for travelling men to go out selling seasonal goods produced in Canada, goods which have always been required in this country. For instance, a man would go out on March 1 to sell underwear, and have his sales completed by May 1. Those goods would be shipped in August or September, and terms of either thirty days less a discount or ninety days net would be given. The result was that the mills had orders, men were engaged, and the financing of operations was carried on under genuine orders. The goods were delivered in the fall and were not paid for until sold. I think that was a very satisfactory way of handling the matter. That condition applied to many lines, particularly those which owing to climatic conditions are required in Canada. That practice is being followed and must be followed in connection with purchases from foreign countries. Why could it not be carried out in Canada?

We will suppose a man requires fifty dozens of a certain article. He does not necessarily place an order for fifty dozens, but due to his expectation that he will do business equal to the business of the past year, he may place an order for half the quantity. If the half quantity could be secured in the manner I have described I am sure our unemployment situation would be very materially relieved, and with expense to nobody. I offer that suggestion, believing it to be workable. To make it effective extensive educational propaganda would have to be placed in the newspapers. I believe that sustained advertising of any particular line will make it known.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, will my hon. friend from South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards) excuse me if I do not follow his argument? With a good deal of what he has said I could agree; but the tariff is not the issue now before the house. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has made it quite clear, the government does not contemplate at this session to express any opinion or offer any tariff policy until after the Imperial economic conference; and in that attitude I think they are right.

I wish to put myself on record candidly and clearly with regard to the three proposals now before us: The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and the budget proposals.

With much that the hon. member for Acadia has said I fully agree, especially with his denunciation of the capitalistic system. I am fully convinced, and have been for many years, that that system, as practised throughout the so-called western world, but especially in North America, is bound to bring dire results. War has merely accentuated the evil consequences of that system, and precipitated the issue. But with all due deference, may I say to my hon. friend from Acadia that he has not fully covered the ground. He has truly stated that the so-called capitalistic system has been of very short duration. Nothing indeed is more inaccurate than the prevailing opinion that capitalism is the basis of our economic and social fabric. The origin of capitalism, according to the member for Acadia, is the discovery of steam and its application to industry. May I embroaden the statement and say that what has been termed the mechanization of industry is but a material factor which has contributed to the building up of the capitalistic system. To fully understand the problem and its consequences, one has to go further and, as in everything human, to find out the moral and social factors. With my very short studies of economics and sociology I consider the two main sources out of which this system has arisen are to be found in the French revolution and in the doctrines of the Manchester school in England. First, there is the French Jacobinistic theory of unlimited rights of individual property, and then the Manchester advocacy of laisser faire and laisser passer. Applied to the condition described by the hon. member for Acadia, to the mechanization of industry, these two schools of thought have brought the uncontrolled concentration, first of capital, and then of potential wealth in the hands of a few individuals who are practically beyond control. These men, or corporations, have now in their hands, not only the sources of wealth of the masses of the people, but they practically control the sources of credit of the state. When I use the word state I use it in the broadest sense, including federal, provincial and municipal governments.

What has been the result? Within the last twenty or twenty-five years, the irresponsible masters of that system have not only concentrated real wealth and capital sources of production, but they have created artificial wealth. They have created so-called capital and issued paper in the form of stocks, debentures and titles of all sorts, which have no reality. The gullible public have purchased that paper; it has been broadcast, and the masses of the consuming public are paying interest upon false capital and giving to it a value it does not possess.

The credit of the country maintained through the banks and large financial institutions has been lent as a moral—or should I say immoral—support to that fictitious capital. The condition existing in Canada exists on a much larger scale in the United States, and in practically all the countries of the western world. I say now, weighing fully my remarks, that the best incentive which can be given to the doctrines and practices of extreme socialism, even in the form of bolshevism, is not by allowing the distribution of a few pamphlets, or the making of a few silly speeches in some dark corners of the cities of Montreal or Toronto, but by lending the authority of parliament and the government to the maintenance of a system which is just as immoral and anti-social as the system now being practised in Russia.

If this is true—and I am, and have been convinced for many years that it is—I venture to say that the remedy offered by the hon. member for Acadia is altogether insufficient to cure the evil. Nationalization of currency is a pretty broad expression. In what form it could be practised, or how it could be executed I am not sure; the hon. member has not quite explained. As I understand it he wants the country, through the inflation of money and the control of currency, to pay its debts at an easier rate than the present value of state paper. That might be discussed, though I think it should be discussed internationally. I do not think the situation of Canada or of any other country will be remedied until there is a courageous international understanding to bring down all debts of all countries.

But where I differ still more with the hon. member is in the suggestion that we should have an artificial inflation of money in order to enable people to purchase more. Would it mean purchasing more or simply giving a few more pieces of paper—inflated paper—to purchase the same quantity of goods? I do not see where the people would be better off. I agree much more with the proposal made last year by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), that the evil from which we are suffering is not the dearth of wealth or of production but the lack of proper distribution, and I fail to see how by increasing the number of pieces of paper which people accept as the standard of wealth we will foster that better distribution.

Suppose we increase the number of bank-notes or government notes, what will it mean? It will mean that if the man who to-day has 100,000 dollar bills, worth perhaps ninety cents, gets double that amount of paper, he will be worth $180,000, nominally. The poor man will double his small amount of money, and the rich man will double his large amount of money; but this will not equalize anything—unless there is some method not contained in the proposal by which we will take from the man who has too much and give to the man who has too little. It may come to that. Certainly, if the so called captains of industry and the chiefs of the large financial institutions do not open their eyes to the situation and come to an understanding with the leaders of state, whether federal, provincial or municipal, and create of their own goodwill and through a sense of the realities, a better distribution of wealth, a time will come—and probably sooner than we expect—when the distribution will be enforced by brutal means. That I do not wish, and for that reason I think it is better to deal with the evil now rather than to shut our eyes to the danger that lies ahead.

Being an old-fashioned man, Mr. Speaker, with a limited knowledge of economics, I think many of the remedies that have been propounded in this and other countries since the war, have one defect: they lack the good old quality of simplicity. I do not think any artificial means, legal or financial, will cure the evils of the world, and our own particular evils, until we all come back to our senses. Public bodies and individuals have more or less lost their heads for the last twenty years. The period of the war, and the short period following it, was a time of intense inebriation. What we need now is to get sober; but not by the old method of taking more gin or whiskey in the morning to cure the headache caused by the intoxication of the preceding evening. At one time that was very much the fashion, but I think that practice has been eliminated by common sense and proper hygiene. What we want is to get sober in the true sense of the word. We must get more economical. People should not be shown a way of spending as much or more money; they should be shown the way back to common sense by spending less. That is the lesson which should be learned and practised first by governments, by public bodies, by great industrialists and by all men who spend a good deal of money. It should be learned by all classes of people, from the wealthiest to the poorest. We must get back to the point where we live according to our means; and when we get to that point the poor will be entitled to better care by the rich and by public bodies.

The immediate object which this government should have in mind is a reduction in debt and in expenditure. Of course they have to discriminate; of course they have to think of the immediate needs of the people who must be helped; but frankly if the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), who is a man of common sense and of judgment, had been given time to look at the figures showing the expenditures of each department of the government and compare them with the expenditures of each department twenty years ago, would he not have found some means of reducing the expenditures of the country to a much larger extent, at the same time giving the people who are in dire need what they may require in the way of work, food and clothing?

Then we want a reduction in debts. I am not going to discuss that question at length, because in order to cover the whole issue one would have to consider the international situation. May I simply suggest to the government that they should miss no opportunity in their relations with the British government and with foreign governments, at Geneva and elsewhere, to enhance and foster against all odds and upon all occasions the need of a reduction and even of a cancellation of all war debts? Until that has been done, the world will find no rest, and there is no possibility of an adjustment.

Now, sir, I come to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). May I say that I read his excellent speech with much interest, particularly the first part of it; but to speak quite frankly, when I came to the end of his remarks and read the amendment I was simply dumbfounded. He gave a broad criticism covering the whole of the budget, with breadth of mind and common sense, and then reduced it all to a small motion confined to the tariff. It seems as if the tariff question has monopolized the minds of a certain number of members in this house; but surely men of broad views, possessing a fair knowledge of things social, economic and political, ought to realize that in the present state of affairs the tariff is but a small issue in our whole economic problem. Of course, the tariff has to be considered, and I recognize the right of every group and every individual to their own views in that regard; but when the government comes along with a budget which practically does not touch the tariff at all, how can the opposition gain much confidence throughout the country by reducing its policy to a consideration of the tariff?

Possibly it may be said that in his amendment the hon. member condemns the policy of the government in dealing with these matters by order in council. Well and good; but why was not the amendment so framed as to condemn the policy of dealing with all matters by order in council? I offered the opposition that chance last year, when I presented a motion condemning the practice of determining policies by orders in council, especially in relation to the Russian embargo; but, frightened by fits of terror on the part of some of their friends from Quebec because the word "Russia" was mentioned, they did not dare vote for a motion condemning in much broader terms the policy adopted by the present government of dealing with these matters by orders in council. In the present amendment the opposition condemns only one policy effected by order in council. I suppose next session they will move another amendment condemning the order in council dealing with insurance companies; two years hence probably they will move another amendment condemning the order in council dealing with bank values, and three years hence they may move still another amendment condemning some other order in council, and so on, until after a decade the people of Canada may be able to find out what is the policy of the Liberal party.

Mr. SPOTTON: They never will.

Mr. BOURASSA: If they do not, they will find out the sooner what is the policy of the Conservative party, and the Liberals will benefit thereby.

Now to come to the budget. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has received so many compliments that I am diffident about adding to them. Undoubtedly all those compliments are deserved. As an old-fashioned man, may I add one observation? He has proven that even in the exposition of a dry summary of figures, it does not spoil anything to be a gentleman and speak as a gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER: Is any comparison meant?

Mr. BOURASSA: All comparisons are odious. If the task of the government—and I presume they consider it as such—is by their budget to apply to the problems of the next twelve months a fairly safe and makeshift policy in order to collect money enough to pay what they expect to spend, then I think it is a good budget. Taking only the financial aspect, I do not begrudge the Prime Minister all the praise that he deserves in that respect. He has a great capacity in those matters. Of all the public men in Canada to-day he is probably the best financier. And he has proven it in the last twelve months. His followers having empowered him to rule as a dictator, parliament having abdicated to him, I will not say its rights, but its functions and duties, he is undoubtedly the best man to deal with the purely financial aspect of the situation. One of the Prime Minister's followers, in his juvenile enthusiasm, has said that the right hon. gentleman outshines Mussolini. Perhaps next year someone will say that Napoleon Bonaparte is blushing in his tomb at the idea that a much bigger man has succeeded him in the estimation of the world. But, I repeat, all comparisons are odious.

Simply on the matter of finance, authority having been given to the government to meet the situation as they please, I think the Prime Minister has done what he should have done, and has done it well. His order in council to prohibit the export of gold, the moment the government found out what the result would be of the sudden change of policy in Great Britain, was effective. The manner in which he launched and reaped the result of his conversion loan was excellent. I do not share the view of my friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth, that the Prime Minister does not deserve any credit because the people of Canada gave him the money, and will lose by the exchange of their loans. From the purely financial point of view, it was very clever on the part of the Prime Minister to take advantage of a moment of panic, when the people were afraid to risk their money in industry or elsewhere and were gathering up their capital and savings, to invite them to give him that money. So long as the people of Canada and the money investors trust the Prime Minister, it was very clever on his part to hold out his hand and grab their millions at the moment he did—and the treasury has been benefited thereby.

With regard to the national service loan, I am bound to express some little doubt.

When the loan was launched and over-subscribed, the Montreal Gazette—which is one day of the week the organ of the Tory party in Ottawa, another day the organ of the so-called Liberal government in Quebec, and all other days the organ of the Bank of Montreal and high finance—the Montreal Gazette expressed its horror at the idea of the government of Canada accepting $71,000,000 more than what had been asked for. It considered this a breach of faith with the subscribers because the amount asked for was to be limited to $150,000,000 and was for a precise object. Well, although I had no brief from the Prime Minister and his government to plead their case against the Montreal Gazette, next day I came out with an expression of my doubts as to the validity of the criticism of the financial men at the back of the Montreal Gazette. First, I dealt with the object of the loan. All that the prospectus —I have it in my hand—mentioned was that the proceeds of the loan would be used "to promote the economic and financial welfare of Canada." There was no limitation, it was just like the carte blanche which parliament gave the Prime Minister. Suppose the Prime Minister had seen fit, for "the economic and financial welfare of Canada," to erect to himself a statue, as did Nebuchadnezzar in years past, he could have spent $50,000,000 of that loan on a golden statue of himself somewhere in this city, and he would have been within the terms of the prospectus. He is to be congratulated on not having abused the carte blanche which was given to him by parliament in this regard as in all others.

But where I think the government went a little beyond the mark was in the use they made of the surplus. Of course, it was sheer nonsense to say that by accepting the $71,000,000 the value of the other $150,000,000 was diminished; ridiculous. There is no such thing as first, second or third mortgages for the various creditors of the government of Canada. All the resources of Canada are pledged to her creditors, whatever piece of paper they may have in their hands or their portfolios. Therefore, I submit the government was not at fault in accepting the over-subscription, but the use they made of it, I think, is matter for fair criticism. In his speech the other day the Minister of Finance explained that out of the surplus the government advanced $11,600,000 odd to the provinces, and devoted about $41,000,000 to cover deficits of the Canadian National Railways. Well, although nothing was mentioned in the prospectus, I do not believe that anybody who subscribed the $221,000,000 thought the government would make use of any portion of it to cover a part of the deficits of the Canadian National Railways so as to enable them to bring down a better budget. I will come back to that in a moment. It was centainly not contemplated, it was not mentioned, and I believe the sooner the government take steps to apply the whole of the $221,000,000 in reducing the outstanding debt of the country, or rather in substituting these new securities for the old securities that may become due before long, the closer they will be to carrying out their moral obligation towards the people of Canada.

With regard to the advances to the provinces, I have no hesitation in saying that the federal government only did what it had to do. I am not referring to the amounts or to the manner in which they were paid, I refer only to the basic principle that the government of Canada, being responsible for the credit of Canada as a whole, has not only the right but the duty to see that no public body in Canada goes by default and thereby creates a feeling in the financial world which will react against the credit of the government of Canada. So, in that respect I think the government did right. On the other hand, I do not agree absolutely with the view expressed the other day by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) in connection with the observations of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) in this regard. I do not think the criticism of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth warranted the comment that he was merely raising a technicality against these advances. The government did what it should have done, and what it may have to do again in the future, in coming to the rescue of the provinces; but surely some basis must be arrived at whereby the provinces and the government respectively would not be in the position of bankrupt clients at the mercy of their banker. As I understood the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, that was his contention, and in that respect I fully agree.

Mr. RHODES: I believe my hon. friend desires to be absolutely accurate, but I think he is in error when he says that Canadian obligations have been retired to the extent of $41,000,000. What I did say was that fifty odd millions were taken up in retired debts.

Mr. BOURASSA: I think the statement appears on page 1758 of Hansard; one column shows the Minister of Finance dealing with part of the deficit of the Canadian National Railways, and the other column shows him dealing with the provinces.

Mr. RHODES: These are the exact words:

As of this date, $50,745,000 of debt has been taken up, while over $11,600,000 is temporarily invested in provincial treasury bills.

Mr. BOURASSA: Later on the minister dealt with the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. HACKETT: That is temporary.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is dealt with at the head of the second column of page 1758.

Mr. RHODES: That has no reference to the surplus.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so, but there is something much more important than that. The duty of the government is not merely to make matters more or less right for twelve months. It has undertaken the obligation of providing some remedy, some permanent remedy for the situation now confronting Canada. Then I say that the matter of finance, important as it is, concerns only a small portion of the situation.

It may be considered to be a hobby of mine; but I have long advocated the necessity of a complete recasting of our taxation system. This system has grown up haphazardly through the various changes in government and the necessities of the times; but since the war, and largely on account of the war, the economic, social and financial condition of the world has been so completely altered as to make it impossible to maintain unaltered the old systems of finance and administration. I do not contend that these systems should be discarded entirely, but I do say that a deep study of these matters should be made by thinking men, irrespective of party and political creeds in matters of trade or tariffs, in order to find some basis of taxation which will result in bettering conditions for the people of Canada. It has been written of late, and I think quite rightly, that perhaps the greatest administrator in England during the last two centuries was Robert Walpole. This man's name was long a matter of obloquy, his reputation was much discussed; but in my opinion, in matters economic, he rendered better service to Great Britain than any other man. The permanent results of his policy were brought about because of the fact that in all matters of taxation and finance he endeavoured to arrive at a proper apportionment of sources of profit and of state burdens as between the different classes of the community. He was not a man of the city, he was a man of the country; he was not an instrument of the tradesmen, the agriculturists or the industrialists; he wanted to make matters such that all classes should derive a proper share of benefits and contribute a proper share of support to the maintenance of their country. I think the same thing might be said, although to a lesser degree, of Mr. Gladstone as a chancellor of the exchequer.

In connection with the income tax, I approve heartily of the reductions made in the exemptions. On the whole the proposals of the government are far in advance of those of last year. Nevertheless, I suggest, as I have suggested to predecessors of the minister, that in order to give social and economic justice, there should be a sharp difference as between salaries earned from year to year and income derived from invested capital. Proper means should also be taken to prevent debenture holders from defrauding the state as they have been doing ever since the income tax was established. These people do not declare their coupons because they are paid through the banks. I was told repeatedly by the late Mr. Leroux of Montreal, a gentleman who gave excellent service to the crown, that he was convinced the government had lost millions of dollars in the case of his own office alone. I have been told also by different accountants in Montreal, the most respected men in their profession, that estates with incomes of between $20,000 to $30,000 have not paid one cent of income tax for years, because all their holdings being invested in debentures payable to bearer, no declarations have been made, and no trace left of the evasions. In the past, I have suggested the affixing of a stamp to the coupons, as is done in England; but I have come to the conclusion that this would not be sufficient; the holders of large quantities of debentures would pay simply so much per hundred instead of paying on a sliding scale. The only way to handle these debentures is to adopt the method used in the case of stocks; force the debenture holders to inscribe their debentures, and then force the company to give a yearly report of the debentures inscribed, just as is done in the case of dividends paid on stocks. In this way the government could reach the debenture holder as it reaches the shareholder.

I come now to the excise tax. Why should not the government call this tax by its true name and term it a special customs duty? It is not an excise tax, it is a customs duty levied over and above the ordinary rates established by the customs tariff.

With regard to the sales tax, I claim, without discussing the rate now, because I have no time, that the tax should be levied at the end and not at the root; in other words, that it should be paid by the consumer when he purchases his needs instead of being charged to the manufacturer or the wholesale merchant. Under the present system the people do not know what proportion they pay to the government, what to the retailer, what to the wholesaler and what to the middleman. My authority for making this suggestion to the government is one which I think will commend itself to members on the other side of the house, that of their own Prime Minister when, sitting on this side, he stated emphatically that one of the essential things connected with taxation is that it should be visible. This kind of invisible taxation which enables a series of intermediaries to pile up profits, dividends and interest upon the sales tax they have paid to the government, is wrong. The government does not get the whole amount and the ratepayers do not realize what they are paying.

I shall not dwell upon the question of trade. I am glad, however, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth once more pricked that old bubble, a "favourable balance of trade." I well remember in the old days, disputes, discourses and debates between the two parties, the two main speakers of which were then Sir Richard Cartwright and Sir George Foster. How many illustrations and counter-examples I have heard about the favourable balance of trade! To reduce the question to an argument ad absurdum which should appeal to the common sense of the Minister of Finance, supposing by your trade policy, or as a result of existing conditions, all the imports of Canada were reduced to $500 and our exports reached the high sum of $1,000. Of course, you would have a favourable balance of trade of 100 per cent over your imports; but where would the Canadian people be? Undoubtedly, these things are very complex. I well remember the great fight in England on Mr. Chamberlain's proposals for trade reform. The strongest argument made against his reasoning about the decline in the trade balance was that of Mr. Asquith, regarding the amount of invisible trade, for example, the value of the shipbuilding industry and of the shipping trade, which were not tabulated in trade returns, but which meant to the people of England much more than the difference between imports and exports. I am giving that simply as an example to show that this shibboleth of favourable balance of trade does not mean much. What counts, after all, is what every man is capable of selling, what he gets for what he sells, what he is capable of purchasing, and what he pays for his purchases.

In closing may I say that if the budget is looked upon as a balance sheet of a private corporation, then it is a fairly well balanced sheet—with this little difference between a private concern and the government, that the Minister of Finance will endeavour, by taxing the people of Canada, to make good the deficit. Of course he does not expect that with this new taxation he will overcome his deficit next year; he knows he will not, and it would be far better to let the people of Canada know this. I suppose, as we do with children, he wants to give the medicine by doses, but I do not believe in deceit. It is just as well to tell the Canadian people that we are in for a few more black years; that they must prepare to pay more and to be more in debt, and therefore they must economize, economize and economize. The government and all the public and financial bodies should show them an example in this regard. It is no use buoying up the people with false hopes—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. BOURASSA: May I finish my sentence? All I want to say is this: I hope next year the Minister of Finance, after twelve months' experience, will present a budget as sensible as this in viewpoint of immediate accounting, but with a much broader aspect with regard to the deeper and general problem of fiscal and financial readjustment in Canada.

Mr. C. B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on his appointment to his new position, and also on the businesslike way in which he presented his first budget to the house the other day. I want also to say, so as not to cover the same ground except in a couple of places, that I agree one hundred per cent with the remarks made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) the other day in criticism of the budget. I must say that the budget was no surprise to me and was exactly as I had expected it would be, because after nearly two years of administration under the present government it is not surprising that the public debt should be increased. During the last seven years, from 1924 to 1930 inclusive, when hon. members on this side of the house were in power, the public debt of Canada was reduced by $276,000,000. Against that we must contrast conditions as they have been since the present government has been in power. According to the funded debt statement as supplied by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, the figures are as follows:

Year	Funded debt
1930..	$2,194,000,000
1931..	2,319,000,000
1932..	2,501,000,000

In other words, in the last seven years of the Liberal administration the funded debt was reduced by $276,000,000, whereas in less than two years under the present government it has been increased by $307,000,000.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the hon. member tell the house what is the relative position of the United States during the same period?

Mr. HOWARD: That is the argument which is usually put up in the house, and I should like to make this statement frankly: I cannot see what that has to do with Canadians. What I am interested in is the position of the people of Canada.

In passing, may I make this suggestion to the Minister of Finance, and I am sure in his fairmindedness he will accept it; when he presents his next budget twelve months from now, I would appreciate it very much if he would have it translated and presented to the house in both languages at the same time. There are many French newspapers throughout the country and it is a great hardship to them to have to translate the budget and publish it at the same time as it appears in English newspapers.

I remember sitting in the house last year when the former Minister of Finance, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), presented his budget. As reported on page 2168 of Hansard of 1931, he said:

> I shall come first of all to a statement of anticipated revenues and expenditures. I will admit that this is the first time for many years that this country has had a budget.

Then he estimated the revenues at $410,000,000, and he estimated that there would be a deficit of $7,000,000 in the operations for the past twelve months. Now for that period for which the former Minister of Finance estimated there would be a deficit of $7,000,000 we actually had a deficit of $119,000,000. In other words, the former Minister of Finance was $112,000,000 out in his calculations for those twelve months, and that is some difference.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) criticized very severely the manner of presentation of former budgets. May I say to him in passing that in comparing the two administrations, we want the Liberal government to be judged on performance, and I am sure that the present government will have to be judged on its promises. In presenting the budget the other day the Minister of Finance on page 1751 of Hansard gave a summary of all revenues for five-year periods. I shall take only the figures for the last year of the Liberal administration, as given by the Minister of Finance. The revenues in 1930 amounted to $446,000,000, and during the past year they dropped to $334,000,000, or a decrease of nearly $112,000,000 under the present government as compared with the last year under the former administration. Against those revenues, according to this same table supplied by the Minister of Finance, the expenditures during the last year of the late Liberal administration were $398,000,000, and last year the expenditures under the present government were $454,000,000, or an increase in expenditure of almost $56,000,000, plus a declining revenue of $112,000,000. If we were the directors of a corporation whose business manager presented any such statement as that to the board, I leave it to the judgment of the house to say what would happen to him.

Dealing as concisely as I can with some other figures which I wish to give to the house, the estimated taxation revenue for this year is $273,000,000, and with the tax increases proposed that amount should be raised to $319,000,000. The Finance minister estimates that at the end of this year's operations he will have a surplus of $4,300,000. Well, all I can say with regard to that estimate is that I hope the year's operations will come nearer to the estimate than was the case with the estimate of the former Minister of Finance.

I do not wish to criticize the budget in detail, but there are a few comments which I wish to make before taking it up in another way. First a word as to the sales tax. The Business Week of March 16, 1932, commenting on the sales tax, says:

> Heavy sales taxation is a stigma that attaches to the fiscal system of every backward and benighted nation, and is an underlying cause of their backwardness because it retards business expansion and the development of new industries.

If, as some hon. gentlemen opposite suggest, the sales tax is to be passed on to the consumer, then it immediately becomes a poor man's income tax. Take the case of two men, one with an income of three thousand dollars and the other with an income of ten thousand dollars. The house must realize that regardless of what a person's income is, almost any two people will consume about the same amount of certain commodities—soap, for instance. The sales tax on soap will therefore represent a greater percentage of the three thousand dollar income than of the ten thousand dollar income. On the other hand, some hon. gentlemen may say that the manufacturer will absorb the tax. Let me give an illustration in that connection. In the city of Sherbrooke a certain manufacturer is producing a product which sells in the markets of the world to the amount of $100,000. In an adjoining city another manufacturer is producing a product which sells to the amount of $100,000. Each of these manufacturers pays $6,000 into the treasury under this proposed taxation, but if one manufacturer has a profit of $15,000 on his turnover, and the other a profit of $20,000, it means that the man with the less profit will pay 40 per cent as compared with the other man's 15 per cent, and that I say is unfair.

I notice that the stamp tax on cheques has been raised to six cents on every cheque over $100. I cannot see that that will make much difference because during the last year and a half the cheques drawn in my constituency for over $100 were very much fewer than they used to be.

But if we are to accept the budget as the inevitable consequence of the government's policies in the past, I appeal to the government now to say what their policies are going to be in the future to remedy the situation in this country within the next twelve months. What is their policy to be in connection with industry during the next twelve months? What is their policy to be in connection with agriculture, and every member of the house knows the deplorable condition of agriculture in this country? What is their policy to be in connection with unemployment? What is their policy to be in connection with finance? What is their policy to be in connection with trade? If this budget is to be imposed upon the people and the people are to be called upon to deny themselves to meet this increased taxation, we have a right to know what the government policies will be upon the five subjects that I have just enumerated.

Touching for a moment on the trade figures, I find that in 1930, the last year of the Liberal administration, the total foreign trade of Canada, imports and exports combined, was $2,393,000,000. One year later, in 1931, that figure had shrunk to $1,723,000,000, and for the year ending March 31, 1932, the figure had shrunk still further to $1,166,000,000, or less than fifty per cent of what the trade of this country was when the Liberal government went out of power. I attribute a great deal of that shrinkage in the trade of this country to the tariff policies of this government, and again I ask the government, what is their tariff policy going to be in the next twelve months, so that industry and agriculture and labour will know what is going to happen to them. I notice that in making these remarks I am in agreement with the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) who, at page 2636 of Hansard of April 20, 1926, condemned the government of that day because they had made tariff changes without first referring them to a tariff board for consideration, and he moved an amendment which concluded with these words:

> And this house regrets that in the case of drastic changes announced in the budget such assurances—

That is, assurances to refer the proposed changes to the tariff board:

> —have not been fulfilled.

I ask him this question: During the last twelve months how have the changes in the tariff been made? When I ask for a statement of the policy of the present government, I must refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) who said that these changes should be decried by everybody because they were not made on business principles. I believe those changes were made in the manner described by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, because of pressure in certain places by certain manufacturers who either were or were not friends of the government. The changes in the tariff which have been made by order in council I would call grasshopper tariff regulations, and I make that classification advisedly. After all, if there is one thing which requires stability, certainly that thing is the changing of the tariff. A man wants to know what the present tariff on an article is, and what it is going to be. After he has shipped the goods he does not want to learn that the rate has been changed to such an extent that he cannot enter the market.

The two greatest problems before Canada to-day are those concerning our railways and the deepening of the St. Lawrence river. Neither of these matters has been submitted to the house during this session, and the subjects which have been brought up for discussion, and most of the bills considered, have been of very little interest to Canada. Certainly their importance is small when we compare them with the outstanding questions we should consider. I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members the position, as I see it, of labour, agriculture and finance. Two years ago government financing was done at an interest rate of only four and one-half per cent. At that time labourers were receiving about forty cents an hour, and receipts for agricultural products were on a fairly profitable basis. What is the position to-day? I think the conditions obtaining in this particular connection are more serious than any other phase of the problem. The rates of interest on government financing have increased to five per cent, six per cent and six and one-quarter per cent. Wages have gone below twenty cents an hour, and the prices for agricultural products are lower than they have been during the past twenty-five years. This condition of affairs cannot continue. The rate of interest on money cannot be maintained by depreciating the wages paid to labour and the prices of agricultural products. The rates of interest must come down to a reasonable basis; wages must go up, and there must be fair receipts on the sale of agricultural products, if we are to maintain a business equilibrium in Canada.

I shall now direct my remarks to the question of unemployment, and appeal to the government to proclaim their policy for the next twelve months. I do not like to repeat the promises made, but I am tempted to quote the words of the Prime Minister at Regina on June 12, 1930:

> This is a new country, and there is no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government does its duty.

Speaking in Moncton on July 10, he said:

> The Conservative party is going to find work for all who are willing to work, or perish in the attempt, and take such steps as will end this tragic condition of unemployment and bring prosperity to the country as a whole.

And then this further appeal was made to the electors.

> Mr. King promises consideration of the problem of unemployment; I promise to end unemployment. Which plan do you like best?

For the information of hon. members I should like to present some figures concerning unemployment. I have before me a list of unemployment statistics for about twenty countries. These figures, which are for the last twelve months, show that Great Britain is second from the bottom, unemployment in that country having increased only 12 per cent. Canada, however, is fifth from the top, unemployment having increased by 80 per cent. I have before me a letter from the secretary-treasurer of the city of Sherbrooke comparing the unemployment situation of 1931 with that of 1932. The total number of unemployed in Sherbrooke in 1931 was 1,201; to-day it is 1,812.

I should like to outline the assistance given to the unemployed in the city of Sherbrooke. Possibly the facts I am about to disclose will indicate at least one reason why agricultural products are selling at such a low level. Single men are allowed to work one day per week at 25 cents an hour for an eight hour day, yielding $2, on which they must subsist. Married men without children receive two days work each week at the same rate, yielding $4; married men with families work three days a week at the same rate, and receive $6. The total number of unemployed who got employment from the city in the year 1931 was 945; this year on February 24, 1,614 were receiving employment.

In the city of Sherbrooke we supply those without funds with free wood, and I should like to run over a few of the figures in this connection. I shall place on Hansard the following record of delivery of wood:

Month—Year	Amount
October, 1931	213 loads
November, 1931	361 loads
December, 1931	766 loads
February, 1932	949 loads

Month—Year	Amount
October, 1930	148 loads
November, 1930	270 loads
December, 1930	613 loads
February, 1930	770 loads

This shows the situation as to unemployment relief. I suggest when the government asks for increased taxation, at least it should tell the house its policy in connection with unemployment relief.

I should like to tell hon. members something about the industrial situation in Sherbrooke. A few days ago the Prime Minister referred to the silk industry of that city, and made the statement that that industry was in a prosperous condition. We have two silk industries in Sherbrooke which produce 60 per cent of all the full-fashioned silk hosiery manufactured in Canada, or ten per cent more than half. Those industries are fairly prosperous, although I shall give some figures in a few moments which may indicate that during the past year sales have been much lower. The profit is lower than it was previously, the 3 per cent excise on the raw material, the ten per cent depreciation in currency, the eleven per cent profit tax, and the six per cent sales tax will be detrimental to those industries. I am waiting to learn the result of next year's operations.

Our specialty steel manufacturers, which used to employ 75 hands, now employ only 15. This year those employees are working only 28 hours per week as against 35 last year. There is a wage reduction of ten per cent and the foundry is closed entirely. Further, I shall relate the conditions in connection with our largest steel manufacturing industry. The pay-roll to-day shows 200 or 300 men less than it did at peak periods, and in that large industry the foundry is closed alternate weeks. This year the plant is operating only four days per week, while last year it operated five.

One of our textile industries has dropped twelve employees; they are paying $500 per week less wages, and the value of their product has dropped 40 per cent. Another textile industry which formerly employed 1,500 hands employs now only 200 or 300, some of which work two days and others three days per week. Only a few work the full week. Another industry reports that business has dropped 40 per cent during the last year; it has reduced the number of its employees 20 per cent, and is working four days a week as compared with five and a half days last year. Another steel industry states its profits this year are much less than they were last year; they are working one hour less per day and the number of employees has been reduced by ten per cent. Here is a rubber industry doing only one-half the business of last year, with wages 15 per cent less and the number of employees reduced by 10 per cent. Here is another steel industry; whose volume of business this year is only one-sixth what it was last year; wages are down 25 per cent; the number of employees has been reduced 40 per cent and they are working a seven-hour day and a five-day week as against a ten-hour day and six-day week last year. Another steel industry which ordinarily employs about 150 men last year employed about 80, and I consulted the manager of that company last Friday and found that the company was now employing only 7 men. Consider what that means, with the overhead and everything else, and only 7 employees working. It means the company will have to draw on its surplus, dividends will be passed and so on; it also means no work for the labouring men and no wages with which to pay the bills of their families.

I was surprised to learn the facts connected with another manufacturing concern in Sherbrooke. It went out of business two weeks ago, loaded all its machinery on freight cars and shipped it back to the United States. Formerly this concern employed 40 hands, but it will do no more business in Canada. Last year our Sherbrooke street railway suspended operations. I am not trying to find fault with my own town, but I do wish to place before this government the gravity of the situation, and to appeal to them again to tell us what they are going to do to settle the unemployment problem, what they intend to do for industry, and what they are going to do for our trade, because if we have no trade we will have no labour and no industries in this country.

I should like to give just one more outstanding example of what this grasshopper tariff legislation can do for a country. In the budget presented last year by the right hon. Prime Minister a one per cent excise tax was imposed on all imports, including lumber. It must be remembered that a very small quantity of lumber comes into Canada in comparison with the enormous quantity of lumber we export to the United States, but the one per cent excise tax was applied, and what happened? In the United States tariff law there is a provision, which I will not read, that if Canada, for instance, applies a duty against United States lumber, that country will apply a duty of $1 per thousand feet against lumber entering the United States from Canada. That stopped shipments of Canadian lumber to the United States. It did not take long to get some action; delegations stormed Ottawa, and the then Minister of Finance saw that a serious mistake had been made. By order in council, again, he amended the tariff and took off the one per cent excise tax on lumber. The Prime Minister was trying to blast his way into the markets of the world; this was one of his experiments. Uncle Sam was not satisfied with that action, however; he said, "That is a very good order in council, but I am sorry we will still have to apply the duty of $1 against Canadian lumber." Then what happened? This government had to pass another order in council making that regulation retroactive, so that it was as though the one per cent tax had never applied to lumber, and they had to refund all the money collected up to that time. That demonstrates the extraordinary habit of this government of changing duties, applying taxes and granting exemptions without due consideration.

Before I leave the question of industry there is another point with which I should like to deal. At page 54 of Hansard the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

> Incidentally to the discharge of these obligations we have improved employment in Canada.

I am not going to answer that statement, but I cannot understand how it could have been made. The Prime Minister then said:

There are a hundred more industries in this country than there were when the present government came into power.

The hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards) said there were 157 new industries, and yesterday the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) said there were 142 What are the facts?

Mr. HACKETT: They are increasing every day.

Mr. HOWARD: The Prime Minister knows, and the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) knows, that before making a statement of that kind consideration should be given the number of factories which have closed their doors. As a matter of fact, during the period in which one hundred new industries came to Canada, 464 industries closed their doors.

Now I wish to touch on agriculture. This question does not affect the county of Sherbrooke so greatly, but it will have to be dealt with by my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Gobeil), my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), my hon. friend from Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) and my hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Tétreault) when the time comes. I would like to have time to compare some of the ministers of agriculture of the past with the present minister, but I never deal with personalities. I will only say that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) from his place in this house called an hon. member on this side a back bencher. I want to say to the minister that the only difference between himself and a back bencher is that a back bencher is a future cabinet minister who has not lost touch with the common people.

This week, coming through the city of Montreal, I learned to my surprise that the new price for milk, which will be announced on April 15, will be $1.35 per hundred pounds delivered in Montreal. If you take off 35 cents a hundred for express it means that $1 per hundred will be paid for milk delivered in Montreal. I do not want to criticize those engaged in the milk business in that city; I know something about that business, but they will sell it at $4 per hundred. If this government were alive to the situation surely they could at least reduce the price of milk to the consumer or, better still, increase the price to the farmer, and God knows he needs it.

In going over the estimates this year and noticing the way they have been curtailed I marvelled that the ministers of the crown, knowing the condition of agriculture, should have consented to the reduction of the agricultural estimates by some $3,000,000. I do not criticize the idea of lessening our expenditures, but if there is one place where under present conditions this government has no right to curtail expenditures it is in connection with the agriculture of Canada. I would ask the members from the eastern townships what they are going to do with regard to the Sherbrooke exhibition, which up to this year has been granted $5,000 yearly by the Dominion government. That money does not go into the treasury of the Sherbrooke fair; it represents one-third of the amount paid directly to the farmers in that part of the country. Now this government have cut off that grant; in other words they have refused to pay one-third of the prize money given the farmers of the eastern townships. What did the Quebec government do? They are just as hard up as this government is and their situation is just as bad. But the Quebec government are paying two-thirds, or $10,000, to the Sherbrooke fair. Although this government has gone back on agriculture in the eastern townships, the Quebec government are paying their $10,000 just the same, and they have also given $2,500 to apply on the deficit of last year.

May I, Mr. Speaker, place upon Hansard certain comparative figures with regard to prices of farm products. Each year I have watched this situation, and I have before me the prices for February 15, 1930, February 15, 1931, and yesterday's prices. These are taken from the Montreal Gazette. In 1930 eggs sold at 50 cents a dozen. That is what the farmers in the eastern townships were getting when the Mackenzie King government was in power. In 1931 eggs sold at 30 cents a dozen. Yesterday the price of eggs was 22 cents, in fact, some extras were sold at 19 cents. In 1930 butter fat sold at 42 cents a pound; in 1931 at 33 cents a pound; and yesterday at 21 cents. Fluid milk brought 7 cents a quart in 1930, 5 cents in 1931, and 4 cents yesterday. Butter was selling at 37 cents a pound in 1930, and the farmers were fooled and voted against the King administration because the price dropped 5 cents a pound at that time, but last year the price receded to 30 cents a pound, and yesterday it was only 17 cents a pound. This week farmers' butter was selling at 10 cents a pound in Lennoxville. Live stock prices have dropped in the same proportion.

Does the Minister of Finance realize the situation in which our eastern township farmers find themselves to-day? Any farmer who has no mortgage interest to meet and food in his cellar can at least get three meals a day, but the farmer whose land is encumbered cannot meet even his interest payments. Within the last two months two farmers who had put all their money into their farms and were financially embarrassed saw their property sold over their heads to speculators, and those speculators have since come to this government to ask assistance under the farm loan credit legislation.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said the Prime Minister is supposed to be an expert in finance. If I had time I should like to talk about the financing that has been done by this government during the past two years. Take the conversion loan. It is true our people came across with their money. But, as member for the county of Sherbrooke, I feel a terrible responsibility, because men of that county came to me and said, "We are invited to convert our victory bonds. Do you think, Mr. Howard, we should do so?" I am proud of the answer I gave them, but, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for the results. But, the results would have been different if we had not had a change of government. I told those men, "If the government want you to convert your bonds I think you should do so." They converted their bonds. What happened? Insiders of this government did not convert their bonds; the people of Sherbrooke and the eastern townships did. To-day their bonds are selling at 92, and the bonds that those insiders did not convert are selling at 104. When I look around and see the lack of confidence, the financial hysteria that has overcome this country, I am appalled. I stand here as a business man, and if I could do anything to inspire confidence in our people I would do so. I think we have the best banking system in the world, but the banks of Canada and this government are one, they are working together. Surely they could work together in such a way as to show better results.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. MacNicol): The hon. gentleman has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the clarity and comprehensiveness of his statement. He began with a review of the events which have so profoundly influenced international finance and reacted on our own stiuation. In that review he asserted:

> The world is close knit to-day in matters of trade and finance as never before in history . . . and we cannot expect normal or prosperous conditions apart from the general world trend.

[Mr. Howard.]

I agree heartily with this statement, and, so far as I can recall, it is the best we have had on our international relationships. But I could have wished that the Minister of Finance had gone a little bit further and offered some definite course of action which would have helped to promote some sort of international solution. The budget does not indicate any international cooperation whatever. Let me give one or two illustrations as to how this lack may affect us. Out in the west all our agricultural arrangements are built up on the principle of a large export crop. Within the last few years the export markets have been very largely closed. So far as I can see the situation, there is no future for western agriculture unless the markets in Europe, or possibly in the orient, are open, and yet there is no indication whatever that the government is taking any steps through which we might hope for an opening-up of markets for western wheat.

Moreover, the tariff arrangements, in the last few months have been such as to make more difficult the selling of our goods abroad. Doctor Marvin, an economist of the Royal bank, in a recent address before the Canadian club of Toronto, as reported in the Financial Times of February 26, said:

> Tariff barriers have hindered the free interchange of goods, and the recent increases in tariffs are more than likely to delay recovery.

I presume Doctor Marvin was speaking of world tariffs, but what is true of tariffs in Europe is equally true of tariffs on this continent. There is no indication that our own government is giving any lead in the direction of lowering those tariffs and thus making possible a greater measure of international cooperation.

I was very glad to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) deal with the question of finance. Up to a very short time ago we in this corner had very little support when we mentioned matters of finance. I am hoping that before very long the minister will get a little further than to think that if we have bimetalism we shall have solved our problems. He did, however, advance some very sound propositions. In this connection I would quote a further extract from Doctor Marvin's address:

> The price level depends upon the ratio of credit and production. When credit expands excessively prices rise, and when credit is unduly contracted prices fall . . . volume of credit has fallen faster than volume of production . . . it is this relationship which has produced falling prices. . . . There cannot be a return to the price level of 1926-28 unless credit expansion is more rapid than increase in production, and a return to that price level is essential if the world's load of indebtedness is to be tolerable.

I am not very much concerned in keeping the world's indebtedness as it is, but I would point out that unless it is made tolerable, the present system is in danger of eminent collapse. Although the government presumably is in favour of maintaining the present system, it is taking no steps to ensure that it will extend even for a comparatively limited period.

Let us consider our rigid adherence to gold as the basis of currency and credit. In his very admirable review the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) said that gold was ceasing to be a medium of exchange and was becoming instead a commodity to be jealously guarded. If that is true, I cannot for the life of me understand why the Minister of Finance should not take steps to get away from the gold standard. If gold is ceasing to perform its primary function, that is, to permit the exchange of goods, why should we continue to use it as the basis of our medium of exchange? Why not select some other medium which would enable us to perform the task of effecting exchange? However, if the minister is determined to cling to the gold standard, then I have a suggestion to make. Why not expropriate the gold mines of this country and enlist an army of unemployed to work those mines to the very limit? If gold is to be the basis of our credit system and if the recovery of prosperity of this country is to depend upon the increase in gold, then let us work our gold mines and get things started. Instead of doing that, we are passing over to private individuals whatever profits may be made out of gold. Apparently we cannot produce sufficient gold to form a basis upon which our credit can be extended and prosperity brought back.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): If the hon. member had money at his command, would he invest it in a gold mine and employ unemployed to work it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not talking about private investments; I am saying that if gold is necessary as a basis the government should expropriate the gold mines and produce enough to form a basis for the additional credit which is declared to be necessary. As I said a moment ago, as far as I am concerned I do not believe in retaining the gold standard. I do not believe gold is necessary as a medium of exchange. In western Canada, we have an abundance of agricultural products, in eastern Canada we have agricultural machinery and textiles and I cannot see why these two sets of commodities cannot be exchanged directly or that some simple medium for their exchange cannot be invented. Under present conditions we have to send people into the mines of northern Ontario to blast out the rock, to crush the rock to powder and extract the gold in order that we may affect an exchange of the wheat of the west for the textiles and machinery of the east. It seems to me to be an absurd arrangement.

Mr. COOTE: And then they cannot seem to arrange it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And it cannot be arranged even then.

There is an incidental matter to which I shall refer for a moment. The revenue from public services is given as $54,000,000, the greater part being from the post office, which shows an increase of $1,500,000. Since this is true, I suggest that in these times of depression we attempt to give public ownership a chance and extend public service into other fields. The government is expected to carry on non-profit bearing enterprises and leave the profit-bearing to private individuals. Coming down on the train I was talking to a gentleman about the output of the briquetting plant near Estevan. I understand that this is a fairly remunerative proposition, it being now in the hands of an American company. Hon. members who have been in the house for some years will remember that large sums of money were paid out for experimental work in the development of that briquetting plant. I do not see why, when we develop an enterprise of this kind, we cannot hold on to it and make it produce revenue for the country and give service to the people rather than turn it over to a private concern.

The Minister of Finance was able to report that he had balanced the budget so far as current services were concerned, but I ask: What has been the cost to the country as a whole for this balancing of the budget? I venture to say that the minister's method of balancing has made it more difficult for the majority of the people to balance their own private budgets. There has been a lessening of income because of increased taxation and an increase in other costs because of customs duties and so on. Although this problem may have been settled from the standpoint of the minister, it means that most of us will have difficulty in balancing our own budgets.

This balancing has been effected in two ways, by a reduction in expenditure, that is, by the cutting down of staffs, salaries and services, and by increased taxation. I suggest respectfully to the Minister of Finance that there are other ways in which the budget might have been balanced. It might have been balanced by increasing the taxes on great wealth, it might have been balanced by the cutting down of debts, or it might have been balanced by the concurrent application of both methods.

The minister referred to uncontrollable expenditures which include debt charges, pensions, ex-soldier welfare work, provincial subsidies and other writings, aggregating altogether $236,000,000, or 62 per cent of the total debt. I always object to the word "uncontrollable," I do not like to think that bondholders are in a class by themselves and that we cannot touch anything which concerns them. Let me point out to the house that the real value of these debts has practically doubled since they were contracted. We heard a great deal this afternoon from the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards) about cloth. Supposing he contracted to deliver one hundred yards of cloth; the yardstick is three feet in length but if in some mysterious way that yardstick was stretched to six feet, I wonder if he would like to have to fulfil his contract and deliver one hundred yards of six feet each. That is precisely what we are asked to do with regard to our debts. There has been a contraction of credit, price levels have fallen and the purchasing power of the dollar to-day is practically twice what it was when these debts were contracted. We are continuing to pay interest on bonds based on their face value, and that seems to me to be absolutely unjustifiable ethically. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) a few moments ago was speaking of the iniquity of paying dividends on watered stock, but it seems to me to be equally iniquitous to ask this country to pay interest on the the face value of bonds when their real value has doubled since the time they were issued.

An hon. MEMBER: That is unearned increment?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is unearned increment with a vengeance. The owners have no right whatever to this increased increment.

The hon. member for Labelle seemed to be afraid of artificially tinkering with price levels. But I would point out that the rise or fall in the price level can be and is definitely brought about by the increase or the contraction of credit or by the increase or decrease in the amount of currency. The price level has been changed; why not change it back? The other day Sir Josiah Stamp, at that luncheon which many members were privileged to attend, said that every change in price level means a change in distribution of wealth. In saying that, he was taking the ground which was taken by Mr. Irving Fisher some years ago, in 1924, I think, when he appeared before the banking and commerce committee of this house:

> Every change in price level means a change in distribution of wealth.

We have been doing that on a wholesale scale; hundreds of millions of dollars have been transferred from one set of pockets into another. That is undoubtedly true; no one can controvert it. That is why I say we ought not to call these "uncontrollable" expenditures, but we ought to deal with that side of our account just as much as we do with the other.

Mr. COOTE: Just as Australia did.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. A ten per cent cut in the salaries of the civil service has been justified on the ground of lower price levels; it is said that civil service employees will be just as well off at ten per cent less salary as they were a few years ago at the salaries they then received. If there is any justification whatever for cutting down salaries because of the change in the price level, there is the same justification for cutting down the bonds to the point where they represent the purchasing power which they had when the bonds were issued. Even after you have cut the bonds in two, I would suggest that is no reason why bondholders should be exempt from taxation. There may be some difficulty with the foreign investor, but as regards bonds held by the investor in Canada we could easily impose a tax involving a reduction in his interest of, say one or two per cent. This would bring in revenues to a much greater extent than is done by the taxes which are imposed under the budget. There is, of course, a certain consolation which comes to me in viewing the whole situation, namely, that it is only a matter of time until most of these debts will be cancelled in any case. Doctor Marvin, in that speech to which I have previously referred, said:

> Prices must rise—

That means inflation or "anti-deflation" or "reflation" as they call it in the United States.

> Prices must rise or there will be a wholesale cancellation or repudiation of such debts.

He was speaking of international debts, but what is true of international debts is surely equally true of internal debts, and unless our bondholders are a little less greedy than they have been in the past, they may take warning that it will be only a certain time before they must relinquish the whole instead of a part of what they now claim.

The minister has, as I have said, brought about a balancing in the budget, in part by reduction in expenditures, but while this may help to balance the budget it is having a very serious effect upon the country. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), who preceded me, referred to the reductions that had taken place in the services given to agriculture. That may prove to be very serious in western Canada. For example, we are threatened with an outbreak of the grasshopper plague. I am told that although some were killed off last year, the eggs are still there and we are likely to have a plague this year. Nevertheless, large numbers of our entomologists have been laid off. That is very short-sighted economy. When we so much need every agricultural aid, it is absurd to cut down the chances which the farmer may have of making a living or from the standpoint of the mortgage companies, of paying his debts.

I come now to the additional taxation. How is this to be raised? Out of $55,000,000, some $40,000,000 or over two-thirds is to be raised through sales tax, import duties and nuisance taxes. Only a very small proportion is to be raised by direct taxation, a tax on incomes. This is in considerable contrast to the situation in other countries. In Great Britain 60 per cent of the revenue was raised last year through income and estate tax. In the United States, under the latest tax bill, 38 per cent was raised through income and estate tax. In Canada last year only 24 per cent was raised through income tax. I cannot see why we should not extend our income tax to at least the level which exists in the United States. This year, of course, we cannot tell exactly what the income tax will bring in, but the rate is so arranged that the tax will fall more heavily on the moderately well-to-do than on the very wealthy. The increases are as follows:

$ 4,000	100 per cent
10,000	53 per cent
20,000	40 per cent
50,000	33 per cent
100,000	32 per cent
1,000,000	31 per cent

Surely these figures ought to be reversed. The millionaires have been very gently dealt with by the Minister of Finance. As regards the discrimination against the poor man to which I have referred, might I quote from an advertisement which has appeared in our papers within the last few days. I quote from a three-quarter page advertisement in the Citizen of April 11, sponsored by the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association, as follows:

> The true nature of this unlaboured progress of Canada in motion is revealed in the fact that dividends amounting to $226,351,000 were paid by Canadian corporations in 1931, an increase of $32,500,000 over the average of the six years ending 1930, and $50,000,000 better than any year previous to 1929.

That is, in this time of depression enormous dividends are being paid; a comparatively small number of people are doing very well indeed. In spite of this we find in the speech from the throne, which I looked up after reading this, the following words:

> I sincerely congratulate you on the fortitude and patience with which the people of Canada have borne the hardships of this period of depression and maintained their usual high regard for law and order.

I am not at all sure that fortitude and patience are a virtue under those conditions. I do not know how much longer the people of Canada are going to stand for the building up of still larger fortunes by the rich when the masses are suffering from this terrific taxation and the various hardships which are brought about by the policy under which we are living to-day.

In one portion of the Finance minister's budget statement I find the following:

> In order to protect the credit of Canada as a whole, temporary assistance was given to certain of the provinces in meeting their obligations.

The minister went on to give the loans to the different provinces, as follows: Manitoba, $2,938,918; Saskatchewan, $10,934,341; Alberta, $4,142,000; British Columbia, $4,371,664. My colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has given full credit to the Finance minister for his attitude in helping out the western provinces, but I would point out that in my opinion the province was given a very small sum, and the Winnipeg Tribune, which is usually a strong supporter of the present government, charges discrimination against Manitoba. In its issue of January 13 last, in an editorial entitled Politics Everywhere I read:

> The Bennett government is taking a quiet hand in the political game. It is refusing measures of financial cooperation to the Bracken government which it would readily and cheerfully afford a provincial government of its own political stripe.

I think that is a very serious charge. I do not know the details—

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): But is it true?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I say that when a newspaper that is a strong supporter of the government makes a charge of that kind, we ought to have some statement with regard to the matter. I think we all do know something about a later transaction than that in connection with the provincial savings bank of Manitoba, which was forced to close its doors a few weeks ago. We do know that Mr. Bracken, the premier of the province of Manitoba, appealed to the Prime Minister of Canada for help, and at first it was refused. Later. after some negotiations, the Prime Minister took the matter into his consideration, and finally on February 9 he wired to Premier Bracken:

> You will be advised by code telegram to-morrow the terms on which your proposals will be accepted.

There came no further word from the Prime Minister. The next communication to Mr. Bracken was from the banks, a telegram dated February 11, which reads in part as follows:

> Referring to your previous conversations with bankers and also with the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister's message to you last night, banks represented in Winnipeg are willing to assume deposit liabilities if you address a communication in the following terms to them.

Here is a message from the private banks to a provincial government saying that "if you address a communication in the following terms to them," then there followed a number of definite conditions, among which I find the following:

> The government of the province of Manitoba will within a period not exceeding fourteen days from the date hereof convene the legislature and repeal said chapter 174 and amendments thereto.

That is I believe the statute providing for the establishment of a provincial savings bank in Manitoba. Premier Bracken protested against some of the conditions dictated to him by the banks. Negotiations went on for a little time and the banks finally consented to his plea that the legislation should not be repealed, but Premier Bracken agreed that the government would not again go into savings bank business. Finally we have this from the banks:

> Referring your message of Saturday, have consulted banks, who are agreeable to waiving the repeal feature provided legislature is convened within two weeks from to-morrow.

There you have private banks indicating how this country is to be governed.

Mr. HEAPS: Where was the lieutenant-governor that time?

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): They asked the private banks to take over the liabilities.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be, but I do not want to discuss that as I have only a few moments left. We finally have Premier Bracken undergoing the humiliation of having to reply:

> Wire received. Legislature called twenty-ninth. Writing officially to-morrow.

And Premier Bracken writes in the terms dictated to him by the banks. In my experience I have never known anything that quite so clearly illustrates the stranglehold which the banks have on the government of this country.

Miss MACPHAIL: They are the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know anything that quite so clearly demonstrates that the banks, in the last analysis, as my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) suggests, are the government of this country. It is an astonishing state of affairs, and I am surprised that Conservative members will even attempt to justify that kind of thing. What I should like to ask is this, and possibly the Finance minister can tell us: Did the government of this country give guarantees to the banks. I am informed that the government gave to the banks guarantees similar in terms to those which they refused to the province of Manitoba. That is something which I think we are entitled to know in this house. In the meantime we have this governmental institution, the savings bank of the province of Manitoba, forced to go out of business. Further the federal government apparently, so far as anything to the contrary has yet been revealed, refused to give the assistance which might have saved the provincial savings bank.

Further than that, let me say that the banks are going outside of their own realm to such an extent that only the other day I had this resolution sent to me from the city clerk of the city of Winnipeg. I am not blaming the government for this situation, but I think it is well that the government and the country should know how far the banks are going and what resentment they are arousing even in official quarters in my part of Canada. This letter from the city clerk of the city of Winnipeg, dated March 30, 1932, reads as follows:

> I beg to append a copy of resolution passed by the council of the city of Winnipeg this morning, namely:—
> Whereas there appears to be a growing tendency for certain banks to engage in the purchase and sale of municipal securities;
> And whereas owing to the relationship between municipalities and their bankers this is an undesirable and dangerous development which tends to place too much control in the hands of the banks, undermine their prestige and work to the disadvantage of the people as a whole;

Now therefore be it resolved that this council does protest against the present practice whereby certain banks purchase and sell municipal securities, even the securities of their own clients.

And it is further resolved that this council is of the opinion, and recommends, that this whole question be thoroughly investigated by the Dominion government before the time when amendments to the Bank Act are up for consideration in 1933; and further recommends that a thorough inquiry be made by parliament into all the circumstances relating to the connection of certain banks with the municipal and provincial bond and debenture issues which have been offered to the public in recent months.

I pass that on from the city council of Winnipeg to the Minister of Finance urging that he make the investigation requested.

My colleague spoke with regard to the question of unemployment. I have not very much to add to what he said, but I would point this out, that we have no indication that the government is taking any steps adequate to meet the needs of the situation.

Might I offer a suggestion which was given to me and which I think has some merit, and that is with regard to single men, of whom we have so many in the west, men recruited very largely to do harvesting and construction work which was necessary in the earlier days. It is suggested that as an emergency measure—it is no permanent solution whatever, but it would be greatly preferable to the soup kitchen idea—that there be recruited a peace army; that every unemployed man be given a chance to earn $1.10 a day, with everything found, and that this peace army go into the north country to clear brush, to make highways and to beautify our parks and other areas, thus creating assets which would be of permanent value to us, especially so in view of the tourist business which has developed in Canada. More than anything else such an arrangement might help to save the morale of these men who are being degraded by hand-outs of food, and provision of very wretched shelter. I cannot see how any men with spirit in them can very long tolerate the kind of treatment single men are now receiving.

Further than that, I think of the families and their sufferings. In the outskirts of Winnipeg, forming part of my own constituency, is the little village of Brooklands. Recently a survey was made in that village, and out of 600 families it was found that heads of 180 families were out of work. That situation is fairly typical of a very considerable portion of my constituency. When I was home at Easter I visited some of the homes in that section, and I should like to tell about one of them. In that home I found a man, a skilled mechanic, who has not had work for months. At the present time he is ill. His wife, a woman of rather exceptional ability, came from the old land, and has had good cultural opportunities. There are seven children. The city is supporting that family entirely, giving them groceries, milk, bread, fuel, light and water. Further than that, it is making a small grant to the mortgage company, because in part the home is owned by the family, and in order that the mortgage should not be foreclosed and the people forced out on the street certain payments are being made to the mortgage company. Clothing has to be obtained in indirect ways. The worst feature however is this: In that home there were four big boys, out of school, sitting hour after hour, day after day, week after week, and month after month with absolutely nothing to do. Two of the older boys, since they were thirteen or fourteen years of age had helped on western farms, getting out as best they could and finding jobs. A few years ago that was possible, but to-day no such work is available. One of those boys told me he had been working in this haphazard way since he was thirteen years of age, and he was coming to realize that unless he soon learned a trade he could not make a success of life.

Thousands of boys are in precisely the same condition. I wish I could tell hon. members of this house about an exhibition I attended at Easter time showing work done by a group of unemployed boys. The finances of the department in charge however are at an end, and those boys are now on the street again with nothing to do. It seems to me a heavy responsibility rests upon some public body. As we say in our amendment, as this parliament is the body with the widest legislative power, it seems it is the responsibility of parliament definitely to lay plans to meet a need of this character. While I do not think the constructive suggestion we make in our amendment goes very far, it does seem to me it would cut down the debts, stabilize the dollar and help stimulate industrial activity that would tide us over for the time being. I urge upon hon. members that they must recognize the fact that we are in no temporary depression; we are facing the break-up of the system. That break-up may not come for a period of a few months or years or it may come quickly. We are not justified however in neglecting to face the seriousness of the situation.

On motion of Mr. Dickie the debate was adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suppose this debate will continue to-morrow?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 14, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, April 14, 1932.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that Right Hon. F. A. Anglin, as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 4 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

James F. Crowdy,
Assistant Secretary.

VACANCY—ROYAL

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that in compliance with section 6 of the House of Commons Act I have issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the constituency of Royal, in the province of New Brunswick, for the election of a new member in place of Hon. George Burpee Jones, who has resigned.

PETITION

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River) moved:

That the petition of Arthur Cyril Boyce and others of Ottawa, Ontario, praying to be incorporated under the name of Lake of the Woods International Bridge Company, which was presented to the house on the 13th instant, together with the report of the clerk of petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on standing orders for the purpose of considering the suspension of standing order 92 in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY

BILL RESPECTING UNFAIR COMPETITION IN TRADE AND COMMERCE

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I beg to submit the first and final report of the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 5, respecting Unfair Competition in Trade and Commerce. I may add that the report is unanimous.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough) presented the second report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, as follows:

The select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines have the honour to submit the following as their second report:

Your committee have had under consideration Bill No. 29, an act to amend the Railway Act, and having heard representations from the railway employees concerned, from the counsel of the railways, and the views of counsel representing the Board of Railway Commissioners, your committee are of the opinion that it is not in the best interests of the country, particularly at this period in the railway situation, to pass the proposed legislation. Your committee therefore, on division, have agreed to report that the preamble of Bill No. 29 has not been proven to the satisfaction of your committee and that said bill should not be passed.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. H. Harris,
Chairman.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I observe from the proceedings that last evening, by common consent, we were to proceed to-day with the debate now before the house rather than avail ourselves of the provisions of standing order 28. In accordance with that arrangement I therefore move:

That the provisions of standing order 28 be suspended this day.

In other words the Speaker will not leave the chair unless a vote is taken which is not probable.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT—ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED AND ADVANCES MADE

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Have any orders in council been passed by the federal government with respect to the Beauharnois power project since August 3, 1931?

2. If so, what are the dates and numbers of such orders in council?
3. Have any moneys been advanced to the Beauharnois Power Corporation or associate company by the federal government since August, 1930?
4. Have any advances made by any chartered bank of Canada to such corporation been guaranteed by the federal government, since August 7, 1930?
5. If so, by which banks were such amounts advanced, and what were the amounts?
6. What was the nature of the guarantee given?
7. What was the authority for such guarantee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I respectfully direct the attention of the Prime Minister to this question, which has been on the order paper for several weeks. It does not in any way request a declaration of government policy in regard to the future; it only asks for some information as to the guarantees given the Beauharnois corporation in the past. I respectfully submit that this question should be answered before the budget debate terminates.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the intention of the government to devote its entire attention to this matter on Saturday. It has been impossible, in the time at our disposal, to gather together what information we have for the purpose of making a proper statement to this house with respect to the whole matter since the default of the power corporation—not the light heat and power corporation—in the payment of interest on its debentures, which were second mortgage securities, which occurred on April 1. If we can complete our labours in this regard on Saturday it is my intention to make a statement to the house on Monday.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

3. Yes.

EASTERN BANK OF CANADA

BANK CIRCULATION REDEMPTION FUND—PAYMENT TO ESTATE OF THE LATE ANGUS MCLEAN

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that the Minister of Finance be authorized to pay to the executors of the estate of the late Angus McLean, of Bathurst, New Brunswick, the sum of $5,000, being the amount of the bank circulation redemption fund at the credit of the Eastern Bank of Canada, which was incorporated by chapter 28 of the statutes of 1928, but did not commence business.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATURAL RESOURCES

REFUND OF MONEY RECEIVED PRIOR TO TRANSFER TO WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting, to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the governor in council, upon the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior may authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of any sums of money received in connection with the administration of the natural resources prior to the transfer thereof to the western provinces, which His Majesty is under any legal or equitable obligation to refund, and that an annual statement be laid before parliament of all moneys refunded hereunder.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WINNIPEG POSTAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): The Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) is not in his place, but perhaps the question I am about to ask might be directed to his attention so that he could reply to-morrow. I have received the following communication from Winnipeg:

Mass meeting of Winnipeg postal group, Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada, strongly protest circular P.S.B. 196, which proposes increased hours of labour, reduction of staff, elimination of all overtime pay, especially statutory holidays, extension of hours worked at night and Sundays, all owing to drastic cuts made in post office estimates. This circular is direct violation of past agreements made between department and staff side representations, and will undoubtedly aggravate unemployment. Passed unanimously.

That is signed by the secretary of the local council of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada. I should like to ask whether the Postmaster General will not reconsider this whole matter, as it seems to me an extension of the hours of labour would be a direct violation of the agreements which have been outstanding for some time between the members of the postal service and the department.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The matter to which the hon. gentleman has referred will be drawn to the attention of the Postmaster General, who to-day is absent from the house on account of illness. I received a telegram in similar terms, and I have asked for a report on the matter. I assure the hon. gentleman that the Postmaster General will deal with the question when he is in his place.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

TEN PER CENT DEDUCTION IN INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I desire to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister based upon a news item appearing in this morning's Citizen. I will not read the whole article but will direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the last paragraph:

The deduction bill has not been finally passed by the house because Premier Bennett is getting information from exempted classes, judges, R.C.M.P. staff, military and air force men, etc., to see if they are prepared to volunteer to take the same cut.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister if this statement is founded on fact.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I cannot think it was ever intended that a newspaper report such as this should become the basis of any declaration of government policy with respect to any matter. I think the hon. gentleman must be fully aware of that fact.

APPLICATION OF REDUCTION TO POSTMASTERS PAID BY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): The day before yesterday I asked a question which had reference to the Post Office Department, and the Minister of Finance said he would give an answer yesterday. I fail to see the answer in Hansard.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I was prepared to answer the question yesterday, but did not do so because the hon. gentleman was not in the house. If my hon. friend will look at section 2, subsection (a) of the bill now before the house, he will observe that the postmaster in question comes within the provisions of that bill.

CONVERSION LOAN

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY HON. MEMBER FOR SHERBROOKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I regret that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) is not in his seat, but I believe this matter to be of such importance that I should refer to it at the first opportunity, so I would ask the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), who is leading the opposition at the moment, to be good enough to direct what I have to say to the attention of the hon. member.

It has been brought to my notice, sir, that during the course of his remarks in the budget debate the hon. member for Sherbrooke referred to the conversion loan, and stated that he had advised the people of his district to convert their bonds. Then, at page 1994 of Hansard, he went on to say:

> I told these men, "If the government want you to convert your bonds I think you should do so." They converted their bonds. What happened? Insiders of this government did not convert their bonds; the people of Sherbrooke and the eastern townships did.

With respect to that statement I have to observe that the hon. member said either too much or too little, and I must ask him either to withdraw his remarks or to substantiate the facts.

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

REPORT OF SIR ALEXANDER GIBB—INQUIRY AS TO PRINTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Marine in connection with the Gibb report. Would it not be possible to have that report printed? I have had several applications for copies and I understand other members also have. I am sure all hon. members would be glad if printed copies were made available.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): As I informed the house the other day, the question of printing that report is at the present time under consideration by the standing committee on printing. As a matter of fact, requests for copies of the printed report have been pouring into my department and I hope the committee will come to the conclusion that the report is to be printed.

TARIFF BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In view of the impending Imperial economic conference I would ask the Minister of Finance whether it is the intention of the government to appoint a tariff board for the creation of which legislation was passed last year, or whether the government has changed its mind as to the usefulness of that body.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Quebec East is too old a parliamentarian to ask a question of that character because he knows full well the government has always taken the position its intention would be made manifest only in the usual form and at the proper time.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 13, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I associate myself with previous speakers in congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on his admirable presentation of one of the best budgets to which I have been privileged to listen in the House of Commons. It was comprehensive and so lucid that the man on the street could understand it. Anyone reading or hearing it would realize that drastic remedies were necessary were Canada to meet her obligations and to hold her present high position among the nations of the earth, and he suggested the necessary remedies.

Before proceeding further with the budget debate I wish, without too great a trespass on the patience of the house, to take up a matter with relation to British Columbia. As is known, strong comments were made with respect to the provincial government regarding the disbursement of unemployment relief funds in that province. Before I came to the defence of my friends "of many days and in many ways," I waited the findings of a commission that was sitting in British Columbia. Doctor Tolmie, as hon. members know, is premier of that province. We thrust him into that position against his wishes. The electorate there were sick and tired to death of Liberal rule and we cast around to find some man popular enough to unite our two factions. Doctor Tolmie, because of his splendid personality and reputation we knew could do the trick, we gave him the third degree and absolutely forced him to accept the premiership of British Columbia. This he did, and he has been doing his best ever since. In his position, as premier, he has a great deal to do with unemployment matters. The minister in charge of unemployment relief funds in British Columbia is the Hon. Ralf Bruhn, a man who has played hard games with the forests of that province, a practical man. No one has ever done anything to impeach his honesty, and only honourable motives have been attributed to him. Mistakes were made, as would doubtless be the case in enterprises of this kind; it was a rush order; but I could point out mistakes that have been made by private and public companies in that province that would dwarf into insignificance the mistakes made by the provincial government. A parliamentary commission was appointed to inquire into the accusations made against the local government. This commission was composed of a number of Liberals as well as Conservatives, the latter of course, being in the majority. It has concluded its investigation and I am going to ask the house kindly to bear with me while I read its findings, as follows:

Charges of extravagance and irregularities preferred by members of the House of Commons and others were also investigated. The following are typical examples:

(a) "That camps were equipped with radios." Your committee finds that no radios were purchased or rented. A carload of camp food and supplies, packed by the shipper in cases once used for radios, probably led to this belief.

(b) "That camps were also equipped with pianos." Your committee finds that none were purchased or rented.

(c) "That edge-grained fir floor lumber, at a cost of $74 per thousand, was used in making tables for camps." Your committee finds that the total expended on edge-grained fir floor lumber was $2.24.

(d) "That a Vancouver firm quoted the purchasing agent a price on 10,000 blankets and that these blankets were later purchased through someone else for the government at a figure considerably in advance of that sum." Your committee finds that a total of 7,700 pair of blankets was purchased from the West Coast Woollen Mills, Limited, Vancouver, and an emergency purchase of 450 pair of blankets was made from Turner-Beaton, Victoria. All of those blankets were seven-pound blankets, purchased for the sum of 66 cents per pound. This figure was considerably less than that quoted for blankets similar in quality, by the Vancouver firm in question.

[Mr. Dickie.]

It is worthy of note that the West Coast Woollen Mills, Limited, is a concern financed by the provincial Department of Industries and that the purchase of these blankets meant not only assistance to an undertaking in which the province was financially interested but meant also that these blankets were made entirely of B.C. wool and by B.C. workmen.

The suggestion made by Mr. Thos. Reid, member of the House of Commons for New Westminster (at page 1180 of Hansard, 1932), that one manufacturer had "sold 50,000 blankets and it took him out of the red," is without any foundation in fact.

(e) The Dominion representative in his evidence stated: "That 104 carpenters were on the pay-rolls for the camp at Deroche on October 16 or 17, 1931, and four only working as such."

The original time-books and pay-rolls for the months of September and October were produced to your committee, and on the dates in question 47 and 37 carpenters respectively were shown in the time-books and carried on the pay-rolls, for a total of seven camps. The maximum number shown for any single day in the month of October was 79. The evidence further indicated that all worked as carpenters throughout their period of employment as such.

(f) Mr. A. W. Neill, member of the House of Commons for Alberni, on February the 10th, 1932 (on page 90 of Hansard, 1932), made the following statement referring to camps:—

"One might say they were equipped almost luxuriously with hot and cold water shower baths, electric lighting plants, and I am informed even radios have been provided in some cases. The tools were furnished on a scale never known before in connection with road work. Every man had enough tools to suffice for ten; every man had a wheelbarrow; every man had a ten-foot saw, which was entirely unnecessary, and everything was done on a lavish scale. The material, Mr. Speaker, was all bought at the right place, you may depend. We have instances of blankets being bought at gift stores. I take it, sir, that you know what a gift store is, but if by chance you do not know may I explain it is a place where the word gift is terminated with an "e," and where one may buy trinkets for bridge parties, and things of that nature. Blankets were bought at such places for road camps." Your committee finds that the camps were built and equipped in accordance with the regulations of the Health Act of British Columbia, and regulations for the sanitary control of lumber, mining and other camps, sawmills and other industries, and were similar, both as to cost and equipment, to camps used by contractors and lumber men for similar numbers, purposes and periods. The showers referred to are required by the regulations aforesaid and were installed at the rate of one to 20 or 25 men, at a cost of $7 per shower; the construction consisted of tar-papered partitions with slats on the floor and wooden drains. Twenty-three "Delco" lighting plants were installed; a number of these were purchased second-hand and have a high salvage value. The cost of lighting by electric light was carefully estimated and it was found that, in large permanent camps, electric light was the most economical of all available systems and also greatly reduced the fire hazard.

The charges regarding radios and blankets have already been dealt with.

The evidence indicated that there was a wheelbarrow for every tenth man and a crosscut saw for every seventeenth man.

Your committee finds that the purchase of tools was on a reasonable basis and sufficient only for the number which the province reasonably expected to employ under the unemployment relief program.

Your committee finds that materials of all classes were bought from citizens of this province without regard to political leanings; instances were brought before the committee of large purchases from prominent Liberals in this province.

It should be noted that there were individual camps which contained large quantities of supplies; these were, however, used as depots, and tools were distributed therefrom as and when required by other camps in the particular neighbourhood.

(g) Mr. Thomas Reid (at page 1283 of Hansard 1932), stated:

"I counted in one camp 450 steel wheelbarrows. They had so many that a man was to be appointed to regulate their use." The evidence before your committee indicated that there might be 450 steel wheelbarrows in one camp but it would be in the nature of a depot or warehouse camp for a group of camps, and that the man referred to would be for the purpose of distributing wheelbarrows and other tools and supplies among the various camps requiring them.

Mr. Reid further stated: "I have no comment to make regarding the construction camps except to criticize the loose way in which they were run." The evidence before your committee indicated that the camps were conducted in an efficient and economical manner.

That is all I have to say on that matter, Mr. Speaker, I wished to put this on Hansard for the instruction of those people who listened to charges against the British Columbia government in the debate now long passed.

With respect to the budget speech, it was an admirable presentation. For three weeks we had been listening to another very tiring eruption of words, and we listened in vain for some suggestion that would assist the government in the very difficult task with which it is now faced in the matter of unemployment, but no sound suggestion was made. The suggestion was made by the Minister of Labour in the late government, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) that a fund of $90,000,000 be created for unemployment insurance, the federal government contributing $30,000,000, the employers $30,000,000, and the balance of $30,000,000 being contributed by the working men of this country. I would ask any manufacturer, any man who is engaged in the lumber business, for instance, I would ask the two good, practical men I know on the other side of the house, the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Munn) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson), what they would think of the manufacturers and industrialists of this country being asked at the present time to raise $30,000,000 for that purpose. We all realize the hardships that exist with respect to unemployment, and there may come a time, when this government gets the ship back on an even keel, when we may be able to do something along that line, or at all events do something more for labour than we are doing at the present time, but just now it is absolutely silly to talk of creating a fund of $90,000,000 to guarantee wages to men who are unemployed. The unemployment question is undoubtedly a very serious one, and a little later, if I have time, I shall deal with it more fully.

We also had that old man of the sea, free trade, again thrust upon us during the three weeks' debate to which I have referred. It is needless to spend any time combating free trade arguments for practically every nation in the world has gone off the free trade list. Even Great Britain has abandoned free trade. What would Canada do, with a population of ten million people, living alongside a highly protected nation of one hundred and twenty million people if we did not have a protectionist policy? We would go down and out. Had we not raised our tariff barriers during the severe times of the past year and a half, our country would have been flooded with manufactured articles from the United States and we would have had more idle working men in this country than we have at the present time. By raising our tariffs we are now buying something like one hundred million dollars' worth less of goods from the United States. That means that that one hundred million dollars is kept in this country for the benefit of Canadian working men. We hope that the government will continue to act along the same lines and protect this country. Whether theoretically protection is right or not, protection is necessary in the present state of affairs throughout the world.

Then a back-to-the-land movement was suggested. It has been advocated that owing to the tremendous number of unemployed people we have in this country we should institute a policy of getting them back on the land. We have tried that policy in a small way in British Columbia. We have been trying to do our utmost for the benefit of those men who had gone overseas and done so much for us, but this back-to-the-land movement I regret to say has not been a success in British Columbia. The back-to-the-land movement may later on prove to be a success throughout Canada if people become more inclined to go back to the simple life, but at the present time we could not place a sufficient number of men back on the land to relieve the unemployment problem throughout Canada to any great extent. But we want them back there. They are better there than they would be thronging the cities, and the time may come when we can induce more of them to go back to the land. It would be a wonderful thing if we could get them out of the cities into the God-given air of the country, where their lungs would have a chance to expand and they would have different ideals than they have in the city. We have become unmoralized, if I may use the word, Mr. Speaker, by salacious literature and by rotten Hollywood films. Our people have been demoralized by bright lights and rubber tires, and the sooner we can get them away out of the cities into the pure atmosphere of the country the better. It is a big problem and I hope that we shall be able to succeed in solving it. It is a long, far cry, but the gap must be bridged between lipsticks and lips kissed with the morning dew. Get them out into the country, into the pure air and doubtless our race will be benefited thereby. In the present age we require some Virgil to teach the dignity of life in the country, someone to teach our people to get out in the God-given air, among good, pure surroundings. Nothing in this world will do as much for our population as the simple country life. We have all read of the expression of little Pippa "God's in his heaven and all's well with the world" when for the first time she went out into the country.

Mr. Speaker, I am becoming somewhat confused and I am afraid I shall have to branch off on another argument.

Mr. McINTOSH: Do not be alarmed; that is often the case.

Mr. MALCOLM: Not many will admit it.

Mr. DICKIE: We have very grave problems with respect to unemployment. Due to the advance of science there are many thousands of men without work. In the great nation to the south of us I understand there are 8,000,000 workless people; I do not know how they are going to be employed. There was a time when the markets of the world were open to that great country; they went full speed ahead; tremendous industrial enterprises were undertaken. At the present time each nation is protecting itself against the inroads of manufactured articles from the United States. In that country there are, as I have said, from 6,000,000 to 8,000,000 people which constitutes a grave problem. We in Canada, I am told, have about 500,000 unemployed. Although our country has a smaller population than has the United States we have greater undeveloped resources. The time will come no doubt when all our men will be given work. At the present time it is very difficult to see how such a condition may be brought about. I do not know, however, how the United States will ever find employment for their idle population. There may come a time when the arguments advanced by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) may have to be adopted throughout the American continent and the world. Due to the advent of labour saving machinery, the use of steam, and the use of engines capable of drawing as many cars as, in the early days, three locomotives would have drawn, one man does the work of ten. It is unfortunate that the man getting along in years should be penalized through the use of labour saving machinery. The fact is, however, that there are too many labourers in the world at the present time. What must be done to remedy the situation is a matter agitating the minds of some of our greatest thinkers. I believe the day will come when two shifts of working men will do what one shift is doing to-day. I do not see any other way of putting our unemployed to work.

It is pitiful to read of the distress prevalent throughout the various cities in the United States and Canada. We are doing our best for them; measures are being enacted to give temporary relief. We want, however, to give relief which will enable them to look forward to the proper rearing of their families; we want to make those people good citizens. The leader of our party, and doubtless that of the party opposite, are agitated, trying, striving to reach a solution of our unemployment problem. Those men must have work if we are to prevent mischievous doctrines from permeating their minds. None of us would like to see in operation the doctrine proclaimed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). We want Canada to be a country where a man may prosper according to his integrity and ability. We do not want to place people in one class as is done in Russia to-day, to do away with initiative, and to do away with all that builds good citizenship. If mankind is to improve it must have some object for which to strive.

I can remember a time when the Indians in British Columbia were almost a truly socialistic people. I remember one Indian who for some unforeseen reason, or by some piece of luck, had accumulated a little more than his fellows. As a result he gave what was known as a potlatch, and gave away everything he had. He reduced his means to a point as low or lower than those of the rest of the band. He was called a chief, or something of that nature, and was well pleased at the return given him for his sacrifice. After he had given away his means he wrapped his blanket around him, sat in the sunshine beside his rancherie, to wait for the next run of dog salmon so that he might get enough to eat. There are some very beautiful ideals connected with socialism. We cannot however do away with initiative, or we will go down, down the line until we finally reach the primordial ooze from which we came in the first instance. We must progress, and must have some reward in view. We do not necessarily need to attack the principles of our fellow man, but must do something for our country and ourselves, if we are to survive. We want no fallacious argument of socialism to permeate this good land of ours. Ideal as a socialistic condition may seem, it does away with initiative. In Russia to-day there are millions who have nothing to look forward to. There are men without smiles going about their business, half clad and half fed. True, some few have gained notoriety as there would be if we in this country adopted a similar system. Thank God however for good Anglo Saxon common sense which permeates the minds of our people.

As hon. members are aware, an economic conference is to be held in Ottawa in July of this year. We know not what the outcome may be, but we do know that earnest men are coming from all parts of the empire to confer and reason one with the other as to what can best be done for the country and the empire as a whole.

It is too early to predict what may happen, but we know they are meeting here with the very best of intentions. There will have to be a little give and take on the part of all the various units of the British Empire, but doubtless good will result, and if we achieve one-half of what we expect we shall do away with the unemployment problem in the empire. Let us deal within the British Empire as much as possible; let us buy goods from our sister dominions and sell to them what we can manufacture to better advantage than they, and we shall soon do away with unemployment. If not, we must adopt some other measures. I know of no other government in the world that is giving more attention to this problem than the present government. The government are looking for suggestions from the other side rather than destructive criticism, they are striving to do something for the workingmen of this country. I think the most piteous feature of unemployment is the man, hollow-eyed, looking for work and unable to get it. We do not want the minds of our people permeated with the mischievous doctrines advanced by the member for Winnipeg North Centre; we want them to be upstanding citizens, not relying on the efforts of others, but climbing up unaided to improve their position and at the same time improve this great country.

Under the wise guidance of our leader, I feel sure that he and his colleagues will solve our major problems. We stand solidly behind him, and we hope he may be spared to put Canada back in that condition of prosperity which we have every reason to expect because of the wonderful potentialities of our great natural resources. We are going to make of Canada a country worth while to live in, and I am confident we shall emerge from the present depression perhaps quicker than any other country under the sun, due to the virility of our people and our great natural endowments. Then let us be careful not to drift under the influence of the indulgent gales so far from the shores of economic sanity as we did during the past, let us conserve our resources, let us go a little slower, and we shall make this one of the greatest countries in the world.

I think no other statesman of to-day has the adaptability and the qualifications so necessary for extricating Canada from the economic morass in which it is now engulfed as has our admirable leader, that right hon. gentleman:

> Whose slow, wise smile,
> Half within and half without > Seems filled with knowledge of the world.

He will bring us out of the impasse, and under his wise guidance we shall emerge from this depression quicker than any other country in the world. I think the economic conference next July will have an important bearing on the future of this country. If our right hon. leader extricates Canada from the tremendous burden under which we are struggling, I might say in the words of Horace, he will have:

> —builded a monument
> Stronger than brass and of vast extent,
> Higher than Egypt's chief pyramid,
> That monument to kingly pride;
> Whose top as heaven is high,
> At base as earth is wide.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate,

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Boards of Trade Act.
An Act to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.
An Act to amend the Judges Act.
An Act respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of securities to be issued under the Canadian National Railways Financing Act, 1931, No. 2.
An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1933.

Mr. MARTIAL RHEAUME (St. Johns-Iberville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of this opportunity offered to me, of expressing my views on the budget brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). First, I wish to congratulate him on his appointment to this high office. I further desire to congratulate the hon. member for St. Anne's (Mr. Sullivan) on his maiden speech in this house.

He highly praises this budget, and adds that all the prominent financiers of this country have approved of it and stated that it was a genuine budget. I do not share the views of the hon. member for St. Anne's. He represents a constituency comprising in the major part workmen earning small wages; were he to call from door to door so as to ascertain the opinion of his electors on the budget, I think his views would soon change.

I wish, incidentally, to point out the figures quoted a few days ago by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). He stated that the government had made an outlay of $40,000,000 to relieve unemployment and had undertaken to make a further outlay of $16,000,000 this year. I am amazed that they are disbursing such large amounts for unemployment relief; not that I am opposed to this expenditure—on the contrary, I approve of it—because I contend that the government do not practise what they advocate. The appropriations for the Department of Public Works amounted to $20,480,550, in 1931-32, and they have been cut to $13,187,000 for 1932-33, which means a reduction of more than $7,000,000. If the government were in earnest they would increase the appropriation for public works. It would be an excellent way to alleviate unemployment. After requesting the municipalities to do their utmost in helping the unemployed, I think the government is showing a poor example in cutting down by $7,000,000 the estimates of the Public Works department.

The other day while glancing over a pamphlet distributed by the Minister of Labour, I discovered that in the county of Chambly-Verchères—which is adjacent to my own and for the most part a farming county—there was expended to relieve unemployment an amount of $129,172; however, the total expenditure for the province of Quebec only amounted to $415,606. I therefore state that Chambly-Verchères was more favoured than the other counties of Quebec. I do not know if it is because the constituency is represented by the Minister of Marine, who must have a great deal of influence with his colleagues, however, that county received more than 30 per cent of the amount allotted to Quebec.

The county of St. John's-Iberville, which I have the honour of representing in the House, received slightly more than $16,000. An amount of $1,210 was granted to the town of Iberville, and only $282.70 were expended, to date, for a population of more than 3,000. An expenditure of $16,195 was made in the city of St. John's which comprises more than 12,000 people and has over 900 unemployed. I contend, sir, that there has been undoubted evidence of favouritism in connection with the distribution of the unemployment funds. When I note that in the county of Chambly-Verchères, in villages comprising between 150 and 200 people, over $6,000 were expended; in Chambly more than $19,000; in Longueuil the population of which is much less than St. John's, almost $20,000 were expended and at St. Lambert more than $69,000, I must protest on behalf of St. John's-Iberville, and state that my county like many others in Quebec, has not been given an amount of relief proportionate to the county of Chambly-Vercherès.

I am pleased, sir, to see the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) in his seat; as I am aware that he understands the beautiful French language, I wish to point out to him that in the budget of his department, this year, there is an appropriation of $10,973,548, that is, more than $8,500,000 is set apart exclusively for military purposes and almost $2,500,000 for the navy.

In a country like Canada where the national debt increases by hundreds of millions of dollars, I contend that it is more than time to cut out military expenditure. The budget of that department is equivalent to one dollar per capita of the population. More than $260,000 are expended on the League of Nations so as to foster disarmament, while, on the other hand, millions of dollars are expended for military purposes. The administration of this department alone amounts to $320,000, the cadet service $100,000, contingencies $35,000, engineering service $327,500, general stores $663,500, non-permanent active militia $1,837,400—namely $168,600 less than last year.

I am, sir, fairly well informed on this non-permanent active militia. In the appropriation pertaining to this matter are included the following items, service, maintenance, pay and allowances with reference to the administration, the training of the militia in camps, staffs, in schools of instruction, target practice, grants to associations, etc. I state that there is no greater waste of money in this country than that which is expended on military training camps. I know of what I am talking about as we have almost every year such camps in the town of St. John's and this has been so for a great number of years past. The town is invaded by regiments of 600, 700, 800 men more or less, who have no knowledge whatsoever of military training, they cannot handle a rifle or understand a word of English. They are fitted up indifferently and come over to this training camp for two weeks, at the country's expense. Millions of dollars are wasted in giving officers the opportunity of taking holidays, at the state's expense. In a poor country like ours, during a crisis, when people are starving, I state that these millions of dollars should be applied to help the unemployed and the needy.

In the item of $4,844,000 appropriated to permanent troops, there is a decrease of $206,000. I have already expressed my views as regards military schools and permanent troops. There exists such a military school in the town of St. John's. I do not wish to express an opinion whether it is better or worse than the others. I am certain that the officers and men of this school follow the same regulations as others established in this country. A few hours per day are devoted to training so as to raise an appetite, and all this at the government's expense. The country meanwhile is millions of dollars in debt. I contend that it is more than time to forego such waste of money. I note that the Royal Military College will cost this year $360,500, namely, a decrease of $25,500. If I be not mistaken, in order to enter this college, one must be well off. If the government wished to put into practice what they advocate, they should first replace these military colleges by agricultural schools.

The government has asked this house for a blank signature so as to dispose of unlimited amounts for unemployment and farm relief. Let them do away with military schools and replace them by agricultural schools and thus make of our sons good farmers and citizens.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) stated this week that the future of Canada depended on farming. I have in hand the budget of agriculture for 1932-33. As I stated just now the population of Canada reaches 10,000,000 and the expenditure per capita for farming is sixty cents, while it amounts to more than one dollar for the militia. In 1931-1932, the estimates of agriculture amounted to $9,929,000; this year they are only $6,671,000, a decrease of $3,258,000. I wonder why our friends opposite, who represent rural counties, and especially those from the west who represent essentially farming constituencies, tolerate a cut of $3,000,000 in the agricultural estimates, while only a cut of $1,302,000 for the National Defence and $1,606,000 for the naval service, is made. I state, sir, that it has no sense. My views are that the militia budget should be cut by 75 per cent and that of Agriculture increased proportionately.

The experimental farms' appropriations are decreased this year by $833,000, while those of the Royal Military College at Kingston are only reduced $25,500, a difference of $808,000. And the government is bold enough to state that it is to relieve the farmers that a blank signature is requested! I trust that the people of this country will open their eyes and see which of the two parties is the champion of the farmers. I note that the grants for agricultural exhibitions are cut down $300,000, that for dairy industry $63,700, for the health of cattle and inspection of meat $896,000, almost a million. What care are they taking of the health of the citizens of this country?

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): After slaughtering cattle infected with tuberculosis, the amount appropriated for that purpose is reduced by $896,000, while the estimates affected to the non-permanent troops is only cut down $168,600. One must keep within reasonable limits. It is quite proper to support a political party, however one must preserve some common sense. One must not forget that members represent the electorate of their constituency. I spy the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Barrette), the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Laflèche) who represent two beautiful farming counties as fine as mine—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Finer.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Perhaps so. When we are aware of decreases such, for instance as that of $376,700 in the appropriation for the administration of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, while a cut of only $206,000 is made on the permanent militia, I state that one must keep within reasonable limits—I see that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins), is in his seat, he is the champion of live stock. I am aware that he has the rank of a colonel; perhaps, military matters are of a greater concern to him than agriculture or live stock. I wonder what he thinks of the $150,000 cut in the live stock appropriation.

The estimates intended for publications which the government distribute throughout the country to help the farmers—and which deal with the work carried on at the various experimental farms—are reduced by $30,500, while militia contingencies are larger than that amount.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to put a question?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): With pleasure.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What were, in 1930, the amounts voted for Agriculture and National Defence?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): My answer to the hon. member is that when the budget of 1930 was brought down, I had not the privilege of representing the county of St. John's-Iberville; I am discussing the present budget. I am not expected to assume the responsibility for the acts of my predecessors, I am simply commenting on the present budget.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I notice in the budget that an expenditure of $20,000,000 was made in the western provinces. In no way do I feel envious, far be it from my thoughts; I am aware that the west is in dire circumstances; we have there compatriots and we must help them out. I regret that the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) is not in his seat, because I should have given him a message for the Prime Minister of his province. I shall ask his good Conservative friends who represent farming constituencies to endeavour to obtain a two cents per pound bonus on butter.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): That was Mr. Houde's policy which you cried down in the last Quebec provincial election.

[Mr. Barrette.]

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): All are aware that the price of butter has come down to 18 cents per pound within the last few days, to-morrow it may perhaps reach 16 cents.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Is that your wish?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): No, sir, we want the government to give a bonus on butter just as they did on western wheat.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): There will be one.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General promised one at the last provincial election.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): We shall see that he keeps his pledge!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I want to give you some idea of the prices of farm products. If I request a rebate, a direct aid for the eastern provinces, it is because of their precarious financial situation. Many of them have failed within the last few months and if business does not improve within the next six months, I think that there will be thousands of farmers who will fail in the eastern provinces. Wholesale butter, last week, sold at 18 cents; eggs retailed at 18 cents a dozen; potatoes 40 cents per bag; pork $6.50 per cwt., beef 5 cents per pound, veal 4 cents per pound; cow hides, 2, 3 and 4 cents, calf hides, 4 and 5 cents, country hides, 35 cents a piece.

I listened to our friends opposite state that from 1921 to 1930, we had had a bad régime which had ruined the country. I would ask them to compare the prices of to-day with those of 1921 to 1930.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What do you designate country hides?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Country hides, sir, are the hides of calves which the farmers slaughter themselves and sell in the village or to a leather dealer; it is what we call "a farmer's hide" and is not supposed to be worth as much as a hide which comes from the Montreal slaughter-houses or city butchers.

Now, sir, I wish to make a few comments on the luxury tax. I regret that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) is not in his seat, however, I trust that his good friend, the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland), will draw his attention to my remarks or that he will read them in Hansard. This luxury tax was discontinued, I do not know by whom, however, if an error was committed, it is when this luxury tax was abolished, and this to the detriment of the people. The following are a few comparisons: a golf suit costs $25; this is about the same price as a workman's Sunday suit, and the tax is the same in both instances; dress suits and tuxedos, etc., are taxed the same amount as for an ordinary man's winter coat. As for ladies' evening dresses, well, I have a wife and daughters, so I know what they cost. I am not opposed to wealth, on the contrary; however, one must draw a line between necessities and luxury. One purchases an evening dress for $40, $50, $60 and $75 and yet you pay the same tax as when you purchase a decent or comfortable coat for your wife. If a man has the means to purchase an evening dress for $60 or $75, so that his wife may attend a ball or an evening party, this gentleman can certainly afford to pay 10 per cent of a luxury tax and hand over $6 or $7 to the state which certainly needs the revenue.

I shall now, sir, draw your attention to a few articles pertaining to sport, not that I disapprove of sports. Perhaps one will say that I am not a golf player, it is true; however, I am a member of a golf club and of many other clubs, and I like sports. Even this morning, I noticed in a store window on Rideau street, golf shoes selling at $2.50, $4, $5, $6 and even $9. When a person can purchase a pair of shoes for $2.50 and he prefers to purchase a pair for $9, surely there must be an average price that might serve as a basis. A person who can afford $5, $6 or $7 more for a pair of shoes, can certainly pay a luxury tax of 50 or 60 cents. I saw some quite nice golf stick bags for $3.50; there were others for $12.50; these articles sold at five different prices. An average price could be fixed. One who purchases a $12.50 article for a golf stick bag when he can purchase one for $3.50, should pay a luxury tax on the difference. I also noticed that golf sticks were on sale at prices ranging from $2.50 to $6. The sales tax on a golf stick is the same as on a pick or shovel. Tennis rackets were marked $2, $4, $6, $8, $10, up to $18. I am in favour of encouraging sports, however, I contend that when a person can purchase a tennis racket for $2, $4, $5 or $6, and that person pays $18, he can afford paying 10 per cent more to help his country.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): You will not be looked upon as a sport.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): The same tax is levied on automobiles "de luxe" as that which is paid by a poor person who purchases a motor truck to earn a livelihood or a salesman who needs a car to earn his living.

There is an article of first necessity which has somewhat drawn my attention, namely matches. They are sold three boxes for 25 cents. There is a sales tax of ½ a cent and an excise tax of 3 cents per box. If you purchase twelve boxes worth $1, you pay 6 cents according to the new sales tax and 36 cents of excise tax, which means 52 cents tax on $1. Now if you purchase a box of chocolates of $1, there is no apparent tax. Would it not be fairer to levy this luxury or excise tax on the box of chocolates than on an article of first necessity as are matches? When you pay $1 for a box of chocolates, so as to satisfy your greediness, I state that this is a luxury. I wonder, sir, if the famous budget so much praised yesterday really meets with the approval of the people?

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I shall now refer to what is known as a grandfather's clock. I had the occasion, together with a group of friends, of purchasing one so as to make a present. The prices ranged from $150 to $600.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): That was a "de luxe" present!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I state that a person who purchases a grandfather's clock for $600 when one can be purchased for $150 or $200, can afford paying a luxury tax of 10 per cent.

I now come to dining-room sets. Last week, I saw in a large Montreal store a dining-room set priced at $1,200.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I understand that quite a heavy duty is levied on furniture. A nice dining-room set can be purchased, to-day, for $200 or $300, however if a person pays $1,200, to satisfy a whim or to boast of the finest dining-room set in the town or village, that person can certainly afford to contribute something to the exchequer.

I further wish to refer to articles considered a luxury such as diamonds, rings, etc. I am not opposed to jewels. Whether a person buys, in Montreal, Ottawa or anywhere, jewels to please some lady, no objection can be taken. Last week, I saw at Birks, in Montreal, a diamond worth $2,500. I contend that if a person can afford purchasing a diamond ring, either for himself or as a gift to his wife or his girl. . .

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): She must be very pretty!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): It matters little; however; I state that such a person can afford paying a tax on articles considered a luxury especially when a tax of 42 per cent is levied on matches. The hon. Minister of Finance is in his seat. I trust that in his next budget—unless he wishes to amend this one—he will consider levying a tax on luxuries.

I shall not add anything further, as I know that a number of my colleagues wish to take part in this debate. The country made a mistake two years ago, it knows it now, and awaits its opportunity.

The Liberal party brought prosperity to this country from 1896 to 1911. From 1911 to 1914 prosperity left us. I do not think that the Conservative party can blame it on their ill luck, but rather on their bad administration. I inquired from a number of old politicians and none remembered that the Conservative party had ever had a surplus in any year. I shall not refer to the period between 1914 and 1918, it was during the war, neither to the years between 1918 and 1921. The Liberal party assumed power in 1921. During two years it had to put up with deficits, however, after balancing the budget, from 1923 to 1930, there were surpluses every year, the national debt was decreased and the country entered an era of prosperity.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Of bankruptcy.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): You are in error.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): You are responsible for this bankruptcy.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): From 1923 to 1930, we were blessed with surpluses. Look at the trade we carried on with other countries. I notice the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé is all ears, I wish to thank him, I am aware that he is well-read, clear-headed and I hope in days to come, will be appointed to the Senate.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear!

[Mr. Rhéaume.]

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Incidentally, I state that if his party appoint him, it will be as a tribute for his services to the party.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Many thanks!

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): As I mentioned a few moments ago, from 1921 to 1930, Canada was prosperous. We traded with foreign countries. It is by doing a good business that a person amasses wealth; however, from 1930 to this day, we have been losing ground. I realize that the Conservative party will reply: the world is undergoing a crisis. In 1930, we also stated that unemployment in Canada was not due to a poor administration but rather to a world wide crisis. My opponent in the election stated: place the Conservative party in power and we pledge ourselves to bring back prosperity in this country within two months.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to add anything further, however, I feel certain that at the next general election, the people will choose the party which has always given protection to the farmer and workmen, because if the people were prosperous and happy, it was certainly under the Liberal régime from 1921 to 1930.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I agree with everything the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) said with regard to the effect on the morale of our people of lipsticks, rubber tires and salacious literature. I am sorry I was unable to follow the remarks of the hon. member who just took his seat, but the French language is very beautiful, and if, when it has been translated, the speech of the hon. gentleman reads as it sounded to me, I am sure it will be very fine indeed. I understand that the Acting Speaker (Mr. Sullivan) himself speaks very beautiful French, and my neighbour intimated to me that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat took advantage of the temporary position of the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Sullivan) to mention something he said yesterday in a speech which was equally effective. I greatly appreciated the humorous, inoffensive and clever manner in which the Acting Speaker was cornered.

The question has often been asked as to what extent the present crisis is due to the world situation and to what extent it has been caused by the lack of an internal policy. I hope the Minister of Finance will excuse me if I do not deal specifically with the budget; my purpose to-day is to discuss the problem from a universal and particularly an European standpoint, and I hope at some other opportune time to deal with the internal aspect of this subject.

One of the most profound impressions an observant traveller in Europe must bring back with him is a realization of the interdependence of the nations and the absolute necessity for greater cooperation among all the countries of the world if we are to enjoy some semblance of the prosperity of the past two decades, and in order to obtain this cooperation the obstacles that stand in the way first must be removed.

The world is clamouring for peace, but there is no peace; it wants a return of prosperity, but there is no prosperity, for we cannot attain the latter without a propagation and realization of the former. We cannot eat our cake and at the same time have it. Briefly, it is the old story of the futility of trying to make an omelette without breaking an egg, the folly of attempting to maintain peace without an application of the essential contributory conditions, and the impossibility of a return of prosperity without the cultivation of the necessary peaceful arts and pursuits incidental thereto. At no time has the truth of the situation been brought home with greater force than during the past few years of financial stringency and economic chaos. More and more clearly are people beginning to realize the uniform character of the world and the utter impossibility, in this great age of industrial development, of any country living unto itself. Thus such phrases as "self-contained nation," "splendid isolation," are rapidly becoming obsolete and devoid of meaning, and even the famous admonition of George Washington against any foreign entanglements seems likely to be discarded as an outworn political anachronism; for the United States is just as involved in world affairs as any other nation and her future is just as dependent upon a successful solution of universal economic problems as that of any other country. In other words, she can no longer live apart from the rest of the world and retain her relative position therein, but she must unite with the other nations to restore the proper balance and stability essential to a return to prosperity.

As regards Canada and the United States our troubles can be traced directly back to Europe where present conditions have for the most part originated. It seems strange that the richest country in the world, with all her vaunted wealth and great hoards of gold should, notwithstanding, have one of the largest armies of unemployment in the world. But such being the case, it can be attributed to no other cause than that the economic unity of the universe has in some manner been disturbed. For immediate causes one must refer to the lack of purchasing power on the part of people overseas. If Europe cannot buy, America cannot sell. For many decades the European market has absorbed the surplus products of this continent, such as wheat, meat, cotton, oil and many highly finished manufactures, but of late years the accumulating bankruptcy consequent upon the great war has left Europe so weak and impoverished as to make impossible of maintenance anything like the trade European countries used to call for in pre-war days. Matters have reached such a pass that our neighbour's troubles merge with our own difficulties on this and the other side of the ocean and that ours cannot be solved without a simultaneous solution of theirs.

My travels led me through some of the northern and central parts of the European continent, comprising a long, continuously changing panorama of formerly bustling urban activity, majestic mountain grandeur and exquisite pastoral beauty and simplicity, and during the entire extent of the journey the sun had shone down on all this beautiful scenery in a veritable blaze of glory, creating in one a momentary impression that all was right with the world and that this glorious sunshine and the products drawn by its power out of the rich European soil were ever at the undisturbed disposal of the inhabitants and possessors thereof. It was not until I had spoken to the peoples in the different countries I had visited and had been shown various ruins and wrecks, many evidences of which could be seen all over Europe, that the other side of the picture began to unfold itself. These ruins and the consequent industrial stagnation of the war broke every delusion I had about that continent in spite of its great culture, history, traditions and scenic appeal. I had thought that the devastating character of the last great war would forevermore become an object lesson to the belligerent countries, but their hatred and suspicion of each other have increased rather than decreased since the world war. I believe the fault lies in the system under which Europeans have been brought up rather than in the people themselves who, in my opinion, have become merely the victims of a vicious war psychology or propaganda. Propaganda may have had a very doubtful value during the throes of war, but in time of peace it is inconceivable how hate, blindness and error are allowed to stifle the natural impulse of man to seek the truth and live in harmony with his fellows.

Before my departure as the Canadian delegate to the Interparliamentary Union at Bucharest, I had entertained a somewhat hazy attitude toward the question of disarmament; but when, during the course of my journey I found out how alike are all the peoples of the world, how similar their cares, joys, longings, lives and ambitions, and when I realized how universal are the decency, honesty and worthiness of the common man, I frankly admit I felt no pangs of conscience in voting against a proposed resolution to set up an armed force for the League of Nations as well as against other motions that I thought might perpetuate the damnable war spirit that had separated Europe into so many factions and that has prevented her from regaining her strength and taking her proper position in the world. I could not help contemplating the part that Canada should and must play in the ever-changing scheme of world affairs, for ever since I was a young man playing baseball on the sand lots of my little coal-mining birthplace with contemporaries of a multitude of racial origin, my mind has been deeply agitated over the great common heritage given to us on this side of the ocean by a Supreme Being to perpetuate the old and yet new doctrine of peace, good-will and the brotherhood of man. Notwithstanding the vicissitudes, exigencies and antipathies resulting from a peculiar psychology of racial warfare, I nevertheless still retain the hope and optimism born of the democracy of youthful experiences, that Canada will some day become, as it were, a beacon light to the rest of the world, torn by bitter strife and racial animosities to show the way to a more complete and mutual understanding amongst the various constituent elements thereof. In order to get a good picture of Europe hon. members should visualize a continent much smaller in size than Canada but with about forty times our population, and composed of some thirty sovereign states, each with its own army, its central government, its frontiers and the usual customs barriers, differing in race and religion, and with all the smouldering feuds and antagonisms of by-gone centuries. This seething, restless conglomeration of races—where did they all originate? Where did they come from; what were their sorrows, their joys and their ambitions? Those were questions, Mr. Speaker, which I put to myself and found exceedingly fascinating. Taking them individually I found some very charming, cultured and progressive individuals, but judging them as nations I had seen and heard only too much of the mutual hatred and distrust which has persisted in Europe so bitterly all down through the ages. When I had finally completed my journey and found myself on board ship again quietly contemplating the whole situation, I could not help but draw a parallel with our own miniature Europe in Canada, and note the difference in attitude on the part of our polyglot and cosmopolitan races which are making their contribution to the building up of this great nation—difference in attitude not only towards each other but also towards the country of their adoption; and I thought, Mr. Speaker, that if something of the tolerance and good will, something of the spirit of friendship and mutual cooperation which characterize our various peoples in this country in meeting their problems could only be infused into their kinsmen on the other side of the Atlantic ocean there would not have been any occasion for the huge burdens of debts and for the nervous piling up of armaments which slowly but surely must bring about the collapse and ruin of every country in Europe.

It is true that we on this side of the ocean have a crisis also, but I think that that is largely due to the breakdown of our foreign markets. Europe has always absorbed our exportable surplus of wheat and other grains, and therefore I think it is the resurrection of that market that will bring about a revival of trade and the return of prosperity in this country. This, of course, does not ignore the existence of our vast internal problems which call for immediate solution, or the necessity of setting our own house in order so that we may adjust ourselves more effectively to world conditions.

In stressing the European situation, Mr. Speaker, I am seeking no alibi for our lack of a policy in this country. My purpose is merely to call attention to the basic unity of the world in which no country can live unto itself, and where each is dependent on the other to the extent of its own deficiencies as well as the others' ability to supply and our own ability to pay. Someone in this country has said that all trade is essentially barter and that commodities can only be paid for in goods. I was very much surprised to learn while over in England that out of the 175 million bushels of wheat which they annually import into that country, 105 million bushels come from foreign sources, while only 70 million bushels come from Canada and Australia. Just how much this disproportion is due to Canada's unwillingness to buy more British goods I am at the moment unable to say, but I feel confident that if our volume of imports from the British Isles was increased it would react most favourably on our export trade in wheat and other food products, for it is hard to understand how Canada and the mother country can trade other than on a reciprocal basis. Only the other day the Right Hon. Mr. Thomas in England made this statement:

> Canada may say, we are interested mainly in wheat, and from the standpoint of Great Britain the most important and indeed the only factor is what they will do in regard to our manufactures.

In plain English that means: If you want us to buy more of your wheat, you must buy more of our manufactures. When Mr. Thomas specifically referred to wheat in regard to Canada's trade with Great Britain he evidently must have been aware of the predominance of wheat as our staple export. Indeed so extensive has our grain trade become that from a country trading originally in only fish, fur and lumber, the sale of our grain in foreign markets has within the past three decades taken precedence over all other products in Canada. In 1932 nearly forty per cent of our total exports, valued at nearly half a billion dollars, was grain products. Indeed, it is through the grain trade that Canada reached the peak of her prosperity, and it is through that trade that she must regain it; for our foreign trade is the lifestream and foundation of our economic structure, and any restriction or curtailment thereof must strike directly and most powerfully upon the primary producers of this country, whose very existence depends upon a profitable sale of their products in markets abroad. Under the circumstances farmers cannot continue indefinitely to sell their products under the cost of production and at the same time maintain a fair and decent standard of living and meet all their various obligations. This condition has its limitations, and unless some methods of enlarging our markets and improving the system of distribution of our products to those markets are evolved, agriculture in the west is likely to sink into hopeless insolvency from which it may never recover, and when a basic industry like farming fails it is bound to affect adversely every other industry in Canada.

I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words about the tariff, but the tariff as one of the disturbing factors in trade recovery has been so thoroughly discussed that I think it would be superfluous for me to rehash the old stereotyped arguments here this afternoon. It may, however, serve some useful purpose to point out the utter futility of economic tariff warfare not only in solving our internal problems in Canada but also in stabilizing world conditions. Tariff revision is a world problem, and as such must be solved by the world at large. I do not think it can be accomplished by unilateral agreement; it must be accomplished by the mutual consent and cooperation of all the countries simultaneously, to do any real or genuine good.

During my visit to Europe I could not help but feel that the continent was too top heavy to last very long without collapsing, and that only an economic union of all the states thereof could save it from ultimate ruin. An American editor has said:

> The way to understand Europe's economic tangle is to picture Canada as if it were hacked and divided by customs and military barriers, so that goods from Vancouver to Montreal would be inspected and charged duty at every few miles.

Such duplication of governmental, military and administrative machinery would be far more than Canada could bear, and it is certainly a load which Europe cannot carry either at the present or any time in the future. Among other obstacles to a return of world prosperity are disarmament, a settlement of the problems of international indebtedness, and the question of minorities. The Versailles treaty was supposed to set the European house in order, but it seems rather to have left a couple of ghosts which appear at frequent intervals to haunt the makers of the treaty and destroy their peace of mind. Senator Borah, chairman of the United States foreign affairs committee, wants to revise the treaty, and so do many others. He comes out flat-footed on the debt question and asks that war reparations and war debts be cancelled. On top of all this, sir, the minorities in Europe are clamouring in ever-accumulating zeal for autonomous freedom within their own ethnographical boundaries or else complete absorption within their own racial groups. On the other hand, so intent are the newly set up states in Europe in hammering together the various constituent elements thereof into one homogeneous whole, by riding roughshod over their minorities, that little heed is paid to the cry of self-determination or to the minority treaties which have been placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations, and by which most of the post-war countries in Europe are bound.

I never saw so many soldiers in all my life as I did on my trip across the European continent. All along the railway lines one could see numerous sentries on guard. Here and there regiments of new recruits were being drilled, and in the restaurants, theatres and railway trains it seemed as if the well-groomed officers were the only patrons. It was not until one encountered the abject poverty of the cities, towns and rural districts that the sight of these well-fed officers became extremely ominous and significant. Time after time the picture of Canada with her 4,000 miles of unpatrolled boundary line, and her very meagre force of men under arms, came to my mind, and I could not help but feel a little homesick for the country where armaments were almost negligible and where war occupied the smallest place in our thoughts. The horrible vision of beautiful glorious Europe poverty stricken on the one hand and soldier infested on the other will always remain an object lesson to me of the folly of maintaining militarism and at the same time hoping for a return of prosperity. Such a futile hope, Mr. Speaker, can only end in despair; for much as the nations would like to disarm, they dare not because of fear of their neighbours, which has grown, rather than diminished, since the last great war. After thirteen years of peace there are now more men under arms than in 1914. Little wonder, therefore, is it that the nations hover so dangerously on the verge of bankruptcy and complete collapse.

In addition to the costs of armaments Europe is shackled by huge war and other debts. I do not think it worth while to mention the amount of those debts, because hon. members are familiar with the figures. British opinion is in favour of wiping out completely all war debts, and is sincere in its desire for a greater industrial prosperity in Germany. But the revival of a strong, industrially prosperous Germany relieved of crushing war debts will hardly be accepted in a friendly spirit by France, whose whole policy in regard to Germany has been based on overwhelming fear, and the consequent determination to keep this neighbouring country down; but how long Germany can be kept down, or how long the German nation can be suppressed without pulling the rest of Europe down, including France, remains to be seen. So far as I am concerned nations of the world cannot get together too soon to eradicate the evils which brought about and continue to sustain the present depression. I have always been puzzled to know why the minorities question has been so ignored, and yet it is one of the main factors of the present chaos and dissension in Europe. Nations cannot be dismembered without leaving behind a lot of ill feeling and a sense of injustice. From what I saw of the rankling bitterness caused by the revision of the map of Europe I cannot help but feel that a little revision here and there would do much towards restoring a better and more harmonious balance. Love of one's country and one's race is a powerful source of many virtues and acts of heroism when it is based on and controlled by ethical laws. When it degenerates, however, into immoderate nationalism it soon becomes a source of countless acts of injustice and wrong. Look at the situation in Europe to-day. Forty million people have been cut off from their ethnical and racial groups by the Versailles treaty. They are being subjected to unspeakable outrages in the name of chauvinistic nationalism. So intent are these new post-war countries upon obliterating all traces of the diversity of the races within their borders that little attention is paid to the stipulations and provisions by which these countries are bound in respect of the minorities. When one therefore realizes that all these atrocities are committed in spite of the fact that minority rights are guaranteed by the League of Nations, and that most of these minorities live in close contiguity to strong kindred nations, the remark made by a certain writer, that Europe is sitting on a volcano which might at any moment erupt and light a flame throughout the world, is based as much on the minorities question as it is on any other of the problems that are harassing the world to-day.

In regard to the race question in Europe, one must take into account the fact that we are dealing with conditions and not theories, concrete situations and not abstract unrealities; for much as one might wish to warp existent realities to suit preconceived ideas of what should or should not be done, one cannot afford to ignore the human element, the peculiar innate characteristic pride, aspirations and ambitions that so stubbornly persist in all races and make people and conditions just what they are. Nothing keeps extreme nationalism alive like the forcible suppression of nationalism. If hon. members could only visualize the hopeless despair of suppressed desire, the cruel pain of thwarted effort, and the spiritual hell resultant therefrom, it would enable them to realize more clearly not only the tragedy but also the great injustice of the situation. Each race feels it is just as good as the other, and it is extremely galling to their self-respect to live in continual physical and spiritual subjugation and forced negation of the very qualities which the superpossessed races consider a virtue in themselves but a sin in those who unfortunately find themselves under their domination. But races somehow will not stay down; and as history has given us countless examples of the folly of forcible suppression, nothing less than a grant of autonomy and liberty of cultural development will free Europe from one of its potential menaces to peace and well-being.

The achievement of self-determination may after all be necessary in order to attain fuller growth and a wider conception of responsibilities. Their pride satisfied, the races should thus be unimpeded in their progressive march to a better civilization. At the present time the minorities in Europe are more interested in political than economic liberation; but once the former is attained they ought to be able to devote their undivided attention to the latter problem. In any case civilization is not a standard but a continuous creative process requiring two simultaneous cooperative impulsions,—that which consists of the fulfilment of a common desire and that which comprises a pooling of separate individual contributions. The tendency of races is, primarily, to develop as separate entities, and secondarily, as parts of one cosmos or united universe. Although probably too much emphasis is being laid on the former and too little on the latter, I do not think that there is anything inconsistent in advocating cultural freedom, or even self-determination, of the races and the economic unity of the world at the same time. Such unity is impossible without peace, and peace is hardly likely unless justice is done to the forty million minorities in Europe.

Many centuries ago a great writer said:

In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas—essentials unity, in doubtful matters liberty, in all things charity.

Those wise words, Mr. Speaker, may well be applied to the situation in Europe. Economic unity is very essential, and it is a matter on which all the nations of the world should place a great deal of emphasis. I do not think we can have prosperity in Canada unless we have prosperity in Europe. It is true that we have questions on this side of the ocean which call for immediate attention, but nevertheless I believe that unless the situation in Europe is changed it is hardly likely we shall have immediate prosperity in this country.

I hope on another occasion to tell the house about my trip to Bucharest and describe what was done there. I left Canada last September as the Canadian delegate to the interparliamentary union conference in Bucharest from October 1 to October 9, 1931. I was the only delegate from Canada. I was supposed to be accompanied by twenty delegates from Great Britain and other British possessions, but the old country being at that time in the throes of a general election, I found myself not only the sole delegate from Canada, but also the sole representative from the whole British empire.

Mr. F. H. PICKEL (Brome-Missisquoi): I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to have this opportunity of dealing briefly with a subject in which I am much interested. If congratulations from a backbencher are worth anything, I desire to offer mine to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for the clear and businesslike way in which he presented his first budget, the preparation of which involves very careful study and a great amount of work. I think the thanks of the house are due to the hon. minister for a task well done.

I represent a constituency interested in mixed farming, principally dairying, such farming as practically all of the counties in Canada east of the great lakes are interested in. Of course, many of the different counties throughout the three prairie provinces, and especially in British Columbia are also interested in this branch of farming, some to a greater, some to a lesser extent, but I understand that this industry is increasing rapidly in those sections. By nature the west is a grain-growing and grazing country, and as such those engaged in it perform a very important economic function. At the present time the dairy industry is suffering greatly in this country; it is simply drifting. I may say, without attributing the cause to any party or to anyone, that it is simply drifting without any directing policy. To me it seems that we have rather neglected the dairy industry. In 1925, with the introduction of the Australian trade treaty, the industry received its death blow, and it has never recovered. Its recovery will take a long time. People directed their agricultural efforts in other directions, having lost interest in dairying, because there was nothing in it. Right here I want to express concurrence in what the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) advocated the other day—a small bonus on butter and cheese. I believe that at the present time that would stimulate and help an industry that is in dire distress. With regard to the address last night of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), we of course do not always see eye to eye, but so far as he voiced dissatisfaction at the treatment which the milk producers are getting in the city of Montreal, I agree with him. The milk producers in the country are receiving one dollar while the distributor in Montreal is getting three dollars; that does not seem to be right; it should be rectified. I think something should be done about it.

What I want to call to the attention of the house particularly is the committee on agriculture. I have been a member of that committee since 1930 and its time has been spent for the most part discussing wheat. I have on three or four occasions tried to get a word in to talk about butter and eggs or something of that kind, but each time I have been sidetracked entirely and the committee has talked wheat. I have never seen Garnet wheat, but I know that I could step up to a bin and pick out Garnet or Marquis or Reward or any other variety of wheat.

Mr. SANDERSON: Did you not talk a good deal about butter in the election of 1930?

Mr. PICKEL: Yes, and with great results.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McINTOSH: You actually slipped in on it, didn't you?

Mr. PICKEL: I trust that something will be done so that we won't slip out on it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am afraid you will.

Mr. PICKEL: I may say that it was not the Canadian article that we slipped in on; it was the New Zealand. Now, I have no quarrel with the west. We all realize that their problems are serious, and anything that can be done to assist the wheat grower of the west should be done; anything that is possible to help them should not be overlooked. At the same time, the dairy farmer, the mixed farmer in the east, should not be overlooked entirely either. This year we have not mentioned butter or eggs or pork in the committe on agriculture. What I should like to see is a divided committee with a dairy section and a wheat section. Then we could do something. I should like to have the committee on agriculture consider some of the problems of the mixed farmer in the east and offer recommendations to the minister and to the house regarding our troubles. But the minute a man mentions the word "agriculture" here, ninety per cent of the members think of wheat and nothing else. This is all well and good in its place, but I do not know why we should talk wheat all the time, to the undoing of the rest of agriculture.

[Mr. Pickel.]

There are several ways in which I think we could help the dairy interests of the country, and I am going to put forward one or two. If we could ever get the ear of the committee on agriculture, I am sure that committee would recommend these things—and it should be by their recommendation that these points should come before the minister and the house. But as we cannot bring it in from that source, I will give it myself. The moment our butter gets on the export basis, it drops in price. Of the total agricultural production of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in 1930, of approximately $700,000,000, only $82,000,000 for Quebec and $105,500,000 for Ontario, was attributable to the dairy industry. That is a shame. These are two great agricultural provinces, and this is the total—$187,500,000. Of the total production of milk for the whole of Canada in 1930, amounting to $237,037,000, fifty-seven per cent was consumed as fresh milk and twenty-eight and a half per cent was made into butter, 6.7 per cent into cheese, and 7.8 per cent into other dairy products.

This is my point. In cheese we have an article with which we can compete successfully on the English market with the rest of the world. With butter, we cannot. We might as well admit at once that we cannot manufacture butter with Australia and New Zealand; it is out of the question, because they make it for half what it costs us. Why, last year 3,000,000 pounds was brought in over a tariff of five and seven cents. It is absolutely impossible to compete with them in the British market in butter; but with cheese we have and always have had the reputation of manufacturing the best Cheddar cheese in the world. To-day in the English market we can get top prices for our cheese, but while in 1904-05 we sent 200,000,000 pounds of cheese to the English market, last year we sent only 86,000,000 pounds. What is the reason for that great decrease? We should be also raising more bacon for that $250,000,000 English market, where our bacon sells for a good price. My point is that the agricultural committee should recommend to the government the encouragement of farmers in the making of cheese, thus lessening the amount of milk going into the production of butter and relieving the situation in that regard. By following such a policy the manufacture of dairy products would be increased immensely.

This policy would not only help the farmers in the east; it would be of great help also to the western grain growers, who could find a market in Canada for 40,000,000 or 50,000,000 bushels of low grade grain. I believe the dairy industry in the east would be benefited greatly also if grain could be purchased more cheaply. At the present time a dealer or consumer in the east, buying grain at the distributing points, is charged the all-rail rate from Fort William to the point of distribution, plus the local rate to the consuming point. I have here some figures I would like to put on Hansard just to give an idea of what this amounts to. These rates are as follows:

Various Rates on Wheat in Cents per 100 lbs. Ex Fort William to Points in East

This shows too big a spread between the rates that are charged and the rates that should be charged, and I think this should be looked into. If this situation were remedied the eastern farmer would save many dollars; more grain would be used and a bigger market would be developed for western grain

I am sorry more of the grain growers who are on the agriculture committee are not in the house, because I would like to ask them to be a little more lenient and allow the farmers from the east to say a word in that committee once in a while. I do not say this in a disrespectful way at all, but when we get up in the committee and say a word about butter or eggs they take the words right out of our mouths and tell us all about it. I would suggest that the agriculture committee, which to-day consists of 60 members, should be divided into two groups. We should have a dairy section and a grain growing section, and I think in that way we would do better work. A great many valuable suggestions might come to the minister and the government if that were done, but at the present time we have no opportunity to say a word.

Now I should like to say a word or two with regard to the Canadian National Railways, in which we are all very much interested. I suppose, coming from the eastern townships and sitting on this side of the house, I am presuming a great deal in venturing a word or two on this subject, but together with the other members of the house and the people of Canada generally I am deeply interested in this question, and we are all bearing the cost. I do not understand why the people of Canada persist in trying to make themselves believe this is a solvent enterprise. It should go into the hands of a receiver and be disposed of. It is no compliment to the intelligence of the people of this country to try to bolster up that railway; if it were in my power to do so, I think it would be advisable to open up negotiations with a view to disposing of it. The only visible purchaser or receiver that I know of is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I have none of its stock, unfortunately; I hold no brief for that railroad, but as all Canadians are, I am proud, of it. I do not think there is in the world another railroad better equipped or managed than the Canadian Pacific. I mention it because I do not know of any other company or combination of people to whom we could give the national railway. By getting rid of it, we would lessen that deficit of a million and a quarter dollars that every week of our lives we are throwing into the mismanaged Canadian National, and negotiations should at once be opened with somebody for the disposal of it.

Mr. SANDERSON: Why not take the matter up with the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion)?

Mr. PICKEL: I am taking it up with the house; that includes the Minister of Railways.

Mr. SANDERSON: He is not listening to the hon. member.

Mr. MANION: I heard every word he said.

Mr. PICKEL: Before leaving this subject may I say that I think the Liberal party is derelict in its duty in that it does not erect somewhere around these parliament buildings an imposing monument to the memory of the late Hon. A. G. Blair, late Minister of Railways in the cabinet of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He told that party what it was doing and how it was going to ruin the country, and that is what will happen if we continue in our present course. We have a bankrupt railroad and if we continue we are going to bankrupt the Canadian Pacific and the country.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is it the railroad or the government about which the hon. gentleman is talking?

Mr. PICKEL: Both railroads.

I should like to say a word or two about the imperial conference, although I would not wonder at people looking askance at a backbencher having the temerity to discuss such a subject. I want to mention a few facts in connection with that great conference which is to take place here in July. During the election of 1930 the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) pranced around the country from town to town telling the people that if we did not elect the Liberal party so that he could go to the conference, we were lost; that there was nobody else in sight who could represent Canada at the conference. The elections came on and the Canadian people decided they would not send that right hon. gentleman. Perhaps they made a mistake. During the special session of 1930, while we were passing legislation in regard to the relief of unemployment and making changes in the tariff, the leader of the opposition took every opportunity that presented itself to instruct the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) how to act when he went to the conference, got him all dressed and dolled up, showed him how to pussyfoot in his stockinged feet and told him he would have to approach the throne with courteous conciliation.

The conference took place, and I suppose my hon. friends thought our worthy Prime Minister would go there and act just as the leader of the opposition had told him. I presume the leader of the opposition showed the Prime Minister just how to approach the throne with that courteous conciliation, and just how to pussyfoot, because he himself had always been so successful in his negotiations in the United States. Every time the leader of the opposition carried on negotiations in the United States regarding any sort of matter, immediately he returned to Canada the government of the United States raised the tariff. As I say, the imperial conference took place in London and the Prime Minister attended it, worthily supported by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). What did he tell them? He shocked the English people; but it was just what they needed; if the Prime Minister had not gone there, they would be still in the rut they have been in for hundreds of years. Strange to say, they took his advice; but after he returned from that conference it will be remembered that during the session of 1931 we sat here sweltering, melting and dissolving in our seats in July, while members of the opposition were bringing in great tomes, encyclopaedias and dictionaries to define that little word "humbug". How they rolled that round in their mouths! What a juicy morsel it was! They were as pleased as a boy going out to kill skunks, and the result was about the same.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PICKEL: I have not much more to say, Mr. Speaker. Indeed I have already said more than I intended and have taken up too much of the time of the house, for which I apologize.

Before the house rose for the dinner recess I had just reached the point where the skunk was functioning well. After we had passed days and weeks discussing that little word "humbug" which was applied to the right hon. the Prime Minister's efforts in England at the imperial conference, things quieted down until the British elections came on. What was the result of those elections? The British people did exactly what the right hon. gentleman had urged them to do, and I consider that that was the greatest political achievement of modern times. I do not think any other statesman in the British Empire, British or colonial, has accomplished so much. The British people went to the polls and voted protection. They had lived under free trade for a century; it was a great reversal of opinion for them to vote protection, but they did so, to my mind, as the express result of the right hon. the Prime Minister's visit to that country, and this session has been conspicuous for the absence of the use of that little word humbug. Once in a while it may slip out unintentionally from some member on the other side of the house, but it has been heard only two or three times this session, and yet Hansard was full of it in the session of 1931.

I should like to express my appreciation of the efforts of the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country. The opposition endeavour to belittle his efforts and to belittle him personally at every opportunity that presents itself. I admit that their criticism does not have much weight, but why they should endeavour to belittle a man of that calibre is more than I can understand. He is devoting his whole life to the good of this country, and he is in earnest about it. He is doing his very best and the people of Canada should be thankful that he is at the head of affairs in this country in these times. It should be every Canadian's prayer that the Prime Minister be spared to lead us out of the morass in which we now find ourselves. From what little political experience I have had, and it has not been much—successful experience, at all events—it seems to me it must be a terrible sacrifice for the Prime Minister to be occupying the position he does. He is pulled first one way and then another. His life must be a continuous tumult, and we should endeavour in every way we can to make his task as light as possible.

In conclusion let me refer for a moment to the dairying industry. I should like a little cooperation from those members of the committee on agriculture who come from the grain growing sections of this country. I have been endeavouring since I came here to do what I could for the dairymen and the mixed farmers, but I must confess that I have not been able to do anything, and if I cannot help them in any way there is no use in my staying here. That is what I am here for, to help the mixed farmers of this country, and if the members of the committee on agriculture who come from the grain growing sections would only cooperate with the dairy section of that committee even to a very small extent we could do wonderful work.

Mr. BROWN: Has the hon. member ever noticed a lack of willingness to cooperate with him with regard to the dairy industry?

Mr. PICKEL: I will answer the hon. gentleman by saying that members from the wheat growing section are too willing to cooperate. If we mention butter they take it right out of our mouths and tell us all about it. If we talk milk, they take it right out of our mouths and tell us all about it, and ninety-five per cent of them use canned milk.

Mr. BROWN: You are dreaming, man.

Mr. PICKEL: That is the condition of affairs, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that this big, unwieldy committee of sixty members be subdivided, and let us have a dairy section, a mixed farming section, and a grain and beef section, if you like. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have talked and heard so much talk about wheat in the last two years that I have stopped using bread. It seems to me that the grain section of that committee should be willing to cooperate courteously with us once in a while for the good of the dairy industry.

Mr. EUSEBE ROBERGE (Mégantic) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go over the whole ground covered by the speech of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel), I approve of the suggestion which he has just made to the house. The committee on agriculture should, next year, be divided into two committees, one could specialize in the dairy industry while the other could look after the products of the farm, as a whole. I think that Quebec as well as the other provinces which have adopted mixed farming, would benefit more by this plan. I cannot approve, however, of his congratulations to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) with reference to this year's budget, the latter does not help the small wage earners, farmers or workmen, and still less does it fulfil the pledges made at the last election. In the last electoral campaign the Conservative party made many promises in our rural districts. I shall not refer to them all but I shall mention butter, because it served as their battle horse. On all the hustings throughout Quebec, the Conservative party stated that it was a disgrace to see farmers selling their butter at such low prices as 28 or 30 cents per pound.

They asserted that as soon as they assumed power the price would go up to 40, 50 or 60 cents per pound. Well, what do we witness now that they are at the helm of the affairs of this country? To-day, while walking on Rideau street, I noticed that butter retailed at 20 cents per pound. All farm products are down like butter and the farmers at present, receive about the same prices as previous to 1896, under an old-time Conservative administration of early days.

In my own county, sir, the work in factories has dwindled at least 50 per cent. In my speech on March 22 last, I stated that the number of unemployed was larger than it had ever been in the county of Mégantic, and at that date it had increased 1,200 or 1,400 over what it was on June 30, 1930, in spite of all the pledges made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I also mentioned then that the government had refused to help the workmen of Black Lake by not expending certain sums, because they had been voted under a Liberal régime and obtained through their member. To-day, I shall add and prove to the house that if the asbestos mines at Black Lake have not been working for seventeen months and if now the Thetford mines only employ half the men that they did in June 1930, notwithstanding a 50 per cent reduction in wages, the Conservative party which has been in power for 20 months, is to blame. The government is entirely responsible for the unemployment prevailing in Black Lake and at Thetford Mines. It is owing to the government's bad administration and forgotten pledges that the mines at Black Lake are entirely closed and are only half worked at Thetford. The embargo placed by the government on Russian goods is also, to some extent, to blame for this situation. I do not approve of the existing régime in Russia, however, I am opposed to the policy of this government which set an example to all the other countries, to the detriment of our industries and our miners who have no work. It is all very well for a prime minister to request that we should repose our trust in him, he has, however, no right to abuse it to starve our workmen so that his name may become famous abroad. It is going beyond all limits and the workman is strongly against such means. If the embargo against Russia was necessary, at least, they could have waited until England, France, the United States, Germany and all the large countries of Europe took such a step; Canada could then have followed. But it is ridiculous that Canada should be the first to take such a step. All the great powers have continued to trade with Russia, and we, alone, have deprived our workmen of work by placing an embargo on Russian goods. Russia to retaliate, sowed, the following year, one third more wheat, and more than doubled its asbestos output, that is why prices of asbestos have fallen more than 50 per cent and wheat proportionately. That is the result arrived at by the embargo adopted by the Conservative government. If the mines at Black Lake are closed, it is because Russia has lowered its prices 50 per cent and doubled its output. And if a similar situation exists at Thetford Mines, the embargo is also partly to blame.

The government, sir, not content with seeing the number of unemployed become larger every day, increases the cost of living by putting up the sales tax 6 per cent, this year. Will that benefit the unemployed? The cost of living having increased, they will become more numerous.

Both the budget and the bill authorizing a horizontal cut of 10 per cent in salaries is evidence of the lack of interest which the government takes in the small wage earner. The latter is called upon to bear this cut while a great number of high salaried people are exempt. This is shown by the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who advocates exempting a class of high officials. Is this a good way of helping the country to reduce its national debt? If the government actually requires these $8,000,000 to balance its budget, why call upon the small wage earners instead of requesting those who are making large profits and are in a better position to put up the money, for a year only? Why not increase the tax on profit from 7 per cent to 50 per cent, after deducting what the act allows for living and overhead expenses. I am quite sure that millionaires and high financiers, who boast of being so patriotic when they force small wage earners to pay, would be willing to help the government to balance its budget, since it would be only a matter of one year.

Mr. Speaker, as long as the government endeavours to levy taxes on those who have no money, it will continue to pile up deficits.

Another subject to which I want to draw the attention of the house will interest, I think, members on the government side as well as those in the opposition, as we have all pledged ourselves to help our constituents. For over twelve years a certain person known as Garfield MacKinnon, who passes himself off as secretary of the Association of Mail Contractors of Canada, and gives as his address Guelph, Ont., has been—according to information which I gathered following an inquiry which I have been making since February 6 last on his activities—travelling through part of Ontario and Quebec as well as through the Maritime provinces, in order to exploit the mail carriers wherever he goes, and take advantage of their trust in him. After having given to the house the proofs which I have in my possession, I hope that members who also are in possession of any evidence that Garfield MacKinnon has also swindled their constituency, will kindly make it known to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé), in order that he may hold an inquiry and protect in the future employees against this individual.

In January last, Mr. MacKinnon came to the county of Mégantic and held meetings, at Thetford Mines, of all mail contractors residing in the upper part of the county; he also held a meeting at Plessisville. The latter took place on January 23. Those present state that the defeated candidate at the last election, Mr. J. L. Beaudoin was also present and that Mr. Garfield MacKinnon promised all mail carriers who joined the association that they would receive in the future $70 per mile, they would also be paid for all legal holidays and all letter boxes would be placed on the right side of the route; he, however, added that those who refused to join the association would lose their position within six months.

To prove my contentions, the following is an affidavit, sworn before notary C. E. Gosselin, of Plessisville, and a receipt given by Garfield MacKinnon to Mr. Joseph Côté, mail carrier:

Province of Quebec,
District of Arthabaska, Plessisville.

We, the undersigned Antonio Boulanger, Wilfrid Boulé and Joseph Côté, mail carriers, all three residing in Plessisville, after being sworn on the Holy Bible, state:

That we are under contract to carry the mail, the first, on rural route No. 1 Somerset-South; the second, mail carrier from the post office of Plessisville to the station of Plessisville and return; and the third, on rural route No. 2.

That on or about the last days of January, 1932, a person named Garfield MacKinnon, claiming to be secretary of the association of mail carriers or mail contractors, called at the respective domiciles of the undersigned, requesting a contribution of five dollars, as mail carrier, otherwise they would lose their contracts.

That the said Joseph Côté alone paid the five dollars requested.

That the two others refused to pay said amount of five dollars.

Sworn before me, at Plessisville, this 4th day of April, 1932.

Antonio Boulanger,
Wilfrid Boulé,
Joseph Côté.

C. E. Gosselin, N.P.

The following is the receipt given to Joseph Côté:

"Membership"
Canadian Mail Contractors' Association
Plessisville, Que.
January 23, 1932.

Received from Mr. Joseph Côté, P.O. to C.N.Ry. Plessisville, one membership fee of five dollars to the Canadian Mail Contractors' Association.

With thanks,

Garfield MacKinnon,
P.O. Box 34, Guelph, Ont.
Sec.-Treas. Canadian Mail
Contractors' Association.

The day of his arrival at Plessisville, I was notified by telephone that Garfield MacKinnon had held a meeting of all mail carriers, at the hotel, in order to induce them to join the Association of Mail Carriers of Canada. A number of my friends having notified me of what was taking place at Plessisville, I asked them to advise the mail carriers not to join this association before ascertaining whether Garfield McKinnon was employed by the Post Office Department and to refuse his request should he not give proof to that effect. I promised them that as soon as I arrived in Ottawa, I would make inquiries and notify them whether it was in their interest to join this association. On my arrival in Ottawa, at the beginning of February, I communicated with the Post Office Department so as to obtain information on this matter, and I wrote the following letter to the Superintendent of Mails:

Ottawa, Feb. 5, 1932.

G. C. Anderson, Esq.,
Superintendent,
Post Office Department,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Anderson.—Will you be good enough to let me know if there is an association for mail carriers in Canada, if so, is Mr. MacKinnon, Ottawa, formerly from Guelph, the secretary.

If this association still exists, will you be good enough to let me know the name and address of the president.

Yours truly,
Eusèbe Roberge, M.P.

The following is the answer received on February 6:

Post Office Department, Canada, Mail Service Branch
Ottawa, 6th February, 1932.

Eusèbe Roberge, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Roberge,—I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 5th February, with regard to the Canadian Mail Contractors' Association.

In reply to your inquiry, I desire to advise you that the last information I have on the matter is a circular issued in 1928 at which time Mr. Joseph P. Everett of Blenheim, Ontario, was president of this association.

In connection with the activities of Mr. Garfield MacKinnon, I am enclosing for your information copy of circular issued by the District Superintendent at Quebec, in accordance with instructions from the department.

Yours sincerely,

G. C. Anderson,
Superintendent.

As mentioned in the letter of the Superintendent, he forwarded to me a circular letter from the District Post Office in Quebec, dated July 19, 1927, which I shall read to the house, as well as the questions that I had inscribed in Hansard on February 18, 1932, and the answers given by the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé).

The following is the circular letter received:

Office of the District Superintendent of Postal Service

Quebec, July 19, 1927.

Notice to Mail Contractors

The department is informed that Mr. Garfield McKinnon is still endeavouring to collect $5 from mail contractors as a subscription to the association of mail couriers; and in order to obtain this amount he threatens to have their contract cancelled unless they pay said amount.

I am instructed by the department to notify all couriers plainly and precisely that Mr. McKinnon has no influence whatsoever with the Postmaster General and that he is entirely unable to follow up his threats as regards cancelling contracts.

Mail contractors will kindly observe that there is no necessity for them to join the association of Mr. McKinnon in order to submit their complaints to the department as all mail couriers are free to communicate directly with the Postmaster General. All improvements in the service in the past was done independently of Mr. McKinnon's efforts and it is therefore useless for them to pay $5 to Mr. McKinnon in order to receive favours from the government.

Mr. McKinnon obtains money under false pretence when he threatens to have their contracts cancelled, while, on the other hand making them promises.

S. Tanner Green, Administrator.

The following are the questions which I put to the Postmaster General, on February 18, 1932:

No. 32

Mr. Roberge: Monday next—Question:

1. Did the Saskatoon district superintendent of postal service on July 28, 1922, send out a circular stating that Garfield McKinnon was to have a bill introduced in April, 1920, in order to improve the position of mail contractors?

2. Did said contractors pay any money to McKinnon?

3. If so, what amounts were contributed and what benefits did they derive?

[Mr. Roberge.]

4. Did the Quebec district superintendent of postal service send out a circular on July 19, 1927, warning the said contractors against the promises by McKinnon?

5. Does the said McKinnon still seek contributions from said contractors?

6. Has the government taken the necessary measures to prevent McKinnon carrying on such practices?

The following are the Hon. Mr. Sauvé's answers:

1. No record.

2 and 3. No official record. No benefits derived by contractors from activities of Mr. McKinnon.

4. Yes.

5. Department understands Mr. McKinnon solicits contributions.

6. Contractors have been properly advised.

After receiving this answer, as the Post Office Department had published a circular letter dated July 14, 1922, notifying mail contractors not to join this association, I made use of this circular letter to point out to those interested the means Garfield McKinnon took to gain the confidence of the mail contractors and swindle them, as shown by the letter he wrote himself on March 24, 1920, and mentioned in the circular letter of the Post Office Department, of July 14, 1922. I shall not read the whole circular because it is somewhat long. I shall simply quote some extract:

On March 24, 1920, Mr. McKinnon wrote to a rural mail contractor of Ontario, as follows:

My Dear Sir,—

Your letter received to-day and I was very glad to hear from you. I am working very hard day and night, doing my very best to secure a large membership, as quickly as possible. In order that we can have our case carefully prepared and presented by experts before the government and parliament, at Ottawa early in April, and I would very much appreciate it, if you would kindly join with us at once.

We will be successful in our undertaking with the government, just as soon as our membership is large enough. So will you kindly do your duty and join with us at once.

Kindly let me hear from you at once.

Yours very faithfully,
Garfield McKinnon.

According to these extracts, which I have just read, Garfield McKinnon was to have a bill introduced in April 1920, in order to improve the lot of mail carriers. To find out whether such a bill had been introduced in the house between the above date and up to the time of making this statement against Mr. McKinnon, I wrote to the law clerk of the house, and his answer is as follows:

Mr. Eusèbe Roberge, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Roberge,—

Pursuant to your letter inquiring whether a bill had been introduced in the house since April, 1920, by Garfield McKinnon, or by others, to improve the position or lot of mail contractors, I must state that I went over the files covering the whole of that period and that at no time was such a bill introduced in the house. I came across a dozen bills relating to the Post Office Act, but none in the nature referred to by Mr. McKinnon.

Respectfully yours

Maurice Ollivier,
Law Clerk.

Tuesday, Feb. 23, 1932.

As you see McKinnon never had such a bill introduced in the house.

The following is a letter published in a circular from the Post Office Department. It is written in English, I had it, however, translated in French:

That this motive did not change is made evident by a letter from a postmaster in western Ontario, who on April 13, 1922, wrote to the Post Office Department, as follows:

On April 12th there was a man in this community by the name of Mr. McKinnon who was supposed to be organizing a mail couriers association.

He was leading the couriers (also the ex-couriers) to believe that he could get them back pay on their contracts as far back as 1917. They were to be paid at the rate of $70 per mile. Some of the old mail couriers were supposed to receive two or three thousand dollars back pay. Of course for the services Mr. McKinnon was going to render them he collected from the couriers the sum of $5 each—at least from those who were foolish enough to pay him. I know some of the ex-couriers who paid him the $5, and he is supposed to dig up this $2,000 or $3,000 of back pay for them.

Our old couriers, Mr. and Mr. paid him the $5, and believe me they need the $5 worse than the man who received it.

It is my opinion that such men as this should not be allowed to travel through this country, taking money out of real poor men, and leading them to believe that he could get for them something which is impossible.

After obtaining the information given to the house, I wrote to all mail contractors of my county, the number 47. Of this number, 17 had paid, each, to McKinnon the sum of $5.

The reason for disclosing these facts to the house, is that McKinnon swindled, as I have just shown, in the county of Mégantic alone, seventeen contractors out of $5 each, he has therefore stolen from my constituents $85. I request the Postmaster General and the Minister of Justice to have this man arrested. He has been living on the proceeds of other people's money for too long, he has obtained their money under false representation.

Both on behalf of my constituents, who have been swindled, and on my own, I ask that this man be made to return all the money thus obtained in my county, or that he be punished accordingly. This man has been scoffing at our governments far too long; he began to play this game under a Conservative régime and did the same thing under the Liberal rule and he has started again since the change of government. I think that the Postmaster General and the Minister of Justice should act immediately and rid the county of this Garfield McKinnon who swindled such large amounts by abusing the trust of mail carriers.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): As soon as I am through, you may speak as much as you like.

I request all members to kindly furnish the hon. Postmaster General with any evidence they may possess, for, in their interest as well as mine, our people must cease being swindled by this adventurer. If, for the last twelve years, the Post Office Department has been unable to obtain the necessary proof to have this man arrested, it is because the mail carriers feared they would be deprived of their contracts if they gave an affidavit as the one I have read to the house. That is why I beg the hon. Postmaster General to give his mail carriers a renewal of their contracts for four years as a reward for the services they render to his department, and to prevent also the person who distributes political favours in the county of Mégantic, from cancelling such contracts.

The hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Laflèche) seems to be interested in this question. This being the case, I shall read to him a circular letter which I have in hand:

Meeting of the Association of Rural Mail Carriers

Richmond, Que., Dec. 22, 1931.

Mr. C. LeBrun,
R.R. 2 Bromptonville.

A meeting of the association of rural mail carriers will be held, at Richmond, in the City Hall, Tuesday evening, Dec. 22, at 8 p.m.

Your worthy member, at Ottawa, Mr. François Joseph Laflèche, will be present and will address the meeting. All rural mail carriers and mail contractors, either from post office to post office or post office to railway station, are earnestly requested to be present at the meeting as questions relating to the improvement of the lot of rural mail carriers will be discussed.

Without fail be there!

Yours truly,

Garfield McKinnon,
Secretary of the Association of Canadian Mail Carriers.

The hon. Postmaster General states in one of his answers to my questions, asked on February 18, that mail carriers have been duly warned; however, so many changes have taken place since this government is in power, that I thought it wise to notify all rural mail carriers to beware of Garfield McKinnon.

The following is another letter to show that this man is not deserving of trust, since he was unable to hold a small contract previous to becoming secretary of an association which he founded to exploit the people:

Ottawa, April 6, 1932.

Mr. Eusèbe Roberge, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Roberge,—

In answer to your letter dated the 31st ultimo, I wish to inform you that Mr. Garfield McKinnon was a contractor carrying mail on rural route No. 6 of Guelph, from Feb. 1, 1919, to Jan. 21, 1920. It was found necessary to relieve him of his duties as mail contractor owing to the unsatisfactory service given.

Yours respectfully,

G. Anderson,
Superintendent.

I think, sir, as a result of this proof and that which may be given by other members, the hon. Postmaster General will find it possible to prevent this individual travelling through our rural districts in order to obtain money under false representation as he has been doing for the last twelve years.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, with other members I wish to extend to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) my congratulations on his excellent presentation of the budget. I liked the manner of its delivery and particularly the absence of partisanship throughout the whole speech.

From the capitalistic point of view undoubtedly this is a good budget; that is, if we are to continue putting the interests of capital above the welfare of human beings. But since that is not my idea, it does not seem to me to be a good budget, particularly in the methods relied on for raising taxes. For the most part the new taxes are to be levied on the great masses of the people; the consumers will have to pay them. It is true the income tax will be paid by those on whom it is levied, but the sales tax, the nuisance taxes and the excise tax—which seems to be a new name for a tariff tax—are passed on to the consuming masses. This will increase unemployment, because the purchasing power of the people will be still further reduced, and at the moment it is dangerously low. So I do not favour the minister's method of raising revenue.

I should like to see the income tax very much increased, but not on the lower incomes; instead of an increase of one hundred per cent in the income tax on a $4,000 income, and reducing this percentage until on an income of $100,000 the increase is only thirty-two per cent, I would graduate the increased percentage the other way, so that the higher the income the higher would be the rate of income tax. I think very soon the time will come when we shall levy taxes on those who have the money to pay them. I have said that before in this house, and I shall continue to say so until finally it will be done. Really the masses of the people, our workingmen and farmers, are not able to carry any greater tax burden than that under which they are at present staggering. As a matter of fact, many of them are not able to pay their present taxes.

I was interested in the proposal made on Tuesday by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) that the state should take over all incomes in excess of $25,000. Why not? At the present time we are in a jam because we have a surplus of goods, but those goods cannot be bought by the people who need them. There are persons enjoying large incomes who could spend more, but they are satisfying all their needs. In fact they do not know how to spend their money. The only way in which they spend it is in creating more machinery to produce more goods to add to the present surplus. Really it would be a convenience to them to suggest another channel of expenditure. True, they snap up government bonds, as we found out this year when the government floated certain loans; those loans were oversubscribed by people with more money than they knew what to do with. But we need a great deal of money to run this country, and by taking it from the masses in the form of burdensome taxation we are simply causing a greater amount of unemployment. Therefore it seems to me that it would be the part of wisdom—although I know that it does not sound sane in this house—to take over this accumulated wealth for the benefit of the state. Indeed, this would not be a very great hardship to our wealthy people, because their wealth will not be of much use to them unless somehow or other we can get out of the depression.

Not only am I in favour of increasing the income tax on the larger incomes, but I am also in favour of an inheritance tax. Really I do not see why money should be inherited in such vast amounts. You cannot inherit education, you cannot inherit any accomplishment. When great sums of money are passed from generation to generation it really means that children yet unborn are destined to become the slaves of other children yet unborn, who by reason of the wealth they inherit from their parents will be able to command the services of hundreds of thousands of people. These whose services are commanded have not a chance to start life on even terms with their more favoured fellow citizens. I have in my hand what has been quoted in this house before, but I do not think it can be quoted too often. It is said that in the United States in 1929 five hundred and four persons had an aggregate net income equal to the gross amount paid to one million and thirty-two thousand cotton farmers and one million three hundred thousand wheat farmers. That condition of things cannot be justified. It is wholly immoral. It is just a question of how long it will take our people—because a similar situation exists in this country—the masses of our people, our workmen, farmers and small business men, to realize what this means, and to see to it that this great wealth shall be conscripted and applied to social uses to relieve the toiling masses from the burden of taxation that is driving them to desperation. Apparently the time is not yet ripe for this to be done, but it will be done, either during this depression or when we are in another, but in any case it will not be very long before in this intelligent age we shall see to it that those who have amassed great wealth by some means or other, legal but immoral, disgorge that wealth to take care of the social necessities of our people.

With respect to the Imperial economic conference that is to be held in this city in July, I have this to say to the government, although I know it does not matter whether I say it or not. They would be very wise not to parade the Imperial conference as much as they have done; at any rate I would suggest that they do not parade it any more, because the more people expect from it the worse it is going to be—for the government. I do not for one moment think that the Imperial conference is going to be the world-shaking event that we have been led to think. As a matter of fact, I agree with the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Sullivan), who spoke the other night. I will quote his exact words because they say just about what I want to say in this regard. The hon. gentleman said:

> The Imperial conference will sit in Ottawa in the month of July.

I think that is about what they will do; and for their sake I pray that it will not be as hot as it was last July, for that would be a bit hard on the old country people. Let us consider the Imperial conference for a moment. It is not that I do not want it to succeed; I do want it to succeed. But how can it? Last year the Canadian Prime Minister went over to Great Britain to tell the British people what they should do. They were to put up a tariff around Britain and give us a preference inside, while in return we were to leave the tariff against Britain where it was but raise the tariff against other countries ten per cent. In brief, Canada said to Britain, "You buy our goods and in return we won't buy yours." Since that time we have artificially jacked up in three ways the prices of British goods coming to Canada by artificially stabilizing the pound; by juggling with the value of goods for customs purposes; and by the new-fangled tariff called the excise. In other words, three times since then we have said to Britain, "We want you to buy from us but we don't want to buy from you."

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), in his very excellent speech the other night, a speech that interested me greatly up to a point and then disappointed me terribly, talked about the things he would like to get from the British Empire. I have all the articles mentioned, but rubber was one of them—things that are coming in free; we shall get these from other parts of the empire. I fancy that will not interest the industrialists of Great Britain very much; at any rate it does not seem to me to be a major concession.

This is the thing that we must realize, and I think we all do realize it, and we might as well admit it, namely, that Canada's trade with the empire has been declining. In the calendar year 1931 we bought 75.8 per cent of our imports and sold 63.6 per cent of our exports outside the British Empire. In 1914 the empire took 55.3 per cent of our exports and in 1929 only 39.3 per cent. But the share of our trade with the United States, both exports and imports, has remained fairly constant over the same period, in spite of American and Canadian tariffs. As a matter of fact Canadian trade has expanded more with "other foreign countries" other than the United States. It is with these countries that we have made our greatest increase in selling and buying. From 1914 to 1929 our exports to "other foreign countries" increased from 7 per cent to 24 per cent, representing almost one-quarter of the total trade. I am using figures from the Canadian Forum compiled by "F.H.U." who is Professor Underhill, I think. But there is something else to notice:

> Our greatest group of export commodities consists of wheat and wheat flour. We grow so much wheat in Canada that Great Britain cannot possibly absorb it all, and we are therefore dependent upon world markets. Our second greatest group of export commodities consists of forest products, lumber, shingles, pulpwood, pulp and paper, and for these the United States is the greatest market. Even if Great Britain shuts out the Scandinavian countries and the wicked Russians, her market, as Professor Underhill says, cannot be a substitute for the American market which we already have.

In view of all these facts, which are known to all of us, it is foolish to hope that we shall be able to build up empire trade unless each part of the empire makes concessions to the others. This is the thing which the government ought to take to heart: It cannot be done with the attitude which the government took in Great Britain last year and which they have held consistently since. Unless we are willing to buy goods from Great Britain, we cannot expect her to go on buying in large quantities from us. Personally, therefore, I do not think that the Imperial conference, which, as the hon. member for St. Ann so aptly said the other night, is to sit in Ottawa in July, will be a great success. I do not think it can be.

May I now for a good part of my time devote myself to agricultural conditions. By agricultural conditions I do not mean calamities like the drought in southern Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta; I mean agricultural conditions that are normal so far as yield is concerned. It is true they are not normal, because the commodity prices have fallen so badly; but as to yield, conditions are quite normal. I know a good deal about farmers and I know that in the best of times farmers work harder than most people. Their hours are long and their labour is hard and unending. On the other hand, country life has many compensations. Anyone who lives in the country, who has spent most of his life on a farm, knows that such life has its compensations. But the farmers to-day are suffering so terribly that I am afraid they are not remembering the compensations of country life. We recall that in 1930, the last session of the last parliament, we heard a good deal about the suffering of the Canadian farmer. I can still remember how speakers then on this side of the house, and now members of the government party, would get up one after another and tell us, almost with tears in their eyes, about the terrible condition of Canadian agriculture, warning us that if the Conservatives were not returned to power it was going to be disastrous indeed for the people on the land.

An hon. MEMBER: And if they were returned to power?

Miss MACPHAIL: We know all about that now. In case you have forgotten it—this was before they went to the country—I want to give some of the gems of wisdom that fell from their lips. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Garland), at page 653 of volume 1 of Hansard of 1930, the long session before the election, interrupted the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), to ask this question:

> Do you consider 45 cents per dozen a fair price for eggs in the middle of January?

If you had asked anyone that question this year they would have dropped dead with surprise. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence), in his inimitable style, said, as reported at page 649 of the same volume of Hansard:

> The egg industry is just like every industry since the government came into power—it is sliding through to ruination.

Well, it is through. If it was sliding before, it has at least now stopped; it is at the bottom. And the hon. member for South Hastings (Mr. Tummon), speaking in the same debate, as reported at page 391 of the same volume of Hansard, referred to the production of cheese and butter as an outlet for the farmer's milk, and said:

> To-day they are receiving perhaps from $1.25 to $1.50 per hundred pounds for their milk.

Those were the makers of cheese. Then he went on to say:

> Therefore when the argument is advanced that the dairy farmer is content to take from $2.10 to $2.40 per hundred pounds for his milk and to get his butter elsewhere, the members of the government who present that argument are simply saying to over two-thirds of the dairy farmers of this dominion: you can dispose of your product just how you like; we are not interested in you at all.

I direct attention to those prices, $2.10 and $2.40; apparently he thought they were poor prices. Now I should like to refer for just a moment to the speech of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), that dynamic and distinguished gentleman from my part of Ontario:

> Personally, I hope this government may very soon decide to go to the country, because I realize full well a change of government is of vital concern to me and to all others interested in farming, and unless steps are taken very soon to this end, farming is a job that will not be sought by very many people.

Further on he said:

These are matters of economic consequence to the farmer, because we hear a great deal about prosperity, there is in Canada to-day no other class that is labouring harder, working earlier, toiling later and getting less for its efforts than the agriculturist.

