That is a complete reply to my right hon. friend's representations with respect to the alleged dictation of a minority. The right hon. gentleman also adduced two other examples in justification of this policy of "blank cheque" expenditure: old age pensions and the bridge over the St. Lawrence. But I think my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) completely and conclusively confuted his arguments in this regard.

Then I look through the pages of Canadian history to occasions when we were accused of obstruction by my right hon. friend. Looking over some of the exploits of my right hon. friend and of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice and of other members of the Tory party, during their parliamentary career, if obstruction be an offence I call upon one hon. gentleman opposite who is without fault to cast the first stone to-day. I refer the house to the uniform franchise bill introduced by the great Conservative chieftain, Sir John A. Macdonald, in 1885. The Liberal party fought it tooth and nail, night and day, and as a result of their opposition certain important amendments were embodied in the legislation, which it is generally conceded to-day were for the good of the Canadian people. In 1896 the Manitoba school question was under consideration in the dying days of a moribund parliament. The Liberal party asked that it be referred to the people. They won out and were justified by the electorate. In 1908 an election measure was submitted to parliament by the Liberal party of that day. It was obstructed by the Conservatives; a compromise was offered by the Liberals and accepted by their opponents. In 1911 the reciprocity resolutions were introduced in this house. The first resolution was introduced on January 26, and up to July 28 not a single preliminary vote had been taken in regard to any one resolution. Then we had the obstruction in 1913 with regard to the naval aid bill. That obstruction was caused by the Liberal party, and I am sure my friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) will bear me out when I say that if any course ever has been justified and vindicated by the verdict of history, it is the course taken by the Liberal party in regard to the Canadian naval policy in 1913.

The other day the right hon. Prime Minister spoke about conferences. He said that last year he saw some of the premiers of the provinces, and that after the termination of this session he was going to call a conference of the premiers of the nine provinces of Canada. That was not his policy in 1930, when he condemned those on this side of the house who advocated two immediate conferences, one with the premiers or treasurers of the provinces to consider the financial aspects of the question, and the other a larger conference to deal with this unemployment situation in a national way.

My right hon. friend has said that the policy of this government has worked well. Has he read the evidence given in Victoria the other day by an employee of this government? I refer to Mr. McGeough, who works directly under Mr. Hereford, an officer of this government. In the press report of his sworn testimony given before an investigating committee of the provincial legislature, appears the following:

> That at camps 1, 2, 3 and 4, Deroche, on October 17, Mr. McGeough found 104 names on the provincial government pay-roll as carpenters at $4 a day, although only four men were working as carpenters, and the camps were virtually completed.

An hon. MEMBER: That has been disproved.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend has no right to say that, because the committee has not finished its work or made any report. So in the province of British Columbia at least we have had gross mismanagement of public funds, and that alone absolutely justifies the demand we made in 1930, and which we renewed in 1931, for a complete supervision by the Auditor General of Canada over all funds expended in the relief of unemployment. I very well recall the words of the Prime Minister during the special session of 1930, when he said, "This administration accepts full responsibility for all expenditures."

I must hurry along. Here we have what is now a national problem, and what was spoken of by the Prime Minister in 1930 at Montreal, at Calgary, and in fact all over Canada as a national problem. What is happening to-day? After eighteen months of the application of Tory principles to the solution of the unemployment problem; after the expenditure of $150,000,000 of the money of the taxpayers, instead of the 117,000 unemployed which were admitted by the right hon. gentleman in September, 1930, to-day we have 550,000 unemployed according to the figures given by the president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada. That is the result of our experience during the last two years, and through that expenditure of public money what has happened? To-day the provinces are almost bankrupt, and in the west the municipalities are in a very serious situation, largely because of the strain put upon them by the misguided and mistaken policies of this administration. Here it is March 30 and this measure is only to be in force for another month at best. This measure will die on May 1, just as the last measure died on March 1, and nothing has been said by this administration as to what will be their unemployment policy after May 1. So I say, Mr. Speaker, in the first place, that this legislation which they bring forward this afternoon accentuates and intensifies all the miseries and evils of last year, and that it violates every rule and usage of this parliament. In the second place, it offers no concrete remedy for the unemployment situation which exists to-day in this country.

We took the position in 1931 that we objected to any blanket authority being given this executive, and in particular we objected to the power not only to control expenditure but to amend legislation passed by this parliament by means of secret and sinister orders in council. What right has this administration to-day to pass an order in council increasing the armed forces of Canada, without reference to the supreme parliamentary authority in the country? That is one example. Then there is the question of the export of gold, and we heard a good deal about the necessity for an order in council to deal with that question. My hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) asked whether that action could not have been taken under the provisions of the Finance Act, and the answer was "Oh, yes, but that might involve a proclamation; it might involve the consideration of war or insurrection, either actual or apprehended." I tell my right hon. friend that if he looks through the record of the Liberal party he will find that in 1929 action was taken in regard to the gold standard. That action was not taken by order in council under any relief measure, nor was it taken by means of any proclamation under the Finance Act. It was done by arrangement between the Minister of Finance of the day and the financial institutions of Canada. So I believe that finally and effectually destroys the argument that the greatest necessity for these powers was to permit the government to deal with the export of gold from this country, because that could have been dealt with in another way, not involving the relief measure at all.

Then we had an order in council having to do with 2,000,000 railway ties not to exceed sixty-five cents each in cost. This money was voted by this parliament under the relief act, but we are not told how it was spent; we are refused the information, and we cannot even find out who were the contractors. I ask my hon. friend, in all fairness, whether it can be said that we have any control at all over expenditures when that condition of affairs exists. Surely my hon. friend is morally bound to give us all possible information with regard to the purchase of ties or anything else under the Unemployment Relief Act.

Mr. MANION: I have already stated to my hon. friend and to the house that we made no contract for ties. We passed an order in council granting a certain amount of money to the Canadian National Railways, and that company has entered into contracts for the purchase of ties; they have set the prices and done everything else, just as these things have been done in past years. I have not refused to give any information that was in the hands of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If that is the policy of the administration I suggest to my hon. friend that it is not a policy which should receive the support of this house. Parliament should have absolute control over and full knowledge of every cent of money spent under the provisions of this act. That is a principle, surely, which has been embodied in our constitution for centuries.

There is one other point to which I should like to refer. In speaking on the resolution a few days ago the Prime Minister held up an example from the old country; he referred to chapter 48 of the statutes of Great Britain, passed on September 30, 1931. He would have this parliament believe that we had there an absolute precedent to guide us in regard to this legislation. But what was the situation there? They gave the executive power for a period of one month after the first day of October, 1931; they gave the executive power to pass certain orders in council, but only for thirty days. What was the situation in England at that time? A national government had just been formed. The Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald had announced his decision to appeal to the electorate and he went to the people five or six or seven days after this very bill was passed conferring certain powers upon the government. And those powers were not for expenditures but for the purpose of effecting economies in the administration of Great Britain—England and Scotland. I suggest to my right hon. friend, therefore, that there is no parallel between the case in England which he cited and the case in Canada as indicated by him. The Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald went to the country and sought a "doctor's" mandate, and I suggest to my right hon. friend that if he is going to violate all the accepted canons, ethics and usages of Canadian parliamentary practice and push this legislation down our throats by means of closure and compulsion, then he should go to the country and seek a dictatorship mandate from the people with respect to this legislation.

I am opposed to every single clause in this legislation. We are ready now, as we always have been, to assist the administration in voting all the moneys they desire in order to meet the situation, but I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite have the right to ask us to abandon our cherished principles touching the accepted doctrines of parliamentary usage and control. They have no right to force their theories down our throats in this free parliament of Canada. If this type of legislation is going to be introduced year after year, becoming accentuated as time goes on, we might as well close the doors of parliament, take that mace off the table and throw it into the Rideau canal, and disperse and go home. Since this session began I have met people in various parts of the country and I venture to say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the Canadian people will endorse the stand we have taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Well, if hon. gentlemen opposite do not agree with that statement will they put it to the test? Will they submit to the acid test to-morrow? Will they seek the opinion of the people on their bungling of the unemployment situation in this country? They will not, because they know that if they did they would be swept out of power on the crest of a tide of popular indignation which would spread sheer terror into the ranks of a bruised and battered Toryism.

We have fought this iniquitous measure on principle. It is true that we have been silenced by the gag, and this is probably the last opportunity left us to express our considered convictions with respect to this question. There is no one on the other side of the house who is more anxious than we are on this side to do all that can be done fairly, honestly and squarely to relieve the distress of the unemployed from shore to shore. But there are two things that we cannot do at once; all we are asking hon. gentlemen opposite to do is to sacrifice a little of their stubborn pride, whereas they are trying to compel us to sacrifice all of our cherished principles, and that we refuse to do.

In order, therefore, to place on record the concerted convictions of His Majesty's loyal opposition with regard to this measure now before the house, I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), the following amendment:

That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved:

1. That this house has been from the commencement of the session and continues to be ready and willing to consider and vote without delay any money or grant, submitted and asked for by the government for relieving distress and providing employment throughout Canada.

2. That this house cannot surrender the rights of the people of Canada, through their representatives in parliament, to maintain direct control over matters of taxation and expenditure, nor vest in the governor in council or in any other body absolute and despotic powers under the guise of dealing with peace, order and good government, particularly while parliament is in session.

And by these principles, sir, we stand.

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver), which was negatived on the following division:

In order to obtain information for the government, Mr. Harry Hereford wrote to me under date of August 7, 1931, asking for full particulars with regard to the undertakings in my constituency for the relief of unemployment. This letter was forwarded eleven days before order in council P.C. 2043 was passed, which order in council indicates the conditions under which relief would be granted. I answered Mr. Hereford on August 13, and my letter was acknowledged by the then Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) on August 19. I informed Mr. Hereford that I was communicating with each municipality in my constituency in order to obtain the required information in connection with unemployment relief. On September 1, Mr. Hereford forwarded a copy of the order in council which had been passed on August 18. After receiving the information from the different municipalities I forwarded this to Mr. Hereford. He did not reply direct, but I received the following letter from the then Minister of Labour, dated September 3:

Dear Sir,—

It has accidentally come to my attention that this department has received from you personally eleven letters and one telegram, all within the last two days, with reference to unemployment works proposed in your riding.

I note that each refers to matters that are within provincial jurisdiction, and it has been made amply clear to every federal member, through declarations in parliament, that the federal government must deal with such matters through provincial authority, and communications from any persons, municipalities or members of parliament, with reference to works in which the province must be consulted, should come to us through the province instead of direct, as they must necessarily in each case be referred to the province for its information and endorsement.

When I was first communicated with by Mr. Hereford I got in touch with the municipalities in order to obtain the best available information on the matter. I forwarded this information to him but the only answer I received was from someone else. I answered the Minister of Labour under date of September 14, 1931, as follows:

Hon. G. D. Robertson,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your favour of September 3rd, in which you complain that the department has received from me personally eleven letters and one telegram, within the last two days, with reference to unemployment works proposed in my riding.

First of all I have forwarded to every municipal council in this constituency a copy of Mr. Hereford's letter of August 7th, in order to take the inventory of the needs of my constituency with regard to unemployment. I have sent each answer to the director of unemployment.

Mr. Hereford's letter of August 7th was sent eleven days before P.C. 2043, dated August 18th, was passed. Therefore, when Mr. Hereford sent his letter to me, there were no regulations relating to unemployment fund this year. It is only on September 1st that, acting under your instructions, he sent me a copy of P.C. 2043.

In the meantime, the municipal councils of this constituency had sent me their requests for assistance, which I have found my duty to communicate to you.

I have written to Mr. Hereford to ask you to send back to me the requests from ten municipalities which are mentioned in the second page of a letter dated September 11th.

I took the trouble to take that inventory in order to show my good-will towards the unemployed and I resent very much the fact that Mr. Hereford wrote me on September 8th: "Aucun bon but ne semble avoir été atteint de cette action de votre part."—No good result has been attained from what you have done in that connection.

I have done that work to the best of my ability and without knowing what regulations had been passed by the council. Now that that inventory has been taken, it will serve the same purpose, because I will communicate all the answers which I have received to my colleagues of the Quebec legislature; but if I had received the regulations sooner, it would have spared me that trouble.

I received the following letter from Mr. Hereford under date of September 8, 1931:

(Translation) I am in receipt of your letter dated September 3, and in answer I wish to inform you that, as requested in your telegram, I recently forwarded to your address forty copies of the order in council, P.C. 2043, embodying the regulations governing the enforcement of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act.

No agreement has yet been made between the dominion government and the Quebec provincial government in connection with unemployment relief, although it is understood one will soon be made. No doubt, when the agreement is concluded, the terms will be published, I shall then forward you a copy.

I note that you have distributed copies of my letter of August 7 to all the municipalities, and since the latter seemed to have recommended municipal works instead of enterprises of a federal nature, no useful purpose seems to have been served by this action on your part, and as previously explained to you, municipal undertakings must first be agreed upon with the provincial authorities.

Respectfully yours,

This gentleman stated that there was then no agreement between the federal and provincial governments, so how was I to know the jurisdiction of the respective governments? I replied under date of September 11, as follows:

(Translation)

Dear Sir,—

I am in receipt of your two letters dated September 4 and 8, and I wish to thank you for having forwarded me forty copies of P.C. 2043. I requested the warden of the county to distribute a copy of this order in council to each of the mayors who were at the last meeting of the county council.

In your last letter dated September 8, you wrote that no good purpose seemed to have been served by my forwarding copies of your letter of August 7 to all the municipalities of my county, seeing that the latter recommended municipal instead of dominion works.

My first duty on receiving your letter dated August 7, was to communicate the contents to the proper athorities, namely the municipal councils of each parish, so as to have them prepare a list of the works to be carried out in each locality in order to relieve unemployment. Had I acted otherwise, they would have probably blamed me.

Since you inform me that the works which were recommended are of a municipal nature, would you be so kind as to return to me, at your earliest convenience, the requests which I forwarded to you for each of the following municipalities in the county of Témiscouata:

1. Town of Cabano.
2. Notre Dame de l'Isle-Verte.
3. Rivière-Bleue.
4. Rivière-Trois-Pistoles.
5. St. Benoit Abbé de Packington.
6. St. Clement.
7. St. Eloi.
8. Ste. Françoise.
9. St. Hubert.
10. Ste. Rose du Dégelé.

May I draw your attention to the fact that the parish of Notre Dame du Portage request repairs to their wharf which is in a dangerous condition. May I further state that I am most desirous to help the unemployed and that I intend to take all the means at my disposal to attain this end.

I regret very much that this list was not made sooner.

As soon as you have returned to me the requests which I forwarded to you, I shall be pleased to send them to my colleagues, the two members for the county of Témiscouata, at the Quebec legislature.

In closing my letter, allow me to express my regrets for the trouble you may have been put to, however, I hasten to add that the work which was done and which might have fallen upon other shoulders is far from being useless, because pursuant to the correspondence which I exchanged with the municipal authorities of my county, I found out what were the most effective means of relieving this crisis.

I trust that the government will first take up, themselves, the study of the underlying causes of the present crisis, so as to remedy it as soon as possible and in a definite way.

Respectfully yours,

Mr. Hereford on September 17, 1931, replied as follows:

Ottawa, September 17, 1931.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot, M.P.,
Rivière-du-Loup, P.Q.

Dear sir,

I am in receipt of your letter dated September 11, in which you ask me to return to you at my earliest convenience the requests that you forwarded to me for each of the municipalities of the county of Témiscouata:

1. Village of Cabano.
2. Notre Dame de l'Ile Verte.
3. Rivière-Bleue.
4. Rivière-Trois-Pistoles.
5. St. Benoit Abbé de Packington.
6. St. Clement.
7. St. Eloi.
8. Ste. Françoise.
9. St. Hubert.
10. Ste. Rose du Dégelé.

Conforming to your request I am returning these letters, however, I have filed a copy, so that I may refer them to the Minister of Labour when the question of unemployment relief is discussed with the provincial authorities. I note that you are aware that requests dealing with municipal works, must first be submitted to the provincial authorities.

Respectfully yours,

Harry Hereford,
Dominion Director.

It has been said by some members on the other side of the house that there has been no cooperation between the provincial government in Quebec and the federal government with regard to unemployment relief. I have here the report for 1930 of the dominion director of unemployment relief, dated March 16, 1931, together with a supplement to the official gazette of the province of Quebec, containing the statute 21 George V, chapter 2, which was passed by the Quebec legislature in 1930 for the relief of unemployment. A similar statute was passed by the provincial legislature in December last. I have also the report of the dominion director of unemployment relief dated March 1, 1932, together with a supplement to the official gazette of the province of Quebec dated December 5, 1931, containing the statute 22 George V, chapter 7, which gives approval by the province to the arrangement made by the provincial and federal government delegates. On September 10, 1930, at pages 64 and 65 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

It is not proposed that this dominion government should in any sense deal with these problems directly. These are primarily problems of provinces and municipalities, and apart from national undertakings.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bennett: There never was any question as to that.

The total cost of public works initiated to relieve unemployment in 1930 was $68,730,647, of which the dominion contributed only $14,303,603, and there was a balance unallotted of $5,696,397. So while the provinces and municipalities were spending over $68,000,000 to relieve unemployment, the amount disbursed by the federal government was only a little over $14,000,000, instead of the $20,000,000 appropriated by parliament.

The last report which we have from the dominion director of unemployment relief, dated March 1, 1932—and note, Mr. Speaker, that this is addressed to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), not to the clerk of the council—says:

Sir, the undersigned has the honour to report as follows concerning the administration of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931.

Then he goes on to report as to the amount of money spent for unemployment relief, but I repeat, he reports to the minister in charge of the Department of Labour, and not to the clerk of the council.

I was a little surprised, Mr. Speaker, when I heard some of my friends on the other side of the house complaining of the alleged bad relations that exist between the federal authorities and the provincial authorities in Quebec. But the other day I heard the Prime Minister himself state that the representatives from the province of Quebec had met the Minister of Labour and had come to an agreement with him with regard to unemployment relief. I think that that is the best answer to the futile complaints that have been made by my hon. friends opposite as to the supposed lack of cooperation by the provincial authorities in Quebec.

There are other matters on which I wish to touch briefly. First of all, as to the relief works that were asked to be constructed in my constituency. There was a request made by the municipality of Notre Dame du Portage for repairs to a public wharf there which is under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Public Works. A resolution urging the undertaking of these repairs was passed by the municipal council and was forwarded to Mr. Hereford, the dominion director of unemployment relief, and I received an answer from him under date of September 17, 1931, in which he states that he has received my letter and the copy of the resolution passed by the municipal council. He then goes on to say:

(Translation):

You inquire what the department intends to do in this respect, in answer, I wish to state that I understand the work projected as well as others suggested by members of parliament, are, at present, receiving the close attention of the Minister of Labour and his engineers.

Kindly accept my sincere regards,

(Signed) Harry Hereford,
Dominion Director.

The Department of Public Works was giving such serious consideration to this matter, Mr. Speaker, that no amount was put in the estimates for this work either last year or this, and the work has never been done. It has been said that when the people were asking for bread the government gave them a stone. So far as my constituency is concerned, may I say that when the people asked for bread the government gave them cement. What works have been undertaken in Témiscouata county for the relief of unemployment since the special session of 1930? There was the construction of a wharf, sewer works, sidewalks, and pillars for a bridge. The cost of the whole was only $21,000, but the quantity of cement purchased was 8,166 bags, costing $5,112.90. I wonder if that is because the exclusive agent of the cement companies in Riviere du Loup is the perpetual Tory candidate in that county. That is going on to such an extent that perhaps the government may have to build a citadel at Riviere du Loup, with all its wasted scenic beauty. A resolution was passed by the school board in my home town of Riviere du Loup asking for an expenditure of relief moneys to build schools. I received the following answer from the then Minister of Labour:

Ottawa, August 31, 1931.

Dear Mr. Pouliot,—

Attention has been drawn to recommendations sought in Mr. Harry Hereford's circular letter to all members of parliament, dated August 7, indicating that you were going to the trouble of communicating with all local school boards in your constituency.

May I call attention to the fact that this would seem to be unnecessary trouble on your part, as Mr. Hereford's circular referred only to federal public works on which you, as sitting member of parliament, should express your views.

Then follows a lecture from the then minister, who was such a great man.

Local school buildings are, of course, within the jurisdiction of the province, and are regarded as not coming within the federal jurisdiction, and, therefore, if the government's invitation to members is being regarded as affecting purely provincial matters, may I correct that impression, as the federal government has no desire, and, indeed, intends to refrain from any interference with provincial or municipal affairs.

We asked an amount between $100,000 and $125,000. Needless to say the people would have had to pay their share.

In the last report of the dominion director of unemployment relief I find at page 44, schedule No. N-212, the following item:

Provincial works; Winnipeg, Greater—construction of new unit of Manitoba university and waterline.

The total expenditure for that work was $700,000. The percentages shared by the province and the dominion respectively were 75 and 25, making the cash expenditure by the dominion the sum of $175,000. If that expenditure was good for Winnipeg why would it not be good for Riviere du Loup? If it was bad for Riviere du Loup why was it good for Winnipeg?

I am sorry the Prime Minister is not in his seat, because I have a quotation I should like him to hear. Nothing could be worse, Mr. Speaker, than to exploit the miseries of the people in order to gain political advantage. That was done at a village called Tobin or Riviere Trois Pistoles. During the last provincial campaign a gentleman said to the electors who were unemployed, "Vote Tory; the greater Tory majority you return the more help you will receive from the unemployment fund in Ottawa." I took the liberty of writing the following letter, dated September 15, 1931, to the Prime Minister:

Rt. Hon. R. B. Bennett,
Prime Minister,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Bennett,—

A man named E. W. Morissette, who is employed by the Brown Corporation at Rivière Trois Pistoles (Tobin), has boasted that between the 17th and the 24th of August ultimo, he had received a wire from yourself to the effect that you were very much interested in the establishment of a manufacture of artificial leather at Rivière Trois Pistoles, to relieve unemployment, and that you wanted him to meet you in Montreal in that connection.

As he took your name in vain, would you have any objection to tell me when you have left for Calgary and when you came back?

With thanks,
Sincerely yours,
Jean-François Pouliot.

Contrary to the customary good will shown by the Prime Minister, I received no reply to this letter. I should like to quote another letter dated at Ottawa May 8, 1931, from the then Minister of Labour:

Dear Mr. Pouliot,—

Your letter of May 6, is received, advising that you are informed that no farmers have been allowed to work under the unemployment scheme.

I can definitely assure you that your information is in general quite incorrect, because a very large proportion of the expenditures that have been made is the result of road grading work, gravelling, et cetera, in which farmers only have participated, and the Director of Unemployment Relief has received numerous complaints that many farmers in comfortable circumstances—

Rich farmers.

—who were not in need, have enjoyed a large share of the benefits of these unemployment relief works.

I cannot say as to the municipality of Notre Dame du Lac, which you mention, but generally speaking I know the above to be true.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) G. D. Robertson,
Minister of Labour.

Apparently the then minister thought the farmers were rich and did not need assistance. Some Conservative members have complained that in the province of Quebec Conservatives were not given a chance to work. In my constituency that condition certainly does not obtain. On all relief works Conservatives were treated as well as Liberals. May I point out that the Liberals have not introduced politics into the matter of relief, but Conservatives have. The government has appointed two men, one in Montreal and one in Quebec, to prevent Liberals from obtaining work when they were in poor circumstances and needed help.

Le Soleil of March 22 contains an interview by Lieutenant Colonel J. L. Boulanger, provincial Deputy Minister of Roads, which is as follows:

(Translation):

We have been able to obtain, thanks to an excellent organization and the good will of the workers, a return of 100 per cent on this work—

Work on the highways.

—and we have employed, without making any distinction, Liberals and Conservatives. The very best feelings prevailed among the groups of labourers, and we cooperated with the Director of unemployment and his assistants.

He adds:

As in the case of labour, materials were equally supplied by Liberal and Conservative contractors.

I had to complain about relief works, because no Liberals were allowed to work on repairs to wharves until I communicated with the Minister of Public Works. After I told him, he was fair enough to give instructions to the effect that relief must be given to people belonging to any political party.

I made a suggestion to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland). I wrote him to tell him that in the armoury at Riviere du Loup there was some clothing which could be given to the unemployed. I said there was no war and that the clothes which had been there for several years and otherwise would be eaten by the moths could be used by those who needed them. His answer was "No." I relate that incident because I believe it is well to remind him of it. I do not wish to speak further, but should like to quote from Montesquieu, the great French philosopher, who wrote about the organization of the state. The following are his words:

> In a free state, every man who is supposed a free agent ought to be concerned in his own government; therefore the legislative should reside in the whole body of the people or their representatives. The political liberty of the subject is a tranquillity of mind, arising from the opinion each person has of his safety. In order to have this liberty, it is requisite the government be so constituted that one man need not be afraid of another. When the power of making laws and the power of executing them are united in the same person, or in the same body of magistrates, there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise, lest the same monarch or Senate should enact tyrannical laws, to execute them in a tyrannical manner.

A great British parliamentarian, Charles James Fox, on one occasion uttered these memorable words:

> We are compelled to own that the democratic form of government gives a power of which no other form is capable. Why? Because it incorporates every man with the state. Because it arouses everything that belongs to the soul, as well as to the body of man. Because it makes every individual feel that he is fighting for himself; that it is his own cause, his own safety, his own dignity, on the face of the earth, that he is asserting.

Then may I quote Byron:

> Freedom's battle, once begun,
> Bequeath'd by bleeding sire to son,
> Tho' baffled oft, is ever won.

In my part of the country, Mr. Speaker, we do not complain of the fact that the federal director of unemployment wrote us for information with respect to the best way of helping the unemployed; but we do complain that no notice was taken of the representations which we made to him. Why should he object that we sent to him requests for works that came under provincial jurisdiction when at the time no order in council had been passed designating the relative jurisdiction in the matter of the federal and provincial authorities? I am confident that every member of this house took the same course—gave the director of unemployment relief all available information in reply to his request. My grievance is that in my constituency certain selfish people were too ready to keep all they possibly could for themselves without giving any consideration whatever to their needy brothers. May I tell the right hon. Prime Minister and the members of his government that I am convinced they are well-disposed towards our people who are suffering at the present time, and I cannot believe they are so hard-hearted as to shut their eyes to the misery of the unemployed. Therefore I would advise them to take the right means to help those people. We on this side of the house do not pretend to be infallible, neither do we think our friends opposite never make mistakes, but I believe we are all animated by good will towards the unemployed, and we are here at great personal sacrifice to do our best to relieve their sufferings as far as possible. That is why we offer our very hearty cooperation to the government, and in discussing matters affecting unemployment we do so not to obstruct, but to keep the government well posted on matters of such vital importance to the country generally.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): On behalf of my constituents Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) to the fact that this present bill will not meet their requirements. Last week I had the pleasure of presenting to him a petition from my people to extend relief until the first of June, or, if possible, the first of July. I hope he will give this request his favourable consideration.

On August 7, 1931, in common with other members of the house, I received a letter from the dominion director of unemployment relief asking for information as to steps necessary to give employment to the largest number of people in my constituency. I had copies of the letter made and sent to about thirty municipalities in my riding, and I got the local authorities to cooperate and recommend what works should be undertaken. Those recommendations were transmitted to the minister, but that is the last I heard of them until some months ago, when I found that an agreement had been arrived at between the federal and the provincial government to assume their respective shares of the cost of certain unemployment relief works. These works are divided into three classes in my constituency. First, we have the ordinary federal public works, but no new undertakings of this class have been started. Secondly, we have provincial public works, part of the cost of which is contributed by the dominion treasury. The third class covers municipal works in which the farmers of my riding are more directly concerned, the cost of which is borne by the dominion, the province and the municipality in certain proportions. The disadvantages of this latter class of works is that they do not provide sufficient employment. After the elections in 1930 the people expected that the new administration would bring about such an improved state of affairs that there would be no unemployment, that work would be found for everyone, and that the prosperity that had existed so long under the Laurier regime, and again under the Mackenzie King regime, would prevail once more.

Of course, the measures taken now cannot be considered a solution of the problem of unemployment. The people of my riding are disappointed that the promises made to them in 1930 have not been fulfilled, and the closing up of saw mills and other local industries has brought about a condition in my constituency more serious than anything I can remember. I have had the honour of sitting in this house through many sessions—this is my thirty-fifth—and I am sorry to say that I have never seen Canada passing through such an ordeal of depression as now prevails. In the campaign of 1878, when the Mackenzie government was turned out of office because of hard times, the depression was a drop in the bucket compared with the present condition. In 1894 and 1895 we had a similar condition; then Laurier came into office. Now, after twenty or twenty-five years, we seem to agree that the policy inaugurated by Laurier and Fielding was sound. The chief reason for our difficulties at the present time, our financial condition, our railway catastrophe and our unemployment situation, is lack of markets. We have no markets for our products, and that condition has been brought about by increases in the tariff which have closed our markets to the products of other countries and shut our goods out of other markets. Tariffs are barriers to the free intercourse of nations; they must be lowered if we are to have good will between the nations of the world and if prosperity is to return.

When I was elected in 1911 we did not dream we would soon be at war with Germany, but I was here for the special session in August, 1914, and I was proud to pledge the support of my people in that crisis. We had no choice then; we were not asked whether or not we wanted to go to war. War had been declared, and the money for the first, second and third contingents was voted without a dissenting voice. But when the rules of the game were changed and conscription was imposed upon the people, we asked that the question be referred to the people. That request was refused. That was the second time closure was resorted to in this house, but now it has become quite a common practice. Probably as our business increases and the time at our disposal decreases, closure will be invoked more often.

I say frankly, Mr. Speaker, that in connection with a question so vitally affecting the people as that of unemployment, it is too bad that an understanding could not have been arrived at between the two political parties. The leader of the opposition declared many times in the name of the party to which I have the honour to belong that we were prepared to give the government all possible assistance if they would follow parliamentary practice. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, who are old parliamentarians, know that this is far removed from ordinary parliamentary procedure; it is something to which we are not accustomed. Though we may have faith in the honesty of the government and may feel sure that this money will be expended in the public interest, there is no limit to the expenditure. The St. Lawrence waterway or anything else might be constructed under this measure. Back in 1837 this same question of taxation without representation came to a head. The governor of that day was surrounded by a council and did not consult the assembly; he simply imposed taxes and spent the money as he saw fit. The people objected; the cry of "no taxation without representation" was kept up for several years, and finally all that we asked was conceded. All we ask now is that the foundation of parliamentary institutions be observed and that the control of public expenditures by the representatives of the people be continued. That is the parliamentary procedure, and it should be followed. Unfortunately it has not been followed; the majority rules, the majority have resorted to closure, and we have had to submit. But let me again call the attention of the government to the fact that they are mistaken if they imagine that by such means as this the difficulty in Canada can be remedied. It will be remedied only when a wiser policy prevails and when we realize that we cannot do business with other nations unless they do business with us. If we break down those barriers and maintain a tariff merely for the purposes of revenue we will be doing something really worth while.

In the old days, Mr. Speaker, the idea of federal taxation was that it should be indirect collected through customs and excise and so on, but circumstances have changed and the case has been altered. Now we have a new state of affairs. We are to have a conference, and for the sake of the country I hope that conference may be successful. When the delegates of the British government come here and ask if we will admit from Great Britain cottons, woollen goods, iron and steel and coal, what will be our position? One of the planks of the platform of the Conservative party is protection for cotton and woollen mills, the iron and steel industry and so on. We can get nothing from Great Britain unless we give something in return; we must give a quid pro quo. We will be compelled by the force of circumstances to follow that idea, and then I hope a new light will dawn on the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. They may realize then that when England imposed a tariff, that tariff amounted to only ten per cent. The high tariff we have in this country is of no advantage either to the government or to the country; the higher the tariff the smaller the revenue. Our trade has fallen off by about $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 in the last two or three years, something we did not dream could happen in such a short time. We are losing from $500,000 to $1,000,000 a week on our railways; people are unemployed, and we are in a serious condition. As I said before, it is too bad that both political parties could not have agreed to the appointment of a national committee to deal with the situation. There are times in the history of nations, as well as in the history of individuals, when we must get away from parties, and I hope the government will consult the men at the heads of the provincial governments so that before this session closes we may show that we are willing to cooperate and do our share of what must be done.

Let me conclude by again directing the attention of the Minister of Labour to the geographical location of the county of Bonaventure, where the long winter and late spring have made it impossible to carry on the work proposed. No relief has been given there; few of the works have been even started, so if the government persist in handing out money this way they will have to extend this measure far beyond May 1. There is a mayoralty campaign proceeding in the city of Montreal at the present time, and every night speeches are being made by the candidates and their friends. It is being freely predicted that next winter will be the worst in the history of Montreal, with no relief given, with the work on the new station stopped and no new work being commenced. The condition in which we find ourselves is very bad, and I sympathize with the Prime Minister in his predicament. I hope he will see the wisdom of dropping party lines at a time like this and working with all hon. members of this house in the interests of the whole people.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gott in the chair.

On section 1—Validity of act and proceedings thereunder notwithstanding date of expiration.

Mr. HOWARD: The Minister of Labour is not in his place, but no doubt other ministers will answer two or three questions I have to ask. At page 28 of the report giving a résumé of unemployment relief I find that the city of Sherbrooke was allotted a certain amount of money, and the proportions paid from the federal treasury and out of different moneys are given. At page 65 there is an item, at the bottom of the page, of money spent in Sherbrooke and taken out of unemployment money, but through the Public Works department. Why is this separation made? For what reason has money been spent through the Public Works department and also directly from the unemployment relief fund?

Mr. BENNETT: There were made out of the fund direct appropriations which were expended under the control of the Public Works department as public works. Then there were municipal works which were arranged between the province and the municipalities, to which the dominion contributed the proportions that are mentioned in the schedules. The division was arrived at in this way. In Nova Scotia, for instance, where there had been a storm that had swept over a considerable section of the coast, repairs had to be made to wharves, and matters of that kind. In the province of Quebec, as the hon. gentleman will recall, communications were sent to the members, and I am bound to say that if the suggestions had all been given effect to it would have been rather difficult to conduct government at all. But in a broad and general way Mr. Hereford tabulated them and then the department undertook the construction of the works in question, similar to those that are mentioned here, some of which could be completed by February 29, although others could not. The Department of the Interior had, for example, a grant with respect to national parks, and under railways and canals there were matters to which reference has been made this afternoon. The dividing line was arbitrarily fixed in one way but not in another; that is to say, such works as it has been the custom of the Public Works department or the Railway department or the Department of the Interior to undertake were undertaken by these departments in connection with unemployment relief, the object being to employ as many people as possible while work was being carried forward.

Mr. HOWARD: The Prime Minister has not exactly got what I am driving at. The money was allotted and the proportions were fixed to be contributed by the city of Sherbrooke, by the federal government and by the provincial authorities, and that money went through the channels of the provincial government; this government did not have it. It went through the provincial government, who approved of the works, and the city of Sherbrooke contributed its share and did the work. At the bottom of page 65 there are indicated certain works done directly from here. I am not going to discuss these items except where they concern my own county, but, as I say, at the bottom of page 65 there is this small item: "Sherbrooke—public building, $742." The point is this. That money was taken out of the public treasury or out of the unemployment fund; but why was it not shown in the estimates in the regular way, charged either to income or to capital through the Public Works department, and not from unemployment moneys? Who is to decide whether the money shall come out of the unemployment fund or through the regular channels of the Public Works department

Mr. BENNETT: I take it that the hon. gentleman, being a resident of Sherbrooke, will be able to determine whether or not that $742 was for repairs. With respect to a large number of these items, my memory is that reports were asked for from the resident engineers as to what works might reasonably be done to afford employment to casual labourers such as carpenters and men occupied similarly. This $742, if it is like the items I have in mind—the hon. gentleman will be able to speak with authority so far as this item is concerned—would represent work done for the purpose of affording such employment as was possible to men who sometimes might, for instance, repair a sewer or perhaps the outside premises in connection with a public building, or who might do painting. Painting is one bit of work that was done in many instances. The reason it is not in the estimates is that parliament was not in session at the time the money was expended or when the reports were made; but as I have indicated to the house on many occasions, these items are all represented by vouchers for expenditure, which the auditor general approves, as he does any other item of public expenditure. They could not well be in the estimates because they did not arise until afterwards. The supreme purpose was unemployment relief.

Mr. DONNELLY: At the last session the Prime Minister told us that in order to relieve distress in the dried-out area and in the agricultural districts of the west, the government proposed a $5,000,000 revolving credit, through a credit association under what is known as the Beatty scheme. Has that scheme been put into operation and has credit been extended to the western farmers? Perhaps the Prime Minister will inform the committee how much has been given out or whether that scheme is in operation at the present time. Is there a report?

Mr. BENNETT: As I told hon. gentlemen, it was not a governmental instrumentality; it was an instrumentality for the public to which the government had made a contribution. A contribution was made through the Canadian National Railways and contributions were made through the Canadian Pacific Railway, the banks and the trust companies to create the fund; but the government has nothing whatever to do with the direction or administration of it. I have not inquired into the matter within the last month or so, but the administration was in charge of a very excellent gentleman as general manager, who at one time, if my memory serves me, was general manager of the Weyburn Securities bank. As to the extent to which their operations were carried on, I cannot say, because I have not the information; it has not been given to us. It is not a governmental instrumentality.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to move a small amendment if the Prime Minister will accept it; if he does not, I will not press it. In the fifth line of section 1, I would suggest that the word "not" should be deleted and inserted instead after the word "deemed." As the section reads now, it is provided that the act "shall not be deemed to have expired" on a certain date. The dictionary meaning of the word "deemed" is thought, or considered, or assumed, or pretended. While "pretended" is an excessive stressing of the word, in this case I use it because it illustrates best my meaning. So that we are going to say now that we shall not pretend that the act has expired on a certain date. It is not pretence to say that the act expired because we all know that it expired at the time stated. That is, therefore, illogical, and is bad grammar. But we can pretend, or assume that it did not expire. I think it would be better if it read as follows:

The orders in council and regulations made thereunder shall be deemed not to have expired, etc.

Mr. BENNETT: The language of many statutes by custom and habit is not always the language that purists and stylists such as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) would choose. In this instance the law officer of this house has settled the terms in the manner indicated and I think there is sufficient authority in British statutes of a similar character for the use of the words in just that way.

Mr. HOWARD: Mr. Chairman, I had not finished my observations. The item which I mentioned and which appears at the bottom of page 65 covers repairs to a public building in Sherbrooke. I would direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that by the use of this method we will not be able to show the Canadian public a true picture of affairs for the next twelve months. I claim that that $742 should have been an expenditure of the Department of Public Works chargeable to income, such as is shown in the estimates or provided for in the contingent fund. Had this been done, the Auditor General's report for next year would show the expenditures for public works as so much, and the expenditures for unemployment as so much. Using this method more money will be shown as having been expended on unemployment than really was legitimately chargeable thereto, while the public works estimates will show a smaller expenditure than was actually the case.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman should realize that this was not an ordinary expenditure nor was it intended to be such; this is an expenditure of $742 to cover repairs to that building for one purpose and one only, to afford relief and employment. It does not rank with the ordinary expenditures for public works. All the safeguards with which the law surrounds expenditures are observed by the Auditor General and by the departmental officials, and I am quite sure that the minister in charge will be pleased to show to the hon. gentleman the original documents which refer to this expenditure. I cannot see that an expenditure thus made for a specific purpose can be taken as having an effect upon the general position of the country. It is regarded as money borrowed, and, as a matter of fact, it is part of the obligations of the country as a whole. If conditions improve, as we believe they must or else this country will not be worth even its loans, these obligations will be met out of income as they mature. We are thus enabled to transfer to income charges which ordinarily, but for the depression, would have been made against income.

Mr. HOWARD: That may be all right as far as it goes, but surely the Prime Minister does not think that when the city of Sherbrooke is spending $320,000 on unemployment, an expenditure of $742 will change the situation very much?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. HOWARD: That is just the point. I do not think a correct picture of the nation's affairs will be shown in the future. I do not doubt that vouchers can be produced for the money expended, but I do not like this way of doing things. I contend that this expenditure for repairs to the public building in Sherbrooke should have been chargeable to income or to the contingent fund, rather than to the unemployment fund.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, I desire to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister a matter which I mentioned last year. At that time I intimated that I would not trouble him with any particulars but I asked him to look into the question of the manner in which men were selected to receive the benefits of the various relief projects.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think the hon. gentleman asked me a question with respect to that matter.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, I did.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it was the Minister of Labour. I did not understand that I had undertaken any responsibility with respect to that, because obviously I would not be in position to furnish the information.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend was piloting the bill last year.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, last year.

Mr. RALSTON: I told my right hon. friend that I would not trouble him with details but I felt that the administration of the act should be looked into. At that time I had under my hand the particulars of a number of instances in which I felt that the money of the country was being wasted in so far as it was not reaching the needy and those for whom it was intended, and that others were being discriminated against. I wanted to give my right hon. friend and the Minister of Labour a chance to evolve some system whereby there would be a decent and proper distribution of labour. A few days ago I mentioned that the system had not proven, at least in the province of Nova Scotia, to be working out in the interests of those who are most in need.

I shall mention three or four instances to my right hon. friend, and I believe that he as a business man and as a man who intends to get the most for the country's money in the way of relief will realize that these instances indicate that this money is not being properly spent and is not reaching those for whom it was intended.

One case was brought to my attention in my own constituency where of those employed on the work, three were in good circumstances, four had bank accounts, and ten were unmarried men. There were several men with families in that neighbourhood who were in hard circumstances but who were refused work. I do not intend to put on record the reason for this refusal, but I will say that it was not that they did not need work. I do not believe that the Minister of Labour himself would approve of the reason given and that is why I ask for an investigation of some of these cases.

Another case was where one man employed on the work was well enough off to be able to lend money to the school section, while the only support of a widowed mother was refused work.

In another instance the son of a widowed mother of eight, the bread winner of the family, three other men each with five or six dependents, one with a family of nine and ten others were refused work while there were employed one man with a bank account, and an unmarried man whose father and brother were both permanent employees of the provincial government and had been working steadily.

In another instance where seven men were employed, no less than five had bank accounts, while others, in need were refused work.

I have received a return in connection with another case at lower Sandy Point in Shelburne county. In this instance the total expenditure was $2,996, one thousand dollars of which was unemployment relief money. The gentleman employed as foreman was a storekeeper, the owner of an automobile and the operator of a taxicab. He drew no less than $229 at the rate of $4.50 per day.

Mr. BENNETT: What sort of work was he doing?

Mr. RALSTON: He was acting as foreman, although he had had no experience with construction work. The reason he was employed, as hon. gentlemen can find out upon investigation, was that he was a good friend of the administration. Lots of men in this vicinity needed work but this storekeeper was selected as construction foreman.

Mr. RHODES: Is the hon. gentleman quite sure he is referring to work done under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act?

Mr. RALSTON: I am, yes.

Mr. RHODES: And not work done as ordinary public works?

Mr. RALSTON: I can let my hon. friend have the return, which is number 186. It shows that the total expenditure was $2,996, one thousand dollars of which was expended under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. This money was all spent together and I cannot tell where the one begins and the other ends. The foreman on this work where $1,000 of unemployment relief money was expended was a storekeeper. In addition to this, two of his sons were employed. One drew $99, and the other $110. That makes about $438 out of the $2,900, or nearly half of the $1,000 drawn by these three men.

In addition to that, another shopkeeper who was on the work, a Mr. Coffin, appears as a labourer and as a timber man and appears also for a team of oxen, and a gentleman who I understand is his son appears for a double team, and they between them get $340. So there is a total of $778 paid out to men who did not need unemployment relief at all, $778 out of a total vote of $2,900. Now if that situation exists generally, then it seems to me that we are not getting the benefit of the unemployment relief money and that it is not being devoted to the purpose for which it was voted by this parliament or which was intended by the government; for the government did make definite regulations that party and creed and religion and race was not in any way to interfere with a man's employment. But that has been allowed to interfere in connection with these cases and in connection with quite a number of others that I could cite.

I have not brought this matter to the attention of the committee without first having brought it to the attention of the Minister of Labour, not my hon. friend who now occupies that portfolio (Mr. Gordon), but his predecessor. I wrote to his predecessor last fall and gave him one of these instances and asked him to investigate the case. I also wrote to the director of unemployment in Nova Scotia and called his attention to the matter. The then Minister of Labour wrote me back that it was something of a minor case; that was the adjective he used. I wrote back rather strongly and intimated that it seemed to me that the government was not doing its duty and the Department of Labour was not doing its duty if it did not see that this money reached the people for whom it was intended, namely, the needy, and that nobody else but the Minister of Labour and the Department of Labour were responsible for seeing that this money reached this class of people. We had some correspondence about it, but the result was nil. Now those instances have occurred and they still remain uninvestigated.

This is what I ask of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I ask, first, that these cases be investigated. If the information which is given me is wrong I want to know it, but this is the information that comes to me, and I believe it to be correct. The information has come from a number of different sources which I believe to be reliable.

I ask, in the second place, that some method be adopted by the Minister of Labour, who is responsible for the administration of this money, whereby the selection of the unemployed will be made by people who have no political interest one way or the other, such as the overseers of the poor, the clergymen of the district, a Red Cross committee. Somebody who knows who are those most in need and who are most deserving, should be selected for the purpose of saying who shall go on these jobs; for I say to my right hon. friend, whether he thinks it is the case or not, that down in Nova Scotia in a great many cases the needy and the unemployed are waiting outside the doors of the Tory patronage committee to see if they are going to get put on the job or not, and men are being taken on just under the same old organization as operates in respect of ordinary federal public works. That is, a foreman is appointed, a friend of the party. He meets the patronage committee, and they decide who is going to get the work and who is not, and they are influenced in very large degree by the politics of the various applicants. I say it cannot be otherwise so long as my hon. friend the Minister of Labour leaves it that way. All the instructions that he can issue and all the orders in council that he can put through will not stop that sort of thing, because after all what you are trying to do, or should do, is not to deal with the matter here in Ottawa, but to reach the needy of that particular district and provide them with work and an opportunity for sustenance for themselves and their families. The people who are allowed to make the selections are in many cases not taking the instructions issued from Ottawa. So I ask my hon. friend in the first place to investigate, and in the second place to adopt a different system in regard to the distribution of these relief moneys and particularly in the selection of the men who are to receive this relief work.

I wish to deal with certain other questions.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Would it not necessarily happen in cases of the kind to which my hon. friend has referred, that the selections would be made by the officials of some municipal government?

Mr. RALSTON: No, not in the counties I know. I only wish that were true. The selections are made in the instances to which I have referred, I am informed, by the usual district patronage committee, the political patronage committee in the district.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is my hon. friend quite sure of the facts, or are his statements merely hearsay? He is a lawyer and he knows that the evidence which he has given to the committee would not for one minute be received in a court of law. It is a hearsay statement. I venture to say that the selection of these officials, if it is done in the same manner as it is done in New Brunswick, is made through the provincial government. In every case an outstanding man in the community is selected as foreman to take charge of the work. He will be a good man in whom the public will have confidence. The storekeeper to whom my hon. friend referred, if he has given a correct statement of the facts, and I am not questioning that at all, probably is a man who understands construction, and the fact that he runs a little country store does not preclude him from being capable of carrying on construction work of that character.

Mr. RALSTON: It means that other people who are just as well qualified and who need the work do not get the job.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may or may not be true. I am pointing out that being a storekeeper does not necessarily mean that he is not a proper man for carrying on that work. I venture to suggest that if the facts were known it would be found that the foreman was appointed through the provincial Department of Public Works, the municipalities in these cases not having anything to do with the employment of the men and not contributing anything.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will listen to me, the foreman is appointed on the recommendation of the district engineer for the federal Department of Public Works. Because I was frank enough to say that I would like to have an investigation, my hon. friend seems to think that I am not quite convinced of the soundness of the case I am presenting.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not say that.

Mr. RALSTON: What I say and what I said before is that I received my information from a number of different sources which I believe to be reliable, and when I state that according to the information a storekeeper is selected for work of this kind and that men with bank accounts in different places in the constituency I represent are being put on the work, I say that the burden is on my right hon. friend to have an investigation and find out who is making these selections, because the men selected and given the work are not the men for whom the money was voted at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the hon. gentleman said that the district engineer made the recommendations.

Mr. RALSTON: I know that the district engineer made the recommendations, but of course he made them on the recommendations of the local patronage committee. That is what he always does.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what he did when you were minister.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly he did, and I am not making any objection to that system when you are dealing with ordinary federal public works. I have never objected to that system in the case of ordinary federal public works. I have taken my medicine, if you like to put it that way, and when I have been administering patronage people have been selected who have been favourable to the government. But that is not what we are dealing with here. We are dealing with relief to the needy. The Prime Minister stated so himself. He said that the relief of the needy is what we are after. Under these circumstances you cannot have the same system that prevails under what is known as the ordinary political patronage system. That is what I am saying. I say to my right hon. friend that so long as you use the ordinary organization, with the local district political patronage committee selecting the foreman, and the foreman consulting with the committee to find out what men he should put on the pay-roll and what men he should not, you cannot have a fair administration of the act.

Mr. HACKETT: Is the method followed in Nova Scotia any different from that followed in the other provinces?—in Quebec, for instance, where the municipalities alone select the men upon whom these moneys are to be spent, and by whom the work is to be done?

Mr. RALSTON: I have never heard in my constituency of the municipalities making any selection of that kind whatsoever.

Mr. HACKETT: Is not the work done by the municipalities?

Mr. RALSTON: No. The work is either direct federal public work or work contributed to by the provincial and federal administrations. I know of no instance where the work has been municipal. When my right hon. friend has that machinery he cannot expect it to work properly. There would be no use having the most pious regulations in the world. Therefore I submit he has to revise his method and select some sort of impartial committee, or the overseers of the poor, or a citizens' committee. I wrote to the provincial director of unemployment, Mr. Spicer, and made that suggestion to him. I said, "Get the services of the overseers of the poor; they know the poor and those who need work. They are the people to make selections. Or, if that is not satisfactory, let the Red Cross or a local citizens' committee do the work." He wrote back and said he did not think—

Mr. SPENCE: Get a good Liberal.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, if we had one or two Liberals out of ten or twenty it would not be so bad. I assure hon. members opposite that even some of the Liberals are needy. I made the suggestion to Mr. Spicer and he wrote back saying he was not sure that the men suggested by overseers of the poor would be the best for the work. I assure you, Mr. Chairman it is better to spend unemployment relief money for those who are needy even though some might not do as efficient work rather than for those who do not need assistance.

Mr. HEAPS: What kind of work was it?

Mr. RALSTON: Work on breakwaters, wharves and roads.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I know I should not interrupt my hon. friend but I should like to ask what portion of the relief moneys in the province of Nova Scotia is expended on wharves and breakwaters such as he has suggested? I should like to ask this further question: Is it not true that 97 per cent of the foremen appointed by engineers in Halifax responsible for the construction of the breakwaters were appointed by a Liberal administration? Is that not so?

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, shall we return to the question before us?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I should like an answer.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know how much money was spent on wharves and breakwaters. The minister may be able to tell my hon. friend. I should think that in the western end of Nova Scotia about $50,000 has been spent on wharves and breakwaters.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I want to tell my hon. friend that this government spent $148,000 in the constituency represented by my hon. friend.

Mr. RALSTON: I have a return in my room. I am not going to bandy words with my hon. friend, but I assure him he is wrong. With regard to the appointment of federal engineers I must say I do not know whether any have been appointed lately or not.

Mr. BENNETT: They are appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. RALSTON: I do say that in our district the recommendations to the engineers are made by local committees. With that machinery we cannot get along very well, so far as the administration of these funds is concerned. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour should see that the situation is remedied.

Mr. GORDON: The situation which has been spread upon the record by the hon. member, if true or based upon facts, would of course raise great anxiety anywhere in Canada. It is strange, however, that the Department of Labour has never received a single complaint, even from the hon. member himself.

Mr. RALSTON: I am surprised at that statement. If the minister had ever read his files he would know something about it.

Mr. GORDON: I do know.

Mr. RALSTON: He knows nothing about it.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. GORDON: You are in Montreal, and not in the Department of Labour.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend will find a file of his own predecessor setting out specifically one instance, and adding that the instance described was but a sample. A further request was made that the then minister make an investigation.

Mr. GORDON: Instead of sending a sample why did you not send the substance?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has made one statement which has proven to be wrong. During the last day or two he has shown a lamentable lack of knowledge of the working of his department.

Mr. BENNETT: A very unfair statement.

Mr. RALSTON: He would have done better to have stayed in the house and listened to the discussion than to run around the corridors, as he has been doing.

Mr. STEVENS: Very small, cheap.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend got up and made the statement that I had not made a single complaint, when the fact is that I had expressly stated before and repeat it today that I had made complaints. There are available about four letters which passed between the predecessor of the present minister and myself. Why does he take that stand? Simply out of ignorance, that is all—nothing else.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Getting nasty again.

Mr. RALSTON: In view of the fact that complaints have been made, will the minister have investigations made? If he finds that my contentions are correct, will he take steps to correct the mistake and have selections made by some body capable of selecting men for these different works? I wait for the minister's answer.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member does not need to wait long. I have had something to do with the administration of the act, and for the past two years have worked in conjunction with many bodies throughout Canada. I am not going to suggest mistakes have not been made. Owing to the fact, however, that my hon. friend lives in the city of Montreal, far away from his riding, and his information is purely hearsay, I do not feel inclined to have investigations made.

Mr. RALSTON: That is about the finest exhibition of shifty work I have witnessed.

An hon. MEMBER: You should know.

Mr. RALSTON: I have given my hon. friend the facts. I have been in my own constituency, and talked with the men who gave the information to me. My contentions are on record in the department over which my hon. friend has control. However, if he is quite content with it—

An hon. MEMBER: Give us the names.

Mr. GORDON: Yes, let us have the names.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister is not interested in them, at all.

Mr. GORDON: Yes, I am quite interested.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the Minister of Public Works wishes to make a few comments.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to reply to some of the statements made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). I wish to assure him that when starting out on this program to relieve the unemployed the government and every member of it kept in mind the primary object of having the work conducted in every case so as to provide the largest possible measure of relief to those in need. I think my hon. friend will admit we had no easy task, and that at times it is impossible to conduct work of this kind in a way which will be absolutely fair and satisfactory to all parties concerned. We agree also that sometimes for some motive or another complaints are made which are not well founded. Sometimes the motives are political, and sometimes they are motives equally unsatisfactory. I wish to assure my hon. friend that from the beginning the Department of Public Works and the officials connected with it have realized their responsibility. We started out with the fixed determination that as far as we could control the situation the work should be given to those who most needed it. I am not aware that my hon. friend sent to the department any complaints whatever with respect to work in his constituency. If he did, such complaints were immediately investigated, and if any abuses were found they were corrected —not only in his constituency, but in every other constituency from which any complaints came.

From the beginning the government has made a sincere and honest, and, in large measure, a very successful effort to meet the unemployment situation in the administration of these works. I am going to read to my hon. friend a letter that early in the season was sent out from the Department of Public Works to all the district engineers. It is dated November 25, 1931:

Dear Sir,—

It has, in a few instances, been reported to the department that the spirit and intent of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, in connection with employment of labour, have not been fully lived up to. The purpose of providing funds from which works would be carried out was to give employment to the needy and this was to be so arranged that the funds available for payment of labour would be distributed as fairly as possible among those in the locality where work was being carried on who were known to be in need, and in the first instance to those who were also the support of dependents.

Employment was to be given to parties in the above category regardless of political affiliations, race or creed.

The department wishes to reiterate that employment is to be distributed as fairly as possible among the people in the locality where money is being expended by giving employment to those in need of funds to sustain their dependents and themselves, and who have not other resources to carry them over the present period.

Employment is to be offered regardless of any political or religious affiliations, or racial stock.

In order that employment may be distributed amongst the needy as fairly as possible, the authorities in the locality who are in a position to know the circumstances of heads of families, and who can be most relied on to furnish a list of parties in need, are to be consulted, and the men are to be engaged in rotation for a few days at a time.

You will be expected to see, as far as possible, that the spirit and intent of parliament in granting the funds for this purpose, and of the government in allotting the funds, are met.

Kindly let me know what your procedure is in assuring this result.

That letter on the instructions of the head of the department was sent by the chief engineer to every district engineer. We have many letters of approval and commendation as to the way in which the works have been carried on. As I have said, any complaint that came in was immediately investigated. In some cases foremen were suspended, in other cases they were dismissed, and in every instance a sincere attempt was made to rectify anything that was not in keeping with the spirit of this legislation and with the tenor of these instructions.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister will admit that his orders were not always obeyed, then.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In some instances they were not, and, as my hon. friend said, in his constituency where they were not obeyed the conditions were very speedily rectified.

Mr. POULIOT: Was a copy of that excellent letter sent to every Conservative member and to every defeated Tory candidate?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No. This is a letter of instructions to the responsible officers of the department—the district engineers—and it meant just what it said.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) not only wrote Mr. Spicer, who under the Department of Labour was the director of expenditures under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, but he also wrote to myself, and I was at pains to take up direct with Mr. Spicer the question which he raised in his letter. I am extremely sorry that not knowing that this stage of the subject would come under discussion this afternoon I am at the moment unable to place my hands on the answers I received and the statistics I have with respect to the investigations I made. But I am in a position to say this, that in every one of those cases investigation was made, and the information which came to me was that these works with respect to which my hon. friend was complaining that his friends were not being employed in as large numbers as they ought to be, were direct public works, which are entirely different, as my hon. friend will know—

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly.

Mr. RHODES: —from relief works as such. Furthermore, my hon. friend in his statement a few moments ago said that the foremen in question were appointed by the district engineer of the Department of Public Works at Halifax. If that is so, it is evident upon its face that they were direct public works.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh no.

Mr. RHODES: Otherwise the appointments in question would come under the direction of the Department of Labour upon the recommendation of the representative of the Department of Labour in Nova Scotia.

But let me say this to my hon. friend. Although I have not the records before me, I know something of political divisions in that province, I know something of the political atmosphere down there, and speaking from memory, but I think with correctness, I may say my hon. friend was the only member from Nova Scotia who wrote to me by way of complaint with respect to expenditures in that province. Furthermore, let me say to him that his complaint arises in the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth. I hope the fact that that is the only constituency from which at the moment I have had complaints of any kind whatsoever does not cast any reflection upon the character of the political administration carried on there when my hon. friend was minister. But the fact of the matter is this, his are the only complaints I have had from that province. On the other hand, I have had numerous complaints from political friends of my own that they were not getting opportunities for employment, and they presented upon the face of it a very good case indeed why they ought to be employed. They complained very bitterly that a large number of Liberals could get employment.

But to my mind the best evidence upon the whole that expenditures in that province were based upon unemployment and need, irrespective of the political affiliations of those who were employed, is found in the circumstance that the Halifax Chronicle—which I may say is a rock-ribbed, thick-and-thin Liberal newspaper, the like of which is not to be found in any other part of Canada—sent a reporter down through the province to investigate expenditures upon public works, and amongst other places, he visited the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth. I am sorry I have not under my hand—if the debate proceeds beyond to-day I will produce it—the statement in that newspaper by its reporter that he found the work had been distributed with absolute fairness so far as the political complexion of the people employed was concerned. My hon. friend is too wise to attempt to argue from the particular to the general, but in effect that is what he is trying to do when he cites the case involving some $200. Let us admit that in the case in point men who should not have been employed were employed. I submit that this proves nothing in view of the fact that there was authorized for the province of Nova Scotia, not only under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act but through direct public works, the expenditure of no less than $1,600,000, the larger part of which was either expended or in process of being expended. As my hon. friend knows, a large part of that amount was spent on highways under the direct supervision of the province, which made a contribution. I may say to my hon. friend that I have yet to receive one complaint from the province of Nova Scotia that this work was not fairly allocated and divided without regard to the political views of the men employed.

I would say this: If my hon. friend has no better evidence with which to bolster up his assertion that money was improperly expended in Nova Scotia than the evidence he has brought forward this afternoon—if it can be called evidence—then he has made a very poor case indeed. I submit that in all fairness to my hon. friend. I think in justice not only to the provincial government but to this government, with regard to expenditures which were made by the Department of Public Works, it is only fair that I should make this general statement in reply to my hon. friend.

Mr. SHORT: As my constituency joins that of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, I am somewhat familiar with conditions in that part of the province. Perhaps I know a little more about those conditions than the hon. member knows, because I spend a great deal more time among my constituents than he spends among his.

I had some $56,000 of this unemployment relief money expended on public works in my constituency, and the only complaint I heard was that too many Liberals and not enough Conservatives were obtaining employment. The trouble with my hon. friend is that his constituency has been Liberal almost constantly since confederation, and a Conservative never obtained a single dollar of public money that was spent in that riding. The Liberals have been so accustomed to spending public money that when a Conservative gets a few dollars they think it does not belong to him, and that is the whole difficulty.

The Minister of Finance mentioned the Halifax Chronicle, which sent a reporter around to the different works to see how the money was being spent. I hold in my hand a report that appeared in the Halifax Chronicle, and every Liberal in the province of Nova Scotia swears by that paper whether it is right or wrong. This article refers to one of the public works undertaken in my constituency, and it states:

> Public wharf at Weymouth is completed. Four hundred foot wharf costing $15,000 built entirely from local labour unemployment aid.
> Weymouth, February 5.—The public wharf built at Weymouth North during the late autumn and winter under the unemployment relief work act is now completed. The wharf which is 400 feet long was built under the supervision of Captain H. B. Fitzgerald of Weymouth North,—

I may say that Captain Fitzgerald is also a storekeeper. My hon. friend mentioned that a storekeeper had been acting as foreman. Captain Fitzgerald is a storekeeper, but previously he was a ship builder and he is thoroughly competent. I assume that the man in my hon. friend's constituency is the same type. Many of these men are retired captains who built vessels in their day, and who are familiar with carpentering work of that kind. The article goes on:

> —and was of great help to the people of that district who had no employment. It gave work to about 100 men, fishermen, farmers, labourers —regardless of politics or religious creeds. The men worked in shifts with about twenty-three men to a shift; besides the work on the wharf itself, the getting of timber and lumber also gave employment to the nearby mills in the getting and sawing of it.

Further it states:

> Practically the whole amount was spent in this place, the money for iron for the piers was spent in Digby county.

I quote this article in order to show that as far as work in my constituency was concerned, the foremen were instructed by the district engineer to give employment to as many persons who needed it as they possibly could, regardless of politics, religious views or anything else. It seems very peculiar that in the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth, which adjoins mine, there should be so many complaints. As I say, I never received a single complaint except that too many Liberals and not enough Conservatives were receiving employment.

Mr. VENIOT: I'll bet you fixed that.

Mr. SHORT: No, I did not; I am not such a dyed-in-the-wool politician as my hon. friend. Every man in my constituency got a square deal.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, yes! !

Mr. SHORT: This refers to only one of the federal works carried on in my constituency. The men were employed in shifts, twenty-three men to the shift, and over 100 men were given employment in that way. Probably another fifty men were kept busy getting out timber, ballast and supplies of that nature. This principle applied to every undertaking in my constituency; I visited each one personally and know whereof I speak. I am speaking from personal knowledge; my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth is speaking from hearsay, which he gets from party politicians in the different places where work is proceeding.

Mr. RALSTON: In the first place, I am not taking the investigation of the Halifax Chronicle, as my friend the minister calls it, one way or the other; I am bringing to the attention of a responsible minister the fact that on the information I have—and I can give the names of the specific works—the order in council has been seriously violated in respect of the men who are receiving the benefit of this money. I do not care whether or not in Digby county there is a single example, but I am rather surprised at the minister when he says he has not heard of any complaints. If he had read the Chronicle as much as he professes he would have seen a number of letters from men all over the province complaining very bitterly of the fact that they were deprived of work because of their politics.

Mr. SHORT: That was not on public works; that was on highways.

Mr. RALSTON: I remember distinctly a letter from a shore fisherman at Arichat, a man with twelve children, who complained that he was told "You want relief work now. You were so smart; you voted against us and prevented your women from coming to the polls in my car." That was in the constituency of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and that letter appeared in the Chronicle. It is rather extraordinary that it escaped my hon. friend's attention.

I am not concerned with the matter of the Chronicle; I am concerned with the fact that in this constituency there are these instances coming to my attention of people who did not need unemployment relief half as much as their neighbours needed it, but who got that relief while others were deprived of it. The ministry can do as they like about it, but I ask them to investigate that condition, I say to the Minister of Finance that the only suggestion I have heard of any investigation made by Mr. Spicer was one instance, in which the best he could say was that all the men employed on the work were those who previously had been unemployed. That has nothing to do with the case. There are many men worth millions who are unemployed, but that does not entitle them to unemployment relief money. My point is that those most in need were not getting the work, and that aspect of the case does not seem to have been met. My hon. friend says he has looked into the matter; I appreciate that. But since he did look into the matter he might have given me the benefit of Mr. Spicer's report in connection with it. This is the first I have heard of his having made a report. I am appealing once more to the ministry, and if it is the Minister of Public Works I am delighted to take his assurance, because I understood it was the Minister of Labour who had to do with furnishing the work. I understood that the Minister of Public Works was the one actually doing the job, the mechanic, if I might put it that way with deference, although the people to be selected were necessarily the wards of the Department of Labour. That, I should think, would be the chain of responsibility. If the Minister of Public Works will look into the matter I am perfectly satisfied that his investigation will be a fair one. Will the ministry give me that assurance, that they will look into these various cases to which I have referred? Surely I am not going to be expected to bring affidavits when I give specific instances in the constituencies. When I point out that there is this complaint, surely the ministry of its own motion will make investigation without anything further. I do not have to come and prove the case here. I am not acting as prosecutor at all; I am simply bringing the matter to the attention of the ministry and asking them to investigate it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): So far as I recall, my hon. friend has not disclosed the names of the places where this work has been done. If he will give the names of the places and write a letter giving the substance of the complaint I will see that the matter is investigated.

2. If so: (a) at whose written request was this inquiry granted; (b) was said written request accompanied by many affidavits; (c) if so, what is the date, and the name of the person whose signature is attached to each affidavit; (d) on what date was each affidavit received by the Postmaster General; (e) on what date did the Postmaster General order the inquiry?

LA RICHARDIÈRE, QUE.—POSTMASTER

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Did the Postmaster General, since August, 1930, order an inquiry in connection with charges of political partisanship lodged against the postmaster at La Richardière?

2. If so: (a) at whose written request was this inquiry granted; (b) was said written request accompanied by many affidavits; (c) if so, what is the date, and the name of the person whose signature is attached to each affidavit; (d) on what date was each affidavit received by the Postmaster General; (e) on what date did the Postmaster General order the inquiry?

*PROVINCIAL-FEDERAL ACCOUNTS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What was the total amount derived from each province for the last five years to date, by all the departments of the Dominion government?

2. What is the total amount paid to each province for the last five years to date, by all the departments of the Dominion government?

Mr. BENNETT: The question which the hon. gentleman asks I submit should be dropped. It is impossible to tell what sums have been derived from each province for the last five years, and by what department of the dominion government. It is possible to ascertain, as is known to every hon. member in this house, sums collected at the customs houses and income tax offices in each of the provinces. Obviously, however, imports at cities like Montreal, Quebec, St. John, Halifax, or other cities at the seaboard do not always show their destinations, and questions which have been asked in times past in this connection have not produced results. The Bureau of Statistics have not been able to get the information. It is not a question which the government could accurately answer, and an inaccurate answer would be worse than none at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question 15 dropped.

DESCHAILLONS, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. VERVILLE:

1. Was the postmaster of Deschaillons, county of Lotbiniere, dismissed, and for what reasons?

2. Who replaced him, and on whose recommendation?

3. Was an inquiry held, and by whom?

4. Did the department receive favourable reports relating to the dismissed postmaster, and from whom?

5. Did the department receive the application of Mrs. A. B. Dubois?

6. Was this application taken into consideration?

Mr. SAUVE:

1 and 3. Representations were received to the effect that the postmaster at Deschaillons was also an employee of the marine department. It was ascertained that he was signal agent and semaphore keeper at Deschaillons at an annual salary of $1,320. As the total remuneration attached to the post office amounted to about $2,000, and both were full time positions, the postmaster was required to abandon one. He expressed his preference for the position under the marine department but refused to resign as postmaster. Action was therefore taken toward a change of postmaster.

2. Mrs. D. B. Lauzé, appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

4. A petition was received bearing 375 signatures.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BILL

Mr. REID:

1. Has the Dominion government any knowledge of a shipping bill or bills which may be taken up at any time by the United States House of Representatives or which are before the Senate of the United States the effect of which would prevent Canadian ships from engaging in trade between two United States ports, to cover round trips from United States ports to adjacent foreign ports such as to points in British Columbia or Halifax or West Indian ports on the Atlantic?

2. If so, has the Canadian government made any protest or any recommendations to the United States government regarding the detrimental effect such proposed bill or bills would have on Canadian shipping, if put into effect?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. The Canadian government has been kept fully informed of such bills by the Canadian Minister to the United States.

2. The Canadian government has made representations to the government of the United States with respect to the matter.

PREMIUMS ON GUARANTEED BONDS

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo):

1. How much has been paid by each department of the government as premiums on guarantee bonds in each of the years 1929, 1930, and 1931?

2. What losses, if any, have been sustained by each department of the government on account of defalcations during the years 1929, 1930, and 1931?

2. Who acted as census enumerator in each municipality of the county of St. Hyacinthe-Rouville, and what amounts did each person receive for his services?

Mr. STEVENS: This order for return is now tabled.

COMOX-ALBERNI, CENSUS

Mr. NEILL:

What are the names and addresses of all parties in the district of Comox-Alberni employed in the organization, management and taking of the 1931 census in that district, showing in the case of each individual: (a) whether a returned man or not; (b) amount received for his personal remuneration; (c) amount paid him for expenses; also showing the basis on which remuneration and expenses were allowed in each case; and where the use of cars or boats were paid for by the government, the names of the parties to whom payment was made in each case, the amount paid, and the rate allowed?

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when the report of Sir Alexander Gibb will be tabled? I see the newspapers have received information which the house has not yet received.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The second part of the report was received a day or two ago, and my officials are making a synopsis of it. It is a very lengthy report, and I hope to be in a position Monday or Tuesday next to table it. As to the reports appearing in the newspapers I can say only that the house will have to judge whether or not they are accurate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Are they?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think they are entirely accurate.

FORECLOSURE OF FARM MORTGAGES

APPEARANCE OF DOCTOR D. A. MACGIBBON BEFORE AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE OF MANITOBA LEGISLATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to the correctness of an article appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 29, 1932. It is stated here that Mr. D. A. MacGibbon, who is a member of the Board of Grain Commissioners has been refused permission by the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce in Ottawa to appear before a committee of the Manitoba legislature which is making an inquiry regarding possible methods of debt adjustment for farmers who are threatened with foreclosures. If that statement is true, is it done with the authority of the minister, and why?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The statement is not strictly correct. It is broached in terms that are calculated to be misleading and to create controversy. The facts are these: Doctor MacGibbon was asked to appear before that committee and discuss a certain resolution which was presented to this house. Doctor MacGibbon wired and asked if it was thought desirable for him to appear and discuss the matter. The answer given to Doctor MacGibbon, which I think coincided entirely with his own view in the matter, was that it was undesirable for him, a public servant holding a quasi-judicial position to be involved in a matter which was of a controversial, or might be of a controversial, character, and which certainly was purely provincial. It was my judgment, the judgment of the deputy minister and I think that of Doctor MacGibbon himself, that it would be better for him not to participate in a matter of that character.

IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

PARTICIPATION OF IRISH FREE STATE—DATE OF OPENING JULY 21

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I wish to direct the attention of the house to a newspaper report which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of March 29, 1932, under the heading:

Will Bar Free State At Empire Conference If Oath Is Abandoned
Consensus Of Opinion Among Government Officials At Ottawa Signal For Boycott

The article is as follows:

If the De Valera government persists in refusing the oath of allegiance to the King of England, officials of this dominion will refuse to permit the Irish Free State to sit at the council table of empire in Ottawa next July.

This was the informal consensus of opinion among high officials of the Canadian government here to-day. No official statement was issued by the government, but everywhere the De Valera attitude is a subject of discussion.

Canada's refusal to grant the Irish Free State a position at the imperial conference on inter-empire trade would, in effect, be the signal for a boycott of Ireland by all other parties to the conference.

As the Irish Free State's economic existence at present depends almost entirely on its relationship with the units of the empire, the sentiment of officials expressed here to-day is of great importance to the De Valera government.

It is admitted that an oath given without sincerity carries little or no weight, as an earnest of fulfilment, but repudiation of a solemn agreement arouses no enthusiasm in Canada, which could have saved millions within the last six months by repudiating Canadian gold obligations payable in New York.

That purports to have been sent from Ottawa and to indicate the opinion of high officials of the Canadian government. In fairness to the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs, and as a duty to the Dominion of Canada, I can say only this, that the correspondent of the Toronto Daily Star made some inquiries from Doctor Skelton who informed him, definitely and positively, that there was no warrant for any such statement being made. I can do no more than say that the appearance of reports such as the one I have just read emanating from Ottawa in the terms in which the alleged news is stated is calculated to do a very great injury to this country, and to prejudice inter-imperial relations.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian government fixed July 18 as an appropriate date upon which the Imperial economic conference might open. Communications were received from various dominions of the British Empire, including the United Kingdom, agreeing to that date. It was subsequently learned however that steamship connections were not all that might be desired for the opening on July 18, and accordingly on March 17 cables were despatched inquiring whether or not July 21 would be a satisfactory date, inquiring as to the numbers comprising the delegations and indicating that Canada would be the host to those members who comprised the delegations. On March 18 Australia replied indicating the date would be entirely satisfactory. On March 23 the United Kingdom, South Africa, and New Zealand replied in the same sense. On March 30 Southern Rhodesia replied in the same sense, their representatives having a special position at the proposed conference. This morning a message was received, dated to-day, from Dublin reading as follows:

No. 3. Reference to your telegram economic conference. Many thanks for your very kind offer of hospitality which we accept with much pleasure. The change of dates suits our convenience. The number of our delegates and staff will be approximately twelve.

Minister for External Affairs,
Irish Free State.

I need hardly remind the house that Mr. De Valera is the Minister for External Affairs of the Irish Free State. That completes the answers from the dominions of the empire including the United Kingdom. From Newfoundland a letter was received.

I make this statement in order to undo as quickly as possible any injury that may be done to the position of this country by reason of the despatch to which I have just referred.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUANCE ACT, 1932—CONSIDERATION OF BILL

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 24, respecting unemployment and farm relief—The Prime Minister—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, last night I mentioned that I had another matter to bring to the attention of the committee. It has to do with work in one particular locality. I may say there are other works which are probably equally important, but I have received special representations with regard to this particular work, and I conveyed them both to my friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) and my friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart). Those representations had to do with the construction of a breakwater at Lower East Pubnico in Yarmouth county. It is represented that about forty families would be benefited by this work being undertaken. It was also represented that the work was very much needed on behalf of the fishermen. I need hardly remind the committee that wharves and breakwaters are essential to the carrying on of the fishing industry; they are not only a convenience, they are a necessity from the point of view both of commerce and safety. I would urge my friend the Minister of Labour and my friend the Minister of Public Works once more to look into the matter of the construction of a work at that point, primarily to furnish employment, but also—and this is very important—to furnish needed facilities for the carrying on of fishing operations.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman, yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Stevens) with respect to the grading of Garnet wheat. I notice he is not in his seat. I should like to direct the attention of the government particularly to this question. To-day is the last day of March, to-morrow will be the first day of April—spring is close at hand. When putting my question yesterday I read part of a letter —one of many I had received—regarding changing some of the grades of wheat. As the government is aware, large numbers of farmers are expecting seed from the Saskatchewan relief commission. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) —because I think he himself made the observation some time before the house met—that it would not be advisable this year to change the grades of wheat. For instance, in the answer I got from the Minister of Trade and Commerce he said:

> I understand that the committee will be called on Tuesday next, and that Mr. Ramsay, the chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners, and others who have been making a study will attend before the agricultural committee so that the whole matter may be given careful consideration.

What the minister is talking of there is the possibility of creating a special grade for Garnet wheat. As I pointed out yesterday, many farmers in various parts of the western provinces are growing this wheat, and the creation of a new grade for it would penalize those farmers. Therefore in view of the close proximity of seeding time I would urge upon the government that no steps be taken this year to create a special grade for Garnet wheat, but that the investigation be continued for another year, when the agricultural committee will be in a better position to suggest to the government what should be done in this regard.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. Minister of Labour, first, what is the number of white collar unemployed in this country; second, what he intends to do for their relief? He does not answer. Is he asleep? The previous Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) had powerful brains in a fragile body, but his successor (Mr. Gordon) is his antithesis. On one occasion Paul Bourget received one of his colleagues of the French Academy and put him up for the night. The next morning he knocked at his guest's door at nine o'clock and was answered sharply: "Don't disturb me, I am working." At eleven thirty he knocked again, and receiving no answer opened the door, when he found his guest snoring gently. He said, "Ah, my friend, you are over-working yourself." Another gentleman, a former provincial minister afterwards a member of the federal government, was attending a dinner with a person having the serious looks of the Minister of Labour, a guest was asked by a friend, "I wonder what that most serious man is thinking about?" The reply came, "Don't worry. He is thinking about nothing!"

I am weary of hearing the Prime Minister repeatedly saying he and his colleagues are working twenty hours a day. Of course, it may be all right so far as the Prime Minister is concerned, for it may be taken as a form of punishment for his having centred upon himself public opinion during the last election when from every platform throughout the country he declared, "I will do this, I will do that for you." It was repeated everywhere. But I do not think the Prime Minister should complain. There are ten million people in this country. Suppose two million of these are electors. Well, if each one of those electors wrote to the Prime Minister for information about something, asking, for instance, who was the Minister of Labour, he would receive two million letters a year—a large number. The Prime Minister is the most decent of men. But the working hours of the ministers cannot differ greatly from what they were when the Liberals were in power. I never heard my leader when he was Prime Minister saying anything about working twenty hours a day. He was simply following the example of his great predecessor, Laurier. Sir Wilfrid was astir early in the morning, from eight thirty to nine thirty he dictated correspondence to his private secretary, then he proceeded to the east block to receive callers, at eleven o'clock attended council, at three o'clock he was in the house, and at night he also attended here.

I am getting tired of this humbug about ministers overworking. They are working so much that no one knows what they are really doing—they are always at work. There are many persons who might come to the help of my hon. friend the Prime Minister. It is a very good thing to keep their minds busy because then they have no time for wicked thoughts about putting people out of work.

Let us take the ministers one by one, and first we will consider my genial friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman). He knows we like him and he does very well as a minister. I congratulate him, but he has less work than his predecessors had, because Canadian imports have decreased. If he has more work it is because he increases the tariff either over his own signature or by orders in council, and he is wrong in doing that. I should like to spare him that sort of work. If he did not do that he would have enough time in which to come to the assistance of the dumb Minister of Labour.

Now let us take my genial friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy). He knows we like him also, but he has not as much work as my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) had when he was Minister of the Interior, because then the federal government had control of the natural resources of the west. Now these have been handed over to the provinces, and my hon. friend has more time at his disposal. If he has not more time it is because he is bothered by callers who wish to be appointed Indian agents or something of that kind.

Now let us take my good friend the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). I congratulate him upon the fact that the Prime Minister has selected him as his adviser in financial matters. That is a great compliment to my hon. friend, and I am sure he will do very well. But with the revenue of the country falling he has much less to look after. I know he has a good deal of work in looking after conversion loans and that sort of thing, but that is because of the condition of the country. He has less to do than Mr. Robb had, for instance, or than Mr. Dunning had. He might have some time in which to come to the assistance of our silent friend the Minister of Labour.

Then there is my genial friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé). He is doing very well; he increased the stamp tax so that now we pay three cents instead of two for a letter. But he is doing very well, except when he is dismissing postmasters. He wastes too much time listening to the complaints of sour-mouthed defeated candidates who want postmasters all over the country dismissed for this and that reason. If he looked after the general administration of his department, without wasting time in dismissing so many good people, he would not be obliged to work twenty hours a day. He might do his work in eight hours, and in the twelve hours saved he might come to the assistance of the Minister of Labour.

Then there is my good friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). I think he does very well as a minister, and that is the best answer to the argument raised by himself and his colleague the Postmaster General when they were in the Quebec assembly. Then they complained of the fact that the Minister of Labour was a lawyer and not a working man, but here we have them sitting in council next to a lawyer who is Minister of Labour. I must not forget my friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), who is doing very well also. I have said that to him very often, and I am in earnest.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not build the station.

Mr. POULIOT: The station is all right now. I am dealing with a stationary minister, whose tongue is stationed in his mouth so that it does not work. I mean the Minister of Labour; I am not referring to the Minister of Public Works, for whom I have great admiration. Hon. gentlemen opposite should be very quiet; the next time I hear any interruption they will get it quick.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I would ask the hon. gentleman, who knows the rules, to observe them. We are discussing section one of this bill.

Mr. POULIOT: I think my discussion is in point, because I am dealing with the members of the cabinet and pointing out that they have much more spare time than the ministers in the last government had, and I am suggesting that they might use that spare time in assisting the Minister of Labour. In any case, I have nearly completed my argument.

I come now to my friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). He cannot complain of overwork, because he does not have charge of the administration of the railways; he just supervises it as his predecessors did. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) also is doing very well, but he is doing no more than was done by my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) when he was Minister of Justice; he is doing no more than was done by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, Hon. Edward Blake or any other minister who held that position. They did not work twenty hours a day.

Mr. COTNAM: How is Mr. Taschereau?

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Taschereau has set a very good example to the federal government by not reducing the salaries of the civil servants of Quebec, and he would not waste a lot of money in order to bring a man like Mr. Ferguson from England to give evidence at the expense of this country.

Mr. COTNAM: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: If you suffer from constipation of the brain so that you can only interrupt instead of making your own speeches I commend you to the Minister of Health, who may be able to recommend a laxative.

Hon. gentlemen occupying the treasury benches say they are working twenty hours a day. Why do they not work only eight hours a day and bring in some of the unemployed to assist them in the direction of the affairs of state?

As a matter of fact, however, the ministers are not working twenty hours a day; only one hon. gentleman says he works twenty hours a day, and I believe him. But, Mr. Chairman, he has to work twenty hours a day simply because he is unfair to the other ministers: he does not allow them to share his work. I am sure they would be ready to shoulder some of the hon. gentleman's responsibilities. The Postmaster General, for example, would no doubt be pleased to help the Minister of Labour and to relieve him of some of his burdens; so would the Minister of Public Works; so would the Minister of Marine; and so would the Minister of Finance, who has to hand over to him the money which is spent in the provinces. The Minister of Labour—I refer, of course, to the present minister's predecessor—was clever enough to manage matters in such a way as to have some freedom to do as he liked. May I read what he said to me in answer to a letter which I addressed to him on September 3, 1931:

> It has accidentally come to my attention that this department has received from you personally eleven letters and one telegram, all within the last two days, with reference to unemployment works proposed in your riding.

It was extraordinary to that famous, excellent and efficient Minister of Labour, the present hon. gentleman's predecessor, that within the space of two days his department should receive eleven letters and one telegram from me, thus disturbing his peace of mind. He could not conceive that any man could write eleven letters and one telegram in two days. As I say, it was to him something extraordinary.

And I was forgetting my dear friend and old classmate, the hon. member for Dorchester

(Mr. Gagnon), who sits just as quiet as any minister—as quiet as that other image the Minister of Labour. Is he the minister's adviser? Let the Minister of Labour speak. If he would speak, I am sure he would repeat the nice things my friend from Dorchester has said. And in the meantime may I express the hope that some day the Prime Minister will acknowledge the service given by my good friend from Dorchester by saying to him, "Here, Dorchester, I will have you sworn by His Excellency as one of my advisers." If he has not yet received word to that effect he is about to receive it, and I am sure he will do well in the cabinet, at any rate until he is stricken by that disease of dismissing poor people who have done him no harm. Meanwhile I wish him good luck.

I suggest to the Minister of Labour that, instead of writing hieroglyphics while we are speaking, he should listen to the advice that is given him, at least the advice of the hon. member for Dorchester. It would be beneficial to him. He has been writing on the same piece of paper for ten minutes; I should not be surprised if he found it extraordinary that anyone could write eleven letters and one telegram in two days. Business efficiency and practical methods—that is something he cannot understand. But that is not all; the Solicitor General's advice has not been taken; it has been regarded as so essential to the government that it has been entirely dispensed with ever since the beginning of the session.

Let me point out something else, Mr. Chairman. I have received a very bold and impolite letter from a man in the civil service named Harry Hereford, Dominion director of unemployment. I must confess that I was surprised to get such a letter from a civil servant. I do not know whether he is Canadian-born or a naturalized citizen—in the latter case it may be, perhaps, that it is so much the better for him. But let me give this advice to all civil servants, whatever their salary may be or however great their self-importance. It is that they should be polite to members of parliament, regardless of politics or anything else. When I recommend someone to the Department of Labour I do so not on political grounds but because I am sure that the person whom I recommend is in need. That is the only consideration that actuates me. When, therefore, I consider it my duty to recommend anyone to the civil servant in charge, I expect him to be civil. When I submitted to this man, Hereford, certain requests that I had received from the municipalities in my constituency, I was merely discharging my duty as a member of parliament and he had no right whatever to write such impudent words as these:

Aucun bon but ne semble avoir été atteint par cette action de votre part—No good purpose seems to have been served by this action on your part.

May I suggest that if this gentleman wishes to avoid trouble so far as this side of the house is concerned, he had better discharge his duties in accordance with the traditions of the civil service. He should be guided by that very excellent principle that is being observed by the civil service, namely, to serve the people. A civil servant should be, above all, civil.

The Minister of Labour showed considerable intelligence—and when I say the Minister of Labour I am referring, of course, to the present minister's predecessor—in having his work done by others. During the last campaign the present Prime Minister used to declare, "I will do this, I will do that"; it was the same old refrain that was heard in every city, town, parish, borough and municipality in the country, and at every street corner: "I will do this, and I will do that." And when he came into power, to his great surprise, the people said to him: "We expect you to do this, and we expect you to do that." But what did he do? He sheltered himself behind the provinces and the municipalities. He asked them to come to his assistance, and he called to the council chamber my good friend, Senator Robertson, and said to him, "Senator, I rely on you: you must arrange this for me." The Senator said, "That's all right; we will arrange it with the provinces. The provinces will bear the burden of the administration of this whole unemployment scheme. We will subscribe our share and the municipalities will do as much as the provinces and the federal government together." Now the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Department of Labour has only to ask the Minister of Finance for one fourth of the money that is to be spent for unemployment purposes, the relief fund being administered by the provinces who contribute their share to it. He need ask for only one quarter of that and then he will not have to worry about the administration of the fund because the whole thing will be done by the provinces. I thank the Minister of Labour for listening to my remarks instead of writing hieroglyphics on a piece of paper. I defy him to say that this is not the case.

I have something else to say about Mr. Hereford. That gentleman blamed me for forwarding some of the requests which I had received from the municipalities before the order in council defining the jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments had been passed. When I asked him to return these files to me he replied under date of September 7, 1931, that he was keeping copies in order to show them to the minister. If the trouble I had taken was superflous, if Mr. Hereford did not need copies of the documents I had sent to him, why did he make copies to be submitted to the Minister of Labour?

I am sorry it was necessary for me to be a little rough with the minister at the beginning of my remarks, but I had to do that in order to gain his attention. Is the minister in a position to tell the committee how many white-collar unemployed there are in this country? I will define what I mean by that term. I mean the clerks who were working in stores, in brokers' offices or anywhere—

An hon. MEMBER: Nowhere.

Mr. POULIOT: These men are unemployed and the hon. member should not make fun of them.

How many are now unemployed who were previously employed by grocery stores, by drygoods stores and wholesale establishments? How many commercial travellers have lost their jobs because of the decrease in trade? How many railroad employees have been put out of work while profiteers were selling ties to the Canadian National Railways which was supposed to be in such bad condition? These are matters of great importance, and for the third time I repeat that they are of great importance to the government if it is sincere.

If this government intends to relieve unemployment it should get to the root of the evil. It should know the cause of all this trouble; it should know why these people have lost their jobs. The minister should be able to advise the committee how many of this class are out of work. There are thousands, in fact tens of thousands unemployed at the present time. This information is not new to the minister, and I am trying to impress upon him that the only way to cure unemployment is to get to the root of the evil and then try to remove the causes. As I have said before in this house, during the war some soldiers were wounded by bullets while others were gassed, shell-shocked or received other injuries, but the same remedy was not applied to all. Every case was studied by expert physicians and surgeons and every man received the treatment which was best suited to his case. That is why many of the men wounded during the war are to-day in better condition—they received the proper remedy.

If the minister can tell me how many white-collar men are out of work, I will sit down. How does he intend to take care of these men? Does he intend to employ them as Volga boatmen on the St. Lawrence scheme?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: It is below the intelligence of the hon. member to make the answer he has.

Does the minister think that these men will be able to do pick and shovel work on the St. Lawrence? They could not do it because they have not had the necessary training. If this government desires order to be restored, there is only one way in which it can bring about that result. The work of the government should be divided among the members of the cabinet instead of being done by a single man, however able. This government should adopt the practice carried out by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) when his government was in power, and by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden. It is only fair that members of the cabinet should share in the work of government. The matter is vital to the country and this method should be adopted. I do not make these suggestions to annoy the committee and the minister, I am simply trying to make the minister understand. Even though he were the greaest physician in the country, he could not cure a disease without first knowing what it was. Each angle of this unemployment question should be considered separately and the minister should take the trouble to obtain as soon as possible the information which I desire. As a matter of fact, this information should have been obtained immediately the government came into power.

A special committee made a study of the unemployment question for a short time after this government took office. One of its recommendations was that immigration should be stopped. I am glad to see the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bourgeois) in his place because this is the first opportunity I have had to welcome him to this house. He is a perfect gentleman and my only regret is that his political principles are wrong. During his last election campaign he paid a compliment to this government by stating that it had stopped immigration. What did the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon) say to that? He said that this government would never close the door to Englishmen who wanted to come to this country. The minister is bringing young boys out here. It is true that they have the money to pay their passage but he cannot guarantee that they will not in the future be a charge upon this country. Perhaps he should take a position as purser on one of the boats which carry these young Englishmen to this country. I think the salary would be high enough.

An hon. MEMBER: Not high enough.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend says it would not be high enough. The statement was made in Three Rivers that the government had stopped immigration. The government lets young men from the British Isles come in and I have no objection to them provided that they come here in times of prosperity and do not take the place of our own people.

One minister who has the greatest task ahead of him is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, provided he receives some cooperation from his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, in order that Canadian trade may increase. When that is brought about, unemployment will disappear and the troubles from which the Canadian National Railways are at present suffering will be removed. Those are plain facts.

Although I have been in Ottawa for several years, this is the first winter that I have met on the streets so many men asking for direct help. We do not see that to such an extent in other cities. They come to Ottawa for assistance as to the Mecca of unemployment relief. They expect by coming here, to the seat of government, to get a job. It is very sad to see those men who seem to be in good health, humiliated to have to ask for charity from a stranger. Patience can exist for a certain time but no one can tell how long that will be. We have in each province law-abiding people, people who respect our institutions, and who look to the star of hope expecting that some day or another their miseries will come to an end. In every home there is a woman who has more worry than any of us can have, trying to make both ends of the family budget meet. With small pay, sometimes with one or two dollars obtained from relief sources, they try to carry on so that their children may be fed and clothed. How long will this last? The other day I saw a young woman who had threatened to commit suicide. She was taken in by a woman whose husband was out of work and who was doing sewing. People in these circumstances realize the links that unite those coming from the same country and they endeavour to protect each other the best they can.

The Prime Minister and his colleagues know that I shall ever be a champion of the social order; I do not want to see it destroyed. But now we have in Canada the seeds of revolution such as exist in other countries. At one time there was a similar situation in France. Those who have studied the history of the world know that prior to the French revolution persons who said that the people were dissatisfied with the régime and that it must be overthrown, were considered insane. The nobility surrounding the king and queen said that this was idle talk; that such a thing as revolution would never happen; that they were safe and would retain their power as long as they wished. But one day the king and queen were arrested and some months later they were guillotined. This is what happened in France. The aftermath of this was that the fortunes of the nobility were confiscated and new fortunes were built up in their stead; a new order was created. It will be remembered that one of the most famous speeches ever delivered was that of Mirabeau when he advocated the contribution of one-fourth; he said to the French Assembly, to the rich, the well-off, the bourgeois who were there: You must contribute one-fourth of your fortunes to the state, otherwise the state will crumble. That was the prophecy, and because the French people did not listen to him when he urged them to return to the state one-fourth of their belongings—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Following the questions that were asked yesterday by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) in regard to Garnet wheat, I wish, under this bill, to discuss the matter. I am sorry the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is not in his place, but probably the Prime Minister will answer this question. Seeding time is at hand; the farmers are ready with their seed. In my district, on account of rust, the only kind of hard wheat we can sow is Garnet. We cannot sow Marquis; Reward is not a success and the farmers who intend to sow Garnet wheat wish to know how it is going to be graded. Yesterday the minister said that the committee on agriculture would inquire into this matter, but I ask the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to make a statement as soon as possible in order that the farmers in those districts where they are sowing Garnet wheat and where they cannot sow any other type may be advised that Garnet wheat will remain at least for one year at the present grades, because I do not think it is good business to change the grade without giving them proper notice. I have received several requests to this effect and I would ask the Prime Minister if it is possible for him to make a statement now in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of grading Garnet wheat has for a considerable time engaged the attention of those responsible for the discharge of their duties under the Grain Act. At the present time Garnet, with other varieties of wheat, is graded under the standard grades. There are those who advocate that it should carry a separate grading; there are others who contend that such a separate grading would be improper, having regard to the very considerations to which the hon. gentleman has just referred. I suppose he has read last year's report of the grain commissioners in this regard. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement in the expectation that members from those western agricultural constituencies most directly affected would present their position before the committee on agriculture so that such legislation, if any, as might be required would be enacted without delay by parliament. The hon. gentleman knows the government is without power in the matter; that power parliament has conferred upon a body which it has created. The Board of Grain Commissioners and the Board of Grain Standards which are created by the Grain Act have authority to deal with the matter with which the hon. member suggests the government should deal. In order that the government might be advised and therefore be in a position to enact such legislation, if any, as might be required to meet the wishes of those who are best able to speak with authority on the subject, it was referred to the committee on agriculture. May I say I agree wholly with what the hon. member has said as to the desirability of having the matter promptly dealt with, and I would add that the agriculture committee meets tomorrow. The representations of the agricultural members being made to the committee, a resolution could be passed at once, and recommendation made to this house which, I assure my hon. friend, would be acted upon by the administration as quickly as possible, having regard to the rules of the house. I would hope, however, if there is any discussion on the matter, that it might be somewhat more relevant to the bill than the discussion to which we have listened for the past forty minutes. I do not say this in an offensive manner, but I do say that I hope when the matter is dealt with it will be considered with more promptitude, a manner which would be in striking contrast to that which has characterized the measure now before the house.

If my friends, those concerned from both east and west, will attend the agriculture committee at its meeting in the morning, will see that representations are made, a resolution passed and a recommendation made that it be brought before this chamber, all facilities of this government will be available for the purpose of seeing that consideration is given to it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I wish to thank the Prime Minister for his kind words. It is a pleasure to see him in such good humour, and I appreciate it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am always in good humour.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You do not show it all the time.

Mr. BENNETT: It is other hon. members who become somewhat heated.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If the right hon. gentleman will stay in that good humour for the rest of the session I hope I shall have the pleasure of many more conversations with him such as I have had to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: They have been long distance conversations.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am glad the Prime Minister has made the statement he did make. I hope whatever recommendations the committee makes will be made definitely, whether or not we are going to amend the grading this year, because seeding is about to commence.

Mr. BENNETT: The sooner the better; that is the reason the minister asked consent the other day.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to refer the Prime Minister and the committee to the provision in the bill which provides for the payment of undischarged obligations after the expiry of the act. May I say that with money voted under the estimates the practice has obtained, and has been approved by the Auditor General, whereby if commitments are made under any particular vote, and the vote expires because the end of the fiscal year has been reached, cheques may be issued for a period of perhaps fifteen days after the expiry of the vote, in order to pay those undischarged obligations. As I understand it that is the most that has ever been allowed. The committee will bear in mind that such an allowance is made in connection with undischarged obligations incurred under a vote which is absolutely limited.

I understand the right hon. gentleman has said that some ruling was obtained to the effect that under the act which we are now asked to extend sixty days' time can be given, according to the Auditor General's statement, for the payment of obligations which had been incurred before the expiry of the act. My right hon. friend said however that there was some doubt about the legality or validity of that practice, and that in order to save any doubt the government had given instructions that no payments should be made after the date of the expiry of the act, according to the letter of the statute. I think he and all members of the government were wise in that respect.

Now, however, my right hon. friend, under this statute proposes that the government may incur any obligations it likes, or deems wise, under the provisions of the old act, an act which as we know very well, after the discussions we have had, provides for unlimited power, and which contains no limit as to amount. He suggests that obligations may be incurred at any time before the actual expiry of the act on May 1, 1932, and that those obligations may be paid at any time thereafter, no matter how long it is after the act has expired. I say there is no precedent for such practice.

To illustrate what I mean I should like to give an extreme case, because after all that is the best way to show it. For instance, this government might agree to pay a subsidy of $10,000,000 per year to a railway company for a period of twenty years. So long as they created that obligation before May 1, 1932, the provisions of the last part of this section permits them to pay their obligations out of the consolidated fund during the whole twenty years. My right hon. friend will probably question that, but I say that is the effect of the section now before us. I will read it, because I think it ought to be on Hansard:

Notwithstanding the expiration of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, chapter fifty-eight of the statutes of 1931, by lapse of time, the provisions of the said act, and all orders in council and regulations made thereunder, shall not be deemed to have expired on and to have ceased to be in force on and after the first day of March, 1932, but to have continued and to be in full force for all purposes thereof whatsoever until the first day of May, 1932, and all undischarged obligations created under the authority of the said act, may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund as therein provided notwithstanding the expiration of the said act on the first day of May, 1932.

In order to make it clear that that is under the act as amended, we find section 3 as follows:

The Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and this act, shall be read and construed as one act, and this act may be cited as The Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932.

I think it is proper to call the attention of the committee to this fact. Not only is there unlimited power under the old act, not only is there provision for an expenditure of an unlimited amount under that act, but now as a result of this new bill there is provision for unlimited time. That would mean that this government could commit the country to any amount the treasury of the country might contain, or might by any conceivable possibility contain after borrowing, for any time the government may see fit. I submit under this section the limitation to May 1, 1932, means nothing at all, except that commitments must be made before that date, but, once having been made, payments may be made for as long a time as the government may desire.

Mr. BENNETT: It is always amazing to listen to hon. members who put cases which they know will never arise, in order that they may support a position which is wholly untenable. The bill asks to confer upon the cabinet or a committee of the house authority to deal with relief and unemployment measures during a period of only one month more. During the month of March they have been unable to do anything, and nothing but accounts which cannot be paid have accummulated. The inability to pay has seriously inconvenienced every province west of the lakes, and also many of the municipalities. This has been brought about by the attitude taken by the opposition. One might have expected that they would have stated their case, clearly recorded their vote and allowed this parliament to proceed with the business of the country. It is not my business to complain of what they have done; they are answerable to the electorate and to themselves. But they seem to forget that after all there is an extraordinary condition in the country. Now and then one of the faithful in a moment—shall I say?—of mental aberration from his standpoint declares there is a condition that is very serious, but at once he is frowned upon by those who would have you believe that everything is just as it has been. Now, everything is not just as it has been in any country in the world.

I will not dwell again upon the reasons that induced the government to ask this parliament to extend the statute for a period of sixty days. This is the last day of March; therefore the extension if granted to-day will continue for a month. In the meantime, as I say, there are large numbers of orders in council that must be passed in order to enable payments to be made. My own personal view is that when a statute authorizes an obligation to be created, and the obligation is validly created under it, and there has been no fraud, nothing to throw distrust upon the accounts as rendered, the obligation of the country should be paid. The hon. gentleman is of opinion that when midnight of the first day of March was reached the obligation to pay ceased with the authority to create.

Mr. RALSTON: The authority to pay ceased.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Not the obligation.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, together with the authority to create new obligations. Parliament, if it enacts this bill, will have conferred upon the executive power to create new obligations during the period of thirty days. It will also make clear that the obligations that have been created and not paid may be paid after the first day of May. There is nothing new about that, nothing at all. It is the law of this country. If the obligation is validly created, an obligation to pay has arisen, and with the loss of further power to create obligations there is no lessening of the necessity to pay. It does not seem to me to require very much argument to make that clear.

Now, what the hon. gentleman suggests is that there may be an abuse of that power. I am bound to say that I anticipated some such objection would be made, and hence it is that any orders in council and regulations must be forthwith laid upon this table. The preamble of the bill is the guide for its interpretation. These works are to be created for one purpose, namely, relief of unemployment, to afford opportunity for those who so much require it to get employment for the purpose of meeting the demands of sustenance, of life itself. The preamble is the interpretative section. The steps taken by the executive will be made known from day to day as they are made effective under the provisions of the statute. Does anyone suggest that if any government undertook so to abuse its power as to pass an order in council of the character indicated by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), and it was laid upon the table of this house the next day, that the government would continue to exist? Is it thought for a single minute that it would?

Mr. RALSTON: What has that to do with it?

Mr. BENNETT: It has everything to do with it, because this legislation is predicated upon one principle—that parliament has conferred upon the executive the power to create obligations for the purposes mentioned in the statute, namely, to relieve unemployment.

Mr. RALSTON: Why limit it at all? Why have any words at all?

Mr. BENNETT: I am so glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that, because I thought I would limit those things. Now I know he would have gone much further; he asks, "Why limit it at all?"

Mr. RALSTON: If your argument is sound.

Mr. BENNETT: "Why limit it at all?" he asks. I assume that when the appropriate time comes he will by his vote give effect to the principle he has just enunciated.

Mr. RALSTON: If your argument is sound, why limit it at all?

Mr. BENNETT: Why trouble with "if's" and "and's"? Once more the hon. gentleman is just endeavouring to set his will against the will of the majority of parliament. All I can say is we have put this provision in the statute deliberately.

Mr. RALSTON: We are going to see it through?

Mr. BENNETT: Well, we are going to endeavour to see it through, because that is what we were sent here for, and I am sorry the hon. gentleman has not yet discovered that he is sitting to the left of the Speaker.

Mr. RALSTON: I have been forced to realize it many times.

Mr. BENNETT: It is unfortunate. When I hear one of his capacity and training talking of piffling five cent pieces, of whether Grits or Tories are employed in a municipality in his constituency, I realize he cannot be very much engaged in thought for the country or he would not be wasting his time talking of such matters. But that is the size of it, and the size of the observations too. They are not creditable either to the hon. gentleman or to parliament itself. I was pointing out that this government has obligations which unfortunately will not be known for a long period of time. If he had observed what was said the other day, that under the act of 1930 only four million dollars had been expended at the end of the fiscal year, and the other fifteen or sixteen million dollars, although it had been expended was not paid until this year, he would have realized the necessity for this measure.

Mr. RALSTON: That was a limited act.

Mr. BENNETT: But I am only pointing out the principle, that the obligation being created it must be discharged.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: And it cannot be discharged just as promptly as the hon. gentleman suggests it may be, for the reason that this government has not control over the works carried on by the municipalities or the provinces. We have in the Department of Labour accounts certified, amounting to millions of dollars, from every province I think, but one, in this confederation. Their payment awaits orders in council. Those orders in council we propose to pass just the day this legislation is enacted in order that the municipalities may be paid for the work they have undertaken. For instance, the municipality of Burnaby may be able to get some of its money from the province of British Columbia when this legislation is enacted, but all the time the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has interposed his will, he has prevented the municipality of Burnaby from getting payment. And that applies to every other municipality in every province in this dominion, because under the construction placed upon this statute—I think improperly—we have not been able to make payment of a single sum since the first of March to the various communities requiring money. We have placed in this statute a provision that obligations created prior to the first of May may be paid thereafter out of the consolidated revenue fund, so there may be an assurance that every obligation created by order in council will be paid. There are balances due for work provided in the agreements as given in detail in the return tabled by the Minister of Labour, and which are explained under the headings of municipal, provincial and federal obligations. Federal works, it will be observed, are practically all paid now. If hon. members have taken the trouble to look at the report they will observe that the federal obligations have been practically all discharged, except where the work is still being carried on. For instance, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) stated that at Shippigan the money had not been spent and he rather insinuated it was a deliberate political oversight; but sitting opposite to him is the member for Northumberland, N.B., (Mr. McDade), who supports the administration, and who finds that in his constituency there is $10,000 unexpended with respect to a wharf at Chatham, for the same reason given by the Minister of Public Works—that the work involved a very large expenditure carrying into the future. With the sense of the responsibility that this executive must have with respect to matters of this kind, we did not care to project ourselves into a period of time which was indefinite. When the engineers making their final report indicated this fact the works were not proceeded with.

Then you came to the next realm, which was the work for the approval of which the province itself was responsible. The contact of the federal government is with the provinces, not with the municipalities.

Mr. VENIOT: Do you say these amounts were all paid?

Mr. BENNETT: I am just making the point that they are not paid; that is what I am saying. Unfortunately, they could not be paid because the work has gone on intermittently. Take the work in Quebec city, for example. This is a standard illustration, because the mayor of that city came to Ottawa together with a delegation of which the hon. member for Quebec East was a member. He knew, as I knew—though I knew it better after they had explained it to me—that the severity of the winter there had made it impossible to carry forward these unemployment works. They had been able to go on only to a certain point, and then they had to stop. They said they wanted an extension of time, and we considered that the obligation being created under this order in council, we should meet it until May 1.

Now I will make this closing observation in that regard. There are very few statutes enacted by this parliament conferring any power of an administrative character on the executive that are not capable of abuse. Every effort that men can make to prevent abuse is being made, and as I explained the other evening no action by this government would impose a new or fresh obligation upon the people of this country, other than the continuance or discharge of those provided for in the report made by the Minister of Labour. except under most exceptional conditions. One of the new obligations we will have to meet is with respect to seed grain in western Canada. We took the ordinary, elementary precautions in connection with it, not ourselves but through the commission and through others who are directing enterprises in connection with the movement of grain, to see that seed might be preempted, or made available. It has not been paid for, but it must be paid for. We knew from each of the provinces what would be its probable needs.

I need hardly say to this committee that nothing so concerns this government as the whole financial outlook of this country. Is there any man who is carefully studying conditions who does not realize just what are the burdens and responsibilities at the present moment in connection with financial conditions? Even the richest country in the world, our neighbour to the south, has a deficit larger than has ever been recorded in any country of the world, amounting to almost two and a half billion dollars, an almost unthinkable sum. With our financial obligations we realize the need for every possible effort to avoid the creation of obligations that are not absolutely essential for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this measure. If the hon. gentleman suggests the possibility of abuse I can only say to him that abuse is possible under any statute where power of an administrative character is vested in the executive. Criticism is always conducive to soundness of administration, and the very criticism that has been made by the hon. gentleman as to the possibility of abuse will be always a factor in deterring those responsible for creating the opportunities for criticism by such abuse. That is known to everyone.

I can only say to this house that to the extent of our ability we propose during the next thirty days to limit our commitments to the minimum consistent with the obligations that already rest upon us and which must be carried out by fresh orders in council, in connection with seed grain, for example, and in connection with the moneys that must continue to be paid to the relief commission of Saskatchewan. We are still caring for many thousands of families out there. It may be of interest, and I think the committee should know that in furtherance of the views which I expressed a few days ago I have despatched a message to the governments of all the provinces for the purpose of enabling us to look at this financial position clearly and ascertain to what extent it may be necessary for the dominion to secure funds to enable the provinces to discharge, within the realm of their responsibilities, the obligations which rest upon them. This we hope to do within the next ten days, in order that the legislation which we will submit to this house to care for the future, beyond May 1, may be based upon as intelligent an understanding as we can have as to what are the obligations involved.

I can only repeat—and I say this with some degree of confidence—that I believe that there is no member of this house, of the legal or any other profession, reading those contracts that have been entered into between the provinces and the dominion, and knowing the terms in which the obligations must arise and the payments be made, who will not admit that it is essential that there should be some provision enabling the payments to be made in the future for the obligations created up to May 1. The right hon. leader of the opposition asked the other evening as to whether or not we contemplated the creation of new financial obligations. I answered that at the moment I had no knowledge of any beyond those connected with seed grain and the work of the relief commission. There may be a few others of which I have no knowledge at the moment, but it is not our intention to create other fresh obligations. But we must frankly meet the situation to which I have alluded, and I trust the committee will pardon me for repeating these matters as I have, because the responsibility for the moment rests with us, and I am anxious that the committee should have as full an understanding of the situation as possible. So I say that we ask this power, not for the purpose of abusing it but for the purpose of enabling us to meet obligations that have been honestly incurred, upon which the contracting provinces and municipalities rely, to enable them to make payment in cash or kind to those who have discharged unemployment work in the several parts of this dominion.

Mr. RALSTON: As to delay, we have bandied words across this floor for some time with regard to responsibility, and when the time comes I and those who are on this side of the house will be quite willing to submit our record to the electors and have them decide who is responsible for the delay and indifference in dealing with this question.

I am not going to be led away from what I was discussing, when the right hon. gentleman rose to speak, by a résumé of the whole debate which has been going on for the last two weeks. The reference which my right hon. friend made to the instances which were given as to the way in which money was being expended was, it seemed to me, unworthy of the leader of a government who himself says they have endeavoured to see that the money reached the needy, and whose government went so far as to pass an order in council declaring that to be the purpose of the expenditure. It seems to me that anyone who could bring instances or point to cases in which it appeared likely that the policy of the government had not been carried out, should be welcomed by my right hon. friend, and that immediately a promise of investigation should be made. I do not think it lies in the mouth of my right hon. friend, or that it puts him or his government in a proper light before the country, to be so intolerant of criticism or of statements which would rather indicate that the assurances they have been given with regard to the administration of this money may not have been lived up to. It seems to me that the Prime Minister should do what my friend the Minister of Public Works did last night, that is, promise an investigation and desist from criticism of those who, notwithstanding the intolerance with which they seem to be met, feel that they should point out to this government instances in which the administration of this act has gone wrong.

Now let us get back to the point. My right hon. friend has a habit of traversing a good deal of territory when replying to a question which he feels may perhaps contain some modicum of intelligence, some grain of soundness. My suggestion to my right hon. friend was that if money was voted in the estimates no more than fifteen days would be given in which to make payment. My right hon. friend suggested that the most he could hope for under the ruling which he had was that within a reasonable time he might be able to make payments after the date for incurring obligations had expired. I pointed out again that this statute is unlimited as to time, and I submit that the Prime Minister has no precedent anywhere for any such statute. I expected that possibly he might justify this section in this way: I thought the provision might have been introduced for the purpose of allowing him to make payment now of obligations which had been incurred under the statute before the first of March. But did anyone ever imagine that my right hon. friend would embody in this statute power to make future payments for obligations incurred between now and the first of May when parliament, according to all expectations, will actually be sitting here on the first of May and would be able to vote money if it had been properly obligated for? But the Prime Minister suggests that regardless of parliament he wants authority now not only to incur obligations but to make unlimited payments for unlimited purposes for an unlimited time. My right hon. friend has not answered the objection in this regard; he has given no reasons for wanting this authority. The suggestion he makes with respect to the fact that the provincial authorities may have made commitments and that their projects will not be completed is not good ground. He saw to it when he made the form of agreement contained in the report of the director of unemployment relief that a definite time limit was put in for the completion of projects, and I should expect that he would do the same thing now; and if he wishes to implement the obligation which he is going to undertake in connection with these projects he may fairly, taking a reasonable time, fix some time limit in the act, providing that within a certain time or before a certain date payments may be made. Let him take his fifteen days or thirty days or sixty days if he wishes, although I say that that is absolutely unnecessary in view of the fact that parliament will be sitting and will be able to vote the money. But let us assume that this is the sort of thing which we are to expect in this country at the present time and that my right hon. friend's demands have to be acceded to. Let us assume that, and let us assume further that the unheard of position which the right hon. gentleman takes with regard to the opposition is correct, namely, that we have been summoned by His Excellency and have come here merely to look on, being nothing but a minority. Assuming all that, I still maintain that my right hon. friend, for his own protection, if he cares nothing for the criticism of those on this side of the house, ought at least to put in some definite time within which all payments must be made in connection with obligations incurred before the first of May. I think that is a reasonable suggestion and I offer it to the Prime Minister. He will probably reject it; but I ask him, in the interests of what I submit is a proper form of legislation, and having some regard for the credit of the country as well as for his own protection and the protection of the government, to insert at least some limitation in the act. If he does not do this he has simply added to the bill the third and perhaps the worst of the indicia of absolutism when he provides now that it shall be absolutely unlimited as to time, as to amount and as to power.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend must realize that the law as it now stands provides that any judgment recovered against the crown is paid out of the consolidated fund without ever being in the estimates. This is merely that principle. Assuming that in every case the person entitled should recover judgment, the claim would be payable out of the consolidated fund.

Mr. RALSTON: Why put it in the statute?

Mr. BENNETT: I asked myself that very question, and I am glad my hon. friend has raised it. Unless the principle were extended to a case such as this, it would be necessary for the claimant to recover judgment in each instance, and no one would suggest that every province and municipality having a claim should have to reduce it to judgment. I know of a case where the crown had grave doubts whether or not it was liable. Fiat was issued, action was brought, judgment was recovered and we had to find the money, willy, nilly, without estimates or anything else. The hon. gentleman knows that in his time as a member of the government orders in council had frequently to be passed to discharge judgments out of the consolidated fund, over which parliament had no control, it being taken that the reduction of claim to judgment comprised such an assertion of the judicial branch of government as to compel the executive to find, out of the consolidated fund, the necessary money. And in the statutes themselves—I forget what statute—it is provided that where a claim is reduced to judgment it shall be paid out of the fund. In this instance we have merely asserted the same principle.

Mr. RALSTON: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I put this to the hon. gentleman. If a claim arises under the agreements to which reference has been made—and they are all referable to the agreements between the provinces and the dominion—and we do not pay, would not any province be able, under a petition of right, to obtain speedy judgment and strike out any defence that might be made?

Mr. RALSTON: My suggestion is that the time for payment should be limited so that my right hon. friend will not incur under any agreement any obligation which might ripen into judgment. There should be a limitation of the power which is sought. That is my point.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the point the hon. gentleman made a moment ago.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the point I am making now.

Mr. BENNETT: I have limited it in this way, that no obligation shall be made that binds the consolidated fund unless created before the first of May.

Mr. RALSTON: I am trying to get the Prime Minister to limit the time for payment so that he should have to limit the obligations he incurs to a date before the expiry of the time.

Mr. BENNETT: We have already provided that the obligations must be created before the first of May.

Mr. RALSTON: But you have not provided how long they may exist.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly not,—

Mr. RALSTON: That is the point.

Mr. BENNETT: —for the simple and obvious reason that I cannot anticipate the time in which a contract would ripen into a claim.

Mr. RALSTON: You did before.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. RALSTON: You provided for May 1, 1932, in the agreement with the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: The obligations were not in any sense unenforceable because the statute under which they were created had no validity.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend does not suggest that the provinces could enforce judgment for work which was done in contravention of that agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not for a moment. Beale's Cardinal Rules for the Interpretation of Statutes lays down this principle: that if under a statute which no longer has validity an obligation has been created, the responsibility to meet the obligation has not vanished because the statute has expired.

Mr. RALSTON: If you get judgment.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not lay it down as judgment; perhaps my hon. friend desires to put it that way. What I say is this: The principle upon which we proceed is the same as that which obtains in the statutes of Canada—that when a claim is reduced to judgment, however small or however large, it is payable out of the consolidated fund regardless of estimates or parliament or anything else. And the general principle thus asserted from time immemorial in this country in our statute law is finding expression here. I do not care to undertake to limit the time within which payment for obligations created prior to the first of May shall be made, but in order that the house may be informed what the obligations are, we provide that the orders in council shall forthwith be laid upon the table of the house.

Mr. RALSTON: The principle upon which I ask my right hon. friend to proceed is this: that the time within which payment must be made shall be limited and therefore, in order to carry out that obligation to limit the time he would have to limit his obligations made before the first of May, so that he would undertake no obligations which would be payable after the time to be prescribed by the statute. That is what I want my right hon. friend to do, and I am suggesting it for his own protection as well as for the protection of parliament and of the country. The Prime Minister is saying that the obligations must be made before the first of May, but they may be payable five, ten, fifteen or twenty years from now, under the statute. That is what I am endeavouring to get him to limit.

Mr. BENNETT: Does anyone think that unemployment relief payable twenty years hence will be of value?

Mr. RALSTON: The Prime Minister knows perfectly well that everything under the sun has been done in the name of unemployment relief. Do not let him take us down that alley, because we have explored it and we have found that this statute is as broad as the Dominion of Canada and as wide as the legislative powers of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: It was intended to be.

Mr. BRADETTE: The fact that a member of parliament is sent here to represent a constituency implies certain obligations on his part, and I wish to make some remarks with regard to the subject now before the committee, which involves the expenditure of millions of dollars on unemployment relief. I mean the trans-Canada highway. This matter is of national importance and although there have been controversies in certain sections of the province with reference to the routing, I intend to discuss it entirely outside of the realm of politics. Last year I had a resolution dealing with this question and I believe the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) stated that I had dealt with the matter in an absolutely non-partisan manner. It is my intention to proceed in the same way this afternoon, but I shall try to obtain a definite answer to my question from the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), or at least from this committee. My resolution last year read as follows:

Whereas the need for the construction of a trans-Canada highway has been accepted by the Canadian people;

And whereas, during last winter, that principle was being actually implemented by the construction of some of its links in northern Ontario out of the funds voted during the emergency session to relieve unemployment;

And whereas the necessity of the construction of two alternate routes is now well established;

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house that all moneys voted for that purpose will be spent on a fifty-fifty basis on the LaReine, Cochrane, Hearst, Nakina and Sioux Lookout section on the one hand and the Sault Ste. Marie, Fort William, Port Arthur and Kenora on the other.

I have in my hand the report of the dominion director of unemployment relief, which shows on page 39 that the sum of $5,250,000 was spent on the trans-Canada highway. The wording of this report would lead one to believe that the route of this highway has been decided upon, at least through northern Ontario. This highway is of national importance because the nine provinces of Canada are all interested in its routing, and they are directly interested in the raising of the money to carry on the construction. One of the largest and most expensive sections to be constructed is in northern Ontario, which, in fact, is the geographical centre of Canada. However, there exists a problem in connection with this section of the country which as yet has not been solved.

During the emergency session of 1930, I made the statement that the provincial government tried to wash its hands of the routing of this road. At that time the then Premier of Ontario, the present High Commissioner for Canada, the Hon. Mr. Ferguson, stated that the routing of the trans-Canada highway rested wholly with the federal authorities. I will not quote the exact words of Mr. Ferguson, but I know they were well received throughout the length and breadth of this country. Although I asked the Prime Minister if these words were true, I did not receive a definite answer until after the session of last year, when a statement was made in Calgary by the Prime Minister.

I read a very interesting article in Saturday Night, as well as in MacLean's Magazine, where it was stated that the country as a whole necessarily must take a hand in this matter so that a logical route could be chosen, less money spent and a smaller mileage constructed. Speaking in Calgary last year the Prime Minister said that the trans-Canada highway should go over the Ferguson highway. That was a definite statement and it was well received by every section of northern Ontario. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) issued a statement to the effect that it was the only logical route. In the light of these statements I am at a loss to understand why it is that millions of dollars have been spent on other sections of the highway apart from the Ferguson highway. I ask the government to give this committee this information which the people should receive before any further money is voted.

The provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have their own highway systems from the east to the west and the same applies to some extent to Quebec, although that province has no real direct communication with Ontario. In Ontario vast stretches of highway will have to be constructed in the northern sections in order to give direct communication between the east and the west. If my information is correct, the province of Manitoba has a highway system from the east to the west, and the same applies to the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

Will the government advise if a definite route through northern Ontario has been decided upon? One section of this country is represented by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), but the people of northern Ontario want to know if our section is not to be taken into consideration. May I repeat the statement made in Calgary by the Prime Minister, I believe on August 18, to the effect that the trans-Canada highway would be routed over the Ferguson highway, via North Bay, Cochrane and Hearst. My resolution was very reasonable in its demands. I asked the federal authorities to make its expenditures on this highway on a fifty-fifty basis; that is, if money was spent on the Sault Ste. Marie, Fort William, Port Arthur and Kenora route a similar amount would be spent on the northern section. I received many letters stating that this was the only logical solution of the problem, and I believe it is the duty of the Minister of Labour to see that the same consideration is given to our section of the province as has been given to the southern section.

The construction of a trans-Canada highway is considered to be absolutely necessary. This work has been carried on not only to relieve unemployment but to create a link between the east and the west. During the last general election, whether Liberal or Conservative, we were as one on this question, we felt that this highway should follow the course of the Ferguson highway via North Bay, Haileybury, Cochrane and Hearst to the Manitoba border. Immediately this government came into power some dilly-dallying took place, and an attempt was made to unload the responsibilities upon the shoulders of the provincial government. I have referred already to the statement of the former Premier of Ontario to the effect that the whole responsibility rested upon this administration. The following year the provincial government stated it was sending out surveying parties and aeroplanes to study the ground in order to decide upon a suitable route but so far no definite reply has been given by this government to the provincial government.

It must be admitted that the Prime Minister has many difficulties with which to contend, but he always faces them very squarely and I do not understand why he has not taken a hand in this matter. We have the spectacle of two sections of northern Ontario being opposed to the construction of this highway along certain routes. More money has been spent on this highway for unemployment relief in the southern part of northern Ontario than has been spent in the northern part. It is true that as far as the Ferguson highway is concerned many fine bridges have been built and many stretches of road have been straightened, but nothing has been done west or south of the town of Hearst. Apparently we are fighting a losing battle as far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned. I mean literally what I say, but I have sufficient confidence and faith in the ability and capacity of the present Minister of Labour who represents northern Ontario, to believe he will see that the people in our section are given a fair show. I do not want to believe anything will be done on account of political expediency, or that the provincial government will favour the southern section of northern Ontario because it has a larger population than we have. Within the last ten years the agricultural population in my constituency has increased over 800 per cent, and within the short period of fifteen or twenty years we shall have a larger population in the northern than they have in the southern portion of northern Ontario. Therefore I do not want to believe that any action will be taken on account of political expediency. I hope and trust that the present administration, because they are defraying fifty per cent of the cost of the trans-Canada highway construction, will, if possible, decide now, before any more money is voted for such construction, where the road should run. We want to be logical; we do not want to hog the whole thing, but we know what the people are thinking in other sections and we know on account of their larger population they are better organized than we are. The basis of a larger population should not signify anything to the present government; they should be willing to give us what is coming to us. We do not want any special favours; we want just what is our due. I have already done a lot of work for the solution of that important problem.

Further, accompanied by a very strong delegation from the constituency of Labelle, including the hon. member representing it, I had an interview with the Premier of Quebec asking for direct communication between the city of Montreal and the Cochrane district on towards Hearst, thereby saving at least 200 miles. There were with me at the time several members of the Quebec legislature, and I had also the support of an influential gentleman from Montreal who thought this was the most practical and feasible route.

One thing that surprised me in the discussion on the routing of the transcontinental highway is that the only section that seems to be directly interested is the northern section of northern Ontario. Saturday Night and other influential papers in Toronto have said that the whole of Canada should take a hand in the routing of the trans-Canada highway in Nippissing and northern Ontario. I am sorry that so far no influential bodies of men in Canada outside of those in northern Ontario have taken an interest in the question. I hope from now on everybody will be interested and realize that on account of the enormous sums taken out of the public treasury for this work, he has a direct interest in such a construction.

I have stated that at present the province of Quebec has no direct communication with the trans-Canada highway in order to reach Manitoba or the Pacific coast; in order to do so people from Quebec will have to travel by the Montreal-Ottawa road to Ottawa, then on to North Bay and thence northwards towards Cochrane, or go around the north shore of lake Superior. On the other hand, the natural route, the one which should be taken so far as Quebec and the maritimes are concerned, is one that will give access by Mont Laurier to Senneterre.

In the Cochrane district to the Quebec border, there are only fifty miles of a link to construct. In Quebec there are hundreds of miles of good provincial highways built by that province, and there is only a link of not more than 150 miles north of Maniwaki to give direct communication to the northern section of northern Ontario. So I repeat that all the provinces should be interested. Once the thing is an accomplished fact—and the undertaking will cost more than it should if the routing is not logical—it will be too late to criticize. This is the time to consider the situation not in a parochial or regional but in a national way. That is why I should like to see a general discussion of the whole matter by all the representatives of all the provinces, because I repeat that we are all directly interested in such an undertaking.

I have no quarrel with the southern section of northern Ontario. Their battle is their own. If they can show they have a better case than we have; if they can show the provincial or federal government that the road should be constructed through their section, all well and good. But then it becomes a local matter whereas the construction of such a road is not a local but a national question. As regards the routing of the trans-Canada highway even in northern Ontario, the provincial assemblies should be consulted; every province in this confederation should have an interest in such a matter. Perhaps some will say that it is now too late in the game for this. It is not too late, because it will take five, six or ten years more before the trans-Canada highway in northern Ontario is finally completed. There are questions of cost, of the country it will traverse, of mileage, of where it should go, of what would be the best routing so far as tourists are concerned. One argument advanced by the good people of the southern section of northern Ontario was that the highway should be constructed closer to the United States border so that more tourists from there might be attracted. That argument, however, will not stand the light of day, because we are building a road, not for the people of the United States, but for those of Canada. In this regard we should apply the Canada first policy. I repeat: The most logical, the most economical and the proper routing of that road is in the northern section of northern Ontario.

Last summer in Calgary the Prime Minister put the situation very well. I have not before me the newspaper reports of his observations, but I believe he said that the road should go via North Bay over the Ferguson highway—he omitted the name of Cochrane —but mentioned Hearst; but at the same time the Ferguson highway takes in the towns of Cochrane and Haileybury. I was delighted at the words of the Prime Minister, because he gave the impression, at least in our section of the country, that he was fully aware of the geographical and physical situation. I was also highly pleased at the comment made a day or two afterwards by the present Minister of Labour when he gave an interview which appeared in the Ottawa Journal, saying that he was delighted at the words of the Prime Minister; that the Ferguson highway was the logical routing for the trans-Canada highway. But a few days afterwards we had very strong protests from Fort William, Port Arthur and, more particularly, Sault Ste. Marie. We then had the Premier of Ontario saying that no decision had been reached; his statement was almost to the effect that the Prime Minister of Canada had no right to make such an assertion; that the routing had not yet been decided. As a representative of the northern section of northern Ontario I began to believe that the people of the southern section of northern Ontario being greater in number than we are in the northern section, regardless of what the cost or mileage will be, the routing would be through the southern section and apparently, by the estimate that I have in my hand, millions of dollars have already been spent in the southern section. I am mentioning these facts not for political advancement nor for any other political purpose, but that the Canadian people may be fully aware of the situation, and that the problem, which is not local but national in importance, may be dealt with in a national way. If I had the time I would read to the house some comments made in regard to the matter by some independent newspapers. They give statistics and prove by facts that the most economical and the shortest route would be in my section.

Some people have said that we have no population yet. I stated a few minutes ago that our population had within recent years increased 800 per cent, and I think I am not going too far in prophesying that within twenty years the Porcupine, the James bay and Hudson bay district on the Ontario side will have an increase of 10,000 or more prosperous homes. The same thing will apply to the Kapuskasing district. There is bound to be an improvement in the mining and agricultural districts in the north country. In north and south Timiskaming we have what is known as the clay belt, and in my view it would maintain at least a million more population. We have other areas which hold potential resources.

To show what people think of our section of the country may I say that during last summer, while at a point beyond Kapuskasing, I met a party of four cars from the city of Toronto. May I add that we have very few tourist parties from Toronto, and very few business men from the southern section of the province. I asked them what they thought of the north country. They had visited Hearst, Kapuskasing and Haileybury, Cochrane, Timmins, and Iroquois Falls. All the members in the party told me that they were astonished at what they had seen, and at the potential wealth and possible future of the country, which was a revelation to them. They promised to become missionaries among their friends, and to recommend vacationing in the north section of the country.

While in North Bay I was approached and told that I should not go into the north section of the country because the roads were not good. My answer is that the Ferguson highway is as good a gravel road as there is in Canada. If any tourist will visit the north section of the province of Ontario they will be well satisfied with the road. No doubt a road along the shore of lake Superior would have wonderful scenic attractions but not more so than in the northern section. We know that its cost would be prohibitive. Ten to fifteen years would be required for construction. On that score alone the people in my district should be given the consideration they deserve. It may be that the premier of the province of Ontario has decided on a certain route which he thinks would give satisfaction to the majority of the people of northern Ontario. Unfortunately I have very little accurate information before me about the actual routing of the road. I do know however that millions of dollars have been spent on the trans-Canada highway in all sections but the one from which I come, and I believe it is my duty at this time to ask the present administration to let me know the exact situation in the matter.

It is not my intention to take up further the time of the committee. I could carry on for a long time, and give reasons why the highway should be constructed along the northern section of the province. I must say that I believe the newspapers have been fair, and have given both sides of the question. I take this opportunity of appealing to the Prime Minister, and to the Minister of Labour, who has boasted, and rightly so, of his love for the north country, to take the part of our section of the country, and see that we receive from the federal and provincial authorities that to which we are entitled. We have no quarrel with any section or area in northern Ontario; we want all sections to profit. We are of the opinion, however, that any government, whether it be provincial or federal, should not forget a section of the country which in the future will support ten times its present population. The truth is that at the present time we have not the representation enjoyed by other sections of the dominion, but with the increased population we are sure to have we must necessarily be heard.

During the last session of parliament a statement appeared in the Northern Tribune to the effect that Hon. Mr. Finlayson, speaking at the town of Kapuskasing, had said that in conjunction with federal authorities three parties of surveyors were looking after the routing of the highway. I was voted down when I tried to get information from this government in that connection. I believe our case should be heard before either provincial or federal authorities. I know the present Minister of Labour made the building of the trans-Canada highway one of his political platforms, and I did the same. We are all one, so far as the building of the highway through northern Ontario is concerned. Our section of the country must not be forgotten; it cannot be left out. It is a new section, and the northern route offers the shortest way of crossing the northern part of Ontario. Moreover, a road through that north country would be a revelation to the people who would have the good fortune of travelling over it. Is it too much to ask for a definite answer on this matter from the government.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended at this time to enter into a discussion regarding the affairs of Burnaby. However, the Prime Minister has made statements which I cannot allow to remain unchallenged. Either those statements must have been made because of the ignorance of the Prime Minister, or on the other hand, previous statements made by the Minister of Labour are grossly untrue. On February 10 the matter to which I am about to refer was brought before the house, and for the benefit of hon. members and the special benefit of the Prime Minister I shall read the statement made by the Minister of Labour on that occasion as to why municipalities could not receive their money. I think before I have finished I will prove to the committee that I had nothing whatever to do with the stopping of payments. The

That, shortly, is the position in so far as the Dominion government is concerned.

He is speaking of the fact that they had sent out $3,371,664.69 to assist the province of British Columbia to take care of New York maturities, and had advanced the sum of $2,300,000 against works for unemployment relief purposes in that province. In addition to that, during the course of the week in which the minister addressed the house a further $225,000 had been advanced to the provincial authorities in order that they might carry on their work in connection with their camps. Then, continuing his final statement, he said:

I am not in possession of the particular facts with respect to the district of Burnaby to which the hon. member has referred, but the federal government has not only carried out its agreement to the full with British Columbia, but made these payments to that province far in advance of the receipt of the necessary vouchers to equate them. I think I can assure the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that in spite of his anxiety with respect to the locality to which he has made reference, matters are proceeding out there, particularly in the last month or six weeks, in such a way that I anticipate no great difficulty.

According to the report of Mr. Hereford, those statements are borne out, because we find that loans were made first of all to cover the dominion's share of moneys on approved public works. That was to an amount of $500,000 in one instance, and $800,000 in another. The Minister of Labour has stated to me that there was an understanding when the money was sent that it was to take care of all accounts rendered by the province of British Columbia. As he himself has said, however, British Columbia has seen fit to take the exact wording of the order in council, and has hidden behind the excuse that no money was sent to pay the dominion's share. That is the controversy which has been going on from time to time since the beginning of January, and it remains unsettled. Only a short time ago, in an interview with the Minister of Labour, an understanding was reached that money would be sent out on the authority of an order in council passed on March 2 to take care of the dominion's proportion of municipal relief expenditures. It would seem that on February 10, $2,300,000 had been sent to British Columbia against relief works. I ask the Prime Minister, when he knew there was controversy, and that the banks were refusing the credit of municipalities, and that merchants would not accept relief cheques, why he did not see fit to send further money? It was on the tenth of February that I brought this to the notice of the house. Why was not the money sent? Only last week I received a copy of a telegram sent to the Minister of Finance by the provincial government informing him that they had some two or three hundred thousand dollars left over from the money so sent, and stating that if they received authority from the government they would pay the dominion proportion of the municipality's account. The Minister of Finance informs me that such a telegram was sent by him, and that he could not see any reason why the provincial government should not pay the account. But in spite of all that we have the Prime Minister getting up and pointing his finger at the opposition and saying I was stopping payment of the money due to the municipality of Burnaby. Why did not the Dominion government send that money, or see that it was sent, when the serious condition of affairs at Burnaby was brought to their attention? I would also ask the Prime Minister now: Will he now send a telegram to the British Columbia government to use that surplus money for the dominion's proportion of the municipality's expenditure? I am glad in a way that this question has been brought up by the Prime Minister, because the municipalities may yet get the moneys owing. I am not particularly interested in who is to blame, but I am disgusted that the buck has been passed to and fro so long. Again I ask this quesetion: Will the Prime Minister send a telegram to the British Columbia government authorizing them to pay the accounts out of the $200,000?

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister will not send a telegram to the government of British Columbia telling them how to do their business.

Mr. REID: They have asked for it.

Mr. BENNETT: He will, as soon as the house passes the legislation now before it, pass an order in council to forward to the government of British Columbia the moneys they may be entitled to receive. A cheque for $500,000 has been outstanding since the second of March. It has been so frequently referred to in this house that I want again to mention it. That cheque will also be sent.

Mr. REID: In view of the explanation, why did not the Prime Minister intervene on February 10—not March 2—to see that the money was sent? On that occasion I directed the attention of the house to the fact that the municipality of Burnaby could not get any money from the provincial government, atlhough over $1,800,000 had been sent to them by the federal government.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the hon. gentleman realizes that we have no contract with the municipalities. We have stated that so frequently that I thought it was well understood. Neither the municipality of Burnaby nor any other municipality had any relations with a federal government. Our contract was with the province. As between the province and the municipality, we were neither a court of justice nor an arbitrator.

Mr. REID: I can assure the Prime Minister that I think I have done a little service to the municipalities of British Columbia by bringing the matter to his attention. I hope the bill will pass. But the Minister of Finance was sent a telegram the other day by the government of British Columbia, as I have stated, and he said that there was no reason on earth why the province could not have paid the municipality's account. That is why I object to the Prime Minister saying I have stopped payment. Here is a telegram that I received to-day:

Deputy Minister of Finance, Victoria, says the dominion's share of the money spent is not in his hands.

That is what the Burnaby Board of Trade was told only the other day. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if that is not correct, that on his own word to me he sent a telegram to the government of British Columbia saying there was no reason on earth why the money could not be paid. Yet we are being told we are stopping these payments, and still the province will not pay the municipalities.

I am glad to see the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in his seat. I was disappointed that information was not given me regarding the Canadian National contract for railway ties. When the government passed the order in council for two million ties at a price not to exceed sixty-five cents each, it made some of us wonder, because certain of our contractors in British Columbia were told last fall that the Canadian National had ties on hand for two and a half or three years ahead. I should like the Minister of Railways to pay some attention to this.

Mr. POULIOT: May I give my hon. friend the information? One of the contractors is a strong Conservative.

Mr. REID: I received this letter the other day and I think some attention should be paid to it, because it would be interesting to know just what price was paid by the Canadian National Railways for the ties. This letter is not from one of my constituents, but from a man in Edmonton whom I do not know. I give that information in case it may be thought I prompted the writer. This is the letter:

March 16, 1932.

Dear Sir,—

Apropos the question raised by yourself in the house reference the purchasing of railway ties by the Canadian National Railways, I offer the following information concerning the workmen on the job.

I am not vouching for the authenticity of this information, but I think the statement is worth looking into. The writer continues:

Sixteen farmers, originally, cut ties for Canadian National Railways in the bush near Edson, Alberta. Each was to receive 8 cents per regulation tie. Each man paid one dollar daily for board. Towards the close most men broke even; two quit as they were getting in debt. One fellow cut 400 ties, an average of eighteen plus, daily. He ended up, after paying for axe handles, with $2.95 to his credit. From the men's viewpoint they would be better off in a city taking the dole. There must be many Canadian taxpayers like myself in British Columbia and Alberta who would feel that an answer to a straight question would be in the public interest. No wonder that there are 6,140 single unemployed on the relief list in Edmonton alone.

That is signed by A. C. Russell, who gives his address as 10555-93 street, Edmonton, Alberta. I hope the Minister of Railways will look into this, because if it is a fact that only eight cents was paid I think the writer is about correct when he says men would be better off taking the dole, for such remuneration is equivalent to slavery—and this government should be no party to slavery. I hope the Minister of Railways will obtain information from the Canadian National management as to who got the contract and what price was paid.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, I am glad my hon. friend has brought up the question of ties, because some rather wild statements have been made with respect to it, one of the wildest by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King).

Mr. REID: Not by me.

Mr. MANION: I am not speaking of the hon. gentleman. One of the wildest of those statements was made by the leader of the opposition. I was not in the house at the time, but I was startled to read this heading in the Montreal Gazette of March 18:

Grave charge made by head of opposition. Mackenzie King refers to railway tie deal. No tenders called.

The Montreal Gazette's Ottawa correspondent in his despatch, dated March 17, then deals with the statement. I am glad to explain the position. When the question was asked in the house by—

Mr. REID: It was asked by myself.

Mr. MANION: No, I think the question was asked by an hon. member before my hon. friend drew attention to it. I took the stand then that the railway management considered that the giving out of prices, names and so forth, in regard to tie contracts, as well as to other contracts, was not in the public interest. That was the attitude I took, and I must confess that I expected it to be accepted by the opposition, as it had been accepted on every occasion, so far as I know, when it was taken by the opposition when they were in power. So I was not prepared for the question at the moment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is not the same thing at all.

Mr. MANION: It is the same thing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When the money is given the Canadian National surely there is no reason why the names should not be given.

Mr. MANION: Before I am done I will give all the information my hon. friend wants, and perhaps if the matter is pushed very far I could give a lot of information as to the way tie contracts were handled in the past. However, I made my explanation to the house and the opposition leader rather heatedly objected to that information not being given. I do not question his right to do so, but I made a statement at that time explaining that as far as ties were concerned the railway management had taken the attitude that they had sufficient ties, as is stated in that letter read by my hon. friend. But demands came from all over the country, from every province except Prince Edward Island, where they do not produce ties, pointing out that very little lumber was being cut throughout the country and asking that if possible we should influence the Canadian National management to purchase ties this year in order to give work to the different sections of the country where ties were cut normally.

I discussed the matter with the government and with the railway management. They adhered to the position that they had bought so many ties in previous years that they were overstocked, and due to their decreased earnings they did not require so many ties for replacement. For example, in 1929—rather a significant year—the management bought fourteen million ties. At all events, that was the attitude they took, and they adhered to the statement that they required no ties and that, if they bought any, we would have to pay for them. Different conferences were held, and in brief that was the position. I discussed the matter with the government; applications and representations were coming from every province of Canada except Prince Edward Island, and in view of these widespread demands, which I think were just because of the decreased cutting of timber throughout the country, the government finally decided to assist the railways in the purchase of a few ties. We discussed the matter with the railway management, and 65 cents was fixed as a maximum because that was about the average price paid last year.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is that for a No. 1 tie?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Was that a loan or a grant to the railway?

Mr. MANION: If my hon. friend will permit me to do so I will explain that later. Therefore we passed an order in council, a copy of which I think has been laid on the table and a further copy of which I have before me, providing for an advance to the company of sufficient money to buy two million ties at a maximum figure of 65 cents per tie. We did not want the management to go above that average price of last year, but as a matter of fact they went considerably below it. Instead of spending the amount mentioned in the order in council, the $1,300,000 which represented two million ties at 65 cents, I do not expect that we will have to pay them more than from $900,000 to $1,000,000. They were able to cut the price very materially because of the decreased cost of everything. This is the point: They made their own price. We merely passed an order in council permitting them to buy two million ties in their own way, of which we were to pay the actual cost, and I am informed now that the actual cost will be at least $300,000 less than the amount provided by the order in council, which means a very marked decrease in price.

Mr. POULIOT: The ties must have shrunk.

Mr. MANION: Someone sitting near me has suggested that it would be a good idea if my hon. friend would shrink. However, the railway management then let the contracts for the ties, spreading them from coast to coast. My understanding is that the average number of ties secured from any individual is about five thousand, in round figures. I am just giving rough averages, but I am told that between three hundred and four hundred contracts were entered into, scattered from Nova Scotia to British Columbia.

Mr. VENIOT: Did they advertise and call for tenders?

Mr. MANION: No, they did not, but advertising for tenders for ties is very much misunderstood. It is true that in past years they advertised for tenders, but they never paid any attention to the prices set out in those tenders. In other words, after receiving tenders the two railway companies usually got together and fixed the price of ties, and they did exactly the same thing this time. They did not call for tenders, the reason being that last year they bought four million ties and when they called for tenders they got tenders for sixty million ties. So they thought that when they were buying so few ties this year they would simply spread them out, largely using the lists they used in the past, with the help of people writing in from various sections of the country. In brief that is what was done.

Mr. POWER: May I ask if they secured two million ties?

Mr. MANION: They have not secured the ties but the contracts have been let.

Mr. POWER: For two million ties?

Mr. MANION: Yes, roughly; a little less, I believe, but in round figures the contracts are for two million ties. The contracts were let just as they have been let in the past; they were let by the railway and prices were fixed by the railway without consultation with myself or any other member of the government. I did not know what the price would be until it was fixed. Frankly I do not mind admitting that, according to reports I have received from some sections of the country, some of those prices are so low that the people making the ties claim they will not make anything out of it. I am told that quite a number of the contractors have taken these small contracts for the purpose of keeping their plants in operation and a certain number of men employed. I have been given that information by a number of contractors who have written in to say that the prices are so low they cannot make anything on them.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister any idea of the average price in any given locality?

Mr. MANION: I think I have it here, and perhaps later I will be able to find it. I cannot give the exact figure, but I think it is very much lower than the price of last year. If my hon. friend will take the figure of two million ties and divide it into the amount of something under $1,000,000, he will get a rough average figure himself. It works out to something less than 50 cents a tie on the average.

In brief that is the story. The reason I could not give any further information than I did give was because all that I had in regard to the ties was the order in council, which already had been tabled, which stated that ultimately the Canadian National Railways would be paid up to $1,300,000 for the purchase of these ties. Probably there will be some other questions asked during the discussion and I will look through my papers and gladly give any further information my hon. friends desire. I might add that when we came into power in 1930 the railways told me they had on hand something over twelve million ties. They use something like six million a year, so they had a supply more than sufficient for two years.

Mr. POWER: Is six million ties the normal yearly consumption?

Mr. MANION: That is what they tell me, although they are using fewer now because the ties last about three times as long now that many are creosoted.

Mr. REID: If this statement is correct I think the spread between the eight cents mentioned and the fifty two cent figure should be looked into. I know there is the cost of taking them to the siding, loading them and so on, but the price of eight cents is very low.

Mr. MANION: I cannot imagine that any such figure was given, unless it happened in this way: Some contractor may have secured a contract for ties and sublet it. He has probably financed the man getting out the ties, and perhaps when the man has finished he will get eight cents out of each tie. But the idea of eight cents being given for ties is so ridiculous that any man who would take a contract at that figure would be fit for a lunatic asylum.

Mr. POWER: That is only for making them.

Mr. MANION: Eight cents is ridiculously low. The average is fifty cents, and no one would take a contract at eight cents.

Mr. REID: Twenty cents has been the price paid to men hewing them in the woods.

Mr. VENIOT: A fair average price under present conditions would be twelve or thirteen cents per tie.

Mr. MANION: That is, clear.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I should like to justify further the attitude we have taken in this matter. After I had made the statement refusing to give the information, on the advice of the railways that it was not fair to them nor in the public interest to give that information, I had this question looked into and I found that the Hon. Mr. Robb had done exactly the same when in my position, as had also the Hon. Mr. Dunning.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But not under the unemployment relief act.

Mr. MANION: The conditions are exactly the same; the purchases were made by the railways, contracted for by them. So far as the railways are concerned, the conditions are exactly the same. We were giving the Canadian National Railways up to $1,300,000, and I am informed that the amount will probably be under $1,000,000. But so far as the refusal to give information is concerned, that refusal is based upon exactly the same grounds as in the past. I have here a memorandum with respect to the matter, which I shall put on the record:

On March 15, 1926, the late Hon. Mr. Robb, on behalf of the Minister of Railways, replied to a question by Mr. Donnelly, as to whether certain contracts for ties had been entered into with certain parties in New Brunswick, the number of ties, and also the price. Mr. Robb gave the information as to the contracts, and the number of ties contracted for, but as to price stated: "Not in the public interest to give information of this character."

That was the attitude I took. I believe that there were two questions, one by my hon. friend from New Westminster and one by the hon. member for Quebec South.

Mr. POWER: For some unaccountable reason the question was dropped from the order paper.

Mr. MANION: I had nothing to do with its being dropped from the order paper, but I presume the reason was that it was exactly the same as the question asked by the hon. member for New Westminster and which was voted down. I saw it myself and there was practically no difference between the two:

Similarly, on April 19, 1926, Hon. Mr. Dunning, as minister, replied to a question by Mr. Fraser as to tie purchases by Canadian National Railways in British Columbia. Mr. Dunning gave the number purchased, and the names of the parties supplying, but, in the matter of price, stated:

"It is not considered to be in the public interest to furnish this information."

On March 15, 1926, Hon. Mr. Robb, Acting Minister of Railways, dealt with the following question by Mr. Macdonald of Richmond—Hansard, 1530, 1926:

"1. What quantities and descriptions of material were bought for the use of the Canadian National Railways during the year 1925?

2. What portion of said goods were iron, steel or metal products and what textiles?

3. From whom were said goods purchased and at what prices?

4. What quantities of fuel and lubricating oils were purchased by the Canadian National Railways, where these purchased, what prices were paid, where was delivery made to the railways?

Hon. Mr. Robb: The Canadian National Railway board and management hold strongly that it is not in the public interest, and would be injurious to Canadian National Railways, to bring down information such as that sought by Mr. Macdonald, and having to do with the purchase of materials and supplies. Even were it a proper principle to adopt, it would be a matter of great difficulty and expense to compile such a statement. In addition, it is information which conceivably might result in increased prices of material and supplies, and consequent increased operating cost of the railway. It has been found that commercial houses and industrial organizations tendering on railway requirements hesitate to submit their best prices when there is likelihood of the same being divulged."

On the same page of Hansard, Mr. Johnstone asked for similar information as to coal purchases. Hon. Mr. Robb gave the names of the supplying companies, but as to the amount contracted for with each company, the price, and the tonnage actually taken, gave the following answer:

"2, 3 and 4. The management consider that it would not be in the public interest, would be injurious to National Railways, and an embarrassment in future negotiations to publish contracts, prices and deliveries, as called for by these questions."

Possibly these citations are sufficient to indicate the general attitude of the late government in regard to these matters.

Mr. VENIOT: There is a difference between the situation at that time and the situation to-day. At that time both railways were in competition in the purchase of ties, but in 1930 and 1931, owing to the depression, the railways got together and decided upon the same average price.

Mr. MANION: They have done so every year.

Mr. VENIOT: Not in 1925, 1926 and 1927.

Mr. MANION: I am informed that they did.

Mr. VENIOT: Then if they did, why did one railway more than another refuse to give the prices? It was not until 1930 that the two railways got together owing to depressed conditions.

Mr. MANION: I am informed differently. The management of the Canadian National Railways informed me that they have always done this, at least for some years, and certainly long before 1930.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a great difference between the two situations. With the position taken by the government and by its predecessor, that it would not be in the public interest that the Canadian National Railways should be compelled to divulge the prices paid for articles purchased by the railways in the ordinary course of administration, I entirely agree. It is a sound principle and I think it would be unfair to the Canadian National Railways if they were forced to divulge such prices. But surely that is not the situation to-day; the Canadian National Railways do not purchase these ties in the ordinary course of their operations. My hon. friend says that they were declining to buy any ties; they did not need any. They were given authority by this government to purchase these ties subject to the understanding that the government would pay for them out of the relief money provided for by this act. This is money which is voted by parliament, not by way of estimates but by special statute authorizing the government to spend certain sums for the purpose of relieving unemployment, and this committee has the right to have all the details precisely as if the money had been voted by an estimate. It cannot do any harm to the railways, nor can it give any advantage to their competitors. This is money given by the people of Canada to relieve unemployment, and surely we have the right to know how that money has been spent, who supplied the ties, and what prices were paid for them. Under the understanding given last session, the pledge given to parliament, we certainly have the right to request that all these particulars should be given the committee.

Mr. MANION: I do not see where the difference comes in. We have given information as regards what we have done or what we shall do with the money voted by parliament. We are giving certain money to the Canadian National Railways with which to buy ties, and they make their contracts exactly as they have done in the past. They make arrangements with dealers precisely as they have done heretofore and I know no reason why we should insist on their giving this year such details as they have refused to give in past years. So long as parliament knows that the money has been handed over to the Canadian National Railways, as it will know, unless there is a desire to attack the Canadian National Railways for the way in which they have spent it, there is no more reason for giving details this year than there was in the past. The hon. member for Quebec South asked a question in regard to the prices of ties. I am going to give the average prices paid in the past years, from 1923 on:

	Cents
1925	80
1926	76
1927	72
1928	78
1929	76
1930	75

The highest price paid was 80 cents, which was paid in 1925, and the lowest price paid between 1923 and 1932, a period of ten years, was the price paid this year. Surely it does not look as though there was anything to find fault with unless it is that the price is too low; certainly it has not been too high. May I add that private companies like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are not asked to give the details as to the people with whom they make their contracts or as to the different companies with whom they deal, and I do not think the Canadian National Railways should be put in a different position.

Mr. POWER: As I understand the precedents cited a few moments ago by the minister, they were to the effect that the government had power to give the names of the persons who had dealt with the Canadian National Railways but had not the power to give the prices paid for the goods. Did I understand the minister correctly?

Mr. MANION: That is apparently what was done in the past; the names were given.

Mr. POWER: Will the hon. minister give the committee the names?

Mr. MANION: I have not the names before me; I will make inquiries and if I can obtain them I have no objection to giving this information to the committee.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister should have them.

Mr. MANION: That is not what was asked; we were asked to give the names and the prices and to furnish copies of the contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am very glad to see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) present for once in his seat. The Minister of Railways is confusing two entirely different issues.

Mr. HACKETT: The Minister of Labour is in his seat every day all the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): One of these issues deals with the normal expenditure of certain moneys voted with regard to the Canadian National Railways. When certain criticism was made from this side of the house in connection with chapter 58, we were told that there were two different types of expenditure; there were expenditures directly under the control of the federal government, and there were expenditures under the joint control of the federal government and the various provincial governments. We asked specifically, not only last year but in 1930, that there should be control by the Auditor General of Canada over all funds, including those which are a direct national responsibility and those jointly controlled by the provinces and the dominion. The position was taken at that time by the Prime Minister, and possibly he was partly correct, that we had no authority to investigate the expenditures made by the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: Beyond being satisfied that the money was actually expended. That is, if we had cause to suspect that it was not being spent, then we could investigate. I elaborated upon the matter at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is quite satisfactory for the sake of my argument. Apart from the discussion in connection with railway ties, I contend that the Auditor General should satisfy himself, through the officers of the Department of Labour, who administer this fund, that this money has been properly expended by the province of British Columbia or any other province for the purpose for which it was voted by parliament.

The vote of $1,300,000 made for the Canadian National Railways had nothing whatever to do with the previous customs of this parliament in regard to votes of money for the national railway. I recall the words of the Prime Minister uttered when this special act was passed in 1930. He said that this government accepted the responsibility for all expenditures. The other day the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) asked the Minister of Railways for certain information in regard to the order in council which had been passed. Where did the authority for that order in council come from? It came from the clause in chapter 58 of the statutes of 1931 which deals with peace, order and good government. In other words, the minister derived a special authority from a special statute; under that special authority he passed a special order in council and under that special order in council a special expenditure was made. He now comes and tells this committee of the parliament of Canada that we are not entitled to the fullest information in regard to every single detail of that expenditure.

We have before us a very commendable document in the form of the report of the director of unemployment relief. This document gives a comprehensive analysis of all the expenditures made under the act of last year. Certain details are submitted for the information of hon. members who voted last year for chapter 58—some of us, of course, under compulsion—but I submit that we are entitled to receive the fullest information on all items. This report covers expenditures which were entirely national in character as well as those which were partly national and partly provincial. Details are given of special expenditures which were entirely national in character and with which the provinces were not concerned. The minister has stated that this item totalled less than a million dollars, but the order in council calls for two million ties at a cost not exceeding 65 cents each. I suggest that this committee is entitled to the fullest and most definite information in connection with this item. We are entitled to know the names of every single contractor for the supplying of ties to the Canadian National Railways. We are entitled to this information because this was a special act, passed under special conditions to deal with what the Prime Minister this afternoon has called a special emergency. We are entitled to know the names of the various station men who went out into the woods in the various provinces of Canada and—

Mr. BENNETT: The Canadian National Railways would not know that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They should know it.

Mr. BENNETT: How?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): If the right hon. gentleman was a business man, would he not know? Is there an hon. member in this committee who, if he were a business man looking after his business, would not know?

Mr. BENNETT: After the Scottish interruption, the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Prime Minister has stated that the Canadian National Railways would not have this information. I suggest that when the Minister of Railways recommended to the executive council, under the special authority which he had received, the passage of an order in council calling for the expenditure of $1,300,000, it was his duty to instruct the Canadian National Railways that the government of Canada would be responsible to parliament for a complete determination of every single item in the expenditure. He should have instructed the Canadian National Railways that in regard to this special vote, made under special conditions to meet a special emergency, they would be held accountable to the Canadian government and the Canadian people for every single cent expended.

Mr. MANION: All expenditures for the Canadian National Railways are dealt with in exactly the same way. At present there is before the house a bill asking for $61,500,000, and in that connection we ask for no more details than we do in this.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is different.

Mr. MANION: I do not see the difference. In connection with unemployment relief there has been passed to the Board of Railway Commissioners the sum of $500,000 for assistance in the construction of subways, and we have not the privilege of auditing that expenditure, unless for some special cause, so I understand. The same thing applies to various works in my hon. friend's province. This government has handed an immense amount of money to the province of British Columbia, which money is being dealt with by the province and by the municipalities, and we have no way quickly of auditing the expenditures. We get certified accounts. We handed over the money on the recommendation of the province, and we are in the same position in this regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am on record in Hansard as having stated in 1930 that this government could have insisted upon having complete control. I am certain that not a single province in the face of a national emergency would have resented in the slightest degree the most complete and paramount control over all expenditures made by the federal government. In the second place, my hon. friend has entirely evaded—I do not suggest deliberately—the point of my argument. The expenditures made under the special statute of last year to meet a special emergency must be completely dissociated from the practices and customs of former years.

Mr. MANION: The expenditures to which I have just referred are under this act. As regards the subways, it is impossible to get all the details.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then my argument applies in regard to subways as well as in regard to any other undertaking of the government under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. My argument is this: before we vote under this special statute to meet a special emergency any moneys for any enterprise—subways, Canadian National railways or any other body, including the provinces—we who are responsible here for federal expenditure demand a full, complete and rigid accounting of them. I still appeal to my hon. friend under this special condition to demand from the Canadian National Railways a full and complete report. They can easily, without violating any confidence or doing damage to the railways, disclose who the main contractors were. The main contractors can be corresponded with and they can supply the Canadian National Railways with complete information with regard to the various subcontractors. The subcontractors can be communicated with by the main contractors and the former can supply the information as to who the station men were. We can then find out the prices, spread, entire cost to the nation, and what the poor fellows for whose relief this act was designed, received for doing this work in connection with meeting a national emergency of unemployment.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock we were discussing the question of railway ties, and now that the Minister of Railways is in his seat I should like to ask one question. Would he have any objection if I were to ask the Canadian National Railways for information concerning ties, with special reference to prices and so on?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend has as much right as I have to communicate with the Canadian National Railways, and so far as I am concerned he may go ahead and get all the information he can.

Mr. REID: I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance which arises out of the controversy which has taken place between the province of British Columbia and the Dominion government in connection with moneys which have been sent. Moneys were sent by the Dominon government presumably to take care of not only provincial works, or of dominion commitments in connection with provincial works, but also of municipal works. Orders in council were not very explicit regarding the dominion's share of the municipal expenditures. The provincial government has consistently taken the stand that the order in council did not specifically state that these moneys were for the dominion proportion of municipal expenditures. Up to date there has been a total of $1,800,000 sent to the province of British Columbia. That province has taken and maintained the stand that the money sent was sent as the dominion's proportion of provincial expenditures only, and that none of the $1,800,000 sent by the dominion is to pay for any of the dominion's proportion of municipal expenditures. The sum of $1,800,000 is more than the commitment or agreement entered into by the dominion government with the province of British Columbia to be expended on provincial public works projects. The total schedules of work submitted by the government of British Columbia in conjunction with the dominion government was $3,250,000, fifty per cent of which was payable by the Dominion government. The total figure for the municipal program was $2,749,963, fifty per cent of which was payable by the dominion, 25 per cent by the province and 25 per cent by the municipalities. Some of the moneys sent to the province were to help the financing of both municipal and provincial programs. However, the $1,800,000 sent by the dominion is to pay, so the province maintains, for provincial works only, although it was understood when the orders in council were passed—and I have this on the word of the Minister of Labour—that it was to take care of all expenditures and commitments, both provincial and municipal. The question I had intended to ask the Prime Minister, which I shall ask the Minister of Finance is: In view of the fact that more money has been paid to the province than the sum for which the Dominion government is obligated, what will the attitude of the government be now? The sum of $1,625,000 is the exact amount for which this government is committed, and they have thus sent $200,000 in which the municipalities are not allowed to participate.

Mr. RHODES: Speaking from memory and without the figures before me, I would say that up to the point where they were precluded from sending further money, after the first of March, the dominion had discharged its complete obligation to the province of British Columbia. There was a matter of $500,000 in question, because a question arose with respect to an order in council which could not be approved prior to March 1. I can only repeat what the Prime Minister said earlier to-day, namely that in all cases we have dealt with the province only. We have made advances to it apart from our own obligations arising out of our share of unemployment relief works. Those advances made by the province against the security of treasury bills were to be dealt with by the province as between themselves and the municipalities, without our direction or control in any respect whatsoever.

Mr. REID: Due to the fact that the Prime Minister said I was delaying payment, I wish to make this statement. To date the province of British Columbia has received over $200,000 more than the dominion's commitment for provincial expenditures, and yet the municipalities are being denied any portion of this.

Mr. RHODES: The money which was loaned by the dominion to the provinces against the security of their treasury notes was intended to be advanced against the province's obligation—and that would apply also to the province's advances to the municipalities. We dealt only with the province. The question is one which rests between the municipalities and the province.

Mr. REID: I am afraid the minister has not grasped my point. The Dominion government has sent $200,000 more than the total commitment. If the federal government were sending the whole amount owing the province it would send the sum of $1,625,000, because the provincial program totalled $3,250,000. Now there has been sent $1,800,000 for provincial accounts, a sum which is $200,000 beyond the amount sufficient to settle the whole account.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is twisted.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, he is all wrong.

Mr. STEVENS: You are about three thousand miles out.

Mr. REID: Well, the minister will have a chance to tell us after I sit down.

Mr. STEVENS: I have been listening to my hon. friend's chatter for some time.

Mr. REID: There is another matter I should like to have cleared up. The figures I have given were supplied to me by the Minister of Labour, and if any hon. member doubts them I have a spare copy. They are also contained in the report of the dominion director of unemployment relief, and I state emphatically that the amount is $1,800,000. If my hon. friends turn to page 11 they will find that the dominion contribution to the province of British Columbia is $1,374,985.50. That is the total money the dominion will pay for all municipal works. Then in the next column we find the dominion expenditure for provincial works is $24,129.50, for provincial highways, $1,098,870.50, for trans-Canada highways, $502,000. If hon. members care to add these figures they will find that my statement is correct, and that the total program in the province of British Columbia is roughly $3,000,000, half of which is payable by the dominion, or the sum of about $1,600,000. Why, therefore, should $1,800,000 have been sent for provincial undertakings only?

Mr. BENNETT: The whole $3,000,000 had to be provided by the dominion.

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: So that the sum which British Columbia has received, $1,800,000, is still $1,200,000 short of what is required to enable British Columbia to discharge its obligations to the municipalities and provide for its own work. It is because they are unable to get the money that we were to loan them that they are in their present predicament. That is what I meant when I spoke to the hon. gentleman before.

Mr. REID: I still maintain the province have $200,000 more than is coming to them for their program of unemployment relief work.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. REID: Yes. They could easily have paid the municipalities because they have received plenty of money with which to pay. The reason the moneys have not been paid is known to nearly everybody in British Columbia. However, I shall leave that phase of the matter and address a few questions to the Minister of Public Works, in spite of the fact that the Prime Minister has said that we are delaying the progress of this bill. I am going to ask the Minister of Public Works regarding some expenditures under the direct relief program. I ask the minister for particulars concerning a building which was erected at Salmon Arm at a cost of $22,000.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): At what page does my hon. friend find that item?

Mr. REID: At page 67 of the report of the dominion director of unemployment relief.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The building has not yet been constructed.

Mr. REID: Has it not been constructed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. REID: But there is an appropriation made?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That public building was in the schedule of authorized works, but after investigation there was a decision not to undertake the work.

Mr. REID: Is there any intention to undertake it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Not under the unemployment relief program; it will have to come in the regular estimates.

Mr. REID: I see there are many items for public buildings erected in Ontario. Have any of those buildings been constructed? I have a reason for asking these questions.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): With the exception of a building in the city of Windsor upon which construction has begun, I do not think any public buildings have been constructed under the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. Other work consisted of repairs, alterations and improvements, which were undertaken because representations were made that carpenters, plumbers and other tradesmen needed work. To afford them some relief we made repairs to public buildings on a pretty generous scale. As my hon. friend will see, these repairs were made to public buildings throughout Ontario and the other provinces wherever we could do the work within the time.

Mr. REID: I am fairly well satisfied by the minister's answer, because when I wrote the department with respect to a post office at New Westminster I was informed that no new buildings would be undertaken under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. It is interesting to know we are all being treated in the same way. Yesterday afternoon the minister gave the house a letter, dated November 25, that was sent to all district engineers telling them that no applicants for employment should be discriminated against on political or religious grounds. Among the many projects which I submitted to the dominion director was one for work at White Rock amounting to $6,300. On hearing that the work was under way I paid a visit to the district and found six men on the job—men who I knew were not actually destitute or in need of relief. The foreman told me he had received his position from the district engineer at New Westminster, Mr. Worsfold. I proceeded to New Westminster and asked Mr. Worsfold who had given him the names of those men on the ground that they required relief. After a little hesitation he told me the local Conservative committee had done so. When I pressed him he admitted that he had got the names from the defeated Conservative candidate who had secured them from the Conservative organization. I claim that is a direct breach of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. I know that in past times there have been such instances of party patronage on both sides, I am frank to admit that, but under this statute a man's religious or political convictions were not to be held against him in the granting of relief. Some men appealed to me for relief and I referred them to the local Conservative committee. When they went there they were told they were out of luck. The minister may ask why I did not write him at the time with regard to this irregularity. Directly I knew of it I appealed to Mr. McGeough, of Vancouver. He found my statements were correct and he objected to those men being put on the job, and towards the end the irregularity was rectified to some extent. Then the local branch of the Legion was given power to list men. I have absolute proof of what I say; I am not speaking from hearsay. I would ask that the minister investigate this matter, and if he finds what I have stated is not correct I shall be glad to make a retraction in this house.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In some way, directly or indirectly, it came to the attention of the department that there was some complaint in connection with this work. If I misunderstand my hon. friend I shall be very glad to be corrected, but I do not understand him to say that any of the men should not have been so employed. The report I have received is that the investigating officer went to my hon. friend and asked him to give the names of men to be put on this work, but he declined to do so.

Mr. REID: I certainly did. That is not my function, Mr. Chairman. I submit that it is not the duty of a member of parliament to furnish the names of men who should be given employment. Had I done so I would have been challenged in this house for giving the names of Liberals. I told the engineer, "It is your duty to go to the municipal authorities or to the municipal hall and find out what men are destitute and in need of employment." I take pride in saying that I did not suggest one name to him. I am glad to see that the minister has had some report, because the facts are exactly as I have stated them.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The facts are exactly as I have stated them, too. My hon. friend is now seeking to leave the impression that there was some political intrigue in connection with this work.

Mr. REID: I am not blaming the minister, I am blaming the district engineer.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The officer who employed the men engaged on this work acted perfectly fairly when he asked my hon. friend to nominate men. Surely there can be no complaint as to that?

Mr. REID: When I objected to the district engineer going to the local Conservative patronage committee to name men for the job I said to him, "You will hear more of this," and left his room. He ran out to me at the elevator and pleaded with me not to take any action.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Shall the section carry?

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, before this bill passes I wish to refer to certain remarks made by the right hon. Prime Minister. If I caught his words correctly, he said that accounts on finished work in conjunction with the provinces and the municipalities had not been paid up to date by reason of the fact that this bill had not yet gone through this house.

Mr. BENNETT: That is so with respect to a large number of them.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not true of the county of Gloucester, nor is it true entirely of the province of New Brunswick, because the auditor of the provincial accounts has shown that at the end of the fiscal year of the province, October 31, there was somewhere around $170,000 of accounts submitted for payment with respect to work completed. The federal contribution of $7,500 for work done in the town of Bathurst had not been paid up to Easter, although the accounts were submitted some time ago. The information given the secretary treasurer of the town of Bathurst was to the effect that as soon as the order in council could be passed the Dominion government would forward the $7,500 to the provincial government, who in turn would forward it to the town of Bathurst. When I was home at Easter I looked into this matter further and found that so far as they were aware in Bathurst no order in council had been passed authorizing payment of the $7,500, but the letter remains there stating that as soon as an order in council can be passed the account will be paid. That work was completed in the first week of December; the account was sent to the provincial authorities at Fredericton, who forwarded it to Ottawa, and the acknowledgment of its receipt is on file. But no payment has been made, so in connection with the county of Gloucester the statement made by the Prime Minister is not exactly correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say it was true in every instance.

Mr. VENIOT: You said it was true in most instances.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said, either.

Mr. VENIOT: The same thing applies to the entire province of New Brunswick. A question was asked in the house as to how much was still due the province of New Brunswick on work accomplished in connection with projects which had been approved, and I think the answer was $171,000. That amount was due long before March 1. Those accounts were not paid, though they could have been paid before the bill lapsed.

Then the Prime Minister referred to the statement I made in reference to the $58,000 unexpended by the Department of Public Works in connection with the Shippigan island wharf, and he said that I wished to make political capital of it. I should like to direct his attention to the words I actually used:

> I do not wish to imply that the approval of this work was made public for any effect it might have had in the by-election, but the fact is that this knowledge that it had been approved came up at the time.

I distinctly stated that I did not wish to leave the impression that politics was involved, and I said that because the matter came under the direction of the federal Department of Public Works and I felt, in view of the splendid treatment accorded me by the Minister of Public Works, that he would not allow Conservatives in the county of Gloucester to play politics in this regard.

Leaving aside the political point, the reason given as to why the work was not proceeded with was that the estimate was $30,000, the amount approved for the project was $15,000, and the work could not be completed before March 1, when chapter 58 lapsed. Let me ask the Prime Minister, as well as the Minister of Public Works, if that is so, why the work at Negro Point was proceeded with, in the province of New Brunswick. The estimate was $22,000; only $12,772 was spent, and the work is not completed. I direct attention to Burnt Church in Northumberland county; $20,000 was the estimate, $11,013 was spent to February 29, and the work has not been completed. Then there is North Sydney, where the estimate was $22,000, where $16,109 was spent, and where the work has not been completed. There is the immigration hospital in Quebec; the estimate was $12,000, the work has not been completed and $7,174 was expended. There is Haileybury, in Ontario, where the estimate was $67,000, where only $17,809 was spent to February 29, and where the work is not one-fourth completed. There is the dredging at Port Hope; $35,000 was the estimate, the work is not completed and only $23,968 has been spent. Take the national research building in Ottawa; the estimate was $40,000, of which only $12,262 has been spent, and I have reason to believe that the work is not one-half or one-quarter finished. Take Point Tupper wharf; $24,000 was the estimate, $16,787 was expended and the work is not completed. If the government say that these works are completed, what must we say about the estimates of the cost? If, on the other hand, matters can be carried on in that way in Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia, why could not the work to which I referred be begun last fall? After referring to these other items the excuse that the estimate was $30,000 and the work could not be completed before March 1 does not hold water, and I think an injustice has been done the county of Gloucester. When I heard the right hon. the Prime Minister give that reason I thought to myself that it was different from or perhaps in addition to, the reason given by the Minister of Public Works.

The Prime Minister must have thought that the reason given by the Minister of Public Works was not sufficient, but when I examined the report of the dominion director of unemployment relief I found that my section of New Brunswick certainly had not been treated in a just and proper way. I am almost driven to believe that this work was stopped for other reasons which have not been given us.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Shady reasons.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I would not use that expression; I would be told I was using unparliamentary language. There is enough shadiness in the atmosphere outside without bringing any into the house. I was surprised to hear the Minister of Labour heatedly make the statement that not one concrete case of dissatisfaction with regard to the expenditure of relief money had been submitted to him. I do not know whether or not any case has been submitted to him directly, but I do know that in one instance twenty-one concrete cases of complaints were submitted to the Department of Labour and I know those complaints were received by the department. I hold in my hand five pages of closely typewritten foolscap containing complaints and charges. From my seat in this house, I say that I put my seat at stake to prove these charges.

Mr. PRICE: Will the hon. gentleman say by what authority he makes that statement?

Mr. VENIOT: I do not need to satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PRICE: You will need to before you get through.

Mr. VENIOT: I make this statement with regard to the charges I have made in this house, that I am prepared to stand by them, at least to the extent of ninety per cent, and to put my seat at stake.

Mr. PRICE: The statements are absolutely incorrect and I have the proof.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, you don't know what you are talking about; sit down.

Mr. PRICE: I have the proof that they are absolutely incorrect. Is that good enough for you?

Mr. VENIOT: Now, sir—

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): What are the dates?

Mr. PRICE: The statements are absolute bunk and I have the proof right here. I have the proof from the Premier of the province of New Brunswick that your statements are absolutely incorrect. How do you like that?

Mr. VENIOT: I like the voice better than I like the man. I think nothing of the man; the voice is rather sweeter than the hon. gentleman. Now, sir, these statements were laid before the Department of Labour. But let me go back of the statement and remind the house that last session I read seven affidavits which set forth the padding of pay sheets.

Mr. PRICE: You have pulled this stuff long enough.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Order.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member for Westmorland has not the courage to deliver a speech. He has not done so since I have been occupying a seat in this house, at least not this session.

Mr. PRICE: Just speak the truth.

Mr. VENIOT: If he can make himself known to his constituents only by means of interruptions, I think it is your duty, Mr. Chairman, to call him down and make him keep his place. As I was saying, last session I read in this house seven affidavits with reference to the cutting out of work on unemployment relief through federal aid under the authority given in the month of September.

Mr. PRICE: And it has been well done.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. gentleman keep quiet?

Mr. PRICE: It has been well done. You have more than is coming to you in Gloucester county.

Mr. VENIOT: I wonder whether my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Gott) has any more onions. He might send some over to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GOTT: Hon. members opposite must all be hungry. The hon. member for Témiscouata has just cried out for steak, while the ex-Postmaster General seeks more onions—an excellent combination used extensively throughout the Dominion of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

An hon. MEMBER: Onions and beefsteak go well together.

Mr. VENIOT: As I was saying, the affidavits in question were personally presented by me to the then acting Minister of Labour, now Minister of Labour, after I had read them in the house, and he refused to take them. He said he would have nothing whatever to do with them; he told me to keep them. He said, in effect, "You keep them and give me the devil to eat to-morrow on the floor of the house". I said I would keep the affidavits since he would not take them. What has resulted since that time? At that time I also stated that two of the men accused in these affidavits of padding pay sheets in connection with federal aid were then under investigation by the provincial government, accused of padding pay sheets for provincial work. The investigation has been completed and the royal commissioner has submitted his report to the local legislature. It appeared in the papers yesterday that the individuals against whom the affidavits I read were made have been found guilty. One of them has been found guilty of stealing $4,000. That same individual had the expenditure of federal aid money and in the month of December, 1930, he returned a pay sheet to the provincial government for federal aid to the extent of $350, not one bit of work having been done for that amount of money. I read affidavits from men whose names were on that pay sheet for December, wherein they swear that they never did work and never saw cheques for the amounts opposite their names. Yet the minister stands up here and says that no concrete cases have been laid before him. The gentleman he sent down to the county of Gloucester to investigate did investigate some cases and he came back here and intimated that he would make no report on the cases he had investigated because they did not come under the federal aid but involved provincial money. The other night I proved from documentary evidence submitted to the legislature of New Brunswick that on every one of those roads I had mentioned in my complaint federal money had been expended; yet that gentleman reports to his minister that these works do not come under federal aid. I do not know where he got his information, but whoever gave it to him led him astray.

I am going to read some of the concrete cases I laid before the department. Here are the details of one in particular. The Blue Cove road is on the federal list which I read the other night. The Blue Cove road was reported by Mr. Carter not to have received any federal expenditures. The Minister of Public Works of New Brunswick, at the request of one of the members of the legislature, submitted the list I have here, giving the names of the roads on which federal money was expended, and this road is among them. Now what are the facts? The supervisor was one Omer Blanchard, a man living five miles away from the road, in another district; yet under the act it is stipulated that the work shall be carried on wherever possible by residents of the district. This man was taken from another district and brought in to do the work. This man refused work to Liberals —now this is political, this end of it—the day after the election; he said, "Not a damned Liberal will get work". He also refused certain men the right to sign their work slips. Incensed by the treatment given them by this supervisor, a number of men went to work in spite of him; but when told that they would not be paid they stopped working. In discussing the situation with the supervisor, some of the men to whom he had refused work because of their politics asked him why no such discrimination was made by him in the St. Leolin district, which is six miles further west. He replied that that district had given a majority to the Conservative candidate while Blue Cove had given a majority against him. Now Mr. Carter, the gentleman sent by the department to investigate upon my complaint, has in his possession the evidence of thirty men to prove that every word stated here is true. After seeing these men he called upon the supervisor. The supervisor, as he was alone with Mr. Carter, attempted to deny the statements of some thirty men. Now there is a concrete case for the department. They have the evidence obtained by Mr. Carter. Oh, it may be said, you have this merely from hearsay. I had that from the lips of Mr. Carter when he returned from Blue Cove after I had given him the names of the witnesses. Mr. Carter had in his note books the names of the gentlemen who had given him this information, and yet he refrains from submitting his report to this house.

There are other cases just as bad as this. There is a case in a certain district where the supervisor went to a man working on the roads two or three days before October 26, the by-election day, and said to him, "If you will vote for the Conservative candidate in the provincial by-election I will guarantee you $20 worth of work after the election." The man refused and said, "I cannot; I am a Liberal and I cannot support a Conservative candidate." This man got off the day of the election in order to vote and when he came back to work the next day he was discharged. There is no hearsay about these statements; this man has made an affidavit and is prepared to swear to it in any court of justice.

There is another case down at Shippigan island. An individual wanted to get work but was turned down because he was a Liberal. He went to work in spite of this refusal but at midday of the second day the foreman came to him and showed him a letter signed by the defeated Conservative candidate in the provincial elections of 1930 stating that if he continued to work he would receive no pay.

I want to be fair with these things. I am not blaming the Department of Labour for what has taken place, but I do say that when these things were discovered, when they were reported by me as being true on my word of honour as a member of this house, they should have been investigated to the full. But this was not done and that is why I blame the department. Whose word was taken for the statement that this was not federal aid, I do not know. I repeat, and

I cannot repeat it too often, that the men in Gloucester county who were under the control of the provincial Department of Public Works used the federal aid money as a campaign fund and political machine. I will ask the Minister of Labour—

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is not here.

Mr. VENIOT: It will reach him—let him read Hansard to-morrow. I will ask the Minister of Labour, now that he has the evidence that federal aid was expended on these roads, that he obtain from Mr. Carter his reports on the old Miramichi road, on the Blue Cove road, on the Bennie Petre road, the south Bathurst and other roads. I was going to refer also to the roads north and south of the Tracadie river, but Mr. Carter reports that he saw only one individual and he was not able to obtain any information. In these cases where he was not able to obtain sufficient evidence the minister should have him return and make a further attempt, but the evidence already obtained should be reported to this house. If that is done it will be seen that it bears out what I have said to-day.

Take the cases of the old Miramichi road or the east Bathurst road, so-called, which Mr. Carter said was not under federal aid. This project is under federal aid, because the provincial Minister of Public Works has stated that practically $14,000 of federal aid was expended as compared to only $5,000 of provincial aid. This was the reply made in the legislature of New Brunswick. Mr. Carter had my report in which I stated that the men who were on the pay-roll on October 26 had not worked. I suggested to him that he look into this matter, and he did so. He found out that there were men on the pay-roll on October 26 who had not worked. He went to the chief timekeeper who told him he could not understand how it was. The chief timekeeper's name is also on that pay-roll, and he stood all day at the polls corralling the men off the road and keeping them there all day in order to vote. Yet he does not understand how it was they were not working. He sent Mr. Carter to a young school boy of seventeen years of age who was acting as assistant timekeeper. This boy told Mr. Carter that he had put the names of these men who had not worked upon the pay-roll under the instructions of his father and William Gallagher. Is it true that these pay-rolls are padded? Replying on March 22, as reported in the St. John Telegraph-Journal, to a statement made by me in this house on February 8, the provincial Minister of Public Works stated that while it was true a number of men had been on the pay-roll on October 26, when it was discovered that they had not worked their names were erased. This goes to prove the statements I made to the Department of Labour, at least in that respect. It goes to prove also that those who had charge of the work—I do not know whether they received instructions from the provincial department or from anybody else—did not hesitate for a moment to use federal money as a campaign fund. Is it any wonder I take such a strong stand against allowing the provincial department to handle this money any longer when the Minister of Public Works has had three or four of the supervisors in his own county of Restigouche reported upon by a royal commission as having stolen some $7,960 of the public moneys expended on the roads in that county?

I take this matter up to-night in order to justify the position I took on March 8. At that time I referred to the expenditure of money in the county of St. John and stated that much of the money had been expended before the projects had been approved. I stated further that the projects approved between November, 1930, and March, 1931, and those approved on November 25, 1931,—I was then referring to the first project—had been held over until the by-election took place. If I am not mistaken, the projects in the county of St. John were approved of in February, 1931, and some of the money was expended. Everybody in New Brunswick admits that at that time unemployment was very acute in the county of St. John, and especially in the parishes of Simonds and Lancaster, yet $7,300 of that money was withheld and not expended until June, the month of the St. John county by-election, which took place on June 29, 1931. I have, from the pay sheets of the New Brunswick Department of Public Works, direct evidence of that expenditure of $7,300 being upheld until June.

I further stated that large amounts of money were expended before the projects were submitted to the Department of Labour, and I have the proof of that from the pay sheets of the New Brunswick Department of Public Works. In September, 1931, they spent $13,168; in October, $17,093; in November, $7,863, and yet the projects were not approved until November 26. Therefore in that respect I have substantiated the statement I made on the floor of the house.

I wish to go back to the expenditures made in the county of Gloucester. There has been submitted by the New Brunswick Department of Public Works to the provincial legislature, expenditures under federal aid amounting to some $26,000 or $27,000 more than the amount involved in the projects approved by the Department of Labour. How in the face of this can the provincial government continue spending still further beyond the amount involved in the projects so approved? Under those conditions, with the knowledge I have of the loose way in which this money has been expended in my province, might I be permitted to say to the Minister of Labour that, if the government will not change its methods of expending that money in the provinces, he have an official of his department examine very carefully the projects submitted before one dollar is spent, and that, if the accounts submitted to the New Brunswick legislature show that there was expended under federal aid by them $26,000 more than is involved in the projects approved, the provincial government be called upon to reimburse that amount to the federal exchequer.

There are other matters to which I should like to refer, but I do not wish to delay at any greater length the passing of this measure through committee. We have been accused of obstruction. May I say to the Prime Minister and his followers that as regards my opposition to this measure, obstruction has been furthest from my mind; but if my hon. friends opposite wish to issue the challenge to us and go to the country on it, we are prepared to meet them and to take our chances then. We have endeavoured to enlighten the people of Canada as to the manner in which the federal government is attempting to usurp the powers that belong to parliament and to parliament alone.

If I may judge from what I have heard said by those whom I have met during the Easter holidays, Conservatives as well as Liberals, they contend that the government has gone too far in usurping those powers; that apparently it mistrusts parliament; that it wishes to have in its own hands the carrying out of matters under this act. Some years ago we heard of a "whisper of death;" now we hear a whisper going among the people, asking: What have the government in mind? Why are they adopting such drastic measures? Why do they wish to become absolute as a cabinet in carrying on relief work? Many of our Conservative friends are beginning to be anxious, suspicious.

Mr. JONES: We are not worried.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend says: "We are not worried." I think he will have a greater worry than I when the time comes for us to explain our conduct to our electors. I suppose the hon. gentleman need not worry very much. He is one of those who has benefited by the reduced stumpage given by the government of New Brunswick.

Mr. JONES: That statement is absolutely incorrect and my hon. friend knows it.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman says that is absolutely incorrect. Did he not cut on crown lands?

Mr. JONES: Not one stick, nor did I receive any benefit from anything I operated on my own private land.

Mr. VENIOT: I shall take the hon. gentleman's word for that, but let me say this, that the firm of Jones Brothers apparently is doing some business with the Department of Indian Affairs. My hon. friend will not deny that, and he will not deny that in 1926, before a court of disclosure, he swore that Jones Brothers was himself and himself alone.

Mr. JONES: I never made any such statement.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend did.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot take back what I said, because I have the record of the court.

Mr. JONES: The hon. member cannot produce any record that will verify his statement.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The hon. member must accept the word of the hon. member for Royal.

Mr. VENIOT: The Chairman says that under the practice of the house I must accept the statement of the hon. member for Royal. I obey the practice, but I stand by the sworn statement given before the court by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the hon. gentleman should not be allowed to do this sort of thing.

Mr. VENIOT: I shall take back the statement I made, but I say that I have in my possession such a record, and I do not have to take that back.

Mr. QUINN: What about the pronouncement from Athabaska?

Mr. VENIOT: That is the first crowing I have heard since Athabaska spoke. I am sure other Conservative back benchers will not brag very much when they look at the record of the vote. It takes my hon. friend from down east—

Mr. QUINN: Yes, from Halifax.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, it takes my hon. friend from Halifax to do the crowing for the Tories in Ontario and the west, because I am sure they were not encouraged to crow when they heard the results of that election.

Mr. QUINN: By the way, what was my hon. friend's majority down in Gloucester? Was it not only thirty-five?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver)): It was enough to bring him here.

Mr. VENIOT: Two hundred and fifty-one.

Mr. QUINN: Oh, no.

Mr. CANTLEY: No.

Mr. VENIOT: I hear the hon. member for Pictou crowing, my old friend from Pictou. I admire his constituency because I was brought up down there. Perhaps it is because of my relations with the Scotch people in Pictou that I am so chary about giving advice.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell us all about the post office.

Mr. QUINN: It is a long way from Gloucester to Pictou.

Mr. VENIOT: The people sent for me; that is more than they would do for you. Since the interruptions are growing I think I shall continue a little longer. I am giving an opportunity to some hon. gentlemen opposite to blow off some of the steam which formed at the time of the Athabaska election.

An hon. MEMBER: Better steam than hot air.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not hear any bragging, with the exception of the hon. member for Halifax. Of course he lives away down by the sea, and when he comes to Ottawa and is free from the foggy atmosphere—

Mr. QUINN: Very good.

Mr. VENIOT: When he finds himself in the clear atmosphere of the Gatineau he wants to toot his horn. Without being discourteous to the people of Halifax may I say that owing to the fog so prevalent in that district, and which condition applies also to St. John, they have become used to the blowing of the fog whistle. Then, when they find themselves in a clear atmosphere they are lonesome, and in order to remind themselves of home they blow their own horns.

Mr. QUINN: You are a pretty good fog horn.

Mr. VENIOT: That is all I have to say just now.

Mr. PRICE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the floor for a few moments. I am very much concerned with my hon. friends opposite who have been doing so much talking, and I feel inclined to say a few words to them. First may I tell them that through their debate on the relief measures they are holding up both the house and the country. The present administration has done everything possible to better the unemployment situation in Canada. The legislation passed by this government has tended to improve that unfortunate condition, and there has been an honest endeavour to alleviate suffering.

Hon. members opposite have criticized the administration; that is their duty. Help yourselves; this administration will survive, and when the next opportunity arrives it will carry the country. People in Canada have too much common sense to listen to the objections of hon. members opposite. The opposition have nothing to offer; they have been obstructing in every possible way, shape and form.

At this point I should like to take my old friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) to task. He has made some comments concerning remarks by the Premier of New Brunswick. Turning to page 944 of Hansard for the current session I find that the hon. member for Gloucester told in flowery language what the Premier of New Brunswick had said. When the hon. member made the statement on March 8 of this year I took objection, and stated I did not believe the hon. member's statement was correct. I feel there is no occasion to hurry, because hon. members will agree I have taken very little time in the debates of this house. I quote from the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester, in which he sets forth statements by the Premier of New Brunswick:

He said. "Not a single Liberal will have any part of this unemployment work. It is Doctor Coffyn"—

Spelled C-o-f-f-y-n.

—who was the provincial government candidate —"that will look after it and not P. J. Veniot."

That partisanship was carried on throughout the length and breadth of the county of Gloucester. There was a by-election in that county; the premier of New Brunswick addressed a public meeting in the town of Bathurst on the Friday night before the election and said:

And at this point I wish to explain that what I am about to read are remarks attributed to the Premier of New Brunswick by the hon. member for Gloucester.

We do not want Doctor Coffyn elected in Gloucester because we need his vote to maintain the government in power. We want him elected so that he will have reason to do something big for Gloucester county along the lines of the unemployment relief aid to be given by the federal government and the province of New Brunswick.

There was a bribe held out to the electors of that county; they were told that unless Doctor Coffyn was elected, unless they returned a man who was favourable to the government, the government would measure the relief to be doled out in Gloucester county by the actions of the electors on polling day.

Now, to go a little further:

Mr. Price: I don't believe the premier ever made such a statement.

Now the hon. member for Gloucester:

Mr. Veniot: And I know you would say, if he did make it, that he had no right to make it, wouldn't you?

Mr. Price: I would simply say just now that he didn't make it.

Mr. Veniot: He did make it. The hon. gentleman has no right under the rules of the house to question my veracity.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, we will just get after his veracity. It has been the privilege in days gone by for the hon. member for Gloucester to make statements in the provincial house, and as he waved papers to declare "I hold the records right here in my hand." But the records did not amount to anything. And he did not have anything of record when he made that statement on the floor of this house. I wish to tell the hon. member for Gloucester that I have communicated with the hon. Premier of New Brunswick. I want it to be clearly and distinctly understood by this house that for future reference—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PRICE: All right. I want it to be clearly and distinctly understood that for future reference this is going on Hansard right now. At page 944 of Hansard the member for Gloucester is reported as follows:

There was a by-election in that county; the Premier of New Brunswick addressed a public meeting in the town of Bathurst on the Friday night before the election, and said:—

An hon. MEMBER: What about the letter?

Some hon. MEMBERS: What did he say?

Mr. PRICE: I do not wish to discuss what was done in the county of Gloucester, but if at any time a man ever had occasion to keep quiet it was the member for Gloucester in consideration of what had been done for his county by the present administration; the expenditures not only by this government but by the previous administration have been enormous. We on this side of the house supporting the present government have never criticized those expenditures because of the fact that the little province of New Brunswick was being benefited. I wish also to say to him at this time that so far as the expenditures at Aboujagan and Barachois are concerned, we are willing that they should be investigated, when we shall be able to show that Liberals as well as Conservatives have been given every consideration with respect to unemployment, and that the relief was distributed in a fair and well-measured way.

Mr. VENIOT: What are you kicking about, then?

An hon. MEMBER: What about the letter?

Mr. PRICE: Here is what the hon. Premier of New Brunswick, Mr. Richards, was supposed to have said. I am so delighted to see the hon. minister for Gloucester county in his seat—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PRICE: —for this is really funny. This is what was purported to have been said by the Premier of New Brunswick:

We do not want Doctor Coffyn elected in Gloucester because we need his vote to maintain the government in power.

Quite true; there is no doubt he made that statement, for he did not require Doctor Coffyn, having already a real working majority. But, according to the hon. member for Gloucester, this is what the premier said:

We want him elected so that we will have reason to do something big for Gloucester county along the lines of the unemployment relief aid to be given by the federal government and the province of New Brunswick.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PRICE: That is what the hon. member for Gloucester quoted, but let me tell him, he laughs best who laughs last. After quoting that statement the hon. member added:

There was a bribe held out to the electors of that county;—

And so forth. The Premier of New Brunswick has the confidence of the province from one end to the other, and I presume he will continue to have that confidence for some years to come. He is a very capable administrator and is conducting the affairs of the province in a business-like way. He writes to me:

The first sentence of the remarks which Mr. Veniot imputes to me is substantially correct;

What is the first sentence?

We do not want Doctor Coffyn elected in Gloucester because we need his vote to maintain the government in power.

Now, what did Premier Richards say? In his letter to me he continues:

The rest is altogether incorrect. I made no reference whatever to Dr. Coffyn in connection with unemployment relief work. I did say that Mr. Veniot was endeavouring to claim credit for the carrying on of relief work because he had been asked, in common with all members of the federal house, to make suggestions to the Minister of Labour; that I understood he was exhibiting this letter for the purpose of indicating to the electors that he was responsible for the obtaining and carrying on of the relief work. I pointed out that, on the other hand, the letter which he had was only the letter which had been sent to every member of the House of Commons and that, as a matter of fact, the administration of relief work in the provinces was within the jurisdiction of the provincial government; mentioning, at the same time, of course, that the Dominion government was contributing a certain proportion of the cost of such work,—twenty-five per cent in the cities and towns where the municipalities themselves were contributing, and forty or fifty per cent where the work was a provincial undertaking.

I may add that three other members of the provincial government were present at this meeting, seated on the platform during the time I was speaking; namely, Messrs. Stewart, Léger and Harrison. They confirm the statement which I make.

Now, I would advise the hon. member for Gloucester to be careful of his statements on the floor of this house. Let him be very careful of his facts before he goes ahead and makes remarks which are absolutely unreliable, remarks which I believe he knows are absolutely irresponsible, and which evidently are made only in an endeavour to injure this administration.

In conclusion I want to tell the hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that when they again come into the county of Westmorland they had better be careful of the statements they make, because I have as much support from the French-Canadians as has the hon. member for Gloucester, and I want him to understand that nothing will be tolerated in my county unless based on facts; he cannot palm off that hearsay stuff in Westmorland. Right now the hon. member for Gloucester knows he dare not go to Aboujagan and Barachois, he dare not go to Cape Tormentine and Cape Bald, and repeat the statements he has made in this house, because the administration to-day is spending money to help the fishermen in the county of Westmorland —something which the previous administration never did. We are spending money judiciously and in the best interests of the people. I want to tell the hon. member that if he takes his friends and goes to the people of Westmorland county and does what he is doing at the present time hoping to help the Liberal party, his efforts will be absolutely futile. The hon. member has endeavoured to belittle the people of Westmorland county, the poor people in the fishing districts who are trying to get a few dollars to help them through the winter; he has endeavoured to show that improper expenditures have been made.

Mr. VENIOT: Never said a word about it.

Mr. PRICE: That will be the result if you do the same thing in the county of Westmorland.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not going to bother answering the tirade of the hon. member, but he purported to read a letter from the Premier of New Brunswick. As far as I could understand it, in that letter the premier denied having made a statement which I attributed to him. I wish to say here and now, Mr. Chairman, that I was present when the Premier of New Brunswick made that statement, and I can support what I am saying now by the testimony of two reporters who took verbatim accounts of his speech. Therefore I stand by what I said, in spite of the hon. member for Westmorland.

Mr. SANDERSON: I want to ask the Minister of Public Works just one or two questions in regard to some of the undertakings in Ontario. I think he mentioned a little earlier in the evening that no public buildings were constructed under the unemployment relief proposals. Is that correct?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think that is correct.

Mr. SANDERSON: In ten or twelve places throughout the province repairs are being made or have been made to public buildings. Were tenders called for in each case?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: Public tenders were called for in each instance?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Not public tenders. Those who were in the line of work required were invited to tender, not by public tender but according to the regularly established practice that has prevailed in the department for many years. Following that practice, the architect looks after the tenders secured in this way, in exactly the same way that was adopted by my predecessor.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then I take it that tenders were not advertised; is that right?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think they were in some cases; I could not say offhand.

Mr. SANDERSON: When tenders were not advertised how did the department arrive at a decision as to who should carry on the work?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have told my hon. friend that the course which has been followed for years was adopted in these cases. The architect in charge of maintenance would communicate with the different tradesmen in the particular town who were interested in that kind of work, and they would be asked to tender for the work. There might be some small expenditure where that course was not adopted, but we are carrying on with the same staff and following the same methods—and they are good methods—for getting this work done reasonably, efficiently, promptly and in the public interest.

Mr. SANDERSON: I quite understand what the minister says as to what was done formerly, but this work is being done under rather different circumstances. This is unemployment relief, and while the minister did not say so I presume he meant that the sitting member for the constituency, if he were a government supporter, recommended a certain firm or firms to do the work, and that where a Liberal member sat for the constituency the defeated candidate made the recommendation. Is that correct?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, you are not absolutely right in that.

Mr. SANDERSON: Am I partly right?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know whether you are or not because the architect is quite free to get tenders wherever he thinks proper and wherever he thinks he can get the best results.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is he an architect employed by the department or is he an outside architect?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): He is an architect in the department in charge of maintenance work.

Mr. SANDERSON: I will put the question directly to the minister, and I will accept his word because I have a good deal of faith in him. He absolutely took precaution and care to keep politics out of the expenditure of unemployment relief money. Is that correct?

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would say that political considerations were not the dominating considerations in the administration of public relief.

Mr. SANDERSON: Was politics a factor to some extent?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I will say to my hon. friend that under equal considerations and with equal advantage to the public interest, if I can find a supporter of this government who will do the work for the price at which an opponent of the government will do it, the supporter of the government will get the work.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then I should like to direct another question to the minister. What does he mean by "equal considerations"?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know that I should be subjected to cross-examination by my hon. friend, but I meant at equal cost to the public and with equally good results.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister need not get sensitive. I want to tell him that if I desire to examine him or cross-examine him I am going to do so, and there is no reason why I should not. The minister has drawn that remark from me by his own attitude. I want to be courteous to the minister and I expect him to be courteous to me as a member of this house. If I desire to put certain questions to the minister I propose to do so, unless the chairman rules me out of order and says my questions are not proper.

Now I want to ask something further. I see in the report of the director of relief an amount of $67,000 authorized for the Haileybury breakwater and harbour for seaplanes. The amount expended to February 29, 1932, was $17,809.84, and I want to ask the minister if he called for tenders for that work.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. SANDERSON: In what way is the work being done?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The work is being done under the supervision of the district engineers and under the immediate supervision of foremen appointed to carry it out.

Mr. SANDERSON: I directed a question to the Minister of Public Works with reference to this item when the estimates were up two or three weeks ago, and I believe I asked him then who had recommended that this work be done. Was it by petition? Was it from the town of Haileybury, or in what way was the work brought about? Was there a request for it, and if so, from whom?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The request came from more than one source. If I remember correctly, the member for that constituency received a letter similar to the one which my hon. friend must have received, asking for suggestions as to works that could be carried on with advantage to the constituency, and which at the same time would afford relief for unemployment. In that way the suggestion came in. I believe that the board of trade also, or the corporation of Haileybury itself, made similar representations.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then the minister did get a request from the board of trade of Haileybury.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: Won't the minister be frank with me? Was it not at the request of his colleague, the Minister of Labour, that the work was gone on with in his own constituency?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As I have said, every member was invited to make suggestions and I have no doubt that the member for that constituency, who happens to be the Minister of Labour, my colleague, whom I appreciate very much, having the interests of his constituency at heart and understanding the conditions up there, was asked whether the suggestion that came in from the board of trade was a good one or not.

Mr. SANDERSON: I want to pursue this a little further. I see a reference to breakwater and harbour for seaplanes. Does the Minister of Public Works think that this was a general work for the advantage of Canada, and can he tell me whether his engineers or any official of his department can say how many seaplanes land at Haileybury in a given length of time?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The breakwater was necessary as such. It not only afforded protection to the wharf and harbour, but it also serves as a landing base for seaplanes. I am informed that several planes are operating there at the present time.

Mr. SANDERSON: How many are employed on the works now?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am sorry, I haven't that information.

Mr. SANDERSON: What is the weekly or monthly pay sheet there?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I don't know; I have not the information.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the minister be good enough to get that information and give it to me?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If my hon. friend desires that information, I shall be very glad to endeavour to secure it for him and send it, but I haven't got it here.

Mr. SANDERSON: There is one more item in Ontario that I want to inquire about. Further down the list there is this item: "Port Arthur—Rubble Mound breakwater, $100,000." The amount expended in connection with this item was $99,999.25; apparently there is a balance of 75 cents. Were tenders asked for?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes. It was a continuation of a contract which I believe was awarded by the former government. It was a long breakwater to which another section was added. There was the same thing last year, for the relief of unemployment also

Mr. LAPOINTE: Apparently the constituencies represented by ministers were in special need of relief.

Mr. MANION: When did Port Arthur get a minister to represent it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am referring to Haileybury, and I am going to refer to some other constituencies in my own province. In common with other members, I received a letter after the session last year, asking for suggestions with regard to public works in the city of Quebec which might afford unemployment relief. I sent in quite a list, but I am afraid none of my suggestions were accepted. I have here the report of the director—and I am pleased to see my good friend the Minister of Marine in the house. At pages 64 and 65 appear the details of the works which were carried out in the province of Quebec—public buildings, harbours and rivers, in connection with which work was done out of the unemployment relief money. I see that up to February 29, 1932, a total of $415,606.78 was expended. Now in the county of Chambly, which is represented by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine, there is, first of all for Chambly, a protection wall, the amount being $19,954.79. At Longueuil, another place in my hon. friend's constituency, there was also provision for a protection wall. Obviously they are in need of protection there.

Mr. BENNETT: Practising it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And practising it as well. The amount expended at Longueuil was $19,- 966.25 up to February 29, 1932. At St. Lambert, which is another good town in my hon. friend's constituency, there is another protection wall, the amount being $69,200 up to February, 1932. Then in Vercheres there is a new breakwater, the amount being $10,354.44. These sums added together make a total of $121,475.48 out of a total expenditure for the whole province of Quebec of $415,000. Apparently more than twenty-five per cent of the unemployed in that province are in my hon. friend's constituency, because after all this money has been voted to relieve unemployment. My hon. friend is certainly generous to his constituents. I cannot blame him for that, but if our own suggestions had met with a better reception, perhaps I should not be so keen about complaining. Surely my hon. friend the minister should give a chance to the other sixty-four members from the province of Quebec. More than twenty-five per cent of the whole expenditure in the province being made in the county of one minister is a little too much; and if you add to that what has been done for Haileybury, I think you will agree that the unemployed in other parts of the country are not getting their share of the money.

Mr. HACKETT: Is the hon. gentleman aware that half the population of Quebec is in Montreal, and that this is one of the faubourgs of Montreal?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Apparently the faubourgs are well treated, as well as the city itself. If I am not mistaken the works were stopped and not proceeded with in the city of Montreal, while the Minister of Marine saw that the works were proceeded with in his riding.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend has referred to these works in the vicinity of Montreal. Unemployment was acute in that city and these works were carried on adjacent to and in what I understand to be the suburbs of Montreal. The works were of a character which could be readily performed at that time of year and which would afford relief to the largest possible number of men.

Mr. HEAPS: Were people from Montreal employed there?

Mr. HACKETT: Certainly.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): They lived there.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is the minister sure of that?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I understand there were some employed from Montreal. The instructions were that the men to be employed upon this work were to be engaged after consultation with the mayor, the reeve or whoever the head of the municipality might be; they were to be taken on in rotation and in a manner best calculated to relieve unemployment in that particular area. I am sure that this was done and that the desired result was obtained. I am sure that if my hon. friend will review all the works undertaken in the province of Quebec and in the city of Quebec he will find that that city has been fairly and generously dealt with, taking into consideration not only the dominion works but those carried on in cooperation with the province. This picture must be considered as a whole. Where very substantial works are being carried on by the province or by the municipality and the province together toward which the dominion makes a substantial contribution, then it may be expected that unemployment will be fairly well taken care of in that particular area and that it will not be as necessary for the dominion to undertake public works on its own account. It must be borne in mind always, as I have said before, that the object of these works was the relief of unemployment. If unemployment was being relieved by works undertaken in the manner I have indicated, then it became unnecessary for the dominion to prosecute work on its own account. The character of the works which we can undertake and carry on is rather limited, as my hon. friend well knows Buildings cannot be constructed by day labour to any advantage, especially in the winter time, while sewer work, roads and other projects of that character executed by the city and province in cooperation afford a greater measure of relief. I know nothing about the works which are stated to have been held up in the city of Montreal; that would come under the city administration and the provincial authorities.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I desire to make a short explanation in connection with the remarks of the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). It is quite true that works were performed in my constituency to the amount of $120,000, but it must be remembered that the south shore is composed of many villages and towns and cities which are suburbs of the city of Montreal. These municipalities are inhabited by men who used to work in the city of Montreal. When the unemployment problem became acute in Montreal, outsiders were stopped from coming on to the island in order to obtain work. A great number of unemployed were created in my constituency because of this fact. We had to relieve unemployment the same as other places in the province, and I am glad to tell hon. friends opposite that we have really done so. A committee was formed composed of the mayors of these different municipalities, both Liberal and Conservative, and this committee attended to the distribution of the work. Everyone in need of work, whether Catholic or Protestant, or whatever race he might be, was protected and given his share. I do not consider that my constituency was treated any better than other parts of the province. It is a strip of land between the rivers St. Lawrence and Richelieu and protection walls are needed on both sides. This was considered to be the best time to carry out these works, as it would relieve unemployment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend contend that twenty-five per cent of the employed are in Chambly?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not know.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Twenty-five per cent of the money was spent there.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I know that the work carried on did not give employment to everyone. As a matter of fact the work was carried on in shifts, some men working three days in the week while others came on for the remaining period. Even with this system many men were unable to obtain employment. I think if my hon. friend knew the real situation which existed in that part of the province he would not make the criticism he has.

Mr. GRAY: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) a question with respect to an item to be found at the bottom of page 66 of the report of the dominion director of unemployment relief. This item is for $14,000 to cover the construction of a wharf on Walpole island in my constituency, and I should like to know upon whose recommendation this work was authorized.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not that information before me, and therefore I cannot answer my hon. friend. However, I think this work has been under consideration for some time, and in looking over what might be done, the engineers included works of this character as being suitable to be undertaken at this time.

Mr. GRAY: I notice that this work has not been proceeded with. In common with other hon. members of this house, I was asked to submit certain proposals for the relief of unemployment in my constituency. I submitted certain proposals with which the minister is familiar, one being the construction of a public wharf in the city of Sarnia. The minister has shown a great deal of sympathy towards this proposal, but it has not been proceeded with. I did not recommend any works to be constructed on Walpole island. This is an Indian reservation inhabited wholly by Indians who are wards of the government, with the exception of a customs officer and perhaps an Indian agent. How any government could think of spending $14,000 on a small Indian island when there are other places with large numbers of unemployed, is hard to conceive. Perhaps the fact that the work was not proceeded with shows that the government found out its mistake in time. I press upon the minister that he brings forward all correspondence or anything he may have showing who recommended the expenditure of $14,000 on a wharf on a small Indian island where the inhabitants are at present receiving the moneys due them from the Indian Department. If this work was authorized, then surely the wharf at Sarnia should have been proceeded with. I object most strenuously to money being authorized or even considered in the manner in which this apparently was.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): My hon. friend need have no anxiety as regards this money being expended. The work will not be proceeded with under this measure. While the circumstances did warrant the carrying on of the work, it would have to appear in the regular estimates and my hon. friend will have an opportunity to oppose it.

Mr. GRAY: Will the minister undertake to give me the information I desire?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I shall endeavour to find out where the recommendation came from and give it to my hon. friend. I understand he is opposed to the work.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Everything comes to him who waits. I do not like to introduce a new subject until the old one is exhausted, otherwise the continuity of the record is broken. There are two or three questions I should like to discuss very briefly, but I do not see any of the ministers in their seats—

Mr. SPENCE: There are several of them present.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had not completed my sentence. I do not see present either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture, the ones to whom I should like to address my remarks through you, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps they will be in presently. I should like to refer to one question with respect to the petition regarding the proposed dollar-an-acre bonus on seeded acreage in southern Saskatchewan. That was discussed recently in the house under a resolution introduced by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The speech made on that occasion by the Minister of Agriculture concluded as follows:

> This is the greatest problem that agriculture has ever faced, and it must be met directly. As I see it, a final adjustment will be made towards the end of the present fiscal year. At that time the provinces will be in a position to give this government their true financial positions and state the commitments which they can undertake in the carrying on of this work. Serious consideration will be given to this problem.

That is the problem of the proposed dollar an acre on a seeded acreage basis.

> This government will do everything possible to give the most generous treatment. The farmers of western Canada have assurance in the treatment they have received up to the present time.

That is the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture on February 18, and as we are now within a couple of hours of the end of the fiscal year, the time has come when we expect a more definite statement from him with regard to that important question. As he is not present, I do not see how I am going to get an answer. The Prime Minister is not here; the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not here. To whom am I to address my remarks?

Mr. BOWMAN: From what page of Hansard was the hon. member quoting?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Page 345 of Hansard of February 18. There is not much use in my proceeding. I do not want to repeat my remarks after the hon. gentleman come in, and I do not want to remain standing here. Will the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Justice come to my assistance? Is the Minister of Justice in a position to answer this question?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The only observation I would make in regard to the matter is that the subject is rather out of order, and the quotation from Hansard is likewise out of order. It is not according to the rules of the house to refer to what has taken place in a previous debate during the same session. This matter was discussed in a previous debate and it is not a subject at present before the committee. Personally I am not familiar with the matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is strange how this rule will always be invoked when the government has no answer. I have the misfortune in always having it invoked against myself, although Hansard has been quoted from interminably this session.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Anything said in this debate may be quoted.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is the same question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was debated before and the debate was concluded.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Minister of Agriculture indicated that a final adjustment would be made towards the end of the present fiscal year. Therefore this is the opportune time, and I do not see how my hon. friend can declare my question out of order. We are now within two hours of the expiry of the fiscal year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then my hon. friend has allowed the opportunity to pass. We are now on another question and another bill. The point I raise, not to embarrass or inconvenience my hon. friend, is that this was the subject of a previous and concluded debate in the house.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend feels more embarrassed at the ministers being absent than I am at his objections; I can wait until another time.

Let me introduce another question, and I shall not read from Hansard; I know it fairly well. On July 1 of last year the Prime Minister made a very impressive speech with regard to the national calamity that had befallen certain parts of the prairie west. At that time nobody ever dreamed that the proposed relief measure which we have been discussing here intermittently during the last month, would be transformed or converted into a loaning measure to be operated by the Saskatchewan government and relief commission with moneys supplied by this government. I should like to know what individuals are to-day responsible for the relief that was anticipated in the west being converted into a loaning policy administered by a commission on behalf of the Saskatchewan government with funds practically all supplied by the federal government. It is now a straight loaning policy under ghastly exacting conditions; I have never before seen such oppressive conditions as are those outlined in a bill recently introduced and, I think, passed in the Saskatchewan legislature. I believe I have a right, as one representing a portion of that dried-out area, to protect my constituents from the extortionate conditions that are laid down in that bill with respect to the return of those loans, and also to protest against the departure from the plain understanding that it was a relief and not a loaning policy that was being introduced by the federal government.

Let us look at the designation of the bill. If it were to be a loan, would the bill not be called a loaning and unemployment bill? I venture the assertion there is not one hon. gentleman, including the ministers present or absent, who ever anticipated that this would develop into a loaning policy under the conditions to which I refer. Will the Minister of Justice say that he permitted that?

Mr. MANION: What is the difference—and I am asking this because I do not know what it is—between loans along this line and the loans for seed wheat? As my hon. friend knows, loans for seed wheat were made for many years under both the late government and the government preceding it. What is the difference between lending money under the present conditions and lending money for seed wheat, which money was charged against the land? By the way I may tell my hon. friend—and he knows this—that ever since we came into power we have been cancelling these loans, and I am sure his government when they were in power did the same thing. They were loans which we knew we could not collect and which we cancelled rather than register them against the land. Will the hon. member explain the difference for the benefit of the committee?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a reasonable request. Back in 1908 is the first time and later in 1915 I can recall a relief measure was administered and in the case of lands patented mortgages taken on the land; in the case of lands not patented, mortgages were filed against the homestead until the lands were patented. That was not preceded however by any intimation by the federal government, such as was made by the Prime Minister on July 1 last. The inference and statement had gone out that this was relief, and not a loaning policy.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend would not deny that a supply of seed wheat was in the nature of relief?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I could read the exact words of the Minister of Agriculture, but I do not think I need to. When the minister began to investigate conditions in the west after prorogation of this house had taken place last summer he was waited upon by a deputation of probably a dozen or half a dozen farmers. They took the ground that inasmuch as their lands were free of mortgage; that they had no indebtedness and yet could not borrow sufficient money to supply themselves with seed, feed or anything else and they did not wish to accept charity from the government. They did not like that idea, and I am not surprised. The Minister of Agriculture said that that was the first time this question had come up of being permitted to pay back relief advances. Up until that time it was anticipated that the aid to the farmers was to be a relief measure, the same as the five cents per bushel was. Those farmers who had crops received in the aggregate money to the extent of $10,000,000. The deputation which waited upon the minister, however, wanted the opportunity to pay back any help they received, because they did not wish to accept charity. We have to respect the stand taken by those people. The Minister of Agriculture asked the house—I do not remember his exact words, but I think I can state his version—if hon. members would not have done exactly as he did, and if they would not have given an opportunity to pay back the loans or relief contributions. As a result we have the introduction of the policy of promissory notes. That was the beginning of the provision for repayment. We have the spectacle of well-to-do farmers with crops of 10,000, 15,000 or 20,000 bushels receiving large federal contributions, running up to one thousand dollars each, while the poor fellows who had not enough grain to feed a chickadee or enough straw to make a hen's nest could not get enough flour to fill a thimble or enough clothing to go around their little fingers without giving some kind of guarantee, mortgage, caveat, seed lien or promissory note. I am sure the government does not wish to finish this session with that ghastly disparity between the treatment accorded those who had and those who had not crops. I have heard the statement made in this house dozens of times that relief should go to the most needy. According to the statement of the government expenditures have been made to the extent of about $10,000,000 to those who had a crop, while those in need of relief are treated in the manner I have described. If the government really knew the tremendous amount of dissatisfaction which has been caused throughout the west by this outrageous discrimination in favour of the farmers who least needed relief, they would not sleep restfully until they had taken steps to redress that disparity.

I am trying to present the facts as accurately as possible. The few ministers present gabble like a lot of magpies and blackbirds, and those hon. members in the house who know anything about the subject refuse to rise and defend this condition of things. So much for that. If hon. gentlemen opposite think they are going to freeze us out by silence they are making a bad guess. Apparently the ground is taken by the government that they have no responsibility in the matter. Many times last year, however, the statement was made by the Prime Minister that the government would take the responsibility. At that time questions were being asked about audits and guarantees of proper expenditures by the provinces. I cannot give exact words at this time, and if I could I probably would not be allowed to, but I know that was the stand taken by hon. ministers opposite. My understanding now is, however, that they wish to free themselves from all responsibility as to how the Saskatchewan government and relief commission are administering these vast sums of money.

The day before yesterday I received an answer from the Prime Minister, and I understood him to say that the expenditure of the money was a matter entirely within the control of the Saskatchewan government. Apparently that is all we can get out of them. I venture to say the Saskatchewan government takes the same position in regard to the federal house. No doubt they will be saying, "Well, we have no responsibility; this is the responsibility of Ottawa." There you are.

The primary purpose of the Saskatchewan bill I have in my hand is to incorporate the Saskatchewan relief commission, and that is provided for in the preamble. There is an indication according to the terms of the bill that the commission will be in existence for two more years, and the sections are made retroactive and binding in every possible way. As there has been doubt on the part of some hon. members as to whether there were any seed grain liens being taken on farmers' crops I should like to read section 8 with respect thereto:

When the commission furnishes seed grain to any person under the authority conferred by section 7, the commission shall take from such person a written agreement for a lien (Form A) in favour of the commission upon all crops to be grown, during the year in which the lien agreement is made and the succeeding year, upon the land described therein.

(2) An agreement may be executed in blank as to the quantities of seed grain to be advanced by the commission, but it shall nevertheless be valid and binding upon the lienor as to the quantities subsequently inserted therein by the commission unless the quantities found to have been actually received by the lienor are less than the quantities inserted in the agreement, in which case it shall be valid and binding as to the quantities actually received.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

So you see, Mr. Chairman, they have a habit in the Saskatchewan Relief Commission of having farmers sign documents in blank. The promissory note produced by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) and handed to the Prime Minister was the first intimation the Prime Minister had that such kind of promissory notes were being taken. I now have before me a blank seed grain lien, and I do not know whether the government knows about it. If I have time before eleven o'clock I will read the form of that lien. It is in blank, but there is space to fill in interest at the rate of seven per cent. The farmers are tied up by these liens as tightly as they would be with a logging chain so that they cannot either wink an eyelash or wiggle a toe.

There are quite a number of lawyers present. The Minister of National Revenue is a well qualified lawyer, and in addition there are some private members on both sides of the house well versed in law. It may be that I am not familiar with such methods of tying up the farmers—hog-tying them, as I call it. Let me read this document.

(5) Upon the execution of a lien note pursuant to the provisions of this act, such lien note shall be deemed to include without express mention the following covenants by the party executing the same, and his executors, administrators and assigns, that is to say:

The title, ownership, and right to possession of the said grain, and of all crops grown upon the land described in this agreement in the year in which the seed grain is supplied to me by the Saskatchewan relief commission and in the following year, and of all crops grown upon any other land occupied by me in such following year, shall remain at my own risk in the said commission until the selling price of the grain supplied is fully paid with interest, and if I make default in payment, or should I sell, dispose of, or mortgage my landed property, or if the said commission should consider itself insecure, it shall have power to declare the said advance due and payable forthwith, and the said commission may forthwith take action against me therefor, and it may at its option take possession of the said seed, as well as of all crops grown upon the said land during the year in which the said seed grain was supplied to me and the following year, and all crops grown upon any other land occupied by me in such following year, and may hold the same until the said sum is paid with interest, or sell the same at public auction or private sale, the proceeds thereof to be applied, after deducting all expenses in connection with such taking possession and sale, in reducing the amount unpaid thereon; all of which shall be without prejudice to the rights of the said commission to pursue any other remedy or remedies it may have now or hereafter against me in respect of the said seed grain or my indebtedness therefor; and without prejudice to the rights of the said commission to collect the balance remaining unpaid at any time after it has exhausted any special remedy or remedies against me, and for any such balance remaining unpaid at any time action may be taken against me, and judgment may be entered by the said commission at any time.

Then there is one further paragraph:

For the purpose of taking possession and recovering such grain the said commission, its agent or agents, may freely enter into and upon my buildings, enclosures and lands, using such force as may be necessary for the purpose.—

I do not know whether that is the purpose for which the extra mounted police were engaged.

—The destruction or damage of the said grain by fire or any other means or in any other manner whatsoever, shall not release me from my liability for payment.

Now, this is a seed grain lien, Mr. Chairman. Anybody who is familiar with realizing on seed grain liens knows that the creditor must keep guard over such grain crop before it is threshed and marketed, otherwise his security is gone. Therefore as a rule the creditor puts someone on the farm to see that the threshing and the marketing are done with his knowledge and advantage. Consequently if after the threshing the farmer refuses to market the grain the lien holder can put on a team and draw it to market, charging the cost to the debtor. Can you imagine, Mr. Chairman, that any government is going to put teams on all these farms, haul the grain to market and charge the cost to the respective farmers in order to realize on the loans made? No government would dare do any such thing. But even if the government did take that step, would not that be the signal for those creditors who had prior claims on the grain—storekeepers, coal merchants, lumber dealers and others in the vicinity—to do the same thing, with the result that the poor farmer would be stripped by them as bare as the day he was born? Does anybody believe that that will be done? But that is the only way in which the government can recover on such liens if the farmer declines to market such grain when desired. There is this provision in the law, that if for any reason it is not expedient to take such action the first year it may be postponed until the second year, and so the horror of that will be hanging over thousands of farmers from now until the second fifteenth of August—a year and a half hence. Nobody in his senses believes that the government will realize on those liens. I don't think any hon. gentlemen believe the government will dare take that course under present conditions. The whole country would be outraged. Take the people down here, those prominent in churches and other organizations who sent out to the west a large number of carloads of fruit and vegetables free —they did not ask for a lien from those to whom they sent those goods—if they heard that the government of Canada with its great taxing powers and financial resources had started to realize on their liens they would be scandalized. I am not exaggerating the situation at all. Unfortunately it is all too true. And we all innocently thought we were engaged in passing a relief bill to deal with what the Prime Minister described on the first of July as a "national calamity." Supposing he had said at the end of his dramatic and very impressive speech, "I am going to provide shelter, food and clothing for the unfortunate prairie farmer, but I shall expect him to pay back the last farthing for this assistance, I shall expect from him a promissory note on demand, I shall expect from him a lien payable next August; I shall expect all these things in return for keeping him alive in the meantime;" if he had said that what would have been thought of him and of his government? Would he have got that wonderful speech blazoned across the entire country—and quite properly so, for it was a great statement. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, it never entered into the thought of any man either inside or outside this house that any such thing as taking liens would be done until the Minister of Agriculture in his perambulations throughout Saskatchewan was interviewed by a small deputation—it is not stated how many; we will say two dozen—and they intimated that they did not want to take charity. I am not permitted to quote what was said in another debate; the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has his eagle eye on me and will not allow me to do it. But the Minister of Agriculture said he knew at that time the aggregate relief expenditures that would be outstanding before the next crop was harvested would amount to about twenty million dollars; that is, twenty million dollars would be expended for seed, feed, clothing, food, gasoline, lubricating oil, harness mending, and so on in that vast territory, including of course the adjoining provinces. Apparently he went out there knowing that that was the case, yet it never occurred to him whether that money would come back to the government or not, whether it was to be treated as a loan or a gift, until this deputation said: "We do not want charity." Then he concluded he would recommend to his colleagues that promissory notes be taken from all applicants for relief before being delivered. Thereupon the promissory note policy was started. That is the story as partly recited by the Minister of Agriculture himself, who is the only one to plead guilty or not guilty, and he is not here, although I saw him a few minutes ago behind the curtains. I wonder if I cannot bluff the absentee ministers into coming back and explaining and defending themselves. They deny responsibility, but I hold the whole outfit responsible, not only this government but the government of Saskatchewan also. Imagine us being handed over, body, boots and bones, into the hands of the Saskatchewan government, that government that was sired by the Ku Klux Klan and damned by nearly everybody else. We are in the hands of that government and its relief commission, and I hold this government responsible for putting us in that position.

The Minister of Agriculture took credit for what he called the compensating adjustment or five cent bonus policy. He took nearly a whole column of Hansard to show the evolution of that policy, and took credit for it. If he is going to take credit for that he must also accept responsibility for the rest of it, the economic crucifixion of cropless farmers introduced by this government in collusion with the Saskatchewan government with respect to these seed grain liens and promissory notes.

Well, what is going to be done? Must we send for the sergeant at arms in order to get the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture here? I do not want to go all over this again; I am sure you do not want to hear me. I will just continue with this rotten Saskatchewan bill. Here is the blank seed grain lien, which is form A. Someone has asked if this bill has gone through. I am not sure whether or not it has gone through the house, but it was introduced before Easter. It may be standing for third reading now, but in Saskatchewan, as in Ottawa, the government has been successful thus far in getting through anything it desired. This is the form of the lien taken by this permanent relief commission which is incorporated by this bill, this lovely, entirely non-partisan organization about which we read so much:

I , of in the province of Saskatchewan, farmer, in consideration of the Saskatchewan relief commission advancing to me the following quantities of grain the agreed on selling price whereof is dollars ($) and which grain I intend to use for the purpose of sowing the land I am cultivating or sowing on the: of section township range west of meridian; and of section township range west of meridian; that is to say—

Bushels of wheat, grade .. at $.. per bushel.
Bushels of oats, grade .. at $.. per bushel.
Bushels of ..... grade .. at $.. per bushel.
Bushels of ..... grade .. at $.. per bushel,

do hereby agree to pay to the Saskatchewan relief commission on the 15th day of August, 19...., the said sum of dollars ($) with interest thereon from the date hereof at the rate of seven (7) per centum per annum and further do hereby make and constitute the said sum of $ together with all interest accruing thereon at the rate aforesaid from the date hereof, a first lien and charge in favour of the said commission upon all crops to be grown in the years 19 and 19 upon the land hereinbefore mentioned, the said commission to have all the rights and remedies for the collection of the said sum as set forth in the act respecting the Saskatchewan relief commission 1932.

I agree to return to the said commission any seed supplied to me hereunder and not used by me for the purpose herein mentioned.

You will notice all the blanks which can be filled in by the commission at their convenience. I am sure any of you or your churches who helped supply the people of the prairies with free vegetables and fruit must be shocked by the exactions contained in this seed grain lien. Is that relief, or is it crucifying afresh those men who are already burdened now with mortgages, caveats, liens and what not? On top of all they have to bear now is to be placed this additional obligation, and does anyone ever expect farmers so situated to stagger to their feet between now and eternity? It cannot be done. Why are they putting on these liens and taking these promissory notes? I think I know; members of the government are not here to answer that question. I wonder if I could get the attention of my friend the Minister of Finance, with whom I always have a friendly chat when opportunity permits. I cannot get any responsible minister, Mr. Chairman, to tell me anything at all about these atrocities.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have handed us over to the ravages of the Saskatchewan government and the relief commission set up by this bill. I use the word "ravages" advisedly, with no reservations and without hesitation. I challenge members of the government now to call me to order with regard to any of the terms I have used in connection with this matter. My only hope is the Minister of Finance, and now I am going to try him. I do not know whether or not in the maritimes they have such things as seed grain liens, but we have or will now have plenty of them out west. I see the hon. member for Saskatoon back there grinning like a basket of chips; I suppose he knows plenty about it but he won't rise and defend this government.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): It is pretty hard to keep from laughing at the actions of a baboon.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: A man has to be pretty badly off when he gives a seed grain lien on his growing crop. Next August 15 the government, through the Saskatchewan government, which works through the relief commission, can start realizing on the crops of these unfortunate Saskatchewan farmers as soon as they are ready to be drawn to the elevator.

Through you, Mr. Chairman, I am directing that point to the Minister of Finance. Can he imagine himself, as Minister of Finance, collecting on these liens from those downtrodden farmers who are already mortgaged to the hilt? We must remember also that these liens are a first charge, and come before anything else. Imagine, I repeat, what would happen if an emissary of the government should go out and start hauling grain to market, charging the cost of haulage against the growers, in order to realize on liens held by the Saskatchewan commission. If that were to happen either he would be mobbed or every other creditor would pile in while the piling was good.

That is the situation. I do not know whether the Finance minister's blood is circulating any faster with indignation or whether he thinks I am just talking. But do not make any mistake about it; until to-night I had not said a word for two days, and now I am not talking for fun. The government had to go to a very great deal of expense to get this money which has been loaned by millions to the Saskatchewan government. Now, so far as I can understand, the government is washing its hands of any further responsibility, and we are being handed over to this so-called non-partisan relief commission. It is a lovely commission, and we have a lovely government to deal with here also. Will the Minister of Finance, who is now present, say whether he would like the job of collecting these vast sums of money under these conditions? There is another question too. Something like $5,000,000 of this is agreed to be paid by this government alone because of the national character of the crop disaster. Are they going to leave it to the Saskatchewan government through the relief commission to collect that also? And if they are not going to collect it, how will they know what is this amount and what is the other? Mr. Chairman, this is an impossible way of collecting money. No government can collect money this way, and no government in Canada will dare to attempt it.

An hon. MEMBER: Why worry, then?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will tell you why, and that is the point. There may be an election up there at any time and then nine-tenths of the farmers in certain areas will be financially obligated to the government that will be appealing to the country. I do not need to tell practical members of this house what will probably happen. Away back in 1908 I ran an election in North Qu'Appelle. One quarter of my constituents in certain polls were under mortgage to the brother of my opponent. A good many of their mortgages were overdue, and foreclosure was impending. Suddenly, like a flash of lightning and with a crash as of thunder, they had to quit campaigning for anyone. Against such odds I therefore know what happens when an electorate is so indebted and when it is indebted to the government of the day the situation is a hundred times worse. I say without fear of contradiction that every one of those hon. gentlemen sitting opposite knows in his heart that what I am saying in this respect is true. This is hoped to be effective on behalf of government candidates, but I am doubtful if it will, as it may work both ways by a backfire. I will now await with pleasure any remarks which the Minister of Finance or any other hon. gentleman on that side sees fit to offer.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): I do not think the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has been up to his standard in his address to the house to-night. He is an old parliamentarian. He sits to the left of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), and there is not an hon. member on the other side who has had a greater political experience than he. But though I listened patiently to what he had to say to-night, to see whether he had one constructive idea to offer the house, I could detect nothing of the sort. He spoke about the Ku Klux Klan leading the province of Saskatchewan, and as he discussed this and kindred matters his heart bled for Canada. Let me remind him and other hon. members of this house that the Dominion of Canada to-day is passing through one of the most crucial periods in its history. Judging by what we have been told, the people of the west are starving to death at the present time, and I may inform the hon. gentleman that there are a great many who are walking the streets of Montreal to-day looking for unemployment relief. What is this house doing? The Liberal opposition talked and talked for weeks about the constitutional question; we have heard quotations with respect to the mother country and constitutional rights; and we on this side have been described by such eminent gentlemen on the other side as the hon. member for Labelle as failing in courage and being in the hands of a few men who are ruling the house. Well, I ask, what is the house doing to-day? Only one question faces this house, and that is the urgent necessity for granting relief to the people of Canada. And when hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the constitutional question, I ask what is the constitutional question? It is the peace, order and good government of Canada, and on these six or seven words hon. gentlemen are holding up the progress of this measure. Yet the mother country, without a written constitution, would have voted this money long ago to relieve suffering at home or in any other part of the empire.

I want to pay tribute to the premier of Quebec for the statement which he has made with regard to this unemployment relief question. There is in the Liberal ranks no greater partisan opposed to this government than the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, and we respect him for the honesty of his views. Premier Taschereau, however, before being a Liberal, is a Canadian. I think the members of this house should likewise be Canadians before they are partisans. We should get down to business and have some sympathy for the people who are suffering to-day in Canada. We should grant them the relief they need. There come to my office every day men with families of six or seven, who are in need of relief. You westerners think that you have all the trouble, but you cannot blame this government for not having done what God has not done; you cannot blame the government for not having given you rain. You cannot blame the dictator of this government, if you wish to use that expression, so far as that is concerned. You will have to go a little bit higher up.

An hon. MEMBER: A little bit.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): The Canadian people are sadly in need of relief, and if hon. gentlemen could vote unanimously a year ago, granting millions of dollars for twelve months, surely that principle can be extended for another few months. My hon. friends opposite have used very far-fetched arguments. They have preached, they have held up the house, and they have spent hours using up pages upon pages of Hansard. On the other hand, Premier Taschereau decided the question for them as a Canadian and not as a partisan when he spoke the following words which I quote from the Ottawa Morning Journal of March 31, 1932, a despatch from Quebec by the Canadian Press:

Quebec, March 30.—To a delegation of mayors of cities and towns in the province of Quebec, who requested in an interview to-day that the time limit for the completion of unemployment relief works be extended, Premier L. A. Taschereau said: "Take your request to Ottawa and we will endorse your action. In the matter of unemployment I wish to pay this tribute to the Bennett government: they have done all in their power to relieve unemployment. I might add, the provincial governments have been equally active."

That is all I have to say on unemployment. I come from a city that pays its full share of taxation and is happy to pay it, and I come here representing people who are prepared to assist their fellow Canadians. I look upon parliament not as the playground of partisanship, or a place for gibes and personal animosities, I look to old parliamentarians such as the hon. gentleman who preceded me, to do something to meet the present grave situation instead of getting up and talking about the Klu Klux Klan and things of that kind. I look to the hon. gentleman to pass this unemployment relief in order to help his distressed fellow Canadians. I look to the opposition, who acceded to the request of the government in the past, to use the same good judgment on this occasion even if it does imperil their political fortunes, and let this relief measure go through, instead of giving to the people of Canada a bare bone known as unemployment. For heaven's sake let us give them something whereby the distressing conditions that now prevail in the country will be relieved forthwith.

Mr. POWER: I was glad to hear the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Bell) quote the Hon. Mr. Taschereau to the effect that the Bennett government had done all in its power to relieve unemployment. That is just what we complain of, it has done all in its power to relieve unemployment with the machinery which it has, but it has not succeeded. We want the government to use some other machinery, to appeal to parliament and to use constitutional means of going about the relieving of unemployment. If that were done, perhaps it would succeed. A moment or two ago my hon. friend said that even to-day people were walking the streets of Montreal unable to find employment. If they are unable to find employment it shows that the government which has done everything in its power has not been able to relieve the situation. We have no complaint to make in connection with what Mr. Taschereau has said, but we do say that the government should go further and consult parliament. My right hon. leader has said that a conference should be called, and I understand from those who were present this afternoon that the leader of the government has agreed to call a conference. So far as we are concerned, we will endorse that procedure. Let the Prime Minister call a conference, but let him get away from the use of the system which has been in operation for the past six months.

I did not rise to discuss this point particularly, but rather to discuss a matter concerning the banks of this country. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) is in his place perhaps he will be kind enough to answer a question with respect to an order in council passed on October 27, 1931, dealing with the valuation of securities by the banks. I do not like to take up the time of the committee in reading all of this order in council, but it is an important piece of legislation and I think perhaps it should be on Hansard. Before I read it may I ask the minister if it is proposed to pass a new order in council in the same terms as that passed on October 27 in order to continue to the banks the authority which they have of valuing their securities at other than their true value?

Mr. RHODES: No, that will not be necessary.

Mr. POWER: Do I understand the minister to say that it will not be necessary because the act we are now dealing with covers the point and permits the extension of the right given to the banks until May 1, 1932? Or is there some other reason?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that I can enlarge upon what I have said. The act now before the house will expire on May 1 and there will be no necessity for exercising any such powers as are contained in the order in council.

Mr. POWER: Will it be necessary to give to the banks such an extension of the rights conferred by this order in council as will permit them to make a report for the month of March other than the ordinary report?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. POWER: The order in council expired on March 1, 1932; are we to assume that the returns made by the banks under the Bank Act after that date will show a true valuation of securities?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend must not put words into my mouth: He put a question to me which I answered categorically; he asked me if there was any intention to pass an order in council similar to the one which was passed, and I said, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the provisions of the Bank Act apply then?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly.

Mr. POWER: So that from March 1 the provisions of the Bank Act will apply?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly.

Mr. POWER: So that the order in council passed in October will no longer be in effect, and I take it from the minister that it is not intended to renew it?

Mr. RHODES: I have stated twice that there is no intention to renew it.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Mr. Chairman, this is too serious a question to be scoffed and laughed at, as hon. friends opposite seem disposed to do. Apparently the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Bell) did not understand the matter discussed this evening by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), otherwise he would not have expressed himself as he did. I do not need to remind hon. members of the committee of the agony and distress which has been spoken of not only by members of the opposition but by members of the government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) told us just recently that the situation was such that this was not the time to talk cheap politics. I agree with every syllable he has uttered in that respect. According to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) there are 250,000 people, or 50,000 farmers, in western Canada who are faced with disaster because their crops have been burned out for three years in succession. The situation was such that carload after carload of produce of one kind or another was shipped out gratuitously from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. From the neighbourhood of St. Hyacinthe in Quebec no less than seven or eight carloads of clothing and provisions were shipped out to these people. All this material was sent gratuitously bacouse we were only too pleased to lend a helping hand. I mentioned this a day or two ago when I addressed this house, and I referred also to the fact that $5,250,000 had been expended in these burnt-out districts. To my surprise I found out that while we in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec had been sending carload after carload of clothing and supplies absolutely gratuitously, when the people of Canada made a contribution through the medium of the government, it was not made as a gift but, as the Minister of Agriculture has said, the people were compelled to sign notes agreeing to pay back what they had received with seven per cent interest thereon. This is a most unheard of thing.