Again, he said:

At last it is beginning to be realized that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada, and that when it declines, when it gets on an unsound economic basis and loses the wide-spread markets it has enjoyed in the past, all the subsidiary industries that are dependent upon it begin to feel the pinch.

That was bad enough in the session of 1930, but it was nothing to the very terrible story told throughout the country while the campaign was in progress. It is a waste of time to recall it, but when I hear supporters of the government pleading for understanding in this house and in the country, saying the condition from which we suffer is a world condition, that agriculture must be patient, that members of parliament must be patient, that the people must be patient, and that we must be fair, I wonder if they remember the speeches they made in 1930. Then they were anything but fair. The Prime Minister came into my constituency, dramatically waved his hand at a closed factory across the street and said "Put me in power and in three weeks that factory will be running full time." That was not enough; a little child toddled up on the platform and the Prime Minister, putting his hand on the child's head said, "Let us vote right for the children's sake." I did not say things like that in 1930; I said the condition under which we were suffering was not entirely due to any government, and then I was accused by my Conservative opponent of being a Liberal. That was a gross libel.

What are agricultural conditions to-day? I should like to give you some of the facts. We were talking about milk, and I now quote from the Milk Producer for February:

Cheese factory milk in 1931 averaged around 70 cents a cwt., some of it less or about the same price obtainable in say 1905. At that time it cost less to manufacture cheese and to hold milk. Taxes were only one-third of what they are to-day. Living costs were less, as prices for what the farmer had to buy were comparable with what he had to sell.

It goes on to say that everything the farmer has to buy has increased in price while everything he has to sell is at about the same price it was in 1905. I was home at Easter, and on the Saturday following Good Friday—I heard someone call it Good Saturday the other day, but I think that is not right—I went out to buy some eggs. I paid 25 cents for two dozen of extras, so you see this government has not been of very great assistance to poultry raisers. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) will see that the egg industry has "slid through to ruination."

Now I should like to make a comparison of prices in connection with many farm products, taken from a Toronto newspaper for the first week of February. The first item is cream sold on a butter fat basis. It sold at sixteen cents a pound in February of this year while in 1930, when things were supposed to be so fearfully bad and when the government now in power promised to remedy everything, it sold for 35¼ cents. Some of the other articles are:

	February 1932	February 1930
Eggs (extras)	23 cts.	48 cts.
Butcher cattle	$5 35	$10 25
Hogs	4 25	13 00
Choice butcher sheep	3 50	8 00
Spring lamb	7 25	12 50
Choice calves	8 50	15 50

I really wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite talk about agriculture at all when I think of the things we heard and the insolence to which I listened in Southeast Grey from Conservative speakers there. I am certainly amused when I think of them to-day. Last week there was a rural conference held in Newmarket which was addressed by a United Church minister, Mr. Armstrong, who is now in Dundas county. He has recently written a book called Salt of the Earth, which deals with people on the land. They may be the salt of the earth, but apparently they have no power in this government. With reference to the conditions of the dairy farmers he says:

Very few herds have an average yield of six thousand pounds of milk per year. Six thousand pounds of milk at fifty cents per cwt. amounts to $30 per year. Take a cow that cost $80 two years ago. Sound accountancy should allow about fifteen per cent for depreciation and another five for insurance. Then she has to be fed and housed and groomed and milked, and the milk taken to the factory. When all these costs and this work are taken into account the income of $30 will come a long way from paying for them.

I should like to discuss agricultural conditions in Southeast Grey, where extreme poverty was hardly known until recent months. In that riding there were no wealthy people and no extremely poor people, but to-day the farmers in all nine townships are having a tremendous struggle. I am referring to the real farmers, not those who must be lectured by someone from the agricultural college but farmers who do their work very well and who are a fine type of citizen. I have here a number of letters to which I am going to refer. The first is from the clerk of perhaps the best township in my constituency. He gives prices, quoting the figures for February 18. He pointed out that they were then getting from seventeen to twenty cents a dozen for eggs—they are much lower now—for cream, fifteen cents a pound butter fat; for hogs, four and a quarter cents a pound. He went on to say:

> I had seven out on the 18th February and received $55.35. A year ago the same hogs would have brought a little over $127.

It is no wonder the Minister of Trade and Commerce said the other day, in such profound manner I almost thought it was a discovery, that when commodity prices fall, debts increase. At any rate, I am glad we all know this, but it was something I thought we should have known a good while ago. So the farmers of Southeast Grey and, indeed, of Canada generally, are finding their debts have increased—well, you can multiply them by two and sometimes by more than that. I am going to take perhaps a little time on these letters that come from farmers who actually engage in the business of farming. One man says:

> Agricultural conditions are the worst I have ever known in my time and if conditions do not soon improve I believe that many of our farmers right here will be down and out and we have as good farmers and as good farming land as any in this province.

He is not complaining of natural conditions. Another farmer who lives in my immediate neighbourhood compares prices with taxes. He says that the total taxes on his farm in 1896, including his road work, which really was manual labour but which he put in at the rate of pay prevailing at that time, amounted to $15.87; this year taxes on the same farm were $106.70, with grain and stock at about the same prices as they were getting thirty-five years ago. He said that then he could get a man for eighty cents a day for haying and harvesting; this year he paid $2 to $2.50 a day.

He gives an interesting comparison of prices between 1896 and 1931, as follows:

Commodity—	1896	1931
Sugar	$2 90	$5 25
Tea	0 25	0 50 to 70
Flour	2 25	2 70

With wheat $1 in 1896 as against 65 cents in 1931. He goes on to give many other articles, including some implements, as follows:

[Miss Macphail.]

Implement—	1896	1931
Walking plough	$ 12 00	$ 27 00
Harrow	12 00	25 00
Seed drill	50 00	140 00
Binder	125 00	240 00

One could go on and on with similar examples, if time permitted. The situation really amounts to this, that the farmers are putting their products on the market below the cost of production and are giving their capital away with every pound of beef, every hog, every bushel of grain, every pound of milk, every dozen of eggs they sell. Some farmers do not realize they are doing this. They are cutting down their living expenses; their standard of living is below what it ought to be; it is becoming lower all the time. By living miserably, indeed, not really living at all, they are trying not to break in on their accumulated capital, but they are actually giving their capital away and cheating themselves. Many farmers who had little mortgages on their farms are finding they have to take bigger ones if they can get them—and some of them cannot; they have to borrow money, and in that case they are simply breaking into their capital.

There has been a decline in the cost of living. This afternoon I secured some figures in this connection from the Bureau of Statistics. The following shows the decline in retail prices from January, 1930, to March, 1932:

Commodity—	January, 1930 Index number	March, 1932 Index number
Foods	106·5	66
Clothing	96·5	76·4

It must, however, be remembered that the things that have fallen most heavily in price are those which the farmer produces, while the things he buys have not fallen very much. So that the farmer, while he is providing a lower cost of living for people who do not farm, is not himself benefiting to any great extent from a lower cost of living.

The drop in agricultural prices from August, 1929, to March, 1932, is 53 per cent, while the drop in manufacturers' prices—this is not retail—in the same period is 25 per cent. I am quite sure, if I had been able to secure the figures for the drop in retail prices, they would not have followed that of the manufacturers'; I do not believe retail prices have declined 25 per cent. Outside of representatives of industrial centres, there is hardly a person in the house who has not some farmers in his constituency, and we find that farmers are being ground between lowered commodity prices and proportionately increasing cost of living, including interest on debt. If it was said away back in 1930 that the farmer was becoming discouraged, you can take "becoming" out and say that the farmer is discouraged. It seems to me that the government which is now in power will have to embark upon a policy of inflation, because when the farmers of Canada send their products, we will say, to England, and are paid in English money, when they get that translated into Canadian currency, they receive less for their product than it actually brought in Liverpool, little as that was. I do not see how we can go on doing this, and so finally we shall go into a policy of inflation, or "reflation," or whatever you like to call it. I do not care what the term is, but there simply must come about a closer relationship between the amount of goods to be moved and the amount of money in circulation. I believe we shall have to acquire a new idea of money and think of money as something that transports goods from the person who sells them to the person who needs them, and then the services that money performs can be paid for. But we are not now over paying for the services it performs; we are paying tremendous wages to money for services which, as it happens, it does not perform.

I feel very keenly in regard to the agricultural situation, and I think hon. members can readily understand why. It is not simply that I represent an agricultural constituency; it is that these men and women, boys and girls, are the best we have in Canada. Remember this, that agricultural people are the source not only of our food supply but of our national life, and if we cannot keep on the farm a decent standard, not only economic but cultural; if we cannot hold our best blood on the land, at least as the source of the life of our urban centres, then indeed, we shall be sapping our national life at its very source.

I have always been extremely interested in cooperative endeavours. I have felt for a long time that farmers can do very much to make their life better by selling, processing and completely marketing their own products cooperatively and buying cooperatively what they need; but you cannot successfully build up cooperative enterprises on a falling commodity price level; it simply cannot be done. If you can keep your price level steady, or if you have a price level that is rising, then the building up of cooperative enterprises is an easy matter, but if you try to build up a cooperative enterprise on a falling market all you do is to bring one more cooperative concern to an end and to discredit the whole movement. For instance, last year we had a number of wise people in the house who knew how the pools got into difficulties. The reason was simply that the price of wheat fell to almost nothing. We have a little abattoir up at Barrie, the first thing of its kind in Ontario. It is experimental; we are trying to have the farmer process his own hogs, lambs and calves. What happened? Three things. First of all, the government pays high interest rates, and so all other enterprises in Canada must do the same thing. Secondly, there was a falling commodity price level, which meant that the meat that you put in to cure was put in at a price higher than that at which it could be sold when they came out of cure, and of course you cannot make money fast that way. Thirdly, in Canada we lack efficient trained men with social consciousness. You can hardly find them. There are some, I am glad to say, but not very many, and when a cooperative enterprise strives to get people who will serve the whole group, people who do not think that success can be measured in dollars but know that real success comes from serving a group and in having the supreme satisfaction of seeing the standard of living steadily raised, whether it be in a rural or urban community, it is very hard to find that kind of person. All these things make it very difficult to make a cooperative enterprise successful. I think one of the casualties of this depression was A. J. McPhail, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. Speaking of cooperation he says:

> The prospect of greater financial returns alone is not enough. Unselfishness, the spirit of sacrifice, the spirit of fair play, of "do unto others as you would that they should do unto you," of kindness—these qualities make a great and lasting appeal to the hearts and imaginations of men. Cooperation in its best and truest sense stands for all of these.

Again he says:

> Cooperation is a combination of the practical and the ideal. It offers ample scope for putting into practice the ideas of the practical man as well as the ideals of the idealist. It is not only the most efficient, economical and practical way of doing business but when carried to its ultimate conclusion it recognizes equality and the interdependence of all human beings. It provides a business medium through which progressive and socially minded men and women wth high ideals can find satisfaction and peace of mind in useful work. It is revolutionary in that it aims to bring about a more equitable distribution of wealth by returning to its members as nearly as possible the full value of the product of their labour.

I did intend to make some concrete suggestion as to what might be done even in this trying time to remedy at least in part the agricultural condition. One suggestion is this. In the case of experimental processing stations, such as the one at Barrie and others that are being started, all the expert help that can be given by the government should be given, and I do think it ought to be possible for these concerns to raise loans without having to pay a high rate of interest, so as to give them some sort of chance. I do think that we must have some degree of inflation. We must at least get ourselves on a par with the pound sterling so that we will get as much money for our products in Canada as they actually brought when sold in Great Britain. I feel that by relieving farmers and the masses of the people—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken over forty minutes.

Mr. ERRICK F. WILLIS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a matter of happiness to this house and the country that this year we had a budget presented by one of the country's most eminent statesmen, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). It is a matter of equal satisfaction that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), who acted as financial critic on behalf of the opposition, also comes from the same small town of Amherst in Nova Scotia. It is also a matter of satisfaction that we have in this house the member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith), who comes from the town of Amherst. It may be said of that town, I think, that it has given to this country more than its share of the outstanding statesmen of this house.

I desire this evening not to follow the budget closely but rather to make reference to conditions which have existed and do exist in the province of Manitoba, particularly in the constituency from which I come. May I say that my constituency has the doubtful distinction of comprising within its borders the entire drought area of the province of Manitoba as designated by a survey made by the Department of Agriculture of that province. I do not think I can better inform the house of the serious conditions that exist there than by reading a letter which I received a short time ago from the reeve of the municipality of Edward, within that area. The letter which is dated March 7, 1932, and addressed to myself, says:

> We have had a cold stormy week and to-day caps it all. It is without doubt the worst day to be out in this winter so far. The week before last we had a thaw which took practically all our snow. Then we had a fresh snowfall of about six inches accompanied with much wind so that very little stayed on the ploughed fields where we would like to have it. It has also been very windy and cold since. The dust did not rise much before, but to-day the air is full of grit, even the snow mixed with it does not keep it down it is so cold and dry.
> Our conditions here may well be described as desperate. I am afraid there are many around both cold and hungry to-day. After the thaw cattle were able to pick up a little in the fields but they can get nothing now and many are out of feed. Ninety per cent of the horses have had to get their living on the prairie all winter and this weather is particularly hard on them. We recognize that considerable has been done for us, the relief work last fall, and the free freight on feed and wood, but the people here have mostly exhausted all their resources; their savings if they had any, the help from their friends, without help now to get feed and seed we are down and out. . . .
> Some among the farmers are very bitter at what they are taught to regard as the indifference of the dominion government to our needs. . . .
> Yours truly,
> M. J. Basted.
> Pierson, Manitoba.

It is the latter paragraph to which I wish particularly to direct my attention this evening. This matter was first brought to the attention of the house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who, speaking in this chamber on July 29, 1931, as reported at page 4280 of Hansard, had this to say:

> I have endeavoured to make clear to the provinces that if we are to maintain any semblance of constitutional right they must be responsible for the creation, within the area of the provinces, of those committees of administration, of control and of supervision which will insure that during the coming winter there will be no hardship, hunger or suffering. But in my judgment it would be an anomaly, and would result in a very difficult situation indeed, if we were to say that the dominion government should assume responsibility for setting up organizations to deal with local communities. I think that would be the negation of every theory we have of constitutional government, because it would involve an assumption that we had such a condition in this country that the provinces, the municipalities, the towns and the cities could not function. It is possible that they may not all be able to function because of financial difficulties, but with respect to the calling of meetings, the appointing of committees and dealing with matters of that kind I have asked all the premiers of the provinces except the premier of Quebec, who said they had the matter well in hand, to consider the matter from that angle, that the provinces, within their several areas, should organize voluntary associations or committees which would undertake to see that the difficulties which must be met during the winter will be successfully overcome.

May I say that that invitation as issued by the Prime Minister was accepted by the province of Saskatchewan, which did set up its organization. May I say that within my own area I went to the different councillors and reeves, pointing out to them their responsibility. Particularly I told them that they must place their needs before the provincial government and that that body in turn would deal with them or would ask financial aid from the federal government. Within the area of my home constituency, certain municipal works were carried on. Taking an average of those works, which were chiefly road construction, in which the responsibility was divided between the municipality, the province and the dominion, the dominion paid 55 per cent of the cost, the province paid 35 per cent and the municipality 10 per cent. There was indeed a great need for those works, because had they not been carried on the people could not have fed their horses or placed their land in shape by doing fall ploughing. Without that assistance it would have been useless to attempt to have a crop. In addition to that the federal government unassisted by the province or municipality, carried on public works and spent $46,000 in my constituency.

I desire to refer more particularly to the correspondence which has taken place between the federal and provincial governments in an attempt to answer the question asked by the municipality of Edward as to where responsibility lies. First I shall refer to the return which was brought down in the legislature of the province of Manitoba. I find a telegram dated October 23 of last year addressed to A. MacNamara, assistant deputy minister of the Department of Public Works at Winnipeg. It is as follows:

> Your telegram October 22 regarding purchase of feed. I am directed to inform you that the expenditure proposed in this connection cannot be contributed to by Dominion government.
> Harry Hereford,
> Dominion Director.

I bring this telegram to the attention of the house because it shows that on October 23 of last year this government stated its position to the government of the province of Manitoba.

Then, seven days after that, on October 30, in spite of the communication of October 23 we find a further message directed to the Hon. Robert Weir, Minister of Agriculture. The part referring to relief is as follows:

> In order to meet the situation it is proposed to allow the municipalities to furnish to any farmer not in a financial position to make his own purchase sufficient feed to carry his stock over the winter, and to pay for this feed on a basis of one-third by the Dominion government, one-third by the provincial government and one-third by the municipality.
> Yours very truly,
> John Bracken, Premier.

I desire particularly to have hon. members note that in spite of the refusal on October 23 the Premier of Manitoba, only seven days later, again asked for a contribution. Then, the next communication to which I wish to make reference is that of November 5, 1931, addressed to Mr. John Bracken, Premier of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba. It is as follows:

> There is an area in Saskatchewan where they have had three successive crop failures. The provincial government has set up a relief commission to advise in connection with this area. The whole cost of administration of this commission and everything in connection with the distribution of seed and feed is borne by the provincial government. In this area the Dominion government provides the money for fuel, food, clothing, seed and feed. If you have such an area and are prepared to set up such a commission and carry on in the same way, I shall be glad to place this matter before council.
> Yours very truly,
> R. Weir.

The answer to that telegram came from the premier of Manitoba on November 24, 1931. It is addressed to Hon. Robert Weir, Minister of Agriculture, and the clause referring to fodder relief is as follows:

> As to the appointment of a commission to administer relief in this area, we do not consider it necessary to go to that expense, but we do desire to secure the same measure of dominion relief that similarly affected areas in Saskatchewan receive. We know of no areas where there have been three successive crop failures, but in some there have been two partial failures and, of course, the complete failure this year. We are asking only for such assistance from the dominion as has been accorded to areas with the same number of failures in Saskatchewan.
> Yours very truly,
> John Bracken.

It is to be noted that Mr. Bracken would not set up a relief commission in the province of Manitoba, giving as his reason that he was not prepared to make the necessary expenditures. May I say that all this time a relief commission was operating in the province of Saskatchewan. I thought it best to learn some details in regard to that commission, because I was particularly anxious that my constituency of Souris should receive the same treatment as the constituency of Assiniboia in the province of Saskatchewan, just across the line. That constituency was in a location parallel to my own, that is to say both Assiniboia and Souris were within the drought area. Assiniboia is in what is known as the "B" area, or the two-crop failure area. The constituency of Souris also, has had crop failures for two years. I addressed my letter to Mr. MacPherson, the Attorney General, whom I happened to know, and on January 15, 1932, I received a letter in reply from the Saskatchewan Relief Commission. It is as follows:

I have before me for reply your letter of the 8th instant to the Hon. M. A. MacPherson. In so far as "B" area is concerned I might state that the commission is suppplying relief in this area in the same manner, and under the same conditions as relief supplied in the "A" area, the only difference being that the "A" area was organized first, having suffered three successive crop failures.

This commission was set up by order in council, of the government of the province of Saskatchewan, for the express purpose of administering relief in any portion of the province where distress was apparent.

The commission is financed by the province of Saskatchewan and operates under the wing of the treasury department. All moneys expended by the commission are received by us and allocated by the treasury department for our use.

Yours faithfully,

G. B. Daniels,
General Manager.

The "B" area referred to in Mr. Daniel's letter is the area in which the constituency of Assiniboia is situated. He indicated that fodder relief was given to that area. I should like to add that Mr. Blakeman, in charge of the federal seed branch in the province of Manitoba, went to Mr. Evans, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for that province, suggesting to him that the federal government was willing to supply two men to make a survey of the constituency of Souris or any other drought stricken area, if the provincial government would supply another two men. For reasons best known to themselves the provincial government refused to do their share.

I desire to refer in chronological order to the telegrams passing between Hon. Robert Weir, Minister of Agriculture and Hon. Albert Prefontaine, Minister of Agriculture at Winnipeg. The first telegram is dated December 5, 1931, and is as follows:

Re telegram. Alberta and Saskatchewan governments are purchasing feed and taking responsibility for their live stock. Dominion government is not buying any feed direct. Would expect Manitoba to do same.

R. Weir.

Then on December 7, referring to the same matter, we have a letter from Mr. Weir, Minister of Agriculture, to Mr. John Bracken, Premier of Manitoba. It is as follows:

Dear Mr. Bracken:

With reference to your letter of November 24 I feel there is no doubt but that Manitoba will be treated in the same way as Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The dominion government is not purchasing direct any feed for live stock for the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Yours very truly,

R. Weir.

May I say that the Minister of Agriculture came to the town of Melita in my constituency on January 12. I met him in Brandon, and although there was a very bad snow storm raging he drove eighty miles out and eighty miles back to visit the reeves of the different municipalities. He got their opinions and took two of the reeves to Winnipeg to point out to the provincial government the needs of the community, and also to emphasize the necessity of the province taking up its constitutional obligations. The Minister of Agriculture at that time impressed upon the provincial government that they should state their needs to the federal Minister of Finance, and that financial assistance would be given. He pointed out also that there were no agreements in Saskatchewan in regard to their two-crop failure area, also that it was a provincial responsibility, and that all provinces were being treated alike. Following that there is a letter from Mr. J. H. Evans, Deputy Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba, to the Hon. Robert Weir, Minister of Agriculture, Ottawa. The letter is dated January 15, and the part relating to fodder relief which I wish to quote is this:

I am hurrying a copy of the complete statement of the standing of municipalities in Manitoba up to January 1, 1931. The municipal department is going to have available inside of one week a statement up to January 1, 1932, which will be forwarded to you immediately. In the meantime I am working on an estimate of our needs, both as to feed and seed. Obviously the best we can humanly do is to give you an estimate. This will be sent to you at the earliest possible moment.

I bring that to the attention of the house particularly to point out that on January 15 the Deputy Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba had not made an estimate of the needs of that province, very well knowing at the same time that the different municipalities within my area had furnished to the provincial Minister of Agriculture all the necessary material. I desire also to refer to additional evidence in a letter addressed to A. MacNamara, assistant deputy minister, Department of Public Works, Winnipeg:

January 16, 1932.

Dear Sir:

Referring to your letter of December 14th in which you mention the question of feed for stock, not only in the drought area of Manitoba, but in other parts of the province.

I have acted on your suggestion and have had Mr. Dickson look up his notes made at a meeting on October 2nd, and find that they do not deal with the point you raise, but only with the question of freight on feed to the drought area. Mr. Dickson, secretary to the minister, informs me that the Senator's attitude towards the question of feed and fodder, was that it was a matter to be dealt with by the provincial authorities, and the minister's secretary comments that the fact that Alberta and Saskatchewan are both looking after the situation in the drought area in this regard would seem to bear this out.

Yours truly,
Harry Hereford,
Dominion Director.

I place that on record for the purpose of indicating that apparently there was an understanding as early as October 2 that a contribution would not be made by the federal government for that purpose. Then on January 30 the premier of Manitoba visited Ottawa, and at that time, so far as I can gather, he made his first estimate of the requirements of his province, amounting to $450,000. On February 16 we have the next letter of importance, when the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) wrote to Premier Bracken:

February 16, 1932.

Dear Sir:

My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, has brought to the attention of the government the question of the necessities of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in the matter of seed grain relief in drought areas.

You will, perhaps, for financial reasons, find it difficult to cope with this problem unaided. I write to advise you that the Dominion government is prepared to render reasonable assistance, and I make the tentative suggestion that for this purpose we will be prepared to lend you the necessary funds against your one-year treasury bills bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per cent.

If this proposal is acceptable to you, we are prepared to name a definite amount to be determined in the light of your necessities.

As you no doubt will require to make your plans as far in advance as possible, if you will, upon receipt of this letter, be good enough to advise me by wire what assistance, if any, you require, you will be advised definitely as to what extent we are prepared to assist.

The matter was again brought to the attention of the provincial government in a speech which the Minister of Agriculture made in this house again pointing out the responsibility of the province of Manitoba. I quote now from Hansard, page 344, two paragraphs taken out of their context to show how the responsibility was pointed out:

My idea had always been that the provincial governments should receive from the federal government whatever money was absolutely necessary and be responsible for looking after their own people.

Then again:

All I can say regarding the difficulty in Manitoba is that the duty of the authorities there is to put their case before the government, indicating what money they require; and in the meantime I should hope that they would strain every effort to look after their own people with the money received.

That seems to have had some effect because on February 19 Mr. Bracken suggested to this government that he would require not $450,000 but $500,000. On February 24 Mr. Bracken again changed his estimate and asked this government for $650,000. Following that the next, and I trust final, document, is a telegram from the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the Hon. John Bracken, premier of Manitoba, dated March 7, 1932:

The whole basis of our assistance to the provinces for unemployment and farm relief is founded upon the belief that the governments of the western provinces would discharge their constitutional obligations and that the dominion in the national interest should support and supplement the work of the provinces in the discharge of their duty. This is made clear in the legislation passed by parliament. We are treating the three western provinces on the same basis with respect to seed and feed. Saskatchewan has advised us that necessary legislation being passed to secure advances being repaid out of nineteen thirty-two thirty-three crop. We assume that similar legislation will be passed by Manitoba and Alberta. Dominion will accept treasury bills of provinces to enable them to function with municipalities in the case of Manitoba up to six hundred and fifty thousand dollars being the amount you indicate as required. Until farm relief act extended no further money can be paid except for obligations incurred prior to March first.

The last sentence of course refers to the blockade in this house at that time.

May I summarize the return to which I have made reference. First, it shows that continuous efforts were made on the part of the province to have the dominion contribute a share of feed relief, which was refused on October 23, followed by the federal government continuing to point out that it was a provincial responsibility; second, the request by federal government for setting up of relief commission or other administrative body and refusal by Manitoba because of expense; third, continuous request by the province that Manitoba be treated as southeastern Saskatchewan and continuous assertion by the dominion that all provinces were being treated alike, and assertion that Alberta and Saskatchewan were both looking after feed and fodder in drought areas of their provinces; fourth, feed requirements were not estimated by the province until January 30, and the estimate was changed on three different occasions with final estimate on February 24; fifth, no loan was requested for feed until January 30, and no refusal was ever made to loan money for feed, and never a consent to contribute a share of relief but only to finance province. That, as I say, is a review of the return. The matter in the province from which I come is of considerable concern because there it has been taken up by the newspapers and by the public, and these are the allegations which are made. First, they say there has been unequal treatment. In Saskatchewan the provincial government, unaided, is looking after ninety-six municipalities in the two-crop failure area, and there is no agreement in regard to it. In Alberta they are looking after their drought area unaided by any share contributed by this government. Manitoba, according to its own survey, has only ten municipalities, and yet that province has been unable to look after that area so far as fodder relief is concerned. Saskatchewan, it is true, has seventy-six municipalities where for three years there has been a complete crop failure. There, apparently, they are feeding 300,000 people. In that area there used to be an average yearly crop in the last five years of 83,000,000 bushels. It is the only place in Canada where the federal government is spending money for that purpose, and it is the great exception. But you must remember that in Saskatchewan there are ninety-six municipalities in the same condition as in the constituency of Souris all of which are looked after by the provincial government. The farmers in my constituency have been treated unequally with those of southeastern Saskatchewan, because in southeastern Saskatchewan they were looked after by the Saskatchewan government, whereas in my constituency they were not looked after by the government of Manitoba.

These are comparisons between the federal constituency of Souris, in the southwestern part of Manitoba, and the federal constituency of Assiniboia, in the southeastern part of Saskatchewan. I have searched in vain among the records—and there are many—as to where this government has treated the farmers differently in Manitoba from the way it has treated them in any other part of Canada; but I find that the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta have treated their farmers entirely in a different way from the way in which the government of Manitoba has treated the farmers in the drought areas of my province. I asked the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) to send a telegram to the Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan, which he did, and the telgram, dated Ottawa, March 13, 1932, reads:

Hon. W. C. Buckle,
Minister of Agriculture,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

What time did provincial government or relief commission commence buying hay, oats or feed? When did distribution commence in federal constituency Assiniboia? What date did relief commission commence work?

F. W. Turnbull.

[Mr. Willis.]

The following came back in reply, dated March 14, and addressed to the hon. member for Regina:

F. W. Turnbull, M.P.

Most of Assiniboia seat in B area and distribution would be general at time commission started operations although provincial government gave some emergency relief. Relief commission started functioning September 1, 1931, and first emergency orders issued September 15, 1931.

W. C. Buckle.

That shows that into an area comparable with the area of the constituency of Souris, feed started to come, apparently, on September 15, whereas through provincial action no feed has come into the federal constituency of Souris. It is indeed to be regretted that such was the case, because we find that the provincial government of Saskatchewan came into Manitoba and bought there their feed supplies in the way of oats and barley and shipped them into Saskatchewan, and now, when Manitoba is looking about for feed and seed, it finds that the best of it has been sold to the government of Saskatchewan.

The second allegation made against this government is that there was uncertainty and no cooperation. I want to point out that on July 29 the Prime Minister placed the responsibility on the province of Manitoba. On October 2, apparently, Senator Robertson again placed upon them that responsibility, and on October 23 they had a flat denial in regard to a share contribution by this government. Again, they were invited on November 5 to set up a commission, but they refused. The responsibility was pointed out to them on December 5 by the Minister of Agriculture and on January 13 he went to the bedside of the premier of Manitoba and pointed it out again. Then, again on January 16, Mr. Hereford pointed out the responsibility, and on February 18 the Minister of Agriculture made a speech in this house in which he pointed out the provincial responsibility.

In the third place, it is said particularly that the dominion has plenty of money while the provinces in general have not. May I quote Mr. Bracken, as we find him in the Free Press of October 17, 1931, in regard to the financial standing of the province of Manitoba. He said:

It may be news to you that while some of the prairie provinces have had difficulty in selling their bonds at a reasonable price, Manitoba recently completed the sale of $5,000,000 worth at five per cent.

Then again, in his budget address, he pointed out the stability of that province; he said that they were practically balancing their budget, at the same time taking care to point out the large deficit faced by the federal government. The province of British Columbia floated a loan successfully; the province of Alberta floated a loan successfully; the city of Winnipeg floated a loan successfully; the province of Ontario floated a loan successfully. Manitoba at first refused to float one, but I noticed the other day that they are going to float a loan at last for $5,000,000.

The fourth allegation against this government is that there was delay. May I point out that the loan was never refused by this government. It was first requested on January 30 last, and then it was changed on three different occasions, until the final figure came to this government on February 24. There were invitations all along the line from this government to the government of Manitoba, and there were warnings to them from this house through telegrams and letters. In regard to delay, may I say that when the time did come, the necessary legislation on the part of Manitoba was not ready to carry into effect the benefits to be derived from these moneys which had been loaned by this government.

The fifth allegation against this government is that the offer of a commission was not applicable because there was no three-year crop failure area in Manitoba. Let me point out that the commission set up in Saskatchewan, as noted in the correspondence we now have on Hansard, were looking after the "A" area, the "B" area and the "C" area—that is, those areas where there were respectively three crop failures, two crop failures and one crop failure.

It is pointed out also that there was a lack of knowledge on the part of the province of Manitoba. That is the sixth allegation. May I point out that the province of Manitoba could merely have taken down the telephone and asked the government of Saskatchewan how they were handling the relief question, and could have had the answer. It is said that the province of Manitoba has received orphan treatment from this government. The only orphans in the picture are the farmers of the drought area of Manitoba. They are the orphans that have not been fairly treated by the province of Manitoba. I repeat, they are the only orphans in the picture. The responsibility, so far as the federal government is concerned, was pointed out, I think, very well by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), when he spoke in this house on April 3, 1930. It is agreed in this house that the responsibility is, first, on the municipality, and when it cannot function then it is upon the province; and finally, if the province cannot function, the federal government has the responsibility. That responsibility the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta have accepted, and they have carried on and given feed and fodder relief to the farmers. Manitoba, of course, was unprepared, in spite of the information which they had from the different municipalities of which I know. On January 15 they had no estimate in regard to feed for their cattle. Then they changed their estimate on January 30, February 19 and February 24, on three different occasions, showing that they had taken no trouble to consolidate the information which had been received from the different municipalities in order to place it properly before the federal government.

It is pointed out that there is a limit to credit so far as the different governments are concerned. May I point out to the house that there is a limitation of credit for every individual, for every municipality, for every province and for every dominion, and unfortunately some dominions have gone beyond that limit. If in the province of Manitoba, as it is alleged, they are in excellent financial condition, then they are able to look after the farmers in the drought area perhaps even better than is the case in Saskatchewan or Alberta.

The chief difficulty, which may be seen throughout the entire picture, is this: At present the government in Manitoba is facing a provincial election which must be fought on federal issues. The premier of Manitoba criticizes this government in regard to unemployment, in regard to its agricultural policy, in regard to the deficit, in regard to old age pensions, in regard to the financing of relief and in regard to the lack of markets. I say to this house and to this country that it is unfair to the farmers of the district I represent that we have in the province of Manitoba a man who, while seeking aid from the federal government, at the same time criticizes that government in regard to its policies. I point to the premier of Alberta, who does no such thing. I say that is unfortunate and I know for the last six months I have been up against that difficulty, of having a man asking for help and at the same time criticizing those who are helping him.

I note that I have not a great deal of time left, but I want to point out that because of these conditions and because the farmers within that area have not been assisted by the provincial government, in my opinion conditions there at present are worse than they are in any other place in western Canada. In that connection I want to point out also, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) pointed out, that this is a great and productive area. There is no lack of productivity of the soil; this condition exists for the same reason that a similar condition exists in Saskatchewan. Soil which for years gave crops is not doing so at present, and has not done so for the last two years because of drought. The farmers who are in that area are as efficient as the farmers in any part of Canada, but the drought is responsible for their condition.

In nothing that I say do I relieve this government of its real responsibility towards the people. It has a real responsibility to the farmers who live in my district, but so far —I know nothing of the future—I have sought in vain to find out in what way this government has not lived up to its responsibility in this regard. It is my considered opinion—and if it were not so I would not say it—that this government has fulfilled its constitutional responsibility and that necessarily the fault must lie with the government of Manitoba. The situation is unfortunate; within that area many cattle and horses have died. The horses remaining are in such condition that it will require more feed and much more care to bring them back to normal. They are so weak at present that they cannot do a full day's work, and they will not be able to do a full day's work when seeding comes along.

I think it is unfortunate that any question of politics should come up in regard to the responsibilities of the municipalities, the province and the dominion. The municipalities have worked hard to do what was possible for the people within their borders, but the municipalities have reached the end of their financial resources and now they must look to the province and the dominion for aid. I think the municipalities have fulfilled their responsibility to their own people.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): At the outset may I follow the excellent example set by those who have preceded me and congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) upon his elevation to the important portfolio he now holds. May I also take this opportunity of congratulating him upon the manner in which he delivered his budget speech. He smiled; he almost seemed to be happy, and I wondered if the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) could have chosen anyone else who could have delivered a budget speech as black, as gloomy and as hopeless as the budget speech delivered by my hon. friend, in a manner equally happy.

For just a moment may I refer to some of the remarks of my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Willis). I noticed that in beginning he said he did not propose to discuss the budget, I assume that there are a great many things in the budget which my hon. friend would not like to discuss, if I have been correctly informed as to what he promised would be included in the budgets introduced by this government.

Mr. WILLIS: My hon. friend is entirely incorrect.

Mr. ELLIOTT: One would almost think my hon. friend was a member of the legal profession from the way he denies anything before hearing what it is. I am told that my hon. friend, with the eloquence which comes naturally to him, went throughout the riding of Souris during the last campaign showing the people in that riding milk cheques—

Mr. WILLIS: Incorrect again.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would it be better to say cream cheques?

Mr. WILLIS: Incorrect again, and may I suggest that three times is out.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I hope my hon. friend was not showing cheques for milk from which the cream had been removed. At any rate he, in common with a great many hon. gentlemen opposite, told of the terrible prices the farmers were getting for the things they had to sell at that time. I do not think my hon. friend will deny that, and I do not think he will deny that the farmers of Souris would be very glad to-day to be getting milk cheques such as they were getting at the time my hon. friend was touring his constituency during the last campaign.

Mr. WILLIS: Now you are correct.

Mr. ELLIOTT: At last we are on common ground. I may add that to-day there is not one product of the farm in connection with which the farmer would not be most devoutly thankful, to what he would regard as a kindly providence, if he could get anything like the prices he obtained when my hon. friend and his friends were going up and down this country saying things were just as bad as they could be and getting worse all the time.

With regard to the balance of my hon. friend's remarks, he spoke of the lack of feed for his horses, but if I remember correctly he was in favour of the duty on corn. While my hon. friend was speaking of the difficulty of getting feed for his stock I was just thinking what a fine thing it would have been for the farmers of Souris if that duty on barley, which he so much favoured, had not been imposed by the present government a year ago.

Mr. WILLIS: The hon. member is again incorrect.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When my hon. friend gets to know me better, I hope he will find I am usually correct. It was a duty on corn as a substitute for barley.

I should like to say a word with regard to the address delivered by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I have listened to her many times in the house; in fact I always listen to her when I have the opportunity, and I believe that to-night she made the best speech she ever delivered in the house. She cited certain figures relating to the prices which farmers are receiving at the present time for their products. They were somewhat along the line of some figures which I intended to quote, but I want to pay my hon. friend the compliment of saying that conditions as she pictured them are worse under the present administration than I had intended to show. If I correctly recall the figure she gave, it showed a decrease of something over 50 per cent in the price of agricultural products. The information I was able to obtain shows that the decrease was just a little under 50 per cent, but I have not the slightest doubt that she is correct, so I give her the benefit of the doubt. I understand the price of manufactured goods has declined by 15 per cent, so we find the farmers of Canada at the present time in the condition that, while the price of what they have to buy has decreased all round less than fifteen per cent—

Mr. SPENCE: Make it 25 per cent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is now thinking of interest rates.

While the price of what the farmers have to buy has decreased less than fifteen per cent, the price of what they have to sell has decreased by more than one-half.

I should like to refer as rapidly as I can to two or three matters, although they have already been mentioned in the brilliant address delivered by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). First of all, let me point out that the budget shows that the trade of Canada this last year is just a little over $26,000,000, less than one-half of what it was two years ago when our hon. friends said that conditions were very bad. May I also call attention to the fact that the funded debt in the last two years has increased by about $307,000,000. The decrease brought about in the funded debt by the government led by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) during the last five years that government was in office, amounted to $257,000,000, and unfortunately we hear now from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that they have eaten up in two years the amount by which the former government reduced the debt in five years, and about $50,000,000 besides. Apparently under some governments deficits are such a common occurrence and amount to such enormous proportions that it is pretty difficult to realize how great they are. May I draw attention to the fact that the increase in the funded debt of Canada during the past two years is within about $30,000,000 of the total debt before the war? Before the war the total debt amounted to $336,000,000, so that the increase that has taken place in the past couple of years would almost equal the total debt prior to the war.

I regret to say that the budget delivered by my hon. friend is, I believe, the most terrible one that has ever been given to the house, not excluding the budgets that were delivered during the war years, because it was realized then that a war was in progress. During that period the deficits some years were very large, but the large deficits came practically after the war was over, while we were in the reconstruction period. The deficit, however, in the present budget is the largest shown in any budget that has ever been delivered in the house with the exception of the war years or the years immediately succeeding the war. Those are some of the things to which I think the attention of the public should be directed at this time.

What perhaps is the best test of the condition of the country is the bank debits. The figures are as follows:

Year	Bank debits
1931..	31,586,000,000

It can thus be seen what a tremendous decrease has taken place. To-day the farmer is selling his grain, cattle and dairy produce, about which the hon. member for Souris was so eloquent during the last election, for from 21 to 30 per cent less than he did two years ago, but as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth pointed out, when the farmer goes to buy boots and shoes for his children, he pays only 4·6 per cent less for them now than he did two years ago.

Another interesting point about the present budget is this—and I am not blaming the present Minister of Finance for all of it, because he had charge of the department, not for the whole year but for only a very small part of it. The sales tax, which is a most important one, last year realized much less than one-half of the estimate. That is not good financing and is not creditable to the manner in which the country has lived up to the expectation of the right hon. gentleman who introduced the budget a year ago.

Perhaps of all the bad features of the present budget, the worst is what is called an increase of two per cent in the excise tax. That is a tariff; there is no question about that. I do not know what is the idea of trying to disguise it by calling it an excise tax, which it is not. It is a tax which will bear heavily on all the people of this country, and bear heavily upon them in a way which cannot be estimated. It is one of the heaviest burdens than can be imposed. When a country gets into the condition in which this government finds this country at the present time after it has been in office for a year and eight months, it should be heroic enough to take steps that will compel those who have the ability to pay, to pay sufficient to get the country out of its financial difficulties. Wealth does not come to the people of any country entirely through their own unaided efforts. The man who has made a great fortune in Canada or any other country has made it partly of course by his own endeavours, but very largely by reason of the opportunities that have been afforded to him by the country in which he lives. At a time of crisis like this, is it too much to ask of the men with whom this country has dealt so kindly that they shall contribute not a small portion such as the government proposes in this budget, but a very substantial proportion of their wealth to help the country out of its present condition and if possible get it back on the road to prosperity. These men will again have the same opportunities they had in the past to make money, which they cannot do as conditions now are.

I would ask the Minister of Finance why it is that in the budget, with the admission as to how bad conditions are in this country, there is no suggestion of any remedy. The only suggested remedy is to make the masses of the people pay more taxes. Mr. Speaker, the common people are not in a position to pay more taxes. I happen to know them pretty well, particularly those in the section in which I live, and during the last six months more of the best farmers that live in this dominion have come to me and told me that they did not know how in the world they were going to get the money to pay their taxes, than in all the rest of the time I have known them. Many who five or six years ago were among the best, most prosperous and enterprising farmers in that community are to-day on the verge of bankruptcy, because the man who was enterprising and courageous four or five years ago perhaps bought another farm for his boy or built a barn or got himself into debt. There is one thing which has not come down in price in this country, Mr. Speaker, and that is the rate of interest which people have to pay on the money they borrowed some years ago or have to borrow to-day. I know something about the way interest works, and I know that it accumulates to-day just as it did when times were prosperous. A great many of the people in this country who borrowed money four or five years ago are to-day unable to pay even the interest. I am fairly intimate with a certain party who has sold several farms and know how conditions are with him; in fact many of our farmers to-day are not only unable to pay off any principal, but are also unable to meet the interest, and many of them are not able to pay even taxes on their farms.

This government came into office less than two years ago—it seems a lot longer than that to the people of this country, but it was only a year and eight months ago—on the greatest group of promises ever made by any party in an election campaign in any country since elections were first started, promises which I think were never exceeded for their absolute lack of limit. The Conservative party in its election campaign proposed certain definite remedies which were going to cure conditions not within a year or two, but almost immediately—in a few days, a few weeks or a few months. It was explained very clearly from every platform from which the Prime Minister and those who were with him spoke in that election that in a country situated as Canada was, different from almost any other country in the world, there was no reason why the people should not be prosperous if the government was doing its duty. This government has been in office nearly two years now, and it seems that the longer they are in power, the worse conditions get. What would the people of Canada not give to go back to the conditions that obtained only two years ago, when our friends opposite were going around the country telling the farmers and the manufacturers and the people in every walk of life how badly off they were.

Why have conditions become so much worse since the present government came into power?

There is no question that world conditions have exercised a certain influence, just as they were exercising a certain influence upon the affairs of Canada during the last election when our friends would not admit that world conditions had anything to do with our economic affairs.

I want to call attention to what I think may assist the government, if they will be assisted, in getting this country out of the position in which we are now placed. We have been building up in this country for a great many years now a fiscal policy. That policy has been built up by great men, the leaders of finance and commerce in this country, and in order that my hon. friends opposite may know just how far they have departed from the policies which they claim to be following, may I call attention to a resolution which was introduced into this house on the eighteenth of January, 1911, by Hon. Arthur Meighen, now the government leader in the upper house? His resolution reads:

> That in the opinion of this house, a substantial reduction in the import duties on agricultural implements is now due the agriculturists of Canada, and is in just accord with the true ends of a protective tariff.

That was in 1911. He followed that up by saying:

> I hope to bring home to the government this afternoon that in their attempts to continue the National Policy which had obtained for years before, they have overlooked, they have neglected one essential feature of that policy, they have quite forgotten its guiding principle, namely, the principle that as our industrial institutions advanced in strength and as they were able with every advance to acquire a hold on the home market, the import duties were to be diminished and adjusted in order to meet the evolving and changing conditions.

Then Mr. Meighen quoted the words of the father of the national policy, Sir John A. Macdonald, who in 1878 used the following words:

> If we had a protective system in this country, if we had a developed capital, we could, by giving our manufacturers a reasonable hold on our home trade, attain a higher position among the nations. I do not mean that we should adopt a tariff like that of the United States, but one such as the necessities of Canada demand.

Then he quotes further from the words of Sir John A. Macdonald:

> It can well be understood that a judicious tariff may, on the whole, be a moderate tariff.

Then the present leader of the upper house went on to say:

> So that the basic principle was laid down in so far as the feature I am now emphasizing goes, was that the object of that tariff was to give the manufacturing industries of Canada a reasonable hold on the home market. The same principle was supported by Sir Leonard Tilley at page 429 of Hansard, 1879.

And he also mentions that it was supported by Mr. Foster who in the year 1894 used these words:

> If there is to be a protective system at all, everybody knows that it must be higher in its inception than as the years gradually pass, when industries have become established and when the industrial development of the country grows apace.

And then Mr. Meighen goes on to quote the words of the Hon. John Haggart and others.

I am about to quote from the speech from the throne which was presented on February 15, 1921, at a time when the present leader of the Senate was Prime Minister. The following words were used:

> It is the opinion of my advisers that in such revision regard must be had to the necessities of revenue and as well that the principle of protection to Canadian labour and legitimate Canadian industries, including agriculture, which has prevailed for more than forty years in this country, must be consistently maintained; but that the customs duties imposed to that end should be no higher than is essential to ensure good standards of living among our working population and to retain and make possible the normal expansion of the industries in which they find employment.

One would have thought, looking over the increase in the public debt of this country and seeing that in 1920 it had increased by about $674,000,000, that if financial conditions were going to be cured by increased tariffs this country needed such advantages at that time as badly as it does now. The point I wish to make is that in the changes in tariff which took place in 1930 and again last year the leader of this government, and the hon. members who followed him, departed entirely from the principles of the national policy as enunciated by Conservative leaders of the past. The national policy was one of protection for industries until they got on a sound footing and were able to compete with outside industries of a similar nature. The provisions of the present Canadian tariff practically prohibit from entering Canada goods which can be produced in Canada. The condition is so serious that I think the house should have from the government some statement as to how long they propose continuing with the experiment of prohibitive tariffs, and how long they are going to allow this country to go back financially by leaps and bounds as they have been doing since they came into power. The country cannot stand such a policy for many years. The high tariff legislation has been in force for a year and eight months, and judging from the speech of the Minister of Finance I would say that there is not much hope of a change, because in this budget he is levying duties which were not thought of a year ago. That is a position which is very serious, so far as Canadians are concerned. It will be quite impossible for some industries to carry on unless a change is made.

One hears a good deal about the Imperial economic conference; I hope that it will produce some good results. It was interesting to note that the Minister of Finance said he did not think it advisable to make any substantial changes in the tariff in view of the impending conference. I should like to ask him this question: What is the difference in that respect between this conference and the last one? We know that just before the last conference nearly all the items in the Canadian tariff schedules were jacked up. I am glad to see the Prime Minister in his seat, because I think he more than anybody else is responsible for the increases in tariff which have taken place. I believe he had some voice in the proceedings which took place when the present budget was being formulated. Why is it necessary to put into the budget speech the statement that in view of the pending conference it is not thought advisable to make any substantial tariff changes?

I wish to say only a few words more with regard to tariff changes which have taken place, and in that connection I should like to read from the Eastern Chronicle of October 20, 1931. That newspaper quotes the Ottawa Journal, which I am sure should appeal to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. It is as follows:

> From the statements of Hon. Mr. Cahan it is clear therefore that what the Dominion government has done is to place tariff on large classes of British goods of from 40 to 50 per cent, according to fluctuations in the value of the pound sterling.

The editorial is quite lengthy, and time will not permit me to read it all I should like to submit the following for the particular benefit of the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister:

> That any manufacturer established under our tariff should as part of his business prepare himself to face changes in world trade and finance without rushing to Ottawa for more tariff when new circumstances do not suit him.
> That a tariff on importation of 40 to 50 per cent is too high a tariff under almost any circumstances, and is particularly objectionable upon British goods.
> Under present world conditions and particularly under the specific conditions which Canada has to face commercially and industrially, it seems to the Journal that the principle and practice of tariff protection is necessary for this country. But it should be reasonable protection. There may be wisdom in giving a good tariff advantage to our manufacturers and other producers. But there cannot be wisdom in setting up a tariff advantage for anybody so great that it can be relied on to furnish a profit at the expense of our own people for manufacturing or production for which this country has no natural advantage, or for business which does not enjoy good management. . . . a man's pocket has a fierce influence on his logic. As for the Journal, our creed is that an industry in Canada which cannot get along with a moderate tariff advantage should not be in this country at all.

I submit one of the great reasons for the condition in this country to-day is the tariff system which has been introduced, a system contrary to the policies of my right hon. friend's predecessors, contrary to the policy followed since the national policy was first introduced.

With regard to the imperial conference I have this particularly to say to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance. I read from the former's speech on the budget of 1930, page 1825 of Hansard:

> If a dollar goes to the West Indies that should go to a Canadian, it is no better than if the money went to the United States.

That statement was made in the campaign when the British preference introduced by Mr. Dunning was an issue.

I was interested also in reading some remarks by Sir Josiah Stamp. He needs no introduction to the people of this country and particularly to the Prime Minister. It was a distinct privilege for many members of this house and the Senate to hear him in an address he delivered in this building a short time ago. I quote this extract from that address as reported in the Montreal Gazette of April 8, 1932:

> "Two thoughts I would leave with you about the Imperial conference," said Josiah Stamp in his concluding remarks. "As an economist I would ask politicians to listen to me. If you have a solution of a thing, or a scheme, or the result of a bargain which is a fine thing for yourself but not so good for the other man, if that is the way it works out, my experience is that no such bargain ever pans out that way. It cannot be lasting. Such bargains have a terrible nemesis within them.
> "I dread to think that the wonderful sentiment of empire should ever be tested by material results. Never by arithmetic should we say a thing is good or bad for the empire. Never must the empire rest upon a mere economic connection that is purely mercenary or materialistic. We require, in arranging for empire trade and relations, not only a wise judgment but a long judgment. Do not let us go into this Imperial conference with any short-sighted penny-wise-and-pound-foolish idea. I believe the British empire is and can be the greatest economic and moral force in the world to-day. We are engaged in rebuilding the world, in rebuilding society, after a military and financial disintegration. In that great task the British empire must lead the way, to the end that 'out of its ashes strong as the morning springeth the new'."

I should like to place alongside those words the passage with which Mr. Dunning concluded his budget speech in 1930 so that hon. members may see how closely the two statements correspond. That, I submit, is the sentiment that should govern in approaching the economic conference. I cannot think that it was good business at a time like this to impose what is called an excise tax, which is really a tax against all goods coming from Great Britain. That was not the kind of friendly gesture that I think makes for success in such a conference. I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that the economic conference will be productive of much good, I do hope, if it does nothing else, that the multitude of wise men who will then be gathered together will be able to point out to the members of this government the economic folly of a tariff that means prohibition of imports and not merely protection for the industries of this country.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting in this house for some time listening to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have yet to find one constructive suggestion coming from them; every word has been a word of criticism. I have been listening to the old story of the tariff. How they have been bolstering it up for political purposes so they may have political propaganda when they go to the country later on! I have lived under every Prime Minister from Sir John A. Macdonald down to the present right hon. gentleman who occupies the position, and I never knew one of them who ever took office under the same conditions as confronted the present Prime Minister. You left on our doorstep a lot of problems that were very hard to handle. We on this side of the house have done everything possible to help out the situation. I remember quite well how the right hon. leader of the opposition went up and down the country asking for more support, to be given a larger representation in this house in order that he might have an adequate majority independent of the Progressives. But a majority was given to this side of the house. We have a working majority and when measures come up we can put them through.

I have heard a great deal of the old story called the tariff from the apostles of free trade. But I wonder where they come in. The tariff under hon. gentlemen opposite was reduced. I admit it. But they raised the valuation for duty purposes. Let me illustrate. On a hundred dollar binder you reduced the tariff to six per cent, but you raised the valuation for duty purposes to $114. That misled the people all through the western country; they were not actually paying only a six per cent duty on their binder, as they were led to believe. Every prime minister has had to have a tariff. And the tariff is a good thing for this country; it has prospered under a tariff. What did Abraham Lincoln say? Listen to this:

> I do not know much about tariff, but I do know this much—when we buy goods from a foreign country, we get the goods and the foreigner gets the money; but when we buy goods made at home, we get both the goods and the money.

Mr. BROWN: Can you prove that Lincoln ever said that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, it is attributed to Robert Ingersoll.

Mr. MULLINS: It is written in history as I have given it. But I can prove what this gentleman said because I heard him; I refer to President Hoover:

> The most urgent economic problem in our day is agriculture. An adequate tariff is the foundation of farm relief. The domestic market must be protected. I would use my office to give farmers the full benefit of our historic tariff policy.

That speech was made at Palo Alto in California on August 11, 1928.

An hon. MEMBER: He has changed his mind since.

Mr. MULLINS: I happened to be down there at the time, I was not then a member of this house. Then what about the right hon. leader of the opposition? Speaking at Kingston, Ontario, he said:

> We realize that our industries here have to have safeguards with respect to competition from other parts of the world, competition from the country to the south of us, competition from conditions as they are in England, and we think that is all the more reason why these days of depreciated currency and the like we should have the benefit of expert advice and information on all these great questions on the tariff.

That was the statement made by the leader of the opposition when touring this country. I have another statement, one made by the Hon. Charles Dunning. Mr. Dunning said, "I am no free trader". I heard him at the town of Yorkton say he was advocating free trade. He was a free trader there, but in the following article he says that he is no free trader. Let me quote:

> "I am no free trader. If Saskatchewan were all of Canada then free trade might be good, but it is not all of Canada, neither is Ontario.

It is because of the difficulty of getting a national tariff policy and making it a practical, not a political matter."—These observations of Mr. Dunning embrace a whole flock of surprises.

It is surprising to learn for the first time and from his own lips that he is no free trader. It is equally surprising to have his admission that Saskatchewan is not all of Canada. It is positively startling to be informed from such a source that the tariff should not be regarded as a political matter. Mr. Dunning is assuredly stepping out. Can it be that he has fallen in with bad company in the wicked east?

That appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune.

Now, before I resume my seat I am going to ask for more protection, and this will seem a rather strange flower to come from the prairies. But I am going to put myself on record as asking, in aid of agriculture, more protection than we have. I want one of the principal products of the farm to have some protection. I want the live stock industry to be protected. For instance, we are bringing in 50,000 cattle and shipping out about 25,000 or 30,000. You will ask me in what way I want protection for the live stock of this country. I have heard it said by hon. members on the other side that prices are going down gradually. I admit it; they have gone down. But I say to them, you have gone down in quality; you have no export cattle at all. What is driving down prices is this. We are bringing in 10,000,000 pounds of canned meats from the Argentine, and how are we bringing in those canned meats? In this way. We are bringing in the front quarters. When they slaughter their cattle in the Argentine they take the hind quarters and cut them what they call long—I am talking on a subject I know something about, because I had money invested in that country in a packing concern —and they ship the hind quarters to England and then can the front quarters, and that meat comes in to Canada in great quantities in competition with our live stock, thus driving prices down. I may be asked how I arrive at the estimate I have given of 50,000 cattle. Perhaps some hon. members may know something about this business; I believe the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) has some knowledge along this line. Well, take a 1,000 pound steer and dress it, and you will find that the average steer will dress 500 pounds of beef. Take the bones from that meat so as to get the meat ready for canning and you have 200 pounds of beef ready to put into cans. If, therefore, you bring into the country 10,000,000 pounds of canned meats you are bringing in the equivalent of 50,000 cattle. Now, I want the government, by order in council, under the authority we have given them in this house, to adopt some sort of protective tariff to stop that meat coming into Canada. I also want them to do the same thing in regard to the bringing in of pickled pork. A large quantity of that product is brought in and some of it comes in free. A good deal has been said about the price of hogs being lowered. Yes; the price of hogs is being lowered by the importation of vegetable oil that is brought in from the south, providing work for coloured labour in the southern country, and it is brought here and manufactured into a shortening called Crisco. We import something like 89,760,400 pounds of this article which takes the place of lard. Lard is a five per cent better shortening than this product, which is a deodorized oil, the odor being taken out by the Wesson process. It is not as healthy a food as lard derived from well fed Canadian hogs—and we have the best hogs in Canada, fed under our conditions. Any man who has ever been in Illinois or Iowa will know how they feed their hogs there, but the hogs in Canada produce a better lard than this imported shortening. I would ask the government to impose a good, stiff, heavy duty in order to shut that product out of this country. I submit that this should be done in the interests of farming in Canada. I find also that there is a good deal of barrel pork coming into this country. Why should we import barrel pork in competition with our farmers who are producing hogs? The Atlantic and Pacific stores in Toronto brought in two carloads of hams from Chicago and knocked the price of bacon down very low. The result was that the hog market in Toronto was affected that day when these hams were imported.

[Mr. Mullins.]

Seeing that it is eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 15, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the second report of the select standing committee on standing orders.

Mr. Bury moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BEAUPRE PULP MILLS

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to lay on the table of the house a petition from the electors of the parish of Beaupré, in the county of Montmorency, praying for government assistance to reopen the pulp mills at Beaupré.

NARCOTIC DRUGS

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION LIMITING MANUFACTURE AND REGULATING DISTRIBUTION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate informing their honours that this house has adopted a resolution approving of the international convention for limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotic drugs, Geneva, July 13, 1931, signed on behalf of Canada by the plenipotentiaries named therein, and request that their honours will unite with this house in the approval of the abovementioned convention; and that the clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay upon the table orders in council numbers 847, 848 and 849 passed under the authority of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR CONSTRUCTION OR COMPLETION OF BRANCH LINES

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for an extension of time from 31st August, 1932, to the 31st August, 1934, for the construction or completion of certain branch lines of railway of the Canadian National Railway Company, authorized by chapter 19, 20, 21, 25, 28, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35 and 36 of the statutes of 1929.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT OF GOLD

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this notice of motion appears inadvertently upon the order paper; the bill which it is proposed to introduce does not require notice and this matter should have appeared under the heading of "Introduction of Bills." Therefore, I move that this order be discharged, following which I shall ask leave of the house for permission to introduce a bill.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. RHODES: As in the ordinary course the notice would have appeared under the heading of "Introduction of Bills," I ask permission of the house to introduce the bill at this stage. I move for leave to introduce Bill No. 45, respecting the export of gold.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. RHODES: This is to provide in the form of an individual statute for making possible the practice which obtained in recent months, and with which hon. members are familiar, and also that pertaining to the export of gold during the war period.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

TEN PER CENT DEDUCTION FROM INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the government whether any order in council has been passed authorizing a deduction of ten per cent of the salaries of civil servants from this month's cheques, which, I understand, were issued this morning?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The order in council has not been formally passed, but instructions were given that the deduction be made in preparing the cheques. It was thought, although there was not legislative authority for this course of action, far less hardship would be worked than would be the case if the cheques were issued for the full sum and a double deduction had to be made at a later period. A further circumstance to be borne in mind is that the estimates were prepared in anticipation of this salary deduction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I understand the Minister of Finance aright, there is no legislative authority for the action taken?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What then is the necessity of Bill No. 19 which is at present on the order paper? If the government can act without legislative authority in deducting ten per cent of the salaries of civil servants, why go through the pretence of passing an act?

Mr. RHODES: I may say that the course pursued is not without precedent. I have reference particularly to a case as far back as 1897, when the government of the day at that time withheld statutory increases without legislative authority and, I think, without sanction by order in council. But I must point out to my hon. friend that although I know technically parliament has not as yet passed the bill dealing with the deduction, there is the circumstance an interim supply bill was passed providing for only the amount less ten per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Interim Supply Bill was one for two months so that so far as it is concerned, there was no necessity for making the deduction. I appreciate the inconvenience that has been mentioned by my hon. friend and that might be occasioned by complying with the law, but the law is there and should be complied with. The position that we are in at the moment is that the government has assumed to act in the matter without any power from parliament. Bill No. 19, to provide for the deduction in compensation in the public service has received its second reading, but it is still in committee; it has not yet passed the Commons; it has not gone to the Senate and it has not received royal assent. My hon. friend knows that until a bill has passed both the Commons and the Senate and has received royal assent, it is not law and no action can be taken under it. This action has been taken without any legislative authority and it is simply substituting the directions of the ministry for the authority of parliament.

Mr. RHODES: I must respectfully beg to differ from my right hon. friend. The governing factor is the voting of the money. Even if Bill No. 19 were passed, not a dollar could be paid to the servants of the crown unless and until the supply bill was passed, so that in the last analysis we must lean upon the Interim Supply Bill which takes distinct recognition of the fact we are proposing that salaries this year shall have a deduction of ten per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The governing factor is the authority of parliament and it has voted for the public service money amply sufficient for a complete payment of the civil service this month.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Interim Supply Bill was for two months.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Of the estimates as printed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The fact that parliament voted an interim supply bill in order to oblige the government is no reason why the latter should ignore parliament in the matter of following the procedure which is essential in all these affairs. I do not wish unduly to labour the point, but certainly one of the obligations devolving upon the leader of an opposition is to see that the rights of parliament in the matter of legislation are respected, and I cannot agree with my hon. friend as to there being any precedent which he could cite as authority for saying that the action which has been taken is legal. It is, I think, both arbitrary and illegal, and I repeat it is another instance of where the authority of parliament is superseded, not even by the sanction of the ministry as expressed in an order in council, but apparently by the will of the ministry as expressed in a mere verbal order.

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that any advantage will arise by an attempt on the part of my right hon. friend and myself to have the last word. Of course when the Interim Supply Bill was passed, my right hon. friend, as was quite right and proper, made the reservations usual in such cases. It was made very clear, and the record will show, that his having assented to the Interim Supply Bill does not commit him to the principle and leaves it open to him to discuss the estimates in full in precisely the same manner as if the Interim Supply Bill had never been passed. But I submit that the governing factor is the voting of the money and as I have said, the Interim Supply Bill gave specific recognition to the fact that the amount available covering the period of a year was to be made available to the extent of the ordinary sum for salaries, less the deduction of ten per cent. Under those circumstances I submit that not only is the course we took proper and in conformity with the law, but it is the one that in the long run will cause least inconvenience to members of the public service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This also is not by way of having the last word, but I assume the same course will be followed with respect to indemnities of members of parliament, including members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit this is not treating members of the House of Commons as they should be treated in this matter until a bill is finally passed, but we may waive that point. So far as members of the Senate are concerned, they at least might have had an opportunity to be heard as to their wishes and will in the matter of their indemnities before action was taken by the government.

Mr. RHODES: I feel it incumbent upon me to say one word in connection with the last remark of my right hon. friend. Members of the House of Commons, in voting for the second reading of the bill, have consented to the reduction in the case of their own salaries. Furthermore I may point out that members of parliament are not paid monthly; they receive an indemnity for the session. It is true they are able month by month to draw a certain amount based upon a per diem allowance, but the fact is that the deduction will be taken care of when hon. gentlemen come to the point where there is remaining at the end of the session a margin of only $400.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The final payment.

Mr. POWER: Will the deduction be made to apply to the militia?

Mr. RHODES: I am speaking without reference to the documents, but I would assume not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if the deduction has been made in the salaries of the lieutenant-governors and judges? I understand that that matter is under consideration. If the deduction has not been made, how will it be possible to make it later seeing that the interim supply bill has been assented to?

Mr. RHODES: I was not aware, Mr. Speaker, that this question would arise to-day, and I am therefore unable to answer my right hon. friend, but I will do so to-morrow.

RETURNED SOLDIER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): May I ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health if after further consideration he is now in a position to inform the house and the country whether the government will bring down this session any new or amending legislation concerning returned men?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I expect to be able to give my hon. friend an answer early next week.

COAL—FREIGHT SUBVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I want to call the attention of the Minister of Mines to the fact that the all-rail coal subvention under order in council expires, I think, to-day. I would ask the minister if he is in a position to announce what action the government will take in this matter of coal subventions. If not, will the government continue the coal subvention pending a decision as to any further action which the government proposes?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Mines): The whole question of subventions in connection with the coal industry is under consideration at the present time. I do not need to assure the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth that the problem presents great difficulty. The intentions of the government will in due course be made manifest when action is taken.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

The Canada Grain Act, including management, operation, maintenance and equipment of elevators, administration of, $2,400,000.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the minister what proportion of our total export of wheat goes to Great Britain as compared with the rest of the world?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I can give those figures in a moment.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall be glad to get them.

Mr. STEVENS: I will supply that information to my hon. friend.

Mr. DUFF: The other evening when we were discussing this item I asked the minister if he would tell the committee what was the policy of the government with reference to the shipment of grain through the port of Halifax. Another question I asked was, what quantity of grain had been shipped from the port of Halifax and the port of St. John in the last three years. This is a very important matter especially for the port of Halifax, in which of course I am more interested than in St. John, and I would like the minister to give the committee some statement in regard to that matter.

Mr. STEVENS: The export of grain through the ports of Halifax and St. John for the last three years has been as follows:

	Halifax Number of bushels shipped	St. John Number of bushels shipped
1929-30. . .	16,639	4,357,788
1930-31. . .	....	11,079,325
1931-32. . .	838,371	3,061,323

I have not the figures under my hand of shipments through the ports of Montreal and Quebec. The question of the export of grain from the Atlantic ports in the winter concerns only the ports of Halifax and St. John after navigation has closed at Montreal. It must be borne in mind that the grain trade of Canada is carried on by private corporations, and once the grain is bought on the Winnipeg market, which, of course, is the large central market in this country dealing with grain, it passes into the hands of the owner who directs its movement as he considers to his own advantage. The movement of grain from Port Arthur and Fort William at the head of the lakes is to certain points in the east which best suit the purposes of the exporter. Some of the grain is moved to Buffalo, some to Port Colborne and other lake ports, or Montreal, as the case may be, and it is there held to the order of the owner. The owner may direct its export, in the case we will say of grain at Buffalo, either through American or Canadian ports at his own option, over which, of course, we exercise no authority or control. There are certain economic factors which enter in at the ports of Boston, New York and Portland, and at one or two other ports to a lesser degree. There is always a great deal of shipping offered with what is known as distress space, and frequently the owners of grain take advantage of the distress rates and contract for shipment through those ports; or it may be that the destination of the grain in Europe calls for shipment through ports other than Canadian, in the opinion of the owner of the grain. The movement of the grain is thus wholly in the control of the owner of the commodity. As far as the government is concerned, and I think what I say of the present government is true of preceding governments, all facilities possible for the handling of the grain have been provided in Canadian ports and will be provided as required in the future so far as possible. The influence of the government is used, so far as it is consistent with the movement of trade generally, in the direction of trade through Canadian channels. We have considered and will consider any suggestions which may be made which will facilitate the movement of grain in such channels. I would impress upon the committee however that the grain is in the hands of the owners of the commodity who, naturally, direct its movement through such channels as they may consider desirable.

There is one other point to which I wish to draw the attention of hon. members. A great deal might be done to increase the movement of grain through Canadian channels if at the point of export or point of shipment there was a larger body of commercial interests connected with the movement of grain through that port. That is, if there were business concerns operating at these points, as there are at other older and more established points, who were interested in the movement or handling or direction of grain, the results would be more satisfactory. Only recently I drew the attention of business concerns in eastern Canada to the desirability of securing an increased interest on the part of Canadian business men concerning the movement of the Canadian crop, which forms such an important part of our export business.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee has listened with great interest to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Had I shut my eyes I should have thought I was back in the session of 1930; the then Minister of Trade and Commerce of that day was asked certain questions when complaints were made regarding this very question. I am sure the minister's many friends must have been delighted to hear him make the speech he has just made. I do not know however how some of my Conservative colleagues from the province of Nova Scotia took it, because they will remember that during the sessions of 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929 and 1930 the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the former government were bombarded —and properly so; I am not objecting at all— were properly bombarded by members representing constituencies in Nova Scotia who complained very bitterly that the government of my right hon. friend, the present leader of the opposition, had failed to see that grain went through the port of Halifax. In fact Conservative newspapers in the province of Nova Scotia referred to the elevator, which the late government had been instrumental in building, as a pigeon roost. The statement was made that very little if any grain was passing through the port, and of course the government of that day was blamed.

I noticed however the statement which the minister read with regard to the quantity of grain passing through the port of Halifax in the last two years, or since the present government took office. It would seem that since my friends from Nova Scotia have taken seats on the government benches conditions are worse than they were when the late government was in power. I need not go into this matter, but I may say that the minister's explanation, that to a great extent the matter is in the hands of the shipper, is quite right. I have always contended that, and there is no question about it. The fact is however that gentlemen who now are members of the government, or members supporting the government, told us two or three years ago that that was not correct, and that if they were put into power, if they were placed on the seats of the mighty, they would see that this condition was changed and that grain would flow through the ports of Halifax and St. John. There was no question about it. Not only in the newspapers but on the public platforms hon. gentlemen now sitting opposite made the distinct statement that the then Liberal government should be turned out of power and that the Conservative party should be given a chance to see that grain flowed more freely through the ports of Halifax and St. John. We were told of course that the Transcontinental railway was built for this special purpose, and the name of my late respected chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was brought into the discussion to show that when he and his government decided to build the Transcontinental railway the decision was made to fulfil the special purpose to which I am now referring. My hon. friends urged that the government led by the present leader of the opposition was not doing its duty by the people who had grain to ship, or to those people in the cities of St. John and Halifax, when they did not see that greater quantities of grain went through the ports of those two cities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, birds will come home to roost, even if they are pigeons sitting on the elevator at Halifax. I can understand why the Minister of Trade and Commerce hangs his head because, after sitting in this house from the years 1926 to 1930 and listening to his colleagues complain to the then government of what a terrible thing it was that these people of the maritime provinces were not receiving their maritime rights, he may well hang his head. We heard a great deal about one hundred per cent maritime rights. If the late government did not give one hundred per cent maritime rights, what has the present government done with regard to the shipment of grain through the ports of Halifax and St. John? The figures given by the minister only a few moments ago supply the answer, and in that connection I need not say very much more.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister must have thought the matter important when he made his speeches during the election campaign of 1930. Of course, perhaps he was not reported correctly. Sometimes we find, when we read extracts from speeches supposed to have been made by the right hon. gentleman, that they were not correct, because perchance, a mistake had been made by some cub reporter. I have before me however what the Prime Minister is reported to have said in the Forum at Halifax on July 3, 1930, just a few days before the election. At that time the people at Halifax were urged to turn the government out of office because of their treatment of the people of Nova Scotia with regard to the shipment of grain, and for other reasons. But they were told something further. At that meeting the Prime Minister made a distinct promise to the people of Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces. What was he reported as saying? I quote as follows:

> Speaking at the Forum at Halifax on July 3, 1930, Mr. Bennett said it was his "determination to force Canadian traffic over Canadian territory and through Canadian ports and to make this country commercially independent of the United States."

He was going to blast his way. I do not know whether he intended to blast the mountains through which the railway passed when coming from Winnipeg, but certainly he was going to do another blasting act so that grain might go through Canadian ports.

What has my right hon. friend done since he made that speech on July 3, 1930? Has he done anything for the ports of Halifax and St. John? I will come to that in a minute. Quoting again:

> He said the development and equipment of the port of Halifax as a great national port was "essential to meet the competition from the United States ports of the Atlantic seaboard and to give maritime ports every advantage in low rates to attract traffic both inward and outward."

What has my right hon. friend or his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce done to obtain lower rates on grain through the ports of Halifax and St. John? During the last two years, what have they done? The minister gave us the answer only a few minutes ago; he told us of the infinitesimal quantity of grain which had passed through either the port of St. John or Halifax since hon. members opposite came into power. Quoting further:

> He further declared that "his consideration was the welfare of Canada and Canadian ports —United States ports were not his concern; the people of that country were quite capable of looking after their own interest."

Yet, in spite of that statement—and no doubt that statement was made to get votes in the city of Halifax for my two hon. friends who represent that city—

An hon. MEMBER: And who are not in the committee.

Mr. DUFF: It does not matter. The fact remains that the Prime Minister made that statement, I will not say deliberately, Mr. Chairman, because you might call me to order; but the Prime Minister, according to the newspapers, is reported to have said that if he and his government were elected he would see that grain would flow more freely through the port of Halifax, and, of course, through St. John. But since that date this government has done nothing. The minister himself admitted a moment ago that, unlike his leader, he was not concerned about freight going through the American ports; he said it was impossible to keep it from going through American channels. And he is quite right. But the Prime Minister did not give the electors of Halifax that understanding. He virtually said to them, "Elect me and my government and we will see to it that the elevators in Halifax and St. John will be full of wheat all the time; we will see that wheat will be flowing through these ports to foreign markets." Let us see whether they did anything else with regard to this great question.

In 1928 there was a meeting of the maritime board of trade at Moncton and I believe that at that meeting that board of trade, owing to the fact, I have no doubt, that they thought that the then government were not perhaps doing things as quickly as they should, and were not seeing that the maritime ports were being used properly, passed a resolution which reads:

1. That the National Transcontinental railway was constructed for the purpose of creating a route to Halifax and St. John that would provide for, among other matters, the transporting of Canada's exportable surplus of grain through the ports of Halifax and St. John at rates that would not exceed those to other north Atlantic ports.

2. That an all-rail rate of 19·34 cents per 100 pounds as requested in this application is necessary in order that the National Transcontinental railway be used for the purpose for which it was constructed.

3. That the board did, in general order No. 448, dated August 26, 1927, recognize this matter as one of national importance and directed the Canadian National Railways to publish an export rate, on grain, of 18·34 cents per 100 pounds to Quebec city. This order was complied with by the publication of C.N.R. tariff No. C.G. 93, G.R.C. No. E1268.

4. That the same conditions and circumstances surround the extension of the export rate on grain to St. John and Halifax as applied in the decision of the board with respect to the rate to Quebec city.

5. That, in view of the national importance of this matter, we would respectfully urge that it is expedient that this matter be given immediate attention by the board.

I am reading a resolution contained in a speech delivered by the hon. the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) in the year 1928 when the late government was in power. I am not going to quote from the hon. gentleman's speech or recite his complaints with regard to the little that had been done by the Liberal party. I do want however to back up what the hon. gentleman said on that occasion, because now his own government is in power. He has been supporting that government since 1930, nearly two years, and I have not heard either him or the senior member for Halifax say one word with regard to this very important matter.

Now the Liberal government did try to arrange this matter; they did endeavour to arrange for a differential rate of one cent per bushel. But they found, when they addressed themselves to the railway commission, that the commission indicated they could not do it unless legislation were enacted with respect to the question. The matter was referred to the government, and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister has evidently forgotten the speech he made in the city of Halifax on July 3, 1930, inasmuch as he wanted to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. Instead of dealing with it as a government he wanted to pass the buck and refer the question to the courts. But now that this matter has again been referred to the government, the final arbiter, it has been or should have been before them for a number of months; and so far as the public and this parliament know, nothing has been done by the government to settle the question one way or the other, to see that a different rate is given whereby more grain can flow from the prairies through the ports of Halifax and St. John.

I say the government has been derelict in its duty in not settling this important question one way or the other, so that the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick may know exactly whether or not something is going to be done in their interests. All we have at the moment is the report of Sir Alexander Gibb. I dare say it was all right, and I am not complaining, to bring this eminent gentleman here to look into questions affecting the harbours of Canada; but I do say that Sir Alexander Gibb's report is not satisfactory to five per cent of the people of Canada interested in our different ports from Vancouver to Halifax.

Now what does Sir Alexander Gibb say about the port of Halifax? Surely the government might have given him some lead as they did when another commission sat in this country with respect to other matters. We remember that it was rumoured, when the Duncan commission was sitting, that the commission was given a hint that they were not to touch the tariff. Surely the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), if he is interested in his capacity of minister in charge of this department, must have been taken into the confidence of Sir Alexander Gibb or taken him into his confidence. But if he was not taken into that gentleman's confidence it was the duty of the minister to see Sir Alexander before he made his report and give him his own views and ideas regarding this matter. What did Sir Alexander Gibb report so far as Halifax was concerned? He practically says that it is impossible to ship grain through the port of Halifax; it is even impossible, he says, to ship heavy freight through that port—and this notwithstanding the fact that the Conservative government in 1914 spent $35,000,000 on that port, and the fact that during the last seven and eight years, and especially during the time that the Liberal party was in power, other millions were spent developing the port of Halifax. Yet Sir Alexander Gibb now comes along and declares that it is impossible to ship heavy freight through that port. All that the people of Halifax and Nova Scotia can expect from his report is to have a few passengers land at that port from time to time.

I say that the government should come to a decision promptly with regard to this question. Let the people of Halifax and Nova Scotia know what is going to be done. Let the citizens of Canada, who have spent tens of millions of dollars developing the port and getting it ready for the grain trade and other heavy traffic, know whether Sir Alexander Gibb's recommendation will be accepted, or whether the government will find means to send grain through the ports of Halifax and St. John.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to say a few words on the subject that has been discussed by my hon. friend (Mr. Duff). I have not the documents before me, but my recollection is that a very important decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners was given on October 28, 1930. An application had been made by the Halifax harbour commission and the transportation committee of the maritime board of trade for a one cent differential, so-called, over the Quebec rate. That means this. There was, prior to 1927, a rate from the head of the lakes ports to the city of Quebec of 34·5 cents per hundred pounds, and a rate to the maritime ports of 35·5 per hundred pounds, one cent higher. Now certain interests in the city of Quebec, or the city, applied to the Board of Railway Commissioners and had the 34·5 rate reduced to a rate of 18·34. Thereupon an application was made by the bodies I have mentioned—that is, the Halifax harbour commission and the transportation committee of the maritime board of trade—for a rate from the head of the lakes ports to maritime ports of 19·34 cents per hundred pounds, preserving the one cent differential. The Board of Railway Commissioners decided against the applicants. I believe their decision was given about October 28, 1930. Some months later a petition was lodged with the governor in council requesting a variation or rescission of the decision of the board, under the section of the act which enables such action to be taken by the governor in council. These proceedings ordinarily are called an appeal to the government from a decision of the board of railway commissioners, but I do not think the word "appeal" is the correct term. I think it gives a wrong impression, because the action taken by the governor in council is not judicial; it is administrative or executive.

However, as I say, this so-called appeal was lodged about the end of May, 1931, if my recollection serves me aright, and the matter then came before the government. I submit that the government should have taken reasonably prompt action, especially in view of the very definite undertakings given by the Prime Minister in Nova Scotia during his pre-election campaign. The government permitted a long time to pass, from June to November of 1931, without taking action. Then in December a very strong letter was written the Prime Minister, signed:

In behalf of the government of Nova Scotia:
Percy C. Black,
Acting Premier.
In behalf of the city of Halifax:
George E. Ritchie,
Mayor.
In behalf of the municipality of Halifax county:
R. A. Brenton,
Warden.
In behalf of the Halifax Board of Trade:
A. N. Jones,
President.
In behalf of the Dartmouth Board of Trade:
E. J. Butcher,
President.
In behalf of the town of Dartmouth:
Walter Mosher,
Mayor.

In behalf of the Halifax Commercial Club:
O. R. Crowell,
President.
In behalf of the Halifax Rotary Club:
W. E. Tibbs,
President.
In behalf of the Halifax Progressive Club:
J. V. Worth,
President.
In behalf of the Halifax Gyro Club:
G. M. Stultz,
President.
In behalf of the Halifax Kiwanis Club:
H. W. Kirkpatrick,
President.

That letter was dated December 10, 1931. It is a little too long to read in full, otherwise I should like to place it on Hansard. It states that this matter is of vital and urgent concern to these communities and to the province of Nova Scotia as a whole. The letter states:

One of the most immediate needs of the port of Halifax, and the channels of transportation of which it is the terminus, is a fair share of the movement of the Canadian grain crop. This need is twofold:

1. To increase the volume of traffic through the port; and

2. To provide the port with an adequate amount of grain for use as ballast cargo.

Then follow a number of very striking facts showing the large proportion of Canadian grain going through United States ports. Then the letter goes on to discuss the Quebec rate, which I have already mentioned. It says:

Prior to 1927, the grain rate over the Transcontinental, per 100 pounds from the head of the lakes, was as follows:

	Cents
To Quebec..	34·5
To maritime ports..	35·5

Quebec applied for and secured a reduction of this rate to 18·34 cents per 100 pounds. And in its general order No. 448 the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada directed the railway to publish this reduced rate over the Transcontinental to the port of Quebec.

On two occasions the railways attempted to upset this rate, once before the board of railway commissioners, and again before the Supreme Court of Canada. Both attempts were unsuccessful. The application of the C.N.R. for leave to appeal from the judgment of the board was dismissed by that body in July, 1929; and in the Supreme Court of Canada, Mr. Justice Lamont, shortly after that date, also dismissed an application of the C.N.R. for leave to appeal from general order 448.

Meanwhile, an application had been made to the board of railway commissioners for an extension of the "Quebec rate" (plus the usual 1 cent differential) to the ports of Halifax and Saint John. This application, and the facts supporting it, were in every particular similar to the application and the facts pertaining to the Transcontinental railway in its relation to the port of Quebec, but certain members of the railway board, having granted the Quebec application, reversed their position and denied the maritime application. The result is that the rate on grain and grain products over the Transcontinental from the head of the lakes to maritime ports is approximately twice the rate to the port of Quebec.

The bodies making the unsuccessful application—the Halifax Harbour Commission and the Transportation commission of the Maritime Board of Trade—are carrying this case on appeal to your government, in the confident hope of securing a reversal of such an unjust and discriminatory action.

The port of Halifax is equipped immediately to handle twenty millions of bushels of grain during the shipping season. Established at this port is a modern elevator with a storage capacity of 2,200,000 bushels, but this elevator lies idle so far as the Canadian export grain traffic is concerned, and little or no Canadian grain comes over the railway lines into and through this province.

It is unnecessary here to attempt an enumeration of the benefits, direct and indirect, that would be derived by our own people from a substantial share of the grain traffic of the country. At this time, when unemployment is such a serious problem, the provision of more jobs for workers on our railways, in our mines and along our waterfront, to say nothing of the stimulation of other forms of industrial and commercial activity, would justify an unusual effort to hold the trade of Canada in Canadian channels.

The chairman of the Halifax Harbour Commission has stated his belief that the port of Halifax has just about reached the limit of its development unless an adequate share of the Canadian grain traffic can be secured, for, manifestly, it is going to be difficult, if not impossible, to develop any turn-around movement of liner tonnage under existing conditions.

In these circumstances, so vital not to this port and province alone, but to the dominion, as a national matter, we respectfully urge an early hearing of the appeal in the Transcontinental grain rates case, and a favourable decision in the interests of our own transportation channels. We realize the heavy burdens and great complexities involved in public administration in this country to-day, but we are confident that, appreciating the urgency of this matter from the standpoint of our national well-being, you and your government will give it early and effective attention.

Yours respectfully,

Then follow the signatures of the gentlemen I have named. After that letter was written the appeal did come on for hearing before the government, according to newspaper despatches, but so far as I have been able to learn as yet it has not been disposed of.

I submit to the minister that there can be no justification for these almost interminable delays in dealing with a comparatively simple matter. First we had the delay from last spring until January before the appeal came on for hearing at all, and we have had the delay month by month ever since. The question of the principles that should guide the government in dealing with these appeals was up for discussion in committee of the whole two or three times last year. It has been laid down, and I do not think it can be denied, that the government are not acting as a court and are not setting precedents that can be applied to other cases. They are not bound by the ordinary rate-making principles which bind the Board of Railway Commissioners. The very object of the section is to enable them to put policies into effect, and the policy of the government as announced before the election was to stimulate the flow of grain through Halifax.

The promises made by the Prime Minister have been read by my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough. Why does not the government act in the matter? That is the question I should like to direct to some responsible minister of the crown. If they have decided in their own minds not to give effect to the appeal why do they not courageously say so? Why keep this matter dangling and pending for these long periods? That is the question the people of Halifax and the people of Nova Scotia would like answered. The case for the application of the one cent differential has been placed before the government very strongly by the Halifax harbour commissioners, and by the transportation committee of the maritime board of trade. The people of the province now await some action which will implement the very definite promises and undertakings given by the Prime Minister prior to the elections of 1930.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, the two hon. members who have very forcibly presented this matter no doubt have done so in perfect good faith, and with much of what they have said I am in entire sympathy. There is no question at all that it is highly desirable, as far as it is humanly possible to do so, to encourage the movement of grain and other cargoes through Canadian channels.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat has said that this is a simple matter which could be disposed of by a "yes" or "no", but I am quite sure that he and his colleague from Antigonish-Guysboro would much prefer that the matter should be delayed rather than an adverse decision given immediately. That there has been delay is without question; the facts are there and I have intimated already to the committee some of the factors which enter into this problem. I am not prepared at the moment to discuss fully the broad general question, but I can say that the department has been carrying on an extensive study of this matter. The more I study it, the more I find to support the view that perhaps some extensive steps can be taken to increase the movement of import and export business through our Canadian ports. I think those who have studied this question will agree that it involves matters of high policy, using a term which is often used, and I am not prepared at the moment to state my own opinion. We are carrying on an intensive study which involves a tremendous amount of analysis of the movement of goods coming into and going out of Canada, grain being the principal export commodity.

That the question is a simple one, I cannot agree; it is an exceedingly complicated and difficult matter with which to deal. It does not follow that we should sit idly by and do nothing, and in that respect I agree with my hon. friends and do not quarrel with their impatience in this matter. I have received many communications from Halifax, St. John and other parts of the maritime provinces both from individuals and different bodies, to all of which I have given a measure of answer. However, I can go no further at the moment than to say that as far as the particular appeal to which my hon. friend has referred is concerned, I think it is desirable that at the moment the door should not be slammed. I would advise and counsel further consideration before this question is disposed of. In regard to the larger question which in my opinion involves important matters of policy, the time for solution has not yet arrived and as far as I am concerned, I am not prepared to give a definite opinion. I can assure the committee that this matter is receiving the very best attention which my staff, members of the government, and myself can give.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee, particularly those members from the maritime provinces, welcome the statement of the minister that this matter is under consideration, but I, for one, am filled with a great deal of apprehension at the rather ominous suggestion made that perhaps we would prefer to have delay in this matter rather than to have the door slammed at once in our face.

Mr. STEVENS: I was referring to the one point, namely, that an immediate decision should be given in connection with the appeal made by the hon. member.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the point with which I am dealing. After the strong appeals made by the hon. members for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) and Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley), I hesitate to press this matter any further, but in the hope that something

I may say may have some influence upon the minister, I desire to say a word or two on the subject.

The minister says that this matter is not simple, but to my mind the only element of complication is the argument which has been made quite frequently to the effect that it will in some way cause a reduction in the tariffs of the American roads and thus lead to no practical effect. That is perhaps the strongest argument or is at least the statement most frequently made in opposing this rate. The Board of Railway Commissioners reduced the rate per hundred pounds on wheat moving from Port Arthur, Fort William, West Fort William and Armstrong to Quebec from 34½ cents to 18·34 cents per hundred pounds. This action was taken regardless of possible clashes with American roads, and the order was issued on August 26, 1927. I had the honour to represent the maritime board before the railway commission, on first general freight rate hearing, and I supported the application then made by Quebec but asked that the same rate be extended to Halifax and St. John with the addition of a one cent differential. Before any decision was given the Duncan commission intervened and as a result of its finding the Maritime Freight Rates Act was passed. That disposed of most of the matters in the general freight rates investigation. The grain rates were subsequently discussed again before the Board of Railway Commissioners. I was not representing the maritimes on that hearing as I had become a member of the government. The order was granted for Quebec but no order was made so far as Halifax and St. John were concerned. I would point out to the committee that at the time of the application to the board, there was in existence a grain rate from these western points of Port Arthur, Fort William, West Fort William and Armstrong to Quebec which was just one cent less than the grain rate to St. John and Halifax; in other words, there was a differential of one cent in the rates to these ports. I cannot see any complication in this matter. All that the maritime provinces are asking for is a continuance of this differential of one cent between the Quebec rate and the St. John and Halifax rate.

Under the terms of the order Quebec now has a rate of 18·34 cents per hundred pounds, and unless an adjustment is made it will mean that Quebec will have a rate of 18·34 cents as compared with the rate of 35½ cents to Halifax and St. John whereas the previous rates were 34½ cents to Quebec and 35½ cents to St. John and Halifax.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. VENIOT: Quebec is not a winter port.

Mr. RALSTON: The Halifax harbour commissioners in June, 1928, applied to the Board of Railway Commissioners to reopen the matter and grant the lower rate to Halifax and St. John to correspond with the new Quebec rate and the maritime board of trade joined them. The matter was heard and in October, 1930, the board dismissed the application and in April, 1931, the present Halifax harbour commission appealed the case to the governor in council. There should be no complication in deciding that the old differential should apply; if the rate has been reduced to Quebec, then it should be reduced correspondingly to St. John and Halifax. This is all the complication there is and it is all the government has to determine. I desire to compliment both the old Halifax harbour commission and the new commission and the maritime board of trade on the excellent way in which this case has been presented, both to the Board of Railway Commissioners and to the governor in council. I have before me the brief, dated April 10, 1931, which was presented by Colonel Phinney, chairman of the present Halifax harbour board, to my hon. friend and his colleagues in the government. Included in that is the application which was presented by Mr. Peter R. Jack, former chairman of the Halifax harbour commission, under date of June 7, 1928. That appears on page 27 of the brief.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the date of Colonel Phinney's petition?

Mr. RALSTON: April 10, 1931. That petition of Colonel Phinney contains a very complete statement of the orders in council, the action which had been taken by the Board of Railway Commissioners and other bodies, the arguments which have been submitted from time to time and the proceedings which have been had in an endeavour to have this low grain rate established to St. John and Halifax, that is to say, after the Quebec rate was established, to get this rate put on a basis corresponding with that to Quebec. It is as complete a case as I think it has been my privilege to see presented. I want to urge on my hon. friend and his colleagues in the government, in spite of the numerous duties they have, a study once more of that brief which was presented, I think at least six or eight months ago; and by that I mean favourable consideration, not merely a study for the purpose of coming to the conclusion that the application cannot be granted. Let me say to my hon. friend that the rate differential is the whole point involved. I am not going to take up the time of the committee in discussing the merits of the ports of Halifax and St. John or their value to Canada as national ports. That has been discussed before; it is set out fully in the brief and it is only because of the fact it is so fully presented that I do not go into it to-day again.

I should like, however, to make this further point, that Sir Alexander Gibb's report, which has just been presented to parliament, is, as regards its reference to the port of Halifax, a very great disappointment, I can assure my hon. friend, not on political grounds, to all parties who are interested in the development of the port, and who realize its importance as the eastern gateway not only during the winter months but all the year round. My hon. friend will realize this when he reads in the public press of the last week or two statements by Colonel Phinney, the present chairman of the Halifax harbour board, Mr. Jack, the former chairman, and by Colonel Jones, president of the Halifax board of trade. Their statements will repay study by my hon. friend when he is considering the matter of grain traffic through Halifax. In Sir Alexander Gibb's report there has been some suggestion that Halifax may as well forget grain as a source of traffic through that port. The arguments which those gentlemen present, both in the brief to which I have referred and in the statements which they have made, as reported in the press, make it abundantly clear that, with all due deference to Sir Alexander Gibb, he has not grasped, either the local or the national importance of Halifax as a grain port.

My hon. friend refers to the desirability of having commercial interests take part in the forwarding of grain to the eastern ports. An assiduous effort has been made by both the former harbour commission and the present one, I know, to interest shippers in using Canadian ports. I believe Halifax and the maritime provinces have done all they reasonably could be expected to do and it is useless for them to attempt to attract grain through Canadian ports in any large quantity at freight rates which are so much out of line with those which have been put into force to Quebec. Therefore I come back again to ask my hon. friend with his colleagues to consider favourably the application on appeal which has been made from the decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners and to give a prompt decision allowing that application.

Mr. CANTLEY: In the absence of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black), perhaps it is incumbent upon me to remind the house that within the last forty-eight hours there has been handed to the government a communication signed by all the Conservative senators and members from the maritime provinces asking it to put into force the rate referred to by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) who has just sat down, that is 19·34 cents per hundred pounds to Halifax and St. John. As to what effect such rate, if adopted, would have, I do not know, but I may say that I have some doubt whether, if that rate were applied, any considerable quantity of grain would be shipped from those ports. My doubt is due to this fact: a large proportion of the grain that is shipped through the port of New York is carried by the large liners. Why is that so? Simply because those large transatlantic boats, coming in and sailing as they have to do, on schedule time, must, due to their great superstructures, be given considerable quantities of dead-weight ballast and the most convenient type of dead-weight cargo they can obtain is grain. In former years, when the United States were shipping considerable quantities of lead, copper and other heavy commodities of that kind, those liners were able to obtain, to some extent, at all events, the dead-weight ballast which they required. Under present conditions that class of commodity is not available. Those vessels, depending on their size, must get the stiffening they require, representing 3,000, 5,000, 8,000 tons on each eastern voyage. I have known liners actually to pay as much as one cent a bushel for the privilege of carrying grain from New York to Europe and tens of thousands of bushels of grain have been carried at from one-half to two or three cents a bushel. That is a condition of affairs that no adjustment of railway rates in Canada can obviate. There is one way in which the situation can be met, and if our hon. friends opposite are prepared to take that step I should be glad to know they have the courage to take it, and that is to prohibit the export of grain through any other than Canadian national ports. If they are prepared to do that, the grain of the western provinces will go through the ports of Halifax and St. John during the winter and through Montreal in the summer. But apart from that I am afraid no very large proportion of grain from the western provinces will be taken away from United States Atlantic ports, particularly New York, as long as modern great Atlantic liners must have a large amount of dead-weight ballast, and with say eight or ten big liners sailing eastwardly weekly, each carrying from one hundred and fifty to four hundred thousand bushels of grain, it will be seen how great this competition with our Atlantic ports is and to how large an extent it may affect and control the situation.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot let the occasion pass without saying a word or two on this question. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) has told us that within the last forty-eight hours a petition signed by all the Conservative members and senators from the maritime provinces was presented to the government in order to induce it to do that which the Conservative party promised to do when they were in opposition. Of course the signing of that petition is not a political matter at all! Nova Scotia is not wholly represented by Conservatives while New Brunswick is represented pretty nearly all by Conservatives, and some weight might have been given to the petition if our hon. friends opposite had consulted the other representatives of the people and asked their cooperation in this matter. The government side of the house has in the past been talking so much of cooperation. They tell us that we on this side refuse to cooperate, and yet at the very moment when one of the most essential questions affecting the maritime provinces comes up, our hon. friends opposite refuse even to ask for cooperation. Therefore their attitude is not very consistent, nor is that of the hon. member for Pictou consistent to-day because we all remember how he reviled the Liberal party when it was in power. He put forward no such argument in 1928-29 as he has put forward this afternoon as an excuse—

Mr. CANTLEY: He is learning.

Mr. VENIOT: Rather late for my hon. friend to learn. He is learning to find excuses for the non-fulfilment of promises made by his party when in opposition. That is the extent of his learning to-day. I well remember the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if I am not mistaken, preaching a sermon to us when we sat to the right of the Speaker, about encouraging Canadian ports. Let me give a little matter of history. In 1928-29, the rate from the head of the lakes to Quebec was 34 cents, and to St. John and Halifax 35 cents and a fraction, but let us deal with round figures. What do we find? The port of St. John handled 27,000,000 bushels of grain, and when we were handling 27,000,000 bushels of grain in St. John we were told that there was too much Canadian grain going through American ports, and that that was our fault. The rate from the head of the lakes to Quebec was 34 cents, and the rate from the head of the lakes to the maritime ports, 35 cents.

[Mr. Cantley.]

Quebec got a reduction from 34 cents to 18 cents, and when we in the maritimes pleaded for a rate on a basis of the rate that we had before when the Quebec rate was 34 cents, I will not say we were refused it by the railway commission, but when the Quebec case was placed before the railway commission the case of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, or the St. John and Halifax case, was not presented in the same light as the Quebec case. A gentleman by the name of Mr. Duchemin, a lawyer from Sydney, I think, represented the Nova Scotia government at that time before the railway commission, looking on only. His statement before the railway commission at that time was: I am representing the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but I am not here at the present moment to push their claims. I do agree, he said, with the arguments of the city of Quebec, and I hope that the commission will see their way clear to grant the request of the city of Quebec for a reduction in the rate. Later on, when some of the commissioners drew his attention to the fact that they were convinced that the claims of St. John and Halifax were properly before the board, Mr. Duchemin stated to the commission before that sitting adjourned, that on the request of his superiors he was withdrawing the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick claims—

Mr. CANTLEY: Pardon me, that is not what he said.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman has had his say.

Mr. CANTLEY: Tell the committee fairly what took place, and what Mr. Duchemin said. He said that in view of the presentations he would ask for a postponement of a decision on that matter.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not the fact. The record of the board will show that Mr. Duchemin said that at the request of his superiors he was withdrawing the case. This matter was fully discussed in the press of Nova Scotia and of New Brunswick at the time owing to a statement that I had made in an address at St. John, and I produced at that time the evidence, a copy of the report of the commission, to prove that my statement was correct. Now what happened? Just about three months before the commission sat to consider what was supposed to be the Quebec request as well as the Halifax and St. John request, officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway raised the argument and officials of that railway appealed to certain members of this house whom I could name to use their influence with the Halifax and

St. John harbour commissioners not to press their case because if the case for a reduction to 19 cents for St. John and Halifax were pushed, we would have retaliation from the American railroads. Another argument that they used was that if we pressed the case the large quantity of American grain that was then being shipped through the port of Montreal would be diverted from that port and would hurt Montreal. To be plain about the matter, I myself, then a member of the government, was approached by officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway to use my influence with the board of trade in St. John, if I had any, and with the harbour commission in St. John as well as with the city council of St. John, to have them withdraw the case. I refused to do so, and I exposed that method in a speech in the city of St. John. What happened? A few months afterwards Mr. Duchemin sent notice to the railway commission that they were withdrawing their case or, accepting the statement of the hon. member for Pictou, postponing their case owing to certain conditions, and the case was then either withdrawn or postponed—it makes no difference which. From that day to this that request has never been granted. It has been further considered since this government came into power, and yet it has not been granted, and the Canadian Pacific Railway were the means of preventing the granting of the differential to St. John and Halifax if they were the means of inducing the representatives of the government of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to agree to having their case withdrawn or postponed. That is where the injury was done to the maritime provinces.

I appeal as strongly as I can to the government to give a decision in this matter. They are the court of last resort. If the railway commission consider that it is out of their jurisdiction or if they cannot see their way clear to giving this lower rate of 19 cents from the head of the lakes to St. John and Halifax, an appeal lies to the governor in council as the court of last resort, and the governor in council has the power to state to the railroads: You shall fix the rate at such and such a figure. But so far that has not been done. The case never came before the old government as it is now before the present government.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): That is not correct.

Mr. VENIOT: That is correct. It never came before the old government on appeal.

Mr. STEVENS: Did it not come before the old government on a petition from the Halifax harbour commission?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, but the reference was made then to the railway commission. The railway commission was dealing with the matter, and the Halifax and St. John authorities, according to my hon. friend from Pictou, had the case postponed. I say that they had the case withdrawn, and after the postponement or withdrawal, as the case may be, they never went before the railway commission until lately—

Mr. RALSTON: The old harbour commission.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, and when the railway commission gave their decision lately against the request, the authorities of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick both combined, I think, and appealed to the government against the decision of the commission. That appeal is still resting before the present government. I am not going to criticize the government for the delay. They may have had ample reasons for that delay. We know the amount of business they have to-day, we know the times of stress through which the country is passing, and that as a result the time and attention of the ministers are well taken up. I urge upon them, however that they give an early decision. Such action is very important, so far as the port of St. John is concerned.

Sir Alexander Gibb has given a report most favourable to the harbour of St. John, and I am proud to say in that report he has stated that St. John harbour was during the last six or seven years and is being now administered most economically, and that it deserves all encouragement possible. I am not making this statement to hurt the port of Halifax; I am content to let the people of Nova Scotia fight their own battles, and I shall fight those of the province of New Brunswick. Following the recommendation by Sir Alexander Gibb we have reason to hope that the government will adopt some means by which they can encourage, to an extent greater than has been done, the shipment of grain through Canadian ports, and especially through the two winter ports. The late government did pass regulations encouraging shipment or import of foreign goods through Canadian ports. A preferential duty was fixed by the late government on all English goods entering Canada. Those goods if shipped in bottoms coming through Canadian ports received an extra ten per cent advantage, and that advantage has had a most beneficial effect. The inward trade through the port of St. John has been stimulated. Before the passing of that regulation shipments from Great Britain to reach Canadian destinations came very largely through American ports.

Mr. MacLAREN: That also applied in connection with West Indies trade.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. After the adoption of the regulation through which an extra ten per cent preference was given on all English goods entering Canada through Canadian ports, 99½ per cent of all the goods shipped from England to Canada came through our Canadian ports, whereas before that time only 55 per cent or 60 per cent came direct. If the government could devise means which, together with the lowered freight rate on grain, would to a certain extent encourage our western shippers to ship through Canadian ports, to my mind they would promote a movement which would stimulate the maritime provinces and put them on a footing, from an economic or industrial standpoint, better than they occupy to-day or have occupied for some years past.

Mr. MALCOLM: Mr. Chairman, as a former minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce and as a member in the committee representing a province which is not as vitally interested in the movement of grain through the maritime ports as are the hon. members representing western Canada and the province of Nova Scotia, I should like to say a word or two in support of the minister's position concerning endeavours made towards the movement of grain through the maritime ports.

To the present Minister of Trade and Commerce I should say that I believe the department under his administration is just as anxious as it was when I had the honour to hold his position, to ship as much of our grain as we possibly can through Canadian ports. The late government did provide the facilities. There is now an opportunity, by governmental action to provide a rate which will demonstrate whether or not grain can be handled in any substantial quantity through these ports. In other words, if the present government grants the request of my hon. friends from this side of the house my hon. friends opposite and the senators, I do not think that at the moment much more can be done except to encourage shippers to prove whether or not we can export a substantial quantity of grain through the ports of Halifax and St. John.

There is much truth in the statements of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) and in those of the minister. We in this parliament however must remember that sometimes we can be a bit too selfish in our national viewpoints. We can be too selfish in our national viewpoint with regard to trade as we can with regard to tariffs; sometimes these things are two-edged swords. I think the minister will agree that the figures have not changed very much and that we enjoy through the port of Montreal about the same export of American grain as the United States enjoys of Canadian grain through the port of Buffalo. Through the years there has been a fairly even balance, and no doubt my western friends realize that some of the export of American grain through the port of Montreal has, in the past, been very helpful to them. Especially is that true concerning certain lower grades of Canadian barley. A market has been found for that barley, whether high or low grade, by mixing in the port of Montreal with American barley, making an admixture more suitable to the continental trade. Likewise we must remember—and this is not a selfish recommendation favouring the west—that the Canadian ports enjoy a very substantial import trade destined for the United States. Especially does that apply on the Pacific seaboard. So, I say, if the facilities and the rate structure which I know the minister is anxious to give, can induce a greater trade through our maritime ports, I believe every hon. member in the house is prepared to support the granting of the rate. As the hon. member for Pictou has said, complete control of movement through maritime ports can be brought about by putting into effect very drastic regulations,—regulations which I believe every hon. member must realize might lead to retaliation which would be more disastrous in its effect than the regulations would be beneficial. Therefore I say to my hon. friends from the maritime provinces that as a former minister I thoroughly support them in their request for a one cent differential and I support the minister in his endeavours to increase trade through these ports by inducing shippers to make greater use of the facilities provided.

The ports of Halifax and St. John simply must be maintained as they are Canada's only winter Atlantic outlets. There is no politics in connection with this matter. In the past, as in the present, this house has been prepared to sustain and support any rate structure which will enable us to bring as much of our western grain as possible through Atlantic ports. I do not however think we would be adopting the wise course if we were to force upon the minister regulations or suggestions which in the aggregate or in the long run might react unfavourably on his department in other ways. I believe the rate structure or differential asked for by my hon. friends has the minister's sympathetic consideration. He fully realizes the tremendous investment which has been made by past governments in harbour facilities; he realizes the investments made in elevator facilities. I am quite satisfied the minister will do everything in his power to facilitate the movement of grain through the Atlantic ports.

Mr. QUINN: Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry I was not in my place when this item was first brought to the attention of the committee. I was quite surprised to learn of the show staged here this afternoon by Nova Scotia and New Brunswick members, with only one exception. It is not very difficult to find a reason for it. If we look at the Halifax Herald of Thursday, April 14, yesterday, we see on the front page, in large letters, the following:

Prime Minister urged to act on maritime appeal. Senators and members declare N.T.R. grain rates case should not be referred back to any body that has already dealt with question.

Now I can understand the panic. Now I can easily understand why the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) gets up in his place and expresses his solicitude for the port of Halifax. Now I can understand why the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) becomes so suddenly alarmed because the port of Halifax is not getting sufficient business. Now I can also understand the attitude of the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) and the attitude of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot). The member for Gloucester wondered why, when this petition was being drawn up, the cooperation of the Liberal members was not asked. Well, there was a debate here for some three or four weeks and the cooperation of the opposition members was asked to facilitate the passing of the unemployment relief bill, but there was very little cooperation from that side. "We will give you cooperation if you will give us our pound of flesh"; that was the cooperation we got from hon. gentlemen opposite. It is no wonder that these hon. gentlemen become so suddenly interested in the matter under discussion. I am told the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough quoted from a speech I made in this house.

Mr. DUFF: No; I did not quote your speech at all. I said you made a speech.

Mr. QUINN: Very well; the hon. member referred at any rate to a speech I made in 1926. I well remember it. The hon. gentleman asked whether I was as much interested now as I was then. I am just as much interested, and more so. But, sir, I am not going to use every opportunity to stand up in this house and bring to the attention of parliament, either in the house or in this committee, what my attitude is and what my demands are with regard to the port of Halifax. I am making my representations in what I consider the proper way. I am not looking for cheap newspaper advertising or notoriety.

Mr. BRADETTE: What about the McConachie family?

Mr. QUINN: I did not bring to the attention of the house the McConachie case for any advertising. If hon. gentlemen will read Hansard they will find that when I made my address on behalf of that family I made it quite plain that I had been asked to do so by a chaplain at the port of Halifax. And that gentleman was not of my political stripe. He was and is a member of one of the outstanding Liberal families of Quebec. I deny what the hon. member for North Temiskaming says, when he charges that I was looking for notoriety or playing politics in that regard.

Mr. BRADETTE: We remember it.

Mr. QUINN: You can remember it if you wish to. I would remind hon. gentlemen that for nine years, they sat here as supporters of a government, of the same party which introduced the National Transcontinental bill into this parliament in 1903. I quoted in my address in this house in 1926 some of the statements of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the promises of the Liberal party with regard to forcing the trade of Canada east and west, and in looking through an editorial in the same paper to which I have already referred I find that on July 30, 1903, the then Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in asking for leave to introduce a bill to provide for the construction of a National Transcontinental railway, said in the course of his speech on that occasion:

Let me observe that if we have used American ports, it is not because of five months in the year our own ports are icebound . . . but simply because we had no railways to reach them. In the face of this, are the Canadian parliament and people going to stand on their manhood and place us in such a position that at all times of the year, not only by one railway, but by two or more, we shall have access from January to December to our own harbours, and be able to say to our American neighbours: "Take off your bonding privilege whenever it suits you, we are commercially independent."

In the same address the right hon. gentleman went on:

The Canadian confederation would have been a union on paper and a union on paper only, but for the fact that the Grand Trunk railway, and the Canadian Pacific railway and the Intercolonial railway brought all parts of our country together to act in unison and to beat with the same heart. This new railway will be another link in that chain of union. It will not only open territory hitherto idle and unprofitable; it will not only force Canadian trade into Canadian channels; it will not only promote citizenship between old Canada and new Canada, but it will secure us our commercial independence, and it will forever make us free from the bondage of the bonding privilege. For that reason alone, in my estimation, it would be worth all the sacrifices and far more than we are called upon to make.

I ask this committee: What did Sir Wilfrid Laurier mean by that, if he did not mean that it was his intention and the intention of his government to force Canadian goods through Canadian channels and have them shipped through Canadian ports? I ask further: Was that the attitude of hon. members opposite during the nine years from 1921 to 1930? They had before them the words of their leader, the greatest Liberal leader Canada has ever had. They knew what he had said when he introduced this bill, namely, that he intended to force Canadian trade through Canadian ports. Hon. gentlemen opposite had their opportunity, but they lay down on the job.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. QUINN: You can laugh if you like. You laugh at every sensible observation made on this side of the house. I see my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), that brilliant gentleman, the only man in God's world who knew that Britain was going off the gold standard. If ever this house had occasion to laugh, it was when that gentleman told the house he knew all about Britain's intention to go off the gold standard. I think he might be quiet for a little while.

I do not engage the attention of this house on many occasions, and I do not intend to fill up the pages of Hansard now. I simply rose to tell hon. gentlemen on the other side just where I stand with regard to the development of the port of Halifax and the trade to that port. I stand, as I always have stood, ready and willing to do my part on all occasions to impress upon this government or upon any other government the importance of shipping the products of this country through the ports of Halifax and St. John.

Where would this country have been from 1914 to 1918 if, during five months of the year, we could not have sent Canadian troops and materials to the war area from the ports of St. John and Halifax? The majority of our soldiers were sent from Halifax, as well as a great many American troops, and a great many of these soldiers came back through the same port. That illustrates the importance of developing those ports and keeping them in proper condition, and I say again to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his colleagues that we in Nova Scotia look to this government for every assistance it can possibly give in the development of our port, and I feel quite certain that as soon as the opportunity presents itself they will give us that assistance for which we have petitioned on many occasions.

Mr. DUFF: I think it is to be regretted that after I and other Nova Scotia and New Brunswick members have risen in our places this afternoon in order to impress upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce the importance of using the great ports of Halifax and St. John, the junior member for Halifax should refer to our remarks as a show. It may be a show for him; he reminds me of the story I read, when a boy, of Rip Van Winkle, who slept for twenty years.

Mr. QUINN: You slept for nine years.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend has been sleeping in this parliament, as far as the shipment of grain through Halifax is concerned, for the last three sessions, and he should be the last member to refer to our discussion this afternoon as a show, especially when I, who do not represent the port of Halifax, come to his help in trying to get more business for that port.

Mr. QUINN: A political show.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend also tries to make out that I would not have risen in my place in connection with this matter if it had not been for the fact that the Nova Scotia members supporting the government discussed this question with the government during the last few days. I am very glad that they did so, but my hon. friend is not fair nor is he correct. Evidently he was out of the house when the discussion started this afternoon, and he must have been out of the house a week ago to-night as well, when I asked the minister to tell us the policy of the government with regard to the shipment of grain through the port of Halifax. I might say to my hon. friend that in my opinion the reason for the meeting of the Nova Scotia members with the government during the last three or four days was that the hon. member for Gloucester and myself rose in our places last Friday night to ask what was the policy of the government. Evidently we must have awakened the Rip Van Winkle from Halifax.

My hon. friend also says that we are trying to get some cheap political notoriety out of this discussion. I wonder what the people of Halifax will think of that statement when they read that my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth, my hon. friend from Hants-Kings, my hon. friend from Gloucester and myself endeavoured to induce the minister to do something for these two great ports. I am sure they will not call it cheap newspaper advertising. The only reference I made to my hon. friends from Nova Scotia was this: I said that during the years the Liberal party was in power some of my hon. friends from Nova Scotia upbraided the government day in and day out for not doing as much as they thought should be done to have grain shipped through the port of Halifax. I wanted to show the minister that my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax, who was so insistent at that time in asking why grain was not going through that port, has been very silent for the two years this government has been in office, though we find that to-day less grain is going through the port of Halifax than went through it when the Liberal government was in power. It is all very well for my hon. friend to lay a bouquet on the tomb of the great chieftain of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with regard to the Transcontinental railway. First my hon. friend says the Liberal party did nothing to ship grain through Halifax, and in almost the next breath he gives credit to Sir Wilfrid Laurier for building the Transcontinental in order that grain might flow through the ports of St. John and Halifax.

What did my hon. friend and his friends do with regard to the Transcontinental railway after the Liberal government was defeated in 1911? That road was built by the Liberal party, who went to the country in 1904 on that issue. I do not know what position my hon. friend took then, in his younger days, but we do know what was done by the Tory party, and we do know their attitude in 1904 with regard to the construction of that railway. They opposed it to the very limit; they did not say one word in favour of it, but my hon. friend says now that while Sir Wilfrid Laurier should get great credit for the construction of that line, the Liberals should be condemned because they did not use the road during the nine years they were in power. Does not my hon. friend know the reason why that road was not used during those nine years, or for that matter during the last twenty years? It was because the ministry of Sir Robert Borden was hardly sworn in before it degraded the Transcontinental railway. It is a well known fact that the road was not finished when the Liberal party was defeated, and what was done by our Conservative friends from Nova Scotia, and for that matter from every part of the country, with regard to that great enterprise? They deliberately increased the grades and put wooden bridges where it had been intended to use iron bridges. That was one reason why the road was not used; the grades were so heavy that the engines could not pull enough cars to make it profitable to ship grain over that line from Quebec to Moncton.

Mr. CANTLEY: You had better shade that a little.

Mr. DUFF: It is true that the grades were made steeper than they were supposed to be. I do not know the technical term; perhaps the Minister of Railways could tell me, but there is no question about it.

Mr. CANTLEY: You are off the track a little.

Mr. DUFF: No, I am not. I know I am making my hon. friend from Pictou squirm in his seat, but I cannot help it. So I say it does not lie in the mouths of my hon. friends opposite to make out that in their nine years in power the Liberal party did nothing in order to encourage the shipment of grain through the ports of Halifax and St. John. Will not my hon. friend admit that the Liberal party did try to do something? Who built the elevator in Halifax? Was that done by the Conservative party? It is quite true that when the elevator was being built, and when the Liberal government and the harbour commission were endeavouring to do something so that grain would pass through the port of Halifax, the newspaper from which my hon. friend just read said it was useless to build that elevator, that the pigeons would roost on it and no grain would pass through it. If I am not mistaken my hon. friend either used those words himself or said, "Amen" when the Halifax Herald used them. So it does not lie in the mouth of my hon. friend now to say that we on this side are rising in our places this afternoon only because we were forced to do so by a meeting of Conservative members which took place several days after my hon. friend from Gloucester and I brought up this question in the house. Both my hon. friend from Gloucester and I are delighted to have the support of the Conservative members from the province of Nova Scotia. all I can say is: More power to their elbows, and may their efforts be crowned with success. If the government is to do anything I know it will not be done because of what has been said by the hon. member for Gloucester and myself; my hon. friends will try to take the credit and I, for one, am willing to give it to them. If the government will put a one cent differential into effect as between Quebec and Halifax and St. John, then I am sure that both the hon. member for Gloucester and I will be very pleased. We will be only too glad to see the port of Halifax obtain a greater amount of business.

My hon. friend did not say what he thought about Sir Alexander Gibb's report, and I wonder if he has taken that up with the government. Is he going to be satisfied that no heavy freight shall go through the port of Halifax? The Conservative party has spent, or perhaps I should say wasted, $35,000,000 on this port because the terminal should never have been built at its present location. One-third or one-quarter of that amount would have been sufficient to construct the terminal in the northern part of the harbour and better facilities would have been provided. The fact remains that $35,000,000 was spent by the Conservative party after it came into power in 1911, and the Liberal party has spent more money on this port than it was justified in spending. Money was spent on Halifax which should have been distributed throughout the province, and yet my hon. friend gets up and says that in nine years the Liberal party did nothing for the port of Halifax. During the Liberal régime millions of dollars were spent in providing new facilities in order to encourage freight and passenger traffic through that port. I and other hon. members on this side from Nova Scotia will do everything in our power, whether in opposition or supporting the government, to see that all possible business goes through this great port on the Atlantic ocean.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, I trust I may be pardoned for delaying the committee while I make a few observations on this important question. This is too vital a matter to be the subject of partisan bickerings. To my mind the policy of the routing of Canadian grain through American ports almost challenges the competency of this country as to the utilization of a great Canadian railway, the Transcontinental, built for a specific purpose and at tremendous cost—I understand upwards of $300,000,000. I have not the figures before me, but as I recollect, in 1931, five times as much Canadian grain was routed through the American Atlantic seaports as passed through the Canadian Atlantic seaports. Canadian grain is being routed through American ports in such huge volume as to build up a business in the United States estimated in 1931, as being worth $20,000,000 to that country. This was the amount of Canadian money expended in the United States to cover the movement and other costs of Canadian grain over American lines and through American ports, while our own ports at Halifax and St. John were being starved for business. During an eight-year period from 1924 to 1931 inclusive, a total of 841,801,868 bushels of Canadian grain passed through American Atlantic seaports, while during the same eight-year period those same American ports handled but 296,025,798 bushels of American grain, nearly four times as much.

The question of the building of the National Transcontinental Railway has been discussed before in this house, and the pronouncements which were made in parliament and during the elections of 1904 and 1908 have been made and do not need to be repeated. The Gibb report is very disappointing so far as Halifax is concerned, inasmuch as it intimates that this port cannot look to the future with any degree of hope for the expansion of heavy basic cargoes, that it must depend principally on package freight. Those familiar with transportation matters and questions of shipping tell me that package freight invariably follows the basic cargo, so if we are unable to obtain the basic cargo—and practically the only basic cargo in this country is grain—then we have little or no chance of securing the package freight. In that respect, and in respect to many other angles to which I shall not refer, the Gibb report is very discouraging.

The former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) has said that this is a serious problem, and with that we all agree. The hon. member also stated that we might lay ourselves open to some measure of retaliation if we embraced too strongly any direct action with respect to the routing of Canadian grain entirely through Canadian ports. As I said before, in 1931, four times as much Canadian grain was shipped through American ports as American grain through Canadian ports, so the question of retaliation is not at all serious so far as we are concerned.

Mr. COOTE: In referring to Canadian Atlantic ports, does the hon. member include Montreal?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Yes, Montreal, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, but I excluded the Pacific ports. As I said, this matter is one which challenges our competency to deal effectively with the routing of Canadian trade over Canadian steel and through Canadian ports. I am sure every effort will be made to see that this wrong is rectified and that there shall be a complete utilization of our Canadian ports, and particularly the ones in which I am most interested, the ports of Halifax and St. John.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, I should like to have some information from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) in connection with the elevator at Prince Rupert which was built in 1926. Immediately after it was opened, it was leased to the Alberta wheat pool. During 1926 and 1927, several million bushels of grain went through that elevator; in 1928 and 1929 about the same amount; in 1930 and 1931 there was one cargo and in 1932 there has been no cargo so far. I ask this question because I understand the lease will expire within a short time. Does the government intend to re-lease it to the Alberta wheat pool which uses it only as a storehouse? Will the minister enlighten me on that subject?

Mr. STEVENS: This elevator is leased to the Alberta pool, and I do not know of any other body of exporters that are more efficient in the handling of their export business than are the pool operators of the prairie provinces. They are now divided into three pools, but sometimes the three operate under one sales agency. They now operate their own sales business, which is efficiently handled and which is in charge of the export trade. At the present time this elevator is full of grain —not moving, I admit—owned by the pool. The movement of grain through Prince Rupert depends naturally on the condition of shipping and the markets, chiefly of the orient. Unfortunately for Prince Rupert—I suppose I can only put it in that way—the main shipping on the Pacific coast calls at Vancouver. Through that port, if I recollect rightly, the export of grain is much larger than it was last year and has reached around 65,000,000 bushels; the movement is free and very large. There is nothing the government has done or can do that will move that grain through Prince Rupert if the owners of the grain do not find the facilities there for its movement to be an advantage over or on a par with those of other ports. As I said a moment ago with regard to the other matter, the grain is in the hands of its owners and they direct its movements. The lease is a very moderate one; the rate is low; the freight rates are low; everything that the country can do has been done for the movement of shipments through that port. The lease, I may say, expires next year. When the time comes the government will consider what is the best thing to do, whether to renew the lease if it is so desired, or to make a new lease with other parties; but that point has not yet been under consideration.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Have the Alberta wheat pool applied for a renewal of the lease?

Mr. STEVENS: Not yet.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As a member representing a New Brunswick constituency, I do not think I should let this occasion pass without making some brief observations. I should like to preface my remarks with the statement that I enter into this discussion in no controversial spirit. As has been well said by my colleague from the county of Cumberland, to us in the maritime provinces, especially those of us who are interested in the great national ports of St. John and Halifax, this whole question transcends partisanship. I should like the house to visualize the entire question in that spirit.

Ever since the days of the decline of wooden shipping in the maritime provinces, our people have visualized the utilization of those two national ports as the winter ports of Canada. I am not very old, but my mind goes back to the year 1895, when the Beaver line first used St. John as a winter port. Prior to that time shipments of Canadian products across the ocean had been through Portland. Boston or other United States ports. The citizens of St. John put up a strong battle to controvert the idea that our ports were not usable during the winter season. It was the old government of which Sir George Foster was Minister of Finance that granted the first subsidy for the shipment of goods through Canadian ports including St. John. That was but the beginning, and from that time on the citizens of St. John expended their money and credit in an effort to build up a winter port.

The battle, however, has been a long one, and their hopes have been deferred. It is time that parliament, with the cooperation of every shade of public opinion in the house, dealt with this problem.

I listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and am appreciative of the fact there are great difficulties in the way. But I should like to impress upon him and hon. members generally that while his statement that the routing of grain is in the hands of the owner is primarily correct; yet grain shipments will travel along the lines of least resistance, and the most important factor is the question of rates. That, I think, is a fundamental principle, and it is only by a reduction in the grain rates that we can, by the natural evolution of business, have that traffic routed through our own ports. Frankly I have always recognized that geography is against the principle for which we are contending; we cannot shut our eyes to the fact; but because of that, we have to take other measures and we ask the cooperation of western shippers to that end. Surely the maritime provinces have done their share in building up the west; surely we have contributed our resources to the building of the railways there, and we ask the western people who are shipping grain to recognize that fact and to reciprocate in some degree. I am not complaining that the shippers utilize the cheapest routes, but I know of no other way whereby this difficulty can be overcome and the hopes and aspirations of our citizenship in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick realized, than by making the freight rates attractive. Therefore I urge that steps be taken to put St. John and Halifax rates on a parity with Quebec rates, so-called, plus the differential of one cent. Let us try that out.

I am sorry there has been interjected into this debate this afternoon an element of partisanship. I suppose that is natural in a house composed of two major political parties, but I should like to remind the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and the hon. member for Gloucester that the movement which is now under way and the representations which have recently been made to the government are not inspired by anything they may have said in this chamber. The movement has been under way for some weeks and the memorial which has been presented to the government sets forth fairly, I think, the position of the two provinces represented. I am not quite certain why the aid of Liberal members from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was not sought. I do not know that it would have added to or detracted from the weight of the representations which have been made. Be that as it may, I do desire to remind this house and the country that ever since the declaration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1903, when he introduced the bill with respect to the construction of the Transcontinental railway, the people of the two eastern provinces have been waiting for the fulfilment of the promise he then made. Although it may have been quoted many times in this house, I desire to read very briefly the statement made at that time, upon which the appeal for the establishment of this rate is now based. The appeal made at that time is based chiefly on the statute under which the Transcontinental was built, and which specified that——the through rate on export traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

That was the underlying principle of the rate structure to be established on the construction of the Transcontinental railway. That principle has never been adhered to from that time to this.

I am not blaming any political party or any particular government which has been in power. I am conscious of the fact that very important elements in our own country have been opposed to the establishment and carrying out of the principle underlying that declaration, and I venture to suggest that we do not have to look very much further than the port of Montreal as being the great deterrent to its fulfilment. They are fearful, I think, of the loss of the traffic which they have enjoyed for many years past in the shipment of American grain through their port. That is natural, but it simply emphasizes the selfishness of the port interests of the city of Montreal. They are willing to fight for that selfish interest no matter what becomes of the rest of Canada or of the winter ports of the maritimes. We from the maritime provinces protest against the selfish attitude of the port of Montreal with respect to this whole question, and I say to my friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the Prime Minister and his government, let us try this matter out. Threats of retaliation should not deter a government from doing what is right if the principle involved is right. I know we are constantly under the economic pressure of the country to the south of us, but we are still a self-reliant nation; I have always noticed that when we stand up for our rights we gain their respect, and I believe that we shall continue to do so if we stand up for our rights in respect to this particular matter.

Let me say just this in conclusion. I did not take up a great deal of time in this house in days gone by when we were in opposition and dealing with the question of maritime rights; though I have sympathized with that movement and have spoken occasionally in favour of it, I have never taken up much of the time of this house discussing it or seeking newspaper publicity with regard to it. The people of the maritime provinces, certainly expect that the principle laid down as long ago as 1903, twenty-nine years ago, by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, shall now be brought to fruition. Matters are now coming to a climax. They feel that ample time has elapsed to make the necessary arrangements. All these huge expenditures which have been made for port facilities, all these things which have been done recently as well as in former years and are now being done through the harbour commissions in St. John and Halifax, have been in preparation for the final carrying out of the principle implied in the Transcontinental railway legislation, and up to date they have all been practically a dead letter. Let all parties in this house get together and get behind the government and ask them to put this into effect at all events as a trial measure. The people of the maritime provinces will then know whether or not they are able to overcome geography, whether they are able to bring to fruition the hopes and aspirations of the last three decades.

Mr. VALLANCE: Naturally I am much interested in the discussion that has taken place this afternoon regarding the export of Canada's wheat and the channels through which it should go. I should like to ask the minister if his attention has been drawn to a new item appearing in this morning's Citizen, reading as follows:

Albany, N.Y., April 14.—A Canadian grain syndicate has signed a 10-year lease for the 2,500,000-bushel elevator planned for the port of Albany, it was revealed to-day when bids for the construction work were opened. The name of the syndicate was not revealed, but A. R. Roberts, of Toronto, its representative, said it had resources exceeding $60,000,000 and that it represented a combination of elevator and grain transportation groups. He said it controlled seven elevators and 20 lake steamers.

I would ask the minister if he has any knowledge of this transaction.

Mr. STEVENS: No more than my hon. friend has from the announcement he has just read. I should like to intimate to him that one should be a little cautious about attaching full weight to stories of that character. Merely to put the question to me, do I know anything about it or not, cannot get us anywhere. I know nothing about it, and the government knows nothing about it other than the statement which was made in the press. Of course we know, as everybody knows, that there have been many stories about the development of the port of Albany on the Hudson river, and all that sort of thing. There is the question of the deep waterways scheme. All these matters are being discussed in the press by persons. some responsible and some utterly irresponsible. I do not think that in considering the movement of our wheat crop we should be brought into any official contact with suggestions of the possible promotion by Americans or others of projects which are obviously of a private character. I would not like to leave in my answer to my hon. friend the impression that much importance should be attached to the announcement, which obviously is not and cannot be official.

Mr. VALLANCE: I really must accept the statement in the press as being founded upon a possibility. However, I am willing to accept the statement of the minister that he knows nothing of the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: No, I do not.

Mr. DONNELLY: In connection with this rate on grain to Halifax and St. John, I have been interested to know whether there is any discrimination against our Canadian ports as compared with American ports. Would the minister tell the committee what is the exact railway rate on grain from the head of the lakes to St. John and Halifax, as compared with the rate from the head of the lakes to New York, Boston and other American ports?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot answer the question definitely at the moment, and perhaps it would be better for me not to reply to it offhand. But I am under the impression, and I give this for what it is worth, that the rate from the head of the lakes to Montreal is the same as from the head of the lakes to New York. When we come to Halifax and St. John we come to the special rates for winter haulage in connection with which two factors must be considered. One is the special rate to Quebec from the west of 18·34.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not for the winter months.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend from Gloucester has said that is not for winter haulage; I am under the impression it is.

Mr. VENIOT: It is all the year round.

Mr. STEVENS: I was not discriminating in that sense. I had simply said that there was a rate to Quebec of 18·34. Then, there is a special rate to Halifax and St. John which is not as high as the normal rate governing the movement of freight, part of which is accounted for in the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Then there is the differential which is now complained of, and we have the arguments of the hon. member for York-Sunbury and the other hon. members who have spoken, asking for a one cent differential to be added to the Quebec rate which would put the maritimes on a much better basis.

While I am speaking may I say to the committee that this whole question is under study. The discussion this afternoon has been earnestly and effectively put forward by all speakers. I assure hon. members in the committee that as early as possible the matter will be taken under advisement, and I express the hope that some decision may be arrived at in the near future. This matter is of tremendous importance. I do not wish to occupy the time of the committee in a long, detailed dissertation, but I assure hon. members that the question of grain is not the only matter under consideration. Many other elements which will be of advantage to the maritime ports may be worked out before long, at least before another session has passed. I can merely add that in the immediate future we will give the whole question the most earnest study.

Mr. DONNELLY: If grain is to be shipped out of this country surely the shipper must know the freight rate from Fort William to Halifax as compared with the rate from Fort William to New York, because no farmers would ship grain to Halifax if it cost five or six cents more than to ship it to New York.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is quite right when he states it is necessary to know the freight rates; I have no doubt any man handling grain is quite familiar with them. It just happened that I had not the details of the rates at my finger-tips, but the Minister of Railways has just this moment handed me a diagram showing the rates. From Fort William to New York the rate is 29½ cents, and from Fort William to Halifax and St. John the same rate obtains.

Mr. YOUNG: Lake and rail.

Mr. STEVENS: That is all rail. The corresponding rate is from Armstrong on the Canadian National railways.

Mr. VENIOT: When did the 29½ cent rate come into force?

Mr. BOTHWELL: What is it to Quebec?

Mr. VENIOT: It is 18·34 to Quebec.

Mr. STEVENS: My information is this rate has been in effect right along.

Mr. VENIOT: No, it has not.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, we are entering a realm of exact rate quotations which I had not anticipated.

Mr. VENIOT: There is a difference of five cents a bushel.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend is wrong, but I am afraid I cannot dogmatize in the matter. I have given the rates as shown by the diagram supplied by the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. MANION: Supplied by the railway board.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, supplied by the railway board. While the information I have given is not a direct answer to the question put by my hon. friend opposite, nevertheless I accept the information on the diagram as correct.

Mr. DONNELLY: We have been talking about a 35 cent rate all afternoon; that is why I asked.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the rate to Montreal?

Mr. STEVENS: The rate is 28½ cents.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not wish to be understood as saying that that is not the rate at the present time. I do wish to say, however, that up until a year ago the railway commission never gave us anything under 35·5 to St. John and Halifax. When was this rate put into effect?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot answer that question from memory, but I think it was within the last three or four years.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am under the impression the rate is still 35½ cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. VENIOT: The rate has been given of 29½ cents from the head of the lakes to Halifax and from the head of the lakes to New York. What is the difference in the distances?

Mr. MANION: May I say that this diagram was prepared for me, at my request, by the railway authorities. As the minister has explained, this diagram shows that the rate from the head of the lakes to Halifax and St. John is exactly the same as the rate to New York. To Montreal it is one cent less. The distances to Halifax and St. John are much greater, but we must remember they are competitive rates, and are in competition with the rates from Duluth and Minneapolis. Duluth and Minneapolis rates are the same to New York. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee, but I must say I was responsible for the chart. Last year for a short time there was a change in the United States rate, and the Canadian rate was changed because it was in competition. That, however, was for only a short time. Those rates are always on a competing basis.

Mr. VENIOT: I know they are on a competing basis, but the impression still prevails that our rate to the maritimes is 35·5 from the head of the lakes. In our application to the railway commission we have asked for a reduction from 35·5 to 19·34.

Mr. MANION: That is because of the Quebec decision.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. MANION: That was because of the decision in favour of Quebec. The rate to Quebec is not the same as to Montreal; it is eighteen cents.

Mr. VENIOT: The rate is 18·34. Quebec had a rate of 34·5; we had a rate of 35·5, and we are asking that the maritimes get a rate of 19·34. While I am on my feet may I say that I regret politics has been introduced into this discussion. I made an effort to keep it out. I see that reference has been made to the statute under which the Transcontinental railway was constructed.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I claim the hon. member is out of order when he attempts to discuss the rate to Quebec under the estimate concerning the Board of Grain Commissioners. I should like to have the committee revert to the question under discussion. It has not been possible this afternoon to ask any question concerning the administration of the act.

Mr. VENIOT: Why should the discussion continue all afternoon and then be closed down at the last moment?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I believe the discussion is in order. Under the administration of the Canada Grain Act a wide discussion may be allowed.

Mr. McINTOSH: You talked on it, and you are never out of order, so it must be in order.

Mr. VENIOT: The statement has been made that the Liberal party, during its term of office, never attempted to carry out or did not carry out the conditions laid down by the statute concerning the use of the Transcontinental railway for transportation to Atlantic ports. If that question had not come up I would not have spoken a second time. But may I call the attention of my Conservative friends to the fact that when they were in power from 1919 to 1921—I am leaving out of consideration for the moment the Union government—they took over all branch and main lines, the Transcontinental, the Canadian Northern and so on; and at that time, in order to encourage more fully transportation through Canadian ports, especially the winter ports of St. John and Halifax, an amendment was proposed whereby, if they had accepted it, the government would not have had any shipments made through the port of Portland. But that amendment was voted down by the Conservative government; and in 1921, instead of discouraging the shipment of grain through Portland, on October 17 they passed an order in council authorizing that nearly $2,000,000 be expended in the port of Portland to prepare it to receive Canadian goods going through that American channel. So that if we get into a political discussion and resort to recriminations, one against the other, we shall get nowhere in this matter. I thought it was my duty, however, seeing that an attempt had been made to blame the Liberals for having done nothing, to try to find out why the Conservative government in 1921 was prepared to spend $2,000,000 to bolster up the port of Portland against the port of St. John. And in that very year there was not one dollar spent on improvements in the harbour of St. John. I suggest therefore that we had better leave these things aside, because if we get into a discussion in detail of the actions of either party we shall get nowhere. I was very much pleased with the address delivered by the chairman (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury) on behalf of the maritime provinces. I think his attitude, one of conciliation and cooperation, will have a greater effect than if we continue trying to make political capital out of a discussion of this kind. While I did express regret that the Liberal members of the maritimes had not been consulted or asked to cooperate in the representations made to the government, still we are prepared to overlook that, and we assure the government that if they will undertake to grant to the maritimes what they are seeking in this respect, they will have the hearty cooperation of Liberal members from that part of the country.

Mr. BRADETTE: I believe I should have the right now, as a lone voice from northern Ontario, to state the sentiments of my section of the country. I believe that most of the anomalies which have to be faced in the maritime provinces would be removed if we could have shipments of grain over the transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec during the summer and winter. This is a very vital question to my section of the country, and as some speakers seem to have made it a political issue, I may say that I fully appreciate the position of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because when I was sitting in support of this party when it was in power, I made representations to the government of that day. I fully realize the obstacles and difficulties which have to be surmounted. I believe that this question is capable of solution. I listened with a good deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou, and it seems to me that the port of Halifax could receive a fair share of the wheat traffic if the old transcontinental could get its quota of freight haulage. I remember, although I was a young man at the time, when in 1903 the charter was granted to the Grand Trunk Pacific. It was said at that time that this was going to provide the shortest distance from ocean to ocean, and the road was going to haul heavy freight, such as grain and cattle, at a cheaper rate than the railway system as it then existed. The people were told that it was going to shorten the distance so considerably, that, as I remember, cartoons appeared in the Montreal Star suggesting that the Transcontinental line, under contemplation then, would be the shortest way to travel around the world. Sad to say, however, our expectations have not been fulfilled. As we all remember, the Transcontinental section from Quebec to Winnipeg was built by the federal government and was supposed to be handed over to the Grand Trunk Pacific after completion. For reasons well known to the country as a whole, that fact has not been accomplished. The fact remains, nevertheless, that we have never had any real haulage of grain from the prairies to the eastern ports over that section of the road. This is the best section of road bed on the American continent. It is over one thousand miles long and the grades are excellent, so that haulage over that section could be done at a cheaper rate than on any other section of our railways.

This question is becoming more and more acute, particularly in Cochrane and along that section of the Transcontinental, because the people have seen the administration of the Canadian National—I will not discuss this point now—withdrawing passenger service from Montreal to Winnipeg by way of North Bay and Cochrane. In our section of the country last summer and fall we were astonished that the royal commission did not find it possible to have at least a brief sitting in the town of Cochrane, which is one of the divisional points on the Transcontinental, being half way between Quebec and Winnipeg. I hope that before the inquiry is over that commission will visit Cochrane and study for themselves, on the ground, the situation as it actually exists.

I wish to be as brief as possible, and for that reason I will quote some observations and newspaper articles that have been published in the past in regard to this matter. Let me read a short excerpt from a speech made in 1917 by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). Speaking at that time the hon. gentleman said:

[Mr. Bradette.]

The Transcontinental, sweeping from Winnipeg through northern Ontario to Cochrane, and thence over the boundary to Amos and down into Quebec city, provided the most direct route and the easiest gradients from the prairies to the St. Lawrence. Accordingly, when the road was completed in 1916, it was able to quote a rate of six cents per bushel on wheat from Armstrong—a station in the Thunder Bay district just west and north of Lake Nipigon, and almost due north of Fort William and Port Arthur—down to Quebec city, 959 miles distant.

But then a mysterious thing happened. Hardly had the rate been announced when the Conservative government almost quadrupled it.

The increased rate, it is alleged, proved not only discriminatory, but also prohibitive. The result was that the expected volume of traffic did not develop.

What was the reason for this startling increase in the schedule for wheat?

That is why I want to ask the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, as I asked the previous government, for support for this proposal. I want to impress upon the government as well as upon hon. members from the maritime provinces and from Quebec, the fact that enormous sums of money have been spent in the construction of the trans-Canada highway, which expenditure is not coming to fruition for the reason that we do not get our fair share of freight haulage.

Let me read a few paragraphs from a resolution passed by the Cochrane board of trade only a few months ago with respect to freight matters:

Re: Freight Service

1. The straight line between Quebec and Winnipeg, with an excellent road-bed and minimum of curves and grades, favours rapid and economical haulage of heavy freight trains.

2. The junctions at Sioux Lookout, Nakina, Hearst, Cochrane, Taschereau, and Herve also support the contention that the National Transcontinental Railway should be put to greater use in cross-country freight haulage.

3. During the war, a huge quantity of freight was hauled over this line at a lower tonnage cost than any other transcontinental railroad.

4. The winter haulage of grain to Canadian Atlantic seaports can be accomplished more economically over this road.

5. The rapidity of development of northern Quebec and of northern Ontario is an assurance of increasing incoming and outgoing freight.

6. By using the old Grand Trunk line between Toronto and North Bay, and the Ontario government owned Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway between North Bay and Cochrane, the National Transcontinental railway can handle the Toronto-Winnipeg freight to greater advantage.

7. The diversion of Canadian grain to American ships, railroads and elevators with resulting loss of wages to Canadian workmen should be prevented and the National Transcontinental railway restored to its proper object of hauling western grain to Canadian Atlantic seaports and carrying eastern products and imports westwards.

8. Of the three transcontinental lines crossing Ontario; Canadian Pacific, Canadian Northern and National Transcontinental, the last is the more suitable for rapid and economical haulage and crosses the most populated, prosperous and promising agricultural, mining and timber districts, suitable for the establishment of one million more Canadian citizens.

A few moments ago the Minister of Railways gave the rates from the head of the lakes to St. John and Halifax via Montreal, and he mentioned Armstrong. Maritime members of this house should realize that this movement is not over the Transcontinental railway from Armstrong direct to the city of Quebec and on to Halifax; it is via a roundabout way, through the Ottawa valley, and because of this the distance covered is very much lengthened. This is an anomaly which should be remedied. At the present time I am apparently the only one directly interested in that section of the country, but I make this appeal to members from the maritimes and in fact to all members asking for their support.

Why was that road built? It is stated that it cost over $170,000,000, but to-day the rails are practically rusting from lack of through haulage. The road was never intended for local traffic. I remember as a young man working as a common labourer on that line, and we realized then that there would be very little local traffic. When this government granted a charter to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway it was realized that the Transcontinental was to be used primarily for the hauling of cattle and grain to the Atlantic coast.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. BRADETTE: No, it is not carried. I hope the hon. member will allow me to go on, because this question is of vital importance to all Canada.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair, and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

RAILWAY COMMISSION AND RATE STRUCTURE—SPECIAL COMMODITY RATES

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 44, to amend the Railway Act.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I shall have to oppose this bill on principle because there are two or three ideas introduced which have not been observed in this country for many years. Section 1 of the bill adds the following words as subsection 2 of section 320 of the act:

> The board may consider the question of what should be reasonable compensation under the circumstances, and may establish a rate structure in the interests of trade development and public policy, though such experimental rates may not at the time or of themselves give reasonable compensation to the railway companies.

It is proposed by this section to give to the Board of Railway Commissioners a power which in the past has always been entirely in the hands of the government of the day, the power of developing trade and the formulation of general public policies. In other words, we would be permitting the Board of Railway Commissioners to take unto itself the matter of the trade of this country, which matter belongs to the government and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. No government in the past has ever suggested that the formulation of such policies shall be put in the hands of an outside body. This objection in itself is sufficient to condemn the bill from the standpoint of any government, whether the present government or the one which preceded it. Section 2 of the bill reads as follows:

> Subsection five of section three hundred and twenty-five of the said act is amended by striking out the proviso thereto and substituting the following therefor:
> "Provided that, notwithstanding anything in this subsection contained, rates on grain and flour shall, on and from the twenty-seventh day of June, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-five, be governed by the provisions of the agreement made pursuant to chapter five of the statutes of Canada, 1897, but such rates shall apply to all such traffic moving from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William to Fort William or Port Arthur,—

Then come the words suggested to be inserted:

> —and to all such traffic moving westwardly from Fort William, and from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William, to Vancouver, British Columbia and to ports on the Pacific coast,—

And then follows the wording of the old section:

> —over all lines now or hereafter constructed by any company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament."

I suggest that that section means that rates shall be fixed without a hearing being given to the railway companies or to other interested parties. If I understand rightly, I think the intention is to put into force all the Crowsnest rates westward. The hon. member nods assent, so apparently I have interpreted correctly. This parliament has no facilities for the making of rates. I admit that in the past, I think it was 1897, parliament did by statute fix the Crowsnest rates, but that was done in agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and was in return for the fulfilment of certain conditions by that company. As a general rule parliament has always taken the attitude that it does not fix rates. I consider this to be the right attitude because parliament, constituted as it is, is not capable of going into such a complicated matter as the freight rate structure of this country. That question is perhaps the most complicated with which anyone has to deal, and early in the present century the Board of Railway Commissioners was constituted for the purpose of giving its full time to the study of the question. The board is the proper body to which to apply for such rate fixing as is covered by this bill.

Thus there are two principles invaded by this bill. The first is to hand over to the Board of Railway Commissioners the forming of the trade policy of the government, which is a matter purely within the jurisdiction of the government through the Department of Trade and Commerce. Secondly, the bill attempts to fix rates, something which has never before been attempted by the parliament of Canada in such a bill as this. Certainly rates should not be fixed without giving an opportunity to be heard not only to the consumer, to whom the hon. member referred, but to the railways themselves. The two principles involved in the second reading of this bill cannot be accepted, in fairness to the railways, in fairness to the people, and in fairness to the parliament of Canada itself.

There is at the present time a royal commission sitting in Canada, appointed to look into the whole transportation question. No one knows at the moment what the recommendations of that commission will be, and it is quite possible that it may offer suggestions which would alter the scope of this bill. In view of what I have pointed out, I suggest to my hon. friend in the friendliest way possible that he might be well advised to withdraw the bill for the present session and hold it over until the next session of parliament. It is possible and even probable that the next session may be called at a date earlier than has been the case in past years, and my hon. friend would not have to wait very long for an opportunity to bring in a bill which would comply with the points I have mentioned. I appeal to the hon. gentleman, in the spirit of fair play which I hope he will show in this regard, to let this bill stand over until next session. By that time he will have had time to look thoroughly into the question and to deal with it in such a way that the recognized principles of rate making which have been in existence in Canada for many years shall not be infringed.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am familiar only with the general principles of this bill. I cannot understand why a request should be made to defeat it on the grounds of fair play. I do not think the question of unfairness is involved in this bill; I submit that the unfairness has existed in connection with the rates prevailing on shipments to British Columbia. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has stated that this bill would give too much power to the railway board, and suggests that it is the duty of the government to deal with matters of this kind. If so the government has failed signally for some considerable time to fulfil its duty; I allude to the standing grievance of British Columbia in connection with the discrimination in the rates between grain for export and those for domestic consumption. Blame can be laid at the doors of both the present and past governments, the net result being that this discrimination has been in effect for something like six years. If now is not the time to take action, I do not know when it will be. It is suggested we should consider it between now and next fall. I submit that we have already had ample time in which to discuss it. If I am not mistaken, the hon. member who introduced the bill quoted the other day from the Duncan report, which specifically recommends the very phraseology which has been inserted in this bill, in one section at any rate. The Duncan report was very highly approved by very many people, and by far the greater part of its provisions have been carried into effect.

As regards fixing rates, which the minister deplores, he himself says there is precedent for that. He does not need to go so far back as the initiation of the Crowsnest pass rate, because it was renewed again in 1923 or 1924, and this bill seeks not to fix rates or make new ones, but only to authorize the railway board to extend the principle of the rates there suggested and carried out. He used the words "to fix rates." I would not say "to fix rates"; it is to equalize rates, only to make the rates westward the same as they are eastward on similar goods and under similar conditions.

He suggests that we should await the report of the royal commission. That commission is dealing with transportation in its broadest aspect and is extremely unlikely to make any specific recommendation regarding rates. Meanwhile we do not know when it will report or what the nature of the report will be, or anything else. But we have before us a gross outstanding grievance from which the people of British Columbia have suffered for quite a number of years. There is no reason why we should not put our hands to the plough to remedy it now; it is there and obvious, and apparently this is the proper method. The Duncan commission and other authorities have said that if we ever expect the Board of Railway Commissioners to give us that justice for which we ask in British Columbia, some language such as this will have to be inserted in the bill to give them the authority, because at the present time it is lacking. I think some members of the railway board, in the course of decisions rendered, indicated that their ruling would have to be adverse to our just desires and interests because of the lack of authority which they pointed out and which is, by this bill, sought to be given to them. I am surprised the bill has not had some active support, not only from western members whose interests are identical with ours in British Columbia, though coming from the other end of the journey so to speak, but also from other British Columbia members.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): If the hon. member who has introduced the bill intends to press it, I desire to say a word with regard to it. I am opposed, first of all, to the whole principle of making special rates for the movement of commodities in any part of the country. General business in many parts suffers more than anything else from what has taken place in the last twenty years in making special rates for particular commodities in certain parts of the country. This bill in its general outline proposes to introduce what is known as the Crowsnest pass rates on all commodities moving westward from Fort William to the Pacific coast, leaving aside altogether the amendments which are proposed to section 320. It should, I think, be obvious to anyone who has given thought to the transportation problem of Canada that if the railways are to continue to operate, they must get somewhere a sufficient revenue to pay the bill. That revenue can be secured in just two ways, either by the people whose commodities are moving paying the cost of moving them, or by the general public paying through their general taxes for the movement of those commodities, At the present time, on one line of railways, the Canadian National, this payment is being made partly in one way and partly in another. The person who moves commodities or who travels on the Canadian National lines pays part of the cost of operation; the general public pays the balance, an amount that since the railway was taken over by the Canadian people has been approxiately $75,000,000 a year. As regards the Canadian Pacific, up to the present moment the people whose commodities are moving have paid the entire cost. If we are to get down to a sound business basis, the commodity that is being moved must pay the cost of moving it; but by such measures as the one now before the house the railway commission is virtually given instructions to make special rates on particular commodities in certain sections of the country. This means that if the railways are to secure sufficient income to pay wages and meet the cost of coal, oil and all manner of operating expenses, some other commodity in some other part of the country must carry the load. Without desiring to criticize what has been done in the past I may say that rates have been made—and perhaps rightly so; I am not at the moment going to dispute the principle—to favour special commodities in particular parts while other commodities in other parts must bear the burden. Within the last few minutes I have taken occasion to get the comparative rates on one particular commodity on western and eastern lines of Canadian railways. A British Columbia lumberman can now move a carload of lumber 1,200 miles for the same cost that an Ontario or Quebec or New Brunswick lumberman can move a carload of lumber 800 miles. If this bill is passed, then the Ontario, Quebec or New Brunswick lumberman will have to bear an additional cost or some other shipper of another commodity will have to bear it to equalize the loss of revenue involved in putting these rates into effect.

If I correctly understood the hon. member who introduced the bill, when he spoke on the first reading he indicated it was his judgment that reduced rates would increase the movement of traffic and the railroads would make more money. That may be quite true; I am not going to dispute it. It may be that the hon. member understands the incidence of railway earnings and what will increase them better than Sir Henry Thornton or Mr. E. W. Beatty or the traffic officers of the two railways, but I am somewhat doubtful and I maintain that before an enactment of this kind is passed, at least the traffic officers of the railway commission should determine what the effect is going to be in that regard. Before any legislation is passed in the house creating special rates or conditions for any commodity in any part of the country, the whole rate structure should be recast on a basis that will be equitable to all commodities and to all parts of Canada. Special legislation creating particular rates for one commodity or one part of the country has, as I said a moment ago, bedevilled the whole rate structure and made it impossible for business to be conducted on an equitable basis. I am opposed in principle to a measure of this kind. Instead of removing discrimination, it can have no other effect than to increase it as between one commodity and another and one part of Canada and another.

On motion of Mr. Munn, the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

The Canada Grain Act, including management, operation, maintenance and equipment of elevators, administration of, $2,400,000.

Mr. BRADETTE: Before the house rose at six o'clock I was pointing out the opportunity which the National Transcontinental railway affords for more direct communication from ocean to ocean and the need for a greater amount of traffic being routed over that road. It has been suggested that the reason we have not our proper share of through freight traffic for the transcontinental is found in physical conditions. Last summer I spent three weeks making an inquiry into this phase of the matter, and I should like to give to the committee the information I gathered in regard to the physical obstructions we have to face in our section of the country.

A very misleading and detrimental opinion seems to be that northern Ontario and northern Quebec suffer from unusual climatic conditions. As a matter of fact the temperatures in these parts compare favorably with much older and more settled parts of the country. The snowfall is invariably lighter, and although we sometimes experience lower temperatures, they are not constant, and the air being dry, the cold does not affect one nearly as much as a damper climate with higher temperatures.

The Timiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway and that portion of the Canadian National Railways known as the transcontinental have operated through northern Ontario and northern Quebec for some years and do not suffer traffic delays owing to climatic conditions. Trains Nos. 1 and 2 of the Canadian National Railways operated over these lines for the past twelve years with practically no delays chargeable to weather conditions, and maintained their schedules without difficulty.

Prior to the construction of the Nakina-Longlac cut-off, which connected the transcontinental railway with the former Canadian Northern Railway, that portion of the Canadian National railway stretching from Winnipeg to Quebec city, some 1,300 miles, enjoyed a period of prosperity and showed a profit over and above operating costs of approximately forty cents on the dollar. Owing to the extremely low grades and slight curvatures through this portion of the country, heavy tonnage and long freight trains make for profitable operation. Solid trains of stock were moved over this line in trains of seventy-five cars and at a speed which saved the expense of unloading and feeding once between Winnipeg and Montreal, which in itself means much in shrinkage and expense to shippers when one considers there are twenty-five to thirty head of stock per car.

Grain was moved over the transcontinental line at a rate of eleven cents per hundredweight and moved at a profit, on account of these favourable conditions.

In comparison with the grades on the Canadian Pacific railway, Algoma district, across the same portion of the country, although much further south and through hillier territory, the same class of engines actually handle only one-third the tonnage handled by the same power over the transcontinental line.

Since the building of the Longlac-Nakina cut-off the portion of the transcontinental between Nakina and Quebec has existed on purely local traffic, made up of pulpwood, construction material and manufacturing materials such as sulphur, coal, lime, and so forth, for the manufacturing plants located along this line, and even under these conditions the road operates at a profit, although a reduced one.

The Transcona elevator, originally built to clean grain and supply the transcontinental line with traffic has never been used to any extent. It would avoid moving the grain to the lake head for cleaning and give the western shippers a shorter route to the ocean ports, a saving in tonnage which would benefit the east as well as the west.

I well remember seventeen years ago the big celebration we had in Cochrane when the first national transcontinental train came in from Toronto. At that time we visualized through passenger and freight traffic going over that transcontinental section of the line, but we have been sadly disillusioned. We have not got that traffic, for reasons which are unknown to the people of northern Ontario, unless it is discriminatory rates. I listened with a good deal of attention to the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon stating that the government has absolutely nothing to do with the routing of the grain. I appreciate that, nevertheless we feel that if there had not been a discriminatory rate against the transcontinental route from Winnipeg to Quebec city and the maritime provinces we would have received a fair share of the through traffic during the last fifteen years. It has been mentioned this afternoon by members from the maritime provinces that at a certain period during the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific the whole project was jeopardized on account of the fact that the grades had been tampered with, or that they were not being built up to the highest standard possible from ocean to ocean. That condition does not apply on the transcontinental section from Winnipeg to Quebec, because luckily most of that construction was done under the régime of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I should like to read a clipping from the Halifax Mail which I think is well worthy of the attention of the house. Under the heading "A forgotten Railway," this paper says:

Discussing the memorial of the Cochrane (Ontario) Board of Trade ("vigorously seconded" by the maritime provinces), the Winnipeg Free Press has some pointed comment to make on "a forgotten railway policy."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): I would remind the hon. gentleman that we are discussing the administration of the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. BRADETTE: With all due respect to you, Mr. Chairman, I submit that my remarks are no more out of order than many of the speeches we heard this afternoon. In fact, the hon. member for York-Sunbury left the chair for a while to make just the same kind of speech that I am making now. I believe the minister will support me in that. I shall not delay the committee very long.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The hon. member will please come to his point.

Mr. BRADETTE: My point, Mr. Chairman, is that the transcontinental is not being given a fair share of the through grain traffic from Winnipeg to Quebec and the maritime provinces. I will continue with the quotation:

The Cochrane memorial, it will be recalled, urges the use of the Transcontinental railway for the purposes for which it was constructed, and the Free Press notes that "in these pleas there is embodied an argument from an almost forgotten past." It adds: "All that has been said by the Cochrane memorial and the spokesmen for maritime interests is true."

The Winnipeg paper points out that the national transcontinental gives the most direct communication between the west and Quebec and the maritime provinces. It has "an excellent roadbed with curves and grades planned for the economical haulage of freight. Moreover, the roadbed was built at a vast cost for the express purpose of carrying freight, especially wheat, from the west to the sea under exceptionally favourable conditions."

The Free Press concludes its editorial comment on this subject as follows:

"Having regard to the use to which the road has been put, it can only be assumed that this railway was built by the country in a fit of absent-mindedness. Before the road was finished, the country forgot what it was all about; and not only has no effort been made to put it to the purpose for which it was built, but difficulties in the way of permitting it being applied to these purposes have been encouraged."

"Looking back twenty-five years or fifty, it is clear that the railway scheme, with which the people appeared so fascinated in 1904, has thus far been disastrous to the country. It is a very large contributing factor to the existing railway trouble. But whether the responsibility for the failure rests upon the government which planned and built the road, or upon the governments which have been in power since the road was completed, is very much an open question. Either the Laurier government, which built the road, did not know what it was doing, or the governments to which have fallen the task of seeing that the road should do the work for which it was supposed to be built, have been sadly lacking in vision and enterprise."