During the Easter holidays I told the people in my constituency what had been done. I think the first carload of produce sent from Ontario was shipped from my constituency, and when the people were told what had been done, they were dismayed to think that the government would act in this way with the funds of the treasury of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: No notes were taken for contributions.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): The government is sending out the people's money and notes are being taken. Upon my return I was surprised to find that a statute had been passed by the legislature of Saskatchewan legally incorporating the commission in Saskatchewan appointed by the Minister of Agriculture or by the federal government to carry out the provisions of the agreement which had been entered into for the relief of those people. I appeal to every hon. member, and I am surprised to see my good friend the Minister of Finance, the man who has the disposition of the money, sitting there smiling as he is doing after he and all the other ministers that have been present have not had a word to say during the discussion of what the ex-Minister of Agriculture has said. If the Minister of Finance wishes to say a word I shall give him an opportunity.

Mr. RHODES: I was smiling just because my hon. friend was asserting with such vehemence that the Saskatchewan commission was appointed by the federal government; he ought to know that it was appointed by the Saskatchewan legislature. I was smiling because of his absolute assurance that he was right when he happens to be quite wrong.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Did the Minister of Agriculture not have to appoint the commission?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): I have not the privilege of referring to the words of the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister, I see, is as ready as anybody else to take advantage of an evasion if he can; but if the Minister of Agriculture did not appoint the commission, according to his own words on the floor of this house, he certainly made the recommendations. The government know that promissory notes are being taken from these farmers who have been burned out for three successive years. This is too serious a matter for anyone to regard it with levity. In my section of the country there is not one individual to whom I have spoken who does not think this is an unheard-of act. If the federal government are taking no responsibility in the matter they are washing their hands of a responsibility which is theirs, because the money is coming from the federal treasury and according to the Prime Minister's own words, promissory notes are being taken for it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Do not think for a moment it is carried. The Prime Minister told us in the house yesterday that this money had been loaned to the province of Saskatchewan. Therefore we ought to know whether this money is going to be returned to the federal treasury or whether, when these promissory notes are paid, the proceeds will remain in the hands of the Saskatchewan government. Is it to be a free gift from the treasury of the Dominion of Canada to the treasury of Saskatchewan and are these people not to receive the money handed out as it were, in a free manner? We have been told that we should try to help the needy in this country. If there be one thing more than another which the members of the House of Commons ought to do, and do unanimously, it is to see that those unfortunate people of Saskatchewan who have had absolute crop failures for three successive years, are put on their feet.

Mr. MANION: Why not sit down and give them a chance to get some help?

Mr. PORTEOUS: Just sit down and give them a chance.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): I am surprised at my good friend the hon. member for North Grey, because just the other day when I was talking to him on this same matter, what was his reply? He said: I had no idea this was being done with those poor people. Yet when this matter is being discussed on the floor of parliament, I am surprised he displays such partisanship.

Mr. PORTEOUS: Who is to pay these notes if the people of Saskatchewan do not?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Who is to pay them? We as members of the opposition say that these people should receive this as a free gift just as was the case when the people of Ontario and Quebec sent carload after carload of relief to western Canada. We do not look for anything in return for that; it was a free gift to the people of Saskatchewan. As I say, when that is the case in regard to relief handed out by the people of Ontario and Quebec to the western provinces, when it comes to a question of the government of Canada paying out money from the public exchequer on behalf of the whole Canadian people, it is a surprising stand for any member of the government to take that they should not let us know what they are going to do.

Mr. GOTT: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Not at all. I think if ever there was a time when we ought to have a statement from the members of the government, it is now. They have sat silent during the last half hour or so. This is a cabinet responsibility; every member of the cabinet is responsible for the actions of any member of it; the cabinet as a whole is responsible for the action of every individual member thereof.

Mr. GOTT: If the hon. member will not allow me to ask a question, I shall draw the attention of the Speaker to the fact that it is now eleven o'clock.

NOTICE OF CLOSURE

Mr. BENNETT: I beg leave to give notice that, at the next sitting of the committee of the whole house, I shall move that the further consideration of the title and clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed.

I may say that yesterday I had some reason to believe that the statement made in connection with this evening would be implemented; otherwise we should have taken a very different line of action. I am very sorry it was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the statement to which the Prime Minister refers?

Mr. BENNETT: A statement made by the ex-Minister of Justice to me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Never. I said: if this bill can be put out of committee to-night, would the third reading be to-morrow? The Prime Minister said yes. I said I would try to see it passed through committee, but I never gave any undertaking.

Mr. BENNETT: We all believed he did. That is all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the Prime Minister had made a statement in the house we would have got through.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suppose the second application of the closure will be the first order of business to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: That will be if the hon. gentleman's representations are as I now understand them, that this bill is not to go through except by closure. I have already given notice of that. If this business is concluded some time after two o'clock, we shall then proceed with government orders and supplementary estimates.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 1, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

CLOSURE—PRIVILEGE

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring a question of privilege of the whole house to its attention. At the close of last night's sitting the Prime Minister, having mentioned that he would apply closure to the matter under discussion, made this declaration:

If this business is concluded some time after two o'clock, we shall then proceed with government orders and supplementary estimates.

The point I desire to raise, and I think it is of importance for future debate, is that the house has no right under the present rule to take up anything after the closure has been applied to any measure under discussion up to two o'clock. I take first standing order 39 under which closure is applied. I will not read the whole of it, but simply the concluding part:

And if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before two of the clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot understand the hon. member's question of privilege. He is talking of the application of the rules of the house. At the present moment no rules are being applied except the ordinary rules of procedure.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, with a view to helping the house in future—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. My contention is that by disregarding this rule last Tuesday the privileges of the house were broken.

Mr. SPEAKER: That was the time to discuss it; the breach cannot be amended now. What is done is done. Even supposing the hon. member's point of order is well taken referring to former procedure it cannot be remedied now, and this is not the time to discuss it.

Mr. BOURASSA: But upon the declaration made by the Prime Minister last night may I not raise the question of privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a question of privilege at all. If at a later date any member undertakes to do something in violation of the rules of the house it is time enough then to bring up the question. It cannot be anticipated. The notice of motion for closure was not while the house was in session, but while in committee.

Mr. BOURASSA: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, for my guidance, if after closure has been decided upon the point can be raised?

Mr. SPEAKER: It cannot be raised academically.

Mr. BOURASSA: I mean after the vote is taken under the closure rule and as a matter of procedure, can the point be raised that the house cannot proceed with other business?

Mr. SPEAKER: When the house proceeds to such business, if the hon. member thinks it is not within the rules of the house, he can raise the question.

Mr. BOURASSA: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. That is all I want to know.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand) presented the third and fourth reports of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization as follows:

THIRD REPORT—BEET SUGAR INDUSTRY

Your committee has had under consideration an order of reference dated Wednesday, February 24, 1932, namely:

"Resolved: that all questions affecting the beet sugar industry in Canada be referred to the select standing committee on agriculture with instructions to inquire into the action which may be taken by the government, by way of customs duties, subsidies, bonuses or otherwise, either in or without cooperation with the provincial governments for promoting the prosperity of the said industry and developing the production of Canadian grown sugar, and report to this house.

Attest.

Arthur Beauchesne,
Clerk of the House."

Your committee has called and examined the following witnesses:—

H. Marshall—Bureau of Statistics, Ottawa, Ontario.

Dr. F. W. Grindley—Bureau of Statistics, Ottawa, Ontario.

W. R. Reek—Director of Experimental Farm, Ridgetown, Ontario.

Thos. Simpson—Farmer, Petrolia, Ontario.

G. L. Rogers—President, British Columbia Sugar Refining Company, Vancouver.

B. R. McMullen—Beet Growers' Association, Alberta.

Chas. Houston—President, Canada and Dominion Sugar Company Limited, Chatham, Ontario.

Alex W. McIntyre—Canada and Dominion Sugar Company Limited, Chatham, Ontario.

W. F. Russell—Alberta Beet Growers' Association.

The evidence submitted established the following facts regarding the industry:

1. That the production of sugar beets has been carried on very profitably in certain districts of Ontario and Alberta: that the area under cultivation has increased from 25,000 acres in 1921 with a yield of 200,000 tons to 42,000 acres in 1931, with a yield of approximately 435,000 tons, and that the production of refined beet sugar has increased from 53,000,000 pounds in 1921 to approximately 100,000,000 pounds in 1931.

The amount paid to the farmers for beets in 1931 was about two and one-half millions of dollars; during the period of normal commodity prices for farm products, an average price of $7.48 per ton was paid to the farmers for sugar beets, but owing to the present low price of raw cane and refined sugar, the factories claim that they are unable to guarantee more than $5 per ton for the 1932 crop.

2. That large additional areas, suitable for the growth of sugar beets, are available in Canada.

3. That there are five firms engaged in the refining of sugar in Canada—The Canada and Dominion Sugar Company Limited, producing cane sugar at their Montreal factory, and beet sugar at Chatham and Wallaceburg, Ontario; the British Columbia Sugar Refinery, producing cane sugar at Vancouver, B.C., and beet sugar at Raymond, Alberta; The Arcadia Sugar Refinery Company, Limited, Dartmouth, N.S.; The Atlantic Sugar Refinery, Limited, St. John, N.B.; St. Lawrence Sugar Refinery, Limited, Montreal, P.Q. The last three have engaged exclusively in the manufacture of cane sugar.

4. That during the past ten years the annual average production of refined sugar in Canada was 963 millions of pounds; the percentage of beet sugar production has varied from 6·2 per cent in 1926 to aproximately ten per cent in 1930 and 1931.

5. That the sugar beet factories at Chatham, Wallaceburg and Raymond, are now operating at full capacity, and that no further development of the beet sugar industry in Canada is possible until manufacturing capacity is increased.

6. That world stocks of sugar on hand are very large and that an estimated surplus of some four millions of tons will be carried over to next year.

7. That there is sufficient capacity in the cane sugar refineries of Canada to refine two and one-half times the amount of sugar necessary to meet the demands of the Canadian consumers.

8. That the consumption of sugar in the area from Winnipeg to British Columbia is approximately 225,000,000 pounds supplied from eastern Canada as far westward as the Brandon district, and from Vancouver, eastward to the Brandon district, except for the tairty million pounds of beet sugar manufactured at Raymond, Alberta.

9. That freight rates on sugar from Raymond, Alberta, to prairie points are from one-half to three-quarters of a cent per pound less than rates to similar points from Vancouver or Montreal.

10. That the granting of bonuses or subsidies at present to encourage the production of sugar from beets, was not favoured by the representatives of the growers or of the refiners.

Your committee therefore recommend that in view of the existing tariff on sugar and in consideration of the substantial payments being made to agriculture and labour by the beet sugar factories at present in operation, the cane sugar refineries should undertake to provide for a gradual increase in factory facilities for the refining of beet sugar in Canada, and that, with the additional advantages in freight rates to points in the middle west, heretofore described, factory facilities should now be steadily increased in western areas where beets are grown, and thereby make it possible to produce from beets a more substantial percentage of the sugar consumption of Canada.

Your committee further recommends that if no successful attempt be made in the immediate future by the refineries to increase the facilities for the manufacture of beet sugar, the government should take into consideration steps to accomplish that end.

FOURTH REPORT—GRADING GARNET WHEAT

Your committee has had under consideration an order of reference dated Tuesday, March 15, 1932, namely:

"Resolved: that the report of the committee on grain standards for the crop year 1931-32, in so far as it relates to Garnet wheat, be referred to the select standing committee on agriculture with instructions that the whole subject be inquired into carefully and that the said committee shall have power to call for witnesses, papers and documents and to report to the house its findings.

Attest.

Arthur Beauchesne,
Clerk of the House."

Your committee, in view of the fact that seeding operations will become general throughout western Canada before your committee shall have sufficient opportunity to inquire into and report to the house on the abovementioned order of reference; and in view of the fact that the manner of grading Garnet wheat may vitally affect the acreage sown, recommends that any change in the system of grading Garnet wheat shall not become effective during the present crop year.

Mr. SENN moved that the fourth report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

MATURING OBLIGATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) with reference to certain questions I asked him and which were answered by him on Wednesday. These are the questions:

1. What Canadian obligations are maturing outside of Canada in 1932?
2. How many of these (in amount) are maturing in New York?
3. Are these all payable in gold?
4. How many of these Canadian obligations are owing by: (a) the federal government; (b) the various provincial governments; (c) Canadian municipalities; (d) Canadian railways; (e) other parties?

The answer given by the hon. minister is certainly misleading if not inaccurate. He said:

1, 2, 3 and 4. Dominion of Canada: $55,000,000 payable in gold in New York.

He added certain observations as to the obligations of other parties. I think in view of the fact that the Prime Minister said in a recent debate that we have $1,000,000 a day maturing in New York—

Mr. BENNETT: Not New York, abroad.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, outside Canada. I wonder in view of that if the Minister of Finance will not correct his answer.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in answering questions the government can only give that information which is within its official knowledge. Bearing that in mind, the answer to the question is correct. But I know what my hon. friend has in mind, and while we have no official figures with respect to obligations other than those of the dominion, I shall be very happy indeed to give him unofficially the information desired.

IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

PARTICIPATION OF IRISH FREE STATE—NEWSPAPER DESPATCH

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) referred to a despatch which appeared in the Toronto Star in reference to the possibility of invitations to the Irish delegation being cancelled in certain eventualities. When my right hon. friend made his statement it might have appeared to some that the despatch to which he referred appeared exclusively in the Toronto Star and was contributed by its Ottawa correspondent. I do not know whether my right hon. friend has investigated the source from which it came, but I am informed that the article in the Toronto Star was from an international news service in New York, and that a similar article appeared in the Toronto Telegram and also in the Montreal Herald, and apparently in a number of other papers, so that its publication was in no sense exclusive, and its source in no way the Toronto Star or any of its correspondents. I mention this because I think my right hon. friend would not wish to create a wrong impression with respect to any one particular publication.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have investigated the matter further. The despatch appeared under an Ottawa date line, and I can find no other similar despatch. I have not been able personally to exhaust investigation of the various papers, but I have been told just what the right hon. gentleman says, that a despatch somewhat in the same sense—I have not seen it—appeared in two Toronto papers and in a Montreal paper. I have not yet received the clippings to ascertain whether they are the same despatch or not, but the Toronto Star despatch appeared under an Ottawa date line, and apparently it was sent from here. That being so, I thought it was important, in justice to all parties concerned, that a statement should be made in view of the fact that the correspondent of the paper I mentioned had seen the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and had received the answer that I have indicated. I will try to see the clippings themselves between now and Monday if I can possibly do so to ascertain if they are the same despatch or not. I am not satisfied myself where it originated because I contented myself yesterday with believing it originated where the date line indicated—Ottawa.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. WALBURG-LOON LAKE BRANCH LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) based on a brief letter I have received from Loon Lake, which I believe has been also forwarded to the Minister of Railways. The letter is addressed to me and is dated March 26, 1932.

Mr. SPEAKER: Cannot the hon. member ask his question without reading the letter? He has just stated that the minister has been sent a copy of the letter.

Mr. McINTOSH: With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, there is a paragraph of the letter which I think should be mentioned in order to make clear the point of my question.

Mr. SPEAKER: But the hon. member says the minister has a copy of the letter.

Mr. McINTOSH: All right, whatever you say; I am quite willing to put the question now. I may say this is the fourth time I have asked this question this session; as yet I have not received a definite answer, and this letter is based on the questions I have already asked. The question concerns the steeling of 44 miles of grade between Loon Lake and St. Walburg in the northwestern part of Saskatchewan. I should like to ask the minister what action he intends to take on the petition he has received asking that steel be laid on the graded portion of this line between St. Walburg and Loon Lake. This is a definite question, and I should like a definite yes or no in answer. The time for action has arrived.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. member asked what action was to be taken, and he demanded yes or no in answer. I hardly know which would be the more satisfactory to him under the circumstances.

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, you do.

Mr. MANION: I think the question was answered, so far as the government could answer it, some weeks ago. The hon. member asked this question and I told him then that the work on this line was in exactly the same position as the work on other branch lines throughout the west and throughout Canada generally. The national railways is not considering going on with practically any branch line work this year, with the exception of a small amount scattered here and there throughout the country, and so far as I know there is very little possibility of this branch line being completed this year.

Mr. McINTOSH: But there is a possibility?

Mr. MANION: There is a possibility of almost anything.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

GUARANTEES BY GOVERNMENT FOR ADVANCES MADE BY BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I undertook to answer to-day questions propounded by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), and the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) with regard to the Beauharnois undertaking. I had prepared to do so, but information was conveyed to me to-day that makes it impossible for me to give the answer I proposed to give, so I should like the questions to stand until Monday when, after having seen some interested parties, I hope to be able to make a statement.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT REPAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Some two weeks ago I directed a question to the Prime Minister which I wish now to direct to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), this being the first of April. When the Prime Minister, acting as Minister of Finance, presented his budget last year, he brought in certain schedules having to do with the tariff on repairs to farm implements. Because of representations made by the opposition he decided that these schedules should not become operative until after March 31. It is now April 1, and I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if those proposed schedules are now in operation, or if the government have taken care of the situation by order in council.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Pending the bringing down of the budget I am happy to inform my hon. friend that the matter is being provided for by order in council.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUANCE ACT, 1932, CONSIDERATION OF BILL—MOTION FOR CLOSURE

The house resumed from Thursday, March 31, consideration in committee of Bill No. 24, respecting unemployment and farm relief —The Prime Minister—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the order is proceeded with, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the motion of which I gave notice last evening, that further consideration of the title and clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed.

You will observe that the words are "further consideration." Last evening it was impossible to separate one clause from another in the discussion, since hon. gentlemen opposite thought it desirable to discuss all three clauses at the same time, notably my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). It is clear, therefore, that there having been some consideration of the measure, the words "further consideration" are correct.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): It is moved by Mr. Bennett and seconded by Mr. Guthrie:

That further consideration of the title and clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed.

Shall the motion carry?

Mr. GARDINER: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is not clause 1 the question that is before the committee at the present time?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Technically speaking, clause 1 was before the committee, but the committee considered every clause of the bill. As a matter of fact, therefore, all the clauses of the bill have been before the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: On another point of order: Is it possible to have three clauses of a bill considered in committee at the same time? Is it not more correct to say that, in accordance with the ruling of the chair, the committee will now proceed to the consideration of clauses 2 and 3?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I do not know that I should advise the hon. member touching the suggestion which he has just made. I do not understand it to be a point of order. The question is on the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will you please read the motion again, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The motion is:

That the further consideration of the title and clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed.

Motion agreed to: yeas, 103; nays, 50.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The motion which has just carried is, I take it, the application of closure to the proceedings of the committee, which means that so far as members of this house are concerned there is no longer opportunity to elicit by question and answer information with respect to the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance bill, which is before the committee at the present time, or on matters incidental and relevant thereto. It is important that that should be clearly understood. We are not now at the second reading of the bill, but in committee, and as is well known, the purpose of the consideration of a bill in committee is to elicit from the government explanations as to the meaning of the legislation, the intent of the government with respect thereto, and also information as to the extent to which and manner in which expenditures under similar legislation in the past have been made. By this motion, all further opportunity to secure information of the kind is denied hon. members of this house.

Mr. STEVENS: You have all day to-day until two o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let this be clearly understood; there can be only one speech on the part of each member in committee. I submit that under these circumstances it is impossible to have any real or adequate discussion. One question may be asked by an individual member but that is all he is permitted; there is no way of following up the discussion in any form.

It is perfectly apparent, Mr. Chairman, that the introduction of closure in this manner at this time is not for the purpose of expediting the enactment of any measure with respect to relief, but clearly for the purpose of shutting off all discussion on the subject. May I make that abundantly clear by referring to the course of the opposition since the introduction of closure at a previous stage in the proceedings of the house. Closure was introduced on Wednesday morning, at which time the resolution was carried and the bill given its first reading. On Wednesday afternoon we proceeded with the next stage of the bill, which was the second reading, when an amendment was moved by the opposition. Had the opposition intended to obstruct, it is perfectly apparent that that was the time at which it would have availed itself of the opportunity to have its members individually speak. As the house well knows, however, there was but one speech from the opposition on the second reading, at which time an amendment was moved, setting forth in two paragraphs the position of the opposition in regard to the measure. That amendment was moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). That hon. gentleman made the only speech from this side of the house on that occasion, and when the amendment was voted down not another speech was made on the second reading either from this side or from the other side of the house. Instead, the second reading was allowed to pass in order that the house might go immediately into committee. In the light of that fact it is impossible for anyone to say that action from this side of the house has been in the nature of obstruction to this measure.

May I go a step further and say that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) last night intimated his intention to introduce closure to-day, he gave the house, as will appear in Hansard, very clear evidence of the fact that he himself had received, from the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), intimation that we on this side of the house had expected to conclude the committee stage of the discussion yesterday and to proceed with the third reading of the bill to-day. The Prime Minister's words are there, to the effect that that was what he had gathered from the ex-Minister of Justice. The ex-Minister of Justice has since explained, what the Prime Minister himself will know better than anyone else, that no one on this side of the house in regard to any measure that is being considered in committee is in a position to curtail discussion completely. While most of us were hoping and expecting that the committee stage of the discussion would end yesterday, and that the third reading would be proceeded with this afternoon, yet the fact that members of the opposition were unable to get from hon. gentlemen opposite much of the information they were seeking had the effect of prolonging the discussion further than would otherwise have been the case. And for that reason the discussion was not concluded last night. Now, notwithstanding that fact, notwithstanding that we have on Hansard of yesterday the record of the intention of the opposition as expressed by the ex-Minister of Justice to the Prime Minister last night and known by the Prime Minister at the time he mentioned his intention to move this motion of closure to-day, the Prime Minister comes along in the first minute of proceedings in committee to-day and applies closure, affecting all three sections of the bill, though as you, yourself, Mr. Chairman, well know, even the first section has not yet been passed. I quote from yesterday's proceedings at page 1557 of Hansard as follows:

> The Chairman (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I would ask the hon. gentleman, who knows the rules, to observe them. We are discussing section one of this bill.

As you yourself have said, Mr. Chairman, section one of the bill is the only section that has been discussed, yet by the most coercive and arbitrary act of which a government is capable, we are being prevented from discussing sections two and three of the measure and discussing at any further length the first section.

May I direct attention to this further fact: During this parliament, this house has had very little opportunity to discuss the question of unemployment and farm relief. There was very little opportunity afforded during the special session, and at the last session it was not until the concluding days in the month of July that the government brought down its measures with respect to unemployment relief. As hon. members know there was no opportunity then to discuss this matter. This year for the first time we have had or at least ought to have had some opportunity to discuss what is involved in this all important question.

What is the nature of the desired discussion? In the first place it is admitted by hon. gentlemen opposite that there has been an expenditure of over $140,000,000 from the treasury of this dominion for unemployment and farm relief.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should say, along with those of the provinces.

Mr. STEVENS: And the municipalities.

Mr. MANION: And the railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will make it perfectly clear. The expenditure on unemployment and farm relief as taken out of the taxes of the people in one form or another has totalled over $140,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not correct.

Mr. MANION: The money expended by the railways was not taken out of the taxes of the people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) says that the part expended by the railroads was not taken out of the taxes of the people. I should like then to know where it came from.

Mr. MANION: The Canadian Pacific Railway Company spent a good deal of money which did not come out of the taxes of the people. That spent by the Canadian National Railways, perhaps, but the Canadian Pacific Railway, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not quibble over a few figures here or there. No one can gainsay the statement that more money has been spent on unemployment relief since the present administration came into power than was required to run the entire government of Canada for a period of any one year during the time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, or for a period of any two years during the time of Sir John A. Macdonald. That gives some appreciation of the extent to which the taxes of the people are being spent for this particular purpose.

We on this side, under a sense of our obligations, have been seeking to discover how that money has been spent. As it is only a preliminary to further expenditures, we have been seeking to ascertain what policies are going to govern the action of the government in the future. I submit that the discussion of a matter of such colossal proportions and so all-important to the taxpayers of this country should not be restricted under closure within a day and a half of the time it has been entered upon. Action so extreme in character has never been taken by any British government in regard to public taxation.

I will not add more at the moment, Mr. Chairman, except to say that it would be pure pretence for us to seek to take advantage in any way of the little right which remains to us under closure to ask but one question each of the ministry with no guarantee that we will receive an answer. I think it better under the circumstances that we seek to prevent a waste of public moneys by attempting anything which is wholly futile. I shall content myself therefore, by saying that the action of the administration at the present time reduces parliament in its most essential functions to a mere futility and a complete farce, and that we of the opposition do not intend to lend ourselves to participation in any step of that kind.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of this session, or, at least, from the time that the measure now before the committee was first introduced, we on this side have sat and listened to objections of various sorts, all of which were calculated to produce but one result—to stop the measures which had been put into effect by this government in order to relieve the unemployment situation in this country. We have heard from the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Mackenzie King) and from those who sit behind him, various suggestions as to why this legislation should be balked or brought to an improvident conclusion, but we have not heard, at least up to the time my right hon. friend took his seat, any suggestion why the relief measures now proposed for this country should be abrogated or not considered as an obligation of this parliament. It must be illuminating to hon. members to hear day after day members of the opposition, either under the direction of my right hon. friend or at least with his approbation, giving reasons why the relief which western Canada and the country has called for should be blocked and made of no effect. The one reason for their action which I have been able to gather from what has been said by the opposition is that instead of adopting the measure now before the house they would propose a better plan, namely, that of bringing into this parliament a proposition—

An hon. MEMBER: Spit it out.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I will spit it out and you will not like what I am going to say —which would afford an opportunity of inquiring into and arriving at some means of meeting the situation which must be faced in order to relieve unemployment.

Mr. VALLANCE: This is the hon. member's last chance.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I ask the committee to judge the right hon gentleman in the light of what happened in 1924. At that time he called a conference to meet in Ottawa to deal with the very serious question of unemployment. At that time there were present in the house and in the city representatives of practically all the leading municipalities of Canada. My right hon. friend knows on that occasion he sent into his council chamber the then Minister of Labour, Mr. Murdock. What did he do? When the people from the various municipalities assembled here in Ottawa, that same gentleman, under the direction of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert, told them that the Dominion parliament had no interest whatever in the question of unemployment; that it had no responsibility to assume in connection with the matter, and that they should go home and look after their own troubles as best they could. Who will deny that? What does the record say? It says that the right hon. gentleman who now assails the Prime Minister and says that he has done nothing, while the whole country rings with the record of his achievements—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I am glad my hon. friends opposite admit that. They will not deny it. While the country rings with the record of achievement on the part of the present Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert hopes the Canadian people will forget his lack of achievement in 1924 when he had the opportunity but let it slip, with the result that owing to his impotence nothing was done. Surely there is only one result that the people of Canada desire and that is that the man whose statements resulted in nothing shall be judged by his lack of achievement and that the man whose action resulted in everything and who now sits in the office of prime minister, shall once again prevail against obstruction, stupidity and ignorance.

Mr. NEILL: As I have not so far taken part in this debate, perhaps I shall not be accused of unnecessarily prolonging it. I probably shall be, but not justly. The reason I did not take such part was that I regard the matter of the extension of the act for thirty days as of far less importance than the matter concerning which I am going to ask the Prime Minister a question, which is the consideration of what is going to be done in connection with unemployment relief after May 1? There are only twenty-nine days between now and May 1 and the extension of the act will take care of that. The question that the provinces, the municipalities and the Canadian people generally are concerned with is, what provisions are contemplated to take care of conditions which will prevail after May 1. In that connection I wish to ask the Prime Minister if he will be kind enough to amplify or clarify an expression which he used yesterday, in debating the sections now before the house, because it seemed to me, on reading it, as if a few words had been left out of the record. The Prime Minister, as reported on page 1565 of Hansard, made this statement:

> It may be of interest, and I think the committee should know that in furtherance of the views which I expressed a few days ago—

I take the reference to a few days ago—and he will correct me if I am wrong—to be the occasion on which he said it was his determination, as soon as the provincial legislatures had concluded their sittings, to call a conference of the premiers of the provinces to consider the question of future unemployment relief. He goes on to say:

> I have despatched a message to the governments of all the provinces—

It seems to me some words are left out there. There is nothing to indicate the nature of the message. He continues:

> —for the purpose of enabling us to look at this financial position clearly and ascertain to what extent it may be necessary for the dominion to secure funds—

And so on. It seems to me something to indicate the nature of the message is left out there. The message was, I suggest, though I have no business to do so, to the effect of asking the provinces to state what they considered their commitments or responsibilities would be or what sums of money they would require. He then goes on to state:

This we hope to do within the next ten days

One would expect that to read: "This we hope to obtain"—that is a statement of what the provinces require. My question is: will he kindly explain the purport of this message and of his intention? Does it refer to calling a provincial conference which has been suggested for the near future, or was it to ask a definite statement from each province setting forth its contemplated expenditures, so that when the Prime Minister received those statements he would be in a better position, as he says, to submit to the house legislation based upon an intelligent understanding?

As the closure has been introduced and I shall not be able to put any further question, I sincerely trust the Prime Minister will give me the information I desire in the same spirit in which I am asking it, that is of getting information in which I think the whole country is deeply interested. He can turn the question aside by some cryptic expression, but I do not think it would be appropriate. What the country is vitally concerned in today is to know what steps the government is contemplating to take care of the situation after May 1.

Mr. BENNETT: That hardly arises out of the consideration of the sections now before the house.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Shall clauses 1, 2, 3 and the title carry?

Mr. MacINNIS: The few words I have to say in connection with this matter I would rather utter while the Minister of Public Works is in the house, but I see he is not. I think what I have to say can be said under the matter which we are now discussing. I refer to the violation of the fair wage clause in connection with government public works in British Columbia. Unlike what has been the policy in the past, it seems to me from examples I have at hand, the government has in this instance helped in the violation of fair wage rates. As it has sent to the various organizations that work from Vancouver and that are engaged in public works carried on from that city, for their wage rates, and as it has received them, I see no reason why it should not be cognizant of what they are. The particular matter I am taking up now has reference to contracts for wharves at White Rock and Gibson's Landing, British Columbia. This was a work in which bridge, wharf and dock builders were engaged. The rate prevailing in the Vancouver district for that kind of work is one dollar per hour, but the government rate paid on that work was only sixty cents per hour. The rate for foremen on that kind of work according to the wage scale in effect in the Vancouver district was $1.25 per hour, but the rate for foremen which the government was paying was only 70 cents per hour. So we see that the government helped the contractors to break down the wage scale which the workers had for so many years been striving to build up. Not only that, but it seems that in order that that might more easily be done, they asked the contractors not to have different classes of workmen engaged on the job at the same time. I have here a copy of a letter from the pile-drivers, bridge, wharf and dock builders to the Deputy Minister of Labour at Ottawa, from which I quote as follows:

Re: Dominion Government Fair Wages Policy

From investigation conducted by this organization to ascertain the rates of wages paid by the Dominion government for repairs and construction of new wharves, we find that in some cases two fair wages schedules have been prepared by the Department of Labour for wharf builders, one rate of one dollar per hour, which is the established rate, and another rate of sixty cents per hour for the same class of labour.

We are advised that in order to successfully carry out this policy of reducing wages, officials have been advising all concerned to carefully avoid having pile-driving crews and wharf builders engaged on the work at the same time. This we presume was considered necessary in order that one group of employees would not be aware of the rates of wages paid to the others.

I have not much to add, but I wished to bring this to the attention of the Minister of Public Works and of the Minister of Labour. I believe that they have been advised of this situation before. I think it is a bad policy to take advantage of the economic situation to force workers who may get a few days of this kind of work to do to accept lower wages than those prevailing, breaking down the wage standards, especially when the benefit from any reduced scale of wages goes, not to the employees themselves, but to the contractors who have the contract for the work. From what I have seen of the Minister of Public Works in this house, I believe he is willing to see justice done, and I hope he will in future see that the fair wage clause in dominion contracts is strictly adhered to.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): In reply to the remarks of my hon. friend, the latter portion of which I heard but the former portion of which I did not hear unfortunately owing to my absence from the house, I can only say that it is the fixed policy of the Public Works department to obtain a schedule of rates of wages applicable to the different portions of the dominion based upon the prevailing rate in the locality. In the works which we do by contract the schedule of wages as fixed by the Labour department is adopted and made a part of the contract. The contractor is checked up from time to time and compelled to pay wages on the basis of that schedule. I understood my hon. friend to refer to two pieces of work, one at White Rock and the other at Gibson's Landing. I have no information here in detail about these works, but I believe they were done by day labour, and not under contract. Under those circumstances the department would have to adopt the prevailing rate in the locality, and that is the course that has been adopted. In the matter of relieving unemployment we are rather embarrassed sometimes by a different rate of wages prevailing on provincial work from that prevailing on federal work, and care must be taken not to get these rates too far out of line. I can only assure my hon. friend that in the future as in the past we shall keep in touch with the Labour department and that the schedules as adopted from year to year by that department will be strictly adhered to in our contracts.

Mr. RALSTON: In dealing particularly with section two, which has to do with the laying on the table of the orders in council which are passed from time to time, I want to ask the right hon. the Prime Minister whether or not the orders in council which have already been passed, particularly with regard to the prohibition of the export of gold will be renewed, and whether or not he will limit in any way the exercise of his powers. He intimated to us that he intended to insert some limitation with particular reference to the subject on which those powers would be exercised.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. If the right hon. gentleman rises to speak, I wish to quote the rule, standing order 39, which reads as follows:

> Immediately before the order of the day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the house be in committee of the whole, or of supply, or of ways and means, any minister of the crown who, standing in his place, shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee, and shall not further be postponed; and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative, no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer than twenty minutes in any such adjourned debate.

The right hon. gentleman having already spoken in answer to my friend from Comox-Alberni, I object to his replying to the member for Shelburne-Yarmouth.

Mr. NEILL: It was no answer to my question.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to you that the point of order now taken by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice is not well taken and that in any event it only amounts to an endeavour to shut off discussion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Laugh again. I love it; I love it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I love the eunuch too.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Once again it is simply an endeavour to ask a question in order to get it put on the record in the hope of being able to tell the country that it has not been answered.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is not a point of order. It is a speech.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that my hon. friend's point is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Quebec East has very properly quoted the rule. I have some doubts whether I should not have called the attention of the committee to the rule before the debate started after the motion had been carried. I do not understand, however, that the mere answering of a question put across the floor constitutes speaking within the rule. If it does, then it is a very limited and narrow construction of the rule, and it has never been so applied in this house since I have been a member of it for the last eleven years.

An hon. MEMBER: But this is closure.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I would rule that the mere answering of a question does not constitute a speech, when a minister is replying to a question put to him by a member of the house.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose I have a question to ask. Does that constitute a speech?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): We will go into that when we come to it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: You cannot apply the rule both ways. It must be one way or the other.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I have ruled that the Prime Minister has not spoken in answering any question in this debate.

Mr. NEILL: Then would it be in order for the Prime Minister to reply to my question now?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): He did. Shall sections 1, 2 and 3 and the title carry?

Sections 1, 2 and 3 and the title agreed to: yeas, 63; nays, 40.

Bill reported on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is obviously the last opportunity that will be afforded in this house to draw the attention of hon. members, as well as the people of the country to the significance of the debate that has taken place during the past two or three weeks, and of the action which is being taken at the present time.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the third bill which has been introduced in this parliament with respect to unemployment relief. The first bill was introduced at the special session of 1930, and was known as the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930. The second bill was introduced at the second session, and was known as the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931. The measure which is now before us for third reading is known as the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932.

The point I wish to make, first of all, is that this is an entirely new measure. It is not an amendment of any previous measure, existent or non-existent. This fact amply demonstrates the soundness of the position taken by the opposition at the beginning of the debate, to the effect that, if the government intended to proceed this year in a manner similar to that in which it did in previous years, it ought to have followed the same course, and introduced a resolution naming the measure it intended to introduce. It should not have proceeded by a resolution which required amendment, and which, when passed, could not, strictly speaking, be held to be a proper foundation for the bill now alleged to be based upon it.

The resolution, introduced by the administration, as hon. members know, was to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of 1931. As was pointed out at the time, chapter 58 had ceased to exist. We have, in this very bill which has been brought down by the ministry, the statement in the first clause that chapter 58 is no longer in existence, that it expired by lapse of time. Notwithstanding the fact that we pointed out that it was impossible to amend a measure which was no longer in existence, hon. gentlemen opposite persisted in proceeding with a resolution having that end in view and, by devious methods and rulings, contrived on the basis of that resolution to bring in this measure, which, as I have said, is not an amendment of anything but is in the nature of an entirely new enactment. I think I am right in claiming that, had the proper methods been followed, the house would, at least, have been saved many questionable interpretations and the long, tortuous and devious methods which were adopted in order to have it declared that a measure that had ceased to exist, not only had the power of perpetuating itself, but actually had the capacity to give birth to an entirely new enactment. That is what appears on the records of this house as the story of the resolution which preceded this particular enactment.

I can only express the hope that some of the rulings and decisions may never be cited as precedents by any subsequent parliament in this country. I believe the members of the ministry will themselves be the first to blush when, in calmer moments, they review what the records disclose of the means which were taken to bring into being this particular measure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is by no means a bill restricted to the providing of unemployment and farm relief. That fact cannot be too strongly emphasized and clearly stated. The bill which is before us at the present time, though it is called and designated the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, is not a measure confined in its provisions to farm and unemployment relief. It is really in the nature of three distinct enactments. One has to do with the providing of unemployment relief. The second has to do with giving the ministry unlimited moneys for the purpose of expenditure in connection with relief, removing from this House of Commons all control over this expenditure and incidental taxation, and allowing the ministry a free hand with reference thereto. The third important feature is that which takes from this parliament what I believe is its exclusive right, namely, that of legislating on matters relating to peace, order and good government, and of giving to the ministry the power to exercise that right in secret session by order in council. The bill must be regarded as three distinct measures, and such opposition as there has been from this side of the house has related exclusively to that provision of the enactment which deprives the House of Commons of its control over taxation and expenditure, and to the provision which gives to the ministry absolute powers to legislate by order in council with respect to peace, order and good government, which means pretty much anything and everything.

There can be no question that at no time in the course of this whole debate has there been opposition on the part of any hon. members on this side to granting to the government what was necessary in the way of moneys for the purpose of relief, and granting those moneys immediately. I made that abundantly clear when I spoke the other evening and said that not only were we prepared to vote what was necessary for two months in the form of supply, or a grant in aid, if the ministry so preferred, but that we were prepared to vote what moneys might be necessary up to March 31, 1933. I went further and stated that if the ministry were wedded to the phraseology or to any other feature of the enactment of the previous year we would be perfectly agreeable to allowing the measure of relief to be voted under a similar enactment, provided that it did not contain the two objectionable features, the one depriving the Commons of its control over taxation and expenditure, and the other giving to the ministry absolute powers in the matter of legislating with respect to peace, order and good government.

The reason I feel it is important to emphasize that question is that apparently even yet, whether intentionally or unintentionally, a certain section of the press of this country does not correctly represent the position of the opposition in this matter. For example, I have in my hand a clipping from the government organ in this city of the night before last, referring to what transpired—

Mr. BENNETT: What paper would that be?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not know it by that name.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am referring to the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday last.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not recognize it by that name.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not attaching importance at the moment to the fact that this is the government organ in Ottawa; I am rather attaching importance to the extent to which a large section of the press appears, up to the present time, to have misunderstood the significance of such action as has been taken by the opposition during the course of this debate. The article is headed:

Liberals Fail In Effort To Kill Relief Legislation
Opposition Amendment Is Rejected 100 To 64

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hear some hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear," with regard to the statement that the Liberals failed in an effort to kill the relief legislation. I think I have made it abundantly clear that the Liberals have been prepared from the outset to grant immediately, and to whatever extent might be required, whatever was needed in the way of relief legislation. What the Liberals have failed to kill is the action of the government which deprives the House of Commons of its control over taxation and expenditure incidental to relief; what the Liberals have failed to kill is the autocratic action of the government, by the use of closure, to gain for itself the right to legislate by order in council with respect to peace, order and good government, a right which under our constitution it was never intended that parliament should be called upon to part with in any particular. That is what the Liberal opposition, despite all its efforts, has failed to prevent up to the present time.

Now may I present a point of view to hon. gentlemen opposite, to members of the Conservative party as Conservatives, which I would ask them to consider carefully before this measure is given third reading. It is an aspect which has been very much in the minds of those of us who have taken the stand that has been taken with regard to this measure; it is a point of view I have already presented in general words but which I wish to present now in concrete form. Whatever is done in this house of an important nature, becomes in course of time, a precedent. We are living in troublous times; we are living in an age where conditions are rapidly changing, and it is quite conceivable that before many years have elapsed we may have sitting on the ministerial benches of this parliament instead of a Conservative government, that is supposed to be the guardian of all Conservative action, let us say a Socialist administration of an extreme type. Let us assume that the ministry of that day, confronted with a period of depression, decides to obtain power to secure from parliament, at a single stroke, all that it may wish to have for purposes of public expenditure on relief and social services of one kind or another, also authority to enact whatever laws it desires, quite irrespective of parliament. Where would such a ministry find precedent for such action? It would find it in the methods of hon. gentlemen opposite, find it in the action they are taking to-day.

Mr. BURY: May I ask a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to be interrupted. It would appeal to the records of this house, to what took place in the parliament of Canada during the month of March and on April 1, 1932, and it would find there that despite a vigorous opposition by those who sought to protect the very foundations on which parliamentary government rests, and to preserve the constitution and all that the constitution stands for, the Conservative government of this day had established the precedent that a ministry may, by use of closure, secure to itself power to obtain from the public treasury whatever sum of money it wishes, naming no amount, and take to itself unlimited authority in the matter of legislation by order in council.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that establishing a precedent of the kind is a pretty serious situation, and I cannot understand how any hon. member of this parliament who takes his duties seriously and who regards himself as a guardian of the liberties of the people, can lend himself to action of the kind. That is the real significance of this whole debate. It is not a question of the voting of relief, as I have already said; that we have all been agreed upon from the beginning. But what those of us on this side have strenuously opposed is the sanctioning of a course which torpedoes all that there is in the way of established parliamentary practice and procedure, and submarines the very constitution of our country. That is the significance of the fight we have put up here and I say, Mr. Speaker, that we would be unworthy of our positions as members of this house if, recognizing the danger in the form in which I have presented it this afternoon, we did not exhaust every possible means to prevent the enactment of any measure that would establish a precedent of the kind.

Now may I give a further reason why it is important that we resist to the nth degree. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been citing, as one of the reasons why they should have the right to introduce this enactment this session, the legislation that was passed last session. They say, "There is the statute of last year, and all we are asking is that we reenact what was done last year." Hon. gentlemen know very well that last year we put up as strong an opposition as we possibly could to the measure then introduced. We pointed out its arbitrary features; we pointed out its revolutionary features, but at that time there was existent, considering the period of the year when the measure was brought in, what to all intents and purposes was closure. The bill was not brought in until the month of July, after a very long session of parliament, and members could not be kept together in this house for a prolonged struggle, with the conditions that then existed. So we had to content ourselves with placing our position on record, but in doing so we in no way acquiesced in the legislation that was going through. Indeed, we did not cease our opposition until the Prime Minister gave parliament the solemn undertaking that the measure then before the house would be amended in committee so that instead of expiring on March 31 it would expire on March 1, thereby assuring to the House of Commons, when it assembled this year, full opportunity to pass a new measure which in no way would usurp its rights while parliament was in session as the measure of 1931 did, for the period when parliament was not in session.

So I say that, having had repeatedly drawn to our attention the fact that whatever is done at one session is going to be made a precedent for what may be done at another session, we have had no alternative but to continue our opposition to the present measure until the government, by the drastic action it has taken, made perfectly clear to the country that even if they had to go the length of coercion and use a weapon with which to defeat those who were fighting for the maintenance of free institutions, they were determined to use that weapon as often as might be necessary to accomplish their ends. For that reason, and that reason only, have we ceased even for a moment our opposition to the two objectionable features of this measure to which I have referred.

I shall not weary the house with any lengthy quotations with respect to the rights and duties of the House of Commons on matters of control of taxation and public expenditure and the rights of the house with respect to legislation; but the Prime Minister and other speakers have placed on record one or two quotations by which they support the position they have taken, and I shall therefore give a quotation or two from outstanding authorities in regard to the solemn obligation of the House of Commons touching the control of expenditures. These quotations represent the grounds upon which our opposition to the action of the present administration has been taken. The Prime Minister, in his speech at the time of introducing closure, quoted from Redlich's The Procedure of the House of Commons. I hold in my hand volume 3 of Redlich, which contains the quotation given by the Prime Minister. I am going to refer to that quotation before I conclude my remarks, but, in the meantime, I wish to quote from a page that is removed by only a few pages from the one from which the Prime Minister quoted. It is from chapter 4, the chapter dealing with the history of financial procedure, and it sums up in a couple of paragraphs the view of this great authority on the obligation of the Commons with respect to matters pertaining to financial procedure. At page 159, chapter 4 begins as follows:

> At the first glance there does not appear to be much to learn from tracing the history of the forms of financial procedure. The motive power in financial development is not to be found in procedure, but in the growth of constitutional principles, in the acquisition by parliament of the sole right to grant taxes and in the further evolution of the predominance of the Commons as the true representatives of the nation. We have already referred to this development, which, so far as it bears on our special subject, was completed by the Revolution of 1688.
> But there is something more to say. The fundamental principle just referred to secures only one of the great functions of parliament with regard to money matters. Soon after the great change made at the end of the seventeenth century, political experience showed that a second principle must be established before the foundations of parliamentary government could be regarded as secure.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to note these words:

> Before the foundations of parliamentary government could be regarded as secure—

Another great principle had to be recognized, and it was this:

> It was necessary to give to the Commons full and unrestricted control over the destination of the money spent, to enable parliament to check its application and to see that the expenditure corresponded to the grants made.

I ask, sir, was there ever a quotation which came to a legislative body so pregnant with meaning as this quotation comes to this House of Commons this afternoon, when, by the action of the Prime Minister and his government, the committee of this House of Commons has been denied all right to endeavour to check the application of moneys, to see that the expenditure corresponded to the grants made, and to exercise its unrestricted control over the destination of the moneys spent. Let me go on:

> The working-out of this principle led by degrees to the present financial apparatus of the House of Commons. The form of a bill of supply and the division of parliamentary business between the two money committees of the whole House had long been in existence. But from 1688 onwards the development of law and practice in finance procedure took a new turn: the old framework was retained, but a new spirit was breathed into all the forms of financial management, especially those relating to the expenditure of the state, and the administration of the moneys placed at the disposal of the government. The complete realization of the idea of parliamentary control reacted upon the whole organization of financial administration, just as the vast extension of the latter determined the way in which the great task of modern parliamentary government—direct parliamentary control over the whole of the national finances—reached its present shape. The result of the whole process has been to establish in actual fact the vital principle of modern parliamentary government—that of the full sovereignty of the nation's representatives in disposing of the financial burdens borne by their constituents.

Could anything be more emphatic as to what lies at the very foundation of parliamentary government, and which, as this high authority says, is the great task, the vital principle of parliamentary government and the greatest of all responsibilities that rest upon members of the House of Commons? Yet it is that right, that duty, that obligation which is being denied this parliament by the bill which we are asked to support at the present time on its third reading.

May I now quote from another great authority, Colonel A. J. V. Durell, C.B., in his The Principles and Practice of the System of Control over Parliamentary Grants—the leading authority on this subject. Redlich was dealing with the financial aspect. Durell, in the part I am going to quote, deals more particularly with the constitutional aspect. At page 3 in the chapter on the House of Commons he says:

> 'It is one of the old standing principles of our constitution that the House of Commons should control the finances of the country. That is the right, privilege, and duty of the house. It has been achieved by means of struggles lasting through centuries, beginning from the fourteenth century down to the seventeenth century, when it was fully confirmed, and since then it has never been practically disputed.' 'Ut quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus approbetur.' The quotation by Edward I of this legal maxim transmuted it into a great and constitutional principle. In other words, the cardinal principle on which the whole of our financial system is based is that of parliamentary control, and by this is understood not the control of parliament in its constitutional sense as composed of Sovereign, Lords, and Commons, but control by the Commons alone. 'Upon this fundamental principle, laid down at the very outset of English parliamentary history and secured by three hundred years of mingled conflict with the crown and peaceful growth, is grounded the whole law of finance and, consequently, the whole British constitution.'

The most ancient, as well as the most valued, prerogative of the House of Commons is the right of supreme control over taxation, to which the right to control issues is a natural corollary. The prohibition of raising taxes without parliamentary authority would be nugatory if the proceeds, even of legal taxes, could be expended at the will of the sovereign. The right, therefore, of appropriation was a logical consequence of the right of levying supplies. 'The chain of historical evidence undeniably proves that a previous and stringent appropriation, often minute and specific, has formed an essential part of the British constitution.' Though the practice of appropriating supplies, in a general sense, is of early origin, that of appropriating them to the specific purposes for which they were granted did not become an established usage until the Revolution, when the principle that 'the grant of supply, and the control of public expenditure in conformity therewith, belongs inalienably to parliament, and pre-eminently to the House of Commons' was formally incorporated amongst the maxims of the constitution, and in the early days provision was made for severe penalties for diversion or misapplication. The control over public expenditure which resulted therefrom has, more than any other cause, vested in the Commons the supreme power of the state. 'It is, indeed, ultimately to the power of the purse, to its power to bring the whole executive machinery of the country to a standstill, that the House of Commons owes its control over the executive. That is the fountain and origin of its historical victories over the other organs of the state; and since that power was recognized and confirmed towards the end of the seventeenth century, the House of Commons has remained, whether reformed or unreformed, whether corrupt or incorrupt, the chief arbiter of the national destinies.'

Yet, in the face of a statement of the constitutional position, such as is there expressed by this eminent authority, and which every one knows to be the only true position, we are being asked this afternoon by the power sought by the executive through this measure to stab the constitution of the country at the very heart and destroy, to the extent to which it may be possible to do so in the course of a short time, the very foundations of government in this Dominion of Canada. I shall quote further from two brief paragraphs in the same chapter. The first on page 9 reads:

> The supreme control of the commons over public grants, as already mentioned, necessarily demands the complete right of control over the manner in which those grants are spent. This second right must be inseparable from the first if the control over the grants is to be effective; but it is a right which was not claimed nor enforced by the House of Commons until long after the right of control over supply had been established.

And on page 10:

> In its constitutional aspect then, the English system of finance and the rules of financial administration are based upon the principle of supreme control by the House of Commons, and the machinery, by which it works, has been built up, developed, extended or modified to meet the requirements of that principle.

It is this most important, most sacred and most far-reaching of all the principles which underlie British constitutional procedure, practice and government that we are being asked by the ministry of the day to violate in the measure now before the house.

That is one aspect of the constitution which we are being asked to violate by this legislation. The other is the right of parliament and of parliament only to do what may be necessary in the way of legislating. I fail to understand how hon. gentlemen opposite could have been led so far astray in their thinking on this matter as to forget the very constitution of the country. I suppose that almost every schoolboy in the land, when he begins to study constitutional questions and matters pertaining to parliament, is taught the provisions of the British North America Act. What does this act say with regard to legislation concerning peace, order and good government? I read from the British North America Act as I find it bound with these Parliamentary Rules and Forms in Beauchesne's volume so entitled. Section VI, which is headed Distribution of Legislative Powers, contains the following subsection entitled Powers of the Parliament:

> 91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—

Then follows the enumeration with which all hon. members are familiar. Is there any word anywhere in the British North America Act which says it is lawful for the executive as distinguished from parliament to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government? Is there one clause in the constitution of our country which gives to any Prime Minister and his colleagues the right to do that which is assigned only to the parliament of Canada as a whole? We cannot afford to allow any ministry to take from parliament that which is given to it by the constitution of this country as its exclusive right and obligation. The right to legislate respecting peace, order and good government is a right assigned not to the ministry but to parliament itself. As we have said repeatedly, why have a parliament at all if the ministry is to be allowed to exercise this power? Peace, order and good government include virtually everything. The ministry have so recognized this fact because under it they have amended the Bank Act and the Insurance Act, have dealt with the finances of this country, have increased the mounted police force and performed various other acts coming within the subjects enumerated as those belonging to parliament.

With the unlimited money they will receive under this bill, with the power they will have under peace, order and good government to legislate on anything they wish, they could if they so desired create a standing army to overawe this parliament, and, do so in virtue of the powers which this house is being asked to give to them by this bill at the present time. That no doubt is the kind of thing the Prime Minister would like to bring about: to establish himself as a dictator, as a second Cromwell in his day, but I say that, before we return to the days of the revolution, we shall do our utmost to prevent a reversion to any condition such as that.

Let me ask my hon. friend—I will refer particularly to the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) because I think he has some conscience in these things—how would he feel if a socialist government were in office at the present time and, under the rights claimed by the ministry of which he is a member, attempted to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government, and to deal with the very subjects with which he and his colleagues have dealt? How would he feel if they passed an order in council to amend the Bank Act without any reference to parliament? How would he feel if they said that, by virtue of a situation which had arisen, the banks of the country should not longer be permitted to carry on their business under the provisions of the act which parliament had enacted; that it was necessary to amend that act, and then proceeded, by order in council, to amend the Bank Act? That is what has been done under provisions of the enactment similar to this measure.

Let us consider the question of insurance companies. How would my hon. friend view the action of a socialist ministry which said: We do not care what the law is with respect to insurance companies, we are going to pass by order in council the legislation which we think is necessary in this time of crisis to make these insurance companies do whatever we believe to be in the interests of the country.

Mr. CAHAN: I assume my answer may be reserved until the right hon. gentleman concludes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should imagine that my hon. friend would want to reserve it for a long time.

That is the position in which we are at the present time. May I go a step further? Under orders in council which have been passed by virtue of this authority to legislate on peace, order and good government, the government has dealt with the question of the currency, the gold of this country. How would my Conservative friends feel if a socialist government in office, using the precedent of the action taken by the present ministry under authority to legislate on peace, order and good government, started forthwith to have the printing presses of this country manufacture whatever money they wished and to distribute that money broadcast, giving as a reason that this was necessary in order to meet a situation which existed?

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Don't worry; there will not be any socialist government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hear an hon. member opposite say that there will be no socialist government. May I say to him that this is the kind of thing that breeds socialist governments of the most extreme type. This is the sort of thing that would provide any government with the weapons it might need in order, if it so desired, to deal in a subversive manner with the constitution and other rights of the people.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the right hon. gentleman mean to infer that if a socialist government came into power these would be the only means it would use to achieve its objective?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to be construed for one moment as suggesting what a socialist government would do. I am endeavouring to place before hon. gentlemen the position as it would present itself to them if a socialist government attempted to do what they themselves are doing. I do not believe that any government, socialist or otherwise, except this one would attempt to go the autocratic lengths that hon. gentlemen opposite have gone, but I do say that any government would find ample justification in the form of precedent for any extreme act, in the action of hon. gentlemen opposite in this particular measure which gives to the government of the day the authority which it does. That is the point I wish to make.

We all know very well that extreme action of the kind for which hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible does not come about in a day. Arbitrary authority helps to breed arbitrary authority. The enjoyment of a certain amount of absolute power creates an appetite for more in the way of absolute power, and finally absolutism knows no bounds. That is the point we have now reached so far as the Prime Minister and his colleagues are concerned.

Let us consider the stages by which the present bill has come into being. It represents an evolution in the growth of autocracy in this country. And let me ask where is a country likely to land, once it abandons known and established methods of financial procedure and once it does not hesitate to undermine the foundations of constitutional government? There have been three steps. The first was the legislation of the special session. When the special session was called, we had reason to believe it was chiefly for the purpose of dealing with the question of unemployment. That was the impression throughout the country. As a matter of fact, as all hon. members know, the greater part of that session was taken up in raising the tariff and giving to the ministry of the day autocratic powers with respect to it, autocratic powers which they have exercised in a very arbitrary manner since they have become possessed of them.

But in regard to unemployment relief, what was done? Were the known and constitutional methods of procedure adopted at that special session? We all know that in the voting of supplies for any purpose there are two considerations the House of Commons is accustomed to observe. One is to fix a definite limit of time, which relates itself to the financial year, to whatever is being spent. The other is to designate specific purposes for which appropriations are being made. Whether appropriations be in the form of supply to His Majesty under a supply bill or in the form of grants in aid under special legislation for the purpose, they usually have this in common, that they recognize a financial year, and sums appropriated are designated for specific purposes. Had that course then been followed, we might not now be so far along the way in rejecting fundamental principles as we have come, but it was not followed. The ministry, first of all, did not ask parliament for just enough money to deal with unemployment relief until the regular session might be held. They asked for an amount very much in excess of what was required prior to the meeting of the regular session. We met in September, 1930. They ought to have asked for what was necessary up until March 31, 1931. Then, before March 31, they should have come to the Commons and asked for the additional amount they needed under a supply bill. But they did not do that; they asked for $20,000,000, and from the records we know that only four or five millions of that amount was spent before the end of the fiscal year. The rest of that money was, almost in its entirety, spent in the following year. The expenditure of a new fiscal year was made under the authority of an act which related to a previous fiscal year. That was, to begin with, a wrong step.

In the second place, instead of endeavouring in any way to specify to the House of Commons where that money was to go, indicating that some of it was to go to the provinces, some of it to certain public works, some of it to be used in the form of direct relief and so on, as would have been the proper procedure, the government did not so designate, stated no specific amounts, but asked merely for this lump sum in general terms for the relief of unemployment. That again was a departure from known financial procedure in the house, and it has helped to lead to much of the difficulty in which we now find ourselves.

The first enactment had this redeeming feature: it had a certain outward appearance of conformity to some of the rules which govern financial appropriations in the house. It named an amount. That was one feature which at least conformed in appearance to what had always hitherto been done in parliament. It is true the amount was excessive. It had no real foundation on any properly considered estimate, but it was named. Moreover, there were words, more or less general, it is true, by which were indicated the uses though not specific, to which the money might be applied. There was thus, up to a certain point, the saving grace of appearance.

An incipient dictatorship was in this way introduced in the first measure. That was what it amounted to, through the government being given a very large sum of money, much larger than it needed for the completion of the fiscal year, a sum to do with pretty much what it pleased. There was moreover conferred upon the ministry, by the general terms of the act, the power to disregard any real control by the Commons or parliament. So, when we come to the next year, 1931, we find the government going a step farther. At the session of 1931 they abandoned even the appearance of trying to conform to the methods of parliamentary procedure, and they asked parliament to give them a blank cheque. They asked for power to take an unlimited amount of money out of the treasury which means the power of granting taxes to an unlimited amount. Never before in the history of any British parliament has that been done. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, if they can, to cite a single instance where any parliament was asked by a responsible ministry to part with its right of controlling taxation and expenditure by appropriating moneys without limit to the ministry of the day. This autocratic ministry, however, claimed, and not only claimed but secured this power, under what to all intents and purposes in the last session was a species of closure.

That was going pretty far, but the ministry went further. Not satisfied with having, under these general terms, secured all the money it needed to do with as it pleased, it demanded and secured also the power to legislate as it pleased, that sacred right which belongs only to parliament, and for the sake of which parliament exists. They have thus taken to themselves the power to make new laws. Do not let us deceive ourselves. It is laws that are being made in secret session of executive council. These hon. gentlemen made laws with respect to banking, insurance, the police force of the country, with respect to many objects that were never contemplated at the time they obtained from parliament the power they did. In addition they have created new offences and penalties in the way of fines and imprisonment, penalties which stand to-day as part of the law of the land. All of this power was taken away from parliament. What is parliament for if it is not to protect the people with respect to the laws which shall govern them? What do we mean by self-government? Why have a parliament, if a ministry is to have rights and powers of this kind?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

One would imagine it was impossible for a ministry to go further than that, but hon. gentlemen opposite have done so. Having tasted absolute authority to the exent I have mentioned, they were determined to extend it still further if they could. There was one limitation and one only which they put on their action of last session; it was put on as a result of the vigorous opposition that was urged on this side. It was this: We contended that at no time, whether parliament was in session or not in session, should any such absolute powers be given to a ministry. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister saw something of the force of our objection. He would not admit its force for the period in which parliament was not in session, but he had not the countenance to force that measure through under closure, if need be, in a form which would yield those powers to the ministry while parliament was in session. Although he brought in the act with the expiration of its provisions originally fixed at March 31, when it was pointed out to him from this side over and over again that parliament would be in session on March 31 and all through the month of March, he himself said that he would change the date to March 1, and he changed it. Why? In order, so he said, that there would be no question of usurping the powers of parliament. Last year, he saw that his action meant the usurpation of the powers of parliament, but since then, under the exercise of autocratic power, he has become more and more indifferent to parliament. This year he comes along and says: I will now go a step further; I will usurp the authority of parliament, while parliament itself is in session, and I will do something more than that, and this I think, Mr. Speaker, is the most amazing thing that any Prime Minister ever did. He said: I will go the length of giving reasons to parliament why its power should be usurped. He gave his reasons, and I will, in a moment or two, quote them to the house. I am pointing out now the length to which autocratic methods, once they are countenanced, may carry a ministry even in a free country.

What is the situation at the present time? We have a measure before us which asks us deliberately to allow our rights to be usurped during the time that we are in session here. The provisions of this measure apply from the first of March to the first of May. I assume that parliament will still be in session on the first of May, that we are going to be in session here all the time between now and the first of May. Whether parliament is in session or whether parliament is not in session, the present ministry is determined to have power which will enable it to secure and to spend all the money it pleases, which is the equivalent of imposing taxes to the extent it pleases, and to legislate just as it pleases, irrespective of both houses of parliament and of His Excellency the Governor General who, it must be remembered is also one of the constituent elements of parliament. That is the position to which we have been brought. Hon. gentlemen may hesitate to accept my word with respect to what I have been saying.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You bet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, perhaps the hon. gentleman will accept the word of the Prime Minister. I regret that I cannot, after what the Prime Minister said to this parliament last session. Let me give the quotation.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): That is very different. His word is worth something.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here is what the Prime Minister said in the last session of parliament, after the opposition had stressed the importance of parliament reserving to itself its right in these matters, especially when parliament was in session. My right hon. friend is reported at page 4448 of Hansard of 1931 as follows:

> Mr. Bennett: I am not without full realization of what is involved in the bill, but in order to meet my right hon. friend I will shorten the time to March 1 and make it clear that we have no desire to usurp powers as was suggested.

No desire to usurp powers as was suggested.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the reason why the date was changed from March 31 to March 1, so that the rights of parliament would not be usurped while parliament was in session. But this year the Prime Minister brings in a bill in which he says that these same powers shall continue, not until March 31, the date he had originally set in last year's measure, but until May 1, and for two months the powers of this parliament are to be usurped. That is the only interpretation that can possibly be put upon what this bill proposes. I asked the Prime Minister the other night what he meant when he changed the date and made that statement last year to parliament. I say that when he made that statement to parliament he was giving the word of the Prime Minister of Canada to the parliament of this country, and that word ought to have been respected above everything else.

Mr. BENNETT: May I interrupt the right hon. gentleman? That word has been respected.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In what way?

Mr. BENNETT: Just in this way. I undertook that I would not usurp the power of parliament and that parliament would be called together in order that parliament might itself extend the power, and that we would not take it otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We hear the Prime Minister now say that what he was going to do was to call parliament together so that there would be no danger of usurping the power of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: And we did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad that my right hon. friend has interrupted. Now let us see what he said to parliament the other night, this after parliament had been called together. He made pretty plain the other evening his view of parliament, and what parliament amounted to in regard to this very enactment. My right hon. friend, in introducing closure, made a speech in which he said more than he intended to say, and in which he publicly revealed his mind perhaps a little more than he had disclosed it even to his own colleagues. At any rate, here are his words. I ask that they be considered in connection with the explanation, which the Prime Minister has just given, of the meaning of his words last session. In the Hansard of March 23, 1932, at page 1414 my right hon. friend says:

> I would not ask this power—

That is the arbitrary power that he now seeks, this power to legislate by the ministry in regard to peace, order and good government apart altogether from the Commons or parliament itself:

> I would not ask this power from any parliament except reluctantly, and I so stated when I introduced the resolution the other day.

I think that "I" is rather significant. "I" would not ask for this power: "I" want this power. There is the voice of the dictator, if you wish. "I" want this power and "I" am going to have it. "I" would not ask for it if "I" did not need it.

Mr. BURY: What about "I" would not give a five cent piece?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister goes on to say:

> We do not believe that this power will be called into play; nay, more, we sincerely and fervently hope that it will not be. But, sir, what is a man without a weapon in the midst of armed force?

There we see what was in the mind of the Prime Minister. He says he needs a weapon. What is the weapon he is going to take?

An hon. MEMBER: And we are going to give him the weapon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but it is a weapon to beat your own back and to destroy your own rights. It is a weapon which takes away from the constituents you represent in this parliament their right to be represented and heard here with respect to all the laws that are passed. That is the weapon you are giving. Now, may I read further what the Prime Minister said, having discovered what was in his mind:

> What is a man who has no instrument for his protection in the midst of the strife of brigands?

As the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) said the other day, he did not suppose that hon. gentlemen opposite would think that that reference was to themselves, because they are the Prime Minister's support. They give him the power, they are the ones that give him whatever enactment he likes. The Prime Minister said:

> What is a man who has no instrument for his protection in the midst of the strife of brigands? Without this power we should be without a weapon that could be used except through a bill in parliament.

Note that exception, Mr. Speaker—"except through a bill in parliament." The Prime Minister says he would be without a weapon except through a bill in parliament. What does that mean? Is not a bill in parliament the only weapon that any ministry ought to have the right to use?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what we are getting. The bill is here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is not a bill enacted by the people's representatives the only weapon a ministry should have, not the excepted weapon. Is not that the only weapon which the ministry should have? My right hon. friend says:

> Without this power we should be without a weapon which could be used except through a bill in parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: And we got the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I challenge anyone opposite to refute this statement. Up to the present time, when a ministry has wished power for any purpose, it has come to parliament and secured the necessary legislation for a specific purpose—not for the purpose of obtaining a weapon that can be used in each and every direction, not for the purpose of getting a weapon that if need be can be used against its own following; it has stated its position to the Commons and the Senate and made such an appeal to reasonableness as would enable it to get the legislation it needed. Here, Mr. Speaker, we are confronted with the difference between government by force and government by consent. With respect to law or government, in the matter of sanctions, there is no alternative except that of force or consent. The Prime Minister says: I will not carry on government by consent of parliament, I am no tgoing to be controlled by legislation, to be enacted by parliament, I am going to secure a weapon that will enable me to govern by force, a weapon that will render me independent of legislation altogether, independent altogether of parliament.

Let us go a step farther. Hon. gentlemen opposite may be a little surprised when they come to realize the extent to which the Prime Minister went in supporting his view. In giving reasons why the authority of parliament should be usurped, what did he say in the next sentence? Let hon. members listen to this:

> —and with the strange views that obtain in these days there is no assurance that the mind of the government would be sufficiently strong to secure consent for any measure it might introduce.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is there anything left? The Prime Minister says—this refers to his own following.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are the majority, they have got the power.

Mr. BENNETT: Parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister tells us now that it refers to parliament. Very well. He says: I feel that today parliament would not do the things I want to have done. Therefore, I am going to take this power to do what I please, whether parliament is in session or not. That is the position, that is the only meaning the words can have.

Mr. STEVENS: You have taken it away from its context.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS: No, you have segregated it from its context.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will bring the sentences all together afterwards. In the meantime let us have no doubt about it

Mr. STEVENS: It is a distortion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is the position. Notwithstanding that my right hon. friend has a majority in the House of Commons, notwithstanding that he has a majority in the Senate, notwithstanding that, so far as party influence goes, he has a majority in both houses, he says: With the curious notions that are going about to-day, I do not believe I could get consent for the things I want to do; therefore I am going to get this right to do what I please by order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what was said. What was said was that you could not get consent for legislation by bill that might protect this country in point of crisis, and therefore recourse had to be had to this bill in order that parliament might protect itself against just such ideas. That is what was said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, we will let the Prime Minister's words speak for themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I go a step farther. Ever since there has been a parliament, when a ministry had to deal with a question, it had to subject itself to the laws of parliament, and, if it wished additional powers for any specific purpose, it had to get those powers from parliament. Why should the present Prime Minister be given powers that the great prime ministers of the past, Macdonald, Mackenzie, Laurier, Borden, never even thought of suggesting that parliament should give them? We have not a situation of the sort to-day that demands such extraordinary powers on the part of a government. Let us go a step further with the Prime Minister's statement:

> And from what we know and have seen, we should certainly be opposed with respect to consent.

In other words, he says: We know that parliament would not give its consent to what we say is necessary. Therefore, we are going to get this power in order to do what we please without consulting parliament. But may I point out the significance of the next sentence. Up to the present time, my right hon. friend has been referring to the House of Commons. But parliament consists of the Senate as well as the House of Commons. What does he say about legislation which requires the consent of the Senate?

> Then the matter would go its weary way, for there is another chamber to be considered before legislation is enacted; and in the meantime the injury may be done.

In other words: We do not propose to allow the Senate, which is on a par with the Commons in authority, to have any voice in the legislation that we want, we are not going to listen to them, we are not going to permit them any authority.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You were going to abolish them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has abolished them in this legislation. He has abolished them effectively. He states he will not even allow their voice to be heard in legislation which may be necessary. Now, Mr. Minister of Trade and Commerce, so there may be no mistake as to the sense, let me read this passage, which I believe will go down in history as the most extraordinary assertion of autocratic intention ever made by any prime minister in the world.

Mr. STEVENS: It is wholly distorted from its context.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The quotation discloses clearly his belief in force rather than consent in the matter of government—

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and which for that reason I will repeat.

> I would not ask this power from any parliament except reluctantly, and I so stated when I introduced the resolution the other day.

Here I make a slight hiatus.

> We do not believe that this power will be called into play; nay, more, we sincerely and fervently hope that it will not be. But, sir, what is a man without a weapon in the midst of armed force? What is a man who has no instrument for his protection in the midst of the strife of brigands? Without this power we should be without a weapon that could be used except through a bill in parliament; and with the strange views that obtain in these days there is no assurance that the mind of the government would be sufficiently strong to secure consent for any measure it might introduce. And from what we know and have seen, we should certainly be opposed with respect to consent. Then the matter would go its weary way, for there is another chamber to be considered before legislation is enacted; and in the meantime the injury may be done.

I think I did the Prime Minister a kindness when I read the passage section by section instead of reading it as one paragraph. I must thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce for causing me to give the paragraph in its complete and concise form.

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman did not read it in a concise way. He left out a very substantial portion in reading the alleged paragraph.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What did I leave out? I left out something for the sake—

An hon. MEMBER: For the sake of fairness.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): And generosity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I left out something that was non-essential.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give the whole of it, then. It will be found at page 1414 of Hansard of March 23:

> Now I go a step further. I would not ask this power from any parliament except reluctantly, and I so stated when I introduced the resolution the other day.

> But, sir, after discussions between my colleagues and myself, and taking into consideration the views expressed to us by others who look at the matter dispassionately and from the outside, dare we as a government, charged with the tremendous responsibility in this emergency of caring for this dominion to the best of our ability, be without that power? We have said, no.

Then he goes on:

> We do not believe that this power will be called into play; nay, more, we sincerely and fervently hope that it will not be. But, sir, what is a man without a weapon in the midst of armed force? What is a man who has no instrument for his protection in the midst of the strife of brigands? Without this power we should be without a weapon that could be used except through a bill in parliament; and with the strange views that obtain in these days there is no assurance that the mind of the government would be sufficiently strong to secure consent for any measure it might introduce. And from what we know and have seen, we should certainly be opposed with respect to consent. Then the matter would go its weary way, for there is another chamber to be considered before legislation is enacted; and in the meantime the injury may be done.

There is the entire quotation.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You read Hamlet with Hamlet left out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This makes perfectly clear the point of view not only of the Prime Minister, but apparently the contaminated point of view of his colleagues as well.

As though that were not enough, Mr. Speaker, what have we witnessed since? In order to secure this power, this weapon which will enable the ministry to ignore parliament, which will render them independent of parliament whether parliament is in session or not, what do they do? They make use of the one coercive measure which was enacted for legitimate as well as coercive purposes, but which was never intended to be used as a weapon wherewith to gain a weapon for an administration which would render it independent of parliament. They are seeking powers which will enable them to coerce parliament, and in order to get that power they use coercion as a means to that end. They bring in the weapon of closure, and with that weapon they strike at the very heart of this House of Commons thereby stifling all further discussion on a great question having to do with the very foundations of parliamentary government and the constitution of our country. They say, "We will not even allow you to discuss in committee matters which relate to the control by parliament of expenditures; we will not allow you to say another word in regard to this right, under the peace, order and good government provision, which we are claiming, to be independent of parliament and to legislate as we please, whether parliament is in session or not. They have used the weapon of closure twice in the course of a short debate in order to end all discussion and debate on the most important question which has engaged the attention of parliament since this ministry was formed. If ever in this world there was evidence of an autocratic power used to the 'nth degree, we have it in what we are witnessing at the present time.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that, with the position as hon. members of the house must now see it, if they have sought to follow the matter at all, they should consider very carefully whether they are going to vote for the third reading of a measure brought to its present stage by closure, and which will enable the ministry to usurp the powers of this House of Commons to the extent to which this measure does. It is no longer a question of the rights of minorities. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been talking about that, and minorities have their rights. This is a case where a minority should fight for its rights. But this is not a case where the rights of a minority only are at stake. It is not even a case of the rights of the majority though the rights of the majority are also at stake. This is a question of the rights of parliament itself and all that parliament stands for.

Mr. BENNETT: And that is government by the majority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend can just keep quiet for a moment, I will be obliged to him. The mere mention of the rights of parliament causes my right hon. friend to burst forth with an interruption. So foreign to his mind has become the rights of parliament that he cannot bear even to hear the word mentioned without interrupting immediately. I want to make it perfectly clear again, Mr. Speaker, that the battle that has been put up in connection with this measure is not merely over the rights of minorities or the rights of majorities; it is true that it has to do with the rights of both; rights, which in the case of the majority no less than in that of the minority are threatened, it is concerned with the rights of something greater than either, namely, the rights of parliament and all that parliament stands for in a free country.

Now may I conclude what I have to say by referring to the quotation the Prime Minister gave this house when he was making his address in introducing the closure. My right hon. friend read a passage from Redlich which he said portrayed what had been going on in this house during the preceding two weeks, and he gave that quotation to the house as representing the true point of view in the matter of what among other things, constituted obstruction.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hear my right hon. friend say "hear, hear." I think anyone reading that quotation will see that what the Prime Minister said about it applying to what has taken place in this House of Commons in the last two weeks is perfectly true, but what the Prime Minister did not see and apparently does not yet see is that the essential features of the quotation apply to himself and those who have been supporting his point of view, and not to any one or to anything that has been done on this side of the house. Let me read the quotation, it is from volume 3 of Redlich, at page 196:

> Focussing once more the results of our retrospect we may arrive at certain important conclusions which will be useful in the search for a solution of the problem set before us. The political development of our own day has laid bare—in the first instance in England, and then in nearly all the constitutional states of Europe—the conventional foundation of parliamentary government. Parliamentary conventions appear above all in the forms of parliamentary action, in the limitations to party strategy imposed by the inviolable bounds of the rules and in the tacit agreement among all who take part in parliamentary life to handle these rules in a reasonable way.

I say those words do not apply to an opposition or to a government. They apply to all members of parliament, and if they mean anything at all, those words mean that you cannot carry on the business of parliament unless you observe the conventional rules with respect to parliamentary procedure in the control of finances and everything else; unless you follow the accepted rules you cannot do any business at all in parliament. That is the exception we have taken to the action of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have said their action strikes at the very foundation of parliamentary government. Redlich says that, if you strike at the foundation of parliamentary government, you cannot do anything at all in parliament, because everything done by parliament is based on the assumption that, by the common agreement and consent of all assembled together in a parliament, you have regard and respect for the conventional foundations of parliamentary government. Let me read the words once again:

> The political development of our own day has laid bare—in the first instance in England, and then in nearly all the constitutional states of Europe—the conventional foundation of parliamentary government.

What is the conventional foundation of parliamentary government?

> Parliamentary conventions appear above all in the forms of parliamentary action, in the limitations to party strategy imposed by the inviolable bounds of the rules and in the tacit agreement among all who take part in parliamentary life to handle these rules in a reasonable way.

I ask hon. members of this house if the rules have been handled in a reasonable way with respect to the resolution on which this bill was founded, and with respect to the stages by which we have arrived at the present consideration of the measure itself. Redlich goes on to say:

> It has further appeared that, though the observance of these conventions does, to a certain extent, depend upon the social character of the membership, a far more important consideration remains: parliamentary conventions are only effective, and the parliamentary government which they support is only possible, when there is an acceptance of the constitutional basis upon which state and parliament are founded.

Could anything be more emphatic than that?

> . . . . a far more important consideration remains: parliamentary conventions are only effective, and the parliamentary government which they support is only possible, when there is an acceptance of the constitutional basis upon which state and parliament are founded.

The constitutional basis on which this parliament is founded is the right of the Commons and the Senate to pass legislation, and for the Commons and the Senate alone to exercise that right, not for that right to be usurped by the ministry of the day. If you take away the constitutional basis, as Redlich says, nothing further remains that is worthy of consideration.

Redlich goes on to say.

> Irreconcilable parties, which oppose an existing union of states or stand for a subordination of state to church, parties which reject the whole framework of society, or which draw their life from a principle only less deep and powerful than that of religion, the principle of nationality, are all in mortal conflict—latent if not apparent, possibly unconscious for long periods—with the conventions of parliament; they are, therefore, knowingly or unknowingly attacking parliamentary government itself, at all events in the form known to the constitution.

Let me read the pertinent words:

> Irreconcilable parties—are all in mortal conflict—with the conventions of parliament; they are, therefore, knowingly or unknowingly, attacking parliamentary government itself, at all events in the form known to the constitution.

The reference was to the Irish party taking the position that Ireland would not be a part of the government of Great Britain and Ireland. That was an irreconcilable position: you could not have a party taking that position and at the same time have government carried on under parliamentary authority. It was in conflict with the basis of government; and, knowingly or unknowingly, the party that took that position was attacking parliamentary government itself, at all events in the form known to the constitution. Now, what is another irreconcilable position?

Mr. STEVENS: Why does not the right hon. gentleman read on? He is purporting to quote extracts from the leader of the government's speech. Why does he not read the next clause? Why does he stop right there?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I stopped at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. STEVENS: My right hon. friend did not; he stopped in the middle.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend please allow me to finish this part?

Mr. STEVENS: The right hon. gentleman gives partial quotations and builds up an argument which is a distortion of the position taken by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I appeal to you to keep order in this house so far as the ministry is concerned. I am reading a quotation from Redlich which the Prime Minister gave the other day. I am explaining it, and am fully fifteen minutes away from the point on which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) was interrupting me. If he wishes to make an interruption of the kind, he can do so when the subject is concluded; he need not break in at a point which he sees is beginning to tell against the ministry.

Let me indicate another irreconcilable position. A position which in British politics has been irreconcilable with constitutional government for three hundred years, and we might as well recognize that fact at once. A party that takes the position that parliament must be supreme over the executive is taking one stand, a stand which I submit is the only one that can be taken in accordance with the constitution and with parliamentary government. A party that takes the position that the executive must be supreme over parliament is taking a position which is irreconcilable with everything that relates to constitutional government. And that is the position which hon. gentlemen opposite are taking.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not care in what form it presents itself, whether it relates to unemployment relief or to any other question, what hon. gentlemen opposite are asserting in this measure, the third reading of which we are asked to pass, is that we shall agree to the doctrine that the ministry is supreme over parliament; that parliament shall part with its rights of control in matters of taxation and public expenditure; that parliament shall part with its right to legislate upon peace, order and good government, and leave these things to the executive itself to do with in secret cabinet council as it pleases. This position is irreconcilable with anything in the nature of constitutional government, and a party that takes a position which is irreconcilable with the constitution is destroying the very foundations of constitutional government.

Let us see now what Redlich says with respect to obstruction. It is to be found in the next sentence:

> Obstruction is, in reality, nothing less than a repudiation of the existing constitution of the country—

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

> —intensified to the point of denying the right of its parliament to exist—

Mr. STEVENS: Exactly what you are doing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

> —and expressed in a conscious misuse of the forms and principles of procedure essential to the efficiency of parliamentary action.

Mr. STEVENS: Exactly what you have done for a month.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shut up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear". I ask, is not that exactly what the ministry is doing in this particular measure—what, by their attitude, has been taking place all through this debate? Let me read that sentence again:

Obstruction is, in reality, nothing less than a repudiation of the existing constitution of the country—

Is not that what hon. gentlemen opposite are doing?

Mr. STEVENS: That is what you are doing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The constitution of the country requires that laws with respect to peace, order and good government shall be enacted by the Houses of Parliament, the sovereign and the people's representatives, and not by the governor in council; but hon. gentlemen opposite say no, these powers are for the executive and so they are striking at the very constitution of the country.

—intensified to the point of denying the right of its parliament to exist.

That is exactly what hon. gentlemen opposite have done. They have intensified repudiation of the constitution to the point of saying, "We do not care whether parliament is in existence or not. We are to have all the money we wish, to spend as we please. We are to have power to pass whatever legislation we like, and parliament may go to blazes, so to speak, so far as we are concerned." That is the position of the ministry at the present time, "expressed in a conscious misuse of the forms and principles of procedure essential to the efficiency of parliamentary action." All through this debate, there has been a misuse of the forms and principles of procedure essential to the efficiency of parliamentary action.

Mr. BENNETT: Look at Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say, therefore, that we have, in this statement of Redlich's, a true statement of what has been taking place, but applicable to the ministry of the day and its followers, who are prepared to let the powers of parliament be usurped by the executive and not to those who from the outset have been upholding proper constitutional procedure. Let me take the next paragraph:

Except within these rules, conventions and forms parliamentary work is impossible: without their protection there is no security that the political assimilation necessary for the sustenance of the parliamentary organism can be obtained.

This all but concludes the quotation which the Prime Minister cited as the one which should guide this House of Commons in its procedure. When this debate is over, when hon. gentlemen's minds are free from their present party prejudice, if they are capable of any reflection, if they have any regard for the constitution, if they care in the least for parliamentary methods of procedure, if they think that the constitution which has been the outcome of centuries of struggle in order to secure the freedom of the people, is something that should be preserved, let them read over what the Prime Minister himself has quoted to the house as a picture of what has taken place in this chamber in the last three weeks, and, in their heart of hearts, ask themselves to the actions of which party in this house that quotation applies. We, on this side of the house, have done our utmost during the course of this debate to endeavour, as members of a party, but primarily as members of parliament, to uphold the rights of this House of Commons, to uphold the constitution, and to uphold proper parliamentary procedure. We have come now to the last moment in which it is possible to say a further word in support of these great principles upon which all freedom in this country rests—security for the future as well as for the present. I appeal to hon. members, on this, the third reading of the bill, the last opportunity they will have of recording where they stand on these great fundamental principles, to forget their party prejudices and show by their votes that they regard as more essential than all else the maintenance of proper parliamentary procedure in all matters pertaining to control of taxation and expenditure by the people's representatives in parliament, and that they regard as more sacred than all else the maintenance of the constitution of the country, and of all that constitutional government seeks to secure.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I have not taken any part in this debate which has continued for several weeks, because I have been convinced from day to day and night to night that the best answer which could be given to the addresses of hon. gentlemen opposite was to publish those addresses to the whole country and let the country judge.

I know something about the history of this country; with the exception of not having been intimate with Mr. Mackenzie and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I have known personally, and have had intimate relations with every Prime Minister of Canada since the British North America Act was passed. I stated one day, I believe, that although but a child at the time I could remember the procession during the celebration of the first Dominion day in Canada. I sat many years ago in the press gallery when Sir John Macdonald led the government and Mr. Blake and his colleagues led the opposition. I do not think that in the whole history of government in Canada there has been a Prime Minister who has consulted more closely, readily and assiduously with his colleagues than has the present Prime Minister since he assumed office.

I have sat in this house night after night since the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) denounced the colleagues of the Prime Minister and I have heard one hon. member after another almost spit forth the most opprobious epithets with respect to the members of the cabinet; I have had experience for some fifty years on the boards of companies and corporations, I have mingled with other men in my professional and business career and I say without a shadow of hesitation that I believe the Prime Minister has consulted with his colleagues in the government and with his party in the house more closely than any Prime Minister who has preceded him. That consultation has not been for the purpose of imposing his views upon his colleagues, because I do not believe that even the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he was Prime Minister of this country was more considerate of the opinions of his colleagues or was more open to reasonable argument and discussion.

What is the basis of constitutional government in this country? It is that the government shall be responsible to parliament and that parliament shall be responsible to the people. In no act of this government has it assumed any responsibility whatever except to carry out by way of administration the authority which parliament has vested in the government.

If my right hon. friend seeks a comparison between his régime and the régime of the present government, let him direct his attention to this fact. Since I have been in parliament I have protested time and time again against the powers taken by his government whereby they were enabled by order in council to make rules and regulations, to end the franchises of every dominion trust company in this country, to prevent any insurance company from carrying on its ordinary business at will, and against the hundred other ways in which his government usurped what he now calls the legislative functions of parliament. If he will come with me to the office of the privy council—the records are as open to him as they are to me—for every order in council which this government has passed which partakes of the nature of legislation, I will show him one hundred similar orders which his own government passed legislating upon the most important and intimate matters of our political, social and commercial life.

The right hon. gentleman now assumes a position which will not be his to occupy for a long time. He once occupied the position of Prime Minister of this dominion, and among those who watched his career on many occasions none were more sympathetic than I. I saw the stress and strain under which he at times administered the affairs of this country without a majority in the house to support him in measures in which his own policies were involved in direct controversy. The right hon. gentleman has forgotten entirely that he is no longer the Prime Minister of this country. He has forgotten entirely that this country has repudiated him, his policies and his party and that he no longer exercises authority in this house. It appears to me that during the last three weeks the right hon. gentleman has been attempting, by the exercise of force, to dominate this parliament in which he represents a minority only. The force which he has used is just as physical and brutal as that which has been used to usurp constitutional government at any stage of British history, only he is confined to the use of his own physical force, to his power of speech and his ability to sustain that speech throughout many hours of debate. He returns to the same debate three or four times and repeats and reiterates the same arguments until the house can no longer refrain from exhibiting its—what shall I say?

An hon. MEMBER: Disgust.

Mr. CAHAN: —its disgust. Perhaps that may not be considered parliamentary.

The right hon. gentleman speaks about parliament, the constitutional practice in parliament, the supreme control of parliament and the control by a majority of parliament, and then about the supreme control of the House of Commons, assuming that that supreme control is vested solely in himself and the gentlemen who sit about him. The control of parliament has passed from the right hon. gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER: Forever.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know if it is ever to return to the Liberal party, but if it should I should be only too glad to see my right hon. friend as the leader of that party and acting again as the Prime Minister of this country. However, I do not think that the hair-splitting controversies into which the right hon. gentleman has entered during the past three weeks will ever restore to him the confidence of this country.

Parliament must assume and exercise its rights, and by closure we are simply exercising by a majority vote in this house, which must always prevail, the constitutional right of a majority in this country and in parliament to express its will in the legislative enactments of parliament. The mother of parliaments has exercised time and time again the right which is being exercised in respect of this bill. We are not proceeding one step beyond the constitutional procedure which has found expression in imperial enactments. We have not set aside one single precedent or tradition which the right hon. gentleman assumes to revere so highly. We have by the constitutional right of closure prevented the right hon. gentleman, who, by physical force, by loud speaking, by the opprobrious and brutal epithets which he has hurled across the the floor of this house—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I respect the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) very much as a gentleman, so I ask him what are the opprobrious and brutal epithets, and whether those are terms he has a right to use? My hon. friend is speaking a little hastily.

Mr. BENNETT: The Hansard of this afternoon alone is full of them.

Mr. CAHAN: My right hon. friend perhaps does not realize the epithets he used.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask whether or not that is a proper term to be used by any hon. member, and whether my hon. friend should not retract the words he has used.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend asked the question first. He used the word "dictator."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: "Dictator" is a perfectly proper word to use.

Mr. CAHAN: It is an entirely opprobrious and brutal epithet to apply to the Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask whether the words "opprobrious" and "brutal" should not be withdrawn by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the words "brutal" and "opprobrious" are not parliamentary, but the leader of the opposition asked the Secretary of State to name those opprobrious and brutal epithets, or the epithets which he considered to be so, and the Secretary of State has done that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The word to which he has referred is "dictator." Does your honour regard the word "dictator" as opprobrious and brutal?

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand the Secretary of State to have finished his enumeration of the epithets.

Mr. CAHAN: I would not be disrespectful in any way to the right hon. gentleman. I applied the word "brutal" to an epithet and not to himself. I have no intention of being disrespectful, because I respect the right hon. gentleman as a former prime minister of Canada, one who has occupied the highest position which his fellow countrymen and parliament can confer upon him. But some consideration must be allowed to those of us who have sat here during the last three weeks and heard epithet after epithet hurled against us by the right hon. gentleman and those with whom he is associated. He has been the leader in doing this, and I tell him that the words which he has used and applied to the leader of the government, the words which he has used and applied to the colleagues in the cabinet of the Prime Minister, are unworthy of one who has occupied the high office of prime minister of Canada. If he wishes at some future date to ensure that respect for the dignity of that high office which he always desired when he held it, and which was happily given to him by those who then sat on that side of the house; if he ever wishes to resume that position of high dignity in the commons of the country, he ought to cease to use such language as he has used this afternoon in this debate. The right hon. gentleman says that this is government by force. I ask him to reflect upon his own conduct during the past two or three weeks. Does he think the reiteration of those arguments which he gives hour by hour and day by day have any intellectual influence upon the house or the country? Does he think he is persuading the Canadian people to accept his views rather than those which have been expressed by the Prime Minister, his colleagues and those supporting him? Does he think the form of argument which he has used in parliament is persuasive and convincing? I think not. What the right hon. gentleman is attempting to do is by forceful expression, forceful action and persistent debate, which has no reference whatever to the issue before us, to compel the house to accept the will of the small minority that surrounds him. That is government by minority, and when it comes to government by a minority attempting to exercise parliamentary rights and privileges, by constant reiteration and abuse of parliamentary privileges such as we have heard, there is no remedy except that which was adopted years ago by the mother of parliaments and which is exercised there day after day and week after week in the ordinary legislative proceedings of their house, and that is to invoke a closure which affords a proper time for argumentative debate but precludes a minority from exercising its physical force so as to prevent parliament from registering its decision on the question at issue before it.

My right hon. friend says that parliamentary government depends upon the rules of the house being handled in a reasonable way. Of course we agree with him in that, but has the right hon. gentleman during the past two or three weeks handled the rules of the house in a reasonable way? Has he been reasonable in the procedure which he has adopted? Can he justify, before the Canadian people or even before his associates and followers in the house, the course which he has adopted? I dislike to say this, but it is obvious, and I say to the right hon. gentleman that, so persistent has become his effort to preclude the majority from expressing its will that when he has spoken in the house on recent occasions, the most intellectual of his followers have abandoned their seats and gone to their rooms rather than listen to his reiterated arguments. Under the rules of the house handled in a reasonable way, hon. gentlemen have full opportunity to endorse those views which are usually expressed through the leader of their party who has wide and ample experience and a habit of speech that is extremely facile. Then if there are others who wish to speak, let them express their opinions, but why have this constant reiteration hour by hour, until not only parliament but the reading public of the whole country are as I said—

An hon. MEMBER: Disgusted.

Mr. CAHAN: —well, disgusted. I do not know whether that is parliamentary or not.

My intention in rising was to point out to the right hon. gentleman that in imperial legislation there are many precedents where this same procedure which he calls the revival of dead statutes has been followed by means of legislation expressed in almost exactly the same terms as those which are found in the bill before the house. As I should like to refer to this matter at some length, might I ask that it be called six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READING

Bill No. 37, to incorporate the Fort Smith-Fitzgerald Railway Company.—Mr. Irvine.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUANCE ACT, 1932—CONSIDERATION OF BILL

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) for the third reading of Bill No. 24, respecting unemployment and farm relief.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose I was about to proceed to say with all sincerity that with regard to the form and content of this bill now before the house I have a larger responsibility than merely that of a member of the ministry, because I think that my own suggestions were carried out with respect to the form and content of this measure. In making those suggestions I was well within the limits of parliamentary practice in vogue in the parliament of the United Kingdom for many, many years. I have not the time to cite many precedents, but here is one to which I would like to direct the attention of the house.

In the year 1921, chapter 67 of the statutes of the United Kingdom for 1921 was passed. It was an act with this title: "An Act to make further provision with respect to the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund and with respect to rating and to the finance of certain local and public authorities." It was in the nature of an act for providing ways and means for relieving poverty in the metropolitan district. That act, by subsection 4 of section 1, provides:

> This section shall continue in force until the thirty-first day of December, nineteen hundred and twenty-two, and no longer.

This statute therefore expired on the 31st of December, 1922, and yet on May 17, 1923, the parliament of the United Kingdom enacted chapter 6 of the statutes of 1923, entitled "An act to extend the duration of and amend certain provisions of the Local Authorities (Financial Provisions) Act, 1921, and the Poor Law Emergency Provisions (Scotland) Act, 1921." That act was passed on the 17th of May, 1923. Section 1 of that act reads as follows:

1. Section one of the Local Authorities (financial provisions) Act, 1921 (which provides for the temporary extension of charges on the Metropolitan Common Poor Fund), shall continue in force until the first day of April, nineteen hundred and twenty-four, as if in that section for the words "thirty-first day of December, nineteen hundred and twenty-two," there were substituted the words "first day of April, nineteen hundred and twenty-four."

The measure which is before the house follows by the terms of the amendment now proposed exactly the form of this remedial statute from which I have just quoted and which extended for more than one year the previous provisions of two acts of 1921, for the relief of the poor and emergency provisions for the relief of distress and suffering, which were then no longer in force.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has my hon. friend the resolution which preceded that English bill?

Mr. CAHAN: I have not looked up the resolution preceding the bill, but I am not concerned with the resolution because there is absolutely no doubt that when the resolution preceding this measure was introduced it was introduced before the expiry of the act. In the case cited the resolution, which preceded an amendment for the revival of what my right hon. friend would call a dead statute, must have been preceded by a similar resolution. Anyway I will state this, for what reputation I have in parliament, that the procedure which was followed on that occasion and the content of the amending measure which was then enacted establish a thoroughgoing precedent for the bill now before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will look at my remarks of this afternoon, he will see that I said that the form in which this bill was presented and its content were perfectly regular, and what the government ought to have done, if it intended to do as it had the years before, was to proceed in that way from the start. I took no exception to the form and content.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot follow my right hon. friend through his many tergiversations, because I have listened to him repeat over and over again that we could not revive a dead statute, that we could not amend a dead statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said you could revive it, but that you could not amend it.

Mr. CAHAN: You can revive it by an amendment, as these precedents I have quoted conclusively show. I do not really know when to take my right hon. friend seriously in this debate; for he has adopted so many attitudes pro and con.

There is another matter to which I would like to direct the attention of the right hon. gentleman. I have heard his great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the right hon. gentleman himself, frequently extol Mr. Gladstone as one who assisted in a very large way in developing responsible government under parliamentary institutions in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. I have before me the British parliamentary debates for the session of 1882, under date of February 20, and I find at page 1124, that when Mr. Gladstone introduced into the parliament of the United Kingdom the new rule of closure, he stated very frankly and fully the grounds on which he based the adoption of that rule. At page 1138 he says:

It is difficult, I believe, to find a single instance of a great legislative assembly which has not found it necessary to adopt some rule for the purpose of placing in the hands of the assembly itself the power of restricting the duration of debate.

He then proceeded at page 1140:

And here I come to what is commonly called obstruction. It is not a very easy matter to define obstruction, and I will not attempt to define it for anyone but myself. I will only give my description of it. To me it appears to be the disposition either of the minority of the house or of individuals to resist the prevailing will of the house otherwise than by argument.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: I ask the right hon. gentleman, as one who all his life admired the great Liberal leader and has often extolled Liberal principles as enunciated by him, to apply the words of Mr. Gladstone to what has transpired in this House of Commons during the last three weeks.

Then after referring to obstruction by lengthy speeches and reiteration of arguments Mr. Gladstone proceeded to say, at page 1144:

They are not merely most powerful means of obstruction; they are not merely most powerful means of inflicting suffering on the members of this house. They are totally incompatible with the dignity and credit of this house.

Grievous as they are, they are almost as ludicrous in the eyes of the community as they are grievous. The whole idea of the conversion of night into day, the disruption of the common order—already hard pressed by our ordinary proceedings—in which time and business are distributed, and the exhibition of a great and powerful assembly in such an attitude before the community, almost amounts to a degradation and depth of insult offered to the house such as, I must say, we ought to endeavour to wipe out.

Proceeding further, he said:

We—

That is, the government of which he was the leader.

We propose that this decision shall be taken on what we think the only sound principle and under what we think the best and most adequate safeguards. There is but one sound principle in this house and that is that the majority of the house should prevail.

In emphasizing his remarks on the following page, he says:

But God forbid that we should see so vast an innovation introduced into the practice of this house, applicable to our ordinary procedure, as would be a rule of the house under which the voice of the majority was not to prevail over that of the minority.

And then he says in closing, page 1150:

I trust that the house will always continue to appreciate—I would almost say worship—liberty of speech, and that it will continue to tolerate, for the sake of liberty of speech, the licence of speech which mocks and counterfeits that liberty of speech. But, however large its fund of patience, and however wise that patience may be, I hope it will not carry that tolerance to such a point that it shall of itself become the grossest of all the vices of a legislative body, and that it shall reach a point where it will inflict upon the House of Commons an incapacity for the discharge of its duties.

I submit to the right hon. gentleman that the conduct of the opposition, with which he himself has identified his party, his policy and his vigorous personality, comes under the denunciation which I have quoted from the Right Hon. William Ewart Gladstone.

I find in A. G. Gardiner's life of Sir William Harcourt, who was with Mr. Gladstone in that crisis, a reference to the same topic. With regard to the necessity of closure the author said:

Harcourt took a stronger view than some of his colleagues, and circulated a long memorandum to the cabinet insisting that it was "essential to secure to a majority the right to prevail which lies at the bottom of parliamentary institutions."

Then as he developed his argument, he said that he wished to make:

"An emphatic assertion of the right of the majority."

And these are the words quoted:

To recognize in one-third or one-quarter of the house an absolute right . . . to postpone indefinitely the decision of a question is, in my judgment, to give a formal consecration to the principle of obstruction. . . . Why is it to be assumed that the minority will not abuse their veto when it is taken for granted that the majority will abuse their clôture. . . .

I could spend the entire time available even to the leader of the opposition in making similar quotations from eminent Liberal leaders of the past.

But the right hon. gentleman says if we follow the precedents established in the mother of parliaments we must look forward to the time when there may be socialistic control of this parliament of Canada. I do not wish to refer to myself personally—I have passed the age of threescore years and ten and I appreciate very keenly that my mentality, my prejudices and my predilections are born of the times in which I have lived and the vicissitudes of my own personal life—but I do not look forward with any fear or shrinking to the development of socialistic institutions in this country on a proper basis. I recognize that the strain and suffering through which we have passed and are passing has already borne fruit in remedial measures, socialistic in their tendencies, and those who are younger than I may well look forward to the time when those whose views are more socialistic than mine will assume the reins of government in this country. When they do they will assume the reins with the voice of a great majority of the Canadian people as manifested at the polls, they will assume office under our parliamentary institutions, not by force and violence, not by bullets and bayonets, but by the voice of the democracy of this great country. In that democracy, although I shall not live to see its development, I have the strongest possible confidence, and I think it would be a shame indeed if any minority in this house at any future time should attempt to thwart the views of the people, should attempt to thwart necessary and essential socialistic reforms by such procedure as we have witnessed in this house during the past few weeks.

I have had very few personal antagonisms in this life, and the right hon. leader of the opposition knows that I have no personal hostility to him. If in the heat of debate—I have not yet reviewed the Hansard report—I have said anything personally discourteous, I humbly ask to be forgiven. I know he has played a great part in the history of this country. I have no doubt that after he has passed into that bourne whence no traveller returns, his youthful followers in this house and the country will erect statues to his honour in the market places. But when they review his political career, as they will in the future, I hope they will forget the episodes of the last three weeks, because they can only look back on them with humiliation and a strong sense of sad regret.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION OF MONEYS TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS IN 1932

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 34, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1932.

He said: This bill is the Canadian National Railways financing act of 1932, to permit the Canadian National Railways to issue securities for the year 1932 totalling $61,500,000, which represents the estimated needs of the national roads from the government of Canada for 1932. The bill comprises three chief items. There is, first, the net income deficit, made up of $42,500,000, not including any interest owing to the government of Canada. In view of the fact that often the total needs and various other items of the National Railways financing are confused, may I say, rather for those outside the house than perhaps for the information of hon. members who have studied the railway question, that the deficit referred to in this bill relates to the deficiency in earnings to pay not only operating expenses but interest due on the fixed bonds of the company, having been purchased in the past by the investing public.

The deficit last year was over $50,000,000, which corresponded to the estimate this year of $42,000,000; and including the eastern lines it was over $60,000,000. It is quite possible, in view of the continuing decrease in earnings of the Canadian National Railways, that the estimate of $42,784,000 for the coming year will be found to be an underestimate, because the railways, both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, and in fact all the roads on this continent, are to-day earning less than they earned at the same time last year, which was a record low year compared with many past years.

The second item in the bill is for equipment, $11,681,000. This is, in a sense, a new item in the bill for financing the Canadian National Railways, because in the past that money was borrowed under what was called the Philadelphia plan, twenty-five per cent being put up in cash, the other seventy-five per cent being borrowed from bankers in the United States and paid over a period of fifteen years. Owing to the international financial situation of the present day, however, the whole of this amount of nearly $12,000,000 must be borrowed from the people of Canada through the Canadian government.

The third item is for construction and betterments, amounting to a little over $7,000,000. That is made up of capital expenditures, such as terminals, stations, branch lines, hotels, bridges and so forth.

Briefly, these three items represent the total of $61,500,000 in this bill, the details of which will be given when the bill reaches the special committee on railways and shipping, which deals with the financial needs of the Canadian National Railways. When the bill is before that committee the officers and, if necessary, the directors of the system will be called.

This bill calls for $61,500,000, but in order to present as clear a picture as possible of the situation, I must point out that this sum, the estimated needs for the coming year, does not represent the entire requirements of railways and shipping for the year, because there is another item of $10,000,000 which will be necessary in the coming year for the maritime freight rates and for steamship needs. So that the total estimated requirements for 1932 appear at the present time to be some $71,000,000, which does not include, of course, anything for the Hudson Bay railway. By way of contrast, I should point out that the figure for 1931 corresponding to that $71,000,000 was $112,000,000, nearly $10,000,000 per month, including, of course, capital expenditures. But at any rate, the money had to be supplied by the government of Canada, or by bonds guaranteed by this government. The $112,000,000 last year, which I have contrasted with the needs of 1932, was made up of four chief items. I shall place on Hansard a complete statement of these items for the information of the house. In brief, however, these four items—I will not go into details at this stage—are these.

First, there was the final estimate of last year, which was higher than the estimate made at the beginning of the year and which totalled, for the year 1931, $87,000,000. The second item was eastern lines deficit and maritime freight rates reduction of twenty per cent, which, in round figures, amounted to $10,500,000. The third item was merchant marine and Canadian National steamships, amounting, in round figures, to $1,500,000; and finally, the statutory items consisting of branch lines, Toronto terminals, Montreal terminals and so forth, which accounted for another $13,000,000. These items make up a total of $112,000,000.

The statement as to financing requirements is as follows:

Up until a short time ago it was customary to make an annual review of the railway affairs of the country. Up to the time of the appointment of the special committee to deal with railways and shipping a review of the railway financial situation was given by the Minister of Railways. That was discontinued, I believe with some loss to the house, some loss to the country and perhaps even some loss to the committee itself. This committee has done excellent work in investigating details of the accounts and making recommendations to the house, but to some extent its work is disconnected and disjointed, and for this reason it seems to me that a dispassionate and non-partisan statement on the railway situation cannot help but be of use. After all, this situation to-day is the greatest problem facing Canada; it embraces what has been described as Canada's second national debt.

I shall endeavour to make my remarks as clear and simple as possible, but I must point out that simplicity and clarity with regard to an immense question of this kind are not altogether easy to achieve. The huge figures involving vast debts to the lending public, enormous accounts against the railways by the government itself, the interest on the public and government debt, the amalgamation of lines and different obligations make this question a difficult one to explain clearly. However, I shall endeavour to make my explanation as simple as possible so that any ordinary citizen of Canada may be able to obtain a good grasp of the situation.

The difficulties which face the railways have been due largely to four causes. The first and chief cause is the fact that in the early days we built a second and third transcontinental railway when a second would have been amply sufficient. Two transcontinental railways would have been sufficient, but we went on and built a third. We have in Canada a sparse population with an immense railway mileage, so much so that this country has the largest mileage per thousand of population of any country in the world. The density of traffic, both passenger and freight, is so slight as to make this fact the chief cause of our troubles at the present day.

The second cause, which has not been mentioned so much but which has been forced upon me by my study of the question during the last year and a half, is the fact that the railways have been endeavouring to reach out for passenger traffic and have been forgetting that freight traffic should be their first concern. As a result of this desire for passenger traffic there have been built luxurious hotels, terminals, trains, steamships and so forth; tens of millions of dollars have been spent in this way when it would have been wiser had the railway companies realized that freight traffic should be their chief business.

To my mind the third cause is motor competition, which might be termed unfair competition. I do not think that the railways of this country should have to face the competition of private companies operating their motors, buses and trucks for profit upon publicly built highways while the railways have to build very expensive highways of their own. The publicly built highways upon which these motor buses and trucks operate are built to a certain extent by the taxes paid by the two great railway systems. Therefore, this is unfair competition.

The fourth cause of the present depressed condition of the railways of Canada is the world business set-back which has taken place during the past three or four years. Not only have the railways in Europe been faced with decreased traffic, but the same applies to the railways in every country and more particularly to those on this continent where such immense distances are traversed by the lines.

There are a couple of points which I wish to draw to the attention of the house and which it would be well to keep in mind in discussing the financial position of the railways. In the first place, there must be kept in mind the public debt, that is, the debt owing on bonds bought by the investing public, the money being used for the extension of the Canadian National Railways. This debt to-day amounts to $1,280,000,000; the interest thereon in 1931 amounted to $57,000,000, over $1,000,000 per week, of which $37,000,000 was payable in the United States. Four-fifths of the total debt of $1,280,000,000 was guaranteed by the government of Canada on behalf of the people of Canada. The people of Canada are responsible not only for this four-fifths which has been guaranteed by the government but also for a large proportion of the remaining one-fifth. The interest upon this obligation must be paid unless this country takes the position of repudiating its debt, as Russia has done.

This is the main figure in the financial picture of the Canadian National Railways, but there is another figure which at times gets mixed up in the picture—and until it is eliminated it should be mixed up—I refer to the Dominion of Canada account. This account as appearing on the books of the Canadian National Railways totals to something over $1,360,000,000. It is made up mainly of three items; loans from the Dominion of Canada amounting to a little over $605,000,000, interest accrued upon these loans amounting to $350,000,000, and appropriations for Canadian government railways amounting to $405,000,000. The last item covers the moneys expended upon the construction of the Intercolonial, Prince Edward Island and National Transcontinental railways.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That was before the national system came into being.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is quite right; much of this money was spent before the Canadian National Railways came into being. The National Transcontinental and the Intercolonial are to-day being operated as part of the national system.

Suggestions have appeared in the press that there should be a refinancing of this system. I have read in some outstanding papers that if a proper picture was drawn of the financial position of the Canadian National Railways, then these railways would be able to pay their way. This suggestion is applied particularly to the $1,360,000,000 making up the government account. The greatest amount which has ever been proposed, even by the railways, to be wiped off has been between $600,000,000 and $800,000,000. This proposal was made in 1928 to the Hon. Mr. Dunning when he was Minister of Railways. The fact is that if that $600,000,000 or $800,000,000 were wiped off no actual benefit would accrue to the Canadian National Railways because not one cent of the principal or of the annual interest has ever been paid. Even if the total amount of $1,360,000,000 were wiped off it would make no actual difference to the financial position of the Canadian National Railways. I repeat, neither the principal nor the interest has been paid by the National railways and, in my opinion, I do not think one cent will ever be paid back to the government.

Mr. BROWN: Is the interest being added year by year to that amount?

Mr. MANION: Interest has not been added on the total amount of $1,360,000,000, but it has been added to an item which is part of this amount, to the $600,000,000 advanced during the past few years to the Canadian National Railways and subsidiary companies. This interest amounts to some $32,000,000 annually and has been added on the books of the company but has not been added in the public accounts of the country.

I want it clearly understood that even if the whole $1,360,000,000 was wiped out it would make no difference to the financial position of the Canadian National Railways. I make that emphatic statement because it has been said so often, by men who should know better, that if all or a part of this amount owing to the government was wiped off, then the Canadian National Railways would be in position to pay its way. As a matter of fact, of the $1,360,000,000, $600,000,000 to $700,000,000 was actually put into capital expenditures of the railways that I have mentioned, so that is absolute capital expenditure on behalf of the national railways or their present subsidiaries or component parts operated by the management. If one were to wipe that off, it would clear the picture, but at the same time it would not improve the capital position. I have under my hand a letter which Sir Henry Thornton wrote me a year ago and which I intend to put on Hansard in order to save time. I shall read just a couple of sentences. We had discussed this question a number of times and I asked his opinion in regard to it. He wrote me as follows:

With reference to the revision of our financial structure which has been under contemplation for a long time: I feel it would be an unwise thing to present it to parliament this session because the present depression and state of the company's finances necessitate an entire review of our previous recommendations.

He gives other reasons and then he closes the letter as follows:

For all of these reasons I think it inadvisable to bring this very complicated question before the next session of parliament.

That was written a year ago, referring to last session. Since that time Sir Henry Thornton has not given me any other opinion than that, and I have no reason to think he would suggest at the present time that this should be wiped out. That is a matter of opinion which can be decided when the whole matter of the report of the Royal Commission on Railways and Transportation is made to parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but is this some new method he is adopting of placing documents on Hansard? I have noticed he has handed two or three sheets to the Hansard reporter.

Mr. MANION: I explained my intention. My right hon. friend has done the same thing for many years, and there is nothing wrong about it. It has always been the privilege of a minister when he is making a statement to the house, instead of reading a lengthy document, to place it on Hansard. I said a moment ago that I was going to place this letter of Sir Henry Thornton on Hansard. I thought I would save the time of the house by doing so without reading the whole of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend forgets that this can be done only by consent of the house. He has not asked for consent. I hope now that we have concluded the discussion on unemployment relief, we may get back to some consideration for the commons.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: May I tell my right hon. friend I sincerely hope we can, and hon. gentlemen opposite need the lesson much more than we do on this side.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend wants the consent of the house, he had better ask for it.

Mr. SPEAKER: There seems to be some misunderstanding. Documents are put on Hansard only if read in the house, except by consent, as the leader of the opposition has said. It has been the custom, when the budget is brought down, for the Minister of Finance to put on Hansard certain financial statements, schedules or tables, without reading them in full,—

Mr. MANION: It has been the custom.

Mr. SPEAKER: —by consent.

Mr. MANION: It has been the custom for ministers to do so, certainly by consent; but I took it for granted that my right hon. friend would not object. If he objects, I shall read the whole letter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let the hon. gentleman ask for the consent of the house. That is all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Ministers usually ask for leave of the house.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry I have hurt the susceptibilities of the leader of the opposition, and if he will permit me I shall place the letter on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: The letter is as follows:

Montreal, Quebec,
February 20, 1931.

Dear Doctor,—

With reference to the revision of our financial structure which has been under contemplation for a long time: I feel it would be an unwise thing to present it to parliament this session because the present depression and state of the company's finances necessitate an entire review of our previous recommendations. Furthermore, the outlook for the future is, at the moment, so uncertain that it is almost impossible to make any precise prognostications.

I imagine the next session will be a very busy one with unemployment, tariffs, government finances and highly contentious questions that there will not be sufficient time to consider in a mature way so important a question as the revision of our financial structure. Also, our own directors are quite unfamiliar with our very complicated financial problem. It will take them some time to become acquainted with it, and I cannot present for your consideration any proposals until our directors have had an opportunity of forming their own conclusions.

For all of these reasons I think it inadvisable to bring this very complicated question before the next session of parliament.

Yours sincerely.

(Sgd.) H. W. Thornton.

Now that I have mentioned the figures, the magnitude of the whole railway problem will be readily appreciated by anyone. It is easily seen that the whole financial structure of the country is impinged upon and even endangered by the immensity of the figures of this Canadian National debt. That is particularly well seen if one would remember that it was not until 1900 that the figure of $50,000,000 was reached in the whole revenues of the Dominion of Canada. This whole question is still more complicated at the present time by virtue of the fact that two-thirds of the interest on this Canadian National Railway debt is owing in the United States, and because of the premium upon United States funds in the last three or four months of last year, it cost the Canadian National Railways something like $1,000,000 to $1,250,000 in premiums on United States funds in paying the interest which they paid in that country. In future, as regards loans, including this equipment loan which I have mentioned, the money will have to be raised altogether in Canada until the premium on United States funds is either wiped out, or until our money reaches more to a level with that of the United States than has been the case for the last few months. What makes the situation more difficult is the fact that in 1931 the revenues of the Canadian National Railways were below those of any year since 1919. Yet, if you look at the interest owing by the Canadian National, it has increased between 1919 and 1931 from $28,000,000 to $57,000,000, or an increase of about $29,000,000. Even, therefore, without government interest of any kind, and with an allowance being made for the difference in deficit or profit in the two years, 1931 was worse than 1919 by $14,000,000. Even if you take the peak year of 1928, when the Canadian National Railways earned more than they ever did in any other year of their history, that year would have been short of interest to the public in 1931 by something like $8,000,000, and besides that there would have been nothing for reserve fund or for any other needs.

When we came into power in August, 1930, we found the condition which I have described, not quite as serious as that of 1931, but getting towards it. The revenues were dropping ominously, and the interest charges were increasing. The revenues dropped from 1928 to 1930 by $54,000,000, and as we were not in power until the last four months of 1930, we naturally could not in any way be criticized for that. I might add that in the last two months, January and February, 1932, the Canadian National Railways were not earning operating expenses. What made the situation worse was the fact that when we came into power in the beginning of August, 1930, there were railway committals amounting to $158,000,000, over which in a general way, we had no control whatever. That amount was a balance of committals made in the previous year, 1929, when a series of committals amounting in all to $270,000,000 was made, including temporary finances, budget, maritime freight rates, branch lines, terminals, railway purchases, equipment and refunding, the refunding amounting to $9,000,000. I have named just some of the outstanding items. The federal net debt before the war was only $336,000,000, so that a series of committals amounting to $270,000,000 in one year naturally made the Canadian National Railway picture a pretty serious one. As one of my colleagues suggests, of course these committals had to be approved by the government of the day. The condition we found being as I have described it, it seemed to me as Minister of Railways that the facts had to be told to the public, because our role was the unpopular one of showing the Canadian National Railways that we felt every reasonable economy should be practised in the operating of that road. That was our duty not only as a trustee of the people of Canada, indeed, as a trustee of the Canadian National Railway itself, but as friends of the road and as loyal Canadians. It seems to me that when the Canadian National Railway attains the position where it will not need to ask for either cash or guarantees from the people of this country, then, and not till then, should the parliament of Canada fail to examine carefully all the expenditures of the road. Therefore we insisted at that time that the road must be run as economically as possible, remembering always that the efficiency of the road must not be impaired. That was a necessary duty for the self-preservation of the Canadian people, of the Canadian government, and of the financial position of this country and the railway itself.

The details of the economies to be effected were left largely to the management themselves, and they cooperated. We appointed a new board of directors, and I wish to pay them the compliment of acknowledging their cooperation with the management and with ourselves in doing everything that could be done to see that these immense yearly advances would not be required indefinitely. There were a few important changes made which I think are worthy of mention.

There had been going on the practice of what we called the switching of votes of money. It had been the privilege of the Canadian National Railway up to about a year ago, if an appropriation of one million dollars, we will say, had been passed for an expenditure in western Canada, to switch that expenditure to eastern Canada, or vice versa. As a matter of fact, in 1930 the switching amounted to well over eight million dollars. No order in council was needed to make the change in many cases. Perhaps it was in some cases, though I doubt it. At all events, this switching was permitted. That was a power which even the government of Canada does not possess, because, as members of the house know, the government cannot devote an item passed for one particular purpose to any different purpose. This switching practice of the Canadian National Railways was discontinued. The question was up last year in this house and the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition emphatically supported the government in the attitude which they took. That was one of the important changes made, though not necessarily an economy.