I now make an urgent appeal to the government to permit us to get our fair share of this through traffic on another score. During the last eighteen months most of the men working on the transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec have been taken off, and only yesterday I received a letter saying that more men were being thrown out of work. A proper routing of our grain coming east would mean more employment in my section of the country. This I believe is sufficient reason for putting the facts before the house; I hope hon. members will be familiar with the situation. If no grain were going through American ports it would be entirely different, but I have in my hand a record showing that almost fifty per cent of our grain passes through American ports. There must be an anomaly somewhere, and the house should enter into a thorough discussion of the matter and endeavour to supply a remedy. The people of Canada who are not familiar with railroad matters and with matters of commerce are asking questions. They do not know why it is not possible to direct some of the traffic over the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Canadian National.

To make my point clear, and to be as brief as possible, I shall read to the house some of the reasons why in my section of the country there is dissatisfaction. I have before me an editorial from the Cochrane Northland Post, which I have no doubt will give food for thought to some hon. members in this house. It is as follows:

Any really satisfactory solution of this gigantic problem must necessarily include two features; the utilizing of the lowest haulage-cost sections to their full capacity, and an increase in freight traffic. Other features such as mutually advantageous cooperation between the two great railway systems will have their place in the solution, but these two are of paramount importance.

In dealing with the matter of increased freight traffic, it may, at first, seem illogical to speak of increasing freight traffic in a wide spread country such as Canada with its just a trifle more than 10,000,000 people. But in the year 1930, according to Colonel C. E. Phinney, President of the Halifax Harbour Commissioners, "Canadian grain moving eastward for export during the past year (1930) has been handled through the following channels:

Via Canadian ports—47,300,000 bushels.

Via United States ports—67,700,000 bushels."

And speaking at Halifax last October, Colonel Phinney quoted an editorial indicating that "transportation of 1,000,000 bushels of grain over the National Transcontinental to an Atlantic port would cause the expenditure of $53,000 for labour and $10,000 for fuel."

Thus, if, in 1930, the 67 million bushels of grain which was exported via the United States had been shipped over the National Transcontinental line over 38 millions of dollars more would have been paid to Canadian workers. Why should this money, so greatly needed by our own workers, be paid into the pockets of workers across the border? The continuation of such a situation is inimical to the welfare of the country and intolerable to the pride of the people of Canada. And that there has been no effort made to remedy this disgraceful state of affairs is shown by the fact that in August and September of 1931 (the first two months of the 1931-32 crop year), wheat shipments of Canadian grain to the United Kingdom left Canada as follows:

Via Canadian Atlantic ports—2,781,810 bushels.

Via Canadian Pacific ports—2,454,455 bushels.

Via United States ports—11,796,785 bushels.

or over twice as much Canadian grain was exported through American channels as through Canadian channels. Such a condition must be irritating in the extreme to Canadian railway and port workers on short time and many without work at all. If it requires a royal commission to right wrongs such as this, surely it is about time that we had new administration for our railways.

[Mr. Bradette.]

There can be no excuse, no justification for this execrable wrong to Canadian ports and Canadian workers. The Dominion government by act of parliament, decreed in the N.T.R. Act:

"The through rate on traffic from the point of origin to the point of destination shall at no time be greater via Canadian ports than via United States ports." In his Halifax speech above referred to Colonel Phinney said:

"The railway built to carry this grain" (Colonel Phinney was referring to the National Transcontinental), "has cost us $330,000,000, and I say we should not sit down and do nothing about it while deficits pile up year after year, on a railway for which we have paid and are still paying, and which is not being operated.

"Isn't it better, for example, to lose a sum of money each year on the railway and have it in operation, than to lose the same sum and not have it in operation? The traffic this road could carry is going through American ports and over American railways, and I ask if it would not be better business to go over our own lines and through our own ports."

When the Canadian railways were caught in the act of transporting Russian pulp to American markets, which was directly competing with our own Canadian product, they offered the excuse that they needed the traffic, and yet here is a vast amount of home grown traffic slipping through their hands into American channels. To paraphrase the song, Do you call this Canadianism?

We believe that the majority of Canadians are whole heartedly behind the Canadian National railways. We all, or nearly all of us, have faith in it and believe that it will succeed."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRADETTE: I think hon. members should be more respectful. I have spoken very little this session and I submit I should be allowed to state the case for northern Ontario. Hon. members have spoken on behalf of the maritime provinces, and I intend to speak for northern Ontario. I may take a half hour more. The article continues.

But it must be operated for the benefit of the Canadian people. Here in the National Transcontinental line, we have a railroad designed and built to carry heavy trains with a minimum of motive power, a line over which western grain can be hauled to Atlantic ports cheaper than over any other line. In the name of common sense, why is this line not used for the purpose for which it was designed and built? Why is Canadian grown grain, which could be transported over this line cheaper than over any other line, diverted to American channels with the consequent loss to Canadian railways and to Canadian workers?

This matter is not just a local one. It affects Canada as a whole. When Canadian workers are deprived of earnings to the extent of over 38 millions of dollars in one year, it is the concern of all Canada. When traffic, which could be economically handled over a railway line built and paid for by the Canadian public, is diverted to foreign channels, the people of Canada have a right to ask why.

What are the railway heads going to do about this? What about our members of parliament?

From the discussion which has taken place to-day it would seem that the maritime provinces, the province of Quebec and northern Ontario are very much interested. To-day a condition exists along the Transcontinental railway from Quebec to Winnipeg wherein thousands of men who were working on the railroad for the last eighteen years have been thrown out of employment. When they read articles such as this disclosing the fact that fifty per cent of our grain production reaches American ports, dissatisfaction must arise in their minds. In my view it is only right and proper that the matter should be discussed on the floor of the House of Commons.

I said at the beginning of my remarks that I did not intend to discuss the matter from a political standpoint, but rather to bring it before the house merely as a condition which must be faced. I greatly appreciated the statements by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I feel sure he will do his utmost to arrive at a solution. I listened with equal interest to the remarks of the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said that the situation was both delicate and intricate. At the same time I maintain Canada should do all in its power to obtain its share of the through traffic.

At this point I should like to read a letter from the Telegraph-Journal and the Evening Times-Globe of St. John, New Brunswick. This letter is dated April 6, 1932 and is as follows:

Dear Sir:

The United States Department of Commerce recently announced that on the average 49 per cent or approximately one-half of Canada's wheat and flour export trade has been handled through United States ports during the last six years.

Practically no wheat has passed through eastern Canadian ports during the last winter season, and our information is that during the summer months almost the entire Canadian crop routed east went to Buffalo.

We beg to draw your attention to the enclosed editorial, published to-day in the Telegraph-Journal and the Evening Times-Globe and to urge upon you the gravity of this situation.

We feel that you, in your public capacity, can strike a blow for the people whom you represent in parliament by standing for the formulation of and strict adherence to a national transportation policy which will divert this valuable trade stream from foreign channels to Canadian railways and Canadian ports, and thus give much needed employment to thousands of Canadian citizens.

The people of Canada are being urged continuously to buy Canadian goods, and thereby employ Canadian labour. In our judgment, Canadian labour includes Canadian railway men and Canadian port workers as fully as it concerns itself with the employees of manufacturing plants.

We feel that men in public life can render no greater service to our country at the present time than by doing their utmost to correct this most unpatriotic and uneconomic condition of affairs.

Yours very truly,

F. X. Jennings,
Acting Editor-in-Chief.

This letter pictures the situation existing with regard to our national railways. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will do his utmost to have his department solve this problem, and, if that is not possible, then some other department, the Railway department for example, should, in my opinion, take steps to meet the situation, so that we shall receive justice in the maritime provinces and also in Ontario. I trust that we shall receive the quota of traffic to which we are entitled, and in that way the situation, which is becoming graver and graver, will be remedied.

I mentioned a short while ago that only yesterday I received a letter from a clergyman of Cochrane deploring the fact that even now, after having been in suspense for several months, employees of the Canadian National Railways who have been in their service fifteen and eighteen years are being laid off—carmen, trainmen, and various other men employed on the road. I repeat that if we were getting our fair share of freight transportation over the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec there would be no railroad unemployment in our section of the country. I sincerely hope that the government will find some solution for this problem. We talk of national policies in this country; a good deal is said about the "Canada first" policy. Well, I submit to the minister that this should be one of the first principles to apply to the railways and our harbour facilities, namely, that we should receive that fair quota of transportation to which we are entitled.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is the grain standards board considered to be under the control of the grain commission?

Mr. STEVENS: No. The grain standards board is organized under the provisions of the Canada Grain Act. The chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners is, I believe, by virtue of his office, chairman of the grain standards board, and of course the individuals who constitute the grain standards board are appointed under statute. They discharge their duties under powers and instructions laid down therein.

Mr. DONNELLY: This item shows a reduction of $331,000. Last year, as we all remember, there was a very small crop and the number of inspectors and graders would not be as large as in an ordinary year. How is the decrease accounted for this year? Does the government anticipate a smaller crop than last year's and fewer employees? In other words, what is the explanation of this reduction?

Mr. STEVENS: Included in last year's were the wheat bonus and a substantial portion, if not all, of the cost of the Stamp commission.

Mr. VALLANCE: Just administration?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do the employees working for the government under this act come under the ten per cent reduction the same as other employees?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: The members of the board too?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. McPHEE: In connection with the wheat bonus, will the minister say who printed the three million cheques?

Mr. STEVENS: Bulman Brothers, of Winnipeg.

Mr. McPHEE: Were tenders called for the printing of the cheques? If not, why not?

Mr. STEVENS: There was no time. The matter was urgent and was rushed by the Board of Grain Commissioners, upon whom was laid the very difficult and complex task which it involved. The board organized it, and, I think, organized it very well. They have handled some three million cheques during the season, up to the present time, for the matter is not yet completed. As I say, there was no time to be lost; a month or any long period could not have been allowed to elapse so as to call for tenders. Bulman Brothers are looked upon as very efficient printers, and in the judgment of the board they discharged this task in the best manner possible.

Mr. McPHEE: How much money was paid?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: The total paid to Bulman Brothers for the printing of the various forms was $40,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Did the board order these cheques?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Not the government?

Mr. STEVENS: No; the board did absolutely all the work. Instead of setting up a new organization we simply seconded the Board of Grain Commissioners in carrying on the work.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was there any political motive—

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly not.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Just a minute; the minister does not know yet what my question is going to be.

Mr. STEVENS: I know what is coming.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was there any political motive in having the Prime Minister's name printed in black on the cheques?

Mr. STEVENS: We all thought black was the most becoming colour instead of red for the Prime Minister's name. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there was no political motive in it at all. It was very well organized and the Prime Minister was concerned in it as Minister of Finance. If it were this year it would be the present Minister of Finance. The name was that of the minister who was responsible for the payment of the cheque.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the hon. gentleman think the present Minister of Finance would insist on having his name printed on the cheque?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think he could escape it.

Mr. TOTZKE: Was the $40,000 paid for the printing of cheques and forms included in the cost of administration?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister says that this decrease of $331,000 is due to the administration of the five cent bonus.

Mr. STEVENS: No, plus—

Mr. VALLANCE: I have in my hand the estimates of 1931-32—

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I said the Stamp commission, the five cent bonus and the ten per cent cut.

Mr. VALLANCE: That makes it worse, because I find that in the estimates of 1931-32, which was last year, we voted $2,681,000 and the year before, 1930-31, $2,884,049. There was no administration of the five cent bonus in that year, nor was there any Stamp commission, so there must have been some other reason for the decrease. There was a decrease last year, compared with the year before, of $203,048, and this year a decrease of $331,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I pointed out the other night that in addition to the cut in salaries and wages, and in addition to the two other items I have just mentioned, we have this year cut out construction work practically altogether. None is required, so far as we can see, and there is included no construction work, which accounts for a considerable sum. These are the four main reasons for the reduction, and as far as we possibly can we are insiting on every economy that can be at all secured.

Mr. VALLANCE: How many employees are under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and what salaries are paid?

Mr. STEVENS: The number of employees is about 930.

Mr. VALLANCE: Permanent?

Mr. STEVENS: The salaries for this year are estimated at $1,908,000 and the number of employees is 847, with the temporary employees varying from about 380 to 400.

Mr. VALLANCE: How many of those appointments come under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STEVENS: All but the temporary appointments.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister said it took $40,000 to print the literature in connection with the distribution of the five cent bonus. I should like to know what other matter was printed in addition to the cheques, if there was anything else, or whether this $40,000 was paid for the cheques only.

Mr. STEVENS: There were some other forms, receipts and so on. There were certain agencies through whom reports of deliveries of grain were made. Every licensed elevator, every warehouseman and so on—my hon. friend knows better than I do the type of person licensed under the Canada Grain Act—made reports of grain delivered to the Board of Grain Commissioners, and to each such licensed agent certain forms were supplied. All that printing, and a good deal of other printing, came out of the $40,000, which covered all the printing necessary to carry out the work.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it the usual practice in making payments by cheque to have the name of the Minister of Finance, or any other minister, on the cheque?

Mr. STEVENS: I suppose my hon. friend refers to departmental payments.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Or any other payments.

Mr. STEVENS: In the payment of ordinary government departmental accounts it is not customary, but I do not recall a parallel to this particular instance. These cheques were sent out to individual farmers all over the country; there had to be some authority indicated on the cheques, and no authority other than the Minister of Finance of this government could have been indicated.

Mr. GARDINER: That would be a guarantee of payment, would it not?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I understand that cheques issued by the Department of Finance are generally signed by the accountant and not by the minister himself. That is why I asked if there was any political significance in this case. Of course if the government are prepared to renew the bonus and to increase it in order to compensate the farmer for the very heavy burden being placed upon his shoulders by their arbitrary way of handling the tariff, the people might like to get another cheque signed by the Prime Minister so it could be framed. Is the minister in a position to tell us now if the government will continue the bonus for the crop year 1932-33?

Mr. STEVENS: First may I say that these cheques were not issued to be framed; they were issued to provide cash for the individuals receiving them.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Many farmers took photographs of those cheques just to get the name.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very glad of that, because undoubtedly it was a red letter day for the farmers. Of course any announcement of the decision of the government in connection with such matters as the bonus will have to be made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Just in case the members of the government have not come to a decision with regard to the bonus, I should like to make certain representations now to the government and to the minister himself, because I know he will deal with this matter in conference with his colleagues. If the government intend to grant the bonus for the crop year 1932-33, I would ask them to consider the barley grower. The minister is aware of the fact—and if he is not, the commissioner sitting in front of him can tell him—that in many districts in Manitoba we have gone into the production of barley, for economic reasons. My information, which I think is fairly accurate, is that fifty per cent of the barley produced in Canada is grown in Manitoba. Many farmers cannot successively grow wheat there because of rust, so if the government contemplate continuing the bonus I ask them to consider the barley grower, who is as much entitled to the bonus as the wheat grower.

May I make another suggestion to the minister. This morning I received a letter from home stating that eggs are being sold for five cents a dozen and butter is being almost given away. Would the minister take up with his colleagues the advisability of giving a bonus on eggs and butter in order to compensate the farmers for the excessive taxes imposed by the tariff?

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to ask the minister whether he contemplates establishing any more inspection points in the west. A number of men connected with the grain trade in Medicine Hat feel that they are operating at a great disadvantage because that is not an inspection point. They made strong representations to the chairman of the grain commission, and I was wondering if any progress has been made or if the question has been further considered.

Mr. STEVENS: Speaking for the government, of course with the advice of the Board of Grain Commissioners, I may say that the matter has been considered but it is not thought that further inspection points are desirable or necessary. There is Moose Jaw and Calgary, and I have no doubt my hon. friend has in mind Medicine Hat as well, in connection with which representations have been made, but it is not thought necessary to go to the additional expense of establishing other inspection points.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am rather curious about those cheques. I wonder if the minister will be kind enough to explain how they were prepared and by whose authority the printed signature of the Minister of Finance appeared on them. The minister knows as well as I do that in the ordinary departmental routine cheques are usually countersigned by the accountant and signed by the deputy minister or whatever other official has been given authority by order in council to sign them. There is no law authorizing a minister of the crown to sign a departmental or other cheque unless such authority has been given by order in council, so I would ask the minister if a special order in council was passed authorizing the Minister of Finance to sign those cheques. This is a most extraordinary procedure; really I do not understand it.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend will see the difference between this case and the ordinary signing of departmental cheques when I tell him these really were not cheques at all. They were certificates; on those certificates there had to appear some authority, and that was the authority of the Minister of Finance, who was proceeding under the act.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Was a special order in council passed authorizing that procedure?

Mr. STEVENS: No. I think not. The certificate was payable by the Dominion government, but by arrangement, the certificates were recognized and paid by the banks.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I think the minister will admit that the ordinary procedure in such a case would have been to have the cheques signed by the deputy minister and not by the minister. It is the most extraordinary thing I have ever heard of, and I have had a certain amount of experience in these matters. It is stated that these were certificates and not cheques, but they were cheques to the extent that they could be exchanged, and unless a special order in council was passed authorizing the Minister of Finance to take such action they should have been signed by the deputy minister.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the revenue and expenditure last year in connection with government elevators?

Mr. STEVENS: For the crop year 1930-31 the receipts were $949,409, the expenditures $425,441, leaving a surplus of $523,968.

Mr. GARDINER: How many additional inspectors have been employed because of the amendments to the act?

Mr. STEVENS: At the time the act was amended it was thought that quite a number of new inspectors would be required, but I think it will be recalled that we reported last year that up to that time—this is now confirmed by our experience of the past year—practically no more inspectors would be necessary. It will be recalled that additional services were included in the amendment such as the registration and supervision of binning, the settlement of claims and the appointment of an assistant commissioner. These are the new services rendered but no additional inspectors have been required.

Mr. GARDINER: With the exception of the assistant commissioner?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Was there any increase in the staff because of the inspection of binning?

Mr. STEVENS: No additional staff was required, it was a sort of adjustment of the duties of the existing staff.

Mr. GARDINER: There will be no extra expense attached to the new provisions with regard to inspection?

Mr. STEVENS: Not as regards inspection in the ordinary sense.

Mr. GARDINER: How much wheat was handled at the terminals at Prescott and Kingston, and are these elevators under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. STEVENS: The elevator at Prescott is under the Department of Railways, and I understand the one at Kingston is controlled by the Canada Steamships line.

Mr. GARDINER: That would come under the control of the board?

Mr. STEVENS: It is licensed as a public elevator.

Mr. McPHEE: Reverting to the $40,000 paid by the government as a political favour to the firm in Winnipeg for the printing of these cheques; this matter becomes more colossal on referring to item 294 at page 64 of the estimates. This is an item under trade and commerce and covers printing of parliament and departmental publications, including the Canada Year Book, and the amount is $126,750. Forty thousand dollars of the taxpayers' money has been paid to this firm in Winnipeg without a tender being called for. Without delaying this item too long, I should like the minister to tell the committee on whose authority Bulman Brothers were asked to print these cheques, I should also like to know what other printing is included in this amount, and what the cost was for the cheques alone.

Mr. STEVENS: Any suspicions which my hon. friend has of political favouritism are not well founded. This is precisely what happened. When the act was finally passed and the house rose about the first week in August, it was necessary that some organization should be rapidly got together to deal with this situation. After consideration the government decided to impose this duty upon the Board of Grain Commissioners. The task was assigned to them, and they accepted with one consideration, that they should be given carte blanche in administration and as to where and how they were to get the supplies required. They were given carte blanche, no one dictated to them, and I am informed by the chairman of the board that this printing was given to Bulman Brothers on his own initiative because he considered them to be the firm who could give the best service in the shortest time in connection with an important order which had to be gotten out as quickly as possible.

I say quite gladly to my hon. friend that the organizing of the staff to handle this task and the manner in which it has been carried out during the past year is a credit to the staff and to the Board of Grain Commissioners. As far as I am concerned, I take no credit either to myself or to my department; we had nothing to do with it. Everything has run so smoothly that up to date I do not think there has been one complaint. The Board of Grain Commissioners handled everything; no questions were asked until they produced their account. I think the whole thing was wisely and economically done.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Did the suggestion that the name of the Prime Minister should appear on these cheques come from the genial chairman of the board?

Mr. STEVENS: It was a certificate from the government of Canada to the farmer and it had to bear some recognized signature which would be accepted by the banks. The name of the Minister of Finance was decided upon, and I have no hesitancy in saying that it was the proper thing to do.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I never heard of a bank accepting a printed signature on a cheque.

Mr. STEVENS: The cheque was countersigned by the authority by whom it was issued.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has the minister one of those cheques available?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I have not.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I should like to see one.

Mr. STEVENS: I imagine I could have one photographed for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I should like to have one so that I could frame it and show it through my constituency. The electors would then have the Prime Minister's name in front of them for the rest of their lives and could think of the promises he made in 1930.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not mind having a limited number framed for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Have the amounts filled in and let the Prime Minister sign them.

Mr. LUCAS: Does the minister know of any farmer refusing to accept one of the cheques?

Mr. STEVENS: We have no evidence to that effect.

Mr. REID: Is the grain for export through Vancouver tested for moisture? I have in mind certain instances where disputes have arisen as to the moisture content.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not uncommon to have disputes arise, and at times reinspection of grain is made at Vancouver. These inspections are made according to law and precisely the same as they are made at all other inspection points.

Mr. REID: Is the grain tested for moisture?

Mr. STEVENS: Most certainly.

Mr. DONNELLY: I noticed an article in the press this morning giving the quantity of wheat that was going to be in store next August. How much wheat is there in store at the present time as compared with last year? Is it more or about the same?

Mr. STEVENS: A day or two ago I had a statement up to date, but I am sorry I do not have it under my hand. I think what my hon. friend refers to was a statement published recently by the Bureau of Statistics based upon the regular monthly reports of all elevators, and so forth. Speaking from memory, I think the quantity in store is around 230,000,000 bushels, which is materially less than it was at the same time a year ago.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is the minister referring to Canada alone, or to the world?

Mr. STEVENS: I am referring to Canada.

Mr. DONNELLY: In Canada alone what is the carry-over of wheat from last year?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: The chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners tells me the quantity at the present time is around 186,000,000 bushels.

Mr. DONNELLY: What was it at this time last year?

Mr. STEVENS: Some figure not far from that, I believe.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is just the point I am referring to. I saw an article in the Ottawa Journal, I think it was, stating that on August 1 or September 1 of this year we were going to have a very small carry-over. We were told the same thing last year, but when September 1 came, we found it was more than before. This year, although we have had only half a crop in Canada, we have not been able to get rid of it because there was a bigger carry-over than there was the previous year. I should like to know the prospect of having a small carry-over this year. As regards all these guesses, there seems to be something we know nothing about looming up on the horizon. Last fall the Minister of Agriculture ran short of political fodder, or whatever you choose to call it, so he went down to the maritimes and told them the price of grain would be eighty cents a bushel and all our troubles would be over. I am sorry, however, to say that it never reached eighty cents a bushel. On that occasion he was simply prophesying; he must have been short of political ammunition. I suppose in a few days the Minister of Mines will go somewhere else and tell the people what Noranda or some of the other copper mines will do. My hon. friends opposite are a little short of political ammunition when they start prophesying what the market, particularly the grain market, will do. My experience of prophesying about the grain market is that it is a dangerous thing to do. I expected last fall would be a sucker market and it proved to be so, to catch those who wanted to try, to make some more money.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was that your experience?

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes. What is the duty at present against our wheat in Germany, France and Italy?

Mr. STEVENS: I have to speak from memory and I am afraid I shall take some chances in doing so. The duty in European countries fluctuates quite frequently. The German duty is, I think—and I speak with some hesitation—around a dollar a bushel. It is very high. I believe the highest rate is $1.50, and we get the secondary rate, which is a dollar a bushel. The French duty is something less than that, but I am afraid I cannot give it offhand.

Mr. VALLANCE: If we bear in mind that during the war the western Canadian wheat grower was the only individual in Canada the price of whose product was controlled—and it was controlled to allow the allies to buy the wheat at a much cheaper rate than that at which they otherwise could have bought it—has any effort been made by the government to break down that barrier against Canadian wheat entering those countries?

Mr. STEVENS: We are continuously making efforts, but I would invite hon. members' attention to the fact that in the last five years, or possibly a little longer, there has grown up in Europe an entirely new attitude toward imported wheat. The quota system has for its object definitely and distinctly the promotion of an increase in production of wheat in countries such as France, Germany, Spain, Italy, and one or two others. Eastward from that you get into the exporting countries, but the chief importing nations have imposed a definite and effective quota system with the deliberate intention of increasing the production of wheat in their own territory. The rates of duty are very high and the result has been to increase the production of wheat in those areas and also of rye in some places. But we have been constantly in touch with the situation, and are doing everything possible to increase the sale of our wheat.

Mr. VALLANCE: Have there been any results?

Mr. STEVENS: I think so.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Did I understand the minister to say there was a surplus of $500,000 in the operation of the Grain Act?

Mr. STEVENS: The elevators.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do I understand the farmers pay all the cost of the operation of the Grain Act?

Mr. STEVENS: No, there was a deficit in the last two years.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it very large?

Mr. STEVENS: In 1930-31 there was a net deficit of $241,149.

Mr. YOUNG: Last year the government gave a guarantee of a minimum price of wheat. Has the minister any statement to make to the committee as to how the government stands now as a result of that guarantee?

Mr. STEVENS: There was no government guarantee of the price of wheat. My hon. friend is perhaps giving a wrong impression.

Mr. YOUNG: We had the impression the government guaranteed the price would not fall below a certain point. Did it not do so?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is thinking of the arrangement with the pools. The government stood behind the pools so that in the absence of the pools' assets, which, as my hon. friend knows, were tied up by the indebtedness of the pools to the three prairie provinces, the banks could make the usual advances, but there was no guarantee by the government of the price of wheat. I believe the government's action enabled the pools to pay a larger fixed or initial price than otherwise would have been possible. If it had not been for the assistance rendered by the government to the banks, the pools would not have been able to pay an initial price at all.

Mr. YOUNG: As I understand the matter, the government's action enabled the pools to pay a certain initial price. As a result of the guarantee that the banks would not lose anything by allowing the pools to pay that price, what is the government's position to-day in that regard?

Mr. STEVENS: Financially?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Not a cent has been called for from the government.

Mr. YOUNG: Is there any possibility of its being called upon to pay anything?

Mr. STEVENS: No. The result was very satisfactory.

Mr. DONNELLY: Last year the agriculture committee asked certain witnesses to come down from Winnipeg and testify, one of whom was Mr. James Richardson, of James Richardson & Sons, Winnipeg, who testified that unless the government or some individual got under the grain prices and propped them up—that was his expression, I think—prices were liable to fall to a very low level during the month of October when the grain was coming on the market. He advised that the government either do it itself or authorize someone else to put a prop under the market. Were any government funds used for that purpose, or was anyone authorized by the government to put a prop under the grain prices? Was anything done to hold up the prices in the grain market last year?

Mr. STEVENS: Of course I am not responsible for anything Mr. Richardson may have said before the agriculture committee, and I do not know just what he had in mind. The only prop the government put under grain prices was the one to which we have just referred, that is assisting the pools in the financing of their portion of the crop. There is this point, however, to bear in mind, that during the past year grain prices have oscillated less than normally; they have been on a fairly even keel. Prices have been low, it is true, but they have not largely fluctuated. So what Mr. Richardson predicted did not occur.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is common street talk all over western Canada that the pool, or the officials of the pool with governmental money, have sustained the market at the present level. I do not know if there is anything in that, and it was to try to get that information from the minister that I asked the question.

Mr. STEVENS: Unquestionably if it had not been for the action of the government in the crop year before this, and in the past crop year, there would have been serious difficulties for the pool, for the selling agency which sold for all three pools in the previous crop year, and last year for the three separate pools. It will be recalled that Mr. John McFarland was called in and took charge of the selling agency of the pool, as it was called, and it was through his efforts in wisely administering a very difficult task that that particular job was successfully carried through. Last year, as I say, it was done through the separate pools, and the action of the government undoubtedly steadied the thing down. Had we not done what we did, that is, given our guarantee to the banks, what would have happened is this: The pools, being without assets—their assets having been hypothecated against the indebtedness of the previous years—would have been unable to make the initial payment, in which case the members of the pool would have probably sold their wheat wherever they could have done so, and a condition of panic might have ensued. But through the cooperation and coordinated effort of the government, the banks and the pools themselves, the whole market was held steady.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of the fact that the government guaranteed the banks against loss from the pool on the understanding that John I. McFarland take over the managership of that selling agency—am I correct in that statement?

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think we can say that.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Prime Minister said so.

Mr. STEVENS: No. My hon. friend is leaving the impression that the government dictated that Mr. McFarland be the manager. I am not in a position to confirm my hon. friend's statement in that regard. I shall not contradict him, but I should not like to agree that he is quite correct.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister will not contradict the statement. Has the government any knowledge of John I. McFarland buying wheat, and to what extent he to-day holds future wheat?

Mr. STEVENS: I have no knowledge of that at all, and, so far as I know, no member of the government has any knowledge of Mr. McFarland's activities in that regard.

Mr. YOUNG: If he did that, could he do it without the government's knowledge?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes. If he is able to finance it, he could do as he liked in that respect.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Prime Minister while acting as Minister of Finance last year claimed that because of the guarantee given by the government to the banks, they maintained the price for wheat. I contended at the time that to argue that way was to claim credit for steadying the world's market; for he spoke not only of the Canadian market but of steadying the world's market. At least he said that those in the grain trade acknowledged that his actions had brought about that result. There is a strong suspicion throughout western Canada that there is a large volume of grain being held, and I would ask the minister to find out if that is true. If it is not true it should be stated accordingly, because it is strongly rumoured that John I. McFarland is to-day holding large volumes of wheat, speculating in futures, with the Canadian people's money.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no, I must hasten to correct that.

Mr. VALLANCE: The banks have guarantees against it.

Mr. STEVENS: For a statement of that kind to go out unadorned would be very damaging, and I know that my hon. friend would not wish to do either the wheat market or Mr. McFarland or anyone else an injury.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is why I wanted the question cleared up.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. John McFarland, of course, is independent of parliament and of the government. He is a gentleman of means, a gentleman with knowledge of the wheat business, and if he has bought wheat on his own account that is his own business. In regard to the pool, Mr. McFarland has served the pool, so I am informed, without salary, as a matter of public service, and I am advised by those who are in a position to know, that it has been a service that is highly appreciated by all. I think we should pay a tribute to Mr. McFarland for the service that he has rendered in that respect.

As far as the government is concerned, I have already stated clearly what it has done. In the year 1930-31, the government stepped in and gave certain guarantees, but behind the government's guarantee was the assets of the pool, the elevators and so forth. The exact figures I cannot recall, but my hon. friends no doubt know them. As far as that guarantee is concerned, I understand that there will be no losses at all. I think it is practically cleared up now as far as any danger of loss is concerned. This year the three pools were confronted with the task of carrying on their business without assets, the assets having been hypothecated to the three provincial governments on the prairies. We again stepped in during the current crop year and guaranteed the pools to the banks so that the banks would advance the pools enough money to make an initial payment. That really meant working capital for the pools. It enabled the pools to discharge that duty and undoubtedly held the market steady in both years, and I confess that I can see no possible ground for criticism of the government in that respect. To the extent that it held the Canadian market steady in the face of the rather strange actions of the farm board south of the line, it contributed to the steadying of the world market.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How can my hon. friend say that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The world market—oh, oh!

Mr. STEVENS: Why should my hon. friends object to that statement? I say that to the extent that Canadian wheat influences the world market, and it certainly does influence it—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a different statement.

Mr. STEVENS: To the extent that Canadian wheat influences the world market, the government's action contributed indirectly to the steadying of the world market.

Mr. VALLANCE: Can the minister tell us what percentage of the total world market Canada's exportable wheat represents?

Mr. STEVENS: Of course it varies from year to year, but roughly speaking one would say from twenty-five per cent to thirty per cent.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would the minister mind asking the chairman of the grain commission?

Mr. STEVENS: He tells me that that is his information.

Mr. DONNELLY: I gather from what the minister has said that Mr. McFarland must be speculating, because he has said the pool this year has steadied the market. How can the pool steady the market? This year the pools have been buying grain the same as any other companies, and when they bring their wheat in they sell it and hedge their "buys" or "solds" each day. When they hold out they are speculating. In a line company doing legitimate business what they buy to-day they sell to-morrow. If Mr. McFarland is doing otherwise he is speculating in and holding wheat. That is what I have been asking the minister. I have been inquiring whether Mr. McFarland has been speculating in or holding wheat, and the minister seems to think he has steadied the market.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is not putting a fair construction on my observation. I make no statement concerning, and I have before me no knowledge of, the exact actions of the pool. It must be borne in mind that this year the three pools are each carrying on their own business, operating separately. They receive wheat, and undoubtedly in the usual way they hedge on the market. They do their business in a normal way; just how much they have bought or sold I cannot tell my hon. friend. Where the government came into the matter, however—and I have said this three times; I trust my language is not obscure—the government simply guaranteed the banks against loss on the pool's initial payment to the farmers on the purchase of grain.

Mr. DONNELLY: We understand that quite well. The pools this year are handling very little of the wheat as it is pooled. The greater portion of the wheat is handled by the pools in the ordinary manner, just the same as it would be handled by any other grain company. The minister now tells me that each of the pools in western Canada is carrying on in the normal way, or is handling its own business. If each pool is selling its own grain I should like to know what Mr. McFarland is doing. What is his business?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. McFarland is the manager or the one in charge of the central selling agency of the pools, handling the wheat for the crop year 1930-31.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Of all the pools?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. But for the crop year 1931-32 the three pools are operating separately, and are not under the control of a central selling agency.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, I have not the reference before me, but speaking from memory, and of course subject to correction, may I say that in the Financial Post of last week the statement appeared that when Mr. McFarland undertook to sell the 1930-31 crop he at the same time bought futures against it, and that as a result of his activities the government to-day is holding millions of bushels of future wheat which it cannot get rid of, except at a loss, until the price goes up.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not know of a bushel of wheat held by the government, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister find out?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, certainly. I am quite certain, however, that there is no such condition as that outlined by my hon. friend.

Mr. DONNELLY: Did I understand the minister to say that Mr. McFarland has nothing to do with the pools this year?

Mr. STEVENS: That is my understanding. He was the head of the selling agency when it acted for all the pools; I am speaking of the crop year 1930-31. In connection with the crop year 1931-32 the three pools are operating apart from the selling agency.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Without guarantees from the government?

Mr. STEVENS: There is a guarantee to the banks this year for the three pools.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If that is so, may I ask the minister if Mr. McFarland has anything to do with the control of the selling?

Mr. STEVENS: As far as I know, he has not.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No control whatever. The government have given unconditional guarantees to the banks for the operation of the three pools.

Mr. STEVENS: No; my hon. friend is not fair. He has put in my mouth words I did not use.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What other construction can we place upon the minister's words?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has said that the government has given an unconditional guarantee; that is not so. The guarantee is subject to the presence of the wheat as security, and an initial payment. In other words the ordinary bank line of credit is extended to the pools, which were without working capital and could not have functioned if the government had not taken action. The government has simply guaranteed to the banks a line of credit to the pools, so that the pools may function in the ordinary way. The banks naturally take the security of the wheat against the advances they make. The margin of safety has been around 32 cents or 33 cents of the market price, whatever it is.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then Mr. McFarland is not officially acting for the pools or the government on this year's sales?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I do not think so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And the government has guaranteed each individua. pool to the extent of the initial payment on the wheat; that is, they have guaranteed accounts.

Mr. STEVENS: What is required to make that payment by the banks.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think we are at cross purposes. In the past crop year the pool permitted all contract signers who so chose to disregard their contracts.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite true.

Mr. VALLANCE: So that to-day John I. McFarland is not operating the central selling agency. Immediately after the imperial conference of 1930, and after the return of John I. McFarland, he assumed the responsibility as manager of the selling agency. He took that responsibility on two understandings: First of all, he was to receive no salary, to which arrangement we quite readily agreed, and secondly, he was to be given a free hand as to the method by which he was to dispose of the wheat. His first act was to close all the European sales agencies. Then because of the fact that the pools disregarded the contracts or allowed the contract signers to disregard them, a very small percentage of wheat found a market through the pools. Probably in all there were only a few million bushels; in fact I think less than 10,000,000 bushels were marketed by the pooling system. Did the government guarantee to the individual pools that amount of wheat at 35 cents a bushel?

Mr. STEVENS: During the crop year 1931-32?

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister tell us how much of the 1930-31 crop owned by the pool is still in the hands of Mr. McFarland, when we may expect it will be sold, and when Mr. McFarland will be allowed to discharge the office he holds at the present time?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend and all hon. members who have participated in this discussion will please recognize the fact that we are not in any sense in control of the pools, and such answers as I have given are given to the best of my information and without precise knowledge. I am told that there is not much of the 1930-31 crop left in the hands of the selling agency. My hon. friend will have to accept that statement for what it is worth as I have no exact information in connection with it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On whose say so were the wheat producers subdivided into three separate units or pools?

Mr. STEVENS: On their own say so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think not. That action was very much against their desire.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly it was not upon the government's say so, or through the action of the government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It must have been either through Mr. McFarland or the government. Here is what happened: The hon. member for South Battleford indicated that Mr. McFarland, since getting into the saddle, had closed all the sales agencies in Europe and England. The next step was to disintegrate the pool so that it would no longer be one unit. I understood before, as I gather from the minister now, that Mr. McFarland is still selling the overage as general manager of the old central wheat agency, but the three prairie provinces have three distinct pools now handling this year's crop. What I should like to know is, who worked out that policy against the wishes of the farmers of the west? Someone did.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly not the government; it certainly had nothing to do with the government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, who did it?

Mr. STEVENS: I tried some time ago to indicate the processes which operated to bring about this result. In the 1930-31 period the pools found themselves in difficulties, and the guarantees of the three prairie provinces, on behalf of the three pools, came due and had to be faced, with the result that the assets of the three pools, three distinct organizations, were placed under the control of the three provinces. I do not mean to say they were turned over to them, but were hypothecated for the security of those provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Pledged.

Mr. STEVENS: When the 1931-32 crop came on the market, these assets having been hypothecated against the losses of the past—that goes back to the 1929-30 crop—the pools had nothing to offer to the banks as security for working capital, and then this government stepped in and gave its guarantees to the banks to enable the three pools to function. As to who withdrew the pools from the central selling agency, I have no idea; at any rate it was due to no action on the part of this government.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Whoever may be responsible, they are pretty well divided up now, so that there is not a chance in nearly a lifetime for them to get together and operate as they were doing before. Through Mr. McFarland or someone else, the organization is nicely carved up into units so as to render them incapable of proper action and functioning. I want now some information in regard to the Stamp commission's report. Last year I put on the order paper three or four questions and inadvertently one of them was not answered. I inquired who or what body asked for a royal commission, known later on as the Stamp commission. Has my hon. friend any information on that subject? What body or individual asked the government to appoint a royal commission to decide on what effect the selling of grain futures had on the producers of the country?

Mr. STEVENS: I am under the impression that it arose out of discussions in the house or in the committee on agriculture, but I am not in a position now to inform my hon. friend from memory just who asked for it, or whether any request was made for it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I assure the hon. gentleman it did not arise out of the committee on agriculture but out of something quite different. Surely the government should know exactly why the commission was appointed. Usually someone asks for a commission but I have never been able to get an answer to that question. If my hon. friend cannot answer the question I will not press it. The primary object of the commission, so far as we know externally at any rate, was to find out whether the trading in grain futures was inimical to the interests of the producer. That is right, I think. The other night, when my hon. friend's estimates were under consideration, I asked him whether he intended to appoint the supervisor recommended by the Stamp commission to see that everything was done on the up and up around the grain exchange. We both agreed that there was not very much urgency for it just now. Is that right? The government, I understood, had not finally disposed of the question but at any rate had not appointed any supervisor, and they did not think they were likely to. Did I understand my hon. friend rightly?

Mr. STEVENS: In regard to the supervisor, the question is referred to, at page 61 of the report, as a more or less tentative suggestion. I do not think it is what one would consider a primary recommendation from the commission. That appears at page 61. The commission indicate that it was suggested that possibly an official might be appointed to whom dissatisfied private producers or those selling wheat on the grain exchange could appeal and present their grievances, and such an official would be in a position to bring the matter privately to the attention of the officers of the grain exchange and make explanations to the dissatisfied party. I confess, speaking for myself, after what consideration I have given to the matter, that I do not think such an officer would be of any great value. I have an open mind on the question however, and if there are any representations to be made I shall be glad to take them into consideration. But my conclusion is that, in the first place, Sir Josiah Stamp and his colleagues did not press that matter; and in the second place, on examination, I see no great use for it. So that no action has been taken.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The other recommendation was that the selling of grain futures could not be very well dispensed with in the world of to-day, having regard to the manner in which world business is conducted generally. As a matter of fact, selling in futures applies to many things besides grain Summed up, this is what it amounts to. The first recommendation was not carried out, and I do not think there is much loss in that regard, though it may be done at any time. I do not think any of the farming community are asking that it be done at this time, at all events, because someone would have to carry the expense of the appointment. The other recommendation, in regard to grain futures, must have been known to the government, because they had the information in their possession prior to the appointment of the commission. I have here the report of the Turgeon grain commission, appointed back in 1923—I believe it ran on into the following year as well. While that commission was not appointed especially to deal with this question, it was incidentally inquired into; I mean the question of grain futures. These are some of their conclusions:

> The conclusions drawn from this survey of futures trading and a future market are:—
> (1) That a futures market permits hedging and that hedging by dividing and eliminating risks in price variations reduces the spread between the prices paid to the farmer for his product and those obtained for it upon the ultimate market.
> (2) That hedging facilitates the extension of credit and thereby reduces the cost of handling grain by making it possible for grain dealers to operate on less capital than would be the case otherwise.
> (3) That for the same reason hedging makes a larger degree of competition possible in the grain trade, on a given amount of capital.

There are twelve conclusions, of which I have read the first three. So that the Turgeon commission's report was then in the hands of the government, and it indicated that the selling of futures was not inimical to the interests of producers or anyone else, but was indispensable in doing business under present day conditions. Now this government appoints a commission at a cost of about $10,000 to find out what nearly everyone already knows. That is the way they are blowing themselves, and then skinning the civil servants on their salaries in order to try to make up for it and balance the budget. I should like to know, then, the net benefit of this commission to the country, when their one tentative recommendation had not been carried out, though I think that was the right thing to do for the present. The other recommendation or finding was the same as that already made by the Turgeon commission, so what good purpose has been served?

Mr. STEVENS: Without doubt there was a considerable body of public opinion in the west that was suspicious of the system of futures in connection with the grain exchange, and I think the very thorough examination by the Stamp commission completely dispelled that suspicion from the minds of the producers. So far as I have been able to learn, there has been no agitation on that subject since this report was made, and I think the expenditure of the comparatively small amount for this work was money well spent, since it stabilized the general system of marketing western Canadian grain.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not want to discourage my hon. friend in what he thinks this report has accomplished, but I can tell him that instead of allaying suspicion it has aroused it. This report is the joke of the west; it is as dead as the dodo, as far as its effect is concerned in the manner suggested by the minister.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a contribution, in these blue times.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend should make a contribution to justify the appointment of the Stamp commission and the printing of this report. As a matter of fact this must have been done for some other purpose altogether; that famous appendix, that was one too many, is believed by many people to have been really what was in the mind of the government. When we consider that the pool has been demobilized, as I have described it, and then has had the harpoon shot into it by this appendix which was taken out when it was too late, and after the damage was done, it is not a very creditable record for the government, especially in their attitude towards cooperative organizations. My hon. friend should dispel this notion, because the impression in the west is that the government is not very friendly to any kind of cooperative organization. I hope that impression is not correct but in any case, wittingly or unwittingly, the government has given the wheat pool a jab in the back which they did not like very well. They were pretty well staggered before that, and it was a badly calculated attack if that was its object. If that was not the object, this commission had no purpose at all except to blow in $10,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite certain that hon. members representing western Canada who are acquainted with the great difficulties with which the pools have been confronted in the last two or three years will not join in the sentiments expressed by my hon. friend. I am always willing to give him a pretty wide latitude, but I must characterize the utterances to which he has just given expression as not only without foundation in fact but as gravely misleading to anyone who may read them. The government of the day, during last year and the present year, have rendered invaluable assistance and support to the pools, which could not have functioned without that support. The only ground for censure that might exist is that the government did guarantee the pools in both those years. We gave that guarantee because we felt it to be of great importance to this country that the pools should not be allowed to collapse. Whatever could be done was done gladly and freely and without any expectation of compensation of any kind. We took the risk, but fortunately because of the good management of these concerns during the last two years by Mr. McFarland and those associated with him, there has been no loss. I do think it unworthy of my hon. friend to suggest that the government has been an enemy of the pools. The pools have had no better friend in the last two years than the federal government. We have claimed no particular credit for it; we are not claiming any credit, but I am bound to defend the action of the government in this respect.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was not saying anything about the guarantee, but my hon. friend finds it convenient to slide out of it in that way. We were talking about the Stamp commission and why it was appointed. I can tell my hon. friend that a newspaper despatch appeared in both east and west when the government was considering the advisability of appointing this commission, and that despatch outlined almost exactly the procedure that was subsequently followed. That despatch described what was going to be done to the pool and who was going to be found in the wrong, and it turned out as prognosticated as per Appendix XII. It worked out exactly as it was described in the newspapers even before Sir Josiah Stamp had accepted the invitation to come over here. Explain it how you will; there it is. No good purpose has been served, and if the government did not know about the Turgeon report they should have known it. So they will have to have some different explanation than can be given by talking about some other subject which we are not discussing at the moment, in order to convince the country that they had any friendly purpose towards the pool when the Stamp commission was appointed.

Just one other matter and I will be through. During the session following my hon. friend's return from France in 1930 he gave an account of his experience overseas and said that the visit of the Prime Minister to Paris had a very beneficial effect in the amount of wheat sold to France that year. I said I didn't think that had anything to do with it; if by going to Paris with his colleague the Solicitor General for a little visit the Prime Minister sold more wheat, he should have gone sooner and oftener and stayed longer.

As a matter of fact here is what happened: France had been using a certain percentage of foreign wheat. That percentage was steadily increased until now she is using about forty per cent of foreign wheat, and according to the press Italy is using nearly sixty per cent of foreign wheat. They are adjusting their quotas to suit their own requirements, and through that adjustment they are taking more foreign wheat now than they have taken for many years. Naturally we are getting some of that trade.

I wonder if my hon. friend still claims, now that the Prime Minister of Canada has given notice to France that the treaty is to be abrogated in a few months, that France and Italy and other countries are buying more of our wheat because of the visits of the Prime Minister to Paris or because of anything the minister has done through the threatened abrogation of the treaties. I would like to know what my hon. friend thinks about it now, whether he still thinks these things can be done by just running down to Paris and later giving notice that the treaty is to be abrogated. Is France buying wheat because she has a fear that we will do something worse, or is she thinking about us at all or about any one other than her own people and their present bread requirements?

Mr. STEVENS: The Dominion government is at all times and under all circumstances doing its best to market Canadian wheat in foreign countries. I have already explained in considerable detail the system of quotas now in vogue and I do not think any good purpose would be served by my expressing again the opinions which I expressed last year.

Mr. VALLANCE: Some prominent Canadians gave evidence before the Stamp commission. I should like to know if it is possible for any member of this committee to obtain a copy of the evidence of any particular witness who appeared before that commission.

Mr. STEVENS: As far as I know, the evidence is in the possession of the house.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is the report based on the evidence.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. STEVENS: I think the evidence itself is in the custody of the clerk. As far as I know I have not a copy in my department, but there is no doubt in my mind that my hon. friend could see the evidence at any time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not catch quite clearly what the minister said in reply to my last question, but I understand now that he does not desire to repeat what he said a year ago. I can quite understand his not wanting to do that, because what he said at that time was absolute nonsense and was better not repeated.

Mr. YOUNG: The newspaper article to which I referred a few moments ago is to be found in the Financial Post of April 9 on pages 1 and 2. I will send it over to the minister.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I hope the minister has not definitely closed his mind to the recommendation of the Stamp commission as to the appointment of a supervisor or some such officer to supervise the operations of the grain exchange. The fact that the report mentions that there is a certain amount of suspicion to be attached to future trading is sufficient evidence that such an officer might properly be appointed. Speaking a few moments ago about the export of grain from this country, the minister said that there had been a change of attitude on the part of the importing countries; I hope he did not mean that that applied to Canada alone.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no. I referred to the attitude of European countries which were operating under quota systems in the interest of their own producers and, of course, against all exporting countries.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Not against Canada alone?

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I should like to know the attitude of the government with respect to the wheat pool, and latterly with respect to the three provincial organizations. Mr. McFarland has had nothing to do this year with the operations of the provincial organization; they are operating simply as grain handling propositions. As I understand it, the only part taken by the government is to back the notes at the banks. I am glad to say that quite a considerable amount of grain has been voluntarily pooled. A few days ago I noticed in the press that an instant payment of ten cents per bushel had been made on the grain pooled this year, and I should like to know if the consent of the government was required before that money was paid out?

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid I cannot answer that question, but my impression is that it was not.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The information has been given that there is not likely to be any loss with regard to pool operations so far as Mr. McFarland is concerned, and I should like to have some information in this connection. Under the operations of the pool, and prior to Mr. McFarland coming into it, although involving crops he handled, durum wheat was purchased with an initial payment of six or eight cents per bushel under Manitoba No. 1 northern. This wheat was all sold at a price above that received for Manitoba No. 1; in other words, the price of durum wheat went up considerably while the price of the other wheat fell. The result is that there is now coming to the growers of durum wheat in the province of Manitoba some $500,000, and when the statement is made that there is to be no loss in the operations of the pool, these growers are naturally concerned. A delegation waited upon the government a year ago at which time there was discussed the spreads between the different crops. I do not know whether the minister is in position to state that an effort will be made to straighten out this matter in order that these growers, largely in southern Manitoba and the Red River district, may receive this $500,000, which is no small item to a certain class of growers. If the minister is not in position to give this information to the committee, I hope he will look into the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I shall certainly look into the matter, but I would have to state that this comes within the purview of the pool itself. I shall check the matter over carefully and give my hon. friend any information I obtain at some later date.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The item is really under the control of the government.

Mr. DONNELLY: The government announced last year that 2,000,000 bushels of wheat would be purchased to be ground into flour. I should like to know if this wheat was purchased through the department or through the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. STEVENS: That purchase was in connection in part with the government of Saskatchewan and in part with the governments of the other two western provinces. It was for relief for the dried-out areas, which was carried on by the relief commission.

Mr. DONNELLY: The department had nothing whatever to do with it?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Item agreed to.

National Research Council, $410,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice there is a decrease of $90,000 in this item, and I should like to know how the minister intends to effect this saving.

Mr. STEVENS: The National Research Council is an important body and I have taken a tremendous amount of interest in it ever since 1916. I agree that as far as possible parliament should be generous with regard to this vote. This year, however, we felt we were warranted in curtailing the expenditure. Savings will be made in reduction of salaries and in fewer payments in connection with special grants for research work to young students and others throughout the country. We are carrying on any research work which is under way at the present time. For instance, some of the work extends for a period of two, three or four years, and that is being carried on, but we are limiting the amount of new work started.

Mr. BROWN: Does the research laboratory at Winnipeg come under this item?

Mr. STEVENS: No, that is under the grain commission.

Item agreed to.

Motion Picture Bureau, $45,000.

Mr. POWER: Is it the practice of the department to make motion pictures or to buy them?

Mr. STEVENS: Make them.

Mr. POWER: Does the department buy any motion pictures, any made films?

Mr. STEVENS: On rare occasions some that are of particular value or use may be acquired, but the department does not make a general practice of buying motion pictures.

Mr. POWER: Have any been purchased during the last year?

Mr. STEVENS: One might be said to have been bought. That is, a separate company, not the officers of the department, took a picture in connection with salmon fisheries.

This turned out to be a very valuable and useful picture which was shown abroad. It was one of those purchased and, I think, the only one purchased during the year.

Mr. POWER: Was a picture called "One Family" purchased in England?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. That was purchased a year and a half ago.

Mr. POWER: Just what was that picture? How much was paid for it? From whom was it purchased?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not under my hand the exact data in regard to that. I think, speaking from memory, it was something in the neighbourhood of $10,000 or $12,000.

Mr. POWER: What was the subject matter of the picture?

Mr. STEVENS: It was a picture of childhood life in Great Britain, more or less of a patriotic character.

Mr. POWER: Was it a picture called "The End of the Road"?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it was more the beginning of the road, because it portrayed young life.

Mr. POWER: It was entitled "One Family," was it not?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is it not a fact that this picture was prepared by the Empire Marketing Board in England?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It was so bad the English press criticised the picture severely and the Empire Marketing Board lost a good deal of money through the production of it. Was that picture purchased directly from the Empire Marketing Board or through an agent? I am instructed the price paid was £2,000, and £200 commission was paid to a third party. The rumour is being spread—I may as well be quite frank with the minister—that this picture was purchased during the absence of the present minister by the Prime Minister himself against the wishes and recommendations of the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce; that it is now in the vaults of the department; that it has never been produced in this country and that the department has never received a cent of revenue from it. I think in fairness to the Prime Minister the minister should tell us exactly what took place.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: It is being circulated as one of the free pictures among the schools of the country. It must be borne in mind that certain pictures are in demand by the schools, particularly in the more outlying districts and, generally speaking, such pictures are supplied free. This is one of them, and it is rather an attractive one. I admit that from the standpoint of adult, cold-blooded, mercenary advertising it would not be classed as a valuable picture, but from the standpoint of portraying family life and a bit of sentiment and empire idealism, it has merit.

Mr. YOUNG: Any creed attached to it?

Mr. STEVENS: I did not succeed in having any creed attached to it, but had I done so it would unquestionably have become perfect. It is rather an attractive picture, in its portrayal of young life.

Mr. TOTZKE: Is that why it appealed to the Prime Minister?

Mr. POWER: What is the justification of the Department of Trade and Commerce buying a patriotic picture?

Mr. STEVENS: First, because the department is patriotic; second, because the administration of that particular activity is under the department.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Has the picture ever left the vaults of the department?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I have grave doubts as to that. I think the minister had better make inquiries. Did the officials of the department recommend its purchase?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not that information before me.

Mr. VALLANCE: During the conversion loan advertising campaign I noticed extensive advertising through the medium of both silent and talking pictures. Would that naturally come out of last year's expenditure under this item?

Mr. STEVENS: No; all the advertising in connection with loans would be paid by the Department of Finance. Sometimes this department will take pictures for other departments.

Item agreed to.

Weights and Measures inspection service, including the International Bureau of Weights and Measures, $310,200.

Mr. POULIOT: May I make a suggestion to the minister? If I am not mistaken, at the present time the charge for inspecting weights is $10, and this is paid by those whose weights are right as well as by those whose weights are wrong. Would the minister consider this suggestion: to charge less to those whose weights or measures are right, and more to those whose weights or measures are wrong?

Mr. STEVENS: That seems like a reasonable suggestion. I shall look into it and confer with the officials who have wide experience in the matter.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for his answer. The suggestion comes from a country merchant who told me that one day he received a visit from an inspector who inspected his balance. The balance could weigh, say 200 pounds and with the weights he was carrying with him, the inspector tested it to forty pounds and found it correct. As a matter of fact the balance was wrong from fifty pounds up, but the inspector marked it O.K., and then the merchant refused to pay the $10. The inspector asked him why, and the merchant told him it was because the inspection was wrong, which he proceeded to prove. This is why I am drawing the matter to the attention of the minister.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is any revenue derived from this service?

Mr. STEVENS: There is a surplus every year of about $60,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does the department supply the weights and measures inspectors in western Canada with a car, or allow them mileage to drive from place to place?

Mr. STEVENS: They are allowed mileage when it is required in the country places.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the mileage paid?

Mr. STEVENS: I am informed that it is from eight to ten cents per mile.

Mr. CAYLEY: How many inspectors are there?

Mr. STEVENS: There are 115.

Item agreed to.

Exhibitions and fairs, including the sum of $750, required by the Department of Immigration and Colonization, $137,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. STEVENS: This is the usual vote for exhibitions. A substantial portion of the item is expended on regular exhibitions in Great Britain in the large industrial centres, and so forth, devoted almost entirely to exhibiting Canadian produce generally, lumber, fish, fruit, flour and all that class of goods. I can give the details of expenditures if required, but this is the usual vote. There is very little variation from year to year in the type of fair that is patronized. Occasionally a large fair or exhibition is involved, but there is no provision in this vote for exhibiting at any large fair.

Mr. DONNELLY: We sent people down to the Argentine to represent the Canadian government at an exhibition there a year or two ago. Would that come under this vote?

Mr. STEVENS: There was a special vote for that.

Mr. DONNELLY: The only thing I wanted to remark in that connection was that before we sent our representatives to that exhibition we were selling to the Argentine $12,000,000 worth of produce annually, and the year after that exhibition we sold them only $4,000,000 worth. If we send another such delegation with no better results, we shall soon be selling the Argentine nothing at all.

Mr. VALLANCE: What is the $750 for which is required by the Department of Immigration?

Mr. STEVENS: That is more or less a vanishing item. Years ago the Immigration department did require certain small exhibits to be displayed in windows, made up by experts under this department, but that is virtually finished. This is just a small vote for some places they have left.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is a decrease of $148,000 in this vote as compared with last year. How is that accounted for?

Mr. STEVENS: There are no large fairs provided for under this item—just a number of routine exhibits.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics, $542,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: I assume the decrease in this item is due to the census work having passed the peak.

Mr. STEVENS: It is due to the tapering off of the census work.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited

Loan to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, repayable on demand with interest at a rate to be fixed by the Governor in council, upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of:—

Deficts in operation of the company and the vessels under the company's control during the year ended December 31, 1931, and interest requirements. Additional amount required in excess of the sum of $755,000 already appropriated, $161,568.53.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): This is a supplementary item which has passed the special committee.

Item agreed to.

Hudson Bay railway and terminals: construction and betterments, including E. B. Jost at $2,250 (revote $630,000), $1,937,700.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is this to complete?

Mr. MANION: It just depends on what we mean by complete. It would hardly be correct to say that it would complete the work, but it will put the port in condition to carry on with any reasonable amount of shipping that may go out there this year. Briefly, it will build a shed which will be necessary to handle package freight of any kind, it will complete the work on the elevator so that it can handle quite a large amount of grain; it will do some work on the water supply, do some filling and some dredging and considerable work on the Hudson Bay railway itself, such as ballasting and levelling up the road, which is always necessary in that country after the winter's settling. In general it will put the whole system in shape to handle any reasonable amount of traffic that may go over it this coming year.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is it contemplated building docks there for coal?

Mr. MANION: There is a dock eighteen hundred feet long, at one end of which there is plenty of room to store coal. There is no intention of putting up a special dock or getting special equipment this year for handling coal. There are two locomotive cranes which can handle any coal which may come in there this coming season. If it is shown throughout the season that there is likely to be a heavy amount of coal coming in through that port later, it is the intention in the coming years to build a complete dock, but with our present equipment we can handle any coal that may come in from either Nova Scotia or Great Britain this season.

Mr. REID: What freight rate was charged on the trial shipment going over that route?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MANION: It was all charged on the Crowsnest basis to the head of the lakes.

Mr. REID: Was that rate made by the government?

Mr. MANION: No, the government does not make rates. The rates were made in this case by the Canadian National Railway itself, subject of course to revision by the Board of Railway Commissioners. I adhere to what I said earlier in the evening, that the government does not make rates.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: From what I gather in the press, I understand that some difficulty was experienced last year in securing this first shipment of grain to go out over the Hudson Bay route, that different grain companies and other people shipping grain seemed dubious about sending it over the route, which did not exactly bear out their enthusiasm for the route in the first place. Without my putting a lengthy series of questions to the minister, would he give us a brief statement as to the success of that trial shipment, the amount of grain handled, the terms and conditions on which it was handled, the costs borne by the government, and the result from the point of view of the shipper.

Mr. MANION: I shall gladly answer the hon. member. I shall have to resort to my memory, but I think it is quite clear in this connection, because I was deeply interested. The hon. member is quite right: last year we had considerable difficulty obtaining anything in the shape of grain cargoes. In fact I will tell now that which I did not state publicly last year, namely, that we communicated with various organizations, both public and private, in western Canada, and we had no success whatever so far as securing grain shipments was concerned. We took considerable abuse because we had not obtained grain shipments, despite the fact that we had done everything in our power to get them. At last we went to John I. McFarland—I do not know his position—

Mr. VALLANCE: Manager of the central selling agency.

Mr. MANION: Yes,—who was appointed by my leader, the right the hon. Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Mr. McFarland came to the city of Ottawa—

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister has just admitted what the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not admit.

Mr. MANION: Well, perhaps I used the wrong word.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, your statement is absolutely true.

Mr. MANION: I am quite sure Mr. McFarland was suggested by the Prime Minister; perhaps I should have put it that way. It is quite possible the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows more than I do in regard to the selling agency as it comes within his purview. Probably I slipped that word in without going into the question. I frankly admit that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is correctly informed concerning Mr. McFarland's appointment, and I shall withdraw my remark.

However, to get back to my statement, may I say that Mr. McFarland held the position of manager of the selling agency. He came to the city of Ottawa and after the solicitation of the Prime Minister and myself—I might say the pleading—we got Mr. McFarland to supply us with two cargoes of grain to be shipped via Churchill.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that how it came about that Mr. McFarland bought wheat for future delivery?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend had better ask Mr. McFarland about that. He supplied two cargoes. Then, while the government was not in the shipping business, and had nothing to do with the chartering of ships, and should have had nothing to do with business of that nature, in an effort to have a trial shipment through the port of Churchill we chartered two boats and guaranteed to Mr. McFarland that the handling would cost no more than if shipped via Montreal. The boats went in and handled the grain very successfully. Delivery of the elevator was made on the fifteenth; loading was commenced the same evening and continued until the ships were completely filled and trimmed. The experiment was quite successful, and my understanding is that the cost was slightly lower than it would have been had the grain been shipped via Montreal. I may add that we were to absorb port charges, elevator charges and any other charges which ordinarily would have been levied. Outside of that every charge was paid, including insurance, which was rather heavy. In every way the sending of these cargoes via Churchill was a complete success.

Mr. LUCAS: Could the minister give us an idea how insurance rates via Hudson Bay compare with those via Montreal?

Mr. MANION: I cannot say exactly, but they are considerably heavier. I believe the rate is about five times as much, perhaps six times, via Churchill as it is via Montreal. I can say at least that that condition prevailed last year.

While I am on my feet I should like to add that through the office of the Canadian High Commissioner at London we have taken up the matter of insurance rates. The Department of Marine has also investigated the matter because it is directly in control of insurance. The Canadian High Commissioner's office at London has passed the matter on to the Imperial shipping committee, in whose hands it now rests. My best information at the moment is that no reduction has been made. It has been more or less promised, however, that if shipments this year are as successful as those of last year, there will be a reduction in insurance rates in 1933. I am afraid that there is not a very great prospect of a reduction this year.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I heard the minister mention the fifteenth of a certain month, but I did not hear the month.

Mr. MANION: September.

Mr. TOTZKE: I should like to ask the minister if he can tell us whether any steps are being taken to ensure further and perhaps more complete trial shipments in the coming season.

Mr. MANION: Yes, every effort has been made. I must admit quite frankly, however, that we have not been very successful. A series of letters has been sent to grain dealers throughout western Canada. Shipping agents from Montreal have gone through the western provinces endeavouring to work up shipments. They assure me that they think there will probably be about ten or twelve ships go out of Churchill in the coming year. Frankly it has been very difficult to get cargoes going out or coming in. One shipping company, the Dalgleish Company—the same people who handled the shipment last year—have offered to take cargoes into Churchill on the same basis as the Montreal rate, provided they can get 1,000 tons, or about one-fifth of a cargo, to take in. In spite of that fact it has not been easy to arrange shipments. We have received very little encouragement, and these shipping agents have had difficulty in securing cargoes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does that cover insurance, too?

Mr. MANION: Yes. They are hopeful that ten or a dozen ships will go into Churchill, which would constitute a pretty fair trial in the coming year.

Mr. TOTZKE: Would there be any doubt about having wheat at the port, in case shipments had to be made?

Mr. MANION: There will not be trial shipments until there is wheat to go out.

Mr. TOTZKE: If the boats are ready to take those shipments out—

Mr. MANION: The boats will not go unless the wheat is there.

Mr. TOTZKE: I shall put the question another way: if wheat is there the boats will go?

Mr. MANION: The wheat will be there only if some agency in western Canada does as Mr. McFarland did last year. That is, some agent in western Canada must sell wheat, as Mr. McFarland did. We are not shipping wheat, because we are not handling it.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister must admit that the government will not guarantee bottoms to any western grain shipper shipping out of Churchill. You guaranteed Mr. McFarland two bottoms in which to ship his grain. In other words he guaranteed you the grain to make trial shipment.

Mr. MANION: There will be no difficulty whatever in getting bottoms. The difficulty is not to get bottoms or to get rates equal to those of Montreal; it is to get cargoes. There will be no difficulty getting cargoes if—

Mr. VALLANCE: But—

Mr. DONNELLY: Will the minister—

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friends will ask their questions one at a time I shall have a better chance to answer. Just now three or four questions are being asked at once from different sections of the chamber.

Mr. VALLANCE: What difficulty will be encountered at Churchill?

Mr. MANION: The difficulty seems to be that western Canada shippers are not enthusiastic about shipping through the port of Churchill, and are not anxious to make arrangements to do so. The late government and the present one—I divide the credit—have put the port into good shape. We had no machinery for shipments; we had no machinery for buying and selling grain in this country and marketing it in Europe, or for chartering vessels. We went out of our way and put this machinery into operation, because we felt it would be a black eye to Churchill if we did not do it. There is no difficulty whatever about getting ships provided the cargoes are there. I do not wish to be misquoted, but I am very hopeful that there will be sufficient to give ten or twelve cargoes out of Churchill this year. If there are cargoes there will be no difficulty about getting the ships.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Has the minister offered the people any consideration at all in the way of reducing the elevator handling charges, or is there the same arrangement as there was last year?

Mr. MANION: There was no charge last year, so that we cannot very well reduce it.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Then you have the same arrangement?

Mr. MANION: We have not had anything put up to us along that line. We will do everything we can, and gladly, to encourage anyone to utilize the port this coming year. As I have said, however, we cannot reduce the charge because there was none last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does not my hon. friend think that it is the excessive insurance rate that terrifies the prospective shippers? They do not like to take a chance. Has the government thought of carrying part of the insurance until the port has had a real chance to work out?

Mr. MANION: I do not think my hon. friend is right in saying that the excessive insurance rate frightens people, because after all what people look at is the through rate, including insurance. What they consider, for instance, is the rate from Saskatoon, which would probably be the shipping point to Liverpool; they would take that rate, via Churchill, and compare it with the rate from Saskatoon to Liverpool via Montreal, and if the rate, inclusive of insurance, were lower via Churchill than via Montreal, it should be attractive to people wishing to ship grain. As regards absorbing insurance, whether I have thought of this matter or not, it has been forced upon my attention. But may I say it is not an easy matter to settle, for this reason. If that were the only thing that held up shipments via Churchill, it would be the duty of the government to do something in that regard, as a trial; but in my opinion that is not the reason that may make it difficult to get cargoes. It is probably a question of world depression, and general business conditions. The difficulty arises again in regard to the absorption by the government of insurance so far as the other ports are concerned. The other ports, both east and west, would rightly say, "Why should the insurance be absorbed in one port and not in another?" Montreal or Quebec would probably come forward with such a representation. They might say, "If you are going to absorb insurance from Churchill, why not absorb it from Montreal and Quebec?" It is not therefore an easy matter to settle, and we do not wish to grapple with that problem unless it is absolutely necessary. And I do not think it is necessary, because the rate this year will be as low as the Montreal rate, if not lower. There was a difference of about two cents per bushel last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Trade and traffic will not as a rule seek a new port unless there is some advantage to induce shippers to do so. Switching traffic from one route to another is a very difficult thing and takes a considerable time to accomplish. When the Panama canal route was first opened, via Vancouver, it remained open quite a while before there was any considerable traffic, especially of grain. Experimental shipments were made there too, as there was a fear at that time that the waters of the southern Pacific would have a deleterious effect upon the keeping qualities of wheat in transit, particularly if it had excess moisture. These difficulties were overcome and elevators constructed, but it must have been six or seven years before any considerable volume of traffic went through that port—a port open the year round. They had high mountain rates to overcome at that time also, there were no Crowsnest rates going then to the Pacific. That was no doubt a handicap. But here is the point. The government, if this route is to be successful, must do something to overcome the fears of the people with respect to rates and all the vicissitudes or possibilities of any new route, I do not care where it is. The route by the Panama occasioned fear because of the warmth of the water, and we can understand that the northern route might occasion fear because of the coldness of the water or because of the presence of icebergs or growlers or whatever there is to make people fearful; and unless there is a considerable volume of cargo produced, pressing for an exit, that port will be very slow developing without the sympathetic support of the government. Its development, I say, will be slow unless the government gives it considerable sympathetic and tangible support of a practical nature such as I have indicated. The minister must realize that this is the history of trade the world over. It takes a great amount of effort and time to swing trade from one route to another, and there must be a good deal of cargo offering and pressing for a favourable exit before switching can possibly be made. The government, I repeat, should show us a more sympathetic consideration of a practical sort in the direction I have indicated, otherwise, for a long time to come, that port will not be used to any considerable extent. It will not be as fully used as it might be, because shippers will not use any new route to an appreciable extent until the advantages and risks are more fully known.

Mr. MANION: I remember that when the Panama route was first opened there was a fear in regard to the effect of the warm waters of the Pacific on grain. To-day, however, there is no such fear in connection with the northern route; in fact the northern waters will rather make it a safe route from that point of view. I think my hon. friend will admit that his government when in power and this government as well have shown great sympathy with the route. Last year we did, as we are doing this year, everything possible to encourage its utilization. I made inquiries to find out how much it would cost to send a ship for one trip. Suppose we sent a ship on the off chance of a cargo; it would cost from $30,000 to $40,000, and that is a nice figure to juggle with unless you are sure of your cargo. May I make a suggestion to my hon. friend and to members from the west generally, who pressed for many years for the building of the railway and the opening of the port. I submit that they also owe a duty to it. Considering the vast amount of money spent upon the route, and the fact that the people of eastern Canada were for many years accused of holding it up, when as a matter of fact the delay was due to war and other conditions; and considering the further fact that $50,000,000 odd has been spent upon the undertaking, I say frankly that I doubt whether western Canada itself is showing the interest it should in the problem, in the shipping of grain and other products I have been listening to a good many lectures from the west, and I respectfully submit that western Canada might listen to me in this regard. I have been listening to them a good deal. I am not saying this in any spirit of disrespect, but I do think that some of the organizations out there, which are very strong on resolutions, might get to work and do more than pass resolutions; they might hunt up cargoes for Churchill. They should do a bit of the work which is not the duty of the Department of Railways or of the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We are all broke up there now, and need help to get this new port started.

Mr. BOWMAN: Have requests been made to the big grain companies of the west to furnish a cargo this year?

Mr. MANION: Yes; requests have been forwarded to the big grain companies, the pools, boards of trade and so forth. I have here a lengthy list of those to whom we sent such requests, and I have seen a few of the answers. I may say that they were not enthusiastic. Last year I pleaded with the people of the west to ship grain through the port because I felt that it would be a black eye not only to Churchill, but a political black eye to us, if we did not get something through the port then.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think so too.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is better at pointing out that it would have been a political black eye to us than he is at giving us credit for what we did do. Last year, I may say, I spoke to one big grain merchant—I will not mention his name. I had a conversation with him in the lobby and asked him whether he would send any grain. He replied, "No, I will not send grain through Churchill. If you give me five or six cents better than the Montreal route offers I will ship through that port."

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the point.

Mr. MANION: Otherwise, he said, he would not consider it at all. And as a matter of fact he did not have anything to do with it. This year, as I have said, we sent letters to the boards of trade, and, frankly, we have not had satisfactory replies, but only pious wishes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why does not the minister communicate with the On-To-The-Bay Association?

Mr. MANION: They have been communicating with me.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Won't they find you cargoes?

Mr. MANION: Without intending any disrespect to the association, I may say that I was really thinking of them when I said that if certain organizations would stop passing resolutions and hunt up cargoes instead we might make some headway.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They used to be active in our day.

Mr. MANION: The association is still very active, but frankly, it does not supply us with cargoes. I should be glad to have their activities take that form.

Mr. BROWN: I agree with the minister.

Mr. BOWMAN: What advantage, in so many cents, or fractions of a cent per bushel, did those cargoes have last year shipped through the bay over cargoes from Montreal?

Mr. MANION: I cannot remember exactly, but it was in the neighbourhood of two cents. Two cents a bushel is quite a difference, and that difference was so great that Mr. McFarland came back to us and proposed that he should pay some of the charges we had not asked him to pay. He felt that he had done so well that he could pay some of the charges we had expected to pay.

Mr. BOWMAN: Will the government be prepared to make the same concessions this year?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that there is any necessity to make concessions, because there will be no difficulty at all in getting ships on the same basis. I do not think there will be any difficulty in getting rates out of Churchill that will be perhaps a little better than the rates of last year.

Mr. VENIOT: Have any negotiations been carried on with regard to the transportation of coarse grains to the maritime provinces via Hudson bay?

Mr. MANION: I have heard nothing of that suggestion, but we will be open to hear all proposals of that kind, coming either from the maritimes or from the west.

Mr. VENIOT: The reason I asked was because I might not be allowed to ask that question when the agriculture estimates are up. I have some memory of a statement by the Minister of Agriculture that it was hoped that large quantities of coarse grain could be shipped to the maritime provinces through Churchill for the feeding of cattle on their way to Europe. I wanted to know if that had been considered by the government.

Mr. MANION: If the Minister of Agriculture expressed that hope I have no doubt the hope was in his mind, and if it will please my hon. friend I will hope so too.

Mr. DONNELLY: Are there still aviators investigating the course of Hudson strait?

Mr. MANION: No, there are no aviators up there now, but the vessels were so successful last year in coming in and going out that we anticipate no difficulty. We have direction finding stations there in excellent shape, and I would be a little afraid to quote the very complimentary remarks of some of the captains in comparing Churchill with some other ports. So I do not think there will be any difficulty in that regard.

Mr. DONNELLY: Can the minister tell us about what time the straits were frozen last year?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid I cannot give that information offhand, but they are open roughly from the middle of July to the middle of October. Last year I think they were open later in the fall, because the season was very mild.

Mr. POWER: Has there been any proposal to stock Hudson bay with fish from Nova Scotia?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Has any action been taken on the resolutions which have been forwarded by various boards of trade in the west in connection with freight rates to Churchill?

Mr. MANION: Yes, that is being dealt with at the moment by the Canadian National Railways, and we expect to have them publish rates in the very near future which I hope will be very satisfactory.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think if we have even an average crop this year it will be pushed to the market as rapidly as possible because of the urgent need for liquidation, and I believe every exit will be required. If there is a crop like last year, however, the grain will likely go out largely via the old lines, the lines of least resistance. I would warn the government, however, that the people are in rather a distressed and complaining mood; the shoulders of the government are looked upon as broad, and the people will be apt to blame the government, whether they deserve it or not, unless that road is used to the fullest possible extent. I think the government would be well advised to get busy and not wait to be jabbed up too much by the On-to-the-Bay Association or anyone else. If there is a normal crop I do not think any difficulty will be encountered, as every avenue of egress will be used.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The government might conscript some grain.

Item agreed to.

Canals—Welland ship canal: construction and betterments, $3,123,400.

Mr. SPENCER: Could the committee have some information on this matter?

Mr. MANION: This vote is practically for the completion of the Welland ship canal and other supplementary works necessary at that point.

Sir EUGENE FISET: There is another item later on in connection with this canal for $25,900.

Mr. MANION: I shall explain that item when we reach it.

Item agreed to.

Port Colborne elevator, improvements, $1,180.

Mr. POULIOT: Is this elevator completed?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: How much grain went through this elevator last year?

Mr. MANION: About 30,000,000 bushels.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY—FREIGHT RATE SCHEDULE

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

Is it the intention of the government when preparing both an incoming and outgoing freight rate schedule on the Hudson Bay railway, to make due rate allowance for the additional mileage distance of about forty miles each way, occasioned by this railway being constructed to within about ninety miles of Nelson before being finally diverted to Churchill?

Mr. MANION: May I point out to the hon. member that the government does not make any of these rates. The Hudson Bay Railway is, as it was under the late government, entirely operated by the Canadian National railway management; they will make rates subject to the Crowsnest pass agreement; and they hope to publish them in the near future. Should there be anything wrong with those rates, they are subject to the Board of Railway Commissioners, but the government itself has no direct power in the matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the Canadian National Railways incur any deficits on the Hudson Bay railway, is it not a fact that such deficits are paid, not by the Canadian National but by the government?

Mr. MANION: That is right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then I presume the government must be primarily responsible for the rates.

Mr. MANION: The rate-making is in the power of the railways subject to appeal to the Board of Railway Commissioners.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): As we have not forgotten that there are Canadian delegates at the disarmament conference at Geneva, may I ask the government what is their stand on the French policy of world police?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. member sent a notice to me that he proposed to ask this question on the orders of the day. In reply I can only inform him that the attitude of the government will be made known at the proper time and place. On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask the Prime Minister if at the present time an agenda has been prepared with respect to the subjects to be discussed at the forthcoming Imperial economic conference, and if so, if the house might be favoured with a copy of it?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): No completed agenda has been prepared, for obviously discussions must take place between the governments concerned. Whether or not a completed agenda will be laid before this house will depend on what is thought desirable after consultation with all the governments concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One other question with regard to the conference. Has the government established any committees, departmental or otherwise, to study the matters that are to be discussed at the conference, and if so, what committees are in existence?

Mr. BENNETT: It has established a large number of committees, but it does not think it in the public interest to make known who they are or what they are doing.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER OF POSITION OF UNDERTAKING AND POLICY OF GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I promised the house a few days ago that I would endeavour to-day to make a statement with respect to the Beauharnois undertaking, and that the government would endeavour to consider the matter carefully on Saturday last so that the statement might be as complete as possible. I shall have to ask the indulgence of the house for it is necessary for me to read documents of considerable length.

1. The Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company is a creature of the Quebec legislature. It was incorporated in 1902, and its charter was amended in 1910, 1928 and 1930. It is therefore not a corporation over which the parliament of Canada has legislative jurisdiction.

2. The Beauharnois Power Corporation is an entity created under the provisions of the Companies Act of Canada. It is a corporation over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction.

3. In 1929 the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited undertook to create and sell $30,000,000 thirty-year six per cent collateral trust sinking fund bonds. These bonds were to be dated the first day of October, 1929, and were therefore payable in 1959. These bonds were secured, not as some persons have assumed, by a charge against the undertaking, but by a mortgage on the shares of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company Limited, and the Beauharnois Transmission Company, and the Beauharnois Land Company, and the Beauharnois Construction Company—all as mentioned in the second schedule to the deed of trust given by the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited to the Royal Trust Company as trustee. The schedule to which I have referred is printed on page 75 of that document, and in order that there may be no misunderstanding with respect to the matter, I shall read the schedule:

> 39,989 (thirty-nine thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine) shares of a par value of $100 each of the capital stock of said Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, being all the outstanding shares of the capital stock of said company, except eleven (11) shares held by the directors thereof:
> 49,989 (forty-nine thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine) shares (having no nominal or par value) of said Beauharnois Construction Company, being all the outstanding shares of the capital stock of said company, except eleven (11) shares held by the directors thereof;
> 49,989 (forty-nine thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine) shares (having no nominal or par value) of said Beauharnois Transmission Company, being all the outstanding shares of the capital stock of said company, except eleven (11) shares held by the directors thereof;
> 49,989 (forty-nine thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine) shares (having no nominal or par value) of said Beauharnois Land Company, being all the outstanding shares of the capital stock of the said company, except eleven (11) shares held by the directors thereof.

These shares constituted the security upon which the issue of collateral trust bonds was based. The provisions as to the amount of the proceeds arising from the sale of the bonds to be received by the Quebec company, the parent company, The Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, are indicated by a document dated the twentieth day of November, 1929, being an agreement made between the Beauharnois Power Corporation Limited and the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company. That document provides not only for the issue of the $30,000,000 of securities; but it also provides for what the operating or parent company was to receive from this issue, the figures being $22,500,000. Section 6 reads as follows:

> The corporation hereby undertakes and agrees to create and issue an issue of thirty year six per cent collateral trust sinking fund bonds of an aggregate principle amount of $30,000,000, and out of the proceeds thereof to make advances by way of loan from time to time to the company up to an amount of $22,250,000 as the same may be required from time to time by the company for any of the following purposes, namely:
> (a) for the payment of any of the obligations and liabilities assumed by the corporation under the said agreement dated the 31st day of October, 1929, between the corporation and the Beauharnois power syndicate, which obligations and liabilities are hereby assumed by the company as hereinafter set forth, or

(b) for the payment of expenditures from time to time made or proposed to be made, either by the company or by any subsidiary company or companies of the company, for or in connection with the development or marketing of hydro electric power resulting from the difference in level between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis in the province of Quebec, Canada, including therein but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, taxes, rates and assessments, governmental fees and duties and overhead and other expenses of the company and of any of its subsidiary companies, and expenditures for the acquisition of properties and rights of any and all kinds in connection therewith; or

(c) for such other corporate purposes of the company as the corporation may approve.

Provided however that any of the said $22,250,000 applied by the corporation in payment of interest on the said $30,000,000 of thirty year six per cent collateral trust sinking fund bonds of the corporation, up to and including the interest payable on the 1st day of October, 1931, shall be deemed to have been advanced under this section 6 to the company by the corporation and to have been paid by the company pursuant to the provisions of section 9 (a) hereof. The corporation further undertakes and agrees to credit the company in the manner set out in section 9 hereof with an amount equal to the net income directly or indirectly received by the corporation on the portion of the said $22,250,000 from time to time remaining unadvanced to the company.

It will be observed from what I have just read that it is provided that the corporation was also to assume the obligations of the Light, Heat and Power Company in connection with the syndicate to which reference has been made so frequently. Those payments so far as one can ascertain amounted to nearly $4,000,000. So that the sum left, $22,500,000 was to be depleted by that further amount. It was also provided alike by agreement and by trust deed, as will be found at page 38 of that document, that the moneys paid to the trustee upon the certification of bonds shall be available for the payment of interest until October 1, 1931. As the interest amounted to, it will be observed, $1,800,000 per annum, two years interest in round figures were also to come out of proceeds of the bonds, amounting in all to approximately $3,600,000.

4. The next point I desire to direct attention to is the prospectuses that were issued for the sale of these securities. They were issued by many bond dealers throughout Canada, the one I hold in my hand being issued by Wood, Gundy and Company and providing that there should be an issue of first mortgage securities for the purpose of completing the undertaking, because it will be obvious from what I have just read that the relatively small sum remaining out of the $30,000 000 collateral trust bonds would not be sufficient to complete the undertaking. In this prospectus it was intimated that it might be necessary to issue bonds against the enterprise not exceeding $50,000,000, that being the sum that was indicated as the maximum first mortgage bond issue that would be issued against the enterprise, and the earnings were indicated when 500,000 horse-power were installed at $6,200,000 per annum.

5. The next point to which I direct attention is that when the enterprise began to function it did not take long to exhaust the moneys available from the sale of the $30,000,000 collateral trust bonds, which in fact and in law did not constitute a charge against the physical assets of the enterprise. When the investigations were being carried on by parliament, it became, as I have said, apparent, that further sums would be required, and following the usual course the company applied to the Bank of Montreal, the Royal Bank of Canada and the Canadian Bank of Commerce for advances secured by bonds, first mortgage bonds, bonds charged against the enterprise. Advances by the banks up to date amount to $6,495,000, and as security for the sums thus advanced the banks hold first mortgage bonds of the undertaking of a face value of $9,742,000.

6. The next point to which I direct attention is that obviously for reasons that are apparent the banks did not propose to advance too large sums, because it was not their business to do so, unless they were in some way secured beyond the mere holding of the bonds of the enterprise. The provisions for construction provided for a canal that would be satisfactory for navigation purposes, and would constitute a part of the St. Lawrence waterways as, if and when the St. Lawrence waterways may be completed. In view of the representations made as to what the cost of the canal would be, that is the extra cost involved to make it available for navigation purposes, in the light of what I have said as to its being a connecting link in the St. Lawrence waterways development scheme, an application was made, after the investigation in this house, to the government, to ascertain whether or not it would assist in keeping the enterprise going, and the government undertake, as I shall presently point out, to secure the banks against any loss they might make by advancing to the enterprise further sums of money beyond the sums already indicated. But the government asked that the banks should secure from the enterprise bonds to the extent of 200 per cent of the advances so made, and to date the advances thus made by the banks amount to $7,951,500, and the banks hold as security for such advances, for the purposes of relieving any claim which might arise against the government, bonds of the face value of $15,903,000—that is, first mortgage bonds against the enterprise, it being represented that the total cost of the canal which is to be available for navigation purposes is somewhere between $15,000,000 and $16,000,000, although I personally think that is a somewhat larger figure than the facts warrant for the construction for navigation purposes beyond the construction of a canal for mere power purposes.

7. Before the house rose last year it will be recalled that on August first, as reported at page 4504 of Hansard, I declared the policy of the government to be as follows:

> The government by every means in its power will endeavour to do the following: (a) secure continuance of the enterprise; (b) secure the rights of those who bona fide have put their money in that enterprise; (c) secure proper control and management; (d) take such other steps as may be necessary when terms and conditions are fixed as will ensure the greatest possible benefit to this dominion as a whole by reason of the undertaking now being declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

In the light of that statement and of the position of the undertaking, the government gave the assurances that I have mentioned to the banks, and they—the banks—took security to the extent of approximately two hundred per cent of the sums advanced, the securities being first mortgage bonds of, not the power corporation, but the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company that owns the enterprise.

8. The next point to which I direct the attention of the house is that in furtherance of the undertaking which I gave to parliament at that time, we first of all secured the continuance of the enterprise. The securing of the rights of those who bona fide had put their money in the enterprise was of course limited and governed by the conditions of the contract under which they had advanced their money. I may add that people in every province advanced money on those second mortgage debentures, or collateral trust bonds as they are called. Subject to the terms of the trust deed, we took every step that could be taken first of all, to see that the terms of the trust deed were observed as to the payment of the half year's interest on the first day of October, 1931—this clause I have just read; and, secondly, that the enterprise was continued as I have just indicated, and that it was controlled and managed in the most efficient way possible. I should say for the information of this house and the country that expenditures to date have been within the estimates made, and the work has progressed up to the point that was expected in view of such expenditures.

9. The next point I direct attention to is the action taken by the government after the house had risen. On Labour Day I met the representatives of the banks and of the company and of all those interested for the purpose of ascertaining what steps might reasonably be taken for the purpose of advancing the undertaking. Suggestions were made that the enterprise would best be managed by the four existing power companies doing business in the locality in which the Beauharnois Company was functioning. They are the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, Consolidated, the Gatineau Power Company Limited, the Shawinigan Power Company and its associated interests, and the Southern Canada Power enterprise. These four power companies are the large enterprises producing hydro-electric energy in the province of Quebec directly affected by this undertaking.

Nothing came of that, and on the 16th day of September, 1931, the premier of Quebec saw me at Ottawa, and with him was a member of his government. They were accompanied by Mr. Geoffrion, K.C., their legal adviser. It was then suggested that the best interests of all would be served if the enterprise were turned over to the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, Consolidated, as they had facilities for management, and they would be prepared to do the necessary financing to complete the undertaking. I intimated that that proposal did not commend itself to the government at that time. Within a week Great Britain went off the gold standard, and financing by any body or group of men became impossible. The government continued, however, to take the responsibility I have indicated in connection with the advances that were made in order to enable the work to be continued.

10. A communication was directed to Mr. Wilson, general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada, who undertook to act as the corresponding medium for the banks that were interested in the undertaking. That letter I will now read because it is important in view of the reply that was made. The letter is dated the 3rd day of October, 1931, and is as follows:

Dear Mr. Wilson:—

Re Beauharnois Undertaking:

On the 16th of September, the premier of Quebec, the Hon. Honore Mercier and their counsel, Mr. Aime Geoffrion, K.C., interviewed me with respect to the reorganization of the Beauharnois undertaking.

It is my considered view, as expressed to these gentlemen, that a reorganization of this undertaking, involving a radical change in its directorate and management, is necessary before the Dominion government and parliament can have confidence that the undertaking will be carried to completion in a manner and with results that will adequately safeguard the public interest.

The act respecting the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, which was passed by the parliament of Canada at its last session and which appears as chapter 19 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, approved by Mr. Geoffrion, K.C., on behalf of the province of Quebec, provides, in section 1, for the annulment of the existing orders in council made by the Dominion government and dated March 8, 1921, and June 22, 1929, and also for the annulment of the agreement between the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, and the Dominion government dated June 25, 1929.

I may add that Mr. Geoffrion sent me a note after this letter had been received by Mr. Wilson in which he intimated he thought it was rather too strong to say that he had approved on behalf of the province of Quebec. He was acting for the province when my colleague, the Secretary of State, completed the legislation, and it will be recalled that he, Mr. Geoffrion, endorsed his approval on the back of the draft bill, but he regarded that as approval of the form of the bill to accomplish the purpose aimed at rather than as saying that he approved merely on behalf of the province of Quebec, although he was acting as counsel for the province. The letter proceeds:

The second section of that act provides for the grant to the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, of the right to divert the waters of the St. Lawrence river up to but not exceeding 53,072 cubic second feet of water to be used for the development of hydro-electric power "in such manner, upon such terms and conditions and with such limitations and reservations as may be prescribed by order of the governor in council."

The terms of this statute indicate that all relevant negotiations in the future, as in the past, shall take place between the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, and the Dominion government;

I should add here that the word "limited" does not appear in the statute. It is incorrect to describe the company as limited, although as a matter of law the liability of the shareholders is limited. The letter continues:

[Mr. Bennett.]

—and it appears to me that as preliminary to a new agreement being negotiated, a reorganization of this company, involving very radical changes in its directorate and management, should forthwith be carried into effect.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, has already issued $30,000,000 of collateral trust sinking fund bonds, which are now held by the public, payment of which is secured by a first fixed and specific charge on all the shares of the capital stock at any time outstanding of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited; and that in the present condition of the financial markets, it may be deemed advisable to avoid any disturbance of this security.

But I understand that the cash advances, which have been made by the banks to enable the works to be carried on are secured by a first charge or lien upon the movable and immovable properties of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited; and that provision has already been or can now be made for the creation by this provincial company of such additional bonds as it may be necessary to sell and distribute to the public to provide for the capital expenditures required to utilize for hydro electric power the 55,072 cubic second feet of water presently available.

I would, therefore, suggest that the present board of directors of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, should place their resignations in the hands of those presently interested in the financing of the company and its undertaking; and that those so interested should submit, through you to me, the names of the proposed directors of the new board, indicating what interests they respectively represent.

I would also suggest that arrangements be made forthwith whereby the right to vote a clear majority of the shares of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, be vested in agents or representatives of the three banks who are now financially interested in the undertaking and that these agents or representatives should have the right, by vesting such majority of the shares, to elect and control the personnel of the board of directors for a term of five years, or for such lesser time as may be agreed upon between the representatives of the government of the province of Quebec and of this government.

The vesting of the right to vote the shares of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, as above suggested, need not prejudicially affect the security for the $30,000,000 of bonds of the Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, now outstanding.

It appears to me possible, if not probable, that such reorganization, as that above suggested, may necessitate the liquidation of the Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, which, subject to outstanding charges thereon, is the holder of the issue capital stock of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited.

It does not appear to me to be incumbent upon the Dominion government, upon the evidence elicited by the parliamentary committee which investigated this undertaking at the last session of parliament, to decide as to the respective legal rights of the holders of the capital stock of the Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited; and, as a matter of fact, the Dominion government has at present no contractual relations with, and, in the future, it is not likely to have any contractual relations with, that company. The shareholders of that corporation should settle and adjust their respective rights and liabilities inter se by mutual agreement or by appropriate legal proceedings. But in any event, all the properties and assets of all subsidiary and associated companies and, or organizations connected with the undertaking of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, should be vested in or held for that company.

In the meantime, however, the Dominion government is prepared to open negotiations with the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, in respect of the parliamentary grant expressed in chapter 19 of the acts of 1931, of the right to divert 53,072 cubic second feet of water of the flow of the river St. Lawrence, and to negotiate with that company as to the terms and conditions, as well as the limitations and reservations, which should be prescribed, under the statute, by order of the governor in council, with respect to such diversion.

It appears to me that the bankers, their associates and clients interested should, forthwith, prepare and present to the government definite proposals with regard to the reorganization of the finances, directorate and management of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, which they will undertake forthwith to carry into effect; and, if these proposals are deemed by the Dominion government to give satisfactory assurance that the undertaking will be carried to a completion efficiently and satisfactorily, then the Dominion government will be prepared to enter at once upon a discussion of the terms and conditions, with such limitations and reservations, as it may be deemed expedient to prescribe by order in council to ensure that Dominion rights and interests, in respect of such diversion of the waters of the river St. Lawrence, shall be properly conserved, and the rights of legitimate investors protected.

If the above proposals are carried into effect, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, will be placed immediately in a position to complete its negotiations with the Dominion government with respect to the terms of the orders in council which are to be made and promulgated when the act respecting the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, above mentioned, is proclaimed and brought into force and effect.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) R. B. Bennett.

Negotiations extending over a period of months were carried on for the purpose of ascertaining just what might be done by those interested in the enterprise to secure its continuance, on the one hand, and that the necessary financial support should be obtained to enable that continuance to be carried on, on the other. However, it was not until the month of March this year that the final reply was received from the bankers on behalf of the enterprise. On February 5 intimation was given that the 80,000 shares of stock given to the Sterling Corporation for the purpose of securing such rights as it had on the river should be cancelled, and those shares have been turned in for cancellation. The letter dated January 8, reads as follows:

Montreal, January 8, 1932.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:—

Re Beauharnois Undertaking:

As you know, the representatives of the three banks and other persons interested have been giving very full consideration to the suggestions contained in your letter to me of the 3rd October last, and to the various other important points involved in this matter, all of which have been very fully discussed with you on numerous occasions since then, and we feel that it is now appropriate to place before you the considered views and suggestions of the three banks. This letter is written for that purpose, and is concurred in by all three banks.

We believe that this very important undertaking, in which so much money has already been invested, and the success or failure of which will have such an important effect upon the financial and economic condition of the dominion, should be carried forward to a point when the undertaking is producing and delivering power.

We believe that if at all possible those who have in good faith and relying upon grants and approvals made and given by the province of Quebec and the Dominion of Canada purchased securities of the company or lent moneys to it, should have their investments adequately protected.

In connection with the foregoing we have in mind the following salient features:

(a) The company's auditors report that expenditures upon the project to date have been approximately $39,000,000. Funds for this purpose have been raised as follows:

(i) proceeds of the sale of collateral trust bonds of Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, and shares of that Corporation represented by share warrants attached to the bonds, $27,000,000.

These collateral trust bonds of Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, of course rank after the first mortgage bonds, mentioned below, of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company.

(ii) loans from the three banks concerned, secured by first mortgage bonds of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, approximately, $11,900,000.

As you know, the loans from the three banks have been secured by the deposit of first mortgage bonds of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, of a face amount averaging one hundred and seventy-three per cent (173 per cent) of the amount of the loans, and after the loans by the three banks had reached $6,000,000 (the maximum amount of advances which the banks were willing to make) you, from time to time, authorized further advances of approximately $5,900,000 upon the understanding that the Dominion government would protect the banks against any loss.

(b) We are informed that the balances of money required to place the plant in effective operation so as to meet its contracts, is approximately $13,000,000, of which amount approximately $4,000,000 will be required between now and March 31, 1932.

(c) During the summer and autumn of 1931 the number of men employed on the site itself averaged 3,500 and during the current winter season the average number of men employed on the site has been 2,000. In addition, it is estimated that the project gives employment to about 2,000 persons as a result of the extensive purchases of equipment and materials.

It will thus be seen that the banks and the government by cooperating to assist the company in its undertaking have contributed extensively to the relief of unemployment.

(d) The work has been laid out on a time schedule calculated to bring the power plant into production by October 1, 1932, the date when the two contracts for the sale of substantial and increasing blocks of power to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated call for initial deliveries. The reports of the company's officers and engineers show that, so far, the work has been carried out in such a manner that it is now up to schedule as to time, and is also within the estimates of cost made at the outset. It has progressed to such a point that it is reasonable to assume that if carried on without interruption, the power plant can be brought into production by October 1, 1932, and at a cost not exceeding the original estimate for such installation. Should anything intervene to prevent the completion of the work up to this point by October 1, 1932, this would jeopardize these two contracts which are vital to the undertaking. These contracts call for the ultimate delivery of 400,000 h.p. per annum. One of these contracts calls for the ultimate delivery of 250,000 h.p. per annum, and is for a period of forty years, and the other calls for an ultimate delivery of 150,000 h.p. per annum, and is for a period of approximately seventy years.

The banks, having in mind the great importance of the undertaking and the effect which the success or failure of the undertaking will have upon the financial and economic welfare of the Dominion as a whole, and in view of your government's attitude, have felt it incumbent to do their utmost to assist the undertaking financially as they have done, but it is of course obvious that these are loans which the banks should not be asked to carry indefinitely, and that the appropriate method of financing the undertaking is to do so by means of further issues of securities when the financial condition of the markets warrants such steps. It is obvious, however, that no such financing can take place unless and until the orders in council which have become necessary as a result of chapter 19 of the statutes of the last session have been promulgated, and the company is able to go to the investing public with conclusive evidence that its rights in this connection have been satisfactorily and permanently established.

As you have intimated in your letter to me above mentioned, and in your subsequent discussions of the subject with myself and others interested, that the establishment of the terms and conditions of the necessary orders in council hinge to a large extent upon your government being satisfied as to the reorganization of the finances, directorate and management of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, we have considered with you and others interested the various suggestions made in your letter and subsequently, and now have to report as follows:

[Mr. Bennett.]

1. All the directors of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company (and of the various other companies associated with that company, including Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited) have placed their written resignations in my hands, and the resignations of three of these, namely, the Hon. Wilfrid L. McDougald, Mr. R. O. Sweezey and Mr. R. A. C. Henry, have been accepted. The acceptance of the resignations of the remaining eight directors has obviously had to be deferred until a new board can be elected, as otherwise the company would be left without a directorate.

2. There has been submitted to you a list containing the names of nine persons suggested as directors of the company, namely:

Mr. W. A. Black, who is a director of the Bank of Montreal; Mr. C. F. Sise, who is a director of The Royal Trust Company; Mr. W. F. Angus, who is a director of The Royal Bank of Canada; Mr. F. B. Common, K.C., who is a partner of Brown, Montgomery & McMichael, solicitors of The Royal Bank of Canada; Mr. A. F. White and Mr. Miller Lash, who are directors of The Canadian Bank of Commerce; Mr. J. S. Norris, who is a director of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated; Sir George Garneau and Mr. Aime Geoffrion, K.C., who have been selected by the premier of the province of Quebec.

It is, of course, not fair to ask these gentlemen to act unless the company is put in such a position that it will have reasonable prospects of carrying out its financing and its project, which involves primarily its being accorded the necessary approvals by order in council to permit the development of the undertaking and its receiving temporary financial assistance until its permanent financing can be done.

It will be noted that the above list would fill only nine of the eleven seats on the board, the intention being that the other two directors should be persons suggested by your government, or, if the government prefers not to make suggestions in this regard, that these vacancies will be filled only by persons acceptable to the government.

3. The three banks have given their most serious consideration to the suggestion which you make in your letter to me—

> "that arrangements be made forthwith whereby the right to vote a clear majority of the shares of the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, Limited, be vested in agents or representatives of the three banks who are now financially interested in the undertaking, and that these agents or representatives should have the right, by voting such majority of the shares, to elect and control the personnel of the board of directors for a term of five years, or such lesser time as may be agreed upon between the representatives of the government of the province of Quebec and this government."

but they are extremely reluctant to accept the responsibility of having the voting rights of the shares of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, or a majority of them, vested in representatives of the banks. The banks are of this view for the following reasons:

(a) That it would be unwise for them to assume the responsibility of having their representatives exercise this voting control;

(b) That the exercise of such functions by the representatives of the banks would probably mislead the public into believing that the banks had assumed responsibility for the undertaking of the company and its success or failure, a position in which the banks naturally do not desire to be placed;

(c) That if the power to remove or to refuse reelection to the directors, or any of them, were vested in the representatives of the three banks, such a power would weaken the directorate's efficiency and dignity, and the existence of such a power in the hands of these representatives would render it difficult to induce the proper type of person to act as a director;

(d) That the vesting of such a power in the three representatives of the banks would give too much power and responsibility to these representatives and the banks;

(e) That if the banks themselves do not require to have their representatives exercise the voting control of the shares, then there would seem to be no reason for asking them to assume that responsibility;

(f) That the same result can be achieved by having Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited (which is now vested with the voting rights of all the shares of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, unless and until the security for the collateral trust bonds of Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, for which these shares are pledged as security should become enforceable) undertake and agree that for a stipulated period it would vote the shares for the election of a designated list of directors.

4. It is therefore suggested—

(a) That a board of directors of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company consisting of the above mentioned eleven persons should be elected at the outset by Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited (which has the voting rights of all the shares of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company);

(b) That Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, should give a written undertaking to the government of the Dominion of Canada and to the government of the province of Quebec that unless and until the security for the collateral trust bonds for which the shares of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company are pledged as security shall have become enforceable, the shares in question will be voted (subject to the provisions of (c) below) for the reelection of the designated board; this arrangement to remain in force for a stated number of years;

(c) That in the case of vacancies occurring in the board, these will be filled by persons appointed by the remaining members of the board, the persons appointed to fill these vacancies to be acceptable to the two governments concerned.

In regard to clauses (b) and (c) above, it is suggested that the term for which this arrangement is to remain in force should terminate on May 1, 1934.

5. As to the reorganization of the management of the company, we feel that this is a matter which should be left to the new board of directors when they take office, as this board will be then in a position to study fully the financial, physical and administrative problems of the company and determine what is best in its interests.

6. In your letter it is suggested that all the properties and assets of all subsidiary and associated companies and/or organizations connected with the undertaking of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company should be vested in or held for that company.

This suggestion can be carried out as follows:

(a) By Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, causing to be transferred to Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company (subject to the provisions of the trust deed securing the collateral trust bonds of Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, and all the rights of the trustee thereunder) all the issued shares (except directors' qualifying shares) of Beauharnois Construction Company (which owns all the shares of Marquette Construction Company), Beauharnois Transmission Company and Beauharnois Land Company; and

(b) By Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, notifying the trustee for the collateral trust bonds of such transfer and acknowledging that the right under the trust deed to receive proxies in respect of the shares of such subsidiaries as are pledged to the trustee is vested in Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company instead of Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited.

In this manner the properties and assets of the subsidiaries will be held for Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company as the sole shareholder of those subsidiaries (aside from directors' qualifying shares), subject to the rights of the trustee for the collateral trust bonds of Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited.

This method would carry out the second alternative proposed in your suggestion. This second alternative is preferable to the first alternative for the following among other reasons:

(i) It is more expeditious, less cumbersome and less expensive than the first alternative;

(ii) If the physical assets of the subsidiaries were themselves transferred to Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, they would be subject to the limitations created by the trust deed securing the collateral trust bonds of Beauharnois Power Comporation, Limited, which restrict the amount of bonds and similar securities which may be issued secured upon the assets of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, and the purposes for which such bonds and similar securities may be issued, and places other restrictions upon such issue, whereas no restrictions are placed upon the issue of bonds and similar securities of the other subsidiaries. This is important, because such other subsidiaries will doubtless require to issue bonds and similar securities in order to carry out their respective undertakings; and

(iii) Some at least of these other subsidiaries have assets which are not required for or directly connected with the undertaking of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company. For example, some of these subsidiaries have lands acquired with a view to furnishing factory sites, housing developments, etc. It is therefore appropriate and advisable that these assets should be kept separate from the assets of Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company.

7. One of the first duties of the new board when elected would be to prepare a plan for the future financing of the company and any reorganization which that might involve. We would earnestly hope that this would not involve the liquidation of Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, as we feel that such a step would seriously prejudice or embarrass the future financing of the undertaking and it might cause injury and injustice to a wide list of shareholders and others who in good faith have invested their money in the securities of Beauharnois Power Corporation, Limited, relying upon the rights which that company's subsidiaries had acquired.

We hope that the foregoing suggestions will prove acceptable to the Dominion government, and that negotiations may now be commenced and brought to a speedy termination with respect to the terms of the orders in council which are to be promulgated when the Dominion statute respecting Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company is brought into effect.

It is needless for me to add that the representatives of the three banks (Bank of Montreal, The Royal Bank of Canada and The Canadian Bank of Commerce) are ready at all times to further those negotiations and to discuss with you in detail any of the suggestions made above.

Yours faithfully,

M. W. Wilson.

The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, P.C., K.C., Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Canada.

There was also the letter dated February 5, in which it was indicated, as I have already stated, that the 80,000 shares issued to the Sterling Corporation had been turned in for cancellation in accordance with the demands made by the government. Negotiations were carried on with the banks and their representatives, legal and otherwise, and in the end, as this house knows, an order in council was passed confirming, by a title superior to that which had theretofore prevailed, the grant of the 53,000 odd second feet of the river, and the provisions, conditions and reservations under which that grant is made appear in the order in council tabled in this house some few days ago. The proclamation duly issued, the statute became operative and the order in council is, as I have said, predicated upon that authority.

11. I next direct attention to the fact that on existing economic conditions which need not here be further alluded to than mentioned, the difficulties of financing were very great, that is the difficulties of selling first mortgage securities at the time, but in view of the position in which the undertaking was, we did in the manner indicated ensure its continuance up to the present time. Among the suggestions which were made was one that they might be able to secure assistance from the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, and negotiations, I believe, were carried on in that sense as well as with one or other or all of the power companies I have mentioned. April 1, being the half-year interest day, arrived and the company was without funds with which to pay its interest on the second mortgage collateral trust bonds. The government did not feel warranted in making any provision for the payment of interest on these securities in view of the terms of the trust deed which constituted the contract between the debenture holders, or the holders of the second mortgage collateral trust bonds and the issuing company, namely, the Beauharnois Power Corporation, for it will be recalled by the house, as I read from the document, provision is made that out of the proceeds derived from the sale of these collateral trust bonds, interest was to be provided up to the first day of October last and no provision was made for any date beyond that. We therefore felt under no responsibility in that regard, for it will be observed that nothing was said in the house or elsewhere at any time indicating that the government would place or would ask parliament to place the debenture holders or, as they are called, the holders of the collateral trust bonds, in any better position than they had placed themselves by the contract they had made when the securities were issued.

[Mr. Bennett.]

12. I next direct attention to the fact that during the progress of the negotiations and discussions and, in fact, recently the exact terms of the contract between the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, and the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company, that is the parent company, first became known in detail to the government. It will be recalled that at the investigation the contract was referred to, but its exact terms did not seem to be a matter of very great importance beyond the fact that a given quantity of power was to be delivered, rising with the lapse of time to a maximum, and the price fixed for it was to be uniform with the price paid by other purchasers of power from the enterprise. I have, however, since obtained a copy of the contract and paragraph 10 becomes one of very great importance. Paragraph 10, which will be found commencing at page 20 of the typewritten contract, reads as follows:

Territorial. (a) It is agreed that during the term of this contract the company will not, without the written consent of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power, sell or distribute electrical power or energy, either directly or indirectly, within the territory which is or may be served directly or indirectly by the Montreal Light, Heat and Power, which territory is understood for purposes of this agreement to be limited to the island of Montreal and such territory as may lie within a radius of thirty miles from Place d'Armes square, in the city of Montreal, provided the territory so defined shall not at any time be deemed to include any part of the counties of Beauharnois, Huntingdon and Chateauguay, and that portion of the counties of Verchères and Richelieu fronting on the St. Lawrence river to a depth of five miles from the said river; and it is further agreed that the Montreal Light, Heat and Power will not, either directly or indirectly, sell or distribute any electric power or energy in the said three counties of Beauharnois, Huntingdon and Chateauguay.

(b) It is also agreed that each of the parties hereto will assist the other in procuring the necessary right of way for the passage of through-going transmission lines across the territories of each of them as hereinabove defined and will mutually facilitate the passage of such transmission line or lines.

The exclusive right to sell power within a radius of thirty miles from Place d'Armes square, that is a total width of sixty miles, is by this company conceded to the Montreal Light, Heat and Power, which company in turn concedes to the Beauharnois enterprise the right to sell power within the three counties of Beauharnois, Huntingdon and Chateauguay, and on the river St. Lawrence for a depth of five miles in the counties of Verchères and Richelieu. That of course has a distinct bearing upon the attitude of other power enterprises towards interesting themselves in this undertaking.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask if that covers merely the 250,000 horse power mentioned in the agreement, or is it exclusive entirely of that?

Mr. BENNETT: It is an undertaking in terms not to sell power in those areas.

13. The next question to which attention should be directed is that which affects the rights of the $30,000,000 collateral trust bondholders. If the members of the house are interested, I shall give them the page of the trust deed on which the provisions in that regard will be found. Article 19, page 51, provides for meetings of bondholders and the provisions with respect to default being made by the enterprise in payment of its interest. There is the usual acceleration clause by which the whole $30,000,000 can be declared to become due, and thereafter follow the usual provisions in trust deeds for the remedies that accrue in case of default. They will be found in article 7, commencing at page 30 of the trust deed. Shortly, after providing for the acceleration of principal and interest whereby the whole $30,000,000, with interest, may be declared to be presently due, it provides for entry into possession and restoration upon removal of default—that is not of importance—the sale by the trustees of the shares and the method by which those who desire to acquire them may use their bonds for the purpose of discharging the purchase price. There is a provision for the appointment of a receiver or receiver manager by the trust company and the other usual provisions in that regard. I shall not trouble the house by reading them, but I think it is important they should be borne in mind.

The position at the moment, if I might direct the attention of the house to the matter, is that there has been default in the payment of interest due on April 1 to the holders of the $30,000,000 6 per cent collateral trust bonds of the enterprise; that that default must continue for a period of ninety days, which would be the months of May, June and July, to enable the holders of those securities to avail themselves of the provisions of the trust deed whereby they may exercise their rights of foreclosure, that is call for the payment of the whole sum, sell the shares and other securities that they hold for their bonds, and become practically, to all intents and purposes, the owners of the enterprise subject to the first mortgage bonds. That, I think the house will observe, is all they stipulated for when they made their advances of money on the security of the bonds, but to-day the parent company whose shares are their security has, subject to the observance of the terms and conditions of the order in council, a title to the water, which title it did not have before the investigation and which arises by reason of the fact that the 53,000 cubic second feet have been granted to them on the terms and conditions mentioned in the order in council under an act of the parliament of Canada which was assented to last year and declared effective by proclamation, I think on March 1 last.

Mr. DUFF: Will the bondholders be represented on the new directorate?

Mr. BENNETT: We have not got that far yet; I was just going to mention that. What action the holders of the $30,000,000 of the collateral trust bonds now in default may take is a matter for them to determine. There is a provision whereby the company may by extraordinary resolution appoint a committee in the meantime, which right I understand has been exercised; but the debenture holders themselves under the provisions of this trust deed may meet together and have a regular meeting for the purpose of determining what action they desire to take with respect to their enterprise, and it rests with them either by proceedings under the trust deed itself in the manner therein prescribed, or by arrangement, whichever is thought the more desirable, to determine what action they shall take.

In answer to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) may I point out to him that subject to the first mortgage bonds the debenture holders may, if they so desire, by appropriate proceedings become the owner of every share of stock of the parent enterprise to which I first referred, namely, the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company. The question of being represented on the board is not the question at the moment for they themselves may become the proprietors of an enterprise subject to the bond issue which I have mentioned.

14. It has been suggested that the government should guarantee the bonds of the enterprise and that other proceedings of various kinds should be taken. But we have now discharged our duty to these debenture holders, as they are called, the holders of these second mortgage collateral trust bonds of the enterprise. We have not only observed in detail and scrupulously the obligations which as I indicated to this house we regarded it as our duty to undertake, namely, (a) securing the continuance of the enterprise and (b) securing the rights of those who bona fide put their money into the enterprise, but I fancy that we have done that more scrupulously than they ever expected that it would be done, for it will be observed that of the total par value of these $30,000,000 bonds a little more than half, certainly not seventy per cent, became available for the enterprise, and two years' interest, $3,600,000 was paid back to them out of their own money. In addition it will be observed that the moneys paid to the syndicate—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton) The $3,600,000 interest that is provided for in the agreement, and nothing beyond that?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the $3,600,000 provided for in the agreement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The amount set aside for interest was specifically mentioned?

Mr. BENNETT: I want to make that quite clear. Paragraph 2 (a) of Article nine provides for interest up to the first day of October, 1931. That paragraph reads as follows:

> For the payment from time to time of the instalments of interest falling due in respect of the bonds up to and including the interest payable on the first day of October, 1931 (October 1, 1931).

That is the limit as to date. In other words, the payment out of their own money of the interest for the two years.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And not beyond in the construction period?

Mr. BENNETT: No, not during the construction period, for in the prospectus upon which the securities were sold it is apparent that it was never expected that the work would be completed for the purpose of supplying either in partial form the contracts entered into or the whole until at least October, 1932—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is why I asked the question.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to make clear that there is no provision in the documents that we have seen, and they tell us that these are the only relevant documents for interest after the first day of October, 1931.

Therefore we have secured during the interim control and management and it is so satisfactory, the engineers certify, that their expectations both as to the amount of work that would be done by a given date as well as the cost of it have been more than met, and we have taken such other steps as we think a government might reasonably be expected to take, and perhaps many in this house will think perhaps more than we might reasonably be expected to take, to ensure that they have not only the continuance of their enterprise but their water rights, available for the parent company on the security of the shares of which the advances were made, and to-day they are in a better legal position than they were prior to the date of the passing of the statute of last year and the order in council based thereon.

15. I have further heard it suggested that the language used by me last year contemplated that we were going to guarantee the payment of interest on these second mortgage securities. That is the reason that I have taken the trouble to read the exact words as they appear in Hansard as used in the House of Commons. Further, I think the answer is more complete when I state this, that the securities themselves, instead of rising in value, have decreased in value, which indicates at once the understanding that was placed by the public upon what we undertook to do and have done. In no event was it ever suggested that we should do more than protect them to the extent to which they protected themselves; and to the extent to which they have protected themselves, we have protected them. In addition to that we have gone further and secured for them, through the parent company as I have said, water rights that are beyond any possible chance of being attacked.

16. As to the future, that is a matter, as the house will see, as to which the second mortgage debenture holders, or the collateral trust bond holders, whichever term you desire to use, must in the very nature of things, take such steps as they think appropriate for the purpose of exercising the rights that are created and granted to them under the terms of the trust deed to which I have referred. We have indicated, as I said at the very threshold of my observations, that as this project was by common consent, alike by the late administration and by this, treated as an undertaking that was a link in the St. Lawrence waterway and that the canal should be a canal that would be available to navigation if as and when that undertaking is proceeded with—we have indicated our willingness to take a very reasonable view of the situation, that is, as to the extra cost involved in constructing a canal for navigation, and if a plan of reorganization is arrived at the government will consider sympathetically, at least, any proposal that may be made involving the acquisition by the government of first mortgage securities to the extent to which the cost might represent the extra cost of the canal for navigation as distinguished from power purposes. But that in any event would not involve us in any payment that would not be repaid under the terms of the bonds themselves. In other words, it might be advisable and in the public interest that by the acquisition of first mortgage bonds funds may be provided in the same way as from any purchaser, for the purpose of enabling them to carry forward the undertaking to which they are now committed and in which they have placed their money to the extent I have indicated from the documents I have read.

17. I think, Mr. Speaker, that that covers the position so far as I can place it before the house at this moment. I think it answers the questions that have been asked by the various members of the house during the last few weeks, and I offer my apologies, sir, for having trespassed so long on the time of the house, but there was no method which I knew of by which the matter could be clearly placed before the house other than by the reading of the documents which refer to the undertaking and its present position.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I ask whether the government concedes the claims of the province of Quebec with regard to the water powers or whether the government would consider placing before the supreme court a stated case as to the ownership and jurisdiction of water powers on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. BENNETT: I may say in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the question has already been submitted to the supreme court. The answers are unsatisfactory; I think that is a fair way to put it. But having regard to the relation of this enterprise to navigation, and to its being a unit in the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, I see no reason why at this particular moment that should be done. It is not improbable that some day the question will be determined on a concrete case, but references by questions have always been found unsatisfactory. The privy council has itself indicated that it very greatly preferred that such should not be done, that it did not feel itself bound by the answers when a concrete case did arise, and further that the opinion thus given in answer to questions was not better than that of the law officers of the crown. For these reasons I am greatly disposed always to avoid references on abstract questions when concrete cases may ultimately determine the issue.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the Prime Minister any objection to placing on Hansard the agreement between the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company and the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company—the whole agreement? The Prime Minister has read an extract from it, and it is a very important document.

Mr. BENNETT: If the house desires I will hand the agreement to Hansard, so that not only paragraph 10 but the whole of the contract may be printed. Obviously however that could be done only with the consent of the house, because it is not part of the particular matter to which I referred. If it is desired however I shall be very glad to do so. It might be put into votes and proceedings—

Mr. GARDINER: That would be all right.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Trade and Commerce suggests it would be preferable to put it in votes and proceedings.

Mr. GARDINER: That is satisfactory.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that this is not an abstract question in the sense it was a few years ago, when the first presentation was made. To-day it is a very concrete question, and as such it is in an altogether different position.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if re-organization has yet taken place and if the nine gentlemen mentioned by Mr. Wilson, as directors, have been appointed, or if the government has appointed the two they are to appoint?

Mr. BENNETT: I hope my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough follows me when I say that it is now no longer the prerogative of the power corporation to appoint directors, for the debenture holders—that is, the collateral trust bond holders, as they are mentioned in the trust deed—can in the ninety days now avail themselves of their rights. In the meantime the directors, less the three whose resignations have been accepted, are carrying on.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Am I going too far in asking whether or not there is a very great distinction between the situation at this time and the situation at the time when the former questions were submitted to the supreme court?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is undoubtedly correct in saying there is a difference, but the difference is not such as would be reflected in any questions which might be framed. I endeavoured to make clear that the mere framing of questions, however carefully and intelligently it may be done, is fraught with no final result, or brings about no final determination, for the reasons given by the privy council itself. They are no better than an opinion of the law officers of the crown. But it is competent for litigation to be instituted and the matter determined in the light of evidence submitted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the event of the second mortgage bondholders taking action, as they are entitled to do, on the date fixed, would there be priority for all the issue of the first mortgage bonds, or only such as are hypothecated for purposes of carrying on the enterprise.

Mr. BENNETT: That is very difficult for me to answer, as a matter of law, without going into the matter with some care. Offhand I would say the courts would determine that the advances made would be the determining factor.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I suggest that if the document to which the Prime Minister has referred is to be put in the votes and proceedings, it should be laid on the table of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to move, with the consent of the house, that we now revert to motions so that I may move that a copy of the agreement in question be laid upon the table.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask that the agreement with the government arising out of legislation also be laid on the table.

Mr. BENNETT: That order in council was filed some days ago.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The house will revert to the order for motions.

Mr. BENNETT: I move, with the consent of the house:

That the agreement between the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated and the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company be laid upon the table of the house and printed in the votes and proceedings for this day, together with a copy of the order in council, P.C. 504 dated the first day of March, 1932.

Motion agreed to.

WINNIPEG POSTAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) on Thursday last called the attention of the government to a circular issued by my department in regard to the hours of duty and the elimination of payment of overtime to post office employees. Unfortunately I was absent from the house last week, owing to illness, and was not in a position to furnish an answer. At this point I should like to thank the Prime Minister for his statement, and the reasons he gave the house for my absence. I am pleased to hand the hon. member a copy of the circular to which he has referred together with a statement setting forth the necessity for departmental action. After reading the statement and my explanation, if the hon. member desires to make further observations I shall be pleased to listen, and to give him what he requires if it is available.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH: (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General has not answered my question; I have read the circular. I asked whether his department was going to alter the agreement which had been in operation for years, and was going to increase the hours of work.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The Postmaster General has given what he considered to be an answer, and the matter is not debatable.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) if he will lay on the table of the house the new regulations regarding the hours of work of post office employees referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) last Thursday.

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): I will do so with pleasure.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, April 14, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): When the house adjourned on Thursday night I was endeavouring to place on Hansard some of the reasons for the low cost of farm commodities, a subject referred to by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). They spoke of the great difficulties affecting agriculture, but they offered no explanation for its being in its present shape. I have endeavoured to satisfy myself why the primary products of the farms are selling at such low prices to-day. Take our importations of canned meats. These importations, I may tell my critics opposite, are larger than I expected to find them. From the Argentine, a favoured country with whom we have a treaty made by hon. gentlemen opposite, we imported in 1930 canned meats to the extent of 7,087,820 pounds, from all countries a total of 8,758,250 pounds; in 1931 our total importations amounted to 5,992,336 pounds. All critics thrive during a depression; that is the time they get their work in. I wonder if our critic from Southeast Grey endeavoured to find out why our farm products were affected to that extent? We are told the price of hogs is low,—four cents a pound. I admit it, but there is a reason for this low price. As I told the house before it adjourned on Thursday night, a corporation in the city of Toronto imported two carloads of hams on July 28 and 29, 1931, from the United States. They brought them in under a duty of five cents a pound, expecting to get away with that duty, but the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) put on a dumping duty, and that firm did not attempt any further importations. But those two carloads broke the market in Toronto by one-half for the Canadian raised product, which is far superior to that imported from the United States. If I were at liberty to tell how those American hogs are raised and fed as compared with the Canadian hogs, I think it would surprise this house, and our people would not buy the imported article. I see my friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) laughing. I wonder that even he, a low tariff man, would permit American hams to come in and break the bacon market for our farmers. That is why the price of hogs went down a cent a pound. In 1931 we also imported from the United States 8,242,059 pounds of barrelled pork in brine. I want hon. members to get these figures, particularly the hon. member for South Huron. They might have been useful to him when he was telling the house how he intended to help agriculture, although he tries to block us on this side of the house when we are doing everything humanly possible to aid that great basic industry agriculture to get out of the hole. Through the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite that staggering quantity of pork in brine was brought into this country under a low duty. Some of it is even coming in free. It is brought in to ship stores in bond, and is then taken out beyond the three mile limit where it is used by our fishermen. If I had my way I would not permit them to eat that pork because I know how the hogs are raised and fed in the United States. I would prefer to have them supplied with the Canadian fed product. The Americans are getting the benefit of that business. Why won't you protect the Canadian grown product and so protect the Canadian farmer? Before I get out of the Marquette seat I will have protection for the farmer's primary products—protection is abused so much by our critics opposite. I want the Minister of Inland Revenue to listen to this, because I desire him to apply the dumping duty and save the situation in Canada. For the manufacture of cottonseed meal and refined cottonseed oil we are bringing into Canada from the United States 180,169 hundredweight of crude cottonseed oil; peanut oil and refining oil for edible purposes we imported to the extent of 337,163 hundredweight. That product was brought in to compete with the fine lard of this country, the best shortening you can have. These figures have been furnished by the Bureau of Statistics and they must be correct. The imports of cottonseed oil amounted to 8,218,214 pounds and of other vegetable oils, 68,885,823 pounds. The house should consider these figures; this material is coming into this country to compete with our hog raising industry. I see hon. members laughing, but it is nothing to laugh about. They are willing, in the agriculture committee, to talk their heads off about wheat, but the country would be better off if more time was spent in the discussion of the hog raising industry. Hon. members talk nothing but wheat and then wail and cry that this government is to blame for present day conditions in the live stock industry.

Mr. BROWN: Is the hon. member aware that last session the agriculture committee spent nearly all its time talking about hogs?

Mr. MULLINS: What has been done this last two weeks? Wheat has been the only matter under discussion. There has been some talk about the whiskers on wheat, but nothing about hogs. The committee has been spending its time discussing durum and other varieties of wheat, why does it not discuss pure bred cattle and help conditions in Canada? This country cannot exist without live stock. A farm does not look like a farm unless there are some live stock. When I go on a farm and see a lot of machinery scattered all over, it does not look like a farm to me. As I said some years ago, a sowless and chickenless farm is not the proper type of farm for this country; this country needs mixed farming. The figures which I have quoted give the true reasons why this industry has been driven into the ground by low prices. I have heard the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) speak on the tariff. The following was said a short time ago by the hon. member for Provencher:

> If the hon. members for Marquette (Mr. Mullins), Souris (Mr. Willis), Selkirk (Mr. Stitt), Portage la Prairie (Mr. Burns), Dauphin (Mr. Bowman), Nelson (Mr. Stitt), Springfield (Mr. Hay), and Brandon (Mr. Beaubier) had told their electors that if the present Prime Minister was returned to power he would increase the tariff. I do not believe they would be here to-day. They know that very well, and they know that they told the electors that the Conservative party was not a high tariff party. Can they go back to their electors to-day and tell them that? If they do they will be misleading those who put them in office.

The Conservative party was never a high-tariff party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: Hon. members may laugh if they wish, but that is the fact. For a considerable period I lived next door to the son of that great man, Sir John A. Macdonald; I sat in the provincial houses with him and I have visited him in his home. I have talked over that great national policy of his illustrious father, and he told me that it was never his father's intention that that policy should be based on high tariff principles to injure the consumer. That is not the policy of the right hon. gentleman now leading this government; it is his intention that no oppression shall be placed upon the consumer. Hon. members should not forget that advertisement which appeared in the Journal the other day. Hon. members opposite put the duty on agricultural implements down until it had reached six per cent, but all the time the price of machinery was climbing in price until it finally reached a prohibitive figure. A large manufacturing company in Toronto has reduced the price of machinery by ten per cent and has allowed a reduction of the same amount on all debts due to the company. That means that to-day a binder can be purchased for $28 less than it could have been purchased during the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. How can hon. gentlemen answer that fact? There is a tariff of 25 per cent on agricultural implements, but the price is coming down. I can remember in 1891 when the duty on agricultural machinery was 35 per cent, a binder could be purchased for $150; under the late administration the duty was reduced to six per cent but the price of a binder had gone up to $281. How can hon. members explain that to the electors? Put the tariff up just as long as the price of the machinery comes down. I want some degree of protection to save this great agricultural industry for the people of Marquette. I met the president of the Massey-Harris Company in front of this building and told him that he never would be able to sell machinery in western Canada with the present low price of wheat. The farmer needs new machinery. I helped a friend of mine for half a day to repair an old mower. There was a broken cog in one of the wheels and we were trying to get the machine together. The price of machinery must be lowered or the western farmer will be put out of business.

This is an answer to the free trade critics on the other side. Free trade is not possible in this country, when all countries have protection. I remember some years ago when I was in England walking around the tower of London, I wondered why so many men were loitering around the tower. I asked one man and he told me he was out of work. He said he had worked for forty years for one company without losing a day's work, but that they had put up two poles, one bearing a large loaf and the other a small loaf of bread and he was asked to vote for the large loaf. He told me that his present condition made it impossible to buy the large loaf and that if he had realized what he was doing, he would have voted so that he would have had sufficient money to buy the small loaf. At that time he was receiving only one day's work per week, and that was the result he obtained from free trade. Germany entered the British market and undersold the home product, and this man was put out of work. We cannot have free trade with protection all around us.

I am sorry the hon. member for Southeast Grey is not in her place. I do not know why she always leaves the chamber when I speak. It may be because I am not very interesting or because of my grey hairs. I shall not discuss the tariff any longer, but will go on to another matter. I find in this morning's Journal a severe criticism of the project which has been the hope of western Canada and which was to assist in the moving of our products. I am referring now to the Hudson Bay railway. The people of western Canada have been living in hopes of being able to ship their produce out of that country by some means or other, and if it is not to be by way of Hudson bay, then let us deepen the St. Lawrence waterway, so that we may be enabled to ship our products out; because no man can farm and pay present freight rates. This article on Hudson bay is just another one of the Journal's pipe dreams. It published a good many articles of the same kind when I was here in 1926; it did not give a tinker's curse for Mullins or anybody else who had anything to do with the Hudson Bay railway. I ask hon. members to read for themselves the statements made in that article with regard to navigation in that great channel. That channel is navigable; it can be made navigable, and I hope to live to see the day when liners will be going out of there in large numbers.

Now I come to the question of unemployment. This country is filled with the unemployed and the great question is—What shall we do with them? There is just one answer: they must go back to the land. They must be taught that tilling the soil is not a disgrace. They left the land a few years ago and crowded into the cities, which to-day are filled with unemployed who will do any kind of menial work. A good many men want to be doctors, preachers and lawyers, and they will do anything so as to escape the drudgery of the farm. These men must be turned back to the land. They must become producers; they must make homes on the prairies. I want to see men happy and comfortable so that they will be contented citizens.

There is another thing I want to mention with reference to the unemployed who appeared on parliament hill a few weeks ago. On that occasion I happened to walk down from the building and it struck me forcibly, as I looked at the sidewalks, to see it littered with cigarette butts. I wondered what the idea was. Before I leave this House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, I am going to bring in a resolution to prohibit the news stands from selling cigarettes to minors. Just think of what you see in the streets of the cities to-day. A little girl of fifteen driving a motor car, with a cigarette stuck between her fingers. A short time ago I was driving my daughter's car in Toronto when one of these little girls nearly smashed into me, and all I could see was her nose above the wheel and a big cigarette in her fingers. These girls will never make mothers. I leave it to any medical man in this house to say whether I am right or not. I want to read into Hansard a statement that appeared in the Toronto Star some time ago, bearing on this subject, because it will show what sort of women these girls will make when they grow to womanhood. Youngsters of twelve and fourteen years will go up to news stands and buy cigarettes, in one of these cheap cigar places. A well-regulated cigar store will not sell cigarettes to minors. What are our provincial governments doing? A few days ago I saw a gentleman from the city of Ottawa taking four delinquent boys to Toronto. When he got off this side of Toronto to go to the home, one of the little chaps pulled a cigarette out of his pocket and lit it behind the gentleman's back. It was easy to see where that boy would land in later life. It is these boys and girls that I want to save. In the Toronto Star on March 19, there appeared the following:

> Surely it cannot be that in the face of such evidence as that furnished by Mayo Brothers, of the Rochester Clinic, of Dr. Kellogg of the Kellogg Institute, Dr. D. H. Kress, neurologist, Washington sanatorium hospital, and countless others, the publishers of The Star would want to see the girls and women of Canada become addicted to the cigarette. Dr. Kress has said that if young women take up this habit, there will be a landslide in physical and moral degeneracy.
> At a medical association conference in Chicago in 1928, a woman doctor of Detroit who had made a study of this phase of the cigarette habit, extending over a period of twenty years, reported that 62 infants out of every 100, born to cigarette smoking mothers never lived beyond the second year. A prominent physician in Washington, D.C., stated that of 5,000 maternity cases coming under his observation not one mother was able to nurse her baby, if she smoked cigarettes.
> They put a leech on the arm of one cigarette smoking woman and the leech died from nicotine drawn from her system. It is to be regretted that such an example should be set the rising generation.

I am not opposed to smoking; I find no fault with a man of mature age who does so. Indeed, there is nothing I like better than to see a man in front of a fireplace, lighting his pipe; but I detest looking at a woman smoking cigarettes. The first woman I ever saw smoking a cigarette was in the city of Rome, Italy. When I saw her light one of these things I thought what a remarkable thing it was. Now you can see scarcely a woman who does not smoke. They nearly all have the pernicious habit in cities.

My time is about up, but I will say this in conclusion. I want the old days back; I do not want present day conditions. Present day conditions will not make Canada what we all want to see this country become. I say: What are you doing? Are you changing? Yes; you have the specialist now. Well, I want the old family doctor back. I do not want the specialist that looks me over first to see how much I have and then takes everything off my back. You can tax a lawyer—and, God help them, we have lots of them here—but you cannot tax one of these specialists. He takes your statement, figures how much you can stand, and then prescribes for you accordingly. Again, I want to see the old storekeeper back in the towns, not the department stores, I want to have the old cattle buyer back in the field—the man who comes to the farmer and says, "How much do you want for these cattle?" And the farmer, with some initiative of his own, states his price and does his own business right there. Give me back the old timers, the conditions we had in the early days, and do away with your new corporations, wheat pools and everything else, that has not competent management.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, might I be permitted to add my congratulations to the many which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has already received on the clear, concise, businesslike statement he made to the house in his budget address, and the gentlemanly manner in which he delivered it. I was the more pleased with his speech because it revealed some understanding of the problems confronting a minister of finance. In one place he tells us that one of the reasons for the falling off in revenue is that the government has been pursuing its policy of "buy made-in-Canada goods." I hope my hon. friend will not hold it against me if I use some of his own figures to prove he was correct in that statement. He tells us that our imports last year for the eleven-month period were some $521,000,000, while for the same period in the previous year they amounted to $831,000,000, or a decline of some $310,000,000. The average duty collected on all imports, dutiable and free, averaged 20 per cent last year. If the government had not shut out that $300,000,000 worth of goods which they claimed they did shut out by their policy, and the $821,000,000 worth had been allowed to come in, at the rate of duty collected the customs revenue would have been $166,000,000. Actually it was a little less than $103,000,000, or a decline of some $63,000,000 from what it might have been. The government tell us they have shut out these goods. The minister tells us the falling off in revenue is due to that fact; he also tells us that last year there was a deficit of some $51,000,000 on ordinary account. If those goods had been allowed to come in at the average rate of duty collected, we would not have had a deficit of $51,000,000 on ordinary account; we would have had a surplus of from $10,000,000 to $12,000,000. I hope the minister will consider this next year when he wants to increase his revenue and when he wonders how the Liberal party, when they were in power, always had surpluses.

There is in the budget one item with which I wish to deal seriously. Last year a special excise tax of one per cent was imposed for the first time and this year it has been increased to three per cent. I do not know why the government call it an excise tax, because it is a straight customs duty imposed on everything that comes through the customs, and on nothing else. Ostensibly it is three per cent, but actually it will amount to four per cent. The reason is that it is pyramided on the duty; it is a tax on a tax. If an article is worth one dollar and carries a duty of 35 per cent, the duty on that article will amount to thirty-five cents and the duty paid value will be $1.35. This three per cent excise tax will be levied not on the invoice value but on the duty paid value, that is three per cent on $1.35, which is a little over four per cent of $1. Therefore this tax, which is ostensibly three per cent, will really amount to four per cent.

But that is not the worst feature of the tax. Its worst feature is that it takes more money out of the pockets of the people than it puts into the revenue of the country. As nearly as I can estimate, the amount of goods imported during the coming year will be $600,000,000 or less. Four per cent on that will amount to less than $25,000,000, which is the most we can possibly expect in the form of revenue to the government from this tax, and, I believe that is a very generous estimate. Levied as it is on all goods coming through the customs, it will have the effect of increasing the price of those goods to the Canadian people. Thus it will invite our Canadian manufacturers to increase their prices by a corresponding amount. Last year we produced in Canada some $2,917,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, of which we exported some $475,000,000, leaving upwards of $2,400,000,000 worth of goods manufactured in Canada to be consumed in this country. This tax invites our manufacturers to add four per cent to the price of all those goods which they sell to the Canadian consumer. That would amount to approximately $100,000,000. But some say the manufacturers may not take full advantage of this. I am willing to admit that; I will grant you that some of our manufacturers have been wise enough, enlightened enough, not to take full advantage of the tariff; they have not advanced their price to the full limit. But the majority of them do so. I shall be very generous; let us say that instead of collecting from the people, under the shelter of this tax, $100,000,000, as they might do, they take only 50 per cent or $50,000,000. Then the people of Canada will, because of this tax, have paid into the treasury, $25,000,000, and into the pockets of the manufacturers, $50,000,000. In other words, at a time when it is imperative for a return of prosperity that the greatest possible amount of purchasing power be left in the hands of the people; at a time when the government's own financial position is such that it is imperative that every dollar taken from the people by way of taxation find its way to the treasury, at such a time the government adopts a tax that will take three dollars out of the pockets of the people for every dollar it puts into the revenue.

I am sorry the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is not in his seat. In his address the other night he propounded a question to which I gave an answer. I answered it at the time with one word "No." I want to answer it to-day in another way. The question was something like this: "Assuming," he said, "that a country with a depreciated currency has been shipping goods into Canada at prices that were injurious to Canadian producers, would the government be justified in using its power to exclude those goods"? The answer I gave him was "No." I want to answer him to-day by asking another question. Let us suppose those goods were boots and shoes. We know thousands and hundreds of thousands of our people in Canada are in need of boots and shoes and cannot afford to buy them. The question is this: Assuming a country with a depreciated currency, or with a currency that is not depreciated—or, indeed, with no currency at all, for any difference it makes to the argument—undertakes to ship boots and shoes into Canada and to give them away for nothing; would the Canadian government be justified in saying to the people who need boots and shoes: You must not accept those boots and shoes which are offered you for nothing; you can walk on your uppers; you can go in your bare feet until such time as you can afford to buy boots at prices at which our own manufacturers are willing to sell. I should like to get to that question a straight answer, yes or no, and I am sorry the minister is not present to give it.

Might I say a few words in regard to the Imperial conference, because I know the government wants my advice in this matter. The guiding principle which should actuate our delegates, whoever they may be, to the conference, should be this, that the only way the conference can be of any benefit to Canada or any other part of the empire, is by increasing trade, not by diverting it. Diversion of trade from one place to another does not add to wealth. Increase our trade by all means, but do not do anything to injure any of the trade that now exists. At present, 23 per cent of our imports are bought within the empire and 77 per cent outside it. Of our exports, 36 per cent are sold to the empire and 64 per cent to the outside world. More than two-thirds of our external trade is with countries outside the empire, and it would be a calamity if the government should jeopardize that two-thirds of our trade in the hope of increasing the other one-third which is carried on within the empire. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, but no one would ever think of giving two birds in the hand for one in the bush.

From remarks made by some hon. gentlemen opposite one begins to think the government may have some plan in mind for making at the conference arrangements under which tariffs will be so manipulated that goods from other parts of the empire will receive a preference if they come directly to our own ports over similar goods that might come by other routes. If they have any such notion as that in their minds I would warn them that it is fraught with grave danger. If our manufacturers or our citizens are buying goods from other parts of the empire, but not buying them in the country of origin, it must be because it suits their convenience to do so, and any attempt to force them to buy where it does not suit their convenience might have a disastrous effect on their business. If our rubber manufacturers, for instance, find it profitable to buy their raw rubber in New York instead of in Malay where it is produced, it must be because it pays them to do so, and if at the coming Imperial conference tariffs should be so arranged as to force those manufacturers to buy their raw material in the country of origin and bring it directly to Canada through our own ports, it might conceivably have the effect of adding so substantially to the cost of that raw rubber that our manufacturers would not be able to compete in the world's markets.

We also hear rumours of plans being made to establish complementary industries within the empire—that is to say, assigning different industries to different parts of the empire; saying to Canada, for instance, you are better suited to the production of such and such products, so you confine yourself to them; saying to Australia, you are better suited to producing these products, so you confine yourself to them; and so on. I do not think that any government, even this one, would be foolish enough to adopt such a policy as that, and hence I shall not waste any time on it.

But there is one matter that is of vital concern to us all, and that is those sections of our Customs Act which give the minister power to fix values for duty purposes, and thereby to raise the tariff at will. I refer to sections 35 to 43 inclusive, of the Customs Act and to the dumping clause in the customs tariff. So long as those sections remain on our statute books any agreement that may be entered into at the conference will not be worth the paper it is written on. It will be absolutely worthless. If at this conference, with these sections still on the statute books, our government should make an agreement with the governments of other parts of the empire to admit their goods into this country under certain conditions, and if the exporters in those countries were then to ship their goods to Canada thinking that they would enter this country under the terms of that agreement, the minister under the clauses I have mentioned could shut out those goods at will. The sections to which I refer should be repealed before this parliament prorogues. Otherwise it is the duty of the Prime Minister at the opening of the conference to say to the representatives of the different governments assembled: "Gentlemen, we are here if possible to make trade arrangements with you, but before engaging upon that task I must warn you that we have certain provisions on our statute books that will enable us at will to raise the duty against your goods and shut them out by that means in spite of any agreement we may reach at this conference." If the delegates from Great Britain and other parts of the empire are wise, they will refuse absolutely to make any agreements with us so long as those provisions are on the statute books. But I want to urge upon the minister the necessity of repealing these clauses before going into the conference, or at least of assuring the delegates from other parts of the empire that they will not be applied against them.

The Prime Minister, in a previous debate this session, made a remark that is rather disturbing. He said that he hoped that at the conference they would be able to discover some means of stabilizing the exchange values of the currencies of the empire. What does that mean? To stabilize the exchange values of the currencies of the empire simply means that we will agree to redeem each other's currencies at certain fixed values. If we should agree to purchase British pounds at the rate of four Canadian dollars to the pound and Britain agreed to purchase Canadian dollars at the price of four to the British pound, and then the Canadian dollar should go below that value, Britain would be in a position of having to redeem our dollars for more than they were worth. The value of a country's currencies depends very largely upon certain factors that are under the control of the government of that country, and not under any outside control. If the various governments were to agree on certain exchange values for their respective currencies, and if one of those countries should see fit to act in such a way that its currency becomes worthless, how can we expect other parts of the empire to redeem that currency at the price agreed upon? We have in this house some who would depreciate our own currency to half its present value. Suppose that at this conference we agree with Great Britain to buy her pounds at four Canadian dollars to the pound, and she agrees to buy our dollars at four to the pound, and then that the men having these ideas as to currency get into power and depreciate our dollars to one-half its present value. Under those circumstances could we expect the British government to live up to its agreement and redeem our currency at the figure agreed upon? The thing is absurd. Backing each other's notes is poor policy for nations, as it is for individuals. Our delegates going into that conference could not do better than to memorize and keep ever in their minds the words of Edmund Burke:

In politics it not infrequently happens that the magnanimous course is the profitable course. Great empires and little minds go ill together.

I would like to say a few words in regard to the subamendment. It reads in part as follows:

Therefore, be it resolved, that in the opinion of this house, as a first step towards general economic reconstruction, our financial system should be nationalized, and provision be made to issue immediately sufficient money to bring the value of the dollar as speedily as possible to that point at which the major portion of our debts were incurred during the war; stabilize the dollar at this point internally and thereafter manage credit and currency issue to secure and maintain a stable price level within Canada.

The object of the subamendment seems to be to stabilize the price level. In my opinion the trouble with the price level is not that it is not stable, but that it is not level. The difficulty is not the price level but the inequalities within the price level. The existence of society, the very existence of the human race itself on the earth to-day, depends upon the division of labour and the exchange of goods. The world could not sustain her present population by any other means. It is only by the division of labour and the exchange of goods that it is possible for the world to produce enough of the necessities of life to support its present population. But the exchange must be equitable. That is to say, making due allowances for differences in skill and differences in the degree of application with which different men work, the exchange should be on an equal basis, that one man's labour is equal to that of another. One day of your labour ought to be as valuable as one day of my labour, and the product of your day's labour should exchange for the product of my day's labour. But that condition does not prevail. We all know, we see on every hand, men drawing big wages for rendering very little service. We also see men rendering valuable service and receiving very small wages. These are inequalities that must be ironed out. It is not so much the price level as the inequalities within it.

We have been told in this debate that the price of primary products to-day is just fifty per cent of what it was two years ago and that the price of manufactured goods is eighty-five per cent of what it was two years ago. If you adjust the price level, raise the whole level as my friends to my left would, by inflating the currency, what would happen? You would bring back the price of primary products to one hundred per cent of what it was two years ago, and at the same time you would raise the price of manufactured goods to one hundred and seventy per cent of what it was two years ago. Can you solve the farmers' problem in that way? As at what date, I ask you, would you stabilize the price level? My friend says that he would stabilize it at the price goods were when most of our debts were incurred. I make this challenge: Name any date you like in this century, in the last century or in any other century, and say that you would stabilize the price level as of that date; I will prove to you that the price level at that date was not equitable, that prices within the level were not fair and just to all. This proposal to correct things by raising or lowering the whole price level will never iron out those inequalities. What is the trouble in Canada to-day? Is it not this: We produce a certain limited variety of commodities, and produce them in vast quantities—more than we can use ourselves. We have a surplus of those commodities which we must sell abroad. When the producers of such commodities can sell their goods abroad they receive in exchange purchasing power, which goes into circulation in Canada and creates employment in all other forms of industry. At the present time our primary producers, those of us who produce goods for export, find they cannot sell their exportable surplus. They have no purchasing power with which to buy other goods in Canada. They have to reduce their staffs. Those from whom they are in the habit of buying have to reduce staffs, bringing about the unemployment and the trouble we are having to-day.

The subamendment proposes to remedy this condition by some change in our financial system, by some change in our currency system, or some change in our banking system. I ask hon. members this question: Why can we not sell our wheat? The Minister of Trade and Commerce explained the reason the other night, namely that European governments have decided not to admit it to their countries. The same applies to our newsprint, our lumber and practically everything we have to sell. I ask my hon. friend from Acadia this question: What change will you make in our banking system; what change will you make in our credit system; what change will you make in our currency system that will persuade the people of Europe to buy our wheat, if their governments will not allow them to import it? What change will you make in our banking system; what change will you make in our credit system; what change will you make in our currency system, that will give us a better price for our wheat, if our own government will not allow us to bring that price into the country when we get it?

I think I understand the argument concerning inflation. They say the farmer to-day is loaded with a vast burden of debt which he incurred during a period of inflation and which he now has to liquidate during a period of deflation. They say when he borrowed $2,000 a few years ago he was borrowing the equivalent of a thousand bushels of wheat. To-day he has to pay it back with the equivalent of three thousand bushels of wheat. That is true. A real difficulty arises there. But I ask hon. members this question: Who hold the mortgages on the farms of this country? Most of them are held by the great life insurance companies, and when loaning money on mortgage most of those life insurance companies insist that the mortgagor take out a life insurance policy for an amount somewhat larger than the face of the mortgage. That has had the double advantage of increasing the life insurance business and improving the security of the loan.

Let us consider the case of the farmer who mortgaged his farm for say $2,000 during the period of inflation, and took out a life insurance policy for $3,000 at the same time. If the proposals in the subamendment were carried out and the dollar depreciated to half its present value, that man would be able to pay his $2,000 mortgage with 2,000 fifty-cent dollars, but the insurance company when his policy becomes due could pay him off with 3,000 fifty-cent dollars. Will that help the farmers? I do not think so. He will find that the rule works both ways. In the subamendment there is a suggestion to go back to the time when the debts were incurred, to a period of inflation. Is it not strange that these debts were incurred during a period of inflation, and yet my friends in the corner ask for another period of inflation?

When are debts incurred? Certainly always during periods of inflation. If a man familiar with the economic history of the human race had twenty years ago been transported to the northern wilds and kept there in absolute ignorance of everything that has since happened in the world, and were brought back to-day and presented with a statement of the present debts of our people as compared with the debts we had twenty years ago, and were asked his explanation, his answer would be, "You must have gone through a period of inflation." It is always during periods of inflation that we get into debt. This is how it works: money becomes cheap; every dollar is torn in two and each half is called a dollar. We are handling more counters. We think we are prosperous. Land values go up; every man tries to buy his neighbour out—goes into debt to do it. The price of stocks goes up—but not in real value, only in the number of counters. When stocks begin to go up everybody begins to speculate. We buy stocks in the morning at 50, and by night they have reached 60. Then we think we have made a profit of ten dollars. We feel rich and begin to live accordingly. Money is plentiful and easily borrowed; credit is easily obtained, and with that credit we buy more houses, more cars, finer furniture, finer clothes, consuming real wealth and giving worthless paper in exchange. That is the story of inflation. Inflate the currency again, and what will happen? There would be another boom in real estate, another boom in common stocks, another period of wild speculation, another period of living beyond our means. Then some fine morning we would wake up to find ourselves more hopelessly in debt than ever.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That would be the time to sell out.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes; everybody thinks he will sell out just before the crash comes. The unfortunate fact is however that he does not do so. When one man sells another man usually buys. Somebody is always caught.

I think the most unjust and immoral suggestion that has been made in this house since I have been a member of it was made by the hon. member for Acadia when he suggested we should tax the savings of the people into circulation. These are his words:

> If I were the minister of finance just for long enough to bring in the budget I would take the attitude that under present conditions we are justified in taxing those enormous savings into circulation.

I do not know what justification he can find for such a statement. We will suppose that two men working side by side receive their pay envelopes on Saturday night. One goes to town and spends his money, having a good time. The other takes a more serious view of life and says, "I will not spend all my money; I should like to save a little for my old age. I should like to educate my children when they grow up." He spends half his income and saves the other half. Surely he is entitled to his savings. If it is taken away from him, what happens? If we tax the savings of the people as suggested, we are taxing those men who make it possible for us to live in our houses. No man can build a house without borrowing money, or at least using someone else's savings. A man either has to save his own money or use somebody else's if he intends to build. If that money is taxed and taken away from him, what will he do? He will have to live outside until he can build his own home. If you tax that money into circulation you say to the banks, "Give us the savings of the people." What will the people do? They will take their money out of the banks and put it into their stockings—the first national bank.

Mr. CAMPBELL: They might put it into government bonds.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, and encourage the government in its extravagance. How would you get that money into the hands of the unemployed? How are we to get it into the hands of those who cannot pay their debts? These are the questions with which we are faced. The people will say, "We cannot put our money into the banks, so we will put it into stocks."

An hon. MEMBER: Or socks.

Mr. YOUNG: Stocks or socks, yes. If it is put into socks, it is hidden away and is of no use to anybody. If it is put into stocks—

Mr. RYERSON: Would it be the socks the hon. member exhibited in the house last year?

Mr. YOUNG: If my hon. friend wishes to see those socks he may do so any time he likes. If he puts it into stocks he will be investing it in more plant and equipment to which my hon. friends in the corner object.

And now, for a moment, I should like to deal with the suggestion made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to the effect that we might restore prosperity by artificially increasing the value of silver in its relation to gold. A few nights ago he made a very elaborate argument to prove that our trouble to-day is due to the fact that gold has become very dear. He said the fall in the price level had been the cause of all our trouble. As we measure everything by gold, a fall in price level means a rise in the price of gold. The minister says we can bring prosperity to China —which uses silver as her standard—by doing the very thing with their standard that has been done with our standard, and has brought disaster upon us. He says we should artifically increase the price of silver in China. If an increase in the price of our standard has resulted in disaster in this country, would not an increase in the price of China's standard have the same effect in that country? He seems to labour under the impression that China buys its imports with silver. China does not buy goods with silver; she buys silver with goods. China has no silver mines. She buys her silver from us, from Mexico, and other countries that produce it. If you artificially increase the price of silver you compel the Chinaman to give you more goods for the silver he wants. Can you restore prosperity to China in that way? I am afraid the Minister of Trade and Commerce was a little loose in his thinking on that occasion.

Coming now to the gold standard, are we or are we not on the gold standard? Some say we are not. We are not; and we are. In so far as redeeming our dollars in gold is concerned, we are not on the gold standard but in so far as measuring values is concerned, we are on the gold standard and we cannot get off it. Our values are still measured in gold, and when we divorced our dollar from gold, our dollar, still being measured in gold, dropped in value to eighty cents, the amount of gold it was worth. The law says so many grains of gold is a dollar, but the law does not say what that many grains of gold will buy, and when we said, "We won't give that many grains of gold in exchange for the dollar," then the business men of the world, and the public generally, the people said, "Well, we will give you for your dollars just exactly what it is worth in gold." I do not agree with the member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) when he says gold was chosen by Sir Robert Peel as the standard because it was pretty and could be cut up in pieces without hurting it. That was not the idea at all. Gold was chosen as the standard of value because in every country, in every age, and under all conditions, it was the one commodity that men were willing to take in exchange for whatever they had to sell. It did not matter what you wanted to sell, where you were, when or under what circumstances, you would always take gold for it. It did not matter what you were trying to buy, people would always be willing to accept payment in gold. The governments of the world in selecting gold as the standard of value simply said: "We recognize this condition which already prevails." That condition prevails, because, as my friends said, the metal has a certain quality in itself. It is imperishable; it is convenient to handle; it can be cut up without injury; it is attractive in appearence.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It is the most useless metal mined.

Mr. YOUNG: Maybe, but the human race are willing to give work in exchange for it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: You cannot make an axe out of it.

Mr. YOUNG: I say the human race are willing to take it in exchange for anything they have to sell, and it is the only thing they are willing to take in exchange. It is no concern of ours whether the metal is of any practical value or not, whether they want it to eat or to wear. The essential thing is that they are always willing to take it in exchange for what they have to sell. That is the reason why gold was chosen as a standard. It has an advantage too. Speaking broadly, the value of anything should be determined by the human labour required to produce it. It would be impossible to determine the value of one man's labour for a day against the value of every other man's labour for the same time, and it was necessary to find some commodity whose value was determined, as I said, speaking broadly, by the amount of labour required to produce it, and which varied in value very, very little. There is nothing produced in the world to-day that I know of the labour cost of whose production varies so little as that of gold. That is one of the great advantages of the gold standard. My friends object to it because it does not vary. They want a measure that does vary. But the mariner must always steer by a fixed star, not by a wandering comet. If we are going to determine the values of other things we must have something stable to measure them by. It would not do for us to measure to-day by a thirty-six inch yard stick and to-morrow by a thirty-eight inch yard stick. We want something that varies less than anything else —and gold is that thing. Those who would abolish the gold standard and put something else in its place must find some other commodity that has all the advantages of gold and that will not vary in labour cost any more than does gold.

Mr. HEAPS: What are they doing in England just now?

Mr. YOUNG: As I said, as a measure of value, England is not off the gold standard any more than we are. True, she is not redeeming her pound in gold, but gold is the measure of value to-day just the same as it was before, and that is the reason why the pound is down so low. Its value is being measured in gold and people will not give as much gold for it as formerly.

Mr. HEAPS: Is not the pound the measure of value. Not gold?

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. YOUNG: No, gold is the real measure of value, and because the pound is not redeemable in gold it has lost its value.

Now, in regard to the proposal that we should nationalize our banks, again I say I cannot agree with the subamendment. What would you do if you nationalized the banks? You would have to set up some sort of body to control them. Who is going to control that body? Would you set that body up independent of everybody else, a self-perpetuating commission not answerable to anybody, and let that commission do as it liked with currency and credit? If not, then you will have to make them responsible to somebody. To whom will they be responsible? To this house, to this parliament. And being responsible to parliament means being responsible to the government of the day. I ask my hon. friends in the corner if they would like to go into an election with all our banks under the control of my hon. friends opposite? Of recent days we have had some light cast on the inner workings of some of our government institutions. Don't you think there is too much political interference? Can you have such government control without political interference? If we made such a body responsible to the government, the government would be held responsible for their actions and they—the government—would have the right to control.

Mr. COOTE: Is my hon. friend trying to discredit the political party system?

Mr. YOUNG: No. I should like to quote a few words from John Stuart Mill's essay on Liberty in regard to this movement to put everything in the hands of government. He says:

> Every function superadded to those already exercised by the government causes its influence over hopes and fears to be more widely diffused, and converts, more and more, the active and ambitious part of the public into hangers-on of the government, or of some party which aims at becoming the government. If the roads, the railways, the banks, the insurance offices, the great joint-stock companies, the universities, and the public charities, were all of them branches of the government; if, in addition, the municipal corporations and local boards, with all that now devolves on them, became departments of the central administration; if the employees of all these different enterprises were appointed and paid by the government, and looked to the government for every rise in life; not all the freedom of the press and popular constitution of the legislature would make this or any other country free otherwise than in name. And the evil would be greater, the more efficiently and scientifically the administrative machinery was constructed—the more skilful the arrangements for obtaining the best qualified hands and heads with which to work it.

Further on he says:

If indeed all the high talent of the country could be drawn into the service of the government, a proposal tending to bring about that result might well inspire uneasiness. If every part of the business of society which required organized concert, or large and comprehensive views, were in the hands of the government, and if government offices were universally filled by the ablest men, all the enlarged culture and practised intelligence in the country, except the purely speculative, would be concentrated in a numerous bureaucracy, to whom alone the rest of the community would look for all things; the multitude for direction and dictation in all they had to do; the able and aspiring for personal advancement. To be admitted into the ranks—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. MacNicol): The hon. gentleman has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. YOUNG: Will you please allow me to finish this sentence, Mr. Speaker?

To be admitted into the ranks of this bureaucracy, and when admitted, to rise therein, would be the sole objects of ambition. Under this régime, not only is the outside public ill-qualified, for want of practical experience, to criticize or check the mode of operation of the bureaucracy, but even if the accidents of despotic or the natural working of popular institutions occasionally raise to the summit a ruler or rulers of reforming inclinations, no reform can be effected which is contrary to the interest of the bureaucracy.

Mr. F. T. SHAVER (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I desire first of all to add my congratulations to those already extended by hon. members on both sides of the house to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the presentation of his first budget. The province from which he comes is comparatively small in area and perhaps small in population as compared with some of the other provinces of Canada, but it has given to the public life of this country many eminent statesmen, and I am quite sure that throughout Canada today there is no one who is regarded in higher esteem than the hon. gentleman who now holds the portfolio of finance, for which he is so eminently fitted by education, by training, by long political experience and, most of all, by great personal ability.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the long address delivered a few days ago by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), the chief financial critic of the opposition. His remarks have been echoed and reechoed—sometimes the echoes were rather hollow—by hon. gentlemen opposite who followed. I noticed that his remarks were absolutely one-sided, and I was particularly interested in one observation he made, which appears on page 1421 of Hansard. Criticizing a speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), the hon. member stated that he had substituted information for argument. When I heard that remark I did not think it could be possible, and I verified it my consulting Hansard; I did not believe a man could be criticized for substituting information for argument. Information presented in logical order which is the method always followed by the Prime Minister, is the very best of arguments, and the speech of the Minister of Finance owned its strength to the fact that it was a presentation of that character. After looking through the long speech of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, which took nearly two and one-half hours to deliver, one must come to the conclusion that such criticism could not be applied to him, as his speech contained the maximum amount of argument built up on the minimum of information.

One of the criticisms levelled against the present government by many hon. gentlemen opposite who have taken part in this debate is the fact that Canada's foreign trade has declined since this government came into power. We all know that that is simply the result of world conditions, and that the foreign trade of every other country is also declining. I venture to say that if the comparisons were stated not in dollars but in tons, yards and cubic feet, in quantities rather than values, there would not be such a great discrepancy between the figures for 1931 and those for preceding years. The policy of the government now in power has placed the foreign trade of this country in a relatively better position when compared with other exporting and importing countries than it has been for many years past. In a period of depression we can make a correct estimate of whether our foreign trade is advancing or receding only by comparing it with the trade of other nations. According to the statistics for 1930, the last year in which hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, our country was fifth among the importing countries of the world, and in sixth position when exports were considered. In 1931, under the protective policy of the present government, we had dropped to sixth place among the importing countries but had risen to fifth place among the exporting countries. In 1930 we occupied seventeenth position with regard to our favourable trade balance, the favourable relation of exports and imports, but in 1931 we have moved up to fourteenth position. There is absolutely nothing in the arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite in an effort to discredit the government because our foreign trade had declined.

Attempts have been made during the last and present sessions to belittle the work of the Prime Minister at the imperial conference. We were told by practically every hon. member opposite who spoke last session—some have referred to it during the present session—that the Prime Minister had made a great mistake when he proposed that Great Britain should adopt a protective tariff, that such an attitude would result in nothing but failure as far as the results of the economic conference were concerned. The major and minor prophets on the opposite side of the house said that Great Britain would never forsake her old policy of free trade. There now seems to be a pathetic look on the faces of some hon. gentlemen opposite—rather like the expression of a man who has been betrayed in the house of a friend—when they realize that the last country in the world to which they could look to carry on free trade, and from which they derived all the shibboleths they proclaimed so loudly during the election, has forsaken the policy she followed for so long and has become a protected country. I am reminded of the remark made on one occasion by the great Disraeli when he described a political opponent as a man who was distinguished among his colleagues because he possessed only one idea, and that idea was wrong. As far as economic ideas are concerned I am sure that many hon. gentlemen opposite possess only one, that of free trade, and it has been proven to be wrong by the greatest exemplar of free trade.

I regret the many attacks which have been made against the manufacturers of this country. It has seemed almost impossible for some hon. members to make a speech without making deprecatory remarks about our manufacturers. They have been referred to as the protected vested interests, as those receiving special benefits from the government, and so on; but coming from a constituency in which there are several large industries, knowing what has been done by industry generally and realizing that no other class deserves the thanks of the Canadian people to a greater extent than the manufacturers, I desire to protest against this attitude. During this period of depression through which we are passing no class has been readier to make sacrifices, and to take such steps as would enable men and women to earn a decent living, than has the manufacturer. I am not concerned so much with the manufacturers as I am with the four thousand men and women in my own county who are making a living in industry and who are enabled to keep their families in comfort and send their children to school because they have had steady jobs since this government came into power. I know it is difficult to touch the hearts of some hon. gentlemen opposite by making an appeal on this basis. There may be hon. gentlemen who would prefer to buy agricultural implements manufactured in a country other than Canada, who would rather drive an American automobile than one made in Canada, who would prefer to use in their homes cotton goods made in the southern states or in Czechoslovakia rather than in the mills in my own county; who would prefer socks made in Japan to those made in Canada; and I know it is difficult to touch the hearts of such hon. members by making an appeal on behalf of the four thousand working men and women in my county. However, I do appeal to them at least to be reasonable and to give the manufacturers a fair show.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SHAVER: Resuming where I left off when the house rose at six o'clock, I would refer for a few moments to the taxation proposals brought down by the Minister of Finance in the recent budget. Every hon. member, I presume, is interested in the reaction of his own constituents to these proposals; he is anxious to know whether they have received them with satisfaction or the contrary. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McGillis), whose constituency is next to mine, and I have received several letters from those whom we represent, strongly approving of the taxation proposals contained in the budget. The Cornwall Freeholder of April 9 had a series of interviews with prominent business men in that town, about equally divided between the two political parties, and while there were some minor criticisms of a few secondary points in the budget, they agreed in the main entirely that these taxation proposals are fair and equitable and so adjusted as to fall on those best able to bear them. I will read one paragraph of an interview with one of the prominent business men of that town. He said:

> We must appreciate the fact that the government must balance its budget, and that the money must come out of the public. I believe that the budget taxation is chiefly aimed to take the most revenue out of those best able to afford it.

That is a clear indication that the majority, at any rate, of the people in my constituency are thoroughly satisfied with the taxation proposed in the budget, particularly in this period of depression through which the country is passing.

Returning now to a consideration of the conditions of industry in Canada, a question which I touched upon briefly before six o'clock, I think that one indication of the progress of industry is supplied in the number of failures in industry in Canada, comparing 1930 with 1931. In 1930, the last year in which hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, there were 2,402 commercial failures in Canada, and in 1931 the number had decreased to 2,216. The Bureau of Statistics informs us that 141 new industries of outside origin have been established in Canada since September, 1930, without taking into account any of the additions made to industries already in existence. Everyone in this house knows the beneficial effect on the automobile industry. For several weeks, in fact extending over a period of two or three months, we frequently saw in the newspapers reports of American automobile firms, one after another establishing branch plants in Canada, many of which are now in operation. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol), in the excellent address he delivered in this house the other evening, gave a very clearcut and comprehensive idea of the advantage which the changes made in the tariff by the present government have brought to the iron and steel industry. The hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Edwards) similarly explained in full the beneficial effect of the present tariff on the knitted goods and woollen industry of this country. These are two phases of industry that have been actually benefited. But I would refer hon. gentlemen to an authority entirely outside Canada, an authority wholly unbiassed and one who has no political preferences so far as Canada is concerned. The following appeared in a despatch dated Washington, D.C., April 14, 1932, and published in the morning newspapers of that day:

> Administration economic experts definitely attribute the expansion of American industrial branches in Canada to the influence of the Canadian tariff policy. The branch factory movement has been considerably retarded by the depression, except in the case of Canada, where it has been maintained primarily by the pressure of a definite tariff policy.

That is the opinion of Dr. F. B. Feiker, of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Relations of the United States.

I would refer more especially to conditions obtaining in my own county. Last year, in a speech I made in this house, I told of the benefits derived by the industries of Cornwall, and those outside the town, from the tariff policy of the present government. I am very glad to be able to tell the house that that improvement in industry has been maintained during the past year. I have here part of a report of the president of the board of trade which was printed in the Cornwall Freeholder of February 6, 1932, dealing with industrial conditions in the town in the year 1931. This is a very clear and comprehensive report under the heading, "Some improvement in conditions here during past year". I will read one paragraph dealing with industry:

> I now pass to statistical information concerning the industrial phases of our town and the surrounding district. The collective figures for fourteen of our industries are as follows: number of men employed, 3,353; amount of wages and salaries, $3,036,591.58; value of finished products, $12,264,377.48. This is a very slight decrease from last year and it is due to the fact that I am able to report for fourteen industries only, whereas last year, figures for seventeen industries were given. In has been impossible for us to get the figures of the remaining three industries, and should we have had them, there is no doubt that there would have been a slight increase over last year.

I am sure that in this period of world depression, when the president of a board of trade of any town is able to report a slight improvement in industry in 1931, it is a matter that must be gratifying to the Canadian people and especially to those of us on this side of the house. I mentioned last year that one of the largest industries in my county, Courtauld's Limited, rayon manufacturers, were constructing an addition to their plant, costing $2,000,000, and giving employment to 300 men during the winter of 1931. That addition to their plant has now been in operation for several months, and whereas when this government came into power 1,000 persons were on its payroll, there are now 1,400, working full time.

The hon. member for Toronto Northwest mentioned the beneficial effect which one successful industry had on others throughout the country, supplying that particular industry with the various chemicals and raw materials it used. As an indication of that truth, this industry to which I refer used last year over three-quarters of a million dollars' worth of Canadian materials including wood pulp from such widely separated parts of the country as Temiskaming, Ontario, and Campbellton, New Brunswick; coal from Nova Scotia; chemicals from Sulphide, Ontario, from Windsor and Montreal, and various other materials from other points.

Let me mention the fine paper industry, represented by two mills in the county of Stormont. By the abolition of tariff item 1060, in the short session of 1930, those industries were greatly helped and encouraged. They received many orders from Canadian magazine publishers, who had formerly received under the terms of that item a rebate of eighty per cent of the duty on paper purchased in the United States. The concerns in question received a good deal of additional business that way. Further, in consequence of the tariff changes made at the last regular session, many American magazine publishers were forced to come into Canada and publish here. That has also brought a good deal of additional business to these mills. In addition to that, stimulation of business in other industries has been occasioned by the tariff policy of the present government, and that has meant a good deal of business for the fine paper industry.

With reference to cotton textiles, which are represented by three mills in my county, it is a fact well known to anyone who has looked into the matter, that since the war there has been a world-wide overproduction of cotton textiles. That is true of nearly every country in the world that manufactures textiles of this kind, except Canada. To show clearly that there has been no overproduction in this country, I would point out that in 1930 the production of the Canadian cotton mills was, in money, $58,587,366; but we imported in the year ended March 31, 1931, $22,634,074 worth of cotton textiles. This proves that there has been no overproduction in Canada; on the contrary, there is great room for expansion in that industry. Let me show how this industry was gradually languishing under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1929 the production of the cotton mills of Canada amounted to $90,079,956, and, as I said before, it dropped in 1930 to $58,587,366. There was a corresponding reduction in capital investment, number of employees and salaries and wages paid. I have not been able to obtain complete figures for 1931, so that I cannot give a comparison showing the result of the policy of the present government on that industry as a whole in Canada, but I am able to give a comparison as regards the mills in my constituency, and they show a very clear and definite improvement. This table shows the production of manufactured cotton in mills in my county in 1930, the last year hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and that in 1931:

Year	Production
1930	6,579,178 pounds
1931	7,135,315 pounds

[Mr. Shaver.]

That shows an increase of 556,137 pounds or 8½ per cent, so that it is apparent the industry has been materially benefited.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite have compared prices; they have told us that prices on manufactured products have not declined to the same extent as those of the products of the farm. That is very true. It is something that always happens when there is a decline in prices, and that everyone deplores; but at the same time the reduction in the price of manufactured products has been much greater than hon. gentlemen have stated in the figures they have given to the house. In a short speech which I delivered a few weeks ago, I pointed out the reduction in price on various items as given to me by one of the leading merchants in my county, a gentleman who has been in business for a long time, who keeps accurate records and who is able to give a clear and correct computation of the reduction in prices. His figures show that in the last two years there have been the following reductions:

Commodity	Reduction in price
Dry goods	22 to 25 per cent
Boots and shoes	18 to 20 per cent

I notice the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) said that there had been a decline in price of 4.6 per cent on boots and shoes, and his figures were confirmed by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott). If they had visited some manufacturers or wholesale merchants or had bought a pair of shoes of the kind they were accustomed to buy two years ago, I am sure they would have found the reduction was much more than that. A gentleman who has a very wide connection with the furniture trade told me that furniture had decreased in price at least 25 per cent.

I wish also to place on Hansard a comparison compiled from figures on sales slips in the country store in which I am a partner. I am comparing prices in January, 1930, on goods on an actual sales slip of that date with prices on the same goods in January, 1932. I have several sales slips, but I have time to place only one on Hansard. I select this one because it consists entirely of manufactured goods, as follows: two pairs of rubbers, one suit underwear, five yards of ticking, pair of overalls, two pairs of woollen socks. The prices are as follows:

Date	Price
January, 1930	$11 00
January, 1932	8 10

That shows a reduction of 26.36 per cent, proving conclusively there has been a great reduction in prices of manufactured goods.

I noticed during the course of this debate, although perhaps not to the same extent as a year ago, some hon. gentlemen opposite are still holding post mortems on their defeat in 1930; they are still blaming New Zealand butter for that wonderful landslide which took place in July, 1930. They have only themselves to blame, they had placed themselves in a position where there was no possibility of escape. For four years prior to the last general election they were telling the people from the public platform, in the press and on the floor of parliament that large quantities of New Zealand butter coming into Canada were not detrimental, but in a sense beneficial to our dairy farmer. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) has been using that argument during the present session. The Canadian farmer, who in their opinion apparently did not know his own business well enough to control his production, had to be warned away from getting on the foreign market, protected from doing so, by the method of allowing butter from countries which could produce it more cheaply to come into Canada at a low rate of duty or under no duty at all. My hon. friends opposite used that argument until a few weeks of the election; then they brought down the Dunning budget and reversed everything they had said during the previous four years. They placed a duty on butter and gave notice of the abrogation of the agreement with New Zealand.

At that time I was making a personal canvass of the electorate in my constituency. I had been at this work for a couple of weeks, and the morning after the Dunning budget came down I noticed a different attitude amongst the farmers. They were convinced already—no argument on my part was needed—that the government which those of them who were Liberals were following, was entirely wrong, because they had admitted this by their own action. But the Liberal party were true to their policy of setting their sails to catch every chance political breeze, and they received the reward which they deserved. Hon. gentlemen opposite have told us about the low price of farm products and have endeavoured to lay the blame for that on the government of to-day. In my constituency I never told anyone that the Canadian price would be raised if world prices declined, but I said to the farmers that they were going to have fair and equal competition in their own markets; they were to have a chance to supply the people of Canada with butter made in this country. That was the argument I used.

The low price of farm products is common throughout the whole world, but I think I can prove conclusively the action which the present government has taken has been of great assistance in maintaining prices of farm products at a higher level than would have been the case had hon. gentlemen opposite remained in power. There is no question that their policy of admitting farm products of different kinds at very low rates of duty had the effect of keeping down the price at different periods of the year when there would be a chance from various causes for prices to rise; there was always this influence of a large quantity of foreign commodities coming on the market. I have under my hand a comparison of price reductions in Canada and in the United States, and I think it is a fair one. The percentages of price reductions in Canada are given by the Bureau of Statistics, and those in the United States by a bulletin issued by the United States Department of Agriculture on February 15 of the present year. This takes the average of wholesale prices of farm products for January, 1932, and compares them with those at various times in the past. The figures are as follows:

	Percentage of Reduction
	Canada	United States
Between January, 1932, and December, 1931..	1·9 per cent	8 per cent
Average for year, 1913..	16·9 per cent	37 per cent
Average for year, 1931..	8·8 per cent	22 per cent
Average for year, 1930..	36·9 per cent	53 per cent

That proves conclusively that comparatively the reduction in prices has not been nearly so marked in Canada as in the United States. I have also the average yearly jobbing prices of creamery butter. For a great many years there has been a spread between the price of butter in New York and Montreal. For the year 1931 when we had a protective tariff in effect—and this is significant—the spread between the New York price and the Montreal price was not nearly as great as it had been in the four preceding years. In 1927 the New York price was 8.72 cents higher than the Montreal average for the year; in 1928, 9.41 cents higher; 1929, 5.75 cents higher; 1930, 5.46 cents higher; and in 1931 the spread had been reduced to 4.15 cents.

I would also compare the prices of eggs. The average price of fresh firsts for the whole year 1931 was 30.17 cents per dozen in Montreal, and in Chicago 20.06 cents, a difference in favour of Montreal of 10.11 cents per dozen. It is significant that the difference in price between Montreal and Chicago is just about equal to the amount of duty imposed by the present government. The reason for that spread in price in favour of the Canadian producer throughout the whole of Canada is that our egg imports for the whole of 1931 were only 2½ per cent of what they were for the first three months of 1930, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and when we imported over $900,000 worth of eggs.

I have here some comparisons taken at different times during the winter. On February 15 the wholesale price of eggs, fresh firsts, in Chicago was 14 cents per dozen, and in my own county on that date the farmers were receiving 20 cents per dozen, or 6 cents more than the wholesale price in Chicago. On February 25 fresh firsts in Chicago were selling wholesale at 13¾ cents per dozen, and in my own county on that date the farmers were receiving 24 cents per dozen, or 10¼ cents above the wholesale price in Chicago.

I have a few more comparative figures to put on Hansard with regard to the prices of a few other commodities during the winter months:

	Chicago	New York	Montreal
March 5, 1932
Eggs, fresh firsts	$0 12¼	$0 15½	$0 28
Creamery butter	0 20½	0 21½	0 24
Hogs	4 05	4 50	5 10
March 14, 1932
Eggs, fresh firsts	$0 11¾	$0 14½	$0 26
Creamery butter	0 20¾	0 23½	0 28
Hogs	4 90	....	5 35
March 30, 1932
Eggs, fresh firsts	$0 13	$0 12½	$0 16
Creamery butter	0 19	0 21¼	0 27

There has been a reduction in the price of butter since that date, of course, but still the price is just about the same in Montreal as it is now in Chicago. At a very conservative estimate I think it can safely be claimed that a great many thousands of dollars have been placed in the hands of the farmers of my county and of other counties in eastern Ontario through the operation of the tariff policy of the present government, which has given them protection particularly in the winter months when the cost of production is very much higher.

A great many hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this debate have spoken in a very pessimistic strain regarding the agricultural industry in our country. I do not believe that that spirit of pessimism is shared by the majority of farmers themselves. They are passing through difficult times, it is true, but I would like to place on Hansard a paragraph from a letter in our Cornwall papers, dated March 14, by one of the leading farmers in my county. It is rather a long letter. The writer states some of the difficulties which farmers have to face at the present time, low prices for their commodities and comparatively high municipal taxes, but he ends his letter on this optimistic note:

[Mr. Shaver.]

The big question with every farmer now is—What can I do by my own efforts, with what I have, to pull through? I am not going to give advice or to dictate in any way. I am going to state facts and figures which I have known and found to be correct, and which go to prove that farming as an occupation is sound and as an occupation, as a means of livelihood and as a means of providing against old age and sickness, and so forth, is second to none, always has been and will be to the end of time. As an investment at the present time, there is nothing to my way of figuring that is more sound or sure. I am in the market right now for an extra piece of land. I need it in my business, and my business is just farming. It is paying me a fair profit, has been for twenty-five years and will continue to do so as long as I think that way. If when I am through anyone can tell me or show me what I think or believe to be wrong, I want to know it. I doubt if anyone can.

I think that the farmers in all parts of Canada can look forward with confidence to the coming Imperial economic conference. We expect that further advantages will be gained in the markets of the motherland for Canadian farm products. I am sure we are all glad that we have at the head of the Department of Agriculture a gentleman who during the time this government has been in power has shown himself to be thoroughly alive to the needs of the farmers in every section of this country, a man who can be depended upon to look after their interests. Canada's future, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, is safe. The people of Canada have every reason to be optimistic if any people in the world have. First of all because of the virile and progressive character of the people who inhabit this northern part of this American continent. Secondly because we have great natural resources of which only the fringe has yet been tapped. Thirdly, and very important at the present time, because our destiny is entrusted to the hands of one of the greatest statesmen in the British Empire to-day. It was his straightforward course at the last Imperial economic conference that made it possible for the coming conference to have a fair chance of success, and I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. gentleman who heads the government of Canada to-day, with the able body of men that he has associated with him in his cabinet, can be safely trusted to see Canada through.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I wish first of all to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the fact that his budget speech was on such a high plane and couched in cultured and dignified language befitting the occasion, that occasion being the presentation to the shareholders of Canada of their annual statement of accounts.

Of primary importance in the budget is the increase in the income tax. I wish to congratulate the minister on his income tax proposals, not simply because he has increased the tax, nor because I like to see an increase in the taxes of someone else beside myself, but because I believe that when we must have additional revenue the income tax is the very surest way of securing it; it is also the fairest tax because it is based purely on the principle of ability to pay.

Perhaps I may be permitted to put on record a few figures to show that the income tax is capable of being used still further as a revenue producer. I will give first the figures of the income tax for 1921, when the present government went out of office, about the end of the war period; the reductions made in income tax in the last régime, and the new income tax, which is still considerably lower than the tax as it was in 1921. The figures that I shall quote are for a married person without children:

Income	Tax 1921	Tax 1930	New tax
$ 10,000	$ 619 50	$ 232 00	$ 354 90
20,000	2,089 50	1,232 00	1.730 40
30,000	4.084 50	2,880 00	3.918 60
100,000	32.749 50	19,064 00	25.248 30
200,000	97,849 50	51,496 00	67,859 40

I think, Mr. Speaker, these figures will show that the income tax is capable of being used still further, provided that additional revenue is required another year.

I wish again to express my appreciation of the fact that the Minister of Finance has seen fit to postpone for another year the imposition of the increased duties on implement repairs, and I hope by the time another year has come round he will see fit to cancel them altogether. In this section of the house, where hon. members are so very much concerned with the matter of implement repairs, we appreciate the minister's action very much indeed. This budget stands in a class by itself, and enjoys the unique distinction of containing no increases in the tariff, and only one decrease. The reasons are of course fairly obvious. I presume on account of the approaching Imperial economic conference the government is postponing alterations until that time. For that reason we appreciate all the more the fact that the minister has made this one exception by postponing the imposition of the duty on implement repairs.

There is just one other feature to which I should like to draw the attention of the minister, namely the method of application of the so-called excise tax. This is increased from one to three per cent, and as it applies only to imports it really constitutes an increase in the tariff. My understanding of an excise tax is that it should apply equally on home products and imported goods. In this case the minister is simply following the example set by the Minister of Finance for the year 1926, the late Hon. Mr. Robb, who, I think for the first time, made the excise tax on motor cars applicable only to imported cars, amounting to an increase in protection.

I think I may safely state that so far as we can now see the outstanding event in the year will be the Imperial economic conference. People in all parts of the British empire are looking forward with hope and confidence to the conference, and I trust the Canadian government will not disappoint the people of Canada or of other parts of the empire by failing to do its share to measure up to expectations. Any disappointment or failure of the conference to measure up to the hopes of the people will indeed be serious. Disappointment would mean reaction, and would have an adverse psychological effect on business. I suggest that the government be prepared—probably they are; but there is no harm in suggesting that they go to the conference prepared to make some substantial reductions in duties on British imports. It seems to me that unless they are ready to do that so far as we are concerned the conference will come to an end. If we expect to secure preferred treatment in the British market for our wheat, butter, cattle, lumber, copper or the many other products of Canada, we must be prepared to meet them in a spirit of fair play and make substantial reductions in the tariff on certain classes of British goods.

When we survey the schedules we cannot help thinking that textiles will be one of the commodities British people will be expecting to ship to Canada. The textile industry is being more carefully nurtured and better protected than any other industry in Canada. Some lines in connection with the textile industry are not indigenous to this country, and we should be prepared to make some concession to British interests in that regard.

I should like to say a word or two concerning the St. Lawrence deep waterway. From one end of Canada to the other there is considerable discussion as to whether or not this project is feasible, but I believe the consensus of opinion throughout Canada is that it is a practicable proposition. From the standpoint of both transportation and power it seems to me that the completion of that project would be a good thing for Canada. At the present time materials and labour are cheaper than they have been for a quarter of a century, and this is an opportune time to go ahead with and complete the work. Cheap material and cheap labour would be available, with resulting lower overhead and lower costs of power and transportation for all time to come. Already part of the scheme has been completed. We have the great Welland canal, the construction of which cost about $125,000,000, and the Beauharnois canal, now almost completed, at a cost of about $20,000,000, ownership of which has been vested in the federal government. In any arrangement made with the United States, Canada would be entitled to a cash credit for her interest in parts already completed, and that is something we may well take into consideration. I do not listen to many of the extravagant predictions concerning reduced rates on our grain and other commodities, put forward by those favouring the project. Undoubtedly many unwarranted and extravagant statements are being made in that connection, but I feel quite sure that from the standpoint of transportation the completion of the project is fully justified.

Then we must consider the development of power. Cheap power is the basis of industry. The more cheap power we can put on the market in Canada the more likely we are to bring industries from other lands. I do not believe I am overstating the facts when I say that to-day Canada has more potential water power than all the rest of the world put together. It seems to me that by a proper development of that power, seeing to it that the overhead in the development is not too great, we can lay a foundation for the greatest industries Canada and the world has ever seen. I may be looking ahead some distance, but I am convinced that Canada has greater opportunities in that respect than any other country in the world. The distribution of money, the employment of labour necessary in the construction of a work of this kind, would be a stimulus to industry and have beneficial effects all round. In addition undoubtely the government would be saved the expenditure of millions of dollars in unemployment relief. Practically the only market we have to look forward to for our wheat is Great Britain, but I still believe the United States is the logical market for many of the products of our farms, our forests and our mines, and it is a market of which I hope we shall ultimately secure a fair share. The completion of arrangements for the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway should be a powerful factor in creating more harmonious relations between Canada and the United States—relations which would, I trust, ultimately result in trade arrangements to the mutual benefit of both countries.

May I draw attention more particularly to the Liberal amendment. It simply asks for a reduction of tariff, I presume back to the position where it stood when the Liberals left office in 1930. Quite obviously this is not sufficient to cope with the present depression. The moving of such a meek and anaemic amendment was not a fitting end to the very able presentation of the case for his party made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). In looking over this amendment in the face of the very serious problems confronting us to-day, I would say it is utterly unworthy of the great traditions of the Liberal party.

On the other hand, the subamendment goes to the very root of present day conditions. Of first consideration in dealing with the depression is the condition of agriculture. In this connection I should like to place upon Hansard some figures from the Economic Annalist, a publication issued by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir):

Annual and Monthly Index Numbers of Prices and Production Computed by Dominion Bureau of Statistics

Year	Wholesale prices, 1926=100 All commodities	Farm products	Field products	Animal products	Retail prices and cost of services
1913..	64·	62·6	56·4	77·	65·4
1920..	155·9	161·6	166·5	149·9	124·2
1926..	100·	100·	100·	100·	100·
1931 (Feb.)..	76·	60·9	45·	87·5	94·1
1932 (Feb.)..	69·2	52·1	43·7	66·2	84·6

It will be noted that while all commodities dropped thirty-one per cent from 1926 to February of this year, farm products separately dropped forty-eight per cent. It will also be noted that the index figure for farm field products to-day is just about twenty-five per cent of what it was in 1920. This was about the time when, I believe, the great bulk of the debts of our western farmers were incurred, so it can easily be seen what a desperate position our farmers are in to-day with respect to those debts. I should add that the column dealing with retail prices and cost of services includes food, rent, fuel, clothing and sundries. I draw attention to the fact that while these retail prices dropped only about fifteen per cent from 1926 to February of this year, field products dropped fifty-seven per cent. This will show one of the reasons why agriculture is adversely affected to a much greater extent than other industries.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) in the very able and very excellent speech he gave us a few nights ago dealt with the money question. I wish to congratulate him on the study he has made of this question, and for the moral courage he had to express the opinions he did from the government benches. I would say that he is the first federal cabinet minister who has ever attacked the money problem from that angle. He stated that there were four factors in the present depression—price levels, debt, interest and trade. In dealing with the fluctuating value of money and showing its effects on liabilities and debts, he asked the pertinent question as to what would happen if the system of weights and measures fluctuated as have commodity values during the last few years. He told us that what we needed to-day more than anything else was stability of prices. I may say that the minister's speech was almost a complete endorsation of the subamendment, because that is exactly what is aimed at. The minister did imply that it would be necessary to have an international agreement to bring about any stabilization of commodity prices and to correct the evils in the money system. I quite agree with him that we cannot deal with this question fully outside of an international agreement, but I do contend that if we sit here and wait until there is an international agreement arrived at nothing will ever be done. We in Canada can correct the position to a very large extent even without assistance from the outside world at all. Let us take the position of France in the depression of 1920-21. I do not think it will be contradicted by anyone that the international bankers' association agreed on a general deflation in 1920 in order to bring the various countries back to the gold basis. Arrangements were made to have this brought about concurrently throughout the great countries of the world. The United States bankers deflated and they put six million men out of work, involving great misery, suffering and hardship. The English bankers deflated, two million men were put out of work, and they have been unemployed ever since. We know what happened in Canada. We had a period of very great distress, not so serious as the depression we are going through now, but very serious indeed. But the action of the French government is worthy of our attention. The government of France forbade their bankers to deflate as the bankers did in the other great countries, and while in other countries prices were tumbling and men were thrown out of work with all the consequent hardship, misery and suffering, commodity prices remained fairly stable in France throughout that period, and every single man was working. As a matter of fact, while two million men were out of work in England, and six million were unemployed in the United States, France was bringing in workmen from Poland and the other eastern countries of Europe to keep her industries running.

An hon. MEMBER: They are not doing it now.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I quite understand that, but France did pull through that period much better than any other country in the world, largely because she refused to follow the general deflation policy of the international bankers and maintained the level of prices. It was not until 1927 that France went back on the gold basis, and she did it then by establishing her currency at 25 per cent of its normal value. That meant writing off about 75 per cent of her national debt, but she did not strangle her industries; she kept her people working. That action of the French government should be an object lesson to Canada and to all other countries in the world. It seems to me that the preferred position in which France finds herself to-day is due to the action taken at that time by the government. After reducing her debts, after refusing to deflate and to go back to the gold basis, France to-day is the second largest holder of gold and she is almost supreme in dictating the financial policies of the rest of the world. If that means anything, it means that in Canada we can do the same thing regardless of whether or not there is an international agreement.

I do not need to take up the time of the house in discussing the relationship of the amount of money in circulation to commodity price levels. I think it is generally recognized to-day that the commodity price level is determined by the amount of money in circulation. This afternoon the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) criticized severely the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) in connection with his subamendment. The hon. member stated that it is absolutely necessary to have gold in order to maintain stability of prices, but I would say to him that the value of gold is fluctuating from day to day. This is a recognized fact among world economists. A short time ago thirty-eight cents in gold was all that was necessary to maintain the United States on a gold basis; to-day it takes about eighty cents. The standard of measurement has simply been lengthened. Gold to-day is one of the most useless metals; gold hidden away and sealed in the vaults in New York is performing no useful function. We have got into the habit of worshipping gold, and until we get away from that habit and get on to a sounder basis, we cannot expect to have prosperity in Canada.

The hon. member for Weyburn overlooked another factor with which this subamendment proposes to deal, and that is the relationship between commodities and debts. Debts were contracted when money was at a low valuation and now that we have almost quadrupled the value of money we have to pay three or four times the amount borrowed. This applies equally to public and private debts. One object of the subamendment is to bring about the return of a proper relationship between commodity values and debts, to bring about the relationship which existed at the time the debts were created. As a matter of fact, there is no other way of paying these debts; going on as we are going on to-day simply means cancellation. My hon. friend probably would throw up his hands in horror at the suggestion of a general cancellation of debts, but we are on the horns of a dilemma—we must either inflate and get back to higher commodity levels in order to pay our debts, or we must cancel many of our debts. There is no middle course; we must choose either the one or the other. May I be permitted to quote a recognized authority in these matters, the Royal Bank of Canada, one of the largest banks in Canada. Dealing with the depression, their monthly letter said:

> The present depression is usually explained in terms of extravagance, overproduction, excessive tariff barriers, etc., but, speaking generally the controlling influence has been the mismanagement of money and credit.

Could anything be more striking, coming as it does from one of the largest banks in Canada?

I direct the attention of the house to the fact that we have in Canada to-day the largest amount of bank deposits we have ever had in the history of the country. The latest figures for February show that these deposits amount to $1,390,000,000, and the increase from January to February amounted to $22,000,000. In some quarters this fact is considered as evidence of stability and prosperity; as a matter of fact it means the very opposite, it is an indication of business stagnation. If there were good investments available in business, this money would soon find its way into those channels. The hon. member for Acadia dealt with this particular question, and it is one of the points upon which he was severely criticized by the hon. member for Weyburn. The hon. member for Acadia suggested that these deposits be taxed into circulation, but I think the hon. member for Weyburn had an entirely wrong impression of what was being aimed at. The hon. member for Acadia was suggesting that something must be done to get this money into circulation, to get it working. For instance, only a short time ago the province of Alberta had to pay nearly 7 per cent on a loan issue. Just imagine—a provincial government having to pay nearly 7 per cent interest; and I understand there were additional inducements in the way of tax exemptions and other guarantees of that kind. Ontario, the wealthiest province in Canada, had to pay 6½ per cent interest on a loan recently floated. All this at a time when there is more money in the savings banks of Canada than ever before! Is it not reasonable to suggest that some governmental action should be taken, not to turn this money into speculative channels, as suggested by the hon. member for Weyburn, but into investment channels in municipal and government bonds?

I have another suggestion to make. Supposing the government were to set a maximum interest rate to be charged by the banks? If that rate was a reasonably low one, the banks in turn would be forced to reimburse themselves by reducing the rate of interest paid on deposits. When the depositor found his interest rate cut down to 1½ or 2 per cent, he would probably buy some good Ontario, Alberta or Saskatchewan bonds, or perhaps the federal government bonds. That is one of the important things which we have to face to-day; we need a lower rate of interest on government loans. However, the main object of the subamendment was to increase the money in circulation and thus stimulate business and cause the rise of the commodity price level. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out, a rise in prices means a corresponding decrease in debts, both public and private.

A short time ago the members of this house were treated to a very excellent address by a distinguished gentleman from the old country, Sir Josiah Stamp. Sir Josiah Stamp is not a mere theorist or student, he is one of the biggest business men in England, being a director of the Bank of England and of the London, Midland and Scottish Railway. Perhaps I could not pay him a higher tribute than to quote the words used by the Prime Minister in introducing Sir Josiah. The Prime Minister referred to him as the greatest and soundest mind dealing with world affairs ever known.

Mr. YOUNG: What did he say about the gold standard?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I shall come to that in a moment. He predicted that England would not return to the gold standard; as a matter of fact, he suggested that England should reduce still further the value of her money. He said there would be no prosperity in England until they got back to the 1929 price level, and in order to get back to the 1929 price level there would have to be further inflation and a further reduction in the value of the pound. Sir Josiah did not attempt to tell us how to run our business in Canada, but his inference was strong. He said something to which this house and the people of Canada might well pay attention; the words of a gentleman who merits the praise applied to him by the Prime Minister should be taken seriously.

In conclusion, I should like to quote another authority, the monthly review issued by the Midland Bank of London, England. This is the most powerful bank in the world, and, dealing with the depression, this is what it says, in part:

> Humanity is notoriously slow to learn by its own mistakes and inefficiency. It is easy to cry to heaven and denounce the slump as an act of God. But the old proverb still holds good, that heaven helps those who help themselves. A first task in self help is to devise a sure means of regulating the commodity price level and thus to avoid the repetition of a large part of the troubles we have brought upon ourselves.

Mr. G. M. McDADE (Northumberland): May I join heartily in the congratulations extended to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), on his elevation to this most important portfolio. The hon. gentleman has had a long and distinguished career in the public life of Canada. For a time he held the high position of Speaker of this assembly, and afterwards was Prime Minister of his native province of Nova Scotia, both of which offices he occupied in an eminently satisfactory manner.

The matter of paramount importance before this house for some time seems to have been the unemployment situation. May I be permitted to dwell briefly on some phases of the subject, particularly as it affects the province of New Brunswick and the county of Northumberland, the constituency I have the honour to represent in this house. We all appreciate the fact that the present depression is world-wide. Some of my good friends opposite, in the course of a discussion that took up about three weeks, seemed to lose sight of the fact that conditions in Canada are no exception to those that obtain in many other countries to-day. As a matter of fact, conditions are better in Canada than in other countries, due reasonably to the sound policies of this administration. I submit, therefore, that it is unfair and illogical to attach any blame to the present government for the existing depression and distress which we find generally in this country. It is, I repeat, a world-wide condition.

Coming particularly to the province of New Brunswick, I may say that there was expended under the 1931 regulations on a contributory basis, on unemployment relief works, the sum of $2,165,020. This, I submit, is a record of which we may be proud. We could not have carried on in New Brunswick if these expenditures had not been made. The following table of expenditures speaks for itself:

	Total	Federal share
Municipal work. . .	$ 439,600	$117,400 00
Provincial works, such as clearing land rebate in stumpage.	292,445	146,222 50
Provincial highways.	1,030,175	412,070 00
Trans-Canada. . . .	148,000	74,000 00
	$1,910,220	$749,692 50

Works of strictly federal character were carried on in New Brunswick under the unemployment relief to the value of $247,800, on public works, and $7,000 in the Department of Agriculture, making a total of federal moneys expended in New Brunswick of $1,004,492.50, aside from direct relief, purchase of ties and ordinary federal public works expended and not coming under the provisions of the unemployment relief fund. In the county of Northumberland, under the 1931 regulations, the following expenditures were made:

	Total	Federal share
Chatham.	$ 45,000	$15,000
Newcastle.	45,000	15,000
Northumberland county highways.	150,000	60,000
Bartibogue river dredging.	5,000	5,000
Bay du Vin.	4,500	4,500
Burnt Church.	15,000	15,000

Also $5,000 in 1932 estimated.

Chatham wharf extension $10,000 voted but not yet spent.

Oak Point wharf, $1,000.

Rebate in stumpage $120,000 for all lumber operations, $60,000.

This is not wholly confined to Northumberland county.

In addition, the purchase of ties in Northumberland under the 1931 regulations—and here I wish to thank the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) for his cooperation in using his good offices with the president of the Canadian National railway system—amounted to $85,000, while about $100,000 was expended by the federal government for strictly federal works, not coming under the unemployment fund.

So far as federal expenditures under the unemployment relief fund in the county of Northumberland are concerned, no politics whatever was practised by the hon. member who happens to occupy that seat at the present time. As a matter of fact some of my good friends, particularly on the north side of the Miramichi river, saw fit to call a meeting and pass a vote of censure upon the member because he did not see fit to interfere in the handling of unemployment expenditures.

[Mr. McDade.]

May I be permitted to say a word respecting the Canadian National Railways? I wish to congratulate the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) upon the very substantial reduction that has already been effected in operating costs. I am sorry that I am not in agreement with the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) in his statement that the Canadian National railway system should be sold to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We from the province of New Brunswick would be opposed to such a proposal unless and until we receive the report of the Duff commission, which has made a careful investigation into the various ramifications of the railway situation and which will be qualified to submit a fair and impartial report. At the same time I wish to say a word for the Canadian National Steamships. I have it on reasonably high authority that next year there will be a sufficient operating profit to discharge not only the operating expenses, but also the interest on the debt incurred. While I am on the subject, I should like to urge upon the Minister of Railways the desirability of including in the small special committee—the executive committee of management—one of the directors from the maritime provinces. We in the maritimes are great admirers of the Minister of Railways, and we feel that as the Intercolonial was the pioneer part of the Canadian National railway system, and particularly as we have such important questions affecting the great ports of St. John and Halifax, the minister and the management might reasonably include in this subcommittee a representative from the maritime provinces.

A matter of outstanding moment to-day in world politics, particularly in empire politics, is the approaching economic conference. I wish to congratulate the distinguished Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett) and his colleagues on bringing this important economic conference to the capital city. May I humbly suggest that we approach the conference in a quid pro quo attitude; that we be prepared to give reasonable concessions in exchange for preferences in the mother country. Of especial interest to us on the north shore of New Brunswick is the policy of the administration to endeavour to secure preference for Canadian lumber. Lumber on the north shore of our province is our basic industry. It is indeed regrettable that private enterprise on the Miramichi is not doing more. The once great activity of lumbering operations which characterized this river some twelve or fifteen years ago is now practically negligible. Last year only 23,000,000 feet were cut, including a large number of ties by the Canadian National, large quantities of lumber supplied to the St. John harbour reconstruction, and valuable orders from the Canadian National Railways. This shows that private enterprise is not acting reasonably in the present economic crisis. Canada's timber supply is estimated to be 424,637,000,000 feet board measure of raw material and 1,121,933,000 cords of small material such as pulpwood, fuel wood, posts and so forth. Fifty-five species of wood occur; 32 hardwoods and 23 softwoods. Forest wealth, including accessible raw materials, and pulpwood and capital invested in forestry operations, is estimated to be $1,866,000,000. Annual production from the forests is valued at $500,000,000. Exports of wood, wood products and paper in 1930-31 amounted to $230,514,474.

I quote those figures, Mr. Speaker, to afford some indication of what a preference for Canadian lumber in the great market of the mother country would mean to this industry. In discussing this matter may I be permitted to observe that crown land timber leases in the province of New Brunswick will expire as of August 31, 1933. This is a very important phase of the question and it is to be hoped that the government of New Brunswick will give fearless, honest and intelligent attention to the renewal of those licences. Our democracy is such that if the American company now holding practically a monopoly of the leases does not see fit to operate the crown lands, those lands should be taken away from them and given to bona fide operators who will go ahead and operate.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that thoughtful and intelligent people are prepared to support this administration upon its achievements. Great problems have been attacked. A favourable trade balance has been established. New trade treaties have been negotiated, vigorous action has been taken to stimulate agriculture. The railway problem is being investigated by a board of experts. Unemployment has been grappled with and to a great extent eliminated. Tariff changes have already brought into this country many new industries. A report on the great harbours and seaports of Canada has been submitted by an eminent British authority. Another eminent authority has reported relative to trading in grain futures. The port facilities of St. John, which were destroyed by fire, have been rebuilt and are now bigger and better than ever. Civil service problems and radio are receiving careful study. Public men charged with irregularities have been forced to face investigation. Without impairing the efficiency of the service, the most drastic economy has been put into practice, and above all, the budget has been balanced for the ensuing year.

In spite of all this there is considerable misery and suffering in the country. These are dark days for Canada and the world, but all is not lost; we still have God. When those sacred and fundamental principles of Christianity have been attacked it is well that we should accept the challenge and effectively combat it. We have in the distinguished and illustrious Prime Minister of this country a man standing firmly by those Christian principles. Can there be any doubt, Mr. Speaker, of our ultimate success and triumph? The times always produce the man, and my native province of New Brunswick has had the honour of giving to Canada, to the empire and to the world a noble character, a brilliant leader and a self-renunciating statesman whose policies and whose principles will bring Canada to immeasurable prosperity and restore happiness to our great Canadian people.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary's) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish, at the outset, to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), on his clear and methodical statement on the budget. However, owing to the necessarily incomplete nature of his statement, it is true to say that the discussion of it is difficult. Not having noted any tariff changes and being aware that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is convinced that Providence alone can solve our problems, and that he reposes no faith in the parliament of Canada to assist him—basing such a statement on the Act, No. 58, by which he assumes all executive and legislative powers, I therefore contend that this budget is certainly incomplete and brought down simply to follow the sessional custom.

Although deprived of our prerogatives, as long as the representatives of the people are allowed to meet in this chamber, under your presidency, sir, we shall continue to fulfil our duty, at least by making suggestions which we deem in the people's interests, since our cooperation is no more needed; and that is the course I intend to follow.

It is true that our financial position is seriously affected, but nevertheless, I do not think that our condition is so desperate as to prompt the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) to suggest to the Prime Minister to seize the savings of the people, savings which were accumulated, thanks to their thrift and sacrifices. The government can gradually bring about great reforms in the administration which will surely foster an appreciable degree of prosperity.

We are all aware that the depression in business extends equally to towns and rural districts. Every province has felt its effects, but especially the western provinces where farming is, as a whole, confined to one special crop. The government disbursed $11,000,000 in rebates, to reward the farmers whom Providence had favoured, and granted nothing to those whom Providence had neglected. The payment of such a considerable amount, unfair in many ways towards others whose crops had failed in the west—a measure adopted to remedy the slump in wheat prices in those provinces—was also very unfair towards the other provinces whose products were also down in price, and where most of the taxes are collected.

This policy of favouritism has not solved the problem, and this year, according to the hon. member for Acadia, conditions have hardly improved.

That section of the country, where a single crop is raised, appeals to the government to obtain even its seed grain, while the other provinces which are entitled to the same privileges, do not avail themselves of such rights because there is no need to resort to such an expedient. The situation seems to be abnormal, and it behooves the government to remedy such a state because the old provinces of confederation cannot forever tolerate such an injustice, such discrimination and, especially, the pillaging of their savings which the hon. member for Acadia advocates.

I submit, sir, that the time has arrived for the government to start an agricultural policy capable of giving the farmers a relative independence, not only of the Dominion government but also of the provincial authorities. This policy which I suggest would not be an innovation because it has already been given a trial with much success—I refer to mixed farming in opposition to the single crop system.

I have here a summary of an address delivered before the Canadian Club by Mr. C. F. Jaffray, a Canadian who settled in the United States a long time ago, he is president of the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Soo-St. Mary Railway Company, and one of the champions of mixed farming in the United States, and moreover, president of the corporation founded seven years ago, in Chicago, to help the farmer and convert him to mixed farming. A few years ago north western farmers from Montana, Minnesota, southern Dakota and particularly northern Dakota were greatly in distress as a result of 1,700 bank failures due for the most part to the depression in the wheat market. It was then that a group of citizens of the principal cities in the United States decided to form a company in order to help the farmers and encourage them to take up mixed farming.

This corporation, founded seven years ago, following a conference held at the White House, in Washington, loaned money to farmers in need, so as to help them in purchasing cattle, and it then succeeded to convert more than 15,000 farmers to mixed farming. To-day, more than two-thirds of the money loaned has been reimbursed to the corporation and the situation of the United States western farmers is a prosperous one, notwithstanding the present depression. The money was loaned by the corporation at 6 per cent for a three years' term. The corporation purchases itself the cattle and sells them to farmers. To encourage the latter to purchase cattle, it organizes in the west, exhibition trains, carrying various farm breeding stock, throughout the rural districts. On board these trains are experts whose duties are to explain to those interested the advantages of mixed farming. Those desirous of making a trial, explain their situation and needs to these agents and request their advice on the number and kind of cattle which they should breed. Then, the loan is made. On $7,000,000 loaned in seven years, $5,000,000 have been reimbursed.

Generally, farmers whose crops covered previously 240 acres, reduced this area to 120 acres and kept the remainder for grazing purposes.

As evidence of the perfection of this system, the farmers have no further need of borrowing on their future crops or of mortgaging their lands. The sale of their cattle brings them in sufficient money to pay their taxes and the costs incidental to farming, thus they can dispose of almost the entire returns of their crop. This system, no doubt, has created a very enviable financial situation for the United States farmers since, notwithstanding the prevailing depression, they found it possible to reimburse almost the entire loan to the corporation without having to further borrow.

This system of mixed farming, which has been so advantageous to the United States western farmers, should similarly be successful in the Canadian west where single crop farming still makes and will probably continue to make conditions very difficult. The same may be said of other provinces where the present method of farming may at any time fail. I would have no objection to the government guaranteeing the capital invested by such corporations, so as to relieve the farming class, just as governments of other countries have done when guaranteeing and even subsidizing insurance companies against unemployment and disability thereby protecting the workers. Thus would we find the serious problem of the farming classes solved and replaced by prosperity. It would be a practical way, and not a temporary one only, of utilizing the taxes levied on the people. No doubt, had the policy prevailed a few years ago, not only the government would not have been forced to levy new taxes, as this budget shows, but like the western United States, the Canadian west would have preserved its credit intact without any need whatsoever of having to be backed by the Dominion government to avoid bankruptcy or be obliged to depend on charity for a livelihood.

Single crop raising it is true, requires less effort and pays better, providing however that everything runs smoothly that there is no setback owing to unfavourable weather, that the crop is not poor or a failure, and, still less, that depression does not set in. The old Latin proverb still holds good: "Labor omnia vincit improbus." A little closer application will enable one to avoid the worries of shiftlessness.

The easy life on the farm is very much like the easy life in towns: it bears with it the uncertainty of the next day. Before pillaging the savings deposited in the banks by the people as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) seems to advocate, I would advise the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to endeavour to put into practice the suggestion which I have just made, and, I think that all will turn out well.

Another point to which I want to draw the attention of the government, is the participation of Canada in the activities of the League of Nations, which absorbs quite a large part of the country's revenues, without accomplishing anything practical. Our share amounts to $300,000 per year. I think the Canadian delegates have always given proof of their sincerity and good faith; briefly, they have always appeared to me in earnest. I fear, however, that such has not always been the case nor is it now the case with all their colleagues.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): The Treaty of Versailles has not succeeded in establishing peace among nations. President Wilson who first conceived the idea of founding a league of nations could not even get the United States to join. Ever since the outset of this institution the United States always opposed its proposals and never will they consent to pledge their responsibilty.

In 1923, when the project of mutual assurance came up, so as to give the necessary assistance to a nation attacked, a number of the great powers refused to endorse it. In 1925, a new attempt was made with the protocol of nations. This again was a failure. In 1925-26, the Locarno treaty was signed, the work of Mr. Briand, by which all nations were to pledge themselves to form a "bloc" against countries declaring war. Again this was a failure. Then follows the establishment of a tribunal at The Hague, to arbitrate disputes between nations. Again this was useless and always for the same reason because this tribunal had no power to enforce its decisions. The treaty of Versailles was amended, the Dawes' plan is adopted, then comes Young's plan; delays are granted for the payments of war reparations. A short while ago, Germany declared that she was unable to meet her payments; to-morrow she will clearly refuse to do so. We will then witness a number of nations anxious to have their loans repaid previous to war reparations, side with her. This is, in a nutshell to what the League of Nations amounts.

Can one possibly believe that France has no cause to be fully armed and maintain friendly relations with the small European nations which she has freed from the German, Austrian or Hungarian yoke, and was also instrumental in having restored to them their territories, so unjustly cut up and tyrannically exploited. After The Hague tribunal, we have had the Briand-Kellogg pact signed by fifty-two nations and which can have no practical result when a well armed country goes to war. The fact is that a number of first class powers have not yet signed this treaty. All these institutions had a very laudable and friendly object in view. Their intentions were the very best. Nevertheless, they failed. To reach the aim which the League had in view, all nations should have joined it and it should have been entrusted with the power to carry out its decrees and, moreover, all nations forming part of the league have given evidence of their good faith. That is Mr. Tardieu's contentions.

After the failures which I have just enumerated, and without the conditions that I mentioned above, we are led to believe that all plans of disarmament so as to promote peace among nations, are purely utopian.

If the procedure of the League of Nations is closely studied, one easily discovers the lack of sincerity and good faith shown by some of its members. The United States invented this sovereign remedy and, for twelve years, have fought shy of it. Are they sincere?

It is well known that Great Britain carries on trade with Russia, thus encouraging forced labour to compete with free labour and this during a crisis. It thus fosters a system of revolutionary government that all civilized nations condemn, precisely when this system has most need of this help to succeed. Did not the League of Nations itself approve of loans to this same Soviet republic? Yet, does not article 23 of the League of Nations oblige all those who signed the pact to endeavour to obtain satisfactory and human conditions of labour for men, women and children in all countries, and to resist forced labour? Is their attitude rational? Would not its duty be to leave to this dangerous power all its over production in order that its own citizens should fully benefit of this abundance?

To-day when conferences on disarmament are held, arms and machinery to manufacture them are being sold to Russia.

Faced with this series of uninterrupted failures of the League of Nations, including the Manchuria fiasco; bearing in mind the inconsistency of its members who pledge themselves one day to follow a very determined line of action, and who, the very next day, do the contrary, are we not allowed to share the views of Mr. Eric Loow—a minister in the South African Union government —which were transmitted by the correspondent of the Canadian Press, in New York, in June, 1931. Mr. Loow stated that he was of the opinion that his country should resign from the League of Nations, adding that the latter had sadly failed in its negotiations regarding the conflict in Manchuria, in 1931-1932, as it would similarly fail in the future to settle any conflict in which the interests of a powerful nation were at stake; that the clear political tendencies of certain recent decisions of the international court had shocked and disgusted the most enthusiastic partisans of the league; that his observations, as head of the South African delegation to the meeting of the league in 1929, had convinced him that the league served as a lobby for intrigues, where most of the important questions are settled behind the scene, by way of underhand dealing, among the various great powers.

It is a known fact, in well informed circles, that England wishes to do away with land armies, submarines and air forces, but that she will never consent to abandon her cruisers; that Italy intends to keep her land armies and the necessary navy to rule the Mediterranean sea. Germany claims equality of armament and has arranged to have her war material manufactured secretly in Holland, Scandinavia and Switzerland; Japan agrees with any peaceful movement, providing she is allowed to put the Chinese lords where they belong, through the mouth-piece of her guns; and the United States are bent on the disarmament of other nations. So that we are faced with nations more or less sincere, most of whom through interest, envy or simply stupidity seek to disarm France.

While Germany was taking part in the deliberations at Geneva—in the interest of world peace—on the anniversary of the Versailles treaty, June 28, 1931, the Reischwehr unveiled on the manoeuvring fields of Dobaritz, near Berlin, an enormous map of the world made of stone, over which the German Eagle soared, and bearing the following inscription: "German soil in the hands of foreigners: Alsace-Lorraine, the Polish Pass, Upper-Silesia, Schleswig--Holstein, the Camerouns, the Togo, German South East and South West Africa." One need not be a prophet to foresee, through the numerous conferences on disarmament, that many a bloody battle will be fought before Germany reconquers all these territories. Going back a few years, we find Italy refusing the intervention of the League of Nations, at Corfu; then come the republics of South America settling their difficulties by the intermediary of the United States after having bluntly refused the good office of the League of Nations; it was powerless to prevent war between Russia and Poland; its influence was nil in the conflict between Italy and Jugo-Slavia; d'Annunzio laughed at it. Its intervention was limited to humbly requesting parties concerned to desist, it might just as well have requested lions to trim their claws, because, without the power to impose its will, it felt powerless.

Ambition, interest, hatred and vengeance are sentiments which are intimately linked with mankind and will survive, as long as nations exist; conferences, congresses, tribunals will always meet on their path these indestructible obstacles which render world peace impossible.

When we have witnessed while war was raging, Thyrsen, the Rothchilds, the Krupps at work, all moved by the same sordid feelings when their brothers were dying by the millions; it is but right to point out these despicable individuals concocting their diplomatic intrigues in lobbies, hidden in large hotels, and spoiling the plans devised for the welfare of those concerned. I was most amazed in reading in the Senate Hansard of March 10, 1932, a statement of a former delegate to the League of Nations, prophesying that in six years we would witness a considerable reduction in armaments. He should have said in ninety-nine years: the danger of being wrong would have been less. And I am still wondering on what he bases his prophecy?

Therefore, backed by facts and common sense, while acknowledging the honesty, honourability, earnestness and good faith of our delegates, I state that it is not less true, that the part played by the League of Nations—apart from questions of a sociological order, which each nation can settle at home—amounts to introducing resolutions which have no force, forming committees, sub-committees and super-committees, commissions, sub-commissions and super-commissions maintaining a staff of secretaries, assistant secretaries, private or public, stenographers type-writers, from class A to C, translators in as many languages as there are nationalities; having printed similarly in as many languages, documents the last of which has no more value than the first and is hardly worth the paper on which they are printed. Within the last twelve years, a bevy of young aristocrats associated with a few old parliamentarians, has sprung up in Europe, at a cost of $300,000 per year representing our contribution in an effort to suppress common sense and substituting in its place perpetual motion. This joke, at Geneva, has already lasted too long, and it behooves the government to cease participating in the League of Nations; such expenses, should no longer be defrayed by taxes levied on the Canadian people.

It seems that the more the question of armament crops up, the more this cancer spreads in all spheres; we even come across traces of it in the policy of this government. For instance, apart from the new taxation, the salaries of all civil servants have been cut ten per cent, except those who bear arms in the country's defence in peace time. 139 officers receive a salary from $4,000 to $4,900; 30 receive a salary from $6,000 to $6,900; mostly military bureaucrats, apart from an army of a few hundred men detailed to escort the right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), and the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) when they leave to attend the Disarmament conference, Oh, irony of fate! on behalf of peace and security. These defensors of Parliament Hill are exempt from the ten per cent cut. This exemption is unfair to the other civil servants and meets with our disapproval.

Mr. SEGUIN (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Translation): A third point to which I want to draw the attention of the government and make some suggestions, is the amendment to the Customs Act enacted on June 11, 1928, in connection with alcohol traffic between Canada and the United States. The government of that day wishing to keep up good relations with our neighbours, amended the Customs Act, chapter 16 George V of the Revised Statutes, so as to facilitate to the United States the task of enforcing their regulations.

From that date the Canadian government kept its word as regards its preventive service staff, paid from the treasury funds, pursuant to the act and to the benefit of our neighbours. The liquor industry, in Canada, fell short by about $20,000,000, on which we lost the excise tax; in return, our neighbours, to repay our kindness, thought proper to close their markets to practically all our products, by erecting a prohibitive tariff wall. Liquor traffic is recognized as legal in Canada; it is carried on under the regulations of our governments, and cannot be looked upon as an immoral trade; we therefore should not hesitate to cancel this act which makes Canada play a deceitful part. I submit, sir, that the amendment to the Customs Act, chapter 16 George V, Article 151 and the following in our Revised Statutes should be cancelled, leaving to our neighbours the full task of enforcing their regulations within the limits of their territory so far as spirits are concerned, just as they do in regard to foreign products which cross their border.

After all, this change is only right, because we should not tax the Canadians, in these hard times, to please others. I feel convinced that should my suggestions be adopted, the federal treasury would be the richer and the country would greatly benefit thereby.

Mr. J.-E. TETREAULT (Shefford) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I feel greatly awed in rising for the first time, in the house, as the representative of the county of Shefford. I avail myself of this opportunity, to thank my constituents for the honour they bestowed upon me by electing me to represent this beautiful county.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. TETREAULT (Translation): I say: This beautiful county. Indeed, the county of Shefford has been highly honoured in the past, thanks to the fame of its renowned politicians and distinguished speakers who represented the county in the parliament of Canada. To mention but a few names, I shall recall to your memory those of the Hon. Mr. Huntington and the Hon. Mr. Boivin who were its representatives, the former from 1867 to 1878, and the latter from 1911 to 1925.

These two men proved themselves worthy of the two great races of this country and were numbered among the leaders of their day.

Being only a newcomer, sir, I do not harbour the illusion that I represent the county with as much authority as did these two hon. gentlemen. However, if devotion to duty and work mean anything, my constituents will know that they did not bestow this trust in vain and the future will bear evidence that I endeavoured to deserve it.

I am pleased to state, at the outset of my remarks, that if I have been elected, it is because we had as leader of our party one of the greatest statesmen that Canada has so far produced, and that the policy he advocates could, alone, extricate our country from the old beaten path where the previous régime had led it.

My friends opposite have not yet realized this, but the future will prove to them that there was but one effective policy, and that was the policy which gives protection to our industries, our trade and our farm products.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), was placed in power, thanks to his motto of "Canada First"—our hon. friends opposite reminded him of it often enough. He gave proof at the Imperial conference, that it was not an empty election cry.

The Social Labour party which was for a time at the head of the most Conservative country in the world, lost for a moment the sense of British traditions, it failed, as communism is failing in another Conservative country: Russia.

England, however, needed a vigorous Conservative impulse to make her realize her situation and it came, for the first time, from the outside. It was the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada, who, at the Imperial conference, was to write down the historical page of this impulse.

Mr. Speaker, as I wish to be understood by all the members of this house, I beg of my French speaking colleagues to allow me to continue my remarks in English.

Mr. Speaker, I claim the indulgence of hon. members as I rise to make my maiden speech in this house. Although it was not my intention to speak at this time, I feel it my duty to make a few remarks concerning the attitude of some hon. members on the other side of the house. I have listened attentively to the debate, and I wonder if any hon. member opposite has said one word in favour of the government. Of course it does not surprise me that they should not do so, because I know the kind of cooperation we receive in the province of Quebec. Hon. members who had the opportunity to listen to Liberal speeches during the last provincial election campaign will readily appreciate the type of cooperation the Prime Minister may expect to receive from hon. members opposite. We have heard them criticize everything the present government has done. Why can they not be sincere and tell the truth to the people of Canada? I should like to tell hon. members what this government has done for my own town of Granby. Before going further may I say that we have had the cooperation of every citizen in that town, regardless of political views. The people have worked together when the interests of our town were at stake.

Mr. ST-PERE: Nobody denies that.

Mr. TETREAULT: Thanks to the tariff changes, we have attracted four new industries to our town. I am proud to say that we are the only town with a population of 10,000 which has succeeded in making such progress, and our success was partly due to the cooperation of the board of trade and the Southern Canada Power Company.

Mr. ST-PERE: They do not charge too much for their gas?

Mr. TETREAULT: No more than they do in Montreal. If hon. members opposite do not appreciate the efforts this government is making, I am in a position to prove that in the county of Shefford we have some intelligent citizens who do appreciate them.

With your permission Mr. Speaker I should like to quote from a few letters I have received from people in my constituency since this government took office. In these letters are emphasized the benefits received from the policy of protection adopted by the leader of this government.

The first letter is dated September 27, 1930, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Tétreault,

I have your letter of the 20th instant with reference to the new change in tariff.

I am thoroughly convinced that the present government has made a wonderful move which will result in far better business conditions in the Dominion of Canada. There are undoubtedly certain items which will have to be readjusted in the carte blanche program they have put through, but so far as our particular industry is concerned, it is just what we needed.

You might be interested to know that in view of this tariff, we are planning to put up an addition which will double our output. This will not only give work to contractors and labourers in the building of our plant, but will also enable me to employ considerably more hands in the near future.

This past week I have been visiting the retail trade in western Ontario, and find them, in every instance, quite pleased with the fact that we are getting an additional protection on our merchandise. I have convinced them that even though there may be a slight increase in the cost of our rayon yarns in the near future, I do not intend to raise my prices, and that I am in hopes with the added protection to be able to decrease my prices in the near future.

On the whole, I think the present government deserves a great deal of credit, and it is through the cooperation of such firms as ours who are not raising their prices, and who will decrease prices if at all possible, that their policy will succeed.

For your further information, you will no doubt be pleased to note that due to the protection given the corset manufacturers, each of them is looking for an increased business and placed orders with us this past week far in excess of yardages ever procured before.

With kindest regards, and my best wishes for the success of the present policy, I am

Yours very truly,

Carl Stohn of Canada, Limited.

Then I have the following letter dated April 25, 1931:

Dear Mr. Tétreault:

I have your letter of the 22nd with reference to the improvement on our plant since last September.

For your information, beg to advise that immediately upon receipt of the news that a new tariff had been brought into effect on last September, the writer called a directors' meeting of our firm, and within ten days' time a contract was let for the building of an additional 27,000 square feet to our present plant. On October the 10th the contractors started to break ground in preparation of the starting of the building. Orders for additional machinery etc., were immediately placed and up to the present writing we have expended approximately $200,000 in building and machinery. Needless to say, our payroll has increased considerably and we are now employing approximately 160 hands, whereas last September, we were employing 92 hands. Our payroll has increased approximately 35 per cent in dollars and cents.

It is very interesting indeed to note our increased sales in spite of the general poor conditions throughout the country. Up to the end of March, our sales increased approximately 37 per cent over and above the first quarter of 1930, and we might say that 1930 was the best year in our business. We can definitely trace orders which have come to us which would have been placed in the United States had it not been for the increased tariff.

Thanking you for your kind interest, we beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

Carl Stohn of Canada, Limited.

On September 18, 1930, I received this letter from the Granby Manufacturing Company Limited:

Dear Eugène:

Mr. Carl Stohn was in our shop yesterday and we discussed the new tariff. He states that the new duty on textile will be of the greatest assistance to them. In fact he went so far as to state that they intended to build a new factory to look after the increased business.

I thought you might be pleased to hear the above and might have an opportunity to give Mr. Bennett at least one example of the results of his Canada-first policy.

Yours truly,

N. E. Clouston.

On June 4, 1931, the Atlas Plywood Corporation, Waterloo, Quebec, wrote me:

Dear Sir,

We received yours of the 3rd with list of new tariff enclosed which certainly comes pretty near to what we were asking for.

We wish to thank you sincerely for the part you took in this matter for us and for all the trouble you have been to. Can promise you that when the occasion arises again you can rely on us in every way.

On June 8, 1931, the manager of the corporation wrote me this second letter:

Dear Sir,

Thanks very much for the booklet you sent me. I am forwarding this on to our Boston office and am also enclosing your letter and am telling them that you, personally, are the one who assisted us in getting what we asked for.

And again on February 24 of this year the Atlas corporation wrote me the following letter:

Dear Sir,

Replying to yours of the 17th instant in reference to the new tariff of veneers, would say that the change has certainly been a benefit to our company.

In 1931 we had from 45 to 60 employees and paid per month $3,539.40 and made shipments of 615,739 feet per month, while in 1932 we have had continually from 65 to 70 employees, paying $4,117.17 per month and shipping 910.695 feet per month, so by these figures you can see we have benefited by the tariff.

If there is any further information that we can give you please let us know, and in the meantime we wish to thank you for the many courtesies you have shown us since you have been in Ottawa.

On May 21, 1931, the Macdonald Metal Products Company Limited, Waterloo, Quebec, wrote me this letter:

Dear Mr. Tétreault,

Your letter of May 19th has been received, and we certainly appreciate the activity which you are taking in regard to our products.

You will be pleased to learn that our factory is running on practically the same basis as it was this time last year, due entirely in our estimation to the department's increase of tariff on nickel-plated goods, particularly our line of nickel-plated cake turners, mixing spoons, and other kitchen utensils. The effect of last fall's increase in this tariff item has made it possible for us to manufacture just as many articles in this poor year as we did last year, and has not increased the cost of these articles to the consumer one cent.

They wrote me again under date of June 3, 1931:

Dear Mr. Tétreault,

We are quite pleased to note in the various changes in the budget that the item dolls and toys of all kinds has been raised from 30 per cent to 40 per cent duty. We believe that this is going to make a tremendous difference in our business here, and we wish to thank you at this time very much for the effort that you have put in at Ottawa on our behalf. We believe also that this 10 per cent increase will greatly discourage the importation of German cap pistols. A few of the items that we import through necessity have been increased in cost on account of the budget, but we are quite content with these increases as no doubt they are designed to help other manufacturers.

That is what we call cooperation.

You will be quite pleased, I am sure, to know that our sales to date this year are practically the same as they were last year, and also that we attribute this to the increase of the duty put through last fall on nickel-plated goods. Also in this connection, we would advise that instead of our prices going up on account of the increased duty there have been a number of changes downward.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): This does not contain letters from unemployed?

Mr. TETREAULT (Translation): There are no unemployed in my county.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Lucky fellow! This is not due to the government you support.

Mr. TETREAULT (Translation): Neither is it due to the opposition.

On February 9, 1932, I received another letter from the Macdonald Metal Products Company, Limited, of which I will give the house the concluding paragraph:

We wish to have you convey to the Prime Minister our thanks for the various protective changes made last year, and advise him that we operated about one-third more time last year than we did in 1930, and that this year we expect to operate practically to full capacity throughout the year, which should mean about a full 50 per cent better than 1930 operations.

The next letter I am going to read is not from a manufacturer, but from a firm engaged in growing mushrooms. They say.

Dear Sir:

We have just received a circular from the horticultural council at Ottawa informing us that the department had placed a minimum value of 30 cents per pound on mushrooms for import. In consequence this will fix this matter up in a thoroughly satisfactory manner for ourselves, as the dump duty applies on anything brought in below this value.

[Mr. Tétreault.]

We wish to thank you for the trouble you have taken for us in this matter, and will endeavour to do whatever we can for you at any time.

Yours very truly,

Slack Brothers,

The next letter is in French. This too is not from a big manufacturing firm, but from a man engaged in making charcoal:

Flodden, Que., June 5, 1931.

Mr. J. E. Tétrault, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—

My most sincere thanks and congratulations on your success as regards the tariff on charcoal. The new tariff will have as an immediate result the reopening of factories and the building of new plants which will employ 2,500 men.

My employees as well as the farmers who sell me wood join with me in expressing our thanks and congratulations.

Yours gratefully,

Ovila Pratte.

I have received from another newly established industry, a letter which demonstrates that these new companies recognize that they are receiving cooperation from this government. It reads:

We have your letter of March 16th, enclosing a copy of the commissioner's letter of March 14th, relative to William Wagner.

Will you please express to Mr. Joliffe our sincere appreciation of his cooperation in allowing us to bring in the different helpers that we required from our other mill.

Mr. J. W. Stark and the writer both feel that there has been a real understanding of our problems, and the promptness with which our requests were granted has been most gratifying.

It is very apparent that our needs have been most promptly and clearly placed before the commissioner, and it is therefore again a great pleasure to thank you most heartily for your service in looking after us so thoroughly and well.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Is that the end?

Mr. TETREAULT (Translation): I have some more.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Read them.

Mr. DUPUIS: Has the hon. member received a letter complimenting the government upon the establishment of a company to make soap out of butter? The price of butter at the present time is so low that it is being used in the hon. member's district to make soap.

Mr. TETREAULT: If I receive such a letter I shall be glad to let the hon. member know. Hon. members opposite have been criticizing the government but they do not mention the fact that new industries have been established in their own constituencies. I should like to read an article which appeared in La Presse of April 2, 1932. Hon. members opposite know that that is not a Conservative paper.

Mr. ST-PERE: Very independent.

Mr. TETREAULT: As my hon. friend will be some time.

Mr. ST-PERE: I mean that La Presse is independent.

Mr. TETREAULT: The article is as follows:

Normal Times Return

The Dominion Statistics of Trade and Commerce show a favourable balance of $15,000,000 for the period of the eleven months of the fiscal year just ended. It is a sign of the times of which we can rejoice, since it indicates a movement towards the reestablishment of the economic equilibrium in the Dominion. Our exports are in excess of our imports, that is we sell more than we buy. We consume still more home products, and this is all to the advantage of Canadian producers, as well as to that of the consumers themselves.

These are not the views expressed by members on the opposition side.

A country which is self-sufficing, which produces at home what it requires, instead of purchasing it abroad, is economically independent and its political life is less subject to changes.

A recent report of Mr. Frederick Hudd, Canadian Trade Commissioner in New York, gives interesting facts on trade dealings between Canada and the United States. Although, he states, the United States exports to Canada and the imports of Canada from the United States have shown a large decrease, in volume as well as in value, the largest decrease is found in United States exports. The latter total $395,647,609 in 1931, compared to $659,093,588 in 1930, therefore a decrease of $269,296,780 or 39·9 per cent. On the other hand, the Canadian imports from the United States amounted to $266,296,780 compared with $402,350,280 in 1930, a decrease of $136,053,509 or 33·81 per cent. Briefly, the unfavourable balance of trade of Canada with the United States totalled $139,350,821, in 1931, instead of $256,743,308, as in 1930.

Mr. Hudd points out a few groups of products on which the variations of Canadian-American international trade was more marked. As regards agricultural products, the value of Canadian corn exports amounted to $1,181,829 compared with $4,179,489, in 1930, and that of raw cotton was $7,247,434, instead of $13,051,040. As to the group of mineral products, the value of the United States exports of bituminous coal to Canada came to $37,624,093 compared to $49,981,697 in 1930. Crude oil and gasoline as well as manufactured metal products still show a greater decrease. The same can be said of United States imports of cheese, cattle hides, furs, linseed, unbleached sulphite paste, newspaper, non-concentrated copper, lead ore and lead matts.

However, the imports of bleached sulphite paste and concentrated cupriferous articles have greatly increased.

As a whole, our trade balance with the neighbouring republic tends to improve, while our trade with Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and the other countries of the Empire give rise to great promises. There are encouraging prospects which portend to normal economic conditions for the future and therefore the end of the present crisis in a still nearer future.

My hon. friends will note that it is La Presse which makes this statement.

If hon. members opposite do not believe that the government is taking the proper means to solve the great problems facing this country, they can find the proof in the statement which appeared in La Presse.

I have mentioned what this government has done for industry and trade, and I should like now to draw the attention of all the government members to the situation confronting our farmers. The exact position in which the farmers of this country now find themselves may not be realized, but they know that the government is ready to cooperate to the fullest extent with the provincial governments in order to improve their position. I submit that the Quebec government, with its surplus dating back many years, should come to the rescue of the farmers of that province. The system of farm loans has been found to be nearly useless as far as Quebec is concerned, as only fourteen per cent of the loans applied for have been granted. It is not fair to help only fourteen per cent of the farmers and let the rest starve. If I am to be allowed to make a suggestion to the farm loan board, it would be that changes be made at once which would enable the farmers to obtain the amounts they urgently require. Hon. members opposite have been criticizing the government for not properly taking care of the farmer, and we should all work together, provincially and federally, to try to relieve the situation of agriculture. As things are going just now, conditions will be bad for the farmers this fall and some plan should be evolved to give required assistance to the farmers of Quebec and the other provinces.

I should like now to refer to a question of mine which appeared on the order paper for February 15 concerning the number of married women in the service of the government. It was a great surprise to me to learn that seventy-four of these women were not living with their husbands. I believe that the cause of this is that they have a position which enables them to be independent. I have received many letters from married women who protest against the employment of other married women who are not living with their husbands. I should not like all married women to believe that I am an enemy of women because I have a wife of my own who is certainly my best friend. However, in times of depression we certainly should give preference to the married man who has a wife and family to support. The government should investigate the matter, and if there are any cases where the father of a family could be employed instead of some married woman who is not the sole support of a family, then let such a man be employed.

Since I have a few minutes more I want to read now an article from the Canadian Textile Journal, with reference to Manhattan Mills Limited:

Manhattan Mills Ltd. Establish Rayon Weaving Plant at Granby

144 Loom Plant to be Brought from Taunton, Mass. New Building to be Erected at Once

Another new textile industry for Canada was announced the latter part of March, The Manhattan Mills Limited, manufacturers of rayon and silk dress materials.

They have decided to locate in Granby, Que., where a new factory, 70 ft. x 240 ft. one storey brick and cement construction, will be built at once and it is hoped to complete the building within two months.

The new company starts off under unusually strong conditions. Mr. Harry Altman who will assume personal direction of the new company is well known as being thoroughly capable in this line having many years of practical experience in making fine dress goods. Their selling organization in Canada is already well established as the Manhattan Silk and Woollens Limited, of Montreal and Toronto, who have achieved success as wholesalers and jobbers in this line, are merging their interest with the new company.

The coming of this company to Canada is different from most companies in that instead of this being a branch of an American firm, in this case the entire factory consisting of 144 looms and other necessary complementing machinery will be moved entirely to Granby from Taunton, Mass., where it has been operating.

Textile and Industrial Centre

Granby was selected as the location for the new factory after investigating a great many sites, and should prove a happy choice, as this city has become well known as an exceptionally fine manufacturing city, as the many diversified industries successfully operating there bear witness. In the textile trades in Granby are, The Granby Elastic Web Co. Limited, The Esmond Mills Inc., Carl Stohn of Canada Limited, The Nordic Hosiery Limited, Stark Bros. Ribbon Corp. of Canada, while other large industries outside of the textile group located in Granby are, The Miner Rubber Co. Limited, The Imperial Tobacco Co. Limited, The Stedfast Rubber Co., Giddings Limited, reed and rattan furniture, The Meyer Thomas Co. Limited, box manufacturers, Granby Last Company. The Granby Manufacturing Co. Limited, makers of celluloid tees and novelties, United Maple Products Limited, Barre & Charron, interior woodwork, Kent Lumber Co., Albert Morin Mattress Factory, James Topp Cigar Co., and many other smaller industries.

Several of the above factories outside of the textile group use large quantities of textiles, such as the Miner Rubber Co. Limited, Giddings Limited, Stedfast Rubber Co. and others.

Work on transferring the Manhattan mills to Granby will be rushed with all possible speed and it is hoped to have this factory ready for operation within three months.

Such a record was made when the Stark Bros. Ribbon Corp. opened in Granby late last fall, as they were delivering ribbon three months after they decided to open a factory in Granby.

The Manhattan mills expect to employ about 150 people when they commence operations.

Before resuming my seat, I should like to assure hon. members that we from Quebec are proud to have in that province a large number of English speaking people. In my own constituency we have about twenty per cent English speaking, and in the town of Granby the two races are getting along wonderfully.

Mr. St-PERE: We are getting along very well.

Mr. TETREAULT: In my constituency French Canadians and English Canadians are working hand in hand, and it is only by means of such cooperation that we can hope to build up this beloved Canada of ours.

Mr. TELESPHORE ARSENAULT (Kent, N.B.): In rising to say a few words on the question before the house, I am aware of the difficult task that faces a new member when, from a sense of duty towards those whom he represents, he undertakes for the first time to address himself to his colleagues in the House of Commons, many of whom have had many years of parliamentary experience. Coming from a county where the majority of the population are of French descent, I think it is proper—and I believe the house will agree with me—that I should express myself in the beautiful language with which I am more familiar.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. ARSENAULT (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my sincerest congratulations to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), not only on the high office he so worthily fills today, but also for his clear and concise statement on the economic situation of Canada which he has so well explained in the budget, and which lucidly defines our revenues, liabilities and expenditures. Speaking on behalf of the citizens of Kent county, who have entrusted me with a mandate in this parliament, I also wish to add my token to the great mark of confidence of which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is at present the object, for the courage, ability and earnestness he displays in the great crisis we are going through. While that crisis is world-wide in its effect, it, however, places upon us serious obligations and duties, a difficult and ungrateful task. We have faith in the future, and the country's affairs could not be in better hands than those of the man whom all acknowledge to be honest, highly experienced and well versed in financial matters. I refer to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In previous debates, the Liberals unceasingly reminded the Prime Minister of his pledges to the electorate during the last election. They seem to ignore that the situation we have to face to-day has been greatly aggravated by uncontrollable causes. They forget that the gates have been closed to immigration in order to keep unemployment at its lowest ebb; that the raising of the tariff resulted in preventing our markets from being flooded by foreign products, thus keeping the Canadian markets for our own producers when times become more favourable. They further forget that the obligations contracted in times of prosperity, the changes brought about by the motor car and its greater perfection, are as many burdens which weigh more and more, add to this the hardships prevailing, accustomed as we were to living somewhat in comfort. Hence these fixed charges such as the enormous amount entailed in the pensions to veterans, the interest on the national debt and the necessary maintenance of our national railways. These new burdens have greatly increased owing to the world wide crisis, and they thrust upon us the pressing duty to economize instead of distributing favours, to cut down salaries instead of increasing them; to reduce the number of civil servants instead of enlarging it. Now, sir, addressing myself to the people of Kent county, mostly fishermen or farmers, I wish to assure them that their special interests have not been lost sight of by the federal authorities who are aware that the fisheries and the farm are, in our section of the country, the two main industries. To the farmers of my county, I shall repeat what, the other day, the president of the French Canadian Association on Education stated to the French Canadian Agricultural Association of Ontario: while certain members of the family—under the guidance of the father and mother, heads of the establishment —will produce grain, fodder, vegetables, other members will busy themselves with making clothes, others will look after the fruit, the preserving of food, the making of cheese and butter, still others will utilize their time in making and repairing furniture, vehicles, sledges, farm implements and erecting and repairing the buildings. So that each member of the family will have work distributed to him according to his age, abilities and fitness. Every one being thus interested in his task, knowing that he is working for himself and his family, will not think of leaving the locality, where he finds continuous and remunerative work, to go to the city or the mills, where the assurance of work and remuneration become daily more uncertain. It is true, that for a number of years, the whole economic organization of this country has tended to destroy home industries and to commercialize certain branches of agriculture. The result is that our rural districts are short of money which is constantly being drained to other centres. All agricultural branches which have been exclusively industrialized have been the cause of over production and have ruined many a rural family who had followed such practice. For instance, the wheat growers who realized large profits as long as their products found an easy market, but the moment the wheat market fell, distress replaced abundance among this class of farmers who have specialized in one branch of agriculture without paying any attention to providing clothes or food products for family consumption.

As to the fishermen of the county of Kent, I wish to inform them that the federal Minister of Fisheries is alert to all which may interest them and, if the present depression is hard on them, they must not lose faith, but hope that their lot will soon improve.

To these two groups, as well as to others, I wish to extend the assurance of my sincere sympathy and unceasing zeal for all that concerns and interests them.

In closing my remarks, let me once more express to the people of the beautiful county of Kent my very sincere thanks for the honour they have bestowed upon me by electing me as their representative. I wish to assure them that on all occasions I shall deem it my duty to protect the special interests of my county and the country at large.

Mr. CHARLES BELEC (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my address may I follow the excellent example of those who have preceded me in this debate, and extend my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) upon the excellent manner in which he has explained the budget to parliament and the country. The budget is a businesslike statement which clearly sets forth Canada's high position among the nations of the world. It shows how Canada has balanced her trade, met all her obligations and maintained her credit. The government of which I am a supporter has courageously tackled the unemployment problem and thus brought relief to thousands of Canadian people. The budget has been well received by the country: it has not disturbed business and it has shown that, despite the world economic crisis, our position is relatively better off than that of any other country.

The tax levies in the budget have been placed on those best able to bear them, and will not prove a hardship to the farmer who in these days has problems of his own. I should also like to remind the house that the government has saved our country industrially by enacting proper tariff protection. As a result of the tariff policy of the Bennett government more than 157 new industries have been established in Canada since the last dominion election, and they are employing Canadian men and women who were idle during the latter years of Liberal misrule.

I should like to tell the house something of the county which I have the honour to represent in this parliament. Pontiac is undergoing the stress of hard times, but undergoing it with courage. The people of that county are descendants of sturdy pioneer stock who have contributed so much to our country. Pontiac is going through the depression, but is not going back. It is true that lumbering, which has been one of our basic industries, is not what it has been in the past, but in agriculture and mining my county is second to none in this or any other country. Think of the diversified wealth in Pontiac. We have the rich Rouyn gold area with the great Noranda mine, while in the Abitibi district the discovery of rich ores presages great development. At Timiskaming we have the great plant of the International Paper Company. In regard to lumbering, may I say that we have untold resources in pulp and hardwood. As a matter of fact the only virgin pine in Quebec is to be found in Pontiac around Grand Lake Victoria.

The constituency of Pontiac extends from the town of Aylmer on the Ottawa river to James bay, and is one of the largest in area in Canada. We have the resources, but best of all, we have the people. The census taken in June of last year shows the population of Pontiac to be 64,155, which represents a gain of nearly 20,000 since the last census was taken in 1921. This is the healthiest sign of all that our county is increasing by leaps and bounds. The northern part, Abitibi, has increased enormously; it has a population of 22,133, which is almost 10,000 more than ten years ago. The people of the northern end of my county, like the people of old Pontiac, depend not upon doles but upon themselves; they are workers, the best in the country.

As regards financial matters, may I say that old Pontiac is out of debt as far as county rates are concerned, and most of the municipalities are in the same happy position. My own municipality of Mansfield does not owe a dollar. I have been a member of the Mansfield council for thirty-five years, mayor for fifteen years and, besides that, chairman of the school board for years. In Pontiac we pay our way. Our people are not extravagant, but limit their spending to their means.

I should now like to say something about agricultural conditions in my county. Prices, in common with those the world over, are the lowest in years, and I would respectfully urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to include Pontiac in the schemes of departmental activity. I regret to say that under the previous government our county was neglected, and, may I say, ignored. I often hear the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) speaking in the house, but I find that during his administration the Department of Agriculture did absolutely nothing for the farmers of Pontiac.

May I point out some of the agricultural resources of my county? The last census of live stock shows the following for Pontiac—I will deal with the Abitibi district first: horses, 2,877; cattle, 11,631; sheep, 1,651; swine, 4,461; poultry, 56,900. In Timiskaming the total live stock is as follows: horses, 2,934; cattle, 21,908; sheep, 10,130; swine, 7,581; poultry, 50,028. In old Pontiac there were 7,606 horses; 38,929 cattle; 25,844 sheep; 15,746 swine, and 162,770 poultry. Thus the live stock census of 1931 showed the following for the whole county: horses, 13,417; cattle, 72,658; sheep, 28,625; swine, 27,688; poultry, 269,698. I have quoted these figures from the Bureau of Statistics to show that our country is progressing despite the hard times. But what we want is a market for our products. I would like to endorse the suggestion that was made by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), that mixed farming be encouraged by means of a cash bonus. This is an emergency situation, and such a step would bring great relief to the farmers of Pontiac county, who are all engaged in mixed farming. I believe that if our exports of live beef were bonused by two cents a pound it would greatly increase production and as well restore the purchasing power of the farmer. In this regard may I point out that the farmers of Canada represent forty-six per cent of the total population of the country, and until their purchasing power is restored general prosperity cannot return.

I would like to see the farmers of Canada recapture the bacon market in Great Britain, and to help them in accomplishing this the government might grant an export bonus of two cents per pound. Denmark now enjoys the bacon market of Great Britain. In 1930 Denmark sold millions of pounds of bacon to Great Britain while we sold only a fraction of that amount. I would also respectfully urge the government to give the farmers a bonus on cheese and dairy products, and a bonus of say three cents per dozen on eggs. This would bring prosperity to the farmer. Establishing a bonus system for our exportable farm surplus would automatically stimulate the market at home and return about $30,000,000 to the farmers of Canada through the increase in the price of farm products. The prices of farm products have dropped fifty per cent, and I would respectfully suggest that it is time that something be done for the farmer.

We are looking forward with the keenest anticipation to the Imperial conference to be held in Ottawa this summer, which I am sure will result in a marked stimulus to empire trade, bring about mutual advantages to the various parts of the British Empire, and herald the return to better days and prosperity.

On motion of Mr. Reid the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rhodes the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Tuesday, April 19, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton) presented the third report of the select standing committee on standing orders.

Mr. BURY moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On motions:

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria, Ont.): With the unanimous consent of the house I desire to move:

That for the remaining period of the present session all private bills when ready for presentation be read a first and second time and referred forthwith, and also that standing order 105 respecting the posting of all private bills referred to the committee of the house be suspended.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is this the usual motion towards the end of the session?

Mr. STINSON: Yes, it is to facilitate the passage of bills that are late in being presented to the house. One bill that we have in mind is that of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan).

Mr. GARDINER: Will the motion apply to bills now on the order paper?

Mr. STINSON: To any private bill now on the order paper, yes.

Motion agreed to.

WINNIPEG POSTAL STAFF

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), I beg to lay on the table of the house the circular as well as the written statement which I forwarded yesterday to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth).

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I desire to lay on the table of the house the following orders in council passed pursuant to the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, all relating to payments of money, namely: Nos. 447, 817, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 876, 877, 878.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 46, to incorporate the Lake of the Woods International Bridge Company.—Mr. Heenan.

SALES TAX—CONTAINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. M. CAYLEY (South Oxford): I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Finance based on a number of telegrams that I have received to-day, similar no doubt to those that the minister has received, from cheese factories and dairy men in Oxford county asking that they be relieved of the sales tax imposition which they find affects the price of what they call dairy containers, containers for cheese and butter. I would strongly urge upon the minister that he view this request favourably because he well knows the hard times which the dairy interests along with other branches of agriculture are experiencing these days. I trust that the minister will accede to this request.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman has succeeded, Mr. Speaker, in making a speech rather than in submitting a question. His remarks would be more appropriate if we were in committee on the resolutions where the matter can be discussed at length and where only can we appropriately make any announcement with respect to the matter.

Mr. CAYLEY: I shall be pleased to repeat my question when we are in committee.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): May I ask the Minister of Finance if he will likewise give consideration to the producers of honey, regarding the sales tax on their containers?

MARKETING BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): In view of the announcement appearing in the western press, particularly in the Saskatoon Star of April 15, which in big red letters says "government to create marketing board," I would like to ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture if it is the intention of the government to bring down legislation this session for the creation of such a board.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The matter is under consideration.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I would like to ask the Minister of Labour whether it is the intention of the government to implement legislation of last year with regard to grants to the provinces on account of technical education.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The question of appropriating moneys for that purpose is under consideration and the provision that may or may not be made will be made known, I expect, in a very short time.

MANITOBA SAVINGS OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I intimated, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that I would endeavour to-day to communicate to him such information as I had with respect to the Manitoba savings office and the difficulties that were experienced in connection with the payment of depositors.

I was absent during the early part of the month of December last, but so far as I can ascertain, on the sixth day of December last Mr. Bracken, the premier of Manitoba, with Mr. Pearson, one of his officials, saw the Acting Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). And I am informed that on the succeeding day Mr. Bracken and Mr. Pearson saw the general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada in Montreal.

Of my personal knowledge, on my return to Canada a few days before Christmas, on the twenty-second day of December, I saw Mr. Bracken and Mr. Pearson. So far as my memory serves me, it was the first occasion upon which I knew of the serious position of the savings office in Manitoba. It was explained to me at some length; I was told of the number of depositors, the extent of the liabilities and the assets with which claims could be met. My memory is that the Premier of Manitoba concluded to remain in eastern Canada over the Christmas season. On December 28, having returned to Ottawa I again saw the premier and we discussed certain obligations of the province of Manitoba which were about due or shortly would be due in New York, and arranged for a renewal by the payment of a million dollars which we agreed to advance to the province of Manitoba.

On January 18 I addressed a communication to the premier of Manitoba which I shall read. This is one of the personal letters concerning which privilege has been removed:

Ottawa, January 18, 1932.

Hon. John Bracken, M.L.A.,
Premier of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Dear Mr. Bracken:

Referring to our many discussions regarding deposits in your savings office, our departmental officials have directed attention to the advertisement that has been appearing in the press, looking towards the increase of these savings. In view of the statements of yourself and Mr. Pearson when you were here, I would think this might lead to a very complicated situation.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. Bennett.

The advertisement in question reads as follows:

The Province of Manitoba Savings Office Invites you to open a Savings Account and offers Safety, Security and 3½ per cent compounded half-yearly.
One Dollar opens an account
Hours: 10 a.m. to 6 p.m;
Saturday 9.30 a.m. to 1 p.m.

Offices: Donald and Ellice, Winnipeg,

Portage la Prairie, Carmen,
Dauphin, Ethelbert and Stonewall.

Mr. Bracken sent a reply dated January 21, 1932, as follows:

Dear Mr. Bennett:

I have your letter of the 18th instant in reference to provincial savings office. I appreciate the thought which prompted you in writing me about it.

When the advertisement to which you refer came to my notice I immediately got in touch with the trustees. Apparently a number of malicious rumours were being circulated, and having come to their notice the trustees thought the advertisement might have the effect of stopping them. On my suggestion at the time, the advertisement was discontinued.

Yours sincerely,
John Bracken.

On January 26 of this year Mr. Bracken, accompanied by E. K. Williams, K.C., who was acting as his legal adviser, visited the city of Montreal and saw the general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada. I know that from what they told me, because on the succeeding day, namely, January 27, Messrs. Bracken and Williams visited me in the office of the Minister of Finance in the east block of the government buildings. Both made statements regarding the savings offices. They stated they had concluded that under present economic conditions they would close the offices. I must say in view of the information they gave to me I told them I heartily agreed with the action they were taking. They explained to me that all the assets they had with which to meet depositors' claims consisted of exchequer bills and bonds of the province of Manitoba, some bonds of the city of Winnipeg, some Dominion of Canada bonds which were no longer in their possession but which had been hypothecated by way of option sale to the Canadian Bank of Commerce, with which the account was being carried. They also intimated to me the resources in cash borrowed on Dominion bonds which they had on deposit in the bank with which to meet the claims of those who had made deposits in the savings office. They expressed the fear that a situation might develop which would require action being taken very speedily on their part. They explained that the banks would lend the money to the Dominion of Canada if we in turn would lend it to them to enable them to meet the claims of depositors which might be made. I declined to consider that suggestion at the moment, but suggested that they return to Winnipeg; and I have a clear recollection of indicating the character of the statement which I thought they might well make, first indicating that the serious economic conditions prevailing warranted action being taken to close the offices, and secondly that they would take advantage of the provision of their law which enabled them to ask for notice before payment. I suggested that thirty days' notice should be asked. They both expressed the fear that such action might precipitate calls being made unduly upon the deposits of the office. However as a result of our discussion, which was somewhat extended, no final or decisive action was taken. It was open to them either to make the statements I have suggested or to take such other action as might be desired.

The records indicate that on January 29 Premier Bracken saw Mr. Rhodes whom I had called in at one of the discussions, because he had been acting Minister of Finance and it was fairly clear that he would succeed me in that department. On the same day instructions were given to send $500,000 for the relief works to the province of Manitoba, and if vouchers came in quickly it was intimated that the government would send another $500,000. On January 30, Mr. Bracken wrote a letter to Mr. Rhodes and among other things stated that the savings office matter was giving him much cause for consideration and worry, and he trusted that the matter would not be overlooked. In consequence of a return requested by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) that letter has been placed upon the records. However, in order to make the record complete, I shall read that paragraph of Mr. Bracken's letter to Mr. Rhodes which has reference to the savings office.

1. Provincial Savings Office: In view of certain rumours being circulated that this institution is unsafe, there may develop such a demand for deposits as cannot be met at once. To allay any possibility of this happening, the banks have advised that they are prepared to loan to the dominion any amount of money that may be necessary in this connection, providing the Dominion will reloan it to the province. This will enable the province to assure depositors that their deposits are fully available at any time, and thus avoid a possible "run" on this institution. If something like this is not done, a difficult situation may arise, one that might be embarrassing not only to the savings office but to trust companies and banks, as well as to the general credit structure.

This matter has been the subject of discussion with the banks and with Mr. Bennett during the past few weeks.

Yours very truly,
John Bracken.

P.S.—While the above matters are all more or less pressing, No. 1—

And many others—

—are of immediate concern.

J.B.

Hon. members will observe that that communication is dated January 30, 1932. Then, on February 4 I received an urgent message reading as follows:

Confidential message being transmitted to you through Bank of Montreal. Would appreciate sympathetic reconsideration of matter referred to.

John Bracken.

The message decoded and forwarded to me by the Bank of Montreal, read as follows:

Please say to Prime Minister of Canada from Premier Bracken—"Unusual demand for money borrowed by province of Manitoba under Province of Manitoba Savings Act makes it necessary to raise by way of loan under Provincial Loans Act amount needed to meet demand. Will be compelled to make public announcement to this effect and also to require notice of desire to withdraw funds which at present is fixed at 30 days but that period will likely be extended from time to time until loans can be raised at best terms possible. We are doing this very reluctantly but no other way is now available. Banks still agreeable to lend the province of Manitoba money to meet this demand but only on additional security of Dominion government which you felt could not be given. Urge your government reconsider situation as we must act by February 6th noon at latest. If joint action of banks and Dominion government could make it possible to issue statement that depositors can be paid in full the present unusual demand would at once cease. Believe if it becomes necessary to take stand above indicated not only credit of province of Manitoba but of other provinces and the Dominion government and many loan and trust companies will be adversely affected. From January 23rd to yesterday inclusive 527 accounts were closed 207 opened with net loss of deposits of over $200,000 only partly offset by revenues from investments received at first of month. Eighty-eight were closed yesterday and withdrawals are continuing to-day.

John Bracken."

The manager of the bank intimated his willingness to send in cipher any reply that I might desire. I immediately replied in these words:

Message received. Have been in communication with banks. No action should be taken until Monday. Meantime advise number of current accounts; total deposits, with full statement of securities held against same.

Immediately upon receipt of the message and before I sent the reply, I communicated with the banks by telephone and realized that the position was one of very great difficulty and calling for immediate action if we were not to precipitate a situation which was certainly undesirable at this time. I received a reply to my telegram dated the next day, namely the 6th of February. It was received through the Bank of Montreal in cipher, decoded, and sent forward to me. It read as follows:

Say to Prime Minister of Canada: "Message received. Will delay action until Monday as per your request. As of yesterday's date number of accounts 42,168 demand deposits $12,736,968 plus interest from December 1st last. Securities held follow: province of Manitoba exchequer bonds and treasury bills at par $8,463,470, province of Manitoba debentures and registered stocks at par $3,084,203, city of Winnipeg debentures and registered stocks at par $532,392, other municipal debentures at par $73,558, Dominion of Canada direct obligation at par $119,000. Stocks and bonds guaranteed by Dominion of Canada at par $2,473,130. Total at par $14,745,755. The total of last two items is pledged for a loan of $2,000,000 of which $1,700,000 has been used. If more details desired will gladly furnish. Would appreciate decision early as possible.

John Bracken."

A message asking for further delay having been sent, Mr. Bracken on the 8th of February wired:

Message received. Quite willing to accede to your request. No improvement in situation.

During the intervening hours—because time was running very rapidly—I took this matter up as best I could through the banks, advised them that the securities were as I indicated, which corresponded with the records of the banks in that regard, and found that the only available securities were those of the province of Manitoba and of the city of Winnipeg and of other municipalities of the province to meet these demands, which were increasing in number.

I disliked assuming responsibility in the matter. The saving offices had no cash beyond what they had borrowed from the Bank of Commerce on the $2,000,000 of Dominion government securities, direct and guaranteed, which sum had been practically exhausted on the night of the 9th. But the banks intimated that if we would assume ultimate responsibility they would supply the necessary funds to enable the province to meet the claims of the depositors, and on the 9th day of February I sent to Mr. Bracken this message:

You will be advised by code telegram tomorrow the terms on which your proposals will be accepted.

The negotiations between the banks and Mr. Bracken were not carried on through the government or any member of it, they were carried on directly in Winnipeg through the western supervisors of the banks doing business in that city, who were in direct contact with their principals at Toronto and Montreal. In due course we were advised of the conclusions at which they had arrived, and it was dependent entirely upon our action as to whether or not they would provide the money to meet the depositors' claims. On the 17th day of February therefore, it having taken some time to get the information in detail, the following letter was sent to the general managers of the chartered banks doing business in the city of Winnipeg:

Dear Sirs:

Referring to the proposals from the government of Manitoba (as per copy attached) which I understand the banks are ready to accept and under which the chartered banks doing business in Winnipeg are about to assume the deposit liabilities arising under The Provincial Savings Act, 1924, of the province of Manitoba, and amendments thereto, the government of Canada agrees with the banks, in consideration of the assumption of such liabilities, to indemnify them from all loss in connection therewith; and on the other hand the banks, in consideration of the agreement to indemnify, agree to transfer to the government of Canada the treasury bills received from the province of Manitoba and all collateral securities received by the banks from the province, pari passu with the making of advances of cash by the government of Canada, or giving of its treasury bills by the government of Canada as hereinafter provided.

The government of Canada hereby further agrees, because of the assumption of such liabilities by the banks to place a deposit in cash in each bank in Winnipeg to meet any withdrawals of deposits so assumed, and upon exhaustion of such cash deposits as may be made from time to time, to recoup the banks in lieu of cash, at the option of the government of Canada, for such withdrawals and interest thereon, and interim interest on any uncovered advances made by the banks, by the giving of one year treasury bills of the government of Canada bearing interest at the current rate, not to exceed 5 per cent per annum, payable half yearly, the liability of the government of Canada to supply cash or its treasury bills to continue until the deposit liabilities assumed by the banks as herein mentioned and all interest thereon are completely discharged.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. Bennett,
Prime Minister.

The copy of the letter referred to is dated Winnipeg, Manitoba, February 16, 1932. It is directed by the premier, Mr. Bracken to:

S. H. Logan, Esq. (representing the chartered banks in Winnipeg).
General manager of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, Toronto, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

For some time, as you know, the government of the province of Manitoba has been giving careful consideration to the position of the provincial savings offices. We have now reached the conclusion that if adequate provision is made for the taking over of all deposit liabilities in connection with the provincial savings offices operated under chapter 174 of the Consolidated Amendments of Manitoba and amending acts, the public interest and the interest of the depositors, under existing conditions, would be best served by the closing of the offices. On behalf of the government I therefore submit the following proposal:—

If the chartered banks represented in Winnipeg are willing to take over all outstanding accounts of depositors in the offices operated under the provisions of said chapter 174, the government of the province of Manitoba will at once issue to the banks treasury bills of the province, payable one year after date and bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, to the extent of such liabilities, and will ratify same at the ensuing session of the legislature.

Pending such ratification by the legislature such bills will be issued by the province to an amount equal to such liabilities as and when assumed and will be delivered, together with, as collateral security, all securities now held by the said savings offices to such chartered banks, these collateral securities to be held, less any realizations therefrom, until the treasury bills are paid, and any realizations therefrom to be applied in reduction of the treasury bills.

If this proposal is accepted by the banks the government will discontinue receipt of deposits in such or any other offices.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) John Bracken,
Premier and Provincial Treasurer.

The transaction ended there so far as we were concerned. We were not at the moment called upon to place any cash in the banks, and as I understand the matter the accounts of depositors were divided among the chartered banks doing business in Winnipeg. I have merely this further observation to make in answer to the question that was propounded by an hon. member upon the orders of the day. The province of Manitoba having concluded, for reasons in my judgment good and sufficient, to discontinue its savings offices, I was not anxious that we should assume responsibility for the accounts which it had itself taken and for which it had acquired the securities that I have indicated. The banks pointed out that they had already too many Manitoba securities in their portfolios to enable them unprotected and unsupported to deal with the situation alone. In view of that circumstance I gave, of course with the concurrence of my colleagues, the letter which I have just read. I am entirely in the judgment of the house with respect to it, but one of two things had to take place: Either a situation that had developed was to become very much worse by reason of the continued pressure of depositors for their money, or something had to be done that would support the situation to an extent that would prevent further demands being made. In view of the fact that the province had concluded to withdraw from the business, I decided that the request indicated, being the only method that was available, should be acceded to for the purpose of saving the situation which had become very acute and the repercussions of which would be injurious not only to the province itself but to the other provinces of the dominion as well as to the credit of Canada.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: For information, may I ask the right hon. gentleman a question? Did not Premier Bracken come to the conclusion to close the provincial office after the Dominion government had refused to guarantee the deposits, which guarantee the government gave to the chartered banks afterwards?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not my understanding of the situation. Premier Bracken and Mr. Williams attended at my office and the statement they made clearly indicated that they concluded it was not wise under existing economic conditions to continue their savings offices.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: They had no alternative. The government refused to give them the guarantee.

Mr. BROWN: Do I understand the Prime Minister to say that it was not through him the terms were sent to Premier Bracken that they were to call the legislature within a certain time and to repeal the statute under which the savings office was formed?

Mr. BENNETT: I have read to the hon. gentleman the documents that passed between Premier Bracken and myself. As regards the agreement with the banks, that was a matter of negotiation between the banks and Mr. Bracken.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: After the federal government had refused assistance.

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand the matter, Premier Bracken was in Winnipeg and they were in Toronto. The inspector general of banks informed me that an agreement had been reached and he told me in a general way what the arrangement was. As a matter of fact, if my memory serves me aright, no such agreement was arrived at as that suggested by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). I do not think there was in the agreement—and I have read it here to-day as I received it—anything that would indicate that the legislature was to be summoned. That is not in this document that I have read.

Mr. BROWN: Those terms were certainly submitted to Premier Bracken by the government or directly from the banks.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure the hon. gentleman it was from the banks direct; it was not from the government. Might I, without being thought censorious, say this: It does seem rather hard, when pressed on every side with problems of great magnitude, when this dominion was not only providing money for the obligations of the province of Manitoba maturing in New York, but advancing money to enable it to meet its obligations to municipalities and cities as well as its own as a government, that when the steps I have indicated were taken, we should be the subject of abuse and the target for criticism in our effort to improve the situation. This is something I find rather difficult to understand.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the Prime Minister if he is laying this correspondence on the table of the house?

Mr. BENNETT: I have put it on Hansard.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask my right hon. friend whether any orders in council were passed to ratify those guarantees or undertakings?

Mr. BENNETT: No order in council has yet been passed and perhaps my hon. friend will realize just why that is the case. When one has a problem of this magnitude to deal with, involving nearly $13,000,000, it is not desirable, until the appropriate time comes, that being the necessities of the time limit, to advertise by order in council or otherwise that the situation has reached the point that it has. In any event the action taken was only as against ultimate loss, as the hon. gentleman will observe.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is there anything binding on the government at the present time?

Mr. BENNETT: The good faith of this administration.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Peace, order and good government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The honour of the country.

Mr. BROWN: Don't you talk to us about honour.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, April 18, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, before saying what I have to say on the amendments to the budget, I want to make a few remarks regarding statements that were made in the house on Thursday last in connection with unemployment relief works in British Columbia last fall. I did not intend again introducing this subject as, first, I thought enough had been said in the house to show the great need there was for having an unpartisan committee handle relief matters, and also, second, that the mere fact of discussing the matter does not help the present situation in British Columbia. I would not again introduce this were it not for the fact that the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) saw fit to bring up the matter in this house, when he read a report which purported to emanate from Victoria—a report in connection with a committee that had been appointed by that legislature to inquire into affairs affecting the unemployment situation in British Columbia, and in which report my name is three times mentioned. I think it is only fair that I should make some reply. I do not propose to allow those statements to go unchallenged. Before proceeding, however, let me say that I am indeed sorry that so estimable a gentleman as the hon. member for Nanaimo, one who is universally liked on both sides of the house, should have seen fit to introduce in this house what at that time must have been either an advance copy of the draft report or a telegraphic copy wired to him the night before, and which I claim was introduced in this house in an endeavour to discredit statements which I and others had made, and with a view to bolstering up his friends in Victoria. It is true, as the hon. member for Nanaimo stated, that a committee had been appointed to investigate the charges that had been made with reference to the handling of unemployment relief in British Columbia. That committee was composed of members from both sides, Liberals and Conservatives, the Conservatives, being, according to custom, in the majority. I may say that both the draft report and the final report as presented to the house in Victoria were prepared by the Conservative members of the committee, and that report was presented to the Legislature of British Columbia only on Wednesday, the day previous to its introduction in this house. The draft was prepared on the 11th. In support of that statement I will quote from the Vancouver Sun of April 11, which was the Monday:

> After Major Brown was dismissed from the committee, the members went into camera to consider the draft report which had been prepared by the chairman. The Liberal members withdrew along with Mr. Pattullo. T. D. Pattullo announced that he had taken the stand that the terms of the resolution calling for a full investigation had not been carried out in any degree. The evidence was not before the committee and he did not consider he could be of any assistance in drafting a report under those circumstances. The other Liberal members withdrew along with Mr. Pattullo.

As a matter of fact, the full inquiry closed only on Monday of last week, which was the 11th, and which was just three days previous to its introduction in this house. Now I intend to deal a little later with the contents of that report, but for the moment I will discuss the investigation which was held. Perhaps it would be well for me to read an impartial opinion with reference to this investigation. I quote also from the Vancouver Daily Province of the 11th, the following:

> Twigg probe "shameless spectacle."

Mr. Twigg was the chairman of that committee.

> Harold Brown, trade board president, slams inquiry. Investigation into relief camp expenditure in British Columbia, carried on recently by a select committee of the provincial legislature was "a spectacle of shameless evasion and distortion of the truth," Mr. Harold Brown, president of the Vancouver board of trade, told members of the real estate exchange at a luncheon in Hotel Georgia at noon Friday. "I 'sat in' on some of the sessions of the so-called probe," Mr. Brown declared, "and can draw my own conclusions from what I saw and heard. If anyone told the truth they would have been crucified.". . . "The gorgeous spectacle in Victoria of the so-called probe—at $200 a day—in which if anyone spoke the truth he would be crucified," exemplifies the policy "to drift," he contended.

Mr. Brown is a very prominent citizen of Vancouver. He holds the important position of president of the Vancouver board of trade and is a well known business man who is held in high regard. I believe that he was formerly Conservative, but at the moment he declares that he has no use for either party. He is therefore just now a non-partisan, and he was, I believe, speaking impartially. In support of that statement, I will show later on the attitude he took when he appeared before that committee.

Such statements, Mr. Speaker, could not be left unchallenged, coming as they did from so important a personage as Mr. Harold Brown, and so Mr. Twigg at once asked him to come to Victoria and explain to the committee the statements he had made, namely, that the whole investigation was a shameless spectacle, etc. He appeared before that committee, and I am going to read here one or two quotations with regard to what he had said, and the statements he made. He was asked whether he would take back or apologize for what he had said. He said, no; he would not take back one word; everything he had said had to stand. I quote:

"We are not satisfied that the details have been developed," he said. "We know funds were eaten up wholesale. My knowledge is based on details that have been given to me personally."

"Gossip?" suggested the chairman.

"No, I do not gossip," retorted Major Brown. "My information is from responsible business men."

He stated the inquiry had been a farce, inasmuch as a timekeeper who had been called from one of the camps to give evidence had been there from fifteen to twenty days and had not been summoned before the committee to give any information regarding the expenditures in connection with those camps. From accounts that have been received since, I may say, Mr. Brown is being generally complimented upon his courageous statements.

Now, regarding the statements made by myself, on March 16 last in this house, I intend to take a few minutes discussing these. On that date I made fourteen definite assertions with regard to the handling of the unemployment relief situation in British Columbia. Out of those fourteen assertions the committee have seen fit to embody only three in their report as submitted in the legislature in Victoria and as presented to this house on Thursday of last week. As I have stated they dealt only with three of the fourteen assertions. However, I will discuss those three because my name has been brought in, and statements have been made regarding what I had said. The first statement made was with reference to a statement which will be found in Hansard of March 16, and which was quoted here on Thursday of last week. Let me read from the report:

The suggestion made by Mr. Thos. Reid, member of the House of Commons for New Westminster (at page 1283 of Hansard, 1932), that one manufacturer had "sold 50,000 blankets and it took him out of the red," is without any foundation in fact.

Regarding that statement of mine, I have only this to say, Mr. Speaker, that the information was given me just before I left for Ottawa by a prominent business man in Vancouver, and one who is in the wholesale line in a large way. I accepted it from him in good faith. The second reference to myself in the report reads:

(g) Mr. Thomas Reid (at page 1283 of Hansard 1932), stated:

"I counted in one camp 450 steel wheelbarrows. They had so many that a man was to be appointed to regulate their use." The evidence before your committee indicated that there might be 450 steel wheelbarrows in one camp but it would be in the nature of a depot or warehouse camp for a group of camps, and that the man referred to would be for the purpose of distributing wheelbarrows and other tools and supplies among the various camps requiring them.

They admit that the second allegation was correct, notice that they say there might have been 450 steel wheelbarrows. I am glad they do admit that because I counted them. They then say it was a distributing camp, but, Mr. Speaker, this camp was miles and miles away off by itself and almost on the boundary line between the United States and Canada. It could not have been a distributing camp because it was not near any other camp and was off the lines of communication or traffic. In connection with the third charge the report of the committee reads:

Mr. Reid further stated: "I have no comment to make regarding the construction camps except to criticize the loose way in which they were run." The evidence before your committee indicated that the camps were conducted in an efficient and economical manner.

What other finding could the committee make when they would not hear the evidence available? They refused to hear the timekeeper who was available as well as other witnesses who could have given information regarding the camp. Mr. Brown, an impartial witness, testified, and it might be as well to quote from his testimony because if I were to make the statements it might be said they were partisan. The newspaper report of this inquiry reads as follows:

Mr. Loutet again asked for one specific instance. "You cannot get evidence in a political inquiry which is accurate," Mr. Brown continued. He asked why a Mr. Brian, who was in Victoria for some fifteen or twenty days, was not called. He was a timekeeper in a North Okanagan camp. "He could have given information on some vital points."

The chairman, Mr. Twigg, then said: "Name another case." To my mind that was practically admitting that this charge was correct. The report continues:

"Then you are attributing to all the witnesses a careful plan of distorting the truth unless you will exonerate some of them," General Clark insisted. "You decline to exonerate any witnesses."

"You can draw your own conclusions," Mr. Brown replied.

And again:

Mr. Brown then asked the right to put some questions of his own to Mr. Twigg.

"Do you consider the inquiry perfect as to details of wasteful expenditure?" He asked.

Mr. Twigg replied that the committee had gone as deeply into these matters as it could.

"I am perfectly satisfied," Mr. Twigg added.

"There has been no extravagance?" Mr. Brown insisted.

"I wont say that," Mr. Twigg answered. "There must be extravagance when you put thousands of men into camps at short notice. The average cost of camps and of feeding the men compares satisfactorily with the cost in lumber and other camps in this province."

I need not go into this matter any further because from the evidence I have submitted I think it has been shown that this committee did not go very fully into the matter of the running of the camps, in fact they refused to hear witnesses who could give them this information. This demonstrates that the whole inquiry was simply, as Mr. Brown publicly stated, a farce.

I am sorry that all the assertions which I made on March 16 were not gone into. I made serious charges, some in connection with provincial cabinet ministers, and these were never brought out. Only three were dealt with. One was admitted; in the case of the other it was stated I was absolutely wrong regarding the 50,000 blankets, and in connection with the third charge they say that the camps were run in an economical manner. I think it is a mighty poor average when out of fourteen assertions and charges only three were dealt with. This would seem to indicate that, generally speaking, all my statements were accurate or eleven of them would not have been left unchallenged.

I have a copy of a provincial paper in which the premier makes a crack at the Liberal members of this house. He states that investigations had been made necessary by the spreading of propaganda to injure the government. I can assure the house that we do not need to say anything here to injure the government in British Columbia. The premier states that the disgraceful statements made by two British Columbia Liberal members in the House of Commons had been proven to be false. That is not exactly correct because, as I say, I made fourteen assertions and only three were dealt with, one of which was admitted to be correct. If there was anything disgraceful, it was the manner in which this whole matter was carried out, especially as some cabinet ministers were involved.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the hon. gentleman referring to cabinet ministers in this government?

Mr. REID: No, I was referring to cabinet ministers of the provincial government.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) would have done his party and his countrymen much more good had he read the full report submitted to the legislature. This report contains many recommendations, but the hon. member saw fit to deal only with the unemployment charges and did not refer to what is also an important portion of the report. I think the hon. member would have done considerable good for the people of British Columbia by advocating the adoption of the suggestions submitted by this committee. I shall read one or two of the recommendations, which are as follows:

> That negotiations be opened with the Dominion government with a view of starting on the Peace river outlet and thus give employment to many men. That investigation should be made to the end that suitable men engaged upon such work would be assisted to a reasonable extent in taking up land in the Peace river district.
> That members of the militia unemployed be cared for by their respective units.
> That arrangements should be made for representatives of basic British Columbia industries to attend the Imperial conference as observers to assist the Dominion government in recapturing empire markets.

I am glad it is admitted that empire markets have to be recaptured. The recommendations continue:

> Direct relief being wasteful and demoralizing be discontinued in favour of work for remuneration.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that in British Columbia camps have been established, machinery has been purchased and considerable money spent and, apart from the demoralizing aspect of the dole, it would be too bad if these facilities were not utilized any further. As I said before, the hon. member for Nanaimo would have accomplished much more had he read all the recommendations submitted to the provincial legislature on April 13.

During the short time at my disposal I shall discuss a few matters touching upon the amendments to the budget and the budget speech, as well as general affairs. I listened last evening to an hon. member throwing out accusations that the Liberal party had changed its attitude. It is rather amusing to hear such accusations, because if there ever was a party which changed its attitude, it is the party sitting to the right of the Speaker. Although not then a member of this house, I well remember, when the Dunning budget was brought down, the pooh-pooh that went up all over the country against what was called the gesture in that budget of extending a preference to Great Britain and raising the tariff against foreign countries. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) called it a meaningless gesture, and generally speaking the budget was ridiculed by hon. gentlemen opposite. But they have since changed, Mr. Speaker, and changed very fast. As a matter of fact, if the Liberal party does not watch out the Conservative party will soon have stolen the whole Dunning policy from under the noses of the Liberal party and will be advocating it here in the house, judging by what I have seen and heard since I came to this house. I remember also that in 1930, when the Prime Minister of this country went to the imperial conference, the great Conservative cry throughout this country was then "Canada first"; put a wall around Canada. But they are not crying that so loudly now. It is now "Empire first" instead of "Canada first." I note further that in 1930 when the Prime Minister went to England there was a Labour government in power in that country. Since then however, there has been a change of government in England and although they have what is known as a Nationalist government now, it is as we know, practically a Conservative government. I believe that the attitude of our government in 1930 was due to the fact that there was a Labour government in power in England. It is significant that at that time the Conservative policy in this country should have been "Canada first," but that now when a Conservative government is in power in England the cry of the Conservative party in this country has been changed from "Canada first" to "Empire first." There is no doubt in my mind that the Tory mind has always been against Labour governments and the Labour party.

Last evening in this house I heard an hon. member read letter after letter regarding factories which have been started in this country since this government came into power, and I could not help but wonder at the time how it was that the number of unemployed was still increasing. Surely these factories are not manufacturing unemployed people. What on earth are they manufacturing in these new factories?—Because unemployment is certainly increasing.

Another hon. member got up and said that if the Liberal party had been in power in this country at this time, prices for agricultural products would have been much lower. It has always seemed strange to me, Mr. Speaker, listening to hon. members on your right speaking of agricultural prices, it would seem that they have better prices in those constituencies than we can get in our constituencies. When that hon. gentleman spoke of prices for agricultural products being lower, I say that that is impossible so far as British Columbia is concerned—the price of eggs for instance, could not be lower unless they are going to give you an omelet for nothing. I saw a letter the other day from a man who said that he gave a dozen eggs for one apple. I asked the price of the apple, and he said that it cost five cents. Then hon. gentlemen opposite say that the prices of agricultural products would have been lower if the Liberal government had been in power. I know that milk was thrown away in British Columbia at one period last year. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that prices of farm products are all right, but we on this side know that the price of eggs, for instance, in British Columbia could not be lower than now unless, as I said, they give an omelet for nothing. I believe that the Conservative policy in this regard is entirely wrong in that they are endeavouring to put industry first in a country that is primarily agricultural. I believe that our agricultural products should be looked after first, and let industry follow along and be built up after agriculture. But instead of that, the Conservative policy has always been to develop industry first by placing rings and restrictions all around Canada with the result that the agriculturist in Canada to-day is practically in bondage or slavery and the farmers cannot purchase any of the goods manufactured within our dominion.

I should like to discuss for a few moments the currency question. It was interesting to hear an hon. member say that gold was the most useless metal in the world. If he would give me all the useless metal of that kind he has, I assure him that I would gladly accept it. But as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, gold is not a useless metal. Apart from its value as a metallic basis for our currency, gold has always been a much-sought-after metal. It is a metal that will not corrode; it is a metal that will not deteriorate; it is a metal that is desirable in the manufacture of many useful and ornamental articles. It is only in comparatively recent years that gold has become a basis of value for the world. Since the beginning of time up until within the last one hundred years silver was the monetary basis. I am not one of those who believe that the settling of the currency question by using the system of bi-metallism or making gold or silver the standard will settle the affairs of the world, but so long as mankind pins its faith to something tangible I believe that our present system could be greatly improved by adopting bi-metallism, which is also more easily understood than the so-called inflation policy, or which we have heard so much in this house of late. I would like to have heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce go a little further in his remarks along these lines the other evening. He has given a great deal of study and thought to this question, and as I say I would have liked to hear him go further than he did when he was on that —to me—very important subject. It is hard for the peoples of the earth to give up a metal that has been used as a symbol of value from the beginning of time. For the benefit of the house I am going to quote from an article, and I should like any hon. member who follows me to reply to the statements I am going to put on record. Here is one of the most startling statements that I have ever read regarding gold. It is in an article by P. A. O'Farrell, who I believe is considered an outstanding authority on this subject, and in this article he quotes Sir Henri Deterding, of whom he says:

Sir Henri Deterding is probably without a peer in the world of finance and business. He is also believed to have amassed unparalleled riches. But riches are not his aim.

Quoting Sir Henri Deterding, Mr. O'Farrell says:

It has often been asked, "What caused the Bank of England, and the British treasury to assume an inveterate dislike for silver money?" England was the first country to reduce the 12 to 1 gold parity of silver. The Bank of England was the first to limit the sum payable in silver. England was the first to altogether demonetize silver, and that 56 years before Bismarck forced Germany to do the same thing.

Dislike of silver currency or worship of gold has been an obsession with the Bank of England and the British treasury for more than two centuries.

As Sir Henri Deterding thinks, this obsession is not born of mature consideration or logical conclusions but of the "unreality" of fatalism.

In 1919 the average price of silver throughout the world was $1.25 an ounce. It climbed to $1.85 an ounce in February, 1920, when there was an actual scarcity in silver for business among a billion people. Asia was at its peak of prosperity, and so was Latin America, in 1920. Gold was at a discount all over the world and silver had once more come into its own as queen of the monetary world.

Thereupon England appealed to the United States and succeeded in conjuring 260,000,000 American silver dollars from Uncle Sam. The British mint combined the 200,000,000 ounces of silver with 200,000,000 ounces of copper and fabricated £100,000,000 sterling of debased silver currency out of the money borrowed from the United States for $202,000,000.

The British treasury then withdrew all its sterling silver money from circulation, melted it into bullion, dumped the silver bullion in the oriental markets and broke the price of silver from a premium at $1.85 to 70 cents an ounce. It was aided in this debauching of silver money by the other countries of Europe, who also debased their silver money and dumped the surplus on the world's markets. This performance brought on the world depression in 1920 and 1921 and the painful recovery of the years following.

In 1927, to make certain that silver would never again soar to a premium over gold, the British treasury created a makeshift gold paper currency for the 350,000,000 people of India who did not want it, and having accumulated 1,000,000,000 rupees, turned them into silver bullion and began dumping that also on an already glutted silver market.

To stop the natives of India from buying imported silver, the government put a tax of over eleven cents an ounce on the white metal, and silver was thus driven down to 25½ cents an ounce in America and to one shilling an ounce in London.

Silver money we are told was demonetized to halt inflation. But instead of real silver money, the fossil monetary experts have put into circulation $6,000,000,000 of counterfeit silver and bronze currency which has only a metal gold value of $500,000,000.

Moreover they have added $200,000,000,000 of inflation paper credit money to keep company with counterfeit metal which, when revolution or an Attila and his hordes sweep through Europe, will be as worthless as the trillions of paper money which Germany issued during the world war.

The gerrymander of the world's money during the last two hundred years has robbed the human race of hundreds of billions of its potential wealth and capital and stalled the conquests of civilization in Asia, Africa, Australia and Latin America.

If the spirit of Balfour could revisit the "Glimpses of the Moon" and hear the outcries for the restoration of stabilized silver to the world, his ghost would quickly fade away muttering, "What fools these mortals be."

Sad to say the cowardice of politicians has had just as much to do with demoralizing the world's monetary machinery as the greed of plutocracy and the stupidity of so-called monetary experts.

The day is past for further soft-pedalling on this vital and fundamental issue. The question before democracy is, "Shall the world's currency be counterfeit and inflated or stabilized precious metals which neither war nor revolution nor the vicissitudes of time can alter or degrade?"

That, Mr. Speaker, is a very significant article, and the statements it contains have not, I believe, been so far contradicted in any paper I have read. I do not say that bimetallism would solve all our evils or ills. I do maintain, however, that with barriers of trade down, and freer trade between nations coupled with a symbol or unit of equality more on a par as between one nation and another, we would go a great way in developing and stimulating trade and raising the standard of civilization throughout the world.

One case in point arises, and that concerns China. China is one country where the unit of value is, I believe, a bowl of rice and where the money standard is silver. Although I am not going to attempt to give figures I shall outline a case in point. For many years we were selling cases of salmon to China. China having a silver standard, and we having a gold standard, and not accepting silver money, I am in a position to draw this comparison. When silver was on a parity with gold every dollar the Chinaman had was equal to the dollar of ours. But to-day however when we sell a case of salmon worth, say, $4.75 or $5, the Chinaman has to give us practically four times that value in his money before we will accept it. Undoubtedly we cannot do business under those conditions. If business is to be on a mutual basis, then there must be a mutual basis either of silver or gold. If business is to be continued the symbol or unit of value has to be equal throughout the various countries of the world, or very nearly so.

I have listened with a great deal of attention to the Minister of Trade and Commerce who spoke a few evenings ago concerning interest, and who was very careful to put the figures at ten per cent. He said neither industry nor agriculture could survive or prosper with that interest rate. Why did he not say six per cent? With our declining wages I believe we will never get out of our present difficulties if the rate of interest on government securities, either municipal or provincial, continues at six per cent, coupled with decreasing wages. I have one little criticism of the government. It was bad enough to take ten per cent off the smaller salaries, but I hope the government will not go any further. They have given the lead in regard to wage reductions and I hope they will not begin to increase the hours of labour. Only to-day I received a telegram from postal workers who are alarmed because of the notice which has been issued stating that they will be called upon to work overtime and longer hours without further recompense. I hope this government will not be a party to a policy of lower wages and longer hours. As one coming from the industrial field I know the great fight waged in past years to bring about the eight-hour day and increase the standard of living. I trust this government will not be a party to cutting wages and increasing hours of labour, especially at a time such as the present, and after so many years of endeavour on the part of workers to bring about better working conditions.

I should like to have seen the government go a little further in connection with the income tax. We are always being told about activities in the United States, and we have been told that in that country the income tax is much lower. In the old country the income tax is almost twice the tax in this country, but from reports we learn that it is paid cheerfully. I should like to have seen the government go after the larger incomes, because although I will not say greed is an inherent quality in all people yet it is in a great many. That greed has to be held within bounds, and to my mind proper taxation would be one way of bringing about the desired effect, and curbing greed to some extent. The words of the poet Burns: "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn" are more true to-day than when they were written, and the fact that the wealth of the world is in the hands of a few should be considered most seriously by the government in power.

Mr. J. LOUIS BARIBEAU (Champlain) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps bold on my part to participate in this debate. I am fully aware that I shall not be able to maintain the discussion on the high level where my hon. colleagues have placed it. Therefore, acknowledging my boldness I rely entirely on the proverbial indulgence of the house.

I deem it my duty, however, to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), on his splendid speech on the budget, so greatly welcome in all provinces of the dominion. The expenditure of the administration have been so distributed that each ratepayer contributes according to his means and the luxuries he can afford.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): May I, sir, quote the views of the leading business men of my district and province. Mr. W. G. E. Aird, manager of the Wabasso Cotton Company, states:

That the general opinion among financiers is that the budget is a moderate and reasonable one.

Mr. Bromley Smith, manager of the Canada Iron Foundries, has this to say:

I think we are still privileged in not having to contribute more, when we compare our position with that of other countries.

Mr. Beaudry Leman, general manager of the Banque Canadienne National, states:

The balancing of the budget is an essential condition of the financial stability of the state and the maintenance on satisfactory basis of the national credit.

Workmen and employers, wage earners and those with independent means: briefly, every body is interested that the finances of the Dominion government should be on a sound basis.

The only possible way to reach this end is that each person should contribute his reasonable quota.

On the other hand, the state must, under present circumstances, cut out useless expenditures and those which are in the luxury class.

Mr. Taggart Smyth, general manager of the Savings Bank, states:

The measures adopted are governed by the needs of the hour and seem best adapted to the present circumstances. Nobody is astonished and I think that the public will welcome them.

Mr. T. J. Tibbutt, president of the Tibbutt Shoe and Leather Co., has this to say:

It is the best budget we have had for a long time past and it is much less burdensome than the United States budget. Canada, however, is less affected than most of the other countries, by the present economic crisis.

Mr. Frank I. Ritchie, manager of the Wayagamack Pulp & Paper Co., states:

The present budget is fair and equitable.

I deem it also my duty to express my thanks to the people of Champlain who have honoured me with their trust by electing me to represent them in this house.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): It will be otherwise at the next election.

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): The constituency, sir, which I represent, besides bearing the name of the father of the whole country, which places it among the most venerable, owing to its seniority, is still one of the most important counties in old Quebec. Extending from the shores of the St. Lawrence river across the Laurentian mountains; to the west, bounded by the St. Maurice river which is the source of so much electric energy; and to the east, by the charming St. Ann's river, the county of Champlain maintains a population of 75,000 people, 99 per cent of whom are French Canadians; it comprises three towns of 10,000, 6,000 and 4,000 people respectively, and thirty rural parishes.

This means that I shall relieve the fears of the young men in making known to you the conditions prevailing in such an important section of the country. The house will derive some information which will allow it to judge better of the situation in Quebec, as well as the excellent results of the government's policy; as I intend to sound the optimistic note, notwithstanding what the hon. members opposite may think, for they have all become pessimists since the people of this country have so sadly left them in the lurch.

Let us examine what is the prevailing situation of industries in cities. Indeed, at Cap-de-la-Madeleine, as everywhere else, the economic depression weighs heavily on the good working classes. Two large pulp and paper industries, the Canada Power and Paper Co. and the Wayagamack are the source of the main activities of the workmen. The former closed its doors a few months ago, while the latter is still working but with a decreased output.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): What a fine government!

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): Does this mean that work is completely stopped and that nothing was done to relieve unemployment? This is where I wish to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on the success of his policy as regards unemployment. At a time, sir, when the improvident policy of excessive industrialization inaugurated by the Taschereau government brought about, in the paper industry, the present crisis, the Dominion government, thanks to its wise policy to relieve unemployment, helped the heretofore prosperous working population of that town to ward off poverty—owing to the mills closing down—by undertaking public works and thus giving work to those whom a prolonged state of unemployment might have placed in dire circumstances.

Beside this pulp and paper industry, there is also a natural silk factory lately established in that town. The latter has already given marvellous results, and will further develop as the effects of the protective tariff are felt.

What I have just stated as regards Cap-de-la-Madeleine, may also apply to Grand'Mere, where there is located a branch of the Canada Power and Paper Co. Again there, while the mills were only working part time, the unemployment act gave great relief. There is also located in that town a very prosperous boot and shoe industry. In the town of St. Tite, is to be found a factory making leather goods, which also is doing well. These facts induce me to state that the situation is greatly improving and that the future is very promising. That is why the working classes, believing in the intelligent efforts of the government are not dismayed, and close their ears to the fanciful theories of a diabolical communistic propaganda. For my part, I shall not cease asking the government's protection for the good working classes of Champlain.

The Three Rivers district, one of the largest producing centres of paper and pulp in the world, is undergoing a severe crisis; and I would suggest to our distinguished representatives, at the Imperial conference, to continue their efforts with the British Government so as to obtain for Canadian pulp and paper a special preference. If our pulp and newsprint were given a preference of 10 per cent, it would greatly benefit this industry, as pulp and paper are amongst our great assets, they are, however, enjoying, at present, but a relative prosperity. A Canadian preference of ten per cent on pulp and paper exports would improve the lot of the numerous workmen engaged in that industry.

May I, sir, read a resolution to that effect adopted by municipal council of the town of Cap-de-la-Madeleine:

Canada, Province of Quebec,
Municipality of the town of Cap-de-la-Madeleine.

Resolution No. 4554.

At a regular meeting (special) of the council of the town of Cap-de-la-Madeleine, held in the ordinary place and chamber of the sessions of the council, at the City Hall, on Monday this twenty-ninth day of February, 1932, at 7 p.m.

At which meeting were present: His worship the mayor, J. A. Nadeau, Messrs. the councillors: Ernest Arseneau, Ernest Houle, Henri Thiffault, Armand Lemire and François Courteau, constituting a quorum under the chairmanship of the mayor.

Moved by councillor Ernest Houle, seconded by councillor Ernest Arseneau,

Resolved, whereas the pulp and paper industry is in a precarious state in our province and throughout the country.

Whereas in July next an Imperial Economic Conference will be held at Ottawa to discuss an economic scheme of mutual preference for the British Empire.

Whereas the National government in England has adopted a protective tariff policy and that this same government is committed to a policy of preference on products of the nations which comprise the British Empire, until and in provision of the mutual and reciprocal results which this economic conference will foster.

Whereas the Canadian government is in favour of a mutual preference policy within the empire.

Whereas England purchases millions of dollars worth of pulp and paper, yearly.

Be it resolved that the council of the town of Cap-de-la-Madeleine takes the liberty of suggesting that the Dominion government continue its endeavours with the Imperial governmen in order that a more substantial preference be granted to the Canadian pulp and news print.

That the clerk be requested to forward a copy of the present resolution to the hon. Henry Stevens, Minister of Trade and Commerce, to Mr. J. L. Baribeau, M.P., for Champlain and to Mr. Charles Bourgeois, M.P., for Three Rivers-St. Maurice, praying them to give it their attention and support.

Carried unanimously.

Certified copy.

Raoul Rocheleau,
Clerk.

I have just drawn a rapid sketch of the workman's condition in the county which I am privileged to represent. Allow me now to introduce to you the finest rural people in Canada.

[Mr. Baribeau.]

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): This statement may appear contrary to the general belief, but it is a fact, since everywhere, in the new parishes as well as in the older ones, agriculture maintains the place where the Creator wished it to be and constitutes a great nucleus of high moral ideals and physical welfare. Come to our country side along the shores of the St. Lawrence river, visit the inland parishes, penetrate even into the back sections, victorious of the forest, and the same vista will meet your eyes searching for the charms of landscapes, and the same happy life will fill your patriotic heart with joy.

What is meant here is that our compatriots are at work; as always, they are part of the land, they love it and toil over it. They do not farm for the time being, satisfied with what each year brings, like those lacking foresight, neither with the simplicity of certain farmers who, believing that the resources of a wheat farm are inexhaustible, live at a rate that only a gold mine could permit, but they farm wisely and scientifically like heads of industries, in view of a permanent success. Let economic crises then come, let meagre returns be obtained, they are inured to the hardships and can await normal times without crying famine nor face ruin and death.

This does not signify that everything runs smoothly. Unfortunately, in Champlain, as in other counties, farmers have deserted the farm for the city, in a race for prize money, which manufacturers offer in the shape of high wages. Furthermore, yet sad to state, quite a number of our farmers having purchased properties at too high a price, are today unable to meet their liabilities. The returns of their farm products are too small...

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): . . . but they know that such prices prevail everywhere; municipal taxes are high, as well as school taxes.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Not everywhere.

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): Our farmers have heavy burdens to bear, and if the former government succeeded in reducing the national debt as stated by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard), it was perhaps, at the expense of our farming classes, for we note that the farmers are those who suffer the most in the present crisis, that their properties are mortgaged, that they have had to resort to promissory notes and contracted obligations which date back to the former régime.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Things are not running smoothly in our country.

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): The farmers realized this situation and proved it eloquently on July 28, 1930. Do they now regret having acted so energetically against their oppressors? They certainly do not regret the New Zealand treaty, nor the generosities of the former government towards the United States, nor the former tariff which afforded very little protection and was the cause of their distress. Now, under the impulse of the new policy, equilibrium will be restored, thus dissipating the nerve wrecking nightmares of a year of depression. I made the suggestion, a few moments ago, to those who will represent us at the Imperial conference which is being held in Ottawa—a great honour for Canada—to do everything possible in order to obtain a preference on newsprint and pulp so as to help our working classes. I shall further add that such a preference would tend besides to aid numerous farmers, for most of them are owners of woodlots, and the sale of their wood would allow them to realize appreciable profits. We must protect our industries, and farming, being the main industry of this country, deserves the greatest protection.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): When the purchasing power of farmers is high, all classes of society benefit.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): Our hon. colleagues in the opposition state that there are more unemployed this year in Canada than last year, but they forget to add that this crisis is world wide in extent. I shall content myself with inserting in Hansard the following figures, taken from the International Labour Review:

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Per day.

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): ...per day, it does not strike him that for all the work performed by the Dominion government, the wood was cut by our farmers, we had the stone drawn, our blacksmiths were given work, we also found work for all those who had a trade in each locality, and the amounts thus disbursed do not appear under the item "hours", however these payments helped numerous workmen.

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): I proceed.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): There are no more unemployed.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): The country is ruined.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): That is your work.

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): There is another class of people to which I want to draw the attention of the house, the navigators many of whom reside in my county. We have a number of associations of navigators, among these a branch of the National Association of Marine Engineers of Canada, also numerous pilot associations. May I therefore make a few suggestions to the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) who, I feel certain, will lend a kind ear to my remarks. I think the government should interest itself especially in the young men who wish to become pilots. No government, up to now, have taken any interest in these young men and yet this profession is a necessary one, even indispensable. These apprentices are destined to replace the pilots as the latter disappear. Most of them are obliged to make great sacrifices to become pilots. A large number belong to families that are poor, as those who have means are not attracted to the hardy life of a sailor which they must undergo to reach their goal. These apprentices find it practically impossible to earn anything in other trades.

They are, on the contrary, obliged to make an outlay of almost $200, each season to complete their apprenticeship. Generally their parents are not in a position to help them, so that you can easily realize their sad lot. According to regulations laid down, these young men have to undergo an apprenticeship of 5 or 6 years before obtaining their officer's certificate. This consists in travelling on ships to and fro between Quebec and Father Point, and between Quebec and Montreal. They must have to their credit at least 50 trips during each season. They are therefore kept busy during the whole season. During that time they receive no salary; on the contrary they must pay their board and travelling expenses, except when on service on the ships. When the trips stipulated by the regulations are over, the season of navigation closes, they have not the opportunity of serving on vessels crossing the ocean. They are idle all winter. Those whose families have certain means are less to be pitied, however, most of them are in straitened circumstances. I think it is the duty of the government and especially that of our worthy Minister of Marine to help these young men. Why should they not be given the preference in working on the government's ice breakers in winter? While thus helping these young men, the latter could complete their naval instructions and become familiar with the difficulties of winter navigation. There is a tendency to further prolong the navigation season, this almost makes it necessary for pilots to have a better knowledge of the difficulties of winter navigation. Where is there a more appropriate school for our future pilots than that of passing a few winters on our ice breakers? They would certainly discover hidden difficulties that perhaps they would never find out during the summer months.

Previous to closing my remarks, sir, I must inform the house that I had the honour of being invited to call on His Excellency, the Governor General, Lord Bessborough—

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): We also.

Mr. BARIBEAU (Translation): —and I would consider it amiss if I did not thank, in the house, the representative in Canada of His Majesty, the King, both on behalf of my fellow-citizens in Champlain and mine, for the cordial reception I received. I felt some pride in being welcomed by words spoken in the language of my forebears and, I think, I am giving expression to the French Canadians' feelings, in quoting, in this respect, a letter addressed to His Excellency, the Governor General by the President of "L'Institut Canadien-français d'Ottawa":

To His Excellency, the Earl of Bessborough,
Governor General of Canada,
Rideau Hall, Ottawa, Ont.
Excellency,—

The Institut canadien-français of Ottawa, the oldest French society in Ontario, founded in 1852 and incorporated by an act of parliament in 1865, having since its foundation, been the purest expression of French self-respect and determination, in Ottawa, is pleased to express to Your Excellency, the deepest feelings of gratitude and heartfelt thanks for the wise counsels that you had the kindness and courtesy of extending to the Canadian people, since your arrival in Canada, on the importance of learning the French language.

To those sentiments we add the testimonial of our proverbial loyalty to the British Crown.

Your Excellency possibly does not realize to what extent the interest you take in the French language is appreciated by the French Canadian population.

I beg of Your Excellency to accept, as a source of information, a copy of the constitution and rules of our society. You may thus judge for yourself what is our aim and what are our means of action.

On behalf of all the members of the Institute and on behalf of all my compatriots, Your Excellency, will allow me to express to you again our sincere and cordial thanks.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient and faithful servant,

H. Beaulieu.
President.

Allow me also to congratulate, perhaps somewhat late, the hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Baker) for the splendid speech he delivered in the French language, in the house, last year. So long as the two great races of this country will understand and admire one another, we may depend on them to elect legislators who will realize what are the best interests of Canada, and I believe that the harmonious cooperation of these two great races constitute one of the surest guarantees of the respect of the constitution and one of the most powerful factors to solve our national problems, whatever they may be.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): In rising to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the very able way in which he presented his first budget. We have, however, to condole with him on having to present a budget in this time of crisis, for it could not be a pleasant task. I desire also to congratulate him on paying the courtesy to this house of remaining in his seat while the debate is in progress. It is a courtesy which we very much appreciate, as we have not received it from some of his predecessors in office.

The budget contains figures that cannot be very pleasant reading for the people of Canada. For instance, our exports and imports are much lower than they have been for several years. Our expenditures and revenues are down. As far as our reduced exports and imports are concerned, we can expect nothing else, for the policy of the government—carried out, I know, in good faith—could have had no other result even in good times. The government have been putting into effect the policy on which the Conservative party were returned to power, and they have done their level best to interfere with trade, to stop imports wherever they could—with the natural result of checking exports. One pays for the other; and if we stop goods coming in, we are bound to affect adversely the selling of our goods in the markets of the world. This year unfortunately we have a deficit of about $119,505,000. We might have had a deficit under any circumstances, but the situation has been aggravated by the trade policy of the powers that be. For instance, the revenue from customs this year is about $77,000,000 less than it was two years ago. Admitting that we are passing through a depression, the customs revenue would not have been as low as this had we encouraged trade with other countries. The interest on the national debt this coming year is estimated at $121,163,000. I am glad to see that this is a little less than it was a year ago, brought about no doubt through the refunding of large blocks of bonds last year.

Reference is made in the budget to the $11,000,000 paid out in respect of the wheat bonus. Canada did not lose by taking this course. Never in the history of the western provinces was that amount more needed than it was a year ago, and every cent has gone into the circle of trade. If the amount had been even greater I feel the dominion generally would have benefited considerably, and I am sorry that the budget contains no announcement as to a continuation of the bonus.

I regret the Minister of Finance has found it necessary to impose a lot of nuisance taxes —stamp taxes, taxes on telegrams, long distance telephones, and so on. These taxes have a detrimental effect on business, and I should be glad to have seen the Finance minister get his additional revenue through a more steeply graded income tax rather than by this means. Those of us who from time to time happen to come under the income tax legislation would, I am sure, have been only too pleased to pay the additional taxation in that form rather than in the form of these vexatious nuisance taxes.

I was glad to notice that the action taken by the government a year ago in guaranteeing the bankers against loss on their advances to the wheat pool, has not involved the country in any liability. I hope the newspapers that at one time so loudly proclaimed the large amounts that the government would have to make good on this guarantee, will please note that their doleful foreboding were quite uncalled for.

Reference is made in the budget to the Canadian farm loan board. Of all the legislation that has been passed in the house with the idea of benefiting agriculture, I think the Farm Loan Act has been the greatest disappointment. When it was going through the house we hoped it would be of real help to agriculture, particularly at such times as these when the farmers are in great need of having some means of carrying them through for a few years until the situation improves. I find, according to a return given to me some time ago, no less than 14,432 applications have been made under this act for loans.

Of those, however, only 4,119 loans were granted, the total sum lent amounting to $7,500,000, and the cost of administering the act being $338,788. These figures are up to December 31, 1931. First of all, they prove that there is a great need in Canada of more loans to help the farmers carry on and, second, it seems to me it must be on account of the very low value of farm property that the board has seen fit to grant only a little over 4,000 loans as against about 14,500 applications. When one realizes that in Saskatchewan alone, according to some figures given me last year, $216,000,000 was taken out in farm mortgages, the farm loan board has had very little effect when it has advanced only $7,500,000 in the whole of the dominion.

This year the Dominion government has considered that the most important thing it has to do is to balance its budget. There are more important problems than that to-day. If you are going to balance your budget at the cost of the people of the country by taxing them heavily and by cutting down public expenses when we need more purchasing power instead of less, then it is not a good thing to balance the budget. We would have been ahead if we had for the time being added to the national debt the amount by which we were short or issued currency directly to meet the deficit, collecting, through taxation in better times, enough to make up the difference. To increase taxation at this time and to cut down salaries and wages in the civil service, an action which naturally has been followed throughout the dominion in commercial life, will have the effect only of cutting down purchasing power all along the line, and next year we are likely to be in a worse position than we are now. In support of my suggestion that it would have been better not to balance the budget this year but to add the deficit to our national debt, I should like to quote from Mr. D. M. Garvin, economist of the Royal bank, who made this statement when he was speaking to the Canadian Club at Toronto, on February 22, 1932:

> The first influence of an unbalanced budget may be to injure confidence to such an extent as to destroy part of the outstanding volume of credit, but sooner or later the borrowing to make up these deficits must tend towards producing the larger volume of credit necessary for expansion.

I wish to congratulate the government on the change which they have made in the income tax, and which was much overdue. I regretted to see the government of the day in 1927 and 1928 reduce the income tax by ten per cent. If it had not been reduced; if even it had been increased at that time, we would be in a position now to make the tax less on smaller incomes. I am sorry, however, while on the one hand the government have seen fit to cut down wages and public expenditures, on the other they have deemed it wise to pay higher rates on borrowed money. I should like to quote from an editorial in the Vancouver Sun a few words which express very well my thoughts in this respect. It reads:

> If it is right for the government of Canada to reduce the wages of civil servants ten per cent, is it not right that the wages of money should also be reduced?
> What right has any government to protect a dollar rather than a man?
> What right has Canada to protect and actually increase the interest rate on her five billions of federal and provincial debts, and at the same time decrease the earning power of a man?
> What right has North America to make a fetish of past performance and at the same time refuse to protect present employed and find work for North America's seven million unemployed? Real industry and labour are working together to get conditions back to normal. Should capital be allowed to hold itself aloof?

The present government came into power with two main promises: first, to raise the tariff and, second, to cure unemployment. We have to give them credit for carrying out the first. They raised the tariff on over four hundred different schedules. We all know, however, this has not been a cure. As regards curing unemployment, it has been a hopeless failure. The public, in regard to the raising of the tariff, is to be blamed, first of all, for putting the government into power with a promise to increase tariffs and, second, for expecting that that would solve the problem. A high tariff, when all is said and done, is no protection. Surely we are beginning to realize that an opposition next door to a factory is much keener than when it is on the other side of the international boundary or across the ocean. When under a prohibitive tariff factories are forced into this or any other country, the new factories must be keener competitors of the older ones that have already been established. If we have brought into this country one hundred new factories, as I believe we have, then those that were already here must be suffering in consequence, because during the last two years, not more, but less money has been put into circulation. This can easily be discovered by following the bank statements. If there is less money to be spent and more goods are being made; if the newer factories are getting the business, then this must be at the expense of some of the older ones.

I believe I am safe in saying that to-day our unemployed in Canada number over five hundred thousand. The government having failed, first, in its trade policy and, second, in its unemployment policy, it is trying the third method, and that is, to practise drastic economy. But while drastic economy may be all right for the individual, it is very bad for us collectively, and if anybody can afford to spend at this time it should be the government because it has all the credit of the nation at its back. While we have some five hundred thousand unemployed largely in the cities, it is well to remember that on the farms of Canada we have nearly half our population very much over-employed and very much under-paid. To follow out its policy of drastic economy the government has reduced its estimates by $55,000,000 and increased taxation to an equal amount. This, in my opinion, is bound to fail, and when we come back here a year hence I quite expect to see a deficit in the next budget. I say this regretfully.

I take this opportunity of directing the attention of the house to the railway situation in the south end of my constituency. Between the two points of Bulwark and Airways there has been great need of a railway for many years. The last time the Canadian National program was put before the house it was agreed to build a line between these two points to meet the great need of the large farming community in that area. A year ago, after some delay, the grade was built. There was time, I may say, to put the rails on, and had they been put on there would have been opportunity to haul from that country an enormous amount of grain which to-day has to be hauled a very considerable distance to other railways. For reasons best known to the railway management, when the grade was made and everything was ready for the rails, no rails were placed thereon. It has not only been a great disappointment to the country itself, but it must be an entire loss to the railways, because they have gone to half the expense and can receive no revenue. They cannot receive any revenue until the rails are laid. When the question is asked why the rails have not been laid, the answer is simply that the railways have not the money. What would be thought of a farmer who built half a house and then, when asked why he did not go on with it, replied that he had not the money? The first thing people would ask him would be, "Why didn't you think of that before you began to build the house?" We might ask the same question with regard to this railway. Only twenty-five miles of steel is needed to give service to 800 square miles, but the people are left with this white elephant and while waiting patiently for the rails to be laid they have to haul their produce a great distance, as they have been doing for a number of years.

Reference was made in the budget to the Imperial conference which will take place in Ottawa next July, and great hopes have been expressed that something worth while will be done. I sincerely hope, for the sake of Canada, that something will be done for the benefit not only of this country but of the empire at large, but I want to warn those who are feeling too optimistic about it that there are going to be great difficulties. For instance, they are going to talk a great deal about empire trade. Now, looking up the figures with regard to British trade, I find at page 498 of the Trade and Commerce Journal that in 1931 British import trade outside the empire was 71·2, while exports were 56·2 to outside countries, showing that they are doing the greater part of their trade outside the empire. According to the figures given to us by the Minister of Finance, the major portion of the trade of Canada is also done outside the empire. Naturally, therefore, the delegates from the various parts of the empire who will come here looking for benefits, will find that they are facing considerable difficulties in the matter of trade. As regards the wheat quota, the offer from Great Britain will not help Canada in the slightest, so far as I can see, because Britain cannot take the whole of Canada's crop, yet she will pay for Canadian wheat on a basis of world price, and we shall have to sell the rest in other markets, with the result that we shall have to meet competition just as keen as we are meeting to-day.

Of all industries that are suffering in this deflation, there is none that is suffering more than agriculture, because, in the ups and downs of price levels, whether it be inflation or deflation, agriculture is the last one able to take advantage of the rise and the first one to suffer from the drop. The deflation that was brought on in 1930 and 1931 had the effect of halving, and more than halving the values of farm prices. This, in turn, had the effect of doubling debts; and when you consider that most of the larger farm debts were incurred during the war, that since that time these debts have about doubled, and that the farmers have paid in interest rates an amount equal to the debts—because, at the interest rates the farmer pays, in ten to fourteen years he pays as much in interest as his total debt—you can readily understand why agriculture is in difficulties at the present time. We must realize that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada. There are other very important industries, but that is the basic one, and the general business of Canada is not improving and cannot improve to any extent at all until agriculture is again on its feet.

I will put on record now a few figures taken from a government publication to show the difference between the prices of agricultural commodities and freight rates. When wheat was worth $1.25 per bushel, the freight rate was 5½ per cent, and when wheat dropped to 60 cents, the freight rate was 12 per cent. When potatoes were $1 per sack, the freight rate was 10 per cent, and when potatoes were 40 cents per bushel, the freight rate was 24¾ per cent. When hogs were $11 per hundred, the freight rate was 1½ per cent, and when the price dropped to $5 the freight rate had jumped to 3½ per cent. When eggs were 40 cents a dozen, the freight rate was 1½ per cent, and when the price was 20 cents, the freight rate had increased to 2¾ per cent. I may point out here that these prices are a good deal higher than we are getting to-day. For instance, wheat is lower than 60 cents and the price of hogs has dropped as low as $2.40, while eggs have dropped to 8 cents a dozen. I might say that during last December and January, turkeys—an item which does not appear here—sold in western Canada for less than one dollar each.

There are no financial institutions in Canada which can properly give the aid required by agriculture. The private banks are not giving the service needed. I shall not deal with this matter at any length because I have dealt with it before, but I do contend that interest rates are far too high, terms of loans far too short and renewals far too uncertain. Agriculture finds itself to-day in a very difficult position, so difficult that if something is not done a still larger number of people will be driven from the farms, where they cannot make a living, to the cities, there to join the ranks of the unemployed. I am told that 85 per cent of the farmers of Saskatchewan would be bankrupt were it not for the generosity of their creditors, and I believe the farmers of Alberta and Manitoba would be running them a close second.

I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) did not see fit to increase the tariff on repairs to farm implements, although the increase of the excise from one to three per cent has the direct effect of a tariff. To-day the tariff on repairs ranges from 6 to 17½ per cent, and to that duty will have to be added the 3 per cent for the so-called excise tax. I am sorry the sales tax has been increased from 4 to 6 per cent, because it is a consumer's tax and will fall upon the family man.

It is claimed that if the western farmer would only go into mixed farming, all would be well, but this statement is made only by those hon. members who know very little about the matter. I have before me a statement giving the percentages of the different mixed commodities raised on farms in eastern and western Canada. The quantity of cattle on farms in eastern Canada is given as 10·65 per farmer, while for western Canada it is 13·62. The figures for hogs are 4·44 for eastern Canada, and 5·85 for western Canada. The production of butter in eastern Canada is 345 pounds per farm, while that for western Canada is 355 pounds per farm. The egg production for eastern Canada is 291 as against 345 for western Canada. These figures should be an answer to those who say that if western farmers would go into mixed farming, all would be well. I know that those who are carrying on mixed farming in eastern Canada do not want the western farmer to enter that line of farming to any greater extent because he proves to be a keen competitor, but the fact remains that at this time there is no money to be made in farming of any kind, mixed or otherwise. At the present time, farming is not a business; it is a pastime, and the land is a liability.

I should like to say a few words in connection with the debt situation. Canada, like all other countries, is facing a serious problem in connection with debts. We must recognize the fact that we are carrying on a debt-creating system. A debt carrying 5 per cent simple interest doubles itself in twenty years, and at the rate which agriculture has to pay, the debt is doubled in about half that time. When this house realizes, as it must realize, that interest in the aggregate can never be paid, then we shall realize why debts accumulate to such a degree. These debts are necessarily increased very rapidly during a change from inflation to deflation, such as we have passed through during the last few years. According to figures furnished by the Bureau of Statistics, the interest-bearing debts of this country amount to no less than over nine billion dollars and this figure does not take into consideration the mortgages on farms or urban property, which some people estimate would bring the total to over seventeen billion dollars. I shall not go into the details of this larger amount; I am perfectly willing to base my argument on the other figure, which proves that Canada, with her small population, is faced with an enormous debt. How long can it continue?

We have not done the best we could for the internal and external trade of Canada. Because of the rash and foolish policy adopted with regard to Russia, orders have been refused which would have proven to be beneficial to many of our manufacturers, particularly the implement manufacturers. Hundreds of thousands of men might now be employed had we not taken what I consider to be a very foolish stand in connection with Russia. I should like to quote from the Vancouver Sun of July 18, 1932. After referring to the fact that the government had started back-door trading with Russia by admitting Russian furs into Canada, the article continues:

If Premier Bennett would think a little more of history and a little less of his own pride, he would realize that finally Canada will have to do business with Russia. Why not now?