Another very useful and important change that was made was the appointment by order in council of a finance committee early in the year 1931. The personnel of the finance committee comprises the president of the road, the legal vice-president, and the Deputy Minister of Railways, who represents myself on the board. The duty of the finance committee was to investigate all the proposed expenditures of capital and to inquire if those expenditures were likely to bring in an adequate return. If they considered that the expenditures were not justified it was their privilege to recommend to the executive committee, and from them the recommendation was made to the directors, that those expenditures should not be made. As a result of the work of that committee in 1931 the figure of twenty million dollars for additions and betterments, called in this bill construction and betterments, was cut down by thirteen million dollars. As a result of the finance committee putting its foot down the Canadian National instead of spending twenty million dollars on additions and betterments last year spent only seven million dollars, and there was held up for the time being at least some thirteen million dollars of expenditure.

Then the management put into effect a number of very important economies amounting to thirteen million dollars which they claimed as special economies. That thirteen million dollars was made up of many items, some of the chief being the paying off of some highly paid but supernumerary officers who were looked upon as deadwood; the cutting off of unnecessary services and markedly non-paying services on some of the branch lines; the curtailing of the services of even some of the trans-Canada passenger trains; the adjustment of salaries and wages; the doing away with the triangular steamship service which had just been inaugurated and was losing very heavily on the Pacific coast; the cutting out to a large extent of club dues, entertainment fees, officers' expenses and matters of that sort; and the cutting off of a steamship subsidy amounting to something like $200,000 a year which it was decided was lost money entirely. After that subsidy was cut off I was rather interested in noting that the steamships still continued to run. Those items with others made up, they claim, a total of special savings of $13,000,000 in 1931, and they claim that special savings in 1932 will amount to a further $15,000,000, not a duplication of the $13,000,000, but an extra $15,000,000 in 1932, or a total of special savings in the two years of $28,000,000. A number of these economies I might say were suggested by the special committee of this house on railways and shipping, which deals with these matters. It is the opinion of those who follow the records of the railway and of the special committee of the House of Commons of which I was speaking, that last year's committee did the best work of any committee which has ever served for this purpose. That committee is made up, as the house knows, of members from all sides of the house, and certainly many of the committee's recommendations were justified.

In addition marked economies were made through greater cooperation than had been formerly taking place between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railway.

Surely all those economies are an achievement worth mentioning, and may I add that it seems to me there is still much to be done from an economical standpoint. As a result of those economies—I am nearing the end of my remarks, and I can assure my right hon. friend that I have no more articles that I wish to put on Hansard—protests came in from all parts of this dominion. Every section of Canada apparently has a mentality that permits it to advocate economies for every place but its own particular section, and consequently every section took the attitude that services should be cut off elsewhere but that theirs should not be interfered with. Probably they felt, and perhaps rightly so, that the prestige of their section was interfered with by the curtailing of the services. Let me give an instance or two. On one of the small branch lines which was losing heavily the Canadian National Railway decided to take off a daily service and substitute for it a tri-weekly service. This was in the province of Alberta. The people using this branch line asked for an appointment with the railway management in that section, and sent in quite a large deputation which protested very strongly against the curtailing of the service. Suddenly one of the officers of the road asked the deputation how they had come in, and they replied that they had come in by motor bus.

Another illustration that came under my own observation of the same peculiar way of thinking was this: A prominent Montreal man had some dealings with the National road. He did not get through a business deal amounting to about a quarter of a million dollars, and he tried to bring pressure on the National road through the government. He visited my office on a number of occasions, once coming from the city of Toronto and on other occasions from Montreal, and on every occasion he drove from Toronto or Montreal to Ottawa in his own car with his own chauffeur. He did not patronize the road with which he was hoping to make a business deal of about a quarter of a million dollars. I mention these instances just to illustrate the feeling of the people, the apparently unconscious pulling away from the patronizing of the railways to motor competition, with its consequent effect on the revenues of the railways; and when I say motor competition I include motor competition of all kinds—motor trucks and motor buses and the private automobile. They are all hitting the passenger revenues of the railway.

I mentioned a few moments ago the tendency of the railways to reach out too much for passenger traffic and neglect freight traffic. It is interesting to note that the total loss on passenger operation of the Canadian National Railway amounted in 1926 to $4,000,000, and that amount gradually grew until last year the loss amounted to nearly $24,000,000. I repeat, the railways have been reaching out for the non-paying branch of the railway business and neglecting the real revenue-producing business—the freight traffic.

As I have said, the management itself cut these services. We were not even consulted. I say that because continually I am receiving from members on both sides of the house protests against reduction of branch line services. I have on all occasions pointed out that while I am pleased to pass on their protests, I have no power to insist on services being continued which the railway management consider it is to the economic advantage of the system to abandon. In short, these changes have been made on economic, not on political grounds.

I wish now for a few moments to deal with certain unfair statements made throughout the country, particularly in western Canada, alleging interference with the Canadian National Railways by the government. For example, it has been charged that we have put into effect these branch line restrictions in service; some newspapers have even hinted, and some have stated quite openly, that in the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway we have interfered with some of the services of the Canadian National Railways. I merely mention this to brand it as false, because there is no basis whatsoever for such a charge. One of the most outstanding papers in Canada about six weeks ago published a front page editorial accusing me of forcing upon the Canadian National Railway management what it termed "crippling economies." I wrote to the editor, whom I knew quite well, to name one crippling economy that had been forced upon the Canadian National Railways, or that the Canadian National Railway management itself put into effect. Of course, he could not cite a single case. He dodged around the question in a four-page letter, but he did not instance any "crippling economies." I simply stated to him that if there were any crippling economies the executive officers were responsible, but I did not think they were so stupid, because at the present time because of traffic decreases they are having quite sufficient troubles of their own.

Another unfair charge made against us is that we forced on the Canadian National Railways management the ten per cent reduction in the wages of the running trades. We had nothing whatever to do with this reduction. It was brought about by the management of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway working together with the representatives of the men's unions. The unions, having had pointed out to them by the railway executives the serious financial condition of both roads, accepted the ten per cent reduction, and I think they deserve credit for their patriotic and loyal stand.

Another charge has been made against us which I think is the most malicious of all. I mention it because it came to me as Minister of Railways from various sections of western Canada, from my own section, from Dauphin, from Saskatoon, from Rainy River and from other quarters, but I remember those four particularly. The charge was that we were forcing the Canadian National Railways to divert freight traffic to the Canadian Pacific Railway, thereby cutting down the earnings of the Canadian National Railways and adding to the earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This charge became so general in some papers and was so generally believed by the men of the Canadian National Railways, that Mr. Warren, western vice-president and general manager of the Canadian National Railways, issued a statement from Winnipeg under date of December 2, 1931:

> That the Canadian National Railways is diverting grain traffic to the Canadian Pacific Railway in the west, as implied in recent newspaper correspondence and current rumours, is emphatically denied to-day by A. E. Warren, vice-president, who upon his return from a business trip to the Pacific coast, issued the following statement:
> It is clearly contrary to sound reasoning for the Canadian National to throw away business at any time, let alone in these times, when this company, in common with all railways the world over, is fighting to secure its share of the traffic offering, and nothing as suggested in the reports has occurred. Rather, the movement of grain by the Canadian National for some weeks has been such that the company was able to put back into service a goodly number of employees, to assist in the transportation of this increased movement.

That was wired by Mr. Warren to all the western newspapers. May I say there has been no politics injected into the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton takes that attitude in a statement which he issued in the last few weeks, and which I think most hon. members have read. He points out what is true, that the management controls the roads. Our role has merely been to point out to the management where we thought they could improve conditions to the advantage not only of the road but of the people of Canada. May I say quite frankly that even in the most prosperous days of the Canadian National Railways many of these economies of which we are now bearing the brunt should have been put into force.

The management of both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways have stated to me that freight rates in Canada are the lowest in the world. In fact Sir Henry Thornton in a letter to me states that if the same freight rates prevailed in Canada as prevail in the United States, the earnings of the road for the past few years would be from $15,000,000 to $26,000,000 greater annually. I wish merely to point out that we cannot have very low freight rates, luxurious passenger accommodation, unnecessary services, and branch lines running to our back doors, and at the same time maintain the railways in a condition of solvency. Let every Canadian do his best to help both railway systems get back on their feet, remembering that better times mean better services. We should all realize that the accumulation of past mistakes has endangered the financial structure of the whole dominion. We should also remember that this is a Canadian question—a question bigger than any party, bigger than any government. We have on the northern half of this continent ten million people endeavouring to develop it, and there is a limit to the taxing possibilities of that population in an area such as ours.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: We must also remember, that in 1931 we had to finance $300,000,000, not one cent of which had to be taken care of before the war. That $300,000,000 was made up of interest on the war debt, on pensions and soldiers' services of various kinds, Canadian National Railway needs, and unemployment relief. We may perhaps bear in mind that when normal times come, as we are all hoping they will come in the near future, these trials through which the railways have been passing certainly ought to be helpful to them, because in hard times all of us, including railway executives, learn something of the fundamentals of sound business. So far as the future is concerned, it seems to me that with a reasonable return to business and commercial normalcy, with a fair attitude by the people of this country in their demands not only as to capital expenditures, but as to railway rates, and with care, caution and economy on the part of the management of our railway system, we may look to the future with hope and confidence.

But because of the serious condition in which all our railways found themselves, it is within the knowledge of this house that we appointed a royal commission to look into the transportation question. In discussing that question it is well to remember that the commission was suggested by Sir Henry Thornton himself before the railway committee last session. His recommendation was endorsed by the committee, and its report was adopted unanimously by this house. The public and the press took the attitude to a large extent that such a commission should be appointed, and as a result there was appointed a most distinguished commission made up of big men in business, big men from various walks of life in our own country and other countries, men of such reputation that they would be beyond the influence of anyone, if anyone had the temerity to try to influence them.

May I briefly give the names and positions of these commissioners, in order to complete the record. The chairman is Mr. Justice Duff, who I am told by many lawyers is perhaps the most outstanding member of the judiciary of this country. Then there is Lord Ashfield of England, who made an enviable record in transportation matters not only in the United States but in England as well. There is Mr. Loree, president of the Delaware and Hudson Railway, who told me that even during this period of depression he had not found it necessary to lay off one man throughout his whole service. He has an outstanding reputation in railway matters in the United States. There is Sir Joseph Flavelle, whose reputation as a business man is known throughout the country. Then there is Mr. Beaudry Leman, late president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, who was an outstanding engineer before he became a banker. There is Doctor Webster of Shediac, New Brunswick, who had an international reputation in the medical profession in both Scotland and the United States, and finally Professor Walter Murray of the University of Saskatchewan. I mention these gentlemen because it is worth while to have their names and their standing upon the record, and incidentally I may say that so far as I can find out, of the five Canadian members of the commission three were originally Liberals while two were originally Conservatives. I am not trying to define the politics of the men from other countries; I mention this because it shows that in naming this commission we were not attempting to pack it in any way but were appointing a commission worthy of the name, which would be big enough and strong enough to go into this whole question and make a report which we hope will offer a real solution to the transportation problem of this country. If they can do that certainly they will deserve the gratitude of the people of Canada.

In closing may I just say that in view of the condition we found when we came into office, I submit to this house that the attitude we have taken has been eminently fair and has worked in the interests of our country as well as the interests of the Canadian National railways.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, during the winter most settlers and sons of farmers work as lumbermen and make a living by cutting railway ties. I remember very well that Sir Henry Thornton once declared before the committee on railways and shipping that he was ready to purchase ties from any settler who made application to him, but now things seem to be a little different. I credit my good friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) with all sincerity; I listened with great attention to his remarks with regard to the purchase of ties, particularly what he said yesterday, but there is one point I should like to bring to his attention.

Apparently this year the settlers have met with some good Samaritans called the Stadacona Sales Company. Public rumour says that this firm, or association, or company is composed of Mr. Maher, a Conservative organizer, a certain Mr. Bolduc, and perhaps a certain Mr. J. S. Royer, and rumour adds that a director of the Canadian National railways is also a member of that firm. I cannot testify as to the truth of that rumour, but that is what is being said. That firm, the Stadacona Sales Company, is a toll gate for ties, eatables, provisions and supplies which are used in Quebec; they make a rake-off on every Canadian National and federal contract. I make that statement as a member of parliament. This organization is something like the Russian selling organization which is located in New York, the Amtorg Trading Corporation, but in any case it is very well known. They get the cream of every Canadian National railway and federal contract which has to do with the province of Quebec.

These were the people who exploited butter for political purposes during the last election, and now they are exploiting preserves in their grafting propensities. There was a great jam and preserve factory in Ontario conducted by Mr. E. D. Smith, whose contracts with the Canadian National have not been renewed; is it because it was selling its products too cheaply? On the menus of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways there are many kinds of preserves, jams, marmalades and honey that are sold for 15 cents a portion. When we ask the waiter if he has something better than the 15 cent brand he answers that he has. It takes him about five minutes to get it; he has to go to the cupboard, the vault or the strong room of the dining car, and then he returns with an individual portion such as I have in my hand. I have two jars here, the one full and the other empty, and

I may tell my friends that the empty one is better than the full one, because there is nothing bad in it. My hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Gobeil) will be glad to hear the name on the label of this jar, because it is something like his own. The label says it is wild strawberry preserve guaranteed pure.

Mr. GOBEIL: What is wrong with that?

Mr. POULIOT: When my hon. friend from Compton speaks he does so with a sour mouth. I thought he must have been eating pickles, but perhaps he was eating this kind of preserves; is it just as sour as pickles? At any rate, this Stadacona Sales Company found a great commercial genius in the town of La Patrie, Quebec, and La Patrie goes well with the Canadian National. I do not know whether it is a lady or a gentleman—it is simply J. Well, J. might stand for Juliette or for Joe; it might stand for John or Jack. I do not know. There is mystery in a name; as Shakespeare said, "What's in a name?" At any rate, this viscous, luxurious compound purports to be a preserve of some sort. On the principle of Canada first, the Canadian National Railways ordered some of this viscous compound, notwithstanding that there are excellent and cheaper preserves made elsewhere in Canada. I see there is a preserve put up by the E. D. Smith Company, and if I am not mistaken, that Mr. Smith is a member of the Senate—a very distinguished gentleman, an excellent senator. Everyone who has tried Mr. Smith's preserves swears that they are excellent, and the price is only 15 cents. But this atrocity costs 10 cents more, which represents an increase to that extent over the legitimate profit that Mr. Smith enjoys. I am glad to note that so many ladies are listening to and appreciating this advertisement which I am giving Mr. Smith's article. Mr. Speaker, here you have a surplus of 66.66 per cent, representing so much graft, and travellers must pay for that. I will sit down in order to allow the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) to tell me whether he knows who manufactures this stuff.

Mr. GOBEIL: When you finish your speech I will answer.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the hon. gentleman tell me that? Will he tell me whether it is a lady or a man? I will sit down so that he may reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman concluding his speech?

Mr. POULIOT: By no means, Mr. Speaker. As I say, this 66.66 is graft, and all the time the Smith Company, who sell a very good preserve, are being penalized and we have to accept this viscous stuff as a substitute. I do not know whether my hon. friend from Compton is interested in the manufacture of this jam. The hon. gentleman is a paragon of virtue in this house; no one is as honest as he is, and as my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) observes, we do not want to see the hon. gentleman die from eating this jam. Certainly I do not want him to poison himself; I do not want to see him commit suicide by eating this stuff; but I shall be more sorry to see him commit murder by inducing other people to eat it. I want my fellow Canadians and my friends to live as long as possible. I do not want to see them dying from eating such stuff. Now there is something else. If these strawberries are sold by a cooperative of farmers of Compton county, may I ask whether all the farmers of that county share in the profits that are derived from the sale of that stuff? If so, I will not complain provided that the product is of acceptable quality; I am sure it would then be. As I say, I do not know whether the hon. member for Compton has anything to do with its manufacture; I do not accuse him of that. But I should like him to tell me, if he is going to speak, where that jam is made—it is really not jam; it is not as thick as jam but quite viscous. First of all, where is it made? In what house is it made? Perhaps it is not made in a house; perhaps it is made in a barn. I should like him to explain also, if he can, how this preserve was made in the wintertime. Incidentally, I must say that the hon. gentleman apparently has a wonderful memory, because I see him taking no notes at all although I am asking him a number of questions, and if he does not reply I intend to put my questions again when the bill is in committee. I am notifying him in advance, so that he had better take notes of the questions I am putting to him. Another question which I hope he will be good enough to answer is this: Did he recommend the sale of that stuff to the Canadian National Railways for their trains and hotels and even for the restaurant here? I should like to know that.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman understands, of course, that purchases of all kinds for the Canadian National Railways are made by the management itself; we are not even consulted in the matter. I mention this merely to inform him that we have nothing to do with such matters as he is dealing with.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister will permit me to remind him that up to the present moment I have said nothing offensive with reference to himself, and what is more, I do not intend to say anything offensive about him.

Mr. MANION: That is all right; I wasn't suggesting that.

Mr. POULIOT: Let me say to the minister, however, that in my opinion the management of the Canadian National Railways was wrong in buying this stuff. I am criticizing this as a purchase made by the management, and whether the purchase was made through the Stadacona Sales Company or through any other concern, the cold fact remains that this atrocious compound has been bought by the Canadian National Railways and, what is worse, has been bought at a higher price than would be paid for preserves of better quality. That is all. But what I find most extraordinary is this, that in this part of the country at present it is pretty hard to pick strawberries, and yet we find that this preserve has been put up during the winter. We had a very mild winter, it is true; December was exceptionally mild, and one or two strawberries were found here and there. But surely people cannot find strawberries in wintertime to make jams and preserves. Certainly you could not pick enough strawberries to sell to the Canadian National Railways for all the people who travel on their trains.

An hon. MEMBER: Does not the hon. gentleman know that we have ever-bearing strawberries in greenhouses?

Mr. POULIOT: If they came from greenhouses I am sure the price would be at least 75 cents. But this does not purport to be made from greenhouse strawberries; they are wild strawberries. Apparently they grow in the fields, under the snow, for this preserve was made in January. In the case of the parliamentary restaurant I could not believe that these strawberries were purchased last summer to be used this winter, but I was told that the purchases of preserves by the Canadian National Railways were made in January. The strawberries themselves probably have to be purchased in June because in December or January the fields are covered with snow and nothing can grow.

I do not know if this one manufacturer is related to the hon. member. When he is present in the house perhaps he will tell us who recommended that this product be used, when the company first started to make preserves, how large their kettles are and so on. To use an American expression, it will be interesting to hear about the melting pot and to find out what quantity of jams or preserves have been sold and at what price.

The jars used by E. D. Smith and Company are of the same size and shape as those put up by the other company. The label may be a little different but everything else is the same. One is sold for fifteen cents while the latter is sold for twenty-five.

The hon. member for Compton is very scrupulous. He told me the other day that he was defending the millionaires. Is he one in making? He told me also that I was fattening myself at the expense of the country, but I have never done that. I wonder if he is any relation to lord bacon, Sir Joseph Flavelle? That gentleman is an important personage in the city of Toronto and perhaps through him the other fellow might sell more preserves.

Down in my constituency are many people who for years have been faithful employees of the Canadian National Railways. This company now comes along and says it has no money and some of these employees are sent back home. They are being deprived of work while such contracts, as those to which I have referred, are being carried out. I know the Minister of Railways is doing his best, but such practices are unfair. There are 50,000 people in my constituency, several hundred of whom work for the railway company. Some of these men have had the honour to drive the trains upon which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), the Governor General or Sir Henry Thornton have ridden. For this service they received letters of appreciation, but that is all. Some of these men came from the country, others from the different villages; they established themselves and attempted to bring up their families as good citizens. Now they are being deprived of work because the company has no money. I remember the first session of 1930, when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that he considered it was his duty to prevent unemployment, and he told Sir Henry Thornton to keep on as many men as possible. When this government came into power there were fewer unemployed than there are at the present time. The Minister of Railways has just said that the Canadian National Railways must practise economy. We agree with him, but at the same time we cannot approve of the railway increasing the number of unemployed.

I receive letters every day from people who have been deprived of their livelihood, and yet money is being wasted on contracts similar to the ones to which I have referred. I do not know who is responsible for this, but I ask the minister to see to it that he is dismissed at once. These contracts should be cancelled and those people who have been put out of work because economy was to be practised should be reinstated at once.

Last year the minister and I had our little tilts, but I have learned that he was not responsible for the trouble in my constituency. Another hon. member was responsible for this, and I intend to confront him with these facts upon his return. It is my duty to defend my people; that is why I am here. When our people are in distress and when we are here to look after unemployment relief, it is our duty to fight for their interests. I do not wish to be disagreeable to anyone. In times of prosperity I would not mind anyone making some money by selling preserves in the right manner, but in times of distress, when people are in such trouble, one should see to it that the trouble ceases and profiteering is stopped.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): I do not for one moment propose to answer such an uncalled-for and silly statement as we have been obliged to listen to from the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), except to say that during the last four, five or perhaps six years one of my brothers in La Patrie has built up a little private trade in wild strawberries put up in cans. I have not the full information in regard to the matter; I hope the hon. member brings it up before the railway committee and between now and then I shall endeavour to get full information. The only thing I can say to the house to-day is that it came to my knowledge about a year ago that my brother received a sample order. Of course I am no merchant, but I imagine these sample orders are shipped on the understanding that they will not be paid for unless they are satisfactory. That is all I have to say for to-night, and if my hon. friend wishes to bring the question before the railway committee I shall certainly endeavour to get the particulars so as to be able to state the facts.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): No more important bill has been brought before the Commons than that which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has introduced to-night. He has given us a very fair and clear explanation of it, and had he not been prompted by one of his colleagues, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), one would have had very little fault to find with the character of his speech. One or two matters discussed by the minister, however, induce me to refer very briefly to his remarks.

The first is the point raised by him that the conditions in which the government, on taking office, found the railway was due to a certain extent to the methods of the late Liberal administration. May I point out to him that during all the years since the Canadian National railway system has come into being, there has been annually appointed by the house a committee consisting of various members from all sides, Conservatives, Liberals and Progressives, and that each year, certainly since I have been a member of the house and of that committee, we have brought in a unanimous report on the Canadian National railway estimates and other matters which it has had to consider. Those of the Conservative party who sat on the committee had every opportunity to criticize the methods of the railway or of the government or the expenditure, had they seen fit to do so. The minister, while a member of the opposition, had every opportunity to criticize the committee's report when it was brought in, but I do not remember a single occasion when either the minister or any member of the present government or any other hon. gentleman on that side criticized the committee's report when it was presented to the house. Therefore I say to the minister he is hardly fair to the late administration when he blames it for the condition in which the Canadian National Railways found itself when he took office.

The other point on which I wish to speak for a moment is in connection with the royal commission appointed by the government. It is true that this commission was recommended by the committee of last year. I am glad also to find that the minister gives the committee credit for making various recommendations as regards economy and that those recommendations have been followed by the railway. But when he speaks of this commission; when he eulogizes the various appointees of it and goes out of his way to say how impartial the commission is and that he knows not whether its members vote Grit or Conservative, that is not the main question in which we as Canadians are interested. What we are concerned in is the report that these men will bring in, and had the minister not raised the question I do not think any hon. member would have discussed it until the report is brought in, at which time we can judge whether these men are of the high character that the minister has given them. If newspaper reports of various statements made at Winnipeg, Ottawa and elsewhere are true, it seems that the commission will not be very favourable to public ownership in this country. One has only to recall that Mr. Loree, whom the minister extolled a few minutes ago, said at Winnipeg that he had never found any government that could carry on business on a competitive basis. We recall that Sir Joseph Flavelle, I think in Ottawa, severely condemned public ownership. I think we should reserve, until the report is brought in, the question regarding the character and type of these men, and I do not think the minister should at this time have introduced the subject matter of the royal commission.

Mr. MANION: I did not discuss public ownership or anything of that sort. I just want to point out to my hon. friend that he has not mentioned Professor Murray, who I understand is an out-and-out public ownership man. I do not know what the others are.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will be a minority.

Mr. MANION: It may not be a minority. I do not know what the others are. I think we might leave the projected report out of the discussion.

Mr. GRAY: I think so too. The reason I criticized the minister was that it was he who introduced the question of the royal commission and sought to spread a halo around the heads of the men whom the government has seen fit to appoint.

Mr. MANION: I stated merely that they were distinguished men; that is all.

Mr. GRAY: And that they were impartial in the way they voted. My point is that we shall judge these men by their report and I am quite prepared to leave the matter over until it is brought in. I do not think it should be discussed further at this time.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I should like, for information, to ask a question of the minister. It might better be asked in committee, but I want to prepare him so that he may be able to give the answer then if he cannot do so now. The debt of the government of Canada was given as one billion three hundred million dollars. I would like to know what amount is included in that charged up against the old Intercolonial.

Mr. MANION: The Intercolonial—if I may be permitted to reply, as this is out of order—is included in the figure for government constructed roads with the Prince Edward Island Railway and the National Transcontinental. The figure for the three of them is given at about four hundred million dollars.

Mr. VENIOT: Are there any interest charges in the books of the government against the old Intercolonial? I would like to know what the Intercolonial cost and what amount is actually charged against it as a government obligation. I ask that for this reason: The old Intercolonial is included in the pact of confederation and Canada itself did not furnish all the money for its construction. Whatever money Canada did furnish for the construction of the old Intercolonial should not be entered up in the books of Canada as a charge against that enterprise, because it was part of the pact of confederation which united Upper Canada with the maritime provinces. The Intercolonial was constructed for the purpose of giving an Atlantic outlet to the business of Ontario and Quebec, and if this is charged up against the Intercolonial it means just that much more overhead which must be taken care of. I wish the minister would look up that information and be prepared to give it when we are in committee.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I should like to take a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, to make a few observations. I would not have taken advantage of this opportunity to-night had it not been for the fact that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has brought the matter to my notice.

The minister took occasion to discuss the question of the commission investigating the railways and to eulogize its members. Like my good friend from West Lambton (Mr. Gray) I would have preferred to remain quiet on this question until we had the commission's report before us, but I am not so sure that the minister's remarks with respect to the commission will do much to placate the feelings of the railroad men themselves with respect to the commission. The minister knows that representatives of the railroad men of the country requested that he appoint one of their members to the commission to represent them, but he failed to do so. No matter what recommendations the commission may make, if they affect anyone in the slightest degree they must certainly affect the lives of the railroad men and their families more than any other section of the Canadian people, and yet the railroad men are the only ones without representation on the commission. Let me tell the house, because the Minister of Railways himself and the government know the fact full well, that twenty-one general chairmen of the Railroad Workers' Unions, representing 26,000 railroad men in this country, have protested to the government with respect to certain members of this commission. They have this to say, and I am now quoting from the Montreal Star of December 2, 1931:

"Honourable R. J. Manion, Minister of Railways, Ottawa, Ontario.

Sir, on behalf of 21 general chairmen representing engineers, firemen, conductors, trainmen and telegraphers over 26,000 in number on Canadian railroads, have noted with surprise and sincere disappointment a reference in today's press to the possibility of your government considering the appointment of Sir Joseph Flavelle, of Toronto, as a member of the commission to investigate the Canadian railway situation. I am instructed by this committee to advise you on their behalf that Canadian railroad men would be overwhelmingly opposed to the appointment of Sir Joseph Flavelle on this commission because in our judgment he has always found himself unable to exercise a reasonable view of the rights of individuals as contended for by organized labour and workers generally and to implore your government therefore to refrain from making this appointment."

The above telegram was also sent to the Minister of Labour, who replied by wire on November 14.

A similar telegram was also sent to Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, Prime Minister, and on November 16th, Hon. Geo. H. Perley, Acting Prime Minister, advised that you were replying to our telegram of November 13, and that he concurred with your reply.

On November 19, we received a letter from you, which we noted was dated November 14, and the next day the press carried notice of the appointment of the commission to investigate the Canadian railway situation.

We now desire to reaffirm our position as outlined in above telegram, and also to express on behalf of the 26,000 Canadian railroad workers whom we represent, the dismay and disappointment which they and we feel in the appointment on this commission of the member named from the United States. Our reasons are as follows:—

1. The gentleman named is now and has been for more than a quarter of a century known and noted by organized labour as its most bitter opponent.

2. He has by his continued opposition to anything emanating from, or connected with organized labour, made it impossible to secure adherence to wage agreements on his own line.

3. He has been ever ready to lead a battle or opposition against organized labour, its views and its claims, when others were doubtful of the justice of such course.

4. He is the only railway chief executive on this continent (in our judgment) who requires and insists on employees of the various classes on a portion of his through line, working for lower wages than similar classes of employees on the remainder of the line this being done on the pretext that those employees, who are underpaid, are on a separate chartered railway. We refer to the Napierville Junction railway in the province of Quebec, a part of the main line of the Delaware & Hudson railway from Montreal to New York.

5. Some months ago this gentleman prepared and submitted a grouping plan for consideration and adoption by the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which the Delaware & Hudson railway was proposed as the dominating component part of the group. That proposal was treated by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by other railway operating heads as it deserved.

Thus, in our judgment, you have placed on this railway commission, the most pronounced opponent of labour's rights and claims in Canada, and a similar choice has been made from the United States.

We know that not only the men in the classes specified above, but practically all of the more than one hundred thousand railway employees in Canada will be seriously disturbed by the appointments referred to.

Labour expects no special consideration but does hope for reasonable unbiased judgment where its interests are vitally concerned, as in this case.

I have the honour, on behalf of these 21 general chairmen, to be, sir,

Yours respectfully,

(Sgd.) J. B. B. Ward,
Chairman of General Chairman's Conference Committee.

These men, Mr. Speaker, are not politicians. They are divided about equally—

Mr. MANION: But the protest came in after the commissioners were chosen.

Mr. HEENAN: I will leave the record to speak for itself. I got the letter which I have just quoted from the Montreal Star, and the railroad men say no. But taking the minister's own word, has he and the government no more regard for the lives and living conditions of the railroad men of this country than to appoint a commission of this kind without the railroad men having a single representative on it? I notice that the minister in his remarks took credit to the government and to his department for practically everything that was favourable with respect to the Canadian National Railway.

Mr. MANION: Oh, no.

Mr. HEENAN: On the other hand he has credited to the management everything of an unfavourable character. He tells us of our railways looking for the wrong kind of traffic, as if our railway managements were not the best in the world. Then he told us of the economy committee and that the Minister of Railways himself is represented on it, and he cited the economies that committee has put into effect, amongst them the ten per cent cut in wages.

Mr. MANION: I did not. The economy committee I quoted as cutting down capital expenditure. The economies the hon. member referred to were effected by the management, and I said so. I do not wish to be misquoted.

Mr. HEENAN: At any rate, he quoted quite approvingly the ten per cent cut in wages.

Mr. MANION: I did not discuss it.

Mr. HEENAN: He commended the men for taking the cut in a loyal way.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: I know how those men took that reduction; they took it the same as the opposition took the bill passed by closure this afternoon. They took the reduction because they had to do so or strike. In that instance I agree with the minister that they were loyal, for rather than tie up the commerce of the country they took the wage reduction. But it is a peculiar situation, and I know the railway men see it as I do, that every time there is a Conservative government in power they have to accept a reduction in wages. I am not suggesting at this time that the government has anything to do with it, but in 1921, just before the Conservative government left office, the railway men had to take a twelve per cent reduction in wages, while between 1926 and 1930 they got between six per cent and nine per cent of that back, but now, with the advent of another Conservative government, they have to take a further ten per cent cut in wages. That speaks for itself.

I could not let the minister's remarks approving of the commission he appointed pass without comment. I do not know any of the gentlemen, but these twenty-one general chairmen know all the executive heads of the railroads of the American continent, and they know who are antagonistic to the ideals of labour. No one in this house, I am sure will stand up and say that railway labour and their representatives are not as fair and reasonable a body of men as can be found anywhere on this continent. Therefore when they make a protest of this character it should be heard. I wish to put myself on record as protesting against this government appointing a commission without the men having a representative on such commission any recommendation of which, however slightly it may affect our railway operations, must in turn affect the lives of the men working on those railways and their families more than anyone else, yet they are the only class of people who have not representation on the commission.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on railways and shipping.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Maloney in the chair.

Yukon territory—miscellaneous expenditure, including salaries and allowances of court officers, etc.—further amount required, $1,000.

Mr. COOTE: We have not been able to hear what particular business is being carried on.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): These are the supplementary estimates for the past year, brought down the other day.

Mr. VENIOT: As I understand, these supplementaries are to make up the difference between the estimated expenditures voted last session and the actual expenditures during the year.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Which shows that in order to meet the administration of justice you now require $1,000 more than was estimated and voted in 1931.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: That being the case, I should like to have an explanation from the Prime Minister. On March 30, 1931, when introducing the supplementary estimates, he made the following statement:

No department has the right to allow its officials to exceed the estimates voted by parliament. This principle has been clearly established, but in spite of this fact such estimates were exceeded without the knowledge of the ministers. The time has come when rigorous steps must be taken to prevent a recurrence.

When the Prime Minister had these estimates before the house I drew attention to the fact that I did not think what he had stated could be carried out. I see now that in making that remark I was quite right, because these supplementaries amount to $2,242,474.83.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is including the railways.

Mr. VENIOT: It should be $1,059,474.33?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: The Prime Minister assured the committee at that time that a new system was to be adopted, and that great care would be exercised in seeing that there was no over-expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: And there was not.

Mr. VENIOT: And that in future we would not be called upon to vote supplementaries in the same manner as we had been in previous years.

Mr. BENNETT: And you are not.

Mr. VENIOT: It appears to me quite singular that the Senate expenditure for the year ending March 31st, 1932, could not be better estimated. I see $12,000 is required under item 300. So the estimate was far afield.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit.

Mr. VENIOT: Then I find under public printing and stationery a further amount of $7,250. I well remember that the Prime Minister made quite a speech on the question of printing, that the cost should be reduced, and that so and so should be done. He claimed at that time that in the Post Office Department expenditure on this head had been accumulating from year to year, and he said that it would not happen in future.

Mr. BENNETT: It has not.

Mr. VENIOT: Why do you want the extra $7,250?

Mr. BENNETT: That is all for this parliament.

Mr. VENIOT: What the right hon. gentleman says is quite true, but we were told that there would be no repetition of this in the future.

Mr. BENNETT: There has not been.

Mr. VENIOT: Then the figures must be wrong. Then we have an over-expenditure in connection with the House of Commons of $63,124.33. Surely that could have been estimated more closely.

Mr. RHODES: I should like to ask my hon. friend how the government can estimate how long a session of parliament will last.

Mr. VENIOT: The last session of parliament lasted just over four months. I am sure the acting Minister of Finance at that time—

Mr. BENNETT: No, the Minister of Finance.

Mr. VENIOT: I beg your pardon; I am sure the present Prime Minister, with all the ability he professes to have and the close attention he says he has been giving the business of this country in order to see that economy is practiced, could have made a closer estimate than this. Then our contribution to the League of Nations requires $32,000 more.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. RHODES: That is easy to explain.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like the explanation. Then we have some miscellaneous items, including a loan to the harbour commissioners of Montreal amounting to $22,400. I wonder why this is put in the supplementary estimates; was there no other way of doing it? I can understand the expense in connection with the royal commission on transportation. The government was not quite sure whether or not that commission would be appointed, and when the appointments were made provision had to be made for expenses.

What I am trying to direct the attention of the committee to is the very decided stand taken by the Minister of Finance of that day, that in future under his eagle eye this house would not be required to pass supplementary estimates at the beginning of the session. This reminds me of one point, which I will touch only briefly now because I intend to take it up when the budget is under consideration; I refer to the great difference between the revenue estimated by the Minister of Finance of that day and the actual revenue of last year. Later on I will take some time of the committee to discuss that matter. I am glad the Prime Minister has rid himself of the burden of the Department of Finance; I hope the present Minister of Finance will make a better guess at what will be required for the future than the former minister made last year.

Mr. BENNETT: When the financial statement is given the hon. gentleman will find that more money has been saved in the departments, as compared with the estimates made, than has been the case for many years past. If my hon. friend will be good enough to direct his attention to the items of which he spoke he will see that the first item is with respect to the administration of justice. A trial had to be held in the Yukon in connection with an event that had not happened when the estimates were prepared. It cost something over $1,000, and $1,000 is required to discharge the balance in connection with that trial. No estimate could have covered that expenditure.

With respect to the next two items, covering legislation and public printing and stationery, totalling something over $90,000, the extra expense arose from parliament sitting longer than was anticipated.

Mr. VENIOT: What was the anticipated length of the session?

Mr. BENNETT: The usual length. In addition, parliament met in February this year, and the charge against the appropriation was for the month of February and March. The item for public printing and stationery is in connection with the unusually large number of documents that had to be printed, arising out of the many matters coming up in the House of Commons that could not be foreseen at that time.

Then there is an item with respect to pensions and national health, which the hon. gentleman did not mention. In these cases it was the custom formerly to issue governor general's warrants, but in this instance it was known and perhaps should have been stated that the estimate would not cover the expenditure. The reasons given by the officials of the department as to why the previous administration had made these expenditures by governor general's warrants, before the house met, are very excellent reasons; that was done in order to lessen the expenditure. In this instance, however, owing to the severity of conditions, the appropriation was not nearly sufficient, and the passing of legislation is involved in order to provide for this large sum.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is that for the ordinary payment of pensions?

Mr. BENNETT: No; there is a surplus under the estimate with regard to ordinary pensions, as the Minister of Finance will disclose at the proper time. This represents provision made for necessitous pension cases, and the amount varies from year to year. It was known that the expenditure would be in excess of the estimate, and this was provided for previously by governor general's warants, for reasons I need not mention since the hon. gentleman who has just spoken was a member of the previous administration.

Mr. VENIOT: Is it still done by governor general's warrants?

Mr. BENNETT: No. The next two items result from the unfortunate exchange position, which could not readily have been foreseen. Our contribution to the League of Nations, if my memory serves me aright, is payable in Swiss gold francs, and it required this extra sum to make good the exchange required to make the payment. With respect to the other item of $3,000, while there was a surplus under the Paris vote it was not sufficient by $3,000 to take care of the exchange situation.

The item at the top of page 3 is one which I should not have thought the hon. gentleman would mention. This represents an obligation placed upon the country by reason of the guarantee of bonds to the extent of $19,500,000 for the Montreal harbour commission, there being no limitation placed in the statute.

Mr. VENIOT: I just asked if this could not have been done in another way.

Mr. BENNETT: Outside of the $875,000 with regard to pensions the total supplementary estimates amount to less than $200,000, of which $35,000 is represented by exchange operations. This leaves less than $165,000 required by way of supplementary estimates for last year, and over one-half of that sum is represented by the printing of reports and proceedings and so on of the commons and senate. I think if the hon. gentleman looks through the records he will not find a similar case for many years. There has been no accumulation to carry forward to another year. At the proper time my hon. friend will find that millions of dollars less than the estimates were expended during the last fiscal year.

Mr. VENIOT: I hope the right hon. gentleman will be able to keep up that record.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure my successor will be able to do so.

Item agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS

Loan to harbour commissioners of Montreal, with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council, for such period and upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of deficits resulting from the operations of the Montreal harbour bridge—further amount required, $22,400.

Mr. COOTE: Will the Prime Minister give us some information about the cost of this bridge as compared with the estimated cost? Has any investigation been made with regard to the large increase which I understand is shown in connection with the construction of that bridge?

Mr. BENNETT: The estimated cost of the bridge as given in this house was $6,000,000, and the guaranteed bonds are $19,500,000. The report of Price, Waterhouse & Company indicated how the money was expended. It was expended for the construction of the structure, for the purchase of real estate and for the payment of fees, commissions and inspections in connection with the construction of the bridge. I do not think that at this particular time I can give the hon. gentleman a history of the matter, for I have not the papers with me. Suffice it to say that it has placed upon the Dominion government an obligation which has to be met from time to time, there being no promise that in the immediate future the structure as a toll bridge will pay interest on the $19,500,000. I may say that further investigations are being carried on to ascertain why the expenditure was so great.

Mr. COOTE: Will some other opportunity be given during the session to discuss the matter, or will the Prime Minister at a later date give some further statement to the house in connection with this bridge?

Mr. BENNETT: I think—I am speaking subject to correction—that in the main estimates there is provision for this matter, which will afford an opportunity for discussion.

Mr. COOTE: Is the report of the auditors in connection with this bridge available to members of parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: It is not available to members of the house. It was made to the department and merely indicated how much money had been spent for various purposes. The investigations that have been carried on are not as to how much each portion of the structure cost but as to why it cost that much money, and that investigation has not been completed.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the Prime Minister later on give an itemized statement to show how the amount was arrived at?

Mr. BENNETT: If, as I think, the matter can be referred to by reason of there being a small item for interest in the main estimates, I shall be glad to give the hon. gentleman such information as I possess in that regard. I cannot, however, furnish the other information mentioned.

Mr. COOTE: When the investigation is completed, will the report of the investigators be available to the house?

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot answer that at the moment because part of it is being carried on by the investigators without the submission of any report. I have not myself received a report, except verbally as to a portion of the expenditure.

Mr. COOTE: I believe there is an opinion which is very general throughout the country that some public statement should be given as to the reason for the great increase in the expenditure over what it was estimated that the bridge would cost. I hope the Prime Minister will be able to give that statement to the house when this investigation is completed.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the investigation which is taking place departmental or through a commission?

Mr. BENNETT: No commission has been appointed. Price, Waterhouse & Company made a report as to the divisions of the total cost of the structure. That is to say, they indicated how much went for steel, how much went for land, how much went for law costs, how much went for commissions, for interest during construction and matters of that kind. All that was carefully examined. The rest of it has been a departmental inquiry, and I do not think it is in the public interest to indicate further the character of the investigation carried on for the purpose of ascertaining why the structure cost $19,500,000.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS, 1931-32

Expenses of the Royal Commission on Transportation (governor general's warrants of December 9, 1931 and February 4, 1932), $35,000.

Mr. GRAY: Is this the $35,000 referred to by the Minister of Railways for expenses in connection with the commission?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. GRAY: In his speech the hon. gentleman gave the names of the commissioners, referred to the excellence of their service and commented upon the impartiality of the views they entertained. I have already made some remarks with respect to Mr. Loree and Sir Joseph Flavelle. One of the gentlemen referred to by the minister was Lord Ashfield. I wish to quote briefly from The Statist of London, England, of February 27, 1932, in which there appears the report of a speech made by Lord Ashfield, and I do so to show the impartiality of this particular member of the commission. Speaking with reference to the underground electric railways group, Lord Ashfield says:

> The change of government which ensued upon the national crisis affected the fortunes of the London Passenger Transport bill, upon which, however, the proceedings can be resumed in the present parliament at the stage at which they were discontinued in the last parliament, if a motion to that effect is proposed by a minister of the crown and passed by the House of Commons.

What I wish to emphasize is the following:

There I must for the moment leave the matter, only remarking that I hold as strongly as ever that there can be no true and permanent solution of the problem of London passenger transport without a unification of ownership, administration and finance, in capable and independent business hands, extending to all the local passenger transport undertakings within a widely defined London traffic area.

I leave it to this house whether public ownership is or is not on trial before the commission.

Mr. COOTE: Will the Minister of Railways or the Prime Minister advise the house whether it is expected that the report of the commission will be available before the end of the session?

Mr. BENNETT: I notice in one of the papers a statement that the promise had been made in the speech from the throne that it would be. If hon. gentlemen will look at the speech from the throne they will find that this is not so. A hope was expressed that it might be so. At the moment I cannot answer the hon. gentleman as to whether the report will be ready or not. We, as a government, cannot do more than assist the commission in meeting any request it may make for information, and provide them with the facilities they may ask for in order that they may carry forward and complete their examination. Beyond that I cannot at the moment go, for it will naturally depend upon when the house rises whether or not the report will be available. If the house were to sit long enough, I have no doubt the report would be complete; but having no knowledge as to when hon. gentlemen opposite will permit the house to rise, I am not in a position to indicate when the report may be available.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is there a possibility of the government acting on the report under the provision for the peace, order and good government of Canada contained in the bill passed this evening?

Mr. BENNETT: Inasmuch as the peace, order and good government provision will expire on May 1 and I have no reason to believe that the report will be made by that time, I think the hon. gentleman will admit that his question was intended more as an indication of his humour than as a desire for information.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend has given us an indication that there will be a new bill presented before the end of this session which will be an improvement on chapter 58 of the statutes of last year. Before that bill is drafted perhaps I might tell my right hon. friend that we will have strong objections to make to his securing the authority to settle the railway problem of Canada under the provisions of peace, order and good government.

Mr. BENNETT: I may say I agree wholly and entirely with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MANION: I do not think the remarks of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) should be allowed to pass without a reply from myself. The statement which he quoted from Lord Ashfield was an ordinary business comment referring to the transportation system of the city of London, England; it no more referred to the transportation problem of Canada than it did to the canals on Mars.

Mr. GRAY: It showed his views.

Mr. MANION: He was speaking in ordinary business terms. As a matter of fact, Lord Ashfield has done extraordinary work for the government of England and at the present moment is regarded as close to being a government representative in connection with the transportation work in that country.

I referred to the commission in order to complete my statement, but I made no reference to the ideas of its members in regard to public or private ownership. I tell the committee quite frankly that I have no idea as to the feelings of the members in this regard. Mr. Loree has been quoted before, and it might be naturally concluded that he would tend toward private ownership because for many years he has been the head of a fairly large privately owned railway company. But on the other hand, as I pointed out earlier in the evening, Professor Walter Murray is an openly avowed public ownership man. I know nothing whatever as to the feelings of the rest of the members. Sir Joseph Flavelle was quoted by a previous speaker as being a private ownership man. As a matter of fact, Sir Joseph for some years was a member of the board of the old Grand Trunk Railway, appointed by the government of that day. I do not remember at the moment just which government it was that appointed him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Union government.

Mr. MANION: That government was made up of very good Conservatives and very good Liberals, so that he was appointed by a combination of both.

These men, outstanding in the business and professional world, were selected as a royal commission to deal with the railway problem of Canada. I doubt whether a more outstanding or abler commission has ever been appointed in this country.

Mr. HEAPS: Why was not a labour man appointed?

Mr. MANION: For the same reason that an agriculturist was not appointed—there was no attempt to have class representation on the commission. If that was to be considered I think it must be admitted that agriculture, which supplies a large proportion of the freight of the railways, should have been represented before labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They should have been; why were they not?

Mr. MANION: Simply because it is not necessary that every class in Canada should be represented on every commission appointed. The commission was very representative, and I am sure it will give a fair deal not only to labour and to agriculture but to all other classes in Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not agree with the hon. minister when he says that this is not a class commission. I should say that men like Sir Joseph Flavelle, Mr. Loree and Lord Ashfield certainly represent a particular class in the community.

Mr. MANION: What about the other members?

Mr. HEAPS: I am not familiar with the other members. I submit that a representative of labour should have been appointed to this commission. If the government wanted to bring someone from England, there were other men besides Lord Ashfield who possessed a very thorough understanding of transportation. I have in mind a former Minister of Transport, Mr. Herbert Morrison, who was a member of the cabinet of the Labour government. This gentleman knows as much about transportation as any man in England. If it was thought necessary to bring Lord Ashfield from England, I think another man like Mr. Herbert Morrison should have been brought also to represent the other viewpoint in that country. I contend that the viewpoint of labour should have been represented on this commission. I do not think it was necessary to go outside of this country to find men who understand the railway situation. We have quite capable men in Canada, and if a representative of labour and agriculture had been on the commission it would have been able to give a better interpretation of the Canadian viewpoint.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Maloney in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1932, the sum of $1,059,474.33 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 39, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1932.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, April 4, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton) (for Mr. Ralston):

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton) (for Mr. Ralston) moved:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with respect to that portion of the motion which calls for the production of papers in the possession of the Civil Service Commission, perhaps it will be within the memory of the house that the extent of our jurisdiction to order the production of papers from that body has not been definitely decided. With the understanding that such papers as the commission may furnish the government will be laid upon the table, there is no objection to the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the reservation made by the Prime Minister the motion will carry.

Motion agreed to.

IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It was suggested the other day that the newspaper report to which reference had been made, indicating that a certain attitude might be taken by the Dominion government with regard to the proposed economic conference, was similar to despatches appearing in at least two or three other newspapers. I have taken the trouble to secure the report appearing in the Toronto Star, as well as the reports appearing in the Toronto Telegram and the Montreal Daily Herald, and I find a very substantial difference between the reports in these several papers.

The article in the Montreal Herald is by Robert Lipsett, special correspondent of the Montreal Herald, and it does not give the views that are attributed to the government in the report appearing in the Toronto Star. The article in the Toronto Telegram is very short, and in neither the Telegram nor the Herald does the report appear under a large headline, as is the case in the Toronto Star. In the issue of the Star of March 29 this article has a very important place. There is also a very vital difference in the substance of the reports, the one indicating the possibility of a boycott, while no such indication appears in the other reports.

Apparently there may have been a common foundation for these reports, but whether in the process of transmission to the several newspapers the reports were altered I cannot say, but at least they do not appear the same in their printed form. I have endeavoured to ascertain the source of the information but I cannot speak with any degree of certainty as to the source from which it emanated.

OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): With respect to the Imperial economic conference, may I ask whether the Prime Minister would consider setting apart, at the convenience of the government, a day for the purpose of discussing matters pertaining to the conference. If one or two days were set apart for that purpose I believe it would meet the wishes of all sides of the house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There is an item in the estimates for an appropriation to defray the expenses of the conference, and it occurred to me that this might offer an opportunity for a very full discussion by the house. If it took a longer or a shorter time than might at present be contemplated, it would be quite all right. It would perhaps be inadvisable to set aside a day, but opportunity will be afforded to take as much time as might be desired for the purpose of discussing every aspect of the conference, upon that vote being considered by the house. We shall make special arrangements to endeavour to meet that view.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is wholly satisfactory provided my right hon. friend will see that the item is not brought on too late in the session.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in the main estimates.

THE BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he is in a position to make an announcement as to the day on which he will bring down the budget?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The budget will be brought down on Wednesday.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) is not in his place but the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) is, and since I was last in the house an announcement has appeared in the press that a protective committee of the holders of second mortgage debentures of the Beauharnois Power Company Limited has been appointed. I believe that notice is appearing in the press throughout Canada. I have made certain inquiries and pending a thorough understanding of just what is involved I will not make a statement to the house. It is undesirable to make a statement that does not embrace every feature of the present position so far as it is possible to ascertain it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask whether the Prime Minister expects that statement to be delayed for some time?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think it should be delayed a very long time, but there are certain legal positions now arising that will necessitate very careful consideration, and the government has instructed that the information be obtained as soon as possible. I suppose the hon. gentleman is under no misapprehension as to what the position was. The debentures, so-called, of the Beauharnois Power Company, are secured by a trust deed, and the security for these debentures is the shares of stock of the Beauharnois Light, Heat & Power Company, and of certain other subsidiaries, and until such time as there is a clear understanding of just what the financial implications of the present default and the appointment of the committee may be, I do not care to make a statement that might be misunderstood.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MERCHANDISE CLASS RATES BETWEEN CHURCHILL AND PRAIRIE DESTINATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question which I wish to direct to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). There was a meeting of the Saskatchewan traffic council at Moose Jaw on March 22, when two resolutions were unanimously passed, one requesting the Minister of Railways to publish, for use between Churchill and prairie destinations, merchandise class rates of eighty-five per cent of the standard prairie mileage freight tariff, the other being a request that the Canadian National Railways publish the same rates forthwith. May I ask the Minister of Railways what action if any he intends to take on these two important resolutions.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): These resolutions have been sent to me and also copies of resolutions by various organizations in the western country. For a considerable time now I have been urging the Canadian National Railways to deal with this matter. My hon. friend knows, of course, that we do not make rates in this house, nor does the Minister of Railways; rates are made by the managements of the railways, subject, of course, to consideration by the Board of Railway Commissioners. They are working at them quite assiduously but there are some difficult questions that have to be considered, and it may be some time yet—not long, I trust, because I am urging them to do it at once—before they are able to publish a statement of rates to be put into force. I have been urging them to do this as early as possible, and in fact within the last few days I have taken the matter up again with Sir Henry Thornton and asked him to impress upon his officers the importance of early action. My deputy, also, has been working on my behalf for several weeks on the question, and I hope it will be done in the near future.

Mr. McINTOSH: I thank the minister for his pointed reply.

EMPLOYEES AT TRANSCONA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I wish to ask the Minister of Railways a question based on a telegram which I have received from the citizens of the town of Transcona, stating that, according to current reports, there will be a twenty per cent layoff of Canadian National employees at that point. I assume it is generally known that Transcona is the site of Canadian National shops. There are between seven and eight hundred employees at that point, and this layoff will be a serious matter. I venture to say that these employees will have to seek relief through the ordinary relief channels if they are laid off at the present time. The question

I wish to ask the Minister of Railways is this: Has he any knowledge of this matter; has the movement by any chance been instituted by the government and, if not, will the government use its best endeavours to see that it is not put into effect?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): My hon. friend no doubt knows that the government has nothing whatever to do with the taking-on or laying-off of men by the Canadian National Railways; that is an entirely administrative function of the management over which we have no control. I have been carrying around in my pocket for the past few days a telegram which I sent to Winnipeg with reference to the matter. This telegram explains our position. While my hon. friend was putting his question I took the telegram out of my pocket and perhaps it might be well to read it in order to put our position before this house and the country:

Regarding your inquiry as to rumoured lay-off of men in Canadian National shops I assure you this matter has been giving myself and my colleagues grave concern. Conferences have been held with the Canadian National management—

That is, by myself.

—who are by act of parliament in complete control of administration of the railways, including, of course, all dealings with the employees and their unions. The management agreed to keep as many men at work as possible considering the continually decreasing earnings of the railways, and they have been discussing the whole matter for some days in Montreal with the representatives of the men with whom they have agreements.

This was sent some days ago when the conferences were on.

Management assure me that they have cut down the proposed temporary layoff very materially, in fact to absolute minimum because of fact that men agreed to lessened time per week spread out over the employees in the shops. They state that they have kept on the maximum number of men for whom they have any work whatsoever to do. In this regard the management tell me that the representatives of the men's unions insist on seniority prevailing according to their agreements. Management inform me they are putting out complete explanatory statement through press to-day or Monday.

That was on Friday, and on Saturday they did put out a statement. It appeared in the press, but in some papers it was merely a synopsis, while in others it was complete. There came to my office to-day, with reference to this matter, some returned soldiers from Winnipeg, and I directed them to the management at Montreal, whom I requested to give these men an interview and to give their representations every consideration, because I thought they had a good case. This is a matter which is entirely in the hands of the management and not under our control, and while, as Minister of Railways, I have endeavoured to have the management handle the situation as carefully as possible, in view of unemployment conditions, the management ultimately are in a position to do exactly as they see fit.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

The house resumed from March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Guthrie for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heenan.

Mr. F. R. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): When the house rose at eleven o'clock on March 1, I was directing my attention to the motion now before the house. I was explaining to the house how timber permits had been given to a firm in Prince Albert, friends of the right hon. gentleman. I stated that in all some sixty-four permits had been given by the late government to this firm, in each instance the timber being listed as fire-killed. The regulations provide that fire-killed timber pays only 50 per cent of the royalty paid for standing green timber. I was reading into the record certain information which had come to me, and I shall continue with my quotations. I hold in my hand an affidavit made at St. Walburg on March 10, 1931, by Alex. Wilson of Glenbogie, a farmer. It reads as follows:

I am a farmer residing at Glenbogie and have been employed during the past two years in taking out railway ties for Hett & Sibbald Limited, and have personal knowledge of the matters herein deposed to.

That none of the railway ties removed by me for the above mentioned Hett & Sibbald Limited were fire-killed jack pine ties.

That all the said jack pine railway ties were green and were made from green timber.

That all dues charged to me by the said Hett & Sibbald Limited, for all ties made and delivered by me were at the rate of five cents per tie, whether grading number three, number two or number one.

I received the following letter dated March 24, 1931, from Mr. I. N. Cave of St. Walburg. It reads:

Pursuant to your request for information concerning the operations of Hett & Sibbald in the timber areas north of St. Walburg, I am pleased to give the following information:

I am a timber cruiser and tie operator during the past three years and have had considerable experience in cruising timber and estimating the value of standing timber on crown lands. I think I can speak with as much certainty as any man in northern Saskatchewan as to the timbers I have cruised.

The whole township 64, range 25, west of the third meridian has been inspected by me and is green timber. It is unsurveyed and I state positively that the timber is not fire-killed.

And further:

I know and personally inspected the west half and N.E. of 12, W. half and N.E. 13-62-25-W-3. This timber is not fire-killed but on the contrary is good green jack pine suitable for railway ties.

I trust this information is what you require.

I have also a letter from Mr. Fred McKenzie, Dominion land inspector at North Battleford. This letter refers to timber permit number 5068 which comprises some seven and three quarters square miles, and is one of the permits to which I have already referred. The letter reads:

I beg to report having inspected the above lands as to the timber thereon. These areas consist of a scattered cut of fire-killed jack pine and spruce situated on the north side of Pierce lake, Saskatchewan. As over 50 per cent of this timber is fire-killed or will die as a direct result of fire, I would recommend that it be disposed of under section 47 of the timber regulations, before it becomes a loss.

I have another letter from the same gentleman dated North Battleford, March 17, 1930, referring to timber permit 5069 which comprises some six and three-quarters square miles. Mr. McKenzie states that the timber therein was fire-killed, while these other gentlemen state it was not. I desire to continue to read from the evidence from which I was quoting when the house adjourned on March 1. I quote as follows from the examination for discovery by Mr. Reed of Mr. Sibbald, taken at Battleford on February 18:

Q. How is it that Marshall got a contract for ten thousand ties last December?

A. As I said before in the year 1930-31 on account of this unemployment situation they have let all kinds of small contracts.

His Lordship: I understood that was limited to one thousand?

A. The contracts to settlers is limited to a thousand.

Q. Nevertheless why should the Canadian National divert from their policy and take Marshall's contract or anybody else's contract rather than yours?

A. We still have our contract but they have been giving them to a great number of settlers. I think there are thirty contracts in the province of Saskatchewan to-day. This is the first year they have got away from it, and they say it is on account of the unemployment situation. Mr. Merkley, the Minister of Labour, made some arrangements with the Canadian National Railways with a view to relieving the unemployment situation and the matter is in his hands. He I think has a great deal to say about it, and it is under that general policy—

Mr. Reed:

Q. You know Sam Ferrie?

A. Yes.

Q. He had a contract for 50,000 in 1927-28?

A. Yes.

Q. You remember Ernest Atkinson had 50,000 in 1924 or 1925?

A. He may have. As I said before, we have only had control since 1925; several people had contracts until then.

They have had control only since 1925. The evidence continues:

Q. During that time from 1925 until last fall did the Canadian National Railways let any contract in northern Saskatchewan except through you?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. What about Sam Ferrie?

A. Sam Ferrie got a contract but when it was brought to their attention it was cancelled immediately. It was brought to the attention of Mr. Dunning and Mr. Ferrie's contract was cancelled.

I understand Mr. Ferrie was the campaign manager for the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh).

Mr. McINTOSH: No, he was not.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): That is the information I have.

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member's information is wrong, like a lot of the stuff he is putting out.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): It is very strange that with the great influence of the hon. member for North Battleford, Mr. Ferrie, his campaign manager, could not hold his contract.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think the hon. member should take that back; the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) denies the statement.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): When the natural resources were turned over to the provincial government of Saskatchewan I understand a royalty of five cents was being paid for these ties, but in the first year since that time I understand the royalty amounts to some eighteen cents. In the fall of 1929 and the spring of 1930 these people received contracts from the railway for 250,000 ties; they delivered 501,000, for which they were paid $380,000. My point is that had the settlers been given the opportunity to supply these ties to the railway they would have been in better condition to-day. Probably a lot of this timber which was rated as fire-killed should not have been rated in that manner.

The people in this part of the country would not be in their present condition had they been able to have had contracts with the railway for the supplying of ties.

Mr. VALLANCE: How is the present government handling it?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): This government has nothing to do with it.

Mr. MANION: The railway bought so many ties before we came into power that none are needed at the present time.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): My hon. friend knows that the control of the natural resources now rests with the provincial government, and they control this business. He also knows that owing to the situation in which the national railways find themselves at present, they will not need any more ties for a long time to come. This is the manner in which our natural resources, the trust that the late government held for the people of Saskatchewan, were administered by them. I was glad to note that the former Minister of Interior, (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton), the other day suggested that some examination or investigation of this matter should be made by the provincial government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I concur heartily with him in that. It should be done in the interest of peace, order and good government in this country. I have talked to fire rangers in that section, and may I say to the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh)—and this is largely in his constituency—I am told by these men that the bush has been left in a deplorable condition. I am told that trees, sometimes three feet at the stump, would be felled and as the stump was too big for a tie, that big piece of timber was left to rot away. They cut the slash and let it lie where it fell; they did not try to burn it, and thus there is a great fire hazard in that part of my hon. friend's constituency. I thought my hon. friend would be much more concerned than he is about the interests of those he represents.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): While I concur in the suggestion for an investigation, if that investigation is held, my hon. friend will not find his statement upheld.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I can only say to the hon. gentleman that this statement was made to me by men who were in his department when he was minister.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, and I know the employees who made it.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): What are their names?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall give them when the time comes. There were two of them.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): The matter can be very easily established as regards permits 5068 and 5069. It is supposed to be fire-killed timber. They are both standing monuments to the mistake that was made by someone because it is green timber.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is it not true the two individuals he mentioned who had contracts were responsible people? Can the amounts about which my hon. friend is complaining not be recovered from them?

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I am not so much concerned about the contractors; I am concerned about the manner in which the timber was rated as fire-killed when it was not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the very thing my hon. friend can prove by having an investigation so as to have the amount recovered from them.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Yes, but that is not up to the contractors; it is up to the Minister of the Interior of the late government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I shall have a word or two to say about that.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): That is all I have to say in connection with that matter. Before I sit down I should like to say a word about the riches of that great area of northern Saskatchewan. Last year we sent up from our city to that area some forty-two families who were on the unemployed list. We financed them to some extent, and I am glad to say that forty of the forty-two families will remain in that area, and that they are doing exceptionally well.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is because the government has a good member.

Mr. McINTOSH: They have not a railway built there yet.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Had the railway not been constructed for political reasons and to serve my hon. friend's interests, they might have had it.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is buncombe.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I want to read the following letter:

Loon Lake, Sask.,
October 1, 1931.

You can see that we are still on the map. Last night was the first time I had to write since being up here as the evenings are getting short—but talk about work! From daylight to dark, and moonlight.

Sure, it is great! When working for oneself it is a pleasure. We have got things comfortable. The cabin, or mansion, is a kitchen, dining-room, sitting-room, combined, with a nice big pantry, also good sized bedroom and clothes closet.

Last week I built an addition to it, 8 x 15, joining the kitchen which I have piled up with wood so the wife don't have to keep running outside every time she needs some. Have also built a chicken house, have nothing to go in it as yet. Cleared about 12 acres of land ready for breaking. Built a rail corral about 500 feet square, also a well. I am starting to get logs out for a pig pen and barn. Of course it will take longer than it should to build the barn, etc., as I have to pack most of the logs on my back, so don't know how I will make out at present, but will never say die. As far as the wife and I are concerned, we say the government will never have this homestead again, as I have no fear it will all turn out all right. We will never starve up here. I shoot an average of two or three partridge, ruffed grouse, chicken and ducks. There are quite a few deer and moose. They come within a hundred yards of the house but I have not anything big enough to knock them down with.

I read that letter just for this reason: in the three cities of Saskatchewan, Regina, Moosejaw and Saskatoon, we have a scheme whereby, with the assistance of the provincial and Dominion governments—and I hope the Dominion government will see its way clear to assist us in this connection—we propose to take these 2,000 unemployed families up to that country which is represented by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh). The cities have agreed to contribute $100; the province has agreed to contribute $100 and we are asking the Dominion government to contribute $100 also, making a total of $300 a family so that these people may be put to productive work whereby they can earn their living. I think a scheme of that kind should commend itself to the government, and I hope the government will see their way clear to assist in that respect.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): About a month ago, I think it was on March 1, I listened to the harangue of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan). I have listened again to-day to his diatribe concerning something about which his knowledge is zero, and I think now that he has exploded and handed to parliament all that is on his chest, it is about time I said something. I should like to add some truth to the falsehoods that have been uttered, because from first to last I do not think the hon. member knows a solitary thing about what he has been talking. Before I go fully into the subject, may I draw the attention of the house to the opening remark of my hon. friend when he said on March 1:

I desire as the representative of a constituency in Saskatchewan—

One would imagine from the attitude of the hon. member since coming into this chamber, instead of being a representative of a Saskatchewan riding, he is more of a delegate for the Tory party. His attitude in the house has from time to time been that of an interrupter, a scowler, a scorner, and insolent interrupter and grunter.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I rise to a point of order. I think that is unparliamentary language.

Mr. McINTOSH: He is posing as a kind of political uplifter. I would suggest if he intends to do any uplifting, he should commence in his own backyard and in his own party.

Mr. SPEAKER: Did the hon. member refer to another member as a coward?

Mr. McINTOSH: No, I said he was prone to be speechless—a grunter—and so he is.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hardly think that is a proper word to use.

Mr. McINTOSH: Well, it is the best I can choose for the occasion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member says that he used the word "grunter" in referring to another hon. member. That is unparliamentary and improper, and I ask him to withdraw the word.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. McINTOSH: Give me time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do it now. I ask the hon. member to withdraw that word.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am willing to withdraw it, Mr. Speaker, if you will give me the opportunity.

Mr. ROWE: Withdraw. It is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to withdraw the word.

Mr. McINTOSH: If you would give me the opportunity to do so, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to withdraw the word "grunter" as applied to another hon. member of this house. It is impolite, and unparliamentary.

Mr. McINTOSH: If Mr. Speaker says the word is not parliamentary I quite willingly withdraw it, and I might, as suggested, perhaps say instead that the hon. member is a "squealer."

Mr. SPEAKER: That word is not parliamentary. The hon. member must not use any such rude epithets at all. It does not add to the weight of his argument nor to the dignity of parliament, and I would ask him to desist from the practice.

Mr. McINTOSH: I quite agree, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. gentleman opposite was the first to start it a month ago, and why did not you call him to order?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is incorrect in that. No such epithets were used in my hearing.

Mr. McINTOSH: His insinuations were even worse. He may get away with such insinuations against others, but not as far as I am concerned. The hon. member on the first of March told us how he was representing a Saskatchewan riding. As I said, I thought he was representing the Tory party better than he was representing his own riding. A little further on he said that he thanked the government for the sympathetic manner in which they had come to the assistance of the people in the province of Saskatchewan. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think we can leave it to the people of Saskatchewan to say how the present government has come to their aid. We have to-day the farmers of Saskatchewan on the dole, we have them giving hundreds of promissory notes and liens on their crops and farms which they will not be able to pay off for years hence, and if any hon. member of this house from any part of Saskatchewan can get up and sincerely thank the government for aiding the people in that way, for getting on the people's backs, he is welcome to do it, but I will not be a party to thanking them for any such thing.

A little further on the hon. member spoke about the problem of unemployment. He has spoken of unemployment in his last two addresses, but he will not admit that when his own party came into power there were only a little over one hundred thousand unemployed in this country, but that by October of that same year the number had increased to over two hundred thousand, and the number of unemployed in this country to-day is over five hundred thousand. What did the hon. member say about the problem of unemployment? He now tells parliament and the country that the unemployment problem is an international and dominion problem, but during the election campaign in 1930, he and his party said that it was a national problem and that the Liberals were responsible for the unemployment then prevailing in the country. Now that hon. gentlemen opposite are in power they say that the problem is an international one. Now we have this pigmy wizard coming along, and telling us that it is an international problem and a national problem. This is another new combination to explain the situation.

A little further on in his address the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) quoted a letter from W. L. McQuarrie, of the Retail Merchants' Association, to show that the retail merchants were satisfied with the attitude of this government. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that the speech of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) fully explains the situation in that regard. Speaking in this house not long ago the hon. member for Melville accurately described the conditions in Saskatchewan under the present relief commission. He told us that he lives in municipality 186 where there is one supervisor and nine relief officers in the municipality, and in order to show the political nature of the organization he told us that nine of these officers were Conservatives and one was a Liberal. In other words, the party of my hon. friend opposite came into office and scrapped the organization of the rural municipalities which would have looked after the administration of relief in a non-political way, and they put in its place a straight political machine, and then my hon. friend from Saskatoon has the audacity to come into this house and tell us that relief is being well administered in the province of Saskatchewan. I say that it is not. I say that it is being administered politically, and so long as that is the case anyone who can read between the lines can tell what the results will be—money squandered, farmers on the dole, the giving of promissory notes and liens that will not be paid off for a generation.

A little further on my hon. friend from Saskatoon referred to the constituency of North Battleford and said, "I have listened many a time." I am glad that he is a good listener, because that is all he has been up to the present time. He has certainly not been much of a speaker and he has refused on more than one occasion to stand up for the rights of the people of Saskatchewan or the people of western Canada. So I am very pleased to know that he is a listener—something at all events. Then, referring to myself, he said that I was greatly concerned about who voted for me in my riding. Well, Mr. Speaker, if there is a member of parliament who does not care who voted for him, I am the man. As long as I get a vote I do not care where it comes from, and the hon. gentleman certainly does not know his man when he talks like that. It does not matter to me whether a vote comes from the country, a village, a town or city—wherever it comes from it is as good as the bank. I am very glad to get it, whatever its legitimate source.

The hon. member went on to say that the vote that I got was not a vote of the urban centres, but was largely a vote of the people in the country back of North Battleford. I have the returns here of the last federal election, giving the figures with respect to my hon. friend's riding and my own, and we will find out exactly how the thing stands. In the North Battleford federal riding there are 170 polls, of which 56 are urban and 114 rural. Of the rural polls the Liberal candidate, that is myself, carried 88, and the Tory candidate, a camouflaged candidate, carried 19—19 out of 114—and the other candidate, a radical, carried 7. Of the polls largely urban in nature the Liberal candidate carried 30, the Conservative candidate 24, and the radical candidate 2. Summing up we find that the Liberal candidate carried 118 out of 170 polls, the underground Conservative candidate, about whom my hon. friend is doing so much blowing, only carried 43 polls, and the other candidate carried 9 polls. There were five polls which had an equal vote between the Liberal candidate and the camouflaged Tory candidate; by that I mean a man who was a Tory and ran as a farmer to capture the agricultural vote. But he did not get the farm vote. The farmers were too wise. Of these 118 polls three were equally divided between the radical candidate and myself. So the Liberal candidate carried 113 polls out and out against the Conservative candidate, and 115 against the third candidate.

The majority over the Conservative candidate was 1,095, if I remember correctly, and the majority over the third candidate was 4,920. In 1925 the majority of your humble servant, Mr. Speaker, was over 1,500 in a three party contest, and in 1926, with a straight Tory in the field and a straight Liberal, my majority was over 3,000. And the majority, with only a Conservative and a Liberal in the field in 1930, would again have been in the thousands.

Now let us go into the riding of my hon. friend from Saskatoon. What do we find? In the Saskatoon federal riding there are 160 polls, of which 47 are rural. Hon. members will notice that the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) wanted to lambaste the country people; he wanted to make out that the rural vote was not as good as the urban vote. Here is the reason: Of the 47 rural polls my hon. friend was well licked in 35. Eleven polls he carried, and in one the vote was even. In the rural area of the Saskatoon riding he was beaten by approximately 1,000 votes, beaten by the men and women who had done business with him for fifteen or twenty years in a merchandising way. He was beaten by people who know him better than the city people, beaten by men and women who had been in and out of his store for years and years. That is the standing of my hon. friend in the country part of the Saskatoon federal riding. In the city, by false propaganda, by a deliberate attempt to blame unemployment on the Liberal party, and by playing in a way which was anything but manly he managed to secure a majority. That is the standing of my hon. friend in his own riding—the rural part.

I should like to indicate his position in the city of Saskatoon. When on my way to Ottawa at the latter end of January I happened to go into the Saskatoon union station, and there met a business man. He said, "Well, Mac., are you going down to Ottawa?" I said, "Yes; where is your man? Has he gone?" He said, "It does not matter whether he goes or not; he is better in Saskatoon than he is in Ottawa." Then a little later I dropped into a restaurant and met another business man with whom I discussed the political situation. I said, "What about F. R.; how is he getting along?" He said, "Oh, he is the worst member we ever had." Of course I could not at the time contradict that statement, because I hardly knew whether or not it was true. Later I went into the King George hotel before returning to the station and got into conversation with a third business man concerning the political situation in Canada, and I said, "How is my friend Mr. MacMillan standing in the city of Saskatoon?" He said, "Oh, no good." I said, "What do you mean; you will elect him next time, will you not?" In reply he said, "No, he will not have a chance at all in the next election in Saskatoon." That is his standing in the city of Saskatoon, and I have defined his position in the rural community by giving the votes cast. I leave it to hon. members to conclude the worth of the hon. member opposite who has been attempting to show that he is a wonderful man from the west. I will leave to the judgment of my hon. friends the position held by the hon. member for Saskatoon.

May I go a little farther. In his speech he said that no company but a certain firm in Prince Albert could get a tie contract, and that that was the only company which had a chance on any permits or any Canadian National railways contracts. I claim Mr. Speaker, that that statement is absolutely false, and I have gathered evidence from the riding to prove that there is not a word of truth in it. For instance, when I became member in 1925 many people in the riding said, "We would like to get contracts for making ties; we can get the wood, we can secure the timber, we can arrange for fire-killed areas, and we think we should have as good an opportunity to make ties in the winter time and make some extra money as any others in the riding, or outside of the riding, so far as that is concerned." I said, "I am with you. As far as I am concerned I think every man in my riding should have a chance to make some of these ties, if he can produce the goods at a competitive rate, and in a manner to satisfy the Canadian National Railways." As a result I wrote the authorities and said, "When your next timber berth is up for sale, when you have more timber limits to put up at auction, I want the notices to be published in every part of the riding of North Battleford." Up to that time the notices had been limited to the larger cities in Saskatoon, North Battleford and Prince Albert. I said, "I want them in every post office in my riding, so that all people may have a square deal, so far as getting a chance at timber limits and making ties are concerned." So that was done, and the result was that men with smaller credit and smaller means came forward and tried to get some of these contracts. One man actually got a contract for 40,000 or 50,000 ties, I am not sure which. He went to Montreal. To prove there is no truth whatsoever in the statement that the Canadian National Railways wanted to give the contracts to one firm and one firm only, Mr. Ferrie went to Montreal in a businesslike way and talked the matter over with officials of the Canadian National Railways. They said, "Why, by all means; if you can make the ties we want, if you can produce them at a competitive rate and if you can deliver the goods we are quite willing to give you a contract." And they gave him a contract.

Now, he had a contract, but he did not have any timber limits from which to make the contract good. So the next timber berth sale was advertised throughout the whole of the North Battleford riding in accordance with my departmental suggestion. An auction sale was held for the first time in North Battleford, and it was held as a result of my request for it. At the auction sale Mr. Ferrie bid. What was the result? He got lost in the bidding, that is all. They bid the timber limits away beyond what he could pay, and the result was that he did not get them. He could not fill the contract, and not only Mr. Ferrie but all other small contractors felt the effects. They had not the money or the bank credit. They may have had experience and ability, but without money and credit they were not able to do anything. I must say the work was let, as usual, to the company with the equipment, the experience, the first class reputation, the credit and the money. That is the situation exactly. Any man who makes a different statement is not telling the truth. Statements which have been made have been made in ignorance of timber limits and operations. As I said, I am having irrefutable evidence brought forward to prove my contention, and at a later time I hope to put it on record.

May I say a word or two respecting Charles F. Marshall. Well do I know Charles F. Marshall. Here was a man who held a position under the crown as postmaster at Spruce Lake. From the return I have before me I understand he got the position in 1923. I was not at that time a member, and was not responsible for making him postmaster; I am glad I was not. On June 6, 1927, he resigned. What did he do? He decided to move from Spruce Lake back to the land of the stars and stripes, from whence he came. What did he do to get back? He had not much money or much credit. He secured the services of an assistant for the period of a month, and at the end of that time he sold the post office building, the lot and the post office to the assistant, I understand, away beyond their proper values and then skedaddled to the United States. That is the man whom I often befriended and who later came back and became one of the Tory ward politicians in North Battleford federal riding. His affidavit does not mean anything; if he took a hundred of them, people would not believe him. That is the situation so far as Mr. Marshall is concerned. I claim he took money under false pretences when he did what he did. He is still working for the Tory party in Saskatchewan, and giving affidavits to my hon. friend from Saskatoon who apparently is badly in need of them.

Then, we have another man here—another Marshall. They are not brothers, but they might as well be, so far as that is concerned. This other Marshall of business profits tax delinquency reputation makes an affidavit in which he tells about certain timber limits. I want to say that for this man Marshall to take an affidavit against Sibbald who had frequently protected him was one of the most dastardly tricks ever done by any man.

What are the facts? They are that this man, who was a painter, had to get out of North Battleford. He went north, and is still there. He went into the store business; time and again he was almost bankrupt, owing his wholesalers and other people large sums of money, and if it had not been for the contracts he got from Hett and Sibbald he would have been driven to the wall financially. Yet, after being saved from the financial gallows through tie contract after tie contract, that man comes forward and, in order to build up Tory propaganda in Saskatchewan, maliciously gives an affidavit which is said by those who know the facts to be a complete falsehood from the first line to the last. I should like to support what was said by my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart); I should like to see this tie question in Saskatchewan investigated to the hilt. Further I would say that my hon. friend can get an investigation started immediately by getting in touch with the provincial government, which now owns the resources in Saskatchewan. Let him bring on this investigation; let him find out the men who are straight and the men who are crooked, and he will find that all the crooks if any are on his side of the political fence. This man Marshall has been doing work for the present government, and Hett and Sibbald have done work for this government and the provincial government with regard to unemployment relief. As I understand it, there was no publicity; there was no competition. The contracts were handed over holus bolus, without regard for the public interest. That is the situation under the present order of things.

I should like to refer to the stand taken by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) in 1930. The hon. member compared the urban and rural votes in the riding of North Battleford. When the election campaign was on in 1930, according to a statement of Doctor A. MacGillivray Young of Saskatoon, my hon. friend's opponent, as reported in the Leader-Post, Regina, July 17, 1930, the hon. gentleman did his level best to secure the Mennonite vote in the riding of Saskatoon. He and his political machine promised grants to the Mennonite schools and hinted that land under the control of the province would be parcelled out to the Mennonites if they would break away from their former political faith with the Liberal party and support the Conservatives. My hon. friend was supported by the provincial government; both did their best to get the Mennonites to change their vote. In one case, in the Gruenthal school, the provincial government promised a special grant of $1,000 for the salary of the teacher and $500 for school equipment for a second room of the same school in another building, while in another case they promised free school seats. In other words they were out to buy those votes; they were also trying to besmirch the Liberal party in the eyes of the Mennonites.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the statement the hon. gentleman is now making is entirely without foundation.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT

AMENDMENT TO MOTION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Guthrie for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Heenan.

Mr. McINTOSH: When the Senate interrupted my address—and I do not know what I ever did to the Senate to have them do that to me—I was dealing with the attempts which were being made by my hon. friend from Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan), hand in hand with the Tory organization of the province of Saskatchewan, to break up the Mennonite vote for the Liberal party in the Saskatoon riding.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): The hon gentleman implies that I used any ability I had in order to get the provincial government to use provincial funds to manipulate Mennonite votes in my constituency. I had nothing whatever to do with the Mennonite vote, so far as schools are concerned. That statement is entirely false.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a matter of controversy between the hon. members.

Mr. McINTOSH: The truth will come out. I did not say that the provincial government used public funds. I said that special grants were made to certain Mennonite school districts. These grants were for teachers' salaries and for school equipment, and in one case free desks were promised a certain school district. We have it on the word of the municipal secretary, C. R. Lane, of Warman, that this was not a municipal question and that the secretary attended a certain meeting at Warman but was there only for informative purposes. It was absolutely an attempt to influence the Mennonite vote to support my hon. friend on July 28 in the city of Saskatoon. No question about it.

Let me go further. My friend went out of his way to make it appear that the Liberal party had insulted the Mennonites. He was becoming a friend of the Mennonites, a sort of knight-gown friend of the Mennonites all at once, and his only solicitude for the Mennonites was their vote. Consequently he got out a poster, accusing Dr. Young and the Liberals of insulting his dear little Mennonites. What was the result? The Mennonites who were said to have been thus treated drew up a petition in the Osler school district. There were 148 who signed that petition to the effect that the tactics of my hon. friend and of the organization that helped to elect him were antagonistic to their ideals and absolutely contrary to their conception of citizenship. More than that, may I say that the provincial government made an attempt to defend their actions in regard to supporting my hon. friend by saying that they were dealing municipally with this question, that it was not simply a problem of giving school grants to get the Mennonite vote. That, however, is absolutely repudiated by the evidence of the secretary of Warman municipality. He said that he did not attend that meeting as municipal secretary, and that at the meeting mentioned these questions were not municipal but had reference to school matters and school matters only. Let me read what is stated by Mr. Boldt, who signed the petition with 147 others in Osler. This is what he has to say with reference to my hon. friend's tactics:

> On the other hand, we resent bitterly the tactics used by F. R. MacMillan in his efforts to secure votes.

He knew what the hon. gentleman and his party were doing. Let me show with what success the hon. member met in his attempt to split the Mennonite vote for his dear little Conservative party. In one poll in Osler he was defeated by 65 to 42 votes. That shows his standing in that poll. In another poll in Osler, he was defeated by 55 to 44. At Miller, he was defeated by 106 to 22; at Peters, he was defeated by 104 to 19; at Mennon, he was defeated by 114 to 18; at Hepburn, he was defeated by 168 to 44; at Smithburg, he was defeated by 75 to 23; at Hochcfeld, he was defeated by 110 to 14; at Hague, he was defeated by 54 to 45; and at Ademuka, he was defeated by 73 to 22. At Gruenthal, the hon. gentleman had the very slight majority of 4, the votes being 48 in his favour and 44 in favour of his opponent. In this poll, where a dastardly attempt was made to break up the Mennonite vote by school grant pressure, that was the meagre majority he received. Had not that attempt been made, he would have been beaten overwhelmingly in that poll as in the others.

Now there is the story. That shows what success the hon. gentleman met with notwithstanding that he and his organization did their very best to break up the vote in favour of the Tory party. But the people there were not the fools they were in Saskatoon; they saw what the hon. gentleman was trying to do and they voted accordingly.

The man who made these inspections in the North Battleford federal riding was a Mr. McKenzie. Mr. McKenzie was a follower of the party of my hon. friend—a Conservative. But I'm told he is not any more. He has had his fill. He has made all the timber inspections since 1923 in the North Battleford federal riding and my hon. friend is being placed before the house and the country in this position: he is stating that one of his own timber inspectors does not know how to inspect timber; that he inspected it falsely and did this in order to see that one firm got the business and that the Canadian National Railways and the Department of the Interior were not playing absolutely fair with the farmers in the riding who could handle this work. That is what it means. Personally I am loath to accept one of these wild statements.

Before I close I desire to put on Hansard a letter received from Hett & Sibbald, Limited. It reads:

142 Bloor Street West,
Toronto, March 5, 1932.

The Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, C.M.G., Leader of the Opposition,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

The writer's attention has been drawn to certain statements made by Mr. MacMillan, M.P. for Saskatoon, in the House of Commons on the 1st of March this year.

It would appear that Mr. MacMillan aimed to cast a slur upon the name of the firm of Hett & Sibbald, Limited, and as his inferences differ so much from the actual truth, we wish to put before you, sir, as member for Prince Albert, some facts bearing on Mr. MacMillan's criticisms.

Referring, I presume, to our firm, as our name is definitely mentioned in certain letters he read, Mr. MacMillan says: " . . . and it is a strange thing that no one but this particular firm could obtain a permit to cut timber in northern Saskatchewan;" he follows with: "it is also a strange thing that apparently no one but this particular firm could obtain a contract from the Canadian National Railways for the supplying of railway ties."

Fire-killed timber berths, Mr. MacMillan stresses on, are put up at public auction after being advertised, and the person bidding the highest cash bonus is awarded the permit, he may then manufacture what the timber is suited for at a fixed rate of dues, and let me state here that we do not hold and never have held a fire-killed timber berth that we have not purchased in the proper way at a public auction sale. Anybody could bid these in, and I will give you a list of a few that our firm did not get—by looking up our records we could give you many more, but these will probably suffice for the present—these are the registration numbers, and anybody who cares to take the trouble can get full details of same: 3870, 3917, 4221, 4487, 4802, 4811, 4462, 4629, 4665, 4481.

We have supplied ties for steam railways, street railways, factories, etc., and we are not ashamed to admit it because it is through building up a business within the last twelve years on strict and sound business principles that we believe has won for us the confidence of those who require ties. We wish to appear anything but boastful in this connection, but wish to be quite frank and think you will appreciate this.

It is most important to make sure a company or individual will get exactly the ties they require, and by the date they require them,—otherwise you fail.

You know parties who have had contracts in Saskatchewan from the railway company; some of them through inexperience or lack of finances have fallen down completely. In connection with three of these cases the parties never delivered one tie, two of them came to us; we were able to finance them, watch their operations, and they had work for the winter.

Regarding fire-killed timber: These are designated according to section 47 of the timber regulations by timber inspectors who must be real timber men as they have to judge whether or not trees are going to die as a result of being fire swept. We know cases in both Saskatchewan and British Columbia where we have operated where the timber appeared from the outside to be perfectly sound, but on cutting or boring trees was found to be worthless, and had to be abandoned. It had been left too long after a ground fire.

Mr. MacMillan read several letters or documents.

The writer knows only one of the parties who wrote a letter. This is J. H. Marshall of St. Walburg, Saskatchewan. This man was a painter and is now a store keeper, but it is the first time we had any idea he was a timber expert, that he can say how long it will probably take a tree to die after being fire swept. Another letter was read from one William Mattila. This man says we told him we had a permit on certain timber, and that he was to cut it, and then he found we hadn't such permit. The fact is unless a clearance is got from the department saying government dues have been paid in full, the purchaser of the ties will not pay for them—and no clearance could be got in the above case. This is a rigid rule and always has to be carried out, so you can readily see how absurd Mattila's statement is.

The writer is sorry he has not his office data with him, otherwise could go more fully into the subject, but as far as this letter goes, any facts stated are absolutely true.

We hope the substance matter of this letter will be put before Mr. MacMillan, as it is not fair that the impressions he has tried to establish in connection with our firm should stand.

Yours very truly,
Hett & Sibbald, Ltd.,
S. Hett, President.

I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more except to remind the hon. member for Saskatoon that we have some fine timber areas in North Battleford while in his riding he has not sufficient to make one third-class tie. If he knows as little about timber as he has demonstrated this afternoon, I doubt if there is sufficient timber in his own makeup to make even one cull tie. Further, may I say that the next time the hon. member encounters a dust or silt storm down in Saskatoon we cordially invite him to come up north where there are many fresh water lakes. We will endeavour to cleanse him thoroughly before he returns.

The heart of the hon. member seems to be bleeding for the settlers north of St. Walburg, but if he wants to help them the best thing he can do is to go to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and try to obtain for these poor settlers who are trying to carve out a living on the frontier the railroad which they have been promised. South of the Beaver river forty-four miles of roadbed is prepared and ready for steel, but no effort has been made to give these people the railroad which it was promised would be finished by 1932. From present indications, not a mile of steel will be laid this year. Beyond the Beaver river, twenty-five miles is graded and ready for the steel but still no attempt is being made to complete this railroad. The result will be that these settlers for years to come will be without the railway facilities promised to them by the Liberal government. Had that government been returned to power, these people would certainly have received the railway consideration to which they are justly entitled.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the affidavits submitted and the allegations made by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) except to say that had these affidavits been handed to me when I was acting as Minister of the Interior, I would have ordered an immediate investigation. That would not have been the first time an investigation of this character was conducted in the department. These files are now in the possession of the Saskatchewan government and it would be an easy matter for that government to investigate the charges made by my hon. friend. I would suggest that he get in touch with the provincial government and request an immediate investigation. Mr. Smart who was in charge of the office at Prince Albert is now the superintendent of a national park in Manitoba; all the other officers concerned are somewhere in the vicinity of these alleged transactions, and there should be no difficulty in carrying out an investigation. The report of the ties purchased by the Canadian National Railways is available and will disclose whether they were burned or green timber. The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) has indicated that the contractors mentioned in the statement are responsible people and if any mishandling has occurred, recovery could be made.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is submitted to the house, I have one or two observations to make. According to the terms of the resolution, the problem of unemployment is one of the most important with which parliament has to deal; but during the debate this afternoon we have listened to speeches which have really nothing to do with this serious matter. Apparently the question in the way it has been discussed for some time, has been boiled down to one affecting a particular locality, either in eastern Canada or in Saskatchewan or in some other part of the dominion. Unfortunately unemployment is not local but national and can be dealt with only in a national way.

I should like to say first of all that I have every sympathy with the last part of the resolution. I am very anxious to see the government take immediate action and state its policy in regard to this question. I also realize that from the time this motion first came before the house, quite a number of things have happened and a different slant has been given to the subject. I see by the papers to-day that within the next few days a conference between the federal and provincial governments will be called to discuss how unemployment is to be dealt with, and therefore I prefer to leave my remarks to a subsequent occasion when I shall be able to discuss that aspect of the matter more intelligently.

My main purpose in rising to-day is that I do not desire to see this question of unemployment discussed in the party spirit in which it has been debated during the past few weeks. I am always afraid, when the party spirit begins to manifest itself, as it often does in the house, that unemployment may be lost sight of altogether and when it comes to a question of what the Liberal party did here or the Conservative party did there, we forget entirely about the large number of people who happen to be out of work. The amendment as set forth by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) takes up almost a whole page of Hansard, and more than nine-tenths of it deals with something that has been threshed out in the house time and time again. This is a form of politics with which we in our group have no sympathy. We would far sooner have the question discussed entirely on its merits. If the amendment had been confined to the latter part, asking the government to submit to the house its program of dealing with this great question, there would be no doubt as to what we of the labour group and the other members in this corner of the house would do. But when we find coupled with this resolution all these "whereases" as to what was said by the Prime Minister in about fifteen different parts of the dominion, it is time this kind of politics was cut out entirely from our proceedings and we got down to the really fundamental questions before us. Therefore, as a protest against this form of resolution, we have decided to abstain from voting on this question.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Heenan) which was negatived on the following division:

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

International Institute of Agriculture, $10,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Grants are made by very many countries to the International Institute of Agriculture, to be used for the purpose of setting up machinery for the gathering of facts and statistics relating to agriculture for dissemination amongst the countries which are members of the institute.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the explanation of the reduction? Has the contribution by other countries been reduced?

Mr. WEIR: I could not say at the moment, but this reduction will not in any way interfere with the obligations that we have undertaken. I understand that we shall receive not quite so many publications.

Mr. SPENCER: Who were the Canadian delegates to the convention in Europe last year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understand that there was no official delegate sent from this country, but that we were represented by Mr. French of the Imperial government.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Salaries, $956,772; contingencies, $50,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: A few evenings ago when items in the Departments of Public Works and Trade and Commerce were under consideration we were led to understand that the items for salaries would not be touched until the bill had been passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, to learn whether or not my hon. friend has stated the understanding correctly, I would have to verify his statement by an examination of Hansard. I understood the items would not be considered until the bill was brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no.

Mr. RHODES: Of course I am subject to correction.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Take another item.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, there are only two items to deal with, so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The items for that department have been called; that serves my hon. friend's purpose.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If that is all the house desires, I am content.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Publications of League of Nations for distribution to members of parliament and a grant to the League of Nations Society in Canada, $3,000.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change in this item, nor has there been for some time. In connection with the various other items on page 55 of the estimates there may be some discussion. This however seems to be the one item in connection with which there will be no controversy. It deals with publications, and is for an amount similar to that asked last year.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Building fishways and clearing rivers, $18,900.

Mr. BENNETT: This seems to be a non-contentious item.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is there not a change in the regulations concerning the fishways which have to be constructed? I have heard some protest in this connection in the province of Nova Scotia.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. RHODES: The query raised by my hon. friend from Hants-Kings arises out of some suggested changes in the law which are contained in the provisions of an amendment to the statute to be brought in this year, and which are now under consideration of the fisheries committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: If there are any contentious features in the changes, where may they be discussed?

Mr. RHODES: There may be discussion before the fisheries committee, and on the second reading and committee stages of the bill.

Mr. BRADETTE: Does northern Ontario come under the item for clearing rivers?

Mr. RHODES: The fisheries of Ontario are within control of the province.

Mr. BRADETTE: I understand the federal authorities are taking care of some of the rivers in northern Ontario.

Mr. RHODES: In the Hudson bay area that may possibly be true, but as my hon. friend knows the fisheries of Ontario are under the control of the province.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to pay compassionate allowance to John Davidson, formerly lightkeeper at Cape Mudge, B.C., $500.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an allowance voted every year for this gentleman, who is still surviving.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. BENNETT: The Postmaster General is not in his seat, but if we could take one item we might expedite business. I am content with any item which would be acceptable to the committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suppose the Postmaster General is busy in connection with the Montreal elections, too?

Mr. BENNETT: I have some reason to believe that is true of many hon. members.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): What item shall we consider?

Mr. BENNETT: Any item which is non-contentious, commencing at page 61.

Post Office—outside service, $31,451,100.

Mr. BENNETT: We might just consider this item and go on. I would not be prepared to deal with it in any event, so we might leave the consideration of the item until a later date.

Item stands.

Mr. BENNETT: Having provided that the house may go into committee with respect to the several departments I mentioned on Friday I propose now that we should deal with second readings of some government measures. Later, if the house is in a position to do so, the different ministers will go on with supply, taking up Justice and National Revenue. Agriculture, of course, is highly contentious, and we will leave that for the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: National Revenue is mainly salaries.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not intend to touch the civil government salaries. I assume the house will desire to be informed about a number of employees in connection with the preventive service, and matters of that kind, and that is why I mentioned that item. The acting Minister of Fisheries is not here to go on with his estimates, but the Minister of Finance, who is very familiar with the work of the Department of Fisheries, will assist in those items.

Progress reported.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECT AND PEST ACT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 18, to amend the Destructive Insect and Pest Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Scope of regulations.

Mr. BROWN: Were any amendments made in committee?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): No, there were none.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS IN 1931

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the governor in council may authorize the guarantee of securities of the Canadian National Railway Company to an aggregate principal amount at any one time outstanding of $11,372,498.86, to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1931 (where amounts available from net operating income or investments may be insufficient), by or on behalf of the Canadian National Railways or any company controlled by or any company comprised in the Canadian National Railways, or in respect of Canadian Government railways entrusted to the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. RHODES: This measure is to provide the money with which to pay the debt incurred by the bill which has already passed this house, authorizing the Canadian National Railways to borrow this sum of money.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 40, to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of securities to be issued under the Canadian National Railways Financing Act, 1931, No. 2.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PETROLEUM AND NAPHTHA INSPECTION

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. 20, to amend the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act.—Mr. Ryckman—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Tests of petroleum.

Mr. YOUNG: The last time the bill was before the house we asked the minister for particulars as to the effect of the amendment on the quality of kerosene which would be sold for illuminating purposes. Perhaps he can give that information to-day.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Inquiry has been made by the Department of National Revenue and also by the petroleum engineer of the Department of the Interior, and I am assured that the oil is of a quality quite as safe and as good as that produced in other fields. It is only a question of specific gravity. The specific gravity of the oil found in this district is heavier, and, as stated before, it has been necessary to import gasoline to mix with it in order to reduce the specific gravity. I am assured that in every other respect what is asked for will result in as safe and as good an illuminating oil as can be found elsewhere. There can be no objection to this being done in the interests of those who have this heavier specific gravity oil. Since the matter was before the committee in the middle of February last there has been no adverse comment of any kind with respect to this bill.

Mr. DONNELLY: When the bill was last under consideration I asked whether some definite temperature should not be mentioned in subsection (b), which reads:

If it weighs more than eight pounds and four-tenths of a pound per gallon.

As I pointed out on that occasion, there should be some stipulation of a definite temperature of so many degrees fahrenheit. I believe that sixty degrees is the temperature generally taken for gasoline; I do not know what temperature is intended here. If the oil is very warm, a gallon will weigh much less than it will if the oil is cold. There should be some temperature specified in the section. Is there any temperature in the old section?

Mr. RYCKMAN: It is certified by Dr. Tingle, chief of the laboratory in connection with the customs and excise branches, and by Mr. Madgwick, petroleum engineer, that the flash point has nothing to do with the value of the illuminating power; and the same statement has been made with regard to the specific gravity. I cannot see that the point raised by my hon. friend relates directly to the matter. This is an amendment of a rather lengthy statute which defines the fire test and the flash test, and so far as my knowledge goes, so far as I have been able to get any information in the department, we are not particularly concerned with the heat test. We are assured of the safety of the oil and that, of course, is the first consideration; we are assured also of its illuminating power, and that also is desirable. When that is seen to, will my hon. friend tell me what relation the heat test has to it?

Mr. DONNELLY: I am not asking for a heat test. I readily understand what the minister means by the flash test; it is to show that there is no danger. But does not the minister see that a gallon of coal oil which is very cold will weigh much more than a gallon of coal oil or gasoline which is correspondingly warm? Take it at 200 and it will be all vapour and will weigh little or nothing, whereas if you get it down to freezing point it will be quite heavy. The oil weights so much at a certain temperature, and if that provision with respect to temperature is not in the act, it should be there. Subsection (b) provides for oil that weighs more than eight pounds and four-tenths per gallon, and if we do not provide the temperature at which the oil shall be of that weight then this means nothing at all. I can put it down to freezing point and it will weigh nearly nine pounds; and if I put it up to boiling point it will weigh practically nothing. I repeat, the temperature should be specified in the act.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Probably the hon. gentleman's criticism is answered by the old act, chapter 159 of the revised statutes of 1927, section 10 of which reads:

Except as herein otherwise provided, petroleum shall not be sold or offered for sale for use in Canada, for illuminating purposes: (a) if, when tested by the pyrometer described in the schedule to this act, at a lower temperature than eighty-five degrees by Fahrenheit's thermometer, it emits vapour that will flash.

Mr. DONNELLY: But that provision has reference to the element of danger.

Mr. RYCKMAN: With regard to sale, this condition (a) must be complied with. Subsection (b) reads:

If it weighs more than eight pounds and seventeen-hundredths of a pound per gallon.

In the bill now before the committee that weight is changed to eight and four-tenths pounds. Subsection (c) reads:

If it weighs less than seven pounds and seventy-five hundredths of a pound per gallon.

The oil may be sold if these conditions are complied with. That has been the law heretofore, and the point raised by my hon. friend is covered by subsection (a), which is not altered.

Mr. BROWN: I do not suppose we can do anything but accept the assurance of the minister that this oil will be equal in all respects to the standard that now obtains. But this oil will be used not only for illuminating purposes, because kerosene is now used largely for motive purposes in tractor engines. We know that the higher the specific gravity, the more difficult it is for the oil to volatilize, and that is my point. This is used for motive purposes, and the fact that there has been no adverse comment from the public means nothing, because the consumers of the country are not organized so as to make representations in a matter of this sort; only through experience can they find out the quality of the oil. It is only when summer comes and this oil is used in tractor engines that we shall be able to decide whether for this purpose it is equal to the oil that is now in use.

Mr. DONNELLY: What the minister has read with regard to the pyrometer test, which is eighty-five degrees fahrenheit, is correct; but my contention is that subsection (a) does not apply to subsection (b). A temperature is fixed in (a) but in (b) there is no mention of any temperature. Unless it is provided what the temperature shall be, this provision with respect to weight means nothing at all. I venture to say that if the minister will take this matter to the officials of his department they will advise him that it means nothing unless the temperature is specified, because as I have pointed out, at a temperature of two hundred and twelve you will have nothing but gas, and a gallon of gas will weigh very little, whereas if you reduce it to zero it will weigh nine or ten pounds. There must be some stipulation with regard to the temperature; the officials will so inform the minister, I am sure.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I have asked the officials and they say that this does not influence the matter at all. The point is this. Section 10 of the act lays down three conditions that shall be complied with before petroleum may be sold for use in Canada, and in one of these conditions only, namely, subsection (b), is any change being made, the purpose being to alter the seventeen-hundredths to four-tenths. Otherwise the law as it existed before must be complied with. As I have said, I have received assurances that this amendment will be distinctly in the interests of certain sections of the country and that it will hurt no one.

Mr. DONNELLY: I contend that if temperature was not mentioned in the old act, it should have been. This amendment means nothing unless temperature is mentioned. I do not say that the change is wrong, but something should be said as to the temperature which shall prevail when a gallon of gasoline or petroleum is to be weighed.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I ask hon. members to look at section 10 of the act, where it will be seen that nothing else is required. Perhaps it might be of interest to the committee to hear a letter addressed to Mr. Taylor, commissioner of excise, by Alfred Tingle, chief, customs-excise chemical laboratory. This letter is dated July 3, 1931, and reads:

In reply to your letter of June 27 having further reference to the request of the Regal Petroleum Company, Limited, of Calgary, I beg to report the result of a further talk with Mr. T. G. Madgwick, Department of the Interior.

I should evidently first explain that until lately Mr. Madgwick was departmentally subordinate to Mr. C. C. Ross, but handled all matters concerning petroleum which were referred to Mr. Ross's branch. In any case Mr. Ross cannot be consulted as he has lately been superannuated on the abolition of his position in the service.

Mr. Madgwick and I are both of opinion:

1. That the illuminating properties of the oil under discussion are not likely to be very different from any other oil of the present high test class.

2. That neither flash point nor specific gravity have any necessary connection with illuminating power.

3. That the act makes no attempt to protect purchasers against the sale to them of oils inferior in illuminating powers, but only endeavours to protect against fire hazard.

4. As we consider that lowering the flash test to 135 degrees F. does not materially increase the fire hazard, we feel that the purposes of the act would be still carried out.

Mr. YOUNG: Section one reads:

(b) if it weighs more than eight pounds and four-tenths of a pound per gallon.

If a dealer had a substance which he wanted to sell as kerosene but which did not comply with this condition, he could perhaps make it comply by changing the temperature.

Mr. RYCKMAN: He could have done that before.

Mr. DONNELLY: Every company selling gasoline puts out a chart which gives the weight of their gasoline at certain temperatures, 60 degrees being taken as the average. However, we all know that as the temperature rises the weight decreases and as it lowers, the weight increases. The same thing must be true of petroleum, and I contend that the temperature should be mentioned in the bill.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am anxious to meet any reasonable demand made by any hon. member and, therefore, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

AUDITING OF ACCOUNTS FOR TRAVELLING ALLOWANCES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Judges Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May we have an explanation of this legislation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I intended to make the necessary explanations in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill is drawn with the idea of improving the method of auditing judges' accounts for travelling expenses. A good deal of difficulty has been experienced in the past because of the various methods of accounting adopted in the different provinces, and it is hoped to change the present variegated system into a regular one and make easier the auditing of these accounts. At the time the bill was drawn, proper attention was not paid to section 1 as it affects the province of Quebec. In some respects the judicial system in that province is unlike the system in the other provinces, and a special clause is necessary to apply to Quebec. Prior to 1920 the judges in Quebec were designated to several areas as provided by the provincial laws; in 1920 a change was adopted abolishing to a large extent the old system. I understand in the district of Montreal there are twenty-one superior court judges; in the district of Quebec there are ten.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is apart from the chief justice?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In the district of Sherbrooke, two, and in the district of Three Rivers, two. All courts are held in these four districts, the former districts having been abolished. This system does not prevail in the other provinces and since this bill was drafted it has been brought to my attention by some judges and certain prominent members of the bar in the province of Quebec that this section does not adequately meet the situation prevailing in the province. It has been sugested that certain amendments should be made to bring this act into harmony with the present system. The bill proposes, in respect to the province of Quebec, to amend paragraph (b) of subsection one of section 21. This, however, would not be a suitable amendment. The section requiring amendment is section 21. But subsection 6 of section 21 is the subsection which applies exclusively to Quebec, and in it are words which are not appropriate to the present situation in that province. It provides that:

In the province of Quebec no travelling allowances shall be granted to any judge requested to sit in review,—

Since that provision was made the court of review has been abolished and there is no necessity any longer for those words.

—or attending any court,—

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Then the following words should also be deleted:

—except within the limits of the district to which he is assigned.

The old districts have been abolished. The only judicial districts in Quebec are the four I have mentioned. It has therefore been suggested that all we require is an amendment first to strike out the words "requested to sit in review," and then to strike out "except within the limits of the district to which he is assigned."

And I propose to have that amendment made. That, I am told, will be satisfactory to the bench and the bar and also to the officials of the department who audit the accounts. Under that system the chief justice of the province or of the district in which the judge resides, shall have the certification of the accounts for travelling expenses from the respective jurisdictions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the minister kindly read the section as it will read with the amendment he proposes?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The present section in the bill will be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

1. Subsection 6 of section 21 of chapter 105 of the revised statutes of Canada is hereby amended by striking out the words "requested to sit in review or" in the second line of the said subsection, and also by striking out the words "except within the limits of the district to which he is assigned" in the third and fourth lines of the said subsection.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But unless we have the statute before us, we cannot very well understand what this means.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The subsection, if amended, will read as follows:

6. In the province of Quebec no travelling allowances shall be granted to any judge attending any court held at any other place than that at which he resides, unless it is certified by the chief justice, or the judge performing the duties of chief justice in the district where the court is held, that the attendance was in his opinion necessary.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is satisfactory.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Section 2 of the bill is directed to the other provinces of the dominion. At the present time judges who are called from their own districts to perform judicial services in other districts, render their bills to the Department of Justice, but there is in that department no proper method of verifying those accounts and year by year the amount of travelling expenses is gradually increasing. Judges are in the habit of interchanging work, as one may say, by going from one county to another or from one district to another, and sometimes without any very reasonable excuse for the transfer. The present system has grown up over a long period of years and I do not know that anyone is particularly to blame for it, but at the present time it involves a heavy expenditure in judges' travelling expenses and allowances which we think could be very well reduced. All that this bill proposes is that accounts for travelling expenses shall not be paid unless the particular judge has been requested by the attorney general of his province to hold court in some county other than his own. If the attorney general has so requested him, that, we think, will be a sufficient check on what one might describe as somewhat unnecessary travelling expenses which are incurred by judges in various provinces. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has suggested a question that some day will have to be decided, that is, whether the Dominion of Canada should pay any part of the travelling expenses of judges. We are called upon by the British North America Act to pay to judges their salaries and allowances, not expenses. It is argued that if it had been the intention of the framers of that act to compel the dominion treasury to pay those expenses, that would have been stated in the section. Apart from judges' salaries, we do not pay the provinces for the administration of justice; we do not pay for the upkeep of the court-houses or gaols or the salaries of clerks of the courts or anything of that kind. Why should we pay the travelling expenses of judges in connection with the administration of justice, which is a provincial matter? This bill, however, does not deal with that question. I know many lawyers who have been in the Department of Justice have from time to time expressed the opinion that some day the question will have to be settled; they do not think these expenses should be paid out of the federal treasury. The word "allowances" is used in the British North America Act, but it is pointed out that the word "allowances" means retiring allowances and matters of that kind which the dominion treasury has always paid, but does not include travelling expenses.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not want to express any opinion as to the last part of my hon. friend's remarks. I must say that I was strongly opposed to clause one of the bill as it stood, but I have not the same objection to the substituted amendment. I think this will meet all the conditions as they exist.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to express my thanks to the Minister of Justice for having had something to do with leave being given to a judge who was absolutely too old to sit on the bench. I remember distinctly that one day that judge while on the bench said he noticed that he was losing his memory, but he was on the bench for two years after that. Now he has been granted six months' leave. I am sorry the minister did not go further and see to it that he resign, because his work has to be done by other judges who have to do more than their share. As the minister knows, we have the rotation system in the province of Quebec, and it works very well. I might say that I have heard from a reliable source that this judge expects to come back to the bench after the expiration of his leave. If such were the case, there would be a strong protest from all the people in the districts in which he might sit. In fact he was a refugee from the bench in Quebec city. No lawyer who has practised in the Quebec courts will deny that every lawyer who has a case coming before this judge tries to evade him.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The hon. member can hardly make those remarks on this bill. They are not relevant to the bill, and I think they are against the rules of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: Pardon me, Mr. Chairman, but I think I can show that they are relevant. It is only those judges who sat in Montreal or Quebec before the provincial law of 1920 was passed who are immovable. The judges who have been appointed since 1920 have to make a circuit of the different districts, and as they go around the different districts they send in their expense bills. I submit that that makes my remarks relevant to the bill. Outside of his judgments I have great respect personally for this particular judge. May I add that the judges generally are doing very well under the rotation system, with this one exception. I am sure the minister will continue his excellent work by stopping any attempt to have this judge come back to the bench. I repeat that I have a great respect for him outside of his judgments.

Mr. RHODES: I move the amendment, Mr. Chairman, which has been suggested by the Minister of Justice.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED DEDUCTION OF TEN PER CENT IN INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 19, to provide for the reduction of compensation in the public service.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the principle underlying this bill was discussed so fully when the resolution upon which it is founded was under consideration that I do not think at this stage I can add anything to what I said on that occasion. I am content therefore merely to move the second reading and to reserve to myself an opportunity to discuss in detail in committee any questions which may arise.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house is to provide for the reduction of compensation in the public service. On the introduction of the resolution I gave a number of reasons why, in my mind, the measure should not pass. When the resolution was introduced I expressed the hope that the bill to follow, which would be founded upon the resolution, might contain some alterations. I am sorry to say, however, that that is not so, that the bill is framed in the same terms as the resolution. I am sorely disappointed, and must quote the words of Virgil, una salus victis nullam sperare salutem—that to the vanquished there is but one hope of salvation, to hope for no salvation.

On second thought I am not very much surprised that the bill is as radical as was the resolution. After witnessing what has happened in this house during the past two weeks, after seeing a demonstration of the theory that might is right, I can expect nothing more than a bill in the terms of the one now before us. I say this bill is economically unsound because it purports to produce revenue through a reduction in purchasing power. It is economically unsound because it purports to create economy in one sphere, namely, in the national budget, by reducing the purchasing power of 65,000 civil servants throughout the country, and by reducing that same power in a large number of other portions of the population. It is economically unsound because it strikes at the very root of contractual obligations between master and servant. On a former occasion, however, I went extensively into that phase of the matter. It is economically unsound because it is of an extraordinary nature and should not have been resorted to until all other means had failed. It is equivalent to a measure of taxation, and hits hardest those least able to bear the burden; in other words, all will have to pay at the same rate. The father supporting a wife and family will pay the same as a married man with no family. The widow with dependent children will pay the same as the civil servant who, with no dependents, lives in security and comfort. The son or daughter supporting a widowed mother or invalid father will pay the same as other sons or daughters living at ease. At page 59 of Hansard the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

> —and desiring that the people of this country should understand fully that the government is anxious to lead the way with respect to matters of economy.

Sir, he has said the government is anxious to lead the way in matters of economy. There is no great skill in the announcement of the policy we are now discussing. Anyone can effect economy in his business by cutting the wages of his employees. The real test of the skilled administrator is to devise and put into effect such policies as will be beneficial to business interests, will produce increased profit, will put more money into circulation, increase employment and thereby increase revenues and extend trade. The Prime Minister went about his task in the wrong way. His policies have killed our trade. Decreased trade and decreased revenues have increased unemployment. Now the right hon. gentleman proceeds to cure unemployment by creating more unemployment.

The statement has been made that the very best antidote for poison is an extra dose of the same poison. I am told, however, that great skill is required in the administration of such remedies, and I submit the right hon. gentleman has showed himself to be a very poor medical practitioner in the administration of medicines or remedies to cure our national ills. Then, we understand the reduction in salaries is made for the purpose of enabling the Prime Minister to balance his budget. He may balance it in the way of dollars and cents, but he is not taking into account the physical difficulties he is creating. He is not taking into account the mental and moral anguish which will follow in the wake of this legislation. He may balance his budget in dollars and cents, but he cannot balance the national budget when the individuals composing the nation are without work and are starving. People must be contented both morally and financially. There can be no balancing of a budget unless the individuals in the country enjoy a perfect state of happiness and contentment. There can be no balancing of a budget at a cost of starvation and privation due to reduced wages and lack of work.

The government has been sorely remiss in its duty when it has attempted to effect a balance at these costs. If a way cannot be blasted into the markets of the world the Prime Minister will blast his way into the pockets of the civil servants. Unable to blast his way into the markets of the world the Prime Minister will now blast open the doors of, and blast his way into the homes of the civil servants. No easier method could have been found than simply to tell his Minister of Finance to do a little juggling with the decimal point. In connection with the $93,000,000 paid to the civil servants he would simply move the decimal point a few places to the right and receive the benefit of the accrued revenue. Civil servants throughout Canada are being asked to contribute their share of the payment of the national debt. Are the people at the head of our large institutions doing the same thing? If the E. B. Eddy Company cut the salaries and wages of their employees, will they take that money and bring it to the Minister of Finance to lay beside the moneys collected through deductions from civil servants' salaries to be applied towards the satisfaction of the national debt?

Not only that, but we know the example set by the government will be followed throughout the country. Following the lead given by the Prime Minister, other employers of labour will make cuts. The money saved through wages cut in the ordinary course of business will not be added as special revenues to help pay the national debt. The few millions which would be collected in that way would be but a drop in the bucket as compared with the hundreds of millions of dollars of national debt. I cannot appreciate the idea behind the horizontal cut, that if, due to the depression, some people must suffer, those who are more fortunate should also suffer. In other words, I cannot understand why, if I should be suffering, I should insist that my neighbour suffer also, even though that suffering might alleviate my own. Certainly there is no warrant for my asking someone else to suffer while that suffering will not help me at all. I fail to realize the force of the argument that because the farmers are having a hard time, or because the financial situation is a difficult one, the civil service throughout Canada should also feel the pinch. I should think the spirit of solidarity should prevail and that we should rejoice in the fact that during this period of depression the hard times are not felt by the entire population of Canada.

I say that these reductions in salary and these cuts in the personnel of the civil service strike at the very foundation of civil service institutions. Some day, when it is too late, the effects of this policy will be seen. I have not time to deal with each of the topics on which I had intended to speak, but I do want to point out that it is most imperative that the civil service of Canada should be maintained at its present high standing. I have no less authority for that statement than the report of the Beatty commission, which at page 9 contains the following words:

> The formal distinction between the legislative and executive branches of government, between parliament on the one hand and the cabinet controlling administration on the other, obscures but it does not alter the fact that efficient parliamentary government is only possible when the decisions embodied in statutory form are made effective throughout the dominion by a body of trained administrators and experts.

Further down the page I find the following:

> The problems of government are becoming ever more complex; the effectiveness of government action must be limited, to a substantial extent, by the quality of the civil service, which is called upon to investigate many subjects of national importance demanding consideration by the government, as well as to make governmental policies effective and governmental decisions operative; and we believe that no more important task confronts those in charge of the country's affairs, than that of improving, and continuing to improve, by every means at their disposal, the quality of the civil service of Canada.

—not to wreck it at every opportunity. Then on page 10 the report states:

> Throughout our inquiries we have been impressed by the character of the work now done in the civil service of Canada. In accord with the highest traditions to be found elsewhere, its own tradition demands the faithful performance of his duties by the individual, though the results of the work done, however important they may be, do not accrue directly to him, either in the form of wealth, or, as a rule, in the form of public recognition.

The quotation is most interesting, but it is rather lengthy. Then on page 11 I find the following:

> It is essential to the continued welfare of the country that the civil service be enabled continuously to recruit workers with a proper scientific equipment for their tasks, and to retain them in the face of the high rewards offered for work of the same character elsewhere.

Here is a most interesting extract from page 13:

. . . . in the past the civil service has been successful in enlisting and retaining men of first rate ability, despite the relatively moderate remuneration. We do not feel the same assurance, however, that it will continue successfully to recruit or hold such men in the future, unless conditions of employment and prospects of advancement in the service can be simplified and improved considerably.

Then they talk about those three factors so dear to the heart of the Prime Minister, security of tenure, superannuation and holidays and sick leave. I quote from page 14:

These three conditions serve, very properly, to assist in relieving the civil servant of anxieties with regard to his own future and that of his dependents; and so set him free, without such distractions, to concentrate upon his duties. But while they do constitute advantages, when compared with the conditions ordinarily prevailing in private employment, such advantages are not those which as a rule appeal most strongly to men of an energetic, creative temperament, among whom the leaders in the service, no less than the directing heads of private enterprises, must be sought. For the sake of the country, no less than of the service itself, it is necessary that conditions of employment should offer a permanent positive attraction to men of this type.

The very fabric, sir, of the civil service throughout Canada is being jeopardized forever by these continual dismissals, made in hit and miss fashion, and by these unwarranted, unjust, unfair and inequitable deductions. I say, sir, that the service is not in a position to bear this reduction. No one earning a moderate salary, such as the majority of civil servants earn, is in a position to stand this cut. A return was brought down recently which shows that 42.5 per cent of the permanent civil service of Canada earn up to $1,500 yearly, while 79.5 per cent of civil servants earn less than $2,000 a year. Those figures should be kept in mind.