In 1792 England implored world powers to have nothing to do with bloody revolutionary France. "France would wreck world thrones and imperil civilization," etc., etc. For twelve years the Pitts and others hurled against French revolutionists the identical language that, until the last few months, one heard against Russia. Finally, in 1804, British statesmen admitted that Britain's stand against France had been childish, and Britain's twelve years' loss of French trade was a blot against British diplomacy and common sense.

And again:

Standing on the floor of the British house of commons more than a century ago, Charles Fox said: "After twelve years of futile experience we are compelled to recognize the Republic of France which we refused to do business with twelve years ago." Only six years ago Mr. Asquith said: "England's experience with France in 1792-93 was a fearful mistake. Let us not repeat that mistake in regard to Russia."

Apparently Canada has seen fit to make that mistake, and no doubt we shall regret it in the years to come.

Canada is not a poor country, as sometimes I think the budget would lead us to believe. According to the Bureau of Statistics the national wealth of Canada amounts to nearly $31,000,000,000. When we realize that in this country we have goods in abundance, that we have everything that man needs or wants, that our greatest trouble to-day is not to produce goods but to get rid of those that we have produced, surely we must see that a cog has slipped somewhere. When we are living in an age of plenty, in a country with surpluses in everything except the budget, surely we should find ways and means of seeing how these goods and services that we possess can be distributed among the people. Purchasing power is needed, and needed in greater amounts, to enable the goods that we have produced in abundance to be transferred to those who want them. The difficulty apparently is in our monetary system. If our monetary system as it is to-day does not work, and we know that it does not, surely it is not beyond the capabilities of mankind or of Canadians to find ways and means to make it work. That system is man-made, and if it has not been made properly it surely can be man-mended. To-day man is a slave to an incomplete invention. I was much interested in reading the other day a letter by W. F. C. Devlin, printed in the Ottawa Journal of April 15. In the course of that letter on the monetary situation the writer says:

Our country is loaded with the physical necessities of life, but we find the circulation of our means of exchange slowed down or withdrawn, so that we cannot freely exchange our goods and services with each other.

Never before were we so physically healthy, yet, on account of our "book-keeping" having gone out of kilter, we are allowing ourselves to believe that we are sick. Our difficulties are therefore of "book-keeping"—not of physical fact. We are allowing our "book-keeping" to control us—instead of we it. There is a strongly growing feeling that the present state of affairs is not only unsatisfactory but unnecessary, and it is high time we set about controlling conditions instead of letting conditions control us.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. SPENCER: In conclusion, if I may be permitted, Mr. Chairman, I am entirely in sympathy and in full accord with the sub-amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. ELIE O. BERTRAND (Prescott) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising in this house to speak on the budget and its amendments, it is certainly fitting to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the delivery of his well prepared speech. Before indulging in too many compliments, it is well to go over and seriously consider the various matters pertaining to the budget, and while the preparation and delivery of the speech might be worthy of praise, that is as far as we should go.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), in reviewing the budget, analyzed and criticized each one of its various features, and in every instance, he proved that far from making for the welfare and prosperity of this country, this budget was conducive to stagnation and a more acute depression. Later on, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) moved an amendment. I do not quite see how the hon. member for Acadia could explain to this house and to the country what he means, for instance, by stabilized currency. We actually believe that there is no stabilized currency in Canada any more than in any other part of the world. However, that is one of the remedies which he has to offer to solve our problems and to get over our present difficulties.

Before dealing with the matters to which I desire to call the attention of the house in the course of this debate, I wish to refer to some of the speeches from hon. members opposite. They have read numerous letters to show how their constituencies had benefited by the tariff, as revised since the coming into power of the Conservative party, that is at the special session of 1930 and the session of 1931. The hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver) told us to what extent Cornwall had become prosperous, thanks to its silk industry. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Tétreault), read several letters, and endeavoured to show how prosperous his county was; he even said: "There are no unemployed in my constituency that we know of." The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Belec) told us of the prosperity obtaining in certain parts of his county and many other hon. members opposite attempted to show all the benefits derived from the tariff and asked the members from this side to give them credit for all the good things that the Conservative policy had afforded the people and the country since their party is in office. What impressed me most in their speeches, was the statement that they would not have fulfilled their duty had they not spoken of the condition of the farmers. Agriculture being stagnant, we were wondering what arguments they could put forth in that regard. They claimed that if farm products could not be disposed of, it was due to world conditions; that, of course, we have to compete with world prices, that the other countries are actually suffering from the depression which is particularly detrimental to this class of the community, and, therefore, they were not to blame.

On each occasion, however, they read letters asserting that the tariff had helped some particular industry or increased the profits of some individual. In each case, they said: "Do us at least the favour to acknowledge what we have done for the country." And then, they turn to the farmers, just as the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Tétreault) did and said: "Do not blame us for the bad conditions obtaining in your districts, as we are not responsible for them." On the one side, they claim credit for what they have done, and, on the other, they do not want to take the blame for the uneasiness that might exist among the farmers.

It is a fact that a certain class of our population is still enjoying, at the present time, rather fat revenues, and that some individuals are more particularly benefited by the protection afforded in the tariff. This very protection, which favours certain industries and trades, is detrimental to other industries that are compelled to pay more for the products they have to buy from the favoured ones.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, to be obliged to make such a dismal picture of the condition of agriculture in Ontario. After what we have heard about the conditions in the west and the maritime provinces, it would seem that our position is not worse than elsewhere. If, as several hon. members have stated in this house, agriculture is the foundation upon which all our economic system is resting, the government should surely protect it and help it to survive.

In my constituency, the farming industry is not lagging in progress. We have fine herds which won the first prizes at the Toronto exhibition and also at international fairs. I would like to add just a few words about the growing of red clover. In Toronto, at the seed exhibition held in November, the county of Prescott got seven prizes out of the first ten. In Ottawa, during the same month we were awarded seven prizes out of the first nine for red clover, and we had the great honour of winning the world championship at Chicago. The winner, on that occasion, was Mr. Remi Lamarche, of St-Isidore de Prescott, who had the best improved red clover seed in the whole world. Nevertheless, much to my regret, we must admit that farming in my county is not a paying proposition. And since we admit that fact, surely we must consider what the future might be and what will become of the farming community.

I would like to say a few words about the hay growing industry. Some might say that it is a thing of the past, but when I am through with my remarks, I think you will admit that you cannot change your farming methods as easily as you change clothes. Some years ago, we were growing hay in the eastern Ottawa valley. Many of our farmers have given it up for the raising of cattle and the dairy industry. However, to carry out the change, you have to erect new buildings and incur a large expenditure which the farmer is unable to bear. Consequently, the farmers who still get some hay out of part of their farm, have to sell it, at present, for $4 a ton. When you know that the cost of the pressing, the wire, the food for the men, the rent and the wear of the machinery, amounts to $2 a ton, you will realize that it leaves only $2 to the farmer. Let us consider the awkward position in which our farmers are now. Last year, the crop averaged one ton per acre. Municipal and school taxes vary from $1.50 to $2 an acre, or an average of $1.75. Take off these different amounts, and you will see that 25 cents is all the revenue that the farmer gets out of one ton of hay. That shows without any doubt what are the conditions we have to face, and I think that the whole country should know it. You must also figure out how many years it would take to effect the change, in order, as I said a moment ago, to go into the cattle or dairy industry.

Let us see now what is the position of those who choose to go in the cattle raising. I have been preparing statistics on that subject since my arrival at Ottawa; consequently, they apply to the month of February. Allow me to tell you what were the prices of live stock delivered by the farmers on the Montreal market. These figures are taken from the price lists of the companies and jobbers who buy live stock on the market. Here are the prices for the week of February 15th: steers, grade one, $6; grade two, $4.50; grade three, $3; cows, grade one, $3; grade two, $2.50; cutters, $1.75; canners, $1; bulls, grade one, $3; medium grade, $2.25; lambs, $6; bucks, $4; sheep, grade one, $3; grade two, $2; lower grades, $1.

In each case, the price is quoted on a hundredweight for live stock on the hoof, and the commission of the seller as well as the freight must be deducted from the already low price that the farmer is receiving for his cattle. Hon. members who are familiar with farm products know that it is very hard to ship first class live stock in February, on account of the cattle having to remain indoors. Consequently, live stock sold in winter are nearly always of the second grade. Take pigs weighing from 150 to 225 pounds, that is selects which are being sold at $4.75 to $5; the second grade is worth only $3.25 per hundred. Deduct the freight and you will see that a farmer cannot raise pigs at that price. The same may be said of second grade cows which are being sold at $2.50 per 100 pounds. In our district when a cow weighs about 1,000 pounds, we consider that it is a nice cow. It would yield about $25 to the farmer, less the freight costs, the commission to the buying agent and then the commission on the sale in Montreal. That would leave an average of $18 or $20 per head for the best cattle that we have for sale.

I stated, a moment ago, that hon. members opposite, whenever mention is made of the condition of the farming industry, did not want their party to be blamed for it. They say: Give us all the credit for what we have accomplished with the tariff which helps a few privileged interests, but do not blame us for the farming situation! Let them read the statement issued by the leader of the Conservative party on July 15, 1930, in which he said:

> We pledge ourselves to promote and develop agriculture, the live stock industry and the dairy industry, that are presently so badly neglected.

Thus he spoke when the products which I have just mentioned were bringing more than double the present prices.

Here is another statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister during the last campaign, when, as leader of the Conservative party, he delivered a speech at Ormstown. He was reported by the Morning Citizen of June 30th, as follows:

> He said it was necessary for the farmers to receive for their efforts a remuneration equal to that which is afforded in other occupations. We must see to it that this profession be made as remunerative as any other.

And we hear hon. members opposite say: "Give us credit for helping the industries and the financiers to better their position; as to the farmer, do not speak about them."

He also said:

> We of the Conservative party pledge ourselves to see that farming becomes again as remunerative as in the past.

Have we not a right, Mr. Speaker, to tell the party in power to-day what we think of their achievements as regards the farming class and the results thereof?

In order to show more clearly to what extent the prices of farm products have fallen down, I shall compare the prices of the week of January 28, 1930, that is a few months before the Conservatives came into office, with those of the corresponding period in 1932, after eighteen months of Conservative administration. In 1930, cheese sold at 18 cents; in 1932, 10 cents; butter, 36 cents in 1930 and 17 cents in 1932; wheat, $1.20 a bushel in 1930, and 56 cents in 1932; oats, 55 cents in 1930 and 27 cents in 1932; steers, $9.50 per 100 lbs in 1930, and $5.75 in 1932; pigs $12.25 per 100 lbs in 1930, and $4.50 for selects, in 1932; sheep, $7 in 1930, and $3.50 in 1932; and I could keep on naming many other prices. The leaders of the Conservative party and those who supported the Conservative policy were then asserting that the 1930 prices were not in keeping with the needs of the farming class and that the farming industry had to be made as remunerative as in the past. They said: "We pledge ourselves to promote agriculture in order that our farmers may receive a remuneration equal to that of other professions. What was the result? Prices fell by more than 50 per cent since 1930.

Mr. ROSS: Go ahead.

Mr. BERTRAND: I will surely go ahead, my friend.

In his budget speech, the hon. Minister of Finance, who, I think is very clever, mentions public debts, railway revenues, and taxes; but we find nothing in this budget concerning agriculture which might be of any future assistance to the farming class and the country as a whole. I hope that future budgets will contain measures beneficial to all classes of the community. The farmers, like any other class of people in this country, were expecting some relief from the budget of 1932; they were hoping for a few privileges to recover some measures of prosperity and to enable them to balance their own budget.

It is said that a broken morale may cause a lot of harm. Well, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the farmers have certainly lost confidence in their own profession, and they are wondering how to get out of the depression in which they are now.

Protection is in force since two years. During the last election there was no question of our country being affected by the world crisis. At that time, the people simply thought that the government should avert the crisis, in order that this country may not suffer from it. What changes have occurred since then and what is the attitude of hon. members opposite toward the farming class? That is where the tariff policy of the government is calling for criticism. They tried higher tariffs which did not protect the Canadian industries during this period of depression. They could not maintain the standard of wages, nor the standard of living in Canada.

They tend to deprive the treasury of revenues, thereby obliging the government to increase the burden of taxation by raising the income tax, sales tax and all kinds of annoying taxes, which contribute, the more and more, to restrict the purchasing power of Canadian consumers on the home market. The tariff has been raised unreasonably. They had faith in such a policy. They can no longer plead ignorance as to the result of high protection. They now realize that tariff is not the supreme remedy to all the ills. The experiment tried by this government has clearly shown the meagre success which high protection gives. The prices of farm products are now at a lower level than we have seen them for a great number of years past.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Shame! shame!

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): To clearly show how the Canadian farmer stands, I shall quote the prices of the various farm products, for the past 20 years.

As you can see, the 1912 prices were as much as 100 per cent higher than at present, and taxation 100 per cent less.

Allow me to inform the house, before it rises, of the various municipal and school taxes in Prescott, for a hundred acre farm: In 1901 the taxes amounted to $38; in 1914, $60; in 1930, $175; therefore an increase, from 1914 to 1930, of 300 per cent. The Dominion government, in 1901, levied $8.72 per capita; in 1914, $16.56; in 1930, $36.01; therefore an increase, from 1914 to 1930, of 120 per cent. The provincial tax amounted in 1901 to $1.85 per capita; in 1914, $4.49; in 1930, $17.50; therefore an increase, from 1914 to 1930, of 400 per cent. Such taxation greatly increases a farmer's overhead charges.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

PRESENTATION OF PETITION IN LOCALITY OF DEBTOR

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspe) moved the second reading of Bill No. 36, to amend the Bankruptcy Act (Locality of a debtor).

He said: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to compel creditors in the province of Quebec to take bankruptcy proceedings in the district where the debtor resides. Last session a similar bill was withdrawn on the representation of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) that this year a general revision of the Bankruptcy Act would be undertaken, which revision would very likely cover this point, but I fail to see that anything has yet been done in this direction. Last session it was objected that such an amendment would make it more expensive for creditors, but on the contrary I think that the procedure proposed would be less expensive in the long run. At present debtors in outlying districts have to come to Montreal or Quebec when bankruptcy proceedings are taken against them, and in many cases the expense is very burdensome. I hope the bill will be given second reading.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this bill being read a second time and referred to the special committee which is now considering the question of amendments to the Bankruptcy Act. The committee was appointed in connection with a general bill to amend that act, and this is one of the subjects under discussion before that committee. My advice to my hon. friend is that he lay his case before that committee, when I am sure it will receive the fullest consideration. In fact the matter is already under discussion in that committee. Therefore I suggest that the bill be read a second time and referred to the special committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee considering the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: Business under the heading of private and public bills having been completed, the house will resume the adjourned debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall continue the comparison which I was making previous to the house rising at 6 o'clock. In 1914, the Canadian farmer could purchase a six-foot mower for $43.50; in 1930, $96.50; a six-foot binder cost in 1914, $102; in 1930, $225.50; a six-foot hay loader, in 1914, sold for $60; in 1930, $122; a fifteen-disc sower, in 1914, cost $69; in 1930, $166. This is, therefore, an increase of 125 to 150 per cent between 1914 and 1930, on implements which are needed on the farm.

It is very difficult, under such circumstances, for the Canadian farmer to earn a livelihood, should conditions not improve, the farmer will be bankrupt; we wonder whether the government will come to the rescue.

The time, perhaps, is well chosen to offer a few suggestions, since our opponents contend that we only offer criticisms, which can have no good results. I am glad to point out to the house that I made very practical suggestions at the session of 1930; suggestions covering eight different features of the question and which had been studied by the Ontario Farm Association and accepted by a number of farm associations. I shall again suggest them to the house since they are still of actuality and should be taken under consideration by the government in the interests of the farming class, in order to assist them in their distress.

I may quote a paragraph from the Department of Agriculture, to be found in the Economic Annalist of January, 1932, issued under the direction of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), and showing, in the following terms the failure of the activities of his department:

> We are thus faced with an economic situation in which probably about one-third of our population find that for every dollar of income which they received in 1929 from produce sold they are now getting only 58 cents, and that when they in turn enter the market as purchasers, the goods for which they paid $1 in 1929, far from being offered them at a price commensurate with their 58 per cent ability to pay, are selling at 90 cents. The result is that the farmer purchaser either declines to buy at all or buys less than two-thirds of his requirements. The retarding effect of this lowered purchasing power on general business is already too familiar to require further amplification.

In the foregoing you may see, condensed in few lines, what the conditions are at the present time in so far as the farmers are concerned. The most startling feature of it all is that such conditions are noted by the hon. Minister of Agriculture himself, for the statement I have just read is published under his authority in the January issue of a pamplet entitled The Economic Annalist. Such a statement is indeed quite astonishing since it points out the inability of that department to give assistance to the farming community at the present time.

The present level of prices for farm products, when compared with that of the year 1914, may be seen in the following trade index numbers: In 1914, 100.0; in 1929, 104.0; in 1930, 61.8, and in 1931, 53.0. This means that, at the present time, the farmer only receives 53 cents instead of the dollar he got for the same products in 1914. Therefore the conditions are worse that in 1914, and once more, we urge the government to come to the assistance of the Canadian farmers.

Our people, and particularly the farmers in Canada, are overburdened with debts and taxes of all kinds. A comparison between our public debt and our exporting trade shows how difficult it is for us to cope with the supreme folly of a Canada First policy, because of the tendency of high protection to restrain trade through higher rates of duty. A nation, as well as an individual farmer, gets into debt when the expenditures exceed the receipts, and debts thus incurred can only be paid through the sale of their products, the value of services rendered and of their trade. A farmer who should attempt to settle his own accounts with the bank in trading his butter for eggs would obtain no practical results; the same may be said of a nation that would attempt to pay its own foreign debts through the exchange of wheat from a certain section of the country for other commodities of the same country; such a method of paying national or commercial debts, is a sheer impossibility.

Where is Canada being led to by that policy of trade restraint with its consequent high tariff that prevents the marketing of our production? A policy of that kind is bound to lead us to almost complete disaster.

A few days ago I came upon a most interesting report in connection with the income tax. In 1927, there were 594 individuals whose income exceeded $50,000; in 1930 the number increased to 603; the number of incomes of between $25,000 and $30,000, which was of 403 in 1927, has grown to 674 in 1930; for the incomes of $35,000 to $50,000, the number which was 574 in 1927, had increased to 1,106 for the year 1930. These figures show that the big interests are enjoying constantly increasing incomes while the remainder of the people are suffering from the depression; it shows also that a protection policy has enabled that particular class of people to earn more money, to add to their incomes, at a time when the mass of the community, the farmers and the workers are in dire need and can not secure employment to earn their living; it means that, while the unemployed and the farmers are crushed under the weight of depression, a certain class of taxpayers are profiting thereby; it shows that our national wealth is far from being properly distributed among the various classes of our population.

Before concluding, I may say that the government might very well look into the real situation in every class of the community; ascertain as to where is centered the wealth which our national resources have enabled these people to accumulate; find out in whose hands such private fortunes are now being held and to levy on same, in order to try and help our population to weather the present crisis and to bring order out of chaos.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): As a result of the decrease in the buying power, unemployment has increased, and so have the hardships and sufferings of the people.

In the main, what are we to expect from the budget proposals? We are offered an increase in taxation to the extent of $55,000,000, and are led to anticipate a surplus of $4,300,000 at the end of the year. Such a statement is likely to create a false impression. No provision is made in the budget for any extraordinary expenditures which the government may be called upon to make; no provision for the relief of unemployment for which some 70 millions have been absorbed since 1930; no bonus for the western wheat, which has cost 11 millions this year; nothing in connection with the Canadian National the deficit of which reached 110 millions last year. Who is in a position to say that we shall not be called again, this year, to provide work or food for the unemployed? Who can say that the railways shall not require further assistance this year?

It is recognized by everybody that the government should, without any further delay, assist the farming class, and in concluding my remarks, I earnestly urge consideration for that particular class, whose welfare, may I say again, is essential to the economical reconstruction of our country, and it is the duty of the government to help agriculture, above all else, in order to preserve in its entirety the economic and financial structure of the country.

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General (Translation): Mr. Speaker, if I feel bound to add a few words to this debate, it is not because my remarks may be necessary for the vindication of the government, but merely because I wish to correct certain false representations made in connection with the present economic conditions and the policy of the government, as well as to reply to attacks launched in this house in terms both abusive and regrettable. I shall not use the same tone of language but the same language. I wish to apologize to the majority in this house if I do not express myself in a language with which they are more familiar.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): There is no apology to offer; we are entitled to speak French in this house.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It is also a matter of courtesy.

In the course of my twenty-five years of political life, I never once thought that abuse and excess of language could be seemly in a man of education or add anything worth while to the standing of a parliamentary debater indulging in the same against an opponent.

Before proceeding with my remarks, I should like to say to my hon. friend the member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand) that my criticism is not levelled at him, for I congratulate him on the high plane of his speech as well as on the great effort he displayed in order to find fault with the government.

May I also extend my congratulations to my genial colleague whose first speech as Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was such a success.

I must at the same time congratulate my hon. friends from Shefford (Mr. Tétreault), from Kent (N.B.) (Mr. Arsenault), from Pontiac (Mr. Bélec), and from Champlain (Mr. Baribeau), from St. Ann (Mr. Sullivan), who, in their maiden speeches, have made a most interesting statement of the facts, thus showing their high sense of duty.

Two years will soon have elapsed since the leader of the Conservative party was elected and authorized to form a government empowered to apply their policy during the five-year term of the new parliament. That policy, which is one of adequate protection, he has been preaching for more than half a century. More than at any other time previously, that policy is called for, since all the other nations in the world have also made it their own in order to safeguard their interests. In Canada, when the Liberal party was in power, they were forced to submit to that same policy, although they disliked it and attempted to cause it to be scorned. Their lack of sincerity in connection with tariff matters impeded our economic education and gave rise to hurtful prejudices. Tariff protection should not be considered as an ideal step towards the fraternity of the human race, but as an economic necessity and as a means of achieving national unity. International fraternity must not be carried out to a point where it may destroy patriotism or compel a nation to weaken itself, to ruin itself in order to be on good terms with its neighbours. Did the government do its best to respect and fulfil the program it submitted to the people in 1930? That is the pertinent question which must be answered by every good Canadian. I think that every honest citizen well informed on our economic and political situation will answer in the affirmative.

The Bennett government came into power at a time when the depression was at its climax. Depression prevailed in this country as well as in other lands. It is a condition both domestic and external. As the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) rightly pointed out, we are now paying for our extravagance, our excesses of the past, and because we waited too long to open our eyes to facts, to reason and justice, because we have, for too long a time, fostered a delusive speculation, because we have denied the existence of a crisis and concealed its causes, we are paying the price now. As far as I am concerned, I have no cause to be ashamed of the policy I favoured in the past, for I am of those who, since the world war, have foreseen the impending depression, denounced those responsible for it, and insisted upon more vision in the government of the people, more caution in legislation and a greater rational economy in the management of various public affairs.

Unpleasant as it may be for me to be the butt of rather abusive attacks, I see in them a redeeming feature because, in their attempt to reach me, my opponents are compelled to ascribe to me words that I have never uttered and promises that I have never made.

The government are doing their utmost to follow their policy and to secure good results from its application in spite of the difficulties arising from the blunders of the past, the poor crops in western Canada, the speculation in wheat and the depression obtaining in other countries with which business could be transacted in normal times, difficulties considerably aggravated owing to present conditions.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): A futile attempt.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The government can not be held responsible for the present world-wide depression.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): They made promises.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The government has decreased our imports to a lower level than our exports. Our people now consume a much larger proportion of Canadian products, these products selling at moderate prices.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Shame, shame.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The ramblings of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) do not anger me. Although the producers may be now selling some of their commodities at a loss, one must bear in mind that we are now going through a process of reorganization, of readjustment. Our methods of production shall undergo a change for the benefit of both the producer and the consumer. If the prices of some farm products are too low, the fault does not lie with the government, but it is due to the depression now prevailing in every country. According to my hon. friend from Prescott, it is appalling to note to what extent the government is to be blamed for allowing such conditions to endure.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): As you were saying three years ago.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): You said so before.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am fond of any echo from my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), but I would rather listen to his speech after mine.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): You shall hear it.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What country could, at the present time, offer to us a better market, if my hon. friends were in power? What country, were they in office, would offer them higher prices for our farm products and manufactured goods? Can you name a country where, at this moment, the depression is not more keenly felt than in Canada?

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): That statement is not on all fours with your pledges.

Mr. DORION (Translation): You have already made promises yourselves. Answer the minister's questions.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall reply to my genial friend from Saint-Denis (Mr. Denis), who, I must give him credit for it, always pays particular attention to me.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): That will take some time.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, to answer my questions. Nobody foresaw in 1930 that the crisis would last as long or that such great depression would be world-wide. Where is there a country whose products fetch a higher price than ours? There is not one. And, that is why my opponents do not answer my question. We are told that in the last couple of years, although many new industries have been established in this country, several old ones have closed their doors. That may be, but it is due to the inflation of the war period. In certain lines, there are too many factories. For instance, I ask my hon. friend for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who is a good Quebecker, whether there are not too many shoe factories in our province?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I do not admit that.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): You never will admit anything.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata will only admit when in the other world. The equipment of these manufactures is too costly for the present requirements.

Our butter and cheese exports show an increase of hundreds of thousands of pounds, and our exports are down to a minimum. In all of that, one may see a good organization for the future, as well as a medium to profit by the return of prosperity. It is a matter of regulating, of simplifying our production, rather than of complicating matters.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is rather complicated.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, it was so much so in past years.

The government has cut down expenditures to the very limit. In the Post Office Department alone, expenditures have been reduced by more than four millions of dollars. We are told that we increased the public debt and, along with a Quebec newspaper, our opponents say:

> Under a Conservative government, our debt and expenditures are increasing, and when the Liberal party is in power, they are decreasing.

They overlook the fact that, from 1896 to 1911, they increased the national debt by over 80 millions and the expenditures by more than 78 millions.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): It was in order to pay for the Langevin building.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What in the world does the hon. member for St. John's know about the Langevin building?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I know something about it.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Our opponents also forget to mention that, under their administration, in 1905, farm products were selling at lower prices than at the present time.

Pork was then selling $5 per hundred pounds; hay $4 and $5 per ton, while poultry fetched 50 cents per pair.

In 1922, they pledged themselves to a fair trial of the Canadian National and that trial proved to be a ruinous extravagance.

If the public debt has increased, it is due to the statutory commitments of previous governments, to unemployment, to the general depression of business over which the government has no more control than they can exercise over the world-wide crisis responsible for the weakening of demand and prices in foreign markets; over the stock exchange disasters and the speculation which, as a result of too optimistic a publicity, made so many victims among capitalists, business men and investors.

The government boldly faced the unemployment problem. If the Unemployment Relief Act was improperly applied, the fault does not lie with the Dominion government whose part is simply that of an endorser to the provincial governments, the latter giving their approval to such works as were requested by the municipalities. The act, although national in character and in every respect a patriotic move, cannot be perfect. There are some who claim that relief works directly undertaken by the government would have been preferable. Such an opinion is not to be ignored and is worthy of consideration.

The local legislatures, who are rightly solicitous to preserve their autonomy, should not take an undue advantage of the Dominion government's participation in their own affairs and thus uphold those who are in favour of legislative union. The impression should not be created among the people that with the federal authorities lies the responsibility in matters that are within the scope of provincial and municipal governments.

We have not broken our pledges, but have done our utmost to keep them. If the result was not all that was expected, it is due, may I say again, to circumstances over which the government have no control. We undertook to put an end to imports of goods ruinously competing with our own products. We have been successful in reducing these imports to a minimum. We have passed more than twenty-five orders in council in order to protect the farmers in the east, and especially the truck gardeners, thus closing the door, during seasons of plenty, to the products of countries enjoying a better climate than we do. For the protection of the western farmers we have established a bonus of five cents per bushel on wheat. We have concluded with Australia a trade treaty that was praised by the leading members of the Liberal party in this house and also met with unanimous approval on the two sides of the house. We have done away with the system under which Canada imported thirty million pounds of butter from New Zealand. Of course, the price of butter is very low at the present time and that makes for quite embarrassing and painful conditions as far as our farmers are concerned. But, what would the price of butter be to-day, should New Zealand export to Canada as much of that commodity as in the past? What are the prices of butter and cheese in the foreign countries? Our opponents are reluctant to give us that information. We never pledged ourselves to cause the price of butter to reach fifty cents per pound, but we undertook to put an end to competitive imports, and we have kept faith.

We have been told that, during the last provincial election, I promised the butter industry a bonus of two cents per pound. When I was sitting in the legislative assembly of my own province, I moved that the local government should grant a bonus of two cents per pound and that they should come to an understanding in that connection with the Dominion government. The motion was not accepted by the Taschereau government. I have been charged with having made that promise throughout the province of Quebec during the last provincial electoral campaign. In the first place, I must say that I never addressed a meeting outside of my own constituency. During the last provincial election, in a speech I delivered in my constituency, I said that the Dominion government were willing to discuss the matter with the provinces if requested to do so by their respective governments. That statement was confirmed by a telegram from my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). The Quebec government were openly opposed to such a policy which was criticized by their prime minister and their Minister of Agriculture. The members who in this house are the most insistent in their demand for that bonus are staunch supporters of the Quebec government who so strongly oppose such a policy. The hon. member for Bellechasse praises the Quebec government who are against the granting of a two-cent bonus for the exportation of butter, and yet we hear him loudly proclaim in this house: "That bonus must absolutely be granted."

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): As long as you do not make a whole speech.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Should this government grant a bonus for the exportation of butter?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): When representations from the Quebec government and from the other local governments are made to us, then we shall be in a position to give an answer to the hon. member for Bellechasse. The hon. Minister of Agriculture in the province of Quebec, Mr. Godbout, also stated that he was opposed to such a bonus, just as he did in connection with the establishment of a rural credit at the expense of the province.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Is the hon. minister for or against the bonus at the present time?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): At certain times the hon. member for Bellechasse has evinced a desire of being considered as a man in earnest; why then should he alter the goal of his ambition to-night? Would it be merely in an attempt to annoy me?

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): You would be better advised in answering my question.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The amendment moved by Mr. Ralston does not ask that bonus for the farmers. Why then, did not those who so loudly insist upon it, request their leaders to have it included in the amendment introduced by the opposition? Where is their consistency? Where is their sincerity? I am of the opinion that the matter is primarily of a provincial character, owing to the fact that conditions in agriculture and dairy farming are different in every province. It is imperative that production of a particular kind be assigned to special districts. Would it be, may I ask, in the interest of agriculture, at the present time, to have the western part of the country engaged in mixed farming or in intensive dairying? Our market conditions do not, at this moment, warrant an increase in production. One must bear in mind that overproduction is the chief cause of the present depression. Overproduction in agriculture must be avoided, and so must we guard ourselves against an unscientific and unconsidered industrialization of agriculture.

The hon. members opposite are in favour of a rural credit system. When they were in power they established one, but now that they sit on the other side of the house that system no longer suits them. In the legislative assembly at Quebec, I always contended that such legislation was a matter for the local governments, owing to the particular requirements of each province. I urged the Quebec government to come to an understanding with the Dominion government in order to secure a better rural credit system. My request was not acceded to. The Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Godbout, opposed a scheme of rural credit, stating that at the present time such system would bring disaster to agriculture and to the province itself. In the amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Ralston no change is advocated in the existing rural credit legislation. Why did the Liberals not request this bonus in their amendment?

A great many things could be done in normal times, but just now we are struggling against adverse conditions. As was the case in the days of the Bourbons and of the Ligue, are we told by a distinguished French writer, parliaments in every country are now appealing to their respective governments and their cry is: "Eripe nos de luto." "Drag us out of that pestiferous mire through which we are floundering." In support of my argument and of the policy followed by this government, I may quote from economists who have no connection whatever with the government or the Conservative party. They are Mr. Ohlin, professor of economics, and Mr. Maurice Guénard, of the Revue de France, both unbiased and keen observers. Mr. Ohlin has this to say:

Beginning with the fall of that remarkable year, the world trade has continually been decreasing and the wholesale prices of all internationally exchangeable commodities have declined in proportions such as to frequently cause dismay among the producers. During the first quarter of 1929, industrial production was on the decline in every country. The New York stock exchange crash in 1931, followed by similar collapses on the leading exchanges of other countries, remarkably aggravated the trend of affairs and added to the intensiveness of depression.

In 1930, as well as in 1931, over-production in agriculture did not cease, in spite of still lower prices. Acreages of wheat were reduced by only a trifling percentage, as also was the case in connection with agricultural foodstuffs (wheat, sugar, coffee, hops) and other farm products grown for industrial purposes (textiles, oleaginous materials, rubber). The depression in agriculture, the results of which were felt so keenly by Canada, was largely brought about by the fact that the yields of crops varied in the last few years, in Europe as well as in America and Australia. As a sequel to the difficulties with which these countries were faced, enormous stocks were accumulated. In 1930-1931 the world had another heavy crop yield, with the exception of the United States. On the other hand, Russia is increasing its wheat acreage by approximately 20 per cent. Result: a disturbed market with protracted instability.

Such a state of affairs will no doubt retard the development of mixed farming in Canada owing to the competition already being felt.

In Canada the wholesale prices of raw products showed a decrease of 33 per cent between June, 1929, and June, 1931, while the decrease in the prices of manufactured goods was only of 19 per cent. With the exception of Sweden, because of special reasons, the same decrease is reported in other countries.

In the United States, between June, 1929, and June, 1931, the wholesale prices of foodstuffs decreased by 26 per cent, and the retail prices, by 24 per cent. In Sweden, the wholesale prices of foodstuffs of agricultural and animal origin decreased respectively by 17 and 23 per cent, while retail prices for the whole decreased by 16 per cent.

In the United States the profits of 1,900 corporations reporting to National City Bank for the year 1930 were 40 per cent less than for the previous year. The decrease in profits was of 90 per cent, in the rubber industries; 70 per cent in the iron and steel industries; from 50 to 60 per cent in petroleum industries, railroads and automobile plants, from 40 to 50 per cent in the case of banks and insurance companies. In Germany, the total profits of financial and industrial undertakings show a decline of 25 per cent and in Great Britain, the loss of about 15 per cent.

In Germany, the market prices of industrial stocks showed a loss of 61.7 per cent, while the decrease percentages in the United States, France and Great Britain were respectively 59.7, 55.7 and 45.

As a result of the decrease in their national revenue, (taxation, customs, railroad receipts, etc.) and of increasing public expenditures (unemployment relief, etc.), several governments were compelled to borrow. In that respect, the situation has not materially changed in most of the countries.

With the exception of France, Belgium, Spain, Lithuania, Uruguay and Russia the amount of notes in circulation is on the downward trend.

After having been a capital exporting country from 1923 to 1928, Canada had to import foreign capital in 1929. That reversal is accounted by a decrease of over 40 per cent in the Canadian wheat crop of 1929 and by the enormous demand of capital required by Canadian industry and for the carrying-over of the large crop of 1928.

In his analysis of the Bennett government policy, Mr. Guénard says:

The situation in Canada does not differ from the conditions in other countries. The main difficulty is that of ridding oneself of the deterministic frame of mind induced by the trend of political, economic and social facts. Canada is powerless in the face of the economic disturbance now obtaining in the United States, the waves of which are unfurling themselves over the Canadian border similarly to the rushing waters of the great lakes on a stormy day. Canada is powerless against the weakness of the sickly English pound, or against the threats of the British tariff, which, in a porcupine like manner, keeps all imports at a distance. Canada,—the fourth largest producing (per head of population) country in the world—has no control over the plethora of markets where the peanut of Africa is left to rot on the docks, the Brazilian coffee used as locomotive fuel and the American wheat has become a food for cattle.

Practically powerless as Canada may be, the Canadians nevertheless face courageously their fate, watched as they are, but unimpeded, by an opposition conscious of the menace. They are struggling against unemployment, are doing their utmost to prevent its aggravation by giving relief to the unemployed. They are economizing and their budget calls for a cut of 43 millions dollars in the expenditures; salaries of civil servants have been reduced, as well the indemnities of the members of parliament and of the cabinet. A favourable trade balance has been established. Canada also successfully floated sinking fund loans as a result of which the country's treasury is materially reinforced. A trade agreement has been entered into with Australia and negotiations are under way for another agreement with New Zealand. Canada has extended an invitation to all nations of the empire to take part in the Economic Conference that will meet on the 18th of July.

Thus, the Bennett government stops, one by one, such leaks as develop in the hull of the ship of state. But the speech from the throne clearly stated the truth: "World conditions are beyond the control of the Canadian people".

"The only thing they can do is to dig trenches and erect barriers in order to stem the menacing forces of economic distress."

Canada is not even in a position to profit by an opportunity that offers, an opportunity which might prove worth while or, at any rate, would have gratified national pride. The government of Newfoundland, whose budget was in a precarious condition, offered to dispose of their entire rights on Labrador, a geographically Canadian territory. The price was one hundred millions and Mr. Bennett had no other course but to reply: "As long as the world conditions are what they are, Canada cannot consider the proposal". One cannot help thinking of historical precedents, of Florida being purchased for 25 million francs and Alaska, for $7,200,000, the resources of which countries subsequently proved to enormously exceed the price of purchase.

Just as on a race track, every turn reveals a higher barrier than the previous one, so in a review of the activities of the Canadian people, one is faced with a higher wall or a wider river that must be cleared to reach the end in view. We have not as yet made any reference to the reorganization of the railroads, to the merchant marine, neither have we mentioned the state of dejection in which the Montreal and Toronto stock exchanges have sunk as a result of the epidemic that originated in New York and Chicago.

On the contrary, the nearer the world depression draws to an end, the factors at play in Canada for the recovery from its effects become more apparent: "at first a young and bold optimism, natural resources of astounding wealth, an inflow of foreign capital and that strength accruing from an unanimously favourable public opinion throughout the world."

Most undoubtedly, the time is at hand when Canada's hour shall be sounded. The only difficulty is to know how many times the hand will have to travel around the dial before we hear the joyful peal of the gong sounding that hour.

The foregoing is the answer of fair-minded men to the outbreaks of our opponents.

We are told of abuse of authority. I sat long enough in a house where abuse of authority was of frequent occurrence.

I will mention a case in point.

I do not speak for my hon. friend from Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who is sensible and who understands quite well, no doubt, any of my references to the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Will the hon. Postmaster General allow me to ask a question.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Shortly; when I am through speaking, you may put all the questions you wish.

The Liberals who are the most shocked at the acts of this government which they state is abusing of its situation, are the same ones, who approved of the Taschereau government, in 1922, when, pursuant to the provisions inscribed in the Quebec Statutes, chapter 91, article 74, the Quebec Liberal government secured authority to take from the consolidated funds, all the money which the Minister of Highways would need to improve the highways, etc. This measure was arbitrary because there was no emergency necessitating such a step. The improvement of highways was a permanent and regular policy, based on plans prepared in advance and on the province's financial state.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Postmaster General's time has expired.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I regret that my time has expired.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): May I put a question to the hon. Postmaster General? What has the Highway Act of Quebec—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall answer my hon. friend when he has obtained the Speaker's consent.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Can the hon. Postmaster General inform me what the Quebec Highway Act has to do with the Dominion government's policy on agriculture.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): A great find!

Mr. E. C. ST-PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my first word will be one of congratulation to our new Finance minister (Mr. Rhodes) on the clear-cut and, may I add, courageous, first budget he has presented to the house. The budget itself, however, brings none of that prosperity promised us by the Tories at the last Dominion election.

I wish to congratulate also my old friend, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) for having—ever faithful to his principles—persevered in the old protectionist policy which he has never ceased fighting for.

I believe that when he stated awhile ago that certain opposition speakers used abusive language he surely was not alluding to the member for Hochelaga who neither in his election campaigns nor in the federal parliament at Ottawa nor elsewhere, has ever struck his opponents below the belt.

This new budget is crammed with statistics which show that our country is in a pitiable state. Our new Baron Louis, the hon. Minister of Finance, asks for money in return for the bad policy, viewed economically, his government has followed up till now. He demands funds from this house repeating the request that the former Baron Louis was wont to make to his partisans: "Give me good politics, my dear friends, and in the future I shall give you good finance."

A moment ago, my good friend the hon. Postmaster General said that for years the members of the opposition have been asking for a free trade policy. At times my good friend can joke without displaying a smile. He well knows, since he comes from the province of Quebec, that the old Liberal party in our province has never asked for free trade, but was content with the economic policy put into practice by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his supporters, based on a tariff for revenue which afforded protection at the same time to our large industries and to the general economic interests of Canada. Like all governments that are hard put to it—and our Canadian government finds itself to-day in the very same position as the governments of many other countries—our government first sets about practising certain economies: the ten per cent cut in the salaries of our civil servants. I am opposed to this false economy and my main reason is that I represent one of the largest workingman's ridings in Canada. I am against this reduction in salaries for the very good reason—and in this I am not moved merely by preoccupations of political expediency—many of our foremost economists take the same attitude—that a reduction in salaries is inevitably followed by a weakening of the purchasing power of the country's citizens; and the Lord knows this reduction in purchasing power has, in the present instance, caused innumerable disasters in different parts of Canada and throughout the entire world. I quote Mr. James Klyne, Assistant Secretary of Commerce in the United States:

> In the period comprised between 1921 and 1929, wages really increased by 13 per cent; during the same period the profits of industry rose 72 per cent; and these same industries gained in dividends 256 per cent.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if this discrepancy does not absolutely justify our large labour organizations who never cease protesting any reduction in wages.

I have never had faith in these plans of work for the unemployed as a solution of the economic difficulties of our population. Such works as have been undertaken have served, with certain exceptions, merely to enrich a large number of contractors, of partisans; and I even venture to say, representing as I do the opinion of the workingmen of my district, that our people would be better off if these relief works were stopped altogether. Direct relief will ensure far more improvement in the economic situation of Quebec, and the other provinces than have these undertakings for the benefit of the unemployed, which have cost $150,000,000.

These works, Mr. Speaker, should be replaced by direct relief. This latter, unfortunately, appears to be misunderstood by the public. This direct relief will not be a "dole" as applied in England; I consider that it will be simply returning to the workers a part of the wealth that industrial and other exploiters, thanks to high protection, have been despoiling them of for a number of years.

[Mr. St-Père.]

No more guarantees for wheat pools! We have there another false principle that has been applied for years. And direct aid, bounties and subsidies granted to industries are no more than another form of protection which puts these same industries in a very advantageous position when it comes to competing with the products of other countries in the markets of Europe. For the love of the Almighty, let us legislators have done with political prejudice, face the real situation, and understand our duty to enable Canada to compete efficiently with foreign products on the great European markets.

The reduction of the expenses incurred by the Canadian National—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Exactly.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Are you willing that we should make a brief examination of conscience? What have we witnessed in this house within the last few years? Members, both Conservative and Liberal, have never ceased asking for branch lines in all parts of the country, supposedly to satisfy a public need. We have played politics with our national railways; and now we have to pay the cost, I will not say of the folly, but of this overzealous ambition to prove to the world that Canada had the greatest known railway system. This railroad problem is to-day a burning question in all countries. In the United States it is the question of the hour and even in France the state railway is face to face with an extraordinary deficit. The statesmen of the latter country are striving their utmost to put an end to such an abnormal situation.

Now let us see what the government intends doing to remedy the present state of affairs. Yielding to repeated outcries in our large financial journals the government is thinking seriously of balancing the budget. The politicians of the neighbouring republic are inspired by the same thought. And, following the wake of Mr. Hoover's government, the government of the right hon. Mr. Bennett believes that the most tangible and the most economical way of improving the situation is to impose taxes. No doubt, taxes are always unpleasant. As an old saying has it: the most agreeable taxes are those that one is not called upon to pay. But there is one tax that strikes me as not only unworthy, that the worker, the consumer, the people of the middle class and even of the industrial class, will find it hard to pay: I mean the 6 per cent sales tax. A tax, like every other measure put forward, should in the minds of those responsible for it, bring about some tangible, some practical result. Can the government reasonably expect, conditions being what they are, with hundreds of thousands of people out of employment, that these people will continue to buy on the same scale as they did when times were prosperous? I say no. Can the government hope that the income tax, as now proposed, will bring the state more revenue than was paid in last year? I say no.

If I take this rather negative attitude it is after having consulted numerous friends, financiers, members of both parties alike. With them I have reached the conclusion that in view of the present depression the government cannot, logically and practically, hope to improve our economic situation.

I refrain from quoting the comments of the Financial Post in its issue of April 16th: it would take up too much time. Whoever wishes to read and study this article will find there a denunciation of the government's new fiscal policy and, further, which will be probably somewhat in the nature of a surprise, a prediction that the present fiscal year will show a deficit of $64,000,000.

Our friends across the way seem to have boundless faith in the coming imperial conference; the name by the way should be changed since, thanks to the recent Westminster Statute there is no longer any empire, but only a "commonwealth" of British nations. Let us, members of this house, read the latest comments of that great English review "The Nation", on the subject of the forthcoming imperial conference.

Of necessity this voice, I will not say of the British government, but of British opinion, expects benefical results from the conference. The article finds a clever way to introduce the idea that England is quite ready to grant the other members of the British commonwealth a certain preference in her markets; but to the reader who knows the use of "distinguo" and can analyse the author's thought it is clear that although England may be willing to make certain concessions, nothing in the world will induce her to adopt an attitude that might prove harmful to her government in its trade relations with foreign countries.

We are told that our industries have increased in number. As to that, I have not looked up the statistics; but concerning the latter I recall what was said by a great French economist: They are often lies published in figures. If this customs tariff adopted by the government, or rather modified by order in council at every meeting of the cabinet, if this tariff, I say, has met with so much success in attracting new industries to Canada, how are we to reconcile such a practical result with the fact, which is there for all to see in our large cities, that industries established for 20 or 25 years, are closing down? We would do far better it seems to me, to keep these factories going rather than try to attract American branch factories to Canadian territory, the profits from which will go to swell the fortunes of certain big American capitalists.

Now let us talk of Canada. It is a good thing as I said a while ago to look towards the past. I believe—and I am not alone in this belief—that we went ahead a little too fast, that we wanted to practise economic modernism at a time little suited to any such design: we have been seeking a rainbow. Certain speculators—and my friends to your right, Mr. Speaker, have heard something about this, particularly those who represent rural ridings—certain speculators, under cover of patriotism, overran our countryside selling worthless stock to our farmers; if the credit of the farmers in our province has suffered slightly in consequence we must blame those who succeeded in making the farmers believe that their money would be more profitably invested in new industries, which had no prospect of success, rather than in lands which would continue to increase the family holdings.

It has been repeatedly stated that Canada is the granary of the Empire. What became of this granary when, after the Great War, the countries of Europe, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Transylvania, Hungary, determined to produce at home the wheat they had been buying from Canada?

We were in too much of a hurry, we forged too far ahead, and more than once we showed lack of discernment, of vision, of economic sense... Take another example: excessive immigration. What does it matter to me that both governments practised it? They sought to attract too many immigrants to our shores; why, only a few days ago I heard the hon. Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) say that he hoped he would never see the day when a British citizen would be refused admission to Canada. Citizens of all countries should be welcomed here and, in Quebec province especially, we may say that we know how to receive them; but at a time like the present when the unemployed from all parts of the country are concentrating in our large cities we should, more than at any other time, close our doors to all immigrants, whether they come from England, France, Italy or other Nordic countries. "Canada First" should be the immigration policy of the new Minister of Labour in the cabinet of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett).

Mr. DORION (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): That's the policy we intend to follow.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): You follow it from a distance.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): With 500 immigrants on the way.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): "Propheta altissimi vocaberis." Our arm-chair economists talk of overproduction and underconsumption. To my mind what we are suffering from just now in Canada is overproduction. Why not make known to our people the true state of affairs? Why not admit the unrest that is found to-day among all classes of our population? Oh, the appeals to communism! I have lived my entire life among the workers, and those of the province of Quebec, be they English, Scotch, Irish, French, Canadian, Jewish, or of any other nationality, have no faith in the principles of communism. As I stated in a former speech, they are not even interested in finding out what the word means. Here is a typical example. Quite recently one of my worthy constituents asked me at the corner of Ontario and Davidson streets: "Will you tell me, my dear St-Pére, what the word communism means?" I thought I should try and explain to him, in my own way: "You see that house there that I built with my own savings? Well, if communism were put into practice I would have to share it with you." His good sense made him answer: "What a crazy idea!"

Let us have no faith in communism; but we must strive towards one end: improving the lot of the masses. From an economic standpoint the situation in our cities is distressing. At the present time a great many small owners of realty built with the savings of the working class, are wondering if to-morrow, with all this unemployment, they will still possess their property. Mention is made of a moratorium on mortgages. Since we talk of high finance in this house you will no doubt be interested to know that a certain prominent financier whom I met recently asked me to have a moratorium declared on loans due the banks—

Mr. DORION (Translation): It would be a good thing.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): —with the understanding that the borrower would continue to pay interest. There you have the true situation, the uneasiness that is gnawing at our people to-day.

Quite frequently the United States are pointed to as an Eden, a terrestrial paradise, in the present crisis. The eldest of my brothers, who died last year, held a very important position with Western Electric in Chicago; and for the last four years he foretold the muddle we are in to-day. When times were prosperous this great company employed some 45,000 people; only 12,000 are employed there now. It is rather odd that in the United States all economists, all university professors and all important industrialists are at one in blaming the present crisis on the high tariff that had been in force for a number of years. What are we to do? In the light of my own personal experience I, a Liberal, do not consider that the only way of reaching a solution is to declare, as the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada did recently, that in a protected world we must have a protected Canada. I say that, in a protected world we need governments with courage enough to espouse the cause of lower tariffs; I believe with M. T. Chadbourne, who organized and controlled southern trade, that the various countries should work in harmony, that a lowering of tariff barriers is imperative, that me must get away from economic nationalism, take a broader view, and acquire a more complete understanding of what the future holds.

We are told that in any country the only road to national well-being lies through a system of protection. I intend quoting certain statements made by Mr. Etienne Fougère, one of the foremost economists of France, in an article which appeared in "L'Européen", issue of September 18, 1931. Speaking of the invasion of protectionism, he writes:

> A new invasion, which it will be hard to withstand, threatens the World, and especially Europe; I mean protectionism. It has already penetrated everywhere and we are beginning to feel its ill effects. But up to now one great country, England, had withstood it and had fought against it at all international assemblies.
> To-day our neighbour and friend has been almost won over to the protectionist cause; and like all neophytes, certain British statesmen have shown themselves overzealous. Indeed, Mr. Runciman, a former liberal minister, and a champion of free trade at Geneva, wants to forbid the importation of all articles of luxury, which amounts to no less than an economic break with France, and a return to mediaeval ways.
> For our part we do not expect things to reach such an extreme pass. However we must be prepared for a customs tariff in Great Britain.
> What one might call fate has urged the nations along this road since the war. They had the choice of two ways:
> A greater measure of freedom in trade which would have lowered customs barriers as political animosities died away; or else a policy of national isolation which would bring about the erection, around each country, of a sort of Great Wall of China, destined to rise higher and higher.
> The second of these two roads was chosen. It has a steep incline and it is difficult to find brakes powerful enough to control what excess there may be. Hence the alarming progress of protectionism.

There is but one way, one, to limit or arrest this progress: economic agreement among nations. Can it be said that we are headed in this direction? The dull and hypocritical debates at Geneva assuredly lend us no encouragement.

If we fail to reach some such understanding we are on the eve of an era of tariff insanity. Already Russia, Germany and other countries are evading established duties. The realization of this will provoke new restrictive measures, and so new sources of irritation and of conflict will be added to those already existing.

The end of the year 1931 will find France with an adverse trade balance of fifteen billion francs, while Germany will have a favourable balance of eighteen billions.

The mere mention of these figures suffices to show that France will have to adjust her tariff policy. But will this unavoidable necessity make for Peace?

Etienne Fougere.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I ask the government to adopt Mr. Etienne Fougere's attitude.

During the debate which has been going on in this house for the past few days some of our friends on the other side have introduced provincial politics. I will add my own comment: my friend, the hon. Mr. Taschereau, has no need of my weak voice to defend his policies; but there is one thing that we must take notice of, and that is that the good old province of Quebec unlike other provinces of this dominon, has enhanced our adherence to the declarations made against confederation in olden times by Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion, Liberal prime minister, elected from the constituency that I have the honour to represent in this house. The other provinces have appealed to the federal government for aid. The good old province of Quebec, which is not perfect but which strives to reach perfection, has this merit, during the present crisis, that it has not come to Ottawa to beg, neither for sympathy nor for federal funds. The province of Quebec, now a part of confederation will continue to be what it has always been, a broad-minded province, at times too open-handed in the matter of concession; but whose people, side by side with those of our sister provinces, will work for the return of that prosperity, that economic and social well-being whose loss Canada has had to mourn these last few years.

Mr. L. DUGUAY (Lake St. John) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I, in my own name and that of my constituents, sincerely congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on his budget speech. I sincerely congratulate also the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) on the extremely arduous task he accomplished with such imposing success. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Pere) also may well be proud of his magnificent examination of conscience. I am convinced that after such proofs of perfect contrition his constituents will not hesitate to give him absolution and will not hold against him the fact that he thought rather late of the remedy he should have suggested in 1926 or 1928.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Change the dates.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Mr. Speaker, allow me to tell you a little about my riding which may not have been very much talked of in parliament but, on the other hand, has been discussed quite a lot elsewhere by numerous people, mostly financiers. Perhaps it will interest you to learn how my county developed from 1921 to 1931. In 1921 Maligne Island was without electric power; neither Riverbend nor Dolbeau had a factory. Its population was then only 35,539, while to-day it has attained 50,253; an increase of 14,714. This industrial development has left bitter memories in the hearts of the older settlers of Lake St. John county; the expansion forced a number of the oldest citizens of the county —the pioneers of the district—to leave their farms on the shores of lake St. John and settle further inland or to go and spend their savings in the little industrial towns which were springing up.

The hon. Prime Minister of Quebec province gave magnificent praise, from 1923 to 1928, to this industrial expansion of Lake St. John county; but he lost sight of the fact that this industrial expansion left in its wake a sorry state of affairs. To-day it becomes our duty to recall to the hon. members on the opposition side that their party is responsible for the present severe crisis and that they should be the last ones to reproach the federal government for having loosened its purse-strings, especially in 1931-1932, in an effort to undo a little of the havoc wrought by these new industries.

Here are the amounts expended by the federal and provincial governments, and the municipalities, for unemployment relief work in Lake St. John county. The municipalities spent $279,100, of which the federal government advanced $122,575; federal and provincial undertakings, in which the municipalities had no part, cost $12,600; the provincial highway between Quebec and Lake St. John took $126,000, of which the federal government paid 40 per cent, or $50,000. To these figures should be added the further amounts granted since parliament passed the bill extending to May first the operation of the Unemployment Relief Act. It is pleasant to recall in this house the large sums given by the federal and provincial governments to help the farmers of my county in particular and the agricultural class in general; but we must inquire, too, how this money was spent. Let me say, first of all, that in some of the municipalities in my constituency—and I believe the same carelessness was evident in most parts of the province—the money was divided per capita, which means that a wealthy family, composed of the father, the mother, and eight children, received the same amount as the family of the poorest citizen in the parish, made up also of the father, the mother, and eight children. I leave it to the hon. members of this house to judge of the efficacy of any such distribution of funds. Other municipalities went about it in another way, giving the necessary money to those who were really in need of it. Now, certain municipalities which should have received money, got none. Why? Because the mayor was a Conservative and the provincial government had the power to distribute this money as they saw fit. The federal government never refused a cent to a single municipality in Quebec province; but I say that the government of the province took it upon themselves, not to give any funds to certain municipalities in my riding where the mayor was a Conservative. To-day our hon. friends of the opposition criticize the way this money was spent for unemployment relief. Well, I think that as far as Lake St. John county is concerned, the blame rests chiefly with the Liberal party of the province. I fail to understand how the hon. members to your left, Mr. Speaker, can preach this policy in the house, as they did before the people of the province during the last provincial campaign in 1931.

Mr. DENIS (Translation):—But that is false.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): I say that this industrial expansion led the government to try a new tack, to preach a new intensive policy; and that brings me to the subject of colonization. In Lake St. John county, from June to August, 400 new settler families had to be established. I simply call such a policy "electioneering colonization." Several members—I mention no names—have skilfully defended on the floor of the house, this colonization program in my district; but their attitude has not been justified by results. I visited several townships in my riding, and I tell these members that they have no right tc uphold any such colonization policy, the chief result of which has been to enrich the big lumber merchants. The settlers were set up in magnificent houses; and this colonization policy afforded to friends of the provincial administration an opportunity to reap exorbitant profits. I am not opposed to colonization—quite the contrary—but the farmer who for some reason or other must abandon his farm, or the individual living in a small industrial town, should be able to settle on a farm where a proper income is assured.

On the first of November last year, 1931, several prominent citizens of my constituency held a meeting at Roberval and signed a petition asking the federal government not to advance one cent for settlement purposes in the county of Lake St. John, until a serious investigation had been held; and to ensure that the money be spent for a better purpose.

Besides this matter of colonization, Mr. Speaker, we must speak of our farmers. They comprise three-quarters of the population of Lake St. John county. I will take the liberty of reading to the house a letter sent me by the Mayor of St. Gedeon.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): A Liberal?

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): I do not think so: the Liberals of my county cannot be overfond of me when they write me letters like this one.

Mr. DORION (Translation): It is the Liberals who do not like him.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): As I read this letter to you, you will realize how critical is the position of the farmers in my riding:

March 31, 1932.

Dr. L. Duguay, M.P.,
Parliament Buildings, Ottawa.
Sir:—

The Catholic Farmers' Union of Quebec forwarded, within the month, a petition to the federal members concerning the needs of the farmers of Quebec province. One of these needs is for borrowing facilities. At the last session of the provincial legislature fourteen thousand farmers signed a petition to the Taschereau government asking for a rural credit system. We had the painful experience to learn one fine morning that all action on this petition had been indefinitely postponed. And that's that. The banks refuse to loan us any money. . . .

Some may find the contents of this letter absurd.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): We have not to do only with high finance; but wth small finance, also. This is small finance. "The banks refuse to loan us any money." That is true. The banks do not wish to make further loans to farmers, especially on account of the Bankruptcy Act as it existed, and still exists. That is the result: they do not believe the farmer can produce enough to make a profit. I repeat:

The banks refuse to loan us any money; the small lenders are without funds and our few Popular Savings Societies are inaccessible to the majority of people. What are we to do? Several of us have already been sold out by the sheriff and if conditions do not improve very shortly most of our farmers (I know whereof I speak) will be reduced to the same straits. What little knowledge I possess does not enable me to indicate the best way of avoiding such a financial disaster for our farming community; but I beg the members of parliament, who are in a superior position, to decide as soon as possible upon a practical way out. The farmers of our province are just as much entitled to consideration at the hands of the federal government as are those of western Canada; these latter receive a subsidy on the wheat they sell, or will sell. Could we not benefit by some such treatment for the sale of our butter and cheese? But, once more, our most crying need at the present time is undoubtedly for a rural credit system adapted to our wants and to our means of repayment. This is a question of life and death for the farmers of our rural districts. There is no getting away from it. The government of Quebec has deceived and discouraged us in this matter. It is really too bad.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): He is not speaking of federal credit?

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): That is exactly what I was coming to. To-day the hon. members of the opposition want this matter of rural credit to be simply taken over by the federal government, and this evening the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé), clearly explained the situation in the province of Quebec, as regards election promises. Last year these gentlemen promised,—and I may say that in the county of Lake St. John the hon. Minister of Agriculture for the province of Quebec, Mr. Godbout, promised the farmers a rural credit system, but he took no steps whatever towards this end, and to-day he is trying to persuade the Quebec farmers that this question of rural credit is purely a matter for the federal government, a Tory administration.

Well, gentlemen, we never ceased to ask for this rural credit system when you were in power. What did you do? You claim it is a matter for the federal authorities! Have the courage and the will-power to assume responsibility for the evil deeds of the Quebec administration.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Very true. They cannot get out of it.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): We are in the hole.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Understanding is necessary.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): The farmers of Quebec must face another problem. It is all very fine to spend money for land settlement and for unemployment relief, but we must not lose sight of the fact that most of our Quebec municipalities are heavily in debt. To-day our farmers cannot meet their taxes. If we give too much encouragement to colonization schemes these people will necessarily allow their land to be sold by the sheriff and will take up holdings in the newly opened districts; then those who remain in the municipalities will have to shoulder all the debts. A great many of our farmers are obliged to pay from $150 to $250 in taxes every year. I believe governments should think seriously,—and by governments I mean the federal government and the provincial governments,—of finding some means of lightening the burden of our Quebec municipalities and our tax-paying farmers.

I am doing my best to show,—I know I have not succeeded in convincing our hon. friends opposite,—that . . .

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): You have nothing to blame yourself for.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Such is the situation in my county to-day from an agricultural standpoint.

An Imperial conference is to be held during the coming summer and, in the interests of Lake St. John county, I would ask the representatives of the Canadian government at this conference to take up the question of paper. If I remember aright, I read somewhere that England imports yearly $63,000,000 worth of paper, of which only $13,000,000 dollars' worth comes from Canada. If, at this conference our government succeeded in obtaining favoured treatment for our paper exports to England, the people of Lake St. John county and the industrial population of Quebec province whose livelihood depends on these paper-mills, would owe an eternal debt of gratitude to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada.

May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to reply to certain statements made by our hon. friends opposite during the famous debate on the proposal to extend the Unemployment Relief Act? A number of these gentlemen sought to prove that the Conservative party is very wealthy—

Mr. MERCIER (Translation): You are richer than we are.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): My riding is one of those that have suffered at the hands of the Liberal administration in Quebec; you have there an excellent illustration of a policy that tends to enrich those who are already wealthy.

But I wished to discuss another subject. Several hon. opponents tried to make people believe that we, on this side of the house, were nothing but a flock of sheep.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Too much honour.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Your government protects wool.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): I cannot speak for my colleagues, but in my own name, I wish to reply to this assertion. I was elected in the constituency of Lake St. John as a Conservative—

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): You won't be elected again.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): —and professing, as does my leader, the right hon. Prime Minister, Conservative ideas. I believe it my duty, in the interests of the country, in the interests of my constituents, to support the policies of his government.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals forget that in 1921, in 1925 and in 1926, they got elected in Quebec as Liberals, under the dictates of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and that they bid down before what we call to-day the radical group, so as to remain in power. They should have been strangled then: the province of Quebec would be better off to-day. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, between the kind of sheep who lie down before a third party and those who—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Sheep seldom lie down in the fields.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): —and those who remain faithful to their policy, which would you choose? For my part I say that if there are two kinds of sheep, if there be sheep of two colours, I prefer my colour to theirs.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I am really sorry that I could not follow our French-speaking compatriots in their beautiful flow of language and the flights of oratory to which they have treated this house to-night, and I regret it particularly in the case of the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé).

But I can understand the Postmaster General when I get a notice that some of the postmasters in my district have been dismissed. In a return tabled the other day I noticed that somewhere around 590 postmasters have been dismissed under the administration of my hon. friend as Postmaster General.

I regret that I cannot compliment my good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) as I should like to have done, coming as he does from the maritime provinces. I think I can compliment him so far as the actual presentation of his budget was concerned, but not upon its subject matter. Possibly that is not altogether his fault; I know he would like to have presented a better budget to the house, a budget along the lines of those presented by that great statesman from Nova Scotia who occupied for so long the distinguished office now held by my hon. friend—the late Right Hon. Mr. Fielding—or a budget along the lines of the Robb and Dunning budgets, which stood for surpluses, freer trade, expanding markets and reductions in taxation. It seems to fall to the lot of our hon. friends opposite whenever they come into power so to manage or mismanage the affairs of the country that they are able to produce only budgets that show deficits instead of surpluses, increased interest charges and increased public debt—budgets which hold out no hope for the Canadian people, and especially the people of the maritime provinces.

If hon. members will look at the public accounts they will find on page 51 thereof a list of surpluses, seven in number, which were the result of the late Liberal administration. The hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Sullivan) said in this house that he would proceed by way of comparison, and I trust that for a few moments to-night I may proceed in the same manner. Two years after taking office the late government were able to change the deficits of the former Conservative administration into surpluses, and for seven years they were able to show reductions of the public debt and large balances on the right side of the ledger.

A survey of the history of federal administration from 1867 down to the present time will not disclose a record anywhere approaching that of the late administration. No other government since confederation has been able to show seven consecutive surpluses and reductions of debt. Then our friends come into power, and in the short space of two years what do we find? We find they have changed the whole situation, and that in the last two years they have rolled up vast deficits. The surpluses under Liberal administration were not produced by cutting ten per cent from the wages of government employees, by curtailment of public services, restriction of trade or increase in tariff. They were produced by directly opposite policies—trade expansion, freer trade, reduction in taxation and tariffs. Because of those policies I think Canada will be able to look back for a great many years upon that period of Liberal administration as a second golden era brought to this dominion through Liberal rule. It is a record of which all Liberals may be truly proud and which our friends opposite would like to duplicate, although during the time they were in opposition they sought to condemn the Liberal party and the policies which produced the results I have mentioned. It was a welcome relief to the people of Canada when in 1924 the Liberal party changed this long list of deficits into one of magnificent surpluses, and continued to show those surpluses during the whole time they held office.

We find that hon. members opposite have added very substantially to the interest charges of the dominion. The public accounts show that last year hon. members opposite, after being in power only a little more than a year, showed a deficit of about $84,000,000. This year we regret to say that they have rolled up another tremendous deficit, an addition to the public debt, of something like $119,500,000. That is not the whole story, because there has been an increase of $13,000,000 in the interest charge, which is shown on page 6 of the estimates for this year, the whole constituting a burden which our people will have to carry for a great many years to come.

When hon. members opposite were sitting on this side of the house they were very free in their advice to the government of the day, and were always advocating some way of taking care of the public debt. Our good friend the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) would wax eloquent on the building up of a reserve fund or sinking fund or some provision for paying off our public debt. I now ask my hon. friends this question: Where is that policy they so strongly advocated when they were on this side of the house? We hear nothing about the reduction of the public debt; on the other hand we find tremendous additions made to it, and interest charges mounting each year. The two deficits I have mentioned total $203,000,000. As the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) showed, the total addition to the public debt amounts to about $307,000,000.

Mr. SPENCE: Are there any other additions the hon. member would like to take in?

Mr. MacLEAN: If the hon. member for Parkdale will have patience I may show him that there are others. Certainly if he waits until another budget is brought down he will see a further substantial deficit.

If the present government had increased the public debt and had shown deficits without increased taxation, there might have been some excuse for them. But we find that deficits have increased, in spite of heavier taxation all along the line. If those deficits had been made without additional taxation, we would not think so much of them. Last year when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who was then acting as Minister of Finance, brought down his budget, his estimate of new taxation was $78,000,000. In the budget brought down this session we find an estimate of $55,000,000 for additional taxes. The figures show that in two years this government have imposed in additional taxation the sum of $133,000,000, and at a time when this country should be receiving relief from taxation.

If the Conservatives had carried out a few of the promises they made during the election campaign the deficit would be much greater than it is. What would have been the situation in Canada to-day if they had gone on with only one promise, that concerning the old age pensions, in connection with which an expenditure of $25,000,000 was involved? Had that promise been implemented, undoubtedly the deficit would have been greatly increased. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this policy of old age pensions has not been brought into effect in Quebec or in the three maritime provinces, and the government in supplementing the old age pensions is only paying some 75 per cent to the provinces that have adopted the legislation.

Hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in opposition promised that they would start a stream of money flowing over this country. I remember the Conservative campaign literature published in my own county at that time contained this promise among others. What do we find to-day? Instead of this flow of money into the pockets of the producers and consumers of this country, we find the flow of money is out of the pockets of the people into the coffers of the government in the way of tariff and taxation—$133,000,000 of added taxation in two years. Now, if increasing the tariff and taxation burdens of the people would balance the budget, this government should have succeeded, as they have followed that course. An advertisement in the Citizen runs: The more you tell the quicker you sell. But our friends opposite might adopt this slogan: The further they go the more they owe. I believe the time will soon come when the people will demand that the government go to the country and let the electorate decide whether they are satisfied with their record.

As I have already said, reducing the salaries of those who have been serving the country well has been resorted to by the government to help out the present financial stringency. This was not included in the many promises which our hon. friends opposite made before they came into power. Nearly everything else they promised but this reduction of salaries, and it has come as a great surprise to the public service. I believe the tariff changes are largely responsible for the difficulties we are in to-day. This government have a policy diametrically opposed to ours, and they are pursuing that policy with a vengeance. The present Prime Minister, speaking in the house in 1927 said:

> Furthermore, and it is on this point that there is an essential difference between us, my hon. friends opposite are more concerned with foreign trade; we are more concerned about domestic trade. They are concerned about developing channels of trade that take our ships, they say, to the seven seas; we are concerned with bringing people to Canada and giving them work to do in the development of our country and at a proper living standard of wages.

This proves conclusively that the policy of the Conservative party is directly opposed to the policy of the Liberal party. As I said before, the policy of the Liberal party is directed to extending our export trade, and it was wonderful how it did expand during the Liberal régime. But immediately our friends got into office they saw fit to increase the tariff, with the result that we have lost our best customers and to-day we find ourselves with a surplus of products which we are unable to market. This home market that they were going to build up overnight, about which our good friend the Prime Minister waxed so eloquent in 1927, has not developed as he and his party expected. When he was addressing the house in 1927 I remember asking him what he expected to do with our surplus products while he was building up this home market. His answer was, "We will sell them." But it has been simply impossible to sell our surplus products, and the home market has not developed. Later on the right hon. gentleman stated it was not a matter of a year, but perhaps of generations before that home market could be developed. As I said at that time so I say now, what is to become of our surplus products while that home market is being built up? The Conservative party were going to give everyone who wished to work a chance to work, they were going to give the Canadian workingmen a full dinner pail and a good many other things when they came into office. Well, our hon. friends have had that opportunity, they have been in power for two years, but up to the present we do not see any improvement from the putting into effect of their policy. Evidently the high tariff policy which they believed would build up industry and improve the economic situation has not worked out as expected. Let me take the automobile industry as an illustration. In 1929 our exports of automobiles and parts were valued at over $47,000,000; in the eleven months of the last fiscal year those exports are down to $4,000,000—a decrease of nearly $43,000,000 in the short period of two years. It is almost unbelievable, but this is what the record shows. No doubt the same condition obtains in a good many other industries.

As I have said before, this budget holds out no hope for the farmer, nor for the manufacturer, nor for the consumer. It is just another wet blanket thrown over agriculture and industry. I can see nothing in it for the benefit of the maritimes. Let me contrast this policy of restricting trade with the policy of trade expansion so well expressed by our former Minister of Finance, the Hon. Charles A. Dunning, on May 1, 1930, when he said:

> Canada will not engage in a tariff war with any country. The world shows at the present time too many examples of disaster following such a course. As a great exporting nation our course must be the contrary one of facilitating trade with those who facilitate trade with us. Those who raise prohibitive barriers against our products entering their markets must expect that we will extend favour to our own good customers rather than to them. I speak in no spirit of retaliation. I would much rather extend lower tariff favours to those who extend them to us than to impose prohibitive tariffs in return for like treatment.
> Lower tariffs to those who buy most freely from us makes for trade extension and wider markets for our products, while prohibitory duties to meet prohibitory duties generally applied constantly tend to restrict our export markets.

Nothing can be more to the point than that wise declaration of tariff policy, and events since that time have proved that the Hon. Mr. Dunning was correct. Our friends opposite have said on different occasions that there would be no retaliation. I can point out time and again where news items have appeared in the press showing that retaliation has been practised by a great many countries against Canada. Senator Robinson, speaking in the United States Senate, said:

> We started this high tariff by putting on embargo rates. The other countries followed, and it makes no difference in the final result whether they were moved by a desire for revenge and reprisal or by the non-vindictive purposes to favour their own industry. Tariff barriers such as those now standing are comparable to a blockade of commerce.

He went on to say:

To say that the United States could close home markets to foreign traffic and live by herself was silly and untrue.

If that statement is true concerning the United States, which is a much more self-contained country than Canada, it is true in a greater degree regarding this dominion. We find that Germany has imposed special duties against goods from Canada and Poland. The newspaper item states:

In the case of Canada, the special customs tariff would be postponable for a period of six months in the event that the Canadian government negotiated for a commercial treaty with Germany.

The Irish Free State has given notice of a tariff to affect all foreign imports that can be made at home; another country that has put up tariff barriers against Canada is Italy, and we find our trade has fallen off. Our hon. friends opposite cannot blame depreciated currency for the falling off in trade, because if ever there was a time in the history of the dominion when the United States could have bought from Canada, it was during the last two years. With their inflated currency they were able to buy here and the premium on exchange would almost wipe out the tariff between the two countries so far as they were concerned. Notwithstanding the fact that they had this favourable rate of exchange, our trade with them and the rest of the world has fallen off to a marked degree. Our exports to all countries, United States included, declined from $1,120,000,000 in 1930 to $605,000,000 in 1931, or a decrease of over $515,000,000 in two years. I ask the question here and now: Who is to blame for this state of affairs? Our hon. friends opposite cannot have things both ways. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), speaking in the house the other evening, said that he and his government took credit for shutting out imports. He said that they had been able to balance the trade of Canada and that we now had a favourable balance of trade, that position being achieved, as he claimed, by shutting out imports. If this government are going to take the credit for shutting out imports, they must also take the blame and the condemnation of the Canadian people for destroying our export market, because it will be found that our exports have declined in practically the same proportion as our imports. Will the minister explain what has happened to our exports that they have declined almost equally with our imports? As regards our trade with the United States, our imports have declined 5.2 per cent, while our exports have declined 3.5 per cent, so that the decline is about the same in each case.

One thing that has tended to discourage trade both from and to Canada, but especially in respect of goods coming in, has been the application of the dumping duty. This duty, which is really an increase in the tariff, has been applied by the present government in a very decided way. We can cite instance after instance where this dumping duty has been applied by the government and where, owing to the rulings which have been put into effect by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), it has been almost impossible for importers and merchants to carry on trade. Our hon. friends opposite surely must realize that we cannot have trade all one way, and that if we are going to sell abroad, we must also buy. As I have stated, the tendency to shut out imports has been one of the greatest factors in destroying our export markets and placing our farmers and other producers in the position in which they find themselves to-day. It was Nicholas Murray Butler who said:

The last place to look for security is in armaments and the last way to seek prosperity is through isolation.

The Conservative party seem to believe in the isolation of trade, of shutting out imports, of living to ourselves, but I think they are finding that such a policy not only is destroying the revenue of the country, but has brought about stagnation in trade and the unemployment situation as we have it to-day.

These hon. gentlemen, not satisfied with the tremendous increase which they have made in the tariff in the past two years, have made this year another very substantial increase by raising the excise tax to 3 per cent. This cannot by any stretch of the imagination be termed an excise tax; it is purely and simply an increase in the tariff, because it applies to everything that comes into the country. Back in 1924 the average tariff was around 15 per cent; at the present time it is 22.1 per cent, the highest of any country in the world with the exception of the United States and Spain. We were led to believe that many articles would be exempt from the tariff which our hon. friends opposite imposed in the short session of 1930, but owing to the imposition of the dumping duty and the excise tax, very few articles now remain on the free list. If we take bills that some people have handed to us, we find that in many cases this dumping duty works a very severe hardship. I should like to give just one illustration, that of a bill that was handed to me by a newspaper. It says:

The finished bill was made up like this:

Six articles at $5 each	$30 00
Exchange 15 per cent	4 50
	$34 50
Forty per cent ad valorem duty	13 80
Additional duty, 35 cents per lb	2 28
	$50 58
Four per cent sales tax	2 04
One per cent excise tax	0 51
Total	$53 13

We could quote a great many other items which have been handed in to us, where merchants find it almost impossible to carry on under present conditions. The Montreal Star, writing about the present budget, said:

> Taxation of any kind retards recovery. The tax collector is the best friend that depression has. When a community is in the condition ours is in to-day, any impost which blocks business or chills initiative slows down the wheels of production and marketing, and tends to postpone the return of those happy days when things were at least "normal." It does not matter so very much, except to the individual, where the blow falls. In every case, it stuns public confidence, saps energy and reduces enterprise.
> In conclusion, it is pointed out that the real sinners in raising taxation are the people who apply political pressure to the ministers to compel the expenditure of public funds.
> Every man or interest that goes to Ottawa demanding a new expenditure is the poorest sort of patriot to-day unless his expenditure is absolutely imperative in the public interest.
> The government, it is pointed out, have made economies, but have not made enough.
> In passing the estimates, not a dollar should be voted which cannot prove its right to exist.

Now this sales tax which is proposed is going to affect very severely some of the industries right in the county which I have the honour to represent. Take the silver fox industry. This sales tax, which will apply on biscuits, will hit that industry very hard, because a large proportion of the food used comes under the category of biscuits and cereals of different kinds on which the sales tax has been increased. If you add on every hundred $6 of an increase in price, it simply means that business cannot carry it; and on the other hand it will almost ruin the manufacturers of these biscuits who are carrying on at the present time under hardships and who also are performing a splendid service to the fox industry in the manufacture of this food product. The same complaint comes in regarding the duty and the sales tax being applied to ice cream. They say it is impossible to increase the standard price of ice cream, because that has been regulated so long at a certain price that an additional price cannot be charged, and therefore it will reflect back on the producer of dairy products. So that it hits the farmer in that way. Containers for dairy products of all kinds are also included in this six per cent sales tax.

If hon. gentlemen opposite had told the people of this country that they intended to carry on in this way and put these policies into effect, I do not think they would have been placed in power. If they had told us that the first year they had the reins of government they would increase the debt of this country by $84,000,000, do you think the people would have given them the reins of power? I do not think so. If they had told the people that this year they would have $119,000,000 of a deficit, I do not think they would have been put in charge. Would any business concern think of carrying on under such conditions? No, sir. I submit that the first thing a business concern would do would be to call in the manager and simply tell him: "You have put my business behind in two years to this extent. I have undertaken to engage you for four years, but I find that it is far better for me to call you in, pay you your four years' salary and save my business rather than continue you in charge for four years, because by that time I shall have no business to save." This is the situation that we are in to-day, and where our friends will land us by the time their four years are up is more than we can tell.

But the worst feature of this budget is that it interferes with and annoys all business. This three cent stamp on cheques is only a small thing, but still it is very annoying and hinders business, and the six cents on every hundred dollar cheque is a tremendous tax on business. As I said, moreover, there is this six per cent sales tax and three per cent excise tax in addition to the regular tariff and the dumping duty imposed in a great many cases on top of that. Is it any wonder that business to-day is languishing and that our farmers and fishermen cannot carry on?

Our friends down in the far corner of the house have introduced a subamendment. That subamendment wipes out the amendment which has been moved by our good friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston): If our friends had offered a subamendment amending our amendment there might have been some chance of our supporting it. But when they introduce an amendment which simply wipes out the amendment moved by this side, it is impossible for them to expect us to support it. They go on to say that they are going to restrict national production. I am not altogether clear as to what their proposal is. Do they propose to restrict the output of farm products? Do they propose to restrict the production of other commodities? Just what their resolution means along that line is something in regard to which I must say I am not altogether clear. Then, regarding the financial system, they say they are going to nationalize it. That may mean doing away with our present banking system and establishing something else in the way of control of our monetary system. These are very far-reaching reforms which would need to be given a good deal of study before they could be considered by this house and given to the public as legislation. Hon. gentlemen claim that money at the present time does not begin to compare with what it was worth when the debts were created. I do not suppose it is any fault of the present banking system if debts were created when wheat was $3 a bushel or when potatoes were selling at $2 and $3 a bushel, whereas now these commodities are worth so very little. That is a condition that has been brought about, I claim, more by the trade policies of this government than, possibly, by the monetary system; and to enter upon reforms such as our friends have advanced is, in my opinion, going a long way. However, there may be a good deal of merit in the sub-amendment, and, as I said, if it had been moved as an amendment to the amendment and not for the purpose of wiping out the amendment, we might have been able to support it. But under present conditions I am afraid that we cannot give it our support.

Another thing: I am surprised that our hon. friends, who are very strong on low tariffs and who back in 1921, I remember, were almost for free trade, have apparently to-day turned their backs on that policy, and now the very thing that we propose in our amendment they refuse to accept. They say, "No; we will wipe that out altogether; we will not support it." I do not know whether they have changed their ideas in that regard and now favour a higher tariff. I do not know just what their position is.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time is up.

On motion of Mr. Duranleau the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rhodes, the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Second report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Stinson.

First report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament.—Mr. Robinson.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Percy G. Davies, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Athabaska, introduced by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and Hon. Hugh Guthrie.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I desire to lay on the table of the house orders in council Nos. 892, 893, 894, 895, 896 and 862 passed pursuant to the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932. All these orders refer only to the payments of money.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Have any orders in council been passed by the federal government with respect to the Beauharnois power project since August 3, 1931?
2. If so, what are the dates and numbers of such orders in council?
3. Have any moneys been advanced to the Beauharnois Power Corporation or Associate Company by the federal government since August, 1930?
4. Have any advances made by any chartered bank of Canada to such corporation been guaranteed by the federal government, since August 7, 1930?
5. If so, by which banks were such amounts advanced, and what were the amounts?
6. What was the nature of the guarantee given?
7. What was the authority for such guarantee?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Question No. 1 on the order paper was fully answered the other day by the Prime Minister. I should like to ask a supplementary question regarding the assurance mentioned as having been given to the banks. Were those assurances verbal or in writing?

Mr. BENNETT: They were in writing in part, and I think the last two or three have been merely verbal assurances that the same provisions would apply. Without looking at the record, that is my memory.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

CUBAN POTATO MARKET

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Has the government received a request from a group of farmers of New Brunswick, in connection with a reciprocal trade treaty between Cuba and Canada with a view of creating a market for Canadian potatoes?
2. If so, will the government grant said request?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Yes.
2. The matter is under consideration.

*MANITOBA SAVINGS OFFICE

Mr. BEAUBIEN:

1. Did the Manitoba government ask the Dominion government for assistance for the province of Manitoba savings office?
2. If so, what was the attitude of the Dominion government?

Mr. BENNETT: I think that question was answered yesterday.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: No, the question is not answered. I read the statement of the Prime Minister in yesterday's Hansard, and I can find no answer. My opinion is that the provincial government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not in order.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Surely I am in order, if the Prime Minister did not answer the question. Speaking to a point of order, if the Prime Minister makes a statement with regard to a question on the order paper I have a right to say whether I agree to the dropping of that question.

Mr. STEVENS: Bring it up on the orders of the day.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Surely a member of parliament must have some rights in this house. It is a very simple question, and all the Prime Minister has to say is yes or no.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question was answered yesterday by the Prime Minister.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But, Mr. Speaker, it was not answered.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The answer to my question is not contained in the remarks made yesterday by the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the question was answered. Further, the second section of the question is improper. It reads:

2. If so, what was the attitude of the Dominion government?

That is not a proper question to put to the government.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have some rights in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the hon. member's point of order?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: My point of order is that this question was allowed to go on the order paper, and has been there for several days—probably a week. If the question is out of order, why was it allowed on the order paper?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is an unnecessary question, and one I do not propose to answer.

DALHOUSIE—MIGUASHA FERRY SERVICE

Mr. MARCIL:

1. On whose recommendation was the subsidy paid for an interprovincial ferry service between Dalhousie, New Brunswick, Miguasha and Carleton, Quebec, discontinued?
2. Has any recommendation been made to vote this subsidy for this year, by whom and what decision has been arrived at?

Mr. STEVENS:

1. No recommendation was received for the discontinuance of this subsidy. It was, together with several other subsidies, discontinued on account of the urgent necessity for economy, and the fact that traffic returns furnished by the contractors indicated that the average amount of traffic carried per trip was so small that it did not justify the continuance of the subsidy.

2. Yes, by Dr. E. Paquet of Bonaventure and Mr. Max Cormier, M.P. (Restigouche-Madawaska). For reasons stated above it is not proposed to continue this subsidy.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS—STEVEDORING AT QUEBEC

Mr. LAVERGNE:

1. Have tenders been called by the Canadian national steamships for the stevedoring at the port of Quebec?

2. If so, who were the tenderers?
3. Was contract given, and, if so, to whom?
4. Was lowest tender accepted?
5. If not, why?
6. Was said contract awarded without tender?
7. Was tender accepted submitted after the closing day for the opening of tenders had elapsed?

Mr. MANION:

1. Yes.
2. Eastern Canada Stevedoring Company, Albert G. Baker Limited.
3. Yes; Albert G. Baker Limited.
4. Yes.
5. See answer to No. 4.
6. No.
7. No.

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memorandums, reports, copies of tenders, and other documents relative to and exchanged between the Post Office Department or the minister or any of its officials and any person or persons in Nova Scotia regarding the mail contract which expired in 1931 and which has since been renewed, between Barss' Corner, Nova Scotia and Newburn rural route division; also a copy of all papers and documents as above in connection with tenders for a mail contract between Barss' Corner and New Germany.

BURNT CHURCH WHARF, N.B.

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of all paysheets, accounts for materials, and other documents, in connection with work on the wharf at Burnt Church, Northumberland county, New Brunswick.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I assume that my hon. friend desires only the expenditures made within the last year. With that amendment I have no objection to the motion.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Motion as amended agreed to.

RETURNED SOLDIER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, April 15, I directed this question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren):

If after further consideration he is now in a position to inform the house and the country whether the government will bring down this session any new or amending legislation concerning returned men.

The hon. minister said he would reply to me early this week. This is Wednesday, so I think I am within my rights in asking him if he has the answer ready to-day?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): My reply was that I expected to be able to answer the question early next week; that is this present week.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, this week.

Mr. MacLAREN: I may inform the hon. member that I have not overlooked his question, but there has been some delay in securing some information. That information is expected within a day or two and then the answer will be given at once.

Mr. McINTOSH: Thank you.

NEW ZEALAND TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ian MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) if he intends to table the New Zealand treaty during the present session?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be able to give my hon. friend a definite answer in a day or two.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thank you.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BEAUBIEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. In view of Your Honour's ruling this afternoon with respect to question No. 6 standing in my name on the order paper, suppose I present a question to the Clerk of the House for him to place on the order paper, where am I to ascertain whether my question is within the rules after it has been accepted by the officials of the house and allowed to remain on the order paper for three or four weeks?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suggest that the hon. member study the rules of the house.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I desire to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your information.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I say that I am not the one who violated the rules; the officers of the house are the offenders, they having allowed the question to remain on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not accused of violating any rules. I gave my ruling in respect to question No. 6 and I do not propose to enter into any discussion with him with respect to it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is no longer on the order paper.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Thank you.

MONTREAL POSTAL TERMINAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I should like to renew the question to the Minister of Public Works that I put to him earlier in the session. Has he now any information to give the house concerning the building of the new postal terminal in Montreal? If I am in order, I would urge that the government proceed with the work as soon as possible.

Mr. STEVENS: You are not in order.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): I am sorry that I cannot give my hon. friend any more definite information. He has no doubt observed an item in the estimates that would be applicable to this work, but whether we will proceed with it this year or not is still undecided.

PRIVILEGE—MR. DICKIE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege with respect to some impressions which may have been conveyed to the house in a speech made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) yesterday.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DICKIE: In dealing with an excerpt which I read from the report of the commission inquiring into unemployment relief matters in British Columbia he said:

> The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) saw fit to read a report which purported to emanate from Victoria.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think the hon. member is in order in treating that as a question of privilege. He is contradicting a speech made by another hon. member, and, as I see it, this is not in any sense a question of privilege.

Mr. DICKIE: It is a question of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, in that he claims I misrepresented matters.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Nanaimo wishes to correct something said by himself—

Mr. DICKIE: Not at all, Mr. Speaker. I wish to correct something said by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. BENNETT: Something said about himself.

Mr. DICKIE: Am I to understand that I may proceed?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member is making a statement to the house that another hon. member said something with which he does not agree—

Mr. CAHAN: It is something personal with respect to the hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it something imputing impropriety to the hon. member?

Mr. DICKIE: If the hon. gentleman made a personal attack upon myself, may I not deal with it upon a question of privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member's personal conduct is impugned, I should say it would be a question of privilege; but if it is merely a difference of opinion on a matter of policy, or as to what occurred in British Columbia, that is certainly not a matter of privilege.

Mr. DICKIE: The member for New Westminster left the impression with the house that I had—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DICKIE: —read a report purporting to emanate from Victoria, and that I used that document in order to justify an attack on hon. members opposite. I wish for the information of that gentleman to say that the excerpt I read was from a report of the commission which was handed to me at noon on the 14th of this month by a minister of the British Columbia cabinet.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was not the actual report presented to the legislature at Victoria.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DICKIE: That has been spread on the journals of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot agree that this is a question of privilege. Contradictions of statements made on the other side cannot be treated as questions of privilege.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 19, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of a long debate I must crave the indulgence of the house for the few minutes I propose to take in discussing some of the conclusions which I have reached after perusing the budget presented by my hon. colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). First, I think this hon. gentleman ought to be congratulated very warmly on his success, since assuming his high office, in handling the finances of the country. I think the Prime Minister could not have made a better choice for the position of Minister of Finance. I gladly join with those who, without consideration of party, have congratulated the Minister of Finance on the frankness and courage, with which he has dealt with the economic situation. It is a good sign for the future when a man like the present minister brings courage and frankness to bear on the political affairs of this country, for they are virtues which should be praised and commended.

Of course, when I say that the minister has been praised from all sides of the house and from all quarters of Canada I do not mean that he has been greatly praised by hon. gentlemen opposite. Some hon. gentlemen, as a matter of fact, have brought forward fair criticism; others criticized not quite fairly, while in some cases there has been criticism of a petty character. One naturally expects, however, in times such as these, that hon. gentlemen will advance their political ideas and parade their wisdom in an effort to serve narrow and selfish party interests. We could not expect anything else from hon. gentlemen opposite after the debate in connection with unemployment which lasted for more than three weeks. That was a stubborn opposition with regard to a measure designed to bring relief to the unemployed of this country, including those in the constituencies represented by hon. gentlemen opposite, and that dispute would have lasted more than three weeks if this government had not been forced by public opinion to end it by the use of closure.

Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to forget or to ignore the fact that this country is passing through a world economic crisis. They seem to forget also that this government has endeavoured, since it has been in power, to cope with difficulties and conditions which are partly the outcome of the economic fallacies, the indifference and the lack of policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. A double remedy has been presented in the budget speech; first it is proposed to raise funds to offset the decline in our national revenue, and then it is proposed to safeguard Canadian industry. I have already said that the present crisis is world-wide and could not have been prevented entirely by any government, but it is true also that hon. gentlemen opposite could have done something to lessen its severity, and perhaps they could have refrained from aggravating the situation as it has been aggravated through their indifference, their lack of foresight and their policies in general.

During this debate, and during the debate on the unemployment question as well, many hon. members opposite have addressed the house. They have stated that the unemployment situation is very acute, and that is quite true. It has been very acute for some time, but I believe hon. gentlemen opposite have been partly responsible for the condition which has existed in this country for the last couple of years. Who in this house does not remember the immigration policy of hon. gentlemen opposite? Who does not remember that in the last two or three years of their régime hundreds of thousands of immigrants poured into this country? Who does not remember that in the fall of 1929 a delegation from the All-Canadian Labour Congress waited on the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour of the day and begged them to stop the influx of immigrants with its consequent effect on the labour situation here. Every member of the house remembers the answer given by the then government; in substance it was that it was not wise to cry "wolf" when no danger was in sight, that the unemployment referred to was strictly of a seasonal character, that the same conditions recurred every autumn and that the immigration complained of, far from providing competition for Canadian labour, in fact added to our human capital by increasing the number of consumers and at the same time increasing our producing capacity.

So the immigrants continued to pour into Canada at the rate of over ten thousand per month. If we look at the statistics we see that during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1930, the number of immigrants who came to Canada was 163,286, while during the first eight months of 1930, as many as 80,000 immigrants entered Canada. The doors of the country were kept wide open to foreign labour while Canadians were seeking work and while the 125,000 young Canadians who each year come to maturity were claiming in vain their right to a place in the labour market of their own country. The heads of our families were concerned with the establishment of their sons and daughters, at a time when the money earned by them, by our own people was being spent in the recruiting, the transportation and the establishment of countless foreigners.

My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) might answer that he stopped immigration. It is true that he did stop immigration, but that was only done because of the pressure of public opinion, and he did not take that step until two or three weeks before polling day. And, if I remember rightly, on the very same day, the leader of the opposition was announcing to the country, at a meeting in western Ontario that he had stopped immigration there landed at Halifax over one thousand immigrants from southern Europe. These people, said the minister of the day, will be consumers. Yes, they became consumers; but it was not long before the authorities, provincial, federal and municipal, had to supply these consumers with some food to consume. Firmly seated in his place in the Quebec bloc of sixty-one members, who were willingly allowing their province to be sacrificed, what was in the hon. gentleman's mind? Happily, the province of Quebec has reacted; the mother province has found its voice again in this house; for at the election that followed in 1930 the Conservative representation in this parliament was increased sixfold. This change came at a very opportune time; it came at the very moment when the country had decided to abandon theories, to face facts, and to place at the head of its administration a man of courage a man without any fear. The country had come to the conclusion that we had to intensify a fiscal policy which would promote the development of our national industries and prepare the way for the rehabilitation of trade and for renewed prosperity. Let us rejoice, Mr. Speaker, that the old province of Quebec is sharing with the others in the work of renovation imposed by conditions and undertaken by this government. It was indeed the province of Quebec that profited most by the protective policy propounded by this government. You will allow me to mention more particularly the province of Quebec, my native province, because I find there a field for better and more ready observation. And from this observation I can say that we in the province of Quebec have greatly profited by the policy of this government.

In our province, as in the other provinces of the dominion, industry must be considered in a dual aspect. There are what I may call the primary industries and there are the secondary. The province of Quebec is remarkable for the development of a small number of secondary industries such as foodstuffs, clothing and other industries producing goods both for the home and for the foreign market. I am leaving aside the pulp and paper industry and the large power developments, because they belong more to the primary class, inasmuch as their products are the raw materials that are used by other industries. But let us consider some of the secondary industries of the province of Quebec, such as clothing, tobacco, shoes and dairy products. Not only have the textile and clothing industries maintained their level during the two years that we have been in power, but the imports of raw cotton have increased in this country lately, especially during the last six months. According to the statistics, during the month of February last 7,074,000 pounds were brought into this country as against 6,527,000 pounds in the month of January, showing an increase at the beginning of this year indicative of greater activity.

Mr. ST-PERE: Is my hon. friend ready to conclude that this gives more work to employees in the factories?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I hold that if the cotton industry is so encouraged as to find it necessary to increase these imports of raw cotton, the result will be more work for Canadian labour.

Mr. ST-PERE: There never was a time when things were so slack in the cotton manufacturing industry.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Surely these imports of raw materials are an indication that in a very short time there will be an increase in labour.

Mr. ST-PERE: They are buying in a cheap market.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This tendency to increase the imports of raw materials will mean in the very near future more labour for the people of this country.

Mr. ST-PERE: I hope so.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It does not appear that you do. As to the shoe industry, which is almost entirely in Quebec, it is to-day normal, and I think I can safely say that the industry is showing signs of renewed prosperity. Our importations in that line have become almost insignificant, for they do not represent to-day more than five per cent of our consumption. The same condition prevails in the tobacco industry. Not only has our consumption of the domestic product increased, but Canadian tobacco has become an important export. When last fall I had an opportunity of visiting the harbour of Liverpool, it was my privilege to go through the tobacco warehouses in that great centre of distribution for the empire and particularly for the mother country; and while going through these warehouses I was proud to see among the bundles of tobaccos from various countries, so many bundles of good Canadian tobacco. On inquiry I was told by those in charge that this Canadian tobacco was highly praised and that its use in England was widespread. They told me that in the near future if we could send more tobacco they would be in a position to distribute and sell it in England. It is also gratifying to know that eighty per cent of the tobacco consumed in Canada has been grown on Canadian soil.

Now I come to another industry which is very important, the dairy industry of Canada. We must not forget that under the régime of our friends opposite Canada imported considerable quantities of butter. Imagine a farming country like this importing, under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, and particularly in the year 1930, because of their indifference to the interests of dairying in Canada, butter amounting in value to $41,-919,372. Imagine $41,000,000 of Canadian money being sent to other countries to purchase butter for a farming country!

Mr. POULIOT: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Is he in favour of higher prices for butter—

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member who is speaking indicates, by taking his seat, his willingness to permit an interruption, the hon. member has no right to interpose a question.

Mr. POULIOT: I am just asking my hon. friend if he agrees—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has not signified his willingness to permit a question to be asked. That is done by the hon. member taking his seat, and he has not done so.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am against the importation of butter into Canada. I am proud to be able to say that under the present régime Canada is again an exporting country as far as butter is concerned.

Mr. POULIOT: Is my hon. friend unwilling to allow me to ask a question?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Oh, no.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the hon. member in favour of higher prices for butter with importations, or lower prices with no importations?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am against the importation of butter into this country, and I am in favour of higher prices for butter. Once the present crisis has passed, better prices will be received for our butter. There is indication that the present consumption of butter in Canada is one hundred per cent of the Canadian product.

I do not desire to spend too much time dealing with these questions, but I must direct the attention of the house to the fact that progress has been made in the general activity of this country. Since this government came into power nearly 150 new industries have been established in the course of a few months, and I am sure that when the present economic crisis has passed, the protecting policies of this government will bring further prosperity to Canada. There are many great enterprises, born of necessity, which must be taken care of. We must consider the reorganization of our national ports, the improvement and completion of our waterways and highways, the continuance of scientific research, the safeguarding of our present markets and the opening up of new ones. These questions cannot be settled over night, as has been suggested by hon. friends opposite who seem to be still under the influence of the dream which they must have had during their long sleep of twelve years while they were in power.

There is one question with which I desire to deal, the St. Lawrence deep waterway. The present indications are that this great undertaking is in danger of being made a political football by hon. friends opposite. Strange voices and strange arguments are heard, particularly in my own province, but I want to say to those hon. members who fear that certain rights may be jeopardized that this government will never relax its vigilance over the safeguarding of Canadian interests and rights, no matter where those interests may be found, in Quebec or Ontario, at Montreal or the head of the lakes. The maintenance of the St. Lawrence river as a national route, the protection of levels during the low-water season, the safeguarding of navigation—which includes the dredging of a thirty-five foot channel between Montreal and the sea—are questions which will be always given consideration by this government. But party struggles and party strife at times will make impossible the discussion of the most important questions strictly on their merits, questions which affect the peace and life of the nation. How can this evil be cured? I believe the best remedy is to bring these matters into the daylight where they can be properly discussed.

Some time ago the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) treated with great justice the actions of a former minister of the crown, but I intend to direct the attention of this house to the kind of tactics employed at Three Rivers during the elections of 1931. During last session I referred to the utter failure of these doubtful tactics, especially to the use of the war scare during 1930. Referring to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), La Chronique, a virulent Grit organ, said that "this potentate" was "the enemy of our language and of our religion." Imagine the Prime Minister of this country being the enemy of French Canadians and of their religion! Another statement by this paper was:

> Remember conscription. French Canadians avenge yourselves next Monday. Victory is at our door.

Luckily the victory went to another door, the door of the great Conservative party and its great leader. I have read the speeches made by some of our Liberal friends during that campaign, and I find that the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Père) said:

> Bennett says that only those workers who are willing to work shall have employment. What does that mean? It will be like the dole in England. They will send your sons, our French Canadians, to work on the roads of new Ontario at mean wages.

Mr. ST-PERE: Who is going to bulldoze me by making me sit down?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ST-PERE: I am rising to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point of order?

Mr. ST-PERE: I deny completely—

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

Mr. ST-PERE: A question of privilege; call it what you like, Mr. Speaker. During every election campaign in which I have taken part—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no question of privilege when the hon. member refers to what his conduct has been in previous elections.

Mr. ST-PERE: I deny completely—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ST-PERE: Words are being put in my mouth—

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a way of dealing with hon. members who do not obey the rule, and I should regret to have to take that course.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not desire to go any further—

Mr. ST-PERE: That is the kind of argument to use.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —in discussing the methods used in that campaign by hon. members opposite. I could cite other speeches which were printed in that organ of the Liberal party but I shall not do so at this time. It is time to cease those war scares and appeals to prejudice. I hope my hon. friends opposite realize that by such appeals they gained no ground in the election and that they should revert to real discussion regarding the merits of the question and let the best cause win.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Is the minister setting the example?

Mr. DENIS: Begin by setting the example.

Mr. ST-PERE: He has been talking conscription ever since he has been in the house.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have to correct the example set by our hon. friends.

Mr. ST-PERE: Talk politics.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I trust that now, after the very courteous attention that has been given me, I may say a few words in a language with which I am more familiar, the language of France,—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —and this, for three reasons: first, to call attention, in a practical way, to the official status of the French tongue in our parliamentary debates and in national affairs,—

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —next, in order to reply, if time permits, to certain statements of the opposition made in French; and lastly to congratulate the members on both sides of the house who, since the opening of the present session, have given our debates that most interesting bilingual appearance that we have noticed. It is willingly conceded that two essential traits of the French mind are clarity and reserve. It is quite true that in political debates this clearness is sometimes obscured. It may well be that the words I have just spoken in the language of the majority provide a striking illustration of this fact. But always, on every occasion, these two qualities are to be found in the sane judgment of the French population of this country, judgment which stands guard over our ideals and our traditions.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate particularly the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) on the vigorous speech he delivered in this house yesterday,—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —a speech that was right to the point, that showed things in their true light, and gave our hon. friends of the opposition to understand that we are quite capable of answering them.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): What a success!

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I also wish to congratulate our friends on this side of the house who delivered their maiden speech within the last few days: the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Tétreault) whose first oratorical effort was eagerly welcomed by the entire house; and the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Belec) who, by the eulogy of his constituency, gave to the house and to the entire country a lesson in patriotism, as he recalled with what courage the citizens of Pontiac are facing the present crisis.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): His words gave us some comfort after the depressing comments of certain opposition members, in particular of the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville (Mr. Rhéaume) in his speech on the budget.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): He is sorry now.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): May I be allowed to touch on a question he mentioned concerning certain works undertaken by the federal government in the county of Chambly-Verchères that I have the honour of representing in this house. The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville has forgotten certain essential facts which would assuredly have changed his way of thinking in this matter. The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville seems to think that unemployment relief is something to be distributed equally among the different counties; although it is well known that this relief is to be granted according to the needs of different parts of the country and the extent of unemployment there.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Everybody knows that it is our large population centres and their neighbourhoods which are suffering most from unemployment; it may well be even that conditions are more distressing around the fringe of the big cities because since the crisis became acute all large cities have banned outsiders from employment within their limits, thus affording protection to their own people. That is precisely what happened in an important part of Chambly-Verchères that I represent: Longueuil, Montreal South, Grenfield Park, St. Maxime, Springfield, MacKayville, and all small towns built along the south shore of the St. Lawrence, inhabited by people of the working class who earned their living in Montreal proper, and who, since last fall, have been excluded from employment within that city's limits. These people had to be helped; and I think my hon. friend from St. Johns-Iberville was not very generous-minded towards the workers of my riding; I will go further and say that he was unjust towards them when he suggested that the small amount of relief granted them was excessive.

If I cast a glance at our statistics, Mr. Speaker, I find that the constituency of my hon. friend from St. Johns-Iberville did not fare too badly. The house was not told by him that, thanks to the Unemployment Relief Act, his county had benefited from municipal works to the tune of $110,000, 25 per cent of which, or $27,500, has been, or will be, paid by the dominion treasury. Neither during the present debate nor in the course of the debate on unemployment, did our hon. friends of the opposition tell the house anything of what the government has done for the unemployed of this country and of the province of Quebec in particular. On looking up the statistics what do we find? We find that throughout the province relief has been given to those out of work: the government has approved and authorized municipal works costing $14,612,000 and has paid out as its share of the cost the sum of $4,643,000. We find that to this expenditure should be added $686,000 spent for federal undertakings under the Department of Public Works; $125,000 by the Department of Railways and Canals; $25,000 by the Battlefields Commission; $40,000 by the Department of National Defence. Adding all these up we have a total of $15,488,836 expended on works done, or being done, in Quebec territory, thanks to the present government's unemployment policy.

As regards the distribution of their funds our friends of the opposition have no reason to complain, that I can see. Montreal has received, or will receive from the federal government, $1,200,000; Quebec, $304,000; Three Rivers, $125,000; Sorel, $40,000; Thetford Mines, $60,000; Shawinigan Falls, $50,000; Sherbrooke, $80,000; Chicoutimi, $250,000. The constituency of Chicoutimi alone has received $250,000 from the federal government, for purposes of unemployment relief.

To sum up, these relief works were divided among 494 municipalities and 84 provincial counties in Quebec province. And as to those counties where the municipal population is less numerous we find that Beauce got, or will get, $35,000 from the Dominion government; Bonaventure, $15,000; Gaspe, $24,500, Labelle, $13,500, Lotbinière, $10,000, Portneuf, $4,000 and Témiscouata, $12,250.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): It is worth noting that all these counties are represented by Liberals.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): One would think they were showering us with presents.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I do not wish to take up more time than is necessary in showing what we have done in Quebec to relieve unemployment. Our friends whose counties were favoured, as I have just pointed out, might at least have made some mention of the fact before this house and given credit where credit is due. But no, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen preferred to attack the leader of the government. But I hope the people of Canada when they read these figures will compare the efforts made by the present administration towards improving conditions and hastening the return of prosperity and the tactics, often unfair, always questionable, employed by our friends on the other side to discredit our leaders and discredit the government in the eyes of our country. Such tactics were not very successful in the past. Three Rivers gave its answer—

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): After you had promised them public works.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —and, a few moments ago, we acclaimed the young member for Athabaska (Mr. Davies) whose election was another eloquent answer to the unfair tactics of the hon. members opposite.

Hard times may, on occasion, be bad counsellors, more so when opponents seek to destroy public confidence in the country's government; but fortunately, Mr. Speaker, as I have just shown, the confidence that our Canadian people put in our Prime Minister on July 28, 1930, not only has not been destroyed by the attacks of our hon. friends, nor by the hard times through which we are passing, but it has not been the least bit shaken. To-day more than ever Canada puts her trust in our distinguished leader whose prestige commands the attention not only of Canada and of the whole British Empire, but of the entire world, as the time nears for the Imperial conference soon to be held here.

But if hard times can be evil counsellors they also bring lessons of courage to our Canadian citizens. We have the proof of this in the willingness with which our people gladly accept the hardest tasks, the most rigorous measures, because the interests of the country demand it and because each sacrifice reminds us of the country we must save.

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to state on the floor of this house that we will continue as in the past, despite the attacks of our opponents, despite the criticisms, never very appropriate, of our Liberal friends, to do our duty; and I have the firm belief that once this crisis is a thing of the past, our policies will give back to this country the prosperity it knew under former Conservative administrations.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, last year, at about this stage of the debate on the budget, I had the privilege of following my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), and at that time, speaking as a member of the Liberal opposition and following the remarks of the minister as closely as I could, I endeavoured to reply to the stand he had taken concerning many matters. To-day however I do not rise in the same spirit of controversy, my only intention being to exercise my privilege as a member of this house to direct attention to certain economic conditions we in the city of Montreal have to face.

Inasmuch as the minister has brought into this debate rather unexpectedly some ghosts of the late election campaign in the constituency of Three Rivers-St. Maurice, I believe I should be permitted to make reference to that election. I do so diffidently, because I am exceedingly desirous, on account of conditions which are obvious, not to take a stand which might appear to be partisan or actuated by purely political considerations. I was in charge of the activities of the Liberal party during the election campaign in that constituency, and hon. members will recall that the election was won by the very close margin of only thirty-eight votes. Despite that fact, I remained silent and a good loser. I could have brought up many matters and subjected them to the test of public opinion; in fact I could have done so more extensively than the Minister of Marine has done to-day. I believe, however, that political parties must organize and do their work before a verdict is rendered, and when a verdict has been rendered there is only one recourse, namely that of contesting the election. I do not believe in post mortem statements, and did not make any. I accepted the defeat, and although grieved on behalf of the Liberal party I made no comments. Not as a Liberal but merely as a member of this parliament I should like to say that I proved a better loser on that occasion than the Minister of Marine has proved a winner this afternoon.

The hon. gentleman dug up some quotations from local newspapers, and I do not doubt the accuracy of their reports. I must assert, however, that these newspaper comments are but a small part of a very extensively developed campaign; if I were to look up my records I could bring before the house heaps of newspaper clippings concerning the other side of the campaign which would be just as embarrassing as, if not more than, the quotations the minister has given. He has made reference to the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Père). In a spirit of justice, and not in one of partisanship, may I say that I have taken part in campaigns in which the hon. member for Hochelaga was interested, and I doubt if any hon. members in either of the larger political parties make public speeches which are as serious, as full of argument and as devoid of prejudice as those of my good friend from Hochelaga.

I should like to appeal to the sense of fairness of the Minister of Marine. He will no doubt admit that during the heat of an election, campaign speakers on both sides make utterances that are regretted at the close of the election. I will not say that such a condition exists more in one party than in another; I would rather take it for granted that such utterances cannot be prevented. I think, however, it is the duty of leaders on both sides to try to control such appeals, to try to stifle them, to try to stop them before the election, and the best treatment to give them after the election is over is merely to forget about them and not to bring them to the floor of the House of Commons of Canada, there to receive great publicity. I think it has been a mistake on the part of members from our province to bring such statements before the house. I recall that some years ago a member from New Brunswick, Mr. Doucet, spent a whole afternoon trying to convince hon. members that the province of Quebec was not able to stage an election on the same high plane as that on which the other provinces carried on their campaigns. As far as I am concerned, not as a Liberal but as a man from Quebec, I deprecate those statements. I think that the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), a leader in his party, should be very careful to avoid bringing to the notice of parliament an insignificant quotation—an infinitesimal fraction of what was said during the by-election in Three Rivers—in an attempt to convince this house and the country generally that on that occasion we did not know how to discuss an economic question. My hon. friend knows quite as well as I do that what decided the issue in Three Rivers was the fact that the people wanted public works—they were hungry and unemployed. I do not blame those who voted for the government, because they were simply trying to secure work in order to provide the necessaries of life for their families. Why dig up a few lines in a newspaper or a misquotation of a speech to convince the house that that by-election campaign was not properly conducted? I regret having to speak in this way, for I did not want to make a political speech to-day, but I know that not only the member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Père) but other members of the Liberal party, including myself, were charged with making statements that we never even dreamed of making. For instance, we were charged with making allusions with respect to the personal character of the Prime Minister. I want to give my word of honour that to my knowledge not one Liberal speaker indulged in anything of the kind, and certainly I did not myself make any such attacks on the Prime Minister. I think the leading men of both parties should at least try to leave these things alone and not attempt to use them as weapons when they speak in this house.

Having made this statement, I desire to discuss the budget, not in detail, but with reference to the present conditions of unemployment, especially in the city of Montreal. I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on his very fine speech. It was clear cut, and although it was not very pleasant in all its features, there was good reason for everything he brought forward, and certainly he made it very clear that we shall have to practise economy to a very large degree in the coming year. I shall not surprise him when I say that having recently been elected Mayor of Montreal I find that the demand for economy is even stronger there than perhaps it is in the federal field. The difficulty is not that we have to economize, but that at the same time we have to find millions of dollars to house, clothe and feed the unemployed. If that problem was not confronting this country I believe it would be a comparatively easy task for every public body to convince their friends and the public generally of the necessity of retrenchment for a couple of years, and that in this way we would achieve magnificent results. But the difficulty is that at the same time we must find not only thousands but millions of dollars to look after the ever-growing army of unemployed. I am speaking now of my few weeks' experience in office in Montreal. The situation in that city—and I am afraid it is similar in many of our other cities—is perfectly appalling and is much more disquieting than I thought it could be before my election to the mayoralty. Every day in the city hall we have armies of unemployed coming to us, men in the most destitute condition—men who have not worked for a number of months, men who cannot pay their rent, men who have no money left. The condition has become worse for this reason, that some months ago everybody had a little money left, or a friend or relative who could help them, or some piece of furniture that they could sell. To-day all these small resources have been exhausted, and if the situation does not speedily improve the army of the unemployed will be greater next fall than it has been in the past. At the same time, our reserves and means of looking after these unfortunate people have been greatly diminished. That is why I appeal to the government—perhaps I need not—in a perfectly constructive spirit and without the least partisanship, to continue as far as possible their contribution for the relief of unemployment throughout the country. I know what they have in mind, but I would dispel the impression that may be entertained by any hon. member that because the government have given a lot of money for unemployment relief the problem is solved and no further federal assistance is necessary. This is not so. To the best of our ability we must meet that problem as long as it continues with us. I feel the government has gone very far in the way of taxation in some lines, but as a member of this side of the house I shall not reproach the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister if by taxing incomes more severely, by taxing purchasers through the sales tax, or by any other forms of taxation which this budget provides for, the main object of the government is to find money to contribute further to the municipalities for the solution of the unemployment problem.

A mistake was made—it certainly was a mistake in our city; it may have been made in other cities—as to the character of the works that were undertaken under the unemployment relief legislation. It should have been the prime object of every public body, municipal or otherwise, to undertake work with respect to which as large a proportion as possible of the money spent would have gone directly to the working men. Unfortunately in certain towns the authorities undertook to build beautiful edifices or public works of a kind which in the first place involved a large outlay for land and the purchase of very costly materials and a large profit to the contractor. This left only a very small proportion of the funds available for distribution among the working men. I submit that the best way of dealing with the unemployment problem is to undertake work of such a character as to leave as much as possible, say seventy-five or eighty per cent, of the money to be paid over to the working men directly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RINFRET: I see now there is a tendency to abandon unemployment works altogether and to favour direct relief. There is this to be said about direct relief—the whole of the money goes to those who need it. But I am afraid that there are social and moral objections to the system. If we could have the people work for the money that we give them it would appeal much more to my sense of equity and social economy. But, I repeat, the main problem is to look after those unemployed men. We are on the eve of a date which in the large cities is going to be distressful to many people,—the first of May. As hon. members know, in the large cities tenants move on the first of May. I know as a fact that in the city of Montreal hundreds, perhaps thousands, of families will have to vacate their homes because they have been in arrear with their rent for a number of months, and they have not been able to secure other accommodation because they have no form of security to offer to their prospective landlords. That is why, although the relief program of the government was to have terminated by the first of May, I take this occasion to appeal to the government to yield to the requests that will be made to them to extend their contribution a few months longer. Many projects have been suggested to us to relieve that special feature of the unemployment situation—the renting feature. People have gone so far as to propose a moratorium, stopping the payment of rents for a few months. Obviously this would be unfair, because it would simply improverish this class of people, who certainly have every right to the rents they obtain for their houses. I rather think the public bodies will have to devise some means whereby they can secure some kind of help before May 1, or else they will have to organize a system of shelter for those left without lodging at that time.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

If during this debate I take the stand that we must more and more undertake work in which manual labour will be the main factor, I would remind the house that there are some works so urgent that they should not be disregarded by the government. I remember that during the war in some of the European countries, which were hardest hit by that great catastrophe, there was still a spirit of carrying on and maintaining certain activities not only because in themselves they were useful but also in order to show that the country had the proper spirit and was carrying on with a certain degree of confidence even in that grave crisis. I think the large companies, to the extent of their ability, and especially the governments, should show that same spirit. In this particular I have not been in entire agreement with the present government in connection with some of the decisions at which they have arrived with regard to salaries and especially with regard to dismissals. I believe the view I have expressed should be taken with regard to a certain class of public works which do not come within the category I mentioned but which are necessary and urgent and should be carried on.

My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) is facing me at the moment; one of the works to which I refer is the Montreal postal terminal. I am afraid there has been some disposition on the part of the ministers concerned to pass that question from one to the other. I tried to find out from my genial friend what was to be done. He sent me to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart); when I went to him he was rather diffident about the whole matter and although he did not say so I felt that he would have been glad to suggest that perhaps I would have been wise to see the Postmaster General. I know that question has been pending for a number of years. I am in a tolerant spirit this afternoon, and I am willing to take my share of the blame for not having put it through before now, but it is sadly needed in Montreal, and I feel that it would not only serve a good purpose in the way of public service but would also provide a great deal of work. Following the remarks I made on the orders of the day this afternoon, I would urge the government to start that work as soon as possible. I do not know if my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works will be in public life for very many years. Personally I would have no objection, but I know he would like to leave his name affixed to some special work, and I think if that terminal in some way could be connected with him it would be a sweet thought for his old age.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. ex-minister has not lost his great imagination.

Mr. RINFRET: I am sorry the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) is not present, because I wish to refer to the very unsatisfactory state of the Canadian National terminal in Montreal. There was an amount of $50,000,000 voted not only for the terminal station but for other works throughout the island of Montreal as well, and these works should have been pushed forward with much greater activity than was shown. I will admit that the railway situation to-day might provide some argument in favour of leaving the work in its present state, but I wish I could take the minister to Montreal and show him the huge, ugly excavation that the stopping of this work has left in the very centre of the city. I think that would appeal, as my hon. friend says, to his sense of imagination and to his practical side as well. Montreal was given an opportunity to benefit through the expenditure of a very large sum of money, but that work has been stopped. Now we have had the appointment of a commission to study the railway situation throughout the country; we have not that report, I understand it is not forthcoming and I am afraid it will not be available during the present session, so I fear that no decision will be arrived at by the government in connection with this matter. But I take the stand, and I take it strongly, that the present situation must be remedied. We cannot leave the city as it is at present. This condition is not altogether chargeable to the present government; it is mainly the result of misrepresentations made by former civic authorities of Montreal. I hope it may be that we will have a union station there; the plan may be changed. I may seem to speak in an uncompromising way, but I do demand for the city of Montreal, and in the interests of the proper operation of the railways, and in order to benefit the unemployed, that this work be resumed as soon as possible and that the former program, or one equivalent to it, be followed by the government.

I have only one further word to say, and that is in reference to the coming Imperial conference. I think I voice the feeling of everyone in this country when I say that notwithstanding the political disadvantages which may follow, we all desire that the Imperial conference shall meet with the utmost success. I would suggest to the government—though perhaps they do not need the suggestion—that they approach that conference in a spirit of exchange rather than the spirit of protection which animated the government during the last campaign. They must understand very well that with the crisis as it exists at present one of the surest means of restoring prosperity is to establish a means of cooperation and exchange. If the government can agree on a certain number of exchanges with the different parts of the empire good results will be brought about. I will not point to the fact that in doing so the government will be following our policy more closely than their own; I am not concerned about that at the moment. I do know, however, that if the government could find some means of disposing of our wheat and other agricultural products, at the same time opening our doors to the products of other parts of the empire, they would achieve something of economic advantage to Canada.

I will add only this word: When they are through trading with the empire let them resume trading with the world, as we did in the ten years we were in office. In my opinion the greatest chance of overcoming the present difficulty does not lie in remaining at home and attempting to solve the problem ourselves, but in resuming our relations with the rest of the world in the spirit of confidence and exchange that always exists in years of prosperity, and which is most needed at a time like this.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, there are many topics which have been brought up during this discussion with which I should like to deal; in the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat there were a number of openings for debate not altogether devoid of interest, but since the railway problem surpasses in peril and perplexity all others which are before the country I feel that I should restrict my remarks to this one question.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) told the house that the financial operations of the year had resulted in an increase of debt of $119,000,000, there was a murmur of dismay from different parts of the house, this notwithstanding the fact that the excess of expenditure over revenue was known, almost to a nicety, to every member of the house who was interested in it. The weekly reports of revenue and the frequent reports of disbursements made it a matter of almost universal information that the ordinary revenue of the year would be entirely inadequate to meet the expenditure. This total of $119,000,000 included $55,000,000 of special expenditure. In this $55,000,000 are $11,000,000 of a wheat bonus and thirty-eight and a fraction millions which went for unemployment and farm relief. There was $44,000,000 of a difference between revenue and ordinary expenditure. There were $17,000,000 of capital expenditures and about $3,500,000 of inactive advances—that is a euphonious way of describing moneys which are paid out, which are never returned and on which interest is never paid.

I said that there was a murmur of dismay and amazement in some parts of the house when the minister announced that the budget of the year before had failed to balance by $119,000,000; but when he told the house that there had been a difference between the earnings and the requirements of the Canadian National Railways of $109,000,000, the house was silent and expressed neither amazement nor dissent. Failure of the government to receive as much as was spent in the financial operations of the year was altogether an extraordinary event; to the same extent it had never happened before, and we all hope it will never happen again. Yet, on the other hand, the requirement by the Canadian National Railways of $109,000,000 from the government was not an extraordinary event. It has become a very ordinary event; it has become so customary that for the past ten or fifteen years we have paid and paid and are continuing to pay, until this has become the major problem of Canada. Yet it seemed to provoke very little interest in the house. I am not sure that all hon. gentleman are aware that in the deficit of $119,000,000 are included, under the maritime freight rates, eleven and a quarter millions which are chargeable to transportation; that there is also chargeable to transportation $1,361,000 which went to the assistance of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and to the West India service, and a further amount of $6,371,000 capital expenditure, largely on the Hudson Bay railway. Therefore, if the total of these three amounts, $19,000,000, is deducted from the deficit of $119,000,000, there remains a deficit of $100,000,000; and if the $19,000,000 are added to the $109,000,000 shortage in Canadian National accounts, we should find that transportation cost the dominion last year $128,000,000. Or, if one prefers to take the figures of the Minister of Railways, who said the requirements of the Canadian National from the government for the year were one hundred and twelve and a quarter millions, the cost to Canada for transportation last year was $131,000,000. Deduct from the $19,000,000 the six and a quarter millions which went to the Hudson Bay railway, and the three or four millions which were paid out to roads other than the Canadian National from the maritime freight rates fund, one will find that the Canadian National Railways last year required government guarantees or cash amounting to $121,000,000.

I have said that there was nothing unusual, nothing extraordinary in this demand. We find in the report of the Minister of Railways that for the year 1929 the increase in the debt to the public of the Canadian National Railways was $144,670,000, and for the year 1930 it was $92,326,000. I have mentioned that last year it was one hundred and twelve and a quarter millions, and the minister has told us that this year it will be at least seventy millions. This demand upon the wealth of the country is so great, and the possibility of putting an end to it seems to be so elusive, that the railway problem is known to be the major problem which Canada has to contend with at the present time.

To solve that problem, a royal commission has been appointed. Men of great experience, men who know the business of transportation thoroughly, men in high judicial office, and men fully acquainted with conditions financial and economic throughout the country, have been brought together, quite regardless of any political allegiance any of them may have, and are making a complete survey of transportation in Canada. It was thought that that report would be available for this session but it is now apparent that it will not. When the report is made it will be received by the house; the report may be controversial the legislation based on it may be contested, I think it is fair to assume that a year must go by before any shred of the legislation to be suggested by the commission can be applied to this great problem.

During the past year parliament as a whole has enacted a number of provisional or conservatory measures. We have acknowledged that conditions are very unusual and we have done unusual things in an effort to cope with them. In this category of enactment may be found the suggested reduction in the salaries of civil servants, the reduction in the indemnities of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons and the withdrawal of amounts usually voted to worthy, if not necessary enterprises. Large sums of money have been voted for unemployment, farm and direct relief and we have endeavoured by extraordinary measures of every type to meet a most difficult and trying situation.

On more than one occasion I have stated in this house that I believed it was an error for the government to engage in the ownership and operation of railways. It is not my intention to reiterate that belief or go into the long yesterdays of railway ownership and administration; it is not my intention to state whether or not that operation has been successful, as that aspect of the question is being investigated by a royal commission, nor is it my intention to prescribe any permanent solution of the problem, as that again is a prerogative of the commission and is a function which I believe it is well capable of performing. However, while this commission is investigating the problem and seeking a remedy for our ills, we as a parliament have not discharged our full duty towards the taxpayers and the financial integrity of the country—if we sit by and merely await events. I can imagine only one greater misfortune than the taking over of the Canadian National Railways by the Canadian Pacific Railway, that is the taking over of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the Canadian National Railways. I do not believe it is desirable that there should be a merger of these two railway systems; I think it is to the advantage of Canada that there should be competition. I think the country would be better off if it was served by half a dozen or even a dozen smaller railroads than by one or two big ones. Canada like most other countries has been a victim of the mania which holds that anything is better because it is bigger. We have big banks, big corporations and big universities and institutions of every description which in many instances appear to have outrun our capacity or ability to administer and manage. Notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel), which I think was made a little bit in the spirit of levity, I do not wish to see the Canadian National Railways swallowed up by the Canadian Pacific Railway any more than I wish to see the Canadian Pacific Railway swallowed up by the Canadian National Railways.

It is my belief that these two systems are both unsuccessful at the present time because there is not sufficient business in Canada to maintain them in their present state of perfection and efficiency. There never was enough business in Canada and there never will be enough business to maintain these roads until we have another ten million people.

Mr. St-PERE: The hon. member is not so optimistic as the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau).

Mr. HACKETT: My suggestion is that the operation of these two roads be pooled for the period which separates us from the day when some better arrangement can be made or when some revival in business takes place. This may seem to be a very unusual statement, to some it may seem to be an impracticable suggestion, but in these days when we are doing so much that is unusual, when we are doing so much that has never been done before to meet a situation, without a precedent, I do not hesitate to advance it. According to its annual report for 1931, the Canadian Pacific Railway had working expenses of $116,000,000, the annual report of the Canadian National Railways including eastern lines shows that its working expenses amounted to $200,000,000. If these two systems would agree to a limitation for a year or two of the wasteful competition which is gnawing at their vitals, if thereby they could cut down their cost of operation by twenty-five per cent, they would offset in entirety the $19,000,000 deficit between net earnings and ordinary charges of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the $60,000,000 deficit of the Canadian National Railways. That, it seems to me is a proposal which should be seriously considered by the government, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The property of either company will remain exactly where it is to-day. An operating board, either entirely independent of both companies or composed of members representative of each company and presided over by an independent chairman, would manage those roads for the benefit of both systems on the basis of last year's operations.

Those of us who live in Montreal know each night at seven o'clock two perfectly appointed trains, equally empty, leave for Ottawa. We know trains from Montreal go to Toronto, trains from Toronto come to Ottawa and trains cross the continent in rivalry with one another, competing for a business which does not exist. They are forced to give a service which is beyond our requirements, to say nothing of our capacity to pay for, simply because neither can, without admitting inferiority, depart from the excellence of the service given by its rival. Last year, according to the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Canadian National Railways incurred a loss of $24,000,000 on its passenger traffic alone. This at least could be eliminated. Then there is the cost of traffic solicitation, which is entered in the books of the Canadian National at between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 for the year, and I assume that the cost to the Canadian Pacific cannot be much less in proportion to the volume of its business. There is also the cost of maintaining rival ticket offices, stations and like competitive organizations throughout the whole country. There must be ample equipment, without replacement, to run either road or both roads for an extended period of time if they are not called upon to operate in competition. This great saving of $80,000,000 could be effected without seriously impairing the service that is given to different parts of the country. It would not make much difference to people coming from Montreal whether they took a train from Windsor or Bonaventure station; the trains leave there at the same time and they arrive here at the same time, but the cost of the second train would be entirely eliminated. The same thing can be said of transcontinental passenger and freight services. I repeat: my idea is that this would be merely temporary, conservatory in its nature and to avail only until a better method can be found or until this tempest to which we have been subjected for two or three years now, has blown itself out.

I know very well the easiest course is to let matters continue as they are, but the cost of railway transport must be paid either by the classes served or by the taxpayer of the time or, with compound interest, by posterity. The rates which prevail on our railroads are undoubtedly low, but at this particular time it would be almost impossible to raise them; the taxpayer is not willing and frequently not able to bear much more taxation; yet if some method is not found whereby the annual requirements of the Canadian National Railways can be met otherwise than by mortgaging the future, the financial doom of this country is sealed; it cannot go on paying out $100,000,000 and more every year for the expensive toy which the Canadian National has become. I would therefore suggest, if it is impossible for these two railway systems to come to an understanding whereby they can effect a saving of an amount equal to their deficit of last year, that a tax known as the Canadian National tax be inaugurated in the form of a stamp tax and applied to all retail purchases other than food, so that the Canadian people, by paying that tax for a few months, might know exactly what the Canadian National is costing them and get at least a taste of the burden that we are placing upon future generations. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Père) last night said very truthfully and candidly that Canada had played politics with the Canadian National Railways. A free translation of his utterance as found on page 2182 of Hansard is as follows:

[Mr. Hackett.]

We have played politics with the Canadian National Railways and we are now called upon to pay the price. I shall not say of our folly but of our inordinate ambition to show the rest of the world that Canada had the biggest railway system in the world.

I do not find fault with either the accuracy of that statement or the spirit in which it was made, but I feel, when the people of Canada knew, as they would do were a tax, let us say of one-half of one per cent, placed upon all retail purchases with the exception of food, something of the expense that this game of politics has imposed upon our country, they would not be happy and possibly not again tolerate those who had played the game. But I doubt whether this expedient of taxation is necessary. I know my own reluctance in making this suggestion, because I dislike the element of monopoly which adheres to it. I can well appreciate the hesitancy of a railway executive, whether he be in the employ of the Canadian National or of the Canadian Pacific, of entering into a relationship of the type I have outlined. He might feel that his competitor was learning something of his secrets, if not of his tricks, and that as a result of that relationship his competitor might derive an advantage. I can understand the reluctance of the government to initiate negotiations tending toward such a relationship, but the fact remains however that last year one road suffered a loss of $19,000,000. I cannot believe that the management or shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway can rejoice very much in that fact. Last year the Canadian National Railways lost to the Canadian people something over $60,000,000, and I know that we are not very much elated over that. True, the actual loss did not measure up to the total requirements from the government. If we take into consideration the stock and debenture guarantees and scrutinize carefully the cancellation of maturing securities we find that since 1919, Canada has, on the average, provided to the Canadian National Railway, nearly a $100,000,000 per year. When times were good the demand was largely for new capital and when bad it was for money to pay deficits. Whether for deficits or for capital expenditures the money had to be found and guaranteed by Canada. Even when it was not guaranteed Canada was effectually responsible for it because of her interest in the Canadian National Railways. If these railroads are to operate their debts must be paid. We have reached a time when we cannot continue to provide these amounts.

While the royal commission is seeking a way out of this impasse it is possible by the joint operation of these two railways to save at least $80,000,000 per year. I for one suggest that the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the taxpayers of Canada might well consider this opportunity of relief. I am not one who entertains hope of relief from ingenious short cuts back to prosperity. We must economize, and in many instances we must begin again at our beginnings. This takes courage and initiative and will entail the doing of many things which hitherto have not been done. I make bold to suggest that the government will not have acquitted itself of its full duty unless it avail itself of every opportunity of effecting economy, even while the royal commission is carrying out its work. Without slackening energy or sinking heart it must go forward with this difficult task or, in the eyes of at least some, it will have been remiss in its duty. It behooves this parliament to take every means available to stem this gush of the financial life of this country. Unless we take all precautionary measures, unless we act promptly the patient may die while the surgeons consult.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, first may I say that I regret very much Canada should be in such an unfortunate position, financially, at a time when the new and genial Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) presents his first budget to the house. I cannot be expected to follow at length the remarks of the hon. member who has just preceded me (Mr. Hackett). He has dealt entirely with the railways problem, and in passing may I say that there is only one solution for our railway problem in Canada, namely to give the railways traffic to haul. We had very little difficulty with the Canadian National Railways in 1928. In that year they earned enough to pay operating expenses and interest on the bonds held by the public. If we bring business conditions in Canada back to the level of 1928 we may solve our railway problem, and that is the only way it can be solved.

Never in my life time have I seen business conditions in Canada as bad as they are at the present time. Our unemployed and dependents number one-fifth of the population. The purchasing power of another two-fifths has been at least cut in two. Some of our industries have almost ceased to function. Most farmers are producing at a loss, and in many cases credit is almost non-existent. As is evidenced by reduced receipts from taxation, trade is at its lowest level for many years. So far as I can see there is nothing in the budget we are now debating to improve conditions; in fact, I think it will only make matters worse. Certainly through its policy of rigid economy it will add to the number of unemployed. The best example I know of rigid economy—and I should like to apologize to any Scotch members in the house—is a dead Scotchman. Thinking of him, we have no idea of prosperity. Because of the increased rate of taxation placed upon business we must expect more unemployment.

I believe that to balance a budget at a time like this is a mistake. Ever since the world began there have been periods of prosperity and depression. That is so at least as far back as history records. We can still draw a lesson from the way some depressions were handled in the past. The book of Genesis contains the story of a king of Egypt named Pharaoh who, when warned that a time of depression was approaching, appointed a very able Minister of Finance named Joseph. Joseph laid up a surplus to take care of the lean years, and I believe we might follow the example set by him. In periods of prosperity the nation should set aside sufficient money to tide us over years of depression. I know that our ministers expect these depressions to come, because in the last few weeks we have heard at least two of them use the expression "normal depression." It is true that this is an artificial scarcity we are suffering from to-day. There is no real scarcity of goods; it is only a scarcity of credit to move those goods into consumption. But if we are going to be stupid enough to continue under such a system I think we should lay aside surplus revenue in the good years to look after the lean years. There are two ways of increasing revenue: one is to increase the rate of taxation, but that has its limits; the other is to leave the rate of taxation the same, but increase the business of the country. By this budget in order to secure additional revenue the government have increased the rate of taxation, but I warn them that in many cases the limit has been reached, and if taxation is increased much further it will only hamper business. Taxation in the year 1928 produced $460,000,000, at a rate much lower than the present rate of taxation. Business was prosperous. This was possible because of the relatively high price level that obtained in Canada at that time. If we can get the price level back to that of 1928 we can again balance our budget without increasing the rate of taxation.

As I said a moment ago, the present budget adds to unemployment. If we are to pay our debts and our interest we must have our population producing goods of some kind that can be sold. To get our people at work and to pay our way we must have money in circulation and we must raise price levels. Whatever way is adopted to bring this about, we must be prepared to allow our dollar to go to a greater discount in the United States. Our people must get used to seeing it lower. They will grow to like it for they will find it better for Canada. To get back to the condition of 1928 we must have more trade; more trade requires more money; we must increase the amount of money in circulation in Canada. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the issue of dominion notes, which is the basis of bank credit, has been restricted, and on December 31st last stood at only $174,000,000 as compared with $327,000,000 in 1918. In September last it was only $141,000,000. If the ratio of increase in the issue of dominion notes in the period from 1900 to 1920 had been maintained up to the present time, we would have in circulation betwen $400,000,000 and $500,000,000 in dominion notes. If our issue of dominion notes at this time were increased to that point it would relieve the dominion of interest charges on at least $200,000,000, and it would make a saving in the budget this year of $10,000,000, which is considerably more than the government are going to save by cutting the salaries in the public service.

The question naturally arises in the minds of some as to how this money can be gotten out to the public. I will not take very much time over that, but will content myself with suggesting three ways of doing it. One is to bring down to this parliament a program of public works. I remember very well the campaign in my constituency in 1930 was run by the Conservatives very largely on the promise of public works—they would have a great program of public works to give employment to all the unemployed. This year we have the smallest appropriation for public works since I have been a member of this house. We might engage in a housing scheme, such as that which I suggested to the house a few weeks ago. After hearing the Prime Minister's statement the other day in regard to the Beauharnois power project, I think we might very well take over that project and complete it as a public enterprise. It would be a splendid earning asset for the dominion and would amply justify the increase of our issue of dominion notes to pay for the completion of the work.

The budget is, I think, a pretty good indication of the economic condition of a nation. If we realize this fact, then this budget, with an expenditure of $119,000,000 more than revenue gives us a good idea of the financial position of the taxpayers and of the condition of industry in this country. The difference between receipts and expenditures this year shows the biggest deficit of any year since confederation, except when we were financing the war between 1916 and 1920. For the period from 1921 to 1930 there was a surplus of receipts over expenditures amounting to $463,000,000—an average surplus of $46,000,000. In 1930 this was suddenly turned into a deficit of $78,000,000, and for the past year, 1931, the deficit is $120,000,000.

Now, the reason for that was not a change of government, but the fact that Canada, in company with the rest of the world, has been suffering from the greatest depression of modern times. The depression is due to the collapse of the commodity price level. This collapse of prices was due to a shortage of gold, which was really due to the gold standard. Prices are the ratio of gold to commodities; when gold is scarce the price of gold rises, and commodity prices fall. The gold standard depressed prices to the point where England, the mother of the gold standard, was forced to abandon her child. Canada being on a gold standard has suffered the full force of this world deflation, although it was inaugurated principally in France and the United States. I know it is quite a common thing for governments to assume credit to themselves for any good times which the people may enjoy under their particular administration, but in reality, as a usual thing governments have very little to do with economic conditions, and a change of government usually makes very little material difference to the people because the policies carried out by different governments do not substantially differ in vital economic matters. In fact as far as economic conditions are concerned, you could very seldom tell whether there has been a change of government at all. But I must say that the tariff policy of this government has had some real effect upon the business of Canada, and as a matter of fact it has made conditions worse. It is not often that any government has as good a chance to do anything worth while for the people as easily as this government could have done last September when Great Britain went off the gold standard. The Prime Minister then, missed the chance of a lifetime. He had every reason, every excuse if you like, for saying: We will do exactly the same as England has done, we are forced off the gold standard and we will not attempt to maintain it. He might have done like Mr. Snowden and said: We cannot pay out gold, we will suspend the gold standard, but we will continue to meet our foreign obligations in gold where they are payable in gold. But the Prime Minister is reported as saying: We intend to maintain the gold standard. He had two alternatives. Although he could not keep Canada on the gold standard, he could keep as near as possible to that point, maintain our dollar as high as possible in the United States, and by doing so keep the value of Canada's exports down to a low level. He could, on the other hand, have thrown in his lot with Britain and kept the currency of Canada at par with the British pound, and in this way have increased the price of Canada's exports. Canada ever since last September might have been one of what is termed the bloc of sterling countries—Britain, Sweden, Norway, Denmark and a few others in Europe.

I have shown repeatedly in this house that by keeping our dollar at a high level in foreign countries, especially in the United States, we keep down the price level of our exports. I will give one example. Wheat is our greatest item of export. Perhaps it furnishes more employment and puts more money into circulation than any other item produced in this country. The price of wheat is set in Liverpool and we are paid in sterling when we sell our wheat to Great Britain. At the present rate of exchange we receive for each pound $4.18. If our currency were at par with Britain's we would receive $4.87. In other words we are now losing 69 cents on every pound sterling—at one time we were losing as much as $1 on every pound. If our currency were at par with Australia's we would receive $6 for each pound. Our chief competitors in the production of wheat are Argentina and Australia. I leave it to any member of this house, but particularly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), an expert in dealing with depreciated currency—as to how the wheat producers of Canada with the pound stering bringing them $4.18 can be expected to compete with the wheat producers of Australia and Argentina when they are receiving the equivalent in their currencies of $6 to the pound. It cannot be done. Canada, by keeping up the dollar in New York, has kept down commodity prices and curtailed the purchasing power of the farmers and all those employed in our primary industries; it has curtailed employment; it has depressed business and has curtailed the earning power of our industries, our railways and the majority of our great corporations. It has cut the power of the people to pay taxes and interest. I should like to sum up this matter in a few words. Had the government frankly abandoned the gold standard our money surely would have gone down to the level of the pound, or it could have been easily kept there. If this had been done there would have been a decided increase in commodity prices, which would have increased the purchasing power of farmers and other classes in our export trade. These people comprise over fifty per cent of our population, and there would have been a very definite stimulus to business. The taxes collected by the government are dependent upon the amount of trade carried on. The government would have secured a sufficient increase in taxes to cover the increased expenditure necessary to pay the exchange on their obligations in the United States. I may say that I discussed this matter with a very prominent financier in Montreal, who expressed that opinion. In addition, the government would have been saved a considerable expenditure, because we would have had less unemployed people to care for. Had the government kept our dollar in line with the British pound there would have been no need to place a dumping duty against British goods; there would have been no need to fix the value of the pound for duty purposes at less than par. The government would have saved itself a lot of trouble and a lot of criticism, and I believe many of the problems with which the government has had to deal have resulted from the policy which was adopted in September, when Britain went off the gold standard.

I think a comparison of the policies followed by England and Canada will illustrate the situation. England frankly acknowledged to the world that she could not redeem the pound in gold. Her currency depreciated in gold countries approximately 20 per cent more than Canada's currency depreciated, and as a result England has been able to secure foreign exchange to meet all her liabilities at maturity. A recent press despatch stated that England has paid off $200,000,000 of an obligation which does not mature until next August. Business has improved; unemployment has been lessened, and the bank rate in England has been lowered four times since September, till now, I believe, it is 3½ per cent. I would like hon. members of this house and members of the government to compare that with the rate in Canada to-day. I have a press despatch here which says that the British bonds in New York have reached the highest level since September. A $1,000 bond is now selling at $1,007.50.

There is one point I should like to emphasize while I am on this question. If government policy is exercised to artificially improve the rate of exchange, that is, to hold up the dollar, in effect this should be regarded as a sort of forced contribution from those who are producing for export, to governments, municipalities, corporations and individuals for whose benefit the rate of exchange is being artificially held up. I understand that the financial policy of this country has been to hold the dollar at as high a level as possible in New York, because of the obligations this country must meet in the United States. I agree with the Prime Minister that it is desirable that these obligations should be met at maturity in the terms in which they are expressed, but I believe that can be best done by allowing our dollar to go down to its natural level, which it would have reached in the natural course of trade. I think if we had followed the course taken by England we would have been better able to buy this foreign exchange, but if it comes to the question whether these obligations are to be paid according to the bonds or whether we are to make good our word to the people of Canada that we will give them employment, I think the claims of our own people come first. I would say to the Prime Minister that many of these people in Canada voted to return this government to power. The New York bankers did not have that privilege, though I suppose they would have voted for this government if they had been allowed to do so.

I do not want to dwell on this phase of the subject too long, but I should like to sum up some of the beneficial results that would have accrued if our currency had been kept on a par with the pound. The price of all exports, farm products, fish, minerals, pulp, paper, lumber and so on, would have been increased. I believe the industries in every province in Canada would have been helped. It would have given the exporters a margin with which to pay taxes and interest; it would have enlarged the market for Canadian coal; it would have given more employment; it would have increased the revenues of the government; it would have reduced the number of unemployed and the expenditures of the various governments in connection with unemployment relief; it would have helped balance budgets; it would have corrected any adverse trade balance; it would have given farmers and other exporters a premium with which to pay the higher prices demanded for Canadian products under our tariff. Through improved business conditions it would have increased the market price of securities held by the banks and other financial institutions so that they would not have needed to write up the value of those securities as authorized by the order in council. It would have led to lower interest rates and thus reduced the budgets of all our governments.

While I am on the question of interest rates I should like to say that I believe the cause of high interest rates in Canada to-day is a lack of confidence on the part of the people. It might be referred to as hoarding in our savings banks. During times of depression such as those we are going through, savings exceed investments, and government action should be taken to correct that condition. I believe the government could and should have kept interest rates down by the scheme proposed a few years ago by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). In 1927, when the right hon. gentleman was a member of the opposition, he suggested that Canada should create a consolidated 4 per cent security of the dominion and provide by legislation that a percentage of the revenue of the insurance companies, which at that time amounted to a net total of over $110,000,000 yearly, and an unstated amount from the savings banks deposits, should be invested in these securities. He suggested that these 4 per cent securities should be issued in renewal of maturing bond issues. The Prime Minister said this would have provided a safe security for the funds invested with our insurance companies and would have enabled the banks, which pay 3 per cent on deposits, to add a measure of stability to their own assets by purchasing a small quantity in addition to the securities already held. If this had been done it would have held interest rates down.

The Prime Minister floated the national service loan at too high a rate of interest. This depressed the price of previous issues, and made it difficult for insurance companies, banks and other institutions holding bonds to show a good financial position. I think this really led to the issuing of the order in council authorizing the banks to write up their securities, because I notice that the order in council was passed because of the depressed prices of good government securities held by the banks.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when we must exercise control over finance in Canada. Municipalities and provinces have been forced to pay impossible rates of interest, rates which will destroy our economic machine. According to a recent press despatch the province of Alberta sold bonds at a price to yield 6.77 per cent interest, and those bonds are free of municipal and provincial taxes and succession duties. I think that is an impossible rate of interest. Interest must be paid out of production. The other night the Minister of Trade of Commerce said that interest must be taken out of the productivity of the country. In the province I mention the chief industry is agriculture, and the sheet anchor of agriculture, if I may put it this way, has always been held in this house to be the dairy industry. A farmer in that province recently sent me cream cheques covering six cans of cream averaging sixty pounds each, which brought him an average of $1.97 per can. That works out at about 33 cents per gallon. How can the farming industry pay the present rate of interest with prevailing prices? Attempts to collect taxes enough to pay that rate of interest would bankrupt the farming industry. The fall of commodity prices has doubled the burden of interest. A rate of 6.77 per cent is more difficult to pay now than 13 per cent would have been in 1928. In 1931 it took three times as much wheat to pay a given debt as it took in 1928. A rate of 6.77 per cent on present prices, if it is to be paid with wheat, is as great a burden as 20 per cent would have been in 1928, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce admits that a rate of 8 or 10 per cent is unbearable.

Surely we cannot leave the matter of finance uncontrolled any longer. We must increase commodity price levels or wipe out in whole or in part the debts now existing. And action cannot be delayed very much longer. When interest cannot be paid out of production that interest becomes usury, and history shows that usurious debts are generally wiped out.

The most important event in the financial world since the war has been the abandonment of the gold standard by England. Speaking of this occurrence, the Minister of Finance, in his budget speech, said:

> Our policy was therefore directed to accomplishing two results: First, to ensure the prompt payment of all obligations due abroad according to contract and, second, to assist in maintaining normal currency and credit conditions within Canada.

Considering the rate of interest which I have just quoted, I am sure it cannot be said that normal conditions have been maintained. The happenings of this year must, I think, convince us that the financial machine is breaking down, and we must exercise control. This, I believe, is the first time in the history of Canada that the federal government has had to assume the role of banker for the provinces—and these are the words used by the Minister of Finance. The collapse of the Manitoba provincial savings bank, the orders in council authorizing insurance companies and banks to write up the value of their securities, and the fact that there is practically no credit for agriculture, are surely good proof that normal credit conditions have not been maintained. If these are normal conditions, then we certainly are in need of a new credit system.

The real basis of credit has well been described as the ability to produce goods as, when and where required. Does anyone think that we in Canada to-day are making use of our real credit? I believe that our Bureau of Statistics, if called upon, could show that our capacity to produce goods and services is far beyond our actual consumption. I think they might very well present to this house a statement showing our capacity to produce these goods and services, and showing actual consumption; and they might also estimate our possible consumption. If they showed the ratio of production to consumption, there is no doubt as to what the result would be. It would show that we have a surplus of goods and services, that we have the capacity to produce abundantly; and if it did show that we have that capacity then it would be for us to decide whether or not we want our people to have an abundance. If we decide that they should have an abundance, then I think it will be inescapable that we must have a new credit system.

I would urge the Minister of Finance, when he brings down his budget next year, to include in it a statement of goods and services produced in Canada, together with a statement of our actual consumption. It would be very illuminating for parliament and for the government and the people of Canada. If the attention of the Canadian public were centred on this problem, they would soon see that we are suffering poverty in the midst of plenty. Surely we are crazy to keep ourselves in a state of want and privation when we have a surplus of goods all around us, and an industrial machine which is working only part time. Only when we are convinced of these facts shall we begin to take a serious interest in this matter.

Money is our medium of exchange, and the amount issued should depend upon the amount of goods and services we can produce rather than on the amount of gold which is in a vault somewhere in the east block, and which no one ever sees and no one is ever allowed to use. Doctor Coates, of London, is reported to have said:

> When central banks want to issue credit, they look in the cupboard to see how much yellow metal they have; they might as well look in the cellar to see how much coal they have.

The root cause of our trouble is the gold standard. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that prices were expressed in terms of currency, currency was attached to gold, and the hoarding of gold caused a fall in price levels. The gold standard, as I have said, is really at the bottom of our troubles, and after our experience of the last two years, why should anyone want to go back to it? Surely there is a better way. Gold has its use for the settling of international balances, and it should be reserved for that purpose only—that is, monetary gold. There is no need of it in connection with internal currency. This use only ties it up so that it is not available for the purpose for which it should be used.

I find that a great many people are very much afraid that if we have this inflation or reflation, whatever it may be called, when we do increase the amount of credit there will be a great increase in the cost of living. I draw that inference from the remarks of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) the other day. What we are asking for is controlled inflation, controlled to accomplish a certain purpose. We want to restore the price level of 1928, and that can be done without unduly increasing the cost of living. If action is taken to prevent undue profits being made, there need be no appreciable rise in the cost of living, and when we do take the necessary action to increase the amount of money circulating in the country, I suggest that we take action, through a business profits tax and a tax on large incomes, and a drastic inheritance tax, as well as the control of capitalization of companies, so as to prevent any undue rise in the price level.

In the true sense of the word, real inflation does not begin until the amount of money in circulation is more than is required to move goods in transit at a normal price level. If you issue more money than is required to move the amount of goods and services produced and available, you have inflation of money and also inflation of prices. But if there is always a sufficient amount of goods to meet the volume of money put out, there will be no inflation of prices.

I wish to refer for a moment to the statement made by the hon. member for Weyburn. He said:

> The trouble with the price level is not that it is not stable, but that it is not level. The difficulty is not the price level but the inequalities within the price level. . . . This proposal to correct things by raising or lowering the whole price level will never iron out those inequalities.

The hon. member himself states that these inequalities were present in 1928. If they were present at that time, then I say they have been multiplied several times by the present price levels. We want to get back to the price levels of 1928, and if there were inequalities in those levels, they can be ironed out without upsetting that level. It is the average level of prices we are attempting to have raised.

It is well known to anyone who has studied political economy that in periods of depression the prices of farm products drop farther and faster than do the prices of manufactured goods, and that when the period of depression is over, the prices of agricultural products will rise faster and farther than retail prices. We want to get back to the levels of 1928. If we can do that, we will then have increased the prices of agricultural products by 50 per cent and retail prices by around 10 to 12 per cent. If there are inequalities in the price levels, all right, let us iron them out. I do not want the hon. member for Weyburn to run away with the idea that because we would increase the amount of money in circulation so as to raise price levels, we intened to increase the inequalities which existed in the price levels of 1928.

For the benefit of the house, I should like to sum up our present position. Because of the action of the government in keeping our dollar at a high level in the United States, this country's economic life and financial stability and the workers of the country have been placed at the mercy of the bankers in the United States and France. These bankers are not guided by any general consideration for our interests, they are guided solely by their own personal interests. Canada to-day might well be described as the thirteenth federal reserve district. I wish the government would exhibit a little more of that sturdy, robust, red-blooded Canadianism of which it boasted so freely when it was in opposition. I wish the Prime Minister would show a little more of that aggressive attitude in connection with finance which he manifested so clearly to the farmers during the last campaign. He told the farmers that he would make tariffs fight for them, but so far as I can see he has not succeeded. He could make finance fight for the farmers, he could make the rate of exchange fight for them. Keeping our dollar at par with the pound sterling would make it worth 60 or 65 cents more to the farmer; that would be making finance fight for the farmer, and would be appreciated. Instead of that, the Prime Minister warns us that the New York money market is the only market open to us and we should be very careful of what we say for fear of offending the New York bankers. It is time we had a national financial policy for Canada.

On motion of Mr. Irvine the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rhodes the house adjourned at 5.53 p.m.

MANITOBA SAVINGS OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question based upon an article in the Montreal Gazette of this morning? I will read only three lines of the article:

The Manitoba premier denied he had stated to Mr. Bennett that he had decided to close the savings office.

Is the Prime Minister in a position to make a statement in regard to that denial?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already intimated my recollection of the conversation. When I saw the article in the papers I telephoned to the banks, and I find that on the date that I indicated, namely, the 26th day of January last, Mr. Bracken, with Mr. Williams, went to Montreal—as I indicated—and he there endeavoured to sell the savings office to the banks, as he did in Toronto. When he came to me on the succeeding day he stated just what that meant, that is, that he had concluded to take the step that I have alluded to. I think he is confusing two occasions. He did not speak of taking the action I indicated the first time he saw me, but on the occasion in January, that I mentioned on Tuesday, the discussion took place. If the hon. gentleman desires, he can, by communicating with the banks in Toronto and Montreal, find that the effort was made to dispose of the savings office by having the banks take it over as I have indicated.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Thank you.

CONVERSION LOAN

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY HON. MEMBER FOR SHERBROOKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one week ago to-day I directed the attention of the house to an observation which had been made in the course of the budget debate by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard). What I said upon that occasion will be found at page 2003 of Hansard. The hon. member was absent for a period of days, but now he is present in his seat I would ask him either to support or withdraw the remarks to which I made reference at that time.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Before my hon. friend for Sherbrooke rises, I think, Mr. Speaker, that objection to words uttered in the course of a debate must be taken at the time the words are uttered. If I remember well, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was in the very seat he now occupies when the member for Sherbrooke was delivering his address. The hon. minister did not say a word at the time, he did not take any objection, and I do not think it is in order for him to raise the question to-day.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, it is quite true I was in my place on the occasion when the hon. member for Sherbrooke was speaking, but I was interrupted a number of times during the course of the debate. I find no fault with this, but the fact is either a message would be handed to me or an hon. member would come to discuss certain questions with me, and as a matter of fact the full drift of the remarks of the hon. member was not borne in on me at the time. I do not propose to discuss the point of order at all. It is only a question of the general fitness of the character of the remarks and the charges implied in them, and I should think the hon. member for Sherbrooke would be the last person to wish to shield himself behind any question of order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Behind the rules is always good shelter for a member of parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Sherbrooke wishes to support the objection taken by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), I shall reserve my decision on the point of order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I do not need the support of the member for Sherbrooke for the point of order I am taking.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not suggesting that the hon. member needs any support, but it is a question for the hon. member for Sherbrooke to decide as to his own action.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Any member of the house has the right to see that the rules of the house are observed.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Sherbrooke does not wish to reply to the observations of the Minister of Finance, I shall reserve my decision.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know whether he does or not; I do.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That ought to settle it.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, time forbids that I make any extended references to the speeches already made during this debate. One of the most notable, I think, was the address of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). It was a notable speech in that it struck a new note and indicated a new viewpoint coming from the treasury benches, and I think we may hope that it will become the basis, in the not far distant future, of an entirely different policy in this country. Worthy also of much study and discussion was the speech made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) yesterday afternoon, which was an able defence of the amendment moved from this corner of the house and an interpretation of the financial system, and which contained suggestions as to how we might get out of our present economic difficulty. I should like also, to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) who, for his many good qualities, is very highly respected in this house. I regret that the world situation, and particularly the economic situation in Canada, should have been such as to make difficult the presentation of his first budget.

I should like also to offer a word of congratulation to the government. As is well known, I hold very different views, both on questions of economics and politics, from those to which expression has been given in the policies of this government, as well as in the policies of preceding governments. Nevertheless, I am not unmindful of the colossal task confronting this administration at the present time, and in view of that fact I will not snarl at the heels of the government. Civilization to-day is in the process of a readjustment so fundamental in character as ultimately to leave untouched no field of knowledge or of experience, nor any institution without at least some modification. In Canada, as in other countries, we are confronted with a situation for which history offers no parallel. Therefore we must face this fact, that there are no precedents which we can fittingly apply, and we must work our way out by doing things which no one knows how to do because they have never been done before. In view of all this I gladly congratulate the government on its able leadership, its honest administration, its decisive and at times courageous actions and its sincere devotion to the well-being of the nation. But when all these things have been said and acknowledged it does not by any means follow that success has been secured. In other words I have no criticism of the captain of our ship, Canada, in so far as his ability as a navigator is concerned. I have no criticism of his seamanship or of the character and ability of his crew. The objection I am going to register to-day is with the direction in which the ship is going and the port towards which it is bound.

I want to direct my attention particularly, Mr. Speaker, to the subamendment moved from this corner of the house. As will be seen by hon. members, this subamendment is a challenge to the existing system, and I had hoped that the debate which followed would have been on that issue and that some difference of opinion would have been offered either with regard to the statements of fact included in the subamendment, the opinions expressed as to the proper interpretation of the economic situation, or to the proposals themselves.

[Mr. Irvine.]

With regard to the amendment I have to say that I look upon it as supporting the budget, since it takes exception only to what to my mind is an infinitesimal detail in the great national policy and attributes to that detail all the present difficulties of our economic life. Since it takes exception to only one small detail in the budget I assume that those moving it are perfectly satisfied with the system as a whole, and so far as I am concerned the amendment by implication really supports the budget. The subamendment, however, unqualifiedly declares that it does not think the present capitalistic system can be salvaged in its present form but that definite modifications are necessary, and so I should like to direct the attention of the house first to the statements of fact contained in the subamendment.

In the subamendment it is stated that there is an ample supply of natural resources to provide the people of Canada with all the primary needs of life: that we have sufficient and efficient industrial machinery, including plant equipment and skilled workers which, if applied to the natural resources, could produce all that we require in Canada. Further it is said that notwithstanding these facts our debts, personal, social and national, are increasing. These are facts that have not been challenged by anyone during the course of this debate, and I question whether anyone will have the temerity to challenge them. They are too obvious to the people at large; they cannot be challenged. Then, with these facts before us, we express the opinion that since this is the case, and our people are hungry and without work or economic hope, the trouble is to be found in the economic system itself. No one has challenged that opinion. It is only an opinion, and I admit that it may be challenged successfully, but so far no one has said there is not some defect in an economic system capable of producing the results enumerated.

Then we come to the next step; having emphasized the importance of finance in the national policy to-day we offer the suggestion, as a first step towards a solution of the economic problem facing the people of Canada, that there should be a nationalization of the credit system of this country. The hon. member for Macleod dealt specifically with that part of our subamendment yesterday, so I will not deal with it further at this time, but will rather turn my attention to the general viewpoint which the subamendment seeks to envisage with regard to the economic conditions with which it deals.

The budget itself, the subject of all our discussion and in connection with which our subamendment has been moved, to my mind is a very true reflex of the psychological condition of the country in respect of our economic problem. It is a budget exactly the same in all major respects as other budgets presented by various governments of the world. These are the outstanding characteristics of the budget. It reveals a marked decline in trade, a falling-off of revenue, a reduction of public services, increased taxation, a reduction in the salaries of public servants and an increase in debt. I am not blaming the government for all these dismal things; I am merely enumerating what the budget discloses to us and to the people of Canada and pointing out the idea which it reflects that there is great necessity in this country for curtailment of expenditures, for curtailment of purchasing power—that for some reason or other we ought to be taking care of our wealth instead of using it.

Now, the budget as a whole presents one issue in particular to which I wish to call attention. That issue is this: Shall this government, shall this parliament, shall this people of Canada be controlled by money or shall it control money? That is not to say that some individuals of great wealth determine the policy of governments, but it is to say that the monetary system is accepted both by parliament and by the people as a sacred institution to be preserved at all costs; and once that is accepted then the factors which I have enumerated as appearing in the budget become, under present conditions, inevitable.

Let me call the attention of this house and of the country to the tragedy of waste which this policy, reflected in the budget, means. There seems to be a desire to save. Well, I am interested in what we are trying to save. Are we really practising a form of economy which will save the real wealth of the nation or are we being penny wise and pound foolish? While we are saving figures in a book through the present system of book-keeping, while we are curtailing expenditures as the budget provides, what about the waste of the machine that is standing idle? What about the waste of the great surplus of goods which no one is able to use because they cannot be bought? What about the waste of human values—the unemployed who are hopelessly walking the streets? What about the waste of youth looking forward in hopefulness to find some expression for their best selves in Canada? What about them? These are the things we ought to be conserving; these are the places where we ought to practise economy. But we cannot save these things while practising this form of economy under the present financial system.

It has been said by many that this is a dollar civilization, that the dollar has been regarded as the god of our age. If this was ever true it is more true to-day than at any other time in the world's history. Canada, like other nations, sits in sackcloth and ashes, offering her sacrifices to the dollar deity. Every luxury denied to the Canadian people in the face of the present abundance is a sacrifice to the dollar deity. Every curtailment of public services, the great mass of the unemployed, the comfort denied the masses of the people, the very necessities of life denied to many—these are all in the line of sacrifices to a book-keeping system. I am reminded of an incident in the history of the great Jewish people. When Moses took a holiday, he found on his return that there had been great disruption in the camp, and the people were worshipping a golden calf. He sent for Aaron to explain the situation and Aaron, trying to make some excuse, said that the people had put all their treasures into the fire, and, lo, this calf had come forth. It seems to me that this is about what we are trying to do in Canada to-day: We are pouring all our treasures, our real wealth, our human values, into the fire of the present financial system, and I fear that the only thing that will come out will be a calf. I protest against such sacrifices, especially when economic abundance renders the performance absurd.

The dollar is an invention of mankind for convenience in the exchange of goods, and I hope that Canada will not for long bow the knee to it nor acknowledge it as the sacred dictator of a sacrificial policy unnecessarily imposed upon the people. This policy of rigid economy is due, perhaps, to certain deep-rooted psychological causes as well as economic. I think that we might divide the honours or the dishonours between instinctive and paralyzing fear and lack of vision on the part of this house and of the country at large. That fear is the fear of scarcity, and I presume it was generated at a time when the world was really in danger of real scarcity, when the tooth and claw method was necessary to survive; and unfortunately for us it appears that instinct does not respond as readily to a new set of circumstances as does intelligence. Instinct has a tendency to go on in a straight line while intelligence notes all the facts of a changed situation. And so it is to-day that we, in spite of the abundance which we are conscious of possessing, go on in a straight line towards scarcity, hampering and hindering the distribution of goods which we have already been able to produce. The fear psychology is gradually developing. Capitalists are afraid that capitalism will collapse, and the socialists and those who are usually termed reds, all opposed to the capitalistic system, are afraid that it will not collapse, which might be a greater tragedy than the other. At any rate, all are afraid of some danger. Even Mr. Wells, in one of his writings, expresses the view that civilization is a race between catastrophe and knowledge, and then later he calls the race off because, as he says, there is not enough knowledge to make a race. I disagree with him in his implication, for he implies that civilization has been built without intelligence, and I fail to see how civilization built without intelligence will ever be destroyed by lack of it. However, from Dean Inge and H. G. Wells to the vociferous and ubiquitous communist agitator, they all encourage us to anticipate disaster, until we have developed what we might call an appetite for disaster, which seems to want to satisfy itself.

After all, what is there to fear? We are told that a crash is about to come; and when we read the words which Sir Montagu Norman addressed to some official in France, we can almost hear the reverberations of that great crash. But what is there to crash? The only thing that can crash is our way of doing things—a way which is not doing them very well, a way of doing things which may be standing in the way of better ways of doing things. The only thing that can crash, I say, is our present system, our method of doing things. The greatest crash would come from the debts of the world, and those of us who are burdened that way do not anticipate that with any sort of disfavour. Let it crash; there is nothing to fear in that.

Capitalism itself is only an incident in the evolution of economics. Economics and all that it stands for will be here when capitalism is gone. But of course there is always danger, for life itself is the most dangerous of all experiments. There are dangers which are usually as great as the achievements with which they are associated. The magnetic compass has been responsible for the death by drowning of mariners in the "Devil's Hole" and of struggles for life in the "Roaring Forties." Every mile that Columbus sailed carried him further in the path of danger; yet he discovered a world. The first aviator faced great danger but he conquered the air. If we are to stand on the threshold of a new age, merely contemplating the dangers ahead, we shall fail in our great achievement. Some hon. members of the house may disagree with my colleagues and myself when we say that we believe we are on the threshold of a new social order, but we will be permitted to express our views at least. Things cannot go on as they have been going. We cannot express too much our opinion in that regard; we should not shiver in fear but we should look at the great possibilities and contemplate the achievements rather than the dangers which may be entailed.

Let me direct the attention of the house to some elements of progressive stability upon which we may restore the confidence of the nation and go forward with greater hopefulness than we have in the past. It is clear to everyone that the fear of danger cannot be overcome unless there are sound and substantial reasons upon which confidence can be based. Confidence cannot be established by well-sounding phrases, by Babbitt optimism. I repudiate with contempt, as I believe every hon. member of this house does, the fatuous and vaudevillian efforts of those who whistle to keep up the courage of the nation. They tell us to keep smiling and ask the penniless unemployed to buy more. They whistle these tunes at great public gatherings and try to get rid of the danger by their whistle. We cannot do that; we must have confidence but that confidence must be based on something substantial and real. It cannot be re-awakened by the hope of reintroducing a system now dead. There can be no resurrecting of dead institutions any more than there can be a resurrecting of dead bodies. The hope of Canada and the hope of civilization must rest in new performances, in new concepts, in new institutions and new practices. I believe that we are on the threshold of the greatest possibilities which time has ever presented to the human race.

The contributions of capitalism have been great, and one of its greatest contributions has been the abundance with which it has presented the human race. Capitalism has made it possible for us to emerge from the economic jungle where the tooth and claw method of survival was the order of the day and to reach a plane worthy to be called a real human plane. Prior to capitalism, humanity was in a state of perpetual scarcity, competition was the natural method adopted in the struggle for survival. But to-day we are in the age of plenty, as our subamendment very clearly outlines, and there is no more reason for a lack of bread, a lack of clothing, a lack of warmth, a lack of housing or a lack of any of the necessities of life than there is for a lack of water. We are in the age of great surpluses. In one year Canada has produced a surplus of wheat sufficient for our needs for another year. If that were done in the case of all our products, the population of Canada would perish in a week unless we found better ways of distribution than have been found so far. The only method of distribution thus far discovered has been through the wages paid for production; if we produce a surplus there will be no more production, no wages will be paid and we will be faced with starvation in the midst of great abundance. The surpluses with which capitalism has presented the world may truly form the essential basis of cooperative economics. Those surpluses should be the basis of a higher system of ethics than humanity has ever been able to achieve in the past. We have tried to be ethical under a competitive system, but I say that we might just as well try to grow roses on an iceberg as to practise christian ethics in the midst of a competitive civilization. Even ethics must have a satisfactory physical basis. With such abundance of all that is essential to life we are on the threshold of being released from economic bondage, the greatest bondage ever faced by the world. Before we can reach that freedom we must be prepared to remove all the restrictions introduced during the period of scarcity and evolve a definite method for the distribution of this abundance. This is a task beyond any individual, or even a government, it is a task for society as a whole. We must attempt to alter the whole course of society in order to reap the benefits of the great advantages which capitalism has presented to us.

To-day there is less cause for despair than at any other period in history. At what period in history have human values received such universal emphasis as during the present period? Internationally there is a struggle going on for the establishment of a permanent basis for world peace. Nationally there is a growing opinion that hunger and poverty are disgraces to society and we are seeking more and more to combine our human good will and intelligence in order to eradicate such as enemies of mankind. There is a growing opinion everywhere that the life and happiness of the people must not be hampered or denied by the limitations of certain agencies which man has devised to serve the purposes of life. Never were these human agencies so universal, so well organized, so articulate and potent as now. These qualities, together with our boundless national resources, or machine of production and our army of competent workers should be entered upon the ledger of the nation by the Minister of Finance (Mr Rhodes) as assets of this country which no debts can outweigh.

We have a difficult problem to face, as have all people who have lived in similar periods of transition, but our assets are greater. Being heirs of the ages, we have greater knowledge to-day than ever before. Our knowledge is not only greater in the aggregate but the capacity of the individual is as great to-day—as, if not greater than, it ever was in the world's history. There is more goodwill in the world to-day than ever before, it has never been more general, more sincere and more forceful. We can still claim to be in possession of courage. Those who read of the exploits of our armies in Europe during the last war know that courage is still in the hearts of Canadians, and they will respond just as much to peaceful exploits as they did to warlike exploits. Human nature is on our side. When we talk about introducing a new economic system most people say: You cannot do that because human nature is against you. Human nature to some people is represented only by criminal exploits. But human nature is greater than that, it will assist us forward with our new system; it is one of the strongest forces in our favour. It is true that capitalism has developed much of the worst in human nature but if we can introduce a system such as is covered by our subamendment there will come a time when we will have an economic system which will bring out the best in mankind.

To-morrow we shall rediscover man himself and build a civilization worthy of his best. There are deeper wells of greatness in human nature than have so far been suspected. Then youth too is for a new system. The young people of Canada are looking for leadership. They are wise enough to sense the danger of the present system and to appreciate the instability which will come from the denying of the necessities of life in the midst of abundance. Finally that great force referred to by Schopenhauer, Goethe, and others as the "Will to live," has not lost its cunning, nor its creative genius. Having brought the race from the slime of incipient life to the highest achievements of modern civilization it will not now abandon us. It will discover what to do with abundance. The real challenge to capitalism does not come from communism or socialism, it comes from the will to live inherent in humanity. Capitalism must meet this challenge of life or perish. Life will not be defeated.

With such a heritage of power there is no room for fear, with such strivings of the vital instincts of the race, civilization will and must come through. Our despairs are but passing clouds before the vision of the mind. Our fears are like the dreams which waken children in the night. Such defeats as we fear may come to individuals, but the race is borne to victory. The great to-morrow is like an unborn babe in the womb of time. The sufferings of the moment, which are real and tragic, are the pains of birth. The life of civilizations, like that of the race, must find its survival in new birth. This truth I put down as the sure basis of hope. Beyond the happy scope of myth no corpse has ever come to life. Those who expect to resuscitate capitalistic civilization, like those who spend their times at graves in readiness to welcome resurrection, shall wear forever the dark mantle of despair. New thoughts, new ideals, new systems and new hopes are the new-born children of to-day who shall be in command to-morrow.

I ask the house to consider the proposals which we put forward in connection with this anticipated new age of abundance so that we may be in a position to take advantage of it, and to vote for the subamendment and economic freedom for the people of Canada.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) upon his very interesting speech. I intend this afternoon to direct my humble remarks especially to my colleagues from western Canada, and I do not know amongst them a more amiable, lovable or sincere friend of the people than my hon. friend. Since I have come to this house, I have been much impressed by the assiduity of members from western Canada who sit with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), by their spirit of cooperation and high sense of duty.

I did not intend to take part in this debate, but the very interesting speech delivered by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) has impressed me to such an extent that it behooves me, as a representative of an agricultural division of Quebec, to rise and thank him for having so happily voiced the sentiments of eastern Canada. The hon. member is still a young man; his political career is full of promise; his speech is one of the most persuasive that has been delivered during this session. My hon. friend has been an eloquent advocate of the needs of the farmers; being himself addicted to the farming and live stock industry, he speaks with authority, and I hope the government will avail themselves of the excellent suggestions he has given them in order to promote the welfare of the farmers and thereby assure our return to prosperity.

May I also congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) upon his masterly achievement; his budget has been everywhere highly commended. The minister comes from the beautiful province of Nova Scotia which has been called by a humourist endowed with a high sense of reality: "The land of apples and statesmen." From that province also comes the distinguished financial critic of the Liberal opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). By a happy coincidence, they were both born in Amherst, and the brilliant city editor of the Montreal Standard wrote last Saturday in his paper, the following words:

> There must have been something about the air of Amherst, Nova Scotia, that whetted minds in keenness and brilliance, in that it created two such outstanding Canadians:—

The hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth.

It has been more or less the custom of parliamentarians to avail themselves of the opportunity offered by debates on the budget to praise the work of their respective parties. May I ask my colleagues, in these times of anxiety, to rise to higher ground and forget our party divisions and discussions? On the eve of the great Imperial conference which will, for the first time in history, sit in Ottawa, and which will have to enter upon the long-awaited agreements necessary to assure the economic revival of prosperity in the different dominions forming the British commonwealth of nations, I humbly suggest that we consider the salvation of our country in the light of our duty towards agriculture as outlined by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe.

Let us forget our divisions and recall the words used by Professor Leacock of McGill university in his recent book entitled Return to Prosperity, a book which will prove beneficial to all men interested in studying the different problems which will confront Canada at the Imperial conference. Professor Leacock on the first page of his book says:

> "The Imperial conference meets on the call of an emergency."

Speaking in this house at a luncheon tendered him by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), the Right Hon. Winston Churchill said:

> "Canada once again stands on the Vimy Ridge of the empire."

Another parliamentarian from England wrote the other day that all the delegates ought to come to Ottawa with outstretched hands.

The Ottawa Citizen of March 5 had on the front page the following caption:

Preparing for Ottawa is Britain's new national slogan.

It continues:

Nothing has captured the imagination of the political, commercial and financial world like the great empire gathering which a few months hence assembles in the Canadian capital. Already ideas of the leading industrial, trade union and business organizations here have been collected by government experts so that a complete review can be made of Britain's trade position.

Have we forgotten our party divisions and discussions to reach such an equanimity, as to enable us to assure the success of that conference? Before setting our hearts to a task of such magnitude, must we not remember that we are Canadians and resolute to achieve a safe return to prosperity?

May I suggest that the imperative task which we must assume is that of safeguarding agriculture? Professor Leacock, in his book which I have just mentioned, calls agriculture "the sheet anchor of national safety." He says:

Agriculture is not a business; it is a way of living, a way of thinking. It carries with it elements of national life that no clattering shuttles and humming wheels can ever supply; in peace, comfort; in war, a guarding arm against starvation. England with a four weeks' parcel of food in August, 1914, ought to have learned this lesson once and for all.

Such a statement provides ample food for thought. Agriculture stands as the very foundation of a nation. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe has rightly said that the "general progress of the dominion depends upon the success of agriculture and. . . upon the soundness of Canadian agriculture depends the future prosperity of this country." I endorse that eloquent sentiment. I regret, however, to say that eastern and western Canada seem to hold different views about agriculture; many people seem to forget that a western farmer is very different from his brother of eastern Canada. Western Canada has developed so rapidly during the last thirty years that the farmers of the west have a very moderate admiration for the farmers of eastern Canada. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that before sitting down at the table with the other delegates and devoting many long hours to a study and discussion of the economic proposals submitted by all the sister dominions of the British commonwealth, we should first of all see if our own house is in order. Let us ask ourselves whether eastern Canada thoroughly understands western Canada, and whether western Canada thoroughly understands the east, which understanding must be brought about before we can have the frame of mind which is essential to building a strong national policy.

By the pact of confederation each province has been entrusted with the task of developing agriculture within its boundaries, and the Dominion government has seen to it that the farmers of Canada as a whole have been helped to stimulate Canadian trade at home and abroad and the production of Canadian commodities. Before the construction of the transcontinental railways and the opening up of new provinces in western Canada, the farmers of the east were not rich. They may not have been very progressive, but at least they were thrifty and paid their debts. In 1840 when the union of upper and lower Canada was brought about, lower Canada or Quebec—why should I not be permitted to say this along with many historians?—had no public debt, while upper Canada, or Ontario, had a large debt, which was paid ungrudgingly by the taxpayers of both provinces. Quebec was then more concerned about responsible government and the freedom of her language than with the hoarding of gold. The farmers of Quebec ever since have continued to be humble tillers of the soil. They have devoted themselves to mixed farming, and later, in the eighties, to dairying, which industry was really first organized in the province of Quebec. In this connection may I say that one of the fathers of the dairy industry in Quebec was a very respectable gentleman from Kamouraska, Mr. Edward Barnard, a brother-in-law of the Hon. Senator Chapais, and the father of Mr. J. E. Barnard, the brilliant director of L'Evenement of Quebec. The farmers of Quebec have lived happily near the great St. Lawrence in the charming vales of the eastern townships, close to the grand Laurentian mountains, in their small, white-painted houses near the village church where they find the inspiration and the courage to carry on the work of their forefathers. At the present time the farmers of Quebec like the farmers of all Canada are suffering great distress, but nevertheless they cheerfully fulfil their tasks, and even now should any of my colleagues from the other provinces happen to be travelling along the St. Lawrence they will hear songs like Alouette, and other gay refrains coming from all the homes.

Confederation has brought to the farmers of Quebec new duties towards the other provinces which they have faithfully fulfilled. But the rapid development of western Canada and the building of railroads have changed the whole economic structure of this dominion. Thousands of emigrants have been induced to go to the western provinces at the expense of the public treasury. I remember that at the beginning of this century, when Laurier was defending his policy of immigration and was being criticized by other parties on account of the disastrous consequences which might follow, that grand old man predicted in biblical language that the twentieth century would be Canada's century. A long procession of immigrants has followed the trail to the west, and millions and millions of dollars have been spent in building railroads and establishing those immigrants on western lands. The crops of wheat of the Canadian west have become fabulous, so much so that Canada has gained the reputation of being the granary of the world.

Canada was then passing through a period of great prosperity and those who were criticizing the policy of the government of the day in the matter of railroads and immigration were accused of being pessimists and of slandering their own country. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that every Canadian must be proud of our western provinces and of their splendid populations and of the courageous manner in which they have fought the depression, but I have no hesitation in submitting that the historians of the future will regret that the farmers of western Canada have been almost exclusively concerned in the extensive growing of wheat.

They were so successful in wheat farming, in real estate speculation and in other fields of speculation that they believed that prosperity would never cease, and sometimes they would throw a scornful look on the farmers of the east who, happily, remained backward. The western farmers have been so powerful in Ottawa that all parties have been begging for their support. Railways have been built for them in almost every district of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and even during this session, Mr. Speaker, when we hear that our railroads, even the Canadian Pacific Railway, are on the verge of bankruptcy, hon. members from the west are urging the government to build a railway in the Peace river valley. Why, Mr. Speaker, should we not more frequently rise in this house and lay our cards openly on the table and say that, fortunately or otherwise, the ideals and customs and mentality of the Canadians of the western provinces are different from that of the east. Professor Leacock in the book to which I have already referred makes a distinction that is worthy of consideration. He says at page 38:

> There is in it an almost creative power that makes a British farmer, in the Greek sense, a poet. In Saskatchewan he is an engineer.

Is there not a good deal of truth, Mr. Speaker, in that contention? The farmers of the west are adventurous and bold engineers. The farmers of Ontario and Quebec are modest and thrifty tillers of the soil. In western Canada the farmers cultivate hundreds of acres of wheat. They raise hundreds of heads of cattle, have each a great number of employees, and use the most modern machinery. The farmers of eastern Canada are not industrialists like their brothers of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, but they are nevertheless even more attached to the soil where they and their forefathers have been living for more than two hundred years.

Both the farmers of the east and of the west have contributed in their own way to the progress of this country. However, legislators have too often forgotten that the western farmers were engineers and industrialists and that the eastern farmers were different. If I may be permitted to refer to the Bankruptcy Act, which has permitted farmers to make an assignment of their assets for the benefit of their creditors, who will not now admit that while such legislation may have been suitable to the west it has proved disastrous to the farmers of eastern Canada. No farmer of eastern Canada ever at any time has demanded of the legislators that he be allowed to go into bankruptcy. I do not think traders and manufacturers have ever been less inclined than now to ask for such a remedy. I am sure that is the case, for in my eighteen years of practice before the bar never have I seen the estate of a farmer in bankruptcy pay one cent to the creditors. This is why it is that now in the province of Quebec societies of farmers, chambers of commerce, and members of parliament ask that the law be amended so that farmers be excluded from the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Act. Last week I appeared before the special committee of this house which is now considering a general revision of the Bankruptcy Act. Many prominent gentlemen from eastern Canada have appeared before that committee, among others, Mr. R. Messier, acting dominion secretary of the Retail Merchants' Association, Montreal; Mr. Lalonde, president of the Catholic Union of the Farmers of the province of Quebec, comprising 16,000 members; Mr. D'Arcy Leonard, representing the Dominion Mortgage and Investments Association, Toronto. At page 20 of the first report of the committee, Mr. G. T. Clarkson, the distinguished head of the firm of E. R. Clarkson and Company, who appeared before the committee to represent the Toronto Board of Trade and the Dominion Association of Chartered Accountants, said:

In my opinion a farmer should not be subject to this act.

The other day two prominent gentlemen, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) and the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard) moved each a resolution—which unfortunately has not been discussed—asking this government to take the necessary steps to exclude the farmers of Quebec from the jurisdiction of the Bankruptcy Act. Recently members from Ontario and Quebec have received a resolution from the Ontario Education Association asking the government to help reassure the credit of the farmers by excluding them from the operation of the act. Undoubtedly the Bankruptcy Act has ruined the credit of the farmers of Quebec.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I refer to other legislation which has been disastrous to the farmers of eastern Canada; I mean the law enacted in 1929 creating the Canadian Farm Loan Board. This legislation may have been beneficial to the western farmers, but it has not been at all helpful to the farmers of eastern Canada. The rate of interest is too high, the legal fees incident to the granting of loans are also too high, and the obligation laid upon borrowers to contribute to the special fund is not only unpractical but absurd.

In a period of depression such as we are passing through at the present time we are in a good position to judge whether bankruptcy legislation or legislation for granting loans to farmers is practicable and suitable to the needs of those engaged in agriculture. I would suggest that all the laws concerning agriculture be studied, amended and readapted to suit the needs of the farmers of the different sections of the dominion. The hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) was right in his suggestion, that such a move ought not to be taken without consulting the provinces. It will be found that there is too much duplication in the granting of subsidies by federal and provincial governments, and such a situation tends to confusion and criticism. It seems to me that we ought to proceed by way of investigation. I was surprised last Sunday to read in the Montreal Standard that Premier Brownlee of Alberta wants a royal commission to be appointed to investigate agricultural conditions in western Canada. He is said to have declared that people in other parts of Canada, particularly in the east:

Were ignorant of the serious condition agriculture was in.

I will not say, Mr. Speaker, that the west is ignorant of conditions in the east, for such absolute statements are not at all conducive to harmony and cooperation between the east and the west, but I may summarize the views of the people of eastern Canada by stating that sometimes our western friends act as if they were ignorant of the problems which confront eastern Canada. Therefore it seems to me that it is necessary that we investigate agricultural conditions not only in western Canada but throughout the whole country. It does not seem to me to be necessary to have recourse to a royal commission now, but would it not be wise before the Imperial economic conference convenes for all the provinces to send delegates to Ottawa to submit their views with respect to agriculture, such as extension of credit to farmers, the best means of encouraging our live stock, dairy, maple sugar and beet sugar industries, and the sale of all agricultural products.

After the Imperial economic conference I would suggest that the government again invite delegates from all the provinces to meet in Ottawa to try once for all to settle their differences without having recourse to the courts. If we could give to our farmers all the money that has been spent to submit to the courts cases of conflict of federal and provincial jurisdiction, it would be possible to provide for them many beneficial measures of relief. At such a conference we ought to be able to meet in a friendly spirit, to place our cards on the table, and to be ready to make any reasonable compromises that may be necessary. And it would be well to discuss the advisability of giving back to the federal government the Quebec maritime fisheries that were in 1922 wrongfully given to the government of Quebec. This step is demanded by all the fishermen of Quebec, and is the only way to help the fishermen, as was admitted the other day by hon. gentlemen opposite, including the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) and the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). We ought also to discuss the advisability of buying Labrador. It would be well, too, to discuss some practical scheme of credit for the farmers of eastern Canada. Finally, we should take such steps as to remove all causes of friction between the provinces.

But in the meantime the farmers of eastern Canada are facing an emergency and they cannot wait. Last year we helped the farmers of western Canada; now it is imperative to think of the east. Hon. gentlemen from western Canada, I ask you to help the farmers of eastern Canada. In this respect I do not know of any better scheme than that submitted so eloquently by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). He suggested that the government grant a bonus or subsidy to encourage the export of agricultural commodities. While we are passing through this economic crisis, stimulation to any avenue of development that will increase employment is surely highly justified, at least while direct relief is being paid out of the treasury. Australia is making a determined effort to sell more meats to Great Britain. May I support the contention of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Belec) and ask the government to try to recapture the bacon export trade which we lost during the war. I think the government should impress upon the delegates at the Imperial conference that it is up to them to help Canadian farmers who, when they went abroad to defend the causes of liberty and civilization, had their avenues of trade in agricultural commodities taken by neutral countries such as Sweden, Norway and Denmark. Since the government are thinking of adopting a policy of direct relief for unemployment the door is wide open for the bonusing of exports of agricultural commodities, and I respectfully submit that such bonuses are necessary because of the present emergency. If we wish prosperity to return we must go to the rural districts and help the farmers create prosperity. Farmers are to save our economic system. Let us save the farmer and communism will vanish.

Let us try to understand each other, gentlemen from the west and gentlemen from the east. Our country is wonderful and we are proud to live in it. Let us secure the future happiness of our children. I respectfully ask my colleagues from western Canada to give us what we are entitled to, and to help our farmers since last year we helped save your western provinces from bankruptcy and ruin. If the French Canadian farmer, for one reason or another, would like to have two or three French words on Canadian bank notes and currency, should it not be a pleasure for our friends and brothers from western Canada to give such a token of courtesy to the four million French Canadians living in this country? With the great development in radio we have found a new way of exchanging ideas and opinions between all the provinces. Let the old French Canadian romances be broadcast over the western provinces, and nothing will prevent cooperation among the different provinces, and the different races becoming closer and more intimate. In these times of sorrow and depression, if the government cannot give bread to all needy people, at least the government may satisfy the souls of the people.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

May I close my few remarks by recalling the words of Right Hon. Winston Churchill, who said that "once more Canada stands on the Vimy Ridge of the empire." I think Vimy Ridge will always illustrate our history. The first time I saw the great painting which hangs on the wall of one of our committee rooms I was greatly impressed by the idea expressed by the painter. At the top of the hill stands a monument dedicated to our heroes by a grateful nation. From the foot of that historic ridge to the top the shades of our soldiers ascend, just as they did on the morning of that memorable day. There they died side by side, Mr. Speaker, brave English Canadians, sturdy Scotch Canadians, gallant Irish Canadians and indomitable French Canadians; there they died, and there their ashes are mingled. They died to give us peace, and now when we are all suffering let peace remain in our souls. Let us forget our differences, and our children will be proud of their fathers.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in this debate may I be permitted at the outset to extend my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the very able and concise way in which he presented his first budget to the House of Commons a few days ago. May I also extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) for the masterly way in which, as the official critic on this side of the house, he replied to the budget speech of the minister. Congratulations are also due to all hon. members who have taken part in the debate, and who have presented points of view pertaining to their own localities and their own interests. May I be pardoned if I do not follow very closely the remarks of the speakers who have preceded me; I desire to discuss a matter which is of some moment to us in the province of Manitoba and for which I may not have any other opportunity of discussing.

I hold in my hand extracts from a return brought down in the house some time ago showing the amount of money advanced by the federal government under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act to the governments of the four western provinces. It shows that as of February 26 there had been advanced to the province of British Columbia, $5,664,000; to the province of Alberta, $4,624,000; to the province of Manitoba, $3,205,000; and to the province of Saskatchewan, $16,302,000. It also shows that $6,500,000 was advanced to the province of Saskatchewan for purely provincial government expenses. I do not wish to infer in any sense that the province of Saskatchewan received more money or more federal assistance than it should have received, but I do maintain that the province of Saskatchewan is not five times worse off than is the province of Manitoba. When we see that the province of Saskatchewan was able to secure for purely provincial government purposes some $6,500,000 it does seem passing strange that the province of Manitoba could not obtain some assistance for the provincial savings office.

In his remarks on Tuesday last the Prime Minister stated in effect that it seemed rather hard that when he and his government were confronted with very trying conditions and faced with problems of great magnitude they should be the subject of abuse and a target for criticism. Well, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman asked for the responsibility, and surely he will not deny anyone the right to criticize his actions. He usually defends his course with vigour and determination, but that is no reason why, if hon. members on this side of the house do not agree with what is being done, they should not have the right to criticize.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to refer to two editorials which appeared in Winnipeg newspapers some time ago. The first appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune, which is recognized as the Conservative newspaper in Manitoba, dealing with the closing of the provincial savings office. It is headed "Not Premier Bracken's Fault" and goes on to say:

Whatever other sins he may have to answer for, Premier Bracken cannot be justly saddled with responsibility for the downfall of the provincial savings bank. It is through no fault of his that the institution has been dismembered and its remains fed to the chartered banks.

Mr. Bracken stated his case in the legislature yesterday with moderation and restraint. It is worth noting by the way that a strong case needs no other kind of presentation. The facts speak for themselves without any accompaniment of sound and fury.

The facts speak for Premier Bracken in the circumstances of the constitution of the provincial savings bank and in the manner of its dissolution.

The last thing that was dreamed of or thought possible when the provincial bank was organized was that there could be such a thing as a public questioning of the safety of the deposits. The provincial savings bank was as strong and secure as the province itself. There could be no danger to the deposits short of an upheaval that would put the province of Manitoba under the hammer in a sheriff's sale, a thing that did not happen, will not happen and could not happen.

But the unexpected thing and what seemed the impossible thing did actually happen. Depositors in the provincial savings bank became anxious about the safety of their money. Whisperings grew into street talk. Street talk grew into small withdrawals. Small withdrawals grew into quite general withdrawals. In short there was a run on the provincial savings bank which, continuing in rising intensity over a period of several weeks, absorbed most of the bank's ready cash.

There was an abundance of security behind every dollar of deposits—securities as good as the province of Manitoba itself—but these securities were not liquid in the chaotic market that prevailed. It became a question of the chartered banks advancing money on Manitoba's securities or the Dominion government advancing it. From neither source was the money available. The savings bank, strong in its foundations as the Rock of Gibraltar, had to go.

It has been said that if Premier Bracken had taken the public into his confidence and made a clear statement of the bank's position the withdrawal of deposits would have ceased. That is a bold conjecture.

If Mr. Bracken had publicly intimated that the bank lacked cash assets, but was otherwise sound the chances are that the run would have been intensified. He could only have made a public announcement with safety if he had been able to find the ready money support he was looking for, and invite all uneasy depositors to go to the bank and get their money. That was the only kind of statement to carry assurance to anxious depositors and stop the drain on deposits.

At no time was Premier Bracken in a position to make such a statement. A neighbourly spirit on the part of the Dominion government would have enabled him to do so, but the Dominion government was not in a mood to play that part. It remained a mildly interested spectator while the savings bank took the count.

From the Winnipeg Free Press I should like to read in part the following editorial:

Manitoba has lost an institution deeply rooted in the popular regard, as the fact that it had 40,000 patrons proves, under circumstances injurious to the credit of the province, and therefore detrimental to private interests as well. The disappearance of the bank is not a very favourable advertisement for Manitoba and Winnipeg. The banks, in keeping with the view that he who pays the piper has the right to call the tune, made their assistance, which was necessary to avoid a worse calamity, contingent upon the bank being turned over to them. They thereby removed what was to them a banking eyesore. The banks are not private institutions but public utilities; the propriety of the course which they have followed in this case, will be properly reviewable by the public when the facts are available.

It is known that the province applied to the Dominion government for help and met with refusal. The explanation by the Dominion, when it is made, may be completely satisfactory. In theory the Dominion is not responsible for Manitoba's financial enterprises; only the supreme consideration of the public safety could be invoked in an appeal such as that made by the province upon the Dominion. But if—as reports in Ottawa seem to indicate—Mr. Bennett, after denying the province, gave the banks aid in taking over the savings bank, the matter takes on a different complexion. But here judgment may well await the explanation promised by the Prime Minister.

Then there is the matter of the reported organized drive against the bank for ulterior purposes. Here there is something more than rumour to go upon. The premier of the province has said that the disappearance of the bank "must be charged in some degree to ill-considered gossip, but in considerable degree to deliberate propaganda." Deliberate propaganda! By whom and to what end? The people will expect further light upon this point.

Following the opening of the Manitoba legislature, which took place after the provincial savings office had closed, a member of the Labour party moved that a special committee of the house be appointed to inquire into the reasons for the closing of the savings office, and bearing directly upon the two editorials I have read, there are a few extracts of interest which I will read from the evidence taken before that special committee. The first extract I want to give is a report of the evidence of Mr. John McGregor, chairman of the board of trustees of the provincial savings bank:

Suspects Organized Campaign

"I suspect that there was an organized campaign behind it," said John McGregor, chairman of the trustees of the provincial savings office referring to the rumours that the institution was unsafe.

"They came out of the blue sky and were so persistent that one must believe they were organized. It is hard to credit any responsible person with doing that. There was no justification at all for these rumours."

The rumours came to the attention of the trustees on January 11, Mr. McGregor said, previously nothing definite had been heard.

In last October the provincial savings office was sound and prosperous, he said. The market value of the office's securities in April, 1931, revealed a balance of $377,000 in favour of the office, compared with the booked value.

In September the value of the securities dropped precipitately, although the number of depositors increased steadily until the end of October. There were, however, unexpectedly heavy withdrawals in November, 1931, to purchase national service loan bonds.

At this point I may say that there was withdrawn from the provincial savings bank in Manitoba, presumably for the purpose of buying national service loan bonds, the sum of approximately one and a quarter million dollars.

Mr. McGregor stated that the office had been liquid up to that time, although a credit of $1,000,000 had been obtained from the banks as a precautionary measure against any drop in bond values.

E. J. Jewers assured Mr. McGregor that there had been no great demand for deposits, but shortly after January 11, Mr. Jewers informed him that the withdrawals were becoming steady. A meeting of the trustees was called that afternoon and it was decided to advertise the soundness of the office to offset the rumours.

Royal Burrit, trustee, declared that political attacks on the financial position of the province were, indirectly, attacks on the provincial savings office. The condition of the office and of the province was closely related and any political speech prior to the closing belittling provincial financial affairs was also a blow at the office.

Great Britain's dropping from the gold standard seriously affected the position of the savings office, he stated. But all banks were likewise affected. The serious situation in the securities markets after Britain's action resulted in most banks being not actually liquid.

As a matter of fact, he continued, chartered banks to-day were permitted in their financial statements to value their bonds as of June, 1930, because at present bond prices none of them would be liquid.

The provincial savings office was the victim of circumstances, he continued. It was not at any time insolvent; only its liquid position was ever affected seriously and until the run its liquid position was sufficient to meet all depositors' demands.

Continuing with the evidence taken before that special committee, as reported in the press from day to day, I find the following:

Testifies Newton Advised Him To Withdraw Savings

Grandview Auto Dealer Tells of Conversation with Conservative Member for Roblin

F. Y. Newton, Conservative member for Roblin, in the first week of February advised a friend to withdraw whatever money he might have deposited in provincial savings office, a special legislative committee investigating the closing of the savings office was told Wednesday afternoon.

This testimony was taken from J. F. Orr, automobile dealer at Grandview, Man., who said he had talked with Mr. Newton in Roblin some time during the first week of February.

Before he named the Conservative member of the legislature, Mr. Orr said that a friend had told him that if he had any money in the provincial savings office, he should withdraw it. It was also suggested that Mr. Orr should advise any of his friends to withdraw their savings.

Questioned, Mr. Orr said that the friend who had given him the advice was Mr. Newton.

The next evidence taken before the committee is reported as follows:

Tell Of Warnings By F. Y. Newton To Take Out Savings

Schweitzer Also Quoted at Inquiry Into Provincial Savings Office

Prominent Conservatives early in February advised friends to close accounts in the provincial savings office, witnesses Thursday told the special legislative committee investigating the closing of the savings office.

Two witnesses from Dauphin described how F. Y. Newton, Conservative member for Roblin, had warned that the institution was not safe and advised them to take out their money and to tell their friends to close their accounts.

Val. E. Schweitzer, Conservative party organizer, told a friend that the savings office was "broke" and that he should withdraw his money another witness testified.

It was H. L. Pulford, a depositor in the provincial savings office, who said that the Conservative party organizer had advised him to close his account. Mr. Pulford was questioned by Hon. W. J. Major, attorney general.

The next evidence, dated April 4, 1932, reads:

Willis Urged Brother To Withdraw Savings
Legislative Committee Probing Closing Hears of Wire From Member for Souris

Brief but decisive warning of the closing of the provincial savings office came to a depositor from a member of the Dominion parliament, it was revealed, Saturday, when the special legislative committee investigating the closing of the savings office resumed its inquiry.

This warning was contained in a telegram to Trevor Willis, and it came from his brother, Errick Willis, M.P. for Souris, who was in Ottawa. The telegram read:

"Withdraw money from Donald and Ellice."

This is the location of The Province of Manitoba Savings Office.

The committee also examined J. T. Haig, Conservative member for Winnipeg, questioning him to determine the source of rumours which had prompted the Conservative member to write to Premier John Bracken asking whether the provincial savings office was safe.

The coincidence that Mr. Haig's political speech in Brooklands, on February 15, had accurately, although stated interrogatively by Mr. Haig, revealed why Premier Bracken had summoned the legislature, was emphasized in the examination of the Conservative member.

Later on in the evidence Mr. Haig stated that he had communicated his uneasiness about the provincial savings office only to Premier Bracken and Colonel F. G. Taylor, leader of the Conservative party. When questioned as to whether he had discussed the position of the provincial savings office with anyone else, he said he had not. He then added that he might have talked to Dr H. C. Hodgson, president of the Manitoba Conservative Association.

Mr. WILLIS: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Yes.

Mr. WILLIS: Would the hon. member put on Hansard the evidence regarding myself?

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I have just read it.

Mr. WILLIS: I refer to the evidence taken at the inquiry.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I have just read it.

Mr. WILLIS: The hon. member has not read a word.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The hon. member can read that himself.

Mr. WILLIS: I am very thankful.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I think the statement made by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on Tuesday last and again to-day will not satisfy the public interested in this question. Among other things the Prime Minister stated that when he met Premier Bracken and E. K. Williams on January 26 they had stated they had come to the conclusion that they should close the provincial savings office, the inference here being that before the province of Manitoba approached the Dominion government it had decided that these offices should be closed. However, the Prime Minister failed to advise the house of any efforts made to solve this problem by Premier Bracken at the meeting on December 6 with the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) or of the meetings held on December 22 and 28 with himself. No reference whatever is made to what took place at these meetings. It does seem inconceivable that the premier of Manitoba should be willing to close the provincial savings offices which had over 40,000 depositors and which were earning for the government of Manitoba upwards of $100,000 yearly. More than that, it was repeated several times during the negotiations by Mr. Bracken that the banks would lend the money to the Dominion government which in turn could lend it to the Manitoba government for the provincial savings office. As I say, nothing is mentioned of the conversation between the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) and Mr. Bracken during the meeting on December 6 or of the discussion of Mr. Bracken and the Prime Minister on December 22 and 28. It has not been confirmed or denied whether Mr. Bracken asked for dominion assistance in order to keep the savings offices open at these conferences. I think this is important and I contend that we should receive a direct answer, yes or no, from the government as to whether Mr. Bracken did ask for dominion assistance at that time. Even if that statement is not forthcoming, the situation presents itself to me in this way. In order to protect the depositors, Mr. Bracken had to have money available to meet withdrawals. The Dominion government as such had no money for such purposes and, naturally, Mr. Bracken endeavoured to secure the money needed from the banks and the banks in turn advised him of the terms upon which they would advance the money. Those terms were as stated by the Prime Minister, namely, that the banks would lend the money to the Dominion of Canada which in turn could lend it to the province to meet the claims of the depositors. The Prime Minister says that on January 26 he declined to do this. In a letter to the Minister of Finance dated January 30, Mr. Bracken urged the necessity of some assistance being forthcoming immediately. On February 4 Mr. Bracken wired the Prime Minister as follows:

Confidential message being transmitted to you through Bank of Montreal. Would appreciate sympathetic consideration.

The Prime Minister replied to that telegram in code to the effect that no action should be taken until Monday, and asked for details of the standing of the bank. Mr. Bracken replied by wire in accordance with the Prime Minister's request. On February 9 the Prime Minister wired Premier Bracken as follows:

You will be advised by code telegram to-morrow the terms on which your proposals will be accepted.

The code telegram sent to Mr. Bracken, and to which the Prime Minister must have given his approval as it was sent from Ottawa, differs considerably from the letter placed on record last Tuesday by the Prime Minister. This letter is from the Bank of Montreal, is dated Winnipeg, Manitoba, February 11, 1932, and reads:

The Hon. John Bracken,
Premier of the Province of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.
Sir:

I am asked to convey to you the following telegram received late yesterday afternoon from Mr. S. H. Logan at Ottawa.

This is the telegram which the right hon. Prime Minister advised Mr. Bracken he would receive. The letter continues:

The telegram reads as follows:

Referring to your previous conversations with bankers and also with the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister's message to you last night banks represented in Winnipeg are willing to assume deposit liabilities if you address a communication in the following terms to them. Delivery of such communication can be made to the Bank of Montreal, Winnipeg, signed S. H. Logan on behalf of banks represented in Winnipeg. Communication is as follows: "Referring to my verbal intimation to you a short time ago, the government of the province of Manitoba has reached the conclusion that under present conditions the public interests will be best served by the closing of the provincial savings offices operated under chapter 174 of the Consolidated Amendments Statutes of province of Manitoba, 1924, and amendments thereto if adequate provision is made for the liquidation of all deposit liabilities in connection therewith, I submit on behalf of the government for your consideration the following—First: If the chartered banks represented in Winnipeg are willing to arrange to assume all outstanding liabilities to depositors in the offices operated under the provisions of the said chapter 174 the government of province of Manitoba will within a period not exceeding fourteen days from the date hereof convene the legislature and repeal said chapter 174 and amendments thereto. Second: In consideration of assuming such liabilities steps will be taken at the forthcoming session of the legislature through appropriate legislation to authorize the issue of treasury bills of the province payable one year after date and bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per cent per annum payable semi-annually. Pending the enactment of the necessary legislation such bills will be issued by the province of Manitoba to an amount equal to such liabilities as and when assumed and will be delivered together with as collateral security all securities now held by said savings offices to such chartered banks and the legislature will confirm the regularity of such issues of treasury bills. Third: It is the wish of the government that as soon as may be the chartered banks through a committee of their own if these terms are acceptable to the banks shall take charge of all such offices and the conduct and management of all business connected therewith and the liquidation thereof it is understood that the banks will not take over the staff and that the government of province of Manitoba will be responsible for rent and other expenses."

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) R. E. English,
For Assistant General Manager.

That letter is considerably different from the one dated February 16, which the Prime Minister placed on record on Tuesday last. Five days had intervened between the sending of the two letters, and perhaps a reference to the rest of the correspondence will indicate just what transpired. It will be noted that the Prime Minister told Premier Bracken that he would be advised the following morning as to the conditions under which the banks would come to the assistance of the Manitoba savings office. The following is a copy of the telegram sent by Premier Bracken for transmission in code to Mr. S. H. Logan, Toronto, Ontario, dated Winnipeg, February 11, 1932:

For some time the government of the province of Manitoba has been giving careful consideration to the position of the provincial savings offices and has now reached the conclusion that if adequate provision is or can be made for the liquidation of all deposit liabilities in connection with the provincial savings offices operated under chapter 174 of the Consolidated Amendments Manitoba, 1924, and amending acts the public interest, under existing conditions, would be best served by the closing of the offices.

Therefore, on behalf of the government I submit the following for your consideration.

1. If the chartered banks represented in Winnipeg are willing to arrange to assume all outstanding liabilities to depositors in the offices operated under the provisions of said chapter 174 the government of the province of Manitoba will at once issue treasury bills of the province payable one year after date and bearing interest at the rate of five and a half per cent per annum payable semi-annually to the extent of such liabilities and will ratify the same at the ensuing session of the legislature which will be convened to meet within the next three weeks.

The banks asked for two weeks.

2. Pending such ratification such bills will be issued by the province to an amount equal to such liabilities as and when assumed and will be delivered together with, as collateral security, all securities now held by said savings offices to such chartered banks. When such legislation receives assent such collateral security will be returned to the province.

3. If this is acceptable to the banks the government will give an assurance that it will discontinue the receipt of deposits in such or any other offices.

The banks asked for the repeal of the statute.

4. In this event the banks would probably desire to take charge of all such offices and the conduct and management of all business connected therewith and the taking over of the same. The government expresses the hope that the banks would be able to absorb the present staffs of the offices and that if the banks needed to keep or use the present premises for any substantial period of time they would assume the rent and other expenses.

That is the form of the letter in which the Prime Minister refers to the conditions under which assistance would be given as of February 11. Then on February 13 we find the following reply from the banks to Premier John Bracken, as follows:

The Hon. John Bracken,
Premier of the Province of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Man.

Sir:

We are asked to convey to you the following telegram which was received last night from Mr. S. H. Logan, through our Ottawa branch:

"First: Banks will not object to an additional week for convening of legislature for purposes mentioned in my telegram of 10th instant.

Second: As collateral security referred to represents deposits and was acquired therewith logically such security must be held until treasury bills are paid and any realizations therefrom in the meantime should be applied on treasury bills.

Third: The banks do not think it would be reasonable for the statute to remain unrepealed. The banks readily accept the declaration of the government that they will not reenter the savings deposit business but to leave the statute outstanding would allow any future government to act under its provisions as such future government would not be bound by the undertaking referred to and could state that the fact that the statute remained unrepealed was clear indications that the statute was to be a part of the policy of the province.

Fourth: Regret that banks with staffs already larger than conditions warrant cannot see their way clear to accept suggestions in this behalf. Banks will not need to continue occupancy of savings offices premises. Signed, S. H. Logan on behalf of banks represented in Winnipeg."

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,
R. E. English,
For Assistant General Manager.

Premier Bracken replied to this in a telegram February 13, 1932, as follows:

Copy of telegram from Premier Bracken to Mr. S. H. Logan, Toronto, for transmission in code.

"Paragraphs 1, 2 and 4 acceptable. If banks insist the government will agree to introduce legislation repealing act but cannot ensure it will be passed and will probably have to inform house it is being brought in at request of banks. Please reconsider this point and let us have your decision on it.

The reply of the banks to that telegram is as follows:

Winnipeg, Manitoba,
February 15, 1932.

The Hon. John Bracken,
Premier of Manitoba,
Parliament Buildings,
Winnipeg, Man.

Dear Sir:

I am asked to convey the under-noted message to you from Mr. S. H. Logan on behalf of the banks interested in Winnipeg. The message reads as follows:

"Referring your message of Saturday, have consulted banks who are agreeable to waiving the repeal feature provided legislature is convened within two weeks from to-morrow since over one week has gone by since these negotiations started. Please advise."

Yours faithfully,
J. W. Spears.

Premier Bracken replied in the following wire, dated February 15, 1932:

Copy of telegram from Premier Bracken to Mr. S. H. Logan for transmission in code:

"Wire received. Legislature called 29th. Writing officially to-morrow."

Now we come to the letter which the Prime Minister placed on the record on Tuesday last, which is the same letter that was placed before the special committee in Winnipeg, and which sets out the details of the arrangement finally entered into between the Manitoba government and the banks. I submit, however, that this letter is not the same as the one which the banks sent to the premier of Manitoba on February 11, and which the Prime Minister of this country advised was being sent. It eliminated the demand which the banks made for the repeal of the statute, and it also allowed the government one week's extra grace for the calling of the provincial legislature. That is all I wish to say in regard to the correspondence which has taken place between the Manitoba government and the banks, except to place on record the last paragraph of a letter dated February 18, 1932, from Mr. J. W. Spears, of the Bank of Montreal, to the Hon. John Bracken, premier of Manitoba. The first part of the letter merely sets out the details of the arrangements. The closing paragraph reads:

> You have referred in a number of conversations with me to the matter of the time of making a public announcement. This is being considered and I expect to hear from the eastern banks to-day or to-morrow. In the meantime our last advice to you was that no announcement should be issued until arrangements have been made by the chartered banks to take over the deposits in their own branches, and also that the banks would like to be consulted by you regarding the form of the announcement.
> Yours faithfully,
> J. W. Spears.

Two things are significant from the correspondence which I have read: first, the Prime Minister must have known of the demands which the banks were making on the province of Manitoba in assisting the savings office, and, second, the banks demanded of a provincial government that it call its session within fourteen days to repeal a statute which affected them. I ask the house who is the government of this country and whether or not they feel comfortable under a financial system whereby our banking institutions can dictate the policies of our governments.

The Prime Minister may feel that he was right in the course he followed, but in view of the circumstances surrounding the closing of this institution and the demands that were put up by the banks to the province of Manitoba, I think the public will say that he made a very grave mistake in the manner in which he handled the Manitoba savings office. More than that, the Prime Minister, in refusing to give assistance to the Manitoba savings office, was subscribing to the intrigue of his political friends in the province of Manitoba, who, it has been shown in evidence, were endeavouring for political purposes, to shake public confidence in this institution.

I contend that the Prime Minister could have given Mr. Bracken a letter similar to the one he gave to the banks, guaranteeing them against loss. That is all that would have been necessary. The run on the bank would have stopped and the institution would have been able to resume its regular routine business. May I point out that this was merely a letter of guarantee to the banks and not even an order in council.

When this government could pass an order in council to allow insurance companies to value securities as of June last; when it could guarantee the banks, on the Beauharnois project, "a private concern," to the extent of $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 and probably $14,000,000; when it could advance to Saskatchewan $6,500,000 for ordinary governmental expenditures; when it could guarantee the banks even in this case in taking over the provincial savings office, surely it cannot justify its attitude in permitting the chartered banks of this country to gobble up the province of Manitoba savings office. I am afraid that the Prime Minister will have to remain, in this connection, subject to abuse and the target of criticism which he feels is so unjust and unfair.

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) will pardon me if I do not join issue with him in regard to the subject which he has been discussing this afternoon. I came prepared to speak entirely on the Canadian National Railways. It would have been a great pleasure to have replied to the arguments presented by him in the house. After all, in respect to the savings bank of Manitoba, there are two outstanding facts: first, that the bank failed because of bad management on the part of the provincial government; second, that the Dominion government, by intervention, saved 42,000 depositors from, to say the least, a great deal of inconvenience and perhaps loss of money. Apart from that, I shall not say anything further. As hon. members are well aware, a provincial election in Manitoba is not very far distant when this issue will be fought out on the public platform of that province, and so far as we on this side are concerned, we shall be glad to join in any such issue as this.

May I join with other members of the house who have preceded me in extending felicitations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the very able manner in which he presented his budget and on the fact that during these difficult times he has been able to balance his budget?

With these few preliminary remarks I turn my attention to a discussion of what has again and again been stated to be one of the major problems facing Canada to-day. I could not understand the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) stating that the Canadian National railway system should be put into the hands of a receiver or sold to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Surely a proposition of that kind cannot be supported.

I was very pleased indeed to hear the explanation made yesterday by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) with respect to a speech which he had previously made in this house, and as to the meaning of which there may have been some doubt. He stated that he was not in favour of any merger of the Canadian National Railway with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I followed very carefully the remarks of the hon. gentleman, previously made; I had read in full the speech which he delivered to the Canadian Club in Toronto on the Canadian National Railway, and I must say that I rather gathered from those two addresses that the hon. member did have in mind that the Canadian Pacific Railway might perhaps consider purchasing the Canadian National Railway. The reason I say that is that in his address at Toronto the hon. member made the statement that a purchaser might be found. Now when one thinks of any organization or corporation taking over an institution of the size and importance of the Canadian National Railway most people in this country would conclude that there is only one corporation in Canada that would be capable of doing it. I must say, however, that I do not think the hon. member for Stanstead gave his usual consideration to the proposition which he advanced in the house yesterday afternoon. As I understood that proposition it was this, that in all probability we would have to wait for a year before the royal commission on transportation would bring down its report, and that in the meantime the two companies be requested to pool their operations, whereby the hon. member thought a saving of eighty million dollars in one year might be made. May I point out to the hon. member for Stanstead just what that would mean? Calculating on the same basis as last year when economies accounted for a saving of $26,000,000 in the operation of the Canadian National Railways, $14,000,000 of which was in wages, to effect economies amounting to $80,000,000 would mean that between thirty and forty thousand railway employees would have to be taken out of the service of the two railway companies immediately. That would be the result of following out the suggestion of the hon. member for Stanstead if the saving he suggests might be made were put into effect. I am sure that neither he nor any other member of this house would at this time suggest that thirty or forty thousand more railway employees be thrown out of employment without notice and without an opportunity to make preparation for the future.

In dealing with this question I purpose touching as briefly as possible on certain phases of the development of the Canadian National railway system, and of the problem as it exists to-day. All hon. members of the house are fully aware of the conditions under which the Canadian Northern, the Intercolonial, the National Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific were merged into one great corporation called the Canadian National railway system. I would draw attention to this fact, that at the time of that amalgamation, it was really a merging together of bankrupt concerns. The Grand Trunk Pacific was in the hands of the receiver, the National Transcontinental was still in the hands of the government; the Canadian Northern Railway had failed in its ability to carry on during the war period and had secured financial backing from the provinces and federal government; the Intercolonial had shown deficits year after year, and the Grand Trunk had been dragged down to the verge of bankruptcy by the contract which it had made for the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific. It must be borne in mind that during those years of the merger, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, we were paying out immense sums to meet the deficits of these railways, as follows: 1919, $55,000,000; 1920, $80,000,000; 1921, $70,000,000; 1922, $58,000,000. It must be borne in mind that at that time we had a medley of bankrupt concerns operating as separate and distinct entities, and operating at tremendous losses, with a great preponderance of main line mileage over branch line mileage, and with forty-one per cent of the roads out of the hands of the construction contractors only within the previous ten years. These railways were equipped as one might expect bankrupt concerns to be equipped. The first step for the new management of 1922-23 was to construct additional branch lines and to furnish the roads with proper equipment. To mention only a few of those items. Between 1923 and 1930 the following sums were spent; for branch lines, $65,000,000; permanent ways and structures, $106,000,000, of which $20,000,000 was spent in one item alone for creosoted ties; freight cars, $71,000,000; new passenger cars, $29,000,000; locomotives, $36,000,000; telegraph lines, $7,000,000. One could go on giving similar sums which were spent in that way. It must be remembered when we speak of the tremendous sums of money which were put into these railways that we knew what kind of a bargain we were making when we took them over. We knew that large sums of money would have to be spent to enable the railways to operate as an efficient and economical unit.

I will admit that expenditures have been made which should not have been made. I do not think that there is anything to justify from fifty to one hundred million dollars being spent on terminals in the city of Montreal. I do not think there is anything to justify the tremendous sums of money that have been spent on the hotel system or on the triangular service on the west coast. The management of the Canadian National Railway undoubtedly made the same mistakes that other great institutions made. What great corporation during the boom years of 1927 and 1928 did not spend immense sums of money that should not have been spent? Nevertheless it must be borne in mind that during this period there has been built up a tremendously efficient transportation machine showing a vast improvement in the efficiency of labour, in mechanical power, in rolling stock and in every other department of railroading. This advance might be summed up by stating that in 1928 there was 31.5 per cent more traffic handled than in 1920 with 220 fewer locomotives and 3,370 fewer cars. It can be truly said that the Canadian National Railways can handle freight and passenger service as economically and as efficiently as any railway organization in the world. During this same period there has grown up among the employees an esprit de corps unexcelled in any similar institution on the face of the globe.

Now, with respect to these expenditures, might I point out that they are behind us, and that we have a well-equipped road ready to handle traffic as economically as any railroad on the American continent.

It devolved upon this new management to coordinate these roads into one great efficient transportation machine and to take every possible means to make the system pay. Just how far the management have succeeded in the performance of this duty under the circumstances which subsequently arose is perhaps a matter of diverse opinion. In times of depression like the present one is apt to stress, to the exclusion of everything else, the monetary loss and the tremendous sums of money from time to time put into this great enterprise. May I take the liberty of reminding hon. members of some of the obstacles with which the management have been faced. First of all, with respect to motor vehicle competition. The first year there were any registrations of motor vehicles was in 1907 when the number was 2,130; in 1910, 8,967; in 1915, 89,944; in 1920, 407,064; in 1921, 513,821; in 1925, 728,005; and in 1930, 1,239,888—or in the last fifteen years between 1915 and 1930 an increase of 1,289 per cent. The first year that trucks were segregated in the registrations was in 1922, when 37,610 trucks were registered; in 1925, 74,489; in 1930, 165,464. In that same year the registrations of buses were 2,098.

Now, commensurate with this increase in the number of motor vehicles doing business in Canada, there has been an increase in highway mileage, until in 1930 we had 394,372·7 miles of highway, as compared with 42,075 miles of single line railway, 14,567 miles of second and third main track, industrial track, yard and sidings. I am quite free to admit that in the matter of short hauls at certain seasons of the year the motor truck certainly has an economic advantage over the railway. But may I point out that the competition as between the railways and the motor vehicles is most unfair, in that the railway companies are under the regulations of the Board of Railway Commissioners; their rates are fixed by the board; if they want to close a station they have to appeal to the board for approval; once passenger or freight service is established it cannot be changed without approval of the board, and so on all the way down the line. There is no similar or analogous regulation in respect to motor transportation, and rates can be changed overnight. So we have this situation to-day, that the motor truck is carrying the freight upon which the railways charge a high rate and leaving to the railways the bulky and heavy freight such as grain, lumber and similar products. If this competition continues it simply means the whole rate structure of Canada will have to be changed. In the event of change it must be borne in mind that our grain cannot carry any higher transportation charges, otherwise it may mean considerable damage to our export trade. Then, too, railway employees have to undergo a severe medical examination to show they are physically qualified to carry on their duties; no such analogous requirements are made of the drivers of motor trucks or buses. It must also be remembered that the railway companies as common carriers are liable for negligence, and as responsible parties they have to pay damages in the event of being held liable by our courts. Most of the operators of motor trucks and motor buses do not carry any insurance, and in many cases are owned by irresponsible parties, so that it is impossible to recover damages from them. And it must not be forgotten that the railway companies operate upon their private right of way, constructed at their own cost, while motor transportation service is carried on on the public highway by corporations and persons operating for private gain.

These differences must be adjusted in fairness both to the railways and to the motor vehicles. I am satisfied that when that adjusment does come it will mean increased revenues for the railway companies. Not only so, but if by some coordination of the services a considerable portion of the motor business could be merged with the railway operations it would give employment to many railway employees who to-day are unable to earn a livelihood because of lack of work brought about by the shrinkage in railway traffic. In an article appearing in the March issue of Commerce of the Nation, under the heading "They Enjoy but Don't pay," Mr. A. D. Ferguson, of the bureau of economics of the Canadian National Railways, estimates that the reduced annual revenue of the railway companies of Canada through motor competition is $41,000,000, made up of $17,000,000 in passenger transport and $24,000,000 in freight transport. That was one obstacle to the success of the Canadian National Railway system.

Then, too, may I call the attention of the house to something else. It is generally conceded that in order to operate successfully and at a profit a railway company must have a gradual increase in traffic year after year. As hon. members are well aware, that has not been the case in Canada, though between 1923 and 1928 the revenues of the company have substantially increased. The figures are as follows:

RAILWAY OPERATING RESULTS—CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS
1923-1931 (Inclusive)
(Including Eastern Lines Accounts, but Central Vermont for 1930 and 1931 only)

Calendar Year	Gross Operating Revenues	Gross Operating Expenses	Net Revenue from Railway Operations

Surely the fact that the population of this country has not increased as was anticipated, and that the business is not there to be done, cannot be blamed on the management.

Another obstacle to the profitable operation of this railway system has been the period of depression through which we are passing at the present time, but I do not know that this depression is without its blessings. With respect to the Canadian National system at least it has called to the attention of the country the seriousness of the problem with which we are faced, and I am sure hon. members of the house were gratified to learn that the estimate for capital requirements and deficit for the coming year has been fixed at some $71,000,000, or $41,000,000 less than the requirements for last year. I think the management are to be congratulated in setting up the finance committee and in making the economies which have been made. When the minister spoke on this subject he pointed out that economies last year amounted to some $13,000,000, and that for the coming year further economies would amount to an additional $15,000,000. In an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe shortly after the remarks of the minister on the tabling of the annual report of the company I find this paragraph:

> The Globe sincerely congratulates the Minister of Railways on the needed economies which he has brought about—or rather which he insists that the management has brought about—in the operation of the National system. That the past period of prosperity and reckless rivalry in competition induced unwise and unwarranted expenditure is beyond question. Doctor Manion has given the country good service in insisting upon a return to sanity in enterprise and outlay. Retrenchment and rigorous economy—easy to preach but difficult to practise—must necessarily dominate the administration of the system for some years to come. Yet, at the same time, equally in the interests of the people who own the railway, there must be constant care that rigorous economy does not become crippling economy.

One would gather from the remarks of some hon. members that there was a vast difference in the results of the management of our two great railway systems. Let me quote from an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 6, 1932:

> Canadian National railway operating revenues fell off in 1931 by $45,000,000. For the Canadian Pacific the corresponding figures are $40,000,000. Bearing in mind the difference of mileage and volume of business, the parallel is decidedly close. Operating costs were cut on the Canadian National $26,000,000, on the Canadian Pacific $27,000,000; freight reductions, Canadian National $31,087,127, Canadian Pacific $24,427,239; passenger reductions, Canadian National $8,439,816, Canadian Pacific $8,428,192. If there is any disparity in the earnings of the company in the final analysis, it pretty well resolves itself down into a question of density of traffic.

The only remedy for our railway is more trade, more business, more population. All that the people of Canada can reasonably ask of the Canadian National management is that they should protect the property at the lowest possible cost to the public against the time when there will be a revival of prosperity.

The mention of economies naturally brings up the matter of railway employees, and coming as I do from a railway centre I must confess that when I hear of these tremendous reductions I feel that groups of railway employees scattered all over the country are bearing the burden of these economies. To-day I received a letter from a man working in the shops at home. He has been employed there for some twenty-five or thirty years, and he tells me that the following reductions have been made in his salary in the last two years: First a day a week was taken off, which meant a reduction of $27 a month; then came the ten per cent reduction, amounting to $14 more and, within the last week or ten days he has been asked to take a further reduction of a day a week, which will amount to $27 more. This means that in the last two years his salary has been reduced by $68 a month. We should take these matters into consideration, and we should bear in mind that one of the invisible benefits to Canada from the operation of the Canadian National railway system is that last year there was paid in wages by the company the sum of $126,950,841, and that the average number of employees was some 91,416. Of every dollar spent by the railway company 63⅔ cents went for labour, while 9 cents went for fuel This $126,000,000 spent in Canada means a tremendous purchasing power and a tremendous consumption, so the welfare of our railway employees is of vital importance to every citizen of this country. These employees have taken salary and time reductions, and some are out of employment entirely. In my own town there are men who have been with the system for fifteen or twenty years, in which time they have acquired seniority rights, nevertheless to-day they are unable to hold a job at all. They may work for two or three months in the course of a year. There is no more loyal body of employees to be found in any institution or corporation in the world than is to be found working for the Canadian National Railways to-day, and it does seem to me that considering their importance to Canada and the purchasing power they represent, together with the fact that with their dependents they number about 400,000 people, they should have greater representation on the board of directors of the company as well as on any other board which has to do with hours of work, rates of pay and other related matters.

It must also be borne in mind that during these years of efficiency in operation and economy in handling passenger and freight traffic, during this speeding-up process, the number of injuries to employees has increased to a remarkable extent. In 1915, the number of railway employees injured was 2,573; in 1920 it had increased to 7,719; in 1925 it was 8,256, and in 1929, 12,483. This is all the more reason why someone who is thoroughly familiar with the risks involved in the work should be on the boards which regulate the terms and hours of service.

There is another invisible benefit to Canada from the operation of the Canadian National railway system. I refer to the benefit that has resulted from colonization and settlement. I often think that this benefit is entirely overlooked. When the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) talks about handing the railway system over to a receiver, which I presume means the dissolution of the whole system, he should surely bear in mind that we owe something to the maritime provinces in respect to the operation of the Intercolonial railway, and something to the remote districts that have been opened up and colonized through the operation of the Canadian National railway system. It should be remembered also that a vast amount of new wealth is being produced annually as a result of the settlement of those areas through the Canadian National Railways. In 1928, the Canadian National Railways handled, in grain products, 301,741 cars; live stock, 61,847; coal, 92,496; lumber, 112,459; pulpwood, 99,458; pulp and paper, 61,654; other forest products, 83,827. Most of these products have come from territory contiguous to the Canadian National railway system, and would not have been produced at all had not the system opened up and given means of transportation to and from these various districts.

Mr. SANDERSON: I take it from the remarks of the hon. gentleman that he entirely disagrees with the observations of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) and those of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. BOWMAN: I have already covered that.

Mr. SANDERSON: My hon. friend has skirted around the subject. Does he disagree with the remarks of those hon. gentlemen?

Mr. BOWMAN: Surely the hon. member heard me. I have made it quite clear that I disagree with every word said by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. SANDERSON: And the hon. member for Stanstead?

Mr. BOWMAN: And I have explained how far I disagree or agree with the hon. member for Stanstead. If there is one thing that can be said to clinch the argument for the continuance intact of the Canadian National Railways, it is the opinion expressed by certain members of this house and, recently, by Sir Henry Thornton before a committee of this house. At page 1644 of the 1932 Hansard, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) stated that had freight rates in Canada been the same as in the United States, $15,000,000 to $26,000,000 more would have been earned by the railway company. And the hon. member for North Waterloo, at page 3987 of Hansard of 1931, said that if the freight rates in Canada were as high as in the United States, the Canadian National Railways would not be registering deficits but would be showing profits. Sir Henry Thornton, speaking before a committee of this house recently, declared that Canadian rates were the lowest in the world and that, had the Canadian railways enjoyed the same rate scale as the United States roads since 1923, the Canadian National Railways would not only have been able to pay interest on all funded debt owed to the public, but would have had $20,000,000 over. Surely if there is anything to be said with regard to freight rates, so far as Canada and the United States are concerned, if population and density of traffic indicates anything, if climate and terrain count, the facts are all in favour of a higher freight rate in Canada than in the United States.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the hon. member permit another question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BOWMAN: No; the hon. member knows I have only one minute left.

Mr. SANDERSON: The hon. gentleman surely will allow me to ask this question. Is he in favour—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is he in favour of the amalgamation of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. BOWMAN: Absolutely no; not under any circumstances.

Mr. SANDERSON: Thanks.

Mr. BOWMAN: I think it would be the greatest calamity that ever befell Canada; it would be a government of railways and not government by this house.

Mr. SANDERSON: Thanks for answering the question.

Mr. BOWMAN: May I conclude with this statement. Bearing in mind:

(1) That the cost of rebuilding and equipping this great railway system is behind us and that in it we now have a railway capable of handling passenger and freight traffic as efficiently and economically as any of the great railways of the world;

(2) That this system is operated by men highly capable of performing their respective tasks and duties and who are loyal to the system to the last degree;

(3) That the problem of motor transportation competition must of necessity be soon adjusted to the benefit of both the railways and the various means of motor transport;

(4) That vast benefits continue to accrue to Canada through the products of new wealth from the farm, the forest, the mines and the great inland waters served by this railway system;

(5) That tremendous sums of money are yearly saved to this dominion by the comparatively low freight rates at which our freight is carried;

(6) That we are now surely at the bottom of this period of depression and that better times are ahead—bearing these considerations in mind, I venture to say that the outlook is not so dark as it appears at the present and that the Canadian National railway system will not only weather this storm but, with a return to prosperity, we shall yet have in this great publicly-owned enterprise a transportation system which will pay its way and also return a portion at least of the vast sums of money we have invested in it.

Mr. OSCAR BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I would not be taking part in this debate, had I not been invited to do so, a few days ago, by the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé). I regret that he is not in his seat. He is probably busy dismissing the last Liberal postmaster left in this country. However, previous to commenting on his speech, I wish to congratulate my hon. friend and neighbour, the member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), who also is not in his seat, on the splendid speech he delivered this afternoon. I should have liked to congratulate him on the progress he has made, for this last speech is quite an improvement over the one he delivered at the outset of the session. I therefore extend to him my congratulations on his progress, and my best wishes that he may realize some day the goal of his ambitions. I would have been pleased to tell him that I entirely agree with the ideas he expressed a short while ago, as I also agree with those expressed in the house, a few days ago, by our friend the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). The time has come for rural members of eastern Canada, representing the farmers of Quebec and Ontario, to agree in setting forth their claims in order to improve the lot of the farmers whom they represent in this house.

I wonder, sir, whether the Quebec farmers of whom I am one of the humble representatives, may not be disappointed at the statement made in the house, the other day, by the hon. Postmaster General. During the 1930 election, our hon. friend posed as champion and guardian of his race and pledged himself, if elected, to be the mouthpiece of the farming class.

We therefore would have been pleased to hear him discuss the questions which interest specially the Canadian eastern farmers, and particularly those of the province of Quebec. We would have liked, for instance, to hear him speak on the policy the government intends to adopt with a view of opening up new markets to farm products; we would have been happy to hear him broach the subject of rural loans and state whether the government has the intention of lowering the rate of interest on these loans to farmers; and whether the government is to expedite and simplify the work of the commission on farm loans; we would have been delighted to listen to him discuss the subject of the tuberculine test and immunization of the dairy cattle; we would gladly have listened to him discourse on the return to the land movement and the policy which the government may have as regards giving a tillage and land clearing bonus; we would have been pleased to hear the Postmaster General discuss the agricultural policy and the measures which the government has the intention of bringing down to improve the lot of this very industrious and important class in the social life of our country.

Instead of discussing these questions, the hon. Postmaster General devoted the greater part of his speech to making excuses and apologizing for the government's fiasco.

The hon. Postmaster General had inured us to a more aggressive policy. During many years he was leader of the opposition in the Quebec legislature. I must admit that he performed this task in a creditable way. He was then somewhat looked upon as the representative and the mouthpiece of the Quebec farmers; at least he delighted to pass himself off as a country folk, as a farmer entirely devoted to the interest of the agricultural class. Judging by the speech he delivered the other night, and from which I shall quote a few extracts, I must say that he simply confined himself to offer excuses for the failure of the agricultural policy of the government. We would have been pleased to find out from the hon. Postmaster General whether the government has even an agricultural policy and whether it intends to really do something for the farmers. In reading over the hon. Postmaster General's speech, I discover, at page 2177 of Hansard, the following words:

> The government cannot be held responsible for the present world wide crises.

A little further, in the same column, the hon. Postmaster General adds:

> If prices of certain products are too low, the government cannot be blamed, but the fault is with the crisis prevailing all over Canada.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): A guilty conscience needs no accuser.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Further on, in the same column he states:

> Where is the country, which suffers less now from the crisis than we do?

On the following page we find:

> If the result is not as great as could be expected, it is, I repeat it, due to causes of which the government is not responsible.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): We have no responsible government!

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): At page 2179 of Hansard, the Postmaster General again apologizes for the government's inaction, in the following words:

> There are many things which could be done under ordinary conditions, but we are up against hard times.

I want, sir, to contrast these few quotations taken from the speech delivered in the house, the other day, by the Postmaster General, with certain more emphatic statements which he made during the election of 1930.

We find one of these statements in an excellent newspaper, La Patrie, of Montreal, which is very sympathetic to the Conservative government and to the party—

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Not at that time.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): —and which has the reputation of being a well informed newspaper. According to this newspaper of July 4, 1930, the following is what he states:

> Will war be declared because I am elected as your member?

May I here make a digression. The hon. Postmaster General and the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau)—neither of them is in his seat—charge us with having roused the passions and discussed conscription. If any one, during the 1930 election, discussed conscription and Canada's participation in the war, it is certainly these two hon. gentlemen.

In the same newspaper we find the following account of a meeting held at Laval des Rapides:

Mr. Sauvé discusses the attitude taken by Mr. Lacombe in the house—

—the latter was his opponent—

—on various questions interesting especially, the farmers of his county and contrasts the indifference of the one who had just held the mandate with his own solicitude for the Quebec farmers.

In "La Patrie" of July 9, 1930, I find the following under the heading:

Mr. A. Sauvé addresses a meeting at l'Abord à Plouffe.

Mr. Sauvé explains that he accepted the nomination at the request of a great number of electors, both Liberal and Conservative.

The following are the exact words used by the hon. Postmaster General—his favourite figure of speech is apostrophe—

Farmers of Laval-Two-Mountains, did the policy which my opponent advocated in parliament bring prosperity and happiness in your homes? And you workmen who suffer from unemployment and whose wages are not in keeping with the cost of living, are you satisfied?

May I invite, sir, the hon. Postmaster General to repeat now these criticisms before the farmers and workmen of the county of Laval-Two Mountains. I would advise him to ask these farmers who sell their butter at 16½ cents per pound delivered in Montreal, according to the market price ending April 16, 1932, whether they are satisfied. I would suggest to him to inquire from the civil servants whose salaries have just been cut, and especially those who have been dismissed, whether they are satisfied.

I always recall a large meeting at which the hon. Postmaster General stated:

I have not been always successful, however, I have always stood by my guns because I am much attached to the people of my province; when it was a matter of championing the interests of the farmer, I was always present in the house.

Further on the newspaper says:

Then the speaker criticizes Mr. Lacombe for his attitude on farm loan, the rate of interest of which is too high considering the returns of the land.

I should have liked, the other night, to have heard the hon. Postmaster General request a reduction in the rate of interest on farm loans.

Further on he states:

I shall go to Ottawa and I shall have sufficient courage to champion your cause under all circumstances. Are you, farmers, going to further submit to the competition of New Zealand butter, which is ruining you? And you, workmen are not your interests linked with those of farming, our main industry in Canada, because when agriculture suffers all are affected. After July 28, you will find in me both an energetic and fearless champion. . . . I do not intend at the age of 55 to play the part of valet. If to-morrow . . .

Note well, sir.

—If to-morrow Mr. Bennett introduces a measure contrary to the interests of my race and my country, I will vote against it.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Did he introduce a single one?

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Mr. William Tremblay, former member for Maisonneuve in the Quebec Legislature, was present at that meeting and, amplifying the remarks made by the hon. Postmaster General, he expressed himself as follows, according to the same newspaper:

Speaking on the lack of markets for wheat Mr. Tremblay stated that the government had failed in its duty because it had not come to the rescue. He spoke of the distress which resulted from such inaction. The whole of our economic life has thus been paralyzed, unemployment has gained ground and our purchasing power decreased.

On July 10, 1930, under the heading "A meeting held by Mr. Arthur Sauvé at Oka" "La Patrie" reports the following words of Mr. Sauvé:

Do you want as your member a man capable of rendering justice to both parties, Liberals as well as Conservatives? Do you want a man who remains pinned to his seat or a fearless man, capable of respectfully expressing his opinion and make known the requirements of his country and province?

May I point out to you, sir, that if there is a silent member of the cabinet, in the house, a minister pinned, bolted and padlocked to his seat, it is certainly the Postmaster General. He is not lavish with his words, he does not spoil us, he is rather—stingy in this respect, for, if my memory serves me right, the Postmaster General delivers but one speech each session.

On July 11, 1930, under the heading "I shall be an independent member free to protest when necessary" I find the following words in "La Patrie":

Farmers who bewail your lot, you whose children are disheartened and filled with anxiety, if you are content with such conditions, vote for Mr. Lacombe. But if you want protection, if is your duty to vote for me. The tariff policy of Mr. King is to blame for the conditions you complain of. The government pretended to change the tariff. But its policy is a deceitful one, to such an extent that the ministers avoid to discuss the results which the budget may have.

The last words could be applied to the hon. Postmaster General himself. When he spoke, the other evening, he was careful not to comment on the present budget he fought shy of the government's agriculture policy, which, in truth, does not exist. Continuing the Postmaster General stated:

If Mr. King is returned to power, I shall sit in the opposition free—as I claim in submitting my nomination—to support sound measures, regardless of party affiliation, such as duty will point out. I shall not be a member bolted to his seat. . . .

He insists on that expression.

. . . but I shall consider myself free to speak my mind when it pleases me and never seeking a reward. If I were aware that such a sacrifice would be expected from me, I would give up political life.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): A senatorship.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I find in "La Patrie's" issue of July 14, 1930, under the heading "Mr. Sauvé answers Mr. Rinfret" at St. Placide, the following account of the hon. Postmaster General's speech:

Commenting on the crisis existing in this country, the speaker (Mr. Sauvé), stated that the government must bear the responsibility of its policy. Answering Mr. Pouliot, the member for Témiscouata, who stated, a few days ago, that the low prices prevailing on butter were due to speculation, Mr. Sauvé inquires why the government does not remedy such a situation and protect the farmers.

At St. Augustin, according to "La Patrie" in its issue of July 18, 1930, Mr. Sauvé refers to rural questions in the following terms:

Mr. Sauvé endorses the policy of a full indemnity for full bred or crossed cattle slaughtered by government officials pursuant to their tuberculine test policy. However, he prefers that, previous to having recourse to such means, immunization should be resorted to, in other words that cattle be treated instead of slaughtered immediately.

We should have been delighted to hear the hon. Postmaster General, who posed as the champion and guardian of the interests of farmers, in the 1930 election, discuss, in the house, the tuberculine test and immunization question of cattle, however he took great care not to do so. At the St. Eustache meeting, on July 20, 1930, our hon. friend broached the subject of Canada's participation in the Empire's wars, and pledged himself not to be the accomplice or the enemy of his race, neither at Ottawa nor anywhere else. The report of this speech fills two or three columns; I shall not take up the time of the house to read it, but I shall add that after these pacifist statements of our hon. friend the platform collapsed. That topped the climax.

I closely followed, the other evening the speech of the hon. Postmaster General and I wondered what excuses the government could invoke for its negligence towards the Quebec farmers; I wondered what reasons they could give for the indifference they show towards the interests of the farming classes in Canada, had they not the Quebec government and Mr. Taschereau to fall back upon. Our hon. friend the Postmaster General, with his inoffensive and kind look is a cunning gentleman, he knows how to change the subject in order to avoid an embarrassing question or to turn a difficulty; he thus endeavours to change the discussion to the Prime Minister of Quebec and the latter's government.

I closely followed the excuses he made so as to avoid making a frank and clear statement with reference to a bonus on butter and farm products exports. To my mind, the excuse made by the hon. Postmaster General is quite a childish one. If it is a sound measure, it is so independently of the views of the Hon. Mr. Taschereau or his Minister of Agriculture. However, I listened to the hon. Postmaster General state, the other evening, with much candour: "If we do not grant an export bonus on butter and other farm products, it is because Quebec has not requested it, it is because the Quebec Prime Minister and his Minister of Agriculture opposed this measure."

First, this statement must be substantiated. However, were it true, since when does this government await, in order to act, that the Quebec government communicate its policy; since when does this government await, in order to introduce a measure, that the Quebec government requests it or any other provincial government? If this bonus is in the interest of farmers, not only of Quebec but of the whole of Canada, this government should itself take the lead in introducing such legislation without waiting for a request from outside. It is, moreover, the first time that I hear a member of the Dominion government state that their policy on a question which interests Canada depends upon the wishes or views of a provincial government.

The hon. member also referred to his statement during the 1931 provincial election with reference to the bonus on butter exports. He contends that he simply stated that the Dominion government would readily consider the question should the Quebec government make such a request. Well, sir, let me inform the Postmaster General that what is needed at present, what the eastern farmers and those I represent request are not tedious speeches but action. Moreover, the minister was more emphatic in 1931, in the course of his campaign than he was, in the house, the other evening. As evidence, I shall quote a statement he made at a meeting held at St. Eustache, as reported by "La Patrie," in its issue of August 10, 1931, under the heading "Mr. Jean-Paul Sauvé promises an inquiry in connection with the Beauharnois Water Power Company."

Hon. Mr. Sauvé: When the famous butter question came up, the Bennett Government decided to put an end to this avalanche of New Zealand butter. If the low prices on butter still prevail to-day the Liberal government is to blame. The moment our government assumed power, it cancelled the New Zealand treaty. We promised a bonus on butter, we shall keep our word. The Liberals contend that this measure is absurd. If the Conservatives win the election in Quebec, you may rest assured that you will have it. I am aware that Mr. Bennett favours such a policy as does Mr. Camillien Houde.

I suppose that there were at the meeting sceptical people who, having heard, in 1930, the pledges of the Postmaster General, had their doubts about the new promises, which were now made in 1931 by the hon. Postmaster General, so turning towards these sceptics, he said:

Remember that it was a Conservative government which, the first, granted a bonus on all Canada's exports.

Mr. RHODES: Will the hon. gentleman be able to finish before six o'clock?

Mr. BOULANGER: I am afraid not. I have a few more observations to make.

Mr. RHODES: Then in view of the fact that we are not proceeding with the budget debate this evening, would the hon. gentleman move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. BOULANGER: I shall be very glad to do so.

On motion of Mr. Boulanger the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

41761—141½

Civil Service Commission—salaries, $204,930; contingencies, $67,000.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): For the purpose of securing this vote I represent the Civil Service Commission in this house. In view of the fact that the Civil Service Commission and the administration of the Civil Service Act are being investigated by a special committee, and as the house will have full opportunity when that report comes in to discuss civil service matters, I should like, if possible, to have this vote passed without very much discussion. While the matter is under consideration before a special committee I do not think it would be expedient for me, representing the Civil Service Commission, to enter into a discussion of its operations.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not wish to delay the estimate at all except to say that I think the minister should have deferred consideration of this item dealing with the Civil Service Commission; for it is not proper that we should discuss a matter that is now under investigation by a committee of this house.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member would not deny them their salaries?

Mr. VENIOT: Would that be denying them their salaries?

Mr. RHODES: No, because one-sixth has already been voted.

Mr. VENIOT: If it would, I would not delay the passage of the item, but under the circumstances I think the item should stand.

Mr. CAHAN: If that is the view of the committee, I shall follow the suggestion of my hon. friend from Gloucester. But it is clear that on the report of that special committee there will be ample opportunity to discuss every phase of it. I should like to have the vote passed, but if objection is made—

Mr. VENIOT: I did not put it in the form of a serious objection. If the hon. Secretary of State will assure us that we shall have ample opportunity to discuss all phases of the question when the report is before us—

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Shall the item carry on that understanding?

Mr. COOTE: At this end of the chamber, Mr. Chairman, it was impossible to hear what the understanding was.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The understanding was that if this item carries there will be full opportunity when the report of the special committee is before the house to discuss any matter that might properly be discussed under this item.

Mr. VENIOT: And all phases of the question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): And all phases of the question.

Item agreed to.

Public Archives—salaries, $90,630; contingencies, $13,500.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a very substantial reduction. Is the staff in the archives being cut?

Mr. CAHAN: The late Doctor Adam Shortt, who held an important position in the archives in a consulting capacity, and who received a very considerable salary, was removed by death during the year, and we have not as yet filled the position. In addition, Mr. Smith, who was the assistant deputy archivist, has also died, and we are not at present filling his position. There have been a number of minor changes. There are two clerks, grade 2, whose positions we are not filling for the present; also the position of secretary to the executive in the archives, and a departmental librarian. These have all been removed by death or by reaching the age for retirement. I thought in view of the existing conditions and the ability of the present staff to carry on, it was expedient not to fill these positions for the present, and that has led to a considerable reduction in the appropriation.

Mr. BROWN: I presume that the minister appreciates as we all do the importance of the work of the public archives. It would be very undesirable that it should be neglected in any way, as it is one of the most necessary works to be carried on under the government.

Mr. CAHAN: So far as the work of the Archives branch is concerned it will be carried on with full efficiency, but the publications which we have been putting out from time to time may be delayed for a year.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask if anyone is carrying out the special work upon which Doctor Shortt was supposed to be engaged for the last few years?

Mr. CAHAN: For the last few years Doctor Shortt was engaged in compiling an index to certain important documents which had been acquired in England for the archives. That work was pretty well completed. As a matter of fact, a year ago I would have retired Dr. Shortt except that for a considerable number of years he had been a very efficient employee of the government and had rendered great service to Canada, and I thought that under those circumstances I should keep him on until he asked to be retired. Less than a week before he died I had a conversation with him, and he told me that he would like to remain on for another year, although he had reached the age limit. I was very sympathetic to his request, and had an order in council passed extending his time for a year beyond the age limit; but he passed away very suddenly.

Mr. BROWN: What is the age limit?

Mr. CAHAN: Seventy.

Mr. BROWN: Would it not be desirable to pursue the same policy with regard to the other officials of the archives?—because there are very few men who have been trained to do that kind of work.

Mr. CAHAN: Those connected with the archives who have reached the age limit, so far as possible I have kept in their present positions. The Dominion Archivist, Doctor Doughty, has given long service, and since I have been administering this department I have secured two extensions of time for him because he is known to be very efficient indeed. The time will come, of course, when new appointments must be made. My own personal opinion is that we can eventually secure the services of some one, possibly not as efficient as Doctor Doughty, to deal with the matter of maintaining the archives. Really what the department will require is an efficient financial administrator, who should have about him men with technical and expert experience in the matter of archives.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are, I believe, a large number of university men doing research work in the archives. Will the cutting down of the library staff make it more difficult for them to carry on their work?

Mr. CAHAN: Not in the slightest degree. Each one who comes from a university to make investigation at the archives is given a separate desk, and there are all the clerical conveniences necessary for assistance in the work. That is not diminished in any way.

Item agreed to.

Secretary of State—salaries, $316,818; contingencies, $68,280.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is there any particular item in the minister's department on which we may discuss war reparation claims?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes. I am bringing down a supplementary estimate, as is customary each year, for payment of reparation claims, and that will afford full opportunity for discussion of the subject. It is on that item that discussion has taken place in previous years.

Mr. COOTE: Is any action contemplated by the minister's department to maintain better control over the issuing of charters to corporations to see that the capitalization of the companies bears some relation to the real assets behind them?

Mr. CAHAN: Since I have been administering the department, close supervision has been exercised over the granting of charters, and I have not received or heard any complaints since I undertook its administration. Every charter is carefully examined, and large powers which were previously given to companies are no longer granted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Can the minister give any indication as to when the supplementary estimates will be down with regard to reparations?

Mr. CAHAN: I would suggest that the Minister of Finance answer that question. I have put in my estimates to him, and I think just as soon as we complete certain business now before the house they will be brought down.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In his statement the minister led the committee to infer that the charters now issued were subject to some restrictions in comparison with the old charter forms. What is there in the new charter forms that was not in the old type granted by the department?

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman is misconstruing my remarks. I said we have made strict personal supervision of all applications for charters, and have dealt with them on their merits. Our object has been to restrict the charters granted on these applications to those powers which are really essential for carrying on the business contemplated by the applicants.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, the minister distinctly said in his first statement that the powers granted now were not as wide as those formerly granted. I am anxious to find out what powers have been withheld.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman would put his question in a different form I could answer it; I cannot answer that general question. All I say is that every application for a charter is examined and investigated very strictly, and if the applicants seek powers beyond what we deem necessary for the purpose of carrying on the business contemplated, we restrict the powers granted very much indeed as compared with the practice in former years. That is a matter of personal supervision and investigation dealing with each individual application as it comes in.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am anxious to find out what difference there is to-day in the granting of these charters. The minister distinctly said that the charters granted to-day do not have as wide powers as was the case formerly. What did he mean by the "large powers" formerly granted that are not granted to-day?

Mr. CAHAN: I thought I had explained it three times. If the hon. gentleman is accustomed to dealing with powers granted to companies I think he will easily perceive what is meant. In order to answer his question I would have to take each application that has been before me since August, 1930, deal with that application on its merits, and show what powers were applied for and what granted.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not at all; just give us one illustration.

Mr. CAYLEY: I see in some cases there has been an increase. How is the total decrease of $53,000 odd arrived at?

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman will look at page 96 of the estimates giving the details, he will see that formerly we had one head clerk receiving a salary of $3,000 and one departmental librarian receiving a salary of $2,800; we have not filled those vacancies. Then at the foot of the page he will find the messenger service has been reduced, and that an allowance formerly given to the private secretary has been discontinued. The savings are represented by small amounts of that nature. We have refrained from filling vacancies which have occurred in order that we might keep down the gross amount of the appropriation. I have done what one would do in his own business.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For years past there has been—shall I say?—a tendency to make it rather difficult for aliens to become naturalized. During the depression a great many newcomers to this country have found themselves discriminated against; they are often the first to be turned off work, and in some instances pressure has been put upon the immigration department by municipalities to have them deported. I should like to have the Secretary of State make a statement with regard to the policy of his department in affording opportunities for these immigrants to obtain their naturalization papers.

Mr. CAHAN: In 1930, the first year I was in office, there were 10,906 certificates actually issued; in 1931 there were 14,790 certificates issued; so the statistics would indicate that we have not put the restrictions upon the number of certificates issued which many people in this country think we should place. As a matter of fact applications for naturalization are made to the county court of the district in which the applicant resides. If the court refuses to recommend the granting of the certificates, under the law there is no option allowed the Secretary of State to issue the certificates. In some cases, in which I have thought the full evidence was not heard or that due weight had not been given the evidence given before the county court judge, I have asked the under-secretary of state to refer the case back for rehearing in order that injustice might not be done. Apart from that, since I have been in office, after receiving the report of the county court judge we have made independent inquiry through officials, as far as we could, in order that we might test the character and standing of the applicant in his community. So many applications have been made that I have been told—though I have no accurate information—that in some instances the county court judge has heard forty or fifty applications in an hour, which would mean that it would be almost impossible in that time for him to make due inquiry. Where mistakes have arisen we have endeavoured to investigate very sympathetically, yet very carefully, in the hope of providing that injustice should not be done. I cannot say very much more in answer to the question of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was just going to ask a question along the same line, though perhaps from a different angle. During last summer, and especially in the months of July, August and September, I noticed that the number of certificates issued ran from 2,000 to 4,000 per month. I was going to ask the minister if in his opinion these increased numbers were due in part to the hard times through which we were passing and to the possibility that in regard to employment or to the obtaining of relief those naturalized citizens had a preference, and that consequently there was a greater rush than usual on the part of people who desired to become naturalized. I wonder if the minister could say whether that was one of the reasons for the increase during those months.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. CAHAN: It is quite possible that this may have been one of the reasons, but to us in the department it seemed that one of the chief reasons for the increase was the adoption of the old age pension act by so many of the provinces. In the west, from which my hon. friend comes, it appears from the applications that settlers who have been in that country for ten, fifteen or twenty years without applying for naturalization, have been told on application for a pension that a pension could not be granted except through the production of a naturalization certificate. I think that has been one great incentive, especially in the provinces of the middle west.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There is one other question I should like to ask the minister, in connection with the explanation he gave with regard to the somewhat restricted powers granted companies applying for charters. I gathered the impression—and I wanted to make sure that my understanding was correct—that a company applying for a charter for the erection of a smelter, a saw mill, or something of the kind, would be held strictly to that undertaking. In the old days the powers granted were so wide in their terms that under such a charter the company might not only erect a saw mill or smelter but might build a railway, establish a line of steamships, obtain various concessions, in fact carry on almost any activity which might be desired. I understand that at present the minister is taking care that the powers granted are restricted to the one object in the mind of the company. Is that so?

Mr. CAHAN: As nearly as possible. In reply to the other question I would direct the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that during the last two years throughout Canada an effort has been made to induce aliens resident in this country to apply for certificates of naturalization. I have noticed newspaper reports to the effect that hundreds of sermons have been delivered by clergymen, especially those of the United Church of Canada, advising their parishioners, who are aliens, to apply for these certificates. In the east there are certain associations, such as the Kiwanis clubs and others, who have been carrying on a great deal of propaganda along that line from day to day, and I am sure those educational efforts have induced a great many to apply for naturalization who had been negligent in not doing so previously.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I did not quite make myself clear. The second question I asked had no relation to naturalization certificates; I asked if my understanding of the minister's statement with regard to the narrowing down of the powers granted to companies was correct.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought I answered that. We try to keep them limited to the objects they really have in view.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to know whether any steps are taken to see that the capitalization allowed these companies will not permit them to issue a large amount of watered stock. I have in mind some very unfortunate cases in Canada, of companies incorporated under dominion charters which issued a great amount of watered stock that in some cases was held by our life insurance companies, and which proved to be almost worthless. I should like to know if the minister can assure the house that action is being taken by his department at this time to see that the capitalization of many of these companies applying for charters is not such as to permit them to issue watered stock.

Mr. CAHAN: I can only say that we do examine these applications strictly, and we endeavour to keep the capitalization within reasonable limits. But after many years of experience in the organization of companies, from the legal point of view I must tell the hon. gentleman that as yet I have never seen a restriction on stock issues that I could not find a very effective and legal way through or around. Mere statutory enactments are very inefficient in that respect.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister, speaking from his experience, said that it was impossible to restrain companies from issuing watered stock. Does he mean that the department of the Secretary of State is impotent to control such matters?

Mr. CAHAN: The Department of State carries out the law by careful investigation and supervision. Outside of that the department has really no authority; it does not make the law. My suggestion to the hon. gentleman was that what is necessary is to see that no large powers are given in that respect under the law. Nevertheless, those who are astute in such matters can circumvent the law very readily.

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the further answer the minister has given, to the effect that so far as the present law is concerned it does not give his department power to control the capitalization of these companies, has the minister given any consideration to the possibility of amending the Companies Act so that that power shall be in the hands of the Secretary of State, to see to it that no watered stock shall be issued as has been done in the past? Is that contemplated?

Mr. CAHAN: If you will allow me to make an egotistical answer, were I to continue for the next half century as Secretary of State, I might do that while I could administer the act; but I do not think I could frame an act which would govern the conduct of my successor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GARDINER: I hope hon. gentlemen will not try to rush this matter without giving it proper consideration. If that is what they intend to do, we can retaliate, although we do not wish to do that. Would it be possible for the minister to devise ways and means at least to curb the situation to some extent? The minister must be aware of what has happened in the last few years, and more particularly during the prosperous period. Many companies split their stock, no new capital being put in, and the people have to pay such commodity prices as will return dividends on that watered stock. Surely the minister is not so impotent in this respect that he cannot propose ways and means of curbing the situation.

Mr. CAHAN: I know of no way of curbing the gullibility of the small Canadian investor. If he will carefully examine the stock offerings made to him, I am sure he can put an end to that riotous dealing in stocks to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But surely the minister does not intend to say that it cannot be stopped. Reputable firms in the past have gone out and sold watered stocks and ruined the purchasers of such stocks, and are we to sit by and say that we are utterly impotent to put an end to that sort of thing?

Mr. CAHAN: The very fact that so many are sent to gaol and to penitentiary for long terms shows that the law is being enforced at the present time. The enforcement of the law with respect to civil obligations is not, however, a matter for my department or for the government of Canada; it is a matter which is imposed by provincial law and within provincial jurisdiction. All I can do is to supervise carefully each charter granted in order to see that, so far as human foresight can foresee, these powers are limited so that they cannot be used for fraudulent or illegal purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. But my hon. friend will readily understand that notwithstanding anything the provinces may do by setting up boards or commissions to investigate companies and to investigate the issuing of stock and its sale in the provinces, along comes a dominion charter covering all the provinces and providing no control at all. And these are the charters that are exploited all over Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend's opinion is not in accordance with the view of the privy council, which says that dominion companies in the respect he mentions are controlled by the provincial authority and are under provincial jurisdiction. My hon. friend should carefully consider it. If he does, I think he will find that the charters which are now being granted are granted under, I do not like to say more careful supervision—I am not making any reflection on my predecessor—but under the supervision of one who has had, as I have had, an experience of thirty or forty years with company law. That experience enables me to assist the officials of the department in imposing restrictions which are beneficial and advantageous to the public. For instance, we found that dominion companies which had acquired surpluses were selling out and then organizing again under practically the same names to carry on the same business, after having denuded the treasuries of such companies of a large part of their liquid assets. That sort of thing is not carried on now because that sort of company cannot secure a charter from the department under present conditions. I have no control over provincial jurisdictions. Not long ago a member of this house brought to my attention a certain company which had reorganized, and said that they had issued a lot of stock, watered and all that sort of thing, and blamed me for not exercising proper supervision. What I found was that the applicants for that charter had come to our department and, having failed to secure the wide powers which they had applied for, they simply went to a provincial secretary and secured from that provincial secretary's office all the wide powers which we had refused.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know why these gentlemen to the right are so anxious to rush this thing through. In the meantime some of us want to learn more about it. First of all, I should like to know this. After a charter is granted, what reports are made by the company to the department? Secondly, what supervision has the department over such companies?

Mr. CAHAN: Every company makes an annual return of its affairs to the department, and that is examined in the department and kept on file for inspection by the public. Outside of that, with regard to their operations, we have no supervision and control beyond seeing that the law is complied with in the respects I have mentioned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to say a word in support of the position taken by the hon. member for Acadia. Everyone, I think, must realize that there has been a great deal of fleecing of the public not merely by speculation in stocks, about which we have heard, but by the process known as the watering of stock, and I do not think things should be left in the hands of the minister in this regard. It seems to me there ought to be legislation. We may have competent ministers and less competent ministers, conscientious ministers and less conscientious ministers; but we ought not to depend upon the individual. Surely there should be some sort of legislation which would protect the public. The minister has said that you cannot protect people who are gullible. That is not quite fair to the public. The fact is that company operations and manipulations have become so complicated to-day that the ordinary man cannot begin to follow them. And there are a great many legal gentlemen in this chamber who perhaps do not follow them very closely, because when a particular matter comes under scrutiny—as for example, Beauharnois—we have endless controversy as to just where each party stands and what is the real situation. Under these circumstances it seems to me that there should be some sort of law which would protect the public.

May I give a simple illustration? If a milkman coming into town stops at a pump and fills his cans half full with water, he is liable to prosecution. We say he is selling watered milk, an inferior article. I suppose it is something like that we have in mind when we say that a stock is watered; yet the minister seems to be taking the ground that while the public can be protected from unscrupulous milkmen, it is impossible to give protection against unscrupulous promoters or manipulators of company stocks. I do not think we can properly take that position. Incorporation is a great privilege; it affords protection to a company, gives it a standing in the community and enables it to enjoy a certain confidence which otherwise would not be reposed in it. Incorporation gives a company the right to transact business under certain conditions, and it seems to me that having those special rights and privileges conferred upon it, it should be under some sort of state supervision. I know the character of the reports which come in; I remember once or twice having to look up some of them, and I found they were of a perfunctory character; they did not go sufficiently into the business of the company to enable the minister and his officials to know just what the company had been doing and what its standing was at the moment. It may be that this would require much supervision, as in the case of insurance and loan companies; it might involve considerable expense, but if the companies receive incorporation they might be charged such fees as would ensure their being properly supervised.

I ask, as the hon. member for Acadia has asked: Is it not possible to bring before this house legislation which would do more than is being done to-day in the way of safeguarding the public interest? I do not think I need say to the Secretary of State that the public feels very keenly with regard to this matter. An effort has been made in at least some provinces to control companies in the interests of the public, and something of that kind should be done here.

Mr. CAHAN: There are laws which visit heavy penalties upon those who water or otherwise deal fraudulently with stocks. The same process of law which indicts and commits to gaol or punishes by both fine and imprisonment those who water milk, brings to the bar and possibly to the penitentiary those who illegally or fraudulently deal with stocks. Under section 120 of the Companies Act wide powers are vested in the Secretary of State, but they can be exercised only on complaint. For the first time in the history of this country I have brought this section into effective operation. No application has been made under that section without a complete and thorough investigation being made, and at times there have been exposures of dominion companies who were dealing fraudulently with their stock, their shareholders, or the general public.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not reflecting in any way upon the Secretary of State, but I would point out to him that while it is comparatively easy to secure a conviction against a milkman, it is very difficult for a man who has a few shares in a great corporation to set in motion the wheels which will bring the big culprit to justice.

Mr. CAHAN: In that I differ entirely from the hon. gentleman. His statement simply shows the great abyss which exists between his attitude towards the administration of the law and my own.

Mr. GARDINER: In replying to my previous question, the minister evidently did not get my point. He made the statement that his department was doing everything in its power to see to it that the small investor was protected and that any company violating the law was brought to justice. I have before me a publication which shows the investments of the Sun Life Assurance Company—

Mr. CAHAN: The Sun Life Assurance Company does not come under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. GARDINER: I find that that company has invested in Imperial Oil Company Limited, stock to the exent of 655,500 shares, at a purchase valuation of $7,672,276.78. The present valuation of these shares is given at $5,244,000, showing a net loss to the Sun Life company of $2,428,276.78. The Secretary of State must know that a few years ago the Imperial Oil company split its shares four to one. What has the minister done with that company in regard to that question? Did he take any action? Would he take any action with respect to any company which followed that same course to-day?

Mr. CAHAN: The matter of the Imperial Oil Company has not been brought to my notice.

Mr. GARDINER: I bring it to the minister's notice now.

Mr. CAHAN: I see no reason in the world, morally, legally or otherwise, why a company with shares valued at $100 should not split them into four shares valued at $25.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister is begging the question.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not begging the question, I am looking it straight in the face. Furthermore, I say to the hon. gentleman that if he will take the stocks and bonds outstanding in this country, dominion, provincial, municipal, town and county debentures and the stocks of the various companies as they were valued in 1929, he will find that to-day the average value of these bonds and stocks is as 35 is to 100. There has been a tremendous loss, amounting to millions and tens of millions of dollars, in the value of the stocks of companies which have been honestly and efficiently administered. That depreciation in the value of these securities is not due to the splitting of shares nor is it solely due to the manipulations which have occurred in the stock market.

Mr. GARDINER: The reply of the Secretary of State is simply begging the question. The minister has made the statement that because of the decrease in the value of stocks, the weighted value to-day is only 35 as compared with 100 previously. I ask the minister this question: Suppose the Imperial Oil Company had split its stock four to one and had not put in any new capital; suppose the International Nickel company had split its stock without putting in any new capital, had those stocks not been watered would they not have been worth more on the market to-day than they were worth before that action was taken?

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman is under an entire misapprehension with regard to watering. Take the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—

Mr. GARDINER: That is a different thing.

Mr. CAHAN: In that instance one hundred dollars of stock represented over $100 of cash invested; the shares were split four to one and the par value of the present share is $25. Unfortunately it is selling on the market for less than that, but there is no watering in that transaction.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister has put up a big straw man and has knocked him down; that is all he has done. We know quite well what the Canadian Pacific did; they did exactly what the minister stated they did; that is to say, they took a $100 share and split it into four $25 shares. That is the face value of Canadian Pacific stock to-day. Their excuse, when their bill was before the railway committee for its endorsation, was that they wanted small investors in Canada to participate in buying Canadian Pacific stock in order that more would be held in this country rather than outside it. But to how many companies does that apply? The minister has mentioned the one company we know of, but what about the other companies: what about International Nickel, the Massey-Harris and all those other companies that have split their stocks without putting any more capital into them and have not split their stocks in the way the minister has cited the Canadian Pacific as having done? The minister is sidestepping the issue, and so far as I can see he is not willing to tackle the problem as the people expect him to tackle it.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish simply most respectfully to suggest to the minister that this matter is really worthy of his serious consideration. Only the other day, in the special committee on radio broadcasting, Mr. Beatty, president of the company to which the minister has referred, proposed the creation of a great private broadcasting corporation for Canada and suggested that the stock of that company might be held by various individuals and interests within the country, subject to certain restrictions. One condition he mentioned was that the stock should always be held by and be transferable only to Canadians, this obviously being in order to maintain Canadian ownership. So Mr. Beatty was asked whether he would take any exception to the inclusion in the charter of a clause that would prohibit at any time in the future the watering of the stock, and he said no, he had no objection whatever. I should like to ask the minister two questions: Is there in existence to-day in Canada any law against stock watering? When we say "stock watering," we mean that a company capitalized in the charter, say, at $2,000,000, issues and secures the subscription of just $1,000,000 in cash. That $1,000,000 is all it has and for many years it operates on that. It happens to strike successful days and the value of the stock on the gambling market advances. The proprietors of the concern then see an opportunity of skinning the public; so without adding another dollar of actual capital, they issue to themselves the balance of the authorized stock and in effect they create an artificial capital of $1,000,000 in addition to the actual capital of $1,000,000. Is there any law to prevent that, and if not, does the minister not think it is high time he provided such a law?

Mr. CAHAN: All I can say is that if that sort of transaction is carried out in any particular case and my hon. friend will bring the facts to the notice of the law officers of the crown, he will soon ascertain that there are such laws in this country; that that is fraud; that stock cannot be issued for nothing, and that those who do so are liable to be sent to the penitentiary. But I am not enforcing the criminal law of Canada. I am merely a humble secretary of state, the humble bobtail of the administration, attending as patiently as I can to the duties assigned to my department.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Owing to the applause I did not quite catch the minister's reply. May I ask him to repeat his answer to my question: Is there a law that will prevent the actual transaction that I have described?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think there is any doubt of that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister tell us where it is?

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend should not ask me to name a particular section. Of course there is a law; the criminal law of this country applies. It is fraud to do that sort of thing and those who are indicted and found guilty of such fraud are sent to the penitentiary by the courts. I should like to refer hon. members to a recent case in England where, under a law similar to ours, Lord Kylsant, a prominent business man there, was sent to the penitentiary for improperly administering the affairs of his company.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is amazing that we cannot bring about a similar situation in Canada; the minister seems unable to do so, so closely do we copy conditions in the United States, with all the evils that follow such exploitation there. May I suggest to him that if such a law exists, it is high time that he enforce it. I remember only a few years ago in this very house a lengthy debate on the British Empire Steel Corporation, when members of both political parties agreed, and so stated, that the British Empire Steel Corporation, at that time and previously, had been watered to the extent of $50,000,000, if my memory serves me correctly. It happened that it was the Minister of Labour in the Liberal government of the day who made this statement in the house. Surely some action could have been taken at that time, and hon. members ought not to be asked or expected by the minister to produce before him isolated cases. They are all around him; it is public knowledge that this sort of thing is being done. Debate after debate has taken place in the house on it. Hardly a year has passed without illustrations being given from this corner and supported by members in other parts of the house. I think the minister is hardly seized of the importance of doing away with this evil.

Mr. COOTE: One of the greatest evils in commercial life in this country is the watering of stocks and their sale to the public by financial pirates. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the case of the Canada Power and Paper Company. Has the Secretary of State power to investigate the operations of the men who formed that company and to inform the committee just what was done, how it was done and who got away with all the profits that should have gone to those who bought the bonds, and who, as the saying goes, were left holding the bag? Last year I put on the order paper a question asking for the amount of securities of the Canada Power and Paper Company and its subsidiaries held by life insurance companies. It was found that $10,000,000 of premiums paid by the people of Canada were invested in securities of this company and its subsidiaries. I believe a number of good paper companies in this country were ruined by the men who formed that organization. I do not know whether it had a dominion charter or not. Would the Secretary of State inform us whether it had, whether anything was done in regard to the matter, and if not, whether anything can be done in the future? That is the important question.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know of any way by which you can prevent dishonest men from committing fraud so long as they may do it and still keep out of the penitentiary. It is not my duty to administer the criminal law. I told hon. gentlemen earlier in the debate that if a proper representation is made to me with respect to frauds committed by any company which has obtained a charter under the Companies Act of Canada, provision is made there for investigation, and since I have been in this office, for the first time in the history of Canada, such investigations have been carried out. They have cost large amounts of money, but they have shown that very grave frauds have been perpetrated, and now in the courts those who perpetrated or are alleged to have perpetrated those frauds are being brought to justice. If the hon. member has any case in mind and will bring it to the attention of the Secretary of State, I shall look into the matter carefully and advise him as best I can as to how those guilty of frauds may be brought to justice. But, as I say, I am not administering the criminal law of the country. I have no supervision over the people's morals, nor does it fall to my department to deal with such crimes as are committed. My time is occupied nearly sixteen hours out of every twenty-four in the performance of such duties as are committed to my care.

Mr. COOTE: What we want in this country is a law to prevent these men watering these stocks. It has been done openly by, I think, hundreds of companies in Canada in the past.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend, but when he talks as he is now doing about watering stocks I begin to wonder as to his knowledge of the matter. It is not the watering of stock that is the chief evil in this country. That is a minor evil, and sometimes when people complain about it without any knowledge of the facts I think they ought to be investigated to find out if they are afflicted with water on the brain.

Mr. COOTE: I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that statement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know whether I am one of those whose brains ought to be investigated; it is quite possible a good many of us may be in that position, but we happen to represent here a considerable number whose brains are of pretty much the same calibre as ours, and we confess quite frankly that we are at an utter loss to know just what to do when we come to a matter of this kind. The Secretary of State rather suggests to us that this whole matter should be left to the courts to decide, but the point we are trying to make is that there is no legislation at the present time adequate to deal with a situation that actually exists. Everyone in this house knows perfectly well that it is next to impossible for a private member to introduce legislation on a matter of this importance with any hope that it will be passed. We cannot even be sure that it will get to a committee; some of us indeed are doubtful whether a bill we sponsor will even get a chance for first reading. Under these circumstances it seems as if we must lay upon the government the responsibility of introducing legislation along this line, and I feel that the Secretary of State, who has to deal with companies, is the one to whom we ought to look for action. Further than that, it is all very well for the Secretary of State to imply that the same kind of action is possible in the big cases as in the small cases, but I respectfully submit that in practice that is not so. It is not possible for a small shareholder to engage a lawyer who will stand any chance whatever against the legal talent that may be engaged by a great corporation. The poor man who has only a few dollars behind him cannot possibly go into a fight against a great corporation, and I do not think it is clarifying the situation for the Secretary of States to suggest that his idea and mine of law are abysmally apart. I do not think that that helps us very much. I want to bring a matter to his attention for the sake of illustration. I happened to find among my papers an editorial from the Manitoba Free Press referring to a particular matter which illustrates the fog in which the public now finds itself; and if some of us here need our brains examined, I presume the editor of the Free Press also needs his investigated. This editorial—I have not the date—says:

> When the searchlight is finally turned upon the many deals and transactions that lie in the wake of the moribund Canada Power and Paper corporation, it must be hoped that special attention will be given to the details of the spectacular Anticosti purchase which created a flurry of public attention in the summer of 1926. Nine millions of dollars of the public's money were paid for the securities of the Anticosti corporation which appeared to be backed by the strongest kind of pledges of three important paper companies. That money has in part disappeared, and the Securities Protective Committee contents itself in its circular letter by saying: "As a result of this acquisition by the new company of the undertakings and assets of all companies concerned . . . the Anticosti stumpage agreement will be automatically extinguished."
> This is not good enough. Holders of the old 6½ per cent Anticosti bonds are to be given new 5½ per cent bonds. They therefore, lose substantial amounts of their capital. Holders of the 7 per cent Anticosti preference shares are to get one and a half shares of new common stock for each share previously held. They lose much of their capital, and must accept also junior securities. They are entitled now to the full truth of the Anticosti deal. They must be at least permitted to learn why they have lost their money. Surely this is not asking too much.

The editorial then goes in some detail into the history of the company and its operations, and concludes:

> It is now time to throw light upon it. The public is entitled to know, for instance, how much was actually paid for Senator Menier's game preserve. It is entitled to know how much water was poured into the securities issued with the island as security. It is entitled to know the costs of cutting pulpwood there. It is entitled to learn whether or not the men who swung the deal exercised sound business judgment. It must know if they are safe persons with whom to invest money in the future.
> The time has come for a thorough house-cleaning in our financial methods, and the Canada Power and Paper collapse is an excellent reason for beginning it.

That is just one illustration of what is taking place right along. What the public wants to know is what is to be done about it, and we ask the Secretary of State, who grants the charters, whether there is any way by which the public may have some idea whether or not the stock of a company so chartered offers a safe investment. I do not think that we are unreasonable in urging him to consider bringing down legislation that will do something in this regard.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but there is legislation at the present time which provides a certain procedure for investigation. For instance, during the past year I instituted an investigation which was very extensive indeed with respect to one of the largest operating corporations in Canada, the Yukon Consolidated Gold Corporation, with a paid-up capital of $6,000,000. I would make exactly the same kind of examination if it were a capital of $6,000 if application were made to me. The public know very well where the facts can be ascertained. If the Canada Power and Paper Company has been incorporated under the Companies Act, then the documents will be on file with reference to the acquisition of the properties for which stock was issued. The facts can be easily ascertained. The later events are found in the court, because if my memory is correct the court approved of the compromise arrangement to which the editor of the Free Press objected in the editorial which my hon. friend has just read. The whole matter was before the court and is a matter of court record; there the real facts can be obtained. But I know of no way in which the Secretary of State can supervise the purchase of, say, Anticosti island, or can properly appreciate the price which should be paid for it. I have no interest in the matter, but men who are competent to judge at the time the land was purchased told me that it had been purchased much below its value, that it was a most valuable acquisition, and that the revenue from its timber and other resources would bring in ample revenue. They told me that they had had its timber resources inspected by very competent experts and that they had the utmost confidence in the undertaking. I know friends of mine invested many thousands of dollars, believing that the reports of those experts would ultimately be realized. Apart from fraud, I know of no way of protecting men against making purchases of timber or mining or other natural resources which in the future may not realize the exaggerated hopes entertained at the time of the purchase. But if any person will allege fraud in regard to the Canada Power and Paper Company, and apply to the Secretary of State in the formal manner provided, I can, if it is incorporated under the Companies Act and unless the company is now out of existence, order a most complete inquiry and investigation with respect to every fact. Time and time again I have so advised men who have made complaints to me. I cannot investigate and imperil the financial stability and credit of companies which are being honestly administered, simply because some newspaper makes reflections upon them; but if fraud is alleged, then there is a way under the procedure laid down in the Companies Act to conduct such investigation. In every case where applications have been made to me an investigation has been conducted.

Mr. SPENCER: A few years ago several of the provinces sought federal legislation with the aim of meeting this difficulty of watered stock—otherwise called "blue sky" legislation. Their position was that without concurrent legislation by the parliament of Canada they had no control over companies operating under federal charters. What help or encouragement did the provinces get from the Secretary of State in regard to the legislation they proposed?

Mr. CAHAN: They got just as little encouragement for the proposition they made to me as they obtained from my predecessor. They asked me to introduce a bill which would transfer certain matters out of the federal jurisdiction into the jurisdiction of the provinces. I told them the proposal was ridiculous, and that no bill that I might introduce could transfer legislative jurisdiction from this parliament to the provincial legislatures. But I also told them that, as soon as they might reasonably desire, the Dominion government, through the Prime Minister, was prepared to call a conference of the representatives of the provincial governments in order to discuss constitutional amendments by which the jurisdiction might be vested in the parliament of Canada in respect to certain matters and in the provincial legislatures in respect to other matters. That was the only answer I could possibly give them.

Mr. SPENCER: I am glad the Secretary of State has told the committee that the Prime Minister intends to take this matter up with the provinces at some future date. Has the minister had many complaints during the last two years with regard to watered stock?

Mr. CAHAN: We made the most complete investigation, covering fifteen months, in the case of one company, in the course of which we brought witnesses from England and from the ends of Canada to give evidence before a commissioner appointed for the purpose. We are carrying on these investigations from time to time in the department. We do not publish the results in the newspapers, although they are given to the newspapers, and sometimes short memoranda appear with respect to them.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has the minister investigated the collapse of the Swedish match trust and its relation to any stock transactions affecting any Canadian company? If not, is it the intention of his department to do so?

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman should advertise his question in the amusement columns of the newspapers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no knowledge of any Swedish match trust being incorporated under the Companies Act of Canada.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think my question is perfectly proper. I have read in the newspapers that investigations of the Swedish match trust are being conducted all over the world, and I am sure there must be some Canadian transactions connected with that trust. I am putting my question in all seriousness. I think when a fair question is asked the minister should give a decent answer, even though he is getting like the Prime Minister—vexed at everything.

Mr. CAHAN: I am never vexed.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: When I ask a question I do not want to be insulted by the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. member thinks I insulted him I most humbly apologize. I was not vexed when I made the remark to which my hon. friend takes objection, for I am never angry; but I am not aware that the Swedish match trust is organized under any Canadian charter.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I accept the Secretary of State's apology, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POULIOT: It is gratifying, Mr. Chairman, to know that this session private legislation with regard to companies is very limited. When some companies come to parliament with a private bill there is often a nigger in the woodpile, and that is why private bills must always be very thoroughly scrutinized. This applies not only to private bills presented to this parliament, but also to similar bills presented to the provincial legislatures. As I say, it is a good thing this session that we have very little private legislation on the order paper. As federal and provincial company law differs in many respects, it is a great mistake to have companies chartered both provincially and federally. The promoters of such companies should make their choice at the time they organize, in order that the public may know whether the companies are provincial or federal in character. This is of the utmost importance, and I cannot understand why a company should be acting under the provisions of both federal and provincial statutes. I do not say this with regard to the present minister; I say it objectively and not subjectively, but when there is some trouble in cases where companies have obtained powers both federal and provincial, at times we are told by the officials of the company that it is a provincial concern, but when we communicate with the provincial secretary we are told that it is a federal concern. No one knows where he is with such hybrid organizations. This is why I respectfully suggest that the Secretary of State be very careful about granting charters to companies which already have been organized under provincial laws. In some cases there are regulations with regard to reports and other matters, such as the number of directors, the capital subscribed and so on, which it is impossible to get but which are essential when we have to deal with these companies.

Mr. COOTE: I feel that some of the suggestions which have been made to-night have gone over the minister's head. Possibly they have entered his mind, but I do not think so. I believe the minister as a rule, when he understands a question, is very gentlemanly and courteous and ready to answer, so I think he must have misunderstood some of the matters which have been brought up. I just want to direct his attention to the fact that, in connection with the Canada Power and Paper Company the Financial Post of September 26 last stated that the security holders' protective committee had a plan for the reorganization of the corporation which would cut its capitalization from $103,000,000 to $52,000,000. The article concluded by saying that with the final winding up of the company there would pass out of existence an enterprise which was not a credit to the Canadian corporation field.

The suggestion which I was trying to make to the minister was that if proper supervision was exercised over the capitalization of these companies before they started operations it would save a lot of grief to the investing public in Canada, and would help maintain the confidence of Canadian investors in Canadian corporations. It is very unfortunate that investors in Canada should be compelled to run the risks they do run at present because of what seems to be a very decided difference of opinion between the federal Secretary of State and the different provincial governments, each wanting to have control of the issuing of charters. I would simply say to the minister that the dominion should refuse incorporation to companies who ask for too large a capitalization for the assets which they possess.

If provincial governments want to give charters to companies which are improperly financed and capitalized, let the provincial governments take the responsibility for so doing. As far as the dominion is concerned, it is time we exercised some supervision, and if necessary introduced legislation which would give the Secretary of State power to supervise the issuing of capital or even debenture stock or bonds by these corporations. I do not think the legislation on the statute books to-day gives the minister the right to exercise that supervision which I think should be exercised, and I suggest that if he has not that authority under the present law he might very well introduce such legislation in this house. It is not open to any private member to do so, since it would involve the expenditure of money, so we can only urge this suggestion upon the minister.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is one other aspect of the matter which I think should be discussed, out of which possibly a suggestion of value to the minister might arise—although sometimes I doubt if he would regard any suggestion coming from this corner as having any value. His profound erudition apparently puts him on a plane high above the reach of any suggestion that may be offered by private members.

The matter I wish him to take under consideration is the growing practice on the part of companies of issuing bonds with a tempting bribe attached to them in the form of bonus stock. I regard that as an utterly unsatisfactory proceeding which should be restricted, if not absolutely prevented. There is a classic illustration of that in connection with the Beauharnois company. The minister will recall that each $1,000 bond carried with it, as a sort of bribe or bait, five class A voting shares. They were so described in the prospectus, which was utterly misleading and almost fraudulent in character, because while this stock might ultimately become voting stock, those who really had time to study it or who had the necessary information realized that it would not be voting stock for some ten years, since the entire control of the company was held by those in possession of the management shares. There was another slightly less tempting piece of bait in the right to purchase twenty-five shares of class B stock at a fixed price of $35, at a time later to be determined by the company. I object most strenuously to the disposal of bonds to the public in that fashion. In my opinion any company seeking a charter should have a sufficiently sound basis for its bond issue to be able to issue bonds on their merits without being under the necessity of attempting to put over the issue by gold bricking the public, so to speak, with these specious and utterly misleading forms of getting something for nothing.

I ask the minister to take this suggestion under advisement, in the hope that if he has the power he will see to it that in any charters he sanctions from now on the granting of bonus stock with bond issues shall not be permitted. If he has not that power, I ask him to consider introducing the necessary amendment to the existing legislation which would bring about that result.

Mr. CAHAN: I can only tell my hon. friend—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Geary): Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPENCER: A few moments ago the Secretary of State told the committee that one investigation with regard to watered stock was being made. He also said that if complaint was made by anyone with regard to watered stock, an investigation would be made. I did not want the names of the companies, but I wanted to know if a dozen or a score or more complaints had been made, because from the way the public have been dealt with in the last two or three years it seems to me they do not know they have the right and privilege to have inquiry made by the Secretary of State. I should be glad if the minister would tell the committee whether he has had any considerable number of complaints which would show that the public know of the privileges and rights which are theirs.

Mr. CAHAN: I can simply repeat what I said before, that since I came into office in August, 1930, we have made a very careful supervision of the terms of the charters issued. During that time only two complaints have been made to my office of the nature suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPENCER: I hope that after to-night the Secretary of State will be pestered by complaints of those who have suffered from the effect of watered stock in investments.

Item agreed to.

Patent record, $25,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Do the fees received from those who apply for patents meet the expenses of running the office?

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot at the moment distinguish between patents and copyrights, but the revenue is half a million a year and it goes into the consolidated revenue account. Therefore we have to ask for an appropriation from parliament for the expenses.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Who is in charge of the patent office?

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Richard, he has been there many years.

Item agreed to.

International office for the protection of industrial property, international copyright union office and union for the protection of literary and artistic works, $2,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How is that money distributed? Is it paid in a lump sum or is it distributed to various institutions?

Mr. CAHAN: It is a contribution made by this country under the Berne convention. It has been outstanding for many years.

Item agreed to.

Expenses under the Canada Temperance Act, $1,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Explain.

Mr. CAHAN: There are only three constituencies in Canada in which the Canada Temperance Act applies, but in case application is made for a repeal in any of these constituencies there has to be an election. Every year it is customary to put in the estimates an amount to pay the expenses of such an election, although one is very seldom held.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the minister name the constituencies?

Mr. CAHAN: I know there is one in Quebec, Thetford Mines, and there are two others. I shall have to ask the hon. gentleman to wait until to-morrow for the answer.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I must confess to ignorance of the application of the Canada Temperance Act. In what way does it apply in certain isolated instances? Do those particular constituencies come under a federal act instead of under provincial legislation?

Mr. CAHAN: There was passed at one time an act known as the Canada Temperance Act, by which counties or constituencies, were authorized to adopt that act. It was adopted by many constituencies throughout Canada. Under the same act they could vote themselves out of its jurisdiction, and as the years went by the constituencies voted themselves out except in three specific instances. These are still under the act.

[Mr. Spencer.]

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I assume that this is what they used to call the old Scott Act. Are these particular constituencies, which must be within some province or other, exempt from the operation of the ordinary provincial legislation?

Mr. CAHAN: I shall have to refer that question to the Minister of Justice.

Item agreed to.

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Salaries, $260,766; contingencies, $30,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to have a statement from the minister with regard to the reported influx into this country of a considerable number of boys, I think it is some five hundred. How many are being admitted, and why should they be admitted under the conditions which now exist in Canada?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration): The newspaper reports with respect to the admission of boys—I must make it plain that they are British boys—cast no reflection at all upon the policy of the Department of Immigration. I think I can probably satisfy the hon. member by saying that as severe a restriction has been placed upon migrants coming to Canada as has ever been enforced by the department. For many years associations have been established for the purpose of bringing people to Canada from other lands. These associations have grown up and have spent large amounts of money and there is no doubt that from time to time they have brought people to this country who have proven to be very acceptable. These associations have not confined their activities to any one race, but mainly have had to do with British peoples.

In connection with the matter referred to by the hon. member, I will say that the provinces have been consulted with respect to what migrants they could absorb, what prospects would be offered to migrants for getting on in the world, or the possibility of their contributing something to the settlement of our vacant lands. The British boys referred to by the newspaper articles are being brought out at the request of the province of Ontario. I interviewed the various agencies and pointed out that we were passing through a time when these boys might meet with obstacles which would give them a good deal of trouble, that perhaps they would not have the same chance as the immigrant who came to Canada a few years ago, and under these circumstances immigration into Canada should be restricted until such time as the outlook might be more attractive. These various associations embrace the United Church of Canada, the Roman Catholic church and other bodies, and their activities have been known to the department. They first asked for 800 boys, but I stipulated that the maximum movement should be 500, and it will not reach anything like that number. I was satisfied with their assurances that these boys would take up vocations provided for them by the different associations and would not be a charge upon the country. I am not persuaded at all that Canada is at a point where she can refuse admission to any desirable people, particularly British people.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is hardly necessary to point out that there are thousands of our own boys just leaving public and high school who find it impossible to obtain work. They are qualified for farm, office or factory work, but they cannot find openings. It seems to me a very doubtful policy indeed to permit boys from any other country, Great Britain included, to come to this country to take work away from our own Canadian boys, who will then have to walk the streets.

Mr. SPENCER: What ages are these boys?

Mr. GORDON: Mostly between the ages of sixteen and eighteen.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I want to protest in as vigorous a manner as ever I have done in this house against the bringing in of these boys. I have not the words at my command to express my utter disapproval of the policy of bringing teen age boys and girls to this country, particularly boys. Only the other day I happened to have the opportunity of studying a report of the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare and I find that in the city of Toronto when the single unemployed were registered during the first great registration, some 12·5 per cent of the total single unemployed were boys of teen age, between sixteen and twenty years, the majority of whom were immigrants who had been brought to this country within the previous few years. That condition in the city of Toronto must reflect the general state of affairs throughout the country and should justify the complete abolition of this policy. The minister will find in every principal city in Canada orphan homes out of which numbers of boys and girls who have reached the age when they are required to leave the institution are being dismissed yearly. These boys and girls cannot be taken care of, yet we proceed to pour in hundreds of other boys from the old country. I wonder if the minister realizes that there is hardly a province which does not require more and better facilities for the taking care of our own boys and girls?

I think the policy of bringing these young people into this country to work for farmers is nothing short of brutal. Case after case can be cited where extreme hardship has resulted, and the mere excuse, as will doubtless be provided by the minister, that there is inspection, is not sufficient. When an inspector visits a farm he cannot expect a boy who has to live with the farmer to tell the truth if there is any danger of the farmer finding it out. The result is that these boys run away, get into the cities, and add to the present unemployment problem. I have protested against this matter at every opportunity, and I repeat my protests to-night and ask the minister to reconsider his stand on the matter.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to prolong this debate, but since the government now in power, through the mouths of its representatives during the last elections, protested so strongly against the policy adopted by the former administration, I feel it my duty to protest against the policy adopted by the minister. It has been said throughout the country, and particularly in the province of Quebec, that the government which preceded the one now in office was responsible for the hard times and unemployment which existed, because of the fact that too many immigrants had been permitted to enter the country. I think it is my duty as a representative of the people of my constituency, and more especially voicing the sentiments of Quebec, to protest most strongly against the government allowing and helping these boys, even British boys, to come to Canada under present circumstances. There is no doubt, from the figures that have been given by hon. members who have preceded me, and having regard to the conditions that obtain in the west and also in Ontario, that these young boys who have been allowed to enter Canada will not be a source of help, but in the course of a few weeks or the next few months, or perhaps in a few years, will, as has happened to others in the past, not find enough work to support themselves and probably will become public charges, of which under present circumstances we have already too many. We are told there is no place where our boys who leave college or their own homes, can earn their living; there is no chance for a boy from Quebec who goes to Ontario to meet his people, if he has any there, to find employment and earn his living; and yet we are allowing boys from the other side to come in. Even if they are good boys, nevertheless they become surplus labour in Quebec, Ontario and other parts of Canada to which they may drift in the future. I strongly protest against the policy of the present administration, which is lacking in its duty and not fulfilling the promises made during the last election, when hon. members opposite said that if they were returned to power they would see that the flow of immigration which was the cause of the present depression would be stopped.

Mr. EULER: I should like to ask the minister as to the policy of the department with regard to a phase of the immigration question which has not been mentioned here to-night and which, as a matter of fact, is directly opposed to what might be called immigration. I refer to the subject of deportation. I am quite in accord with any policy that restricts, to the extreme, immigration to Canada at this time, having regard to the depression and the prevailing unemployment. But many deportations are made by the department, I understand at the request of the representatives of the municipalities. I offer no objection to the deportation of foreigners who are undesirable, but I should like to say a word on behalf of a certain class of people who came to this country in good faith, at a time when we wanted them to come, and who have been here perhaps only two, three or four years, not sufficiently long to qualify them for naturalization and citizenship. Some of them, through no fault of their own, though quite willing to work if employment can be obtained, have been placed in the unfortunate position of being deported. There are those who consider, I believe quite honestly, that a man who is not a citizen and who has become a public charge should be returned to the country of his birth. I am not quite in sympathy with that view. When men have come to Canada in good faith, perhaps at the invitation of the federal government; have taken employment, have conducted themselves properly, and would no doubt in due time, just as soon as possible, become Canadian citizens; and when, through no fault of their own but because of the depression that now reigns in this country, they lose their employment as many native-born citizens have done, we should apply the greatest judgment, generosity, fairness and justice to any proposal that they be deported. What is the minister's policy when a request comes, let us say from a municipality, that a certain list of residents, foreigners, who have been here a short time, be deported on the ground that they have become public charges? Does the department deport them without further investigation? Or does it make inquiries of its own, and if so, upon what principle does it act before deporting those people?

Mr. GORDON: When I assumed administration of the Immigration department, the situation as I found it in regard to the working out of the question was one which I have never agreed with since I have been able to comprehend the meaning of migration to this country. The question that has just been raised by the hon. member has, of course, given me a good deal of concern. Every case is dealt with upon its merits. In the past, through various influences, through different policies that were adopted, it was thought that the solution of our country's troubles was to encourage people from any quarter of the globe to come to Canada, and for this purpose assisted passages were given and concessions were granted here and there. That policy was not new; it was followed by the United States for many years, and some ten or fifteen years ago they saw the fallacy of it. This government, however, adopted an attitude which I think should be commended. When we came into power, having regard to the fact that we had through various agencies allowed people to come into this country, sometimes as a result of representations made by people not under the direct control of the government of the day, we found ourselves confronted with a situation that was not very comfortable to say the least. Rightly or wrongly, I came to the conclusion that we should take drastic steps to control immigration, from the standpoint, not of pure materialism, but of trying to control our population so that in the future we may be able to say that we have attracted to Canada those best calculated to build up a strong and virile country. So far as I am concerned, that policy has been very sturdily pursued. I am not unmindful of the difficulties involved in the point raised by the hon. member, because I have to deal with such matters every day. Men have been attracted to Canada; they have come here expecting to find work and oportunities far beyond those available to them in their own country. At times they have undoubtedly been induced to come here by promises made by those who in the past had agreements with various transportation companies, promises that could not be fulfilled. That is a burden which the government of Canada must assume. We have at present in this country from many lands, hundreds of thousands, many of them splendid people, but many of them, I must reluctantly admit, such as we could well do without. We have many people representative of many races; we are faced with the problem of divided families, with part of the family in Europe or elsewhere and part of it here, with all the hardship that that involves. Even though we are confronted with a severe depression it will take a great deal of argument to convince me that we have to shut the door to migrants from the British Isles who want to come here, paying their own way, taking care of themselves and bringing money with them, although that is an indifferent matter compared with the spirit that prompts them to come. So far as I am concerned, while at the present time we encourage no one to come here until we clean up at home the mess that was left with us, I want to say to the committee that there will be no shutting of the door to British immigration.

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that the hon. gentleman answered my question. I should like to know the policy of the department in respect to deportations. Does the department accept the recommendations made by municipalities as to deportations, or does it make further inquiry as to the merits of each individual case?

Mr. GORDON: When a complaint comes in to the department—and under the Immigration Act these complaints come from the clerks of municipalities—against people who have contravened the provisions of the Immigration Act, it is investigated by the officers of the department, and until the case has been finally decided and an appeal has been allowed or dismissed, no deportation takes place. There never has been a deportation of people from this country without careful investigation beforehand.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to be misunderstood. I have no complaint whatsoever to make with regard to deportations of a delinquent or a man who has committed a crime and is consequently deported after he has served his sentence. I am referring entirely to those who, merely by reason of the fact that they cannot find employment, but would otherwise make desirable citizens, are reported to the department, and I am asking whether in such cases they are deported.

Mr. GORDON: I know of no case where deportation has taken place of a desirable citizen simply because he has become a public charge through inability to find employment. I do not know of any such case.

Mr. SPOTTON: It is very refreshing indeed to hear the opposition criticizing the immigration policy of this government. I presume that if it had not been for the 750,000 immigrants who were brought into this country by the late government during the last six, seven, or eight years, we would not have had such an unemployment problem on our hands to-day. However, my immediate point is this: There seems to be a direct attack to-night against permitting five hundred British boys to enter Canada. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite are straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. On behalf of those boys in my constituency I just wish to say that we have boys of sixteen to eighteen years of age who came through the Vimy Ridge farm at Guelph and latterly from Norval near Brampton, and in the last four years I have been responsible for bringing some fifty-five of these boys to my constituency. I wish to bear testimony to-night, Mr. Chairman, that my county is very proud of those boys. They came from selected families in the old country and came because they had a desire to learn farming out here, not to tell the boss how to farm or how they do it "over 'ome," but to learn farming as it is done in this country. There may have been one or two or three of them who have gone to the city, but if they have I do not know it, and I keep in close touch with these boys. The farmers in my county want more of them. I had one boy who came to a farmer in my county and stayed two years, grew robust, learned farming and then returned home to England, and he is now one of the greatest boosters Canada has. Another young man succeeded him, and this fall after two years with the same farmer he goes to the agricultural college at Guelph to pursue his further studies there.

I cannot understand why hon. gentlemen who are always talking about doing something that might block any arrangement we might make with the empire at the coming imperial conference, should just a few weeks before that conference meets tell the world that we cannot take five hundred clean British boys and assimilate them here. I think we can do it in the province of Ontario if they are not wanted elsewhere. I could not let this opportunity pass, Mr. Chairman, without stating the position of the farmers in my county. When hon. gentlemen opposite speak of the unemployed in the cities, there is not a farmer who can go into the cities and find very many boys who want to go out to the country and learn farming. Most of the farmers in my constituency who apply for boys who do not smoke; they do not want cigarettes being smoked around their buildings. In the ranks of the unemployed in the cities I do not think you could find a young fellow who knows which end of the horse to put a collar on, and they do not want to know; they do not want to learn farming. So it is ridiculous for hon. gentlemen opposite to say that these British boys are taking employment from those who are to be found in the ranks of the unemployed in our cities. I just rose, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the few hundred boys who have come to my constituency in the last ten years, to say that they are a very fine type of citizen, and that the farmers in my county are asking for more of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have been amazed to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration for the second time during the present session refer to his arduous endeavours to clean up the mess that was left on his doorstep when the late government went out of office. The only impression that his remarks have left upon me is that they are redolent of his self-appointed pasture. I wish to ask my hon. friend from North Huron who was a member of the opposition in 1929, what was his attitude on that occasion with regard to the stand taken by the leader of his own party in regard to immigration into Canada. The present Minister of Immigration was not a member of the house at that time, but my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce was here, and for the information of the committee may I just quote the words of his own right hon. leader in a debate in this house just a few short months before his party faced the Canadian people in the election of 1930. It is well known in the minister's own department that the policy of effective restriction of which he now prates so highly, had already been put into effect by the late administration before he was honoured by the portfolio of minister. Here is what the Prime Minister of Canada, then leader of the opposition, said in this house of February 11, 1929, at page 22 of Hansard, speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne:

> We have here one of the largest undeveloped areas in the world; we have a very pressing necessity for more people. There need be no misapprehension about that, notwithstanding what has been said from time to time to the contrary.

Then listen to this:

> It will be found that the increase of population in this country brought about through bringing additional people in will not only lessen unemployment for those who are now in it, but will increase all employment.

Where are my Tory friends now? Where is the member for North Huron who would not swallow a camel?

Mr. SPOTTON: In answer to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre—

[Mr. Spotton.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SPOTTON: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member asked me a question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member for North Huron may reply when I am through.

Mr. SPOTTON: The hon. member asked me a question twice, Mr. Chairman, and I should like to—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend can answer all the questions he likes when I sit down. My hon. friend from North Huron said that we were straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. By his silence during the speech of his own leader, now the Prime Minister of Canada, he not only swallowed a camel—he swallowed a whole camel corps. During the session of 1929 the then leader of the opposition, now Prime Minister, a few short months before the general election of 1930, used these words, as recorded in Hansard, that the bringing into Canada of immigrants would not only lessen unemployment but would increase employment all through the dominion. Let me quote him further at page 23:

> Mr. Bennett: The minister says: "Hear, hear." The responsibility rests with him and his government. We have no power to control the expenditures; we have no power over the money of this country; but all I can say is that when in the fullness of time that power is entrusted to those who sit to the left of the Speaker, they will deal with the immigration problem in a different manner.

And what was that different manner? The general organizer of the Tory party, who is now a distinguished member of the Senate, introduced into this house a resolution for bringing in 300,000 immigrants to settle the vast spaces of our western prairies. The government spent millions of dollars last year in Saskatchewan to help the destitute. How many millions of dollars would it have cost this Tory government if the plans of its general organizer had been put into effect?

Now, sir, my versatile and volatile friend the Minister of Railways gave expression to this perfect gem, and I hope my friend from North Huron will remember it. I am quoting from page 2746 of Hansard of May 22, 1929:

> My complaint is not so much that the number of British immigrants is not larger, as that our immigration of all classes is much too small. The question is often asked: how many can we absorb in this country? I submit that we can absorb as many as we can put at useful occupations and as many as we can handle without crowding out the other classes of the people already here, whether they be farmers or labouring people. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we could take many times the numbers of people of all kinds than we are getting at the present time.

That was the official policy of the Conservative party a few months before they went to the country in 1930.

An hon. MEMBER: Quote it again.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am going to quote another passage which is equally significant. At page 2752 of Hansard in the same speech the present Minister of Railways said:

> It is obvious to my mind that the government has not a satisfactory immigration policy. If Canada is to grow, prosper, and progress, it is the duty of this government to awaken to its responsibilities and really try to bring down an immigration policy adequate to the needs of this dominion.

That, Mr. Chairman, was the policy of the present Prime Minister in 1929, that was the policy of the Minister of Railways in 1929, that was the policy of the distinguished organizer of the Conservative party in 1929, that was the policy of every single member of the Conservative party who supported his leader in this house in 1929. Then in 1930 they went to the country on a diametrically opposite policy, and yet the Minister of Immigration has the audacity to come to this committee this evening—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He has the audacity to come to this committee this evening and talk about the "mess" left upon his doorstep. If there were too many immigrants brought into Canada in the three or four years preceding 1930, the fault lies not with the then administration but with the official opposition of that day; for if their recommendations had been hearkened to we would have had ten, twenty, yes, one hundred times as many immigrants as were admitted —and then the Minister of Immigration would have had on his doorstep that "mess" to which he has referred twice this session. I hope the members of the Conservative party will read the record of what passed in this chamber in the session of 1929, for then they will realize that the work of the late administration was effective in restricting the flow of immigration, although in taking that course they had to fight against the pressure put upon them by the leaders of the Conservative party to flood Canada with immigrants for a period of five, six or seven years.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, early in the discussion the Minister of Immigration said that no one was deported until he had had an opportunity to appeal to the department. The case which I am about to deal with has to do with the city from which I come, and I think there are many like it. The lady in this instance had been in Canada for over twenty years, she was married in this country and had three children, whose present ages are eighteen, seventeen and fifteen; she developed fits and was put into an institution at Woodstock Ontario; she was deported on October 3, 1931, and was on the way to Great Britain before her husband even knew what had happened. What is the policy of this department with respect to the husband and three children who are left in the dominion?

Mr. GORDON: I cannot identify the case to which the hon. member refers, but for his information I may say that the deportation of people to their country of origin is not done in any autocratic, cruel way, such as might be inferred from his remarks. They are given every opportunity, so far as I know, because their cases come under review time and again, with a view to finding out what responsibility this country has to take care of these poor unfortunates who find themselves in mental difficulty and have to be put in mental hospitals. I am sure the hon. member recognizes that the province of Ontario and the other provinces have spent many millions of dollars in order to treat and take care of mental cases. I think it is incumbent on the other nations of the world to take a leaf out of the provinces' book and to assume their responsibilities in this regard. I can assure the hon. member that no case that I have any recollection of has not received very careful consideration by the department in an effort to place the responsibility where it lies. As these cases come up every day it is impossible for me to identify this particular case.

Mr. MITCHELL: These cases are well known in the section of the country from which I come. What the people of Hamilton most object to with respect to this case—it was widely discussed last year—was the separation of the mother from her husband and her children without their knowledge. We want to know what is to become of the three children. It was at least the bounden duty of the department to let the husband know that his wife was going to be deported. I would like to say that the lady in question is living the life of a normal human being in England, and is not in any institution of any kind at the present time.

Mr. GORDON: Would the hon. member give me the name?

Mr. MITCHELL: I will give the minister the name.

Mr. SPOTTON: I must apologize for rising, but since the hon. member for all Vancouver directed two questions to me and would not allow me to answer I will take this opportunity of doing so. The hon. member asked me where I stood. He may not be able to understand this, but I have often stood for myself, and I have not always stood behind the various leaders of the Conservative party. Probably my hon. friend will not be able to understand that. On every fit occasion for the last thirty years I have always stated that there was no hurry to populate Canada with the different European nations. Those who are here are all citizens of Canada and they are all our brothers, but throughout my whole life my attitude has been that this is the last of the new countries. During the thirty or thirty-five years I have considered this matter it has been my belief that Europe was becoming overcrowded, and the different countries were looking to Canada because, as I say, it was the last of the new countries. I always said there was no hurry to fill up our great west but that we should keep it for the children, and the children's children, of the two great pioneer races of Canada.

That always has been my position, and it will continue to be so. What is going to happen in the future if we fill up our great west? The two great pioneer races in Canada must reserve a place for generations yet unborn.

> What matter that at different times
> Our fathers claimed the sod;
> What matter that at different shrines
> They prayed unto one God;
> In fortune and in fame were bound
> In stronger links than steel;
> And neither could be safe or sound
> But in the other's weal.

That has been my stand, I wish to inform the hon. member for all Vancouver, throughout my whole life.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to ask the minister what is the policy with regard to divided families. He mentioned the problem of bringing divided families together, and I should like to ask if a man in this country who has a close relative in a European country other than Great Britain has a chance of getting that relative out to Canada at the present time.

Mr. GORDON: The policy of the department with respect to the union of divided families is first to investigate closely that part of the family residing in Canada. If on investigation we find that the person in Canada is acceptable in the view of the departmental officials and of myself, and that the person sought to be brought to Canada will not disturb or be a burden upon labour in this country, then a recommendation is made to council and an appropriate order in council is passed. All those orders in council are available to hon. members of the house. Of course, of necessity that policy must be relaxed when we get through this depression.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I believe the minister did not quite understand the question of the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I think what the hon. member meant was this: If a man and his wife in this country have a boy or girl in the old country, and that child has reached the age of twenty-one years, I believe they cannot bring the child to Canada because of some regulation enacted in the past. I should like to ask if a father or a mother can bring a boy or a girl of twenty-two years of age from Poland or Roumania to Canada.

Mr. GORDON: Not as a matter of right. We are charged with trying to preserve, for the present at least, the labour market in Canada for persons at present within Canada. While it may occasion some distress to parents to be unable to bring their twenty-two year old boy to this country, yet we must preserve to the people who are here what labour is available to them. However, I hope that is not a policy which will have to be pursued for a very long time. Each case is dealt with on its merits, but the underlying principle is this: If the person sought to be brought to Canada is likely to take a position in the labour market here which will displace some person already legally and properly in Canada, then the reunion will have to be postponed until things take a different turn.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just want to ask the minister a question in connection with the speech he made in this house on February 23. At page 440 of Hansard I find the following words:

> . . . whether we like it or not, we must get over to the positive side of immigration, because we must have more people if we hope to pay off the debt with which ten million people are loaded at present by reason of the railroad problem on our hands.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is that the policy of the government?

Mr. BOWMAN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MITCHELL: I would like an answer to my question, because this matter has been the subject of discussion in the labour movement in the city in which I reside. What is the policy of the Minister of Immigration in connection with the announcement he made in this house this year?

Mr. GORDON: I do not know that I need add much to what I said on that occasion. Anyone who has followed the debates in this house and who has an appreciation of the different railway and road services that have been created in this country, preceding settlement, must recognize that in order to get the fullest advantage of them, and indeed to pay for them, people must be colonized along those services. I do not think the hon. member need have any great fear that in its administration of the immigration laws the present government will induce to come to Canada people who are likely to disturb the labour market. But we have an immense country. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre blamed the situation upon someone on this side of the house, and charged me with blaming it on members on the other side of the house. That really does not mean much to me, because at present I am administering this department, and my task is to colonize the people at home, with full knowledge of the fact that without an increased population, carefully selected—which may be a slow process—this may be difficult.

That is what I meant by the positive side of immigration. We will ultimately get to the point where we will have a population which properly colonized, will be able to share the burden of debt which has arisen from the public services we have projected and made available to the people of this country. That is the policy of the government.

Mr. BOWMAN: I gather from the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that the policy of the Conservative party in 1929 was wrong. If that is so, I presume the party will be commended for changing their policy and getting on the right track now. With respect to permitting teen age boys to come to Canada, I appreciate the difficulties with which the government is faced when these youths are brought in from Great Britain. It is a serious matter. I also appreciate the difficulty in putting into force rules or regulations which perhaps would interfere with the good will and good feeling which exist between Canada and the old country at the present time. Possibly a gentle hint from the minister or from the government to the authorities responsible in the old country, or those who are thinking of bringing these youths to Canada, might have the desired effect without the necessity of there being any binding rules or regulations adopted by the Department of Immigration.

Mr. SPENCER: I notice quite a decrease in the amount asked for this year. Can the minister tell us where the cut has been made?

Mr. GORDON: The decrease is due to the abolition of certain offices: one chief clerk; one woman officer; one clerk retired; two clerks, grade four; one clerk, grade three; four stenographers, grade two; two typists, grade two; one typist, grade one; one clerk, grade two; one messenger. Then, of course, there is the ten per cent reduction in salaries.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: A year ago the minister made a statement with regard to the placement of families in various provinces under his back to the land policy, which he advocated. Has he any information to give the committee now?

Mr. GORDON: Rightly or wrongly—I do not know whether hon. members will agree with me—it became apparent to me when I assumed my present office that there were and would continue to be in increasing numbers people unemployed who were formerly engaged in industry. In Canada we had many families who had farm experience and who had gone to the cities, attracted there by high wages. They found themselves out of employment and although they had some money it was dwindling through payment of rents and so on. I thought it desirable to enlist the services of the railway companies and of those who had theretofore been interested in immigration, with a view to coordinating the efforts of all. The purpose was, by helping people to select vacant farms, of which we had many thousands, to enable them to go back to the land and become self-supporting. Someone may disagree with that and say that that is not the place in which to become self reliant. I am not prepared yet to agree with those who hold that view. However, we did meet with a measure of success, which I think is commendable. Many people who found themselves out of work, with some money and with farm experience and an agricultural background, joined in the effort and went back to the land. The latest figures we have, so far as the railways and the department are concerned, show that just under fifty thousand people are back on the land to-day. That comprises families who have taken up farms, and about fourteen thousand single men who are working on the farms of Canada.

Mr. VALLANCE: Where did they go?

Mr. GORDON: I could scarcely trace the fifty thousand.

Mr. VALLANCE: Tell us where some went.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What proportion established themselves in certain parts of Quebec?

Mr. GORDON: I will come to that. The department pursued the project which it outlined for itself in the fall of 1930 and, I believe, every province in Canada followed in the wake. Certainly Ontario and Quebec did, as well as the western provinces, and the maritime provinces, in a measure. I have not the figures as to what they have done, but if any hon. member would like to have the figures which the railways and the Immigration department have for the farm placements, they are available, because we have kept complete records of each family, where they have gone, what wages they are receiving, and so on. I do not think that the families would care to have their names heralded from the housetops. They are receiving no help from the government. They are doing all right and are going to make good.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the minister be good enough to table in the near future a report of that transaction so that we will know where we are?

Mr. GORDON: I shall be very glad to table a report, but I do not want to give the names of the people who have gone to the farms.

Mr. VENIOT: Why?

Mr. GORDON: That is their own business.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister could state how many had settled in each locality.

Mr. GORDON: Yes, but not their names.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think the minister knows what he wants to convey, but there seems to be a misunderstanding in the committee as to what he is actually conveying. When the minister speaks of settling these people on farms, does he mean settling single men as hired men, or is he referring to those placed on abandoned farms? If the latter, I should like to know where those abandoned farms are, because I do not know of a single instance where this has taken place. Is the minister referring to the single men placed under the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, where the farmers were paid by the government for the keep of the men?

Mr. GORDON: No, I have no reference to that. The families which have been settled on farms consist of people who had sufficient money to go back to the land under the guidance of the railways and the department. I was not referring to the single men placed on farms and assisted by government gratuities, I was dealing strictly with the business of the department.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am vitally interested in the question of colonization, because my riding has shown the greatest improvement in this respect of any district in Canada. During the last ten years the number of occupied farms in Cochrane county has increased from 274 to 2,490. Last year I endeavoured to obtain the information now being asked for by hon. members, but I was unable to do so. Will the minister advise the committee how many people have been settled in North Timiskaming?

Mr. GORDON: I am sorry I am unable to give the information asked for by the hon. member, and unless a resurvey were made to divide Canada into ridings for the purpose, I doubt if it could be supplied. The following figures show the number placed between October 1, 1930, and February 29, 1932:

British Columbia	70
Alberta	1,360
Saskatchewan	696
Manitoba	904
Ontario	2,567
Quebec	127
Maritime provinces	431

I have examined the reports of the railways and I find them to be very accurate. The families placed by the Canadian National Railways number 2,894; by the Canadian Pacific Railway, 2,471, and by the department, 987. The single men placed by the Canadian National Railways number 2,983; by the Canadian Pacific Railway, 4,331 and by the department, 6,155. These figures cover the same period to which I have referred, from October 1, 1930 to February 29, 1932. On the basis of five members to a family, 45,229 individuals have been absorbed in agriculture.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, I still maintain I am not receiving the information for which I have been looking for the last two years and to which I am entitled. The hon. minister has just stated that those who have been placed on farms would not like to have their names shouted from the housetops. but this government has been going up and down the country boasting of its wonderful back to the land policy. The hon. minister has just stated that 50,000 people have been placed on farms without any assistance from the government, but I maintain that to do that is humanly impossible. The minister knows that in northern Ontario the settlers will require provincial or federal aid before they will be able to seed their land. People cannot be taken from the cities and placed on the land without assistance from the government, especially with the present low prices being received for farm products. If the government sees fit to announce this policy throughout the length and breadth of this country, it should furnish the information to which the committee is entitled. There is no back to the land scheme which is workable under present conditions without aid from either the provincial or the dominion government. I have received hundreds of letters asking for federal aid, and the government owes it to the committee to announce a clear and definite policy in connection with land settlement. Mention is made of abandoned farms, but there must be some reason why those farms were abandoned—there is no doubt that the original holders could not make a living. It would be impossible to take people from the cities and place them upon the land in northern Ontario without governmental aid. I shall not criticize, but will support any movement which will alleviate unemployment in the cities, but I do not want to see the unemployment in the rural districts become worse. I have enough faith in the minister to feel assured that he will do his best to see that this situation is remedied.