When I spoke previously on this question the Minister of Finance said in reply that the only equitable way was to have a horizontal cut. Let me give a concrete illustration. In this house we as members are cut ten per cent; my $400 will lie next to the Prime Minister's $1,900, but that is done by virtue of an arbitrary rule. If a graded cut were made whereby the Prime Minister and myself paid according to our respective means, my $400 would not be $400, and the Prime Minister's $1,900 would not be $1,900! It is true that on the other hand the Prime Minister will pay a tax on his income, but I will have to pay an income tax of my own, so in that respect we are equal, because the income tax is based upon the capacity to pay. This ten per cent reduction, however, is an arbitrary rule disregarding the capacity to earn or to pay.

To follow that example through let us consider the civil servant who earns $3,600 a year. He is not yet at his maximum; this year he is entitled to a statutory increase of $120, but what will happen? First he will suffer a loss of $360, or ten per cent of his salary; in addition he will be deprived of his annual increase of $120, amounting to another three per cent, and in addition five per cent of his salary is deducted for superannuation, which would amount to $190. Therefore this civil servant will be mulcted to the extent of $670. It is true that his contribution to the superannuation fund ultimately will come back to him, but for the time being he suffers a deduction of 18 per cent, and in addition he will have to pay income tax on whatever is left of the $3,600 after the deductions are allowed. Right away that civil servant suffers a deduction of 18 per cent, while hon. members of this house suffer a loss of ten per cent.

I am further opposed to the passage of this legislation, because, as I say, it prejudicially affects the interests of this constituency, and I have no apology to offer for taking up the cudgels on behalf of the very large proportion of civil servants who live in the city of Ottawa, any more than I have anything to say against anyone who takes the part of any particular class in his community whose privileges and rights do not in any way conflict with the general wellbeing of that community. In this city the ordinary citizens have certain rights and privileges, and the civil servants, as a particular class, have particular rights and privileges, and as such they have the right to be taken into account. Therefore, I make no apology for taking up the cudgels, as I do, on behalf of that class, just as I would do on behalf of any other special class constituting a minority but with special rights, provided that those rights did not clash in any way with the rights and general interests of the community at large. Ottawa has a population of 130,000 inhabitants. On the 31st of March 1931 there were 11,766 employees of the civil service residing in Ottawa, of whom 8,009 were permanents and 3,757 were temporaries. The civil servants' pay-roll for that year in Ottawa was $19,134,162; it is now, in round figures, $20,000,000, because of statutory increases granted last year but not granted this year. Now, ten per cent of $20,000,000 is $2,000,000, and the statutory increases cut off this year amount to about $500,000. Therefore Ottawa will be deprived this year of the sum of $2,500,000. Bad as that is, it might be tolerated with great difficulty, with great misery and anguish. But we know that in trade a dollar is worth three dollars in turnover; so that during the coming year Ottawa will suffer a loss, not of $2,500,000 but of $7,500,0000. Now what does that mean? It means absolute catastrophe financially for the city of Ottawa It means that $2,500,000 is to be taken from the earning capacity of 12,000 people in a population of 130,000. Can hon. gentlemen realize what that means? Do they realize what it means to have $2,500,000 levied upon 12,000 people living in a community of 130,000? It means that every man, woman and child, every head in the city of Ottawa will suffer a tax of $19, and every civil servant in the city will be taxed to the extent of $209.

> There will accrue to the revenues approximately $8,300,000.

He will therefore obtain $2,500,000 from Ottawa, leaving $6,000,000 to be derived from sources outsides this city. That $6,000,000 will be levied on 62,000 employees, less the 12,000 in Ottawa, or on 50,000 employees distributed among a population of 10,000,000. This means that every one of the civil servants outside Ottawa will contribute on an average $120; but the population outside Ottawa will feel it to the extent of 60 cents per head, as compared with $19 in this city.

Of course, it will be pointed out that if all the civil servants resided in Ottawa, Ottawa alone would have to bear the burden. That is perfectly true; but is that any reason why this city should be made to suffer in the way I have indicated? If the Prime Minister and his government had had in mind an equitable measure they would have seen to it that this cut would be, not horizontal but graded, in order to alleviate the blow that has been struck at this community. Up to March 2 there were in Ottawa, according to the records of the city hall, 6,286 registered unemployed. But that does not take into consideration all those that do not register. It does not take into consideration the 169 who have been let out of the air force; it does not take into consideration the 82 artisans who have been let out of the Public Works the first of this month it does not take into consideration the 313 Department of the Interior employees who have not been reabsorbed into the service; it does not take into consideration the 150 other employees let out in this happy-go-lucky, hit or miss fashion; and it does not take into consideration those who will be let out within the next few months.

This, sir, is a situation that is very far from being reassuring. The Prime Minister stated, as reported at page 561 of Hansard:

> The Canadian Pacific Railway Company a year ago instituted such economies; the Canadian National Railways last year instituted economies in that direction; and further economies have been effected by the findings of boards in connection with the running trades. Recently a board was sitting in Montreal when its duties were suddenly ended by an agreement being arrived at whereby a ten per cent reduction was accepted by the clerical staffs of the railways, the question then being under consideration by a conciliation board.

That is true, and with that I have not much quarrel. But why did not the Prime Minister listen to the representations that were being made by the civil service organizations, or which they were trying to make? Why did he not listen when they came to him that morning? I am not so sure he did not tell them that they ought to consider themselves lucky that they did not suffer a more severe cut. I am not so sure he did not tell them that they ought to "give until it hurts." The Prime Minister was right in using the language I have just quoted with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway. But let me point out that the quotation includes the findings of boards. A board was sitting, an agreement was arrived at, and the reduction was accepted. There was a conciliation board, but the Prime Minister never granted a board of conciliation—

Mr. BENNETT: May I correct the hon. gentleman? A ten per cent reduction was made in all clerical staffs of the Canadian Pacific Railway without a board or anything else. The hon. gentleman is talking about the running trades.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am quite prepared to accept the word of the right hon. gentleman, but this is what he said:

> The Canadian Pacific Railway Company a year ago instituted such economies; the Canadian National Railways last year instituted economies in that direction; and further economies have been effected by the findings of boards in connection with the running trades.

That is perfectly true. I have taken this verbatim from Hansard, and if the right hon. gentleman has been misreported, I am prepared to take his word.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has not followed me. In the hotels of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific and in all clerical forces, reductions were made by the company as employers without regard to any other consideration than the desire to effect economy. With respect to the running trades, with which they had an agreement, they had an arbitration under the provisions of the act in that regard.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is correct as regards the running trades; they had an agreement and there were boards. But if they had no agreement with the clerical staffs, then my remarks apply to them also; and I say that the right hon. gentleman should have listened to the representations made on behalf of the civil servants, just as the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway should have taken their employees into consideration in an endeavour to arrive at some human understanding whereby the reduction might have been graded. Because the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Canadian National Railways did not do it right in one connection, although they did in another, is no excuse for the right hon. gentleman to think that he is at liberty to take the wrong course in every direction.

The right hon. gentleman is reported on page 561 of Hansard as having said that the cost of living to-day is about 14·4 per cent lower than it was in 1926. I am not concerned with what the cost of living was in 1926, I am concerned only with the cost to-day. I had intended to go into the different phases of the economic feature of this question, but this has been done quite fully by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). The Labour Gazette of February, 1932, shows the cost of living for December, 1931, as $17.76, and for the end of January, 1932, as $17.59, a difference of less than one per cent. Rent has not come down, fuel and light have not come down, the cost of food has come down very little, insurance rates on life and fire have not come down nor have telephone rates. The right hon. gentleman has had telephones taken out of the Supreme Court building, the Daly building, and other departments. There will be fewer telephones in use and the rates certainly will not decrease. The cost of electric light and gas has not come down; interest on mortgages has not come down; school fees have not come down; the rates of instalment payments have not come down; practically all contractual obligations have not come down. In this connection I shall quote from the Beatty report as follows:

> So rapid an increase in numbers, followed by so rapid a decrease, inevitably interferes with the smoothness of operation of the departments, and is a factor tending to reduce efficiency, at the same time that it causes innumerable problems of organization and classification, which cannot always be dealt with as rapidly as they arise.

And again:

> The cost of living, which had already risen considerably from year to year since the beginning of the century, rose even more rapidly during the war years. In 1920, when the maximum was reached, foodstuffs were more than twice as expensive as they had been in 1913. The cost of living generally was 90 per cent higher than in 1913. Meantime, there had been no corresponding increase in civil service salaries. From 1913 to 1920, the average increase in civil service salaries was about 43 per cent, less than half as much as the rise in the cost of living. Since the salaries of the great majority of civil servants only sufficed, before the great rise in the cost of living, to keep them and their families in moderate comfort, it is easily seen that this failure of the average increase in salaries to keep pace with the rise in the cost of living involved a real hardship, during this period, for a considerable number of civil servants, for whom relief could only take the form either of resignation in order to accept better paid employment outside the service, or of a general revision of salaries which should have regard to the actual increase in the cost of living which had occurred.

These words should have been taken into account by those who have had to deal with matters of this kind. I continue:

> Since the cost of living bonus had been calculated in relation to the needs of men with families, and had nothing to do with the merits of the services rendered by them, it of course acted as a levelling influence, reducing considerably the range between minimum and maximum salaries, and so narrowing the prospect of advancement in the service.

And in referring to the work performed at the present time by the service, the report says:

> It is safe to say that the tasks discharged by the civil service at the present time are very much greater and more complex than they were in 1913; and these tasks have been undertaken by a service which is organized along the same lines as before the war, and with essentially the same structure. It is a tribute to the service as it now stands, that its structure has stood the strain so well.

The repeated blows it has received has sapped the foundation of this great institution. We hear a lot about the permanence and security of employment in the service, but in this regard I should like to quote from the Civil Service Review of December, 1931. The following is an article by a press correspondent:

> Of course there is always the security argument. On more than one occasion, and under more than one administration when accompanying civil service delegations as representative of the press I have heard "high authorities" apply that blessed word "security" as a sort of salve or earwash against the sound claims of the service for long overdue salary revision.

The security of employment in the civil service cannot be valued or fixed by means of orders in council passed under peace, order and good government. The article continues:

But now even this security, like other well known securities, is not so secure as it used to be—witness what happened (and is still happening) in the Interior department.

And again:

Despite the facts of the case, however, the service has always been, and doubtless always will be, a favourite cockshy for such as are unable to find better sport or more useful employment; and of course, it is in the trough of periodic depression that the brickbats fly thickest and fastest. Just an old Spanish custom but frankly, as a newspaper man, I am at times unpleasantly surprised to find unwarranted and illogical attacks on the service in the columns of journals that might be expected to maintain a higher standard of editorial criticism.

I think these words could be applied to the words of hon. members on that side of the house, to which I hope to have an opportunity of referring on another occasion. The article continues:

With this in mind I would suggest that civil service organizations and well-wishers of the service generally should lose no opportunity to keep the press and the public better informed concerning the efficiency of the service and the value and importance of the work that is being done by civil servants in the interests of the people of Canada.

I come now to what I consider to be the gem in the speech of the Prime Minister. When the right hon. gentleman introduced the resolution upon which this bill is founded, he stated that he did so because the Minister of Finance was ill and regretted that he did not have an opportunity of preparing himself adequately for the occasion. I wonder what would have happened had the right hon. gentleman prepared himself a little more adequately? He is generally very careful in the selection of his examples or citations, and I was surprised at his quoting the authority which he did. He quoted a letter which he had received from a lady, and I shall read it again. It is as follows:

It is now, and has long been, a cause of deep thankfulness that I have a salary to be cut, and that in these times of stress, when burdens are so great, not only in Canada but throughout the British Empire, whose honours and greatness we share and enjoy, that we can share and share gladly in the pinching. Ten per cent of my salary now seems but a small premium to pay for the security and comfort enjoyed by me in my years in the service. Since we have enjoyed the good years, shall we not also have the lean?

The right hon. gentleman read one letter. To even up I shall read a second one. Then if he wants to even up by reading another, I shall read a third. Let me say that at this game I shall trump every ace he plays, and he may play with a deck of aces so far as that is concerned. The first letter I wish to read is as follows:

Is it possible that Mr. Bennett is going to cut the salaries of those who have hardly enough to live? I am a widow with three children, all of them going to school yet. I earn $900 a year. I pay $20 a month rent. I have managed to live with $55 a month but I have deprived myself of every pleasure; not even a picture show for years, but I was glad to do it. I managed to get an insurance policy to protect my dear little ones if anything happens to me. $7.50 less per month means years of sacrifices and privations for nothing, as I will be unable to continue to pay the premium. It would be different if I was alone, but there are the children. Can you do anything to stop this and see that justice is done?

You might as well stand on the beach and command the sea to stay where is it as try to stop this! This is somewhat different from the "pinched" lady who lived in security and comfort! But in order to have the Prime Minister even up with me, I shall read another letter:

As you are one of our representatives I suppose I have the right to write to you. I was interested to see the letter from the nice lady civil servant who was glad to be "pinched" to please the Prime Minister and save the country. I wonder if she gets the same kind of a pinch as I do? I am the wife of a letter carrier; my husband reached his maximum $1,500 per year this year past. He had to walk many thousands of miles through all kinds of weather in order to get to that high salary. Now they are going to take $150 off. We have four children all of school age; our present monthly salary cheque, after $6.25 for superannuation and $7.40 for insurance are deducted, is $111.35. Our rent is $25 and I do not think the Prime Minister will care to live in our house. Food for six of us costs $60. Heat and light comes to another $10; we can't afford a telephone. That leaves $16.25 for clothes, doctors' bills, recreation and all other expenses.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour need not listen to this; their monthly expenses do not amount to this:

Now, comes the cut of $12.50 per month. How can the Prime Minister expect my husband and me to enthuse! There are lots more in the same position as we are, thousands of us. Maybe I am not as patriotic as the nice lady, but my husband knows something about sacrifices for his country. He served for three years in the trenches in France. He risked his life then, like so many others and would do it again, but just the same the Prime Minister's horizontal idea of British fair play is not the kind that I was taught.

Would it not be more Christian and fair all around if some of the millionaires—like the Prime Minister—and many other Canadian wealthy men would give up some of their many luxuries before making us give up our bare necessities?

The Prime Minister also said that he as well as all the other members of his cabinet had received similar letters from many civil servants, stating that they desired to make contributions in this time of stress. When this matter was under discussion before, the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) was speaking. At that time there were only a few ministers of the crown in their seats. The hon. member for South Perth asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) how many letters he had received, and he replied: "None came to my department." The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) said the same thing. Those were the only two ministers who were present on that occasion. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman, after having put on the street hundreds of employees of the Interior department, a large number of temporary employees, nearly 200 employees of the Department of National Defence and eighty-five employees of the Department of Public Works, after reducing the salaries of 12,000 civil servants in Ottawa; does not feel like opening the doors of his apartments and hearing what these workers of yesterday, the unemployed of to-day, have to say, rather than fall into rapturous ecstasy over the writings of a "pinched" lady. I wish just to paraphrase those famous words that have oft been quoted in this house. "Let him open his door to the destitute widows, to the despairing fathers, to the imploring mothers, to the starving children. Let him for one day take contact with those who suffer. Let him take contact for one day with human misery! Then, were but one fibre of humanity left in the right hon. gentleman, he could not but put an end to this orgy of dismissals and of salary reductions." I think the words of the Latin poet are appropriate at this time:

Quos Jupiter vult perdere, dementat prius!

The Prime Minister came to Ottawa in July, 1930. He came to deliver what might be called the most important pronouncement of the Liberal-Conservative campaign in the political centre of Canada, the capital city. He came here for a distinct purpose: certainly it was not for the purpose of helping the Liberal cause throughout Canada: it was not for the purpose of helping the two Liberal candidates in this city. Throughout the campaign he had been most lavish in his promises, but when he came to Ottawa there was no use in offering bridges, because we have all the bridges we need. There was no use offering free ports, because the Georgian Bay canal has not been built. He came to the city of Ottawa, the heart of the civil service of Canada, and so he talked of the civil service. This is what he is reported as having said, amongst others things:

Here dwell those who administer the departments of state. Here the major part of government is transacted. I have had a brief experience as a minister of the crown, but long as a member of parliament, and I would like to take the opportunity—

He never found the opportunity during the long time he was a member of parliament.

—of stating that the service rendered by the members of the government service in Ottawa has been and is invaluable.

That was no news to us in Ottawa, but it was a compliment well deserved and graciously expressed. He continued:

It has been said of the British civil service that it provides the stabilizing influence of government. That is true in Canada.

That was once true in Canada, but it is no longer true, not since the Prime Minister has started on his campaign of dismissal, salary reductions and general disruption of the service. He continued:

Good judgment and experience have always been placed at the service of the country. Canada must retain the services of its best brains.

Are we to infer from that that all those who have been retired, or will be retired, are the worst brains or have no brains at all? But that of course, was said on the eve of an election. He goes on:

We have them here—

Certainly, we know that.

—and we must see to it that those who forsake the greater remuneration of private business and turn a deaf ear to the insistent calls and temptations of other countries, are not asked to pay too high a price for the loyalty and devotion which belongs to us.

But we must not forget this was said on the eve of an election. He talked then of loyalty and devotion! What does he say this year? At page 561 of Hansard of this year, introducing the bill providing for the salary cut, the Prime Minister said:

They could command a larger compensation in other walks of life, yet in these days it is apparent that the compensation given is not so much out of line as some people have thought. There is a measure of security of employment; there is a certainty of not too long hours.

In 1930 he talked of loyalty and devotion, and now he talks of security of employment and not too long hours. On the eve of the election he talked of "turning down higher salaries" in the outside world, and now he says that "the compensation is not so much out of line." O tempora, O mores! Loyalty and devotion on the twenty-sixth of July, 1930, and security of employment and not too long hours in 1932! Why, Mr. Speaker, speaking of security of employment, since the Prime Minister started his campaign of dismissals, you could not get Lloyd's or any other insurance agency for any premium to insure the security of a position in the civil service.

The Prime Minister also said:

I make no distinction of class or race; it applies to all.

Why bring that up? He also said:

The civil service contains men and women equal to those in any part of the world.

Of course, that was said on the twenty-sixth of July, 1930, on the eve of an election. It looked then as though better remuneration for the civil service were in the offing. But to-day the Prime Minister says:

We must not ask them to sacrifice their future entirely.

No, Mr. Speaker, we do not ask them to risk their future, but we order them arbitrarily by means of this legislation to risk their future and everything that is sacred to them. But we are not to-day on the eve of an election. The Prime Minister continued:

That is equally true of those in the lower grades.

That was on the eve of an election, on the twenty-sixth of July. The Prime Minister knew that a large proportion of the civil servants belonged to the lower grades. He went on:

They are one in the great machinery that moves the government of Canada, everyone of them discharging as they do their duty and obligation to this country, and we render them homage for so doing.

We render homage—
—the gallant knight—
O see him stand
His hat in hand,
His heart on his sleeve,
On this election eve.

Yes, that was on the twenty-sixth of July, on the eve of an election. But to-day the army of the dismissed and of those about to be dismissed now returns the gallant knight's homage, and in the words of the Roman gladiators about to enter the fatal arena they now cry, Ave Caesar! Morituri te salutant! Hail Caesar! Those about to die salute thee!

The lower grades! When the members on this side of the house said that the exemption of five per cent to those earning less than $1,200 and who paid into the superannuation fund was a sop, no truer word was spoken. When I asked the hon. Minister of Finance how many civil servants there were in receipt of $1,200 or less, he answered at page 901 of Hansard that there were 16,408. That seemed a formidable number. It seemed as though an army of civil servants would receive the benefit of the five per cent exemption. But I subsequently asked him how many of the 16,408 paid into the superannuation fund and how many into the retirement fund, and he answered that 5,550 were paying into the superannuation fund and 550 into the retirement fund.

Subsection 2 of clause 5 of the bill makes it quite clear that the five per cent exemption will apply only to those who pay into the superannuation fund, and will not apply to those who pay into any other fund. So, after all, the benefit of the five per cent exemption will apply only to 5,550 civil servants earning $1,200 or less, and will not apply to 10,858 civil servants with a remuneration of $1,200 or less. It means that 10,858 civil servants with a remuneration of $1,200 or less will be called upon to pay the full ten per cent.

O ye employees of the lower grades! On the eve of the election the Prime Minister rendered thee homage, but to-day, two years later, he cuts your salaries by ten per cent.

The Prime Minister also said on the twenty-sixth of July:

I am not here to-night to make that kind of preelection promises.

Oh, no! On that sultry evening, butter would not melt in the mouth of the right hon. gentleman. He said:

All I say is they are the same promises I have given to the people of Canada.

Don't the civil servants know it? Promises of what? Bridges, free ports, highways, and not least, the promise to end unemployment. The Prime Minister said:

I promise to deal fairly by them.

And the report in the Ottawa Journal shows that statement was greeted with cheers. To-day that ought to be changed to tears. The Prime Minister went on to say:

To see that they have justice, and as a great chieftain of my party once said, a fair day's wage for a fair day's work.

That was true in those days, Mr. Speaker, but to-day there is not a fair day's work to be had in order to give one a fair day's pay. Here is another gem:

I have long since by personal investigation—

The right hon. gentleman has always been very strong on personal investigation:

—satisfied myself that all is not well to the extent that they would have it—

That is, that the civil servants had cause for complaint. He went on:

—and from my investigations and they are considerable—

Nothing small about the Prime Minister:

—I have concluded—

What did he conclude? After these numerous personal investigations, and they were considerable, what did he find? Did he find that there was overlapping, overmanning, money being squandered? No, Mr. Speaker, he did not find that. All he found on the eve of the election was "All is not well to the extent that they, the civil servants, would have it." If there was overmanning at that time, surely his considerable and numerous personal investigations should have revealed it to the right hon. gentleman. If there was anything wrong at that time, why did he not find it out in his numerous personal investigations? If he did find out anything wrong, why did he not say so? Why did he wait until the introduction of this measure to say that there was overmanning and overlapping in the civil service? He did not then use these words which are to be found in Hansard of the twenty-sixth of February, 1932, at page 560:

That does not detract from the value of the service that is rendered by the painstaking and thoughtful men and women who serve the state with loyalty, and who do not look upon their positions merely as an opportunity to enable them to see what they can get from the treasury, but there are those who take that attitude, and ultimately that matter must be determined by suitable and proper investigation.

The right hon. gentleman did not find that out on the twenty-sixth of July, 1930, or if he did, he did not say so. Well, after his personal investigations, what did the Prime Minister conclude? He concluded (1) to add to the Civil Service Commission a member chosen from the ranks of the service itself; (2) to have the merit system rigidly adhered to; (3) to have a survey of all the civil service with a view to a proper reclassification, and the Prime Minister said "Such action will be taken at once, and not nine years hence." I will end unemployment, the Prime Minister said, and unemployment two years afterwards has not been ended. Nor has the Prime Minister made any attempt as yet to have the service reclassified. The Prime Minister also promised an amendment to the Superannuation Act to ensure equitable operation. But that was on the eve of the election, and no amendment of the sort has yet been brought down.

Just before I conclude I should like to put on Hansard a verse that I have just received:

The Psalm of Bennett

Bennett is my shepherd, I am in want,
He maketh me to lie down on park benches,
He leadeth me beside still factories,
He restoreth my doubt in the Conservative party.
He leadeth me in the paths of destruction,
For his party's sake.
Yea, though I walk in the valley of the shadow of debt
I will fear much evil, for thou art against me.
The politicians and profiteers, they frighten me.
Thou preparest a reduction in my salary before me
In the presence of mine enemies.
Thou anointest my income with taxes;
My expenses runneth over my income.
Surely unemployment and poverty
Will follow me all the days of the Conservative administration
And I shall live in a rented house forever.

For the reasons I have indicated I repeat that I am absolutely opposed to any cut in the salaries of the civil servants of Canada. I realize a considerable number of hon. members in this house feel that some reduction should be made; still I cannot agree with them.

An hon. MEMBER: The cup runneth over.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do believe that the cuts should be graded, and I honestly and sincerely believe that if those who interrupt me were as free to speak their will as they are to make interruptions, if they were as free to stand up and express their own views, they too would say that the reductions should be graded. I dare not use the word I had intended to use because it would not be parliamentary, but I say they are not brave enough to stand up and state their views.

If I cannot prevent the passage of this measure, if the vote in favour of the reduction is to be taken, I am driven to a middle course. I therefore move seconded by my colleague from Ottawa:

That all the words after the word "That" in the said motion be struck out and the following words substituted therefor:

"the said bill be not now read a second time, but that this house is of opinion that any deduction from the salaries of public servants by way of a fixed percentage applying indiscriminately to all such salaries, except as to those under $1,200 as provided for in the said bill, is unfair, inequitable, and unjust; and that any proposal to make such deduction should have regard to the cost of maintaining a decent standard of living.

Mr. T. F. AHEARN (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, in seconding the amendment proposed by my colleague the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier), I, like him, felt that I was proposing the lesser of two evils. Dismissals and reductions should come last of all and not in the middle of the government's efforts to retrench. To-day, coming as they have at the beginning of retrenchment, they have shaken the morale of the civil servants of Canada. The Prime Minister of Canada has said that the horizontal cut of ten per cent should be received gladly and patriotically—

Mr. ROBINSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. AHEARN: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ROBINSON: I am wondering if my hon. friend is speaking for the civil servants in the border cities, because if he is he is wrong.

Mr. AHEARN: We have heard of the kindly old lady who wrote to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) the letter which has since become so famous. The general public and the civil servants, however, are entitled to seek the cause of this legislation, and I have no doubt they will find that it is brought about through the failure of the high tariff policy of the Conservative party to cure the depression which is at the root of our trouble. To my way of thinking the so-called cut is simply a ten per cent extra income tax imposed upon public servants. Elementary economics teach us that taxation shall not be imposed on one particular class or community. Practical politics are found often to be diametrically opposed to that principle, and all through history isolated classes and communities have been specially picked out and made to suffer, as are the civil servants in Ottawa to-day. This is nothing new.

In August, 1930, the government changed its tune. Formerly it had said that the growing depression in Canada was due solely to alleged Liberal misrule, but in August it announced that the condition in Canada was only part of a growing world depression. I think the choice then presented itself of either advising private industry in Canada to maintain wages and salaries and thereby to maintain spending power, or to do the reverse. The government chose to cut down salaries and dismiss employees. It must take the responsibility of giving a very definite lead to private industry throughout Canada. No government can escape that responsibility.

The example the government has set as to dismissals and salary cuts has been followed throughout Canada. This is a bankers' policy of deflation; it is being carried to an extreme, and the end is not in sight. If the government had called a conference of employers late in the year 1930 and had made an appeal to them, as did President Hoover of the United States, to maintain spending power by maintaining wages in my opinion Canada would be in a better position than it is to-day. Only private concerns already facing financial difficulties would have failed to follow that lead.

Very often hon. members in this house have quoted letters and books in support of their arguments. Instead of that I purpose to speak from my personal experience in some companies with which I am connected.

I happen to be a director of several Ottawa companies, and I am glad to say that more than two-thirds of those companies up to the present time have not reduced their pay-rolls or the number of their employees. Among these is the largest company with which I am connected. These companies decided that the maintenance of spending power in Ottawa would, in the net result, benefit them more than the discharge of employees, provided red figures could be kept at a reasonable distance from their ledgers. Another company of which I am a director, even before 1930, was worrying about the red figures in its ledgers, and the directors decided that the service must be cut down by 30 per cent, or if the regular number of employees was to be maintained that the employees and management must take a ten per cent cut. There was an agreement that either one or the other course must be adopted. There was also unanimous agreement, however, that only one and not both of these courses would be followed. This company was operating in a position different from the others because it was working on a fixed tariff, extending over a period of years, its reserves were depleted and its borrowing powers were therefore much restricted. But it did not cut wages and dismiss employees as well; it did not, as an hon. member of this house characteristically stated, cut wages and also discharge forty per cent of its employees. A reference to the bureau of statistics will disclose the fact that the number of employees of this company has remained practically the same, except for the usual seasonal variation.

The government cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be compared to a private company experiencing financial difficulties. No private concern has such enormous powers of borrowing or of taxation, yet the company of which I speak—and I know there are many others like it—chose to cut wages rather than discharge employees during the continued depression. The government of Canada is doing both, and I think that is the important point that should be remembered by this house. I do not think the actions of the big companies are absolutely typical of what is happening in Canadian industry; thousands of employers in Canada are maintaining employment and wages in spite of falling revenues, and those in charge of these concerns think they are doing a helpful and a patriotic work.

What will be the reaction to the lead of the government? What are employers in Canada going to think? Unless I am very much mistaken they will decide that the government would not adopt this course if it had any real hope that its policies would get this country back to normal within a reasonable time. How can this cold-hearted and panic-stricken move of discharging men and women and reducing wages be viewed except as a confession of failure? That is what the business men who have been maintaining wages and employment are saying to-day. They are also wondering, I think, if they should delay very much longer in making cuts and dismissals, following the lead of the government, because naturally they feel that if the depression is going to last for several years they had better lay up reserves. I think the government is setting an example which will have its effect in every constituency in Canada. How many hon. members will be able to return next session and say that men and women were not dismissed as a result of the example given by the government, and that as a result the purchasing power in their own constituencies has not been further contracted?

I suppose the action of the government will be popular with a certain type of individual, and it may be approved by a certain type of farmer. But it is a distinct threat to the farm hand, and no one who works for a wage or salary can fail to see the threat to that wage or salary in the wide-open invitation that the government is giving every employer in this country to-day.

For over two years the President of the United States has followed the policy of asking private industry to maintain wages and salaries and thus help maintain purchasing power. The president has never deviated from this policy, and I believe that as a result hundreds of thousands of people in the United States are at work to-day instead of walking the streets. Only a few weeks ago President Hoover let it be known through the press of the country that he wished civil service salaries maintained, and he stated that he would veto any bills coming before him which had in view the reduction of salaries. I think no one in the United States is more anxious to bring into effect every reasonable measure of economy possible, but the president would not consent to the reduction of salaries. I am told the United States treasury faces a deficit of about two billion dollars, but in spite of that fact the president evidently realizes what an unwise lead to private industry would mean. I should like to quote from an article appearing in the Literary Digest of January 23, 1932, headed, "Swinging the Economy Axe." I think this illustrates my point:

> Four representatives introduced bills to slash the pay of federal employees, who number more than 600,000. But President Hoover, strongly as he advocates economy, let it be known that he would veto any bill to reduce government workers' pay. He feels, the correspondent tells us, that such action would impair the efficiency of federal departments. . . .

This is the big point:

> . . . . and set a bad example in private industry.

The Minister of Finance speaks of the $8,000,000 that will be saved by this special and extra income tax. What about the direct losses it is bound to cause? The government cannot make dismissals and wage cuts without this action being reflected in the national revenue. It will be almost impossible to compute, but I believe the loss to the treasury in the end will over-balance the gain, and the government will have a residue of unemployment, misery and discontent with which to deal.

I do not propose to enlarge upon the despair and the misery which will be caused to so many people in the city of Ottawa by the policy of the government as contained in this bill. I can only say that we feel it too deeply to say very much about it. Who can stand up and honestly say he believes this horizontal cut is equitable? Let us consider the case of a mail carrier receiving we will say $1,350 a year. First he gets a ten per cent cut, and then he loses his statutory increase, which makes a total loss of about $255. In addition he must pay five per cent of his salary to the superannuation fund. Then let us consider the contribution of the cabinet ministers under this special income tax. On taking office their salary was $10,000 per year which, with their sessional indemnity of $4,000, gave them an income of $14,000. On that amount they will pay $1,400 by this special income tax. Since taking office in 1930 the ministers have had their government cars taken away from them by the edict of the Prime Minister and to make up for that the head of the state showed great compassion and allowed each minister $2,000 per year in lieu of a car. I understand that this amount is not taxed. Fifty dollars a month, or $600 a year, will pay for a great many taxi rides, and we have some very luxurious taxis in Ottawa. Of course we are always delighted to see members of the cabinet on the Ottawa street cars, because it shows that they still have some spark of democracy left. Now consider the mail carrier and the twenty per cent contribution he is asked to make, and then consider hon. ministers. How can any man with any regard for equity and justice defend this bill? When you come to figure the financial sacrifice, it is the amount a man has left that counts.

When speaking on the resolution on which this bill is based, the Prime Minister referred to some remarks which I had addressed a few days previously to the Ottawa Liberal Twentieth Century Club. The right hon. gentleman chose to say that I was making political capital; I choose to say that I stated facts. I suppose that what aroused the right hon. gentleman was the statement that the Liberals expect to win the traditional and almost sacred Tory county of Carleton, which has always selected a Conservative, no matter what his record in public life might be.

Ever since the ten per cent extra income tax was first announced by the Prime Minister, it has, I think, been quite apparent that every effort by the Liberal members to express disagreement with this bill has been met with the cry, "This is making political capital". The Ottawa newspaper supporting the government, or one that used to support it, set up that cry. When the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), who spoke from the heart, pleaded for those unfortunate men of the Royal Canadian Air Force who will soon be walking the streets, his successor in office replied to the effect that he was making political capital; and this was said in such unparliamentary language that I could not repeat his exact words without falling foul of you, Mr. Speaker.

If making political capital has suddenly become a major offence, does the right hon. gentleman think that his record in that respect entitles him to reprimand or rebuke anybody? Does he imagine that his remarks during the last general election campaign are gone and forgotten? Am I to take it that not one hon. member sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, will attempt to make political capital out of this bill if it passes, nor that one Conservative newspaper will make any attempt in that direction? We on this side of the house, as a matter of fact, are not worried very much about making political capital, because hardly a week passes in these strenuous days when the right hon. gentleman himself does not supply us with all that we require.

To very many civil servants in the constituency which I represent, the passing of this bill will mean a double income tax. To the people of Ottawa it will mean the drying-up of purchasing power. To those unfortunate men and women whom the government is letting out, it will mean misery and privation. What a far cry from July, 1930: "We will end unemployment." Whoever thought that those who raised that cry would actually cause unemployment? The city of Ottawa, in a business sense, has been very adversely affected by the government's action in respect to the civil service. Perhaps nothing that has been done has so adversely affected the city as this government's statement that a survey will be made to ascertain whether further dismissals cannot be made. That statement hangs like the sword of Damocles over the head of every civil servant and, to a lesser degree, over the heads of all the citizens of the capital of Canada. What is to become of the men and women who are being dismissed? If another $150,000,000 is to be spent by the dominion and provincial governments and by the municipalities under the same conditions that have obtained up to now, it means on the average less than a month's employment in the year, and at small wages.

This government came into power because it promised to end unemployment, and today, in spite of its election promise, the government of Canada is leading the way in cold-hearted dismissals of civil servants, and, in addition to that, it is bringing in this wage cut. In 1933 or 1934, when this parliament is dissolved and the Tory party composes its bedtime story for the campaign, does the right hon. gentleman imagine that the people of Ottawa will believe him again? If he does, he had better recall what President Lincoln had to say with regard to the extent of the people's credulity.

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull): Speaking to the resolution on March 3, I stated that the government, in introducing this legislation, was certainly setting a bad example to private industries, to contractors and to municipal and provincial governments. I did not think I was making any mistake in that regard, because I felt that private companies would certainly follow the example set by the government. I regret to say that my prediction has been justified. I have here an article that appeared in the Citizen of April 2 under the heading "Lower Wage Rates in effect by May is New Decision." I understand that contractors in the city of Ottawa decided at a meeting to follow the government's example. Let me quote exactly what was published in the Citizen:

"The contractors and other employers of labour in the building industries of this city have been considering for some time the relative value of the wages paid to employees in this industry, as compared with the existing cost of living, together with the cuts in salaries that have, and are, taking place in other occupations throughout the city. Finding the rate per hour is entirely too high in proportion, and also finding that under existing rates it is almost impossible for a prospective builder to receive any return whatsoever upon a commercial building, we feel that under the present conditions the public at large is paying too much for the necessary repairs and improvements that have to be done to keep their existing property from deterioration."

"We also consider that the existing rate, as paid to labour on civic work, is far too high, and take this opportunity of protesting against our civic authorities paying from five to fifteen cents per hour more than the rate paid by other industries. Having the interests of the public in view, the contractors have decided that the existing rates will be reduced from five to twenty-five cents per hour to take effect on May 2 next. It is our sincere hope that the residents of this city and district will appreciate the fact that it will give them the opportunity of having their work done at a greatly reduced cost, as already prices of materials have been materially reduced. The contractors feel, that, with these new rates, they will be greatly assisting the Mayor, J. J. Allen, in his commendable 'Work and Buy Campaign.'"

I certainly was not surprised at this move on the part of the contractors of Ottawa. I said on March 3 that I had been requested not only by the Liberal electors of my riding but also by the Conservative Association to protest against this legislation. One of the reasons given by these associations was the one I have given, namely, that if the federal authorities sought to save $8,000,000 by means of a horizontal cut of ten per cent, that example soon would be followed by private enterprises.

The employees of the E. B. Eddy Company in my own city suffered a cut last year, and although I cannot certify to my information, I understand that this company intends to make a further cut this year. This is the largest concern in my constituency and ordinarily it gives employment to a considerable number of people. In addition to a cut in wages last year, these employees are to-day working only part time and are faced with a further cut.

The hardships borne by the civil servants in Ottawa and Hull do not seem to be known to the authorities. Over 12,000 civil servants in Ottawa and 500 in Hull will suffer this horizontal cut. Those receiving less than $1,200 per year will suffer the cut but have their superannuation paid. I believe the service will suffer because of this reduction. These men and women have been allowed to think that their salaries would be increased year by year, but this year they are not to receive the usual increase and are to suffer a reduction as well. As I said before, there are 4,000 employees in this city and vicinity who receive $100 or less per month, and these people will face a reduction of $60 in their annual salary. As stated by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) the prices of fuel, rent, mortgage interest and other contractual obligations have not decreased, but in fact have risen during the past year or so. Only three days ago the Department of Public Works dismissed 102 of its temporary employees, and many of these employees who live in my city are to-day in the ranks of the unemployed. I have cited already the case of a father of eight children who after being appointed temporarily to this department decided to buy a home for his family. He invested all the cash he had saved at the time and assumed an obligation which to-day amounts to about $1,200. This man will not only suffer the loss of his position but must face the possibility of finding himself and his family out on the street. I have made representations to the department in this connection, but so far have obtained no results.

There is no use trying to find work in my city, as at present there are 3,000 unemployed. Some three or four hundred men receive one week's work per month, and the remaining 2,600 have no work and must live on charity. During last winter the city of Hull with the assistance of the provincial and federal authorities spent over $19,000 per month on direct relief. This will show to a certain extent what hardships this cut in the salaries will work on my constituents.

We in the province of Quebec are not used to these cuts in salary. The provincial government has taken drastic steps to balance its budget but it has never for one moment thought of reducing the salaries of its employees. As a representative of the city of Hull and one interested in the support of all those working in the service, I wish to renew my protest against this bill.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, since this bill was presented I must confess that the more I think of it, the less I think of it. I wish the government would bring down something which I could support. For three or four weeks I have been opposing a most objectionable relief bill and now I am faced with another bill which is almost as odious. I have not been able to discover one redeeming feature in this legislation, unless it be the five per cent sop which is given to the lower grades. This is nothing less than an admission of the soundness of the graduated system; in fact, it condemns the bill itself.

I think there has been only one minister who has stood up to defend this bill, and no wonder. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) undertook to defend it, and being the experienced and capable man he is in parliamentary practice and debate, it may seem like presumption for me to criticize his criticism. It was really a lamentable case he put up in support of the bill. I congratulate him for trying to father it, because before that it had been an orphan so far as the rear guard Tory forces of the house were concerned.

The minister said there was no difficulty in securing men and women for the lower classifications, while there is difficulty in securing and retaining those in the higher classifications. What does that mean? It means that it does not matter much about the lower grades because, according to the minister, or as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Beynon) said the other day, "we can go out on the street and pick them up any old time." The higher classes are nurtured more carefully because they cannot be got every day and the government cannot be sure of keeping them. These reasons given by the Minister of Finance in support of this bill are not those which should be expected from a gentleman of his parts, and I do not think he really holds that view. If I am putting a wrong interpretation upon his remarks I wish he would correct me right now.

Mr. RHODES: We are not in committee.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I never did think a maritime Tory was just quite as bad as an Ontario Tory, but what am I to think now?

The higher classes are being taken care of because there is difficulty in replacing them. That is given to us as a profound reason for supporting the bill. It was stated also that those in the higher grades donated to the income tax. Why should they not pay in both instances? To state that there should be a sort of saw-off because they are hit by the income tax is absolutely absurd. If lower classification escapes a cut, the minister said, a greater burden is thrown on the public. That was thought to be a cincher, but it is not. The same revenue can be secured out of the civil service on the principle of graduated cut, provided it is sharper at the higher salaries. So that is another piece of—what shall I call it?—nothing offensive, but a sort of highclass bit of piffle.

A graduated cut makes many inequalities, one at every grade, argues the minister. Of course it does. My hon. friend argues that it is better to have one great big differentiation between the lower and the higher paid ones than to have a number of small graduations. I never before heard that principle enunciated. If that were sound, how would you get along with your income tax graduation? How would you get along with all the grading in our wheat and cereals generally and other farm products? The closer the grades are together, the fairer the system, and the nearer you get to a sound and just graduated system. The same is true in this instance, but my good friend must have been in desperate straits when he pointed out that you would have a little inequality between each grade. If that is sound, how is it that every government that I know of except this one and one other, has had a graduated rather than a flat rate system of salary cut? Is his government right because it stands alone? Or is it wrong because this principle is unsound and has been proved to be so? I am very much disappointed with the Minister of Finance because I admire him greatly. What kind of defence would his colleagues and supporters have made if they had attempted to give one? They surely would have muffed it badly, because the bill is indefensible.

I am interested in this matter, not because I have in my constituency any more civil servants than any other member has in his I think I have one, but I take this ground, which I have always taken: I do not want to profess I have a tremendous amount of experience, but I cannot help having some. One who has been in parliament so long, whether he has made the best of his opportunities or not, cannot but have some knowledge of the civil service and the important part it plays in the affairs of government. Since I have entered parliament I have heard the veriest nonsense talked in all parts of the house except perhaps from the corner to my left which is so eloquently silent now. We have heard about the civil service of Ottawa, the silk stockinged brigade on Wellington and Metcalfe streets and that sort of thing. Because the staff dressed respectably, it was apparently thought they were not doing anything. I am sorry to admit that long years ago—I shall not say how long—I used to hold such opinions myself; but when we grow up we try to absorb some knowledge of affairs, although apparently some members opposite have not yet done so. I take the ground that it is more important to have a first class civil service staff and a second rate government, such as we have, than to have a second rate staff and a first class government, such as we have not. I do not want to put the government in the second or third class; I shall just say an inexperienced government. We all have to be freshmen at some time or another and gain by experience, but there is not very much evidence of that experience developing yet in our hon. friends opposite. After long years on my farm in hiring men and women and my experience in the government of Saskatchewan as well as some here, I feel strongly about securing the very best staff that money will buy, using them well, paying them well and then expecting good service from them. That pays every time. At this time above all others it seems to me that principle should be carried out. But we are told the country's finances are bad; the budget must be balanced and therefore we have to go after the civil service staff and try to practise economy—that kind of so-called economy. I do not think that is economy at all. It is, as the old saying goes, saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung; penny wise and pound foolish.

Lest I be thought wrong, let me call to the support of my contention some of the findings and sayings of the Beatty commission. I do not think anybody has cast any reflection upon the capacity of that commission to deal with the question of civil service salaries; my only regret is that these findings have not all been carried out. I am sorry to have to quote, but this is so good it is worth while, and lest my stand be challenged, I wish to support it with this testimony. I read this from page 9 of the report of the Beatty commission:

> The formal distinction between the legislative and executive branches of government, between parliament on the one hand and the cabinet controlling administration on the other, obscures but it does not alter the fact that efficient parliamentary government is only possible when the decisions embodied in statutory form are made effective throughout the Dominion by a body of trained administrators and experts. Until well within the nineteenth century, there was no country which possessed a trained civil service.

Therefore the importance and efficacy of our work in this legislative chamber depend upon a trained civil service staff to carry on the administrative services. Otherwise our legislation would be of no effect; we might as well have so much waste paper. Thus the administrative arm of government as represented by the civil service staff is a most important part of government. Because of that, this is not the time to weaken that arm; this is the wrong time to do so. Then on page 10 of the Beatty commission report, I find this:

> Throughout our inquiries, we have been impressed by the character of the work now done in the civil service of Canada. In accord with the highest traditions to be found elsewhere, its own tradition demands the faithful performance of his duties by the individual, though the results of the work done, however important they may be, do not accrue directly to him, either in the form of wealth, or, as a rule, in the form of public recognition.
> It is the service as a whole, whose prestige is increased, or whose influence for good is extended, when work of outstanding merit is performed; and it is within the service only that the individual worker obtains his reward. His reward is not in material advantage, but in the recognition and approbation of his fellow workers.

He gets merely a salary and the state gets the advantage and profit which is sometimes very great, of his work. On page 11 I find the following:

> The importance of the responsibilities devolving upon the scientific workers in the Department of Agriculture, for example, it is almost impossible to exaggerate. In these days, when improvement of the quality of farm products is all important, their work is of lasting benefit to every farmer practising scientific agriculture, and to every organization marketing farm products. Much the same may be said, in a very different field, of the research work carried on in the Department of Mines by the staff of the Geological Survey and others. Many mining camps in Canada have presented new mining and metallurgical problems, upon the solution of which the development and economic use of their ores has depended.

That bears out my contention in full. Let me supplement it by another quotation from page 13 of the report:

> In the course of discussions with deputy ministers and others who appeared to give evidence, we were impressed with the keenness and ability of many of the senior officers in the service. Their calibre is proof—if proof be needed—that in the past the civil service has been successful in enlisting and retaining men of first-rate ability, despite the relatively moderate remuneration. We do not feel the same assurance, however, that it will continue successfully to recruit or hold such men in the future, unless conditions of employment and prospects of advancement in the service can be simplified and improved considerably.

That was said about two years ago, but the Beatty commission at that time took the ground, just as the Minister of Finance did, that it was difficult to hold good men, and they were fearful then that they would not be able to hold them. Conditions have since changed rapidly, not due entirely to our friends opposite coming into power, of course, but reading this report I am bound to ask myself and the house this question: Are the conditions surrounding the civil service to-day conducive to holding men and getting good service, when the axe is now uplifted and threatening to strike at any time? The Prime Minister said that there were still too many in the civil service. Who knows who is going to be the next victim? Under such conditions how can you possibly get the maximum service from a staff, no matter how good it is?

I think I have quoted sufficiently from the Beatty report to show that the Beatty commission, a recognized authority, more than confirms what I said about the importance of the civil service. What did they say would be the cost of putting their recommendations into operation? They say:

> We estimate that the net additional cost in the first year will be approximately $360,000; and the total additional cost, when adjustment is completed, approximately $750,000 annually.

That would have secured the salary increases that were recommended for these 2,500 members of the scientific and technical service. A new classification was also made recommending increased salaries to various classes, but I shall not dwell on that except to say that the increases recommended run all the way from ten to forty per cent of an increase for the 2,500 members of the technical staff. Then there was that vast body of civil servants comprising some fifty or sixty thousand whose salaries were also under consideration by the Beatty commission, with a view to having the salaries adjusted upwards or downwards as the case might be, although it was generally expected that the revision would be upwards.

There is another class of civil servants, the research workers on the staff of the bureau of research. These men are doing very, very important work. The then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) was organizing the bureau just about the time the Beatty commission started their investigation, and I observe that the Beatty commission in their interim report urged that the increases for the staff of the research bureau be granted right away. That recommendation was carried out by the government, and it applied to about thirty or forty research men. They got their increase. Why? So that Doctor Tory and the Hon. Mr. Malcolm would be in a position to attract the very best men that good money could secure. By giving these men their raise right away, we got a good staff. Where is the fairness in applying a straight ten per cent salary cut to these men, who got their increase, and to the 2,500 technical men who were recommended for an increase by the Beatty commission, ranging all the way from ten to forty per cent, and who did not get it? And applying the cut also to that other great body of civil servants whose salaries were under consideration by the Beatty commission and who have received no increases, whose cases have not even been dealt with yet? I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that you could pick up sixteen men from the highways and by-ways who would make a worse muff of this job than has been made by this government. I cannot conceive that it would be possible.

How did the government go about it? I must largely absolve the Minister of Finance of blame, because at the time the decision was hastily made I do not think he was Minister of Finance. We know, of course, that estimates are dealt with a considerable time before the house meets, so the present Minister of Finance could not have had very much to do with it. There could be only one man responsible, and I do not think there is another man in Canada who would have thought of dealing with this matter in the way he has dealt with it. That one man, I am sorry to admit, is the Prime Minister. He made up his mind that the salaries of the civil servants were too high, and that ten per cent must come off, and without giving them a chance even to make a squawk the head comes right off by the shoulder. You must have noticed in your boyhood, Mr. Speaker, having been brought up on a farm—nearly everybody in politics claims to have been brought up on a farm—that when you go out and cut the head off a cockerel—the axe is a very unscientific but a very sure way of doing the job—when the head is severed from the body the cockerel's mouth opens and gives a last gasp. That gasp is not very effectual. It is somewhat guttural, and accomplishes nothing. Now the civil service heads were cut off right by the shoulder before they were given an opportunity even to squawk. Of course the Prime Minister is a courteous gentleman, and when the civil servants asked for an interview it was granted, but on the very day that we were discussing the salary cut in this house the civil servants' representatives trooped into a room in this building to present their views. Just imagine! Does any class of people in the world deserve that kind of treatment by the Prime Minister of the country? I submit that they do not. Kicked around like old boots; that is what they were. The rest of the government must bear their share of the responsibility, however, whether they had anything to do with it or not, and they are bearing it and trying lamely to defend the government's course. The civil servants troop in and present their case to the Prime Minister, although it is already all over. Does the government think that the morale of these men will be improved by such treatment? Does the government think that the ship of state will be any safer in their hands, especially when the axe is still suspended over their heads? I lack words, Mr. Speaker, with which to express my utter disgust at such conduct towards such an important arm of government. I would not speak with such assurance, sir, if I did not know that that was the wrong way, from years of personal knowledge in dealing with government employees. Even if they were the most unworthy wretches under heaven, they did not deserve that kind of high handed, imperious treatment. Many of the staff are organized. Even the letter carriers and those workers who clean the rooms in this building are organized and the government could easily have consulted with them first and eased the blow. But there was another way to do it, and I am going to refer now to another Tory government to show apparently that good things can come out of Tory governments as well as bad things—I would be glad to say good things of this government and to throw a bouquet if I could only find an opportunity to do so. Up in Queen's Park, Toronto, they had the same sort of unpleasant duty to do. They desired to cut the salaries of the civil service, and how did they go about it? The premier of Ontario called in the heads of the civil service organizations. Every government should welcome every class of society that is organized, and should be ready to hear its representations on behalf of its many members. Well, in Ontario they called in the heads of the various civil service organizations and said in effect: We want you to sit down with us and assist us in doing an unpleasant duty which we think it is in the interests of the province to have done. And that was done. They did not adopt a flat rate, remember; no such nonsense as that, but a graduated system from top to bottom.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Have we heard any kick about it? Not one. What was that graduated system, Mr. Speaker? I must say I have been carrying the information around in my pocket ever since this bill came down. I find that to-night I am without it but I feel I know it well enough from memory to give some of the more important features. There was provision for a two per cent cut on the low salaries up to $1,000, and there are about ten steps in the ladder. Of course from the standpoint of the Minister of Finance that will be an objection, if he is serious. The cuts run from two per cent on small salaries to twenty-five per cent, the latter on salaries from $10,000 upwards. If such a system were adopted here all the deputies with salaries of $10,000 would receive larger cuts, and if the same scale were used in this bill the ministers would be cut about 50 per cent instead of ten per cent as at present proposed. The rate in Ontario, however, stopped at $10,000, and all salaries over that figure were taxed 25 per cent. Had the same rate continued I repeat there would have been a cut of 40 or 50 per cent on ministerial or other salaries of $20,000.

A survey of the salary cuts in Ontario raises the point that this question must have been viewed from a different angle by the provincial and federal governments. The government in Toronto viewed the matter from a fair, honest and just angle. Surely members of the federal government are not trying to save their own hides by taking the same cut as their most humble stenographer at $60 per month. If that is not the reason, what is it? What is more, Mr. Speaker, we learn from the schedules which have been worked out by the various organizations that not only are the lower paid servants to receive the same cut as the Prime Minister and his cabinet, but their cut is to be greater, even after allowing for the superannuation refund sop. In some cases the cut is greater by four per cent, depending upon the salary range. Those in the lower classifications in many cases are losing their statutory increases, plus the ten per cent. We can see the look of guilt on the faces of hon. members opposite, and especially on those of cabinet ministers, but they will commit this crime whether or not we object. We thus see that the humble charwomen and the post boys on the street are receiving greater percentage cuts than those of the cabinet ministers. This legislation is on all fours with the income tax outrage which was proposed last year by the government, but which fortunately for themselves was withdrawn. They would do well to-night if they were big enough to refrain from such a heinous crime against the lower grades of Canadian civil servants. No man living who has any heart in him at all can defend this measure; yet it will become law. Well, if there is a political gallows or a political purgatory there will certainly in due time be some contributions to it by hon. members opposite.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that the world is in sad difficulties; no wonder, if there are many governments like this one. The ship of state is in danger. We remember a short time ago that one of our passenger ships ran on a reef at Bermuda, and on that ship were some of our Ottawa civil servants. I fancy if we had been on that ship in distress we would not have submitted to a lessening of the crew or have told them that they would be given hail Columbia later on regarding their salaries. That would be the time we should encourage them to do their duty. That is what we should do now: We should encourage the staff by simple justice and improve their morale instead of the opposite as the government are doing at present.

No wonder the country is wondering what will happen next. There is only one joy left to many in Canada, and that is that of guessing what hon. gentlemen opposite are going to do next—nobody knows. I do not wish to take too much time in a discussion of this matter, but hon. gentlemen opposite know they are deserving of my criticism and that is the reason they are saying so little—they have a guilty conscience. If I were doing them an injustice they would be howling like a lot of coyotes.

So it is that instead of having a staff at its top notch of efficiency, we have one suffering a deep sense of injustice. I do not have to go round looking for evidences of their views in the matter; I can hear them from all points—I do not need my audiphone to know that; I can hear it without any trouble. Some of the staff are wondering who is going to get the axe next. They are in a state of dread and anxiety; some of them are in almost despair.

As a rule the farmer, although he may be badly off, has enough to eat. True, some of them just now have hardly that much, but the great average class of farmers do not suffer from lack of food. The same does not apply to those civil servants receiving only about $80 per month. My hon. friends opposite know perfectly well there is a prejudice against civil servants because of misinformation on the subject on the part of so many people, and some of the general public also hold the mistaken idea that civil servants do not do very much work, when as a matter of fact some of them are broken down with overwork. If we get more legislation like this, after the unemployment proposition, I do not know what may happen. Words fail to describe our indignation and disgust with this government, composed of men who are capable of better things and who know better. I have not one word to say against any member of the government as an individual, but some evil genius or evil spirit gets possession of them when they get together, and then there is the devil to pay.

Let us consider a certain family I know, consisting of two parents and four children. This man was on the canal first, until he reached his maximum of $100 a month. He was an ambitious young fellow, but he reached the limit of his salary range; children are a greater charge on the family budget as the years go by, so he decided to try to qualify for a higher classification. In order to do so, he had to go to school at night after working hard all day, but finally he started as a letter carrier at $85 a month, dropping $15 a month from his previous salary. He was given one increase, which brought his salary to about $90 a month, but while he was still getting $10 less than he had received previously, along came this legislation and he is now cut off from any further statutory increase, plus 10 per cent cut, or more than the Prime Minister is cut.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It seemed very short, Mr. Speaker; I hope it seemed as short to your honour and those to whom I regretfully directed my remarks.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Before this amendment is put, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should say just a word, even at this late hour. May I pay my respects to my hon. friend from Melville (Mr. Motherwell) who, perhaps unwittingly, paid me a very great compliment when he suggested that I might reply to his argument. Although my hon. friend treats the most serious subjects with levity, and sometimes in a most entertaining fashion, I know of no hon. gentleman who asserts his views with greater vehemence. In fact, when the hon. member for Melville says a thing on his ipse dixit he rather leaves the impression with the house that the last word has been said. May I also say to my hon. friend—and I do so not unkindly—that he paid me a compliment when he said he was disappointed in the Minister of Finance. If my hon. friend had not been disappointed in me I would have been disappointed in myself, because had it been otherwise I would have been afraid something was wrong with my course of action. You can always count on my hon. friend from Melville to be against the government.

But I notice, Mr. Speaker, that even my hon. friend is not infallible in his arguments. He proceeded to find fault with me because of an argument I used during an earlier stage of this discussion. In the first place let me say that he took from its context a sentence which I used on that occasion and put an interpretation upon it which it should not properly be given. I will let that pass for the moment, but I also brought forth the argument on that occasion with respect to the difficulty of securing permanency in the higher grades, and my hon. friend said that was mere piffle. Within two minutes the hon. gentleman proceeded to read from the report of the Beatty commission, after commending that commission as one with respect to which no criticism could be offered, and as a recognized authority. Then, if you please, one of the first things he read from that report was the very same argument I used on that previous occasion and which my hon. friend called mere piffle.

There would be some merit in my hon. friend's argument if he were right in his assumption that this is a salary reduction. It is nothing of the sort, and I want to make that point very clear. The bill itself says in terms that this is for one year, and the government has repeatedly asserted that the idea is to ask for a contribution from the civil servants for one year only. No one will be more delighted than the members of the government—and I am sure I can speak for all hon. members of this house, on whatever side they sit—if a similar sacrifice is not called for in future years.

My hon. friend said that no government, admitting a cut or reduction to be necessary, would be so foolish as to follow the course taken by this government and make a level cut. Let me say to my hon. friend that the very first act of the Liberal government when it came into power in 1897, when civil servants received salaries as low as $400 a year, was to deny to them their statutory increases for that year. That applied throughout the service, to the high man and the low man, and the government did it without statute or order in council; they just did it, in defiance of the statute which said that the civil servant "shall" receive an annual increase of so much.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I ask my hon. friend if that was not the war pension that was taken away?

Mr. RHODES: No, the statutory increases of all civil servants, as provided by statute in 1896; I have described the action taken by the Liberal government in 1897.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Can my hon. friend point out a precedent in Canada for a ten per cent reduction all along the line?

Mr. RHODES: I am just using that as an illustration, to show that there was a level action taken with respect to every employee irrespective of salary; in other words, it was a straight reduction. I was merely dealing with the principle. As I said previously, if we are discussing this as a salary reduction which was to be permanent and which would have a bearing upon the salaries of civil servants I believe the matter would be entirely arguable, and for my part I would be prepared to discuss it upon its merits. But let me say again that we are asking for a contribution for this year only; this measure has no bearing upon the salary status of civil servants or upon their superannuation.

Hon. gentlemen opposite—and I do not find fault with them—have been rather at pains to take the attitude that this is rather a pleasant duty on the part of the government. I want to say that the government took this step with very great reluctance, but I also wish to point out to my hon. friend from Melville and to his associates that I have discussed the matter quite frankly with many civil servants, who realizing the gravity of the situation as it exists to-day, are prepared to make the sacrifice which the government, in the circumstances, has felt called upon to ask them to make. But I think, rather than be condemned, the government should receive some degree of commendation for taking their life in their hands and exhibiting enough courage to sponsor an unpleasant measure of this character. If we were after popularity, and wanted to help our peace of mind, we would ask for an increase in the salaries of the civil servants instead of asking that a reduction be made.

I do not propose to labour the argument at this hour of the night, especially as I discussed the question at considerable length during the better part of a day while the house was in committee on the resolution. With respect to the amendment, I have only this to say. No one knows better than my hon. friend who moved it, and who is a lawyer of parts, that irrespective of any merit there may be in the principle of the amendment itself, it simply means that if his motion were passed it would have the effect not only of defeating the bill itself but would be a direct vote of want of confidence in the government. For that reason I must say to the hon. gentleman and to the house that we are unable to accept his amendment.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the minister a question? Can I gather from his remarks that this contribution which the government is asking from the civil service and from members of parliament will be just for this year and no longer?

Mr. RHODES: For one year, that is all.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I do not intend to speak at great length on this question, but I have observed that whenever the government bring down legislation of this kind they always try to create an atmosphere for it. We have to go this way or that way, as they dictate; otherwise we are not patriotic. Now we are told that we must do what is asked here for the sake of the country. There is one gentleman who has been in the government and who has had no less a champion than the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself. Speaking at Calgary on December 31, 1930, the Prime Minister made this statement:

> I cannot leave this subject without paying tribute to the remarkable service rendered to Canada by Hon. Gideon Robertson, Minister of Labour. He has worked without regard to hours. His intimate knowledge of every part of the dominion has made him an ideal minister.

To supplement what my hon. and learned friend the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) said a few minutes ago, may I quote a decision which was given by Senator Robertson in March, 1931. His decision was stated by the Deputy Minister of Labour in a letter to the manager of the Témiscouata railway, dated Ottawa, March 2, 1931. I quote:

> As you are aware, there have been comparatively few changes in wages rates in Canada within recent months and the policy of employers in general has been to maintain existing wage scales.

About the same time an interview was published in the papers to the effect that the then Minister of Labour thought it improper to reduce wages at the time. When my hon. friend the senior member for Ottawa spoke about the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Prime Minister interjected a few remarks about that company. I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Pacific Railway has so much to do in the administration of this country; what the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway says is supposed to be infallible. Mr. Beatty is certainly a good man; at least he is supposed to be; but I do not see why we should bow down at everything he says.

My hon. friend from Hull (Mr. Fournier) made an excellent speech in which he referred to the bad example set by the government at the present time. Now we realize perfectly well that the government has some difficulty making both ends meet; that is indisputable. But why place the whole burden on the shoulders of the weak and the poor, those who have very small salaries? That is what I cannot understand. For instance, as I have said twice already and as I repeat for the third time, I expect the government itself to set an example in the way of sacrifice; but the members of the administration are protected. They saw that the business of the country was diminishing; they saw imports and exports decreasing considerably last year, and probably at that time Mr. Beatty gave word to the Prime Minister that there might be a cut in the salaries of civil servants. Then what happened? We saw that special provision was made for cars for the ministers. I do not object to ministers receiving a salary of $20,000 or $25,000 a year—and the year before last there were articles in the papers in regard to the indemnities to be paid to ministers. But such an increase should be given only in times of prosperity and not in times of stress. Yet last year there was a special allowance of $2,000 voted for cars for ministers. That allowance appears in the estimates again this year, although it has been reduced ten per cent. The salary paid to ministers was $10,000, plus their indemnity of $4,000, or a total of $14,000, and with a ten per cent reduction it would be $12,600. Now the members of the government are not in reality suffering a cut, because with the special allowance for cars they have actually $400 more than they had before. Instead of a reduction of ten per cent on $14,000, they have a reduction on $16,000, which, as I say, leaves them $400 more than formerly. And ordinary members have to pay $400 from their indemnity to help to make up that surplus. As I say, therefore, the ministers are not really suffering any cut; it is the members that suffer. The ministers have so arranged matters that they will not suffer. If the cut is for one year, and if the ministers think it is reasonable for the government to cut the salaries of poor civil servants who receive only $1,200 a year, out of which they have to pay five or ten per cent, as the case may be, would it not be fair for the members of the ministry to emulate the example of those Japanese Generals and commit hari-kari before beginning to sacrifice others? Let them begin with themselves. I think it is extraordinary for the government first to protect itself without giving a chance to poor civil servants.

If conditions were different and the budget were being balanced, and if business in the country were prosperous, I would not object to ministers voting themselves a salary of $20,000 or $25,000. When ministers in England receive £5,000 or £10,000, as the case may be, the poor civil servant who receives only £200 does not have to make a contribution towards their salaries. The ministers should be ready to set a good example in these matters and should admit that the proposed cut is a very unwise move.

Every hon. member of this house has to be a sort of information bureau for his electors. They come to him with all their troubles, they come for donations to charity, to bazaars, to sports and everything of the kind. Upon being elected an hon. member has to sacrifice to a great extent his personal business. We do not complain about this, but we do urge upon the government to give consideration to those who are weak or who are not lucky enough to be able to enjoy the good things in life enjoyed by others. I ask the government to reconsider its stand against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa, which amendment I gladly support.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Chevrier) which was negatived on the following division:

I would suggest that in declaring pairs the members be asked to do so in order, as they sit, just as the ordinary vote is taken.

Main motion (Mr. Rhodes) agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: In order that business may be expedited, we propose to-morrow, if we reach supply, to take up the remainder of the departments that have not yet been considered, and the convenience of the opposition will be studied as to which department it is desired to take as we proceed. There are, I understand, certain members of the opposition who wish to deal with different departments, and their convenience will be considered in that connection. So far as I am aware, the following departments have not yet been before the committee: Finance, Railways and Canals, Labour, Mines, Immigration and Colonization, National Defence, Interior, Pensions and National Health. There is the resolution on bankruptcy, and there are other government orders. If we reach supply we shall make the necessary arrangements to suit the convenience of the opposition as to which department they wish to consider.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand it is the intention of the government to take up any of the bills?

Mr. BENNETT: If we reach them, we shall take up the bankruptcy resolution, the second readings that are on the order paper and the committee stages of any bills we may have an opportunity to deal with. If the right hon. gentleman will intimate what department he would prefer we take up to-morrow if we reach supply, we shall be glad to suit his convenience.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to express the appreciation of the opposition of my right hon. friend's attitude this evening.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Tuesday, April 5, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I beg to move that the third report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization, presented to the house on April 1, 1932, be now concurred in. I also wish to present the evidence on which that report was based.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. McINTOSH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I rise to a question of privilege in connection with a report in this morning's Ottawa Citizen and Journal, dealing with my speech yesterday on the amendment of Mr. Heenan to the motion of Mr. Guthrie, to go into committee of supply. There was much confusion in the house at the time and it was almost impossible to catch the words that were exchanged between members participating in the debate. To prove this the report as found in Hansard is different from the report in the papers mentioned. The statement I wish to deal with is "an exhibition of ignorance." May I say, Mr. Speaker, these words are not found in Hansard and are therefore not officially correct.

FLOTATION OF INTERNAL LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) or to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), based upon a news item which appears in the Regina Leader-Post of Tuesday, March 29, in which the hon. member for Regina is reported to have announced to the Regina Conservative Association that the Dominion of Canada will shortly be floating another internal loan to meet increasing demands made on the treasury.

Is that statement based on fact, and, if so, when will an announcement be made to the house? Further, what is the amount of the loan and the rate of interest?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The matter in question has not been considered. If and when it is the house will be communicated with in due course, in accordance with prescribed form.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Where did he get his information?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Ask him.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution.

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bankruptcy Act, and to provide for the administration of the act by the Minister of Finance, and for the appointment of a superintendent of bankruptcy and the payment of his expenses from a percentage of the gross receipts out of the sale of any property of the debtor; and to provide for such assistants as may be required, and for the licensing of trustees and payment of fees therefor.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Bankruptcy Act, as it appears on the statute books of Canada today, was originally passed in this house in the session of 1921, and we have now had ten or eleven years' experience of the operation of that legislation. As the years have passed, many suggestions have been made in regard to amendments to the act in very many respects, and from time to time certain amendments have been made with the idea of improving the machinery which is available under the Bankruptcy Act in respect to the estates of insolvent persons. Recently the whole subject of our bankruptcy legislation was considered at a meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, and a committee of the members of that association, who are considered to be experts on the subject of our bankruptcy law, was appointed for the purpose of considering whether certain further amendments should not be made to render the act more workable and less expensive in its operation. I have had submitted to me a recommendation of the committee which was appointed by the Canadian Bar Association, and that association also submitted a draft bill on the subject. That report and the bill then submitted have been very fully investigated by the law officers of the Department of Justice, and it was decided that it would be in the interests of the whole community if certain of the proposals contained in that report were adopted as amendments to the present Bankruptcy Act. The whole draft bill as submitted has not been adopted, but in addition to that various suggestions have come to the department from every province in Canada in regard to amendments to very many of the clauses of the present act. These suggestions have come from very responsible bodies: from wholesale dealers' associations, from retail dealers' associations, from some farmers' organizations, from chartered accountants, from lawyers, from judges, and, in fact, from almost all classes of our community. I shall have placed at the disposal of a committee which I will propose shortly a very large number of these suggestions in order that they may be fully considered, because a great many of them have not been included in the measure which has been drafted pursuant to the resolution now under discussion.

Briefly, may I state that the most important provision in connection with the present resolution is the one for the appointment of a superintendent in bankruptcy. It is by reason of that proposed amendment that the matter is now brought before the house by way of resolution. It will involve some charge on the public fund, and for that reason it has to be introduced into this parliament by means of resolution.

The proposal to appoint a superintendent in bankruptcy is a new departure. It has been considered by many associations, including the Canadian Bar Association's committee, and has been very seriously recommended. It is thought that we should have some controlling power attached to the Department of Finance, as proposed in the bill, in order that all the machinery involved in the Bankruptcy Act may come within the purview of a superintendent who will have full power to deal with the trustees who are appointed in various parts of the Dominion of Canada in regard to the winding up of insolvent estates. The chief complaint which is made against the present law is the expense attendant upon its operation. Complaints come in from time to time that in many cases there is nothing left for the creditors because of the expenses of winding up, that the fees paid to trustees, to lawyers and to inspectors eat up the whole available estate so there is nothing left for the creditors.

That is a situation, of course, which we should remedy if it is possible to do so, and it has been considered that if someone had a commanding position in control of the whole machinery, having jurisdiction throughout the whole of Canada, much of the expense now involved in the winding up of estates might be done away with. I believe that proposal has been very well received in all the trading communities of Canada. This resolution mentions the appointment of a superintendent, and the bill will provide for the appointment of a superintendent with very wide powers.

It is my intention, if this resolution passes and the bill is introduced, to submit the bill to a special committee of this house—I would suggest a fairly large committee—in order that not only the proposals contained in the bill may be considered but that other proposals from responsible bodies, corporations and individuals in every part of Canada who have submitted proposed amendments, may be considered as well. I think the time has come when we should have a very full discussion of the question of amending the Bankruptcy Act, and if the bill is given second reading I will ask that it be referred to a special committee in order that these proposals may receive the fullest study and consideration and that an effective amending bill may be submitted to the house as a result. I submit the present bill more as a basis for discussion. The government is not wedded to all the proposals it contains, though we have gone over the bill very carefully and we think the proposals contained in it will considerably improve the present measure. It may be, however, that there are other amendments just as necessary as those we have suggested in the bill, and we will welcome those suggestions from any quarter whatever.

Mr. BOURASSA: Would the minister state if it is his intention also to submit to that committee Bill No. 36?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I had not thought of doing that, but the proposal contained in Bill No. 36, which is a private bill and which has been on the order paper for some time, certainly can be submitted to the committee. That is one question that is almost sure to be brought up.

Mr. BOURASSA: The committee will consider that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, it will have a free hand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would my hon. friend indicate some of the reasons which operate in favour of the transfer of the administration of the act from the Department of Justice to the Department of Finance?

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was the question that struck me in the first instance. This is really a financial matter; it has to do with the winding up of estates and the distribution of assets. It is not strictly a legal matter at all, and it was thought that if a superintendent were appointed he would occupy somewhat the same position as that occupied by the superintendent of insurance, for instance, who has charge of all the insurance over which the Dominion government has control, and who is an official of the Department of Finance. I believe this matter was thoroughly considered by the Canadian Bar Association committee, and they thought it would be appropriate to attach such an official, if one were appointed, to the Department of Finance rather than to the Department of Justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible to discuss this matter until we have before us the bill which is to be introduced by my hon. friend, so I would suggest that the committee report the resolution, and that the discussion take place either on second reading or after the committee has considered the matter.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Guthrie thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 41, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read the second time?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it is agreeable to the house I would ask unanimous consent to have the bill read the second time now, in order to set up the committee and have the matter considered. Therefore I move that the bill be now read a second time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In consenting we are not committing ourselves to the principle or to anything else.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, I now move that the bill be referred to a select committee of the house, to consist of seventeen members to be hereafter named, to consider and report upon this bill.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—CANADIAN CURRENCY

STATEMENT OF MR. COOTE ON MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter I should like to bring to your attention. I have been handed a copy of the Montreal Daily Star of March 1, in which there is an editorial headed "Bennett, the Vancouver Sun, and Money." In part the editorial states:

> Mr. Coote, Progressive member for Macleod, deserves the thanks of the people of Canada for introducing his resolution calling for an inquiry into Canadian money because it elicited from the Prime Minister, not only a clear exposition of the character of money, but a very definite and emphatic assurance that his government proposes to keep Canadian money firmly founded on a gold basis.
> In other respects Mr. Coote is not so much entitled to gratitude; for, while Mr. Bennett's analysis of the existing situation steadies public confidence in our money, Mr. Coote's figures and surmises tend to unsettle it.
> This is not because Mr. Coote is right and Mr. Bennett wrong. It is wholly because money is a mysterious thing to most people, and they do not know for certain that rash figures flung out by glib theorists as well as visionary theories flung out by glib figures may be most misleading in their deductions.

I think the inference is that I have been quoting rash figures, but I want now to challenge the Star to show where my figures were wrong. Rash figures were flung out glibly enough in this debate, but not by me; they were used by the Prime Minister. Some of his figures were so far from the facts as to make one wonder whether he was really serious or knew what he was talking about on that occasion.

Mr. BENNETT: Since the hon. gentleman has challenged the newspaper and I am here, while the newspaper representatives are not, will he be good enough to particularize?

Mr. COOTE: Yes, I shall particularize. First of all, I should like to say that this speech was broadcast all over Canada through the newspapers, and as Will Rogers says, the people know only what they see in the papers. I hope the newspapers of Canada will be good enough to publish the correct figures. On the occasion of which I speak the Prime Minister was discussing the causes which led to the abandonment of the gold standard by Great Britain. I should like to refer to the remarks which he made then and, if I may, I shall be glad to quote his figures. He stated that the great excess of imports over exports by Great Britain was responsible for forcing the old country off the gold standard, and he gave the figures. On page 647 of Hansard he is reported as saying:

> I think if my hon. friend will now do me the honour of thinking for a moment as to what I said he will recall it was this: The great excess of imports over exports brought about the situation. Once more I come back to my illustration. England had continuously increased her imports and they were swelling up by hundreds of millions of pounds so that at one time they had reached the colossal figure in one week of two billion pounds more imports than exports—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, as does everyone of the public press, that the word "million" and not "billion" was meant. The Free Press, in referring to the fact, mentioned that it believed it was "million" that was meant, and I made the correction in Hansard.

Mr. COOTE: The figures I have given from the Montreal Star are the same as I read from Hansard. The Prime Minister continued:

> —ten billion dollars in our currency.

I have taken the trouble to look up the British government trade returns for the month of September. The figures are not given by weeks, but the excess of imports over exports for the whole month of September is £35,000,000. There is a tremendous difference between that and £2,000,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I direct your attention to a point of order. There is standing on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Macleod an adjourned debate that has not yet been concluded. I do not know whether he is now anticipating the discussion of that question, but I consider his remarks are not in order. The figure of £2,000,000 to which I referred will be found in Mr. Chamberlain's speech. This, however, is not a matter of importance. The point is that a discussion on this matter is not now in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the heading of public bills and orders there is in the name of the hon. member who has been addressing the house a motion on the subject on which he is at present speaking. Under the rules prohibiting the anticipation of an item on the order paper he is not in order in endeavouring to discuss it on a motion to go into supply.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker, before you rule me out of order, may I say I am trying only to correct some figures broadcast in the press. I am not attempting to renew the discussion on the resolution which is on the order paper.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty is this: the hon. gentleman is not in order for the reason that he has the right of reply in the debate in question and he is making a statement to correct figures which, as everyone who took the trouble to read the documents, saw were incorrect. If on a motion to go into supply each member were to rise to correct figures, we should never get anywhere. The figures he has quoted are as inaccurate as any figures could be. The figure given in Mr. Chamberlain's speech was £2,000,000. The hon. member denies that. The opportunity to discuss the matter will be found under his own resolution and he is I submit with deference, abusing the privileges of this house to say it is a question of privilege, thus enabling him to make a speech in this manner.

Mr. COOTE: With all due deference, I did not raise a question of privilege. I thought on a motion to go into supply it was the privilege of every member to correct statements that are as far wrong as the figures in question. There are other figures which I think should be corrected, which were used in the same debate. Of course, if the Prime Minister wishes to prevent me from correcting those figures, I am in your hands, Mr. Speaker, as to whether I shall be permitted to proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is true on a motion to go into supply the widest latitude is allowed in debate, but at the same time the rule is explicit that a subject on the order paper cannot be anticipated either in that or in any other way, and I would ask the hon. member to refrain from debating his resolution on the order paper until it is called.

Mr. COOTE: I am not attempting to debate that resolution; at the present time I am endeavouring simply to correct some figures which have been placed upon Hansard and from which I think a wrong inference has been drawn by certain people and is liable to be drawn by others. I should like the opportunity to correct those figures. I always understood that a motion for supply was debatable on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays, so that any member who had a grievance could air it before the house, and that is all I am trying to do to-day. I shall be as brief as possible—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, have you made a ruling on this? If so, I think the hon. member should be asked to obey it.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member understood my ruling and in his continuing remarks he will not undertake to disobey it. The ruling was plain enough.

Mr. COOTE: All I say is that on that occasion the Prime Minister stated that the gold withdrawals from the Bank of England—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Order!

Mr. COOTE: —amounted in two days, Friday and Saturday, to ten billion pounds, which, of course, is more gold than there is in existence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I should like to have this matter settled one way or the other. I submit the hon. member is in open defiance of your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I ask that you enforce it.

Mr. COOTE: I would like simply, if I may, to correct those figures.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member has done so half a dozen times.

Mr. COOTE: Hon. Mr. Snowden in a speech in the House of Commons in Britain, dealing with this matter, indicated that the withdrawals of gold and foreign exchange during these two days amounted to £28,000,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would ask for your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Would the hon. Minister of Justice please state his point?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that you ruled that this subject was a discussion of a motion already on the order paper and that the hon. member was out of order. He is also quoting from a previous debate in this house this session, which makes him equally out of order; and the debate has not yet concluded.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite out of order to refer to a previous debate in the same session on a different subject and I hope the hon. member will not transgress that rule. My ruling is that he cannot now discuss the resolution standing on the order paper in his name.

Mr. COOTE: I would be one of the last men in this house, Mr. Speaker, to dispute your ruling, but I submit that I have not discussed the motion standing in my name. I have simply attempted to correct some figures which have been placed on Hansard and which appear in the Montreal Star of the first of March. I think that is a privilege which should be accorded any hon. member on a motion to go into supply. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity for correcting those figures. I have not done it as completely as I should like to have done, but I do not wish to run the risk of even seeming to challenge your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: We propose to take the departments which were mentioned last evening before the adjournment of the house, and then to take up the departments which the right hon. gentleman stated they were prepared to discuss in detail. That is, we will call an item in each of the remaining departments, and then take up Mines, Interior, Immigration and Colonization, Pensions and National Health.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, at this end of the chamber we have no idea of the business that is being transacted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Come on up to this end.

An hon. MEMBER: Join the Tories.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would ask hon. members to bear in mind that there are some of us who are trying to follow the business of this house, and we cannot possibly do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the Prime Minister before we proceed to take up an item in each department—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The leader of the opposition has the floor. What is the matter?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We do not know what is before the house at all.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): That is not my fault, it is yours.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that we ought to submit to impudence from the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): I would ask the hon. member to take his seat.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): The hon. gentleman will please take his seat. I would ask that the business of the house proceed, and that hon. members speak audibly, and that other hon. members preserve order so that other hon. members may hear what is going on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I imagine the reason my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) was unable to decide what was before the house was that there was nothing before the house at the moment. The Prime Minister has indicated that it is the desire of the government to call an item in each of the departments. I see no objection to that being done if it is going to facilitate the business of the house in permitting the government to take up on Thursday or Friday whatever particular department they may wish to take up. I should like to point out, however, to my right hon. friend that I assume the reason the rule calls for items of individual departments being taken up on the first three days of the week before they can be taken up on the other two days of the week is that it is only on the first three days of the week that there is an opportunity for hon. members, if they so desire, on going into committee of supply, to move an amendment. I assume that my right hon. friend has not in mind depriving the house in any way of its fullest opportunity to take up grievances or to move any amendment on going into supply. I do not think he has; if I thought he had I would oppose this particular course being adopted. However, I take it that his purpose is simply to facilitate the work of the government in taking up any department on a Thursday or a Friday. I imagine that other business will progress far enough to necessitate the taking up of supply on one or other of the first three days as well as on the last two of the week, so I imagine that our rights will be fully secured.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the motion was that we might be seized of all the estimates so that the convenience of members might be suited as to what departments would be considered on given days. So far as having any object in mind such as has been suggested for Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays, it would mean that we would not go into supply at all on these days. It is hardly possible to conduct the business of the house and not go into supply.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Unless all departments had been called.

Mr. BENNETT: No, because on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays we still have to make the motion to get the Speaker out of the chair, and then the only two days left for supply would be Thursday and Friday. When I suggested last evening that we should do it as I now indicate, it was to bring all the departments before the committee, and I went further and said that the government would consider the convenience of hon. gentlemen opposite who might desire to consider particular departments on given days. This morning the secretary of the right hon. leader of the opposition telephoned to my office and said they would be ready to take up to-day Mines, Interior, Immigration, Pensions and National Health in the order named. I am simply saying at the moment that we will call an item in each of the remaining departments, if that is acceptable, in order that all the departments will be before the committee. Certainly there is no intention of depriving this house of the widest possible latitude in discussing the shortdoings and shortcomings of the administration, and I trust that when next a vote is recorded hon. gentlemen opposite may be able to muster more than twenty-six objecting to the conduct of the government.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Hudson Bay railway and terminals; construction and betterments, including E. B. Jost at $2,250 (revote $630,000), $1,937,700.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the minister if his item will be considered by the railways and shipping committee?

Mr. MANION: No.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will there be plenty of opportunity to discuss this later on?

Mr. MANION: Yes, we wish only to get into the items. I shall be ready to give a complete statement when we return to this item. I was going to suggest that we pass on to another, and not consider the present one passed.

Item stands.

MINES AND GEOLOGICAL SURVEY

For organization and equipment of the explosives division under the Explosives Act (Chap. 62, R.S. 1927), $10,000.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot say much about this item, but we will show our good will by allowing the minister to proceed with it to-day.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Conciliation and Labour Act, $39,000.

Mr. HEENAN: I presume the minister is going to let this item stand. I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if it is the intention of the government at this session to bring in a bill to provide for unemployment insurance?

Mr. McINTOSH: That is a poser.

Mr. GORDON: We shall proceed to page 21—

Mr. HEENAN: Just a minute; I do not think the minister heard my question. I am asking whether the government is going to introduce a measure at this session providing for an unemployment insurance scheme for Canada?

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, the answer is no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask the minister regarding an application for a conciliation board which has been made by the federation of civic employees of the city of Winnipeg. Would the minister tell us the situation in regard to that?

Mr. GORDON: I shall be very glad to look into the matter. Of course I have not the details before me but at the earliest opportunity I shall give the hon. member the information he desires.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May we ask that the item stand?

Mr. BENNETT: Surely.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION

Relief of distressed Canadians outside of Canada, $3,000.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, this vote has been carried in the estimates for many years, and the money is used for the relief of Canadians outside of Canada who find themselves in distress. During the coming year I hope we will not have to use the whole of the sum voted.

Mr. SPENCER: How was the amount used last year?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figures before me, but if the hon. member wishes the vote to stand I will supply them.

Mr. POULIOT: What is the exact meaning of the word "distressed" in the vote?

Mr. GORDON: It is the condition a person is in when he is in the condition the hon. member is often in.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, we have here—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —a dumb Minister of Labour—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —so much so that when—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I ask that order be maintained. The minister has made a remark which all hon. members have heard, and the committee is entitled to hear the reply.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The remark by the minister was most uncalled for.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I will speak very candidly. A man like the Minister of Labour, who gave us such an exhibition of humbug last week—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —could not answer a pertinent question about white-collared unemployed asked by a member of parliament. I do not wish to lodge any personal attack against any hon. member in this house, but when I address a question to a minister, however big he might be, I think he should answer decently.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: It is pretty hard to redress an old tree, but I will try out his education. I have succeeded in connection with some hon. members, and I will begin on him. People suffering in this country had hoped for unemployment relief from this man but he is good only for making bold replies to hon. members and showing his gross ignorance in the House of Commons of Canada. It is time to put a stop to that, and I think the Prime Minister should tell his colleague to go away, to leave the cabinet, so that he may be replaced by a decent man who knows something about the troubles of the people. He should be replaced by a working man, and not by one who sneers at the troubles and miseries of the unemployed. He should be replaced by a man who understands the sufferings of others, and who is ready to come to their rescue in a decent way, a man who uses decent language and has decent thoughts. Decent thoughts are expressed by decent language, but we cannot expect decent language from a minister who answered so boldly my hon. friends from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and Rimouski (Sir Eugène Fiset) and other hon. members on this side of the house who have tried to obtain from him an answer which might at least to some degree be intelligent. We are here, Mr. Chairman, to exercise our rights and privileges as members of parliament, and I do not mind what the dumb minister may say to me. He can tell me that Jean François Pouliot is a crazy fellow, that he is too curious, but he cannot say that the member for Témiscouata county, in the province of Quebec—a county composed of fifty thousand souls and over twenty thousand electors—is not entitled to receive a courteous answer from any one on the treasury benches. If the minister's manners can be tolerated in the mining districts, if the miners there are to be treated discourteously by men of his calibre, I protest at any attempt to treat members of parliament in the same way. I say once for all—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like those members who are jeering at me to be just as independent as I am to speak their will freely instead of making such silly jokes when a man is upholding his own views, and also the views of the Canadian electorate, the views of those who are weak, the views of those who are in distress, because they are not properly taken care of. I have been sent here to exercise my rights and privileges as a member of parliament. I am afraid of no man. If the minister was as thin as a consumptive I would have some regard for him, but he is a big, stout, strong fellow, and I like to fight such men. If he were as big and solid as the rock of Gibraltar—and he has some of the characteristics of rock when he treats the troubles of the unemployed so unsympathetically—if his heart is as hard as the rock of Gibraltar, I warn him—and my words are definite and final—we will teach him manners, so that when he goes into the far north the miners will say: "Oh, well, he is a gentleman! What did you do to him, did you give him a shave, a hair-cut, a massage—?"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: "—He has been polished by His Majesty's loyal opposition in the House of Commons." That is all I have to say for the present, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the item is carried I should like to have an explanation from the minister as to the meaning of the word "distress."

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask the minister what situation a man has to be in to take advantage of that vote? There is nothing so extraordinary in the question asked by the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. GORDON: If the hon. member would like to have particulars how this vote has been spent in the past I would ask that it stand so that I may get the information for him. I do not wish, Mr. Chairman, to complain too bitterly of the remarks made by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), which during this session have been directed towards myself without any provocation, because I think on all occasions I have endeavoured to give any member, irrespective of where he stands, all information that may have been asked for. However, it has been implied that at times I suffered in silence while such remarks were directed towards me. I thought when the hon. member asked for the definition of the word "distress" he did so facetiously—if I may go that far without again arousing his wrath. I should be very regretful indeed if he took my reply as being anything more than an indulgence in the repartee in which he is so skilful himself.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right; the thing is over now.

Mr. HEENAN: Is the government actively engaged with any other bodies in bringing young boys and men to Canada at the present time?

Mr. GORDON: I presume the hon. member will have an opportunity to discuss that subject on some other item, but if the committee prefer that I make the answer now I shall be quite willing to do so.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Shall item 58 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Item 58 stands.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Scientific institutions — expenses connected with the Dominion observatory at Ottawa, $50,000.

Expenses connected with the Dominion astrophysical observatory at Victoria, B.C., $20,600.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would the minister explain the decrease?

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): There have been the following reductions: Salaries, $15,362; astrophysical and geophysical research, $450; general scientific maintenance, $880; general expenses, $188; total, $16,880.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That includes the ten per cent contribution; there is no reduction of the staff?

Mr. MURPHY: The reduction has been made on the basis of the present staff, eliminating seasonal and vacant positions, deleting statutory increases, and reducing all salaries by ten per cent.

Mr. DUFF: Stands.

Mr. BENNETT: Do you want it to stand? There is nothing in it.

Mr. VENIOT: All items involving salary reductions are to stand.

Mr. BENNETT: That was dealt with in the bill last night when it was given second reading.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not asking that it stand.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Carried.

Mr. MURPHY: I have not yet completed my answer, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. member's question. I should have added: Also providing for the following changes in staff—char service, to be provided by the Department of Public Works; watchman, to be replaced by a constable from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; one-half the salary of W. A. Dyer, junior electrical engineer, to be paid by the Department of Public Works; W. E. Jacques, astronomer, his salary to be transferred to the branch vote. That does not mean a reduction. The following are to be retired as from April 1: C. R. Westland, astronomer, grade 2; W. E. Jacques, astronomer, grade 3; G. P. Hatton, assistant, grade 1, and A. W. Grant, head clerk. These men whose names I have read have received notice of their retirement but the actual separation from the service has not occurred, and it may be that in further reorganization other changes may be made. This is not to be taken as a final readjustment.

Item agreed to.

Mines branch, for investigation of mineral resources and deposits; of the mining and metallurgical industries, and of mineral technology; wages, expenses of testing and research laboratories, investigations by Dominion Fuel Board, including salaries and all other expenses, $238,500.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will the minister give us a brief outline of the changes in staff that bring about the reduction?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Mines): The reduction is made up partly of the ten per cent reduction and partly of the lesser amount being purchased in the way of supplies and things of that character which we think we can get along without during this year.

Mr. HEENAN: Are there any men who are not on the permanent staff but are on the prevailing rate of wages who are covered by this item?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, there are some.

Mr. HEENAN: When the Minister of Finance was discussing his resolution some time ago it was pointed out to him that there were some prevailing rate men on the canals who had already had a reduction in wages, and I gathered from him that when his bill was in committee he might take those men into consideration. I am wondering what effect it will have if some of these men whom we are now dealing with in this item have already had a reduction in wages, and if it is proposed now that they shall suffer a further ten per cent reduction.

Mr. GORDON: There has been no reduction prior to this; this is the only one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is any assistance being provided for gold mining under this particular vote?

Mr. GORDON: There is no direct monetary assistance but there is the usual assistance by way of investigation which is carried on in the mines laboratory.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a reduction in this vote of $61,500, which is rather a respectable amount. Is it intended to reduce the staff there as well? Then ten per cent mentioned by the minister would not account for this $61,000.

Mr. GORDON: There are altogether about ninety employees, fifty being on prevailing rates, and the reduction in salaries there, together with the saving made in the purchase of supplies, accounts entirely for the total reduction.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no intention to reduce the activities of the Fuel Board?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. HEENAN: Do any of these men who are on prevailing rates earn less than $1,200 a year?

Mr. GORDON: This applies in its entirety to the labourers whose rate of pay was 50 cents an hour, less ten per cent.

Mr. HEENAN: If there are any men on prevailing rates who are earning less than $1,200 a year—and I assume there are—then unless the five per cent reduction which is to apply to the permanent service applies to them also it will not be in keeping with what apparently the minister has in mind at present. In other words, the permanent civil servants earning less than $1,200 are now being reduced, practically speaking, by five per cent instead of ten per cent, whereas, the men on prevailing rates who are probably earning much less than $1,200 will be getting a ten per cent cut. I was wondering whether the minister would consider this point. These men ought not to be given the full ten per cent reduction but should be reduced in line with those earning less than $1,200 in the permanent service.

Mr. GORDON: I shall be glad to look into the matter when the act is being applied, although the hon. gentleman will note that the prevailing rate has been established at 50 cents an hour, which probably is more than the actually prevailing rate. I am not complaining about that, however. I shall look into the question.

Mr. CAYLEY: At first glance this would appear to be a neglect of the great mining industry, because there is a reduction of $61,500 for investigation of mineral resources, deposits, and so on, and other kindred activities. I should like the minister to tell us whether this is the purpose, or whether we have been spending too much in previous years. Will he promise to give this matter further attention and provide some further encouragement later on? It seems to me a poor policy indeed to neglect this great mining industry which every year has grown to greater and greater proportions.

Mr. GORDON: I have been personally interested in the Mines department for many years, and any curtailment of the activities of that branch would receive my very reluctant consent. But in this connection I do not think we need fear that the activities of the department will be interfered with in any way. The natural resources have been all turned over to the provinces, and of necessity that transfer included some of the activities formerly carried on in the Mines department. I have gone into the question of the operation of the department with the heads of the various branches, and I can assure the hon. member that the mining industry will not suffer by reason of what at first glance would seem to be a substantial reduction.

Mr. CAYLEY: What branch of the mining industry is under the control of the federal department? If we have no control in the provinces where is our activity carried on?

Mr. GORDON: The federal department of mines at no time exercised control over the mining industry in the various provinces, but for many years, either through the Geological Survey, or, by itself, the department has exercised a sort of jurisdiction over mining in general, by way of advice and research, either alone or in cooperation with those provinces having mining departments of their own. The mines branch is the only place in Canada where research work, such as they carry on, can be accomplished; none of the provinces have the equipment or men trained and equipped to carry on these investigations. For instance, any mine in any province having a problem can request the assistance of the mines branch and can obtain the benefit of their experience and advice in dealing with a metallurgical or other problem.

Mr. CAYLEY: Where is this research work carried on, here in Ottawa?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. CAYLEY: Could the minister say what results have been obtained from the tests which have been made with regard to the coal deposits in northern Ontario?

Mr. GORDON: Investigations have been carried on in connection with the northern Ontario lignite field. These investigations and tests are still proceeding, and I am advised that there has been no certain conclusion drawn as to the possible commercial value of these deposits, or as to whether they may serve any certain locality in the near vicinity. I presume that information will come only when the tests have been completed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I presume the laboratories are not as busy as they were formerly, but I should like to ask the minister if he thinks he will have sufficient funds to meet all the demands for investigations and tests in connection with minerals generally, now that he has very well equipped laboratories for the purpose.

Mr. GORDON: I know the hon. member, who was formerly Minister of Mines, takes a deep interest in this subject, and I can assure him that the vote will take care of any investigations that may be reasonably expected. One reason why the vote remains about the same, or is slightly reduced, while the laboratories are capable of taking care of the greater activity of the mining industry, is the excellence of the laboratories themselves, which were started some years ago and which were brought up-to-date quite recently. I can assure the hon. member that the laboratories are probably as good as will be found on this continent.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister be kind enough to advise the committee whether any investigations were made by the fuel board during the past year, or whether any are in contemplation for the coming year, in connection with extending the experiments which were made in order to demonstrate the economic possibilities of pulverized coal? I recall that the late government installed a pulverized coal unit in the furnaces which heat this building. Last spring I inspected that unit, and from my conversation with the employees I gathered that it had been very successful both in reducing the amount of fuel used and in the saving of money. There was a good opportunity for comparison because some of the units used ordinary coal which was shovelled in by hand.

The third point on which I would like information is this: Having gone to considerable expense to demonstrate the usefulness of that system, the minister might give it more publicity by publishing a pamphlet which would be available to the trade generally, because after all, while a good purpose was served by demonstrating the commercial possibilities of this system, it must be given publicity in order to encourage people to install these pulverized coal units, which will help to provide a market for our coal.

Mr. GORDON: At the request of the British Columbia government quite elaborate tests were made in connection with pulverized fuel, and a report was prepared and forwarded to the British Columbia government. I have looked over the report but I frankly confess that it is so highly technical that I was unable to follow it beyond the narrative descriptions it contained. The results were not altogether disappointing, but they were not as hopeful as they might have been with respect to the coal sent here for test. I assume that the British Columbia government will publish the report if they believe the tests show that the use of that sort of coal is practicable. I do not believe the department has under consideration, and certainly the officials have not discussed the matter with me, the publication of the report here.

Mr. NEILL: That was not quite what I had in mind. I am aware of that exceedingly technical report which I think no one but a highly trained engineer could understand. That report was sent to the British Columbia government, and I understand they forwarded it to the various mine owners who had furnished the coal, so that if they wished they could make use of the information obtained. That report had more to do with the heat units, the amount of moisture and matters of that kind. What I had in mind was the demonstration which the department put into effect in the plant by which these buildings are heated, where they installed a pulverized coal unit whereby the fuel is pulverized and fed to the boiler in the usual pulverized coal method which I think is called the screw method. The results were highly satisfactory. While I obtained them personally, so to speak, I was not able to give them that publicity which I think they deserve. It was a practical demonstration, which was very important to people interested and which should have been made public throughout Canada, that it was highly successful to use pulverized coal in a heating unit of that description. If the minister would authorize the preparation of a brief pamphlet giving information such as I obtained from that demonstration, it would not cost very much; it would be very interesting; no doubt the press would publish it and it would be of great benefit to the coal industry as a whole. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. GORDON: I believe that was a test made here for the Department of Public Works.

Mr. NEILL: And it is still in operation.

Mr. GORDON: Yes. I would be glad to take up the question of putting the result in pamphlet form for the benefit of others who want to use that type of fuel.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the item for publications I notice a reduction of $25,000. Can the department afford to make this reduction? When I was in the department we found at the end of the year we were invariably short of reports and had to increase the amount in order to meet the demand. Has the demand fallen off?

Mr. GORDON: Last year we recovered part of the deficit that had accumulated in previous years. I am well aware of the difficulty that my predecessor had in procuring money for this vote. Hon. members sometimes do not realize the importance of it; I know I do, but I believe this appropriation will be sufficient for this year. Some of the publications that are not so important, I admit with some reluctance, will have to be held back until next year, but those reports which are very important to the mineral industry will be taken care of under this appropriation.

Item agreed to.

Dominion of Canada assay office—for maintenance of assay office, Vancouver, B.C., $16,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What are the details of the reduction in the amount for the Vancouver assay office?

Mr. GORDON: The Vancouver assay office, in case some hon. members are not familiar with its history, was established some years ago, in fact after the opening up of the Yukon, for the purpose of being able to purchase at Vancouver, Yukon and coast gold, thereby keeping the gold in Vancouver instead of having it shipped to Seattle. Beginning late last year, I think, the larger depositors, the mines up on the coast like the Pioneer and the Premier, found it more convenient to ship their gold to the Mint. I am not just sure by what method these shipments would be made, but they would be either by registered mail or more probably by express. At any rate, I inquired as to the reason for the falling off in the work of the assay office. There was no necessity for making four assay tests of shipments and in this way the expense was greatly reduced because each assay is expensive. That accounts in the main for the difference in cost.

Mr. REID: Is a charge made for any assaying done?

Mr. GORDON: Yes; it is a very nominal charge. It is covered by an old order in council and it has always been handled in that way. The assay office, I may say, does not lose very much, but it does not break even. It exists for the convenience of the small operator.

Mr. CAYLEY: Where is the gold now produced in Canada marketed? Is it marketed only in Ottawa?

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I shall have to refer the member to the Minister of Finance. The gold, of course, comes from the Canadian gold mines to the Canadian Mint. I am afraid I am unable to give the hon. member the information he desires as to what occurs after it reaches there.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It all comes here?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is any special premium given now for gold production?

Mr. GORDON: If the hon. member means the difference in exchange, I think he will agree with me the word "premium" is a misnomer with respect to that. The same practice is being followed as was inaugurated when the licence system in connection with the export of gold was adopted, namely, the three day average.

Item agreed to.

Geological Survey—For explorations, surveys and investigations, wages of explorers, topographers and others, $142,500.

For publication of English and French editions of reports, maps, illustrations, etc., $42,000.

For maintenance of offices and museum, expenses of special exhibitions pertaining to natural resources, purchase of instruments, chemicals, books of reference, miscellaneous assistance and contingencies, $42,500.

For museum equipment, $8,000.

For purchase of specimens, $1,000.—Total, $236,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I see a reduction of $47,500 under the item of explorations, surveys and investigations, wages of explorers, topographers and others. Does that mean that certain of the parties will be cut down this year?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, the parties will be cut down this year. That again I recommended with a good deal of reluctance, but I think with the rearrangement in the field, the projects of the Geological Survey will not be seriously interfered with. The officials of the department have, I believe, rearranged the survey parties in such a way that the mining industry will be served, I admit not as well as it might otherwise have been, but for this year I think there is a justification for cutting down the survey parties.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How many parties is my hon. friend sending into the Northwest Territories?

Mr. GORDON: I presume the hon. member has reference mainly to Great Bear lake?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. GORDON: Six. So that I may not be misunderstood when I say the Great Bear Lake district, that would cover Dismal lake, Coppermine and East and West.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I frankly confess I do not like to see that reduction in the item for the publication of English and French editions of reports, maps, illustrations and so forth, I know there is a tremendous demand for that sort of thing. I question very much whether the minister can meet the demand if this appropriation is reduced by $28,000 which is rather a substantial reduction in an item of that nature.

Mr. GORDON: I cannot agree with what the hon. member has said. I recognize that the department will have to look after every dollar, and to cover the requirements we may have to mimeograph some of the reports in order to make them available to the industry. The money is simply not available this year, and we have to do the best we can.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Good training for the whole lot.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is, after all, a species of advertising. The mines branch of the federal government is engaged chiefly in research and in mapping the results of the geological parties that go out. I know how important a work it is, and in the past I have had some little controversy with my leader in order to squeeze a little more money out of the government than they were sometimes prepared to give me. I know that every dollar voted for this purpose was used up, and frequently we were unable to meet the demand for maps and publications from parties interested, from people who were going to invest money in the mining enterprises of Canada. That is the reason I lodge this protest now. I think it is false economy to cut this vote because, after all, this is the method by which the activities of the department are brought to the knowledge of the public, who thereby become interested in the mineral possibilities of Canada.

Mr. CAYLEY: There is an item for purchase of specimens; what are those specimens?

Mr. GORDON: That vote is provided for the purchase of mineral specimens, unique specimens of ores for museums, an educational exhibit for those interested in the mineral industry.

Mr. CAYLEY: Is it possible to get collections of these specimens from the department?

Mr. GORDON: We have departmental publications giving details of the contents of the cabinets of mineral specimens, and the price of the cabinet. These cabinets are sold to various public institutions for the purpose of disclosing the mineral resources of Canada The cabinets are accompanied by an index showing where the mineral samples were found and what they are. The cabinets are provided at a cost of about $35 or $40 for the most expensive.

Mr. CAYLEY: Containing about how many specimens?

Mr. GORDON: Over 140.

Mr. CAYLEY: All named and classified?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. Before I resume my seat may I say with respect to publications that last year we were able to overtake some, in fact almost all, of the delayed publications. While there may be a few publications that may be delayed this year by reason of the lack of money, I feel certain that by getting out some cheaper publications for the time being and dropping probably some of the more expensive maps and pictures of rocks and occurrences, we shall be able to get through this year without the industry suffering.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What organization does the work of geting out these publications?

Mr. GORDON: The material for the mines publications is prepared in the mines branch by the engineers, mineralogists and chemists and others interested in the subject in hand. So far as the geological survey publications are concerned, the material is the result of the work of the exploratory parties that go out each year into known areas. When they come in with their field books the data is reviewed and ultimately the material appears in the publications.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But what organization does the actual printing?

Mr. GORDON: The printing of all these reports is done at the printing bureau.

Item agreed to.

Mines — salaries, $541,224; contingencies, $15,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to object to the passing of this item, but there may be some members of the house who may be under the impression that the salary items will not be touched at this stage, and perhaps the item should stand.

Mr. GORDON: I am quite agreeable to that.

Item stands.

Grant to the Imperial Institute, $9,733.33.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. GORDON: This is a yearly grant made to the Imperial Institute under an agreement with the British government. It followed as a result of the Imperial conference of 1923. Great Britain and a number of the dominions make a contribution to this institute.

Mr. IRVINE: Would the minister say what the institute does?

Mr. GORDON: It carries on the work of investigation of the minerals of the empire, gathering and coordinating and disclosing to all units of the empire information as to the minerals found in different parts of the empire.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Have there been any benefits to Canada from this expenditure?

Mr. GORDON: I cannot answer that categorically. It is an investigation which in my view is highly important. The boundaries of no country are run according to the minerals enclosed within it, and I think the Imperial Institute is doing a highly important work in letting all parts of the empire know where within the empire they can get the minerals which they have not within their own borders.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is doing a very fine work.

Mr. GORDON: That is my view.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is a lot of money to spend if we are not getting any benefit.

Mr. CAYLEY: Does each dominion vote a specific sum for this purpose?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. Those who subscribed varying amounts in the year 1923, when the agreement was reached were the Imperial government, the Canadian government, the Australian government, the Indian government and the governments of other parts of the empire. If hon. members do not agree that it is a worthy cause, I am afraid we are bound to go ahead, anyway.

Mr. CAYLEY: What is the total amount under the agreement?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the agreement before me, but I am told by the assistant deputy the amount required each year is £25,000 of which we subscribe the amount set out in this item.

Mr. CAYLEY: Those collections are kept in London, England?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, they are forwarded to London, England, so that the work may be carried on.

Mr. CAYLEY: To Canada House?

Mr. GORDON: To the Imperial Institute building in London. I am afraid I do not know the exact location of it.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payments in connection with movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and for the cost of administration thereof, $1,100,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I notice that this year there is a considerable reduction in that item. Where does the minister purpose to curtail the expenditure? We understand of course that this money is spent for subventions for moving coal.

Mr. GORDON: As a result of the falling off in the consumption of coal throughout Canada—and I presume the same applies to the United States and other countries—the Dominion Fuel Board have come to the conclusion they will not require any more money than named in this vote.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no reduction in the subventions?

Mr. GORDON: No, there is an increase.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The subventions are identical with those of last year, both east and west?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: How much of the vote was used last year?

Mr. GORDON: I do not appear to have the total amount before me, but I will be very pleased to supply the information to the hon. member.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister the different services for which the amounts were spent? Are they under separate headings?

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. GORDON: I have the figures for nine months of the last fiscal year. Alberta coal to Ontario cost $50,247.48; Alberta and Crowsnest pass coal to Manitoba, and to some extent to western Ontario, cost $211,764.80; Saskatchewan coal to Manitoba and western Ontario cost $26,943.70; British Columbia export and bunker coal cost $17,795; rail and water borne coal from Nova Scotia to Ontario and Quebec cost $96,208.60. Then, all rail coal from Nova Scotia, including a small portion from New Brunswick, cost $140,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the last item?

Mr. GORDON: The amount was $96,208.60. New Brunswick coal moved for the three years from 1928 to 1930 inclusive amounted to only 595 tons, a comparatively small amount.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister mentioned the sum of $140,000. Was that straight movement by rail from Nova Scotia?

Mr. GORDON: I think the hon. member is referring to the all rail movement from Nova Scotia.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. GORDON: The sum of $140,000 is not quite accurate. That estimate is made, because the figures were not in when the information was prepared for me.

Mr. HEENAN: It strikes me that the reduction mentioned by the minister is not encouraging to the miners; it would seem that the government is anticipating less business in the coming year than there was in the last. True, the minister has said the fuel board has come to the conclusion that a smaller quantity of coal will be moved in the coming year. In view of that, and in view of the promises made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign of 1930 to the effect that he would bring into operation a national fuel policy which would increase the sale and the use of Canadian coal, I must say there is a very poor outlook. This year in the discussion of estimates we hear the government say that they do not anticipate as much coal will be sold during the coming year as in the last. I was wondering if the minister could tell us whether or not the government has a national fuel policy which will give some encouragement to the miners.

Mr. GORDON: This item is not reduced because the government anticipates the use of less coal during the coming year than was used in the last, but because of the experience gained from our operations last year. The movement of coal east and west from the Canadian fields into the central part of Canada is something of a very difficult and intricate nature. Anyone who has given the matter consideration—and I presume the hon. member has—is familiar with that fact. It is not because we do not anticipate using more coal next year than we did last that this item is reduced, but because of the experience gained last year after the subventions were increased. We found last year that we did not need the appropriation we anticipated we would need. I can say however that the use of Canadian coal is increasing. The western coal operators, after the adjustment had been made early in 1931, fully anticipated they would be able to displace foreign fuels in their natural market, which of course, extends as far east as Manitoba. Their anticipations were in large measure realized. But in common with all of us, they did not anticipate the falling off that took place in the consumption of coal. With the added assistance by way of subvention, if the normal consumption had taken place, the western coal operators and the miners would not be facing their present difficulties. That is the problem presently under discussion. It applies with almost equal force to Nova Scotia. The problem, I assume, confronted my predecessor as it confronts me to-day, of getting coal as far as the central zone in order that nobody shall bear a greater burden than he should be called upon to bear with respect to the marketing of our coal. The whole subject is again under review in the light of present conditions, and I hope we shall be able to find a solution to enable our coal mines to carry on until the consumption of coal becomes normal again.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Did the minister give the total amount expended under this item last year?

Mr. GORDON: No, the figures I quoted were to the end of December last year. The figures from December onward I have not before me, but if any hon. member would like those figures I shall be glad to make them available as soon as I get them.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I take it that the figures given relate to the amount expended on the actual moving of coal up to December 31?

Mr. GORDON: So far as the Dominion government is concerned, the subvention, but not the total cost of the movement.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Quite so. That was $628,000 approximately?

Mr. GORDON: That is approximately correct. It is an estimate and may be subject to some slight revision. I shall be very glad to have the statement audited and compared and furnish the hon. member with a copy.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What other items make up the expenditure?

Mr. GORDON: It will be noticed that the figures I read from this compilation cover just the nine-month period. To complete the statement the figures for the winter period from December until the end of this fiscal year would have to be added. Those figures I have not got, but if they were added to those I have given they would disclose that the amount asked for now probably will about meet the requirements.

Mr. ELLIOTT: All the $628,000 was expended up to December 31?

Mr. GORDON: There is one large item estimated, but the other figures are accurate.

Mr. HEENAN: In view of the fact that there is a strike in progress in the Alberta coal fields, may I ask if the minister is making any effort to bring the conflicting parties together?

Mr. GORDON: Just so soon as I heard of the impending labour trouble in some of the mines of southern Alberta and the Crowsnest pass I got in touch with the premier of Alberta and asked him to keep me advised as to what was going on. I assured him that the services of the federal Labour department were at his disposal, and that we would gladly cooperate with him to have the dispute amicably adjusted. A number of communications have passed between the premier of Alberta and myself, and as late as yesterday I wired him with respect to a suggestion that he had made a week or ten days ago for the appointment of a commission to study the coal industry generally in his province. With that suggestion I have no quarrel; his judgment may be the best in that regard. I can assure the hon. member that I am keeping in close touch with the situation, and that the department is quite willing and ready to offer its services in order to bring about an amicable arrangement.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister told us that $628,000 was paid on account of this subvention. How many tons of coal was that paid on?

Mr. GORDON: I have not added up the figures, and I trust I shall not be held too strictly to account if they are not absolutely accurate. These are the figures for the nine months to the end of 1931: Alberta to Ontario 22,634 tons; Alberta and British Columbia—that is Crowsnest pass—to Manitoba and western Ontario, 180,248 tons; Saskatchewan to Manitoba and western Ontario, 60,221 tons; British Columbia, export and bunker coal, 53,561 tons; Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to Quebec and Ontario by rail and water, 332,159 tons; all rail—this is an estimate—95,000 tons. If I might revert to the question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) the estimated item was $140,000. Those figures will give the amount of coal moved under the subvention.

Mr. YOUNG: That makes less than 1,000,000 tons, and a portion of that coal would be moved anyway. How much of it is new business to Canadian mines?

Mr. GORDON: I have not those figures before me, but as regards the territory served I think I should be safe in saying that all coal moved into western Ontario would be new business for the mines.

Mr. YOUNG: That would be 180,000 tons.

Mr. GORDON: I know that in the Manitoba market the western mines have captured the major portion of the trade. I do not want to be extravagant in my figures, but I should say they have now eighty per cent of that market.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When the subsidy was increased it was estimated that the mountain mines in British Columbia and Alberta would supply 200,000 tons which came in from the United States to the Winnipeg market and as far west as Portage. I do not know whether that hope has been realized. I am referring to bituminous coal.

Mr. YOUNG: What I wish to find out is what this policy is costing us. As nearly as I can gather from the minister's statement, we have displaced a quarter of a million tons of American coal at a cost of two-thirds of a million dollars. That involves the loss of a certain amount of revenue which was derived from the coal that came in from the United States. How much is that?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the figures.

Mr. YOUNG: There are several things which it is necessary for us to know before we can arrive at a conclusion, and I suggest that the item be allowed to stand until the minister can tell us how much we have paid out in subventions, how much new business has been brought to Canadian mines, how many men have been employed, what wages they have received, what revenue we have lost through the non-importation of American coal, together with all other factors that might help to throw some light on the question. We want to know definitely what the policy is costing us.

Mr. RALSTON: What rates of subvention are used in estimating the amount that will be necessary for next year? I have endeavoured to look up the rates but I have not had an opportunity to verify them. As I recollect however, last year there was a two dollar maximum on all coal railed from Nova Scotia to Montreal. There was a two dollar maximum contribution to Montreal, and the forwarding rate into Quebec points was one-fifth of a cent per ton mile with a maximum of seventy-five cents, and a one-third cent ton mile with a maximum of $1.50 into Ontario. Is there any increase in these rates of subvention included in the amount for which the minister is now asking the committee?

Mr. GORDON: No; these estimates are based on the subventions as indicated by the hon. member.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to direct the attention of the minister particularly to this matter and to ask him whether he can give me the grounds for the announcement made in Nova Scotia. On March 13, just before the vote was taken among the miners on the question whether the acceptance of the so-called Duncan report should be approved, a message was broadcast from stations in Glace Bay and Charlottetown to the effect that the sale of over a million more tons of Nova Scotia coal was guaranteed, and down in Nova Scotia a great many newspapers as a result of the visit of Premier Harrington and his colleagues, made an announcement accordingly. The New Glasgow News said:

> Premier Bennett promised that upper Canada this year would absorb at least a million tons of Nova Scotia coal.

The Sydney Post said:

> Arrangements will be made by the Dominion government for absorption of an additional million tons of soft coal, which will be sold to consumers in Ontario and Quebec.

The Amherst News said:

> A definite pledge was given by Mr. Bennett that his government would undertake to distribute 1,000,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal in the province of Ontario.

The Glace Bay Gazette, published in the centre of the mining district of Cape Breton, said:

The marketing of this huge coal order becomes effective almost at once. People experienced in the coal trade would not have dared to predict a week ago that so favourable a turn would come so soon.

The Halifax Herald, quoting Premier Harrington, said:

"The increase in tonnage from the Nova Scotia mines this year would amount to a minimum of an additional one million tons."

And the Sydney Post, once more, had this to say:

The pits on the north side will mine their quota of an additional million tons assured by sales in Ontario and Quebec.

Does my hon. friend know of anything in connection with the subventions on coal which would justify such a statement?

Mr. GORDON: The plight in which the miners of Nova Scotia at present find themselves, through various contributing causes and factors, with which I have no doubt the hon. member is conversant, was brought to the attention of the government by the premier of that province. The seriousness of the situation would impress itself upon anybody, and the matter was immediately taken into consideration. The railways and large consumers of American coal were interviewed, and others were interviewed without delay in an endeavour to find additional markets for Nova Scotia coal in order to relieve the situation of the miners there. I think I can safely say to the hon. member that the negotiations will very shortly, in fact I hope within the course of a very few days, come to a successful conclusion. The matter is under the careful consideration of the government, who are acting in harmony with the railroads and keeping in touch with those interested in Nova Scotia, and we hope that these newspaper reports will be fully justified in fact. That is my hope, and I believe that the hon. member will join with me in that hope.

Mr. RALSTON: I can assure the hon. gentleman that I most heartily join him in that hope, but I want facts on which to base the hope. I understand my hon. friend to say that so far as subventions are concerned there is no increase proposed in the vote here which would justify the hope that any more coal will be moved under these subventions. Is that so or not?

Mr. GORDON: That is quite true; this vote does not take care of extra subventions If, however, arrangements can be made to find a market for the coal, and if the government feels that it is wise and desirable to see that the coal is moved into the consuming market—and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that the government will do everything in its power to have this done—then ways and means can be found to bring about that end.

Mr. RALSTON: The market is there. The railways will use the coal; there is no doubt about that: the railways will be a market for the coal. The question is to get sufficient subvention to induce the railways to take it.

Mr. GORDON: How much subvention would the hon. gentleman suggest would be necessary for the railways to use an extra million tons of coal?

Mr. RALSTON: I should think my hon. friend would know that better than I would; he has the benefit of the assistance of the fuel board, which is doing the figuring. I say the railways provide a very substantial market; I know they will not use one million tons, but apparently my hon. friend has adopted that figure. Then I ask him what markets he proposes to utilize in order to reach that figure, because I want to impress upon him that it is no use to provide for one million tons on the one hand and take away half a million tons on the other because of the falling off in consumption. The Nova Scotia coal fields need to sell a million tons more, and that cannot be done if on one hand you provide for a million tons and, on the other, you have to meet a falling off in consumption.