Mr. GORDON: I think I have a fair idea of the difficulties being faced by settlers in the riding of the hon. member (Mr. Bradette) as well as throughout Canada generally because incidentally I have come into contact with them for many years. But I should not like his observations to go without some passing comment. I trust the hon. member does not complain because the government has met with a degree of success in having people return to the land on their own money, the government making the way as easy as it could for them, only with advice, I will admit, as to placing them upon the land best suited to them. I trust he will not complain as to the success the department may have attained in that regard.

With respect to settlers in the northern part of Ontario, I know their plight; I am acquainted with their difficulties and I appreciate the courage which they have exhibited throughout this period of depression. I have reason to remember their courage during the past two or three years; I am not unmindful of their wants; I am acquainted with the efforts that have been made by both the Quebec and the Ontario government to assist them while they have been cleaning up their farms. I do not need to tell the hon. member that those settlers will receive most sympathetic support.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask the minister whether the list he just read showing the returns to the farm by provinces, includes all he has in mind? If it does, I may say that he has given no figures showing 50,000.

Mr. GORDON: The figures—and this is all I have said in the house or out of it—including the units of families together with single men, would amount, as of April 2, to 44,959. That is being increased each week. This is on the basis of five to each family.

Mr. VENIOT: That does not agree with the figures the minister read for his province.

Mr. STEVENS: He gave figures of families.

Mr. VALLANCE: I noticed the minister quoted the figures for the various provinces. The other night, when the hon. member for Saskatoon was speaking, I think on the Unemployment and Farm Relief bill, he read from some letters that he had received from settlers that had been placed in Meadow Lake, north of Battleford, showing how successful they had been. I know the country into which those people went and I know a number of people who have gone in there and done well; but all the people I know that have gone into the northern portions of Saskatchewan have been those driven out of the south because of the conditions existing there. If the minister is counting those people—

Mr. GORDON: I can assure the hon. member I am not.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have watched the migrations of those people in the last two years. Situated as I am on the west centre of Saskatchewan, I have seen hundreds of them go in. Is it the intention of the government, now that they are placing them on abandoned farms, as the minister has stated—

Mr. GORDON: Not only on abandoned farms—on any farms available, or crown lands.

Mr. VALLANCE: The only farms available to-day in Saskatchewan are either homesteads along the northern fringe of settlement or abandoned farms, because you cannot sell a farm; if the minister knows where he can make any sales, I wish he would let me know.

Mr. GORDON: I am making them every day. If the hon. member has a farm to sell, let him place it with me.

Mr. VALLANCE: We are dealing with immigration of British boys. I listened to the hon. member for Dauphin give as his reason why we should go, as we say in Scotch, "very canny" at this time, the approach of the imperial conference. I am of the same opinion that we should go "very canny," but not for that reason. Looking at the question from the boys' viewpoint, I do not think this is any time to bring a boy from Great Britain into conditions such as prevail in Canada to-day. I might tell the minister it is just twenty-six years ago to-day since I left the Clyde, but the day I reached Canada conditions were very different from what they are now and any boy coming from Great Britain at this time will find the struggle much harder than did those of us who came here when I did.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member is too modest.

Mr. VALLANCE: I am not. There are hundreds who have done the same as I. I urge the government to go very slowly in inviting those boys to come to Canada at this time. Like the hon. member for Bow River and for the same reason, I know many of them and get close to them because I am a fellow countryman. We have travelled the road they will have to travel if they come here.

Mr. GERSHAW: The minister said that he had not given any assistance in a financial way. Has he received any request from the provinces to help to place on the land some of the experienced farmers who are unemployed? I quite agree that land in some places is available. If such a request were to come to him, would his department be willing to consider it in view of the fact that in any case they have to keep most of these people?

Mr. GORDON: The question of giving state aid to colonization—and it has been a subject that many countries in the western hemisphere have undertaken—is one that requires a great deal of consideration. We in Canada have from time to time given aid; shortly after the war we started on rather an elaborate program of state-aided settlement. In view of the present situation the success of that is very difficult to measure. When the program of the department became known with respect to reestablishing people on the farms where they would at least be able to look after themselves in a modest kind of way, many requests came in from all kinds of societies and even at times from provinces, outlining schemes whereby people could be put on the land and be state-aided with money. This is a matter that would require most careful consideration. When I started out to try to reestablish people on the land, my viewpoint was that we would take people from the cities, get them off the unemployment shelves and make them self-supporting.

The house met at three o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1932-33

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1933, was presented by Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I desire to lay on the table of the house orders in council P.C. 905 and 906, passed under the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): On the orders of the day I would ask permission to reply to an inquiry made last evening by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer). There remain under the Canada Temperance Act the following districts: the city of Thetford Mines, Quebec, the district of Manitoulin, Ontario, and Lisgar and Marquette in Manitoba.

CANADA POWER AND PAPER CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): In relation to certain matters mentioned last evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), with regard to the Canada Power and Paper Corporation, the fact is—I was quite confident of it last night, but did not wish to rely entirely upon my memory—that this company was incorporated under the laws of the province of Quebec. It is true that applications were made to the Secretary of State for an inquiry with respect to that company, and one of the applications contained copies of the Winnipeg Free Press from which extracts were read last evening. Representations were made direct to the Secretary of State and to the Secretary of State through the Department of Justice by the firm of Hunt, Auld & Warburton, of Winnipeg. Mr. Thomas A. Hunt subscribed the letter, to which I replied as follows:

It is impossible for me to order an investigation of the Canada Power and Paper Corporation, because it is a Quebec incorporation and does not come within the terms of section 120 of the Companies Act, Canada.

Subsequently representations were made to the Prime Minister to the same effect, and these were referred to me for action. I find that on September 26, 1931, I wrote the Prime Minister as follows:

My Dear Prime Minister:

I have received applications for an investigation, under section 120 of the Companies Act of Canada, into the business and affairs of Canada Power and Paper Corporation, which was one of the companies recently merged under the auspices of the Dunning committee into Consolidated Paper Corporation Limited.

I have declined the request for an investigation into Canada Power and Paper Corporation because I have ascertained that this company was not incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act, but was incorporated on January 16, 1928, under the laws of the province of Quebec.

As you spoke to me recently about a prospective investigation of the above mentioned company, I thought you would be interested in knowing the grounds of my decision.

PURCHASE OF FERTILIZER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) or some other member of the government whether a resolution has been received from the provincial government of Prince Edward Island asking for assistance in the purchase of fertilizer.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I believe a resolution to that effect has been received but I was unable to look up the details last night. I will be glad to look into the matter and give my hon. friend the information at the next sitting.

SUPPLY

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Short in the chair.

Salaries and contingencies, $290,766.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to ask the minister one question. Could my hon. friend tell us whether the subject of migration and settlement within the British Empire will be one of the matters taken up at the forthcoming Imperial conference?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): That hardly comes within the scope of this item, but I imagine matters of that character will be discussed, though to what extent or from what angle I am not prepared to indicate at the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand it, then, the minister's reply is to the effect that he imagines this may come up but at the present time he cannot say.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Last night the minister was giving us some information about the back to the land movement, although I am not sure that most of us got a very clear idea of the extent of that movement or of just where the people were being placed. Another aspect to the question arises in connection with the proposal made by some of the western provinces to establish people on the land in connection with unemployment relief. To-day I received a wire from Winnipeg, signed by W. L. Parrish, chairman of the commission, reading as follows:

We urgently request immediate action on back to the land scheme approved by city council and provincial government and set out in Mr. Clubb's letter to Mr. Gordon dated March 16th and referred to in Clubb's letter of April 16th. Opportune time to start scheme rapidly passing away. Please do your utmost with Prime Minister and Minister of Immigration. Applicants and public very restless at delay. Please wire reply.

This back to the land scheme as proposed in Winnipeg and endorsed by the province and the city council has been a matter of negotiation for some time, and if these people are to go out on the land they should be there at once; otherwise it will be impossible for them to do any seeding this year. I have not been personally in close touch with the details of the movement, but I know that the minister has recently had an interview with Mr. Clubb, and we should like to have some very definite information as to whether the government is going to fall in line.

Mr. GORDON: The subject referred to by the hon. member scarcely comes under the vote of civil government, but since it has been brought up I might as well discuss it now. Many schemes, all founded on the assumption that they will be state-aided with money have been put forward by municipalities and provinces and societies, but the government has not, up to the present time, given any encouragement to state-aided land settlement —that is, any new state-aided land settlement. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Quebec and probably some other provinces have taken steps towards provincially-aided land settlement, but so far as this government is concerned it has not indicated to anyone that it is prepared to embark upon state-aided colonization.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then it is quite definite that no help may be expected in the immediate future from this government.

Mr. GORDON: When the hon. member says no help—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No financial help, I mean.

Mr. GORDON: Exactly. Possibly the future may disclose where state-aided colonization might be advisable and necessary, but at the moment the government is not prepared to embark upon a scheme of that character.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just to be very definite, "at the moment" implies that there will be nothing forthcoming in time for this spring's operations.

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. BRADETTE: The minister last night, I do not think wilfully, misrepresented what I said on the subject now under discussion. I said I was absolutely in favour of any movement that would help the back to the land scheme. I repeat, I am absolutely in favour of such a movement and, going further, I am in favour of any movement that will keep the rural population on the land at the present time. I believe that the minister last year said that a provincial conference was going to be held in Winnipeg. At any rate, whether that statement was made by the minister himself or whether it appeared in some of the newspapers, I gathered the impression that it was the intention of the department to hold a conference in the city of Winnipeg where all the provincial governments would be represented and in which a thorough discussion of the back to the land movement would take place. So far as I have been able to ascertain, no such conference has yet been held. I want to make myself quite clear on this question. It seems to me that the movement, or the slogan, or the policy of the department, whatever you choose to call it, does not go far enough. As I said last evening, unless the people you place on the land receive a certain amount of help from the government, it will be impossible for them to remain there. On the contrary, it will simply aggravate a situation which is bad enough at the present time. This applies more particularly to the northern section of Ontario. When we speak of putting people back on the land, we have not in mind the prairie lands, because even in the three prairie provinces there is very little prairie land left for settlement, most of the land available being timbered land. The minister knows that to-day there is no market to be had for the lumber, timber, and pulpwood which would be the first crop from such land. This is particularly true of Ontario, for the people cannot even give away the pulpwood they have been cutting during the last two or three years. So that unless the people who are placed on the land at the present time, especially in the wooded areas, receive a degree of help for the first year, at any rate, the situation will be very serious indeed. In northern Ontario there is plenty of land that could be taken up even in the settled parts around New Liskeard, Cochrane, Iroquois Falls, Kapuskasing, Matheson and the Porcupine district, that are to-day partly unoccupied. I am not going to criticize the past policies of any provincial government, but the fact is that the settlers in those districts, not having been able to get any assistance at the initial stage of settlement, could not graduate from the settler to the farmer class. The same principle applies at the present time. If you take people from the city, even people with some money, they will not be able to carry on unless they get help either from the federal or from the provincial government. Some people may be under the impression that if you place more settlers on the land they will not have a market for their produce. So far as northern Ontario is concerned, this argument does not hold, for the very good reason that the people are not now able, nor for a good many years to come will they be able, to produce enough for the requirements of the domestic market around Cobalt, Kapuskasing, Iroquois Falls, Kirkland Lake and the Porcupine district. And the same is true of Sudbury and other districts in the southern section of northern Ontario. So that on that score there is no cause for concern; we could have thousands of additional settlers in northern Ontario and there would be no danger from the point of view of disposing of farm products.

I wish to read here a brief statement issued by Mr. W. J. Price in January, 1932, a report on marketing conditions in northern Ontario, submitted to the Ontario marketing board:

An examination of these tables, especially the summary, reveals that a policy of land settlement may be followed with vigour, without fear of bringing about overproduction in such essential food products as beef, pork, lamb, butter, eggs, poultry or vegetables. Also it reveals a market sufficiently extensive that for many years to come will be well worth studying and cultivating both by the growers of northern Ontario and of old Ontario as well, the latter particularly as regards those lines which nature has ordained never to be produced commercially in the territory.

I have suggested that such a scheme as the back to the land movement would be physically impossible unless the settlers were bonused in the clearing of the land, and I believe that the provincial government is to-day fully aware of the situation; so that this would be the time for the federal government, through the Department of Colonization, to initiate such a movement.

I wish now to read from a short article which appeared in the Porcupine Advance of March 31, 1932:

Recommends bonus for settlers here.

Plans submitted to Ontario legislature would give settlers a bonus for acreage cleared.

A despatch from Toronto last week says that the "back to the land movement" in Ontario would receive added impetus if a series of recommendations formulated last week by a sub-committee are adopted by the agriculture and colonization committee of the Ontario legislature and approved by the house.

The report presented to the main committee recommended:

1. Bonusing of settlers for acreage cleared and seeded.
2. Immediate survey of vacant farms in Ontario.
3. Publication of the results of the survey in Canada and Great Britain.
4. Eventual establishment of a distinct department of colonization under a deputy minister.
5. Establishment of "shacks" in farming districts where prospective settlers would live while preparing the land.
6. The doubling of Ontario's cultivated acreage by a concentrated back to the land movement.

Has Held Inquiry

Under the chairmanship of Dr. Paul Poisson, Conservative, North Essex, the sub-committee has held meetings throughout the present session of the legislature. During that time it has listened to various officials of the agricultural board and settlers loan commission.

Various speakers have testified as to the seriousness of intention of prospective settlers and the question of vacant farms has been prominent. Many farms along the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway had been abandoned by settlers, who had gone to cities, and were now trying to return. Without some form of government aid, it was felt they would be unable to do so. Even in old Ontario there were hundreds of improved or partly improved farms which could be obtained cheaply, the sub-committee's report pointed out.

This brings me again to the comment I made a few moments ago. A provincial conference should be held for the discussion of this back to the land movement. The western provinces have been given their natural resources and any settlement schemes which they inaugurate are under their own jurisdiction, but I believe this government should hold a conference on this matter as soon as possible to avoid conflict with provincial regulations. This matter may come under provincial jurisdiction but we cannot get away from the fact that assistance will have to be given by this government to certain sections of the country. I am sure that the suggestion to maintain our present rural population and keep the people on the land will receive the support of every section of this committee.

The minister represents to a large extent a settlers' riding and should appreciate the necessity for some bonusing system for land cleared. As I said last evening, this matter should be out of the realm of politics but statements by the minister and his department have appeared in different Conservative papers in Montreal, which interpreted these statements in a political way. It has been said that the premier of the province of Quebec is not playing the game with the farmers and settlers. I hold no brief for that province, but I contend that the Quebec scheme is the best there is in Canada. If a similar scheme was in effect for northern Ontario there would be no unemployment and distress among the settlers. The best thing which could happen this year would be for the province of Ontario to inaugurate the bonus scheme put in effect by the province of Quebec. I make this statement in order to correct the impression given by a certain section of the press—particularly Conservative papers—which has been making political capital out of the statements issued by the department. This question has become political because of the interpretations of the statements issued by the department to the effect that a wonderful way has been found to solve unemployment in the cities. I maintain that the present scheme does not go far enough, and the statement of the minister that it is being put into effect without any expenditure by the federal government cannot be accepted in its entirety. I repeat the statement I made last evening: unless this government is willing to initiate a bonus system for the clearing of land, unless it is willing to assist settlers at the primary stages of settlement, although the scheme may not be doomed entirely to failure, it will not attain the ends for which it was inaugurated. I have before me a letter written by Mr. R. Wallace, of Kingston, dealing with that matter which reads in part as follows:

Some time ago I read an account of an experiment in North Carolina, perhaps Greensboro, where forty families were taken out of the bread lines last spring and put on small holdings of vacant land. Houses were fixed up for them by repairs and otherwise, seeds and small tools were supplied, and last fall every one of them had made good, having more than enough produce to carry them through the winter, and all were happy in their independence.

The same success could be obtained in Canada if the minister would give assistance to the settlers at the initial stage of settlement. Northern Ontario does not begrudge the millions of dollars given to the west for wheat bonuses; northern Ontario does not begrudge the bonuses given to the maritime provinces in connection with freight rates, but it does feel that some assistance should be given this spring to its settlers. These men have courage and determination, they want to retain their holdings, but unless assistance is provided it will be physically impossible for them to sow their land this spring. I do not blame the government particularly for this, it is due to certain conditions which have arisen, but these men want to be able to cultivate the land they have cleared during the last two years, they want to be able to put seed in the land they cleared and ploughed last fall, and this will be impossible unless assistance is given.

Only a few days ago I had an interview with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), and he told me that the government could not interfere in this matter. However, the government will have to interfere in northern Ontario. The elevators of the west are overflowing with grain while only a few hundred miles distant settlers find it impossible to obtain seed. The expenditure of half a million dollars would be sufficient to supply seed to the settlers of northern Ontario. It is true that in the past the provincial government has been supplying seed grain at cost, but that government has a regulation to the effect that unless the grain supplied during the previous year is paid for, a settler cannot obtain a new supply. I contend it is within the jurisdiction of this government to provide the remedy for this situation. I have faith in the minister, knowing the situation as well as I do myself, and I feel confident that he will find a way to make it possible for the settlers of northern Ontario to obtain seed in order to make their holdings productive.

I thank the committee for the attention it has given to me, especially as I know it is not a popular thing for an hon. member to get up and make a speech at this period in the session. But there are occasions when an hon. member must speak, and that is the reason why I have made my statement. I want the back to the land movement to be successful, and I hope this government, in cooperation with the provincial government, will find it possible to remedy the situation. If the rural districts are made prosperous, then every other section will be prosperous; if a way is found to make it possible to keep these people on the farms, I believe the cities immediately will feel the beneficial effects. All the settlers want is a fair proportion of the good things of life, and it is within the power of this government to inaugurate a movement to satisfy their wants. We are willing to help all other activities, but we must be willing at all times also to help the primary industry of this country. For a long time to come Canada will be primarily an agricultural country. I repeat, at the present time expenditures wisely applied will go a long way towards alleviating the serious situation in which these settlers in northern Ontario now find themselves, and will thus assist our great primary industry.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understood from the minister that he had cut the immigration staff to the bone. What is the necessity for the continuation of a director of publicity at $4,140 and an assistant director of publicity at $3,000; what publicity are they carrying on?

Mr. GORDON: Prior to the change in the immigration regulations there was a large staff in the office of the director of publicity, and publicity work was carried on in the United States, Great Britain and the other countries of Europe. Since those restrictions were put into effect the staff has been very largely reduced. The present incumbents of those two offices have carried on such publicity as is necessary in connection with the colonization policy at home. Their efforts have not been as extensive as in the past because their work has been confined to Canada. The present staff consists of only five people, three stenographers and the two officials. Perhaps in the future this staff could be further reduced, but from my observations of the work they have carried on I think both these officers should be continued.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Their work at the present time is purely devoted to the colonization activities of this department within Canada?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the nature of the publicity in connection with that work?

Mr. GORDON: The preparation of articles for the press and keeping records of the meetings of the various organizations that I have called together from time to time to forward the policy of colonization at home. They have also carried on some work in connection with the British overseas offices as well as replying to inquiries from the United States not in the nature of publicity inviting people to come here, but keeping the British offices and American inquirers in touch with the situation in Canada. I would not say restricting—

Mr. NEILL: Advising them not to come.

Mr. GORDON: Not exactly; but pointing out to the British and American people just what the conditions are with respect to an immigrant's chances of success in this country. That generally is the class of work they are carrying on.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the work is only such as the minister has just described, it can certainly be carried on by any ordinary clerk in his department; it is not necessary to have a director and an assistant director of publicity for the purpose. I am not anxious that the present employees should be dismissed, far from it; but if this government is bound to carry out what to me is its absolutely stupid policy of economy, then they should carry it out in a logical and intelligent fashion, and not retain in office these departmental or branch heads who are merely decorative at the present time and performing no useful functions. If the government are going to cut out the little fellows, they should cut out the big ones too.

Mr. GORDON: I shall be very glad to take the matter under further consideration. I am persuaded, though, that these men are doing useful work at the present time.

Mr. VENIOT: Last night when we were discussing this item the minister was kind enough to give the committee the following information as to persons placed on farms: single men—by the Canadian National Railways, 2,983; Canadian Pacific, 4,331; the department, 6,155—or a total of 13,469. Were those 13,469 placements permanent, or merely single men hired temporarily to work on farms?

Mr. GORDON: Those placements were farm labourers. Whether they are permanent or not will depend upon their temperament, their environment and how much they are getting in wages. If things improve in some other locality they will probably quit the farm and go there.

Mr. VENIOT: As to the families placed, I see the figures are: 2,894 by the Canadian National; 2,471 by the Canadian Pacific and 987 by the department—a total of 6,352. The minister said the average was five to a family. Is that average arrived at from detailed information? If so, why not give the committee the number in each family placed on farms? That is quite a large average.

Mr. GORDON: Not in some sections.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister be able to furnish that information?

Mr. GORDON: I probably could, but that average was arrived at by taking a cross-section, as it were, and estimating the number in each family. We started this movement back in November, 1930, probably some of those families have increased since then, and we may have a great deal of difficulty gathering the information.

Mr. VENIOT: If the minister could get that information, even before the closing of the house, I would be quite satisfied.

Mr. GORDON: Probably I can get the information for the most part.

Mr. VALLANCE: Last night I directed a question to the minister and I made a mistake, but it seems to me the answer he has just given the member for Gloucester does not quite bear out his answer to me. He told the member for Gloucester that 14,000 single men were placed on farms. Does that total include the men who last year were placed on farms in Saskatchewan under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act?

Mr. GORDON: No, it does not.

Mr. HOWDEN: While we are talking about the back to the land movement, I would point out that there are on relief in the city of Winnipeg just now considerably over two thousand families and some seventeen thousand single men. At the present time the province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg are joining hands to place a lot of these men on the land. Personally I do not see any means by which Canada will ever overcome her unemployment problem until a large proportion of these men are got back on the land, where they can at least feed themselves. Contrary to the opinion expressed by my hon. friend from North Timiskaming (Mr. Barrette) we have a good deal of land in Manitoba that is suitable for settlement and I have no doubt that a lot of these men could be settled on the land in Manitoba, where they would at all events find a living. We have not heard so much lately about distress among the farmers of Manitoba as compared with the farmers of the other western provinces. I believe that the farmers of our province are getting at least their bread and butter and have a home over their heads. It stands to reason that at all events cabbages and potatoes can be produced on the land while they cannot be produced on a paved street in a city. This is a proposition which I think should appeal to the minister and to the government, and perhaps the government may see its way clear to giving some assistance to the province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg in getting these men back on the land. We have the men and we have the land. Many of these men who are now unemployed are bona fide farmers and they are only anxious to get a little start on the land. The amount I have heard spoken of is six or seven hundred dollars and a piece of land, not an extensive piece. I think in Manitoba at all events we can best overcome unemployment by getting these men back to the land where they can find a living for themselves on the soil.

Mr. DONNELLY: In connection with this back to the land movement, I would point out to the minister that we have in southern Saskatchewan a large dried-out area in which a great many of the farmers have not had crops for two or three years in succession. Some of them are now destitute and are moving to the northern part of Saskatchewan and trying to hew out homes for themselves there. I have had several communications from them asking if this government would be willing to assist them in any way in moving from the southern part of the province to the wooded area in the north. Is the department in any way assisting these people to move from the southern part of Saskatchewan to the north? Has the minister considered the matter at all, and is he willing to assist these people?

Mr. GORDON: The province of Saskatchewan is I believe taking care pretty well of the situation to which the hon. member refers. We must always remember that such subjects as have been referred to by various hon. gentlemen with respect to colonization are in the main peculiarly matters for the provinces to deal with, and I think each province of Canada in one way or another has set up a board or commission which is more or less taking care of that situation. We certainly have had no communications from the provinces generally with respect to the dominion entering into a state-aided scheme of colonization. The province of Saskatchewan has itself inaugurated a scheme which I believe is working very well. The province of Ontario loans money to settlers, and the province of Quebec bonuses land clearing. I do not know what efforts have been made in the maritime provinces but I am sure that they are taking some steps to colonize there because I have had occasion to talk the matter over with their representatives.

The whole question of state-aided colonization is a very, very intricate one, and our adventures into that field have not been crowned with the success that was hoped for. It is, I am afraid, only too true that if you start a person out on a farm loaded with any debt at all, in a large number of cases that will spell his ultimate disaster. That therefore confines the effort to pure gratuities, and just how far the Dominion government is justified in going along that line, and taking over a responsibility which is plainly a provincial one, is a matter for very serious consideration. I am glad to have had the views of hon. members on this question, and while I have given the matter a great deal of consideration, I wish to assure the committee that I will consider it again and see if we can work out in conjunction with the provinces some scheme that may help out in this situation. I may say that all the forces of the land settlement branch have been put at the disposal of those interested in colonization. That branch is very efficiently run, and I know from the many hundreds of communications I have received that it is rendering a real service. I, personally, and I think in this I speak for nearly every member of the house, do not want to go into any state-aided colonization scheme unless it becomes abundantly apparent that that is the only solution. We have met with a measure of success, as I pointed out last night, in inducing people who have some money to take up farms, but we have almost exhausted that class of people who have had an agricultural background and who have sufficient money to return to the land. The future with respect to further efforts along the line of colonization will have to be worked out as we come to it.

Mr. MARCIL: The minister has the advantage—I do not know whether it is really an advantage or otherwise just now,—of filling the dual capacity of Minister of Labour and Acting Minister of Immigration. He has been kind enough to express the wish to hear the views of hon. members with respect to colonization schemes that may be in progress in different parts of Canada. I would like to call attention to the province of Quebec, particularly the eastern part including the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure. In Bonaventure county the lumber industry has practically disappeared. Our limits have been sold out to the International pulp mills. The mills have been closed down, and last year there were no shanties at all in Gaspé and Bonaventure counties, and only one in Matane county. Thousands of young men have been thrown out of work, and consequently the local farmer has no market for his produce. There is a state of affairs existing in that county which I have not seen for the last thirty years that I have had the honour to represent it here in this house. The present government, under the mandate given it by the people, is seeking to face a condition of affairs which has never before existed in the history of Canada. Many different crises have been discussed in this house from away back to 1878, but within my experience the present one is ten times worse than any we have had before. The only solution that we have in the province of Quebec is to try to induce the thousands of farmers who have flocked into the cities, particularly to Montreal and Quebec, to return to the land. Many of these people are now homeless or will be turned out on the first of May because they are unable to pay their rent. Applications have already been made for the use of the drill hall in Montreal to house hundreds of these families. I understand that twelve hundred families are to be put out on the street on the first of May in the city of Quebec. A large number of these people are farmers or the sons of farmers who flocked into the city at the time of the war where in munitions work they earned as much as ten or fifteen or sixteen dollars a day. Attracted by those high wages they gave up farming. There is no solution possible in the province of Quebec without a return to the farm, no matter to what extent manufacturing and industrial occupations may be developed. We have in Canada ten millions of people in a country that might be able to support one hundred millions of people, but we cannot support our present population without a great many of them returning to the land. No matter what program the government has in mind, no matter what is agreed to at the forthcoming Imperial conference along the line of developing industry and manufacturing, the problem of unemployment in Canada will not be settled until a large proportion of our people return to the land. These people must be sent back to the farms, back to the land. I was glad to hear the minister say that the legislature of the province of Quebec has undertaken some back to the land scheme. In my own constituency His Lordship Bishop Ross, now the bishop of Gaspé, during the last five or six years has headed a movement with a view to opening up new colonization centres in the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure, and has attracted a large number of young married people who have gone into these settlements to make homes for themselves, repeating the history of the formation of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec which took place a century and a half or two centuries ago.

So far as I can see there is but one solution for the people to whom I have referred, namely to induce them to go back to the land where at least they may have something to eat. True, at the present time there is no market, but the time will come when there will be. Our lack of market is at the root of our present economic difficulties. Due to a kind Providence we have bountiful products of all kinds in all parts of the country with the exception of one or two isolated parts. I hope the Imperial economic conference will be productive of markets; if it is our troubles will be solved, and also the railways will profit. I hope the minister will not abandon his efforts to help the province of Quebec in its scheme of colonization. I know it is his ambition and that of his colleagues to put an end to the present state of affairs, and this can be effected only by going back to the land.

En passant, may I say the Dominion government granted a sum of money to my constituency to carry on local improvement works. The eastern part of the province of Quebec has climatic conditions different from those of Ottawa. In that part of the country, so far as weather conditions are concerned, we are three or four weeks behind this city. Therefore a large number of works authorized last fall have not yet been commenced; others have been commenced but not continued. I have had the honour to send the minister a resolution from county councils in my constituency asking for an extension of time. This work cannot possibly be completed by May 1, and although small when compared with other problems the government have to face, it is important that some way should be found to give an extension of time for the completion of the work. The government may see fit to extend the time to June 1 or July 1.

Coming as he does from a new part of Canada, I should like to impress upon the minister the importance of getting people back to the land. We know that northern Ontario has been changed from a wilderness to its present state of development and that it is one of the most promising parts of Canada. The same may be said of the eastern section of the mother province of Quebec; the conditions down there are about the same as those which obtained in northern Ontario. I hope the aid given to that section of eastern Canada will not be merely transitory but of a lasting character, something which will endure.

Mr. MUNN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in connection with this back to the land movement. In my view if the provincial and federal governments cooperate much good could be accomplished.

I should like to say only a few words concerning the province of British Columbia. In that province there are thousands of acres of logged-off land, fertile soil, where it is not necessary to have irrigation. Climatic conditions are perhaps the best obtaining anywhere in Canada or, indeed, anywhere in the world. The trouble with logged-off lands is that it costs too much for any individual to clear them, the cost being about $300 or $400 per acre. Once they are cleared however they are really worth while. My opinion is that the federal government in cooperation with the provincial government should formulate some land clearing scheme whereby they may put on the market ready-made farms. Those farms would not necessarily be large, because four or five acres of land will support the ordinary small family which might come from the city of Vancouver, Victoria or one of the other large centres. Although the individual cannot finance the clearing, the government is in a position to borrow funds, and carry on the work.

At this time when there is so much unemployment, rather than build roads here, there, and everywhere, I suggest that those lands be cleared, small houses built, and an opportunity afforded to men from the city to gain a living. Probably they would not be regular farmers, but chaps who had not made a success of city life. Get them back to the land; they are misfits in the cities. At least they could grow their vegetables and fruit, could keep cows and chickens or whatever would be necessary to maintain a family. The minister said these men would have to have money; I do not think that is so. Those farms could be sold, to purchasers bonded for a period of twenty years. Payments could be made small, thereby enabling the average man to make a success of his venture.

I am absolutely opposed to any assistance being given to immigration. Rather than assist a policy of immigration I should like to see a system such as I have suggested. Help the chaps who are now here. Get taxes down, and make Canada a country in which people will want to live. When people in other countries see Canada is worth while they will come, without assistance. In the meantime help the people at home.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a situation which has arisen in my own constituency and to which I have already directed the attention of the deputy minister who has been kind enough to give me all the information at his disposal. I refer to the action of the United States immigration authorities in refusing Nova Scotia fishermen and yachtsmen admittance to the United States to undertake seasonal employment in that country. The minister may not know that these men, because of the serious condition in the fishing industry in Nova Scotia, go to the New England ports and sail from them either on trawlers or schooners to the fishing banks. Some of them ship as members of the crew or as skippers on yachts from the city of New York and elsewhere. All this is seasonal employment, and many of them have gone back and forth in this way for years. This year, for the first time, they have been refused admission to the United States, with the result that many are deprived of their means of livelihood. I understand fully that this is a matter within the control of the United States immigration authorities. The deputy minister was good enough, however, to ask me to submit to him any names I may have, and I am getting them for him.

I wished to bring the matter to the attention of the minister however, and it is for that reason I am now taking the time of the committee with the idea of finding out from him if there is any possibility of making arrangements in cases such as I have described. I have in mind an arrangement which I have seen described in the newspapers whereby Canadians and citizens of the United States cross the border between the cites of Windsor and Detroit to attend their daily vocations, each in the country of the other. That arrangement must be the result of some convention. I was wondering if there was any possibility, or if the minister knew of any method whereby effective representations could be made so that these citizens of Canada might work at their usual avocations in the United States during seasonal periods.

Mr. GORDON: I am very glad the hon. member has brought up the question. It is under consideration by the department, attention having been directed to it by other hon. members as well. I will do my utmost to see that the same sort of arrangement is made with respect to the people to whom the hon. member refers as has been made at Detroit and Windsor.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to say just a word with regard to some of the suggestions which have been made to the minister this afternoon in regard to land colonization. I have listened with great interest and some amusement to some of the proposals which have been made. It is possible that if the speakers had taken time to go into details they might have answered the objections I am going to take, so it would be unfair on my part to denounce their proposals as absurd, although frankly I am tempted to do so.

For the first time in this house I am in the happy position, with regard to this question, of agreeing with the minister. I congratulate him on having taken the ground that to attempt to place men on the farms to-day under a burden of debt would render the possibility of their success almost negligable. I agree heartily with him. I wonder how many of the members who have been speaking of paving stones and cabbages realize that you can walk out on a farm to-day but you cannot pluck cabbages, nor can you pick up eggs under every piece of shrubbery. Indeed you cannot domesticate the wild fowl that are still to be found in some parts of our provinces. You cannot catch a buffalo and milk it. These things all cost a good deal of money. To start farming under the scheme suggested by the hon. member from northern Ontario or the hon. member from Manitoba would imply at least a plough, a drill, harness, horses, seed, a wagon, at least a cow, a stable, a house and some fencing. I am leaving out of the picture at the moment the chickens which are almost a necessity. Surely chickens would be needed at the start, unless my hon. friend from Manitoba has the idea that the would-be farmers could go out and rob the nests of the wild ducks. They could do that for a time in the spring, breaking the law by doing so, but that source of supply would be rapidly exhausted.

I do think members should take into more serious consideration the financial aspect of farming to-day. It is no longer possible, as it was in the days of my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), to go out on a farm and use the old hand-made implements, weave your own clothes and make nearly everything you require at home. Those days have passed with regard to modern scientific agriculture. So far as the unemployed are concerned, I doubt if the average person who is out of work to-day is temperamentally fitted for farming, even if he is fitted by education. Some of these people may have drifted in from the farms, but they have lost contact and they do not like the life. If they had liked it they would have tried to stay with it, as many of us have done. The fact is that it is very difficult to take the average unemployed man and turn him into a farmer. Certainly it cannot be done inexpensively, and the proposal seems to be that the state should be saddled with the financial burden of turning unemployed men into farmers. Before they could even begin to pluck a cabbage they would have several months of seeding and other work. Frankly I regard the proposals as ill made and ill thought out, and I think the minister will be on absolutely safe ground if he takes an exceedingly conservative attitude towards these suggestions.

Mr. NEILL: I should like the minister to give me a little information with regard to general immigration. I should like to have the figures for the last twelve month period of which he has record, giving the total immigration into Canada, as well as the number of those coming from the continent of Europe and elsewhere and those coming from the British Isles.

Mr. GORDON: The total immigration for the eleven months of the fiscal year ending February 28, 1931, was 85,810, and the total for the eleven months ending February 29, 1932, was 24,314. In the first mentioned period British immigration amounted to 26,951, and in the last mentioned period to 6,818. Immigration from the United States in the first mentioned period amounted to 22,877, and in the last mentioned period to 13,394.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to make a few remarks on that subject. I have not taken any of the time of the committee during this debate hitherto, and I would not have taken any time this afternoon had I not become a little fed up with the reiterated statements that have come across the floor of the house, not only from back benchers but from cabinet ministers as well, to the effect that a great deal of the economic distress and unemployment in this country to-day is due to the immigration policies pursued by the late Liberal government. I think if there is any subject at all on which hon. gentlemen opposite who sat in this house during the last three parliaments should keep quiet, it is this subject of immigration. Talk about people in glass houses not throwing stones; hon. gentlemen opposite would need to have a house of brass to maintain the attitude they have taken, knowing as they must know what has been the attitude of their party in the past.

I am not here to defend the Liberal party with regard to the number of immigrants they brought into the country. I thought they brought in too many, but I said so in 1923 and did not wait until 1932. I did not blow hot in 1923 and cold in 1932. It is well known to all of us who have been here since 1921 how bitter and unanimous were the reproaches of the Conservative opposition of that day against the Liberal government because more immigrants were not brought in. A vigorous policy of immigration was talked of on every platform and from almost every seat on this side of the house. There is only one section of this house that has any reason to say "I told you so" or which can come out of this mess with clean hands, that is the section occupied by the groups in this corner. While I am not directly a member of those groups, except as a member of the little group which sits at this desk, we are affiliated in as much as we are often united by the bonds of common interest and common ideals in political matters. I hear an hon. member say that we are united also by the bond of common sense, and there is also something in that statement.

As I say, they—and I also—repeatedly opposed the government of the day in the efforts they made to bring in so many people. Our stand was consistent then and is consistent to-day. I will leave the other groups to speak for themselves, but briefly and sketchily I want to clear my skirts of any suggestion that I was in any way a party to having a great number of immigrants brought in. I go back now to the year 1923, that is nine years ago,—and I could go back further if I wanted to. I find that I spoke then on March 15 on this subject, pointing out that in my opinion the two main sources of the demand for this excessive immigration were the transportation companies, who sought to make money by the transportation, and the large corporations of employers, who sought to bring in large numbers of labourers so that they might have a bank of idle men from which to draw as occasion required. I also made the point that I thought that was an expensive bank to have, that it was not a profitable thing, that we had to pay for that idle labour in many ways. I said:

> We pay for it in the mental and physical deterioration of the workers, for one thing. We pay for it as well in the cost of the doles, amounting up to millions. In the old country those unemployment doles amount to many millions every month. They are forced to do it over there or there would be a revolution. We will be forced to do it in Canada, and we pay in that way as well as in the other ways I have indicated.

[Mr. Neill.]

That was almost prophetic considering that it was said nine years ago. I also commented on the deteriorating effect of unemployment, citing my own experience in that regard. I pointed out that we brought in these men at the danger of increasing the discontent of the unemployed in Canada. Does not that sound true to-day? I said that for these reasons and many others, we should not be allowed to make ourselves the vehicle, not to say the tool, of piling up a large surplus of idle labour for the corporations. I also referred to the fact that the policy of the Minister of Immigration of the day seemed to be, as regards the prairies, to bring in a lot more farmers, in the belief that this would make the farmers in the prairies prosperous. I pointed out that this was putting the cart before the horse, because the better way was to make farming prosperous, and farmers, hearing from their friends who had succeeded, would then come in. Later on, in 1928, on March 5, I brought up the subject again. I said I did not expect to get any sympathy or support from either of the two major parties because my ideas did not agree with those of either of them, and I noted the fact that we were dealing at the moment with the proposed assisted system of immigration. I said I thought it was the Ultima Thule of audacity to ask unemployed men in this country to pay taxes in order to bring in others to compete with them, and I wondered whether the manufacturers would be willing to do the same as to manufacturers. Working men in this country were being asked to pay taxes to bring in other workers to compete with them in the often congested labour market, and I asked whether that was the idea of protection we had heard so much about. I also pointed out the evils of this assisted system. Men were being brought out to farm on the prairies and were afterwards discovered in the slums of Toronto. Further, I referred to an investigation that had taken place in the United States which demonstrated that after all available free land had been exhausted the bringing-in of more immigrants did not increase our population but only replaced our children and our children's children by the sons of people now living in Bulgaria or Roumania or some other country in Europe.

I come now to May, 1929, when the immigration vote was again under discussion and the assisted system of immigration was being considered. The then member for Pontiac, Mr. Cahill, moved that the vote should be cut down to one dollar, and this was supported by the present member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) and the present member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), both Liberals. It was supported very largely and strongly by members of the Progressive group now to my left. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) were particularly outspoken, and I see that the former gentleman warned the minister that he had better be careful before introducing similar votes in the house or he would be liable to sustain defeat. On that occasion I said that I was in accord with the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite—referring to the member for Acadia and the member for Battle River—and added that while we did not want to embarrass the minister by refusing to vote money which he had already committed himself to spend, I should like him to reply to the request made by the hon. member for Acadia, that he would pledge himself to consider seriously before bringing in at another session any more votes of that kind. I asked him to give an undertaking that he would consult the house and pay a good deal of attention to the sentiments that were then expressed. The debate on that occasion covered several pages of Hansard, but not a single protest was made by the party to my right. Their attitude was at all times the complaint that the government did not bring in enough people. It was the Progressives, the farmers, the Labour members and the Independents that protested.

We come now to the present situation. Very shortly after the present government were returned to power, it was largely heralded in the newspapers—I think in August or very shortly after that—that they had passed an order in council prohibiting or very much restricting immigration. I was very much pleased to see this intimation, but the orders in council were not printed in the papers; all that was published was the general idea, and certainly the impression that the ordinary individual, even the ordinary member of parliament, would gather from those reports was that the restriction of immigration had been almost wholly complete. But that proved to be very far from being the case. As a matter of fact, the government only restricted to a degree those from the continent of Europe, and practically no restrictions at all were placed on those from the British Isles. On June 26, 1931, the Minister of Immigration said:

> Immigration from Great Britain has not stopped and has not been restricted.

I ask the house to take note of that.

> Any Britisher who wants to come to Canada . . . is as welcome as anyone else. I hope the time will never come when there is any restriction against people coming to this country from Great Britain.

And even last night the hon. gentleman emphasized the same thing again. That is only twice, but he has said it on several occasions in between. He said:

> So far as I am concerned, . . . I want to say to the committee that there will be no shutting of the door to British immigration.

So that it is quite clear what his attitude is. With all due deference and speaking as a man born in the British Isles and with all the sympathy with the British people which that suggests, for my relations are there, and my people's graves are there, so that I sympathize with them in whatever troubles they are called upon to bear, I submit, nevertheless, that in view of present conditions, we are not entitled to let immigration in at the figures mentioned a few minutes ago, even from the British Isles. Two years ago, possibly only eighteen months ago, what did New Zealand do? If there is a dominion within the empire which is more exclusively British in its point of view and in its racial origin than any other, that place is New Zealand. The reasons I need not discuss; it is so. You will find very few Americans or people who have come from the continent of Europe settled in New Zealand. The people of New Zealand are almost exclusively English and Scotch, with an admixture of Irish. You can see that in the place names: Christchurch, Wellington, Nelson, Oxford and so forth; and in the province where the Scotch settled Scotch names predominate. Now what did these people do, with all their inherited association with the British Isles, with all their intense loyalty to their racial origin? What did they do in their legislature, without protest? Either legislation or an order in council was passed stating that because of the present conditions of unemployment they were sorry but they would not be able to permit any immigrants to come from the British Isles. A vote of regret was passed and forwarded to the British government, but they felt that their paramount duty was to those to whom they owed that duty, that is the people of New Zealand, and that immigration should be prohibited for the time being.

That is the attitude we should adopt. The minister has indicated that the immigration for a period of eleven months amounted to 24,000, which would be about 26,000 or 27,000 for the year. Take 27,000 people and plant them down in Ottawa or any other city, say to them "What are you going to do?" or "What are we going to do with you," and what will happen? I admit that the order in council contains restrictions to the effect that no man shall be admitted unless he has sufficient funds to maintain himself until he can obtain employment, but who in these days can say how much money will be sufficient for that purpose? There was a time when $5 would have kept a man until he could obtain employment; there was a time when $20 would have been sufficient, or at the most $100, but who to-day would be willing to pledge his word, or, more important, his pocketbook to guarantee that a certain amount would be sufficient to keep a man until he obtained a job? These immigrants are carpenters, blacksmiths, mechanics and farmers, and who can say what would be a reasonable amount for them to have? Would $2,000 be sufficient? It might be three years before a man could obtain a position, and he and his family would have to exist in the meantime. Twenty-seven thousand times the requisite figure—these people do not bring that amount with them—would be required. Under present conditions it is absolutely impossible to say whether it will take six weeks, six months or two years before a man can find employment. In the meantime these people are a burden on the community or are taking work away from those who are here and who surely have the first claim. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has said that we are passing through a desperate crisis, a crisis such as Canada and the world has never known before, and yet these people are permitted to enter. The government is spending millions in order to keep the unemployed from revolt. There are 30,000 idle men in Vancouver and it needs only one man with brains to act as a leader to bring about trouble. These are the conditions under which we inject 27,000 more emigrants.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think the hon. member would make an incorrect statement by design, and I interrupt at this time in order that there may be no misapprehension. The figures disclose that of the 27,000—averaging the figures for the twelve months—21,000 are wives and children coming out to relatives. At the present time when an application is made for the admission of a relative, the officials visit the man who wants to bring out his relatives and inquire as to his ability to care for them. I have insisted that before permission is granted it must be abundantly apparent that the man is able to receive his relatives and continue to take care of them.

Mr. NEILL: Would the term "relatives" include only wives and children, or does it include other relations?

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. GORDON: Wives and children and a few brothers and sisters.

Mr. NEILL: And cousins?

Mr. GORDON: There are a few other relatives.

Mr. NEILL: I am reminded of the maid who, caught in the kitchen with a policeman, always explains the situation by saying it was her cousin. Why have these people suddenly left their relations in the old country to come out here? Even if the figure is smaller than I have stated, and after all I took the minister's own figure, even though it is only 6,000, that is 6,000 too many. It is folly's crown of follies, to bring out more people at the present time, and the government should restrict all immigration until a brighter day dawns.

We are unable to find out just what means the government intends to adopt to remedy the present situation. We have to go to the columns of the newspapers for information. When we inquire on the floor of the house we are snubbed and told that we will receive the information at the government's pleasure. The newspapers state that the government is going to give only direct relief, no work and is looking into the question of unemployment insurance, but when we ask a question in the house we receive no satisfaction or information. We are left to glean our information from the columns of the press in some distant part of the dominion.

Under present conditions I repeat that for the moment we should regretfully reject the entry of any brothers, sisters or cousins from Great Britain, allowing only wives and minor children.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly interested at this time in the immigration of Anglo Saxon or European people, but I am concerned with the immigration of Asiatics into British Columbia. The minister will remember that last year I brought up the subject and stated I believed that over 40 per cent of the Japanese in British Columbia had entered illegally. The minister told me that he had no knowledge or information concerning that fact. Since that time my statement has been corroborated, because the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been carrying on investigations, I assume, in collaboration with the minister.

Mr. GORDON: They were under way at that time.

Mr. REID: I am glad to hear that, although the information came to me after I had spoken in the house. The following are extracts from newspaper articles dealing with these investigations:

Yoshi, who had been an Immigration department interpreter for sixteen years before his arrest last July, was convicted mainly on the strength of silent witnesses, a mass of documents put in as exhibits during the two-day trial by Hon. R. L. Maitland, K.C., acting for the Dominion government.

The plot, evidence showed, was almost detection-proof. Faked naturalization papers were forwarded to Yoshi's fellow-racketeers in Yokohama, Jinno, Mochizuki and Maruyama.

This trio rustled up "business" among Japanese seeking entry to Canada, saw that they got passports, provided them with spurious naturalization certificates, coached them as to what they should say when they met immigration authorities at Vancouver.

Then the "tip" was cabled to Yoshi, according to the evidence of the documents. As interpreter for the department he met the boats, translated questions into Japanese for the immigration inspectors, translated the newcomers' answers into English.

It was not necessary, the crown claimed, for Yoshi to interpret incorrectly, for the immigrants had already been prepared as to what to tell the inspectors.

Now comes the serious part:

Further testimony showed that the "racket" was so highly organized that a regular scale of prices had been set. In correspondence the aliens were referred to as "pieces of cargo," and the approximate price for one "piece" was $150.

I have four questions to ask in connection with this matter. First, how many cases were investigated? Second, how many deportations took place as a result of the investigation? Third, is the investigation still proceeding? Fourth, what steps are being taken to prevent a repetition of this kind of business?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figures as to the number of people who were deported following the investigation. I may say for the information of the hon. member that very shortly after I took over the administration of the department, in making a general review as to how things were going, I concluded there was something wrong in Vancouver. The officers of the department had had the port under observation, and the investigation referred to was then in progress—not by any means an easy investigation to carry to success. I trust the reference to Mr. Maitland as being a member of the British Columbia legislature is not to his disadvantage.

Mr. REID: Not at all.

Mr. GORDON: I found him to be a very eminent counsel.

Mr. REID: I am pleased he conducted the investigation.

Mr. GORDON: As a result of the investigation, Yoshi, who had acted as interpreter for fifteen years, is now in the penitentiary. Investigations are going on constantly. I have enlisted the help of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and we hope to minimize illegal entries. I may say the Japanese are not by any means the only race who enter this and other countries in defiance of immigration laws. With respect to the observations made by the member for Comox-Alberni, I need only repeat that I cannot agree with him that where a man has been legally admitted and is found to be doing well we should prevent his wife and children joining him.

Mr. NEILL: No, I do not ask that.

Mr. GORDON: That is the policy at the present time with respect to the immigration to which reference has been made. We are certainly investigating each case to ensure that unemployment or destitution will not occur by reason of a man's wife and family being allowed to join him.

Mr. NEILL: I do not wish to tell the minister his own business, but I happened to make an investigation with regard to the Japanese, and I understood that twenty have already been deported in consequence of the investigations made by the department, that further cases are being investigated and possibly fifty or sixty Japanese who came in by this particular form of "racketting," as the member for New Westminster said, through the collusion of this particular Japanese crook, will be deported. It emphasizes what I have said in the past. I believe the department is now going to adopt the principle that I advocated some years ago. I said at that time it was a mistake to have exclusively Japanese interpreters. I always held it was possible to get white men who could speak the oriental languages. I understand the department are now taking steps to this end, which will shut off that avenue of fraud in the future.

Mr. REID: I am glad the member for Comox-Alberni has mentioned the matter, because I think it is advisable that a Canadian immigration inspector who can speak the Japanese language should be chosen for the position of interpreter. In view of the fact that the bars are up against Europeans and who might very well become good citizens, has the minister considered the advisability of something being done to prevent the entry of Asiatics? Their standard of living is lower than ours, British Columbia appears almost a paradise to them, and their entry is bound to be detrimental to our people.

Mr. GORDON: The only Asiatics who are permitted to enter Canada at the present time are the wives, and children under eighteen years of age, of Canadian citizens presently residing in Canada, who have been legally admitted to Canada, and who on investigation are found to be ready and willing and able to receive and care for their relatives.

Mr. NEILL: What about the gentleman's agreement with reference to the Japanese?

Mr. GORDON: I had not that in mind when making the statement. I think every member is acquainted with the agreement entered into with Japan, which contemplates the entry of 150 Japanese each year.

Mr. NEILL: I have not the agreement before me, but I am familiar with it as I had a great deal to do with its being brought about. By that gentleman's agreement it was arranged that hereafter—it was not so before—Japanese immigrants would be subject to the immigration laws of Canada, except only that they could bring in seventy-five adults of a certain restricted class and seventy-five women and children each year. It is quite possible that that agreement was framed to carry out a well-known oriental expression, "to save their face". The Japanese said they did not mind so much being excluded if we insisted on it, but they did not want it to be done by force of law as though they were an inferior people. But it was distinctly understood, and so expressed if I am not mistaken, that they would take no exception to any restrictions on the immigration of their people, providing those restrictions were common to the world at large. They said: You can restrict us altogether, if you restrict white people too. So if the government in August, 1930, had said: "This order in council will also apply to the oriental people," the Japanese could not have made any objection, because they would have been treated in the same way as white people. I think the government has been remiss in not applying that principle, for now we have this very unsatisfactory condition— certain white men from continental Europe cannot come in, but they see 150 Japanese being allowed to enter every year by means of this agreement. I think the minister might well consider the application of that general restriction. I am sure the Japanese would not find any fault under the circumstances.

Mr. HOWDEN: The government seems to have reversed their policy. Not so many months ago a young man came out from England of his own volition, paying his own way. He was held up at Halifax and informed that he could not land. He had very well-to-do relatives in the city of Winnipeg. They corresponded with the department, but were unavailing in their efforts to have their brother remain in this country. My assistance was sought, and I telegraphed the department that the young man's relatives were prepared to post $500 and guarantee his support for five years at least. The reply I got from the deputy minister was: Would I take the responsibility of advising that this man be allowed to enter Canada and take the bread out of the mouth of another Canadian? That seems to me to be a decided reversal of policy.

Mr. GORDON: Could the hon. gentleman give me the name?

Mr. HOWDEN: Not offhand. I telegraphed the deputy minister and wrote the minister. Let me cite another case. A young lad was brought to this country by his parents when he was about five years of age. His father eventually became naturalized. When the boy was twenty-six years of age he went to visit relatives in the States, stayed there for about eight months, and then had a mighty hard time trying to get back into Canada. He spoke no language but English. He was not familiar with the language of his parents who had come from central or southern Europe. I am not sure whether he did finally get back here or was sent to the old country because the American authorities held him up as being an alien, and when he was not permitted to reenter Canada it looked as if he would be sent back to Poland or some other European country, where he would have been considerably more of an alien than in this land. I mention these two cases because it seems to me rather strange that they were treated in this manner only two months ago and now we hear that thousands of immigrants are being permitted to enter this country. I certainly would be the last man to keep families separated. I think that wives should certainly be permitted to join their husbands and children their parents, but apart from that I do think that none from outside should be permitted to enter Canada at this time.

My former remarks seemed to cause considerable apprehension in the mind of my hon. friend from Bow River. I was suggesting that this government might well assist the movement which is now going on in Winnipeg, to place unemployed families on the land, not to make farmers of them, but to place them on the land where they could make a living for themselves.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How would they live?

Mr. HOWDEN: They would not necessarily have to go extensively into the business of grain farming. I might say to my hon. friend who has interrupted that one of the difficulties we have had in this country in the past is that too many people have gone on the land for no other purpose than to grow grain. Lots of people with no idea of living in their homes on the land go out into the country in the summer, put in a crop and harvest it with machinery, and then move back into town when winter comes along.

Mr. CAMPBELL: A very small percentage do that.

Mr. HOWDEN: But the fact remains that it does occur and has occurred, and that is probably one of the reasons why there have been failures in grain farming on an extensive scale in western Canada and other places. The problem we are up against now is: what is this country going to do with these unemployed? There is no possible chance that I can see of manufacturing industry being able to absorb the hundreds of thousands of idle people that we have in this country at the present time. Every community throughout Canada is burdened with unemployed men, and those people who have some little resources left are called upon to help feed these hundreds of thousands of people. A very large number of these unemployed have expressed their desire to go back to the land with a little bit of assistance, and get their living from the soil. I would submit to the minister and to the committee that from the earliest days of history human beings have always taken their living from the land. They cannot take it from paved roads or city streets. There is only one place they can take a living from, and that is from the land, and hundreds of people just now are prepared to make the trial. Since the cities and communities of Canada are feeding these unemployed month after month and year after year, it seems to me it would be a saving in the long run if they were given an opportunity to make this trial.

The hon. member who criticized my remarks and those of some others of us said that the proposal was ill made and ill thought out. The Winnipeg city council and the members of the provincial government in Manitoba have decided that it is not ill made and not ill thought out, and they are endeavouring to provide considerable funds to send hundreds of these men to the country where they will probably be able to make a living. There is no suggestion that they be put on quarter-sections and be made fully fledged farmers, or anything of that kind. The idea is that they will be able to sow enough vegetables and raise enough poultry and what not to enable themselves and their families to live. The objection was offered by the hon. member for Bow River that it would cost an unreasonable amount of money to establish these men. I would point out to the minister and to the committee that there are communities in Manitoba where men have gone back to the land without any funds at all and we do not hear any complaints from them to-day. I grant you that they came originally from southern Europe, and that they did not spend very much money on automobiles or picture shows or other modern sources of entertainment and amusement. But the fact is that it can be done, and that people can go back on a productive piece of land and get a living from it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: How can they get the land?

Mr. HOWDEN: That is the problem that presents itself to the several governments. These people will have to be supplied with the land and with a few hundred dollars. There seems to be no prospect of ending this process of feeding hundreds of thousands of people; we cannot kill them off, drown them or shoot them. We have to feed them, and if they are given a chance to feed themselves it is possible that they may make some headway.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have been trying for some time to get an opportunity to ask a supplementary question of the minister along the line which has just now been spoken of by the hon. member for St. Boniface. I do not intend to enter upon a discussion of the merits of the scheme, but the fact is, as I said earlier, that the Winnipeg city council and the province of Manitoba have endorsed a certain scheme. The minister told me a little while ago that his department was not prepared to give financial aid to this scheme.

There is another point which I think ought to be cleared up, and it would be of very great help to the committee in Winnipeg if it were cleared up at the present time. Supposing that so many hundreds of these unemployed men were actually placed on the land as a mere relief measure, would this government be prepared to give, say, the one-third of what it would otherwise cost them for relief if these people had remained in the city, and thus assist to that degree in the carrying out of the scheme? I think we ought to have a very definite answer, yes or no, as it would materially help the Winnipeg committee to know what they can expect from Ottawa.

Mr. GORDON: It is obvious that any such action as that would have to be of general application all over Canada. The province of Saskatchewan are doing this very thing themselves in conjunction with their cities. The province of Quebec has adopted another method of encouraging the return to the farm lands of that province. With respect to the other provinces I am not presently acquainted with what they are doing. I am not yet prepared to agree that this is primarily a responsibility of the dominion. As I said in my observations an hour or so ago, many schemes have been started. I have investigated a lot of them, and I must say that while they were started undoubtedly with the best of intentions, they could not hope to go forward with any degree of success because the people who started them were more enthusiastic about the theory than they were acquainted, in my view, with the actual facts of how to assist people on to the land. It strikes me that to be a successful farmer, and I say this subject to correction by any of those who have spent their lives on the land, you require a good deal of training to know how to make headway on a farm, and of course everyone will agree with me that you also need an abundance of courage. I think it would be a great mistake just to take people who happen to be unemployed and put them on a farm. I think no useful purpose would be served, and one season would not pass before they would forget even to thank us for our efforts. I believe they must have the desire to go on the land and must have some agricultural background. True, an odd one who has not had experience may succeed, but from my talks with men who should know—and I believe, do know—I learn it is most essential that we do not take people who are utterly inexperienced, and put them out on the land. They would suffer great hardships.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the judgment of the minister, any relief assistance granted by the Dominion government could not be diverted to help any scheme of that kind?

Mr. GORDON: The subject has been given a great deal of consideration. I do not wish to appear to be one who is not prepared to put forth every effort to help as much as possible. I do not think however that time has yet arrived—and I hope it will not arrive—when in Canada we have to begin a system of state-aided colonization. The other phase of the matter has a good deal of merit, namely to capitalize what we know we might have to pay to a certain person for purposes of direct relief, and help to establish him on a farm. If the provinces cannot discharge their legislative responsibilities, and find themselves hopelessly insolvent—I hope none of them do, and I believe they are not in that position—then they may make out a case whereby the federal government would be justified in adopting throughout Canada a plan such as that suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I said earlier, I am sorry to be so insistent. The committee in Winnipeg knows perfectly well that if the scheme is to go through this year it must be proceeded with within the next few days. We have had warm weather in Winnipeg, and they are urging the government to give the necessary yes or no with regard to their proposition for the present season. I ask the minister just to say yes or no; with whatever he says I shall be quite satisfied. I should like however to have a direct answer which would enable the committee in Winnipeg to know what it may expect from the government.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Representing one of the Winnipeg constituencies, I was deeply interested in the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) and I heartily support the principle put forward by him. In the matter of unemployment Winnipeg has a burden upon its shoulders which is daily becoming more unbearable. In that city the idea of assisting to relieve the unemployed by putting them on the land has received a good deal of consideration. As I understand it there is no suggestion indiscriminately to place upon the land people without any agricultural background. In the city of Winnipeg, however, as in many other centres throughout Canada, there are people who in more prosperous days, for one reason or another, picked up their belongings and moved from the rural to the urban centres. What caused them to do so is not of importance, but the fact is that many unemployed in the city of Winnipeg—and I know it—are experienced agriculturists and, having found that the bright lights of the city are not as wonderful as they had thought, are now hungry to go back to the land.

I do not think the present is the time to debate whether or not the duty is primarily that of the federal government, the provincial government or the administration in the city of Winnipeg. We are faced with certain given facts, and we know that since the special session of 1930 the federal government has seen fit to cooperate not only in principle but with funds to relieve the unemployment situation through public works undertakings and payments of direct relief. If the federal government has funds to assist in the erection of buildings in the city of Winnipeg, if it can expend federal moneys for food, clothing and fuel to effect direct relief, then there is no technical reason why funds could not be provided to place unemployed men on the land, if it is deemed expedient so to do.

I urge upon the serious consideration of the minister the facts brought out so forcibly by the hon. member for St. Boniface, and the suggestion that the government seriously consider endeavouring to work out a plan along the line suggested by the hon. member. It is my understanding that before prorogation there will be introduced such further legislation as may be necessary to deal with unemployment. It is not for me to say, nor do I know what the nature of that legislation will be. However the public press carries information, or what purports to be information, to the effect that the relief granted will be confined to what is known as direct relief. In my opinion it would be deplorable if relief were confined to direct relief.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I hope such will not be the case, but that whatever legislation is introduced in the house will be sufficiently wide that the measure of aid to be granted will not be confined to direct relief. In that connection it is my hope that in working out the relief scheme this matter of placing those who are well qualified and anxious and hungry to go on the land will be fitted into the program. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) asked: Where would they get the farms? That situation has been canvassed. I know that in the province of Manitoba there are many abandoned farms. There is no suggestion of putting people out into the wilderness or the bush; abandoned farms are available. Many of them are available because of abandonment which took place as a result of the soldiers' settlement scheme. Farms were bought at a price far beyond their intrinsic value, with the result that there have come back to the municipalities farms which were once well cultivated, and with substantial buildings situated thereon. Titles to them have reverted either to the municipalities, for taxes, or to the crown. They are improved; the buildings are going to ruin, and the land—and it is good land—is growing up with weeds. Certainly there is a tremendous economic waste. The suggestion has been made that under the proposed settlement scheme these lands might be carefully selected and be made available at a mere nominal value. If they were given by the municipality or by the crown to the individuals placed thereon, to my mind that in itself would be a good investment. They would then become productive, which would mean revenue to the municipalities in which they were located. I have very great pleasure in taking advantage of this opportunity to urge strongly upon the minister the advisability of keeping an open mind on that question and endeavouring to work it out.

Mr. YOUNG: Would you have the government equip these farms?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Let me answer that in this way. I would suggest that in working it out there be a committee, and without casting any reflection upon members of either the legislature of Manitoba or this house I would suggest that the members of the committee be not politicians, not members of either assembly, but practical business men and agriculturists who would choose the locations and judge as to the suitability of the individuals desiring to be so placed. With regard to the capital, that could be provided jointly by the governments and the municipalities, as has been done in the matter of direct relief. This could be done instead of merely supplying a man with food and lodging; it would give him a stake and a real chance. Even though there were many failures, with a fair percentage of successes the scheme would be worth while. When you give direct relief the relief is only temporary. It seems to me the other system has more vision to it; you are really giving a man a stake in the country.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the suggestion just made, and to many others which have been offered. I had intended to ask a few questions and perhaps make a few comments with regard to land settlement when that item came up, so I shall reserve what I have to say until that time, save this: If a man of fair capacity is placed upon an improved farm, with no capital debt and with a small amount of assistance to start with, I believe it is possible for such a man to make his living. Unquestionably it has been proved to be true in respect of all our assisted colonization attempts, under which we have placed men on farms with fairly heavy capital debts, that from the moment those men were placed they became potential problems, and now they are practically all problems.

With regard to the suggestion just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, if unemployed were placed upon abandoned farms, without capital charge and with a small sum of money to assist them, at once another tremendous problem would be raised. I refer to the attitude of the soldier settlers, the empire settlers and the civilian settlers who have purchased land from or through the board. You would at once raise the important question as to what was to be done with those who are carrying their debts, and who are now fighting in an endeavour to obtain greater relief. They would point to such a movement as a very real reason why they also should have all their debts cancelled and why they should be treated in the same way. I am not discussing that question at the moment, but this is something which certainly must be considered in relation to any scheme for placing men on farms without obligation to themselves.

Mr. SANDERSON: If I understood the figures correctly, a moment ago the minister said that during last year 14,000 men had been placed on farms. I took the minister's statement to refer to single, hired men. Was that correct?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: Could the minister tell me what proportion of those 14,000 men were put on farms in old Ontario?

Mr. GORDON: I could not say, but in the entire province of Ontario—

Mr. SANDERSON: Has the minister the figures by counties?

Mr. GORDON: No, but up to April 2, 1932, there were 4,165 men placed in Ontario.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Were those farm hands?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: Could the minister give me some idea of where they were placed in Ontario? At the moment I am interested only in old Ontario.

Mr. GORDON: I have not that information before me, but I think I can get it and let the hon. member have it by counties.

Mr. SANDERSON: I thank the minister. With regard to farming under present conditions, when the farm industry is perhaps at its lowest ebb in our history, I want to say that in Ontario to-day you could go up and down the county roads, especially in the western part of the province, where there is land equal to any in the world and where the facilities so far as buildings, machinery and so on are concerned are unsurpassed, and in many instances you could find farmers who would be very glad to move off the land if they could get someone to assume the burden of the mortgage. In my judgment to go ahead and attempt any back to the land movement in old Ontario would be futile and a sheer waste of money. There have been more sheriff's sales of farms in the last year in Ontario than in any previous ten-year period in our history, and I am surprised that the minister and the government should attempt to work out any back to the land policy at the present time. The drift is the other way; sheriffs are driving a lot of farmers from their homes in Ontario. I will go further and say that the farmers who are hanging on, hoping that conditions will improve and prices pick up, are remaining on the land because they happened to have some small nest egg laid away for a rainy day, and they are fast approaching the end of those resources. What they will do then I do not know, but I would urge on the minister that he should not enter upon any back to the land scheme. If the government wants any scheme let them work out some policy that will aid those already on the farms so that at least they can make a living.

Mr. POWER: As I understand it there were 14,000 farm hands placed by the department, and in addition there were approximately 30,000 others located on farms.

Mr. GORDON: Men, women and children.

Mr. POWER: I think the figure was somewhere about 6,000 families.

Mr. GORDON: There were 6,352 families.

Mr. POWER: What form did the assistance given by the government take? Just what did the government do by way of placing them on farms?

Mr. GORDON: In the fall of 1930 the Department of Immigration and Colonization got in touch with the colonization departments of the two railways. The idea arose from the desire on the part of the government to revoke what was commonly called the railway agreements with respect to immigration. There was some hesitancy on the part of the railways to agree with the restrictions that were impending and were placed upon immigration, but after several conferences lasting a week or so they were content that these agreements be revoked; and out of that last conference came the idea that rather than see the colonization establishments of the railways and of the department dissolved, we should turn their activities towards an endeavour to colonize people who were then in Canada, who wanted to go back to the land and who had enough money to enable them to do so. A survey was made, as well as one could be made, of the people with money and agricultural experience then in Canada.

Mr. POWER: Who made that survey?

Mr. GORDON: It was made partly by the railways and partly by ourselves through the various land settlement agencies in Canada, with a view to finding out that class of person who had left the farm, attracted no doubt by the high wages that prevailed in industry in past years, but now finding themselves out of employment, their savings going into rents and other expenses of that sort in the cities. Then an effort was made by the two railways and the department to list available suitable farms throughout Canada, and while that survey was not a complete one by any means, yet we assembled that information. The railways and the department interviewed the person desiring to go back to the farm, finding out what kind of farm he wanted.

Mr. POWER: What facilities has the department to carry on that work?

Mr. GORDON: It is and has been for several years organized from coast to coast under the land settlement branch.

Mr. POWER: In eastern Canada also?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. POWER: The Soldier Settlement Boards?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. These people were placed on the land as I have indicated. Whether we have done them an injury by assisting them to get back to the land is a matter of opinion, but certainly I am not prepared to agree with that suggestion at all, because I have had too many expressions of satisfaction from those people who have gone on the farms and who are mighty happy to be there, in spite of what the hon. member for South Perth has said. In the province of Ontario 611 families have been placed on farms.

Mr. SANDERSON: Where were they placed?

Mr. GORDON: I have not that information at the moment but I will give it to the hon. gentleman before the estimates are through. That was the policy we pursued. The railways and the department used the existing organizations to bring the prospective farmer into touch with the farms that were available, and we very carefully went into the question of purchase to see that he did not suffer by reason of making an improvident bargain. So far as that could be avoided, we tried to safeguard him. I went over many of them myself and the officers throughout Canada carefully canvassed the situation, because there are still people who can drive a pretty hard bargain when selling farm lands. I wanted to avoid as far as possible a repetition of what happened in some cases in the earlier days of the Soldier Settlement Board. If the department and the railway companies are, as suggested, totally wrong in this effort, then of course we shall have to suffer for our delinquency; but no one can convince me that we are wrong, because I am persuaded that these people are immeasurably better off where they are now. While a large percentage of them cannot make a considerable amount of money just now, nevertheless they will stay on the land.

Mr. POWER: There are a large number of people in the city of Quebec who would be only too glad to go on the land, and I should like the minister to indicate the procedure they would have to follow if they wanted to do so.

Mr. GORDON: I am assuming that they are people with some money.

Mr. POWER: No one in my county has any money left now.

Mr. GORDON: I should say that in the city of Quebec they could avail themselves of the assistance granted by the province.

Mr. POWER: So that it is provincial, so far as Quebec is concerned. That is what I am coming to.

Mr. GORDON: That is scarcely fair.

Mr. POWER: If the minister refers to the provincial government my request for information for some of my constituents who would like to go on farms, why has he been talking so much about the 44,000 he placed on farms?

Mr. GORDON: I trust we shall not get into acrimony by reason of misunderstandings. The people I am talking about are people who have some money.

Mr. POWER: And who could have gone without any assistance from this government at all.

Mr. GORDON: Not necessarily.

Mr. POWER: What did the government do for them, then? The minister talks glibly of having made a survey through his land settlement agencies. How many land settlement agencies has he in Quebec? There is one in Sherbrooke.

Mr. GORDON: I think that is the only one.

Mr. POWER: So that a survey of the whole province of Quebec was made from one land settlement agency in which there are probably half a dozen employees. Surely the minister should be able to give better information than that. I do not know, there may be several employees; but there are several million people in the province of Quebec.

Mr. GORDON: For the information of the hon. gentleman I may say that we placed in the province of Quebec more than we did in Ontario, for we placed, in conjunction with the railways, 761 families.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister any idea where they were placed?

Mr. GORDON: I can get that information.

Mr. POWER: I should be glad to have it. Am I to understand from the minister that it was his land settlement organization that did this?

Mr. GORDON: And the railways.

Mr. POWER: Let us, if possible, endeavour to segregate the railways from the land settlement organization. If my information is correct,—I have not checked it—I do not think that the land settlement office in Sherbrooke can have a personnel of more than five or six. The minister has said to the house, and very proudly, that the land settlement board has an organization all over Canada, that it was able to list the lands that were for sale, and was able to make a survey of the people in the cities; and, mind you, in the province of Quebec he takes one of the smaller cities as headquarters. I tell him it must have been an impossible task to organize the back to the land movement in that province through the organization he has in Sherbrooke. It is altogether outside the realm of common sense to think that a few people in the city of Sherbrooke, a small office staff, could make anything like a survey of people in Montreal who are looking for employment. It is impossible for an office staff a hundred miles away, a staff of people who in all probability know nothing about the citizens of Montreal and nothing about agricultural conditions in the province of Quebec, except in so far as they may be acquainted with conditions in the district surrounding Sherbrooke, to make a survey of the people with money in the city of Montreal who would like to go on the land. What do they know about farms in the county of Kamouraska or in the county of Témiscouata? Would they have the faintest idea of how many vacant farms could be purchased in the county of Rimouski on which people could obtain a living, provided there was not too much of a capital debt before they started? If they are not doing the work properly, why do we talk so much about it? I am rather under the impression that in so far as my province is concerned, the work was done by the railways, and if the minister is frank I think he will admit that that is the case.

Mr. GORDON: I will look into it further and if that is true, I shall have no hesitation in saying so.

Mr. POWER: I appreciate that reply of the minister after the speeches he has made and after the newspapers of this country have been putting him up as the great colonizer, the new father of his country. He has stated he is placing people on the land, but when I ask him how he does it, he says he will look into the matter. If he has not the information surely he should be courteous enough to say, "My deputy has that information, I will ask him and then give the information to the committee." I have no doubt the same situation exists in Ontario. Could the minister inform the committee how many land settlement boards there are in Ontario?

Mr. GORDON: I have not that information but I can easily obtain it.

Mr. POWER: Does not the minister think that in order to get his estimates through he should obtain this information? We all want to get home but I do not think he should take advantage of that fact to come before the committee without knowing anything about his department. It is a matter of common courtesy and public policy that a man paid to be a minister should know what he is administering. I have no desire to be offensive to the minister, but I think he should have the information desired by the committee. I can remember years ago hon. members then sitting on this side of the house waxing very indignant at the then Minister of Immigration. The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) one of the most genial of men, was blocked for four or five days in the passing of his simple estimates because it was his first year as minister and he dared to make the statement that he would get certain papers and have them available for the evening.

Mr. VENIOT: He was told he was mentally unfit.

Mr. POWER: No, it was another minister who was told he was mentally unfit. There is nothing attracting more attention throughout the country than this problem of land settlement. It is easy enough to talk of land settlement, but there are many practical difficulties to be overcome before a large number of people can be settled on the land. I should like to see them settled, but before that can be brought about we must have a better organization than the present sketchy system. Placing one single family on the land and putting it in a position to obtain a living is a considerable job. If the minister does not know how that is going to be done, then I suggest to him that he get busy and learn. The cases referred to by the minister may have had some capital, but considerable study must be made of marketing, transportation and other questions and that cannot be done with a staff consisting of four or five people. Again I suggest to the minister that he should be able to give the committee the fullest information on this subject.

Mr. HOWDEN: Mr. Chairman, I come from Manitoba and notwithstanding the deprecatory attitude adopted by many hon. members in connection with this movement, I am keenly interested in it. At the present time the city of Winnipeg in cooperation with the province of Manitoba is placing several dozen families, not on farms necessarily, but on parcels of land where they can make their own living. I am fairly certain that an appeal has been made to this government to give some assistance to this movement, and I should like to have an undertaking from the minister that at least he will give this matter serious consideration. A short time ago the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) stated that farmers in Ontario were being forced off their farms. That may be very pitiful, but they at least had a roof over their heads and they have had a living for the last eighteen months or two years when hundreds of thousands of other Canadians have had to get along without. An effort is being made by the city of Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba to place these people beyond the realm of charity, at least for the time being, and, as I said before, I appeal to the minister to undertake to give serious consideration to this matter.

Mr. GORDON: That matter is under consideration, and I am sure that the government will be sympathetically inclined to any effort being made to assist the people of Manitoba or of any other province.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): We seem to be in the position of not knowing what to do. Some hon. members are recommending one thing while others recommend another. I should like to know if a survey has been made of the provinces in order to find out how many farms would be available. Could the minister advise how many farms at suitable prices have been found to be available for this scheme, say in Ontario?

Mr. GORDON: If the committee was considering the proper vote I would have more accurate information available.

Mr. POWER: Is any money being voted this year for this particular purpose?

Mr. GORDON: The soldier settlement vote would cover this matter; we are dealing now with civil government.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fraser, Cariboo): Votes numbers 55, 56, 57 and 58 cover the matter which we have been discussing all afternoon.

Mr. VENIOT: Last evening the minister said he would be perfectly willing to discuss this matter under this vote, and knowing that, he should have had the information available this afternoon.

Mr. BROWN: I think the committee has a distinct grievance against the minister in this respect. This matter was discussed to a considerable extent last evening and I am surprised that the minister did not bring down the information which he has promised to bring down this evening. It has been stated that 50,000 have been placed on the land, but I am inclined to think that when we receive accurate information it will be found that that number has dwindled considerably.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a good deal of interest this afternoon to the discussion which has taken place, and I have been thinking of how quickly people forget. This country has a very elaborate land settlement scheme—I do not know the exact figures, as I intended to get them from the minister when the particular item was under discussion—which up to date has probably cost $60,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER: More than that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps more than that has been paid for this experiment in land settlement. Seventy odd per cent of those placed on the land have been sons of farmers raised on the land. It has been said that too much was paid for the land purchased, but I think the fact is that in 90 per cent of the cases the land was acquired at prevailing prices; in only 10 per cent of the cases could it be said that high prices or some other influence had entered into the transaction. I should like to bolster up the minister a little in his determination not to be let into another scheme of this kind, but I agree with hon. members on this side when they say that he would be well advised not to do too much blowing about having placed people back on the land.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A bit of hot air.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I won't say that. I would give the minister a little advice in this connection. The soldier land settlement scheme, to put it mildly, has been a colossal failure. From the moment I took control of the department for a short time I felt it would be so. May I say to my hon. friends from the cities of Winnipeg, Sherbrooke and Quebec that if they want to organize any return to the land movement they had better have a board of practical farmers rather than doctors and lawyers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Let men who have had some experience on the land, and have paid for their experience, advise those who want to try farming. You cannot keep men on the land to-day who have invested their life savings on their farms; even although they have spent all their lives on the land, through no fault of their own they are being forced off, as my hon. friend from South Perth said this afternoon. It is all very well to talk loudly about schemes for taking people out of the cities and putting them on the land, but you cannot keep them there. I think the minister is well advised to take the matter into his consideration, and I hope he will consider it for a long time before embarking on a similar scheme. You would never think of spending money to put a man in a law office or to make a doctor of him unless he had somebody behind him financially.

Mr. POWER: Any fool can be a lawyer.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps he can; the difficulty is some people seem to think that any fool can be a farmer. If you give a man with some practical experience an acre of land, perhaps he is better off there than wandering homeless in a city. But at the moment any large scheme of land settlement will have just the same chance of success as the soldier settlement scheme had, and it will cost the country just as much money. If you go into such a scheme with your eyes open, with no hope of any return on your investment, I am satisfied; but otherwise for heaven's sake don't embark on it. Why do we advocate this method of settling on the land people who find themselves in difficulties? I would deprecate anything like the dole, but unfortunately conditions are such in this country to-day that people cannot be allowed to starve, and perhaps the cheapest way is to grant them direct relief. By the way, I may say that until the government changes its policy perhaps that will have to be done. But the minister is being bombarded this afternoon with requests to go into another land settlement scheme, and I warn him that if he does so he will have just the same results as we had from the soldier land settlement scheme. The minister's idea of advising people who are willing to invest their money in farms is all right, but from my experience in connection with the department I say to the minister that it would be just as well not to open up any discussion about land settlement schemes, because they invariably lead to requests for assistance from all quarters. If we are to give such assistance, let us give it without any hope of ever receiving our money back.

Mr. HEENAN: Did I understand the minister to say last evening that the Ontario government was responsible for bringing out 500 boys from the old country?

Mr. GORDON: The Ontario government, I presume, were prompted by the various churches to submit the proposal to admit up to 500 boys. The first request was for the admission of 800. I thought that was too many. I took the matter up with the Ontario government, they in turn, I assume, took it up with the various church organizations concerned, and the number was reduced to a maximum of 500. From the latest information I have received I do not think more than 250 will come forward. They are coming from the United Church, the Y.M.C.A., the Catholic Immigration Association, the Salvation Army, the National Children's Home, Fagan's Home and Quarriers.

Mr. HEENAN: Are the church organizations and the Ontario government guaranteeing any set wage?

Mr. GORDON: Those organizations take full responsibility for placing the boys on farms. We are also placing Canadian boys on farms; that work is always being carried on by the department.

Mr. HEENAN: Have the church organizations, the Ontario government or this government guaranteed any set wage or security of employment?

Mr. GORDON: They guarantee to train the boys and find them employment on farms. I have never heard of their guaranteeing any set wage.

Mr. POWER: If a man in my constituency with $5,000 capital wanted to go on a farm, and I referred him to the minister, what would the minister do?

Mr. GORDON: I would have him on a farm in no time.

Mr. POWER: How?

Mr. GORDON: I would turn him over to the director of soldier settlement and he would show him half a dozen farms, and make a deal for him if he does not know how to do so himself.

Mr. POWER: Would you give him any direct assistance in cash?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. POWER: In any other way?

Mr. GORDON: Only advice by trained officers of the department.

Mr. POWER: So really you would give the man advice who has money and wants to go on a farm?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. POWER: The department gives him advice, and that is about all?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. POWER: So the 44,000 who were planted on farms were planted there through the advice of the hon. minister and his department?

Mr. GORDON: Not altogether; through the advice of the department and the two railways.

Mr. POWER: So that sums up the return to the land work done by the department?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. POWER: No money was expended, saving perhaps the travelling expenses of some of your advisory officers. That is about all that has been done. I would not talk so much about it if I were you.

Mr. HEENAN: Are the boys induced to come to this country by advertisement, or by the churches direct, or how?

Mr. GORDON: The societies in England submit the names of the proposed migrants to the department, then we investigate through our agents in the old country as to the desirability of the boys coming here.

Mr. HEENAN: I sympathize with the minister because I have been fighting this battle for a number of years both in and outside the cabinet. It is a wonder to me that the churches of Canada and the government of Ontario are not more interested in Canadian boys. I had a similar case to contend with when an organization was trying to bring boys over from the old country to work in the banks of Canada. When I took issue with them these gentlemen answered that the English boys were better bred and better brought up than the Canadian boys, and they knew how to meet the public in a more respectful manner. I took the view, and I take it yet, that we have as well bred and as well brought up boys in Canada as there are in any country of the world, and if the minister listens to gentlemen of this sort who are going to different countries of the world seeking well-mannered boys and well-mannered men to bring to Canada on the ground that we have not well brought up and well-mannered boys in this country, he will have this country flooded with that kind of people. At that time I had to get the Minister of Immigration to make a ruling that these boys came under the order in council prohibiting the bringing in of contract labour, and I feel that these boys who are being brought out now to work on farms come under that same order in council. If they are only coming here to go on a farm to work, surely they should be regarded as labour; and the minister ought to put his foot down on that immediately, because the province of Ontario is not the only province that is interested in this matter. The province of Ontario cannot give the minister any assurance to-day that these boys will not be in Calgary next week, or in Winnipeg or Vancouver a month from now, and so I say that the province of Ontario through the churches, whether Catholic or Protestant, or other organizations acting as colonization or immigration agencies, should not be allowed to bring people into Canada from any other country in the world. I am saying this in all kindness to the minister because I know what he is up against. I know that when I was Minister of Labour I was continually up against the Immigration department, but as the minister is now two in one, Minister of Labour and Minister of Immigration, he will only have himself to fight. I do not know how these two ministers will get along together, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Immigration, but they could not get along any worse than I as Minister of Labour got along with the Minister of Immigration and the deputy minister. The minister is laughing, because, as I remember, he sat back one time and asked, "Is this an Irish fight?" I say again, Mr. Speaker, that the minister ought to consider this question very seriously. If I were Minister of Immigration to-day let me tell you that no province, Ontario or any other, could induce me to allow boys or men to come into this country to take the place that rightly belongs to Canadians. The minister should look into that matter because there are so many societies with philanthropic ideas, always wanting to do something for somebody else in any other part of the world except Canadians. When these people told me that they were bringing boys over here because they were better bred and better brought up and could meet the public more respectfully than our Canadian boys, I told them to go and mind their own business and I would look after the Immigration department.

Mr. SANDERSON: How many deportations were there from Canada last year?

Mr. GORDON: Deportations for the calendar year ended December 31, 1931, were 6,582.

Mr. SANDERSON: And what was the immigration for the same calendar year?

Mr. GORDON: It was 27,530.

Mr. McINTOSH: How were they distributed by provinces?

Mr. GORDON: We have no figures as to the distribution of migrants amongst the provinces.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The other evening the hon. member for North Waterloo brought up the question of deportations, and in the course of his remarks referred to people who were deported from Canada by reason of having become a public charge. I have been circularized by several people in Alberta, amongst others by Mr. Joseph A. Clarke, former mayor and also a councillor of the city of Edmonton, protesting against this policy. In a letter to the Nor-East Adviser under the heading, "Should a Hungry Man be Deported," he says:

> To now tolerate two subaltern municipal employees to boldly announce a right-about-face policy, without public discussion or any authority, or even knowledge, of the only body entitled to speak for us, viz.,—the city council, is un-Canadian.

In other words, Mr. Clarke says that there is a movement on the part of two officials of the city relief department to have men deported for no other reason than that, because of being unemployed, they have become a charge upon the city. He also says that there is a movement on foot, largely initiated by these two men, to add to the criminal code the crime of being hungry. I would ask the minister whether the Department of Immigration has deported men from the province of Alberta solely because of their having become a charge upon some municipality.

Mr. GORDON: Each case is investigated on its merits. I recollect no case where deportation has been ordered of a person simply because he was without funds.

Mr. SANDERSON: As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing that this item carry on the understanding that the minister give me the information that I asked for.

Mr. GORDON: Oh, quite.

Item agreed to.

Immigration salaries and contingencies, including grants to immigration societies, provinces, etc., as may be authorized by the governor general in council, $1,360,000.

Mr. LUCAS: I should like to have some particulars regarding the "grants to immigration societies, provinces, etc."

Mr. GORDON: The vote has been carried through in its present form for some years. Properly, it should be changed, because this year there are no grants to societies and provinces. The vote is misdescribed.

Mr. BROWN: Is the minister prepared to give any further consideration to the complaint of Mr. A. M. Graham?

Mr. GORDON: I hope that matter is a closed book, so far as the department is concerned; so far as I am concerned, it is. I do not purpose to spend more time on it.

Item agreed to.

Empire settlement scheme, including grants to immigration societies, women's hostels, etc., as may be authorized by the governor general in council, $60,000.

Mr. GORDON: I am asking the Minister of Finance to move an amendment.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That item 56 be reduced by the amount of $45,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why the reduction?

Mr. POWER: Is this a vote of want of confidence?

Mr. GORDON: This vote has been carried from year to year, and with the exception of about $20,000 has never been used. The balance of it is to take care of certain commitments under agreements made a few years ago with the British government with respect to supplementing advances made by them under their boy settlement scheme. We have never had to use the money, and I do not expect we will need it this year Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Amount required for soldier land settlement advances, for advances under the British family schemes recoverable from the British government, for the cost of administration of soldier settlement and general land settlement, and for the cost of administration of soldier settlement staff performing investigations for the war veterans' allowance committee, $1,500,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As there is some information I should like to have on this item, and as it is now six o'clock I think the item should stand until the committee resumes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes; a number of hon. members would like to make some comments in connection with this item.

Item stands.

PRIVATE BILLS

LAKE OF THE WOODS INTERNATIONAL BRIDGE COMPANY

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 46, to incorporate the Lake of the Woods International Bridge Company.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Sections 1 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—rights of municipalities saved.

The CHAIRMAN: There has been a change in this section; the new clause appears in the bill as reprinted.

Section agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

On section 20—Labour and materials.

Mr. CANTLEY: In my judgment this section does not provide a sufficient guarantee as to the use of Canadian material and labour. Therefore I would move, seconded by the hon. member for West Algoma, that the section be amended by adding the words "At least one-half of all material used or being part of the bridge and the fabrication of same shall be of Canadian origin and workmanship."

Mr. HEENAN: I think that is covered in the reprinted bill.

Mr. SIMPSON: I rather think that is taken care of in the amended section.

The CHAIRMAN: In the reprinted bill section 20 reads:

Canadian materials and labour to the extent of at least fifty per centum must be used in the construction of the said bridge and a certified statement shall be sent weekly to the Department of Labour giving the names and addresses of firms supplying materials and the quantity thereof.

Mr. CANTLEY: I have not seen the reprinted bill, but I do not think the words which were read are as effective as those I have suggested. My amendment is a little stiffer, I think. I want Canadian steel used and I want Canadian workmen employed to the extent of at least fifty per cent.

Mr. HEENAN: That is the intention of the present section, and I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. BROWN: Is there any difference in meaning?

Mr. CANTLEY: My amendment states that all material must be of Canadian origin.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the hon. member tell us how much that will add to the cost of building the bridge?

Mr. CANTLEY: I fancy the sponsor of the bill will accept that suggestion.

Mr. HEENAN: I would accept it but I think it is already covered. It was the intention of the committee that at least fifty per cent of the material should be of Canadian origin. I do not see how we can say that all the material must be of Canadian origin, because this is an international river, and the international line is exactly in the middle of the river bed.

Mr. CANTLEY: My amendment states that one-half the material must be of Canadian origin. It might be suggested that under the section as reprinted, angles, channels and so on rolled in Canadian mills from billets imported from Germany or some other country might be used. If my suggestion is adopted you get over that point. That is why I stress the word "origin" rather than the words "Canadian material."

Mr. HEENAN: I understand my hon. friend's point, and so far as I am concerned I accept the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG: Does my hon. friend mean that this steel will have to be made from ore mined in Canada?

Mr. CANTLEY: In all international bridges of this type you can depend upon it that our American friends see to it that at least one-half of the material is of American origin, American workmanship and American fabrication.

Mr. YOUNG: That does not answer the question.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think we should be equally careful in regard to our end of the bridge; that is my point; I am not interested in what the bridge costs.

Mr. YOUNG: Does my hon. friend's amendment mean that the steel used in that bridge would have to be made from ore mined in Canada?

Mr. CANTLEY: No, because a large proportion of the steel made in Canada is unfortunately not made from Canadian ore; but it is of Canadian origin in so far as the ore is smelted in Canada, and the steel is made here. The fabricated material is rolled in Canada from steel produced in Canada; it may be from home ores or from foreign ores, or it may be partially one and partially the other. At any rate, it is of Canadian origin when it comes out of the furnaces here.

Mr. GARDINER: If the amendment is carried, as now proposed, it will mean that so far as the Canadian section is concerned the bridge will never be built.

Mr. HEENAN: I understand that my hon. friend's idea is to protect Canadian industry and Canadian labour. I know he has no desire to block the building of the bridge—

Mr. CANTLEY: Certainly not.

Mr. HEENAN: —but I may say for his information that, so far as labour and materials are concerned, I know that the materials will be supplied by a firm in Winnipeg, which is the nearest point. As to whether all the materials, such as ores and so forth, will originate in Canada, I am not prepared to say, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that we are anxious to protect Canadian industry and labour as far as possible. I am just as much interested in this as my hon. friend, and I should be glad if he would allow the amendment as drafted by the committee to go through.

Mr. VALLANCE: In the interests of the mover of the bill I might point out to the hon. member for Pictou that it would be possible to bring in foreign ore and billets and make one hundred per cent channels, T's and so forth, which would be fifty per cent of the workmanship embodied in the bridge. You could bring in all the ore and billets and roll the material for the bridge, so that your company would get it all.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. YOUNG: Is that with or without the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: As printed, and as amended in the committee.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

On the order:

House in committee on Bill No. 29, to amend the Railway Act (preamble not proven).—Mr. Nicholson.

Mr. T. E. SIMPSON (West Algoma): On behalf of the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) I move that the order be discharged, the preamble not having been proven.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

RAILWAY COMMISSION AND RATE STRUCTURE —SPECIAL COMMODITY RATES

The house resumed from Friday, April 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 44, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): This is an equalizing freight bill intended to give to the west what we think is due them —the same classification as has been made on the eastern lines through to Fort William. The trouble is that those who fix the rates do not always use good judgment. For instance, they always penalize a commodity that will stand the maximum rate. I have been shipping all my life and have had a good deal of experience in this regard, and I know that the railroads are sure to get the maximum out of any commodity that can stand it. This necessitates a battle for the rights of the shipper. Take, for example, a carload of silk from Vancouver to New York as against a carload of coal; there is a vast difference in the freight, because they charge whatever the commodity will stand. We argue that one commodity rate should apply to all coarse grains, and we are opposed to the discrimination between the export and domestic rates. We contend that the domestic rate should be brought more into line with the export. The farmers of the prairies no doubt have a low grade grain that could be shipped to the coast for poultry or stock feed if they were given a satisfactory rate, but of course it would have to be lower than the present rate. This would not only furnish a market for the low grade grain which the farmer on the prairie has; it would also help the consumer in British Columbia. The climatic conditions are particularly favourable there for stock and poultry raising and, while things are quiet at the moment, an enormous business has been done there. But there could have been a good deal more if lower rates had been in effect on all rough commodity freights. There is a regular lumber commodity rate and also a lower rate for slabwood, poles, ties and cordwood. It costs as much to ship a carload of lumber as it does to ship a carload of cordwood or slabs. Why should not a little common sense be used and these rates reduced on coarse grain as well as on wood products? The railroads are looking for business and I think they would find it by adopting these rates. It would help not only themselves but business generally. Vancouver is a port open twelve months in the year, and it is possible that there would be considerable business in poultry exporting if it was possible to obtain feed from the prairies at a satisfactory price. The equalization of the export and domestic rates on grain would help not only the farmers on the prairies, but the people of British Columbia and throughout Canada as a whole.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say in connection with this bill. We have not the bill before us, but from what has been said by the hon. member who introduced this measure we have been able to obtain a fair idea of its provisions. The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Munn) dealt more with commodity rates, but so far as I can understand, it is not intended that this bill shall deal with such rates.

The very important and complicated question of freight rates has been before parliament for some time and has been the subject of discussion throughout the country. I am sorry to say that at times this matter has been injected into the political arena in an effort to make some political gain. It is not my intention to go at length into the history of freight rates. This matter came before parliament over thirty years ago and some hon. members may recall the system then in use for the adjusting of freight rate schedules. Prior to 1903 the railways simply filed their tariffs with the Department of Railways and the railway committee of the privy council either approved or disapproved of such schedules. This system proved to be very unsatisfactory as many of the provinces complained they were being discriminated against and had no voice in the fixing of rates. In 1903 parliament, under the leadership of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, appointed what is known as the Board of Railway Commissioners, designed to function as a court of record and established in the same way as the supreme and exchequer courts. It was to have complete control and authority over all questions relating to the operation of railways, including the charges to be made for the handling of traffic. As I have indicated, it was to function as a judicial body to hear all interested parties, and its decisions were to depend, first, on the evidence submitted, and, second, on a proper appreciation of the evidence in relation to the relief sought. Provision was made for appeals from decisions to the privy council. I think it will be admitted that on the whole this board has proved to be satisfactory. At times there has been criticism, but every section of Canada has been granted the opportunity to appear before the board.

As I understand the present bill, one of its provisions is to add further powers to those already possessed by the railway commission; it is to be given the power to consider matters of trade development and public policy. The objection to this provision is that it would give a political tinge to the railway commission; there would be danger of disturbing its judicial character.

Another provision of the bill is to permit the fixing of rates without a hearing—in other words, to extend the Crowsnest pass agreement west from Fort William to Vancouver. It might be well to recall just what is meant by the Crowsnest pass agreement. This agreement was entered into in 1897 by the Dominion government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Under its terms the railway agreed to construct a line through what is known as the Crowsnest pass to Nelson, British Columbia, for which it was to receive a subsidy of $11,000 per mile, or a total of $3,400,000. In return the railroad was to give a rate on grain and flour, from points west of Fort William to Fort William and any point east thereof, of three cents per hundred pounds less than the existing rate. In addition certain reductions were made in the rates on named articles or commodities shipped from the east westward. This agreement remained in force until 1918, when, under the War Measures Act, the Board of Railway Commissioners was given temporary power over the agreement. In 1924 it automatically came into force again, after which an appeal was made to the supreme court with the result that the board was directed to restore the rates provided by the agreement. At the same time the supreme court found in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in its contention that the terms of the agreement applied only to those points which were in existence at the time of the making of the agreement. It is quite apparent that in view of the condition which prevailed as a result of the decision of the supreme court, some action had to be taken; the old agreement had to be either cancelled or extended to take in the other points including the Canadian National.

A large number of people hold the view that since in 1903 we set up a court to deal with this matter, the railway commission, that court, should be given a free hand rather than be hampered by any such legislation. In the session of 1925 the government of the day brought in legislation extending the rate under the agreement to other points, including those reached by the Canadian National Railways. I may be pardoned for expressing the opinion that the action of the government of that day was no doubt based on political expediency; a general election was pending, and by leaving the old Crowsnest pass rate agreement in operation the government thought they would be able to draw support from the prairie provinces.

It is very interesting to read the debate on this matter during the session of 1925. It will be noticed that the Conservative members from British Columbia argued that the agreement should be abrogated, or if the government insisted on putting into force legislation extending the agreement, in all fairness it should be extended as far west as Vancouver. Its supporters on the other hand argued that the government was dealing quite fairly with British Columbia, and pointed out that an order in council had just been passed directing the railway commission to make a general review of freight rates and to provide for their equalization throughout Canada. The government laid special stress on the provision for an appeal to the privy council, where, it was said, justice would surely be meted out. No doubt the order in council was framed with the object of giving the impression that other sections of the dominion would have their grievances adjusted. At this point I desire to quote from the debate. I find that on page 4440 of Hansard of June 18, 1925, the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the present leader of the opposition, in discussing the matter said:

> I would say to the house and the country that if this government remains in office it will not take the view of the order in council which my right hon. friend takes—

That is, Mr. Meighen.

> —but will regard that order in council as a direction to the railway commission as to how it expects this policy to be worked out, and will see that the policy is worked out in accordance with the terms of the order in council. The order in council sets out the government policy. It is a direction to the railway commission to equalize rates. That direction indicates how this government expects this policy of equalization to be worked out. And I would remind hon. members that there remains, as the commission itself well knows, an appeal from the commission to the governor in council with respect to matters of railway rates. This government has stated what its policy is with respect to the equalization of rates, and unless that policy is carried out in accordance with its intention—if this government is in office when the question comes up—and I have not the least doubt it will be—it will take care to see that the policy is carried out in the spirit and intent of the letter as expressed in the order in council itself.

As I have said, great stress was laid on this appeal to the governor in council. Now, the right hon. gentleman's government was in power for the following five years, with the exception of an interruption of a few months, and although an appeal from the decision of the railway commission was taken to the privy council, up to the time of the election of 1930, no decision had been rendered. Having regard to the pledge given at the time, I think it may well be claimed that the Liberal government of that day did not keep faith with the people of Canada, and particularly with the people of British Columbia, in the matter of freight rate adjustments.

During the course of that debate the Conservative members from British Columbia urged the government to abrogate the agreement or extend it to Vancouver. The member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) the other evening said he could not understand why this bill did not have the active support of all members from British Columbia. Well, the hon. member himself sat in this house during the session of 1925. I have gone very carefully through the debate to which I have referred, but I cannot find that he offered any suggestions to the then government, nor did he support the Conservative members from British Columbia who demanded justice for their province with respect to freight rates. Apparently he was a supporter of the government's legislation and a believer in the policy of that government with respect to the matter as outlined in the order in council. That was his opportunity to serve British Columbia by using his influence with a government that was friendly to him, if he believed, as he does to-day, that that particular legislation was in the interest of British Columbia. Now he sees an opportunity to gain a little political kudos out of this matter and is prepared to jump into the boat along with my friend from New Westminster. The people of British Columbia took the promise of the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) very seriously. I remember quite well the striking headlines in the Vancouver press, particularly in the Vancouver Sun. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni still has a copy of that paper on his file. On the front page were large photos of three of the lions of the Liberal party—the Hon. John Oliver, the Hon. Doctor King, and Mr. Jerry McGeer—with this declaration: These are the three men to whom credit is due for what they secured for British Columbia in the way of freight rates, an opportunity of pleading its cause. The cause was pleaded before a friendly and sympathetic government—but still the differential remains. Time has wrought great changes; one of those gentlemen has passed to the great beyond, one has been translated to another place, and the third, the $150,000 freight rate advocate, is busy looking for another fat job.

As I have already said, I think the opinion is general that such a complicated matter as freight rates and railway tariffs should be left in the hands of a competent and judicial board, such as we have in the railway commission. I should like again to quote from Hansard of the same date, page 4439, where will be found these remarks by the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the present leader of the opposition:

> I have been looking over some of the speeches which I made in western Canada last fall, and which were quoted, in part I think, by the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) in his remarks the other evening. I notice in speaking on the prairies I intimated very clearly that my view was that the railway commission was the right body to fix freight rates and should be given a free hand in the matter. When speaking in Vancouver and Victoria I made similar statements.

At that time we had the leader of the opposition arguing that this whole matter should be left in the hands of the railway commission. Then at page 4413 of the same date of Hansard the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) made the following statement:

> Admitting therefore, as I do, and as I think all will, that class legislation is bad, that special agreements for the advantage of any one section of the country are bad, and also that the matter of freight rate making should not be given to parliament, we have then to consider, so far as I see the question, how far we should depart in the public interest from the principle that I laid down, that rate making should not be given to parliament but should remain vested in the Board of Railway Commissioners.

At page 4420 we have this further testimony from this same hon. gentleman:

> The railway board is charged with the duty of making rates fair and equitable to all. We have set up the board to do that work. Why then not let the board perform that duty? They are infinitely better qualified to make these rates than are members of parliament. If parliament has no confidence in the railway board —and that sentiment has been expressed by some hon. members—then the remedy is not to throw the business of rate-making into this house; the remedy is so to constitute your board that you will have confidence in it.

I think that answers very fully the question which the hon. member brought up the other night in introducing this question.

I have mentioned that the Conservatives also took part in that debate. I shall quote only one. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) at page 4319 of Hansard of June 16, 1925, said:

> I have argued in this house and before my own constituents and the people of my province for certain principles which I think should underlie and govern the making of a freight rate structure. I have argued that the fixation of rates is such a complicated problem that it should not be pitchforked into parliament, but rather that it should be dealt with by a competent board, that board in my estimation being the Board of Railway Commissioners.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I think it is the general opinion of all sections of this house and throughout the country that such a complicated matter as freight rates should be left in the hands of an independent judicial tribunal such as the Board of Railway Commissioners. Before this board the railways have the privilege of appearing as well as the people. Any body or individual can appear before the railway board and lay before it any hardship that may be worked on them through the running of the railways.

I am anxious to support any movement which will bring relief to the farmers of British Columbia and which will help to remove that 21½ cents differential that exists between the domestic and the export rates on grain. I listened very carefully to the hon. gentleman's remarks when he introduced this proposal. I have studied the question very closely, and I have come to the conclusion that the legislation proposed by this bill will not give to the people of our province that which they feel they are justly entitled to. Not only that, but if this bill should become law it would still further tie the hands of the railway board.

There is another objection. There is at the present time an appeal pending before the privy council from the railway commission, and from the remarks of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) the other day during the debate on this particular question we can take it that this government has been prepared for the last year or year and a half to hear the appeal without delay, but so far the provinces have not been able to arrange a time suitable to all. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, if I thought that by this legislation or any other method justice would be done to the people of Canada and British Columbia would receive what she is entitled to in the matter of the removal of that differential, I should be only too willing to lend my support.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, on division, and debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dickie in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Canals—Lachine canal, improvements, $20,900.

Mr. VALLANCE: Will the minister explain the item?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): This item is for the complete renewal of an old wharf at the lower entrance of north lock No. 1 on the north side of the Lachine canal which has been made necessary by the wear and tear of time.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Barber.]

Rideau canal, improvements, $17,000.

Mr. MUNN: Is that canal of any practical service to anybody? If so, let us know; if not, why spend the money? Years ago it may have been some use; what about to-day?

Mr. MANION: Yes, the Quebec canals are all useful. A great deal of wheat from the prairie provinces passes through them.

Mr. VALLANCE: But we are talking about the Rideau canal.

Mr. MANION: Oh, I beg the hon. member's pardon. The Rideau canal is not used for business purposes to any great extent. As my hon. friend knows, it was built in the old days for war purposes, or something of that sort. It is kept open, although very little business passes through it. I doubt very much if the people in this section of the country would like to see it closed, and it does not cost much to keep it in operation.

Mr. SPENCER: Is there any revenue derived from it?

Mr. VALLANCE: I suggest it be handed over to the historical monuments branch.

Mr. MANION: We are keeping it in that shape now. The hon. member for Battle River asked if there was any revenue, and in reply I would say that very little revenue is derived from the canal. There is no charge on boats going through, but a small amount comes in from a few small water-power plants.

Mr. HEENAN: I should like to refer to the reduction in wages of the men on these canals. I understood the minister's explanation to be that the reduction was a realignment or readjustment of wages to conform to the prevailing rate of wages in the district. I gathered from the minister's explanation that different grades of craftsmanship had been established. Probably the minister is not prepared to go on with this item just now.

Mr. MANION: Go ahead, but please speak a little louder.

Mr. HEENAN: I understand the minister or his department has established first and second class carpenters, blacksmiths, machinists, chauffeurs, engineers, and so on. I was wondering if he would be willing to conform to a ruling which has prevailed in the Department of Labour for a great many years, namely, that there be only one class of craftsmanship. For instance, a carpenter was a man who used the tools of a carpenter.

Mr. MANION: I was more familiar with this matter a few days ago than I am at the moment, and I am refreshing my memory. They are not all arranged in the two classes, as my hon. friend has suggested. Some types of workmen are divided into two classes. From a hurried observation I notice that there are first and second class carpenters, blacksmiths and cable splicers. Then on the next page of the information I have before me there may be one or two other types of crafstmen divided into the two classes; out of the twenty-five or thirty different types of workers there may be four divided into first and second classes. The rate of wages, however, was established after consultation with the Department of Labour concerning the prevailing rate of wages.

Mr. HEENAN: Will not the minister reconsider his position concerning the establishment of different grades? There has been a great deal of trouble in connection with the establishment of wage rates. I can recall that while the Hon. Thomas Crothers was Minister of Labour a ruling was made that a man using the tools of a carpenter should be classed and paid as a carpenter. The reason was that there were contractors working for the government who had to pay the prevailing rate of wages for carpenters. In order to get around that clause in their contracts they established different grades of carpenters. Those men were all doing the same work, but there would be only two or three first class carpenters on a job, and the rest would be second or third. If the establishment of different grades prevails a great deal of trouble will be heaped upon the minister and the government. Therefore I ask the minister to reconsider his view. The change to which I have referred was not made without due consideration, and the result was satisfactory both to the government and to the contractors. In connection with government works contractors file tenders which they believe will secure the work. Immediately they begin to seek ways and means of saving money so that their profits may be greater. Naturally they turn to the item of wages, and make an effort to cut them down. The government will not allow them to cut wages, so they then attempt to establish different grades of labour, first and second class carpenters and so on. That is a vicious method of defeating the fair wage clause, and I am sure the minister does not wish to allow contractors to employ cut-throat methods in connection with their tenders, and attempt to reduce the wages of the workingmen by the establishment of these various grades. The laws laid down governing fair wages do not force any contractor to keep any particular man employed; the services of an unsatisfactory workman may be dispensed with. On the other hand if a man is engaged as a carpenter he should be paid carpenter's wages.

After long years of experience it has been found necessary to establish only one grade of carpenters, blacksmiths, machinists and craftsmen of all types. I ask the minister to reconsider his view, and to follow the rules of the Department of Labour, the one prevailing since the days of Hon. Thomas Crothers, to the effect that a man using the tools of a carpenter must be paid the wages of a carpenter.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid I gave my hon. friend the wrong information. Originally there was an intention to make provision for first and second class carpenters. My hon. friend was one who made objection, and further objections were received from men on the Welland ship canal. The matter was discussed with the Department of Labour, and as a result the provision for second class carpenters was struck out. The result is that there are none. May I add that there have been second class carpenters on the Quebec canals since 1920; whether or not they are retained against the rules of the Department of Labour, I do not know.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the work going on in connection with the Rideau canal. I have no objection to that work, but I do object to being tossed out of my bed during the night because of explosions taking place on the work. I do not want that to happen again. If it does I may have to enter a suit for damages against the government. One explosion takes place at night and another at six o'clock in the morning. Surely there should be some thought for comfort and convenience of the people.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to be unkind to my hon. friend, but in this instance he is in the position in which he so often finds himself in this house. The government is not doing the work; it is being done by the city of Ottawa.

Mr. VENIOT: And yet the government is paying for it.

Mr. MANION: No, it is not. The dynamiting that is going on is not political dynamiting of any kind.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps I might enjoy it if it were.

Mr. MANION: The work is being done by the city.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have a clipping here from Labour, which is the official organ of the railroad brotherhoods and other international labour organizations. Under date of March 17 it says:

> Maintenance workers on Canadian canals have been handed two stiff blows by the Department of Railways and Canals.
> It has announced a wage cut, running as high as 25 per cent and retroactive to February 16, and a new classification that will cut further into the workers' depleted pay envelopes.

Is it true that the twenty-five per cent cut in wages was made on the date mentioned, February 16?

Mr. MANION: There was a cut which came into effect at about that time. I explained it once before in the house in reply to a question asked by my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River. The reason was that there was a reduction in the hours of work just before the last election, while the wages were continued at the same rate per day, which put the men on those canals altogether out of line with the prevailing rate of wages in whatever section was concerned. After consultation with the Department of Labour the prevailing rate was ascertained and these men were merely put on the hourly rate prevailing in the particular section.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would the minister say the basic rate was cut twenty-five per cent?

Mr. MANION: I do not know what my hon. friend means by the basic rate.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hourly rate.

Mr. MANION: Yes, that is right; the hourly rate was cut by 25 per cent, or whatever it was, in order to make the rate the same as the rate paid in those districts by other employers.

Mr. HEENAN: Just to keep the record straight, Mr. Chairman, I may say that though the minister, with his nice smile, says the hours of labour were reduced just before the last election, that was done as part of a permanent policy. It may have been right or wrong, but it was a set policy. The treaty of Versailles, which was signed by Sir Robert Borden on behalf of this country, called for a reduction in the hours of work. In nearly every instance where hours were reduced it will be found that wages or salaries were not interfered with. For instance, when the railway men obtained the McAdoo award reducing their hours from ten to eight the wages were left as they had been previously, and when civil servants in Ottawa were put on the eight-hour day salaries and wages were not reduced. The same action was taken in connection with canal employees. When reductions were made in the hours of work, on canals or any other public works, notwithstanding that it was done just before the election it was the intention that salaries and wages would not be reduced in line with the reduction in working time. At the moment I am not complaining because of what the minister has done, but I do want to say it was the intention of the previous government to leave those salaries as they had been. The whole trend in labour circles throughout the world is that hours should be reduced but that the earning power should not be reduced correspondingly. I just make this statement for the information of the minister; this action was not taken because of the election but was part of the policy adopted by the previous government.

Mr. MANION: I would not for a moment suggest that this was done because of the election; I merely mentioned the date, which happened to be July 16. I am sure it had no connection with the election.

Item agreed to.

Trent canal, improvements, $133,400.

Mr. LUCAS: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. MANION: This work is being carried on in connection with the Trent canal, which as my hon. friend knows runs from Trenton to the Georgian bay. There are a number of different items; I have a whole list here. The amount is to provide for plant and channel improvements, structural replacements, rebuilding and concreting of old decaying timber dams, aids to navigation, miscellaneous surveys, investigations and so on. Since 1925 no heavy capital expenditures have been made towards the completion of a through Trent waterway from Trenton to Georgian bay. This is for fairly heavy work in different parts of that canal, which extends for 240 miles.

Mr. LUCAS: Could the minister tell us the total amount spent on the canal?

Mr. MANION: Since the canal was first built the capital expenditure has amounted to $19,000,000, and the betterments to $3,600,000, making a grand total of $22,600,000.

Mr. LUCAS: Is there any revenue?

Mr. MANION: Practically none.

Mr. BROWN: What is the extent of the traffic?

Mr. MANION: I think there is a little freight traffic, but it is largely the same type of traffic that is carried on the Rideau canal. There is some tourist traffic, and after all the tourist traffic of the country is one of our big industries. I think there is very little freight, however.

Mr. GARDINER: Is there any fishing up there?

Mr. MANION: I think so.

Mr. MUNN: I am somewhat familiar with the Trent canal; I know that country fairly well, and I think this government should consider very carefully the further expenditure of money on that useless inland waterway. You can sit on the bank for a week and see nothing but an odd gas boat go up and down the canal. I do not think the expenditure of $100,000 in order to provide a canal for a few fellows with gas boats is justified. I lived in Orillia, close to this canal, for several years and I think it is one of the most miserable failures of all our inland waterways.

Mr. MANION: While there is no income from the traffic on the canal there are water powers that must be kept up, and we do get an income nearly equal to the amount of this vote. Last year the income was nearly $98,000, and for each of the two previous years it was about $95,000. This income came from lock houses, water powers, land rent, transmission and telephone lines, boat houses and so on. The water powers provide ninety-five per cent of the income, so that the works must be kept up.

Mr. MUNN: Where are the water powers?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I can give my hon. friend the exact places, but we are getting the income so I do not suppose the names matter much. With the exception of the vote last year this is the smallest amount to be voted for a number of years. A great deal of money has been spent on this waterway, and my recollection is that for many years in the neighbourhood of $250,000 was voted each year. There has been an agitation up towards Georgian bay to have the canal completely opened to Georgian bay, but that has not been done as yet. There is a good deal of capital expenditure necessary before that is done; it would require $3,000,000 more. But we have no intention at the moment of undertaking that expenditure in view of present financial conditions. The upkeep of the canal is necessary, however, and this expenditure this year, exactly as in past years, is distributed to meet absolute necessities wherever they exist.

Mr. EULER: The minister has said that there is no revenue from the canal. That is the fact. Is there any revenue from any of the canals?

Mr. MANION: No, none except the power revenue.

Mr. EULER: Would the minister care to express an opinion on a matter which has been discussed in this house before and which is of some importance, namely, the question whether there should not be revenues from all our canals? Why should a private business —and it is almost entirely private business— have free use of canals constructed at the expense of the country? Has the minister thought of the advisability of at least making the canals self-sustaining, even if we get no interest on capital investment?

Mr. MANION: Tolls were abolished in 1903 by the Laurier government—

Mr. EULER: That does not make any difference.

Mr. MANION: I am not saying this in order to make any invidious comparison; I am simply stating a fact. Since that time no tolls have been charged on canals in Canada. There are sound arguments that could be advanced in support of the contention that tolls should be charged, but I do not know that it would be advisable at the present time.

Mr. EULER: This is just the time, when you need the money.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but it would be to a large extent a toll upon western wheat, and this commodity is bringing about the lowest price paid in a considerable time. It is true that the Panama canal and the Suez canal charge tolls, and, as I say, there are arguments to support that view. But I do not think I should care to express any definite opinion on the matter at the moment. It is quite open to debate and my hon. friend has good ground for the position he has taken.

Mr. EULER: I personally brought the matter up in the house some years ago and it has been brought up by others, and the only reply I have ever heard to the question why tolls should not be charged is that it has always been done this way. I regard that as a very insufficient answer.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: So far as tolls on the Trent canal are concerned, I fear that the revenue would be so small that you could not see it. There are one or two sand barges that go through the canal in the season, but the toll would be infinitesimal. What I wish to protest against, though, is not only the large vote expended on what is more or less a luxury—a vote of $133,400—but the fact that the vote has been increased from the previous year by the sum of $17,000. In the previous year the amount authorized was $116,400, and this year, in face of a curtailment of expenditures generally; a cutting down in the salaries of civil servants by ten per cent; a cutting down in sessional indemnities of members and senators by ten per cent; and a cutting down in the wages of railway employees by more than ten per cent—as we have heard to-night, it is twenty-five per cent—we are launching out on what might be described as a luxurious expenditure. The minister made reference to the tourist traffic. I venture the statement that our tourist traffic is not attracted here by the merits of the Trent canal; the tourists come to see something far more attractive than that. So that an expenditure of $17,000 more this year than was spent last year in a matter of this kind looks to me like extravagance run riot.

Mr. MITCHELL: With regard to that twenty-five per cent reduction in wages, which went into effect on February 16, is it the intention of the government to add to that reduction the further ten per cent cut made in salaries and wages of civil servants?

Mr. MANION: It is a matter that we have been discussing, and ordinarily it would have been done without any question whatever. I rather think, frankly, that it will have to be done in fairness to other governmental employees. It is a little unfortunate that the twenty-five per cent reduction was made so close to the ten per cent proposal, but as a matter of fact when the twenty-five per cent reduction went into effect the ten per cent decrease had not been thought of by the government, so far as I know at any rate. It is true that this should have been done when we first came in, but it was called to my attention by my officers about the time it was put into effect and when I found what I considered was not a reasonable rate, after discussing the matter with the officers of my department and with the Labour department, we put into effect the rates that now prevail. As to the ten per cent, we have been giving a good deal of thought to that, because it does seem rather unfair to the men. But they have this to remember, that for a year and a half they received better wages than men in the same kind of employment in other parts of the country; so that while it appears at the present time to be a severe cut, they had enjoyed that advantage for over a year. The cheques went out two days ago with the ten per cent taken off. The question is still under consideration, but at the moment it is altogether likely that the ten per cent will remain off.

Mr. HEAPS: What pay do these men receive now with the ten per cent off?

Mr. HEENAN: Did I understand the minister to say that he was reconsidering his decision in this matter of the ten per cent?

Mr. MANION: No. I said that the matter was still under consideration, not having been absolutely decided, but I was frank enough to say that I thought the ten per cent would have to remain off in justice to other governmental employees. They will be treated on the same basis.

Mr. HEENAN: I can see the minister's point of view, that when a general reduction of ten per cent is being applied all round he should apply it here as well. I can understand why he does not wish to exempt the employees on canals. But I want to point out that the rest of the government employees did not have a twenty-five per cent reduction right on the eve of the ten per cent cut, so that in that regard the canal employees are in a little different position. If the minister will give me his attention—

Mr. MANION: I am listening to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HEENAN: He takes too much notice of his officers in making these cuts. I say, the rest of the government employees did not suffer a twenty-five per cent cut on the eve of a further ten per cent reduction, so that these particular employees are now going to suffer to the extent of thirty-five per cent. Even if we admit for the moment that perhaps they had been receiving for a time more than the then prevailing rates of wages, a thirty-five per cent cut is a pretty heavy one.

Mr. MANION: May I say here—

Mr. HEENAN: One moment. As I pointed out the other evening to the Minister of Finance, who agreed with me, if the minister reduces his employees another ten per cent then the contractors in that particular district will have the right to ask the Labour department for a further reduction of ten per cent so far as they are concerned, to bring their employees on a level with the canal employees. And so on down the line. There is no end to it when you are going down, although there is always an end when you are going up. I repeat, I can see the minister's point of view, but I want him to reconsider the matter. I am not going to argue whether it was right or wrong to make that twenty-five per cent reduction in the rates paid the canal men, to bring them into line with the prevailing rates paid in the district; I will not discuss that at the moment; but when you take another ten per cent off these men, you give the contractors in that district the right to say, "Our prevailing rates are higher than the rates paid to government employees and we are entitled to make a further ten per cent reduction." In other words, you are simply inducing those contractors to follow suit. I implore the minister to reconsider this matter in that regard. I think the fairness of my argument will appeal to him.

Mr. MANION: We have been using the term "twenty-five per cent" but my officers remind me that the general cut did not amount to that much. A cut of twenty-five per cent was made where such a deduction was necessary to bring the rates paid to a level with the prevailing rates. In some instances no cut was made at all.

Mr. HEENAN: It does not make any difference what was the extent of the cut, the argument is the same.

Mr. MANION: There is another point to be considered. These men working for the government are assured of steadier employment than those working for private contractors. The men on the canal are practically permanent employees, and my hon. friend knows that it is a great advantage for a man to feel sure of reasonable continuance of employment.

Mr. YOUNG: Do they work all winter?

Mr. MANION: Certain repairs are carried out on the canal during the winter. Some of these men are on part time, and some are dropped. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) asked for the rates of wages. I shall give the rates paid on the Welland canal, which are as follows:

Blacksmith	65 cents per hour
Blacksmith's helper	45 cents per hour
Timberman	60 cents per hour
Carpenter	75 cents per hour
Carpenter's helper	45 cents per hour
Chauffeur	$120 per month
Compressor runner	60 cents per hour
Concrete finisher	50 cents per hour
Concrete foreman	65 cents per hour
Diver	1 25 per hour
Electrician	70 cents per hour

Mr. HEAPS: When were those rates in effect?

Mr. MANION: Those are the rates after the reduction had been made.

Mr. HEAPS: There will be a further ten per cent reduction made on those rates?

Mr. MANION: That is quite right.

Mr. HEAPS: That will bring the rates below the rates prevailing in the district?

Mr. MANION: It may possibly bring them ten per cent below the prevailing rates, but I have just given my argument in defence of that. The men who have been working for private contractors on the Welland canal are practically finished. I have received hundreds of letters from men who have been working for some years for private contractors and who would like to get jobs with the government. I think a protest has been received from only one organization.

Mr. HEAPS: The Minister of Railways ought not to use the argument he is now using, that because many are out of work those who are employed should be satisfied with any rate of wages. I have no doubt there are many people outside of this House of Commons who would be willing to act as members of parliament for considerably less than $3,600 per year, and there are many who would be willing to accept the job of Minister of Railways at a great deal less than the minister is receiving at the present time. The last thing in the world the government should do is to reduce wages because people are out of work. This brings us back to the general ten per cent reduction, but in adopting that policy the government has given a lead to outside employers. The minister has admitted that the wages received by the men on the canal or the employees of his department are probably below the prevailing rates in the district, and there is no doubt that other employers who are paying a higher rate will reduce their men to the rate now paid by the government.

Mr. MANION: The annual pay of these men would be much higher than the annual pay of the men to whom my hon. friend is referring.

Mr. HEAPS: There are many outside employers who provide steady employment. Take the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission, for instance; their men are employed steadily the year round, and probably their rates are higher than those of the federal government. It is quite possible that members of the same union will be receiving different rates of pay, the one rate ten per cent below the other. I draw this aspect of the matter to the attention of the minister, as I do not think the government took it seriously into consideration when it adopted the general cut.

Mr. MITCHELL: The government took advantage of the depression in order to reduce its own rates by twenty-five per cent, and now it proposes to make a further cut. This will be setting an example to outside employers to reduce again their rates of pay by ten per cent.

Mr. NEILL: When Bill No. 19, which provides for the ten per cent cut, was introduced by the Prime Minister for the Minister of Finance, such a case as this was referred to. The Prime Minister was asked if some men who had recently had their wages cut would receive a further cut of ten per cent, and he answered to the effect that there was a special provision in the bill to take care of such cases. The Prime Minister referred to section 6 of the bill, which reads:

> The treasury board may make regulations,—(b) determining in any case of doubt the amount to be treated as the amount of compensation of any member of the public service of Canada for the purposes of this act.

That subsection was to take care of just such cases as we have been discussing this evening. I suggest to the minister that all he has to do is to take advantage of the procedure provided by that subsection and thus fulfil the assurances given by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MANION: The matter is not absolutely decided, and I shall agree to give it further consideration, although I shall not go any further than that at the moment. I should like to point out that governmental wages compare very favourably with those paid by private companies. While I should not care to give the names of the various companies, I shall give the rates paid for different occupations.

Mr. HEAPS: Are these companies in the same district?

Mr. MANION: Yes. I should not like to give the names of the companies, but if my hon. friend desires I shall let him see the list. The rates for blacksmiths paid by different companies are 38 cents, 48 cents, 45 cents, 75 cents, 75 cents, 50 cents, 60 cents and 60 cents. Our rate is 60 cents, which is as high as or higher than six out of the eight.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the prevailing rate?

Mr. MANION: I am simply pointing out what might be the prevailing rate. First class carpenters; 45, 54, 70, 75, 60, 55, 60, 60, 65 cents; ours is 60.

Mr. EULER: That is 60 before the ten per cent is taken off, which would make it 54.

Mr. MANION: Yes. Electricians; 48, 53, 51, 60, 70, 90 cents; ours, $145 a month, which is a pretty fair wage. Labourers; 30, 34, 42, 35, 30, 35, 25, 25, 30 cents; ours is 40. With the exception of one there is no other in that whole group in Ontario that pays as high labour wages as we do.

Mr. HEAPS: Don't you think the government ought to be a model employer of labour?

Mr. MANION: Yes, and I think we are.

Mr. HEAPS: Two cuts of twenty-five per cent?

Mr. MANION: That is not fair.

Mr. HEAPS: One of twenty-five and one of ten per cent.

Mr. MANION: Twenty-five was the highest cut, and some took no cut at all. It was simply put at the prevailing rates. Those are the prevailing rates. Generally ours are beyond the highest rates paid by private companies. The ten per cent cut is simply because of the fact that all government employees—including my hon. friend and myself, if we can be termed such—have taken a ten per cent cut. My hon. friend thought that plenty of people would be willing to become members of parliament at $3,600 a year. Well, all they have to do is to get elected—and my hon. friend from Hamilton has had the most recent experience in that line.

Mr. HEAPS: How do the government rates in Ontario compare with the fair wage standard?

Mr. MANION: Our rates have been settled after consultation with the Labour department. That department is noted for giving breaks to the workers, and I have no doubt that it has taken into account any legislation dealing with wages. But I repeat, this matter is still more or less sub judice, and I shall give it further consideration before deciding absolutely.

Mr. HEENAN: The minister's citation of rates was correct. If he will look at the labour situation all over Canada he will see that that condition prevails in every province

Some employers will grind their workmen right down into the mud, into a condition of slavery; but that is no reason why the government should follow suit.

Mr. MANION: We are not doing that.

Mr. HEENAN: I know he would be one of the last men to follow in that line. While the fair wages legislation of 1930 mentions "the prevailing rate of wages," it empowers the Minister of Labour to declare that the prevailing rate shall not be taken as the standard unless it is fair and reasonable. I am not going to argue the matter any further in view of the minister's promise that he will give it further consideration. Unfortunately he was not in the house when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance made certain statements in connection with this very same matter. Undoubtedly other employers of labour in that particular section will take advantage of the government's attitude to seek to reduce their labour wages another ten per cent, and therefore I would ask the minister to give the subject very careful consideration.

Item agreed to.

Welland canal, improvements (revote $10,700), $25,900.

Mr. GARDINER: This is the old canal, I presume. What improvements are you making there?

Mr. MANION: Yes, it is. Certain water powers and docks have to be kept up under a contract.

Item agreed to.

Welland ship canal, improvements, $125,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What is the reason for providing this item when we have already provided for construction and betterments, $3,123,400?

Mr. MANION: This is for a wharf on the east side of the canal at Welland, $100,000, and the balance of $25,000 is for the completion of a dock at Homer, just outside St. Catharines. We get wharfage fees from these docks.

Mr. VENIOT: I notice the following despatch in the Montreal Daily Star of this date:

Manion asserts shipway urgent. Traffic will be diverted to N.Y. ports says minister.

Toronto, April 22.—Warning that unless the St. Lawrence river were developed, downbound traffic on that waterway might be diverted via the ports of Oswego and Albany, N.Y. through the United States, was given last night by Hon. R. J. Manion, Dominion Minister of Railways and Canals, when he addressed the Toronto Transportation Club.

Is that a forecast of the policy of the government in connection with the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway? Perhaps the minister is not in a position to answer my question to-night.

Mr. MANION: Oh yes, I remember the speech very well. I think it worth while for the people of Quebec to be reminded there is danger if the St. Lawrence ship channel is not constructed that traffic will be diverted through Oswego and Albany down the Hudson river and out by New York. That is the sum and substance of what I said. I did not discuss the policy at all. I merely pointed out that if the St. Lawrence waterway were not constructed there was that danger, and I quite adhere to that opinion. I think there is that danger which it is well for all of us to keep in mind.

Mr. VENIOT: I quote another paragraph from the minister's address:

Outlining the railway situation in Canada, Dr. Manion told the Transportation Club that in his opinion the Canadian National Railways would never be able to pay its debt to the Canadian government. Occasionally editorial writers, he said, "take the attitude that because facts are told we are doing damage to our railway situation in this country. I do not see what good it does the railways of Canada metaphorically to stick our heads in the sand and not see our troubles."

I agree with the minister that we should view our troubles in the proper way, but I am afraid from the minister's assertion expressing fears of the attitude of the United States that some of that red Canadian blood has gone out of him.

Mr. MANION: Not a bit.

Mr. VENIOT: Not a bit? I take it that the minister was speaking on behalf of the government, as a cabinet minister at all events, not simply giving his own opinion, and apparently he is basing the policy of the government on what looks to be a threat from the United States. If anything is to be done in Canada because of threats coming from the republic to the south of us, I think we ought to know it.

Mr. MANION: I did not mention any threat from the United States. I merely pointed out the possible danger which is recognized by many. I was not telling anybody in the United States anything that he does not already know. Regarding my remarks about the railway, I have nothing to withdraw. They are practically the same remarks that I made in this house. So far as the debt of the railway to the government of Canada is concerned, I do not think that it ever will be paid. Not a cent of it ever has been paid, and I am sure that not a cent of it ever will be paid.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think that it ever was intended that one cent should be paid. That is all right, but why should it be heralded all over the country, especially when addressing such an important association as the Transportation Club.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend has asked me a straight question and I will give him a straight answer. The reason it must be told is this, that the Canadian National Railways were being run too extravagantly and they had to be brought to task accordingly. The reasons there were for bringing them to task must be told the people or we would be accused of crucifying the Canadian National Railways. That is the answer to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Lots of red blood in that.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada: maintenance and operation, $288,780.45.

Mr. ROGERS: What does this amount cover?

Mr. MANION: It covers all the expenses of the Board of Railway Commissioners, the salaries of the staff, travelling expenses and all that sort of thing.

Mr. ROGERS: It looks a very big sum.

Mr. MANION: It is less by $32,000 than last year.

Mr. ROGERS: That may be, but I notice that there is another item for the salaries of the railway commissioners. This seems a very big sum.

Mr. MANION: The salaries for the commissioners are statutory. The item before us covers such things as the salaries of the staff, $219,866.81; official reporting, because most of the evidence is taken down in shorthand, $11,800; official car, $3,000; printing, $6,000; stationery, $4,000; telegraph and telephone, $1,500; travelling expenses for the board and staff, $20,000; contingencies, $22,613.64. It is a big item, but it is less than last year by $32,000. Mr. Justice Fullerton has given me a very fine impression. He is a man who I believe is efficient, able and just, and I believe that he will do a great deal of good to the whole board.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. CAYLEY: Just what progress has been made with regard to the Toronto Suburban Railway?

Mr. MANION: None. The interest has not been paid. We have received recently from some shareholders in England who hold some of the 4½ per cent debentures a claim sent by their legal representatives, but nothing further has been done. The property has been turned over to the bondholders and they are at liberty to do as they wish with it. The service was discontinued and the road abandoned so far as the Canadian National Railway is concerned.

Mr. CAYLEY: That would mean that the Canadian National Railway from now on has no further interest in the road and admits no further responsibility as to the payment of interest and principal to the bondholders?

Mr. MANION: That is the attitude they take, yes.

Mr. CAYLEY: Then it is finally closed up so far as the government's interest in the road is concerned.

Mr. MANION: The government never had any interest in it. The road was a subsidiary of the Canadian National, but it was never guaranteed by the government or by the Canadian National. The government had no direct interest in it at all. The government has finished with it unless these people who are making claims can show that they have legal rights to claim something that they have not obtained.

Mr. CAYLEY: It is a mystery to me how the Canadian National assumed the ownership of the road without assuming responsibility to the bondholders.

Mr. MANION: They simply took over the railway and paid the interest on the bonds, but the bonds were never guaranteed by the government or by the railway in any shape or form. The Canadian National operated the road.

Mr. NEILL: On a lease?

Mr. MANION: They operated the road through ownership of the common stock, and they paid interest on the bonds. For some years they have been paying the interest at a loss. They are not only losing the interest they paid which had not been earned, but they had to pay for repairs and so forth.

Mr. CAYLEY: Did the road ever earn interest?

Mr. MANION: I know that it did not of recent years, and my deputy informs me that it never did. After that state of affairs had continued for some years, when the Canadian National got into financial difficulties this year they saw no reason why they should continue to pay interest that was not being earned, and in addition, my recollection is that to continue to operate the road they would have had to spend on it $300,000 in capital expenditures. So they simply decided that they had no further obligation to pay the interest on the debentures. After all, the debenture holders of this road are in no worse shape than the debenture holders of many other private companies all over the world, and the only reason these people are making any claim at all, so far as I can see—I am speaking subject to any information that I have not at the moment—is that it is nominally a government institution. But the government never guaranteed it, and the Canadian National never guaranteed it. The Canadian National were simply operating the road. That is the only link there is with the government. Of course, it is possible that after further consideration it may be admitted that they have some claim, but so far I have seen no reason for admitting any.

Mr. CAYLEY: If the road never earned the interest, and the government have paid it out of the revenue of the country, one would feel that the government did recognize the responsibility.

Mr. MANION: The government did not pay the interest; the Canadian National Railways paid it. It may have been indirectly paid by the government, but—

Mr. CAYLEY: The Canadian National Railways did not earn it, so it was paid out of the revenues of the country.

Mr. MANION: That is correct.

Mr. CAYLEY: Was there an offer made by the city of Toronto at one time to buy this road?

Mr. MANION: That claim is made by the owners of the debentures, but I cannot answer my hon. friend's question: They claim there was, but that is something about which I know nothing.

Mr. CAYLEY: I understand they offered at one time to pay $3,000,000 for this road. Do the officers of the department recollect any offer of that kind?

Mr. MANION: My deputy says he does not, and it was before my time. I do know that the owners of the debentures claim that an offer was made by the city of Toronto, but that the sale was not made.

Mr. GARDINER: How did this road become a subsidiary of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. MANION: It was a subsidiary of the old Canadian Northern, and I believe it was taken over by order in council on the recommendation of the Canadian National Railways' management made to the government of the day. I am sorry I cannot give the year, but I know it was some years ago. It was a Mackenzie and Mann subsidiary of the Canadian Northern Railway. The Canadian National Railways took it over and operated it for some years at a loss, but during those years paid the interest to the debenture holders.

Mr. GARDINER: Did the old Canadian Northern pay the interest, too?

Mr. MANION: I presume it did, but I cannot say definitely.

Mr. CAYLEY: I have a clipping before me, but I am not just certain from what paper it has been taken. It is as follows:

> I would like to ask if the Canadian National recognizes any moral obligations. The Canadian National Electric has the very strongest moral claim. Toronto, in January, 1922, by a majority of over 2,500 voted to buy this electric road for $3,000,000 (the mortgage being $2,628,000), which would have given the bondholders par for their bonds and later Toronto bought a portion of the railway in the Toronto limits for $118,317 on which I believe the mortgage was not discharged.

Further on in the same article I find the following:

> And why did the government by act of parliament passed on June 6, 1919, incorporate this road as part of the Canadian National system, and in that act state that any deficit would be paid out of the consolidated funds of Canada? If Canada is willing to take umbrage under a legal technicality and not recognize any moral claim it will complete the mistrust Great Britain has in Canada's financial integrity and make Canadians hang their heads in shame.

It would seem a good offer was made at a time when the road was paying its way, and for some reason or other that offer was turned down.

Mr. MANION: Of course that is the history of many businesses. I do not suppose there is a business in the world to-day that cannot look back to a time only a few years ago when it could have sold out for a big price, and they are sorry they did not do so. As to "Canadians hanging their heads in shame," may I say that such suggestion is a habit followed from time to time by people who have held bonds of some Canadian road. We all know the story of the Grand Trunk junior shareholders. The matter was put before a board of arbitration with the consent of the management of the old Grand Trunk, and the board of arbitration decided against them. However, that agitation still goes on in England. It would seem that widows and orphans in Canada must also get consideration. After all there are two sides to all questions, and there may be some justice in the present case. If there is further legal proceeding or further consideration by the government, any claims will be given attention. I would have no desire whatever to sidetrack any moral claim. According to the statement put to me by the railway, however, there is no moral claim. The four and a half per cent debenture holders of the Toronto Suburban had a mortgage on the Toronto Suburban Railway. Therefore when the Canadian National Railways refused to pay the interest the debenture holders had a right to foreclose their mortgage. And if they wished to operate the road they could do so, or sell it out, or do anything else they liked. As a matter of fact even when the interest was being paid I am informed the debentures of recent years did not sell much above fifty. Surely the people buying the debentures were not sure that the government was paying the four and a half per cent, or a government bond of four and half per cent would have brought more than fifty.

Mr. SANDERSON: What was the total issue?

Mr. MANION: About $2,600,000.

Mr. CAYLEY: There seems to be some difference of opinion as to the moral obligation, and I can quite readily see that there would be. I have before me a letter on the stationery of the Financial Post, and among other things it says:

> The Toronto Suburban Railway first mortgage four and a half per cent debenture stock due July 15, 1961, generally referred to now as the Canadian National Electric railway bond issue and which I presume you prefer to, is quite a conservative investment.
> The issue is secured by a first lien on over fifty-six miles of road between Toronto and Guelph, power houses, land, buildings, franchises and other immovable property, as well as a first floating charge on the remainder of the company's assets.

They call it quite a conservative investment. I should have preferred the expression, "quite a safe investment".

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: So would I.

Mr. GARDINER: What date was that?

Mr. CAYLEY: May 27, 1931. Here is a communication from the Toronto Saturday Night dated January 10, 1923. It is as follows:

> We consider the Toronto Suburban Railway four and a half per cent debenture stock an attractive purchase. There is a first mortgage on the property and while the railway is owned by the Canadian National Railways one can be sure that it will be looked after by the Dominion government, if earnings are not enough to take care of it.

There was the view that the Canadian government or the Canadian National Railways would look after it. The minister knows as well as anybody that sometimes the public do not understand what they are buying. The certificates that were issued are very misleading. Quoting from another newspaper article I find the following:

> The Toronto Suburban Railway passed into the hands of the Canadian National Electric Railway a number of years ago, and the certificates read—"The Canadian National Electric Railway." The bank amalgamations used a very similar form, and in each case assumed the absorbed banks' liabilities. These certificates bear the signature of H. W. Thornton and three or four other officials of the Canadian National Railways. The transferring has always been done by the Canadian National Railways and the interest cheques came from the Canadian National.

That is the point I wish to bring out. It seems as though everything was done to induce the public to feel that they were secured, and even those who were in a position to know felt to a certain extent that the certificates were good if the government had taken them over. I know we cannot protect the public against buying, and yet when they see certificates signed by men they know, they think everything is all right.

Mr. MANION: There are others in the same position.

Mr. CAYLEY: I am very sorry this has occurred. Now I should like to ask the minister a final question. I see a long list of other bonds in a similar position, that are not guaranteed. I suppose they will ultimately fall in the same category?

Mr. MANION: Not necessarily; some of them are in a much different position. Some are on portions of the road that could not possibly be let fall, no matter how much you might wish to do so. For example, you might have bonds on a central portion of the old Grand Trunk line running from Toronto to Montreal, a part of the line that could not be given up. The Toronto Suburban, however, happened to be hanging out on a limb, so to speak, and I suppose the National railways felt they could let the owners take it over. If the mortgage is on an integral part of the line the Canadian National cannot take that position.

I do not wish to be misunderstood, and I do not wish to be unfair to the people who had the interest coming to them. I greatly sympathize with them. I do not wish to be hard-hearted; I understand how people may be misinformed, sometimes quite unintentionally and at other times intentionally. Of course no government is responsible. My hon. friend read something with reference to 1923, when this government was not in power. Even the late government, however, was not responsible for the opinion of a newspaper financial critic. As I say, I have every sympathy for those people, and if later on it is shown that they have rights that have been misconstrued or misinterpreted or violated by the Canadian National Railways certainly I should be the last to say they should not be given justice. That is the best I can say. I sympathize very much indeed, but at the moment I also sympathize with the people of Canada who have paid the interest on these bonds for a number of years, when that interest was not earned. I do not know, without some further reason being shown, why the interest should continue to be paid when it is not earned.

Mr. EULER: I had not intended to take part in this debate and I do not desire to prolong it, but I cannot quite agree with my hon. friend the minister with regard to the moral obligations and the liability of the owners of the road, who after all are the people of Canada through the Canadian National Railways. I do not agree that the obligation to pay the interest or the principal is at all dependent on whether the road earned the money.

Mr. MANION: I did not say that.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend said he had a great deal of sympathy for the people of Canada. We all have that sympathy for ourselves, because the railways are losing money and naturally they do not want to pay out more than is necessary. But I view the matter in this way: There is a distinct difference between the shareholders of this road, who after all are the people of Canada, and the bondholders of the road who are the creditors. When a business goes wrong those owning the business should be the losers and the creditors should be paid if the assets are there with which to pay them. It may be perfectly true that there is no legal liability; it may be perfectly true that in order to satisfy their claims as far as possible the bondholders may take possession of the road, which is worth practically nothing. To-day the people of Canada, through the government of Canada and the Canadian National Railways, have taken absolutely, I contend, the position of the original owners, who were the Canadian Northern or the Mackenzie and Mann people.

Mr. MANION: They were the owners subject to the mortgage.

Mr. EULER: Quite so, but the mortgage holders are the creditors and the men who own the stock are the owners.

Mr. MANION: I am the owner of my house, but if I do not pay the interest the mortgagor can take the house.

Mr. EULER: I am very glad my hon. friend raised that point, because I was going to use that illustration with regard to the moral obligation. We will suppose that I have a house or property, or my hon. friend has it, which is worth $10,000. I need money, and I place a mortgage of $5,000 on that property. I owe that $5,000; I merely give the mortgage as a sort of security upon which the creditor may realize. I owe the whole of the $5,000, whether or not there is any security given; that is my contention. If it should happen, for any reason at all, that the property becomes worth only $2,000 or $3,000, or if the insurance on the house is allowed to lapse and the house burns down, that does not wipe out the debt; the money is still owed if there is any possibility of paying it. Should the house burn down, the debt is not wiped out even legally if there was a personal obligation, but of course in this case there was no personal liability.

Mr. MANION: And the government was not really the owner; the National railways owned it.

Mr. EULER: The government is the National railways; I do not think you can dissociate the two at all. The point is this: There was a liability in the first instance, when these bonds or debentures were sold. I presume the actual money, which amounted probably to almost the par value, was paid into the treasury of Mackenzie and Mann, or the Canadian Northern Railway, and now the government of Canada, through the National railways, has placed itself absolutely in the position of that original company. I think that must be regarded as true.

Now there is a debt to the extent of over $2,000,000 owing to these debenture holders. Is there not a moral obligation? The mere fact that a mortgage was given as security means nothing whatever as far as the moral obligation is concerned. I do not care whether the road is worth a red cent; if the debtor is able to pay he ought to pay his debt when it comes due. I think that argument is absolutely sound. The legal obligation may not be there, but I cannot see how the government of Canada, which placed itself in the position of the original borrower of that money, can escape the moral responsibility.

Mr. MANION: I think there is a slight difference in the two cases. The government of Canada never guaranteed those bonds, nor did the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. EULER: But they borrowed the money.

Mr. MANION: No, the government did not borrow the money and neither did the Canadian National. The old Canadian Northern borrowed it on a mortgage on the road, and the persons holding the mortgage have a right to foreclose. If the debenture holders thought the Dominion of Canada was responsible why was it that the bonds sold for from $50 to $35 during the last few years?

Mr. EULER: That is quite justified by the position which has been taken by the government. The debenture holders began to fear that the interest was not going to be paid, so they were glad to realize whatever they could on the bonds.

Mr. MANION: I am not going to argue too strongly, because there is merit in what my hon. friend says, but I think there is merit also in the other standpoint, and certainly the Canadian National take that attitude. So far we have backed them up. If it can be shown that through the whole history of the companies the Dominion of Canada is liable, then I presume the day will come when the Dominion of Canada will come through with the money.

Mr. EULER: A debt was created, and I do not see how the debtor can escape payment in full.

Mr. HEAPS: Did the government create the debt?

Mr. EULER: No, but the government placed itself in the position of the original debtor.

Mr. MANION: In 1919 Mackenzie and Mann would have been practically bankrupt if they had not been taken over by the government. If the government had not stepped in those bonds would not have been worth one red cent.

Mr. EULER: That is quite true, but the government did step in, very unwisely, I think. They should not have taken over the road at all.

Mr. MANION: They did step in, but I am not sure they stepped into the debt to the extent of one hundred cents on the dollar.

Mr. EULER: Certainly they did if they took the place of the original debtor.

Mr. NEILL: Would the government allow a fiat to be issued if the people concerned wish to take the matter into court?

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to give a definite answer; that would be taken into consideration.

Mr. CAYLEY: Section 18 of the act passed in 1919 states:

> The works of any of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern system which have not heretofore been declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada. . . .

What does that mean?

Mr. MANION: Does that refer to the Toronto Suburban?

Mr. CAYLEY: Yes, it is a section from the act by which it was taken over.

Mr. MANION: I should prefer not to attempt to answer that question. It is a legal question.

Mr. CAHAN: I can answer it, Mr. Chairman. To declare a work for the general advantage of Canada means nothing more or less than to bring it under the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada under the terms of the British North America Act.

Mr. CAYLEY: I am very glad to have that information. It seems to me that it is more than a moral obligation that we have towards these debenture holders; it is really a legal obligation.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Was not that order in council passed under the War Measures Act?

Mr. PORTEOUS: With regard to these bonds, I have a communication from Sir Henry Thornton which reads in part:

> The earnings from the properties of the Toronto Suburban Railway Company (now Canadian National Electric Railways) have for many years past been insufficient not only to pay interest on the debenture stock referred to in the trust company's letter, but even operating costs, and the Canadian National Railways, without any obligation on their part, have during the period advanced moneys to the electric railways company to enable it to pay the interest on the debenture stock.

The question I want to ask is this—

Mr. SANDERSON: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. PORTEOUS: It is dated October 21, 1931. My question is this: If the Canadian National Railways had no obligation in connection with these bonds, why did they pay interest on them during that period?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I can give the reason for their having done so, but they did for some years. That, of course, is not a sufficient reason why they should do it forever. Possibly they thought that the road might be used again, that it might become a profitable investment. They have done many things with which I do not necessarily agree.

Mr. CAYLEY: Section 19 of the same act from which I have been reading provides, with respect to the power to abandon the line, as follows:

With the approval of the governor in council, and upon the recommendation of the Board of Railway Commissioners, the company may abandon the operation of any lines or parts of lines of railway and incidental works, the operation or continued maintenance whereof has, in the opinion of the Board of Railway Commissioners, become unnecessary or inexpedient through duplication, or other economical considerations; and with the consent of a majority in value of the registered security holders affected may dismantle or dispose of the lines of railway or works so abandoned.

Has the law been carried out in that regard? Has the approval of the governor in council and others concerned been obtained?

Mr. MANION: No, I do not think it has. What was done was simply this. The railroad was abandoned by the Canadian National Railways and the owners, that is to say the debenture holders, could operate it if they chose. I speak subject to correction, but I do not think we have ever passed an order in council or that it has been submitted to the Board of Railway Commisioners, though I cannot say positively.

Mr. CAYLEY: Would it not be necessary?

Mr. MANION: I think not, for the reason that the debenture holders could operate the road.

Mr. CAYLEY: You simply walked out and left the property.

Mr. EULER: Have foreclosure proceedings been taken?

Mr. MANION: I do not know. That would be done through the Canadian National Railways, but certainly it has not come back to me in that form.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous services: including salaries and expenses of experts employed temporarily (revote $5,000), $41,300.

Mr. REID: How is this item made up?

Mr. MANION: It is made up of a number of items. It is for salaries to provide for emergency assistance if required, the equivalent of five temporary clerks, $5,400 less ten per cent; maintenance and operation of official cars; general expenses; travelling expenses; telegrams, telephones, express, printing, stationery and contingencies. It is really for emergency demands that may arise in the department during the year.

Item agreed to.

Railway employees' provident fund: to supplement pension allowances payable under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum payments during the period 1st January, 1932, to 31st March, 1933, the sum of $30 per month instead of $20, as fixed by the said act, $29,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the minister explain the purpose of this queer legislation. Will it be retroactive? Are old employees under that pension fund going to be treated like the new pensioners, or will their minimum continue at $20? I see it applies only for one year. I suppose the purpose of this is to enable the railway to retire as many of the old employees of the Intercolonial as it can this year, but the minister must realize what a shock it will be to the old pensioners who are receiving a minimum of $20 per month to-day to see new pensioners getting $30, and this only for one year.

Mr. MANION: This is for the very purpose my hon. friend mentions; it is to supplement the pension allowances paid to employees on the Prince Edward Island Railway.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will it be retroactive?

Mr. MANION: This is a supplementary vote to give the employees the extra $10 so that they will receive $30.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It applies to everyone?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Item agreed to.

J. L. Weller, $3,500.

Mr. VENIOT: Explain.

Mr. MANION: This is a pension paid to Mr. J. L. Weller, who for many years was an engineer on the canals.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I assume we shall not be able to discuss the Mafeking cut-off this year?

Mr. MANION: I am sorry, but that opportunity will not be provided.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I suppose we will have a chance next year?

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman had an opportunity under the vote for the Hudson Bay railway, but he did not avail himself of it. I am sorry, because I should have liked to discuss this matter.

IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Soldier and general land settlement—amount required for soldier land settlement advances, for advances under the British family schemes recoverable from the British government, for the cost of administration of soldier settlement and general land settlement, and for the cost of administration of soldier settlement staff performing investigations for the War Veterans' Allowance Committee, $1,500,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the committee be able to obtain under this item the information asked for this afternoon?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): The information asked for has no reference to this item.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Could the minister furnish the definite items of expenditure in connection with this vote?

Mr. GORDON: There will be required for soldier land settlement advances, $505,000; for advances under the British family schemes, recoverable from the British government, $20,000; for cost of administration of soldier settlement, $744,000; for cost of administration of general land settlement, $213,000, and for investigations held in connection with the Department of Pensions and National Health, $18,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: For what purposes are these advances now made? I understand that no further loans are being granted.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. GORDON: The estimated advances are: for taxes, $357,000; for insurance premiums, $101,500; for seed and feed, $8,000; for breaking and clearing, $15,000; for repairs to buildings, $12,000; for summer fallow and weed control, $3,000; for legal expenses, $1,500; for expenses re sale of securities, $2,000; for administration charges, recoverable from settlers, $2,500 and for sundry expenses, $2,500. This makes a total of $505,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: How many of these settlers are still on the land, and how many have left their farms during the last year?

Mr. GORDON: As at December 31, 1931, there were 11,612 soldier settlers, and 5,184 civilian settlers, making a total of 16,796. Under the British family schemes there were still on the land, 2,383 settlers and 226 purchasers of reverted property, making a total of 2,609. The grand total of both schemes is 19,405.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: How many settlers, particularly soldier settlers, have left the land during last year?

Mr. GORDON: As at December 31, 1930, those who had left were as follows: Soldiers, 252; civilians, 195; British family schemes, 103, making a total of 550.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The minister will remember that under the amendments of 1930 it was provided that no foreclosures were to take place except through the district courts. Could the minister advise the committee if any adjustments have been carried on in such a manner as to require the services of these district judges?

Mr. GORDON: It has not been necessary to utilize the legislation referred to. The policy laid down is that no rescission of contract shall take place which would cause a man to have to give up his farm. Such a policy would be utterly hopeless at a time like this.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There were no forceful foresclosures?

Mr. GORDON: None whatever.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: How much was due from the soldier settlers and the other two classes during the past year on arrears and on current account, and how much has been paid during the past year?

Mr. GORDON: To April 14, 1932, the current payments falling due amounted to $3,373,890.87; there were arrears of $2,065,151.67; there was paid on account during the past year $881,705.63—or 26 per cent of the current payments falling due.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Is that the general percentage as applied to all three classes?

Mr. GORDON: That applies to the soldier settlers only. With respect to the three thousand British family settlement scheme, the current payments falling due amount to $850,487.33; arrears, $652,910.23; total, $1,503,397.56. The payments on account during the past year amount to $91,548.94—or 18 per cent of the current payments falling due.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: So the soldier settlers have done rather better than the others, I suppose on account of the deductions that have taken place with regard to the soldier settlement farms.

Mr. GORDON: It would appear that the soldier settlers have done better than the others by just the difference between 26 and 18 per cent. That in a measure is due to the remedial legislation, and also to the fact that they have been longer established on the land than the British family settlers.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: What were the total advances made by the Dominion government on this whole scheme; the amount paid, the amount deducted by way of legal exemptions made during those different years, and the total now outstanding as the whole investment?

Mr. GORDON: As of December 31, 1931, the gross loans, including interest, totaled $137,882,141.98. From that should be deducted land transferred to the British settlement scheme, $8,431,234.51, repayments of $47,657,960.27, legislative reductions—that is the remedial legislation to which I made reference —$21,721,976.52—making a total of $77,811,171.30. That deducted from the $137,882,141.98 leaves a balance of $60,070,970.68. Then there were losses on resale of reverted properties, $10,565,913.42, which should be deducted from the amount just mentioned, leaving a balance of $49,505,057.26. The British family settlement loans amount to $13,878,170.64. This makes a present net investment by the country, $63,383,227.90.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There is one point in these statistics that I do not quite follow. I understand the total advances made, including interest, represents the country's original investment in the entire scheme of about $140,000,000, that something like $48,000,000 has been repaid, including interest. The minister will have noted from the records that in 1922 interest exemptions were granted, running over two, three or four years, according to the length of time of the men on the land, amounting I think to $10,000,000. I was chairman of that committee at the time. That apparently is not taken account of. Should not that $10,000,000 of exemptions have been added to the $137,000,000 of total investment, and then deducted just as were the other deductions? Because undoubtedly the country will be paying interest upon the equivalent of that $10,000,000.

Mr. GORDON: The amount referred to is not included in the $137,882,141.98. It would have to be added.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It should be. It was an exemption just as much as the $121,000,000. I shall have something to say later on the general policy.

Mr. GORDON: I am instructed that the amount never was charged up to the advances. Strictly speaking, I think it should have been.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes.

Mr. CAYLEY: I have heard some complaints from the municipal councils that they were unable to collect their taxes on abandoned farms. Is any provision made for the payment of such taxes? I have in mind some of these veterans who have undertaken farming operations, and have done well, but under present conditions they find their taxes are a very heavy burden. Some have reached the condition where they are likely to have their chattels seized for taxes. In order to keep these well qualified farmers on the land, is the government extending them any assistance?

Mr. GORDON: The question of taxes on these lands of course always has been a problem, because under the British North America Act, if I remember correctly, such lands would not be subject to municipal taxes. With respect to the settlers themselves we have adopted the policy that where a settler is desirous of staying on the land, even in these times when he is having a difficult struggle, he will not be disturbed and the government will take care of his taxes, making the advance to soldier settlers as the act contemplates in order to tide them over this period.

Mr. CAYLEY: Then all he needs to do is to make application for the advance?

Mr. GORDON: If he makes application to the district office for an advance for his taxes, the officer will very likely know all the man's circumstances, and if the settler is making an honest effort, in other words, if he is not making a fraudulent attempt to secure an advance, the policy is to make that advance of taxes to him in order that he may not find himself confronted with a bill that he cannot meet.

Mr. CAYLEY: Do you take a lien on his chattels for the repayment of that advance?

Mr. GORDON: Originally under the legislation the government had a prior lien or charge against not only the land but the chattels as well, but in 1930 legislation was passed disposing of the prior lien against the live stock, so that now the government has no priority on the live stock for taxes. I can assure the hon. member that in any case of merit the government will see that no man has his live stock sold for taxes during this trying period.

Mr. CAYLEY: Thank you.

Mr. LUCAS: Would the minister tell the committee how the collections during the past year compared with the preceding year?

Mr. GORDON: Does the hon. member want it by provinces?

Mr. LUCAS: Perhaps the minister would give the totals and then by provinces.

Mr. GORDON: In 1931 the total collections amounted to $883,642.45, or 27.6 per cent, and in 1932, $881,705.63. The figures are not given in all cases by provinces, but in some cases by districts. The amounts collected from the soldier settlers in 1931 and 1932 were as follows:

District	1931	1932
British Columbia. .	$237,490 32	$147,357 25
Calgary office. . . .	89,383 75	114,972 57
Edmonton office. . .	105,140 03	227,108 22
Saskatchewan. . . .	150,358 86	177,297 57
Manitoba.	81,700 23	61,977 52
Ontario.	118,258 83	89,797 37
Quebec.	30,991 53	24,877 29
Maritime provinces.	70,318 90	38,317 84

So in spite of the low commodity prices the settlers I think are doing remarkably well, and it will be noticed that in spite of the tragedy in southern Saskatchewan the settlers paid more in 1932 than in 1931.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: A little over a year ago the minister put into effect certain changes in administration for the purpose of bringing about economies. Would the minister tell the committee what was the result of the economies thus effected? I am not asking for details but simply in the gross, as to the number of employees and the amount expended.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. SANDERSON: Would the minister be good enough to state the total arrears of interest?

Mr. GORDON: Answering my hon. friend from Red Deer first, on August 6, 1930, the staff amounted to 526 persons with annual salaries of $974,274, and on December 31, 1931, the staff had been reduced to 368 persons with annual salaries of $704,010. The reduction in the staff therefore was 158, and the reduction in the annual salaries $270,264. Then there was a reduction of 41 in the number of motor cars. In August, 1930, there were 161 motor cars, of which 41 were deemed to be unnecessary. I believe the experiences in the last year and a half have amply justified the reduction.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister made some change in the settlement board within the last year. Previously there was a board of three members.

Mr. GORDON: I did not make the change; parliament did.

Mr. SANDERSON: But the minister must take the responsibility.

Mr. GORDON: Certainly I do. Originally there was a board of three, now there is one. It was by reason of that change that the economies to which I have made reference were possible. I shall illustrate, if hon. members wish: Originally there were three members, composed of a chairman and two commissioners.

Mr. SANDERSON: Were the three all ex-service men?

Mr. GORDON: No; two were ex-service men and one was not. There were nine divisions at head office, each commissioner having three divisions of the service under his jurisdiction. In the field I found that no one of the offices was so organized that it corresponded with head office, and that no two districts seemed to have the same method or system of accounting. I believed that it would be desirable to do away with the board of three and to place one man in charge. That was done, and the nine divisions at head office were reduced to three. Each district office throughout Canada was reorganized so that its business methods would conform to those at head office. We found that irritating delays in answering complaints and requests from settlers were eliminated, because there was very little if any conflict in jurisdiction at head office. From the correspondence I have reviewed coming from many hundreds of settlers I think the change was desirable, and I know it is working out very well.

Mr. SANDERSON: One member now takes the place of the former three; is that member an ex-service man?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, and one with a very fine overseas record.

Mr. DUFF: Which two men were let out, and what positions did they hold?

Mr. GORDON: Colonel Rattray, the chairman, and Mr. Maber, one of the commissioners, who was not an ex-service man and who had a substantial superannuation. I am told that his superannuation amounted to about $3,600.

Mr. DUFF: Why was Colonel Rattray let out when he had been chairman of the board, and when he had advised that the board be reduced from three to one? Why was he not kept on as the one remaining member, instead of bringing in an outsider?

Mr. GORDON: I was never advised that Colonel Rattray suggested the reduction. Certainly he never did so at any time to me.

Mr. DUFF: I do not suppose he had a chance, when you fired him.

Mr. GORDON: Well now—

Mr. DUFF: Would the minister give us the reason why Colonel Rattray was let out? He was chairman of the board, an ex-soldier, a good business man, and there were no complaints against him.

Mr. GORDON: Because I believed I was getting a better man to take charge. I do not make that statement as any reflection upon Colonel Rattray, who I believe was a fine soldier and a gentleman. However, after making a complete survey from coast to coast I concluded that a stranger and an outsider should be put in charge, and I think the efficiency of the department has amply justified the change.

Mr. DUFF: Who was the gentleman put in charge?

Mr. GORDON: Thomas Magladery.

Mr. DUFF: Where did he come from?

Mr. GORDON: Originally he came from Edmonton, and subsequently lived in New Liskeard. He was appointed in October, 1930, by the old board composed of Colonel Rattray and the other two commissioners, to make a survey on all phases of soldier land settlement.

Mr. SANDERSON: On the recommendation of the minister, of course?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, on my recommendation. I may say there was no division of opinion among the members of the board as to the necessity for doing it. Prior to that he had made a general survey among and had organized the sales forces of a large agricultural machinery company operating in the three western prairie provinces. He was well acquainted with the situation with respect to settlers generally and with those in the west particularly.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, if I understand my geography the place from which this gentleman came who was appointed after Colonel Rattray was the town of New Liskeard, which is in the constituency of my hon. friend the minister. In other words he appointed a man from his own constituency and dismissed a good servant of the public who had served overseas.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUFF: We want Rattray put back.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Mr. ILSLEY:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda, reports and other documents exchanged between the Department of Public Works and any person or persons in Nova Scotia regarding the expenditure of public money under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, on the construction of a wharf, and on repairs to an existing wharf, both at Great Village, Colchester county, Nova Scotia; also a copy of the payrolls, showing the amount expended in labour and how expended; also a copy of the accounts showing prices paid for iron, logs, ballast, ballast poles, timber and plank, and from whom purchased.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I move to amend this motion slightly. I find that the place is Spencer's Point and not Great Village. I move that in the fifth and sixth lines the words "and on repairs to an existing wharf, both at Great Village" be struck out and the words "at Spencer's Point" be substituted therefor.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? It must be by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: These reports are not divided into parishes. The best than can be done will be done, but there is no division of work by parishes.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that a certain amount has been allowed, to be spent in that parish, the Dominion contributing one portion and the province and the municipalities the other.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the county of Bonaventure, not the parish. We will give such information as we have.

ST. NAZAIRE D'ACTON MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. DUMAINE:

For a return showing a copy of all tenders, the names of each person tendering, the amount of each respective tender and the date of its reception, the name of person to whom contract was awarded and on whose recommendation in connection with the mail contract on rural route No. 1, St. Nazaire d'Acton, in the county of Bagot; also a copy of all telegrams and correspondence exchanged in this respect

Mr. ELLIOTT: I refer to the date when the vacancy occurred.

Motion agreed to.

NEW ZEALAND TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) if he will advise the house just why he is unable to introduce the bill respecting the trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand reference to which appears on the orders of the day. It would have been of advantage to some of us had we had this agreement before the completion of the debate on the budget.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the agreement will be tabled to-morrow evening between ten and eleven o'clock. By doing this we will synchronize with the tabling of the agreement in New Zealand, which will be at about three o'clock on Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will probably synchronize also with the closing of the budget debate.

RADIO BROADCASTING

LEGISLATION RELATING TO CONTROL AND OWNERSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) advise if it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation during this session on the subject of radio broadcasting and ownership control?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, until the report of the committee dealing with this matter is tabled in this house, obviously I can make no announcement with respect to this matter. The question asked by my right hon. friend affords me an opportunity to say that my attention has been directed to a report in the newspapers indicating that certain discussions took place during a caucus of the government party. What transpires at caucuses is not supposed to be a matter of discussion and I have pleasure in informing the house that this matter was not discussed in any way. The government would not anticipate the action of the committee by suggesting what the report of the committee should be. It is obvious that a committee composed of the gentlemen who compose this committee would not take kindly to any such suggestion, even if it were made as it will not be. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and the former Minister of Marine (Mr. Cardin) are sufficient guarantee of the fact that this committee would not appreciate a suggestion from the government as to what its report should be, even assuming that such a suggestion were in the minds of the government, which it is not.

Mr. EULER: I assume that that statement covers the report that the Minister of Marine

(Mr. Duranleau) was in Montreal the other day in order to discuss going on with the proposals made by Mr. Beatty.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly does.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) and other hon. members as to whether the government proposes to introduce legislation to amend the Pension Act during the present session, may I inform the house that the government has given very careful consideration to the statement submitted by the associated veterans in connection with the operation and administration of the act. Representatives of the five service organizations concerned were heard by the government on April 23, and the view taken by the government is indicated by a letter to Major J. S. Roper, chairman of the associated veterans, which reads:

Ottawa, April 23, 1932.

Major J. S. Roper, M.C., K.C.,
Dominion President,
The Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League,
(Chairman of the Associated Veterans),
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

With reference to the legislative proposals submitted in January and to the hearing held to-day by the government at which were present representatives of the associated veterans, i.e., the Amputations Association of the Great War, the Sir Arthur Pearson Club of Blinded Sailors and Soldiers, the Canadian Pensioners' Association of the Great War, the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada, and the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League:

Under the amendments to the Pension Act of 1930, the Pension Tribunal has operated for only eighteen months and the Pension Appeal Court for fifteen months. When the legislation of 1930 was passed, it was suggested that it should at least have a fair trial before further amendments were made. The government is of the opinion that it can hardly be said that the time it has been in operation has afforded a real opportunity to test its effectiveness. Every effort will be made to improve the administration of the act and to expedite decisions being made. Our information warrants the belief that, when parliament again meets, we should be in a position to definitely determine the weakness of the present act and desire that every effort should be made to ascertain what amendments may be necessary.

The government will be pleased to refer the whole matter to a committee of the associated veterans' organizations, in conjunction with a committee appointed by the government, the report to be presented to the government before the first of, say February, 1933.

On behalf of the government, I desire to thank you and your officers and members not only for the spirit in which you have approached the matter under consideration, but also for the real assistance you have been in the administration of the act, and to express the hope that, as a result of cooperative effort, the conditions of which you complain may disappear.

Believe me, I am,
Yours faithfully,
(sgd.) Murray MacLaren,
Minister of Pensions and
National Health.

The reply from Major Roper reads as follows:

Ottawa, Canada,
April 24, 1932.

Colonel the Hon. Murray MacLaren,
C.M.G., P.C., M.P.,
Minister of Pensions and
National Health,
Daly Building,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Sir:—

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your very courteous letter of April 23, regarding the legislative and other proposals affecting ex-service men and women in Canada submitted to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister and members of the government of Canada by representatives of The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada; The Amputations' Association of the Great War; The Sir Arthur Pearson Club of Blinded Sailors and Soldiers; The Canadian Pensioners' Association of the Great War, and the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, hereinafter referred to as the associated veterans.

Since these proposals were presented in January, a survey has been made of the complaints arising from the operation of the present act from one end of Canada to the other. On investigation these complaints resolve themselves into three major classes, viz.: complaints re (a) the congestion of cases in the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada and the Pension Appeal Court; (b) the length of time it takes to get a final decision; (c) the unnecessary appealing of cases by commission counsel. The associated veterans are pleased to have the assurance of the government that every effort will be made to improve the administration of the act and to expedite decisions being made. This will in a measure satisfy some of the complaints.

The associated veterans have further taken into consideration the proposition made by the government to refer the whole matter to a committee of the associated veterans' organizations in conjunction with a committee appointed by the government, the report to be submitted to the government before the first of February, 1933. After taking into consideration the statements made by the government to the associated veterans yesterday and having due regard to the times through which Canada is passing the associated veterans while realizing the necessity of immediate remedial action, have come to the conclusion that they should accept this proposition provided that the report is made to the government when complete and any necessary legislation evolving from the same is presented to the next session of parliament. This also will enable a very close study to be made during the summer of the act by all parties interested. The associated veterans, however, are of the opinion that no time should be lost in appointing this committee and they are prepared immediately to meet together and name their representatives. In conclusion we wish to thank this government and its predecessors in office and the parliament of Canada for its kindness and consideration in days gone by and at the present time and to assure them that the ex-service men of this country to-day as in the days from 1914 to 1918 are willing to do everything in their power to assure the peace, order, and good government of Canada.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

(Sgd.) J. S. Roper,
Dominion President, Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League on behalf of the Associated Veterans named in the body of this letter.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): May I say I listened to the reply of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and I want to thank him for the definite and satisfactory answer that he has given to the many questions asked him this session in connection with pensions and returned men. But I should like to ask him whether, when the committee is appointed for next session, soldier settlers will be included by the government in the investigation?

Mr. MacLAREN: No; this subject does not come under the purview of the investigation.

Mr. McINTOSH: I might say that it was connected with the pension question in 1930, and I should like to impress upon the minister the importance of not overlooking the interests of the soldier settlers next year when the question is investigated.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has not the right to make a speech.

Mr. McINTOSH: It is not my intention to make a speech.

PURCHASE OF FERTILIZER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): In answer to a question asked on Friday last by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean), my information is that no such resolution has been received.

PRIVILEGE—MR. NEILL

APPEAL FROM RULING OF MR. SPEAKER—RULING SUSTAINED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I rise to a question of privilege under authority of standing order 16 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, and also of Bourinot, pages 303 and 304. Both these authorities lay down the rule that any question of privilege must have a reference to a member of parliament and to his functioning as such. The matter I wish to take up very briefly comes under that definition, so I presume I am in order. On page 2295 of Hansard of April 22 will be found two definite misstatements, both concerning myself. Both are intended and one of them is calculated to prejudice my political record and reputation. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) was referring to a debate in 1925 in connection with railway matters and he read to the extent of half a column the exact words of a speech made on that occasion by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), then Prime Minister of Canada. A little later on he used these words, referring to me:

> Well, the hon. member himself sat in this house during the session of 1925. I have gone very carefully through the debate to which I have referred—

Please note the Ultima Thule of caution. He had gone through it, not carefully, but very carefully.

> —but I cannot find that he offered any suggestions to the then government, nor did he support the Conservative members from British Columbia who demanded justice for their province with respect to freight rates.

He then, to the exent of about half a column, bases on that statement an attack against me. My answer is that his statement is entirely wrong. I did speak in that debate—

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the hon. member to order. So far he has given the house nothing that indicates he is speaking to a question of privilege. I have looked up the debate to which he refers. The hon. member for Fraser Valley says:

> I have gone very carefully through the debate to which I have referred, but I cannot find—

And so forth.

Mr. NEILL: But I am now going to proceed to show that is a gross misstatement.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Fraser Valley could not find certain things in a debate, that is no basis for a question of privilege on which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni could make a speech in refutation. What the hon. member for Fraser Valley said was fair criticism of another hon. member, and there may come a time in debate when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni can reply; but he cannot, on a question of privilege, make a speech in reply, as he is attempting to do now.

Mr. NEILL: If refuting a misstatement is not a question of privilege, then I appeal from your decision, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a question of privilege and it is not a proper statement to make.

Mr. NEILL: Then I appeal from your decision. I have not even been allowed to state the question. Am I permitted to continue?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member can appeal from the Speaker's ruling if he wishes. I rule that it is not a question of privilege, and it is an attempt on the part of the hon. member now to continue a debate which, so far is he is concerned, is closed.

Mr. NEILL: Then I appeal from that decision. While you are looking up the points of order, perhaps I may be allowed to state the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am looking up the procedure in regard to appealing from a Speaker's ruling. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni having quoted from the speech of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, as reported in Hansard of April 22, 1932, at page 2295, and on a question of privilege undertaking to reply thereto; the Speaker having ruled that the same is not a question of privilege and that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is out of order, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni appeals from that ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, April 21, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, previous to the adjournment of the debate, on Thursday evening, I compared certain statements made by our friend, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) in the course of the elections of 1930 and 1931, with the recent statements he made in the house. I did so not simply to be disagreeable to him, but for the sake of truth. Ever since our hon. friend has held a responsible post in the council of the nation, he would gladly have forgotten and, especially, have people forget certain pledges and statements which he made at election time. There are certain historical facts in his political campaigns which it is but right to consign to Hansard, so as to refer to them when the opportunity arises.

There is, sir, an argument set forth by the hon. Postmaster General in his speech, on April 19, last, to which I want to reply. At page 2178 of Hansard, the hon. Postmaster states:

> Our opponents forget also to mention that, under their regime, in 1905, farm products sold cheaper than they do to-day. Pork sold at $5 per cwt. and hay at $4 and $5 per ton; poultry 50 cents a pair.

What a fine argument, sir, for a person who contends that he is in earnest and what a consolation for farmers who are obliged to practically give away their products now! The scope of such an argument is unbounded, the hon. Postmaster General might just as well have gone back to 1832 and stated: "A hundred years ago the price of farm products was less than to-day." He might have gone as far back as the deluge! However, what does it prove, and especially, what relief can this afford to farmers? I trust that the hon. Postmaster does not look upon farmers as idiots; I hope that he is aware that farmers realize that 27 or 28 years ago, if the price of farm products was about the same as that of to-day, the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar was greater than at present. The farmers are aware also that the taxes they paid 27 or 28 years ago, were ten, fifteen or perhaps twenty fold less than now. The farmers equally know that in 1905 labour was cheaper, that the price of necessities such as farm implements was much less than to-day, in 1905 or 1896, the rate of interest on farm loans was lower than now. Therefore, I think it is childish to say to farmers, as a small compensation: "Cheer up, do not complain, the prices of commodities are about the same this year as they were in 1905 or 1896."

Instead, sir, of having to resort to such arguments and discuss Quebec's provincial affairs in this house, our friend, the hon. Postmaster General, who likes to pose as an expert in farm matters, would be well advised, with the help of his Quebec colleague, the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), to formulate an agricultural policy, one agreed upon and definite, thus brushing aside the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) who, to my mind, seems helpless to devise one himself. While our Quebec cabinet members busy themselves in petty and insignificant political squabbles, while they waste their time in ordering dismissals or discussing party questions with reference to political favours, our western friends who are organized and well represented in the house, help themselves to the treasury funds.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): They have been doing so for a long time.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Let me point out to an incident which recently happened in my county and which proves that our western friends, thanks to their excellent organization and the fighting spirit their worthy representatives display in the house, have practically emptied the treasury; there does not even remain a paltry $1,000 for the Quebec farmers. A few days ago, the municipal council of the small settlement of Ste. Sabine, in the upper part of my county, along the Maine border, wrote to me to inquire whether it would be possible to obtain $1,000 to purchase seed grain for the poor settlers of the parish. This parish was settled about ten or fifteen years ago; the farms are not yet in an advanced state of cultivation and the returns are not sufficient to afford a livelihood to those on the land. Previously, these settlers worked in the lumber camps, across the border, however, within the last few years, the United States government has closed the frontier to Canadian woodcutters; the result is that farmers from Ste. Sabine, as well as those from the surrounding country, are now destitute. The municipal council forwarded to me a resolution requesting a grant of $1,000. This is not a large amount, $1,000 only, to relieve these poor settlers, at Ste. Sabine, when compared with the ten or eleven million dollars paid as a bonus on the western wheat or again with the fifty million dollars or thereabouts expended in the west to relieve the farmers and guarantee the bonds of the western provinces, which are practically bankrupt. I referred this matter to the Minister of Agriculture and the director of unemployment. The following is my letter to the latter:

Ottawa, April 12, 1932.

Mr. Harry Hereford,
Director of Unemployment,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

I have the honour to enclose a copy of a resolution from the Municipal Council of Ste-Sabine which was forwarded to me by Mr. Edmond Mercier, secretary-treasurer of the council.

As you will note by this resolution, the farmers of that parish request a grant of $1,000, in order to purchase seed grains.

I suppose that such a request can be granted pursuant to the special Unemployment and Farm Relief Act (ch. 58, 1931).

The parish of Ste-Sabine is a settlement where the land has not yet been sufficiently improved to afford a livelihood to the settlers. Formerly the farmers of Ste-Sabine worked, in winter, in the lumber camps of the state of Maine, they earned enough to purchase their seed grain. For the last two years, the United States have completely closed their frontier and, owing to this, distress prevails now among the Quebec parishes along the frontier.

I wish to strongly support the request of the settlers of Ste-Sabine, and let me assure you that by granting this request you will be performing a good deed.

Yours faithfully,

Oscar L. Boulanger, M.P.

My letter to the hon. Minister of Agriculture being similarly worded, there is no need of reading it. I shall now read the answers.

The first is the answer of the director of unemployment:

Ottawa, April 15, 1932.

Mr. Oscar L. Boulanger, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—

I wish to acknowledge your letter of April 12, enclosing copy of a resolution of the parish of Ste-Sabine, referring to a grant of $1,000 which the municipal council request in order to assist the farmers in purchasing seed grain.

This is not a matter which can be dealt with pursuant to the agreement concluded with the province by virtue of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. However, I think this matter is entirely relevant of the provincial authorities.

You are aware, no doubt, that the Dominion government has concluded an agreement with the province in connection with the measures to be taken to relieve unemployment. However, this agreement does not cover such matters as the purchase of seed grain.

Kindly accept, sir, the assurance of my highest consideration.

Harry Hereford,
Dominion Director.

The letter of the hon. Minister of Agriculture is as follows:

Ottawa, April 16, 1932.

Mr. O. L. Boulanger, K.C., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Boulanger,—

I received your letter dated the 12th inst. enclosing a petition from the farmers of the municipality of Ste-Sabine who request a grant of $1,000 so as to help them in purchasing seed grain.

Unfortunately, we have no fund from which we could draw to give this kind of relief. Moreover no distribution of seed grain is made by the Dominion government. I would invite you to advise your correspondent to communicate with the provincial authorities on this matter.

Yours faithfully,
R. Weir.

I do not know, sir, pursuant to what agreement or understanding our western friends succeed in obtaining seed grain and I am wondering why this agreement favouring the western farmers does not also apply to the eastern farmers. If the hon. ministers who represent us in the dominion cabinet would bestir themselves in the interests of the Quebec farmers, it seems to me that we could obtain the same advantages as those granted to other sections of the country. I note by this correspondence that it has become a habit with the Dominion government to throw the blame on Quebec. I thought at first that it was the hobby of a few young back benchers on the government side, but I discover that our hon. friends, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Marine are also playing this game and endeavour to saddle the errors and blunders of the Dominion government upon the province of Quebec. It is more than time that Quebec should be left in peace; I think the Dominion government has enough serious and difficult problems to deal with and to occupy the great intellectual powers of the cabinet. They could devote their entire time, resources and ability to settling the problems which necessarily befall them; and allow Quebec to look after her own affairs, without interference.

Furthermore, the latter has shown that it was able to manage its own affairs. Quebec has given evidence of moderation and common sense, it proved this in the last provincial election by again reposing its confidence in statesmen who may have erred in the past, but who have the interests of the public at heart and offer guarantees of integrity and ability.

Do not interfere with Quebec and she will continue to set the example to others, to trace the path and lead the way. The other provinces of the Dominion would be well advised to follow in her footsteps and manage their affairs as she does; if they had followed her example, perhaps we would be better off.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): We do not come to Ottawa to beg.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): The other day I extended my congratulations to my friend, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon). Again, to-day, I do so, on the score of his having set aside the habit of belittling his province. He is clever and he soon discovered the errors of his ways and ceased following in the footsteps of those on the government side, who cannot rise in the house without saying something disagreeable about their province. While I am referring to my hon. friend, the member for Dorchester, he may perhaps allow me to make some suggestion to him. He requested the other day the cooperation of the opposition. He stated that the cooperation of those sitting on your left, sir, was needed, that the cooperation of all men of good will was required to save agriculture, which he admits is greatly in distress. However, I well recall what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated a short while ago, when he exclaimed in an angry tone:

It is not the opposition that rules in the house, it is not the minority but the majority.

I am therefore compelled to advise my friend, the hon. member for Dorchester, to make his suggestions, which are excellent ones, I admit, to the right hon. Prime Minister and his cabinet.

With reference to pledges made to farmers by hon. members opposite, may I, sir, consign to Hansard a statement made by the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice (Mr. Bourgeois), in the course of the election last August. The hon. Postmaster General was discussing a bonus on butter, but the hon. member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice went one better than him by promising a bonus on cheese. According to "La Victoire" a newspaper published solely for the occasion, since its issue has been discontinued; our hon. friend stated.

On August 8, 1931, at Three Rivers—evidently the following are his words, since a friendly photograph of him adorns the first page—

If you will put your trust in me, and favour me with that share of influence which necessarily will result from an election under the present circumstances, I shall work with all my energy to obtain from the Dominion government a bonus on cheese made in our rural sections, thus fostering the dairy industry which forms the basis of our economic agricultural system.

May I inquire from my hon. friend who is listening, also from the hon. Postmaster General who is in the house, what has become of this famous bonus on butter and cheese?

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Carry out your pledges!

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Since we are discussing the Three Rivers' election, may I refute the statement often made—I think the hon. Minister of Marine repeated it in the house, last Thursday—that the Three Rivers' election was an endorsation of the government's policy. Well, to contradict this assertion, I have but to quote the newspaper to which I have just referred and in which I see in large head lines, covering the width of two pages, the following:

We shall discuss politics in four years, for the present let us vote for Bourgeois and the government.

We must conclude, therefore, if no mention of politics was made, if the electorate was not called upon to vote on the government's policy, the people evidently could not approve of that policy. To explain these large head lines, two paragraphs follow. One appeals to the business men:

We, in business, feel the reaction of this far flung crisis. There should be no question of politics in this election. Our business and interests take precedence. We shall talk politics when business has picked up.

And just next to this paragraph the other appeals to property owners.

Property owners we are burdened with taxes—

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): And to be sure we are aware of the fact!

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation):

—the government invites us to cooperate in carrying out works. It places unlimited amounts at our disposal. Let us not send to Ottawa an enemy of the government, but Bourgeois, the friend of ministers, he will get us our quota of the public funds. Our interests take precedence over that of politicians.

I repeat it, sir, our opponents did not discuss politics, they did not request the people to give their verdict on the policy of the government. How can they, to-day, state that the government's policy was approved by the people in the Three Rivers-St. Maurice election.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): It cannot be so!

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that at this late stage in the debate I find it necessary to take part. Such would not have been my plight had I been present at the time the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) made his speech and proposed his amendment. Had he been interrogated across the floor of the house I venture to say he would not have made the misstatements which were made and upon which he hinged his argument. That those misstatements were grave there is no doubt, and I cannot possibly realize how the hon. member could have made them. I refer only to the tariff and currency features of his address. The Department of National Revenue was brought into this debate in no very commendable manner. I am sorry the hon. member is not in the house, because he will find himself in the unfortunate position in which I found myself. I must say, however, that the alleged facts which he presented to the house were, in many respects, wholly wrong. I realize that in connection with tariffs he and all about him protest against the artificial barriers formed by the tariff and its ill considered increases, and suggest that it is manipulated. That is not the worst of it; he says we juggled with the currency. Page 1894 of Hansard for the present session discloses that the hon. member had before him an order in council and a survey of the facts. He states emphatically that on September 28, a date soon after England went off the gold standard, an order in council was passed providing the value for duty purposes. But he is not content with that statement. Later on in a cross-fire with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) at page 1912 he says:

No, you issued an order in council fixing the exchange at $4.86⅔, and then changed it next day.

Again on that page he says:

And you changed your mind again.

Referring to the same alleged order in council, Mr. Speaker, there was no order in council of the 28th of September. The hon. member refers to "juggling"; if he could juggle with these orders in council that he had before him when he made his speech and produce one of the 28th of September, I should have nothing to say.

Mr. YOUNG: What was done?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On what authority did the minister act?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The minister did not act; that is the point. The ministry acted on the 29th of September and passed an order in council. It did not revoke what had been done before. It provided that the pound should be as the pound has ever stood since this trouble, at $4.86⅔; and the value for duty ever since, notwithstanding what the hon. member said, has been and is to-day $4.86⅔. To make such an attack and embody it in an amendment, in effect saying that we walked up the hill and then walked right down again, when there was no foundation whatever for the statement, seems to me to be something that an hon. member who values the good opinion of this house should not indulge in.

At page 1894 the hon. member said that that was not all, that we passed an order in council to the effect:

We will not hold sterling up to $4.86⅔, but we will hold it up to $4.40.

That has no relation to the fixing of duty in the ordinary sense, and the hon. member must have known it.

Mr. YOUNG: Had it any effect on the duty paid?

Mr. RYCKMAN: It had no effect whatever, and never has had, except on the special dumping duty. It had on that, but that is not what the hon. member said. He led the house to believe—you cannot read it in any other sense—that that was for fixing duty as determined by order in council in the ordinary course of business between Canada and England.

Mr. YOUNG: It had an effect on the amount of duty collected.

Mr. RYCKMAN: As I have stated, it relates to the special duty. It takes on an altogether different complexion when you consider why that was done, but he did not tell the house, and no one seemed to be anxious to interrogate him or to find out the facts. At the time the order was made fixing $4.40 as the value of the pound on the 23rd of October, general business in England had improved, so had wholesale values, and in dealing fairly with England we were bound to fix the value in the neighbourhood of $4.40. I heard with pleasure Sir Josiah Stamp address members of parliament not so long ago in this building. He said at that time, as I understood him, that the increase was about 8 per cent. I have read myself that the value as fixed by a writer in The New Republic was something over 7 per cent. In those circumstances plainly a change had to be made in a proper accounting for dumping duty. What was done? We favoured Great Britain and took off 10 per cent. We have been told since that 8·8 would be an accurate estimate. We deducted 10 per cent off the pound and called it roughly $4.40. That was used for dumping duty and for nothing else, notwithstanding the express statement of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth.

Then he objected to the blanket power which he said we have. At this session we seem to be troubled very much with blank cheques, blanket power and so forth. It is amusing to me when I consider how our tariff policy is belaboured by our hon. friends opposite. The tariff power we have is no more than that exercised by those who preceded us. It is no more, except in detail, than was evolved from the principle laid down by the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding himself when in 1904 he put on the dumping duty and explained it very fully in his budget speech. The principle of that duty, which is objected to so strongly by many hon. members opposite, is distinctly of Liberal origin. It has been developed under Liberal governments. It is no different now from what it was at any time during the Liberal régime, except for the slight amendments made last session and the session before. Therefore, when objection is taken to the powers of the governor in council, or when it is said that the Minister of National Revenue is acting too widely when he acts under the order in council, it is just simply hitting at what was done by the Liberal government. I do not think there is any one who will say for a moment that what has been done has not been done with the intention of making it applicable successfully to business in Canada. That it has brought about success there cannot be any doubt whatever, as I hope to show before I am through.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under the Liberal legislation did the law extend beyond the application to natural products?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes, it did; my right hon. friend must remember that fir doors are not natural products, and when he was Prime Minister action was taken with relation to fir doors, as the ex-Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Euler) can tell him.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend states that there is no difference in principle between what is done now and what was done then. Would he not say that the power to fix values which the minister now exercises has no limits? The government can fix values for duty purposes at any figure they please, four or five or ten times the invoice value, whereas under the old law the price in the country of origin was the basis and could not be exceeded.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Not with regard to items such as were fixed by my hon. friend's government not so long ago. As I recall it, the order dealing with fir doors fixed the rate at 77½ per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: That was not an order in council.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes it was; I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend give a definition of dumping as it was under the Liberal legislation and as it is at present?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I can give this definition, given by the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding himself, who said that it was a special duty or what might be called a slaughter duty. My right hon. friend will find that statement made—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a designation, not a definition.

Mr. RYCKMAN: —in 1904. But on the tariff side as well as on the currency side my hon. friends are finding fault with what was put on our statute books at the instance of the Right Hon. William Fielding, who was regarded as their patron saint.

Mr. EULER: That is far-fetched.

An hon. MEMBER: Be fair.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is the fact. In addition to that, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) said that we were sitting over in the east block so that we might fix values; that we were fixing valuations for duty purposes in connection with all these cases, and he refers to a list quoted at page 1895 of Hansard. Looking at that list, I am very much surprised that the hon. gentleman should have mentioned these articles. The first is sheets of iron or steel; no action such as he speaks of was taken with relation to that. Fruits and vegetables: Yes; and the former government took action in the same way, during the years 1926, 1927 and 1928. Common and colourless window glass: We fixed no values; we took them off, so that the statement in that connection is incorrect. Fir doors: The government of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) showed us the way, as appears from order in council P.C. 80/2398, passed on December 21, 1927. We did the same thing and did it more effectively and with better results. High-starting torque silent type electric motors: No action whatever was taken in the way suggested, or in any other way. Then, to fill up space, mention is made again of sheets of iron or steel: No action was taken by the government, as I have pointed out. Sugar above No. 16, Dutch standard in colour: No action was taken by the governor in council or by the minister. Single ply veneers of cedar: Action was taken by the department after investigation in the home market as to what was the home market value, and that was all. No action was taken by the minister or by the governor in council. Cotton fabrics and artificial fabrics: Action was taken, but not under the British preference.

At the close of this section of the hon. gentleman's address he referred slightingly, as I think one must gather, to thumb tacks and furniture nails, cotton wiping rags, pot cleaners and baby pants, described as sheet rubber goods, and lamp shades, electric lighting fixtures, and so on. Now I desire to read a few letters to show what the business people of Canada think. I will take, first, thumb tacks, in regard to which the hon. gentleman made some facetious remarks. I have here a letter from the Dominion Tack & Nail Company, Limited, of Galt, addressed to myself and signed by the Secretary-Treasurer, Mr. C. M. Taylor. I can read only extracts from this letter, because I have a good many letters which I should like to quote from.

> We thought you might be interested in learning the effect which the fixing of these values on our products has had on our business.
> Previous to these values being fixed, and owing to large importations of these tacks from Germany at prices which were, in some cases, little more than the cost of our raw material, the part of our plant manufacturing these lines was operating only thirty-five to forty hours per week, at a reduced scale of wages, and with a very reduced staff.

From surveys which we had made, we found we were getting only a very small portion of the Canadian market, particularly on thumb tacks, and what business we were getting was resulting in a loss to us owing to extremely low prices. We were actually selling thumb tacks in Australia and New Zealand at higher prices than we could obtain in Canada.

The plant and machinery making furniture nails and thumb tacks represents an investment of approximately $75,000 and the equipment is sufficient to take care of the Canadian market. Unless we had received protection now given us when we did, we fear this investment would be practically idle now and certainly a number of men would be out of employment.

We have made no upward revision of prices on thumb tacks, but rather have been able (in anticipation of increased volume) to reduce our prices slightly. The consumer is paying the same price, or less, for these tacks, although, naturally, certain importers (with no investment to speak of) are possibly paying a little more than the former absurd importation price.

We therefore wish to take this opportunity of thanking you and of complimenting you, and the government you represent, for taking the necessary step to protect Canadian industry and the employment of Canadian men and women.

Mr. YOUNG: Did I understand the minister to say that no action was taken with regard to fixing values for duty purposes on sugar?

Mr. RYCKMAN: None such as described.

Mr. YOUNG: I have here a bulletin—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend may be referring to the action which was taken with regard to refined granulated sugar, which permitted of six thousand farmers being employed in the sugar beet industry. That action was promptly taken by the government, but that has no relation to the subject mentioned by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth.

The following letter was received from Arrow-Hart and Hegeman (Canada) Limited:

Toronto, Ont., April 20, 1932.

Hon. E. B. Ryckman,
Minister of National Revenue,
Ottawa, Ont.

No doubt it will be of interest to you to know that the Arrow-Hart and Hegeman Electric Company of Hartford, Conn., who have been exploiting the Canadian market for the last twenty-five years with merchandise manufactured in the United States, decided in December, 1931, to manufacture within the British Empire and picked Canada as the seat of their operations.

We are now established here under the name of Arrow-Hart and Hegeman (Canada) Limited, with office and factory at 310 Spadina Ave., Toronto; production in this plant starting March 1, 1932.

Previous to the establishing by your government of the values for duty purposes on wiring devices, it was not felt expedient that we take this step. However, since these values came into effect, it became absolutely necessary, if the American company wished to protect the business they had at that time in Canada.

We are very anxious that you do not assume that these values for duty purposes are having a tendency towards enhancing prices of this class of material to the consumer. This is not the case. The prices established by our company are strictly competitive with other Canadian manufacturers long established here, and in some instances are lower than the present domestic selling price in United States.

The Canadian company, at the present time, is employing approximately thirty hands, all of whom are Canadian born with one exception, that of the factory superintendent, and quite naturally, our employment of Canadian labour will continue to increase.

Being aware of the attitude of the Prime Minister and yourself towards the policy of attracting industries to Canada, I thought you would be interested in having before you a voluntary letter giving tangible evidence of the fruits of your policy.

That letter is signed by the managing director of the company. Under date of April 21 I received a letter from the Amalgamated Electric Corporation, Limited, of Toronto, manufacturers of wiring devices. It reads in part as follows:

We have been enabled to obtain our porcelain and bakelite parts within Canada and have transferred all moulds and had new moulds made up for both porcelain and bakelite parts which heretofore was entirely imported, and in doing this help make it possible for the Hamilton potteries to set up to manufacture this type of porcelain in Canada.

We have made up dies and tools for metal parts formerly imported, and whereas our purchases of such parts formerly amounted to approximately $125,000 per annum, they now are practically nil.

Our business is greatly affected by volume of building, and although this volume is now down to approximately one-third of the regular building program, due to developing our own lines and making in Canada instead of importing, we have been enabled to keep our entire factory staff (and in fact add a small number) with very little loss of time to our employees, while we can truly state that under former conditions —that is, the flooding of the Canadian market with foreign-made devices—our plant would not be in operation this year.

It may surprise hon. members, but the fact is that there are in Canada eleven concerns engaged in the production of wiping rags. The principal competition in this commodity comes from the coolies of China and Japan. It has been stated that the rags which come from those countries are not of the best as far as good health is concerned, and there is no doubt that they were destroying the home market.

Mr. YOUNG: On whose authority does the hon. gentleman say that?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If my hon. friend prefers the dirty rags from China and Japan, he can have them.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not answering my question.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Upon investigation by the officials of the department it has been found that this industry is expected to employ three hundred men whereas previously they employed only two hundred. This will prove to be an important contribution to the relief of unemployment.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are they employing three hundred?

Mr. RYCKMAN: They said they would.

Mr. YOUNG: Oh, oh.

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend laughs, but I have found that these gentlemen tell the truth. I have found that they do not overstate the facts. In connection with women's and children's clothing, I received a letter under date of April 21 from the Canadian Association of Garment Manufacturers. The letter reads in part:

> During the time when these goods were flooding the Canadian market a number of Canadian factories had to close their doors. Since the regulations fixing higher values on these goods have been in effect many factories have reopened and others have taken on large numbers of additional employees. In addition to this the cotton mills in Canada, who had lost most of the raw material requirements of the Canadian trade, have taken on hundreds of extra employees and some of them are now running three shifts, twenty-four hours a day.
> These regulations have had a very definite effect on the unemployment situation in Canada. They have given additional employment to thousands of people.
>
> It is a fact that, owing to the greater volume of Canadian business which manufacturers in Canada have been able to obtain, they were able to reduce their prices and we believe it can be shown that the consumers are buying ready-made cotton dresses as cheaply to-day as before this regulation was put into effect.
> We believe the retailers, even those who had previously been buying these dumped goods from the United States, are entirely satisfied with the present situation. These fixed values have been of advantage to manufacturers and retailers and have given increased employment to thousands of workers without increasing prices to the consumer.

I have other letters, both before me and in the office of the department, which I could read. These letters which I have read were not picked out, but were quoted simply to show the true condition in connection with certain items referred to by hon. friends opposite.

Mr. POWER: If the hon. member reads many more it will be found there is no unemployment in Canada.

Mr. RYCKMAN: These letters should demonstrate that an effort is being made to stop the importation of goods which are of no benefit to the consumer and to give to the manufacturer of Canada the right to sell his goods in this country. Only this morning I received a letter from the Dominion Textile Company Limited, and hon. members know the attitude taken by this company. If I had the time I should be glad to read this letter to the house. I received another letter from a concern manufacturing sheet rubber goods stating that this fixed valuation had given them a chance to do business without the necessity of increasing the price to the consumer. I have been very particular to see that there shall be no increase in price. However, these manufacturers are honest men; many of them were doing business at a loss and it was not necessary to ask them to engage in a special agreement as to prices; they voluntarily offered to protect the consumer. There is just as much assurance that these men will keep their promise as there is that hon. members will keep theirs.

A short time ago I was approached by a gentleman, who shall be nameless, who wanted to import misses' dresses from Czechoslovakia. These dresses could be manufactured very theaply and the value for home consumption would be ordinarily about one dollar, but if ten thousand dozen were taken they could be sold for thirty-three and a third cents each. The real value would have been $120,000, but this gentleman would have had to put up $40,000 to obtain these dresses. However, the tariff regulations prevented his flooding this country with ten thousand cheap dresses. I do not think any fair-minded man will say that the action taken was not the right one. It might be said that this is similar to the hypothetical question asked by Mr. Fielding when introducing the dumping principle. He said: Oh, some will object: but why should we not get cheap goods? Yes, he said, if we can have a continuance of the cheap goods; if they will enter into a contract for fifty years to furnish us with cheap goods, all right, but the moment this supply dries up, then you pay and you pay heavily. It will be said that the transaction which I instance of the dresses means a tariff increase of 200 per cent. That is so. If hon. members are in favour of keeping out those dresses, then they are in favour of a tariff of 200 per cent, and if they are in favour of a tariff of 200 per cent, then they will find that the cases cited by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) simply move out of the picture because they are not to be considered. They are in the same class as the misses' dresses, to which I have referred.

Mr. YOUNG: What value did the minister set for duty on those dresses?

Mr. RYCKMAN: That point was not reached. They never came in. On page 1897 of Hansard a list of goods is given with apparently very high duties and the hon. member says:

> I need not say those figures include sales tax, excise tax, the exchange rate and the arbitrary fixing of the value for duty purposes by the Minister of National Revenue.

I wish simply to say that I had nothing to do with any of those items, so I think it is unfair—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Who fixes the price for duty purposes?

Mr. RYCKMAN: —in eagerness to make out a case, to utter, with regard to a member of the government, statements which are wholly untrue.

I should like to point out that the principle laid down in the amendment was not followed by my hon. friends opposite when they were in power. We have heard the comments upon it. When they are in opposition they are against the tariff; when they are in power they keep the tariff going. The general trend of the tariff is pretty nearly the same with hon. gentlemen opposite as it is with the government at the present time, and I venture the assertion that if by any chance a Liberal government had been in power when England was driven off the gold standard and when we had this pressure in the sale of distress goods, action similar to that taken by this government would have been taken by them or, indeed, by any government that had the interest of Canada at heart. If hon. gentlemen will visit the office of the Department of National Revenue, I can show them lists of houses that are selling or trying to sell nothing but distress goods. If prices are kept down—and no one is complaining that they are too high—and if employment is given to Canadian men and women, surely it is in the interests of the country to follow this line of tariff protection inaugurated by a great Liberal and carried on by a great Conservative.

I would also point out that this method of dealing with the currency springs from the time when the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding was Minister of Finance. If hon. members will turn up the statutes of 1922 and look at chapter 18, they will find he was wise enough to establish the structure—and pretty complete it was too—of the present proceeding in relation to currency.

It is suggested in the amendment that the action taken by this government has been detrimental to the interests alike of producers, importers, distributors and consumers. They have inserted the middleman twice; they have left out nobody; they say that this plan is a benefit to no one. I am fairly familiar with inquiries that have been made of me as to the attitude of the chain store people and others who are willing to import as long as they see a chance, if they can import, to make at the expense of the Canadian consumer a handsome profit on the imported goods because of the distress in the country from which they come. That is contrary to the policy of the Conservative party, and I believe also to that of the Liberal party. I must add this: I have heard complaints, as I am sure others have done, of those in our towns and cities who have had to close up their shops because of the chain store, because of its immense buying power, because it can go to a man who, on account of some driving exigency, must have the money, and compel him to sell his goods to it at less than their value. Hon. members know that sort of thing takes place. The condemnation of the chain stores, which at one time subsided somewhat but perhaps has been revived on account of the hard times, is that it was felt in the hearts of people that they were losing out because there was in the business a bigger man with more money who could undersell them. These big institutions can go to countries where they can buy goods for a fraction of their cost. The case I cited was one-third with 200 per cent. There are cases of ten per cent; I know of one case of 25 per cent discussed with me. Those of us who have found in towns and cities that the chain stores have driven out popular business men who simply could not continue, ought to say: We are not now going to give some special privileges or lay down any of these barriers that have been erected by a former government and by this government to prevent the importation of goods which are not being merchandised in accordance with good faith in business. This government stands for that; it is what we have tried to do and I know we have had success in doing it. Some are dissatisfied, because of course one cannot please everybody, but I am of opinion that businessmen who are asked to decide what should be done would not think for a moment, after September 21, when England went off the gold standard, of allowing any man with money to buy large quantities of goods, as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth said, at the rate of five shillings worth for a dollar. These people were intent on buying the goods; they would have brought them in and our concerns would have been put out of business. I am thoroughly convinced that if one month had gone by without our taking refuge in our statutes, originating as I have indicated, the country would have suffered and most likely have become bankrupt. I could elaborate the matter further, but I think from what I have said my attitude with regard to it will be understood.

Before I sit down there is one other subject to which I wish to refer. I believe in every man having a fair chance in business so far as it is possible for any government, especially a Canadian government, to give it to him.

I wish to say a word about the ten per cent cut. I think it can hardly be said, if I may mention a personal matter, that I ever cut anybody's salary, and I was opposed to this cut until I thought about one compelling thing, but now, Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that the best thing that this government did in the way of the budget, and this is not language of exaggeration, was introducing that cut, and I will tell the house why. There has been brought about by that cut a special sense of real financial responsibility that goes throughout the whole civil service. The cut is from the Prime Minister down, and there is an attitude now towards expenditure such as there never was before and which never could have been brought about except for that cut.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is the minister in favour of the exemptions?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I will tell you that when the voting comes. But in case that answer is too short, I will say that I am in favour of everybody paying who can reasonably be made to pay.

Mr. SANDERSON: That is better.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I have a reservation with regard to the judges but I am not debating that now. I think my argument is a sound one and would carry conviction.

There has been extravagance, great extravagance. This is a country with thirty-one billions of resources, and the thought may have been, why should not one who is employed by this government be generous in expenditures? I have found out since I came here, and it is not by the Department of National Revenue alone that I am judging because I believe that in this respect the National Revenue department is the best of the lot because our estimates are never made up with the idea of getting more than we need but rather working up to what we do need—I have never seen anything like the expenditures that go on for stationery supplies, telephone and telegraph charges. There is no business in the world that would put up with the telegram policy of the government. There is never any thought of sending a night message when it would do just as well as a day message, and long distance telephone calls, no matter how unimportant they may be, are made and carried on without apparently any consideration of length of time—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. minister, but he has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think I have conveyed the idea, Mr. Speaker, that I wished to convey.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to join with those who have preceded me in offering my congratulations to the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the very clear and business-like budget statement which he presented to this house and to the country on April 6. Dealing with the situation under our present system he made an excellent case, and from that standpoint I have very little criticism to offer. He hopes to accomplish what most Finance ministers have done or tried to do, namely, balance his budget, by cutting down services and increasing taxation. It is the orthodox system, but in my opinion it will only tend to aggravate the present very serious unemployment situation with which we are confronted. It would appear, Mr. Speaker, as if there were very few members amongst the two old parties who fully appreciate that important changes have taken place in our social and economic life within the past decade, and that new methods are essential to cope with the changed conditions. I was particularly struck by some remarks made by Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, the new American ambassador to London, when he was speaking before the Pilgrims' Club in London a few days ago He is reported in part as follows:

Mr. Mellon declared that one of the world's greatest difficulties in the solution of this crisis is that those who are left over from the last century still look upon the past decade as merely a prolongation of all that went before. "But really the years since the end of the war were the beginning of a new era. Just as the flames of the French revolution brought an end to the ordered, satisfied world of the 18th century, so the guns of the world war marked another stage in human history."

I am afraid that the Minister of Finance has been following the stern lights of the ship which only light up the past, instead of being guided by the search light at the masthead which probes into the mists which lie ahead, as was so beautifully described by Sir Josiah Stamp, the noted economist, whom we all had the pleasure of hearing a few days ago. May I pause here to thank the Prime Minister for the hospitality and the opportunity which he afforded on two occasions during this session for hon. members to meet two very distinguished visitors from the British Isles, the Right Hon. Mr. Winston Churchill and Sir Josiah Stamp. Listening to the inspiring addresses of these two gentlemen, one more readily realized why it is that Great Britain has played such a dominant part in world affairs. As Mr. Churchill pointed out in connection with the results of the recent British election, perhaps never has the stage been so well set for the successful conclusion of an Imperial economic conference. I am sure that after listening to Sir Josiah Stamp one could not help but feel inspired with new hope and new confidence that with such men working on our complex machine there was at least some hope for the future.

I am not one of those, Mr. Speaker, who believe in belittling the outcome of the coming Imperial economic conference. I think that we have a right to expect important developments. Not only the people of Canada but the people of all parts of the British Empire are looking forward to this conference with the hope of some constructive action being taken, and I think we should serve notice on all those who will take part that they cannot and must not allow that conference to be a failure. The success of the conference will depend largely upon the attitude of those who take part in it. If they meet in a spirit of compromise, each one ready to sacrifice something for the good of the whole, success is assured. If on the other hand, they meet in a spirit of selfishness, with each trying to get something at the expense of the others, the conference is doomed before it ever starts. I would like to say to this government that having accepted full responsibility for Canada, and as they will assume and should be accorded a full measure of credit for whatever success may be achieved, so will they be held accountable if the conference proves to be a failure.

On February 9 last I introduced a resolution into this house asking that a substantial increase be made in our income tax. The principle of that resolution was accepted by the house, and I wish to take this opportunity to thank the Minister of Finance for embodying that principle in his budget. It is true that he might have gone further, and in support of that statement I should like to give a few figures showing the relative rates of income taxation in 1921 as compared with last year and the new tax this year. The figures are for a married man without dependents:

Income	Tax 1921	1931	1932
$ 3,000	$ 40	....	$ 12 00
5,000	126	$ 32	60 90
10,000	619	232	354 90
50,000	9,649	6,704	8,962 80
100,000	32,749	19,064	25,248 30
500,000	318,349	162,952	214,183 20

It will be seen from these figures that there is still a considerable distance to go before we reach the rates in effect in 1921. There is a matter to which I called the attention of the Minister of Finance when discussing the resolution referred to, namely the taxing of bearer bonds at their source. When the budget comes before the committee I trust he will see that provision is made to carry this into effect.

There is another suggestion I should like to make, namely, that during this depression, or as long as the government finds it necessary to keep in force the ten per cent reduction in salaries, tax free bonds in Canada should come under the income tax regulation. If I remember correctly, when speaking on the salary reductions the Minister of Finance argued that this was not actually a reduction in salaries, but simply a contribution for the time being, an effort to help out the country in this time of distress. My suggestion is that the government would not be breaking faith with those who hold tax free bonds, but on the other hand that those people should make a contribution in these times when money is needed. I cannot see why a man who is drawing a wage should have to make a contribution while a man who is living on an income from tax free bonds should go scot free.

Among other expenditures enumerated in the budget statement I find the sum of about $11,000,000 in payment of the wheat bonus. Out of this amount the province of Alberta, from which I come, received the largest share.

I wish to take this opportunity of saying to the Prime Minister that the farmers of the west appreciated very much the wheat bonus, and I hope he will see his way clear to continue it another year. If it could be worked out so that payments would be made on an acreage-seeded basis, this would be fairer, as all those who put in a crop would then be treated alike.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) on the very excellent speech which he made in this debate. The greater part of it was of a very high order and to my mind at least proved that the minister was giving a great deal of serious thought and study to the subject in an endeavour to find a remedy for present ills. It is a hopeful sign when we hear a cabinet minister expressing such views, and he has set an example which might well be followed by hon. members from all sides of the house.

Concerning the amendment moved by the Liberal party I have only this to say: It does seem rather strange that in a time of stress such as we are passing through that great party has nothing to offer but the same old tariff argument which has been before the country for the past fifty years. As has been pointed out already by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), a Liberal policy was in effect in the year 1930, and yet it did not prevent the depression coming on. The amendment moved from this corner of the house at least presents something new, and offers what we believe to be some constructive suggestions. By the national control of currency it does not necessarily follow, as some people have suggested, a turning on of the printing presses and the printing of unlimited quantities of paper money. As has been already shown in some European countries, that would be calamitous. I think hon. members will agree with me when I say that never in the history of the world has there been such an abundance on all sides, and yet never has the distress been more acute.

More and more the opinion is developing that the root of our trouble lies in our financial system, and the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce would indicate that he recognizes that fact. So, Mr. Speaker, believing as we do that finance should be controlled by the people, we have offered an amendment to that effect. If we go back far enough into history we come to a time when no money existed, and what trade there was was carried on by a system of barter. This was a cumbersome method, and could not be applied to our complex system in use to-day. As I understand it, money was first introduced as a convenience for a medium of exchange. I should like to add that the person who first introduced it as such gave to the world the greatest labour saving device which has ever been invented.

The three essentials for the life and comfort of man are food, clothing and shelter. Money, as money, adds nothing to these; we can neither eat nor wear it. It is very necessary however as a convenience, or as a medium of exchange. Instead of keeping it as such we have converted money into a commodity to be bought and sold for profit. And, worse still, we have legislated into the hands of a few people the right to control it. May I be permitted to quote a short excerpt from one of Professor Soddy's works entitled The Inversion of Science, at page 44:

> Democracy, in its struggle with autocracy, has failed to recognize that, of all the prerogatives of government, the issue and regulation of the currency is the first, if not the only essential, and it is not necessary to look further for the cause of its hopeless failure to give to the world a system of humane government. The coining of money can in no sense be defended as a legitimate form of private enterprise. Here at least we may claim to be upon ground that not even the most extreme individualist can dispute.
> But passing from theory to practice, we have seen how our inverted ideas are fast making it the only form of private enterprise. Quite unwittingly and because of the confusion of economists between wealth and debt, democracy has given to the financier of to-day powers which never yet in history have been wielded by the most absolute autocrat. Irrespective of peoples and parliaments, kings and cabinets, the control over the manufacture of money has put into the hands of a few men absolute power over industry, and with it the very life of the nation. Industrialized nations are so heavily in debt that industry is being administered as a bankrupt concern in the interests of its creditors, and its primary purpose to produce wealth is more and more becoming secondary to this. Shylock has us all in his grip, scientific men and inventors, black coat and artisan, farmers and labourers, editors and journalists, teachers and professional men—all are being brought under a centralized financial domination. But thought is still free, and, despite the press, let us hope some remnant of it may persevere in our ancient schools and universities.

I do not wish it to be understood that I am accusing our bankers and financiers of being dishonest, nor do I suggest that they are breaking the law. I find my views on this point fully expressed in an address delivered before the Wakefield, England, Rotary Club by W. Bell, an associate of the Royal Institute of British Architects, from which I quote as follows:

> It would be idle to assume that the big financier-bankers are the unregenerate villains of the tragedy of the industrial crisis for our modern Shylocks—both Jew and Gentile—have every right to manipulate the money market for their own ends so long as we permit them. They are not in business for the good of their health any more than we are. It is the system that is at fault, and not altogether the men who handle it; and I blame the public at large for submitting to such an iniquitous system as the private control of credit, since we are all victims of its unchallenged sway.

It is the system, Mr. Speaker, that is at fault, and it must be remedied if we are to meet the new conditions under which we are now living. Mr. Bell, in another paragraph of his most excellent address, points out that credit is like the sap which flows from the roots and gives life to the tree; interfere with this free flow and the tree becomes sickly and stunted, and if the condition is not remedied it will soon wither and die. Mr. Bell goes on to say.

> The present industrial system may be likened to a tree, the branches of which are capital, labour management, transport, mining, and so on; all of which are useless without the sap of credit which rises from the roots through the trunk of finance to the most distant branches. At present the sap is not circulating from the roots and thus purchasing power is lacking. The industrial tree is therefore languishing because the proper conditions are denied it for functioning naturally. It is suffering from bad circulation of its sap, credit, which is the symbol of life in any healthy tree.

Credit, being the sap of our industrial tree, should not be in the control of any private individual or group of individuals but should be scrupulously guarded and controlled by the state.

We hear a great deal these days about a managed currency. In my opinion we have now a managed currency, but it is managed in the interests of those who control it rather than by the state in the interests of the people. To bring about the changes which we advocate may require some radical departures, it may require breaking well-established precedent. The Minister of Trade and Commerce in his admirable speech stated:

> If we could restore the levels of 1928 for wheat, copper, paper, lumber and fish, we would restore prosperity to Canada.

He states again there must be a stabilization of price levels. That is true. But we must go farther; there must also be established a parity of price levels, in other words a fair exchange value between commodities. If we have to get back to the price levels of 1928 to bring back prosperity, in my opinion it can be brought about only by a measure of inflation; but, Mr. Speaker, if we should again reach 1928 price levels, the then important task before us will be to see that we have a state controlled currency to prevent these ever-recurring cycles of depression.

Sir Josiah Stamp said that every change in the price level means a change in the distribution of wealth. He also stated that the world was not ready to abolish the metallic base for currency at the present time.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce asked the question, on page 1909 of Hansard:

> What is the cause of this drop in commodity prices?

And then he answered his question as follows:

> Prices are expressed in terms of currency and in the leading countries of the world the value of currency is attached to gold. If gold is scarce or is being hoarded, if gold is in abnormal demand for debts, then inevitably commodity prices will fall, simply because people will be anxious to dispose of their commodities in order to secure gold to meet their obligations. We are confronted with this situation, and it is admitted by everyone that gold is scarce.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if gold is scarce, and if Sir Josiah Stamp is right in saying the world is not ready to abolish the metallic base, then the question arises how can we, in face of the shortage of gold, increase this metallic base so we may issue more currency to restore the 1928 price level. My answer is: by adopting the bimetallic base that served the world from time immemorial, and which was only abolished some fifty-five years ago. Even with a nationally controlled currency as suggested in our amendment and in order to meet the world requirements, it would possibly require a metallic base, and so I am going to suggest that the remonetization of silver and a return to the bimetallic standard would approximately double our currency and thus materially improve our present situation.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), speaking in this debate a few days ago, made this statement as reported at page 2123 of Hansard:

> Gold was chosen as the standard of value because in every country, in every age and under all conditions it was the one commodity that men were willing to take in exchange for whatever they had to sell.

I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member make that statement, for I am sure he must know that prior to its demonetization silver was also freely accepted as a measure of value for what people had to sell. It seems almost impossible to reach an agreement amongst the nations of the world as to a new world currency, but may I say that when Britain over a century ago decided to abolish bimetallism and go on the gold standard, she did not wait for the rest of the world, but started out alone, and eventually the rest of the western world followed suit. And so to-day, I believe, that if the British empire at the coming conference were to take the lead in restoring silver to its ancient and well-established position, it would not be long until the rest of the world followed her example. In 1816 following the Napoleonic wars Great Britain endeavoured to go on the gold standard, but from 1816 to 1873 a substantial portion of the British currency was used in the form of silver. In 1873 Germany collected the French indemnity of one billion dollars in gold bullion and promptly went on the gold standard. In the same year Great Britain and Germany closed their mints to the free coinage of silver, and they were followed by France, Italy, Spain and other countries. As a result in a few years silver was denied access to the mints of the world. This was an arbitrary act and was the cause of the very serious slump in the price of silver. In 1873 the price was approximately $1.30 an ounce; in 1883, ten years after demonetization, it had fallen to $1.11, in 1893 to 78 cents, in 1894 to 60 cents. During the war it jumped again to $1.30, due to the fact that the warring countries of Europe, or as we might say, the countries of western civilization, Europe and North America, had an insufficiency of gold and of course, owing to the war there was a lack of movement of gold, so that they could not make their purchases of supplies in Asia; and silver was once again absolutely essential to the carrying on of business between Europe and the Asiatic countries, and it leaped back to about $1.30 an ounce. But when the war was over it again fell, and in 1920 it had dropped to $1.01, in 1921 it dropped sharply to 62 cents, in 1929 to 53 cents, in 1930 to 30 cents, in 1931 to as low as 26 cents, and to-day it is around 28 or 29 cents an ounce. It will be noted that the price of silver dropped steadily from the time it was demonetized in 1873.

A vast section of the world still continues to use silver as money, but it is not accepted freely by other countries. Silver is still the money of India and of China. India, in part, is endeavouring to use a paper rupee based on gold, but only with a varying degree of success. Not for generations but for centuries the oriental has been accustomed to the use of silver as currency. When Britain in 1893 closed the Indian mints to the free coinage of silver and attempted to force them on to the gold standard it was not received kindly.

Mr. J. F. Darling, who is an authority on the silver question, and whom most of us had the pleasure of hearing last year, said, in part:

> Gold is the rich man's money; silver is the poor man's money; and there is a great disequilibrium between the values of the two metals. How great this disequilibrium is the following figures will show. The relative values used to be, and for hundreds of years, that silver was worth from fourteen to sixteen times that of gold. The value of gold to-day is seventy times that of silver, ratio of production of the two metals has not altered. It is about fourteen to one. There has been given to gold a purchasing power which is much greater than it ought to have, and you have made the other metal, silver, much less. The problem of the world to-day is how to restore equilibrium between those two metals, which are the foundations of the world's economic structure.

And may I quote also a gentleman well known to this house, one of the keenest minds in our public life to-day, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. Speaking on this question before the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association at their annual meeting in Toronto last year, he said, in part:

> Mr. Darling is an authority we cannot lightly cast aside, and certainly in support of his principles there may be named many leading figures in the world. Julius H. Barnes, chairman of the United States Chamber of Commerce, is authority for the following words:
>
> "The fatal mistake was made of treating silver as a commodity, although it still represented resources and capital and credit to more than half the population of the world. Silver, which had been the standard money of the world for twenty centuries, was in a few months to be treated in the market as a commodity, without mature consideration as to the effect on the initiative and confidence of a thousand millions of people. A price of silver which fluctuated from $1.45 some few years ago to thirty-five cents to-day, and yet symbolizes the credit and resources of great people, could not but harm the business structure of the world."

Mr. Meighen continued:

> Restoration of natural values between gold and silver would undoubtedly right the balance between Orient and Occident and help set going the vessel of the world's industry which is lurching very badly now. The power thus secured to enlarge the world's monetary supplies would undoubtedly tend to an improvement in commodity values, and, therefore, to a return to the old honest relation between debtor and creditor; that is to say, to the relation upon which the debts themselves were contracted.

The Romans fixed the parity between silver and gold legally at 12 to 1, and for several hundred years prior to 1873 Great Britain and France had fixed it at 15½ to 1, so that the relation as to price remained fairly steady throughout the centuries when both metals were on a monetary standard.

When Great Britain attempted to place India on a gold basis, they could not give them gold, but only a gold certificate—which was paper money. The oriental mind looks on paper currency as false, and consequently it has not been freely adopted. These people want a metal currency which they have been accustomed to for centuries, which they can feel, which they can hoard, bury, if necessary, and which will not deteriorate. Take the case of India and the ornaments which are possessed by the women of that country. It is only in the personal form that the women of India are allowed to hold anything. Prior to 1893 when the British government closed the mints of India to the free coinage of silver, in times of stress these ornaments, which amount to an enormous sum, could be turned into the mint, and they would get value in coin for them; with the low price of silver to-day, they are practically worthless, and it is thought that the low price of silver is responsible for a lot of the unrest in India at the present time. The people of India are in somewhat the same position as the farmers in western Canada, who have millions and millions of bushels of wheat which are of little value. Restore the value of wheat and a lot of the farmer's troubles will disappear. And if the value of silver is restored you will restore the purchasing power of approximately one-half the population of the world and if this were done, in my opinion, a lot of the unrest in India would also disappear. Everyone recognizes to-day that one of our great problems is the question of markets. The western world is so industrialized that each country has a surplus, and as a result we find each country trying to retain its home markets through tariffs while at the same time trying to dump its surplus on the other fellow's market. In the oriental world, which represents half the population of the world, we find possibilities for unlimited markets if only their purchasing power were increased. In this connection I would quote Mr. A. W. Palmer, writing in the Empire Review of London. He says in part:

> It has been worked out that in India alone, if the standard of living there increased by a penny per day, it would mean an annual additional purchasing power of approximately 400 millions sterling. Imagine what that means when the same principle is applied to Burma, Siam and Malaya, and to that country destined to become one of the greatest countries of the world—China. A market totalling another 2,000 millions sterling annually awaits development.

I should also like to call the attention of hon. members of this house to a speech delivered in Vancouver on August 26, 1931, by the Hon. Herbert M. Marler, the Canadian Minister to Japan. A study of that speech will show the tremendous possibilities for the development of trade in that vast country, the orient. If our currency to-day is issued on the basis of the supply of gold, and if you double the base, which is what would happen if we adopted the bimetallic standard, you would double the amount of currency and thus it would be inflation to that extent and would without doubt increase the price of commodities. I know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has given a great deal of study to this question, and I hope he will see that it is brought before the coming conference for a decision.

I know there is a feeling amongst the members of both the old parties that the members in this corner of the house are visionary, and that, being chiefly farmers, they are not competent to deal with financial questions. But I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that there is now almost a complete disillusionment amongst the people, as to our bankers and big financiers being the omniscient supermen heretofore believed. At this point, let me quote what I consider a gem from the lips of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. This is from the same speech from which I quoted a short time ago:

> There are some who hold up their hands in fear at any suggestion which affects fundamentally the vital arteries of currency. Everything in the mind of these people is radical which tends to improve values, and everything is sane and conservative which tends to bring them down. From this mentality—call it what you will, the gold mentality or any other—it is surely time we were rescued. If other remedies can be proposed, let their protagonists come forward, but do not let us sit idly by and proclaim ourselves helpless in the face of a dilemma which we ourselves have created. Do not let us conclude it to be natural and inevitable that men, women and children the world over should be suffering from peculiar and worrying deprivations in the midst of an abundance of all those things of which no worker by brain or hand should be deprived.
> Someone said not long ago that the world's great bankers had always been right. The world's great bankers are not always right any more than the world's great statesmen or great warriors; but whoever has been right and whoever has been wrong, there has been error, and momentous error, somewhere, or we would not be in the morass we are in to-day. Why should we sit in eternal adulation at the feet of those who have brought us where we are? It seems to me more practical and sensible to clear our minds of predispositions, to analyze our problems at their roots, knowing that something helpful can be done and to find out what it is.

The group in this corner of the house recognize, as does every thinking man to-day, that the old system is not functioning properly, and we are prepared to cast old beliefs and prejudices aside and face the issue squarely. It is only in this way that progress will be made.

Before I close, there is another suggestion which I should like to make, on two grounds: first, on that of economy, and secondly, to improve our parliamentary institutions, the latter being the more important. Everyone is aware of the great interest that is being centred in the other chamber of parliament at present, and I am going to suggest that the time has come to bring in a measure of real Senate reform. The opinion is being strengthened by recent disclosures that some action should be taken if our parliamentary institutions are to hold the respect to which they are entitled. The leaders of both parties in the Senate, at the beginning of this session, stressed the fact that the Senate was and should be a judicial body. With this I heartily agree. But, Mr. Speaker, how can it function as a judicial body when the party spirit is fanned and kept alive amongst its members? We find that both the old parties go to that body for their chief political party organizers. We find senators taking part in political campaigns, and the party spirit is kept at such a pitch that when a matter of grave concern comes up for decision, a decision which may cast a reflection on one party or the other, then that decision is not made on judicial but on strictly party lines. Therefore I am going to suggest, first, as a measure of economy, that our constitution be changed, cutting down the number of Senators from ninety-six to fifty-two, allowing six senators for each province, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, which would retain four as at present. The United States, with a population of 120,000,000, have only ninety-six senators, or two for each state irrespective of size or population. Secondly, to eliminate partyism and get a more judicial body, I would suggest: first, that the dominion and the provinces each have the right to appoint half the number. Secondly, that when a person accepts the position of senator he be disfranchised and not allowed to take part in any political activities, a position similar to that occupied by our judges. Thirdly, that senators be not appointed for life, as at present, but that a retiring age of seventy-five be established. I have not the time to go into details but I believe that if these suggestions were carried out the Senate might serve a very useful purpose as a judicial body and would come to be held in high esteem by the people of Canada.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I must, first express my astonishment in seeing our Conservative friends so garrulous, for they deprived us during eighteen months of the pleasure of listening to their speeches. The government must be very unrestful, to be obliged to call upon its followers to help out its policy which has placed the country in such a critical situation.

We must, sir, congratulate ourselves and, at the same time, congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) for having appointed a Finance Minister which we requested on behalf of the people's rights. We regret, however, that the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has to bear all the economic and unconstitutional blunders committed by his predecessor. The first act registered by his predecessor was to abolish the former tariff commission whose members, with all due deference to our Conservative friends, were better qualified than the Prime Minister to decide upon questions relating to customs. Their advice would have been of great assistance to him, however, he was deprived of it. It is true that, shortly after, he found out his error since he created a new commission similar to the former one. We still await the appointment of its members; no doubt it will come with time. Meanwhile let us be satisfied with the appointment of the Minister of Finance. The Prime Minister is to be congratulated, as he has been very fortunate in his choice. We must now caution the hon. Minister of Finance not to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor; otherwise we are lost and the future of the country is for ever endangered. I am aware that hon. members opposite do not share these views, blinded as they are by party spirit and satisfied with temporarily feeding in the manger.

I listened to a number of their speeches. Their attitude can be explained. They accepted the budget such as it was. A different stand would have compelled them to admit with us that their administration had not been very flourishing, that our national debt had greatly increased since the country was under their régime, that our trade had alarmingly dwindled owing to their high protective tariff, which resulted in helping the manufacturers to realize unfair profits to the detriment of the workmen, whom they threw on the streets, depriving them entirely of their purchasing power. Thus the consumers were burdened with new liabilities and must pay additional taxes to cover the deficit resulting from the protection granted to a privileged class of a protectionist government which, at present, directs our destinies. They would also be forced to acknowledge the deficits which the government must cover by levying new taxes or increasing some of the old ones, and by adopting a horizontal cut of ten per cent on all civil servants' salaries, excepting those of judges, military men and the Royal Mounted Police—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): It is coming.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Which is a most crying injustice, a cut which affects far more the small salaried employees than those who are highly paid. They would have to admit also that, to solve the unemployment problem, the government dismissed hundreds of civil servants, and thereby increased the number of unemployed. They would have to admit that in having large amounts voted for works to relieve unemployment, the government acted hypocritically, since it reduced, on the other hand, the regular appropriations by an amount almost equal to the two-thirds of the amount voted for unemployment.

In Montreal, the government discontinued the work in connection with the Canadian National Railways, thus depriving the unemployed of almost $10,000,000, per year, work which was necessary and which was set aside to please the former municipal administration of Montreal which was defeated at the last municipal election. The government also stopped the expenditure of $1,500,000 for repairs to the Montreal harbour.

I could, sir, continue this enumeration, but I shall not do so. It suffices to prove to the house and the country how greatly the Canadian people erred by reposing their trust in those who now govern. Faced with such a failure, what excuses does the government offer? The only one, is that the crisis is world-wide—a contrary statement to that which was made at the last Dominion election. They then pledged themselves to find markets for our products, to bring back prosperity, to give work to all who needed it and, to our dear Quebec farmers, for whom the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) felt a sudden frivolous liking during the electoral campaign, they promised better prices for their butter. They made all these pledges, knowing fully well that they could not fulfil them, but they were intended, however, to deceive the people and capture their votes.

When we, in the opposition, basing our contentions on the budget provisions, blame the government for ruining the country, we are charged with making false representation; the hon. Postmaster General himself charges us with using abusive and regrettable language, when criticizing the government. As far as I am concerned, I have nothing to take back, here or elsewhere. However, may I point out that if such language has been used in the house, the Postmaster General can blame himself. Allow me, sir, to prove this statement. Contrary to what was said in the house, the Liberal party does not advocate free trade. All are aware of this, we are moderate protectionists; we believe in a tariff for revenue to protect not only the manufacturers and industrial interests, as you do, but the consumers who have a right to expect some consideration from legislators. This is called abusive language. The Postmaster General has miscontrued truth in making false statements to help the cause he is championing. This is again regrettable language, for as a member of the government he is held to state the truth. Let me give a further proof; he charged the Quebec government with having enacted in 1922, a measure similar to that adopted last session by this government to relieve the unemployed and farmers. The Quebec government never had a similar measure enacted, it never sought the authority to dispose of enormous sums through a blank signature, or to have recourse to armed force in order to maintain good government, peace and order.

Nowhere, neither here nor elsewhere, can there be found a precedent for such legislation. By this blank-signature act, it is possible to amend the whole of our statutes, and some have already been amended; the prerogatives of parliament have been assailed. The hon. Mr. Taschereau never had such legislation enacted. The Postmaster General's language is abusive and regrettable. Do not interfere, please, with the Quebec government's affairs; if you have petty scores to settle with Mr. Taschereau, this is not the place to do so. You have more important business to look after in your own department, for instance the dismissal of postmasters for supposed active political partisanship. You are better qualified to carry out this petty job than to administer the province of Quebec. The advice can equally apply to the friends who surround you. This discussion on the Quebec government makes you appear more ridiculous than interesting. A word to the wise is enough!

It is true, I have not had as much experience as the hon. Postmaster General, however, like himself, I have never believed that insults and abusive language are becoming a man of good political education. On the other hand, I wonder whether the hon. Postmaster General has a right to lay down principles which are pleasant to hear, and then set them aside at the first opportunity. I will recall the advice he gave the post office employees a few days after his appointment to the cabinet. "Have no fear, he stated, you will not be dismissed from the service, providing you fulfil your duty." How many of these employees were dismissed, since then, because they had the misfortune of having a Liberal relative, or again, worse, because they carried a red handkerchief in their pocket?

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Shame! shame!

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Principles are worth more in their application than on one's lips. Let the hon. Postmaster practise both and his fairness will be greater.

There is, to-day, one fact certain: our country is passing through a very serious crisis. Notwithstanding what the Postmaster General may think, this crisis is more acute to-day, than it was in 1930. It had only begun at that period, in 1932, it has become alarming. Why? Because the government did not fulfil the numerous pledges it made to the people in order to attain power. The remedies which they had promised to apply have not produced the desired effects. What is the result? The patient is worse and they have gained the reputation of being quack politicians. They still criticize the former government which gave the country ten years of prosperity. Do they think that the people will place faith in their word? No, the people have become wise; they are aware that the high protective tariff has been their ruination and that the discordant note sounded by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), in London: Canada First, greatly harmed our foreign trade.

The hon. Postmaster General calls this an economic necessity. For him, international brotherhood is a word void of sense; it should not exist. Countries have no need of it.

I could, however, point out to one case among a thousand, where the hon. Postmaster General thought so much of brotherly love as to suppress his spirit of patriotism even in the administration of his own department.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Shame! shame!

Mr. DENIS (Translation): It is in connection with the purchase of Canadian stamp obliterating machines. His department preferred to rent American machines, paying $18,000 per year, and even more owing to exchange rates, rather than use Canadian machines, acknowledged as superior, since his department has made use of seventy of them, distributed among the various post offices in Canada.

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Shame! Shame!

Mr. DENIS (Translation): In acting thus, he obliged this industry to close its doors and throw on the streets a large number of employees. This is what is called Canada First, and helping our industries. In this transaction the hon. Postmaster General took the advice of party lawyers, probably paid by Americans to depreciate the value of Canadian machines, he was the dupe of his friends, and many of our people are unemployed since then. That is his brand of patriotism.

Previous to closing my remarks, sir, may I address a few words to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), with reference to his comments on immigration. Before criticizing the Liberal government for having given too much encouragement to immigration and thereby being somewhat responsible for unemployment, I would suggest to him that he read the speeches delivered by his friends, in the house and elsewhere—

Mr. ST-PERE (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. DENIS (Translation): —to especially peruse the speech of the chief organizer of the Conservative party, in the last election, the hon. Senator McRae, who wished to bring to this country 300,000 English immigrants each year; also the comments made recently in the house by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). Had he read these speeches, he might, perhaps, have reproached himself instead of us. If, to-day, immigration has decreased, I do not think that the Conservative representatives of Quebec are entitled to take the credit of this, for what we have noticed about them, since they occupy a seat in the house, is a blind submission to the autocratic will of their leader. Their influence is nil and their presence here will be short. Far be it from my thoughts to trouble their peace, however, their days are numbered. The Canadian people await but the opportunity to cast in the cold shades of the opposition those who deceived them at the last dominion election. The country will have no more to suffer or to pay for their bad administration.

Mr. CHARLES BOURGEOIS (Three Rivers-St. Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I feel diffident in rising to make a few remarks in this debate, but I trust they will be received with the courtesy extended to me by both sides of the house when I spoke at the beginning of the session.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is worthy of our congratulations upon his choice of a Minister of Finance. There could hardly be applied politically to the province of Nova Scotia that old biblical quotation: "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Once more the maritime provinces have made an invaluable contribution to the administration of our dominion. The Minister of Finance, personally, politically and in every other respect, must be considered as worthy of his present position in public life, but his best claim to the praise of this country is in the budget which he submitted to this house with a view to restoring our national affairs to a more favourable financial condition.

In supporting the financial statement of the minister I am only following in the footsteps of the leading men in the industrial life of Three Rivers, which I have the honour to represent. These men have had no hesitation in declaring publicly that the budget recently brought down was a sound one and will be the means of meeting the requirements of our country at the present time. In making this statement I refer particularly to Mr. Thomas J. Tebbert of the Tebbert Shoe and Leather Company; Frank I Ritchie, manager of the Wayagamack Pulp and Paper Company; C. Brownley Smith, superintendent of the Canada Iron Foundries, and W. G. E. Aird, manager of the Wabasso Cotton Mills. The opinions of these prominent business men have been given in the Nouvelliste, a newspaper published in Three Rivers. The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Baribeau) has quoted these opinions, and I shall not repeat them.

I should like now to express myself in the language with which I am more familiar.

(Translation):

Renowned economists have burnt the midnight oil in an endeavour to fathom the causes of the economic depression which has spread throughout the world and, especially, in what is commonly known as the leading nations.

The causes—which were mentioned here in the house—can be summed up as follows:

1. The world war which upset everything.
2. Overproduction.
3. The credit crisis.

It might be proper to add the hostile attitude taken by Soviet Russia against capitalists the world over; Russia having decided to use all the means at her disposal to become self-supporting. Then we must not forget the disturbance created in England's economic system by the Pan-Indian agitation. The study of the causes which brought about this economic unrest, the effects of which are felt in Canada as in other parts of the world, although, perhaps, not to the same extent as in other countries, was necessary to consider the means to be taken to wipe out or at least attenuate the acuteness of this deplorable situation.

Authorities, better qualified than myself, have pointed out, without, however, being unanimous, what would be the means to relieve this crisis, and more particularly, unemployment. Useless to say that I do not flatter myself with the idea of having discovered a panacea, a cure all for the ills from which our economic system suffers. However, I would deem it unfair, in all respects, were I to omit congratulating the Bennett government, on the measures which it has taken to relieve unemployment. It is no reason, because they have not overcome all the difficulties, of which a number were probably insuperable, because, here and there, errors may have been committed, to deny or underestimate the very great and meritorious efforts made by this government.

They, first, realized—may it please the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis)—that owing to the condition of our markets, the lack of work, the decrease in wages, it was a matter of great concern that we should not be flooded by immigration, foreigners; that it would be ridiculous to relieve our unemployed, while exposing them to foreign competition. Bearing this in mind, they, by an order in council passed in 1930, took the necessary measures to stop the flow of immigration. The main provisions of this order in council can be found at pages 7 and 8, of the pamphlet "Report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization, fiscal year ending March 31st, 1931."

Similarly, they protected our farmers, by adopting an appropriate tariff and thus prevented an unfair competition from outside, as for instance, the competition carried on by New Zealand against domestic butter. This protection which was urgently needed, was extended to our industries. I have already, in this respect, quoted statements of manufacturers whose factories are located in the county I represent. Let me but add or rather repeat what I stated, when moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne, that, since the Conservative party assumed power, there was established in my county a new industry, the Cellophane Co., and that moreover the Canada Iron Foundries Limited, have since enlarged their plant.

It must, however, be admitted that the paper industry, in that district—we have at Shawinigan and Three Rivers, a number of mills manufacturing various kinds of paper and employing, in normal times, a great number of people—it must be admitted, I say, that this industry is, at present, greatly affected, and if conditions so far have not improved, it is entirely due to the provincial government.

It is only fair to credit the present administration with having adjusted our balance of trade. Stabilization, we are aware, is what is needed most, at present, in our economic structure. An unreasonable overproduction, added to greatly perfected machinery, were the cause of our storing up large quantities of good of all kinds, an abundance which has, up to this day, been unparalleled; however, the lack of stabilization which is felt, immobilizes, so to speak, this great acquired wealth and prevents its normal distribution. It is only just to credit our government for this rapid adjustment of our trade balance, which, at one time, unfavourably upset and threatened to greatly accentuate this economic embarrassment from which we suffer.

It is a truism to state: the purchasing power of a country decreases when there is an excess of its imports over its exports. The Prime Minister was therefore right in expressing, at the outset of this session, his great satisfaction at seeing matters set right in that respect. This adjustment is due to the foresight and initiative of the statesmanship of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). He realized and acted immediately, stopping by his tariff an excess of importations, thus protecting us.

The Dominion government has already contributed a lump sum of $26,586,762 to municipal and provincial works, to the building and maintenance of provincial and national highways—Quebec's quota in this grant amounts to $4,642,807.06. But this assistance, notwithstanding its magnitude, did not, we must admit, entirely relieve the economic depression. The time has come to decide whether the government can and must renew the aid already extended. They have, in the past pledged our national credit by coming to the assistance of our jeopardized railways, guaranteeing also their bonds; they have also helped out the western provinces which were in a precarious situation owing to the lack of markets for their wheat. It behooves the leaders of the party in power to decide whether the credit of our country can be further pledged to relieve the present crisis.

It is unnecessary to say, because it is evident that, unless bankruptcy is at our door, the government must in order to relieve unemployment again pledge our credit. This is a most urgent matter, and, as far as Quebec is concerned, I humbly suggest—since I am in no way an economist—that it is mainly in the return to the land that our hopes rest. I have no fear in stating that, in Quebec, the ever increasing wave of emigration towards the cities, and also towards the United States, has resulted in considerably changing the ratio which existed between the towns and the rural sections. I daresay that if we added the figures representing the populations of Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers, Sherbrooke, Shawinigan Falls, Chicoutimi, Rimouski, Coaticook, Hull and other cities and also large villages, which are to all purposes small towns, the urban population would amount to 75 per cent of the total people of Quebec.

I read in Le Droit, in its issue of Friday, April 22, 1932, the following article, "The Return to the Land," signed by Charles Gautier:

> It is generally recognized that the return to the land movement is the best remedy to the present economic crisis, that it will also be the means to prevent in the future similar crisis, or at least lessen its virulence.
>
> But, apart from the question of crisis and unemployment, farm settlement is necessary in a country where the city population is far too large and where that of the countryside is decreasing every decade.
>
> Mr. Edouard Montpetit recently verified this fact, the ratio is upset between the population of cities and that of the rural districts. In a country where agriculture is the source of its greatest wealth, the rural population is not sufficiently large.
>
> Take, for instance, Quebec. In the course of the last ten years, the total population of the province increased by 513,610. Out of this increase, according to statistics, the cities absorbed 491,047, while the rural sections only absorbed 22,553.
> "Our rural population, writes Mr. Joseph Dandurand, in 'l'Action Catholique' has fallen to 36·9 per cent from 44 per cent which it was in 1921; from 51·8 per cent in 1911; from 60 per cent in 1901; from 66.4 per cent in 1891; from 77·1 per cent in 1881; from 80·5 per cent in 1871."

Yet, it is not the number of farms or the lack of land which is at fault. One needs but to travel through a few counties of Quebec to verify that many farms formerly in excellent condition are now fallow land. In many localities a large number of farmers who had settled in the back concessions have left for the cities or the United States.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BOURGEOIS (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock, I was referring to those who had abandoned the land where they could have earned a livelihood but preferred to live miserably in cities where they increase the congestion. One may argue that the reason they left the countryside was because they could no longer earn a living, the price obtained for their products was too low to permit them to continue farming. I deny the truth of such an argument. In most cases our country folks were attracted, lured to the cities by the hope of finding an easier livelihood. However, it was a deception; too often they met hardships, sometimes ruin, financial disaster, or became physical and moral wrecks.

One should never cease to proclaim the fact that the French Canadian, owing to his traditions, fitness and physical strength, is especially adapted to live on the land, and I have no hesitation in stating it is one of the noblest occupations and most necessary to the existence of a nation. It is as a farmer that the French Canadian contributes his greatest share to the nation's activities.

But what means must we resort to, may be asked, in order to induce the farmer to return to the land of his forebears which he sold often for a mess of pottage, or unfortunately lost. There is no lack, in Quebec, Ontario, or the other provinces, of charitable institutions, philanthropic associations who would voluntarily take charge of distributing relief which might be supplied, they are in a much better position than our government organization to seek the unrooted farmer in cities where he idles away his time, inquire into his former life, his fitness, his means, the members of his family and what help may be expected from them; then through the assistance given by the government, reestablish him on the land where he can build again a home and live in relative comfort. It is all that he can hope for and there is nothing to prove that the farmer, with average ability, possessing health, energy, and leading a good life, cannot find on the land his food, clothes and a shelter.

I have endeavoured to describe, in its outlines the government's past policy which, to my mind, has borne fruit, also, perhaps, its future policy as I see it, and, may I add, as I would wish it to be. The first duty of the state is to balance its budget. This task, the government is fulfilling, notwithstanding our difficult situation. The government must also, in a period of unrest as the one we are undergoing, relieve the sufferings and poverty which necessarily appeal to the public. This task which is strewn with difficulties, because in fulfilling it the government risks burdening too heavily the treasury and, on the other hand, it must also increase the load which the ratepayers have to bear. Those, however, who are at the helm of affairs not only did not shirk this duty but in fulfilling it they displayed a zeal, a capacity for work, a business manner with which the moderate and sound opinion of the public will fully credit them.

There is a limit, however, that the state must not go beyond in carrying out its work, moreover it would be overstepping its bounds: it behooves the government, not to so mould the minds of the people that they will be prone to expect everything from the state. In alluding to this conception—which I think only right—of limited state interference, I have no intention to give a warning to the government which I support and in which I have faith. A government which is conservative and gives protection as this one does, can give rise to no fear that it will break the most cherished traditions of its party. What I wish to point out, is the part that, under present conditions, the people themselves have to play in their own sphere.

I referred a moment ago to this law known as social equilibrium. Weighing all the views exchanged in the house on questions which more or less directly relate to the budget, one realizes to what degree of deep perturbation the centre of gravity of the economic structure of the world has shifted. It is that centre of gravity which must be found and set in place. By its displacement, collectivities which abused of their own prosperity, relying on an unbounded optimism, are taught a sharp lesson. Neither have we escaped it. However severe it may be and however short we desire it, it must inevitably be of benefit in the first place to those who have been most affected.

Without this awakening of the conscience of nations to the laws of "the bread earned by the sweat of one's brow", of thrift, justice to all, charity and sacrifices, the most enlightened and best directed governments will remain powerless. In requesting the government, as it is done in certain countries and even among us, since certain members of the extreme left have advocated it, in the house, to check our insolvency by resorting to state measures, would simply mean adding government disorder to social disorder and thus pave the way to anarchy or revolution.

What strikes me most in the midst of the present distress and what seems to me to herald better times, is that we are gradually returning to the path over which our forebears trod happily along. Things were then cheap: eggs, butter, meat, clothes, wood and coal cost very little, the fees of notaries and doctors were small. A cent was highly valued and had to be earned by the sweat of one's brow. That cent was appreciated and when possible it was preciously placed in the family chest, there was no hesitation however in giving or lending it to the neighbour to rebuild his house or barn that had been burnt, because there was a greater love for the neighbour than for the cent, even when earned by hard work. In those days, one knew how to serve and be served; thus the intercourse between servants and masters, employees and employers, workmen and capitalists was marked with a true human spirit which constituted for society an equilibrium of invaluable stability.

There was, therefore, a better distribution of worldly goods and less misery to be found. Much happiness then reigned over Canada.

I am not astonished, sir, that prices are falling, especially when they denote, as they do, a superabundance of wealth. The years following the war had created a somewhat fictitious prosperity resulting from a restless activity, alarming and unsecure, regardless of the needs and cares of the future. Through this activity rose a kind of Babel tower where capital and labour, industry and agriculture, wealth and poverty, injustice and charity carried on the confusion of languages and threatened to engulf all in a universal catastrophe.

Prices are falling. The cent is hard to earn. In the saving, the lending or the giving, it must be the outcome of the sweat of one's brow. Capital resting in its banks flanked by colonnades or pyramid shaped buildings, must, if it does not wish to crumble, fill the abyss which it has created between itself and labour and itself earn its millions. Work must also learn again to serve, so that there may exist real servants on the farm and true women servants in the home. Thus order will appear amidst this chaos where monstrous and fraudful wealth irritates the entrails of harassed and provoked poverty. What so many human beings rightly look upon to a degree, as an injustice of social life will turn itself to a little charity too long forgotten. There will then be stability. We shall hear no more of 20,000,000 unemployed in a civilized world. Governments will then peacefully carry out their work and their task of balancing the budget will be made easier.

I shall now close my remarks. All are aware that near the mouth of the Saguenay, that giant stream which, at Tadoussac, rushes to meet the majestic St. Lawrence, there are to be found two twin rocks, two formidable rocks whose foundation seems to rest at the very centre of the earth and whose lofty summits appear to be lost in the clouds. These two capes, Cape Trinity and Cape Eternity, have the appearance of two sentries of the infinite, mounting an eternal guard at the gates of our country, and which the sun bathes in rays or squalls unceasingly endeavour to root from the foundation bases. To all travellers that chance, work or pleasure bring to this region, it is an unforgettable spectacle and all agree in saying that it is one of the most marvellous landscapes that nature has strewn over our country with such fairylike prodigality. I see therein an allegory.

Through the storm we are passing we must, to strengthen our faith, assure our prosperity and safeguard our future, follow in the footsteps of our forebears and, particularly, in those of the two greatest creative minds and statesmen that our country ever had, among us French Canadians, Jean Talon, and among you English Canadians, Sir John A. Macdonald.

Secondly, we must rely on our efforts and say to ourselves that we are able to pursue a broad and happy existence, providing however that we display, as our forefathers did, an unshakable energy, for our soil still thrills with the future crops it hides, as it is ready to give up the wealth of its numerous and various mines and the spoils of its gorgeous forests. We must, however, entirely retain an unalterable respect for our laws and institutions, not follow the example of agitators but guard ourselves against the pestilent preachings of communism and sovietism. To follow the example of our forefathers, pursue with energy the development of our national resources, respect our laws and institutions, that is our Cape Trinity. It says: I trust.

But as we are only human, weak, limited in means and discouraged by a trifle, since we are like dust in space and time, we shall repose our faith in God who, in His everlasting power and infinite fecundity, will know how to bring our present sufferings to an end. Cape Eternity whispers: I have faith.

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron): This is the first time, Mr. Speaker, that I have had the pleasure of addressing the house during the present parliament while you have been in the chair, and I wish to congratulate you, sir, upon your elevation to your present position. I also wish to congratulate you upon the impartiality with which you have presided over the debates of this house. I think you should also be congratulated, Mr.

Speaker, for burning the midnight oil while learning the beautiful language of our compatriots. Right here I wish to say to our French Canadian friends from Quebec that I am delighted that I have lived long enough to hear the French language spoken from our side of the house. It was rather lonely to be sitting in the old parliament listening to the eloquent French addresses from the government side of the house and not knowing whether what the speakers were saying was correct or not; but now we are glad we have such a gallant band of able men from our sister province who will take care of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, and glad that those battles of passion and prejudice will no longer hold sway.

In the short time allotted to me, Mr. Speaker, I suppose I shall do as all other hon. members have done—discuss everything else but the budget. So far as the budget is concerned, I think it suits my constituency very well. I suppose the principle of taxation is that it should be borne by those best able to bear it, and the increase in the income tax, the tax on corporations, comfortable chairs in railway coaches, compartments, staterooms and telegrams would seem to be fair and equitable. In connection with the tax on telephone messages, I should like to say not many local calls in the country districts bear tolls greater than fifteen cents. About the only place our people will feel the effect of the increased taxation is through the six per cent sales tax. They were quite used to that under the Liberal régime, and apparently in my county they liked it because they supported the King administration. Therefore so far as the budget is concerned I think it will be well received in the constituency of North Huron.

Most of the budget speeches of the present session were made during the discussion on the unemployment relief measure. I do not know about conditions in any other province, but in the province of Ontario I have heard practically no complaints about the handling of relief moneys. In my county relief measures were placed in the hands of the municipalities, regardless of politics. A Liberal mayor selected the ten men who went north from my home town, and we were all satisfied. The councils of the various municipalities in my county handled the relief problem in an eminently fair and efficient manner. I wish to give a few impressions I have gathered from listening to the debate. When I heard my right hon. leader being traduced, as he has been during this debate, and when I have seen during the course of every debate opposition speakers trying to enhance the glory of the leader of the opposition, it seemed to me that their attitude was fully set out, and that they had given an indication of their future campaign methods throughout the dominion. Having studied his well prepared address I have come to the conclusion that the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) made it abundantly clear what their method of campaign will be. He approached the different subjects with which he dealt very carefully. After laying a foundation he approaches his next point with some such expression as: "I do it with some reluctance." During the course of his speech he said:

> This is a matter which I find it somewhat distasteful to discuss, since it has been my practice ever since I entered politics not to indulge in or discuss personalities.

This was an admission that he was going to discuss personalities.

> But on account of the peculiar circumstances of the case, in that it is proposed, as I hope presently to be able to show, to entrust to one man supreme power in this country, and in that this one has, partly of his own volition and partly on account of the extravagant and exaggerated adulation of his followers, thrown his personality into politics so that it has become almost a political issue, we who take a definite stand on this matter must discuss that personality as any other live political issue.

He goes on to show that that personality was the moving spirit in the last campaign, and gives it credit for the winning of the general election. He then proceeds to state that the personality to which he has referred is as unstable as the shifting sands, has the manners of a Chicago policeman and the temperament of a Hollywood actress. He even goes to the race track to get the word "welsher." It is not necessary for me to repeat the personal attacks which have been made upon the leader of this government. But let me say this: In 1930, rightly or wrongly, the people of Canada dismissed the old physician and took in a new one; and I presume he will be in his place, prescribing for the next three years. We have been elected for a five-year period, and I think the people of Canada are sick and tired of political parties slipping to the country whenever they think the psychological moment has arrived. I agree with the platform of the United Farmers of Canada that legislatures elected for a definite period should have the nerve to stay during their full term of office, and appeal to the people at the end of that time. They should not strive at any particular time on some special issue to throw up a smoke screen, but should wait until they have served their full term, and then face the country on their record.

If the opposition think they can take a certain line of argument and hon. members on this side of the house are so infantile, puerile, or senile that we will take it lying down and will not meet it, then I purpose to disillusion them to-night. We in the province of Ontario are prepared to meet the campaigners right out in the open, whether they come from Vancouver or any other section of the dominion. When a man mounts the platform and makes the statement that the leader of the government entered into conspiracy with the chartered banks of Canada to put the provincial savings bank of Manitoba out of business, such a statement should not go unchallenged. That matter may rest with the hon. members from the province of Manitoba, but it also is of interest to hon. members from Ontario.

I shall give an example of the arguments used. I cannot understand the mentality of a public speaker who looks into the faces of an intelligent country audience and thinks he can get by with the political twaddle and clap-trap that has been handed to the people of Ontario during the last six months. One hon. member opposite visited Picton a few days ago. I happened to be in that place two days later, and found that the high school boys were talking about the remarks the hon. member had made while there. Speaking to a body of farmers on a Saturday afternoon he said, "There are two hundred cars in front of this hall to-day; had it not been for that wicked Tory party with their policy of high tariffs you could have bought each of those cars for $500 less, and you would have been able to feel in your pockets the $100,000 of which, because of the tariffs of the Conservative party, you have been robbed." Mr. Speaker, I imagine at least half of those cars would be Fords. If bought new they would cost $650, so that if they could have been bought for $150 it would be marvellous indeed. I presume, too, that not many new cars were bought last year, and that most of these were purchased under the King administration during its eight or nine years' tenure of office. And yet they thought they could inflame public opinion so that listeners would go back home and say, Mr. So-and-so told us to-day that owing to the high tariff policy of the Conservative party the cars around there have cost $100,000 more than they should have.

Then we find hon. members on the other side getting up in this house speaking about the millionaire cabinet ministers. I hope they are all millionaires. The only difference between themselves and myself is that they are on their second million—I am on my first. I know there are some hon. gentlemen opposite who are averse to having any money, and if a rich aunt left them $150,000 they would not sleep until they had spread it out among other people. Well, if a rich aunt leaves me any such sum I will keep it a few days at least and run it through my fingers. But we have hon. gentlemen opposite appearing on the public platforms in my province and declaring one of the first acts of the Bennett administration was to raise their own salaries $2,000 a year. That is in a measure true but it is a half truth which is ever the basest of lies. Think you, sir, that we are going to let anything like that go by? I have tried to refrain from speaking in this house, on the advice of my physician, but when I heard that statement I thought: That is one thing we will have to nail anyway. The people of Ontario can rest assured that most of the statements of those hon. gentlemen are of the same character. I asked for a return. I shall not have time to go through all the details, but I will deal with the former Prime Minister's car. Hon. gentlemen opposite forgot to tell the people that when the Bennett administration assumed office the eagle eye of the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) glanced around to see where he could curtail expenses. Some of you gentlemen perhaps have been commercial travellers at some time or other, or perhaps some of you have had men on the road, and you know that little travellers' book they call the "swindle sheet"; you will see commercial travellers figuring in it at night or while going from station to station to see if they can level up their expenses a bit so they will have a little extra for Sunday. Well, looking over the travellers' expense sheet of the old cabinet the Minister of Finance saw that a considerable saving could be effected, and I presume he said: Now, we will cut out these expensive cars driven by liveried chauffeurs from Dan to Beersheba, sometimes with the cabinet ministers, sometimes without them, and we will effect a great saving. Then I do not know what conversation took place, but anyway it was arranged that in lieu of the chauffeurs and the cars each minister would get $2,000 per year, and that henceforth they could go about on foot, on bicycle, on horseback, by taxi, aeroplane, or in any other way they liked, but they would have to do it at their own expense. The following table will show what has been saved in the case of the leader of the opposition:

Year	Repairs, etc.	Gas and oil	Chauffeur's uniform	Chauffeur's salary	Depreciation	Total
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.

An hon. MEMBER: Whose car?

Mr. SPOTTON: William Lyon Mackenzie King's.

That is the return of the expenses of the ex-Prime Minister; but in it I have computed the depreciation which I believe is fair. I have asked for outside figuring on this, and hon. gentlemen will kindly check these figures. In 1923-24 a Cadillac was purchased for $7,150, less $300 allowed for the old car. We are charging up the $7,150 because that is really the purchase price of the car. In 1927, that car was traded in valued at $3,000 towards the cost of an $8,400 Pierce Arrow. Subtracting the $3,000 from the original cost of $7,150, the depreciation on the Cadillac for those four years is $4,150. Dividing $4,150 by four we get the depreciation for each year —$1,037.50. I do not know whether that Pierce Arrow bought in 1927 for $8,400 has been sold or not, but it would be fair to say that a car five years old would not be worth more than $1,400. I doubt if any one with $1,400 cash in his pocket would give more for a Pierce Arrow five years old, even though a prime minister—the grandson of a grandsire—had ridden in it. That represents a depreciation of $1,400 a year for five years on the Pierce Arrow, plus a depreciation of $1,037.50 for four years on the Cadillac. In other words, this spendthrift government has stricken out an item of $5,951.14 and substituted therefor $2,000; next year it has struck out $5,256.41 and substituted therefor $2,000, and so on down the line, the figures being $4,042.78, $3,720.76, $4,143.92, $3,992.43, $4,414.22, $4,439.51, $4,250.44. The total cost of keeping the car and chauffeur for the ex-Prime Minister for the nine years—the entire upkeep—was $40,211.61. Under the new arrangement it would be $18.000 for nine years. I regard that as pretty fair financing. To draw a pen through $40,211.61 and to substitute therefor $18,000 is something commendable. That represents a saving of $22,211.61 in nine years, or approximately $2,500 annually.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SPOTTON: If it is short.

Mr. SANDERSON: His figures are very interesting. Has he also the figures relating to the cost of improvements of a private car on the railways for the present Prime Minister?

Mr. SPOTTON: I am very much surprised that my hon. friend should ask that question. He may go on talking about railways; I am talking about cabinet ministers raising salaries. We will now take up the Minister of Immigration. He was the man who had led the economy group—and I am not throwing stones at the United Farmers, because I know the organization well enough to know that the so-called Progressive group who put their hand to the plough and looked back are entirely different from the United Farm group that put their hand to the plough and did not look back. One was a real conversion, the other a mock conversion. The figures for the Department of Immigration are these: 1927-28, $4,554.42; 1928-29, $4,503.63; 1929-30, $4,115.28; 1930-31, $4,404.85. In other words, in four years there was a total of $17,796.94, almost $18,000; and now the government that substitutes therefore the sum of $8.000 is said to be doing a wrong act. Take the Department of Finance. In eight years we find the total of $40,910.71 as against $18,000, a saving of $22,000 in that period. In the Department of Agriculture in eight years the total was $28,854.12 as against $18,000. I will not go into depreciation here. A Cadillac bought in 1924 was turned in in 1927 for a Pierce Arrow.

I have asked the department whether this included the joy ride which that minister made when he took the Pierce Arrow over for its health, giving it a sea voyage, but they tell me that it is not included. The figures for four years for the Department of Trade and Commerce are $15,739.03, and now it will be $8,000 for four years. I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman came from my section of the country; I am glad to know that he kept his chauffeur well-liveried so that the people would know he was a great statesman when he passed by. The sum of $722.61 was spent on rigging out the chauffeur during four years, but when the hon. gentleman got to his county the chauffeur was left in the garden and the cabinet minister got into his Ford car and drove around the constituency. I give him credit for it. As regards the Department of Railways, I will just give the figures by fiscal years. They are:

1924	$3,465 44
1925	3,050 43
1926	3,486 65
1927	3,234 82
1928	3,515 55
1929	3,791 70
1930	3,701 86
1931	3,919 16

Those are the different years for the Department of Railways. Lest anyone should think that I am just selecting the worst of the departments, I am prepared to give any other department asked for.

An hon. MEMBER: The Department of Marine.

Mr. SPOTTON: In the Department of Marine the total was $44,732.79 in nine years.

Mr. CHAPLIN: He was no piker.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Postmaster General?

Mr. SPOTTON: He used a car belonging to the department. Someone I believe has asked for the Minister of Labour's department. The Minister of Labour did pretty well for a man who pleads for a fair wage clause and who is going about shedding crocodile tears seeing that the working man gets a fair deal. When he started out, like every young traveller, his expenses were light. As they get educated, however, travellers' expenses grow, and that is so here. In 1928 it was $4,216.59; in 1929 it was $5,137.42; in 1930 it was $6,701.84 and in 1931 it was $5,975.18. Gasoline was an exceptionally heavy item, amounting to over $1,000 in one year and over $1,100 another. The others were much more modest. In this department a Willys-Knight was bought for $4,500 in the year ended 1927. That was traded in in 1929 for a Cadillac costing $5,724.25, an allowance of $1,800 being made on the old car.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What uniform did the Minister of Labour's chauffeur wear?

Mr. VALLANCE: Tell us about the budget.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SANDERSON: Just one question; I am sure the hon. gentleman will permit it.

Mr. SPOTTON: With all due respect, I must ask the hon. member for South Perth to take his seat.

Mr. SANDERSON: It is a simple question.

Mr. SPOTTON: My time is nearly up and I must ask the hon. gentleman to wait until I have concluded.

Mr. SANDERSON: As one hon. member to another, surely the hon. gentleman will answer my question.

Mr. SPOTTON: The clever accountants on the other side of the house can analyze the figures I have given, but by this one act the Dominion of Canada, on the number of cars that were running around this country, has saved approximately $50,000 per year. I may be a little out either way on that figure, but I cannot be far wrong. The only thing that might be questioned would be my figures on depreciation, and I am told by liberal garage men they are eminently fair. For four years the Minister of Labour averaged about $6,000 a year; now the present Minister of Labour will manage on $2,000 per year. I have been warned that my time is about up.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is the hon. member running out of material? He should tell us about the budget.

Mr. SPOTTON: I am a little hard of hearing but I think I hear braying somewhere. During the last day or so I have noticed that the groundhogs are beginning to come out.

Mr. VALLANCE: It does not look like it.

Mr. SPOTTON: I do not take up a great deal of the time of the house, perhaps because I am not as competent to do it as many hon. gentlemen opposite, but hon. members might allow me to use the few minutes at my disposal. Speaking for my people in North Huron, I know they are not expecting us in this house to be bickering back and forth with small political arguments during this time of stress and strain. I would not have attempted to go into these figures had it not been that they were being broadcast throughout this chamber and the province of Ontario. When arguments such as these are presented I feel like saying to hon. friends opposite: Canada is passing through a crisis; drop your petty politics and come let us reason together. An hon. member gets up and says that two hundred factories have closed, and we hear actual applause. During the next campaign I should like nothing better than to have a sound picture of these proceedings to show how seriously the opposition has been aiding in the work of this session. When we go back to our people we will say: Regardless of whether or not our party is elected, we shall do our best and give our support to all necessary legislation, no matter whence it comes. Perhaps not the majority, but many of the opposition sit there chuckling and hoping that Canada will become more depressed so that hard times may cause the defeat of the government. The old farm which was left us was in a terribly run down condition. The roof was off the barn, the fences were all down and the soil was impoverished; it could not be expected that there would be a good crop the first year, but we are cleaning up the soil and we shall be able to give a good account of ourselves.

Considering the load he is carrying, the Prime Minister should be given every encouragement. I am reminded of a story in connection with a train climbing the Caledon mountains. With much chugging and puffing the engineer finally brought his train to the top of the grade. The brakeman came along and the engineer said, "I never thought I would make the top." The brakeman replied, "You wouldn't have made it if I hadn't put on the brakes." We hear hon. members saying that they hope the economic conference will be a success, but they know it will not be. What father would place his hand on his son's head and say, "My boy, I am sending you off to college but I know it is no use"? I claim that has been the attitude of the opposition during this session.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) when he says that there was possibly a great deal of claptrap during the last election campaign, but I think he will agree with me when I say that this side of the house does not hold a first mortgage upon that commodity. The hon. member discussed the depression as affecting automobiles; I am going to discuss the depression of human values which has taken place since the inception of this parliament. I hope that the contribution he made to this house will go to solve the conditions under which the agriculturists of this country are suffering.

With other hon. members, I compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on his presentation of his first budget. However, I contend that the budget itself is nothing to cheer about, and I do not think that this dominion will be able to stand many more like it. It places an added burden of $5.50 on every man, woman and child in this country, an additional burden of $27.50 on the average family of five. In my opinion it lacked the only sound method of taxation, the taxing of those who can best afford to pay and the placing of the burden where it is best able to be borne. The sales tax has been increased, and after all, we might just as well call it by its proper name—the buyer's tax. This tax increases the cost of every conceivable article used in the homes of this country. The same thing might be said of the excise tax, which has been increased by 200 per cent, enhancing the cost of well nigh everything that goes into the home of the ordinary citizen. There is plenty of money in Canada, and in this time of stress, when every individual has to face a decrease in wages or a shortening of hours, all of which causes a reduction in his buying power, it would have been in the best interests of this country had the government gone, like the Quakers, to where the money is. Two-thirds of the money to be raised will be taken out of the pockets of the average tax payer.

This afternoon one of the speakers broached the question of a change in the constitution of the Senate. I am opposed absolutely to an appointed Senate. I feel we have reached that stage in our legislative development when the Senate should either be abolished or elected; we have reached that stage in the development of our democratic institutions where every individual who fashions or makes the laws should be directly responsible to the electorate. If we must have a place wherein to put those who have passed their sphere in this chamber, the best thing to do would be to provide some sort of pension. I say this in all sincerity because after all some sacrifice is made by those who participate in public life; and when they give the best years of their lives to the service of their country they are surely entitled to some consideration in their declining years. I believe that would be a far better way to deal with the problem than the spectacle we have before us to-day.

The question of inflation has been touched upon during the debate. Rather than express an opinion of my own, perhaps it would be better if I gave the viewpoint of a well known economist. Coming here in the train from Toronto to-day I picked up a copy of the Mail and Empire. That newspaper should be respectable enough for some, and to make the viewpoint doubly impressive, there is in it a clipping from the New York Times carrying the following article:

The abandonment by Great Britain of the gold standard is looked upon by John Maynard Keynes, the British economist, as the possible starting point of world economic recovery, in an article in the May issue of the Atlantic Monthly. Great Britain's policy has already stopped the decline of prices, measured in terms of national currencies, over the large part of the world allied with sterling, and has brought about the abatement of the deflationary pressure in Great Britain itself, Scandinavia, Australasia, India, Ceylon, Malaya, East and West Africa and Egypt and, in substance, in South America, Canada and Japan, Mr. Keynes writes.

As a result of quitting the gold standard, Mr. Keynes says, Great Britain is to-day "decidedly the most prosperous country in the whole world." Mr. Keynes predicts that the forces released by Great Britain's abandonment of the gold standard will in time undermine and destroy the creditor position of France and the United States.

The article further quotes:

"An almost collapse of the financial structure of modern capitalism" can be averted by a policy of inflation and by ceasing the "competitive panic" for liquidity. . . . He recommends a similar policy for the United States.

And so on. I should like to make this observation: After all is said and done, inflation is only a form of assignment. A man in business assigns at fifteen cents on the dollar, or whatever the rate may be. Nations inflate or repudiate. I appreciate the fact that we are going to inflate whether we like it or not, but I would point out that inflation is not the solution of the ills from which we are suffering. Let us make no mistake about that. We may get some temporary relief from it, but the problem goes far deeper than mere inflation of currency. Many hon. members have noted the additional factories that have been constructed and put into operation since the last general election. Listening to a repetition of this statement one would be led to believe we are in the midst of a boom in our industrial era. I come from an industrial riding and it has been my good fortune in the last twelve months to meet men and women in many other industrial constituencies. Moreover, I have in my hand correspondence from other industrial centres in Canada, and I should like to cite the conditions that actually exist so far as relief is concerned, in Hamilton, the fifth largest and the most highly industrialized city in the dominion. I take this from the official figures for the week ended March 26, 1932, issued by the relief department of that city over the signature of J. H. McMenemy, relief officer.

Commodity	Quantity	Amount
Groceries (orders)	4,514	$15,221 00
Milk (pints)	24,410	1,748 90
Bread (loaves)	33,722	2,023 32
Fuel (orders)	1,061	5,821 00
Shoes (pairs)	751	1,910 20
Underwear	——	263 60
Total		$26,988 02

The number of families that are drawing relief is 4,521. This does not include the expense of overhead; it is merely the actual cost of supplying the very necessities of life to these unemployed and their families. When, over the week end, I was discussing the subject with the mayor of our city, he told me that actually there were 7,000 married men out of employment there. The following is the comparison between this and last year:

Year	Families supported by Hamilton
1931	2,109
1932	4,521

This shows that the situation is just twice as serious as it was a year ago. When you analyse the figures, you find that the average increase per week in the maintenance of married men and their dependents is between 100 and 150. These men have spent all their savings and have found it necessary to look to the city for relief. It is estimated that, including unmarried men, Hamilton has 15,000 out of work in a population of 160,000. We must admit it is essential that persons who are unemployed should be sustained by those in more fortunate circumstances; it is equally important that this policy should not diminish the opportunities for productive work. The policy of work or maintenance is here to stay, but we cannot all be maintained. Emphasis must be placed upon the provision of work or Canada will come to disaster.

I should also like to give some figures regarding the amount of money spent on productive relief work in Hamilton. This is from a speech delivered by the mayor of the city, as reported in the Hamilton Herald of Tuesday, April 19:

City	Days' work	Wages	Rate per day	Per capita relief
Toronto	11	$ 53	$4 80	$2 00
Hamilton	23	103	4 40	4 00
Ottawa	22	97	3 60	1 80
London	26	91	4 00	2 00
Windsor	40	157	3 40	7 00

Recently the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) spoke of people crowding into the cities and expecting to be spoon-fed by the government, but the figures that I have given show very clearly that there is very little spoon-feeding being done. We can assume that the average rent in the city for the class of people doing this work would be twenty-five dollars per month, so it will readily be seen how much chance a man would have of making both ends meet when the total wages earned for relief during the year were only $103. The amount expended in direct relief has doubled in the last twelve months. Quoting from the Child and Family Welfare bulletin for January, 1932:

Civic relief in December, 1931, showed an increase of one hundred per cent over 1930—expenditure of $102,956.64 on 5,350 families and 14,421 dependents, against $49,750.58 in December, 1930. This was for groceries, fuel, shoes and underwear. "Made" work, providing three days work per month for the married men was netting about $13.20 per month per family.

Going further east, I find that this resolution was forwarded to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and I presume to the government, from Trenton, Nova Scotia:

The employees of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, Limited, Eastern Car Company, Limited, and other citizens of the town of Trenton met to consider the serious conditions of unemployment. We much regret to make these representations but the grave circumstances of the people are certainly worthy of any effort on our part.

We find that approximately 45 per cent of the families of the above named employees are in need and 40 per cent are in dire want. Men and women have not suitable clothing to go to church and other places of social interest, children cannot go to week-day school or Sunday school for the want of clothes and proper nutritious foods.

Now, sir, this is a deplorable state of living for Canadian citizens, and one which we firmly believe should not exist in Canada to-day, and we resent any method of administration which allows the same to continue.

Providence has provided sufficient food, clothing shelter, wealth and all the necessary things for human life, so all might enjoy a measure of life as life was meant to be, but what do we find to-day—men walking the streets deprived of the privilege to work while their wives and children suffer starvation. Such conditions will only create an atmosphere detrimental to Christian citizens.

The above statement is not exaggerated; it sets forth the facts as they actually exist at present, and we have endured this suffering for the last ten months in silence, but we are now compelled to make these facts known.

We make these representations to you with the hope that you will use your good offices immediately and place some work with the plants at Trenton. Direct relief is not adequate to meet the needs of the people; providing work is a much better method, and one that would promote human welfare which should be considered at this time.

It concludes:

We only ask for the right to work in order to live, and we believe your government has the authority and the right to grant the above request.

John C. Reid, Chairman.
Rev. P. C. Lewis.

After all is said and done, Mr. Speaker, these men are only asking what was enunciated in the declaration of the Lambeth conference, a meeting of bishops from every civilized country in the world, held in the city of London in the year 1930, which laid down the guiding principles of the faith until the next conference. The language used in this declaration, it is true, is possibly more polished than that employed by these men and women of Trenton, but it carries the same message and the same criticism of present conditions. Dealing with the present social system it says:

This change can only be effected by accepting as the basis of industrial relations the principle of cooperation in service for the common good in place of unrestricted competition for private or sectional advantage.

We gladly recognize an improved relationship between the different classes engaged in industry, and a better realization of the meaning of cooperation in service, but we cannot say that society has even yet come to believe that industry exists for man, not man for industry.

It is not the business of the Christian church to suggest technical remedies. But it is our duty to rouse dull consciences and to turn the attention of all Christian people to the moral background of the picture. It is a strange paradox that the capacity of the world to produce more than it needs of almost everything should coexist with extreme poverty in large areas of population, and the "discordance between consuming and producing power" calls for hard thinking and courageous action.

From what I have said, and I say this in view of the fact that the government has under advisement its policy in connection with unemployment relief, it will be obvious that there is a dangerous situation existing in the cities of this dominion. Only last week the firemen in the city from which I come were sworn in as special constables. We see thousands of men and women in straitened circumstances for the first time in their lives, men and women who placed their faith in thrift, hard work and honesty, and who invested the product of their thrift in what they believed were sound securities for the provision of comfort in their old age. To-day these people find the value of their securities gone. I live amongst them and I know the conditions. They find themselves out of work and losing their homes. They are in the position in which the industrial worker has often found himself, of not knowing where to look for their next meal. I can understand these conditions existing fifty years ago, but when people are hungry in a land of plenty; when farmers are unable to sell their products and, men in industry cannot use their strength and skill in the production of the things that the farmer so badly needs, I think all will agree that such conditions are a challenge to our good sense and to our courage; and that courage should be exercised notwithstanding the psychological state of many who still persist in looking through the spectacles of 1870 at the problems of 1932. It is useless to declare against the present dole, because after all is said and done, I say to those who would not have the dole in this country, that you have the dole—an unqualified dole. It is not much use grumbling about its cost, because after all, these men and women on the streets must live, and even if we have failed to provide them with work, it is the duty of the state to see to it that they suffer no undue hardship through conditions over which they have no control.

For years labour has propounded the idea of unemployment insurance as the only scientific way to deal with unemployment. I admit that such a measure would be only a palliative, but I think most hon. members will agree that in view of conditions which have obtained during the last two years some such scheme is necessary. Three years ago industrialists said: "We do not pay our men to be idle; we pay them to work. We do not want any dole system such as that followed in Great Britain." I left industry only three days before I took a seat in this House of Commons, and I can say that the men and women who work in industry have come to the conclusion, because of their experience with intermittent employment, that some form of insurance is necessary against the greatest curse which enters the workingman's home—the fear of unemployment.

After all, society never moves until it has suffered. It has always been necessary to get out into the rough sea, to find ourselves in rough waters before we could really accomplish anything. One of the greatest benefits to be derived from the depression is that we have been taught to think. We all know that to cope with this period of distress through which we are passing many great fundamental changes will have to be made. Undoubtedly some form of unemployment insurance will be one of them, and if Labour members in this house could assist in bringing about such a change, their efforts, especially in view of their small numbers, would be most commendable.

I listened to the splendid oration by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who spoke about the necessity for thrift and economy. I do not for one moment question that the hon. member was under the romantic spell of early Quebec. It has often occurred to me that perhaps the most stable form of economic organization was that which existed between the feudal system and the industrial era as we know it to-day, where the labour of the man in the field balanced the labour of the man engaged in industry—the blacksmith, the shoemaker and so on. Whether we like it or not we are up against the problem of mass production in agriculture and industry. We are in the midst of the greatest period of transition the word has ever witnessed. In my opinion economy is the antithesis of mass production. Every move in the direction of economy intensifies the troubles from which we are suffering. If carried too far, these economic measures which are being promoted all around us will have the power to shake the very foundations of our social structure.

There are many to-day who talk economy and practise it as a moral obligation. I venture to say there is not one in a million who really understands the direction in which he is heading. Why do we fool ourselves? Right in this city of Ottawa in which the House of Commons is situated we are witnessing a "spend more" campaign. We are told to spend more in the city of Ottawa, but to save more in the House of Commons; save more by cutting wages, laying off men, and any other possible form of economy. I do not deny the existence of a problem in connection with federal, provincial and municipal financing. I do say, however, that measures of economy and the necessity for economy, so far as governmental organizations are concerned, are but symptoms of a disease. Our real difficulty lies in the maldistribution of wealth. That is the terrible mess in which we find ourselves because of our laissez faire attitude and our failure to recognize the existence and the enormous influence of science as expressed by mass production in agriculture and industry.

The real wealth of a nation is expressed in the ability of its people to consume the output of the fields, the factories and the workshops. For that reason labour stands for a policy of high wages. Probably at this point I should make a comment in connection with the present policy which is common in the city of Hamilton. My remark concerns St. Paul's cathedral, that magnificent structure in the heart of the British commonwealth which was designed by the brilliant architect, Sir Christopher Wren. As we walk into that building we see a tablet on the wall which bears the inscription, "If you desire to see the achievements of this man, look around you." If you desire to see the achievements of economy in the midst of mass production, just look around you.

I should like to put the case of the municipalities before the house. If it is to be the deliberate policy of the federal and provincial governments to deny any assistance to the municipalities in connection with relief works, the problems of the municipalities will be greatly intensified. Many men are looking forward to relief works upon which they may earn sufficient money to pay the rental, on the homes in which they and their families live. I question very much whether the municipalities can carry their burdens very much longer. We must remember they have only two major sources of taxation, namely real estate and income. Speaking for the province of Ontario, there is no doubt we have just about reached the maximum, so far as taxation on the homes of the people is concerned. I believe the government will be well advised even to increase their contribution to the municipalities for these purposes. Such a policy is absolutely essential, particularly in view of the fact of the many avenues of taxation that the provincial governments and this government have in comparison with the few that are open to the municipalities.

We have had several committees sitting dealing with subjects referred to them by this house, but none of them have dealt with what I consider are vital problems. I think we should have set up a special committee to study the best means of introducing a system of unemployment insurance. I readily understand that such a system will have to be based on the peculiar needs of this country, but study and preparation are required before any action can be taken, and I am of opinion that in view of the basic need for unemployment insurance the first duty of the government was to set in motion a special committee for this purpose. Then I think the government might well have taken hold of the suggestion embodied in the resolution of the member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) for the establishment of an economic research council. I am convinced that before we get out of this depression the need for such a council will be imperative. I believe the resolution contains the germ of an idea that will be of great assistance in approaching the problems that have to be solved if we are to climb back to prosperity.

I have a number of other suggestions to make, but time will not permit. I say to the government that the people are ready for leadership—not leadership backward, but forward. The people are willing to take chances.

An hon. MEMBER: We have taken too many.

Mr. MITCHELL: Someone on the other side says that they have taken too many chances. Well, you have played pretty safe, you have not taken any chances so far in regard to solving the major problems confronting the dominion. It is all very well to be favourable to banks, insurance companies, and power companies, but governments do not exist merely to be paternalistic to such corporations. The people of this country are ready for a real progressive policy initiated by this government.

Mr. D. B. PLUNKETT (Victoria): It is gratifying to note that the budget has been received throughout Canada in a very commendable manner, and I belive it is worthy of consideration for its complete and clear review of the country's present obligations and future necessities. Perhaps the best evidence of its favourable reception by the country is the very weak criticism of the budget offered by hon. members sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker. It is noticeable that in any criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite no solutions have been offered or positive suggestions made that are any better than those brought down by the government. Particularly is this so in reference to the care or relief of the unemployed.

During the debate it has been suggested by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), and in this he was supported by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), that all deposits over $20,000 in the savings banks should be taxed for the direct benefit of the state. As political publicity this may sound very well at the present time, but what faith or confidence can the people be expected to have in this country if those who by hard work and industry have saved some money and deposited it in our savings banks are to have those savings absorbed by the state? What incentive would there be for anyone to work and save his surplus money for future contingencies if such proposals were to become law? Our banks are the custodians of the people's money, and the only money actually owned by any banking institution is its capital stocks and reserve funds. The capital stock usually consists of the bank's office buildings and other property; its reserve funds are usually invested in government and other first class securities. Usually neither of these is available for loans; for this purpose banks rely generally on the money entrusted to them by their depositors. Deposits may be divided into two classes: deposits payable on demand, which appear as current accounts; and savings accounts, on which fifteen days' notice is sometimes required before withdrawal. It will therefore be seen that it is a primary duty on the part of banks that they protect their depositors' funds. No business or industrial venture is so susceptible to fluctuating conditions as the banking business. I wonder how many hon. members would make good bank managers?

Let me make this comment on the taxing of incomes over $20,000. A contracting firm handles big contracts, sometimes running into millions of dollars. We will suppose that after a contract has been completed, and the contracting firm has paid off all the debts incident to the contract, it has a balance running anywhere from $200,000 to $600,000. It may have to wait a considerable time before it gets another contract, and in the meantime deposits a portion of that money, say $50,000, in savings account in a chartered bank, Well, if the suggestion made by the hon. member for Acadia were put into practice, $30,000 of that deposit would be taken by the state. Would that be a good thing for the commercial life of this country, or would it not? That is one of many things that must be given due and fair consideration before we could adopt the plan proposed by the hon. gentleman. He has said our banking institutions do not consider first of all the welfare of the people. I wonder what reception he would get if he were to make that statement in the United States. Many depositors in that country who have lost thousands of dollars through the failure of their banks would think the Canadian a funny person who would make such a statement. To-day in the United States they are marking their return to normalcy by the fewer number of banks that have failed this month as compared with the preceding month. To deride or belittle the banking system of this country is not doing a service to Canada. That could have been done in times of prosperity as well as in times of adversity. Take the provincial savings office of Manitoba; that was a government-conducted affair. I do not think I need to comment upon it, but I submit that it was a splendid thing the banking houses of Canada were able to absorb and save the depositors in that province. What of the American money that is coming into our country now for deposit? Would that money come in if the American people did not have faith in our banks? While there may be an increase in deposits in the savings banks of the country, it will be found on inquiry that a part at least of that increase is coming from the United States, and it is coming here for safety and for no other reason. When the history of this depression and of these hard times is written, the brightest spot in it will be the conduct of the financial and credit system of Canada as it was maintained by the Prime Minister and his government; and I have no doubt that his successor in that very high office, the present Minister of Finance, will be equal to all that is put upon him.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has said in this house that our forefathers, when they built their homes in Canada, believed that they were founding a democracy. I agree with that statement, but I have sometimes wondered whether our forefathers would have permitted some of the speeches that are being made in this country to-day. And when I hear men going up and down the country saying, "The state owes me a living," I would reply with this: They owe something to the state. Many of them are living better in Canada than they have ever lived or ever will live in any other country, and the social legislation of this country is burdening the taxpayers to the limit. Let us not forget that the taxpayer is the best citizen, for he keeps the wheels of government running.

I now wish to make a few remarks with regard to unemployment relief in British Columbia, a subject which has been forced upon the attention of the house by hon. members opposite. It has been a surprise to me, if there were any real maladministration of affairs in British Columbia, that some hon. members from that province should have so graciously permitted the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) to present such rumours, for they are rumours inasmuch as none of them are facts. Or was it their policy, with their larger experience in political life, to accept no responsibility for unproven statements which might become embarrassing later on, and which the hon. member for New Westminster, in his enthusiasm, was willing to assume? The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Munn) have had considerable political experience, both having been members of the British Columbia legislature. These hon. gentlemen were supporters of the late Liberal administration in that province when that government had control of the political destinies of British Columbia. And what is the record of the Liberal government there? When the Liberal party came into power in 1917 the public debt of British Columbia was $25,521,000, and when the Conservative party took office in 1928, after nearly twelve years of Liberal rule, the debt was $117,452,000, or an increase of $650,000 per month. That was the extent to which the public debt was increased by the Liberal administration of British Columbia. The present leader of the Liberals in that province is Mr. Pattullo, formerly Minister of Lands, the one who has been instrumental in saddling on that province a land policy that has left a debt on the people of British Columbia of over $12,000,000. The four projects he fathered when Minister of Lands were Sumas, South Okanagan, Merville and Creston. These gentlemen were enthusiastic supporters of that government which was so extravagant in provincial affairs, and responsible for these tremendous expenditures. But they want to have the taxpayers forget their past, and so they point to the Conservative administration of British Columbia and say, "Just look at their administration. Forget about our past. Our future is bright; wash us and we shall be whiter than snow." And so, passing down the political highway of adventure, they come to Ottawa, where they find that their party is not altogether immaculate nor above reproach; for as they pass through the valley of humiliation someone whispers "Beauharnois." But posing in a superior attitude they hope that their own weakness and failures in the past will be forgotten if they make an attack on the present administration in British Columbia. Inferences, innuendoes and generalities, spoken without reliable evidence in writing, are not statements of fact and should be very carefully considered by hon. members.

The unemployment situation in British Columbia presents difficulties which other provinces have not to contend with. In the last eighteen months eleven thousand outsiders have come into British Columbia from other provinces. This is a considerable burden for a province with a population of only a little over six hundred thousand, about the size of Toronto. In the report issued by the Dominion Director of Unemployment Relief it will be found that British Columbia leads all the provinces in man day's work given for the expenditures made. To control these people who came from other provinces was very difficult, and had they not been given relief in some cases, hon. gentlemen in this house, whose hearts are so sadly torn for the working man, would possibly have said, "You made them swear that they did not need money; you put them through a third degree to be sure whether they needed it or not. Was that right?" I will read you a few extracts to show what some of these working men have done. I am sorry the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) is not in the house, because this might interest him:

Relief Case Investigated

Vancouver Man Who Applied For Work Had Three Houses and 320-Acre Farm

Vancouver, March 22.—Investigation of the case of a man who applied for relief work from the Vancouver relief department has disclosed:

He owns his own home with a clear title.

He has clear title to another house which he rents at $18 a month.

He has a third house that is mortgaged.

He has a 320-acre farm at Weyburn, Sask., which he values at $4,500 and which has $2,500 against it.

His two daughters, which he claimed were dependents, are earning a total of $166 a month.

Relief Officer H. W. Cooper, reporting the case to the civic relief committee yesterday, stated the man in question had registered under the provincial government scheme, made an affidavit that his real estate, negotiable securities or cash, consisted of a house, etc., assessed at $2,000 and enumerated his dependents as being a wife, three daughters and two sons.

Mr. Cooper stated he had written the provincial government for instructions regarding prosecution.

Then in Victoria, British Columbia, a man was convicted and it was shown he had $3,222 in a Winnipeg bank, $115 in the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and three shares of British Columbia Electric Railway valued at $100 each. A nominal fine was imposed for his having made these misrepresentations. I shall not give the name of this man, but if any hon. member desires it, I shall be glad to furnish the information.

If hon. members desired to criticize the administration of unemployment relief in British Columbia, would it not have been fairer to send these facts to the British Columbia government? If hon. members did not desire to send them through to the Conservative government, the information could have been furnished to the leader of the opposition, and no doubt he would have investigated these matters while the house was in session. But hon. members did not do that, they saw fit to make statements—they were not statements, that is my mistake; they were rumours—three thousand miles away from those who were being attacked, thus making impossible a fair defence.

I shall refer particularly to some allegations made by the hon. member for New Westminster, speaking in this house on March 16. I shall read a letter dealing with these allegations, and I am sure it will be found to be illuminating and of value to hon. members of this house. Under date of March 23, I received the following letter from Hon. R. W. Bruhn, Minister of Public Works at Victoria:

For your information I am enclosing memorandum from Mr. Philip to myself, in connection with the statements made by Mr. Reid in Hansard of March 16. I also enclose one of my speeches which I delivered in the house here, giving further information in regard to unemployment relief in British Columbia.

As there have been some comments on the cost of lumber, for your information I may say that the average cost per thousand feet of lumber, delivered at the camps, is $20.60. The average cost per camp, including equipment, per man, is $36.46. This is considered rather low.

The statements made by Mr. Reid and other speakers are without foundation, and you are quite safe in making that statement should you have an opportunity to do so, as the unemployment committee here has so far found nothing to warrant such statements.

The following is the memorandum of Mr. Philip, chief engineer, to Mr. Bruhn:

With reference to the speech of Mr. Thomas Reid in the House of Commons, page 1283 of Hansard.

Employment of men: We have employed almost 25,000 on unemployment relief works, instead of 16,000.

Twenty-three Delco plants were purchased, some of them second-hand, not 100 as given to Mr. Reid by a truck driver. Possibly if Mr. Reid would apply to the proper quarters for information his data would be more reliable.

With reference to the water supply; it is true that a well was dug where the supply was insufficient owing to the dry weather at a cost of $75, and another well was dug on which a total of $22 was spent. It was not necessary to use this well as the water became plentiful in the first one which was dug, owing to weather conditions. This is the scandal Mr. Reid takes the time of the House of Commons to investigate.

As to the manufacturer who told Mr. Reid that he had sold 50,000 blankets and "It took him out of the red." The facts are that 7,700 pairs of blankets were bought new and 420 pairs second-hand, making a total of 8,120.

As for the steel wheelbarrows, he may have counted these in one camp for distribution throughout other camps. As to a man appointed to regulate their use, this is too ludicrous to even discuss.

With regard to the coal: This was bought locally in Mission and hauled to the camp for cook-house ranges. It was found when these ranges were purchased that they had coal-burning grates but this was rectified as soon as possible. No coal was purchased by the carload.

As to the tenders for cutting wood, this refers to Allco camp. At one time the supply ran out and no available wood could be had less than three miles from the camp, which had to be delivered on the logging railway. A small contract amounting to one or two hundred cords of wood was advertised in the regular way and some local settlers took the contract.

With regard to the government road foreman who had $50,000 in the bank: We have no knewledge of this, but if the information given by Mr. Reid is as reliable as the blankets, wheelbarrows, the water supply, the coal and the grader which was unable to turn on the road, then I submit that very little attention should be paid to the hon. member, Mr. Thomas Reid.

That is the memorandum of Mr. P. Philip, chief engineer and Deputy Minister of Public Works.

I should like to make a passing reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). One statement was as follows:

One might say they were equipped almost luxuriously with hot and cold water shower baths, electric lighting plants, and I am informed even radios have been supplied in some cases.

A reply to this statement is made by the Minister of Public Works at Victoria in the following words:

Camps were built according to standards laid down by provincial health regulations of 1920. Shower baths with hot and cold water were put in in permanent camps as called for in these regulations. Showers were in the proportion of one to twenty or twenty-five men. The cost of these showers was approximately $7 each, and consisted of lumber and tarpaper stalls, with platform of slats and timber drain.

There were twenty-three lighting plants purchased or enough for approximately ten per cent of the camps. Some of these plants were bought second-hand and have a high salvage value. The cost of lighting by electric light was carefully estimated and when the period over which the lights were to be used and the salvage value of the plants were considered, it was found that in large permanent camps electric light was cheaper than coal oil or gasoline lamps.

Misinformed as to radios: There were none purchased.

Another statement by the hon. member was as follows:

The tools were furnished on a scale never known before in connection with roadwork. Every man had a wheelbarrow; every man had a ten-foot saw, which was entirely unnecessary, and everything was done on a lavish scale.

The answer is as follows:

Regarding tools: The statement that each man had enough tools to suffice for ten, is a very loose statement and is entirely contrary to fact. Public works inventories show that for the number of men to be employed, namely 16,000, there was one wheelbarrow for every 7 men and one cross-cut saw for every 11 men.

Perhaps one can hardly blame hon. members for making such statements when it is considered that the former provincial Speaker and Attorney General apparently has accepted similar rumours. The following article dealing with the piano story appeared in the Victoria Times, a good Liberal paper, of March 17:

Camp Piano Story Refuted
Also Nothing in Carload of Radios Rumours, Manson Tells Committee

The mystery of the piano at the Blue river relief camp, which has been causing politicians so much concern, has been solved.

A. M. Manson, K.C., M.P.P., who had the matter up last week, announced at Wednesday's session of the legislature's unemployment investigation committee, that he had had telegraphic inquiries made and that "The piano story arose from an old piano taken into camp."

"As for the carload of radios, which people report having seen come in, there is nothing in it," said Mr. Manson. "It is only proper when a member gets information sent to him in connection with matters like these, we should clean it up."

I hope hon. members of this house will take cognizance of that statement. The article continues:

"It was not fair for any member of the committee to present the piano story in jest," said J. W. Berry, M.P.P. "We are deluged here with this kind of stuff—reports about the way moneys have been expended," Mr. Manson went on.

The following article appeared in the Colonist of March 23:

'Cousin Rumour Goes by Board
Another Myth Exploded at Public Accounts Hearing

Joining the "carload of radios" and the "Blue river piano" myths, which had been previously exploded before the unemployment committee, another choice bit of gossip was dissipated yesterday before the public accounts committee, with another retraction from A. M. Manson, K.C., who had introduced the subject to the committee on the strength of a letter from a citizen at Coalmont.

As it reached the committee the rumour was that a cousin of the Minister of Mines had made a good thing out of renting some machinery to the government on Tulameen roadwork, with machinery he was supposed to be buying on time purchase from the government. Examination into the rumour showed that the man in question, B. L. Hatfield, was no relation to the Minister of Mines and that he did not rent machinery to the government for this work.

The hon. member for New Westminster, speaking in the house on April 19, stated that his information in regard to blankets was given to him by a prominent business man in Vancouver. Surely it is time that a letter verifying these statements should be presented to the house. If I were to give in the house all the statements that I hear on the street or from business men, I am afraid we would need a greatly enlarged Hansard. He further made this observation:

This would seem to indicate that, generally speaking, all my statements were accurate, or eleven of them would not have been left unchallenged.

The hon. member has something to answer now.

Mr. MUNN: May I ask a question?

Mr. PLUNKETT: The hon. member can make his speech later. I have very little time.

Mr. MUNN: I should like to say this—

Mr. PLUNKETT: I do not interrupt any hon. member when he is speaking, and I hope the same courtesy will be extended to me.

The hon. member for New Westminster, speaking in the house on these questions which he considered to be of such moment, missed something good regarding his own port. I should like to help him out; I want hon. members to know that New Westminster is a great and growing port and it is going ahead even in these dull times when everybody is visiting the wailing wall in Jerusalem. This is from the British Columbian:

March export of lumber best for more than year. March was the best month for lumber exports from the Fraser river for more than a year, according to the month's figures issued at the harbour board office to-day. The export of lumber totalled 18,638,989 feet, as against some 14,000,000 in March, 1931.

There were twenty-nine ships in port in March, as compared with twenty-six in the corresponding month last year. For the first three months of this year there were eighty-two ships, as against seventy-five in the first quarter of 1931.

Export of shingles also showed a marked increase, being 8,236,800 in March this year against some 2,000,000, in March, 1931. Canada salmon was another product that showed an increase, 13,447 cases this March against 1,300 in March last year.

There are several other figures given, but my time is almost up.

I wish to make just one remark in regard to educational methods in Canada. It was not long ago in British Columbia that the college students went on strike because the provincial government had reduced its estimates by $250,000. I sometimes think these days that education has gone a little too far; that we must stop at the public or high school point and let those who desire a better education pay for it. It has become such a burden upon the people, it is almost unbearable. University students of to-day seem more capable and informed upon communism, atheism and companionate marriage than they are upon political economy or any national virtue which would help in the advancement of our citizenship or the relief of the taxpayer who has to pay the bills. We have all read the essays and theories of economic experts and we know of what little value they are. None of them has evolved anything which could help us out of our present dilemma, and I do not know what may happen to us as a nation if all our citizens should receive an academic education; for I find few, if any, of such people ever work at manual or laborious work except by way of talk, theory and writing. And while they talk, the taxpayer works to meet the obligations that conserve our institutions and advance the nation.

Many suggestions have been made by hon. members to the left of the Speaker, with regard to what we should do. Many of them have come from the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). It is only right to expect that the mind which knew when England was going off the gold standard, would be more full of facts than any other. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) gave some suggestions; so did the hon. member for New Westminster and also the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). But not one of them said in the house that he had the endorsation of his leader. Is it going to be a part of the Liberal policy that every one can dictate it?

Mr. MUNN: We have a certain amount of freedom over here.

Mr. ROBINSON: And they show it, too.

Mr. PLUNKETT: I can only say this, that they may have a certain amount of freedom over there, but at the same time I am looking to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Mackenzie King) as their leader because he is drawing the salary. Perhaps they are dissatisfied with him; perhaps they are not; but some of us on this side consider that as long as he is their leader, he is something of an asset to the Conservative party and I think it is the unanimous wish of us on this side that he continue to occupy that position for years to come.

As a nation we should have no doubt about the future, for the following reasons:

The decisive action on the part of the federal and provincial governments, municipalities and our two great transcontinental railways, to stop unnecessary and wasteful expenditures, and the realization of our citizens, that, if Canada is to prosper, extravagance must end.

The present outlook and possibilities for good crops and the knowledge that came by those engaged in agriculture that the growing of wheat alone, to the exclusion of other farm products, does not guarantee a living or assured financial returns.

The coming Imperial conference with all its future possibilities for increased trade to all parts of the British Empire. This conference we hope will be a great success.

Therefore we should, with assurance, expect that Canada will be carried through this time of trouble and economic warfare by the character of our people and the intergrity of our institutions.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I cannot find it consistent to vote for either of the amendments offered by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I shall give my support to the main motion.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, making and listening to budgets is a rather disappointing occupation at the present time. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has received so many compliments and congratulations regarding his presentation of the budget that I am sure he will pardon me if I sympathize with him instead of congratulating him. I know the difficulties he has in the position he holds in a government that does not intend to change from the beaten path it followed when conditions were so different. I said that budgets are disappointing to the people who hear them, and I can assure the house that this one is a great disappointment to me. It is disappointing in that it does not take into consideration the changed conditions under which we are living, the fact that the class which has assumed the prerogative of supplying the needs of our people has fallen down on the job, and the fact, as stated in the words of his own leader during the election campaign of 1930, that the first duty of the Canadian government is to provide work for Canadians.

It is rather to be regretted that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Plunkett), who has just taken his seat, should have gone out of his way to take a slam at the unemployed in general as well as at other hon. members. As long as he confined himself to hon. members, he was quite within his right, but when he went out of his way to infer that because one or two unemployed people were found imposing upon the local authorities, all the unemployed were in the same position, he was going rather too far. I say that he will not make the same statement before a meeting of the unemployed in the city of Victoria. The time is long past when anyone should have the gall to say that men are unemployed because of their own fault. Let me quote from a letter that I received recently from an alderman in the city of Vancouver:

I represent, as you well know, a district composed of workers of an excellent calibre from the standpoint of citizenship—skilled mechanics; men who have in better times operated thriving little business ventures but who have lately been forced to the wall; labourers who by a maximum of effort and self-denial have gotten together a little home and up to the present have succeeded in bringing up their families respectably. These men are those who do not appear in unemployment parades. They are men who will eke out their small savings to the ultimate cent before they apply for relief, and these are the men who, I assure you I am not exaggerating, call on me or 'phone me not singly or in pairs but sometimes as many as sixteen a day, begging me to to something to help them over the hump. And what can I do?

If the member for Victoria has any solution for this problem, if he believes that the majority or even a small minority of the unemployed are sponging on the local authorities he should make that known to the people who are charged with investigating those who apply for relief, and I am sure that they would very soon tell him that not one man in five hundred of those who come before them comes until all his resources have been dissipated.

Mr. HEAPS: Does a capitalist ever sponge on the public?

Mr. MacINNIS: They all sponge on the public. While I did not intend to say very much in connection with unemployment, as the hon. member for Victoria has brought up the question it may be well for me to touch upon it.

As the members of the house know, we met here in September, 1930, with a great flourish of trumpets in order to deal with the problem of unemployment. A certain appropriation was passed and certain provisions were made at that time for unemployment relief. In making those provisions and in allocating the funds provided by that appropriation it was stipulated that all work done would be done under the fair wage clause which applies in government contracts to government work, and through its fair wage officers the government saw to it that that clause was carried out all over this dominion. In 1931, however, we did not have the opportunity of discussing an appropriation for unemployment, and we therefore had no opportunity to stipulate what should be the conditions obtaining in relief work. As a result we find that instead of the provisions of 1930 for unemployment relief being carried out, wages were materially reduced, and not only were wages materially reduced but a great deal less work, relatively, was provided and a great deal more direct relief given than was the case in 1930. While we have not before us the government's unemployment policy for 1932, I assume from what I hear that no work whatsoever will be provided and that all that the unemployed will receive will be a handout from the present government.

Let me point out another thing in connection with the unemployment provisions in 1930. At that time it was the policy of the government to keep employed as many men as possible, and to that end it was provided that out of the twenty million dollar appropriation there should be paid the carrying charges for eighteen months on $25,000,000 which the two Canadian railroads were going to spend for work and supplies outside of their usual budget. But this year, with conditions much worse than they were in 1930, we find the government taking the lead in reducing wages and in going back on the working conditions which the government employees have had for many years. For instance, I quote from a circular that was issued from the Post Office Department just a few days ago, on April 11:

The postmaster is advised that the item which for some years appeared in the estimates to cover overtime and statutory holiday pay has been deleted from the estimates for 1932-33. However, the amount provided for salaries for 1932-33, even outside of the ten per cent deduction, has been greatly reduced. These facts leave the department no alternative but to modify the regulations governing overtime, hours of duty and compensation for work performed on statutory holidays.

It goes on:

It follows that the eight-hour daily period of duty cannot in all cases be subject to a minimum spread of hours or even to two attendances.

That means that instead of a post office employee going to work in the morning, coming home for lunch, going back after lunch and then finishing his day's work, he may now be called upon to come to work, go home or lay off, come back to work and lay off several times during the day. There is no limit to the number of times that that may happen within the spread of twenty-four hours. The circular continues:

Moreover, the concession granted by the department whereby seven hours' night work and six hours' Sunday work have been considered a full day can no longer be operative.

With the number of unemployed continually increasing in this dominion, and with private organizations cutting down their working day and working week, this government is extending the working day of its employees and leaving the unemployed to be taken care of by charity soup kitchens. The bulletin goes on.

Immediately on receipt of this circular the postmaster will take steps to arrange the staffs and hours of duty so as to take care of the work with a minimum number of employees, and will, as soon as possible, report such rearrangement to the department giving particulars as to the number of employees who could be released as the result of the more economical distribution of the staff.

That is the contribution of this government to the unemployment situation in Canada. They are giving a lead to private employers to cut down staffs and to put more people on the list of unemployed to be cared for by the municipalities. In this instance I am afraid the government is setting a rather dangerous precedent. We know that when a misunderstanding arises between workers in public utilities and their employers, or in other industries, the government sends out representatives from the Labour department to try to effect a conciliation. What position can the government take when it becomes known that these employees were only resisting conditions similar to those that the government itself has been putting into effect, without consulting in any way their organized employees? Where is the boasted collective bargaining about which we have heard so much? If private employers treated their organized employees in the way this government treats its employees, there would be strikes and discord from one end of Canada to the other.

At this point I should like to read two telegrams I received from organized federal employees of Vancouver. One received on April 19 is as follows:

Postal Employees Amalgamated Civil Servants protest post office circular 196. This increases hours of night work, hours of Sunday work and lengthens daily tour of duty in that it gives the postmaster authority to spread working day over twenty-four hours period. This circular eliminates payment for over time in excess of regular duty and for work performed on statutory holidays. Through application this circular many employees will be dismissed which means remainder of staff will be required to perform extra work under more difficult conditions. Salary cut bad enough but consider proposed action infinitely worse in that it means loss of all rights gained through organized effort of past twenty years. Proposed action will aggravate unemployment situation. Consult colleagues and interview National Secretary Knowles for full particulars.

That is signed by D. J. McCarthy, Secretary for the Amalgamated Postal Employees. Then, I have a shorter one from the Secretary of the United Postal Employees of Vancouver. This is dated April 22, and is as follows:

Meeting held under auspices Vancouver Branch United Postal Employees strongly protest recent order PSB 196 whereby improvements in working conditions in Post Office Department gained over period of twenty years are nullified. This follows ten per cent salary cut and withholding of statutory increases in the interests of staff and in conformity of principles of organized labour we ask your support in above protest.

May I repeat that this government is setting a very dangerous example to private employers of labour in Canada.

In the speech from the throne we were told that conditions were gradually improving. At the very time that speech was being drafted and was put into the hands of the Governor General, what were the actual conditions throughout the length and breadth of Canada? The Labour Gazette for the month of March gives the following information from the reports of the employment offices in the different provinces—the figures are for the month of January, 1932, as compared with the months of December and January, 1931.

In Nova Scotia, the positions offered show a decline of 32 per cent as compared with the preceding month, and an increase of one per cent over the month of January, 1931.

In New Brunswick the demand for workers was 17 per cent less than in the preceding month, and nearly 38 per cent less than in the month of January, 1931.

In Quebec the orders received for workers were 19 per cent less than for the month of December and for the month of January, 1931.

In Ontario the orders received at the Ontario office called for 16 per cent less than in the preceding month, and 49 per cent less than in the corresponding month in 1931.

Orders received at the Manitoba offices were seven per cent less than in the preceding month, and nearly 47 per cent below that of 1931.

In Saskatchewan the number of orders for workers were 25 per cent less than in the month of December and nearly 32 per cent less than in the month of January, 1931.

In Alberta employment opportunities were eight per cent less than in the preceding month, but over 25 per cent less than in January, 1931.

In British Columbia the demand for labour through the labour offices was 22 per cent less than the month of December, and 31 per cent less than for the month of January, 1931.

The figures I have given, showing the requests for labour in the different provinces, are really the best indication of business conditions. They show that in every province of the dominion with the exception of Nova Scotia, requests for labour were less in the month of January, 1932, than in the same month of 1931. In Nova Scotia there was an increase of one per cent over the previous year.

I should like to say a few words concerning the budget, the Liberal amendment, and the amendment to the amendment proposed by the group in this corner of the house. First I shall refer to the Liberal amendment, and in doing so may I congratulate the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) upon his masterly criticism of the policy of the government. However, a very definite flaw in his criticism is that it compares conditions in the years 1922 and 1930 with those prevailing to-day. Liberal members—and it would seem with a great deal of right on their side—have on occasions drawn attention to the statements and promises made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign of 1930. It seems to me we have to admit that conditions during the last two years either are or are not comparable to those prevailing in the years immediately preceding the last federal election. If they are not comparable with the situation which existed prior to 1930, what is the use of saying, "We did this or that during our term of office"? Whatever was done, and with whatever success, was accomplished out of the material conditions of that time. If those conditions cannot be duplicated now, they cannot do the same things as were done in the years prior to 1930.

However, it is when we come to consider the amendment of the opposition that we learn, and as far as I am personally concerned learn with a shock, that the events of the last two years have taught them very little. One is inevitably driven to the conclusion that the only solution they have to offer for the very serious situation in which we find ourselves at the present time is a reversion to things as they were in 1930 before the present government came into office. In the years preceding the last general election things of course were not so bad as they are to-day, but I had been connected with the civic affairs of Vancouver some time before 1930, and I can very well remember that we had a rather serious unemployed situation there for every year from 1925 down to 1930. While I had nothing to do with civic affairs in the years preceding that period, I am sure we had recurring unemployment during every year the Liberal party was in power. In 1930 the Conservative party was going to put an end to the depression by increasing the tariff. I point that out at this time because that is the only thing that the Liberal amendment has to offer—another alteration in the tariff. By thus increasing the tariff the Conservative party was to make it impossible for foreign-made goods to come into the country and so conserve the market for our own manufacturers. But our conservative friends overlooked the fact that taking production as a whole very little profit can be made by producing for a local market; that if profit is to be made by the manufacture and sale of commodities, such commodities must be disposed of in other countries than the country in which they are produced; that is, you must have a foreign market. The reason for this I will explain to the house.

I referred a moment ago to the number of unemployed in this country. We have them to-day in every industrial country in the world. If an unemployed man in the city of Ottawa or anywhere else goes out looking for a job to-morrow, and finds one, he will find it on one condition, and one condition only; or at least this condition is implied when he gets the job —that he will produce more for the person employing him than that person will pay him in wages. That is, the value in goods he produces for his employer will be greater than the value his employer pays him for his labour. That, I repeat, is implied in the contract of every man who goes to work for an employer. What relation the values received and the values produced have I will not go into at this time, but it has been stated on the floor of this house that it is about four to one; that is, if a man receives one dollar in wages, he produces four dollars in goods. Evidently then the person so employed cannot buy goods to the value of four dollars with the one dollar he receives; so that for every one dollar of commodities that a worker can consume there are three dollars' worth that must be disposed of in some other way. There are other people in the community, however, besides the working class. There is the owning class or the employing class, the buyers of labour, or to be more correct, the buyers of labour power; they will consume some of it. They are not so numerous, but their purchasing power is relatively greater. So we may say they will dispose of another dollar's worth of commodities. But we still have one half the total product to dispose of, and it cannot be disposed of where it was produced because of the limited purchasing power of the working classes and of the limited consuming capacity of the employing class. That is the reason why this government has its trade commissioners in every country in the world looking for a market for our goods, and it is the reason why every other industrialized nation has its trade commissioners in this country seeking a market for their goods. Every country to-day is reducing the wages of the workers in every line of employment, hoping thereby to reduce the cost of production and obtain an advantage in the markets of the world. This, however, is a vain hope, as the people who cannot buy the commodities produced in their own country because of insufficient buying power, for the same reason will not and cannot buy the goods produced elsewhere.

Another intended result of the tariff policy of the present government was to attract foreign capital—of course to the benefit of the country. That always seemed to me a peculiar kind of reasoning. On the one hand we raise the tariff to shut out competition, and on the other hand we beckon to our competitors to come in to continue the competition—and of course send their profits to the countries in which their head offices are situated. I think it is pretty generally admitted by every thinking person to-day that the industrialized countries of the world are overequipped with production machinery of every sort, and that any further agricultural or industrial development without increasing purchasing power will only intensify competition and add to unemployment. If the people of Canada produce more than they can consume individually, for the reason already stated, and if the people of the United States, France, Germany, and of all other countries produce more than they can consume individually, for the same reason they cannot consume these commodities collectively, even if the circulation or passing of commodities from one country to another be as free as air. You cannot increase trade except by increasing the power of the masses of the people to draw on the products of industry.

The Liberal amendment suggests a change in the tariff policy, which change I suppose would be a reversion to the policy of that party up to the election of 1930. The depression set in in the fall of 1929, after the Liberal party had been at least seven years in office. If they were not able to stave off depression during that time, by what logic can we suppose that what they could not prevent then they can cure now? Of course, it seems reasonable to me that the power to set the prices of imports for duty purposes, as at present exercised by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), is a detriment to trade; but at the same time I submit that the root causes of the depression are so fundamental in character that the removal of surface irritations, such as the tariff or its regulation, will not have any effect in removing those causes. I have said in this house before, and I repeat it now, for it cannot be stated too often, that the world depression is not due to the fiscal policies of governments. In my opinion it is due to defects inherent in the system itself. If it were due to fiscal policies, surely there is somewhere in the industrial world to-day a government that would have sense or business ability enough to carry on its affairs without being affected by the conditions that are now prevailing. If it were in the power of government to prevent or to overcome this depression, I am sure that there is enough business ability in the ranks of the present government to do that, and that there was enough business ability in the ranks of the preceding government to have prevented it. But in my opinion it is due not to the fiscal policies of any government, but to the inherent defects in the capitalist system itself.

I pointed out a moment ago that when a person entered industry he did so on the understanding that he would produce for his employer more than his employer paid him in wages. Now, what he produces for his employer over and above what his employer pays him in wages is termed in political economy surplus value. And surplus value is the life blood of capitalism. So long as this surplus value can be put back into industry as new capital, then capitalism can and will continue; but the moment that surplus value cannot be put back into industry as new capital, that moment capitalism will languish and die. And that moment has arrived. Very little new capital has been invested in industry in the last few years. Let me point out to those who tell us that conditions will improve and that Canada will come back on a high tide of prosperity very shortly, that unless new capital can be put into industry in such measure as the world has never known before, prosperity will not return. In its growth, capitalism has materially changed the social relationships between man and the methods of satisfying his needs. It has placed the means of production in the hands of a few, and in doing so it has created a huge propertyless population without the means or the skill to produce its sustenance from nature, as our more primitive forebears have done. In the last one hundred and fifty years the world's population has increased manyfold. The large majority of the world's peoples are congregated in cities without contact with the soil out of which life can be sustained.

In face of the present situation, a world well equipped with industrial and agricultural machinery which cannot be used, a farmer class that is crushed with a burden of debt which it cannot pay, and a superabundance of produce that it cannot dispose of, and an ever-increasing army of unemployed, the Liberal amendment is no solution.

The amendment to the amendment differs from the government's policy of doing nothing, in waiting for good times to come, God knows how or when, and it differs also from the policy of the opposition, who hope that by a slight reduction in the customs tariff we shall be able to bring back the prosperity of the golden age between 1922 and 1930. Our amendment differs from both these policies in that it points out that we have in this country, this Canada which we members of parliament represent, abundant natural resources to supply all the primary needs of the people; that we have developed an industrial machine that is capable of producing more than is necessary to meet the requirements of the people; that all that is necessary is that the abundant natural resources of the country and the machinery of production should be organized, controlled and directed so as to meet the needs of the people. Further it points out the dominance of finance in the economic life of the world to-day, and that as a first step towards economic reconstruction the nation must have control of the issuance of currency and credit. We insist that currency and credit is too important a factor in the everyday life of the people to be left in the hands of private interests, to be manipulated for private gain. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Plunkett) said that it was a fine thing that the banks of the country were able to absorb the provincial savings bank of Manitoba when it got into difficulties. That is one of our objections to the banks—their tendency to absorb. As a matter of fact, they have absorbed about everything that is loose in the dominion, including the affection of some politicians. While the amendment to the amendment aims at the stabilization of the price level that is not the end itself but merely a means to the end,—just what we say it is, a first step. The end we have in view, what we want to bring about, is a reorganization or reconstruction of the economic life of the country on the basis of use and not of profit.

On motion of Mr. Sanderson the debate was adjourned.