I want to ask my hon. friend, who says that the government is exploring the matter now, what markets he expects to find for a million tons of Nova Scotia coal.

Mr. GORDON: Every effort is being made to find markets for a million tons or more of Nova Scotia coal. I trust my hon. friend will not blame this government if the consumption of coal falls off; that is something we cannot control, but we do recognize that it is desirable to find a market for that much Nova Scotia coal. That effort is being made by the government, and I hope it will be successful very shortly.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the subvention now extend to railway coal?

Mr. GORDON: I think railway coal is all moved on the o.c.s. rate.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The subvention has not heretofore applied to the movement of railway coal?

Mr. GORDON: No.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the subvention on lignite coal from Saskatchewan destined for the Manitoba market. Last year the original rate of fifty cents per ton was changed to a mileage rate of one-seventh cent per mile. That, we felt, rather worked against the coal of that area reaching the Manitoba market, because the difference amounted to ten cents a ton. I think possibly that had a little to do with the trouble in the Estevan coal fields last September. I pointed out the unfairness of this change on two or three occasions last year, and I should like to know if the minister has any intention of giving that coal area a little better treatment by way of subvention than was given last year.

Mr. GORDON: I am told that mines such as the Truax-Traer can compete in the Manitoba market against coal from Alberta and the Crowsnest. However, I will go into the matter again, and if we are able to discover a discrepancy that will be taken into consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): The minister seems to gauge the activities of that coal field by the activities of the Truax-Traer mine. That is only one company, though it is a large one. They do surface mining, a stripping process, which is not really coal mining as we know it. Most of the mines do deep seam mining, and of course that is a little more expensive. We do feel that something of an injustice was done that area last year by reducing the subvention ten cents a ton, which gave the Alberta fields that much of a preference in the Manitoba market. I hope the minister will take this into his serious consideration and see if we cannot have the subvention restored to where it was before last year.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I had intended to ask one or two questions somewhat along the lines asked by the hon. member for Weyburn, but I understand that the item is to stand so that this information may be brought down, so I will let my questions stand also. I hope the minister will realize that the matter is very important, because after all this item embodies the fuel policy of the government, which is a matter of very great interest to everyone, particularly to those who represent coal areas. We desire to find out not only the coal policy itself but also the increased business that has been brought about by the application of this policy. We realize that coal consumption may fall off, so that perhaps it is not an absolutely fair criterion of the success of the policy, but surely it would be fair to judge it by the increased percentage of business handled by Canadian mines in preference to mines in other countries. Keeping that in mind, I hope the minister will bring down all the information necessary to enable us to find out very definitely just how successful the policy has been, what increased business has been brought about by it, and what has been the cost to the country.

Mr. GORDON: I shall be very glad to get that information and bring it down, and to let this item stand in the meantime. Of course I am not unmindful of the importance of having the cost of these coal movements made clear; it is an important and intricate subject, on which I should like to have a full, free and frank discussion in order to have the benefit of the views of all hon. members.

Mr. RALSTON: I know the minister appreciates what my hon. friend just said, that this is a most important matter in the east and the west, and I am sure the minister will welcome anything which will afford the slightest possibility of the solution of a problem which has proved extremely vexing for quite a long time. The policy of subventions was inaugurated three or four years ago, and I should like to ask my hon. friend if his department has explored the market which could be opened to Nova Scotia coal if a subvention were granted which would be sufficient to justify the Canadian Pacific Railway using Nova Scotia coal as far west as Belleville, let us say, and the Canadian National Railways using it as far west as Prescott. I understand that is within what my hon. friend calls the central fuel area, which is called by other people the acute fuel area.

Mr. GORDON: My hon. friend means the amount of coal that would be used if Canadian coal entirely displaced United States coal on the railways? That has been investigated with respect to both railways as far west as Trenton, Prescott, Belleville, Brockville and other towns; in fact, the Dominion Fuel Board has investigated the differentials in laid down costs as far as North Bay and Cochrane. They have considered this question just as far as there was any possible hope of projecting the use of Nova Scotia coal westward, with a view to collecting all the information possible as to where the breaking point would come, beyond which no government could go in making up the differential in the laid down costs. I am sure anyone who has given study to this matter will conclude that there is a point beyond which the difference in cost is so great as to preclude the use of eastern coal. That applies to both western and eastern coal, but that information is at present under review by the Dominion Fuel Board, and of course what their investigations will disclose will determine how much this government may have to pay as between the laid down costs in order that a million tons more or less may be given in new business to the Nova Scotia mines. I am hopeful that it will be a million tons and probably more.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend cannot tell us the amount just on those two items for railways alone?

Mr. GORDON: I should like to be able to satisfy the hon. member in that regard, but I have not the figures before me. They are very intricate and I did not come prepared with that information.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: While that point is under consideration, and in order to suggest another line which the minister might have in mind when this item again comes before the committee, it may be remembered that when last year we were discussing another matter, that of unemployment relief, I brought up the same question in connection with the Brazeau collieries in Alberta, whose sole market is the Canadian National Railways. We realized then that no financial assistance is given in respect to coal used by the railways themselves, and in this particular area and others of a similar type the railways are the sole market. On that occasion I made the suggestion that if we were spending money for the relief of unemployment, there was probably no other way in which we would furnish a greater amount of employment for as small an expenditure than by paying, within a reasonable area, the difference to the railways between the cost of using Canadian coal and that of using United States coal. That has not been tried out, so far as I understand, and I know in my own area—and I will discuss this question further when the item comes up again—the issue is a live one, because the coal contracts are small and a great number of men are out of work. Therefore, as regards coal from the Brazeau and other collieries in Alberta and eastern Canada where the different mines have for their market railway lines exclusively or partially, but particularly such railways as favour steam coal alone, where the railway itself is the sole market and where at the present time coal from the United States is largely used, I hope the minister will keep in mind the question of the possibility of paying the difference in cost between the two classes of coal, Canadian and United States, to those railways in order to increase the area within which Canadian coal is used, thus supplying work to our own mines.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister had any computation made as to the approximate amount it would cost to provide a market for another million tons of coal in the area that he has in mind as being possibly feasible?

Mr. GORDON: Not a computation that I would care to disclose, because my research into the matter has not gone far enough for me to make any pronouncement. I think it would not be wise at the moment for me to make one, because I might have to change my viewpoint, and to give out a statement of that kind at the present time, when the matter is under consideration, might lead only to false hopes on the one hand or agreeable hopes on the other. I prefer to have the matter stand until the situation has been further investigated, and as I said a few moments ago, I hope a conclusion that will in a large measure go towards correcting the acute situation in Nova Scotia will be reached.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should like to join with the hon. member for Red Deer in pressing upon the attention of the minister the necessity, if the railways are to be included, of considering the movement in western Canada. If this is to be considered, it is a new departure. In the past we have been able to persuade the railways to use western coal further east on their lines than was economical from their standpoint. They could have purchased coal cheaper for the use of trains running out of Winnipeg and yet they used our western coal as far east as Minaki and Kenora. If a subvention is to be applied to the movement of eastern coal for railway use, my hon. friend will of necessity have to take into consideration the movement of western coal. I just want to warn him that from my past experience he is stepping into a pretty expensive undertaking if he attempts to move coal for railway uses. I am frank in saying that so far I do not believe we can justify, from the standpoint of the amount of new coal that has been consumed in the Canadian market, the expenditure in which we have been engaged for some years past in using our own coal for domestic purposes. I always felt and still feel it was a gesture in the right direction to encourage the use of Canadian coal in fields which it might not reach under existing rate schedules. But when one begins to talk about coal for railway use, one must consider seriously whether the expenditure is warranted. If, however, this is to be done by the government for the eastern movement, then of necessity the same must apply as well to the western movement.

Mr. COOTE: Did I understand the minister correctly when he said that the Premier of Alberta had suggested the desirability of having a commission investigate the coal industry in that province?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. As the hon. member probably knows, some six or seven years ago there was in Alberta a commission that made an exhaustive report on the coal industry there generally. I do not know whether that report has come under his eye, but I have had occasion to look into it. That suggestion was made by the premier of Alberta, and I take it that he deemed the appointment of a commissioner would be helpful. I am not questioning his judgment in that regard.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to urge upon the minister the desirability of appointing such a commission; in fact, I have already advocated it in the house three or four times. In order to interest the minister in the need of a thorough investigation into the industry, I should like to point out the situation as it was brought to my attention when I was in that district shortly before coming to Ottawa. Most of the mines in the Crowsnest pass district operated about 117 or 120 days last year, so that a few men got that number of days' work. The majority of the men received only ninety to one hundred days' work.

Mr. GORDON: To what mines does the hon. member refer?

Mr. COOTE: Mines at Blairmore and Bellevue; and possibly Coleman is about in the same position. Some of the men got only sixty days' work. They would be mostly the day men who would receive $4.50 a day. The total wages of a man who got sixty days' work would be $270, and he must have some relief in addition to that. The man who got ninety days' work at $4.50 a day would receive only $405. Further, all those men have as the minister knows, certain deductions from their day's pay for locker fee, union fee, doctor's fee, coal and rent. Their condition is really very bad. Some of the contract men, of course, are doing better, but even they in many cases are not making enough to keep themselves and their families, and perhaps the majority of them are family men. I am not blaming the minister for this condition, which is a difficult one, but if he had a royal commission investigate carefully the situation there, it might help the government to formulate some policy that would lead to better conditions in that area. I hope the minister will view this proposal of the premier of Alberta in a very sympathetic manner, because I am sure that there is great need for it.

Mr. GORDON: I can assure the hon. member that I replied to the Premier of Alberta and assured him that if he set up such a commission the department and the Dominion Fuel Board would facilitate the inquiry and give him all the data at our disposal. I do not know what is in the mind of the Premier of Alberta at the present moment, whether he intends to pursue that course or not.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Topographical Surveys — Topographical and aerial surveys and maps for the general development and administration of the country, including hydroelectric, forested, mineralized, agricultural and industrial areas; expenses of Geographic Board of Canada; centralization of all aerial photographic operations in cooperation with the Royal Canadian Air Force; traverse of northern rivers and lakes for administration of Northwest Territories; legal surveys of all remaining Dominion lands; surveys for administration of Dominion parks; certifying of standard measures; plotting and printing of maps and plans, etc., $133,500.

Amount required to pay the fees of the board of examiners for D.L.S. of the secretary and of the sub-examiners and for travelling expenses, stationery, printing, rent of room and furniture, etc. (the fees of Messrs. F. H. Peters, W. M. Tobey and Harry Parry, members of the board, and J. A. Cote, secretary, are to be paid out of this sum), $1,800.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would the minister give us a short statement with respect to the services that are being discontinued, permitting a reduction of $116,500?

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): In a general way no services under this vote are being discontinued. The reduction simply means that the work in general is being curtailed in this branch of the service.

Mr. COOTE: How many men are being kept on in this branch of topographical surveys?

Mr. MURPHY: The number is 102.

Mr. COOTE: Are the salaries of these men covered by this vote?

Mr. MURPHY: The salaries of fifty, amounting to $115,128, are covered by the civil government vote, and the salaries of the other 52 are payable under the other vote. They amount to $117,517.50.

Mr. BROWN: I notice that this item covers surveys for administration of Dominion parks. If it is in order to discuss under this vote the Riding Mountain park, I would ask what is the minister's policy with regard to that park. I understand that it has been suggested that the west end of the area that is now reserved for a park should be taken out of the park area. I know that that was the desire of many people in the west. What is the minister's attitude in regard to that?

Mr. MURPHY: I think that question would more properly come up under the item of parks.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What number is that item in the estimates?

Mr. MURPHY: It will be found on page 52, Dominion lands, and so forth.

Mr. BROWN: I will take it up then.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to know the reduction in the personnel of this department.

Mr. MURPHY: In the topographical surveys branch?

Mr. COOTE: The reduction covered by this vote.

Mr. MURPHY: The number is sixteen.

Mr. COOTE: Under this vote?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: Are any survey parties being sent out this year?

Mr. MURPHY: In reply to my hon. friend's previous question, I should have said that the total reduction is sixteen. Part of the salaries will be paid out of this vote and part out of the civil government vote. But the total number I gave is correct, sixteen, as far as that particular branch is concerned. Arrangements have been made to send out some survey parties this year.

Mr. COOTE: Under the topographical surveys or land surveys? I see that they are both mentioned in this vote.

Mr. MURPHY: There will be parties sent out by the topographical surveys branch. That is the item we are now discussing. There may also be parties sent out by geodetic surveys.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Now that the natural resources have been transferred to the western provinces, is this department doing any topographical work in Manitoba and Saskatchewan?

Mr. MURPHY: The topographical surveys branch makes surveys all over the dominion. Possibly the hon. member has reference to subdivisional surveys. That work was formerly done by this branch, but it is now a function of the provincial governments and is carried on by them.

Mr. CAYLEY: I see that vote 186 provides $142,500 for geological surveys, and it includes the wages of explorers, topographers and others. Do these overlap in any way, or are they two different branches altogether?

Mr. MURPHY: These surveys do not in any degree conflict with one another. The geological survey, which the hon. member mentioned, is a function of the Department of Mines, and is carried out by that department for the purpose of discovering minerals. That is entirely different from the survey made by this branch, which concerns itself mainly with the mapping of various areas, showing the physical characteristics of the country, such as forestry, water powers and general contours.

Mr. CAYLEY: But the maps used are just the same, are they not?

Mr. MURPHY: Certain maps are made by the Department of Mines of areas in which a special survey has been carried on. The work of that department however in no way conflicts with or overlaps the work carried on by the topographical branch of the Department of the Interior.

Item agreed to.

Geodetic Survey of Canada—control operations—triangulation, geodetic astronomy, base lines, precise levelling and investigations—for the charting of sea coasts, water areas and forming a basis for the production of all survey maps and for pursuing investigations of the earth's crust, $139,000.

To recoup the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway Commission in connection with their claim for injury to John Hedin, $240.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is there some reduction in the staff of geodetic survey parties in the field?

Mr. MURPHY: There has been a reduction of two in this branch of the department.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A reduction of two in the staff?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has there been any reduction in the parties engaged in the field service?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes. There is provision for a survey party in northern Quebec which will be engaged on the completion of the final link of fundamental control in one of the large circuits of triangulation. There will also be a party in eastern Quebec. This operation consists of the inspection of the permanent ground marks with identification of the intersected works, and so on.

Mr. TOTZKE: Quite clear.

An hon. MEMBER: As mud.

Mr. MURPHY: There is a party in Ontario carrying out levelling operations in the area extending between lake Ontario and Algonquin park, in Northumberland, Peterborough, Haliburton and Hastings counties. Also another party in Ontario will establish fundamental bench marks in certain cities and towns.

Mr. BRADETTE: Is there any money to be spent on the geodetic survey of the coastal lines of James bay?

Mr. MURPHY: Not this year.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the St. Lawrence river basin near completion?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed that considerable work is to be done in the St. Lawrence basin near the strait of Belle Isle, but no provision has been made to carry on this work this year.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Under this item I believe we must consider aerial photographic work carried on by the Royal Canadian Air Force. From the diminution in the item I would judge the work has been largely reduced. Is it the intention in the coming year to carry on much aerial photographic work?

Mr. MURPHY: There will be a certain amount of aerial photographic work done this year, but not as much as in previous years. I think the hon. member has in mind the making of maps from aerial photography.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am informed by an hon. member that the item to which I am directing my remarks was passed while I was not in the chamber.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, the question would more properly have been asked under the previous item.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was called from the chamber for a moment.

Item agreed to.

International Boundaries—expenses connected with the survey and demarcation of international boundaries, $28,000.

Mr. BROWN: What part of the boundary lines remains to be marked?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. MURPHY: The marking of boundary lines is practically completed, but those markings must be maintained. To use a colloquial expression, the lines must be kept in shape.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is a matter in connection with which both the United States and Canada are interested, and in the past each country has voted similar amounts for this work. Has any arrangement been made for a reduction in the vote to be passed by the American congress?

Mr. MURPHY: I have no information on that point.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Yukon Territory—salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territory, including surveys, $57,500.

Grant to Yukon council for local purposes, the construction and maintenance of roads, and to provide for the payment of bounty on wolves and coyotes under the provisions of an ordinance enacted by the commissioner in council, the sum to be paid not to exceed $20 each for wolves and $10 each for coyotes, the pelts of the animals on which bounty is paid to be surrendered to the government. The proceeds of the sale of such pelts is to be placed to the credit of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, $105,000.

Mr. REID: Is the bounty on coyotes payable only to the Yukon territory?

Mr. MURPHY: On this particular item the bounty is paid only on wolves destroyed in that territory.

Mr. REID: Is that the only place where a bounty is paid?

Mr. MURPHY: No. A bounty is also paid on wolves destroyed in the Northwest Territories, Mackenzie and Keewatin.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Northwest Territories—salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territories, including investigation work, schools, hospitals, relief to destitute, maintenance of prisoners and insane patients, administration of the Northwest Game Act and the Wood buffalo park, etc., $127,560.

Arctic explorations and administration of Eskimo affairs, salaries and contingencies, equipment and supplies; relief to destitute; schools; hospitals and medical services; maintenance of prisoners and insane patients; education; travelling expenses, etc., $82,560.

Expenses connected with the maintenance of reindeer station at Kittigazuit, N.W.T., $20,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In what services does the minister propose to save $35,000? The population of that part of the country is growing all the time.

Mr. MURPHY: Possibly I can best answer the hon. member's question by giving a comparative statement of expenditures in 1932-33 and 1931-32 as follows:

	1932-33	1931-32
Schools	$ 3,200	$ 3,200
Relief to destitute, maintenance of insane patients and prisoners, orphan and destitute children	10,540	10,540
Hospital and medical services	22,058	21,530
Printing, stationery and contingencies	4,500	4,500
Mackenzie district administration and Northwest Game Act	70,656	98,200
Salaries, Ottawa	12,636	21,225
Administration of vital statistics ordinance	400	500
Administration of the fur export tax ordinance	800	1,000
Unforeseen expenses	2,770	2,770

The totals are: 1932-33, $127,560; 1931-32, $163,465. There is an increase in one item of $528, with total decreases of $36,433, or a net decrease of $35,905.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The decreases are on the administration largely, $8,000 Ottawa and $27,000 in the general vote.

Mr. MURPHY: In the Mackenzie district administration, yes.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

The house in committee of supply, Mr. MacNicol in the chair.

Government of the Northwest Territories—salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territories, including investigation work, schools, hospitals, relief to destitute, maintenance of prisoners and insane patients, administration of the Northwest Game Act and the Wood buffalo park, etc., $127,560.

Arctic explorations and administration of Eskimo affairs, salaries and contingencies, equipment and supplies; relief to destitute; schools; hospitals and medical services; maintenance of prisoners and insane patients; education, travelling expenses, etc., $82,560.

Expenses connected with the maintenance of reindeer station at Kittigazuit, Northwest Territories, $20,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will the minister explain the reduction in the vote as it affects arctic explorations and administration of Eskimo affairs?

Mr. MURPHY: I will itemize the vote under the different headings, giving the estimates for 1932-33 with those of 1932. These are the items:

	1932-33	1931-32	Decrease	Increase
Salaries, living allowances and retiring leave	$20,146	$46,510	$26,364	———
Medical officers, field expenses, etc.	8,500	13,150	4,650	———
Travelling expenses, doctors, nurses and investigators	2,500	3,000	500	———
Hospital grants, Eskimo	3,000	3,000	———	———
Eskimo provincial and municipal hospital	1,000	1,000	———	———
Dispensers	———	360	360	———
Eskimo schools	7,250	5,250	———	$2,000
Annual Arctic expedition	23,300	47,100	23,800	———
Relief to destitute and sick Eskimos	15,000	23,000	8,000	———
Unforeseen expenses	1,864	2,110	246	———

Summarized, this shows for the year 1932-33, $82,560, and for the year 1931-32, $144,480, there being one increase of $2,000 with a total decrease of $63,920, or a net decrease of $61,920.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not hear what the minister said as to grants to schools. Is there any reduction in school grants?

Mr. MURPHY: There is an increase in the grant to Eskimo schools of $2,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hospitals remain the same?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Do I understand the minister to say that last year there was a grant of $23,000 for the care of Indians as compared with a grant this year of $15,000? If so, there will be $8,000 less to take care of the sick and destitute amongst the Eskimos.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Why does the minister assume that none of them will be sick this year?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed that fortunately the health of the Eskimos this year is much better, and we estimate that we shall require that amount less than we spent last year.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the first item the minister gave there is a decrease of $26,000. Has there been any reduction in staff to account for that decrease?

Mr. MURPHY: Eight officials have been retired. These are the details:

	Salary	Living allowance
One exploration and development officer	$5,120	$3,000
One investigator, grade 3	3,305	——
One investigator, grade 1	2,400	——
One botanist transferred to Reindeer vote	2,520	——
One assistant botanist transferred to Reindeer vote	2,040	——
One medical officer, grade 1 at Chesterfield, not required (Proportion of salary not required, $760.)	2,520	——
One assistant engineer transferred to Geodetic survey	2,700	——

This gives a total of $24,365, from which there will be deducted ten per cent, leaving a net amount of $26,529, from which should be subtracted the adjustment of Doctor Livingstone's statutory increase of $30, making a net reduction of $26,499.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is it intended to send a ship up to the north this year?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes. Supplies will be sent, but the expedition that has been sent in previous years will not go out this year. In other words, we are not chartering a steamship but have made arrangements with the Hudson Bay Company to carry our supplies. That explains the difference.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is it estimated that $20,000 will establish the reindeer quarters? Have the reindeer arrived at permanent quarters yet?

Mr. MURPHY: No. Last year when this item was under discussion it was expected that the reindeer would arrive during this present fiscal year but the progress has been much slower than was anticipated, and it is doubtful if they will reach their home on the Kittigazuit peninsula during the coming fiscal year 1932-33. Provision has not been made in this item for the upkeep of the herd; the $20,000 is simply to prepare the quarters.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister can give no estimate of what the total number of reindeer will be when they do arrive?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. LUCAS: I understand some time ago the department shipped a number of buffalo from Wainwright park up into the northern areas. Has the minister any information as to how these buffalo are doing in that northern territory?

Mr. MURPHY: A number of buffalo were sent from Wainwright park to Wood Buffalo park, which is situated partly in northern Alberta and partly in the territories. I think the total number sent out amounts to between six and seven thousand head. These animals are looked after by permanent wardens but I have no definite information as to the increase which has taken place. Recently a man was sent up into this territory to make a special report on the condition of the herd. A certain number of old bulls and barren cows are slaughtered each year for the relief of destitute in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. TOTZKE: The amount of the vote last year was $106,400; was all that expended?

Mr. MURPHY: There remains unexpended some $82,500.

Item agreed to.

Dominion lands, parks, etc. — Dominion lands, seed grain, mining lands and ordnance, admiralty and public lands, salaries and expenses, etc., $90,600.

Mr. BROWN: Will the minister now answer the question I asked when the previous item was before the committee?

Mr. MURPHY: That particular item will be reached a little later on, when it can be discussed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the hydrometric survey and other work of the kind been turned over to the provincial government?

Mr. MURPHY: These services are still being carried on by the bureau.

Mr. TOTZKE: What expenditures were made last year in connection with Dominion lands?

Mr. MURPHY: The expenditures under this item were incurred in the administration of Dominion lands, seed grain, mining lands and ordnance, admiralty and public lands and salaries and expenses.

Mr. TOTZKE: Will the minister specify the expenditures in connection with Dominion lands?

Mr. MURPHY: The estimates for 1932-33 are made up as follows: Winnipeg, salary of J. F. Drew, $1,920, and of stenographer, $1,380; Regina, salary of J. A. Reed, $3,360 and salary of stenographer $1,380; Edmonton, salary of A. Norguay, $3,360 and of stenographer, $1,620; Revelstoke, salary of T. J. Wadman, $2,880; Calgary, salary of Colonel F. M. Steele, $3,780; Fort Smith, salary of Joseph Milner, $4,260 and of M. Meikle, $4,560. This makes a total of $28,500, which with the ten per cent decrease leaves a net total of $25,650.

Mr. TOTZKE: What are the present duties of these men?

Mr. MURPHY: These officers are retained for the purpose of making adjustments on seed grain and fodder relief loans which were made, I believe in 1914 and 1915, many of which still remain outstanding.

Mr. TOTZKE: They have really nothing to do with Dominion lands?

Mr. MURPHY: The item is simply listed under this vote.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is this seed grain a former loan?

Mr. MURPHY: As I explained a moment ago, adjustments are being made of loans made in 1914 and 1915, many of which have not been repaid.

Mr. DONNELLY: What has been the average collection each year for the last five years as compared with the cost of administration?

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry I have not the detailed figures before me. I am informed that the total amount advanced in the years mentioned was between $14,000,000 and $15,000,000, of which something under $5,000,000 remains unpaid. We have only one man in each province to deal with these loans.

Mr. DONNELLY: Are sufficient collections being made to cover the administration expenses?

Mr. MURPHY: Two or three years ago the collections more than covered the cost of administration, but at the present time I doubt if we are doing much more than to collect enough to pay these costs.

Mr. BROWN: Is any of that money outstanding in Manitoba?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take up a matter which although it does not come within any of these votes is one within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior—I refer to the islands in James bay. The people in my section of the country do not seem to understand that these islands belong to the federal government, and I ask the minister if he has received any requests from the Ontario government to have these islands come under provincial jurisdiction. Only two years ago the natural resources were returned to the western provinces and the people in my section of the country are firmly convinced that any lands within the boundaries of James bay should come within the jurisdiction of either the government of Ontario or of Quebec. Has the minister received any correspondence, or has anything been done by the provincial governments or the federal government in the matter of giving these islands to Quebec and Ontario?

Mr. MURPHY: If my memory serves me correctly, I have had only one communication in regard to the jurisdiction under which these islands would come, and that is concerning one situated in Hudson bay, not in James bay. Inquiries were instituted and it was ascertained that that particular island came under the jurisdiction of Ontario rather than that of the dominion. But at the moment I recall no communication being received by the department in regard to the general question of jurisdiction and administration of those islands in James bay.

Mr. BRADETTE: I would infer from the reply of the minister that any islands in the Hudson bay inland sea come under the jurisdiction of Ontario. This will naturally imply that all the islands in James bay belong to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I have in mind at the present time the Belcher islands, part of which, some people from Quebec contend, belong to that province. Naturally we in Ontario contend that the whole of them belong to our province. I bring up this question to emphasize the importance of knowing definitely as soon as possible under whose jurisdiction these islands come, so that there may be no delay in any improvements or work, whether mineral development or otherwise, that may be done there. The federal government and the authorities of the provinces interested, that is, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec, should get together in the near future so as to decide the question of jurisdiction. Since the beginning of the session I have received several letters of application for certain rights, whether mining or otherwise, in some of the islands in James bay, and so far I have not been able to get any satisfactory reply from the provincial authorities. I believe at one time the minister was good enough to grant me a personal interview in which he told me the applications came under his jurisdiction. If, according to what he said a few moments ago, the islands in Hudson bay are really under the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario, I believe in my section of the country and even in Toronto they are unacquainted with that fact, and the government owes it to the country to make a definite statement in the matter. Their natural resources have all been given to the western provinces, and I maintain that all those islands in that great inland sea should be given to the three provinces I have mentioned. I am making this plea very earnestly on account of certain conflicts over mining and colonization laws and so forth, because if we have complication of jurisdiction, it is bound to hurt the development of that section of the country.

Mr. MURPHY: I speak subject to correction, and I have not in my possession the legal opinion in respect to this matter, but as I understand it, the islands in James bay and Hudson bay proper are under the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament; that is, they belong to the crown in the right of the dominion. When I spoke about an island in Hudson bay being under the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario, I had reference to an island which is situated in the mouth of one of the rivers. An island so situated comes under the jurisdiction of the province if the shore line on either side of the mouth of the river would, if extended, include that island in the province. I do not wish the hon. member to understand that in illustrating my point a moment ago by mentioning this particular island, I was saying that all islands in Hudson bay were under the jurisdiction of the provinces. My understanding is exactly the opposite. Any island which is situated within the bay proper, either James or Hudson bay, would belong to the crown in the right of the dominion. As I say, I speak subject to correction.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am indeed thankful to the minister for the useful information he has given, but again I ask that in the near future a conference be held between the provinces interested and the federal government to decide the matter. I know from actual fact that thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands of dollars would be invested to-day in some of those James bay islands if the exact jurisdiction were known. The fact, as the minister has mentioned, that islands in the estuaries of some of the rivers are under the jurisdiction of the provinces, while islands in the Hudson and James bays are under the jurisdiction of the federal government, is the reason that people contemplating development work are afraid to go ahead with it, being in a state of uncertainty as to the matter of jurisdiction. In making this plea I have the support of the Minister of Labour, who comes from my section of the country and is familiar with the situation. I ask the government very earnestly to hand over at the earliest possible moment to the jurisdiction of the provincial governments interested, namely, Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba, all islands within Hudson and James bays. As I have pointed out before as regards Belcher islands alone, some people maintain that part of them should belong to Quebec and part to Ontario, while naturally, as a northern Ontario man, I maintain that the whole of them should belong to Ontario. I want to impress upon the committee the fact that there are complications of this nature, and as it was an easy matter for the federal government to return the natural resources to the three western provinces, it should be easy for them to give to the provinces I have mentioned, those islands within certain degrees of latitude within Hudson and James bays. This would help wonderfully in the development of the mineral and other natural resources that require capital for development; I shall not include agriculture at the present time. This question should be settled satisfactorily so that the people may know exactly where to file their applications. When there are legal complications between the provincial and the federal authorities people naturally are not willing to spend their money. The mining laws of the dominion differ in some respects from those of Ontario, and on that score alone I would urge upon the minister the necessity of calling such a conference. I know the government in the near future will receive communications from people interested in the development of northern Ontario, strongly urging that this matter be settled at an early date.

Mr. MURPHY: I shall be very glad to give consideration to the representations made by the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In respect of the first item dealing with seed grain relief, I understand in those cases the liens are taken on the land itself. I have two or three questions to ask in that regard and I think I can put them together. The minister can consider and answer them after I have finished. First, do those seed grain liens, nominally at least, still carry interest? Second, is there any large number of these old seed grain liens within that part of Saskatchewan which has suffered from crop failures for some years and is now receiving one hundred per cent relief? Third, if so, which of these two liens—the old seed grain lien upon the land or the new lien upon the crop in connection with which notes have been given payable to the Saskatchewan Relief Commission—has priority? Perhaps I need not ask the fourth question, for an estimate by the minister as to the value of either the old liens in that district or of the new notes recently signed. But the first three questions are serious.

Mr. MURPHY: In reply to the first question, interest is being charged on the old liens. In reply to the second, whether some of these liens are still existent in the southern part of Saskatchewan in the dried out areas, although I cannot answer categorically, but speaking from my experience in dealing with the matter I would say that these liens are attached to lands in all parts of Saskatchewan as well as to lands in Manitoba and Alberta. As to the question which lien would have priority, the old seed grain which was put on the land or the new lien in Saskatchewan which was put on the crop, I would say, although I am not a lawyer, that the old lien would come first because it was put on the land. That lien would have priority over all other charges against that land, especially in those cases where relief was granted fifty per cent by the dominion and fifty per cent by the province. Although the legal members of the house may be in a better position to answer that question than I am, my own opinion is that the first lien would have priority.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the minister if he is right in his contention that there is still some money owing by the farmers of Manitoba to the federal government on account of seed grain advances in 1914-15? I am under the impression that Manitoba does not owe anything to the federal government for that advance of seed grain. Am I right in that or not?

Mr. MURPHY: I think the hon. member is quite correct when he states that there is nothing owing to the Dominion government for seed grain advances in the year 1914-15. But I did not understand him to refer particularly to 1914-15 when he asked his first question. There is money owing to the Dominion government for seed grain and fodder relief in the province of Manitoba, but not for 1914-15. It goes back as far as the year 1876, when there was a grasshopper plague in Manitoba, and some of the liens given at that time have not yet been discharged.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I cannot believe that the minister is serious in saying that the farmers of Manitoba—I am speaking of the farmers—owe anything to the federal government on account of seed grain relief in 1876. Was not that all wiped out some years ago?

Mr. MURPHY: No, it was not.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does the government intend to try to collect that money?

Mr. BROWN: Is that what Mr. Drew is doing, trying to collect money advanced in 1876?

Mr. MURPHY: He is trying not only to collect but also to adjust.

Mr. BROWN: I think this is a most ridiculous situation which has been presented to the house. Imagine keeping a man in Winnipeg to collect money advanced to settlers back in the year 1876, most of whom are probably dead by this time. Before this item passes we ought to get details of these advances; the committee should be told just how much of this money has been collected in recent years and what Mr. Drew is doing in Manitoba in that regard. Really it is a most ridiculous situation.

Mr. MURPHY: It is a situation which has been before this house practically every year since then.

Mr. BROWN: But it has not been presented as plainly as now.

Mr. MURPHY: I was not minister in previous years. As I said, Mr. Drew is not simply endeavouring to collect, because I am quite as well aware as the hon. member of the inability of the farmers of Manitoba to pay under present conditions. Mr. Drew is endeavouring to adjust these matters. Recommendations come forward at frequent intervals from Mr. Drew, with whom is associated an official of the provincial government, and in a great many instances his recommendations have been that these seed grain liens be cancelled. But they are not cancelled until the matter has been investigated and the recommendation forwarded by the commissioner.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What commissioner?

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Drew, with whom is associated an official of the provincial government, by the name, I think, of Mr. Gyles.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: They adjust these seed advances?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, seed grain and fodder relief.

Mr. BROWN: The only seed grain involved in this discussion goes back as far as 1876. Am I not right in that?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think that is quite correct.

Mr. BROWN: That was the statement we got from the minister.

Mr. MURPHY: No, some go back as far as 1876, but advances for seed grain and fodder relief have also been made in the intervening years. I cannot give the hon. member the details, as I have not got them here.

Mr. BROWN: I think we had better have the details. The very fact that the minister has mentioned 1876 indicates that it is a situation that needs to be investigated. Those old liens, of course, should be cancelled at once. The item had better stand until we get the details.

Mr. MURPHY: If it will suit the purpose of the hon. member I shall be very glad to furnish him with a statement showing the advances that have been made over the different years and the amount collected.

Mr. VALLANCE: For the information of the hon. member for Red Deer, who asked the minister which of the two liens would have priority, may I say that the liens that are being taken to-day for seed grain advanced in Saskatchewan are not being placed against the land, but against the crop, due on August 14, 1932.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am quite familiar with that fact, but I wondered whether a lien against the land itself might also include a lien on the crop grown on the land, in which case, of course, it would take priority.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do I understand that if we allow this item to pass the minister will bring down the information we desire to have about Manitoba?

Mr. MURPHY: Certainly, I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: We would like to know when these advances for seed grain and fodder were made to the farmers of Manitoba, the amount advanced and the amount repaid, together with the amount of the interest.

Mr. BROWN: I would like to know the amount repaid year by year.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And how much damage the grasshoppers did in 1876, if the minister has that information.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. DONNELLY: I notice that this item speaks of admiralty and public lands. What is that?

Mr. MURPHY: The Department of the Interior, as the hon. member is aware, has for many years administered the dominion lands. From time to time ordnance lands have been turned over to the Department of the Interior from the Department of National Defence, when that department no longer had use for the lands for their particular purposes.

Item agreed to.

To assist in publishing the transactions of the Association of Dominion Land Surveyors, $125.

Mr. SANDERSON: What is this amount voted for?

Mr. DONNELLY: Will the minister explain the term "publishing the transactions"?

Mr. MURPHY: The sum of $125 is asked for the purpose of assisting the Association of Dominion Land Surveyors in the publishing of their annual report. Not only will this grant aid the association in the publication of papers read at their annual meeting, but it will enable them to employ the services of a shorthand reporter so that the discussion following the reading of papers may be available. The report contains information of great value to the general public, as well as to officers in the government whose duties are connected with surveying and engineering.

Item agreed to.

Advancement of forest conservation in Canada, $254,000.

Mr. LUCAS: Does the administration of the nursery at Indian Head come under this vote?

Mr. MURPHY: The nurseries at Indian Head and Sutherland are now administered by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. VALLANCE: Owing to the fact that this is an item involving an expenditure of $254,000 I should like to know in what provinces and to what extent the advancement of forest conservation is being carried out?

Mr. MURPHY: This item covers not only the advancement of forest conservation but also the total contribution made by the Dominion government towards the technical research into forest products. The description of this vote is hardly accurate; it covers the total amount set aside by parliament for the purpose of carrying on technical investigations into forestry matters throughout the dominion.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does reforestation come under this item?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. TOTZKE: Why is there such a large decrease in the vote?

Mr. MURPHY: The decrease comes about simply through the general policy of economy.

Mr. TOTZKE: In what way have decreases been made?

Mr. MURPHY: The forestry department maintain three laboratories, one at Ottawa, one at Montreal, and one at Vancouver. The services carried on in Ottawa are of a purely technical nature, dealing with such subjects as wood utilization, the study of the application of fire retardants to wood or wood material, and the increasing uses to which wood may be put. In the Montreal laboratory the work is solely for the purpose of assisting Canadian pulp and paper industries. The one in Vancouver concerns itself with the utilization of British Columbia woods. In addition to that the general services rendered by the forestry department are made available so that cooperative action may be taken with the provinces in compiling information as to the forest resources of Canada.

Mr. TOTZKE: Is there a decrease in all these services?

Mr. MURPHY: There is a decrease in all these activities. Although the services are being maintained, less service is being given in the department.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I understood the minister to say that the work of reforestation, the management of forestry branches at different points and the practice of providing seedlings and young trees to farmers had been taken over by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. MURPHY: I said that the nursery stations at Indian Head and Sutherland were being administered by the Department of Agriculture. There are other stations, however, of a different nature, where different problems in forestry are studied, and which are still administered by the forestry department.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That was my understanding. I understand that the practice of distributing seedlings and young trees is now carried on by the Department of Agriculture, but the nurseries of another type where technical work is carried on and where a study is made of the utilization of different woods are still under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MURPHY: That is correct.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think I am voicing the opinion of all farmers when I say we were greatly relieved when we learned that the work of reforestation and of handling nurseries and the distribution of seedlings and young trees throughout the farms on the bald prairies had not been done away with. About a year ago we were shocked to learn that there was a possibility of this service being discontinued, and we are now delighted to know that it is still being carried on. Coming from a prairie province, the minister will be as familiar as the rest of us with the splendid work done in the past by the department he now heads, and the great loss which would be suffered if that work were discontinued.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understood the minister to say that this grant covers several activities, such as forestry research, fire protection and so on. How is the money allocated to each activity?

Mr. MURPHY: The estimates for 1932-33 are as follows: Head office administration, $25,290; research and investigation, $29,352; Petawawa experimental station, $20,033; research and investigations, $15,532; prairie district, main and suboffices, $8,893; research and investigations, $21,374; British Columbia, district offices, research and investigations, $15,353; forest product laboratories at Ottawa, $60,080; Montreal, $32,589; Vancouver, $25,504; giving a total as shown in the item of $254,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: Does not the aerial forest patrol come under this item, or has the service been discontinued?

Mr. MURPHY: Now that each province has control of its own resources the forest patrol and fire protection service is a provincial activity.

Mr. VALLANCE: Did the forest patrol come under this item before, and would it represent the $146,000 decrease?

Mr. MURPHY: Before the natural resources passed to the western provinces the Dominion government did maintain the patrol service under this item. But I do not desire the hon. member to be under any misunderstanding, for of course he realizes that the natural resources were transferred in 1930, and therefore there was nothing included in the estimates last session for fire patrol work.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does this grant include an appropriation for advertising of fire protection?

Mr. MURPHY: No, there is nothing in this item for that purpose.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am doubtful, Mr. Chairman, of the advisability of the government making the change they did with respect to the forestry stations at Indian Head and Sutherland. In the opinion of the minister will this service be performed more cheaply than it was done under the forestry department by men who were especially trained for that kind of work? Everyone knows that the forestry patrol stations under the Department of the Interior had the approbation of every individual interested in tree planting. Now that this work is relegated to a secondary position I have very grave doubts as to the wisdom of the transfer. I am bound to say that I think the tree planting stations would be much better administered under the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry I have no actual figures to give the committee as to the savings which it was hoped might be made by the transfer of these stations from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture; but doubtless the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) will be able to give the information, or I shall be pleased to obtain it for the hon. member.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How many inspectors were dispensed with by reason of the transfer?

Mr. MURPHY: Speaking from memory, I think we had nine inspectors doing this inspectional work.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not continuously?

Mr. MURPHY: No; at periods of the year some of their work was carried on at the forestry stations. I think I am correct in stating that three of those men have been retained by the Department of Agriculture for inspectional purposes.

Mr. VALLANCE: In reply to the last question I asked him the minister stated that his department did not now maintain an aerial forestry patrol service. In what manner are the national parks patrolled?

Mr. MURPHY: The patrolling is done for us by the national defence department.

Mr. NICHOLSON: With regard to the forests products laboratory, I note $60,000 is provided for Ottawa; $32,000 for Montreal; and $25,000 for Vancouver. Would it not be better to have one central forest products laboratory so that effective work might be done in testing woods and finding new uses to which they can be put? One of the serious handicaps that the forest products business of this country labours under is that through lack of such research work we find it difficult to meet world competition. For example, in the British market we cannot meet competition from Norway and Sweden and other European countries because up to the present time we have not gone far enough in practical tests of different classes of Canadian woods to be able to say to the British importers just what purpose any particular class of wood will serve. Up to date the whole scheme of laboratory work so far as forest products are concerned has been wholly inadequate. I understand this vote has been reduced, and when it is spread over three laboratories it seems to me that we are simply maintaining a skeleton organization that serves no useful purpose. Instead, we should be furthering the interests of the forest products business of this country by more intensive research work. I believe that if the laboratory experts were brought here they would tell us that, were their work concentrated in one place, they could carry on more efficiently than when they are spread out as they are now.

Item agreed to.

Administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $50,000.

Mr. TOTZKE: Is there an item in this vote for Jack Miner's bird sanctuary?

Mr. MURPHY: There is nothing in these items.

Mr. TOTZKE: Then there is to be no grant this year.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not say that. It may be among the miscellaneous items, but it is not in this vote.

Mr. GRAY: This matter is of vital interest not only to the members of western Ontario but to Canadians generally. It is true that Jack Miner's bird sanctuary does not come directly under this item, but I do not know where else we could discuss it better. In view of the fact that there is a saving this year of $6,750 under this particular item, I would ask the minister to urge upon his colleagues that they include in the supplementary estimates at least $2,500, the grant that was given last year, and if possible $5,000. Under the late administration a grant to this sanctuary was $5,000, and last year it was reduced to $2,500. I do not need to urge upon the committee the importance of this grant, not only from the standpoint of bird conservation but also from the point of view of the American tourist traffic. Each year some 20,000 cars bring in American tourists who visit the sanctuary, and when you consider the work that Jack Miner and his friends have been doing towards the conservation of birds, I think it will be generally agreed in the house that this grant is one that should be perpetuated. I am sorry that the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott), whose proximity to the bird sanctuary has been frequently referred to in this house, is not in his place. I understand, however, that he and other members from Essex whose personal knowledge of this matter is greater than mine are heartily in accord with the grant, and I urge upon them, as well as upon the minister and the government, to see to it that a grant of at least $2,000, and if possible $5,000, is included in the supplementary estimates for this sanctuary. It costs Mr. Miner the sum of $10,000 a year to conduct it. I do not think it is in the interests of economy that the grant should be deleted from the estimates, and I again urge that the minister speak to his colleagues, pointing out that there is a saving of $6,750 this year in the vote for the administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, which ought to enable them to include an amount in the supplementaries for this bird sanctuary.

Item agreed to.

Investigations of water and power resources and of International Waterway problems, the Dominion hydrometric survey, the Western Provinces Water Board, and for the administration of the Dominion Water Power and Irrigation Acts, etc., $175,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is a reduction of $75,000 under this item; what accounts for it?

Mr. MURPHY: There are the following reductions and increases:

Head office administration	$35,109 96
British Columbia, Yukon and Northwest Territories	7,182 15
Saskatchewan and Alberta	26,308 11
Manitoba	9,580 65
Ontario (Increase)	2,254 40
Quebec (Increase)	1,124 97
New Brunswick	15 00
Nova Scotia	137 00
Prince Edward Island	46 50

This makes a total of $75,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: This item includes the Western Provinces Water Board. What are the functions of this board, and how much of the item is intended for it?

Mr. MURPHY: I regret to say that the wording of the item is not correct, and that this should not have been included in the printed estimate. There is no such board.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is what I wanted to know. Had you not better amend the item accordingly? This is mentioned for a specific purpose and the minister says there is no such board in existence. Why, then, do you need the money? Was this Western Provinces Water Board ever in existence, and if so, what were its functions? I have never known anything about it, and I should like to know.

Mr. MURPHY: The reference to the Western Provinces Water Board is purely a typographical error; it should never have been in the printed estimate. I am quite willing to have it struck out.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that the item be amended by striking out the words "the Western Provinces Water Board", appearing in the sixth and seventh lines.

Mr. BROWN: Does that affect the amount of money?

Mr. VALLANCE: Will the Minister of Justice also move for a reduction in the amount of the estimate? This must have been considered by whoever prepared the estimate.

Mr. MURPHY: Nothing was provided for that purpose.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice some of these items are being passed rather speedily, and we now find that we are voting money for purposes which do not exist. We had better examine each item in order to avoid a repetition of this instance of the Western Provinces Water Board.

Mr. HEENAN: How is the government coming along with respect to the payments to be made to the settlers on shores of the Winnipeg river whose lands were flooded by the waters from the lake of the Woods?

Mr. MURPHY: Nothing is included in this vote for that purpose. I think the hon. member is aware that this is a matter which concerns both the province of Ontario and the Dominion government. No satisfactory arrangement has as yet been arrived at in regard to the matter.

Mr. HEENAN: In either 1928 or 1929 an amount of between $25,000 and $50,000 was included in the estimates for the purpose of commencing negotiations with the settlers. I do not blame the minister for the delay which has taken place in this matter, but surely, when practically all the rest of the international obligations have been adjusted in that neck of the woods, as we call it, the settlers should not be the only ones not taken care of. Settlement has been made of the question as to what height of water shall be maintained in the lake of the Woods, and, if I remember rightly, the International Joint Commission recommended in 1916 that compensation should be made for lands destroyed or flooded. I have personal knowledge of many settlers who have been flooded out by the Winnipeg river. I understand that the province of Ontario says that it has nothing to do with this matter. I have not before me a copy of the votes and proceedings of the Ontario legislature, but my information is that the Minister of Mines gave an answer to a question on the floor of the provincial house to the effect that the legal authorities had said that the province was not legally bound to pay. I am not sure whether our Department of Justice has made a similar ruling, but if these payments are to be based on the elimination of technicalities, the settlers will never be compensated. The claims are based not upon technicalities but upon the findings and recommendations of the International Joint Commission. Lands have been flooded and homes destroyed, and in view of the fact that this government has more to do with the International Joint Commission than the provincial government, I think it should see that these settlers are taken care of at as early a date as possible.

Mr. VALLANCE: The estimates for 1932 contained the following item:

For investigations of water and power resources and of international waterway problems, the Dominion Hydrometric Survey, the Western Provinces Water Board, and for the administration of the Dominion Water Power and Irrigation Acts, etc., $250,000.

This was a decrease of $225,000 over the vote of the year before. It would appear as though a vote had been made last year for this Western Provinces Water Board, and I should like to know how much money was spent last year on this board.

Mr. MURPHY: As I explained a few moments ago, it is simply a typographical error.

Mr. VALLANCE: Last year too?

Mr. MURPHY: Evidently the wording for this year has simply followed that of the year before, and possibly the year before that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And the year before that.

Mr. MURPHY: It is beyond my power to give any other explanation to the hon. member than that already given.

Item, as amended, agreed to.

[Mr. Heenan.]

To provide for the expenses connected with the national parks of Canada, historic sites, care of indigents in the parks, the appointment of stipendiary magistrates in the parks and the payment of their remuneration, etc., $1,100,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have any new areas been taken over since last year?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have any recommendations been forwarded by the province of British Columbia for new park sites?

Mr. MURPHY: Communications have been received at various times in regard to the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No action has been taken?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. VENIOT: Have any been received from the province of New Brunswick?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: What action has been taken?

Mr. MURPHY: No action has been taken?

Mr. VALLANCE: How much money was spent last year in Prince Albert national park, and was the golf course developed to the extent anticipated, having in mind the fact that the work was to be done for relief purposes?

Mr. MURPHY: The expenditure last year for Prince Albert park amounted to $143,149.92. I do not know the expectations of my hon. friend in regard to the work to be done on the golf course, but very little progress has been made.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has a recommendation been received from the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Mackenzie King) that something be done?

Mr. GRAY: I should like to refer to the grant made to the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada. There has been considerable agitation for an historic site to be erected in memory of the late Indian chieftain, Tecumseh, who fell in the battle of Moraviantown during the war of 1812. This matter has been brought to the attention of the board from year to year and last year a resolution was passed favouring the erection of an historic monument. Large public subscriptions have been made for the purpose, but the reason given by the board for not proceeding with the work is that it was unable to obtain a sufficient grant from the government. What portion of this vote will be allotted to this board, and how much money was expended during 1931?

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. member the detailed information for which he asks, but last year there was spent altogether the sum of $49,981.42 for the erection of cairns and other monuments in various parts of the dominion. I am sorry I am unable to give him the details or the geographical locations of the sites. I shall be glad later to give him that information, which can readily be furnished.

Mr. GRAY: I shall appreciate that. Can the minister say what amount is allotted to this commission for the year 1932-33?

Mr. MURPHY: $27,350.

Mr. BROWN: What is the cost of the monuments that are being erected? They seem to be all of a standard pattern.

Mr. MURPHY: From $250 to $350, depending upon the geographical location of the site.

Mr. CAYLEY: The minister will remember that last year I asked him a question regarding a cairn that had been decided upon to mark the site of the first cheese factory in Canada, and which the historic sites commission decided was coming to the township of North Norwich on the road known as Quaker street. The minister assured me that the site had been decided upon. I should like to know if the work will be done this year and the cairn erected.

Mr. WILLIS: What kind of cheese?

Mr. CAYLEY: Headcheese.

Mr. MURPHY: It is not proposed during the coming year to erect any historic monument at the site mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think the minister has the information in regard to the matter about which I ask, although the work was done in the last year of the previous administration. It will be remembered that during the rebellion there was a battle known as Cut Knife Hill. The Department of the Interior raised a monument there on which they placed an inscription which was obnoxious to the Indians of that Indian reserve. Has the inscription ever been changed, and if so, what is now the inscription on that monument?

Mr. MURPHY: I understand a change has been made in the inscription, and the one which it is proposed to put on the tablet has received the sanction of the historic sites board who are members of the commission.

Mr. TOTZKE: The historic sites committee has for some time been trying to get a roadway to the Fish Creek cemetery which is a site of the rebellion of 1885. Has anything been done in that regard?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed that negotiations in regard to this matter are still in progress.

Mr. REID: Is it the minister's intention this year to acquire any further areas for park purposes in British Columbia?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. CAYLEY: Coming back to the matter I have mentioned, do I understand the committee have given up the idea of marking the site of the first cheese factory, or is it just postponed?

Mr. MURPHY: The matter has simply been postponed. I am also told that on information received from Doctor Ruddick, the dairy commissioner, there exists some doubt as to the proper location, and until the Historic Sites and Monuments Board are fully convinced that they have located the proper place on which this monument should be erected, the matter will remain in abeyance.

Mr. CAYLEY: I was under the impression in the first place that Doctor Ruddick was emphatic that this was the true site. I do not know what has changed his mind.

Mr. MURPHY: Like other men, possibly Doctor Ruddick has changed his mind.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Might I inquire as to whether the work of delimitation of park areas carried on in connection with the transfer of the natural resources to the provinces has yet been completed?

Mr. MURPHY: I understand the delimitation of the park boundaries was completed before the transfer of the resources to the provinces.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I understand at the time of the transfer, in respect of one or two of the parks, there was still a question as to the inclusion of certain items of land, particularly in connection with Banff park. I refer to the question of the inclusion of certain coal and mineral areas within the park. The minister assures me that work has been completed.

Mr. MURPHY: Everything in regard to the delimiting of the park boundaries was settled before the transfer, and to date no areas have been added to or subtracted from the park.

Mr. BROWN: Perhaps at this point the minister will answer a question I have put to him twice regarding the boundaries of Riding Mountain park.

Mr. MURPHY: Will the hon. member kindly repeat his question so that I may be able to answer it correctly?

Mr. BROWN: It has been suggested in many quarters—and I believe the suggestion has received the approval of many people in Manitoba—that the western area of Riding Mountain should be excluded from the park. All I am asking the minister is what his policy is in regard to the matter. These representations have been made to me.

Mr. MURPHY: Certain representations have been made to me and, I think, also to the department, advocating the taking from Riding Mountain park as presently constituted a certain area to the west thereof, but up to the present no policy has been decided upon with regard to the matter. It is still under consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I notice a reduction of $219,000 in the appropriation proper for national parks. This is certainly not a service that the federal government can afford to curtail, because it has nothing to do with the transfer of the natural resources. The federal government has taken upon itself the obligation of maintaining those national parks. They have been a splendid advertisement for Canada. Moreover, from year to year, we have been adding to the areas, the last occasion being the park set apart in Manitoba. Knowing fairly well the difficulty that the minister and his staff will have in administering and providing the necessary funds for carrying on this work, because some improvements must certainly be made, I feel it is rather a poor policy to begin to curtail this particular service, which is one of interest to everyone in Canada. I regret very much to see that the minister, no doubt having listened to other members of the government urging him to practise economy, has decided to cut this amount out of the parks appropriation. Rather I would judge that the parks will require greater and greater amounts to be spent on them each year. I should like to know what particular service and what branches of the service will be cut. It is a very substantial cut—$219,000. I think I am safe in saying that the minister himself did not agree to this cut very willingly, because I quite appreciate that he realizes as well as any member of the house, the necessity for keeping up these parks. I am sorry to see the vote for the national parks reduced in any particular, because I know full well the necessity for maintaining and improving our national playgrounds. What particular items will be cut as compared with last year?

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. MURPHY: With the general remarks as expressed by the hon. member for West Edmonton I am disposed to agree, because I feel that our national parks are a wonderful asset to the people of Canada, not only from the standpoint of the enjoyment they give as scenic beauty spots, but as a potential source of revenue because of the tourist traffic they attract to this country. The reduction in the vote this year is accounted for mainly by the fact that there will be practically no new construction carried on in any of the parks this year. There is also a slight decrease in maintenance costs. In other years the vote included a considerable sum for the construction of new buildings, bridges, roads, and so forth, but this year we are carrying out practically no work of that nature, for reasons of economy pure and simple.

Mr. BROWN: Has the minister any jurisdiction over the Peace park established in Turtle mountains?

Mr. MURPHY: None whatever.

Mr. BROWN: It is purely provincial?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. REID: Is there any limit to the area which the dominion government will accept as a site for a dominion park?

Mr. MURPHY: There is no limit as to area.

Mr. REID: Neither minimum nor maximum?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. REID: Has the department taken over Garibaldi park from British Columbia?

Mr. MURPHY: No. When I said that there was no limitation as to area, I should have qualified that by saying that the department would not willingly accept an area which might be so limited in size as to be unsuitable for a national park. Outside of that, there is no minimum or maximum limit as to area or boundaries.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Is any portion of this amount for historic sites earmarked for repairing Fort Prince of Wales at the mouth of the Churchill river in northern Manitoba? The minister paid a visit to that fort along with myself and several others last year, and as I stated to him at that time there is more history and more tragedy woven around that fort than any other historic site in Canada. It was built by the Hudson's Bay Company from 1733 to 1741 at the time the English and French were at grips in the bay for the fur trade. The fort is about three hundred feet square, built of solid stone masonry, with walls from thirty to forty feet thick, and there are about forty very large guns scattered around the ramparts and now lying buried in the mud. The fort is rapidly falling apart. The arch of the main door is falling down and is held up only by a stick of timber placed there through the kindness of some official of the Department of Railways and Canals. This year a great many people will be visiting Churchill because the eyes of the whole world are focussed upon this new port, and it certainly is a disgrace that this historic fort should be allowed to remain in its present state. I hope that the minister will use his best endeavours to have at least a small amount of money spent this year to set up and reinforce the main gateway, dig the guns out of the mud, and generally make this historic site a little more presentable.

Mr. MURPHY: As the hon. member has stated, it was my privilege last year to visit the site of Fort Prince of Wales at the mouth of the Churchill river on Hudson bay. Originally it was my intention to have an amount included in this vote for at least a partial rehabilitation of this historic fortress, but again owing to the general need for economy and the fact that it would take a considerable sum to do any work of importance on the fort, no provision has been made for that purpose this year. I assure the hon. member, however, that I am as anxious as he is that this work should be done at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. COOTE: Has a new bathhouse been built at the upper hot springs in Banff park?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, it is now in process of erection.

Mr. COOTE: It will be completed under this vote?

Mr. MURPHY: No, the bathhouse is being built from the unemployment relief fund.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the minister if he has supervision and control of the projected highway from Lake Louise to Jasper over the summit? I am quite aware that this work is being done under the unemployment relief scheme. Who has charge of it?

Mr. MURPHY: The work is being carried on by the parks branch under the direction of our chief engineer, Mr. Wardle.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is there any estimate of the total cost?

Mr. MURPHY: The estimate is not very definite. Speaking subject to correction I think it amounts to about $20,000 per mile.

Mr. MacINNIS: In further reference to Garibaldi park, I understand that it has been offered to the dominion by the provincial government. Has that offer been rejected, or is it still under advisement?

Mr. MURPHY: No official offer has been made to the department, but in correspondence possibly with myself, although I am not certain about it at the present moment, the matter has been mentioned.

Mr. NEILL: I had some correspondence with the minister last year. I think he sent one of his officials out to the province of British Columbia to look into certain projected parks on Vancouver island, and when I asked for the report I was advised it was not for publication but for the minister's private information. I suggest an investigation of that kind, dealing with a public matter, should be made available to hon. members. If it is not for public use, of what use can it be? One of the minister's well known officials made an inspection of proposed sites on Vancouver island and the people are anxious to know whether there is any prospect of the government taking action. I do not see why we should not have the information contained in the report, but if we cannot have it perhaps the minister would give us some information as to the steps contemplated by the government regarding those sites, two or three of which are on the west coast of Vancouver island, and one including what is known as Strathcona park and adjacent territory, which belongs to the British Columbia government. Can the minister give us any information on those points?

Mr. MURPHY: Certain communications were sent to me with regard to areas in British Columbia which, in the opinion of the writers, might be suitable for a national park. Our chief engineer, Mr. Wardle, was sent to investigate these different areas. His investigation was not thorough or complete. After some weeks or months he submitted a partial or preliminary report of his investigation. The fact that no policy has been decided upon by the government as to whether or not an additional park will be established in any of the suggested areas explains why the report has not as yet been laid upon the table or made public. Mr. Wardle's report was simply for the information of the minister. However, if and when a decision is made to establish another park in British Columbia, and a full and complete report is made by our officers, there is absolutely no reason why such information should not be tabled.

Mr. NEILL: That is satisfactory, so far as it goes, but the matter has been hanging fire longer than the minister suggests. Mr. Wardle was out in British Columbia not last year but the year before, and these proposals were first initiated perhaps eighteen months before that. Could the minister give me some idea as to when a policy will be formulated in that regard, or is the matter to be held in suspension owing to the present economic conditions?

Mr. MURPHY: In all probability, until economic conditions improve it is barely possible that any further parks will be established in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did the chief engineer also investigate regarding the Garibaldi park area when he was in British Columbia?

Mr. MURPHY: No, that area was not investigated on that occasion.

Mr. COOTE: I noticed the minister told the hon. member for West Edmonton that the reduction in this estimate was due to the fact that very little road work was being done in the parks. I wonder if the minister can tell us about how much work was done in the parks in the past year under the unemployment relief grants. I understood some work was done, and I am wondering if it would offset the reduction in this vote.

Mr. MURPHY: Between $800,000 and $900,000 of unemployment relief moneys were spent in connection with the various parks.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the construction of the Golden-Revelstoke highway, $271,900.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will this construction bring the Big Bend road to a point where it joins the provincial undertaking?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. MURPHY: No; we anticipate the road will be completed next year by the dominion and the province.

Item agreed to.

To provide for a refund of amount paid in 1928 on behalf of the Central Manitoba Mines Limited, being royalty on gold obtained from mineral claims in the province of Manitoba and acquired under the provisions of the Quartz Mining regulations, $1,916.37.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think we should have some explanation on that item. Why are these people being paid the sum of money mentioned?

Mr. MURPHY: The Yukon Quartz and Yukon Placer Mining Acts, applicable to that territory only, as well as quartz mining regulations applicable to the prairie provinces and the Northwest Territories, provided for the payment to the crown of a royalty on gold at the rate of 37½ cents per ounce. On June 11, 1928, the Yukon Quartz Mining Act was amended to provide for the payment of a royalty on the profits of the mine in excess of $10,000 during any year, in lieu of a fixed royalty of 37½ cents per ounce, but the royalty on placer gold remained unchanged. It was understood that a similar amendment would be made as soon as possible to the quartz mining regulations applicable to the prairie provinces, but as a general revision and amendment of these regulations was at the time engaging the attention of an interdepartmental committee, the change referred to was not made effective until April 1, 1929—that is, for a period of nine months thereafter. During that time Central Manitoba Mines, Limited, paid in royalties the sum of $1,916.37, which was at a higher rate than afterwards obtaining, and for that reason they are asking for a refund.

Item agreed to.

To provide for expenses in connection with determination of location and boundaries of ordnance and admiralty lands in the province of British Columbia, $3,000.

Mr. REID: Would the minister kindly explain this item?

Mr. MURPHY: Section 8 of the agreement of February 20, 1930, between the dominion and the province of British Columbia on the transfer of the railway belt and Peace river block, provides for the appointment of two persons, one by the governor general in council and one by the lieutenant-governor in council, to determine the location and boundaries of the several parcels of ordnance and admiralty lands within and without the railway belt. By section 6 of the said agreement, ordnance and admiralty lands included in the railway belt did not pass to the province. By section 7 of the said agreement, all ordnance and admiralty lands which were set aside as such before 1871, and which have been transferred to Canada by the Imperial government, continue to be vested in and administered by the government of Canada. It is provided, however, that Canada shall recognize and confirm any alienation of any part of such lands made by the province prior to the date of the said agreement. The dominion also undertakes to perform every obligation of the province under any agreement made by the province or any provincial act, orders in council or regulation.

It is very advisable at the earliest possible date there should be a clear understanding with the province as to the location and boundaries of the several parcels of ordnance and admiralty lands in the province of British Columbia, some of which are said to be very valuable. It is therefore proposed to provide a sum of $3,000 for the expenses of a commissioner to be appointed under the authority of section 8, who will possibly be accompanied by a departmental expert, as the matter of titles to be investigated is in some cases very complicated.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have lived in western Canada for twenty-six years and I am puzzled to know what are admiralty lands.

Mr. MURPHY: In the main they are lands which were set aside by the British Admiralty in the early days for admiralty purposes. They have been transferred to the crown in the right of the dominion.

Mr. YOUNG: What were those admiralty purposes?

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry my knowledge of history is not sufficient to inform the hon. member for what particular purpose any parcel of land was set aside, but as I understand it, these parcels of land were set aside for various admiralty purposes in the same manner that ordnance lands are set aside for military purposes.

Item agreed to.

To provide amounts required for expropriation of areas for right of way on the Savona-Port Moody section of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, also on the Pembina and Stonewall branches of the same road, $2,500.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with those portions of the Canadian Pacific Railway which were constructed by the Dominion government and afterwards turned over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, it is provided in the contract between the dominion and the company that the necessary right of way for the railway will be acquired by the government where necessary. Before this department had advice as to what lands were affected by the right of way, a certain number of patents were issued which contained no reservation of the lands required for the railway. Many years ago the neccessary deeds were obtained from owners in a large number of cases, but some cases have remained unsettled up to the present time. The areas in each case are small, but in addition to paying for the land the government has to provide the necessary expenses for the legal work connected with the transfer of title. It is impossible to forecast what expenditure may be required, as there is no means of knowing what price will be demanded by the various owners, nor is there any means to estimate what amount will be required for legal purposes, and possibly for expropriation proceedings. The sum of $2,500 is named merely as affording a basis for action to clear off all these pending cases as far as possible in 1932-33. The Department of Justice has advised that it is the duty of the Dominion government to procure title for the railway in all these cases.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MacLEAN: Before the resolution carries I would ask the consent of the committee to revert to vote 206 dealing with the administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MacLEAN: There are one or two matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. The treaty was entered into in 1916 and will expire this fall, but it is provided that it shall remain in force from year to year after that date or until notice is given by either party to determine it. The people of Prince Edward Island think that our American friends have been getting the best of the bargain, and that we are really preserving the birds in the maritimes for their benefit. Two or three years in succession the provincial legislature has passed a resolution objecting to the renewal of the treaty without the province being consulted. One recital in the resolution states:

Whereas the said prohibition was enacted without receiving the assent of the government or the legislative assembly of the province of Prince Edward Island.

They refused to be a party to the treaty. Another recital states:

And whereas the government of the province was requested to enact a law confirming the provision of the said treaty and the federal legislation thereunder, which the government refused to do.

The government of Prince Edward Island has absolutely refused to be a party to this legislation. As the treaty expires this year, would the minister consult the three maritime provinces, particularly Prince Edward Island, to find out just what their objections are? Perhaps he could give us some information regarding the proposal he has in mind for continuing the treaty.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not in a position to state that the provisions of this treaty are satisfactory in their entirety to any or all of the provinces. I think the hon. member will realize the difficulties that any government would be under in drafting a treaty or formulating regulations under it which would be satisfactory to each province. But I may say for his information that the provinces have been consulted in regard to the operations of this treaty, officers of this department being continually in touch with officials of the various game departments of the provinces. As for over twenty-five years I have been a sportsman myself, I feel I have some little knowledge with regard to this problem. I am quite convinced of the value of the treaty to the people of Canada and to Canadian sportsmen. From my knowledge of its workings I believe it is very important not only from that standpoint, but by reason of the provisions it contains for the protection of insectivorous birds. The hon. member knows that increasingly our crops, both grain and vegetable as well as fruit, have been suffering from the ravages of insects, and it is most important that we protect our bird life, especially the insectivorous birds. That protection is one of the main items in the treaty and I do not at present intend to take any step to discontinue the treaty, although I do not say that regulations drafted thereunder might not be amended from time to time to suit particular areas in different parts of the country.

Mr. MacLEAN: Has the department received a resolution passed by the legislature of Prince Edward Island in connection with this matter?

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. MURPHY: Yes; a resolution has been received by the department from the Prince Edward Island legislature. I have called a conference to be held some time during the present month, to which officials and ministers from every province in the dominion have been invited in order that they may lay their views fully before the department and the government.

Mr. MacLEAN: That conference is in connection with the treaty?

Mr. MURPHY: In connection with the operations of the treaty, yes.

Mr. MacLEAN: I am pleased to get that information from the minister, and I trust that the representations which have been made by the local legislature will be given consideration, and that they will be notified when the conference is called.

Mr. CAYLEY: There is no item here for assistance to Jack Miner in his splendid work, and I do not know whether it is the intention of the minister to see that some assistance is given him. Since, however, the minister has revealed the fact that he is an ardent sportsman, I am sure that the work that Jack Miner is doing in western Ontario will appeal to him, and that he will do what he can to have the small amount of $2,500 which Mr. Miner is asking for included in the supplementaries.

Mr. MURPHY: This item, I am informed, has always been included in a special vote in the supplementary miscellaneous estimates.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Did not the department receive a request some time ago from a society that part of the land of Manoir Richelieu, Murray Bay, be made a sanctuary for birds? I heard that this request had been made to the department by Canada Steamship Lines. Has it been favourably received?

Mr. MURPHY: Certain recommendations reach the department from time to time in regard to the establishment of bird sanctuaries throughout the dominion, and they are dealt with almost immediately; but at the moment I am unable to inform the hon. member whether this particular request has been received by the department or not. To the best of my knowledge it has not, but I speak subject to correction. If such a request is received, I assure the hon. gentleman that it will be dealt with at once.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is the government paying a certain amount of money to these people for their land for the bird sanctuary?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to call to the attention of the minister certain matters in connection with the Migratory Birds Convention Act, and in doing so I may say that I am speaking not from personal knowledge but from what has been told me. The licences or permits given to collectors in British Columbia for the collection of specimens have been, I am informed, largely abused. I am encouraged to bring this to the attention of the minister in view of his reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Prince and the minister's intimation that he realizes the value of conserving the bird life of Canada for the good of the country. I am informed that there are really too many licences or permits granted for the collection of specimens, and that the specimens collected are indeed the rarest birds. It is stated that the number of specimens allowed each collector is far too great, and that the privilege of collection has been commercialized. Furthermore, it is pointed out that collectors coming in from other countries, particularly the United States, are allowed to collect specimens without any restriction whatsoever. That there is a certain amount of commercialization can be substantiated by the case tried in the British Columbia courts recently. The person prosecuted claimed that he was merely exchanging skins of one kind for skins of another, and the magistrate held that an exchange of that kind was tantamount to a sale of skins outright. I had some definite information on the subject, but not knowing that this question would come up to-night I did not bring it with me; I cannot therefore present it to the minister at the moment. If, however, he wishes, I shall be glad to give him the names of those who have complained to me and to help him in any way I can.

Mr. MURPHY: If the hon. member will submit his complaint in writing, I shall be glad to have the matter investigated.

Item agreed to.

PENSIONS

Civil flying, $1,000.

Mr. GRAY: Will the minister explain this item?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): This is to provide a small sum for pensions in connection with flying. The list is a very limited one, and those provided for by other acts do not come within it. For the last four years the expenditures have been $240, $240, $346.40, and $230.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the pension given for service or disability?

Mr. MacLAREN: Disability.

Item agreed to.

European war—naval, militia and air forces after the war, $48,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister explain the decrease of $2,500,000 in this item?

Mr. MacLAREN: The decrease is more apparent than real. The estimate for the previous year, $50,500,000 was considerably in excess of the amount expended, which was about $44,000,000, a difference of over $6,000,000. The estimate this year is for $48,000,000, which is actually $4,000,000 more than the expenditure of last year. It has been found very difficult to make these estimates with absolute certainty. Because of the amendments made in 1930 to the Pension Act, those who had previously accepted a final payment in lieu of pension were permitted to make a fresh application. There were 19,000 men who came within this category, and it was impossible to say just what proportion of this number would make application last year. As a matter of fact, the claims came in much slower than was anticipated, and the expenditures were less than the estimate of the previous year by the amount I have mentioned, $6,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If the minister will look at page 8 of the annual report of the department he will see that the payments made to the men and their dependents amounted to $50,491,000. Does that amount cover the pension list as well?

Mr. MacLAREN: It includes the pensions paid and other items such as pay and allowances.

Mr. SANDERSON: Am I to understand that the difference between the estimate and the expenditure was caused by certain applications not having been decided?

Mr. MacLAREN: No. A previous amendment to the Pension Act permitted a man receiving a small pension, say of five or ten per cent, to take a lump sum as a settlement. At one time there were something like 25,000 men in this class. The amendments of 1930 permitted those who had accepted a final settlement to make application for reinstatement of their pensions, and it was necessary to calculate the number of men who might make such applications. There were 19,000 who were eligible for reinstatement, and we did not know whether most of these men would make application in one year or whether the applications would be spread out over a number of years. As a matter of fact the number of applications was under 12,000. That gave us a larger sum of money than we required to expend.

Mr. SANDERSON: I understand, then, there are 7,000 cases not yet heard or pending decision.

Mr. MacLAREN: Possibly 6,000 or 7,000, but I cannot say that we expect them all to come up.

Mr. SANDERSON: Has the minister, in his estimates for this year, estimated on those 6,000 or 7,000 cases?

Mr. MacLAREN: The estimate includes 2,000 of them. It is presumed a number of them will not appear.

Mr. SANDERSON: How does the minister arrive at the decision that a number of the cases will not be pressed?

Mr. MacLAREN: When we started out we had nothing to guide us as to how many cases there would be. We have now the experience of something like two years. We have as a basis to guide us the number that have been appearing each month during the last twelve months, and the estimate is made to allow for 2,000 in the current year.

Mr. SANDERSON: Of the cases which were entered last year or the year before and not decided—and there must be thousands of them—what estimate did the minister make of the ones which would likely come up this year?

Mr. MacLAREN: Is the hon. member asking the question in connection with the appropriation, or is it a different question he is asking now?

Mr. SANDERSON: My question is based on the vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If the minister will look at page 10 of his annual report he will find the following: Between March 31, 1930, and the end of 1931, there were new pensions awarded by the Board of Pension Commissioners, 4,394 for disability and 1,473 for dependent pensioners, and new pensions awarded by the pension tribunal and pension appeal court, 405 for disability and 52 for dependent pensioners. That is apart from the final payments. I think the question my hon. friend was trying to frame was: What is the estimate this year by way of new pensions to be awarded, in the first place by the Board of Pension Commissioners, and in the second place by the pension tribunal and the pension appeal court?

Mr. MacLAREN: As I was saying, there are 2,000 of those for final payment. I cannot give the number estimated for the others, except that it is based on the number passing through from month to month.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is a point I want to emphasize. There is no disposition, is there, on the part of the department gradually to lower the estimate of the number of cases for next year that will be granted pensions? In other words, there is no tendency to be more strict in the adjudication?

Mr. MacLAREN: No; on the contrary we are anticipating an increase, not a diminution in the pensions. There will probably be an increase in pensions for some considerable time.

Mr. SANDERSON: If the minister says they are anticipating an increase in applications for pensions, why the decrease in the estimate?

Mr. MacLAREN: Evidently I have failed to make the matter clear. Although there is a decrease in the actual estimate, it will allow $4,000,000 more this year than was spent last year on pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Perhaps if the minister will give the increase last year over the year previous and then the estimated increase this year over last year, we shall see whether there is a progressive increase or not.

Mr. MacLAREN: The expenditures for the last four years are as follows—I am giving round figures:

1928-29	$40,000,000
1929-30	39,000,000
1930-31	44,234,000
1931-32 (for ten months)	39,000,000

The estimates were:

1928-29	$39,000,000
1929-30	42,000,000
1930-31	50,000,000
1931-32	50,500,000

Item agreed to.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada, $451,284.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the minister be good enough to inform the committee as to the success of the amendment of last year in regard to the Board of Pension Commissioners themselves dealing in the first place with all applications for pension?

Mr. MacLAREN: That is a question I have much more satisfaction in answering than many others coming under pensions, because the effect of the amendment passed last year was really good. There was a very decided effect on the administration as regards applicants. I should like to put the following on record for the information of the committee: applications for pension received by the Board of Pension Commissions from August 1, 1931, to February 29, 1932, amounted in all to 14,347. Applications granted during the same period numbered 7,084. That, I think, was a large number within that period. While there have been many cases where the progress in granting pensions has been slow and has taken much time, here is one instance where a large number of applications have been dealt with and pensions granted within a comparatively short time. That is one of the very gratifying results of the amendments passed last year. In addition, the pension board had 2,150 applicants medically examined. The board has still a large number of cases to deal with.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it not a fact that the amendments of last year throwing this work on the pension board have lessened the work of the tribunals out in the country?

Mr. MacLAREN: They have lessened it materially, for two reasons. They actually deal with the cases themselves, and many of them finally. In addition, the work has been pushed back, as it were, to the pension board, and some of these cases, of course, will ultimately come to the tribunal.

Mr. GRAY: In round figures some 14,000 applications came before the board, and of these some 7,000 were accepted and pensions granted. How many of the balance either were referred to the tribunal or made application to the tribunal?

Mr. MacLAREN: I have not the exact figures on that, but the pension board was required to assign reasons in writing for declining a pension, and at the same time to inform the applicant that if he could get additional evidence his case would be reconsidered, and if that additional evidence was not satisfactory he could still ask for a hearing before the tribunal. So far many of the applicants whose claims have not been granted have rested there, but they still have the right, which they may ultimately exercise, to proceed further, as I have just stated. The fact remains that a large proportion of those who have not had their claims granted have not proceeded further. I am told that about 500 of the 7,000 have asked for a hearing before the tribunal.

Mr. GRAY: That is 500 out of the 7,000 who were not granted a pension?

Mr. MacLAREN: Exactly. There were about 7,000 granted and 7,000 declined, so it was about fifty-fifty.

Mr. GRAY: What became of the 7,000 cases in which a pension was declined? The minister will see my point. What is clogging the machinery? Is it because of the great number of applications that are being heard? The minister says that 500 of these 7,000 who were not granted a pension are asking for a hearing before the tribunal. What became of the others?

Mr. GEARY: He has just told you.

Mr. GRAY: He has not, and with all respect to my hon. friend from South Toronto, the minister can handle his estimates without his assistance.

Mr. GEARY: I am only addressing myself to my hon. friend, not to the minister.

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot say what has become of the others. All I can say is that they have not proceeded further. They were informed that their application was not granted and they were given the reasons why it was not granted. They were told that they had the opportunity to collect further evidence and to have their case reviewed by the same board, and if an unfavourable decision were then given, they had still the opportunity of being heard before the tribunal. There were about seven thousand of them, of whom five hundred have asked to be heard before the tribunal. What about the rest? I do not know. They have not signified anything. They may be looking for further evidence, and they may still ask to be heard before the tribunal. We do not know anything except that they have been so informed, and that with the exception of about five hundred they have not proceeded further.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With all respect to the minister I can scarcely credit that statement that only some five hundred of the seven thousand whose applications were not accepted by the Board of Pension Commissioners are not proceeding further before the pension tribunal or the appeal court, because in reply to a question on the seventeenth day of February the minister replied to me that there were pending at that date, which was just the other day practically, 2,436 cases before the pension tribunals, and before the appeal court 1,231 cases. If the minister's statement is correct the majority of these cases now pending must have antedated the amendment of last year.

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, they are not included in the 14,000 to which I was referring.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I would like to ask a question on a point of procedure. Where cases come before the tribunal and are adjudicated upon, whether favourably or unfavourably to an applicant, what then is the policy of the administration as to the appeal of such cases? Is there any general instruction that all cases favourable to the applicant shall be appealed?

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think there is any policy. It is all laid down in the Pension Act. I understand that the question is, in the event of a case failing before the tribunal—

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): In the event of a case being adjudicated upon favourably to the applicant, is it automatically appealed?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, certainly not. In the event of an applicant succeeding or failing before the tribunal, the procedure is not a matter of policy at all. It is all laid down in the act. The pensions advocate has the right of appeal for the applicant, and the commission counsel has the right of appeal on behalf of the pension board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The significance of the figures is that whereas since their inception there were 4,545 cases referred to the pension tribunals, of which number they allowed 2,129 and disallowed 2,416—about a fifty fifty proportion—there were appealed by the pension applicants 1,172 and by the commission counsel, who is ostensibly representing the administration or the treasury, 1,550. So that the commission counsel, whether under instructions or not, has appealed far more cases than have advocates acting on behalf of soldiers applying for pensions. I asked the question how many decisions rendered by the appeal court were in favour of the applicants? The reply was:

On appeals by pension applicants, 26; by commission counsel, 239.

Almost ten to one of the appeals sent to the appeal court were in favour of appeals lodged by commission counsel as against those lodged by pension advocates. Then I asked the question:

How many were adverse to the pension applicant?

And received the answer:

On appeals by pension applicants 703, by commission counsel 343.

Taking it in a negative way we find on appeals there were far fewer decisions against commission counsel than there were against applicants for pensions. I think the figures speak for themselves with relentless severity.

I recall that last year during a discussion on the estimates it was pointed out that a circular letter under date of June 25, 1931 had been sent out by the chief commission counsel to all commission counsel throughout Canada instructing them to pursue the most rigid course in regard to these appeals. On that occasion I complimented the minister because the minute the matter came to his attention he was good enough to withdraw that letter from circulation. I trust there are no more instructions of that type being given to commission counsel. Speaking for myself I have the ulmost confidence in the personnel of the tribunals; I think they have done a remarkable work, but I have very little confidence in the attitude of the appeal court, as constituted, towards the claims of the applicants.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to say to the minister that I am not criticizing him; I have found him friendly and considerate, and he has gone out of his way on several occasions personally to investigate cases concerning pensions I have brought to his attention. Therefore anything I may have to say is not critical of the minister. It appears to me, however, that he must realize by now that the Pension Act, with the amendments which were added in 1930, is far from being perfect, I should like to ask if it is the intention of the government at this session to bring down any amendment or amendments to the act.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like to say a few words concerning several points brought up by hon. members opposite. In the first place, it is the right of applicants to appeal. All they have to do is to advise or request a pension advocate to have it done. That is a matter entirely apart from the department. Then, appeals by commission counsel are not departmental matters. Commission counsel acting under the Board of Pension Commissioners make the appeals which in their judgment should be made. I should not like to agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre about the appeal court. I have had much to impress me concerning the good work done by that court. There are certain facts we must bear in mind concerning the three courts. The Board of Pension Commissioners, or some of them, have been acting for ten years or more. They are well trained, experienced men. At the head of the appeal court is a man who was on the supreme court bench of one of the provinces for about fifteen years, a man who has had an extensive training and is fitted for his position. Then there is the tribunal composed of twelve members chosen from every portion of the dominion and representing the different provinces. Naturally most of those men have not been trained in their particular work; they are new men at new work, and I think it is fair to expect that some time will elapse before they learn accurately the value of evidence. I should like hon. members to bear in mind that I recognize there is a marked disparity between the number of appeals allowed on applications by advocates and by commission counsel. I am not going to judge these officials harshly because I think they are all trying to do their best. We may reasonably suppose it will take time to train men properly to weigh evidence as it should and will be done.

Mr. GEARY: I should like to straighten out a matter of procedure. Did I understand the minister to say that the Board of Pension Commissioners instructs the appeals on behalf of the crown, so to speak?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: So that each case is considered by the Board of Pension Commissioners, and it is the board which gives the instructions that the appeal be taken?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: I understood the commission counsel—

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, that is true; the chief commission counsel is an official of the pension board.

Mr. GEARY: It did transpire last year that a circular letter was sent out which provoked a good many appeals—at least that was the inference. The minister was good enough to see that that letter was withdrawn. Perhaps the minister will let us know if within his knowledge any active part has been taken in invoking the appeal to the federal appeal board since that time, because there is a feeling on the part of some that the right of appeal by commission counsel has been very largely used. In many cases that appeal has been successful, whereas the appeal by the man has not been successful to anything like the same extent. I should like to be assured that it is not departmental policy that there should be such a large proportion of appeals by the commission counsel against the tribunal decisions.

Mr. MacLAREN: As I have just stated, it is not departmental policy. As soon as my attention was drawn to the letter sent out last year I disapproved of it and asked the pension board to recall it. The chief counsel is an official of the pension board.

Mr. SANDERSON: It does appear to me that the great defect of the Pension Act is the delay in dealing with cases that come before the tribunals. I have personal knowledge of twenty cases, of which ten or twelve have been pending for eight, nine, ten and twelve months, and two cases have been pending for fifteen months.

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot discuss specific cases—

Mr. SANDERSON: I would not expect the minister to do that.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have found that so many conditions were supposed to exist, but a close analysis threw a different light on them. I do not know whether those cases are still pending, but the applicants sometimes delay their own cases. As to legislation this session, the question is being very closely studied at the present time. Of course, delay cannot be wholly avoided. We are aware now what this machinery is costing the country, and surely no one is going to advocate that it be increased still further. We are trying to expedite the work as far as possible, but, as I pointed out, the pension board is granting more cases than the tribunal and the appeal court hear.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would not suggest for a moment that the machinery be increased, but could not the present machinery be speeded up? For instance, the tribunals meet at certain points in Ontario, but although there may be twelve or fourteen cases on the docket they will sit for a day, dispose of four or six cases, and then move on to another point. Would it not be possible for the tribunal to clear the docket before they moved on?

Mr. MacLAREN: If any hon. member will look over the itinerary he will find that the tribunals do clear the docket in each place.

In Toronto we have had a board sitting continuously for the last few months. In many centres the tribunals sit for three, four or five days and dispose of their work.

Mr. SANDERSON: That may apply to Toronto, but let me take Stratford in the county where the tribunal meets. To my knowledge that tribunal has never sat longer than a day and a half although there would be twelve or fourteen cases on the docket. In that time it could deal with only four or six cases. Why should not the docket be cleared before the tribunal moves on to another point?

Mr. MacLAREN: There is no reason why the tribunal should not do so.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the minister look into that?

Mr. MacLAREN: I will ask that an itinerary be sent to the hon. member which will show how long the tribunals have sat in the different centres during the last six months.

Mr. HOWARD: We have succeeded in getting the tribunal to sit in Sherbrooke once. There were fifteen cases on the docket. The tribunal spent only one day there, heard five cases, and then moved on to another centre, just as the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) had said. Of the five cases heard two were immediately dismissed and in the other three the applicants were granted extensions of pensions. But those three cases were appealed, and not a thing was done for any of the applicants. One of those is the most glaring case I have had anything to do with. It is an absolute shame. If I were to make any suggestion it would be that the decisions of these tribunals be final.

INDIANS

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Superintendent General of Indian Affairs): I would ask the chairman to call item 201.

To provide for expenses connected with the administration of Indian affairs, including salaries, supplies, relief, medical attendance, hospitalization, dwellings, agricultural activities, surveys, roads, bridges, irrigation, dyking, education, etc., and a grant of $100,000 approved by parliament in the session of 1926-27, $3,873,000.

Right Hon. R. B. BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REPORT UPON BILL NO. 41

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That Messrs. THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving that you do now leave the chair for the purpose of enabling the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means, to make good the supply to be granted to His Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933, may I at the outset crave your indulgence for those imperfections which are bound to appear in the discharge of a difficult and onerous task on the part of one who has been Minister of Finance for but a few short crowded weeks.

These imperfections will be the more apparent and my task the more difficult when viewed in the light of the brilliant achievements of my immediate predecessor in office.

This review of the year's financial operations will be made under five headings:

(1) A brief reference to events which have so profoundly disturbed international finance and the consequent reactions on our own situation;

(2) The financial operations and accounts of the dominion for the fiscal year ended March 31, and in this regard it will be understood that the figures are not final but represent the closest estimates that can be made;

(3) Canada's trade and commerce;

(4) The estimated revenue and expenditure for the fiscal year 1932-33, and

(5) Ways and means for securing the revenues required to meet the estimated expenditures.

The past year was replete with financial difficulties and problems, many without precedent. Canada, in common with other nations, was in the midst of a period of declining prices and diminishing revenues. During the summer, coming events began to cast their shadow over international finance. The crisis in Germany, following quickly after the collapse in May of the most important bank in Austria, brought sharply to the attention of the world the need for international action upon the vexed question of reparations and inter-governmental war debts. The proposals of President Hoover for a one year moratorium were heralded as a signal for returning world confidence, but the optimism was unfortunately short lived. Although the debt holiday was accepted after some delay, its effect was partially lost in the controversy which served only to emphasize the difficulties of the situation. Meanwhile, the climax drew near, brought on by a repatriation of credits and consequent withdrawals of gold from countries whose reserves had already been reduced. Throughout the world, gold was ceasing to be a medium of exchange, becoming instead a commodity to be jealously guarded. The pound sterling became daily subject to test and finally the world was startled by the announcement on September 21 that Great Britain had been forced off the gold standard. She was followed in rapid succession by many other countries. In the United States, problems arose as a result, on the one hand, of hoarding by individuals, and, on the other, of the effort of their great financial institutions to build up their "liquid position." The fall of foreign exchanges and the dumping of securities brought on practically a demoralization of the investment markets.

It goes without saying that these events had a peculiar significance for Canada, a debtor country, having at the moment an unfavourable trade balance. Our exchange could be maintained only so long as financial operations, based upon normal conditions and confidence, were resulting in a net inflow of money. Between October 1, 1931, and March 31, 1932, the dominion, provinces, municipalities and semi-public bodies, had, it was estimated, $72,000,000 of debt maturing in New York or London, and, in addition, $80,000,000 of external interest charges had to be provided. Added to these, there were the debts of corporations and individuals. With these obligations to be met, the dislocation of external money markets presented no inconsiderable threat to our credit abroad.

Steps had been taken on September 8 to improve our position in New York by the opening up of negotiations for the sale of $50,000,000 dominion guaranteed bonds of the Canadian National Railways which at that time had $37,000,000 of short-term credits borrowed in that market. The best tender was from a syndicate which purchased $25,000,000 outright and took an option on the remainder. The issue was popularly priced, and the option was exercised. However, much of the buying was on Canadian account, and it was necessary to arrange for partial settlement in Canada, the consequence being that to avoid a serious disruption of the already sensitive exchange situation, only part of the New York short-term loans could be paid off, leaving $18,500,000 to be renewed.

Following the decline in sterling, the Canadian dollar showed continual depreciation. The low was reached on December 16, when the premium on New York funds was 24⅞ per cent. It was realized that, notwithstanding the high credit position of Canada, any effort to stabilize exchange at par with gold could not, under conditions then existing, be successful. Our policy was therefore directed to accomplishing two results: First, to ensure the prompt payment of all obligations due abroad according to contract and, second, to assist in maintaining normal currency and credit conditions within Canada.

On the 14th of September, the government commenced buying the gold production of the larger Canadian mines, on a basis approximate to the value of New York funds. This gold has been used to meet obligations in New York and has been sufficient to keep the dominion out of the exchange market, and at times to provide external gold funds for the National Railways and provinces. From the viewpoint of Canadian commerce, the policy was generally advantageous.

With respect to the internal situation, the needs of industry, of crop-marketing agencies and of public bodies harassed by falling revenues, made it obligatory that credit facilities in Canada continue to operate smoothly and at reasonable cost to borrowers. Also it was imperative that there be no flight from the Canadian dollar through fear of inflation. This could be accomplished only by maintaining domestic confidence and by preserving a reservoir of credit which could be drawn upon to meet any external crisis. It was successfully accomplished under a policy authorized by the order in council of October 19, which, while maintaining the redemption rights under the Dominion Notes Act, permitted the export of gold only under licence issuable by the Minister of Finance to chartered banks. On the 19th of October, the note issue, including those issued under the Finance Act, was $144,468,571, and the gold holding represented over 45 per cent of the face value of the issue. On the 19th of March, 1932, the note issue, including those issued under the Finance Act, was $142,896,193; the gold holding represented over 45 per cent.

The number of licences issued to March 1 was 182, representing gold to the value of $28,969,566. Of this amount $19,839,286 was on the Dominion's account, being gold purchased from the mines; the balance was the property of miners, banks and individuals who deal in gold.

Well may Canadians look back with satisfaction over what has been accomplished. All external debts have been met on the due dates. The $72,000,000 principal amount of external debts, payable by the public bodies of Canada and maturing before March 31, was provided for partly by repayment and partly by renewal, but at this date only $33,000,000 of the original amount is represented by debt owing abroad, and this balance is so arranged that orderly redemption can be carried out without embarrassment. The holders of Canadian securities with obligations for external payment have received their 80 millions of interest as it became due.

This accomplishment, together with the strength of our banking system and stability of our financial institutions generally, has contributed greatly to the return of confidence, as exhibited in the improvement of the Canadian dollar in the exchange market, and in the higher quotations for Canadian public securities.

Revenues 1931-32

The financial statements published from month to month during the year have indicated that, in common with all other countries in the world, we have experienced a marked decline in taxation revenue, which represents approximately 83 per cent of the total receipts of the government. Of the major sources, the income tax alone has brought in approximately the sum estimated, having yielded $61,000,000. Customs receipts fell to $102,800,000, reflecting the drop in the value of imports occasioned by a number of factors, such as the further decline in prices, the unfavourable exchange rate as regards importations from the United States and generally the policy of encouraging production in Canada.

The total receipts from taxes will be $273,300,000, a statement of which, together with the comparative figures for the previous four years, is now submitted.

Public Service Revenues

Collections from the various public services, it is estimated, will total $54,000,000. Post office, which is the major contributor under this head, will show an increase of $1,500,000 due to the raise in postage rates and because postage stamps may now be used for certain excise stamp taxes. The post office revenues are estimated at $31,748,000, as against expenditures estimated at $34,550,000. This does not include disbursements made by other departments on account of post office, nor does it, on the other hand, give any credit for handling the mail of the various branches of the public service free of charge.

Interest on investments, being payments from harbour commissions, boards, etc., financed by way of loans from the Dominion, and including the regular payments by Roumania on its loan, it is estimated will total $10,000,000. In this is included the interest paid by the chartered banks for advances under the Finance Act, which it is estimated will amount to $360,247, as compared with $539,984 last year. A five year comparison of the revenue from these public services follows:

Special Receipts

Having accepted the principle of the moratorium in respect of inter-governmental debts, our receipts from German reparations annuities were reduced to $1,001,570 applicable to the period prior to the 1st of July.

This has been supplemented by $6,000,000 received from the custodian of enemy property and taken into our accounts as a partial offset to the disbursements from the consolidated revenue fund in respect of compensation paid to civilians for damages sustained in the war.

The following is a comparative summary of the total revenues over the last five-year period:

Ordinary Expenditures 1931-32

The ordinary expenditures for the year are placed at $378,700,000, which is approximately $19,000,000 less than was estimated. The expenditures on services for which provision is made annually by vote actually were $25,000,000, less than the amounts authorized by parliament. On the other hand, certain statutory expenditures, such as subsidies to provinces, old age pensions and exchange, exceeded the estimate by $6,000,000.

Over $3,635,000 was in connection with exchange, mainly the premium on gold purchased from the mines. This expenditure was largely offset on the revenue side by credits totalling $2,248,000, resulting from the sale of New York exchange and the discount on sterling purchased to meet London requirements. A further credit of $506,000 was realized in the purchase below par of sterling securities for sinking funds, which made a net expense for the year on premium, discount and exchange of $881,000.

A statement by services of expenditure on ordinary account for the last five fiscal years is as follows:

Capital Expenditures

The amount voted for capital expenditures was $18,861,000, of which it is estimated $16,975,000 was spent in 1931-32. A year ago the expenditures on capital account were $28,200,000. Savings of $600,000 were made by the Department of Public Works and $1,300,000 by Railways and Canals. The principal items of expenditure were: Hudson Bay railway, $5,215,000; Welland canal, $2,940,000; St. Lawrence river channel dredging, $4,200,000; and the Research building, Ottawa, $1,700,000.

A five-year comparison of capital expenditures follows:

	20,636	22,809	22,561	28,222	16,975

Special Expenditures

It is estimated that special expenditures will amount to $55,100,000, as compared with $16,789,000 on this account in the previous year. The chief items are wheat bonus and unemployment relief.

Unemployment Relief Act, 1930

A reference to the Public Accounts will disclose that as of March 31, 1931, the sum of $4,432,000 had been paid on account of unemployment relief under the authority of the act of 1930. In the year now under review, expenditures on the authority of that act will, it is estimated, amount to $13,250,000. This brings the total expenditure by the Dominion under the authority of the 1930 legislation to $17,682,000. A small residue of accounts has still to be adjusted, the estimated amount being $400,000.

Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931

Expenditures under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931 fall into three divisions:

(1) Dominion services, the whole cost of which is borne by our treasury;

(2) Provincial and municipal public works, to which the Dominion contributes an agreed proportion and

(3) Direct relief, to which also the Dominion contributes a proportion of the provincial and municipal expenditures.

Under Dominion services, expenditures amounting to $6,481,000 have been approved, of which $3,765,000 will be chargeable to the accounts of the fiscal year now ended. The distribution by departments is as follows:

Public Works	$ 1,560,000
Railways and Canals	568,000
Interior	885,000
National Defence	71,000
Justice	83,200
Board of Railway Commissioners	500,000
National Battlefields' Commission	25,000
Agriculture	7,000
Administration	65,800
	$ 3,765,000

The program of provincial and municipal public works involves an expenditure estimated at $70,469,675, of which the Dominion's contribution is placed at $26,586,763. These undertakings are under the control of either provincial or municipal authority, and payments of the Dominion's contribution are made only after the submission of accounts for expenditure, duly certified by the appropriate provincial authority. Under this head, provision is made in the accounts of the fiscal year 1931-32 for disbursements of $12,278,000. The following statement shows a division of this program of works by provinces:

Unemployment Relief Works, 1931

Province	Total Works	Dominion Share	Provincial and Municipal Share
Prince Edward Island	272,250	125,000	147,250
Nova Scotia	2,546,869	999,923	1,546,946
New Brunswick	1,911,870	749,692	1,162,178
Quebec	14,612,975	4,643,808	9,969,167
Ontario	27,869,177	8,790,833	19,078,344
Manitoba	6,565,495	2,931,987	3,633,508
Saskatchewan	5,519,843	2,759,922	2,759,921
Alberta	5,171,225	2,585,612	2,585,613
British Columbia	5,999,971	2,999,986	2,999,985
	70,469,675	26,586,763	43,882,912

For direct relief, the federal contribution chargeable to the 1931-32 accounts is estimated at $8,957,000, the major part of which applies to the drought areas in Saskatchewan.

To sum up, these special expenditures for unemployment and farm relief in the fiscal year 1931-32 will be $13,250,000 under the legislation of 1930, and $25,000,000 under the legislation of 1931, a total of $38,250,000, and the balance of commitments to be carried over into the next fiscal year will be $16,000,000, not including provision for direct relief beyond the actual disbursements mentioned above. The latter requirements are difficult to estimate as they are governed by the exigencies of the situation in the different provinces and it requires a considerable period after the actual relief payments are made for the accounts for the Dominion's share to reach Ottawa.

Provincial Financing

Having dealt with expenditures for unemployment and farm relief, it may be appropriate, while on the subject, to refer to further assistance rendered to provincial governments by way of loans. It is a matter of common knowledge that for some months various provincial bodies have been unable to issue securities on the New York market, where they have had obligations falling due. In order to protect the credit of Canada as a whole, temporary assistance was given to certain of the provinces in meeting their obligations, but in no instance did the government undertake the role of banker with respect to the redemption of maturing provincial debts in New York until it was satisfied that every other avenue had been diligently explored by the province without success. The sums advanced under this head total $11,637,190. In addition to this amount, $10,794,000 was loaned for internal purposes, including provincial share of relief works. In those instances the government's assistance was given as a part of its relief program on the urgent representations of the provinces that in existing circumstances their commitments could not be fulfilled without such aid from the Dominion. As security, the Dominion holds one-year treasury bills of the provinces and the rate of interest charged is that which the Dominion had to pay for the money. The loans by provinces are:

—	Loans covering obligations maturing in New York	Loans for public works and relief	Loans for governmental services	Total
	$	$	$	$
Manitoba	1,189,185	1,794,733	.....	2,983,918
Saskatchewan	3,934,341	500,000	6,500,000	10,934,341

British Columbia	3,371,664	1,000,000	.....	4,371,664
	11,637,190	4,294,733	6,500,000	22,431,923

Including loans and expenditures, Dominion disbursements on account of unemployment relief and assistance to the provinces, will total $60,681,923 as follows:

Act of 1930		$13,250,000
Act of 1931—
Federal Services	$ 3,765,000

Loans and Advances Non-Active

Advances to certain corporations, being non-interest producing, are treated as expenditures in estimating our debt position. These advances were three in number—$1,360,000 to the Merchant Marine and Canadian National (West Indies) Service, $1,495,000 to Quebec Harbour Commission, and $534,000 in payment of interest which the Dominion guaranteed on bonds issued by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal in connection with the harbour bridge. There is now presented a five-year summary of expenditures under the heading of Loans and Advances, Non-Active:

The total of all expenditures for the year is $454,246,000. A comparative statement summarizing the expenditures by divisions, is now submitted:

Summary of all Expenditures

(000 omitted)

—	1927–28	1928–29	1929–30	1930–31	Estimated 1931–32

	378,864	389,595	398,442	440,057	454,246

Having detailed the revenues from all sources and the expenditures under the appropriate divisions, the net result of the accounts for the year may now be indicated. With ordinary revenues of $327,719,000 and ordinary expenditures amounting to $378,743,000, the resulting deficit on ordinary account is $51,024,000, which has occurred as a consequence of the decreased yield from taxation and notwithstanding the reductions made in expenditures. Special expenditures, including $49,282,000 for unemployment relief and wheat bonus as previously detailed, total $55,138,000. As an offset to this amount, $7,022,000 was received in special revenues, leaving a balance not provided from income of $48,116,000. In addition, there are the capital expenditures of $16,975,000 and loans and advances non-active of $3,390,000. The amount, therefore, of the increase in debt for the year is $119,505,000.

1931 Conversion Loan

Reference was made in the budget last year to the conversion loan campaign which had just closed. As a matter of record, the final figures in connection with this debt operation are now presented: Of the $1,084,800,000 in bonds eligible for conversion, $638,600,000, or sixty per cent, were converted. This operation did not involve any change in the amount of public debt outstanding, as the exchange was made at par. Details of the conversion are:

Loans Eligible for Conversion	Amount Outstanding May 1, 1931	Amount Converted
5% War Loan maturing October 1, 1931	$ 52,929,600	$ 38,625,700
5½% Renewal Loan maturing Nov. 1, 1932	73,323,150	37,523,200
5½% Victory Loan maturing November 1, 1933	446,659,950	276,688,100
5½% Victory Loan maturing November 1, 1934	511,910,650	285,772,300
	$ 1,084,823,350	$ 638,609,300

While the conversion had no immediate effect on the annual interest charges, the government will benefit substantially within the next few years by reason of the lower interest rates obtained. This is indicated by the following statement:

Fiscal year	Saving in interest
1932–33	$ 193,128
1933–34	568,360
1934–35	3,335,241
1935–36 and annually thereafter	6,192,964

The time for this conversion loan was admirably chosen. Its execution was attended with outstanding success, and its effect upon our financial position has been marked. That this is so is due entirely to the vision of the Prime Minister whose conception it was and under whose guidance it was conducted. The total expenses in connection with the Conversion Loan were slightly over one-half of one per cent.

The conversion loan operations had resulted in 70 per cent of the October 1st maturity being refunded. There remained only about $13,000,000 to be paid on the due date. The state of the public finances did not permit this to be met out of current revenues. Consequently in August, Canadian institutions were invited to tender for the purchase of all or part of $13,000,000 to be absorbed into the 1946-56 Conversion Loan series at the interest rate of 4½ per cent. Tenders were accepted at par for $4,500,000. The balance was arranged through temporary credits with the Bank of Montreal, which were later paid off from the proceeds of the National Service Loan.

Temporary Borrowings

In September last the Canadian National Railways required funds in New York to meet maturing credits and these were financed directly by the government by an issue of $18,500,000 in three months' 2¼ per cent treasury bills, which were sold to the Chase National Bank of New York at par. At the same time, $500,000 was borrowed for purposes of the Dominion, making the total $19,000,000. When the bills matured in December, $1,000,000 were redeemed and the balance renewed for ninety days at 5 per cent; subsequently $3,000,000 were redeemed, leaving $15,000,000 still outstanding.

Pending flotation of the National Service Loan in November, it was necessary to borrow temporarily on treasury bills from the chartered banks in Canada, an aggregate amount of $34,800,000. These bills have since been retired.

National Service Loan

A major operation for the year was the flotation of the 5 per cent National Service Loan in November. The subscription lists were opened on November 23rd with provision that they might remain open until December 12th. The bonds were offered for public subscription in two maturities at a price of 99·25 and accrued interest for the five-year bonds, and at 99 and accrued interest for the ten-year bonds maturing in 1941. The campaign was under the direction of a Dominion-wide management committee, under the chairmanship of Sir Charles Gordon, President of the Bank of Montreal.

The offering was $150,000,000 and, while provision was made for the campaign to extend over a period of twenty days, the issue met with such popular response, that the amount was substantially over-subscribed and the lists closed on November 30th; but, to meet popular demand, subscribers on November 30th were allowed to offer in payment cheques dated December 1st. The accepted over-subscription was $71,198,200, the total issue being $221,198,200, of which $79,535,200 was for the 1936 maturity and $141,663,000 for the 1941 maturity. The total number of subscriptions was 109,000, indicating that the loan was widely distributed. While the banks made application for $30,000,000 the government took the view that it was in the national interest to give the preference to small investors; therefore, when subscriptions far exceeded the $150,000,000 offering, the banks were asked to withdraw their applications.

The following statement indicates the extent and nature of the distribution:

National Service Loan

* Largely made by institutions.

In making announcement on the night of November 29th of the acceptance of the oversubscription which, due to the influx of applications on the last day, turned out to be much larger than was then anticipated, it was stated that the government would put into motion a plan whereby the excess would be used for debt reduction. As of this date, $50,745,000 of debt has been taken up, while over $11,600,000 is temporarily invested in provincial treasury bills of the four western provinces taken in connection with New York debts.

The expense of raising the National Service Loan, including commissions, advertising, printing and delivery of securities, was less than one per cent.

Canadian National Railway Company

The annual report of the Canadian National Railway Company for the year 1931 having already been presented to the house and the whole railway problem being under review by a royal commission, remarks under this head will be confined to a brief statement of the operating results and capital requirements in the year and the financing arranged.

The year 1931 was marked by a further severe drop in gross earnings to a low point since 1919, and notwithstanding reduced operating expenses, the system's operations (excluding eastern lines) showed a net income deficit of $84,262,000 after taking into consideration all debt charges, an increase of $23,000,000 over 1930. Deducting the interest charged but not paid upon debt to the government represented by loans and advances carried in the public accounts as non-active assets, the loss amounted to $52,200,000 and this is the amount which might be considered as the addition to the country's deficit for the year, in interest charges in respect of government loans having already been absorbed in the public accounts.

In addition to provision for the deficit, it was necessary to provide a further large sum for capital expenditures and the retirement of railway debt. While new capital expenditures were greatly curtailed in 1931, commitments arising out of expenditure programs for branch lines, terminals and hotels undertaken prior to 1930, were still large. The total financial provision which the government was required to make, either directly or indirectly, for expenditures of the Canadian National Railways in 1931, was $108,976,265, made up as follows:

Deficit, Canadian National Railways, excluding Eastern Lines	$ 52,255,676
Deficit, Eastern Lines	8,712,762
		$ 60,968,438
Capital expenditures including new equipment		33,990,106
Debt retirement		9,791,691
Discount on securities issued		4,226,030
		$108,976,265

Of these requirements, $41,282,899 are being furnished by way of advances by the government out of the proceeds of the National Service Loan and temporary borrowings in New York already referred to. The deficits on the Eastern Lines, amounting to $8,712,762 have, in accordance with the provisions of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, been paid as an expense of the government and are included in the statement of expenditures submitted. The balance of the requirements, namely, $58,980,604, including discount, was provided from the proceeds of Canadian National Railway bonds guaranteed by the government. These proceeds came, in part, from an issue (dated February 1, 1931) made in the previous fiscal year and, in part, from the $50,000,000 4½ per cent 20-year bonds, to which reference has already been made, sold in New York early in September last, at a cost of 4·79 per cent. Only $38,589,599.15 of this issue was applicable to 1931 expenditures, as $11,410,400.85 of the bonds were sold to redeem a temporary bank loan carried over from the previous year. The guarantee of the securities was authorized by legislation of 1931.

The advances made by the government stand as to $29,910,400.85 under authority of the Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Acts of 1931, and as to $11,372,498.86 under the supplementary legislation recently passed by parliament to provide for expenditures up to the end of 1931 in excess of amounts authorized for such purposes.

These advances have been made from the treasury under legislation which anticipates repayment through the sale of securities guaranteed by the government. It may, of course, transpire that such repayment will not be practicable and that the company will find it is unable to assume carrying charges on this debt. It has not been considered advisable, however, to take these advances into our accounts as expenditures, pending the determination of policy with reference to the future financing of the company after the report of the Royal Commission on Railways has been received and considered.

The estimate which is before the house for the operations of the Canadian National Railways for the year 1932, is $61,500,000, to which $6,217,000 is to be added for Eastern Lines deficit, after crediting the 20 per cent reduction in tolls, making a total of $67,717,000. Of this amount, about $49,000,000 represents the estimated deficit after paying interest on funded debt held by the public but without provision for interest on the government's capital in the system. The total shows a considerable reduction from the requirements in the past few years but it is still a very large figure and constitutes one of the country's major financial problems. Outside of the interest on the national debt of the dominion, it is the largest single item in the country's budget and represents over one-seventh of the money which the government is called upon to raise for all current purposes.

Indirect Liabilities of the Government

The amount of railway securities presently outstanding bearing the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada, is $969,683,288, to which should be added $31,235,118 of securities guaranteed for other enterprises, making a total of guaranteed obligations outstanding as of March 31, 1932, of $1,000,918,406, as compared with $954,917,112 a year ago, a net increase of $46,001,294. The total funded debt of the Canadian National Railways to the public now amounts to $1,274,587,745.

Steamship Companies

The steamship companies operated on behalf of the government, which are budgeted for on the basis of actual cash outlay required in the year, received advances from the dominion treasury amounting to $1,360,853, divided as follows: Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, $444,285, and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, $916,568.

Harbour Commissions

Advances to harbour commissions in 1931-32 totalled $14,148,540. The chief expenditure, amounting to approximately $5,800,000, was made in Saint John where a reconstruction program was necessary on account of the disastrous fire which occurred there. The balance of the expenditure consisted mainly of commitments in connection with the completion of development programs undertaken prior to 1930.

The following statement shows the amounts advanced to each commission in 1931-32, and the total advances to date:

Advances to Harbour Commissions

—	Advances 1931-32	Advances to date
Chicoutimi	465,000	2,626,000
Halifax	2,752,000	7,593,000
Montreal—Harbour	1,412,000	57,389,000
" Bridge (deficit)	534,000	704,000
New Westminster	170,685	170,685
Quebec	1,495,000	25,924,995
Saint John	5,763,855	9,170,855
Three Rivers	747,000	2,426,600
Vancouver	809,000	21,416,900
	14,148,540	127,422,035

The Quebec commission does not pay any interest, and consequently its loans are treated as non-active assets. This also applies to the advances made to enable the harbour commissioners of Montreal to meet the deficit on the harbour bridge. The other loans have paid interest and are carried as active assets, although it may be observed that some adjustments may prove necessary in this respect in the near future.

Canadian Farm Loan Board

The loaning operations of the Canadian Farm Loan Board were again financed from the dominion treasury by the purchase of $1,500,000 of the board's 5 per cent bonds at par. In addition $107,603 was paid for capital stock of the Board in accordance with the provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. The total capital furnished by the Dominion government for the board's operations since its inception amounts to $7,216,465, divided as follows:

Initial Capital	$ 5,050,000
Purchase of Bonds	1,800,000
Purchase of Capital Stock	366,465
	$ 7,216,465

Wheat Marketing Guarantees

Under the authority of section 3 of chapter 58, statutes of 1931, orders in council concerning the marketing of the western grain crops were made. The house will recall the problems which the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited, faced in financing its operations in connection with the 1930 crop. The government, believing that it was in the national interest to protect the credit of the marketing agencies in such a way that the grain might be marketed to the general advantage of growers, had given an undertaking to the seven chartered banks concerned, which then made available the necessary credits. The undertaking was given status by order in council P.C. 2238, dated September 12, 1931. This undertaking has served its purpose, and without cost to the treasury. Based upon present market prices, the expectation is that, when all accounts are settled, the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited, will be able to settle all advances without recourse being had to the dominion's guarantee.

With respect to the 1931 crop, the three semi-public marketing agencies in the prairie provinces found their position a perilous one at the commencement of the marketing season. The assets usually pledged against bank credits were already encumbered, thus restricting the credit available. Representations on their behalf were made to the Dominion government by the premiers of the three provincial governments concerned, and, as a result, an order in council was passed on September 12, 1931, authorizing dominion guarantee of credits under certain conditions to the Manitoba Pool Elevators, Limited; Saskatchewan Pool Elevators, Limited; and Alberta Pool Elevators, Limited, calculated against their respective working capital at the commencement of the 1931 marketing season. However, the certificates of the chartered accountants directed to establish the amount of working capital showed that the proposed basis would not be a satisfactory one, and, therefore, a subsequent order in council was issued establishing specific amounts which the Dominion would guarantee under certain conditions. The amounts were: Manitoba Pool $1,250,000; Saskatchewan Pool $12,000,000; Alberta Pool $7,500,000. This plan has functioned to the satisfaction of all concerned and no liability has developed against the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The operations of the year are summarized in a condensed cash statement, which now follows:

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Continuing the practice introduced last year, the cash statement is followed by the balance sheet. The active assets are made up of cash balances and specie accounts, loans and advances which are realizable or income-producing, and other miscellaneous accounts. These assets are taken as an offset against the gross liabilities in arriving at the net debt.

Total liabilities as at March 31, 1932, being estimated at $2,832,355,834, and active assets at $451,238,348, the resulting net debt figure is $2,381,117,486.

Trade of Canada

Turning now to the matter of external trade, Canada has continued to share in the pronounced shrinkage, both in volume and value, that has marked the commerce of the world. The following is a statement of Canada's foreign trade for the first eleven months of the last fiscal year, as compared with the same period in 1930-31:

(000 omitted)

—	11 months ended Feb. 28, 1931	11 months ended Feb. 29, 1932	Decrease
Imports	831,232	521,056	310,176
Exports, Canadian produce	744,669	536,595	208,074
Re-exports, foreign produce	16,038	9,951	6,087
	1,591,939	1,067,602	524,337

The figures indicate a reduction in the dollar value of total trade of approximately 33 per cent, which corresponds fairly closely to the average fall in the world trade. Notwithstanding this unfavourable aspect of our external commerce, a very distinct improvement has taken place in the conversion of an unfavourable into a favourable balance. Starting last June, our exports commenced to exceed the imports and a surplus of exports over imports has continued month by month to date. Taking the last eleven months' figures as a basis, the balance has been favourable to the extent of $25,491,000, as compared with an unfavourable balance of $70,524,000 in the previous corresponding period. Comparative figures are as follows:

(000 omitted)

11 months ended	Imports	Exports	Excess of Imports over Exports
February 28, 1930	1,135,248	1,053,246	82,002
February 28, 1931	831,232	760,708	70,524
			Excess of Exports over Imports
February 29, 1932	521,056	546,547	25,491

In the eleven months' period ended February 29, 1932, the latest date for which statistics of trade by countries are available, Canada's imports from the British Empire amounted to 131 million dollars, representing 25·3 per cent of total imports and showing a decrease of 56 million dollars from the previous corresponding period. Our exports to the British Empire are shown at 204 million dollars representing 37·4 per cent of total exports, a drop in the period of 71 million dollars.

The imports from the United Kingdom decreased 43 million dollars and exports dropped 44 million dollars.

A summary showing the imports from and exports to the principal parts of the British Empire is as follows:

*Increase.

Our largest trade continues to be with the United States, to which exports in the eleven months ended February 29, 1932, amounted to 227 million dollars and from which imports were 317 million dollars, an unfavourable balance of 90 million dollars to Canada on the interchange. While exports declined 32·5 per cent in the period, our purchases from the United States have decreased 40·6 per cent.

A statement is submitted to show the percentage of our trade with the British Empire, United States and other countries in the first eleven months of the fiscal year, and, for purposes of comparison to indicate the trend, similar percentages for the previous fiscal year.

Having reached the conclusion that the interests of both contracting parties would be promoted by the negotiation of an entirely new convention, Canada gave notice to France, in December last, of her desire to terminate the French convention made in 1922, and to proceed to the making of a new agreement. The existing treaty terminates, therefore, on June 16 of this year and it is the earnest hope of the government that its place will in the near future be taken by a commercial convention which may be of mutual advantage.

Estimated Revenues and Expenditures 1932-33

Based upon present rates of taxation and reasonably stable conditions, it is anticipated that the revenues in the fiscal year 1932-33 which has just commenced, will amount to $319,100,000 from the following sources:

Customs Duties	$100,000,000
Excise Duties	45,000,000
Excise Taxes	70,000,000
Income Tax	48,000,000
Post Office	32,000,000
Interest on Investments	11,500,000
Other sources	12,600,000
	$319,100,000

The ordinary requirements for government services in 1932-33, as provided for in the main estimates, together with certain special and statutory amounts such as for old age pensions and payments to railways under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, are estimated at $369,900,000 and, in addition, $9,600,000 is voted for capital expenditures.

A very considerable contribution to the balancing of the budget has already been made in the reductions of appropriations which have been recommended to the house for the current year. Leaving aside the extraordinary expenditures on wheat bonus and unemployment relief, the expenditures in the fiscal year just ended are estimated at $404,900,000. in comparison with which the estimated expenditures of $379,500,000 for 1932-33 show a reduction of $25,400,000, after absorbing an increase in interest on the public debt of $12,700,000.

The perplexities which ordinarily attend the curtailment of expenditures on governmental services are rendered much greater in the present instance by reason of the reductions which had already been effected in the ordinary and capital expenditures, and particularly by reason of the increasingly smaller proportion of the expenditures which are controllable. Thus in the proposed expenditures for 1932-33, the fixed and, in general, uncontrollable amounts, including debt charges, pensions and ex-soldiers' welfare, provincial subsidies, and similar items, aggregate approximately $236,000,000, leaving only $143,500,000, or 38 per cent, under the classification of controllable. In the fiscal year just ended, the corresponding figure of controllable expenditures was $179,300,000. It will therefore be seen that the reduction which it is proposed to effect this year in the controllable expenditures is $35,800,000, which is the equivalent of 20 per cent. These figures have been cited to illustrate the drastic economies which the government has felt it necessary to institute, having regard to the depleted returns from taxation.

With revenues estimated at $319,100,000 and the usual current expenses of government amounting to $369,900,000, it is clear that increases in the rates of taxation are necessary. Accordingly it is proposed to recommend measures which will, it is estimated, increase the revenues by $55,000,000, thus balancing the current expenditures and leaving a surplus of $4,300,000. If expectations are realized, this surplus would serve to cover a large part of the capital expenditures as well. Even a slight improvement in price levels, and the general volume of business would, of course, be reflected immediately in the returns from customs and excise taxes, and our budget position would be correspondingly improved.

Without building too greatly on help from this source in the present year, it is the considered view of the government that reductions in expenditures, on the one hand, and proposed additions to the taxation revenues on the other, will, in the final outcome, represent a complete balancing of the budget on the usual current governmental services. While, unfortunately, the estimates of revenues, which are conservatively based having regard to the present conditions of business, do not cover the special expenditures on unemployment relief, nor the more indirect liabilities arising out of the financing of the Canadian National Railways, it is nevertheless, in our judgment, as substantial a step in the direction of providing currently for every responsibility of the government as would be in the public interest to make effective in any one year under existing conditions.

Income Tax

It is proposed to raise the rate of taxation on incomes of corporations and joint stock companies to 11 per cent, to take effect in the 1931 taxation period. Under the act at present, a corporation whose financial year is not coincident with the calendar year is allowed until April 30 of the following year to pay the tax. It is proposed to amend the act to provide in such cases for the return of income and payment of the tax within four months from the close of the fiscal period. This will have the effect of accelerating the collection of the tax from those corporations whose fiscal periods do not end with the calendar year. A further amendment to the Income War Tax Act will repeal the provisions relating to family corporations.

In respect of the tax on personal incomes, it is proposed to repeal the deduction of 20 per cent now allowed from the tax payable under the established schedule of rates. In addition, all taxpayers, including corporations, in receipt of net income in excess of $5,000 will be required to pay a surcharge of 5 per cent of the amount of tax otherwise payable.

The personal exemption, where heretofore $3,000, will be reduced to $2,400, and where heretofore $1,500, will be reduced to $1,200. No change is to be made in the exemption for dependent children. Hereafter the exemption granted in respect of income from annuity contracts will be $1,200 instead of $5,000. This will bring the exemption into conformity with the Annuities Act as amended in 1931.

The penalty provisions in the Income War Tax Act will be amended so as to provide that in cases where investigation reveals that a taxpayer has deliberately understated his income, the amount of income not disclosed will be added in double the amount and the tax assessed thereon. The decease of the taxpayer will not avoid the tax penalty.

The changes in the exemptions and in the rates of tax payable will apply to incomes of 1931. The following statement indicates the proposed increase in taxation, in the case of a married person without dependents, at various amounts of income:

Sales Tax

The sales tax will be increased by 2 per cent. Some additional revenue will also be derived from a limited adjustment of the exempt and partially exempt list, in the case of a number of articles not primary products which it is believed should, under present conditions, carry a proportionate share of the tax burden. The chief items to be taken from the exempt list are bakers' cake, and pies, lard compound and similar substances made from animal or vegetable stearine or oil, ice cream, processed milk foods and cereal foods under Customs Items 45 and 46, and usual coverings for goods not subject to the sales tax. Biscuits are to be raised from the half to the full rate.

Special Excise Tax on Imports

The special excise tax on goods imported into Canada will be increased by 2 per cent, making it 3 per cent.

Insurance Tax

The tax upon insurance premiums passed at the last session was not put into effect by proclamation as provided by the statute, owing to difficulties over the jurisdiction of the Dominion and provinces in the matter of insurance. It is now proposed, under the Special War Revenue Act, to impose a tax of 1 per cent of net premiums of insurance companies authorized to transact business in Canada or in any province of Canada, other than life, marine and farm mutual. This tax was in force from 1915 to 1929. British and foreign companies, not so authorized but maintaining deposits with the Dominion, will also be assessed 1 per cent of net premiums received in Canada. Canadian policyholders who insure their property in Canada with companies other than those mentioned above, will be charged a tax of 15 per cent of the gross premiums payable on such insurance.

The stamp tax on cheques, promissory notes, money orders, etc., will be increased. The precent rate is two cents for each instrument exceeding $5. The new rate will be three cents over $5 to $100 and on instruments over $100, six cents. The tax of 10 per cent, minimum 25 cents, on sleeping car tickets and of 10 cents on each parlour car ticket, will be reenacted. The tax on cable and telegraphic messages will also be reenacted, but the rate will now be five cents for each message costing more than fifteen cents, and the measure will be extended to include long distance telephone calls at the same rate.

A minor amendment also is proposed to the Special War Revenue Act in connection with the stock and bond transfer tax. The present exemption for inter-dealer transactions in bonds is to be repealed and a regulation substituted which will ensure the application of the tax in all transactions except where dealers in securities are acting as purchasing agents for clients.

The sales tax changes come into force immediately; the stamp tax on cheques, telegraph and telephone and transportation taxes, it is proposed to put into effect as of May 2.

Tariff

Having in mind the near approach of the meeting of the Imperial Conference, it is deemed undesirable to make any tariff changes touching the British preference. This decision of necessity precludes any major tariff adjustments.

With one exception, no tariff amendments are therefore proposed. The exception relates to repair parts for farm implements, for which the special rates granted to March 31, 1932, will be further extended to March 31, 1933.

In proposing these additional measures of taxation, consideration has been given, on the one hand, to the ability of our people to bear the extra burden, and, on the other, to the absolute necessity of placing our financial house in order.

Bearing fully in mind the fact that, in common with the whole world, we have suffered —while not in equal degree at least in substantial degree—as the result of a depression universal in scope and of unparalleled magnitude; realizing also the anxieties and burdens of the people and the manifold difficulties resulting from the trying period through which we are passing; and appreciating how desirable it is that we should endeavour to the fullest possible extent compatible with the public interest to call for as little further sacrifice as possible;—at the same time we would be recreant to our duty if we failed to face our problems with determination and at whatever sacrifice, fully meet our financial obligations, balance our budget and preserve our national credit in the eyes of an observant financial world.

This course may result in hardship. It may entail sacrifice. But in the long run it will result in less hardship, and will call for less sacrifice than that which would flow from a policy less courageous.

Furthermore, the preservation of our national credit is an indispensable prerequisite to the return of prosperity.

While the world is close knit to-day in matters of trade and finance as never before in its history—and we cannot expect normal or prosperous conditions apart from the general world trend—nevertheless some one nation, or group of nations, must assume the leadership and point the way. To that end an opportunity unique in history is afforded to the British nations, whose representatives will assemble in Ottawa at the Imperial Economic Conference in July next.

If the delegates who assemble here meet in an atmosphere charged with determination to approach their deliberations from the viewpoint of mutual advantage, there will result measures which will give a marked stimulus to empire trade.

And while these measures are primarily designed to stimulate trade within the empire, they will release forces and establish currents which may well flow beyond our borders to the eventual benefit of the world at large.

As a final word, may I say that I do not propose to indulge in prophecy. But I do desire to record my firm conviction that we are not far removed from events which will herald the dawn of better days; that those qualities of courage, resourcefulness and thrift which characterized our forebears are not lost to the present generation; that our struggles and difficulties of to-day will serve as a challenge to greater effort on the part of governments and people to the end that Canada will be found in the vanguard of those nations who successfully emerge from the greatest testing time in modern history.

I beg to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that when we are in committee of ways and means I shall move the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter seventeen of the acts of 1928, chapter thirty-nine of the acts of 1929, chapter thirteen of the acts of 1930 (first session), chapter three of the acts of 1930 (second session) and chapter thirty of the acts of 1931, be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 409q, the several enumerations of goods, respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite thereto, and by inserting the following item, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

Tariff Item	—	British Preferential Tariff	Intermediate Tariff	General Tariff

2. Resolved, that any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the seventh day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolution imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for consumption for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the reduction of twenty per centum from the rates of tax under the first schedule of the act be repealed;

2. That the rate of tax applicable to corporations be increased from ten per centum to eleven per centum on the income in excess of $2,000;

3. That all taxpayers in receipt of net income in excess of $5,000, excluding incomes exempt under section 4 of the said act, shall pay an additional tax of five per centum of the amount of taxes otherwise payable under the provisions of the said act;

4. That the personal exemption heretofore afforded to the extent of $3,000 be reduced to $2,400 and where heretofore afforded to the extent of $1,500 be reduced to $1,200;

5. That income arising by way of annuity contracts within the meaning of paragraph (k) of section 3 of chapter 24 of the statutes of 1930 be exempt to the extent of $1,200 in lieu of the exemption heretofore provided of $5,000, but the said exemption of annuity income heretofore provided and arising out of annuity contracts entered into prior to the passing of any act based on this resolution shall continue in full force and effect;

6. That the provisions relating to family corporations be repealed, such repeal to come into force at the end of the 1932 calendar year or fiscal periods ending therein;

7. That in respect of fiscal periods not coincident with the calendar year the return of income and payment of the tax, by persons other than individuals, in lieu of being made and paid on or before the 30th day of April in each year as in the said act provided, must be made and paid within four months from the close of the fiscal period and if not so made and paid all provisions of the said act shall mutatis mutandis apply;

1. (i) That every company authorized to transact the business of insurance in Canada or in any province of Canada, other than life and marine insurance companies, fraternal benefit societies and purely mutual fire insurance companies insuring principally farm risks, shall pay for consolidated revenue fund a tax of one per centum upon the net premiums received by the company in Canada on and after the first day of January, 1932.

(ii) That every insurance company not so authorized to transact the business of insurance in Canada or in any province thereof but which maintains a deposit with the Minister of Finance as security for the claims of all Canadian policyholders exclusively of such company to the amount of at least the amount of the liabilities of the company to policyholders in Canada, shall pay for consolidated revenue fund a tax of one per centum upon the net premiums received by it in respect of insurance on property in Canada, other than marine insurance, effected or renewed in the portion of the calendar year 1932, and of each calendar year thereafter for which it maintains such deposit.

(iii) That every person resident in Canada who insures or has insured his property situate in Canada, or any property situate in Canada in which he has an insurable interest other than that of an insurer of such property, with any British or foreign company or British or foreign underwriter or underwriters, or any association of persons

(b) which does not on or before the first day of May, 1932, or at the time such insurance is effected or renewed, if after the said date, maintain a deposit for the purpose and to the amount aforesaid, shall each year pay a tax of fifteen per centum of the gross premiums paid or payable for such insurance during the next preceding calendar year.

2. That on every cable and telegraph or radio message originating in Canada for which a charge of more than fifteen cents is made, except press despatches, and on every long distance telephone call originating in Canada for which a charge of more than fifteen cents is made the sending company shall pay to the consolidated revenue fund a tax of five cents and may charge the same to the person paying the regular charges for such message.

3. That every purchaser of a seat in a pullman or parlour car shall pay, in addition to the regular price of each such seat, a tax of ten cents and that every purchaser of a berth in a sleeping car or other sleeping accommodation on a railway train shall pay in addition to the regular price thereof a tax equal to ten per cent of the said price, provided that such tax shall in no case be less than twenty-five cents.

4. That the stamp tax imposed by parts VI, VIII, and IX of the said act on cheques, receipts to banks, money orders, travellers' cheques and post office money orders for amounts exceeding five dollars, and on bills of exchange and promissory notes, be increased to three cents on every instrument for an amount not exceeding one hundred dollars, and to six cents on every instrument for an amount exceeding one hundred dollars.

(ii) That the following words be removed from the list of articles exempt from the consumption or sales tax set out in schedule III to the said act, as enacted by chapter 54 of the statutes of 1931, that is to say;

"Bakers' cake and pies, not to include biscuits;" "and substitutes therefor" in line seven of the said schedule; "lard compound and similar substances, made from animal or vegetable stearine or oils;" "materials for use solely in the manufacture of any substitute for butter or lard;" "extract of rennet;" "ice cream;" "usual coverings to be used exclusively for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax;" "materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of usual coverings to be used for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax."

Also under the heading "Goods Enumerated in Customs Tariff Items;" the following figures and words, namely:—

"45. Milk foods, n.o.p.; prepared cereal foods, in packages not exceeding twenty-five pounds weight each;"

"All articles manufactured or produced by the labour of the blind in institutions established for their care or under the control or direction of such institutions."

"Biscuits of all kinds."

7. That the special excise tax on imports imposed by section eighty-eight of the said act, as enacted by section fourteen of chapter 54 of the statutes of 1931, be increased to three per cent.

8. That any enactment founded on paragraphs two, three and four of this resolution shall come into force on the second day of May one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two.

On motion of Mr. Ralston the debate was adjourned.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED DEDUCTION OF TEN PER CENT IN INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

The house resumed from Monday, April 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. 19, to provide for the deduction of compensation in the public service—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HEENAN: When the resolution was before the committee, and again yesterday, I think, the Finance minister stated that this reduction was a contribution by the civil servants to the state, and not a reduction in wages. I was wondering if the Prime Minister—the Finance minister is not in his seat at the moment—could give any assurance to the house and the civil service that the present salaries will be restored at the end of the year. I would also ask a question with respect to those who have been denied their statutory increases for this year. Suppose a man has been denied a statutory increase of $100 for this year. When the statutory increases are restored, will he receive $200?

Mr. BENNETT: It is not possible, Mr. Chairman, to answer either of those questions. Unless the economic conditions of the country change the whole matter, of course, will have to be carefully reconsidered. The Finance minister told the committee yesterday that this measure expired at the end of March next and there is a provision in the bill to that effect. It will be recalled that in 1897, when the Liberal government came into power, the Postmaster General did not provide for the statutory increases for those in the Post Office Department, and if my memory serves me that condition continued for something like three years, and there was no subsequent readjustment at that time. It well may be that it will take some time to bring about the readjustment that the hon. member mentions. No promises can be made or assurances given. The statute means exactly what it says and nothing more.

Mr. HEENAN: During the discussion on the resolution it was brought to light that the men working on our canals at prevailing rates had had their wages reduced, and the Minister of Finance indicated to this side of the house that when the bill was in committee he would consider any situation such as that. I was wondering if the Prime Minister is in a position to say whether or not it is intended further to reduce the wages of these men who have already had a reduction.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 6 of the bill provides for regulations being made by the treasury board, amongst others, to determine the amount of compensation for the purposes of this act. If the reduction in salary contemplates the compensation prevailing at the time the reduction of ten per cent becomes effective, then the treasury board will consider that fact. It is difficult to lay down a hard and fast rule with respect to it, and that is the reason the minister has placed section 6 in the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: Yesterday the question arose as to the inequalities which would exist if there were a reduction by five per cent in the salaries of those civil servants who are receiving less than $1,200. Would the Prime Minister take into consideration the fairness of reducing the rate charged against those who are receiving less than $1,200?

Mr. BENNETT: As the statute reads, that would not be possible. As I have said, however, under section 6 it would be competent for the treasury board to determine what should be the true compensation against which the reduction should be made. That is the only answer I can give.

Mr. HEENAN: In other words, it is possible you may or may not take it into consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: No, under section 6.

Mr. VENIOT: You can or cannot?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Through questions asked by the former Minister of Labour I understand from the Prime Minister that statutory increases will not be granted this year. The right hon. gentleman said he would make no promise at the moment as to what might happen to statutory increases later on. May I urge upon the right hon. gentleman that a fearful hardship will be imposed upon those who are now being deprived of those statutory increases. They have expected that in the years to come they would enjoy the benefit of the increases, provided their conduct was such as to warrant the receipt of them. Because somebody did not do something away back in 1897, I ask the right hon. gentleman not to follow the example given at that time. I would be very grateful now if he would say that at least the matter will be taken into sympathetic consideration, and that when the time comes the civil servants may receive better treatment than was given in the year 1897.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the hon. member will be the first to agree that under the present economic and financial conditions no promise of any kind should be made as to what will or will not be done regarding statutory increases. Of course any government, whatever it may be, would give every consideration to a question of statutory increases, having due regard to the prevailing conditions. I think that is all any government could fairly do. The hon. member misapprehended my meaning with respect to the year 1897. I merely said statutory increases were not given in that year, or in the three succeeding years, and I made the statement merely as an illustration to indicate that so far as this particular measure is concerned, the deprivation of statutory increases is nothing novel.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions: "compensation"; "member of the public service of Canada."

Mr. GARDINER: Under clause (b) of section 2 certain exemptions are made from the deductions, including His Excellency the Governor General, the lieutenant-governors of the several provinces of Canada, the members of the judiciary, the members of the military, naval and air forces of Canada, and so on. So far as I am concerned I do not think we should give any exemption to those who are receiving salaries from the public service. A good deal of discussion took place on this matter before, and to-day it is not my intention to take a great deal of time in further discussion. I would point out however that we know the judiciary in Great Britain have been subject to deductions which have taken place in that country. I have information from the High Commissioner's office to the effect that on salaries from £2,000 to £5,000 there has been a reduction of ten per cent. Above £5,000 the cut has been 20 per cent. Under those circumstances I can see no justice in the exemption of any persons from the proposed reduction, with the exception of those who are receiving only sufficient to take care of their meagre needs. Therefore I move an amendment to clause (b) as follows:

That clause (b), section 2, be amended by striking out the words "other than" in the 18th line and also by striking out the words "and includes" in the 23rd line and by inserting the words "and includes" after the word "Canada" in the 18th line.

If the amendment is accepted by the committee His Excellency the Governor General, the lieutenant-governors and all those now exempted from deductions will pay their share, just the same as other persons receiving salaries from the public treasury.

Mr. BENNETT: It is obvious of course, Mr. Chairman, that the government cannot accept that proposal. The reductions in Great Britain were made under the provisions of a statute which I mentioned to the house on another occasion. Within thirty days from October 1 the minister or ministers were charged with the responsibility of carrying into effect changes by way of reductions that might have been thought desirable or necessary in the public interest. The hon. member for Acadia has said those reductions in some instances were ten per cent and in others 20 per cent. Amongst others the judges received the reduction. Subsequently that action was rescinded. Judges are not servants of the crown; they are the buffers which stand between the crown and the people, when occasion arises, for the purpose of administering justice to all parties who may be litigants, and for the purpose of protecting the people from the crown and from one another. That consideration, which has been elementary with respect to the judges since the Act of Settlement has ultimately prevailed.

I am glad to say a considerable number of judges have communicated not only with the Minister of Justice but with myself indicating their desire to make a contribution of ten per cent of their salaries to the public weal. They have asked that appropriate action be taken in that regard. I may say the same thing has occurred with respect to the others. With respect to lieutenant-governors of the provinces however I should like to point out that they are not in receipt of salaries sufficient to enable them to discharge the duties devolving upon them by reason of their offices. In consequence of that fact it is very difficult to get any person to undertake the duties of that office. The salary is so inadequate as compared with the necessary expenditures that it is not only undesirable to cut their salaries but a compulsory reduction of the salaries of representatives of the crown is not a matter which could be undertaken under present conditions in this parliament, for reasons which I think are fairly obvious.

I do not think I should mention any names, because it would be wholly improper to do so, but I may say that one lieutenant-governor said he would have to leave his office if the ten per cent cut applied to his salary. Some of them have taken office at very considerable sacrifice to themselves, and are dependent upon their salaries to discharge their duties. With respect to the other exemptions mentioned it will be found that the section reads as follows:

The Governor General of Canada—

Whose communication to this house I read some few nights ago—

The lieutenant-governors of the several provinces of Canada—

And I suppose it is within the knowledge of every hon. member in this house that there has been no revision of these salaries, although there has been some augmentation of the salaries of representatives of the crown in this dominion by reason of arrangements made some years ago. With respect to the provinces that is not so; the salaries of the lieutenant-governors stand at $9,000, except in the smaller provinces.

Mr. VENIOT: There are some provinces where perquisites are voted for the lieutenant-governors.

Mr. BENNETT: Not in every part of Canada; that is the point exactly. In some parts there are government houses, in others there are none. In some cases the province assumes certain responsibilities for the upkeep of the establishment, whether it be rented or furnished by the crown; in other cases it does not. In any event I am only pointing out to the committee that the matter engaged the careful consideration of the government, and we were convinced that if the service is to be maintained and there is to be an executive in each of the provinces, as the British North America Act requires, to give effect to the proposal suggested by the hon. member would be to make it most difficult to carry on and in some instances would bring about resignations.

The reason for there being no reductions in connection with the judiciary I have already mentioned. In respect to the military forces and the police force, I can only say that the experience following upon what was done in Great Britain induces the government to believe that these are not services in which any such reduction should be made by compulsion. But there, too, some officials have already indicated to the government their desire that a ten per cent reduction should be made in their compensation.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, so far as I am personally concerned I am opposed to this bill in its entirety. I so expressed myself when the resolution was first before the house, but in view of the fact that a day or two ago the bill was given second reading, that is, its principle was adopted, I realize that it is useless for me to say very much. However, I do feel that clause (b) should be amended to leave out all the words after the word "Canada" in the sixth line, as by deleting the remainder of the subsection, "the Governor General of Canada, the lieutenant-governors of the several provinces of Canada, the members of the judiciary, and the members of the military, naval and air forces of Canada, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police," would come within the scope of the bill. I do not think it is in the interest of the country that these civil servants should be exempted from the ten per cent reduction, while members of this house and of the Senate and the civil service generally are forced to relinquish ten per cent of their remuneration.

As I said a moment ago, I am opposed to this bill in its entirety, but since the house has adopted the principle, I submit we should go the whole distance—nobody should be exempted from the operation of the bill. I cannot agree with what the right hon. gentleman said about exempting lieutenant-governors, judges or anybody else from the ten per cent reduction. When the resolution was first placed on the order paper I remember reading in the public press a statement by His Excellency the Governor General that he was willing to give ten per cent of his salary towards the revenues of Canada. It seems to me that when we are asking elevator men, charwomen and every other civil servant to take a ten per cent reduction in their remuneration, we should not turn down His Excellency's offer. I submit that in view of that offer and in view of other facts, His Excellency should be placed in the same position as members of the Senate and of the House of Commons and everybody else who is covered by this bill.

My right hon. friend told us that the lieutenant-governors were not getting sufficient remuneration. That may be so, but I should like to know which lieutenant-governor did not ask for the position which he now occupies? Which lieutenant-governor would give it up if there was no salary attached to his office? If any lieutenant-governor mentioned by the right hon. gentleman thinks his official salary not sufficient, let him resign, and let the government appoint other men to the office subject to a ten per cent reduction in salary.

Let me go a step further. We have dealt with members of the judiciary. If, as my right hon, friend says, they have written him and other members of the cabinet expressing their willingness to take a ten per cent reduction in their salaries, would it not be in the interests of peace, harmony and good government in this country for the right hon. gentleman who is in charge of the bill to exclude them from the exempted classes. Then our lighthouse keepers, our postmasters and every other civil servant who has to take a ten per cent reduction would go to bed and sleep better if he knew that the judges too had taken a ten per cent reduction.

We hear a good deal these days about the judiciary having a contract with the government. I say the judiciary has no more of a contract with this government or with the people of the country than I have. I am opposed to the reduction of $400 in my indemnity. I submit that I am entitled to the same treatment from this parliament as are the judges and the members of the military forces or any one else who come under these exemptions.

My understanding is that no member of the militia force has a contract with the government any more than any other civil servant, that when they join the force they fill out a certain form and sign it, and if my information is correct they agree to take a lower rate of pay if the government should ask them to do so. So why should our generals and colonels be exempted from this ten per cent reduction of salary when you, Mr. Chairman, and I and other people have to take the reduction? Surely our services are worth at least as much to the country as the services of the gentlemen with the high hats down in the Woods building. Therefore I submit that the members of the military and naval forces should be put on the same basis as other civil servants.

The members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are also exempted from this ten per cent cut. What a spectacle we have witnessed in the past few days in regard to that force! In the old days, sir, everybody in Canada looked upon the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as the best body of men in the dominion. We looked up to and respected them, but within the last few days police bodies appointed by the provinces have been blanketed into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, in spite of our economic condition, this government has been saddled with the upkeep of these bodies.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUFF: I say yes.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. BENNETT: The provinces are paying for them, under an agreement. They merely prefer that they should be administered in that way.

Mr. DUFF: Is it not a fact that these provincial police organizations were blanketed into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and that their salaries are paid by this government?

Mr. BENNETT: They were not blanketed in. An agreement has been arrived at between the Dominion of Canada and the governments of Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba, and Nova Scotia whereby the Dominion government become the administrators of the police forces of those provinces, but the provinces pay for them.

Mr. VENIOT: Is it not a fact that the federal authorities said to the province of New Brunswick, "We will carry on your police force for a certain amount of money"?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it was the other way about; the provinces asked the dominion to carry on the work, and the provinces pay the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The entire cost?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, at a fixed rate of $1,000 per man per annum, if my memory serves me aright, though I speak subject to correction. The Dominion government is responsible for the administration of the provincial body as a part of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But does that amount paid by the province cover the entire cost of the dominion?

Mr. BENNETT: It is based on the assumption that it will cover the cost. The system has not been in operation very long, but that is the assumption.

Mr. DUFF: I am not quite clear about this yet. The Prime Minister has not told us whether the provinces pay the total cost of carrying on the work of the provincial police—

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: —or if the money is paid into this treasury in a lump sum, while this government pays the individual members of the police force. My understanding is that this government pays the salaries of these men, and the provinces pay a lump sum into the federal treasury.

Mr. BENNETT: The computations based upon an average cost of approximately $1,000 per man per annum; the agreement between the provinces and the dominion is based upon that computation. In addition, of course, there is the service that was being rendered by the dominion police force in connection with preventive and other matters, but that has nothing to do with this case at all. The provinces merely thought it more economical and conducive to sounder administration if the dominion, having one police force, would undertake to control their forces as well so as to make one where there were two formerly. For that the provinces pay a sum based upon the average cost per man per annum which, in our judgment, will be sufficient to save the dominion from any cost whatever in connection with the forces.

Mr. DUFF: That does not change my argument at all; the fact remains that those men who were formerly provincial policemen in the different provinces now have become members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I say that if other people are to suffer a cut of ten per cent in salary, these men who have been taken over from the provincial police should have a ten per cent reduction also.

I certainly think everyone in this country should be treated alike. If any part of the civil service is to lose ten per cent by way of salary reduction then I say there should be no exemptions; the judges, members of the militia and naval forces, members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, lieutenant-governors and the governor general should all come in the same category and make the same contribution to the federal treasury.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I want to add my endorsation of the amendment now before the committee. Since the Prime Minister has stated that the amendment is not acceptable to the government, however, I am afraid there is very little hope that it will be adopted, since the government commands a strong majority in the house.

I am not in the same position as the preceding speaker, who stated that he was opposed to the bill in its entirety. I voted for the ten per cent deduction for several reasons. I realized that there was a serious situation existing throughout the country. We have just listened to the budget presentation by the Minister of Finance, and I am sure we all realize that the balancing of the budget made very necessary economies such as this ten per cent deduction, and since the measure is to apply for one year only I think most of us can stand that cut of ten per cent. The amount each will contribute will not be very large, and the cost of living has dropped approximately fifteen per cent, so our loss will not be as great as the benefit we will obtain through the decreased cost of living.

I had in mind also the conditions existing in the west. There are thousands of farmers, business men, school teachers and others in western Canada who would be thankful indeed to receive the salary paid the average civil servant in this city, even with the ten per cent reduction. We have public school teachers out there receiving only a few hundred dollars a year, while others are teaching for just a small government grant and boarding around among the people, in order to continue the work.

But, Mr. Chairman, while I favour the bill in general, I do not favour the exemptions outlined in section 2. The Prime Minister has said that he has received letters from some judges stating that they are willing to take the ten per cent cut voluntarily. In fairness to those judges I think the others who have not so volunteered should be required to contribute ten per cent. I am convinced that no hardship will be worked on any judge if the ten per cent reduction is extended to cover their salaries. The salary of the lowest paid judge in Canada is $5,000 from the Dominion treasury, and that amount is supplemented in various provinces; in my own province, for instance, the judges receive $1,500 in addition. I would make bold to say, also, that we are over-judged in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear; but we cannot control that.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: By actual count we have 286 judges in the Dominion of Canada. I think if we compared our judiciary and the total population of this country with the number of judges and the population of the British Isles, we would feel like hiding our faces because of the extravagance we have exhibited in connection with the salaries of the judges in Canada. That being the case, it offers an added reason why we should insist that every one of the 286 judges in Canada should contribute ten per cent of his salary towards helping to meet the urgent situation now confronting us.

I listened with considerable interest to what the Prime Minister had to say with regard to the lieutenant-governors, but I should like to know why the salary of the High Commissioner for Canada has been reduced from $10,000 to $9,000. An item appearing on page 10 of the estimates shows that a reduction of ten per cent has been made in the salary of this gentleman, while the salaries of the lieutenant-governors have been left unchanged. It would seem to me that the expenses of this gentleman are just as great as if not greater than those of the lieutenant-governors; if a deduction is fair in the one instance, it would be equally fair in the other.

I cannot see any justification for exempting the members of the military, naval and air forces from the proposed reduction of ten per cent. We have been told that there are 139 persons in the department of National Defence drawing salaries between $4,000 and $4,900, thirty drawing salaries between $5,000 and $5,900 and fifteen drawing salaries between $6,000 and $6,900. A total of 184 persons in that department draw salaries of $4,500 per year or over. A deduction of ten per cent should not cause any hardship to any of these persons.

It is rather difficult to state exactly how much revenue would accrue if this deduction was levied against those at present exempted, but I have made an approximate computation. Judges of Canada draw something over $2,000,000 in salaries, and a ten per cent reduction would amout to about $214,190. If this deduction were applied to the officials of the Department of National Defence, it would mean a saving of over $88,000, and if it were applied still further to the non-permanent active militia and the permanent forces, it would amount to between $600,000 and $800,000. A considerable saving would be made if this deduction were applied to the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, although there is a question as to whether or not there is justification for making the reduction when the salaries are paid by the provinces.

His Excellency the Governor General has made a voluntary offer to accept a ten per cent reduction in his salary, and I think his action deserves the thanks of this chamber. His Excellency is not a Canadian by birth but he has set an example which I think is worthy of the commendation of every hon. member of the house.

If this reduction were applied to the salaries of the lieutenant governors, the judges and the members of the militia and mounted police, there would be an added revenue of over one million dollars. It would be only fair, it would be only equitable, it would be only right that these gentlemen should make a contribution to the finances of this country on a par with that being made by the members of this house and of the Senate.

[Mr. Carmichael.]

Mr. BENNETT: In answer to the hon. gentleman I shall first point out that the judges are not civil servants. It was because they are not, that the action taken in Great Britain was altered. That is an important point to remember. Some hon. members may take the view that because their salaries are paid out of the public exchequer, their positions are as indicated, but the fact is that they are neither servants of the crown nor civil servants.

Mr. DUFF: Are members of parliament servants of the crown?

Mr. BENNETT: I have observed often that they are not, and technically speaking I do not think they are. Some of them are high admirals and others occupy other positions.

I shall not inflict upon the committee the argument which has been made so fully in the law journals and to which I made reference the other day, nor shall I refer to the editorial comments made by British papers as to the error of seeking to reduce the salaries of British judges.

With reference to the lieutenant-governors of the provinces, I can only say that the court of last resort in the empire has held that within the boundaries of the provinces these gentlemen represent the sovereign, and to reduce their compensation by this statute would be to act at variance with the long series of precedents which have obtained with respect to matters of this kind. Some hon. members may well say that I have not seemed to be bound by precedents where it is necessary to change them; I admit that quite freely, but I believe it would be wrong to depart from the principle established in this regard. The offer made by His Excellency the Governor General has been accepted by the government; I do not believe the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough was in his place the other evening when I read a statement to this effect.

We come to the third of the three classes, the crown, the judiciaries and the forces of the crown. The men who come within this third class are under discipline—they cannot resign even if they so desire. They are not under an ordinary contract, they are enlisted men, and the government contracts that during the term of their enlistment they shall receive a given compensation. It is not a contract in the ordinary sense because the word "enlistment" is used rather than the word "contract." They cannot leave the service without being guilty of desertion and prosecution, and they cannot resign.

These are the reasons why the three classes, the crown, the judiciary and the forces of the crown, are not made subject to the provisions of this statute.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does that apply to the mounted police as well?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The law officers of the crown are very doubtful as to whether or not we have the power to make a reduction, at least with respect to the first and second classes. With respect to the third class, the forces of the crown, presumably we have the power to change the terms of the enlistment, but the government is of the opinion that this should not be done.

The action taken by the government in this instance does not arise out of any desire to do other than what is fair to all parties in the state. But there must be a frank recognition by parliament of the fact that the crown, the judiciary and the forces of the crown are in a position different from that occupied by any of the classes covered by the bill. I shall not, as I said, dwell on the first two. As to the third class, if they were occupying a position such as has been suggested, the matter might be looked at from another angle. But from a question of law, apart from any other consideration, the forces of the crown occupy the position I have indicated and there is not an hon. member of this committee who does not understand that enlistment and contract are different. In the latter case, there is freedom to leave the position you have, while in the other, a man cannot leave his position except by becoming a deserter.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What about judges?

Mr. BENNETT: Judges may resign.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Is it not a fact that officers in the militia may also resign?

Mr. BENNETT: They are subject to military law and there are certain provisions under which they may avail themselves of their right to resign, but it is not a right such as that which belongs to those who have free contracts as has a civil servant in the ordinary acceptance of the term. The position of a civil servant is entirely different; in other words he may exercise the free right of resigning. That is a fair way to put the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister has given us certain technical objections to the proposed amendment. We have surely reached the stage when we can look a little beyond technical considerations to some of the realities in the case; there are some things deeper than the technical. As a matter of theory it may be that the crown is supreme, but I submit in all seriousness that the people are sovereign, and that is the important point we need to keep before us to-day. It merely beclouds the issue by, shall I say, dragging in such terms as "the crown," which would indicate that there is something sacrosanct about arrangements as they now stand.

Let me refer particularly to the lieutenant-governors. The position taken a few minutes ago by the Prime Minister was that it was exceedingly difficult to get anyone to occupy lieutenant-governorships. Does this mean that Canada cannot get anybody to represent the crown? Does it mean there are not enough patriotic people who will represent the crown in this country? If so, we are in a sorry way.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what it means.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Coming to realities, we all know that to a very considerable extent to-day this position is, I think I may say, formal and social in character. Whatever the constitutional aspect may be, in practice the duties are very largely formal and social.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The expenses are social.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The expenses undoubtedly are incurred very largely in social functions. Since that is the real fact of the case, the sooner we reach the point where we shall abolish these lieutenant-governorships altogether, the better for everybody concerned, and that idea is coming rapidly to be felt by large sections of the people in Canada. I know of no better way of hastening this consummation than by carrying such an amendment as the one before us, because by doing so we assist very materially in having a still larger number of people reject these honours. Before very long people will come to understand there will have to be changes in the British North America Act, changes in our relationships, but just because of certain technical matters I do not think we ought to be asked to go on forever supporting institutions of this nature. It seems absurd that the postman who comes to our door and who is already underpaid and that many civil servants who are to-day being turned out on the street because of these cuts, should be made to suffer in this way, while people who are occupying what are essentially formal and social positions go scot-free. I do not think that is reasonable and I know the same opinion is held by a majority of the Canadian people.

With regard to the mounted police, the full facts have not been laid before us, but I understand the western provinces are adopting this arrangement of the mounted police for purely economic reasons. I very much doubt whether the mounted police are to be paid a smaller amount than the old provincial police received, or whether a central administration from Ottawa can be conducted more economically than administration from the various provincial capitals.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows the reason for the change. It does away with two series of overheads. That is the whole story.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know that, but that is another point. We have in Ottawa an overhead whereby at least one official of Royal Canadian Mounted Police is receiving a salary of $12,000 or over. I cannot quite understand why a man who is obtaining a salary of $12,000 or over should be retained in that position and not be subject to the cut to which other people in government employ are subject.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And he can resign.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, he can resign if he wishes. To revert to the other point, the Prime Minister knows very well that before he came into office there was a good deal of friction between the mounted police in Saskatchewan and the provincial police of that province. The provincial police rather resented the coming into that province of the mounted police. It is very doubtful whether it was necessary for some years to have two distinct police forces there. The Dominion government, however, retained their police force here and now we are told, because there would be a saving of one overhead, we must have a centralized police force.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I am sure he desires to be fair. The provinces have asked the dominion to take over the administration of the police and merge the two into one. In no case has this been done at the instance of the federal power; it has been asked by the local or provincial authorities.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I accept that explanation; in fact, I have information to that effect directly from some of the provincial premiers. But that does not alter my argument that the federal government might have withdrawn the mounted police force from, say Saskatchewan, and allowed that province to carry on, thus saving money to the dominion treasury. The federal authorities did not wish to do that; they wished to retain their police force and keep up this enormous overhead. Under those circumstances the provinces, in order to save money for themselves, consented to give up their own police force, merging it into the larger one.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the provisions of the Customs and other acts, we have to maintain a preventive force. That work has now been taken over by the mounted police. Therefore there is a further saving so far as that phase of the question is concerned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I can understand there may be some saving. I do not want at present to go into the other matter which I should like some time to discuss, that is of the danger of a centralized police force. That underlies and I think more than overcomes the economy that may be secured under the recent arrangement. All I am pointing out at this time is that it is an entirely wrong principle that a police force should be exempt when other people equally worthy and doing equally good work in the service of the country should be subjected to a cut of this character. Only yesterday, I think it was, a watchman was laid off and his job taken over by a mounted policeman. Had a watchman been doing the work he would be subject to the ten per cent cut, but to-day a Royal Canadian Mounted Policeman being on the job, the latter is not subject to the cut. The work is practically the same, and with all deference to the Prime Minister's statement with regard to the forces of the crown, I cannot see why men who are safeguarding government property or acting as ornaments in the art gallery or anything of that kind, should not be subject to a cut just as much as any other civil servant.

The same argument applies to the defence forces. The Prime Minister was not very explicit when he referred to British experience. I presume that he referred to the riots which took place when there was a reduction in the pay of the navy. I hope he does not imply that if the salaries of our militia were reduced there would be riots in this country, but I think that that was his implication. Surely that is not true! It seems to me that since so many of the higher salaries are being paid to those engaged in the national defence, as the hon. member for Kindersley pointed out, and since they may resign if they wish to do so, there is no particular reason why they should be exempted as is proposed. It is all very well to talk of having entered upon certain terms of enlistment. But may I point out that many of the civil servants have enlisted in the civil service of this country ten, fifteen or twenty years ago, giving up lucrative employment elsewhere to do so, and giving up the prospect of promotion elsewhere. They entered the civil service of this country on the implicit understanding that their tenure of office would be secure. To-day a good many of them are being let out, and the rest of them have had their salaries cut down below what they would ordinarily receive under the statutory arrangements. It seems to me that this is all wrong, and I join with others who have protested against it in urging that we should have equal treatment for all classes of those who are receiving payment from this country.

Mr. DUFF: Before we leave this question about the judiciary, I am not quite sure whether the judiciary includes the ex-judges as well as the judges. I would ask the government if I am correct in assuming that the judges on pension are not subject to this ten per cent reduction. I notice on pages 22 and 23 of the estimates for 1932-33 a large number of estimable gentlemen who are receiving very large pensions. I will only read the first three names, for instance, on page 22. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick receives a pension of $6,666.66. I would like to know if his pension is subject to this ten per cent reduction, and if not, why he gets off without making this ten per cent contribution while the Finance Minister and I have to pay it. The same question applies to the next gentleman on the list, who receives a pension of $8,000, and also to the third gentleman, P. B. Mignault, who receives a pension of $12,000 a year. It seems to me that unless the pensions of these gentlemen are subject to this reduction, the act should be amended to include them, for surely a man who is drawing a pension of $12,000 a year and is carrying on a law business in a city of Canada should come under the provisions of this bill just as much as the elevator men and the lightkeepers and the charwomen and the members of parliament. Consequently I say that this act should be amended.

With further regard to my argument as to the blanketing—perhaps I should have said whitewashing—the provincial police into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I observe that in addition to the provincial police the land forces of the preventive service were also taken into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Now if the land forces of the preventive service had not been taken into the mounted police in the last few days they would have been subjected to this reduction of ten per cent, but because they have been taken into the mounted police the preventive service officers who work upon the land are not subject to the reduction.

Mr. ERNST: They get less money.

Mr. DUFF: I do not care whether they get less money or not. The labourer is worthy of his hire, and if they are not getting more pay it is perhaps because they are not worth any more. I am going to argue this like my hon. friend would argue it if he were in court.

Mr. ERNST: May I congratulate you if you do?

Mr. DUFF: My argument is this: Because the land forces of the preventive service are taken from the department of my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue and put into the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice under the guise or under the heading of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, they are not subject to this reduction of ten per cent, while the members of the preventive service who still remain under the Minister of National Revenue and whose work is much more hazardous than that of the land forces—I am referring now to the captains, officers and sailors on the preventive boats on the Atlantic and Pacific—have to suffer the ten per cent reduction. The land forces go scot-free and the members of the far more hazardous branch of the service have to suffer the reduction. I say that that is not fair, and I appeal to the Minister of Justice and to the Minister of Finance to see that the act is amended so that both these branches of the service will be treated alike. I should like an answer to my question, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the judges and ex-judges.

Mr. RHODES: The ex-judges are in the same position with respect to their pensions as the judges with respect to their salaries.

Mr. DUFF: They do not pay the ten per cent?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. BOWMAN: I would like to say a word or two with respect to the proposed amendment as it would affect judges in the province of Manitoba. Under date of the first of April there appeared in the Winnipeg Evening Tribune an open letter from Judge Stubbs, of the city of Winnipeg, to the premier of the province of Manitoba, in which he states that he has been informed by the premier himself that the government of the province of Manitoba proposed to tax the county court judges of the province in respect to their surrogate court salaries, which I might say are paid by the province. The proposal as set out in Judge Stubbs' letter was that the salary which Judge Stubbs receives for the performance of his surrogate court duties, namely, $2,500, was to be taxed by $1,350, and that the salaries of the other county court judges who receive $1,500 for the performance of their surrogate court duties were to be taxed by $1,000. The county court judges in the province of Manitoba receive a salary of $5,000 from the dominion government, and $1,500 from the provincial government for the performance of their surrogate court duties, with the exception of Judge Stubbs, in Winnipeg, who receives $2,500 in this latter respect. Judge Stubbs, in a spirited letter, wrote to the premier protesting against this tax and pointing out that so far as the province is concerned the tax amounts to fifty per cent of the salary which is paid to these judges by the provincial government. Some two or three days later Mr. Major, the attorney general for the province of Manitoba, replied on behalf of the government, intimating, while not directly saying so, that the tax would be put into effect. If we add to that tax a further reduction of ten per cent on the $5,000 salary which these judges receive from the dominion government, surely it is not treating the county court judges of the province of Manitoba in the manner in which they are entitled to be treated as judges of our courts.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Let them resign, then, if they are dissatisfied.

Mr. BOWMAN: That is a very smart reply.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It is a true reply, too.

Mr. BOWMAN: You might make the same reply to all the other civil servants whose salaries have been cut.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The Prime Minister said the civil servants could resign.

Mr. BOWMAN: My hon. friend is receiving a ten per cent cut in his indemnity; why does he not resign?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I will resign any time my hon. friend will.

Mr. BOWMAN: I suggest that my hon. friend should not try to make a hero of himself. Quite frankly, I should have liked to see the judges throughout Canada come forward, as has the Governor General, and submit voluntarily to a ten per cent cut. I believe they would improve their position in the minds of the public if they were to do that.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Let us improve it for them.

Mr. BOWMAN: I have in my hand a letter dated March 7, 1932, from a county court judge in the province of Manitoba, from which I should like to read one or two paragraphs:

> I gather from press reports that the matter of a reduction in judges' salaries will be the subject of some debate, or at least remarks or opinions by members of the house, also that the power of the government to reduce such salaries is apparently in some doubt.
> In speaking for myself only I have no hesitation in saying that if a voluntary consent by the judges to a reduction would be of assistance to the government, I would be happy to do my part.
> If the matter comes up you will know my ideas on the subject, and have my hearty support and cooperation in any way that will help bridge the difficult period we are going through.

Mr. GRAY: Will the hon. member give the judge's name?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BOWMAN: This letter is from Manitoba. If any hon. member wishes to see the letter he is at perfect liberty to do so. I hope hon. members will agree that I should not give the judge's name.

Mr. GRAY: I am stating what I believe to be the rule. If an hon. member reads a letter he should give the name of the writer. I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOWMAN: I have read only some excerpts.

Mr. GRAY: What is the ruling?

Mr. STEVENS: There are occasions, when a letter is not of a controversial nature, where it is desirable to withhold the name of the writer. I think the house usually agrees that in such cases the names should not be given. There is nothing controversial about the letter which has been read.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As to whether or not the letter is judged controversial depends on which side of the house an hon. member may happen to sit.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I had a similar experience a couple of years ago. Although the letter was of a noncontroversial nature the minister was one of the first to ask for the name of the writer.

Mr. STEVENS: On this occasion it is from a member of the judiciary. Surely my hon. friend will not insist upon the production of the name, particularly when the hon. member for Dauphin has agreed to show the letter.

Mr. BOWMAN: Mr. Chairman, in the Winnipeg Evening Tribune of April 4, I find an editorial under the heading "Independence of the judiciary." At this point I should like to read one or two paragraphs from the editorial:

> There are further facts to be taken into consideration.
>
> Judge Stubbs is not a member of the civil service of the province or of the dominion. He is a judge. The complete independence of the judiciary has long been recognized in English law. Independence, it was decided long ago, can be achieved only by permanence of tenure of office and absolute security in remuneration.
> It is a cardinal principle of our judicial system that judges are appointed for life, and can be removed from office only by impeachment proceedings which are so carefully safeguarded that a judge must be very clearly unfitted for his high office before he can be removed from it. He is not subject to removal because of the displeasure of any government, or even of the crown itself.
> Along with the assurance of permanence in his appointment must go absolute security of remuneration. That is at least one-half of the guarantee of his independence, because, if his salary is subject to the whims of a government or a political majority, he can obviously have no real independence. The power to reduce or refuse to pay his salary would constitute practically the same control over his acts and judgments as the power to remove him from office altogether.

I have pointed out this anomaly in so far as it exists in the province of Manitoba. I think hon. members will agree that we would be most unfair if we were to ask judges receiving salaries of $7,500 to consent to a reduction of $1,850, or those receiving salaries of $6,500 for a contribution in any one year of $1,500. For those reasons I cannot support the amendment.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Referring to the judges in Manitoba, my hon. friend said they were subject to the tax on their surrogate court salaries. What about the judges in the other provinces?

Mr. BOWMAN: I am not making any comments in that connection. I have already stated my views.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment. I thought the arguments of the Prime Minister were inconclusive. He has said that the judges are not civil servants, but that they act as buffers between the crown and the common people. I should think that would be true only in cases of litigation in the exchequer court, and hon. members know that that court performs only a very small part of the judicial activities of the judges. In ordinary court cases one would suppose that judges acted as buffers as between man and man, or between law-abiding portions of the community and those seeking profit by crime. I believe we are entitled to draw an inference from an hon. member's remarks, and especially from the remarks of a member as capable as the Prime Minister of expressing himself. The inference we might draw from his remarks would be that if judges' salaries were reduced their function as buffers would be imperilled or lessened, and that citizens would not be buffered as well as they were before. I do not think any judge would care to lend himself to that view. I think the test is on the question of salary. Do the judges receive salaries which could properly be reduced? When we know that members of parliament are receiving a cut which is equivalent in their case to 30 per cent or more, I do not know why judges receiving $5,000 to $15,000 per year should not be cut to the extent of ten per cent. Several hon. members have said that judges have written saying that they would agree to a cut. I submit that that is the answer to the suggestion that we should not tax them. They themselves recognize that they can afford to pay, and that it is proper they should do so. Is that not the answer to the suggestion that their salaries should not be cut? If it is right to accept a proportion of salary from one judge, or from half a dozen, would it not be better to have the contributions uniform? Otherwise we will have a condition which obtained not long ago in connection with a certain member of a legislature in one of the provinces. He made a gesture by rejecting a certain portion of his salary. After he left office the money was not disturbed, until he took advantage of his undisputed rights and asked for the payment of the moneys lying to his credit. I do not say that would be true in connection with the judges or other people who would voluntarily agree to make a contribution, but there would always be that danger, possibly from heirs of a deceased judge. If it is right to do it for some of the judges, or some of them at least think it so, why not make it apply all round?

As regards the lieutenant-governors, as my friend has said, the office of lieutenant-governor is regarded by many people as a high honour, and wealthy men are always glad to take the position. I do not know what the custom is in the east, but in British Columbia our lieutenant-governor does not pay income tax—and the income tax is pretty steep out there and is going to be steeper. Possibly the release from income tax would add very considerably to the admittedly small salary that the lieutenant-governor gets in proportion to his expenses. The suggestion has been made that in the case of one man at any rate he would be compelled to resign. Well, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest —and men with more claim to statesmanship than I possess have taken the same view— I would say, let them resign, let us do away with all the lieutenant-governors. I do not apply that to the governor general perhaps, but let us do away with all the lieutenant-governors in this time of financial stress and anxiety. This dominion got along for the greater part of last session without a governor general, and we find that in Ontario they managed to worry along during the recent session without a lieutenant-governor either to open or close the proceedings. No doubt the duty was performed perfectly well by the chief justice of the province. I think it would be a good gesture in these days if we did away with our lieutenant-governors altogether.

As to the army and navy, the Prime Minister in his later remarks pointed out that there was more than a contractual arrangement, that it was a question of enlistment and the rank and file could not resign. That is true. But it could be easily got around by the government making the ten per cent reduction, and if any member of the permanent forces did not approve of it, give him an opportunity to leave the service. So far as making the reduction by "force of arms," so to speak, I do not think that would be right. I speak with some feeling because I was once a victim of something similar at the hands of the ancestors of the government now in power, because it was a Conservative government that cut my pay. I had enlisted with the permanent corps at its certain, agreed wage—a very small one. After some months I was advised that my remuneration had been cut down. Coming from a frugal country that did not strike me as being a fair demand. I put forward the very arguments advised by the Prime Minister to-day, that you cannot enlist a man and then cut down his scale of pay. I went before a board—there were officers galore, the general commanding, colonels, majors and other officers, and I took considerable risk of being put in the guard room for insubordination because I dared to stand on my rights. After a great deal of argument and discussion I was told that I could not get the rate of pay for which I had enlisted. But I got around it in another way.

As regards the suggestion that something might happen here if, as in Britain, we should enforce a ten per cent reduction, why was it said if it was not meant? The suggestion was: Look at what happened in Britain in connection with the reduction in the pay of the navy. I do not do anyone any injustice when I say it was found that the men of that particular grade had had their pay cut to an unreasonable extent, and to an extent far greater than the reduction applied to those drawing much higher salaries. There was good ground for the complaint by the men; but after all it was made in a most orderly way and only as a complaint. If there was not any such implication, why was the point made? The implication there is: "We had better be careful; if we meddle with the pay of the army and navy in Canada some weakness may develop which may imperil our safety." I do not think that is a pleasant implication, and having been a member of the permanent force, I take it upon myself to say there is no danger of any feeling of that kind being generated even if this cut is put into effect. But if there is any such danger, the sooner we find it out the better. If our army and navy are so unreliable that a ten per cent cut in pay for one year in the face of every civil servant in Canada having to take such a reduction, means that weakness will develop, the sooner we find it out the better. But the men of our army and navy have too much loyalty—not in the flag waving sense, but in the real sense of the word—to object to share in a general cut in pay. We have not heard of any letters to the Prime Minister from the rank and file volunteering to contribute ten per cent of their pay, and we do not know whether they have been given a chance to make such offer, but I am sure that no feeling of disloyalty would be engendered by a ten per cent cut—regret of course; but not disloyalty—but if any of them should consider a ten per cent cut improper because they are enlisted men, then give them the opportunity to withdraw from the service. In these days of unemployment I do not think very many would withdraw.

For these and many other reasons, that I cannot now dwell upon, Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope the amendment will pass. The right hon. Prime Minister, said of course he could not accept the amendment. But I do not see any necessity why it should not be accepted in the spirit in which it was put forward by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, the committee must rise in any event before six o'clock as this is Wednesday night. As it is quite obvious that we cannot conclude the discussion, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BENNETT: We propose to take the bills standing on the order paper—the Minister of National Revenue is ready with his bill, then the fisheries bills, and the Secretary of State tells me that his bills are ready to proceed with; then number 13 on the order paper and number 14. That will be the last to be taken up if we finish with the bill now under discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Do I understand that we start to-morrow with the bill we have just had in committee?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. But the order will be subject to change if it is not inconvenient to the house, because the second readings should be proceeded with before we go into committee in order to get those bills out of the way. Then we will take supply in such order as may suit hon. members opposite if we know their wishes in advance so the minister may be prepared with his estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I desire again to say how much we appreciate the Prime Minister's offer in that regard. I think we will be prepared to go on with any supply if he will let us know the day before.

Mr. BENNETT: To-morrow we might continue with pensions, after which the justice department might be taken up and concluded. Then I could take up external affairs.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 7, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury) presented the third report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury) moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

First report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Stinson.

First report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Harris.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I move that the supplementary estimates which have been reported this day by the select standing committee on railways and shipping be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), I desire to lay upon the table orders in council numbers 439, 445, 449, 469, 509, 545, 736, 742, 766, 767 and 772, passed under the authority of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932.

I may say with respect to one of those orders in council dealing with Esquimalt, a question was asked the other day as to whether any new authorizations would be made. This is not a new authorization, but it contemplates $16,000 of an authorized expenditure of $191,000 being expended at this point rather than $31,000 as was originally intended. In other words, $15,000 will not be expended on repairing the dry dock and $16,000 will be spent on the dry dock grounds out of the original appropriation of $31,000, included in the $191,000. It is an entirely new item so far as items are concerned, but it does not increase the expenditure authorized.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): With regard to the tabling of orders in council from day to day, as only one copy is tabled, it is impossible for the different members who desire to see them to have that opportunity. May I suggest to the Prime Minister that they be printed either in the votes and proceedings or as an appendix to Hansard so that every hon. member will have an opportunity to study them?

Mr. BENNETT: That will be a matter for consideration.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do all these orders in council deal merely with the expenditure of money, or are there any passed under the provision respecting peace, order and good government?

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is—and I think I am accurate—there is none of them dealing with other than the expenditure of money, and with respect to money expenditure the basis for all such expenditures except, I think, with respect to the item I mentioned, will be found in the printed report that has been before the house some time. When there is any order in council passed under the provision relating to peace, order and good government, I shall endeavour to direct special attention to it.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

TRUSTEES DEFINED. DISPOSITION OF FINES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42, to amend the criminal code (Trustees defined. Disposition of fines).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The bill is rather a simple one. The first section provides for an amendment to the interpretation clause in regard to the word "trustee." "Trustee" in the criminal code is defined as a trustee appointed under deed, will or other instrument in writing. The amendment is to include trustees who will be named under an act of parliament.

The other amendment is in regard to the application of fines. Generally speaking, all fines imposed, save those in regard to revenue, go to the treasurers of the various provinces to be disposed of as they see fit. There is in the present section a special clause in regard to Ontario allowing certain fines to go to the municipalities. The idea is to put Ontario on the same basis as the other provinces in respect to these fines. The matter was litigated recently and a case went to the judicial committee last autumn in regard to a large fine which was imposed in Toronto some years ago.

Mr. FACTOR: Under the new amendment will the fines go to the treasury of the province of Ontario?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, to be disposed of as the Ontario legislature may see fit.

Mr. FACTOR: It takes away the effect of the decision of the privy council in respect to the Jarvis case and re city of Toronto.

Mr. GEARY: May I ask the minister if the proposed bill is to be made retroactive in any way?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WESTERN RELIEF

Mr. BERTRAND:

1. Were the supplies to relieve the western people purchased by the Dominion relief committee?
2. Were these purchases authorized by said committee?
3. If so, how, where and by whom were they made?
4. How many car loads of supplies were purchased and sent to the west?
5. Were said car loads of supplies carried free of charge by the railways?
6. What was the chief merchandise thus supplied?

Mr. GOTT:

Of Ontario's donations of food to the west, what percentage was sent by the residents of Huron South?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to questions 17 and 18, may I say that the contribution of food made to the relief commission in Saskatchewan and to other portions of western Canada were made without reference to the federal government, and we are not in a position to answer those questions. The relief commission in Saskatchewan was appointed by the provincial authorities. I can give later, if it is so desired, a report as to the number of carloads that were shipped, but I cannot undertake to indicate in detail what the cars contained nor the points at which they originated.

Questions dropped.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO BE INTRODUCED DURING PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask my right hon. friend if he would be able to give to the house at an early date—I would not expect an answer to-day—a statement of any further legislation that is likely to be brought down this session. We have now an indication of the budget resolutions to be considered, and the order paper, I think, contains mention of all other legislation of which we have had any intimation up to the present, apart from what may be based upon the reports of committees. If my right hon. friend could indicate at an early date what if anything in the way of further legislation is to be introduced, I think it would facilitate the work of the house generally.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was looking into that matter to-day. The Department of Agriculture may have two or three bills, one of which I think will be laid before the house within the next day or two, and there may be other amendments of departmental measures from that department. There are also one or two other bills, departmental measures, and of course depending upon the progress of events there may be another measure for submission to the house with respect to which I cannot say more than that it is a possibility. Beyond that, so far as I could ascertain at noon to-day, after carefully considering the matter for some time, while I do not wish to make a definite statement which the right hon. gentleman would not in any event accept, I can only say that so far as I know there is no legislation to be brought down other than that I have mentioned.

The right hon. gentleman spoke of legislation based on the reports of committees. I made clear the other day that further legislation would be introduced with respect to the problems of unemployment and matters of that kind. I gathered from what was said that the right hon. gentleman included that in the measures he mentioned. If he did not, I desire to indicate that on Saturday next I expect that representatives of all the provinces will be here, and that legislation will follow that conference of a character that cannot be wholly determined until such time as we have had an opportunity of discussing the matter with the representatives of the provinces.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUNNYBRAE-GUYSBOROUGH BRANCH LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Railways by way of supplementing a question addressed to him yesterday by my genial friend the hon. member representing Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), lord high admiral of the north Atlantic fleet. I refer to the extension of chapter 34 of the statutes of 1929, under clause one of which the construction of a Canadian National branch line from Sunnybrae to Guysborough was authorized. I trust that the minister will be good enough to arrange for one year's extension of that act. I would also ask if he cannot give us some assurance that work on this branch line will soon be continued and pushed to completion. The road is now seventy-two per cent completed, and as the government is confronted with the problem of unemployment I suggest that here is a splendid opportunity of providing employment, now so urgent a matter.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) has drawn this matter to my attention on other occasions, and my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough also brought it up yesterday.

Mr. DUFF: And at other times too.

Mr. MANION: Yes, certainly.

Mr. DUFF: We are both interested in this, my hon. friend from Pictou and myself. There is no distinction between us in that respect.

Mr. MANION: I was not going to make any distinction between the two as a matter of fact. In regard to the continuation of the construction, that branch line is in exactly the same position as all the other branch lines throughout the country in that continuation of construction depends to a certain extent upon general conditions in the coming months. Regarding the extension of the time for construction of the line which my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough mentioned yesterday, the government will bring in a bill some time this session to extend the time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED LAY-OFF OF SHOP WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways if he can give us any information with regard to the reported lay-off of large numbers of employees in the Canadian National Railway shops. Winnipeg I know is in consternation over the report.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): This question was brought up in the house a couple of days ago by some other hon. member, and I pointed out then that a committee from the shops had been here and had gone on to Montreal and was dealing with the management, in whose hands, of course, rests this whole matter. I was advised by Mr. Hungerford to-day that the management are still dealing with the committee and they are hoping to get some sort of an arrangement which will be more satisfactory than the original proposal. That arrangement, of course, is a matter between the management and the committee, but like my hon. friend I trust that the result will be better than the proposal contained in the original statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I state to the minister that I have had representations from both Edmonton and Stratford as to large numbers of railway employees being summarily laid off at both these cities, and the representations are to the effect that numbers of these men will become a public charge unless in some way arrangements can be made to have them retained at least on part time. I hope that the minister is bringing that phase of the situation before the railway company.

Mr. MANION: I brought that phase to the attention of the railway company some weeks ago because it had been brought to my attention—I do not exactly remember how—that a lay-off was likely to happen, and at that time the officers of the railway indicated that large numbers would have to be laid off. I suggested to them that in view of the unemployment situation they should endeavour to keep on as many employees as they possibly could, and their final proposition which was published in the press last Friday contemplated the laying off of only about half the number originally proposed to be laid off according to the statement of the railway officials to me. The men themselves agreed to a shorter working week, and the company decreased the number it proposed to lay off. But the committee is still negotiating with the management. I presume that Edmonton and the other point mentioned by my right hon friend are in exactly the same position as Winnipeg, and that whatever decision is arrived at in regard to Winnipeg will be applicable to the other shops throughout the country.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I heard the answer given by the Minister of Railways in regard to the completion of the Sunnybrae-Guysborough branch line. Do I understand the minister to say that so far as he is concerned he does not know whether this construction will proceed or not? Can he not give an answer to the effect, that it shall proceed?

Mr. MANION: I have already answered the question of my hon. friend from North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) a couple of times, and the situation with regard to the Sunnybrae-Guysborough branch line is the same as that of all other branch lines. The management under present financial conditions do not recommend going ahead with construction of any branch lines, but providing conditions improve they may change their recommendation.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is a very good answer. Thank you.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I would ask the Minister of Finance if a cheque to cover the dominion share of the municipal expenditures incurred in British Columbia in connection with relief work,—the order in council for which was passed on March 2, has yet been sent; and, if not, when such moneys to cover the dominion's share of municipal expenditures will be sent?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The money was sent by wire I think on Monday last, very early in the week, at all events. In fact, it was the first money that was forwarded after the bill received the royal assent.

NEW ZEALAND TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he expects to give the house any information on the New Zealand treaty?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, I expect to.

Mr. JACOBS: This session or next?

Mr. STEVENS: This session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Following the question that has just been asked, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if it would not be possible to make some official statement before we resume the debate on the budget because the New Zealand treaty is necessarily a matter of which many of us would like to make mention at that time.

Mr. STEVENS: I could not say definitely. We are awaiting some further word from New Zealand.

PETROLEUM AND NAPHTHA INSPECTION

The house resumed from Monday, April 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. 20, to amend the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act—Mr. Ryckman—Mr. Tummon in the chair.

On section 1—Tests of petroleum.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was last before the committee I was troubled by some matters which appear to be cleared up in the general statute, chapter 159 of the revised statutes of Canada. First, I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to clause 2 of the act, the interpretation clause, subsection (j), where specific gravity is defined. As mentioned by the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly), it is quite true that these tests were taken at about 60 degrees. From section (j) I read the following:

> "Specific gravity" means the weight of any fluid as compared with the weight of distilled water, both being at the temperature of 62 degrees by Fahrenheit's thermometer, the barometer standing at thirty inches; and specific gravity is expressed by stating in pounds and hundredths of a pound the weight of a gallon of the fluid compared or to be compared.

There is a schedule attached to the act, which defines the mode of testing, and specifies the pyrometer. Following the specifications for the pyrometer or testing apparatus are directions for applying the flash test. These directions are very minute, and they show how important it is that the temperature should be given every attention. For instance, if the room be too cold the temperature must be brought up; if it be too warm it has to be lowered. The amendment proposes only that there shall be a change in subsection (b) of section 10. There are three subsections in section 10, and all must be complied with. If I may be permitted I shall read the three clauses in section 10. They are as follows:

> (a) If, when tested by the pyrometer described in the schedule to this act, at a lower temperature than eighty-five degrees by Fahrenheit's thermometer, it emits a vapour that will flash; or,
> (b) if it weighs more than eight pounds and seventeen hundredths of a pound per gallon; or,
> (c) if it weighs less than seven pounds and seventy-five hundredths of a pound per gallon.

As we are aware the suggestion is that the seventeen-hundredths of specific gravity should be changed to four-tenths. Section 10 has been in the statutes for a long time; I know it was in the revised statutes of 1886. As has been certified this change can have no deleterious effect, and the effect may be beneficial. The temperatures are settled by the act through the clauses I have given.

While this matter is of a somewhat technical nature I hope hon. members will feel they understand the proposal, that it is only a minor change in the specific gravity arrived at by the test prescribed in the act itself in accordance with the schedule.

BOARDS OF TRADE ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 3, to amend the Boards of Trade Act.

He said: The sole amendment made by the Senate is to this effect, that representatives to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce may be appointed by the council of the several boards of trade, as well as at the annual meetings of those boards. After the bill passed this chamber the boards of trade throughout Canada made representations to the Senate that as the section then stood the necessity of appointing representatives at the annual meetings of all boards of trade should be obviated, and that these representatives should be appointed in the alternative either at the annual meeting or, if not then appointed, by the council of the board of trade. Representations were made to me while the bill was in committee in the other chamber, and I thought at that time the amendment was well advised. It is for that reason I now move concurrence.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 4, to amend the Patent Act (as amended).

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Tummon in the chair.

On section 1—Conflicting applications: notice to applicants.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I may say that since this bill passed its second reading it has been considered by a special committee of this house. I do not think any committee could be more patient than that committee has been in hearing the representations made by those interested in patents, and especially by the representative patent lawyers of the country. The bill is reported with amendments, and the entire committee concurred in the amendments suggested.

The first section of this bill deals with conflicting applications for patents. Formerly such patents were referred to arbitration under section 22 of the Patent Act. In 1923 parliament passed an amendment to the effect that, after arbitration proceedings were initiated, either party to those proceedings might apply to the exchequer court for the determination of the conflict, and that thereupon no further proceedings should be taken by arbitration. The result has been that in order to obtain access to the exchequer court arbitration proceedings have necessarily been begun, which were very expensive to the prospective litigants, and then, after considerable expenditure had been made by the one or both parties in preparation for the arbitration, on the application of one of the contestants, the whole case came within the jurisdiction of the exchequer court. After thoroughly considering the matter and in the hope of avoiding these circumlocutory proceedings and obviating expense for applicants for patents who could ill afford to bear that expense, the committee has unanimously adopted the proposed amendments to section 22. Some changes were made, but section 22, as now expressed in section 1 of this bill, has received the unanimous approval of the committee, and I think I may say the unanimous approval of all the experts who appeared before the committee. I therefore move that section 1 be adopted.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Invalid claims not to affect valid claims.

Mr. CAHAN: This section is important in this respect. It has been held by our courts that in an action for the infringement of a patent, if there were one valid claim in the application and several which were invalid, effect would be given to the valid claim. But the contrary is true if the action is one in which a patent is sought to be impeached. The committee concurred unanimously in this section, which abolishes any distinction between the two kinds of action. The section now provides that in any action or proceeding respecting a patent, whether it be an action for impeachment or for infringement, which contains two or more claims, when one or more of such claims are held to be valid, but another or others invalid and void, effect shall be given to the patent as if it contained only the valid claim or claims, so that all of the issues in the controversy before the court may be decided by the court. I move adoption of the section.

Sections 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 27, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Tummon in the chair.

On section 1—Provincial analyst.

Mr. RYCKMAN: This section deals with the administration of the act and is important from the viewpoint of the department. However, I do not think there can be any difference of opinion as to the working out of the provisions. This section defines a provincial analyst as follows:

> "Provincial analyst" means any analyst appointed by the government of any province and having authority to make any analysis for any public purpose.

The new words are those which are underlined in the section. I might explain that at certain points throughout the dominion there are analysts, who have not been appointed directly by the provincial governments but who have received authority to make tests and analyses. This section will permit the services of these analysts to be used in an official capacity.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Power to refuse or suspend licence.

Mr. RYCKMAN: This section will permit the minister to give to the commissioner of excise the power to sign revocation of licences to brew beer. At the present time this takes up considerable time of the minister. It has been the practice that where a person has been convicted of selling liquor without a licence, should he possess a licence to brew beer, it is immediately revoked. I think this work could well be entrusted to the commissioner of excise.

Mr. LAPOINTE: None of the functions covered by the section to be amended are important?

Mr. RYCKMAN: It is true that this section transfers ministerial authority to an administrator, but I think I have stated correctly the character of the authority involved.

Mr. EULER: The authority granted by this section is analogous to that given to the commissioner of customs in connection with seizures.

Mr. RYCKMAN: This is similar only, if I may say so, in a lesser degree. Where conviction has been made for an infraction of the liquor laws of the provinces, it has been our practice to cancel any licence held by the offender.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Recovery of penalties.

Mr. RYCKMAN: This is a matter of administration and I can best explain it by reading the note. It is as follows:

> The section as it stands provides for trial of excise offences before a judge of a county court, or before a police or stipendiary magistrate or any two justices of the peace. There are other functionaries vested by the provincial legislatures with the powers of two justices of the peace, e.g., the chief magistrates of Prince Edward Island, but who do not come within any of the classes specifically described above. Doubt has arisen as to whether such persons have jurisdiction to try offences under the Excise Act, and it is thought expedient to confer such jurisdiction upon them specifically.

This is merely an effort to arrive at uniformity of administration.

Sections 4 to 13 inclusive, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are nearing the fifteenth of the month when in the ordinary course certain expenditures will have to be made, and if the house is agreeable I should like to ask for interim supply. Of course, this can be done only by unanimous consent and if it is obtained I shall move that you, Mr. Speaker, do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply to consider certain resolutions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What will be the amount of interim supply requested? I understand it is to be one-sixth of the total.

Mr. RHODES: We are asking for one-sixth with the exception of certain special items, where we are asking for one-quarter. This is necessary if we are to function smoothly in the matter of the payment of our accounts. The new system of accounting requires that money must be voted and available in order to be ear-marked before commitments are made. The special votes in connection with which we are asking for one-quarter are Nos. 35 and 36, covering the Senate and the House of Commons. When the Senate and House of Commons are in session we are at the peak of our expenditure in connection with these votes. With respect to vote 45, experimental farms, we are asking one-fourth for that as well, because this being seeding time, it is the time of year when the largest experiments in the department are made. We are asking the same with respect to vote 186, geological survey, mines. At this period of the year the parties are leaving for the field and they must be placed in funds. Many of them live in remote areas not near to banks, and they must take actual money with them. Under our new system of accounting where there is no opportunity of switching accounts or of utilizing other funds, as was the case in the old days, when perhaps one-twelfth might suffice, the vote must be available in full. Another item is 207, care of patients under the Department of Pensions. This vote is very heavily called upon at the present time. It is an item which is largely uncontrollable and doctors' bills are flowing in from all parts of the country. The overhead at this time is therefore particularly heavy. Item 209 is for pensions. This is for pay and allowances of ex-soldiers in the hospitals. Vote 210 is for unemployment relief, pensions, and vote 211 is operating expenses, pensions. One smaller vote is for the Commercial Intelligence branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce. These total amounts we are asking for under the division of one-quarter aggregate $2,236,407.85, as against the sum of $33,108,718.84, which represents one-sixth. I merely mention these figures to indicate that the amount we are asking for as one-fourth is relatively small compared with the total amount asked for.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Some of the items which my hon. friend has just enumerated have not been discussed at all. It is customary to obtain from the government the assurance that if such interim supply is passed it will not be taken as in any way committing the house to any one of the items nor in any way prejudicing the full discussion of an item and its ultimate rejection if so desired.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so; it is distinctly and clearly understood that it is without prejudice to the full rights of the house to discuss these items in extenso.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst), to take the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A great honour.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Ernst in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: When last evening I stated the order of business for to-day I was not aware that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) proposed to take interim supply to-day. Had I known, I would have mentioned it.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $33,108,718.84, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1933, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1933.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $2,236,407.85, being one-fourth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, namely, votes Nos. 35 and 36, Senate and House of Commons; No. 45, Experimental Farms; No. 186, Geological Survey; Nos. 207, 209, 210 and 211, Pensions and National Health; and No. 286, Commercial Intelligence Service, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1933, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1933.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. RHODES moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Ernst in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1933, the sum of $35,345,126.69 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 43, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1933.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS IN 1931

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No 40, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of securities to be issued under the Canadian National Railways Financing Act, 1931, No. 2.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Ernst in the chair.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEBTS DUE TO THE CROWN

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25, respecting debts due to the crown.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if it would suit the convenience of the house, I would suggest that, without committing ourselves to the principle of the measure, we go into committee. I have particularly in mind the circumstances that objection has been raised by some of the provinces. There is no desire on the part of the government to attempt to enact legislation which does not carry the judgment of the provinces, and if that objection is pressed to any extent, we can amend the bill accordingly in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Ernst in the chair.

On section 1.—Deduction of sums due the crown out of moneys due or payable by the crown.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minister has foreseen the objection that would be raised on behalf of some of the provinces. I think I can speak for that of Quebec. They claim, and I think they are right in submitting, that it would not be fair for the government of Canada to retain either the whole or part of the subsidy to be paid to the province as a compensation for any debt or alleged debt, due to the crown in the right of the dominion by the crown in respect of the province. The subsidy is due in virtue of the constitution and some debts which may be claimed by the government of Canada from the provinces would not possess the same status as the payment of the subsidy. For instance, when, I think, my hon. friend was premier of Nova Scotia, that province strenuously objected to the dominion keeping the subsidy due to the province under the constitution, because of a claim that the dominion thought it had against the province for payment of certain militia expenditures in connection with a strike.

According to the civil law of Quebec, two debts may be compensated when they are equally due; they are demandable and liquidated. I do not think a claim of the character of the one I have mentioned and others of the same nature ought to be offered by the Dominion of Canada in compensation to prevent the payment of a subsidy. I would ask my hon. friend to strike out from the bill the mention of debts due by provincial governments.

Mr. RHODES: As the hon. member for Quebec East knows, I anticipated this objection and I have a rather intimate knowledge of the circumstances to which he refers. Of course in that case I should say this, that at that time the account was in dispute. We took rather exceptional ground that the attitude of the federal authorities was very high-handed. I thought that then and I still think so. In this case I have nothing of that sort in mind. I do not believe it is right and fitting that the dominion should attempt to interfere in any event with the subsidies; those are sacred things and they must be paid.

I shall, however, give a case which arose the other day where one of the provinces—I shall not mention the name—was in arrears in a very substantial amount in its obligations to the federal treasury, and at the same time it was pressing us for payments on pension accounts which it had sent in. It is manifestly unfair that a situation like that should not have some remedy applicable to it. The object of this bill was an entirely different one, as my hon. friend fully realizes. It was more largely concerned with individuals and in that case I do not think any exception can be taken. I would therefore ask my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, to move that section one be amended by striking out the words "provincial government" in the second line.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move accordingly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was going to ask the minister whether it would not be possible to include municipalities in that amendment. I do not know just what relationships may be existing between the dominion government and the municipalities, but in connection with some of these relief works in which the dominion, the province and the municipality are cooperating, it may very well be that the municipality may get behind in its payments, and in such a case I would not like to think that the dominion government would hold up any subsidy to the province—I know, of course, that no subsidy goes direct to any municipality—because of any sums that a municipality might be owing. Would it not be possible to exempt the municipalities?

Mr. RHODES: There would be no objection if the danger my hon. friend has in mind were to arise, but as a matter of fact the municipality would be in an entirely different position from the province because, in the first place, we pay no subsidies to municipalities. In the second place, my hon. friend had reference to money coming to municipalities in virtue of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. There again we have no contract whatsoever with municipalities, our contracts being entirely with the province.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why put in the municipalities?

Mr. RHODES: That would place us then in the position of an individual or corporation who were debtors on some other account to the dominion, a matter entirely different. I would not anticipate a case where this legislation would be exercised if an account was in dispute.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 8, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would the minister say what the amendment is?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The amendment made by the Senate gives the right of appeal in case of conviction under the clause. I see no objection to a man having the right of appeal under those circumstances.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 30, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Ernst in the chair.

On section 1—Moratorium on annual representation work.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is annual representation work?

Mr. MURPHY: It is the work required to be done each year by the holder of a mineral claim. After a miner records his claim he is required under the act to do one hundred dollars' worth of work or else pay one hundred dollars in money each year until he obtains final title.

Section 2 agreed to.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Ernst in the chair.

On section 1—"Drug" defined.

Mr. MacLAREN: These amendments are being made to the act so that it will conform with the regulations which were adopted at the Geneva Narcotic Convention held in the year 1931. The amendments are few in number; they affect neither retail druggists nor physicians. As wholesale druggists are affected they have been consulted in the matter, and have raised no objections to the proposed changes. While the retail druggists are not affected they have been informed regarding the changes. I might explain that clause 1 is to broaden the definition of the word "drug." Not only can it be made in the natural way, but if it is prepared by a synthetic process it comes under the definition of the word "drug."

Section agreed to.

On section 2—"Opium" defined.

Mr. McGIBBON: I should like the minister to give the committee a definition of some of these terms.

Mr. MacLAREN: I must refer to the act, if I am to do that.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Liniments, ointments and other preparations excepted.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is cannabis sativa?

Mr. COTNAM: I think it must be ultra vires.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think in Quebec the term is cannabis sativa, the vowel "i" in the word sativa having the sound of the vowel "e". Hitherto this was a drug which was not included in the list which might be used. It is one form of the drug used in India which, I believe, goes under the popular name of hashish. Probably hon. members have read about it. There is no objection to the use of it, and therefore permission will hereby be granted for its use.

Mr. NEILL: I thought the minister said this bill did not apply to retail druggists. I find this section refers to retail druggists.

Mr. MacLAREN: I hope the report does not show I said it had no reference to them; certainly I intended to say that it did not affect them. If the hon. member will read the explanatory notes I think he will find my statement is correct. In them I find the following:

Such necessary changes do not in any way affect the medical profession or retail druggists in this country.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Neglect to keep records.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should explain this section, because it is rather important, and has special reference to codeine. While codeine may be sold by retail druggists without registration, if it is imported in wholesale quantities it must be registered. The change is for the purpose of checking up the proper uses of morphia and codeine.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. BENNETT: We will proceed with supply, Pensions and National Health.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are we not to proceed with item No. 11 on the order paper?

Mr. BENNETT: It will have to stand until Monday. Some information I am seeking I have not yet received.

SUPPLY

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Ernst in the chair.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada, $451,284.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister the figures in regard to the actual cost in the first place of the Board of Pension Commissioners, in the second place of the pension tribunals and in the third place of the Pension Appeal Court?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I am endeavouring to get that information for the hon. member. In the meantime I am prepared to answer any further questions in this connection.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to delay the committee, but it seems that the matter of pensions is one to which this house and country must pay attention. I received information from the Board of Pension Commissioners the other day, and from it I learned that at that point there are 23,900 applicants for pensions, that in the pension tribunals there are 2,650, and before the appeal court there are 1,316, making a total of nearly 30,000 applicants for pensions to-day. I think it is quite apparent to everyone in this house that at the rate those cases are being heard they will never be disposed of in the history of man. Those applicants are dying all over the country, and they have not yet been given an opportunity to be heard. Parliament in its wisdom, or its unwisdom, gave these boys the right to be heard. That right having been granted, neither parliament nor the country is justified in putting any impediment in the way of its being exercised. It is quite apparent that with thirty thousand cases before the tribunals now the machinery is absolutely inadequate to function successfully.

I am going to make a suggestion to the minister—I have made it to the Prime Minister a good many times in the last few years—that we conscript the county judges to hear the cases in the first instance. I see the difficulty of creating more machinery, and I do not think we should do so, because in a year or two we would have a large number of officials on our hands with nothing to do, and the difficulty would be to get rid of them. More than that, we would have difficulty in getting the proper class of men to act. Consequently if we conscript the county judges to hear the cases in the first instance, those cases could be cleared off in about twelve months. Then I would convert the Board of Pension Commissioners into an executive body. Finally I would throw the tribunals and the appeal court together and make the combined body a court of appeal. I do not see why one man should not constitute a court of appeal. Then we could have enough courts to handle the appeals in ten or twelve months and give these men an opportunity to exercise the right that parliament said they should have. I feel we are not doing justice to the men, and we are not doing justice to ourselves, for having granted them the right to be heard, we are not justified in putting any impediments in the way of their exercising that right. I make this suggestion to the minister because I am so thoroughly convinced that otherwise these thirty thousand cases cannot be successfully handled.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I am not in a position to say whether the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) is practical or not, but I should like to join with him in urging that something be done immediately in this matter. I think any of us who have a number of pensioners in our constituencies must constantly be faced with the fact that the machinery provided by parliament for dealing with their cases has not proved adequate, and that there have been delays resulting in a great deal of hardship to those concerned. I hope that something may be done without delay to remedy this unsatisfactory condition of affairs.

Mr. MacLAREN: I presume the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) wished to know the salaries and other expenses in connection with the three courts. Here are the figures:

Board of Pension Commissioners, salaries of staff	$ 339,500
Commission counsel and staff	48,744
Staff in connection with insurance	10,800
Total	$ 399,044

There are other contingent expenses in addition to the figures I have already mentioned, the total being $415,284. The figures for the pensions tribunals for the ten months up to the last day of January of this year are:

Salaries of members	$ 52,405 88
Salaries of staff	103,125 97
Equipment	2,072 54
Telephones, telegrams, etc	1,361 38
Transportation and travelling of staff	53,352 58
Stationery and office supplies	4,473 82
Rentals	276 50
Maintenance and repairs to equipment	139 02
Freight and express	153 17
Miscellaneous	1,265 08
Fees and transportation of outside specialists	27,684 12
Transportation of witnesses	6,737 06
Transportation of applicants	10,531 37
Hospital observation costs	2,109 26
Pay and allowances	3,777 73
Cash advances	4,985 20
Accounts receivable	225 86
Janitors' supplies	13 43

Those figures make a total for the ten months of $274,894.13. The exact figures for the pension appeal board are not here, but the total is about $40,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are the figures for the pension advocates included in any of those totals?

Mr. ARTHURS: I should like, Mr. Chairman, to make a plea for the country doctors who are the representatives of the department in the various country places. These men are paid a certain scale of fees, but only when they are dealing with pensionable cases. In other words, these doctors have men consulting them daily whose ailment perhaps has nothing to do with their pensionable disabilities. I think those doctors should be allowed a small retaining fee of $200 or $300 at least in addition to the ordinary scale of fees, which is most inadequate.

I desire to endorse what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) has said. For many years I was on the pensions committee of this house. At the time the present law was recommended it was practically the unanimous opinion of that committee and of the representatives of the men, the pensioners, that the legislation then proposed would have the desired effect. As a matter of fact it has not had the desired effect, and to-day we find we have the cases of thirty thousand men waiting for decision by the various tribunals. Many of those men will be dead long before their cases are heard. Something should be done to bring these cases to trial at least within a reasonable time.

Mr. MacLAREN: The total cost for advocates is $184,260 which includes the advocates, the registrars and assistants, the head clerks, the principal clerks, the stenographers, the office boys and court reporters.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many advocates are there?

Mr. MacLAREN: Thirty-three.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many commission counsel?

Mr. MacLAREN: Ten.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Mr. Chairman, in common with the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) and other hon. members who have been for some years members of the pension committee, I have been greatly concerned with the present situation of thousands of applicants awaiting decisions on their cases. I am of the opinion that we have about all the legislation we need; I think the act as it stands is a good act and that it fairly well covers the necessities of the occasion, but we run into difficulties when we consider the machinery for carrying out the intentions of the act. I think it may be taken for granted that the people of Canada as a whole, that every hon. member of this house and any government which may be in power is anxious that these men should be dealt with properly. There is complete unanimity in that respect but the people of Canada as well as hon. members of this house have been wondering for a long time why it is that their intentions so definitely expressed have not been put into force. In speaking in this way we are not trying to be critical of the minister or of the government, we are simply suggesting that perhaps it may be necessary to go a little further in simplifying and amplifying the machinery of the act. Perhaps in an attempt to be solicitous for those who are deserving of pension and to see that no one not deserving shall slip in, we have made the machinery too cumbersome for its purpose. As stated by the hon. member for Muskoka, there are in the neighbourhood of 30,000 applicants awaiting consideration, many of whom have been waiting since the time the act came into force in 1930.

Mr. ARTHURS: And some before that.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes, and some before that, although I am speaking of the applications made under the new act. That is a long time for men to wait who are rapidly sinking into premature old age or who are hopelessly ill.

I have discussed the suggestions made by the hon. member for Muskoka with the hon. member himself and with others. I am not quite certain that his suggestions are the best, but I have not heard any others which offer any improvement. After all, there is a body of men scattered throughout the country who, on the whole, hold the respect of the people for their knowledge of law, their ability to sift evidence and their honesty and fairness of purpose. Whatever we may say about the salaries paid, we all agree that our judiciary is a body of men which can be depended upon to give fair opinions and decisions. Although they are not trained in this particular act, which is very intricate, they are properly trained in the sifting of evidence and even though the most of the evidence offered in these cases is of a medical character, the judiciary has had certain experience in the consideration of this type of testimony in the trial of civil damage and other suits.

It is obvious to all of us, and particularly to those who have been working on pension matters from year to year, that hundreds of these men are losing not only hope for the future but confidence in the country for which they fought and which promised to look after them. They are losing confidence in the legislation by which this country has endeavoured to carry out its promises. When the committee met a couple of years ago and evolved the present machinery it was thought it would be fairly ample for every contingency, that the cases would be handled with reasonable expedition and that there would be very little accumulation by this time. It is obvious that the committee was mistaken and that the machinery, effective though it may be within its limits, is not able to cope with the tremendous accumulation of applications which has occurred. Humanity dictates that we must supplement the present machinery with something else which will prove effective but, as the hon. member for Muskoka has said, we must not set up a tremendous machine to employ hundreds of men which after the accumulation has been taken care of will constitute a problem with which this country will have to deal. The suggestions offered may not be the best, but I would impress upon the minister and the government the need of immediate attention to this matter. If no other suggestions are put forward, it is due to this house and to the men chiefly interested that the suggestions which have been offered should be weighed and considered in a careful and sympathetic manner.

The minister may remember that twelve months ago I spoke in this chamber in connection with a particular case, that of a man by the name of Martin. The minister was good enough to interest himself in this case which was expedited so far as a hearing by a tribunal was concerned. This man had his hearing months and months ago but, as is the case with nearly every favourable decision, his case was referred to the appeal court where apparently it has been buried. In the meantime, the man is sinking rapidly. Such action is not fair to the man and it is objected to by all his friends. These people know his condition; they attended the hearing at the tribunal and having heard the decision, took it for granted that the man had won his case. The delay in a final decision has created a very bad feeling among all those with whom he was acquainted. This man's case is typical of hundreds and thousands of other cases.

I say now, as I have said before, that I am not in favour of the present provision which permits an appeal on the part of the commission from a favourable decision by a tribunal. The men who meet the applicant face to face are able to size him up, and I have always held that they are best able to decide, from their personal impression of the man, whether or not his case is a just one. I have felt that the final authority should lie somewhere, and I have regarded the tribunal as the logical body in whom it should lie. The law provides otherwise, however, and to some degree it has resulted in protecting the treasury. But to a greater degree it has increased the delay and the cumbersome nature of the machinery. I would suggest, therefore, that when the proposal of the hon. member for Muskoka is weighed, those judges, if they are appointed, or whoever is appointed to look after the matter, should be given some power of finality, so that when they have heard a case it will not be merely the disposition of one stage of the proceedings, simply piling up in greater numbers cases that must be finally disposed of subsequently. If appeal from their judgment is necessary something might be done along the line suggested by the hon. member, which was in effect this: that the present members of the pension tribunals might be utilized as judges of appeal, divided into several courts of perhaps three members in each. These experienced men who are now engaged in the work might then form a sort of enlarged appeal court by means of which the whole matter might be expedited. Every man in this chamber and in the country as well has in mind the absolute necessity of dealing with this question and dealing with it in time to be of some good to the men for whose benefit the act was passed. I am not speaking critically; the mistake was mine as well as every other member's, because I took part in the committee in setting up this machinery, and my hopes have been frustrated, as have the hopes of every other member of that committee. It is obvious that it is not the fault of the minister or of the government itself. The fact is that the machinery we set up, under the conditions in which we set it up, was inadequate to meet the situation. But the situation must be dealt with, and lacking a better suggestion—and I for one am prepared to accept any suggestion from any quarter which might meet the situation—I would urge that this proposal that has been made be not turned down without the most careful and sympathetic consideration.

Mr. GRAY: I rise to make a plea on behalf of the returned soldiers who are applying for pension in the smaller centres. I had not the privilege of hearing the address of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), but I gather from the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), that he suggested something about county judges having jurisdiction over the matter. I had hoped to discuss that very subject when we were last considering this question. Like the hon. member for Red Deer, I have no fault to find with the legislation; but I do find fault, as the returned men themselves find fault, with the machinery which has been set up under that legislation. That machinery is too cumbersome. We did not realize exactly the extent to which applications for pensions would be made, and now we find that in the smaller centres the men are not having their cases heard by the pension tribunal. The minister the other night intimated that the members of the tribunal are working at full capacity, and I have no doubt that he is correct; but may I cite one specific example which I am sure is typical throughout Canada. In the county of Lambton, in the city of Sarnia, no tribunal has met although for over a year, as I am informed by the Canadian Legion, some twenty-eight or thirty cases have been waiting to be disposed of. It is true the tribunal have met in London, but all the cases they can handle there are those from the county of Middlesex and the city of London, and it is recognized pretty generally that they are unable to sit in the various county towns throughout the provinces. For this reason returned soldiers throughout the dominion find that their cases cannot be heard, while, as pointed out by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), men are dying and going to their graves without the relief that was promised by their country and in the legislation itself when it was adopted.

I submit that in order to speed up the matter some additional machinery should be created. To this end I was going to suggest the appointment of the county judges. With all respect to them, I submit that in the majority of counties, especially in the smaller county towns, the county judges are not overworked, and I am sure that they would undertake the work without extra pay. This would obviate any additional expense to the government, and the judges would be able to administer the act just as well as any tribunal; for after all it is only the administration of a statute. As the hon. member for Red Deer has pointed out, the judges are used to hearing evidence and they would know the various applicants who would come before them. Everything considered, we should be able to clear the decks and have justice done the soldiers. In addition to that, may I point out to the minister that it would be, in the end, a real economy to the country. It may be said that there are some centres where the county judges are overworked and therefore would be unable to deal with the situation. In such centres an additional county judge might be appointed for the duration of the act. I suggest, therefore, that the members of the tribunal be left to sit on cases as they are now doing in such centres as Toronto, Windsor and the larger places, but that in the smaller centres—in the county I have the honour to represent and in the large majority of other counties—some action be taken to expedite the proceedings and to see that the returned soldiers shall get a square deal through the administration of the act.

I am not complaining of the act, nor am I finding any fault with the minister; what I am complaining of is the machinery under which the act is administered. May I suggest also that in the smaller centres the pensions advocates are not giving, in the preparation of cases, that assistance which they should. To some extent this is no doubt the fault of the men themselves; but it has been my experience, and no doubt the experience of other members of the house, that the great bulk of the work has fallen upon the shoulders of the Canadian legion, who are doing it gratuitously in their spare time. They are working without any remuneration but merely in the hope that their reward will be the granting of pensions to those men whom they are helping. In the majority of cases, members of the legion or, where this is not so, others who are patriotic enough to assist in the preparation of cases, are doing the work. I do not think that is fair, and rather than pay large salaries to advocates I would suggest that in those centres some allowance might be made to the men of the legion and others of that sort who are giving valuable assistance.

I do urge the minister to see that the work of hearing applicants be speeded up. I am sure that anything that may be done to bring this about will meet with the unanimous approval of all parties in the house, and I urge upon the minister and the government to consider it. I gather from the remarks he has made in reply to the hon. member for North Battleford and others that it has not been definitely decided by the government not to introduce legislation this session. Let us have it in ample time, and if it is intended merely to establish additional machinery I am sure that we on this side of the house will support it.

Mr. McINTOSH: It would appear to me that as regards the northern part of Saskatchewan, at least the part I represent in the Commons, two main difficulties confront the returned men. One is in regard to those who are on the land and I intend to say something about that later on when that item comes up. The other is in regard to the pension question that we are now discussing. I asked the minister, I think twice this session, whether the government was considering the matter of bringing down new legislation in connection with returned men, and I think the hon. member for Red Deer also asked the question once, but so far the minister has given the answer simply that the matter is under consideration. In other words, no definite answer is given and we do not know in the Commons, and I am satisfied that the returned men throughout Canada have no idea as yet whether anything is to be done this session or not. My conclusion, from the answer of the minister, has been that we are not going to have any new legislation this session. If I am correct in that assumption, I think the returned men throughout Canada ought to know about it. The government ought to have its mind made up by this time whether it is going to do anything in the way of ameliorative legislation this session or not, and if not, the quicker that fact is known, the better; there is no use in delaying it.

Apart from that there is the question of the act. I think the act is all right or about all right. The administration of it is the difficulty. Some think we have too much machinery; some think we have not enough, and others think we ought to add to it. Thousands of cases are waiting to be settled; progress is not taking place as it should and the returned men are becoming very much dissatisfied. I was wondering whether the minister could not have a conference with the pension board, the tribunal and other bodies to discuss the whole situation in an endeavour to arrive at some conclusion whether the suggestions made here to-day can be acted upon, whether anything can be done to improve the administration of the act, and thus hasten the hearing of those thousands of cases that are at present clogging the administrative machinery.

I appreciate the answers the minister has given me so far. I know he occupies a difficult position. I know the problem requires thought and perhaps the government's mind has not as yet been made up, but I believe in the interests of the returned men throughout Canada they ought to know whether they are to expect anything in the way of legislation this session. They ought to know this at once. It is very important that anything that can be done to hasten the hearing of all these cases should be done, because I know in the North Battleford riding we have many cases that have not yet been heard, and the returned men there are not very well pleased. They are working hand in hand with the legion and all the other soldier organizations to get action. I have done my best to cooperate with them apart from politics at all, yet many cases have not been settled and as has been mentioned here this afternoon, if they are not settled soon the men will pass away and redress will be impossible. I would therefore be glad if the minister, while we are in committee on this question, could deal with one or two of those phases in such a way as to send out at least a note of encouragement to the men throughout Canada who are expecting redress and who so far have not received it.

Mr. GERSHAW: I desire to mention just two difficulities with which I have met in connection with this legislation. I well realize that the committee who drafted this legislation hoped it would meet the situation. It was hoped that the judges who actually saw the applicant for pension and who heard the evidence which he and his witnesses gave, would be the final judges as to whether he should receive a pension or not. Great disappointment has been created in many instances where, after a case has been worked out and a favourable decision obtained from the tribunal, it has been found that the government advocate has appealed the case and then, after long months of waiting, that the appeal board has turned it down on some technicality. I know there are many cases before the appeal board, but this has been a very disappointing feature in connection with the working out of the legislation.

There is also the old difficulty of diagnosis. If a certain diagnosis is chosen, it might be worked on for months or years and finally there might be disagreement in regard to it. It seems too bad there is not some judge who could give a man a pension either on the diagnosis chosen or for whatever his trouble is or whatever the judge thinks it is. It is unfair that these men should be denied the privilege of pension through no fault of their own, but simply because of a difference of opinion as regards diagnosis.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to say a word in support of the general idea of some effort being made to speed up the work of determining whether men are entitled to pension or not. From my observation it would seem to me that if the present plan is followed, many of these men will go to their graves before we or the country will know whether they are pensionable cases. In the portion of northern Ontario in which I live, I know of cases where I have been making every effort I could, where the Great War Veterans have been doing the same thing and where the Canadian Legion are constantly trying to bring cases to trial, so to speak, but where men have been waiting for two years or more, ever since the last legislation was passed, and do not seem to be any nearer getting before a tribunal than when they started.

The statement made yesterday about tribunals going into certain districts and spending a day hearing certain cases and then going on to another district, is true so far as northern Ontario is concerned. I know of men who have been notified that a tribunal would be in a certain place on a certain day and who have travelled a hundred miles to be there that day, only to find, just before their cases were to come up, that the tribunal had moved on to another place. I believe if the proposal of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, which was supported by my hon. friends opposite, whereby district court judges could be conscripted for this work, were adopted, it would facilitate at least the primary part of the work and send the men on, if necessary, to a court of appeal. These judges are men trained in taking and weighing evidence; the applicant comes before them for a pension; the medical officers are there and they are in a position to decide, I think as carefully and accurately as any group of men who could be found anywhere. Surely the country has an obligation to say to those soldiers: You are or you are not entitled to receive a pension. The fact that we are now fourteen years from the conclusion of the war and that there are still some 26,000 or 27,000 applicants for pensions whose cases have not been heard and who have no idea when they will be, does not speak well for the administration of the act. Whether the county judges are the right ones or not will, I presume, be for parliament to decide, but certainly some steps should be taken to bring this matter to a conclusion and let the country and the returned men know who are entitled to pension and who are not. The cases are becoming so long drawn out and the dissatisfaction which is being created is such that one can hardly express the feelings these returned men have for what seems to them to be a deliberate neglect of what they look upon as an inherent right to have their cases thoroughly examined and a final decision made.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I should like to make a few observations relative to the working out of the present pension legislation. First I should like to make it very clear that so far as I have been able to ascertain there is no disposition on the part of the ex-service men to blame anybody in particular because of the present delay. The facts are, as hon. members of the house who were then present, are well aware, that in 1930 the whole matter of pension legislation was reviewed by a committee of this house. That committee in conjunction with representatives of the ex-service men worked out amendments to the then existing legislation with a view to solving the question. That the legislation has not worked out as well as anticipated is not a matter for blame of the government or of the ex-service men or of the members of the committee. I think it is conceded by all that the pension legislation passed in 1930 and as amended in 1931 had in view facilitating the hearing of claims for pensions and their adjudication, but in the working out of that legislation certain defects have become obvious. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister not in any critical mood but as the result of considerable inquiry from the men who are involved and from the officers of the various organizations representing the men.

As far as I have been able to ascertain, the present congestion occurs at two points; first, before the Board of Pension Commissioners. I believe that to-day there are before that board approximately 23,000 cases. The number was greatly increased by reason of the amendment introduced in 1931, which had the effect of referring back to the Board of Pension Commissioners all those cases which had previously been refused by them. The reason for the referring back was because of that provision which is ordinarily known as the benefit-of-the-doubt clause, which was introduced in 1931. I am not going into that in detail because it is familiar to all who have studied the question. But as the result of that 1931 amendment there was referred back to the board cases which they had previously dealt with to the number of 15,311. Since the passing of the 1931 amendment more than 14,000 cases have been dealt with by the Board of Pension Commissioners, but there stand unadjudicated to-day more than 23,000 cases. At the present rate it is estimated that it will take years and years to adjudicate upon the cases already before them. Pension applicants making application to-day find that even with the machinery operating at maximum speed it will be years before their case can be determined.

As to the steps that should be taken to alleviate the congestion at the initial point, I am not going to elaborate. I understand that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has made certain suggestions. I feel that the minister and the department are fully seized of the situation, and to put it in a plain, frank way, I think it is up to the department to work out some method, whether it is the method suggested or not, whereby the hearings before the Board of Pension Commissioners can be speeded up, and speeded up very considerably.

So far as the tribunals or the secondary courts are concerned, my opinion is that they are getting on very well indeed and that at the present time they are not in any sense congested. They are able at the present time to take care very comfortably of the cases that come before them, but in view of the fact that so many of the cases heard by the tribunals and decided in favour of the applicants are appealed on instructions from the Board of Pension Commissioners, we find congestion again before the appeal court, and there is the place where the present congestion is most marked. I have in mind a particular instance. Individual cases prove nothing perhaps, but this is a case which has been pending since 1927 to which I wish to draw attention. A favourable decision was granted in 1930. The case was referred to the court of appeal. I have investigated the record and I find that the applicant was dealt with very generously by the court of appeal. They found upon going into the facts that in their opinion a favourable award was not justified and they referred the case back to the tribunal, suggesting that further evidence was necessary on certain points and giving the applicant the opportunity to adduce further evidence. That case went back, was heard, and a second decision was given in favour of the applicant. The case was appealed again, on instructions from the Board of Pension Commissioners—I am not saying whether they were right or wrong in doing it—and now it is held up again by the court of appeal. I have visited that court and have looked up their records. There is congestion. But it is not their fault. I think they are doing as much as is humanly possible, but it is not possible for them to hear and determine expeditiously all the cases that are coming before them.

Ex-service men and their organizations, rightly or wrongly, feel that too great a percentage of the cases determined favourably to applicants by the tribunals are being appealed, and therefore delayed. The psychological effect throughout this country is very, very bad. Take the case I instanced. It is the case of a widow. She is at present ill and penniless, living on charity in a third-rate hotel in the city of Winnipeg. There have been two decisions in her favour and yet the matter comes before the court of appeal again and is there awaiting decision.

Mere criticism is of no value in itself unless some suggestion can be made. I draw to the attention of the minister—I know that he has perused it—and to the attention of the house the joint considered opinion of the various ex-service men's associations, presented to the government with certain suggestions. Briefly, their suggestions relative to relieving the congestion in the appeal court are, first, that more care should be exercised by the Board of Pension Commissioners before they order an appeal from a favourable decision by the tribunal. Secondly, that inasmuch as the court of appeal consists of only three members, and the tribunal of twelve, sitting in threes, and in view of the large percentage of appeals coming up from the tribunals to the court of appeal, that court has more to do than it can handle. The suggestion has been made by joint committees of all the organizations that the court of appeal be enlarged—but in such a way as to involve no additional expense in administration—by making available for decisions in review the full membership of the tribunals. Roughly, the suggestion is that the same chairman of the court of appeal be retained, and that the legislation be amended so that the court of appeal may call upon any two members of the tribunal to sit in with the chairman and review cases. If that system were adopted, instead of one court of appeal consisting of three men there could be about fifteen men sitting, and five courts could be in operation instead of one. By that method there would be no additions to the personnel of the present machinery, no increase in the expense of administration, and there would be the advantage of expediting the hearing of appeals. Further, there would be coordination of the work of the appeal court and the trial courts.

Rightly or wrongly the feeling is abroad that there is not proper coordination between the court of appeal and the tribunals, the trial courts. The witnesses come before the trial courts sitting at given centres. Those courts hear the witnesses, observe their demeanour and weigh the evidence. It is a well known principle of law that an appellate court will not reverse the decision of a trial court upon matters of fact—on matters of law, yes, but on matters of fact, no, unless it is obvious there has been a gross miscarriage of justice. In view of the fact that 60 per cent or more of the cases decided before the tribunals in favour of the applicants are appealed, and approximately 75 per cent of the appeals are allowed, there is a feeling that something is wrong, and that through lack of coordination between the two courts a weakness exists. There is a belief that if members of the trial courts were allowed to sit in on the appellate courts they would gain experience both in the trial and appellate divisions, and as a result there would be better administration of justice and greater expedition in the administration of the act.

There are two points for consideration. First, there is the congestion which cannot for years and years be relieved with the present machinery. Secondly, we know of cases which have been heard before the appellate court wherein the applicants have received favourable decisions, and yet because of appeals being filed in the meantime they could get no relief. We know of cases where applicants have received favourable decisions from trial courts. Those decisions have been appealed and the applicants have had to wait six months or a year for the hearing of their cases. In the meantime they may be in want, in destitute circumstances, and urgently in need of medical attention which they do not receive. I may receive the answer, "Oh well, ultimately the appeal court will decide in their favour, and the decisions would be retroactive." The answer is that many of them die in the meantime, and many others suffer hardships. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, although I know the minister is endeavouring to do everything within his power, and that these matters are constantly in his mind, I earnestly urge upon him to consider, not at another session but before this session closes, the making of certain amendments to the existing legislation which will expedite the hearing of cases.

Mr. ROSS: I think the hon. member who has just taken his seat has laid his finger upon most of the sores in connection with this matter. Probably I would do well to review the progress which has been made at various times in an endeavour to satisfy the returned men. I think all people are convinced, when they look at the large sums of money which have been spent in an endeavour to give the returned men satisfaction for the sacrifices they made, that there has been no great effort to economize.

The procedure we have known for years and years arose from the formation of the Board of Pension Commissioners. That body had absolute control in the matter of the pensions of ex-service men. All men who have served know about the activities of the pensions board. As time went on there was a feeling, first that the actions of that body were arbitrary; secondly, that cases were heard in camera, and that the men who gave decisions concerning the eligibility of applicants to pensions did not see the applicants. Because of that condition the board of appeal was formed, and the two organizations I have named worked for some years. But as the hon. member who has just spoken has said, there was no coordination or cooperation between or standardization in those two bodies. There was a feeling that jealousy existed between them, that they were working contrary to and criticizing each other.

Then we came to the committee of 1930. When the statement is made that ex-service men are dissatisfied, the reply might be made: "Well, this is your own legislation." I should like to say, however, that in the committee of 1930 every attempt was made to keep free from partisanship. The legislation under which we are now operating is the result of an endeavour by the returned men to wipe out difficulties and get away from dissatisfaction. Consequently, arising out of a decision of a meeting of returned men in Regina, the suggestion was made that tribunals be formed, and that they be empowered to sit on cases after they had been heard by the Board of Pension Commissioners. Then, the court of appeal formed the third court. So that no matter what government was in power, and no matter who may have been the minister, undoubtedly there was the greatest endeavour to give satisfaction.

Here is where the difficulty arose: Throughout the meetings of that committee we were constantly informed that the Board of Pension Commissioners were overburdened, and were unable to deal adequately with the applications. But what happened? The legislation not only placed upon the Board of Pension Commissioners all the burden they already had, but sent back to them all the cases that had been commuted and all the cases that had been dismissed. It was pointed out in committee then: If the Board of Pension Commissioners are overburdened at the present time, how in the world are they going to function when this additional burden is thrown upon them? It was my belief at that time—and I did not support the legislation; the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) stood with me—that this was bound to fail. In short, you were going to plug the machinery right at the beginning. And it has turned out just as we predicted. I am afraid we are again in this position, that we are not getting cooperation between the Board of Pension Commissioners and the tribunals. It may be that one is too hard and the other is too easy, but there is no cooperation. You have two courts reviewing cases. The Board of Pension Commissioners review each application. They do not say, "We dismiss the application." They just simply say in their letter, "We do not grant this." Then they add, "You may take this now to the chief advocate of the tribunal." If there was some cooperation and the reason was given why the application was refused, it would save a whole lot of reviewing and would give the tribunals a better opportunity to go on with their work. But imagine the position. Here is legislation directing that the case be reviewed thoroughly by the Board of Pension Commissioners. They do not grant the application, therefore the case goes to the tribunal. It is taken to the tribunal by the advocate. Someone says the advocates do not work. I differ absolutely with that statement; they do work. But the advocate has got to go through the mill with the case, and when he is satisfied it is ready for hearing it is brought up. A little bit of standardization of opinion would save all the delay. Suppose it was announced: "We have sat on this case in camera; now we will throw it open and submit it to the tribunal." I do not think "tribunal" is the appropriate title. In my opinion the apt title would be "travelling pension board." If this travelling pension board were part of the Board of Pension Commissioners, the men would not be disposed to appeal their cases, for there would be something definite, something determinate in the way in which they were dealt with. What happens now? The man goes through the mill again with his case, his eligibility is established, and he goes away quite satisfied that he is going to get his pension. Then within ten days he gets a notice, "Your pension is appealed." No reason is given for this action. I have taken up one or two cases and asked the reason for appealing them, but without getting any satisfaction. Apparently it is just a matter of routine. Does that occur in only a small proportion of these cases? No, I am told the appeals run as high as eighty per cent of the cases dealt with. There is the cause for dissatisfaction, that after going through two courts the returned man gets a letter saying, "Your case is appealed." He does not know on what grounds it is appealed, nor does the advocate. Every service man knows what a pension board is, and I would keep that title before him. I would change the system so that instead of a court sitting in camera you would have travelling pension boards. Then it is quite clear the number of appeals would be trifling. Our intention at the time the legislation was passed was that the man should have the benefit of this appeal court.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS: That was our thought in the committee of 1930, that the court of appeal we had proposed would be for the benefit of the man. But now he has to go before a third court to fight his case. If the first two courts were pension courts, then of course there would be no appeal, and the appeal court would be what we intended it should be—a third place for the man to have his case reinstated. Let me add, Mr. Chairman, that the committee recommended and this parliament gave the men exactly what they wanted, but evidently some unseen, occult force has upset our plans. When we formed this court of appeal it was the intention that it would be for the benefit of the returned man.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROSS: Instead of that the Board of Pension Commissioners have used it as a court of appeal to the extent of eighty per cent of the cases dealt with. That is the position we are in, and that is the difficulty. We should take the organization and say: "Here, work together, cooperate, coordinate and get this thing settled." I think, if anything, the county court judge would be the best man for the appeal court. I have no objection to the present courts of appeal. They have dealt fairly with any cases I have had before them. In several instances, as has been said, they felt there was further evidence that could be brought out, and instead of giving a decision they sent the case back to the tribunal. In that way I think the present head has shown his hearty sympathy for the returned man. All that is needed is a spirit of cooperation, a desire to work together; but a feeling of jealousy has crept into these courts, and as a result the returned man has suffered.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): May I ask the indulgence of the committee, Mr. Chairman, to refer to one other point? In doing so I may be crossing a bridge that may never be reached. It has been intimated to me that there is a move to change the legislation in this respect, that the tribunals which at present hear the cases and have power to adjudicate and render a decision are to have that power withdrawn, and that travelling boards are to be constituted, boards of inquiry to gather the facts in relation to each application, and then to submit it to the Board of Pension Commissioners for decision. If that be so, I suggest to the minister that any step in that direction would be a mistake. The whole trend of future legislation with a view to carrying out the wishes of those immediately concerned has been, instead of centralizing the matter of decisions in Ottawa, to decentralize as far as possible to the districts in which the men live. In the development of this legislation there have been brought into being the tribunals which sit in given centres and before which the applicants can bring their testimony and discuss their case with the members. The returned men have great confidence in this system and feel that they will obtain the best measure of justice by being face to face with the trial court which is to adjudicate upon their cases. There is a well grounded fear that if the power of adjudication is taken away from the tribunals and they be permitted to act only as fact finding bodies, the applicants will not obtain the treatment expected. I do not say that this action has been mooted by the government but it has been intimated to me on very good authority that it is under consideration, and I take this occasion of drawing to the attention of the minister that any step along this line would be considered as retrograde in character.

Mr. MacLAREN: In a discussion of these matters, practically everyone seems to have an opinion a little different from his neighbour's. I do not blame the machinery so much; if we want to criticize, perhaps we should criticize that special committee of which I along with several other hon. members of the house, was a member. This committee placed so much work upon the proposed organization as to make it practically impossible of being effectively carried out. The fault does not lie with the organization, it lies with the authority which placed an almost impossible burden on the machinery. Certain of the amendments enacted last year did a good deal towards remedying this trouble. I would remind the committee that when the amendments of 1930 were passed there were 19,000 final payment cases given authority to come before the court and there were 6,000 cases before the old appeal board. That did not offer a fair start to any organization or machinery.

I do not think it is proper to try to make the actual facts appear more unfavourable than they are. No doubt there were many difficulties encountered, but I do not think a fair picture of the conditions prevailing has been presented. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Kennedy) has repeated several times that it will take years and years for the pension appeal board to handle its work. I think the facts of the case are against that statement. As I said the other day, in seven months this board has dealt with 14,347 cases. In seventeen months the tribunals have dealt with 6,008 cases and in thirteen months the appeal court has passed on 2,947 cases. I do not think the hon. member referred to that. In my opinion this machinery is working quite rapidly; it is all a question of the number of cases to be heard and providing the facilities for hearing them. The different courts are working industriously and in one instance they are getting on quite rapidly. I do not mean to convey that there is complete satisfaction with the result, but I think the true facts present a different aspect from that attempted to be given by hon. members.

Hon. members interested in these matters should go down to the department and see it in operation. They should meet the officials and discuss the different aspects of this matter. I suggest that this would be to the mutual advantage of hon. members and the department.

One hon. member has stated that no court has been held at Sarnia. I am sure if this had been drawn to the attention of the officials the error would have been rectified, although I am of the opinion that there is probably some good reason for a court not having been held. Another member referred to the fact that a tribunal had sat and then moved on before a certain applicant could present his case. I venture to say that a proper explanation can be given for this. The itineraries of these tribunals are arranged several weeks ahead in order that witnesses may be gathered together, and if a man should arrive too late, the court must move on in order to keep its appointment somewhere else. If the hon. member will give me the particulars in this connection, I shall be very glad to look into the matter.

The suggestion was made that the judges of the county courts should handle these cases. Hon. members have expressed opinions for and against this suggestion, and I shall at present not offer comments. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) has stated that there should be cooperation, coordination and standardization. Hon. members should not be of the opinion that the members of the courts do not consult or cooperate. I encourage them to do so, and, irrespective of my encouragement, I know they do. I do not say that they do it so constantly, because there is some difficulty when men are scattered throughout the country. But that point is not lost sight of.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SANDERSON: No. I would ask that you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Tummon in the chair.

Mr. SANDERSON: When the committee rose at six o'clock the minister was making some observations arising out of the discussion this afternoon. A few nights ago, when we were in supply on this item, I made some brief remarks and I want to repeat some of them. In my dealings with the minister he has always been very kind and patient, gone to a great deal of trouble and taken a personal interest in any matters I have brought before him, and I do not want him to think my remarks are at all critical. My only desire is that out of this discussion will come, if not this session—and I hope it will this session—perhaps next session some amendments to the Pension Act to overcome some of the difficulties and defects that have been found since the amendments have been added, I have also nothing critical to say in regard to any official of the pension board, the tribunal, the appeal court or the department.

Mention was made this afternoon of the special committee that sat in 1930. I think the personnel of the committee of 1930 was practically the same as that of the committee of 1928, and most of the hon. members who spoke this afternoon were members of both those committees. In passing I should like to remark that the committee of 1928 and that of 1930, in recommending amendments to the Pension Act, made an earnest and sincere attempt to frame those amendments in the light of the evidence placed before them. This afternoon the hon. member for Kingston City mentioned the fact that almost everything the representatives of the legion and of other ex-service associations suggested, was carried out and embodied in the amendments made to the act in 1930. I think the greatest difficulty which the committee had at that time, and which appears to have been the bone of contention in regard to granting pensions ever since the inception of the act, that thousands of ex-service men had been discharged on demobilization without medical examination, and that many had been discharged with a medical examination which was not very thorough, I do not lay the blame for this entirely on the authorities of that time, because when the men returned from overseas they were all anxious to get out of the service and back into civil life, and I believe many returned men at that time, for that reason, hesitated to say they had any disability. Those who were in charge of the administration of the act from the time of its inception to 1928 before the first committee was formed, and again up to 1930, were confronted with the situation that the great difficulty which lay in the way of a returned man receiving a pension was the fact that it was impossible for him or anyone else to prove absolutely that his disability, no matter of what sort it might be, was traceable to war service. The amendments were framed largely for the purpose of overcoming this problem so that the returned man, if he could not prove by medical authorities that his disability could be traced to war service, would get at least the benefit of the doubt and, if possible, a pension would be awarded to him.

From my observation of the working of the act since 1930 in connection with quite a number of cases that have come under my notice, I have reached the conclusion that the returned man does not always get the benefit of the doubt, as was intended under the amendments. In some cases it is perhaps more difficult now to prove that his disability can be traced to war service than it was before the amendments were added in 1930. If this objection could be overcome, I do not think there would be much criticism of the Pension Act. The trouble seems to me to be that we have too many boards or courts. We have first the Board of Pension Commissioners, second, the tribunals, and then the appeal court. In many instances where a returned man comes before a tribunal and the evidence is brought out, the verdict is that he is eligible for pension. He leaves thinking he has won his case and he is at last going to receive a pension. But that does not always happen; for the reason that the appeal court, which has not seen the man as the tribunal has, reviews the evidence and reverses the decision of the tribunal, the result being that the man who thought he had been granted a pension, does not receive it. That is a difficulty which should be removed. some method ought to be worked out whereby the intention of the amendments as added in 1930 in regard to giving the returned man the benefit of the doubt, may be made clearer and workable.

In connection with the act as it stands there are many other matters which in my opinion are not working out to the benefit of the ex-service men. I well remember that in the committee of 1930 the hon. member for Kingston city took the stand—and I do not think he had any supporters; I am free to confess that I did not agree with him—that the whole machinery with regard to pensions would be clogged; that it would not work. As time has passed his judgment has proven to be correct: there is a clogging of the machinery making it very difficult for the returned man to secure a pension. He may be out of work, as in many instances he is; he may have a wife and family depending upon him, and he is kept waiting for months and even years. I have in mind two cases that came under my observation, where the applications for pension were made before the Board of Pension Commissioners, one in September, 1930, and the other in November, 1930. In both cases the decision of the Board of Pension Commissioners was that the men were not entitled to pension. Both those cases were handed over to the tribunal, but they have not yet been heard and they go back to 1930. Surely that should not be. There should be some method whereby those cases could at least be heard and disposed of, favourably or otherwise, without that length of time elapsing. We have in this country many men who have made applications for pensions and have been turned down, and that condition will continue to exist. Apart altogether from the justice of their cases, whether they are entitled to a pension or not, the whole machinery should be speeded up. I made that suggestion to the minister the other night, but from his remarks this afternoon I do not think that he took it seriously. The other night he gave the committee the number of cases that had come up, the number of cases pending, and other information in that regard. I know there is a tremendous number of cases pending, and thousands and thousands of cases which have not even come before the pension board yet. It is a well known fact that many men returned from overseas apparently physically fit, but as the months and years went on, some disability developed which they claim is due to their war service. That condition will continue, and if there is any way in which the minister and his department and the government can work out some amendments to the act to accelerate the machinery, I think I can assure him that if those amendments are brought down even this session he will receive the most sympathetic cooperation from this side of the house.

I would appeal to the minister to take into consideration, I will not say the criticism, but the suggestions that have been made this afternoon in regard to the working out of the Pension Act. I know that the minister is sympathetic. I know that he has a very heavy department to administer and that at times it may be difficult to satisfy the claims of returned men, but if he would give this matter some attention, I think with his officials he would be able to work out some solution which would improve the condition that now exists.

The hon. member for Kingston this afternoon mentioned another matter. He thought that there was not the proper cooperation and coordination between the pension board, the tribunal, and the appeal court, and he mentioned especially the lack of cooperation as between the tribunal and the appeal court. It may be so. I have no knowledge of this, but the hon. member for Kingston as a rule speaks of things of which he has full knowledge, and he must have some information which bears out the remarks he made this afternoon. No hon. member who sat in this house three or four years ago will deny that at one time there was a lack of cooperation and coordination between the pension board and the appeal board of that day. That was proven, I think, before the special committee on pensions that sat in the session of 1928. This is a matter which should receive the attention of the minister, and if it is one of the difficulties that is keeping ex-service men waiting, not only for months but for years, to get a hearing, the minister should take action to remedy it without delay. I feel satisfied that he will, and that he will be able to work out some solution of this very difficult problem. It is a problem that has grown with the years and will continue to grow. I do not think that this country will be able to reduce to any material extent its expenditure on military pensions for the next fifteen or twenty or perhaps thirty years. My own opinion is that the number of applications and the expenditure for pensions will continue to increase.

The suggestion was made this afternoon by some hon. members that a solution of the difficulty might be to have the county court judges hear the pension cases. They may be right, but I do not think so. I am not in favour of that suggestion. I do not think the county court judges should be asked to take up this work. I think rather it should be done along the present lines, but the difficulties that now exist should be smoothed out.

I will mention a matter on which I dwelt for a moment or two the other night. The travelling tribunals when they visit certain places to hear cases do not clear up all the cases they have on their docket. Notices are sent out to returned men that their applications for pension will be heard at a certain place on a certain date, and they travel perhaps many miles to get to that place with the expectation that at least their cases will be heard. But the cases are not all heard. There may be ten or twelve cases on the docket and only three or four or five may be heard, and the men whose cases are not heard have to go back home without even knowing when they will have another chance to have their cases heard.

Mr. MacLAREN: They may have not been sent for. Unless they are prepared they should not come.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am speaking of cases where the men have been sent for, and where their cases have been prepared for them by the pensions advocate, and where they have been notified by mail to come, with transportation sent to them in many cases to the place where the board is sitting. They are notified to be there on a certain date and that their cases will then be heard.

Mr. McGIBBON: Considering that these bodies are working as hard as they physically can and that there is now an accumulation of thirty thousand cases to be heard, with more coming in all the time, what is my hon. friend's solution for the difficulty?

Mr. SANDERSON: One solution that occurs to my mind now would be for the tribunals to make their docket lighter. Do not load it up with a lot of cases to hear in one or two days which they cannot possibly finish in less than six or seven days.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am afraid the hon. member did not get my point. With thirty thousand cases to be heard it is absolutely a physical impossibilty for the present tribunals, the pension board, and the appeal court to handle them if they worked twenty-four hours a day. What is my hon. friend's solution for that difficulty?

Mr. SANDERSON: The solution I suppose would be that the machinery and staff should be enlarged, which would entail more cost to the country.

Mr. McGIBBON: And in two or three years you would have to dismiss them.

Mr. SANDERSON: That would be an easy matter. We are dismissing civil servants all the time.

Mr. McGIBBON: You would not get good men to take the job just for a year or two.

Mr. SANDERSON: I do not agree with my hon. friend from Muskoka on that. I am sorry we do not agree, but I should like to ask him this question: Does he think it is fair that returned men should be notified to be at a certain place to have their cases heard, and, after waiting two days, not have them heard?

Mr. McGIBBON: I agree that is not fair.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am glad we agree on that.

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like to have the names of those men, because I should wish to have investigations made.

Mr. SANDERSON: I will send them to the minister to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to say a few words, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MANION: I wonder if the hon. member would allow me to speak first. Like the hon. member for South Perth who has just taken his seat, I was on the committee. It is well to point out, as did the hon. member for Kingston to-day, that the scheme put into force in the year 1930 was formulated by the soldiers themselves. My hon. friend knows that.

Mr. SANDERSON: I mentioned that.

Mr. MANION: Yes, probably so.

Mr. SANDERSON: And I said all their suggestions were carried out.

Mr. MANION: I remember that the hon. member for Kingston made a proposal which, in the newspapers, was called the Ross scheme; the other was called the Power scheme, because it was introduced by the chairman of the committee. I remember clearly that some of my colleagues and I supported the scheme put forward by the hon. member for Kingston, and I have a clear recollection of being waited upon by a number of officers and soldiers who told me they were opposing anything like the Ross scheme, and that they adhered strictly and continually to the scheme which with the unanimous approval of the committee ultimately was put into effect.

I mention those facts because I believe it is well to keep them before us. In other words, the members of that committee, who came from all parties in the house, did everything they could at that time to put into force the scheme requested by the soldiers themselves as a result of their Regina convention. I was told at that time that their action was a result of the convention, and I believe I was correctly informed. Beyond that, it is well to remember that before this government came into power a vast amount of money had been spent for pension purposes. There had been an expenditure of about $47,500,000. Considering that immense amount of money, it is well to remember that the total national revenue of Canada before the year 1900 never amounted to $50,000,000. I mention that fact merely to indicate the immensity of the undertaking before us. It is not always as easy to deal with a question as one might believe. I think the hon. member for Muskoka has said, and the statement has been made this afternoon on several occasions, that 30,000 cases are awaiting attention. I am informed by the officers now sitting in front of the minister that the number is only 23,900, and that includes cases which are not at all serious. There is no use making the condition any worse than it really is. I am informed by one of the officers in front of me that a few days ago a soldier who had served only one day applied for a pension.

Although mentioning these facts, I am not trying to indicate that there is no room for improvement; we all know there is. Last year we made improvements, and they had been made before; but it seems to me we shall be making a mistake if from year to year we continue to change the act. I mention these facts as one who was a member of the old committee. I believe my hon. friend from South Perth served at that time, but I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was in the house then. Certainly all parties in the house put forth an endeavour to satisfy the soldiers to the greatest possible extent.

Mr. SANDERSON: I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: Probably we went the absolute limit, because hon. members will recall that an election was at hand, and all parties were anxious to give satisfaction.

Mr. SANDERSON: I quite agree with the minister.

Mr. McGIBBON: I cannot let the minister get away with that. May I say that I pride myself in the accuracy of my statements. Although I have sat in this house a good many years I never had to withdraw any statement I had made. Irrespective of what the officials have told the minister, I must say that the figures I am about to give came to me a few days ago from the secretary of the Board of Pension Commissioners. Although I have given them to the committee already, I feel I must now repeat them. The number of applications on hand by the Board of Pension Commissioners on February 29, 1932, was 23,900. On the same date there were 2,650 applications before the pension tribunals, and before the appeal court there were 1,316. If those figures are incorrect I cannot be blamed; I took the time from their clock—they gave it to me. Those figures were supplied by the Board of Pension Commissioners, and I submit, sir, that we should take as correct the figures we get from officials of this department. I know the gentlemen sitting in front of the minister dispute my figures, but with all due respect to them I think statistics supplied by the Board of Pension Commissioners are more reliable than statistics supplied by them.

Mr. MANION: I have asked the officers of the department now sitting in front of the minister, and they adhere to the figure of 23,900. They say, however, that there are a number of cases now being dealt with by the appeal boards which are not included in that figure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, I do not regard this discussion as being in any way a waste of time. I think the joint intention of hon. members who have participated in this discussion is, if possible, to improve the administration of the pension scheme. One of the finest notes in the whole discussion is that not the slightest tinge of partisanship has been displayed by any hon. member who has spoken.

The hon. member for Kingston to-day gave a very able résumé of the history of the pension legislation in the Dominion of Canada. Many hon. members in this house will recall the first struggle which took place in the years 1919 and 1920 through the organized veterans' organizations to have important amendments made to the pension legislation. They will recall the work that was done by parliamentary committees sitting from year to year. Finally, as a result of recommendations made by a parliamentary committee a royal commission presided over by my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth was appointed. That commission went throughout Canada and heard evidence. As a result of their report legislation was passed to form the federal appeal board, and a system of soldiers' advocates. That system was not considered to operate as people thought it would, and in 1930, as the result of the work of a committee of that year, the present act was brought into effect.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said this afternoon that there were two flaws in the present administration. I agreed with him as far as he went. I am convinced of one thing, that the first defect in the present administration resulted from the amendment passed in 1931. That amendment was excellent, to a certain degree, and will, in time, operate to the benefit of ex-service men and the nation. The flaw in it, however, in my opinion is that it has placed upon the Board of Pension Commissioners a task which they cannot efficiently carry out. I am convinced, from personal observations, that to-day the pension board is trying to carry out a task which is really beyond its powers. The first remedy—and I am speaking in the most friendly way to the minister—if we are to keep in force the amendment of 1931, is if possible to enlarge the Board of Pension Commissioners so as not to have the system glutted at the outset.

The other evening I spoke about the pension tribunals, and so far as my observations have gone I must say these gentlemen have carried out their duties in a most exemplary manner. As far as the province of British Columbia is concerned—and this part of my remarks might possibly be political—I have nothing but commendation for the minister because of his choice of the two distinguished gentlemen he has appointed from our province to carry out the work of the pension tribunals. I do not believe that in the entire province you could find two gentlemen who are better qualified for carrying out this very important work. If the personnel throughout the rest of Canada is of the same standard it is of a very high order indeed.

This afternoon the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray), complained that the tribunals did not visit the small centres. My hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) suggested in a very constructive sense indeed that some of the powers for the secondary review might very well be bestowed on the county court judges. This, I think, is well worth consideration by the minister. For some fifteen or sixteen months we have trained twelve able officers of the pension tribunal. By their decisions, some of which have been upset by the appeal court, they must now have a very intimate knowledge of the Pension Act, and I believe they are thoroughly competent to deal impartially with any cases which may be brought before them, and that they will give the returned soldier the benefit of the doubt without imperilling in any appreciable degree the security of the treasury. I have always had the suspicion that the ultimate tribunal is inclined to be influenced by too careful consideration for the security of the treasury as against the merits of the case affecting the returned soldier.

I wish to object most strenuously to the system of commission counsel. I believe the officers of the pension tribunals can be depended upon to render a fair and impartial verdict in regard to every service case that comes before them. Now the minister has got twelve men trained in this work, and he might very well allow each one to form a pension tribunal. This would give him twelve courts instead of four, which would go some distance towards meeting the point made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario and the hon. member for West Lambton.

Mr. MacLAREN: We have six divisions now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then he could have two apiece for each court. That would enable the smaller centres to be visited, and the grievance in this respect would be immediately remedied.

My experience is that the main grievance of the ex-servicemen to-day is twofold. In the first instance, there is the delay in dealing with the case of the successful appellant which has been appealed from the pension tribunal to the appeal court of Ottawa. In the second place, there is the system of having a commission counsel lodge an appeal against the successful pension applicant. I think it absolutely contrary to all the accepted canons of justice and equity that an official under the direction of the Board of Pension Commissioners, the court of first instance, should himself direct the appeal from the decision of the gentlemen of the pension tribunal—who have seen the applicant and, as was said by an hon. member this afternoon, have studied his demeanour and have heard all the evidence—to a body down here who can only refer to the record of the case. As I say, I am convinced that even if your tribunals to-day were your ultimate court in regard to pensions, the treasury would not suffer to any appreciable degree. Then there is the delay here in Ottawa after the successful applicant has his appeal launched by the pension advocate. You have the machinery clogged throughout the three stages. I urge the minister to enlarge the personnel of the board as I have suggested, which he could do without incurring extra expense. I may tell him that they are far more sympathetic towards the cause of the returned soldier than they were nine or ten years ago. That may be due to the threat of appeal machinery hanging over their heads. If you enlarge the machinery of your court of first instance, if you make one member of the pension tribunal a quorum to hear appeals in the country, and if you take away from the commission counsel the power of launching appeals in the appeal court, I am convinced that the thirty thousand cases to which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred will be disposed of within eight or ten months, with resultant satisfaction to the many ex-servicemen throughout the dominion.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any information as to whether the Board of Pension Commissioners in the past have used detective agencies for the purpose of securing information about applicants for pensions prior to the time of their enlistment?

Mr. MacLAREN: I have no knowledge on that point. I do not know that I thoroughly follow what the hon. member is asking.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Perhaps the minister will allow me to answer. There have always been what are known as social service investigators, who do make investigations with respect to the applicant's family history.

Mr. GARDINER: Has it been the practice of the pension board to employ detective agencies for the purpose of obtaining information with regard to the applicant for a pension prior to the time of his enlistment?

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot say as to employing detective agencies, but I can quite understand the pension board would investigate the early history of an applicant for pension whenever they thought it necessary. The early medical history might have a very direct bearing upon the man's disability.

Mr. GARDINER: Would it be necessary, for instance, in the case of a man claiming a pension for an injured arm or hand to make such an investigation? I can quite understand that in cases of certain diseases such an investigation might be necessary, but not for a physical injury.

Mr. MacLAREN: I would say it might be necessary to ascertain whether the loss occurred previous to enlistment or not.

Mr. McGIBBON: The man could not enlist if he had lost an arm or a hand.

Mr. MacLAREN: Presumably a man might enlist although he had one eye or imperfect sight. I can understand that in some cases it is necessary to investigate a man's condition previous to enlistment.

Mr. McGIBBON: Surely, Mr. Chairman, the minister must have a lapse of memory. A layman's opinion with respect to a man's sight previous to enlistment would be absolutely worthless.

Mr. MacLAREN: That is not at all what I had reference to, Mr. Chairman. I say it may be necessary to investigate a man's past medical history.

Mr. GARDINER: I had a case brought to my attention the other day which seemed to me to be rather extravagant. The Thiel Detective Agency of Montreal was engaged to find out something about the applicant prior to enlistment. In this man's file there is a report signed by T. A. Lawson, acting general manager of the Thiel Detective Agency. The person whose history was to be investigated, the man who was applying for pension, had an injured left hand, and the board had supplied him with certain casings to put over that hand. The investigator began his work on April 2, 1924. He left Ottawa, went to Toronto and then to Collingwood, and came back to Ottawa again. On May 14 he went to Regina, then to Moose Jaw, then to Caron, back to Moose Jaw, again to Regina, then to Prince Albert, to Shell Brook, then back to Moose Jaw, to Mossbank, then to Cranbrook, British Columbia, to Fernie and finally back to Ottawa, arriving here on June 6. When the matter was brought to my attention it did seem to me that the Board of Pension Commissioners must have been pretty hard up to find an excuse to avoid paying a pension to a man whose hand was injured through war service.

Mr. MacLAREN: I might suggest that the proper course is to furnish me with the particulars so that the case may be looked into. Each case should be explored thoroughly in order to see what can be said on each side.

Mr. GARDINER: I suppose this file will be available to the minister if I discuss the matter with him some time?

Mr. MacLAREN: Certainly.

Mr. NEILL: Since the matter has been introduced I should like to say a word or two on this question of investigators. I have no objection to the ordinary investigator who goes around and asks a man about his occupation, his ability to work, or his income, or who asks the man's employer these questions, but I do not like the way some of these men do their work. As my hon. friend from Acadia has mentioned, the department does not hesitate to spend quite large sums of money in investigations of this kind, and I know of one case in which an investigation was carried out in the old country and brought forth evidence trying to show that a certain injury had been caused eleven or twelve years before the time alleged.

I do object to the procedure followed in one case which came to my knowledge. The question largely turned upon whether or not the man was deaf previous to a certain occasion, and one of these industrial investigators, or whatever they call them, was sent around to make an inquiry. He did not go near the man; he did not tell the man he was making this investigation, nor did he tell the people whom he interviewed that his inquiry was of vital importance to the man in question. I will not say he snooped around, although that word was used; I suppose he was carrying out his duties to the best of his ability. He would go to a little town; he would go to the grocery store and ask the proprietor, "Do you know John Smith"? The answer would be yes, and then he would ask, "Is he deaf"? The storekeeper would answer, "I do not know; I never noticed it. I do not think so." That would go into the record, and that was the procedure followed right along. The investigator did not tell the persons he interviewed how important the matter was to the soldier; the soldier himself had no opportunity of hearing this evidence, but when the matter came up for decision that man lost his case largely because there were several foolscap pages of evidence of a similar kind. I was told that if I were given an opportunity of seeing this damning evidence I would not have been dissatisfied with the decision of the court, but I put this to the minister: If this man had been accused of a crime would evidence obtained in that way have been used against him? Of course it would not. The people would have been sworn and they would have been confronted with the accused. But because he was a soldier asking for a pension, that sort of evidence was accepted. Surely that is carrying this investigating business too far. I objected at the time and I still object. If we are to have these courts, with two government counsel against one counsel for the soldier, surely the inquiry should be conducted in a legal way and evidence which is not given under oath should not be accepted.

Mr. MacLAREN: May I correct my hon. friend in his statement that two government counsel are employed as against one for the soldier? That statement has been made before, but it is not so. Two government counsel do not appear as against one advocate for the soldier.

Mr. NEILL: There are never two counsel for the government?

Mr. MacLAREN: Not in the same case.

Mr. NEILL: Possibly I am wrong, but in any case that is a detail which has very little bearing on the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In the beginning there were two counsel, for purposes of training.

Mr. NEILL: I can give the minister particulars of the case, if he wishes them.

Mr. McGIBBON: I am glad to hear the minister say he would like particulars of these furnished to him, but I ask him now what good it will do. I have a case that was turned down by the court of appeal; I think judgment was signed by Judge Hyndman. The man has a cardiac condition, with rheumatism and arthritis, and he is absolutely incapable of doing anything to-day. It was absolutely proved that his condition was due to war service, but in their investigations they got a positive reaction to a Kahn test for syphilis, and on that ground Judge Hyndman signed judgment depriving this man of his pension. That test is not specific; any medical man knows it is not definite. You will get it in connection with many other diseases. This soldier was a respectable man; he absolutely denied ever having had that disease, but even if that had been true it could have had nothing to do with his disability. The judgment was absolutely absurd and ridiculous to any man with any knowledge of medicine, and through that judgment this man lost his pension. I do not hesitate to say that I could submit that evidence to one hundred medical men, and that one hundred per cent of them would say he was unjustly deprived of his pension, but what recourse has he? If I give the minister the evidence will he say that he will correct this injustice?

Mr. MacLAREN: Would you repeat your question?

Mr. McGIBBON: If I submit the evidence to the minister will he correct this injustice?

Mr. MacLAREN: This gives me an opportunity to say a word to many hon. members who perhaps do not fully understand the working of these courts. I have nothing to do with the pension board; it is my duty to allow that board to form its own judgments without interference, especially as the minister could not possibly know all the circumstances of the case. That is also true with regard to the tribunal and the appeal court. In a judicial way these bodies are independent of the minister, as they should be, and so I take that attitude. What I said to my hon. friend the leader of the Progressive party was that I should lay the files and the information before him. It does not follow that I am going to express any opinion on any particular case, but I will assist any hon. member to the best of my ability.

Mr. McGIBBON: I think the minister is quite right, and I never thought anything else, but his remark might have caused some misunderstanding. The point I am trying to make is this: We have a final court of appeal which has given a judgment which is absolutely absurd and which has deprived a man of what is rightfully his. What recourse is left to that man? He won his case before the tribunal when he proved that his disability was due to the war. That was accepted by the court of appeal, but they deprived him of any benefits because in performing a routine test they obtained a positive reaction for syphilis—a reaction on a test which is not specific and final and which is obtained in many other diseases. And the man absolutely and positively denied having this particular infection. There is a case of rank injustice. The judgment was signed by Judge Hyndman of the court of appeal. Now the man is down and out and cannot earn a dollar; he is a cripple.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under the meritorious clause, how many cases have been submitted to the Board of Pension Commissioners since the amendments of 1930, and in how many of them has decision been rendered?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am afraid I have not the numbers here; I believe I stated that there were thirty-seven applications and one hearing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As a matter of fact, there were forty-seven applications, roughly speaking, and so far only in one case has decision been given. Surely that is an absolute outrage after eighteen months; in that time decision should have been rendered one way or the other. I know of applications that have been made from all over Canada to the Board of Pension Commissioners, and only one judgment has so far been rendered under this clause. I cannot conceive the reason for this delay. These are the most urgent cases of all, as a rule.

Mr. COOTE: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a complaint made to me by several applicants for pension who have been ordered to report to Belcher hospital for examination. In one instance the applicant had a bad heart. He was engaged in manual labour, and when he complained he was taken to Belcher hospital, put to bed and taken care of for about a month before the examination was made. If this is the practice that is to be carried out, then I submit that these men have very just grounds for complaint. It is obvious that in most cases a heart affection improves after the patient has been in bed for some time under proper care, and if the returned soldier is to be examined for heart trouble he should be examined the moment he comes in from the country, for that is the time when his heart is bothering him. I know nothing about medicine but I do submit in all fairness that that is the proper time to have the medical examination. After the man has been in bed a month under proper treatment it is highly probable that the doctors will report his heart as normal; then he goes back to work and after a short interval his heart begins to bother him again and interferes with his work. This is one practice which the minister could rectify; he could see to it that when men are sent for examination the examination is made at once. The doctors should see the man under the conditions in which he has to work ordinarily. Will the minister undertake to have the present practice changed?

Mr. MacLAREN: I should like to have the particulars of the case. I shall have to make inquiries first to see whether that is actually the case.

Mr. COOTE: If it is, will the minister see that the necessary change is made?

Mr. MacLAREN: I shall be pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the minister also look into the question I have raised in regard to meritorious cases?

Mr. MacLAREN: After all, what is a meritorious case? It is one who is not eligible for pension—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under the act.

Mr. MacLAREN: Under the act, yes; one who is not eligible under the act but who has done something meritorious or in whose history there is something that warrants the authorities in going outside actual eligibility in order to meet the case. That is on the one hand; on the other there are a great many cases that are waiting, cases that come under the act and that should be taken up first. I understand that the Board of Pension Commissioners takes up first those cases that are pressing; as far as possible they are heard in the order of priority of urgency. There are other cases that come before the meritorious cases, because the latter have no entitlement at the outset.

Mr. COOTE: I did not get the minister's reply to the point I raised. I can assure him that there are several men who have told me that what I have stated has actually taken place so far as they are concerned. When I have an opportunity I shall look up the files, because it can be easily proved. If the minister will assure me that, in the event of his finding what I have represented to be correct, he will put a stop to the present practice, I shall appreciate it.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the hon. member will let me have the names, I shall have the matter promptly investigated and let him know. I think, however, it is fair to hear all the facts first.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I can give the minister a history of a case that occurred long before his time. This was a man in my own neighbourhood, a young chap who came back from overseas with some weakness that caused him to have fainting fits when under heavy work, so that he could not carry on his ordinary job. He looked as fit as a fiddle when he was resting, but he could not do any work; his heart bothered him. I knew nothing about his heart, but at my solicitation he was sent to hospital three times for examination. The facts as I am giving them were confirmed by the doctor. The man was put under observation in a state of absolute quietude, and he remained in bed for some time. While in bed his heart behaved normally—it always did when it was in bed. I complained; I said that, though I was a layman, I did not think it was common sense to examine him under such conditions. I suggested that he should be examined under conditions in which he usually showed his symptoms. Finally, in order to get rid of me, thinking me a nuisance, they said "We will give you authority to have him examined under whatever conditions you suggest." I had him put through a physical test for two or three minutes and immediately his heart action was affected. That was what they said. I can assure the minister of this case because I accompanied the man on each occasion in order that I could verify what he said.

Before six o'clock the minister made three statements, or rather one statement that might be divided into three parts. First, he commented on the difference of opinion among the members and spoke of the consequent difficulty of arriving at any conclusion from what they said. My own observation was that there was unusual unanimity on the part of hon. members as to the best method to be tested out. The minister then said, quite correctly, that the situation which existed was no fault of the different boards, the Board of Pension Commissioners, or the tribunals, or the appeal court, but was the fault of the committee of which I had been a member as well as himself, we had imposed on these bodies an impossible task which we expected them to perform. He said we had placed them in such a position that there was bound to be an accumulation of work, and I heartily agreed with him. But unfortunately the minister concluded with the statement that the situation was not so bad, that the boards were keeping up with their work fairly well, and that there was not so much cause for alarm. May I state what my experience has been—not my opinion, which perhaps is not worth as much as the minister's, considering the position he occupies; he is more closely in touch with affairs than I am, although I have had a good deal to do with the matter. I would suggest that in all that has been said this afternoon and evening, we have been endeavouring to rectify the error which the committee made. We acknowledge we were wrong. Some of us may have disagreed somewhat in the committee itself, but as one of those who agreed to a unanimous report, I am prepared—and I suggest there are others—to rectify a mistake which the minister says we made, in order to take these men away from the impossible position in which the minister suggests they are placed, and to take from them that impossible load which the minister indicates we have placed upon their shoulders.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to ask the minister whether Belcher hospital in Calgary is owned by the government or whether it is leased; and if it is leased, when the lease expires and what chance there is of having this hospital moved to a better location? It is one of the worst locations they could have got in Calgary. It is located on Eighth avenue, the main business street of the city, with street cars running in front of it and a switching track up the lane behind it. I understand it was formerly used for a warehouse and it is a place illsuited for a hospital. If this building is simply under lease by the government, the hospital should be moved to some more suitable location as soon as the lease expires.

[Mr. Speakman.]

Mr. MacLAREN: The lease has something like six years still to run.

Mr. COOTE: What rental is being paid for the building?

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not recall the rental, but it is quite high. It has to run something like six or seven years.

Mr. IRVINE: Some years ago the Alberta legislature decided to offer government house for sale. There were no offers to buy the house, whereupon it was restored as the residence of the lieutenant-governor. I suggest it would be an excellent use of government house to make out of it a hospital for returned soldiers. I shall ask the minister to keep that in mind for the future.

Mr. COOTE: As a final word I should like to say that it would be much appreciated by the returned soldiers in Alberta who have to use a hospital, if the government would see fit to have that hospital removed to a more suitable location.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I regret I have not been present during the entire discussion on this matter, but I should like to make a few observations regarding the operation of the Pension Act. I understand this legislation was brought into existence with the unanimous assent of the house, and that it is not looked upon as a party measure. Nevertheless, almost every one of us realizes that there is a great defect in administration and I want to point out one defect which I think exists in the law and should be remedied. I do not wish to coin a startling phrase, but I really believe the returned soldier, who is an applicant for a pension, is under our legislation treated in a worse way than a man who is charged in our courts with an ordinary crime, and I think I can prove what I say. When a man is charged in our courts with a crime and the court of first instance renders judgment in his favour, a judgment of not guilty, the crown has no appeal; the only appeal it has is against sentence. What is the situation that we find under the pension law? I understand the cardinal principle in the act was that a returned man, an applicant for pension, ought to have the benefit of the doubt; that is one principle that has been enshrined in our legislation. What happens? By law he has in the first instance the benefit of the doubt. He goes before the tribunal and a declaratory judgment is passed in his favour. That is, his case passes altogether from the region of doubt and partakes of the nature of a positive judgment. Then what happens? The crown appeals the case. After that what is the mental attitude of a returned man towards his country? A competent tribunal has passed a declaratory judgment that he is entitled to a pension and the court of appeal wipes out that judgment altogether and claims that he is not so entitled. Therefore when I make the statement that under our present legislation an applicant for pension is treated less fairly than a man charged with a crime, I think it goes without argument that such is the case.

I believe the legislation might be remedied in this way: I understand the returned men asked for this court of appeal in order to protect their rights. This country, once a judgment is passed by the tribunal in favour of a pensioner, ought to stand by that decision, and the right of the crown to appeal should be wiped out of the statute.

I should like to refer to the matter of congestion which exists at present in regard to the hearing of applications for pension. If that congestion is not removed before long, it is certainly going to be disastrous to this parliament and government at the next election. I know the returned men are becoming absolutely dissatisfied; they are wondering what is happening. I should like to make this suggestion by way of an improvement in the existing legislation. Recently we had a debate in the house about the salaries paid to our judges, and I think it was indicated that we have in our population of 10,000,000, more judges than they have in Great Britain and Ireland with a population of 45,000,000. I am not in favour of reducing judges' salaries, but that is another matter; I am in favour of giving the judges more work. I would suggest that the county court judges, in order to get this congestion cleared up, might have equal power with the pension tribunal and for that matter we might give to the service of the returned soldier applicants for pension, two weeks of the long vacation and possibly the first week of the ensuing court session. I make these observations in all sincerity, as a returned soldier, and also at the suggestion of the combined returned soldiers' organizations of the constituency which I have the honour to represent.

Mr. McGIBBON: I should like to ask the minister whether he has decided to take his tubercular cases away from Calydor sanatorium?

Mr. MacLAREN: The answer is no, I have not decided. I think there will not be many going.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then that compels me to make a few observations, Mr. Chairman, and I predicate them upon this, that parliament and the government should keep faith. When they cease to do that, we are in a deplorable condition. That necessitates my going back for about ten or twelve years when a parliamentary committee of this house on pensions requested the government of the day to make an agreement with Calydor sanatorium in the district of Muskoka for taking care of the tubercular patients who are wards of the government. The committee made that request because this institution is one of the best in Canada or on the continent of America, and because they were not able to use it to the extent that they wanted to use it. At that time there were many thousands of patients nominally listed as tubercular but in whose case the final diagnosis had not been made, and consequently they were not drawing a pension. The object of the request was that this institution should be used to make a final diagnosis and clear up these cases in order that they might be properly treated and that those who were illegally drawing full-time pensions should not be allowed to draw them. The people of that institution agreed to the request of the government, and they put up three dollars to every one that the government of the day put up. They increased their staff and overhead expenses, and they have never got the patients to which they were entitled according to the agreement. As a result the overhead and cost of maintenance for the patients was increased even for civilians, and to-day that institution is in financial distress. Probably I should not say that but it is a fact, due to the agreement which they made with the government of this country. They lived up to the letter and spirit of the agreement, but the country did not. The institution never got the patients that they were legitimately entitled to expect, although I do not believe that any number was definitely specified in the agreement.

I am informed by the medical superintendent, Mr. Chairman, that the other day this institution got a letter from the department that it was going to close the whole thing out, going to scrap that institution and leave it with that increased staff and increased overhead expenses. The surprising thing to me is this, that when I spoke to the minister about it he did not know anything about it although the letter that was received by the institution said that the matter was finally settled. Now the question I want to ask the minister is this: Who is running his department? Are the officials going to decide and settle matters of policy and give final judgment without the minister knowing anything about it? If I were minister and an official did that for me he would lose his job the next morning. It is a most humiliating position for officials in a department to decide and settle matters of policy and notify those concerned that that is the end of it without the minister himself knowing anything about it. Over and above that, the point I want to impress on the committee is this, that parliament and the government of the day solicited the agreement with that institution; it was recommended by the pension committee of that day, and the government of the day made the agreement. The institution lived up to the spirit and the letter of the agreement, and as a consequence they have suffered serious financial loss. What I want to ask the minister is this: Is he going to repudiate the spirit of that agreement?

Mr. MacLAREN: So far as that question goes, I do not propose to answer any question suggesting that the minister is going to repudiate anything. I have further to state that my hon. friend has not stated the case correctly. Without delaying the committee I wish to state that I did not make that statement to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. I did know about the matter, and it was not terminated. Conditions were proposed to this sanatorium on the same basis as all the other sanatoria in Canada. The term of the agreement has expired. Further, I am still looking into the matter to see if there is any obligation on the department in honour, if not according to the letter of the law.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would ask the minister to be a little more definite and say wherein I mistated the case.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is very easy. The member stated that I did not know that notice had been sent. I did know it. It was proposed that they continue on the same basis as other sanatoria.

Mr. McGIBBON: All I have to say, and I will apologize if I am wrong, is that when I went in to discuss it with the minister he did not know anything about it.

Mr. MacLAREN: Excuse me, I did.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister said he did not.

Mr. MacLAREN: I must ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. McGIBBON: I am willing to withdraw it if I am wrong, but I had to produce a letter to the minister to let him know what I was talking about. If he knew about it, I would not have had to do that.

Item agreed to.

Care of patients and medical examination respecting pension, $2,200,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister to explain the reduction of $800,000? According to the minister's annual report there were 12,077 admitted to hospital last year as against 9,941 in 1929-30, and inpatient treatment was given to 15,519 as against 12,939 in 1929-30. So that the medical population is increasing all the time in these hospitals. How is this decrease justified?

Mr. MacLAREN: The three million dollars which was voted last year was in excess of the requirements. There was spent last year $2,275,000, which left a balance of $725,000, so that actually it means that we are getting along with $75,000 less this year. I do not know whether that will cover the requirements.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand.

Item agreed to.

Salaries — administrative, $1,333,000; insurance, $35,000; hospitals and clinics, $1,567,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Do the same explanations attach to the reductions in this vote?

Mr. MacLAREN: The ten per cent is a factor.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In connection with the hospitals and clinics?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes, there has been some reduction in staff. The decrease is made up of a reduction in staff, and the ten per cent cut.

Mr. COOTE: How much of this item is for salaries? The item does not make it clear.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is entirely for salaries.

Mr. COOTE: The second section of the item is an expenditure for insurance; is that for salaries?

Mr. MacLAREN: That is in connection with the administration of life insurance on the disabled men.

Item agreed to.

Compensation (pay and allowances), $1,950,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Was the entire amount of last year's vote spent? I notice there is a reduction of $800,000, and I was wondering if the entire amount had been expended. If so how could a reduction take place?

Mr. MacLAREN: The sum of $875,000 was unexpended.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment relief, $1,250,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Who are eligible under that vote?

Mr. MacLAREN: Pensioners who are in need of help, bearing in mind the pensions they are receiving and other means at their disposal. The other day the vote was increased to the extent of $875,000. Last year the vote was $1,250,000, but in the supplementary estimates of two or three days ago an increase of $875,000 was made. During the last year relief was administered during the summer months, a procedure which is not customary. Then, there were more applicants, and the municipalities now direct the men to the department rather than find work for them locally. For those reasons there are more calls on the resources of the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is a pensioner eligible, no matter what the assessment of his pension may be?

Mr. MacLAREN: He is, if it is a small assessment. If it is sufficiently high he does not receive money from this vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is there a fixed percentage?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, he could not depend on the pension. If he received a full pension he would not come under this vote, because his pension would be sufficient. If, however, he received only a small pension his receipts might be brought up to a certain figure.

Mr. VENIOT: What relief can be given to a returned soldier who has applied for a pension, whose case is not decided and who is unable to work or to find work? I understand that no relief is given in such cases, and am wondering if it is not possible to make provision for them. I have in mind two instances where applications have been brought before the pensions board, and in both cases not only are they unable to find work, but if they could find it they would not be able to take it because of their incapacity. These men are literally at the mercy of their friends and neighbours. Both are married, and one has a family of six children. Surely in cases of that kind something should be done, although there may be no authority under the act.

Mr. MacLAREN: The cases described by my hon. friend would come under the civil unemployment relief, but not under the present vote.

Mr. VENIOT: When there is no work for them, what must they do? Are they to starve in the meantime? So far as I know there has been no direct relief provided. There are numerous cases throughout the country such as I have described, although I cite only two from my own county. Perhaps the minister would consult with his officials and see if during the winter months some relief could be afforded. Fifteen or twenty dollars a month would be very helpful in the winter time.

Mr. GERSHAW: Could the minister tell us if this money is actually being spent? I ask the question because I have received communications from two merchants to the effect that these moneys have not gone forward to the needy people.

Mr. MacLAREN: The relief is not tendered in cash, but orders for groceries and coal are given. Cheques are sent to householders to pay rent bills.

Mr. GERSHAW: Have those cheques been going forward? The merchants have been objecting because of the delay.

Mr. MacLAREN: My hon. friend will understand that those payments had to await passage of the supplementary vote for $875,000, and the royal assent, which was not obtained until a short time later. Cheques have gone out.

Mr. McLEAN: How many in the three maritime provinces received relief under this vote?

Mr. MacLAREN: If the hon. member wishes I shall send that information to him; I do not have it before me.

Mr. ROSS: Will the back amounts be paid in cases where assistance has not been given since January? As I understand it, the ex-service man cannot get this relief unless his pension is low. In addition to the pension he receives he is allowed about $4 per week until the sum he receives is brought up to about $60 per month. I understand since January these payments have not been made.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have explained that they were not made because we had not the money with which to make them.

Mr. ROSS: Will back amounts be paid?

Mr. MacLAREN: Absolutely.

Item agreed to.

Operating expenses and working capital, $400,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. MacLAREN: Office expenses, telegrams, telephones and so on.

Item agreed to.

Sheltered employment, $70,000.

Mr. HEAPS: What is this item for?

Mr. MacLAREN: We have workshops at Halifax, Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton, where disabled men are employed at making and repairing furniture. This represents the sum necessary to make up the deficit.

Mr. HEAPS: There has been a good deal of complaint in Winnipeg at the department not reopening the workshop that was burnt down some time ago. The disabled men who formerly worked there are in many instances depending on municipal relief. Can the minister hold out any hope of reopening that workshop?

Mr. MacLAREN: I would not wish to encourage my hon. friend. The building was destroyed. About twenty-five men were engaged there. As a matter of fact these factories have passed their original objective, which was to train the men, not to give them employment for the remainder of their active days. But these factories have been continued, although there is some discontent among those for whom we cannot find room in them. While these factories do give complete relief to the men who are able to get into them, still I do not think it would be in the general interest to acquire more factories.

Mr. HEAPS: How many are employed in the four shops still in existence?

Mr. MacLAREN: In all, one hundred and ninety.

Mr. HEAPS: So it costs $70,000 a year to look after those one hundred and ninety men?

Mr. MacLAREN: That is right.

Mr. HEAPS: Would it not be better to pay those men a fairly substantial sum and do away with the factories?

Mr. MacLAREN: They are earning their living in those factories. This is a better way of helping them than the method suggested by my hon. friend.

[Mr. MacLaren.]

Mr. HEAPS: Would not the same argument apply equally as well to those returned men in Winnipeg who to-day are doing practically nothing on account of the shop having been burned down?

Item agreed to.

Grant to Last Post Fund, $35,000.

Mr. GRAY: I am heartily in sympathy with the minister in his endeavour to reduce the estimates wherever possible, but it does seem to me that in this particular instance no reduction should be made. The amount last year was $40,000. The minister is reducing it this year by $5,000. There is no more worthy item in the estimates than the grant to the Last Post Fund. I think the minister is well aware that it is becoming increasingly difficult for the local organizations to raise money for this particular fund. I would urge that he increase the vote to the original amount of last year. I am sure every hon. member would be heartily in accord with a motion to this effect.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLAREN: I agree the fund is for a very worthy purpose, and I will see if anything can be done on the lines suggested by my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

Pension tribunal, $65,700.

Mr. MacLEAN: There seems to be considerable dissatisfaction, Mr. Chairman, in the working of this tribunal. After the pension tribunal has met the applicant personally, gone into all the details of his case, and decided in his favour, I think it is most unfair that an appeal should be taken by an official of the department, with the result that in many cases the successful applicant before the pension tribunal is deprived of his pension. It would be a good deal better not to grant a pension at all than to inflict this hardship on the successful applicant. I think this should be looked into, and I should like to hear what the minister has to say on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Tummon): All that has been discussed on the previous item.

Item agreed to.

War veterans' allowances, $1,300,000.

Mr. NEILL: As this represents a cut of twenty per cent, I hope it does not mean there will be any reduction in the purposes of the grant. This is one form of soldiers' relief that has worked well. Perhaps as times improve we might like to see the act extended, but up to the present the administration has been satisfactorily conducted. The officials seem to be willing and anxious to do their best for our war veterans and the consideration of cases is kept well up to date, and I do hope this cut does not mean a permanent reduction, because these men are dropping in, so to speak, all the time as they become of age. I hope the minister can give some explanation as to surplus funds last year that will reassure the men in that regard.

Mr. MacLAREN: This item is an unavoidable expenditure. If the men are qualified I presume they will be paid no matter what may be the estimate. This is one of the most satisfactory parts of our pension work.

Mr. HEAPS: How much was spent last year?

Mr. MacLAREN: We have not figures for the whole year, but for the ten-month period we spent $839,000 of the $1,600,000 voted.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out that up to September 1, 1931, when the legislation had been in force for one year, the number of those receiving allowances was 3,049, representing an expenditure of $990,084. That was the first year.

Mr. HEAPS: Then it is quite possible that the amount provided in the estimates will be sufficient for the ensuing year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to quote just one other paragraph from the annual report of the department:

> The work is up to date in so far that on December 1, 1931, 8,490 applications had been received by the committee, of which 8,375 had been finally disposed of; the remaining 115 having been deferred for further information or awaiting consideration.

I think this is an example to the three courts we have dealing with applications for pension in Canada.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am very glad these officers are receiving a little recognition, because really this committee is doing a very good work.

Item agreed to.

National Health — quarantine: salaries and contingencies of organized districts, public health in other districts, Tracadie and Bentinck Island lazarettoes and leprosy generally, $192,000.

Mr. VENIOT: I was speaking to the minister the other day with regard to a rumor that the lazaretto at Tracadie might be closed and the lepers removed to the quarantine station in Quebec. At that time the minister assured me that nothing had been heard of it in the department for at least the last year and a half. I should like to know if the minister is in a position to-night to say that there will be no removal of the lepers from Tracadie to the quarantine station in Quebec; I should like to get it on record.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am in a position to say that the matter is not under consideration at all, nor is such action contemplated. Of course I cannot say it never will happen, but I have no intention of making any change at present.

Item agreed to.

National Health—immigration medical inspection, $163,200.

Mr. HEAPS: How much was spent under this vote last year?

Mr. MacLAREN: For the ten months we spent $180,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister tell us how many doctors are engaged in this work abroad?

Mr. MacLAREN: There are twelve doctors overseas; last year the number was reduced by four or five.

Mr. COOTE: Are their salaries being reduced?

Mr. MacLAREN: The reduction applies to everyone.

Mr. VENIOT: With the policy of the government a very definite restriction in immigration, why is this amount necessary?

Mr. MacLAREN: It is necessary to have a certain number of medical inspectors. We have two in London, two in Liverpool, two in Glasgow, one in Belfast, one in Paris, one in Hamburg and two in Antwerp. That is the minimum.

Mr. VENIOT: I thought we were not permitting any immigration from the continent. If that is so, why keep medical inspectors over there?

Mr. MacLAREN: I am acting in conjunction with the Minister of Immigration, and I accept his advice as to the number of doctors he thinks should be there.

Mr. VENIOT: Then when the immigration estimates are up perhaps the minister will give us that information.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, $18,000.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to know why this item is being reduced by $2,000.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is the ten per cent reduction.

Mr. COOTE: Is it the intention to pay the blind a smaller pension this year? This is about the last place we should start to curtail our expenditures.

Mr. MacLAREN: If the hon. member will look over the grants he will find them all treated in the same way.

Mr. COOTE: I do not think these blind people ever received sufficient pension, and I protest against the action of the government in making this reduction.

Mr. MacLAREN: This is not for pensions to the blind. It is a grant.

Mr. HEENAN: Surely the government are not going to cut the blind as well as those who can see. They are going a long way when they reduce by $2,000 the grant to the Institute for the Blind. I had thought that before now they would have revised the old age pension scheme so as to take care of the blind under that provision. Had a real government been returned to power, the blind would have been receiving assistance to-day under the old age pensions legislation. Surely this is one place where the government should have refrained from putting their knife into the allowance made to suffering humanity—an allowance of $20,000. The matter is worthy of reconsideration.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): In connection with this grant to the institute for the blind, may I say that during the last campaign I was asked whether I was in favour of pensions for the blind, and I said I was. Probably, therefore, it would be consistent for me now to repeat that statement here. I am not going to make a speech, but I wish to call the matter to the attention of the minister. It seems to me that if this parliament can legislate on pensions because of the disability of age, by the same token they have power to pass legislation to meet the disability of lack of sight. The age set under the Old Age Pension Act is three score years and ten. That age is fixed because it has been found that after seventy years of age a person who is without means of supporting himself is helpless. The basis of the pension is the physical inability of the individual to make his way in this world. Age is one disability and lack of sight is another, and if blindness comes before the age of seventy it is a disability that prevents the individual from earning his living. I urge that upon the minister. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River suggested that if a real government were in power they might do something about it. In reply to the hon. gentleman I would point out that in 1926, I placed on the order paper—and this was when a government which was supposed to be a real government was in power—this question:

Is it the intention of the federal government to introduce legislation to provide pensions for the blind?

The answer I received, which is of record, as given by the then Prime Minister, now leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), was:

The matter of pensions for the blind is not enumerated under the provisions in the British North America Act applying exclusively to the dominion.

That was the stand taken by the party supported by the hon. member. But apart altogether from that, I think the principle is sound, and I hope to see the day when, whether it be by an amendment to the old age pensions legislation, or by a separate act, legislation will be introduced in this house making the matter of pensions for the blind a federal burden to be dealt with by Canada as a whole, so that those afflicted people will get similar treatment throughout the dominion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the minister give some details of the expenditures under this item? What is the work done by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind? How many persons do they care for?

Mr. MacLAREN: The institute was formed by the combination of existing organizations in Canada and it works in close affiliation with similar local bodies. The total expenses incurred exceed $200,000 per annum, which is raised from grants from the federal, provincial and municipal authorities, and from private subscriptions. Industrial establishments are maintained at Halifax, Ottawa, Toronto and Winnipeg. There was authorized in 1919 payment of an annual grant of $10,000 for a period of five years.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I doubt whether during the last nine years there has been a single session when some hon. gentleman somewhere in the house has not asked that this item be increased rather than decreased. The necessity for caring for unfortunate people so afflicted touches a keen chord of human sympathy, and I think this should be one of the last departments to be affected, if ever it is affected, by the so-called economy program of the government. I join with those who have preceded me in protesting against this reduction. There are one or two other items in which reductions are equally inexcusable, but this one certainly will not receive the approval of the Canadian public. Any reduction in a vote intended to take care of acute human suffering or of a disability of this type will be protested against all over Canada.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I wish to say one word in support of the attitude that has been taken towards this reduction. In protesting against it I would point out something that perhaps is not apparent to everyone. At this time, during a year when able-bodied men, in full possession of all their faculties, find it unusually difficult to secure employment to support themselves and their families, it becomes doubly and trebly difficult for people who are afflicted with any major disability, and particularly blindness, to obtain work. These people are placed at a peculiar disadvantage at this time when competition for any position at all is so keen. All positions to-day are eagerly sought by men in full possession of all their faculties, and under these circumstances the condition of the blind becomes very much accentuated. I would protest against the reduction. I think that public opinion, to say nothing of the opinion in the house on all sides, would certainly have supported a substantial increase in such an item rather than a decrease. May I also support the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, a suggestion which has been discussed in this house from time to time but never dealt with; I refer to the question of pensions for the blind. The blind form a class set apart from all others; their situation is so peculiar that pensions granted to them would not arouse jealousy among other people. It would not establish a precedent whereby others suffering from other infirmities might come forward and demand similar consideration. This disability forces people to move in a world of darkness all the days of their life, and to people so afflicted generous treatment should be given. Such treatment, I say, would not be resented by others nor would it constitute a precedent; on the contrary, it would be appreciated and supported by the whole country. Another factor must be considered, namely, the extent of such assistance; I do not mean individual assistance, but the total cost. After all, and most fortunately, this is a class comparatively limited in numbers and the total cost would not be such as to prohibit reasonably sympathetic consideration of their case. I hope that at some time, and the sooner the better, the house will have the pleasure of supporting a measure which will provide, on the part of the people of this country, financial assistance for the blind.

Mr. MANION: May I point out to my hon. friend that in past years this grant has not been so large as it is this year? The grant started originally in 1919 at $10,000 and for a number of years continued at that figure. In 1921-22 it was raised to $20,000 and in 1924-25 and continuing years it was dropped again to $10,000. Then in 1928-29 it was raised to $15,000 and it has been $20,000 for only a couple of years. No one questions the sympathy to which my hon. friend and the other hon. gentleman have given expression in regard to people who are blind, but the fact is that it was thought the easiest way to deal with all these grants was, if there were to be any cuts at all, rather than cut out some entirely, to make a ten per cent cut in all of them, and this has been done. In view of the past amount of the grant, I think that is the fairest method that could be adopted. I am not quarrelling with the statement made by anybody in regard to the sympathy these people deserve, but at the same time this seems a fair action when one remembers the grant was $10,000 only a few years ago.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The remarks of the Minister of Railways afford me an opportunity for making another protest. I think there is some justice in his contention that it is better to reduce all the grants by a certain percentage than to eliminate some entirely, but I notice one grant is eliminated, that to the Canadian Social Hygiene Council, an organization which has done splendid work throughout the whole country, the value of which can hardly be estimated, work of an educational character which, if we consider the fact that every year brings a fresh contingent of young people who arrive at the age when such education is necessary, must be carried on continuously if it is to be of any value. May I suggest that it would be well for the future of Canada, well for the future of the entire community, if the suggestion made by the Minister of Railways were carried out completely and none of these grants, particularly that of the nature I have indicated, were cut out.

Mr. HEENAN: Just for the information of my good friend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and for his information only, because, if I remember aright, I do not think he was a member of the last parliament—

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I said 1926.

Mr. HEENAN: I am speaking of 1926 to 1930. The hon. member stated that he placed a question on the order paper in 1926, asking whether it was the intention of the government to introduce legislation to provide pensions for the blind, and the then prime minister, now leader of the opposition, answered to the effect that the matter came within the jurisdiction, not of the federal parliament but rather of the provinces. I want to point out to the hon. member that the then prime minister replied correctly on that occasion. The difference is, however, that if one were to ask that question to-day, the present Prime Minister would say that it was not in order for a member of the opposition to ask questions with respect to the policy of the government. The situation is this, that this being a matter that did come and still comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces, we had representations made to us by various provinces that the first time the Old Age Pension Act was amended we should take care of the blind. The blind people in 1928 or 1929, I am not sure which, had the assurance—I was on the delegation that met them—that the first time we amended the Old Age Pension Act they would be taken care of under it, of course with consent of the provinces. The act was amended last session and the representation was made across the floor of the house to the present government, but they did not see fit to accede to it. That is why I made the remark I did.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I should like to thank the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy river for explaining once more that this is one of the many things which the party he supports would have done had they remained in power.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Canadian National Committee for Mental Hygiene, $9,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This appropriation is not cut just ten per cent and the Minister of Railways should explain why the tip of the scythe has cut more deeply in one spot than another in the garden of flowers. In this case we shall have no blossoms this year and nobody will be happy. There will not be any more seeds sown. Why is it that in some cases only the flower has been cut off, while in others almost the entire plant has been stricken down?

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. MacLAREN: It is obvious what the position is. Under special conditions a reduction has had to be made in the vote this year.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to know the conditions. If the members of the committee will take a glance down this column they will find some very interesting facts. First of all, as mentioned by the hon. member for Red Deer, the appropriation for the Canadian Social Hygiene Council is entirely cut off; this appropriation to the Canadian National Committee for Mental Hygiene is reduced by more than fifty per cent, but apparently we conceive it to be necessary to maintain almost the entire expense in connection with the grant to the Chief Constables' Association of Canada and the grant to the Interparliamentary Union, the latter being reduced by only $60. I disagree with the principle enunciated by the Minister of Railways; but if, as he asserts, it is the policy under which these estimates have been cut, surely an explanation should be forthcoming from him why in this case fifty per cent is cut off this appropriation and only ten per cent cut off that to the Chief Constables' Association.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: While the minister is considering his answer, might I suggest that this is a peculiarly inappropriate vote to be cut at this time. A few days ago, in common I assume with a few of the other members of the house, while perusing the columns of a newspaper published in this city, I noticed some rather unfavourable comments in respect of, shall I say the sanity of members of parliament, including members of the government and leaders of the house. If we are to take that editorial seriously, might I suggest that an increase rather than a decrease in this vote might be necessitated? But apart from that and speaking perhaps more seriously, the time in which we live and the nervous strain under which we are all working—I mean the people throughout the country—would certainly necessitate extreme care and possibly increased expenditure in respect of this particular appropriation. I think it was a mistake, at least in this instance, that the doctrine enunciated by the Minister of Railways in regard to a ten per cent cut, was not adhered to, instead of a fifty per cent cut being made.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member for Red Deer has not fully explained whether the restoration of the grant to its old standard was in his opinion for the purpose of taking care of the mental condition of members of the House of Commons, or that of the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. COOTE: While the minister is cogitating his answer may I say that if one cared to be facetious he might suggest that the economic conditions obtaining in this country under the present government are such that we may need a very large grant to take care of all the people who will become mentally deranged. Speaking seriously, I believe that the economic conditions in this country at the present time are going to increase, and have already increased, the strain upon institutions and people who are caring for the mentally deranged, and I think that this is one of the last votes that should be reduced if the Canadian National Committee for Mental Hygiene is making any proper use of the grant. I say that in all seriousness, and I am surprised that the Minister of National Health would reduce this grant by fifty-five or sixty per cent. Certainly he should explain to the committee why this grant has been reduced from $20,000 to $9,000 at a time like this. We need something more than the simple statement that all these grants are being reduced by ten per cent, because the reduction here is over fifty per cent.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This committee is entitled to an explanation, and I for one will not allow the vote to pass until we get one. That is the least we can expect from the minister.

Mr. MacLAREN: I have no further explanation to give beyond the one I have already given.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is that explanation?

Mr. MacLAREN: There is a reduction all around this year in view of the financial stringency.

Mr. COOTE: The financial stringency is driving some people almost out of their minds; in fact, some men in this country have been driven insane because of it. How the financial stringency can be given as an excuse for reducing this grant by over fifty per cent is beyond my imagination.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If we receive no better explanation from the minister than we have had I am opposed to the item carrying.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the interparliamentary union, $540.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is this item for?

Mr. MacLAREN: For some reason it has been put forward by my department for several years. That is the only explanation I can give. I might mention that I happen to be president of the Canadian branch just now, and when we have our annual meeting I hope that everyone will be present.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I suggest to the minister quite respectfully that he might just as well cut out this vote. It is only $540 anyhow for the interparliamentary union, and members of parliament whose indemnities have already been cut can stand the cutting out of this small sum. It will not be missed, and we could add that much to the vote for the blind.

Mr. COOTE: Will this add anything to the health of the country?

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Administration of Justice—Exchequer Court of Canada—contingencies—judges' and court officials' travelling expenses, remuneration to sheriffs, etc., printing, stationery, etc., and $150 for judges' books, $7,500.

Printing, binding and distributing court reports, $3,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I want to ask a question which may properly come under this vote. There are occasions when private citizens, having or thinking they have a claim against the crown, wish to proceed against some body representing the crown, and I understand that before they can do so a fiat must be granted by the Department of Justice permitting them to bring suit. The question arose through a request made to me by one of our returned men. He had got into some dispute with the pension commission and he was under the impression—I am not familiar with all the details—that he was being wrongfully refused payment of pension after the act had been complied with to the extent of the pension itself being granted in part. He was then advised that the next step to be taken was to proceed against the pension commission, and that in order to do that he had to secure a fiat from the Department of Justice permitting him to bring suit. I am not familiar with the procedure, and I should be glad if the minister would tell me first whether, under any circumstances, suit of that nature may be brought; if so, is it necessary first to secure a fiat? Also, what procedure must be followed in order to make application for that fiat? If the minister can answer that it will enable me to reply to the inquiries made.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): All actions or suits against the crown can be commenced only by a fiat permitting action to be brought. I do not know the facts of the case to which my hon. friend has referred, but he may take it as the law generally that no suit can be entertained against the crown without the consent of the crown, which is the fiat. Application for a fiat is made to the Minister of Justice, and when granted suit can be brought in the exchequer court. In any reasonable case a fiat is never withheld.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Thank you. If that is the case a person wishing to apply for a fiat simply communicates with the Minister of Justice stating his case and making his request?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a form of petition submitted when a request is made for a fiat. A petition is filed, and then on the recommendation of the minister His Excellency the Governor General endorses it, "Let right be done." That is the fiat.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: A copy of the petition may be secured from the Department of Justice?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The form of petition is in accordance with the rules of the exchequer court, which are available to anybody.

Item agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The next item is in connection with penitentiaries. Unfortunately my deputy is not in the chamber.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Go ahead.

Penitentiaries—amount required for cost of administration, construction, purchase of land, supplies and equipment, maintenance and discharge of inmates at Kingston, St. Vincent de Paul, Dorchester, Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Collins Bay penitentiaries, $2,655,700.

Mr. BRADETTE: I should like to refer to the case of Fontaine and Lacasse, who, on account of a miscarriage of justice a few years ago, were sent to a penitentiary. Afterwards it was found that they were innocent. I understand they have made application to the Department of Justice for compensation. To bring the facts clearly before the committee I shall read an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of March 17, 1932:

The Citizen has received a letter from Lionel Fontaine in which he appeals to us again to draw his case to the attention of parliament. This we do in the belief that until some restitution is made a blot will remain on Canada's reputation for impartial justice.

Fontaine is one of the two men (Lacasse is the other) who were charged, "identified," and sentenced as the guilty persons in the robbery of an Ottawa milk salesman in Rockcliffe in the fall of 1929. They were given two years and served seven months of that term before their innocence, by an extraordinary turn of events, in which the police had no part, was established.

It is now nearly two years since Fontaine and Lacasse were shown to be the victoms of a miscarriage of justice. But they have received no redress.

Then the closing paragraph is as follows:

Presuming no steps have yet been taken to "amend the incident" it is time that something were done. Fontaine asks on behalf of himself and Lacasse for compensation to the amount he would have earned if gainfully employed during the seven months the two lay in prison innocently convicted. We respectfully call the attention of the authorities to this request once more and suggest that the compensation be paid.

I think the request is very reasonable, because had they been falsely accused by a layman he would have had to make compensation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member is no doubt aware of the fact that while we in this parliament make the criminal law of Canada, the Department of Justice or the government does not administer that law throughout the provinces. The unfortunate prosecution which resulted in the conviction of these two young men was undertaken at the instance of the attorney general's department of the province of Ontario. His officers made the arrest and conducted the prosecution; the federal department of Justice had no part in it whatsoever. Conviction was made after a trial in the province of Ontario, and sentence was imposed by a court of that province. The prisoners were ordered to serve their terms in the penitentiary at Kingston. As soon as the true facts were brought to the attention of the former Minister of Justice he recommended that the two young men in question be released. I do not think he had authority to make a payment of money, or to do anything other than he did do—to have the young men released as speedily as possible. This case has been before me at least half a dozen times, and in each instance I have informed the applicants that if they have any redress they must seek it from the legislature of Ontario, in which province the prosecution was instituted. It is one of those unfortunate miscarriages of justice that sometimes take place, but I cannot see that the federal department is in any way responsible for it.

Mr. BRADETTE: The Minister of Justice has said an injustice was done to these men. Naturally the Canadian people will think they are entitled to compensation. So far as I can learn, no application has been made to the provincial legislature. It would seem that pressure should be brought upon the provincial authorities by the federal government so that this anomaly may be remedied. From the article appearing in the Citizen one would conclude that these young men think they should receive compensation from federal authorities.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They have no reason to think that, because ever since they were liberated they have been informed definitely and on many occasions that any claim to compensation or indemnity they may have should be lodged with the Ontario legislature. They know that; I do not know whether or not they have made application there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have learned there is to be some reorganization in connection with the personnel of the penitentiary at Kingston. Is the minister in a position to make a statement in that connection?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes; reorganization is contemplated. We have two penitentiaries at Kingston. One of them is in course of construction, and has hitherto been referred to as the preferred class penitentiary. The name has been changed and it is now known as the Collins Bay penitentiary. That institution was controlled by an acting warden who had never been appointed to the wardenship. Formerly he had been an inspector on the penitentiary staff, and he has now returned to his duties as inspector at Ottawa. Another member of the staff named Allen, who was chief engineer, has been appointed warden of the Collins Bay penitentiary. Warden Ponsford of Kingston penitentiary has retired. The position is now vacant. There is an acting warden in that penitentiary, a man who has been for a long time on the penitentiary staff, but the appointment will be filled by the Civil Service Commission. The advertisement for that position has recently been current, and I think applications are all in and are now under consideration. I do not know what the determination of the commission will be in that respect. There is also another change through the retirement of General Hughes, who for many years was superintendent of penitentiaries. That position is likewise vacant and an advertisement is current by the Civil Service Commission to fill it.

Mr. REID: Has the minister any information regarding a criminal by the name of Bagley? He escaped from Oakalla provincial prison some time ago. It is said he was sentenced to a ten-year term at New Westminster penitentiary and was released after serving only five years. Later he was picked up by the provincial police and put in the provincial prison at Oakalla. He is now advertised as a very desperate criminal who boasts that he will not be taken alive.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I have some information with regard to the case. This man Bagley, or Brown—I think Brown is his correct name—was implicated, with three others, in an armed robbery some six or seven years ago. They were convicted and received fairly long terms in the penitentiary. Brown, or Bagley, was sentenced to a term of ten years and twenty lashes. His three companions in crime were released in 1928 and 1929. Brown was not released at that time. He did receive the lashes that were imposed and has served with remission—because remission is allowed for good conduct—six and a half years of his term. In November, 1930, he was released for deportation to the United States, being an American citizen. He was deported. Subsequently he seems to have again come to Canada in some way or other, and committed a further crime, for which he was placed in the provincial prison at Oakalla, British Columbia. From that prison he escaped, and has since been guilty of some other serious depredation, I do not know exactly of what nature. I believe at the moment his whereabouts are not known, but, I understand, he is regarded as a dangerous criminal.

Mr. REID: Is the position of warden at New Westminster penitentiary being filled?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, that also is awaiting action by the Civil Service Commission. The warden at New Westminster resigned to take the position of chief of police of the city of Vancouver.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How does the Civil Service Commission go about filling the position of warden of a penitentiary?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I must say quite freely that I have not been consulted about it either directly or indirectly by any member of the commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Have any of them ever been in a penitentiary themselves?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot say as to that, but I understand that they selected a committee and placed the applications before the committee to deal with. I know of one case —and I fancy that my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition will recall it—where the Civil Service Commission made an appointment some years ago and actually brought the man from Nova Scotia to fill it, but when he got here they reconsidered the matter and told him he could not have the position, and appointed another man. But I do not know the modus operandi adopted by the Civil Service Commission in regard to these appointments, more than the fact that they advertise the vacancies.

Mr. GERSHAW: A few years ago a resolution was discussed in this house regarding the advisability of providing work for inmates of penitentiaries with a view to supporting their families. Has anything along that line been considered?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Nothing along that line has ever been adopted. I do not think anything of the kind is in force in any prison in the British Empire. I believe in some prisons in the United States something is done in this way, the inmates being paid at the rate of about ten cents a day.

Item agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

London—salaries and expenses of the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, including $1,800 additional salary for the High Commissioner to that authorized by chapter 15, R.S.C., $123,660.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know whether the Prime Minister as yet assumes responsibility for the utterances of the high commissioner or not, but if he does perhaps he will explain to the committee what the high commissioner meant when he said the other day, as reported pretty generally in the press of Canada of April 6:

On every hand—

This is referring to the British people.

On every hand it is said that since the reformation there has been nothing of such importance as the economic conference in Ottawa next July.

I have been at a loss to appreciate the significance of the reference to the reformation in connection with the economic conference, but perhaps the Prime Minister can explain.

Mr. BENNETT: As far as I know, Mr. Chairman, the remark must have meant that there has been an entire reformation of the fiscal system of Great Britain, and this is a manifestation of it, being the result of the efforts in that direction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I notice the high commissioner also says:

The conference is spoken of in Great Britain as the new dispensation in British history. Independent of politics, independent of everything else, it is realized that the empire is facing a determination of its independence on international contacts.

Can the Prime Minister explain the sentence, "The conference is spoken of in Great Britain as the new dispensation in British history"?

Mr. BENNETT: It marks an epoch probably, and epochs and new dispensations are more or less synonymous. Possibly the high commissioner thought another landmark in history was being passed which was very important to the whole British empire. I am bound to say that my attention had not been directed to that particular part of his remarks. The first observation I had seen. Assuming he is correctly reported, I cannot think he meant other than just what is said, that the coming economic conference is a very great and important event in the minds of many people, that the British public were expressing great hopes and expectations of a favourable outcome of the conference to be held in this city next July, and that under the newer dispensation of closer trade relations between the various component parts of the empire another epoch would commence. I imagine the words "new dispensation" were used in that sense, rather than as affording liberty or licence,—if one might use either word—to indulge in other than the most hopeful expressions of good will and of belief in the future of the commonwealth of nations under closer union and a new dispensation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Evidently the high commissioner is indulging in a large measure of prophecy; we hope he may not be humbugging the British public, as well as the Canadian, in what he has had to say. Does that account for the $1,800 additional salary being given to the high commissioner?

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact the salary is lessened by $1,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The item reads:

Salaries and expenses of the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, including $1,800 additional salary for the High Commissioner to that authorized by chapter 15, R.S.C.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite sure the right hon. gentleman has overlooked the fact that the salary of the high commissioner is $10,000 under the statute, and that for many years an additional $2,000 has been paid. There is nothing new in this item; $2,000 less ten per cent leaves $1,800, and the language of the item is exactly as it has been for several years. The salary is $12,000, less $1,000 representing ten per cent of $10,000, and less $200 representing ten per cent of the additional $2,000 which has been voted yearly during the last ten years. That is the explanation; there is no increase at all.

Item agreed to.

Washington—representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $92,900.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the Prime Minister give the reasons for this decrease?

Mr. BENNETT: The decrease represents ten per cent of the salaries and a readjustment of staff. The salary reduction amounts to $4,759, and the balance is represented by an adjustment of personnel.

Item agreed to.

Geneva—salaries and expenses of the office of the Canadian advisory officer, $22,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who is the Canadian advisory officer?

Mr. BENNETT: Doctor Riddell. He has been in that position for some years.

Item agreed to.

Geneva — Canada's contribution to the expenses of the League of Nations for 1932, including secretariat, international labour organization and permanent court of international justice, $220,613.94.

Mr. BENNETT: The increase in this item comes about by reason of the slight change in the standard used for the purpose of determining the amount to be paid by each of the member nations of the league. Our share amounts to not quite thirty-five one-thousandths; the exact figure is $^{35}/_{999\frac{1}{2}}$. We pay that proportion of 1,079,669·63 gold francs, or $227,621.10 in gold dollars. The slight change made in the basis of adjustment by the finance department of the League of Nations—for they have a budget, and what amounts to a minister of finance—imposed that amount upon us.

Mr. SPENCER: How are the expenses allocated?

Mr. BENNETT: The old basis was the postal union rates. Under that system rather a heavy burden was imposed upon us, but some adjustments have been made and now we have an arbitrary allotment, fixed by the department of finance of the league. Perhaps the details would take some time to explain, but the representatives of the nations first of all determine how much will be required for the year. This year there is an extra amount in connection with the disarmament conference and the expenses incidental to it. Then they apply a principle at which they have arrived, and as a result our share is almost thirty-five one-thousandths. The expenses are divided into 99½ parts, of which we pay 35 as our share.

Mr. SPENCER: I was wondering if the question of population had anything to do with it.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the question of population was not regarded as a sound basis upon which to determine these contributions when the league was started. I suppose my hon. friend is familiar with the fact that the postal union arrived at certain understandings upon which they classified the different countries, and our original contribution was made under that classification. It imposed upon us rather a heavier burden than would have been the case if population had been the standard, because we occupied a position of somewhat greater importance, from the standpoint of the international postal union, than was indicated by our population. I remember discussing the matter at some length with Sir Herbert Ames when he was attached to the financial section of the league, and he explained to me the difficulties which had been encountered in the early days in arriving at some basis on which the computation could be made. It is not based solely upon population. There were factors which determined the action of the international postal union at one time, and those factors have been considered. Finally the arrangement I have indicated was arrived at, by which the whole cost was divided into 99½ shares, our portion being 35.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It always seems rather strange to me that it is only under an item of expenditure that we have any opportunity of finding out anything definite in connection with our policies with regard to foreign affairs, but apparently this is the only way we can get at it.

There are one or two matters with reference to which I should like the Prime Minister to make some statement. I refer first to Canada's attitude, in the league, with regard to Manchuria and conditions in China. I think almost everyone must have been disappointed at the attitude of the league, especially in the earlier stages of the trouble. I do not know just what is the position at the present moment, but whatever that may be with regard to the league proper, still the league is only a combination of the member nations, and as yet we have not had a statement as to the attitude of Canada as a member of that league. I wish we might have from the Prime Minister some statement with regard to that whole matter.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman desires that I should enter into an historical discussion, in the first instance, of the incidents that led up to the present conditions in Manchuria and the difficulties that have been encountered in an amicable adjustment of the differences between Japan and China. If so, I shall have to take another occasion for that, but I should like to remind my hon. friend that Canada was not a member of the council of the league, and of course responsibility for the conduct of the business of the league when the assembly is not in session must rest with the council.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to interrupt—

Mr. BENNETT: That is quite all right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Each member of the league is at liberty under certain circumstances to make representations to the council with regard to anything that is liable to upset the peace of the world.

Mr. BENNETT: I was only going to point out that the conduct of the league was determined by the council up to the time the assembly met and that Canada had not membership in the council. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman desires that I should indicate just what steps were taken by the council. I assume that hon. members are all familiar, from reading the newspapers and the official reports that have appeared from time to time, with the steps that were taken by the council. In the end, the assembly was called together, and as it was called together at a time when the representatives of the government were present in Geneva, in connection with the disarmament conference, they were asked to attend the meeting of the assembly. They did attend at that assembly, participated in the discussions, and assisted in arriving at the conclusions which were reached and which, you might say, were practically unanimous as to what position should be taken.

I did not think it would be wise, and I certainly accept the responsibility for having so advised our delegates, that we should endeavour, with the slight knowledge that we possess as compared with those who are constantly in touch with the situation at Geneva, and those who are responsible for the investigations in Manchuria, either to blame or praise this country or the other in connection with matters so serious as those involved in the then differences between Japan and China. But in view of what the hon. gentleman has said, and owing to the fact that I have not brought with me the papers connected with the meeting at Geneva, I shall be glad to let the item stand and indicate to the committee just what was done so far as we were concerned, the part our delegates took in the assembly, and the opinions which they expressed at that gathering, and which I think would reflect at least the sober, intelligent and moderate judgment of Canadian public opinion. I shall be glad to do that, and the item can stand for that purpose.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Thanks very much. May I ask the Prime Minister, if on some future occasion he brings this matter to the committee, whether he will also be prepared to give the committee some idea as to what instructions have been given to the Canadian delegates to the disarmament conference? That is a matter of general interest to the people of Canada, and it would be well for us to know just where the government stands with regard to the whole disarmament question. Are we prepared to take any sort of lead with regard to such matters? I suppose that at this late hour there is hardly time to go into that, but when the Prime Minister is bringing down other information possibly he will be willing to give some idea as to where our delegates stand at this time.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be glad to do so, Mr. Chairman.

Item stands.

Expenses of Canadian delegates to the assembly, council and commissions of the League of Nations, $17,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who were the delegates apart from the two ministers?

Mr. BENNETT: This item does not cover the gathering to which the hon. gentleman refers. The meeting of the assembly the other day was a special meeting called as I indicated a moment ago; and as our delegates were present in Geneva attending the disarmament conference they attended the assembly gathering. This item covers the expenses of the assembly meeting, which is usually held in the fall, and the amount against which it is placed, namely, $18,000, represents the expenditure for last year's meeting. The expenses generally run from $15,000 to $25,000, depending upon the length of the meeting and the numbers that attend.

Item agreed to.

Geneva — Canada's contribution to the expenses of the League of Nations for 1932, including secretariat, international labour organization and Permanent Court of International Justice, $220,613.94.

Mr. BENNETT: This item will stand and I will endeavour to make an explanation such as the hon. gentleman desires.

Item stands.

External Affairs—salaries, $87,678; contingencies, $67,000.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a slight decrease in the departmental staff, as will be observed, and the rest of the decrease in expenditures is represented by the ten per cent reduction.

Item agreed to.

Privy Council—salaries, $42,984; contingencies, $7,000.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a slight decrease brought about by a small reduction in staff and the application of the ten per cent.

Item agreed to.

Office of the secretary to the governor general—salaries, $29,322; contingencies, including house allowance of $1,500 per annum to the secretary to the governor general, $70,500.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the item of last year, with reductions.

Item agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one item I propose to leave. There are three items at the top of page 56, and the first of which, the item for hospitality to foreign visitors, No. 233, has been reduced this year by $23,000, because there were two extraordinary obligations incurred last year for which provision was made. The royal houses of Japan and Siam were represented in this dominion during that period. The second item is a revote of some money that has been standing in connection with the arbitration of the I'm Alone case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that the item for hospitality is exclusive of anything connected with the imperial conference.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. That is one item I am not going to touch.

Miscellaneous—to provide for the arbitration expenses—"I'm Alone" case (revote), $9,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the Prime Minister report any progress in connection with that case?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Justice Duff visited Washington last month and had a conference with the representatives of the American government. The case is rather complicated at the present time. The right hon. gentleman is, I think, fully aware of the intricate and delicate legal questions that have been raised, and at the moment there has been no determination of these preliminary questions, with respect to which reports had to be made to enable further action to be taken. But some progress has been made by reason of the conference that took place last month.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 8, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

SURVEY OF NATIONAL PORTS

REPORT OF SIR ALEXANDER GIBB TABLED

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I desire to lay on the table of the house Sir Alexander Gibb's report on a survey of the national ports of Canada.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): May I ask the Minister of Marine if the report of Sir Alexander Gibb which has just been tabled will be printed and made available to every member of the house?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): As members of the house can see, the report is voluminous. It contains many charts, plans and sketches, and to print it would be very, very expensive. I intend to refer the report to the committee on printing, and the committee will decide whether it should be printed in full or only a synopsis should be made.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Minister of Marine, now that the report of Sir Alexander Gibb is down, whether it is the intention of the government at this session to introduce any legislation based upon the report?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The report is being studied now, and the question whether any legislation will be brought down will be under consideration within the next few days.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED UNDER AUTHORITY OF ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I beg to lay on the table the following orders in council passed under the authority of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act; Nos. 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 771, 773, 774 and 785.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VACANCY IN REPRESENTATION OF MAISONNEUVE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to draw the attention of the government to the fact that there has been a vacancy in the constituency of Maisonneuve ever since the sixteenth of January last. On the twenty-first of January the government issued a writ for a by-election in Athabasca, where there was also a vacancy, but no writ was issued at the time with respect to the vacancy in Maisonneuve. I would like to ask if it was the intention of the government to allow that constituency to go unrepresented in this parliament this session; also whether the government intends to take steps to see that a writ is immediately issued.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The Prime Minister is out of the house at the moment, but he will be in shortly and I will bring the matter to his attention and ask him to give an answer.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 10, to amend and consolidate the Fisheries Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur-Thunder Bay) in the chair.

Mr. NEILL: Has this bill been reprinted, Mr. Chairman? I do not see how we can go on with it if it has not. It is not on our files. There was a large number of amendments, some of considerable importance, made to the bill in the marine and fisheries committee, and I do not see how we can intelligently study the bill unless it is reprinted with the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur-Thunder Bay): I understand that the committee did not order the reprinting of the bill, that the amendments were short and that it was not considered necessary to reprint the bill.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know what the committee did not do, but it is not customary to discuss a bill with so many amendments in committee of the whole without first having the bill reprinted, and I have never heard that it was necessary for a committee to order reprinting; that is a matter of departmental policy. I do not see how we can adequately deal with this bill. We trusted the amendments would be on record; we do not know what they are. For hon. members who have spent many days discussing this matter in committee it will be unfortunate if we have to begin all over again. I would suggest either that the amendments be printed in the votes and proceedings or that the bill be reprinted.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to join in the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in requesting the minister to comply with the suggestion. I happen to come from a constituency in which great interest is taken in this bill. Not being a member of the fisheries committee I have no idea what amendments were made, and have not had an opportunity of attending discussions in committee. Therefore for the information of hon. members who have not attended the meetings of the fisheries committee I request that the amendments be printed or be put into such shape that they may be considered by the committee of the whole.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amendments adopted in committee were neither numerous nor very important, and for that reason the committee did not see fit to order reprinting. I wish to be courteous, however, and be as fair as possible to hon. members. If they think the bill should be reprinted, I have no objection. Therefore I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

FISH INSPECTION ACT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 6, to amend The Fish Inspection Act (with amendments).

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur-Thunder Bay) in the chair.

On section 1—Application of act.

Mr. RALSTON: Was there a substantial number of amendments made to this bill?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): I think there are two.

Mr. RALSTON: Will you please tell us what they are.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): There is no change in the principle of the bill, but a slight change in the phraseology.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister introduce the amendments agreed upon in committee?

Mr. DURANLEAU: On this bill?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): Section 1 was amended in committee, and an amendment was inserted, known as 1 (a), as follows:

Section 4 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:—
(g) to prescribe the size or sizes of containers in which oysters may be shipped or taken from any province in Canada, and how such containers shall be marked;
(h) to provide for the grading and inspection of oysters;
(i) to prescribe how incorrectly marked containers of oysters shall be remarked and dealt with.

Mr. NEILL: What section does that amend?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): Section 1 of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: The confusion in this instance illustrates the need for the reprinting of the bill. We do not know what the amendments are. We have only a very imperfect recollection of what took place, and those hon. members who were not in the fisheries committee cannot possibly decide on the merits of the amendments.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Chairman, these clauses were embodied in the existing Fisheries Act. The suggestion was made in committee that this part of the Fisheries Act should be incorporated in the Fish Inspection Act because it concerns inspection. In the result therefore, we are deleting these clauses from the Fisheries Act and incorporating them in the Fish Inspection Act. There is no new legislation, but only a transfer from the Fisheries Act to the Fish Inspection Act. I do not think the amendments require printing.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, referring to that part of the act which concerns oyster fisheries, I would like to call the minister's attention to regulations passed last year governing fishing for oysters. For instance, I find clause 12 is as follows:

"Minimum size of oysters." Except with the permission of the minister, no one shall fish for, retain or kill any round oyster of a less size than three and one-half inches in diameter, or any long oyster of a less size than four inches in length, of the outer shell.

In certain sections of the provinces of New Brunswick it will be impossible to observe those regulations. The Caraquet bay oysters cannot be fished under that regulation at all. There is no use stating that if the regulations are observed the oyster will grow to a greater size. The natural shape of the Caraquet oyster is round. It is not elongated such as those found in Shediac bay or in Buctouche bay or Buctouche river. The result is that the men who have been able to earn their livelihood by the observation of former regulations are now thrown out of work. I ask the minister to look into these regulations very carefully, and to recommend that the sizes which obtained in the past be allowed. There is no use telling us that the regulations are enforced for the greater protection of the oyster beds. That may be true in certain sections of New Brunswick but certainly it does not apply to all sections.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for the information and suggestions he is now making. He has referred to regulations, and I can assure him his suggestions will be well considered.

Mr. VENIOT: Since the minister has been so considerate in connection with my suggestion, I have a further one to make. In the name of conscience, do not allow oyster packages, as designated in the regulations adopted last year, to be used further. It is not a package that should be put on the market at all; it is too bulky and its appearance is enough to condemn the contents. Let us have a decent package. The inspectors of the minister's department have reported that the package is ungainly and unsightly, and I hope he will take that report into consideration. Some manufacturers of barrels submitted a certain plan, and that has been accepted. But simply because the plan meets their view is no reason why it should be accepted. The package most convenient to handle and best in appearance is the package that should be accepted, even if you have to put fewer oysters therein. If the package is to contain two, three or four hundred oysters, as the case may be, and this necessitates such an ungainly way of packing them, then reduce the number of oysters and put them in an attractive package. Do not impose on the public such an ungainly package as the one ordered last year.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am told that the fish dealers of Prince Edward Island are perfectly satisfied with the regulations as to those packages.

Mr. VENIOT: I may say to the minister that they are not satisfied. I am acquainted with hundreds of those dealers.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It will be a matter of investigation on the part of the officials of my department, and if my hon. friend's complaints are well founded no doubt we will take the necessary steps to remedy the situation.

Mr. MacLEAN: What is the size of oysters under the old regulation and under the new?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the information under my hand to-day, but I will supply it later on to my hon. friend.

Mr. MacLEAN: Who asked for the change? Is it a departmental regulation or has it been requested by parties interested?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say offhand if it is purely departmental or if the change was made on the request of someone, but I will supply the information to my hon. friend.

Mr. VENIOT: In the past the regulation diameter was three inches for the round oyster and three and a half inches for the elongated; under the present regulations it is three and a half for the round and four for the elongated. There is no trouble about the four-inch diameter for the elongated oyster, but there is a great deal of complaint about the three and a half inch diameter for the round oyster. Whoever made the recommendation did not have in view the size of oysters in the different sections of New Brunswick and perhaps in Prince Edward Island. I can assure the minister that as to the Shemogue oyster, the Shediac oyster, the Buctouche bay and Buctouche river oyster and the Baie du Vin oyster, there is no trouble applying the regulation, but when you come to oysters further north in New Brunswick you cannot apply it and do justice to the market, nor will the application of the regulation protect the oysters in northern New Brunswick.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Containers must be inspected.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): Section 2 was amended in the twenty-third line, where the word "shall" has been changed to the word "need." The proviso will now read:

Provided that boxes for smoked herring and boxes for dry salted herring need not be inspected and marked until they have been packed and made ready for shipment.

Mr. NEILL: Was there not another amendment made to that section?

Mr. ERNST: All the words after the word "shipment" in line twenty-five were struck out. The amendment in so far as it relates to fish oil was also struck out.

Mr. NEILL: The same thing should be struck out in subsection 2.

Mr. ERNST: It was.

Mr. NEILL: When we pass this bill the Angel Gabriel won't understand it. I find the member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) is driven to appealing to the house to do something for conscience sake.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): Subsection 2 was amended by striking out the proviso:

Provided that such fish oils as may hereafter come under the provisions of this act shall be prepared and graded in accordance with the regulations and be inspected in accordance therewith.

Mr. NEILL: Carried.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Penalty for altering official mark.

Mr. NEILL: No amendment to section 4?

Mr. ERNST: No, but there was an addition to the old act.

Section agreed to.

Bill, as amended, reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur-Thunder Bay) in the chair.

Marine—salaries and contingencies, $437,137.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When will the deputy minister be appointed?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I think it will not be long.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How long has the position been vacant?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As the hon. member for Quebec East knows, this is a matter for the Prime Minister, so I think the question should be directed to him when he is in the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am hardly ready to accept the doctrine that if the Prime Minister is not ready to appoint a deputy minister the department should not have one. Would my hon. friend subscribe to the principle, that even if he needs a deputy minister he will not have one if the Prime Minister is not ready to make the appointment.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I did not say the Prime Minister was not ready to make the appointment, but I have an assistant deputy minister and an assistant to the assistant, who are both very competent men. I do not think my hon. friend should press for an immediate appointment, because we want to make a first class choice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Have any applications been made to my hon. friend for the position?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I told my hon. friend, any such applications must be made to the Prime Minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not a word whispered to the minister himself?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No official word.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wonder if perhaps that is the reason why the appointment has not been made, all the applications going to the Prime Minister and none to the minister himself. I would not blame the minister if he did not make an appointment under those circumstances.

Item agreed to.

Ocean and river service—maintenance and repairs to Dominion steamers and icebreakers, $1,521,000.

Mr. ARTHURS: I should like to direct the attention of the minister, from my place in this house, to the situation with regard to the marine agency in the constituency which I represent. We have been somewhat unfortunate in the past in regard to the boats provided by the government. Many years ago, prior to the war, we had a good boat known as the Simcoe. Owing to the exigencies of the war that boat was taken from that station and sent to the Atlantic coast, for which work it was totally unsuited, as was shown by the fact that it was lost with all hands on its first voyage.

Subsequently a boat built for the St. Lawrence service, the C.G.S. Grenville, was placed on that route. This was a first class boat in every way, but it was rather small for the service. Two or three years ago the government purchased a vessel known as the St. Helier, which I am led to believe was built during the war for coastal patrol work in Great Britain. This boat had an overall length of 130 feet. It was unsuited for the service and was unseaworthy in many ways, and a number of sister ships were lost. This boat was purchased by the late government on condition that it was to be lengthened to 180 feet, which was done, but no provision was made for changing the location of the engines. As a result when they attempted to turn her over to the captain and crew at Prescott she was found to be 14 feet down by the stern. In order to remedy that I understand about 200 tons of cement were placed in her forehold. In many ways she is absolutely unseaworthy, or so I am informed; she is cranky, and naturally must be under the conditions I have named. Any man with any marine experience at all will understand that the steering apparatus, the rudder and so on, built for a boat 130 feet in length, would be totally unsuited for a boat 180 feet long.

I would ask the minister to have this boat inspected by a thoroughly competent naval architect before it is placed in the service. The members of the crew, together with their families, are naturally apprehensive as to their safety. I neglected to mention that we had another boat in that service called the Lambton, which also belonged to the Department of Marine and which was lost in lake Superior with all hands simply because it was not suited to the work. I think I am quite justified in bringing this matter to the attention of the minister, because I believe the government would be negligent if they did not look fully into it before risking the lives of the crew of this boat.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I had no knowledge of the facts just brought forward by the hon. member; I always thought, and it was the opinion of the department, that the vessel in question was quite seaworthy. But I will be pleased to have an immediate inspection made by a competent officer. I am anxious to give the best service possible in that direction, and this will be done immediately.

Mr. ARTHURS: I did not intend to reflect on the minister at all; this boat only came to the station late last fall, and we had no previous experience with her.

Mr. NEILL: While this item is only for maintenance and repairs it might be a proper time to ask the minister if he has carried out what I believe was his intention, the construction of a sister ship to the Estevan to aid in the lighthouse work on the Pacific coast. I presume the minister knows this vessel is very badly needed. The Estevan is continually at work and the work has increased very much in late years, in fact, to a really marked degree, along with the development of the country. In years gone by they used to have three steamers, whereas now they have practically only one, the Estevan, with any equipment to lift the big buoys. For the lack of a sister ship or some auxiliary boat, we find that this powerful boat is going around doing what I would call petty work, such as a smaller boat would be suited for. Driven by necessity, therefore, they have allowed the lifting of buoys to get behind, so that the light goes out, and to try to meet the immediate situation they have adopted a sort of temporary system which takes up a good deal of time and is by no means satisfactory. All this is due to the fact that the vote is not sufficient to take care of the work. It was the intention of the department some years ago to build a steamer. Possibly this is being done now; the boat may be under construction. I cannot too strongly emphasize, however, the importance of another steamer on that work on the Pacific. I have not the figures with me, but if I remember rightly, in the last ten years the lights and buoys on the Pacific coast have increased one hundred per cent although the equipment to handle the work has gone down, from the standpoint of numbers at any rate. Can the minister give me any information in regard to this matter?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Though the department is fully seized of the necessity for such construction, we did not consider the time opportune to incur the expenditure, especially in view of the reduction in our revenues. We have decided not to undertake such expenditures at the present time, but we have the matter in hand and hope to be able, as soon as possible, to proceed with construction.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is it the intention of the minister to go on with the project which the department contemplated two years ago, of building a new boat to replace the Jalobert, at Rimouski? I understood that plans were being prepared and estimates were obtained, and that it was proposed to go on with the construction at the earliest possible date. As the minister knows, the Jalobert is a small boat and the conditions under which she is operating at Father Point are extremely dangerous at times. The construction of a new boat is absolutely needed.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: That very question was brought to the attention of the department two or three years ago and has been under consideration since. I regret, however, that I must give to my hon. friend the same answer I gave in the other case: the time is not opportune to undertake such expenditures. Unless it becomes absolutely necessary, I do not think we should go on with that undertaking at the present time.

Sir EUGENE FISET: If the minister will take the trouble to peruse the reports on file in regard to the Jalobert, he will see that it is becoming increasingly necessary every year to provide a new boat, and I hope he will give due consideration to the application already made.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can promise the hon. gentleman that I will personally look over the last report and inquire into the matter.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous services relating to navigation and shipping, $37,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the services for which this amount is being asked?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The amount voted last year was $53,000, reduced this year by $16,000. The vote is made up as follows: Examination of masters and mates, $15,760; navigation schools, $6,240; for the temporary relief of distressed seamen, $2,000; investigation into wrecks, $5,000; registration of shipping, $2,000; removal of obstructions in navigable waters, $2,000; expenses on live stock shipments, $4,000.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to reimburse the British Board of Trade for expenditures incurred in the relief of distressed Canadian seamen not authorized by the Canada Shipping Act, $300.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has the minister any better information to give as to what a distressed Canadian seaman is than was given by the Minister of Labour?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the Minister of Labour gave a fair definition to my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not to me; he did not say anything to me.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) came to the rescue of the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That hon. gentleman was not in any need of being rescued; I think the distressed seaman at the time was the minister.

Item agreed to.

To provide subsidies for wrecking plants—Quebec and British Columbia, $40,000.

Mr. NEILL: I notice that this vote has been reduced almost fifty per cent, and knowing the minister's desire to be fair I am quite sure that most of this cut has been taken off Quebec rather than from the Pacific ocean. I should like the details, and particularly information as to where the paring has been done—I mean, what services.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The cut was from the Quebec Salvage Company grant.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What amount has been deducted from that subsidy so far as Quebec is concerned?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The department was under contract with the Quebec Salvage Company—

Sir EUGENE FISET: With the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —and is still under contract until the first of May. It is the Quebec Salvage Company.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Canada Steamships.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Well, I know that the Canadian Pacific Railway is greatly interested, and I am not sure whether to-day it does not own the majority of the shares. I can say, however, that the majority of the shares are to-day in the hands of Canadians and Canadian firms. It was suggested last year, when my estimates came before the committee, that the majority of the shares of that company were American, but that is not the case to-day. The contract expires on May 1. With the Pacific Coast Salvage Company we have a ten year contract expiring in 1935, so that we have made no change in the subsidy.

Mr. NEILL: That is the explanation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As to the Quebec Salvage Company, we had to cut down expenses here and accordingly we intimated to the company that we could not grant the same amount after May 1 next.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Do I understand that the subsidy will not be renewed after May 1?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It will be renewed in the sum of $30,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Has the minister received any applications from other wrecking companies for similar subsidies, and have those applications been refused?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say that applications for grants have been received, but we have received communications from the Maritime Foundation and Wrecking Company, which operates a plant at Rimouski. They have asked that a grant be not given to any other company in order that they may be able to compete. After due consideration we came to the conclusion that we should reduce the grant to the other company, but we could not cut it out entirely.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The minister has received from the Maritime Foundation and Wrecking Company a statement to the effect that they are able to carry on all the wrecking work in the gulf of St. Lawrence right up to Rimouski without receiving any grant. Notwithstanding this fact, he is granting a subsidy to cover that part of the river lying between Quebec and Rimouski, which subsidy has been paid to the company for the past twelve or fifteen years.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have had proof that this company is operating its plant at a loss and under the circumstances we thought it only fair to maintain the grant.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the minister give the Maritime Foundation and Wrecking Company of Rimouski the same consideration given to the Quebec and British Columbia wrecking companies? If a grant of $30,000 is to be paid to the other company, does the minister not think that this company should receive some consideration? This company paid for half the cost of construction of the wharf and necessary dredging work at Rimouski, something which no company has ever done before. If this grant is to be renewed on May 1, does the minister not think that in all fairness it should be divided between the two companies? I think this is a very moderate request to make and I hope the minister will give it due consideration.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The Quebec Salvage Company has always given first class service.

Sir EUGENE FISET: So has the Foundation company.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have no assurance that that company always will maintain a plant for salvage purposes. We must all realize the importance of being assured that first class salvage service will always be available on the St. Lawrence. The Foundation company organized its plant at Rimouski one or two years ago; this was not done at the request of the department as we were perfectly satisfied with the service given by the Quebec Salvage Company. If another company opens up a plant, is it fair that the grant should be divided? Suppose a third company starts to operate on the St. Lawrence, would it be fair to divide the grant by three? Suppose a fourth company opened up, would it be fair to divide it by four? We must be assured that we will always have a first class salvage organization on the St. Lawrence, and that is why the grant has been made up to date and that is why we have come to the conclusion that we should maintain that grant to the extent of $30,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I do not think the minister is being exactly fair to the Foundation company. He should remember that two years ago when the Department of Public Works agreed to construct the wharf at Rimouski, this company was compelled to pay half the cost of that work. They paid their bills and they paid for the dredging at Rimouski. They were assured that they would be given fair and due consideration and they have simply made a protest to the department that as far as their company was concerned it was unfair to give a substantial subsidy to a company that had received a subsidy for a great number of years. The Quebec company has hardly been operating as far as the lower St. Lawrence is concerned. The company at Rimouski is operating the most powerful tug on the lower St. Lawrence and their assistance has been called for by the Quebec Salvage Company. To all intents and purposes the Foundation company is doing all the work down there, and the arguments advanced by the minister hardly apply as far as the Maritime Foundation and Wrecking Company is concerned or as far as the city of Rimouski is concerned. I refer particularly to the distribution of coal for the Canadian National Railways in the section between Moncton and Levis, and also to the distribution of the fertilizers which have been accumulating at Rimouski for the last few years. In view of the service which the Foundation company has given, in view of the assistance given in the construction of the wharf and the reduction of our unemployed, I ask the minister to give further consideration to this matter. I ask him not to continue to give the reasons he has given for refusing this request. When this contract is to be renewed I ask him to take all these facts into consideration and divide the grant which he proposes to give to the other company.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not want my hon. friend to understand me as criticizing the operations of the Foundation company; that company is a very reliable one and is doing a large business in Canada. As a matter of fact, it carried out undertakings at St. John, New Brunswick, both for the department and for the harbour commission; it took a large part in the work of reconstruction after the fire which occurred last year. The department is on the best of terms with this company but I do not think it would be fair at the present time to divide the grant between the two companies. This company has been operating only for a year or two and I think it should be allowed to continue for another year or two before we either wipe out all grants or decide to divide them between the two companies.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It may be quite true that this company has been operating at Rimouski only for a couple of years, but it had been operating in other parts of the lower St. Lawrence for many years before that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: In Newfoundland.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The minister will admit that as far as emergency calls are concerned, the fact that this company is located at the entrance to the gulf enables them to render a better service than a company operating out of Quebec. I ask the minister to give this company an equal chance, or at least cut out all subsidies. I realize that he has given this company extremely fair consideration in the past, but I am talking for the city of Rimouski. I am going to try to get everything possible for Rimouski, notwithstanding what the minister may say.

Mr. DUFF: Do I understand correctly that this contract will expire on May 1, at which time a new contract will be entered into?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: In these days when we are trying to economize in every way, would it not be a good idea to call for tenders for this work? That is done in the Trade and Commerce department where they are subsidizing different steamship companies. I would suggest to the minister that instead of handing over this contract again to the Quebec Salvage Company he call for tenders and see which company is willing to do the work the cheapest. As the minister said a moment ago, this new salvage company may not stay in the business for very many years and therefore in calling for tenders he need have no fear that the department would not be properly protected. I would suggest that he call for tenders for a contract period of ten years and let the firms on the St. Lawrence tender for this work.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My intention was not to enter into any contract for the time being but rather to get along with this vote this year, and then we can see what we can do afterwards. The plea of my hon. friend from Rimouski is so strong that I shall take it under consideration. If the committee will allow this item to pass we will consider the advisability of dividing the grant.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps a new deputy minister will consider it.

Mr. PLUNKETT: What is the actual division as between Quebec and British Columbia under this vote?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I told the committee a moment ago, we are under contract with the Pacific Coast Salvage Company for another three years. They receive a grant of $10,000. If the finances of the country had permitted it we would perhaps have increased the grant to the Pacific Coast Salvage Company by five or ten thousand dollars, but as we are reducing the grants as a whole by over thirty thousand dollars, we could not make any increase to that company this year.

Mr. SHORT: Would the minister explain why it is necessary to give a grant to the salvage companies in the St. Lawrence and on the British Columbia coast? We have salvage companies operating in the maritime provinces without any subsidy at all, some of them profitably and others unprofitably, but they take their chance. There is perhaps not quite as much shipping in the maritime provinces, but there is still a great deal of shipping done there, and I would think that our salvage companies are entitled to the same consideration as those on the St. Lawrence and in British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: But we must remember that the maritimes get $160,000 of a fishing grant to which they are not entitled.

Mr. SHORT: That is only your opinion.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not like to repeat what I have already said to the committee, but it is of the greatest importance that we have in the St. Lawrence and on the Pacific coast first class salvage equipment for the protection of life and to give an efficient salvage service. Those companies which have been engaged in the salvage business in the St. Lawrence and on the Pacific coast in the past have been operating at great loss, and as it is essential to have first-class salvage equipment always in operation we thought fit to give this grant to the St. Lawrence and British Columbia companies. The salvage companies in the maritime provinces are in a different position because they operate all the year round, and the companies there are doing a good business, but on the St. Lawrence the salvage companies are losing money all the time.

Item agreed to.

Life saving service, including rewards for saving life, $50,000.

Mr. NEILL: This vote for life saving shows a cut of 33 per cent, and the ten per cent cut in wages would not account for ten per cent of this total cut because, of course, there are other expenses than wages. The point I wish to inquire about is this: So far as the Pacific coast is concerned, and I presume the same is true of the eastern coast, this life saving service is what I would call a specific one. That is, they have a steamer during certain months of the year, and they maintain two life boats equipped complete for service in the winter time but cut down to a skeleton staff in the summer. If you are going to reduce this vote by 33 per cent, are you going to cut down the personnel on these boats, which only have a meagre equipment now? Or how are you going to bring about this 33 per cent reduction, of which less than one-third is accounted for by the cut in wages?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have had to exercise strict economy this year, and the following economies have been effected in this service:

1. Winter crew of four extra men, each station, eliminated from Bamfield and Clayoquot, leaving six men each station—regular crew.
2. Two boatmen eliminated from Bay View and Cheticamp, leaving six men each station—regular crew.
3. West coast land patrol reduced to minimum cost, allowing no reserve.
4. Provision for wreck pay and rewards reduced to a minimum.

Mr. NEILL: I am afraid that this is an example of that economy which is expensive in the long run. It is all very well to economize where the economy involves at most only inconvenience. For instance, nowadays we sometimes ring up a $4,000 man in a department and a $2,400 man takes several minutes time getting the $4,000 man. Then the $4,000 man leaves his office unattended and walks along a corridor to the phone and communicates with the person who is calling him, and perhaps that process is repeated again a couple of minutes later—this in order to save a phone. I do not think that is true economy, but at most it involves only inconvenience and delay. But to exercise economy in a vote of this kind strikes at the very root of the matter. It is economizing at the possible expense of human lives. I know that west coast like a book, and these life boats are not fit to be taken out in winter with only a skeleton crew. The minister mentioned six men: but one must always be left at home as a watchman, and so forth. It has been found from experience that to man these boats adequately, and they are pretty big boats, so that they can put out to sea and reach the scene of a wreck, you must maintain more than six men in the winter time. I deprecate very much the suggestion of economizing in that way. I have not raised my voice in the house this session to protest against any other economy, painful and awkward as it has been in connection with many of the estimates. I am of opinion that such a change would imperil the lives of the crew and the usefulness of their operations. Of those six men one must constantly attend to the engine, another must steer, and another be in charge of the remaining three. Those four men would have to do the work of taking the people from a wreck while perhaps holding the boat off rocks, and so forth. If the minister has made his decision I can do no more than enter my protest.

At this time I should like to mention another point, which I had intended to raise during the discussion on the bill to reduce by ten per cent the salaries of civil servants. These wretchedly paid men receive only $65 per month. They are not stenographers here in Ottawa receiving only $65 per month, but they are men who maintain families and if called upon have to go out and risk their lives. In fact they must do that, or they would be of no use; and for those services they receive only $65 per month. In addition they receive $25 for board allowance making their total remuneration $90 per month. The $25 allowance however is not as beneficial to them as it would be to some one working in Ottawa, because those men are married and must maintain their homes, and the $25 just pays for their food on board ship. Therefore they are receiving considerably less remuneration than some workmen on shore. Of the $90 per month only $65 is available, because the $25 has to go to their mess.

Under the bill now going through this house stipulating a cut of ten per cent, these men receiving $1,080 per year will be cut $108, because they are not eligible for superannuation. They would like to have that benefit, but through the operation of some legal quirk they are not allowed to qualify. A case has been decided to that effect. If they were paying into a superannuation fund, by the provisions of the bill now going through the house the government would pay their superannuation allowances and they would be receiving a cut on their salaries of only five per cent, or $54. However, because they are not eligible for superannuation—because if they were to drown to-morrow their widows and children would receive no payment from the superannuation fund—they are to be taxed, forsooth, ten per cent. The cut is levied on the full salary of $1,080, whereas in my view it should be only five per cent and based on the monthly salary of $65, or the yearly salary of $780. Surely in such cases special consideration should be given. They are receiving less than $1,200 per year, and whether or not they are paying into a superannuation fund, they should not be docked more than five per cent.

As the bill reads to-day—and undoubtedly it will pass in its present form—these men receiving the miserable salary of $65 per month, or at the very most $90 per month, are going to be docked ten per cent simply because through an interpretation of the law they are not eligible for superannuation. Can we expect those men to be enthusiastic about their work when they see men receiving salaries greater than theirs docked only five per cent, and when they realize that from the beggarly renumeration I have mentioned will be cut ten per cent. I hope the minister will take steps to consider this injustice, and at least make an effort to arrange that these men be deducted only five per cent, the same as they would have been had they been paying into a superannuation fund. That is as good an illustration as I can think of; these men who are poorly paid and receiving only $1,080 must submit to a ten per cent cut, whereas other men receiving superannuation benefits are docked only five per cent. The fact is that they are really receiving only $780, and from that amount will be deducted ten per cent on $1,080. I am quite sure the minister will realize the justice of my suggestions and that he will do all within his power to get—I am not asking at present for better remuneration, although they certainly ought to have it—special consideration of their case whereby the cut may be reduced from ten per cent to five per cent.

Mr. SHORT: Mr. Chairman, I do not often agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but in some of the suggestions he has made to-day I concur. I have noticed that the minister intends to reduce by two a staff in my constituency. A few days ago I brought to his attention and to the attention of his department the fact that it was absolutely essential the crew should remain as it is. A reduction would not be in the best interests of the work that particular station is performing; in fact with a smaller crew, they could not possibly function. I trust the minister will comply with the request I have made to the effect that no reduction take place in the crew.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Chairman, I can tell the two gentlemen who have just taken their seats that the matters they have mentioned will be considered. I note that the Pacific coast life saving service is getting $20,400 out of the $50,000 vote, and with that amount I hope to be able to increase the crews of the boats I have just mentioned. We may consider decreasing the crews at other points, but to give proper crews to those boats.

Mr. NEILL: Might I suggest that the minister give consideration to the five per cent I mentioned.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We will consider the matter. The same point was brought to my attention by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis. I told him, and I now tell my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni that we will consider the question of increasing the crews at those stations.

Mr. DUFF: I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I happened to be in the house a few nights ago when an hon. member on this side of the house moved an amendment to the bill which deals with the horizontal reduction of ten per cent on salaries. Unless my memory is defective I recollect the hon. member for Comox-Alberni voted for the horizontal reduction of ten per cent on the salary of every civil servant, although to-day he seems to be advocating a graduated cut. I am entirely in agreement with his present attitude; in fact I go farther, and say that I am opposed to any reduction on any civil servant's salary. I am surprised indeed—perhaps I should be gratified—to learn to-day that for some reason or other my hon. friend has had a change of heart.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He has seen the light.

Mr. DUFF: He now comes forward and asks for a reduction of only five per cent from the salaries of men who are performing a very great service to this country, the members of life saving crews. I agree entirely that there should be no reduction of their salaries; instead of a five per cent reduction there should be none whatever.

I agree with him that it would not be good policy on the part of the department to reduce the number of men on those crews from ten to six. The boats are very large; they have to be launched in very rough weather and more than six men are required to handle them. I should like to know how the minister arrived at this particular reduction; which men has he decided to leave off the crews? Will he discharge the whole ten men, and then have the Civil Service Commission appoint six others? It would be interesting to know the plan adopted.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, while the minister is preparing an answer, I should like to reply to my hon. friend's remarks in reference to myself. I observe with pain he does not know that those boatmen are not appointed by the Civil Service Commission, but by political influence.

Mr. DUFF: I did not say they were so appointed; I asked if they were.

Mr. NEILL: I am surprised that with his long attendance in this house he does not know it. I was glad to see that while he started his remarks in a spirit of modified antagonism, later on he agreed thoroughly with me. As regards how I voted the other day, though it is foreign to the discussion now, I suppose I may be allowed to explain my position. I voted for the second reading of the bill to cut my salary and salaries of civil servants ten per cent, and I am prepared to go to my constituents and defend that action. That was the principle of the bill. But at the very moment when I so voted I had in my desk, written in my own hand, an amendment to move in committee to section three providing against the condition I have been describing, and asking that men drawing less than $1,200 should not be docked anything at all, or at most not more than five per cent. I had provided for dealing with just exactly the case I have been describing this afternoon. So I do not think I am guilty of having changed my attitude. However, that is such a trifling detail that I need not waste the time of the house on it. I am glad to get support along the line the hon. member suggested for not reducing the men on the boats. When a minister says he will look into it and endeavour to do something, we generally suppose he is going to do something, so I must for the time being accept his promise.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. minister be so kind as to inform us whether there exists a life saving service in the province of Quebec and, if so, in what localities.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): There is no life saving service in the province of Quebec, this service exists however in the provinces of British Columbia, Ontario, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister please reply to my question with regard to whether the boat crews have been reduced?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say offhand whether we have come to the conclusion to reduce the crews on the eastern coast. In my answer I was dealing with the crews on the western coast. But I will also look into the situation on the eastern coast. If we decide we cannot reduce the crews, then we shall have to cut expenses in some other direction, but we will consider the matter.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the marine insurance rates be higher on account of the fact that item 140 has been reduced?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the rates will be the same.

Mr. POULIOT: Did the minister have any communication with Lloyd's?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have had no communication with Lloyd's, but on the other hand we never gave them any undertaking that we would maintain the estimate at $1,860,000. I can assure my hon. friend that the cut will not curtail the efficiency of the service. We do not anticipate any increase in the rates of marine insurance.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Neill.]

Hydrographic and tidal and current surveys, and to provide for the maintenance and repair of hydrographic steamers, $468,000.

Mr. NEILL: Will this allow for commissioning the Lillooet on the west coast?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, sir.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does that provide also for the Acadia?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Two or three years ago there was a very distinguished specialist in the hydrographic survey; I refer to Mr. Savary. He was a very efficient public servant, but he accepted a position in the provincial service of Quebec because his salary in the federal service was too low. If there is a decrease in the salaries of the specialists who are making hydrographic maps, does not the minister fear that some of them may be attracted elsewhere? If they leave the service would he not find it difficult to replace them?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I was not at the head of the department when Mr. Savary accepted a position in the provincial service of Quebec, but I am sorry that we have lost the services of such an expert. At the present time we have first-class men attending to this work, and they are so devoted to the department and so patriotic that I do not think they would ever dream of resigning on account of the cut.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a question of patriotism, Mr. Chairman, it is a question of necessity. My remarks were not a criticism of those employees.

Mr. REID: Are the hydrographic surveys regarding the depth of channel, tidal and other data with respect to the Fraser river made available to the public?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the same question was put to me last year by my hon. friend. On that occasion I told him that this part of the work belongs to the Department of Public Works, not to the marine department.

Mr. REID: Is it done every year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not by the Marine department, but by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. NEILL: Does not Mr. Parizeau furnish plans as a result of the operations of the Lillooet? I am glad to pay tribute to the excellent work he and his assistants do.

They chart a certain area, and the maps are issued to navigators and others who need them. I am only too pleased to testify to the usefulness of their work.

Mr. REID: Complaint is made that it is very difficult to obtain such data in regard to the Fraser river.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The Marine department attends to inlet, bay and ocean surveys, not to the survey of rivers.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Will the hon. minister inform us what work has been accomplished by his department in connection with the hydrographic survey in the gulf of St. Lawrence?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I cannot say exactly how far the work has been proceeded with. My information is that the department will continue this year the hydrographic survey of the gulf on the north shore. The Acadia will proceed to that part of the gulf at the opening of navigation in order to carry on the hydrographic work of last year.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): What about the south shore?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): We shall begin by the north shore; it is possible that we may proceed later on with the hydrographic survey of the south shore.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): How many boats perform this hydrographic survey?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): On the Atlantic coast, we have the Acadia and the Cartier. On the Pacific coast, the Lillooët and two smaller boats, the Pender and Somass. As the committee is aware, we are at present building, at Collingwood, a boat which will also be utilized in the hydrographic service. This quite up to date boat will be launched at an early date and will carry out, I feel certain, efficient and considerable work. I cannot say for certain whether it will undertake hydrographic work this year, but assuredly next year.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Have we any boat performing hydrographic work on the Canadian side of the Great lakes?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): There is no hydrographic work being done, at present, on the Great lakes.

Mr. POULIOT: (Translation): Are there marine charts to indicate the tides?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): For the Great lakes?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): We have all this information. Hydrographic surveys have already been carried out on the Great lakes and these charts are at our disposal.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): When was the last complete hydrographic chart of the St. Lawrence river and gulf published?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I think that it was some years past that the last hydrographic chart of the St. Lawrence was published, however, as the work progresses, the department makes the necessary corrections.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Does the department keep track of the erosion, the silt piled up by the currents, and all such matters? I understand that the geographic maps keep track of them.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): They must be kept track of since it is for that purpose that charts are made.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): What is the sale price of these charts?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): They cost very little. Should my hon. friend wish to obtain one, he can do so at very little cost and even gratuitously, I think, by addressing his request to the Department of Marine.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the minister would tell me if the survey of the channel between the wharf at Rimouski and deep water has been made by the hydrographic survey and, if so, if he could give me an idea of the depth of that deep water channel.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I regret that I have not this information with me.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the minister would be good enough to have one of his officials obtain that information for me, and I will tell the minister why I ask. Last year the report was circulated all through the press of Canada that the channel was only seven feet deep, though three years ago it was dredged to a depth of 16 feet. Unfortunately it has filled in to a certain extent, and last year I asked the minister if he would be kind enough to let us have the services of one of the departmental dredges in order to have that channel maintained at a proper depth.

What I am anxious to know is this: Has the map of the channel been corrected sufficiently to enable navigators to know exactly what is the actual depth of the channel between deep water and the wharf itself?

Along the wharf at Rimouski the water is 22 feet deep; the channel was to be the same depth, but it was dredged to only 16 feet and consequently some of the big boats belonging to the local trading people dare not come to Rimouski, since their navigators are under the impression that the channel is only 7 or 9 feet deep. I wish the minister would do me the kindness to ascertain the exact condition of the channel and let it be made public, either through the press or by circulation of the departmental report, so that the local navigators will be made fully aware of the depth of the channel, in order to give Rimouski harbour a proper chance.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will do with pleasure what my hon. friend requests.

Mr. POULIOT: Since the Acadia and the Cartier are in the St. Lawrence service would the minister tell me who supplies the coal for these boats and who supplies the food and clothing for the crews. I should like to know if tenders are called for and, if so, how they are called and what time is given in which to tender.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say offhand where the coal is bought. As to the food, on those boats we have employees who are under contract to supply food to the crew at so much a day.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is not the Acadia an oil burner?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, there is no oil used on these boats.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is the minister sure the Acadia is not an oil burner?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not sure whether it is oil or coal, but the provisions are supplied under contract.

Mr. POULIOT: What about the uniforms for the crews?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We do not supply uniforms for these crews. I am sure we did not buy any uniforms this year.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the construction of a new steamer for hydrographic surveys, $147,000.

Mr. NEILL: Is this boat for use on the Pacific coast?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Will this sum complete it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

[Sir Eugène Fiset.]

Mr. NEILL: When will it be ready for operation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the boat will be launched next week at Collingwood.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the minister make a speech on that occasion?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Unfortunately I cannot get away; we are too busy here.

Mr. NEILL: Is it a coal burner?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes. The hon. member will remember that last year the matter was brought up in the house, and at the request of the hon. gentleman, supported by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie), I had the specifications modified. If I remember correctly I had to have the boat lengthened by 14 feet, and I had to have a double bottom built instead of a single bottom, in order to encourage our Canadian mines.

Mr. NEILL: I congratulate the minister on that action. Now may I put in a plea with regard to the name of this boat. It is to be used on the Pacific coast, and it will be largely occupied with work on the west coast of Vancouver island. So it would seem appropriate that in some way its name should symbolize this connection with that coast. I am not suggesting that it should be called after my wife or anything like that; I have no ambition to immortalize my name in that way, but I think it would be appropriate to give the vessel some name thoroughly typical of the historical associations of the west coast.

I would suggest the name "Alberni," which is the name of the largest town on that coast. This place was named after Count Alberni, who was what we would call to-day the navigating lieutenant of the fleet of Quadra, the Spanish commander who occupied the west coast. Later, by means of a treaty consummated at Nootka with the British officer, Captain Vancouver, the Spanish commander agreed to evacuate the whole of that territory, and that was how it came into possession of the British crown. So I think the name "Alberni" would be thoroughly symbolical of this historical occurrence. The Canadian Pacific Railway, which operates coastal boats in those waters, has followed that idea by calling its latest steamship after an Indian princess who gained fame in connection with the treaty signed at Nootka, when the British captain and the Spanish commander met. I would respectfully urge upon the minister that he consider a name like that, which would be far more appropriate than the name of some politician who passes like a shadow that is gone with the break of day.

Mr. PLUNKETT: When the minister is considering a choice of names, I think "Independent" might be symbolical; it might represent the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in his political aspirations which we have seen demonstrated so often in this house. There is a question I want to ask, however. Is the boat completely furnished and equipped, or will the furnishings be bought on the Pacific coast?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Answering first the question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I am sorry that his suggestion was not brought forward sooner, because the ship has been named.

Mr. NEILL: Before being launched?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes; we had to name the ship about a month or two ago, before launching her. The name we chose was that of the man who had been in charge of the hydrographic department in Ottawa for years. He had been a very devoted servant of the department, over which he had had charge for a number of years, and he was an outstanding hydrographer. I refer to the late Mr. William J. Stewart. We thought, after mature consideration, that we should christen the boat Stewart, in recognition of the services of a faithful public servant who died about two years ago.

Mr. NEILL: This is the first time in a rather long experience that I have heard of a child having been christened before it was born. It was really premature. Suppose it had turned out to be of a different sex from what was anticipated? Until the actual launching takes place, and some fair lady breaks a bottle of wine on the ship, the name should be subject to revision. I say this with all due respect to the memory of Mr. Stewart, whom I have heard spoken of casually as a man that had been of great service in his own department. But Mr. Stewart had no associations, either personal or geographical, with the area in which the boat operates and I submit that it would be more appropriate, if a boat is to be named after him, that it should be a boat navigating on the Atlantic coast, where he was more in touch with conditions and where the people would recognize the significance of the name. The first thing the minister knows, people on the Pacific coast will be supposing that this boat was named after the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), which I am sure is not his intention or ambition. I would submit, if it is not too late yet, that the name I have suggested or some similar name would be far more appropriate. I leave without any comment or reply the witticism of the hon. member for Victoria with regard to the name he suggests.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Perhaps I did not express myself correctly when I said that the boat had been named. What I wanted to convey was that we had to cut the name into the frame of the boat, and when the time came to have this done my attention was called to the necessity of fixing upon a name. I had a conference with my officials and the matter was discussed thoroughly, and we decided upon the name Stewart, which was accordingly cut into the frame of the boat. The boat will be christened in due course. As regards the question asked by the hon. member for Victoria, the boat must be delivered on the Pacific coast from Collingwood, which means that she must be equipped before she leaves that point.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What will be the total cost of the boat?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Around $700,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Were tenders called for?

Mr. DURANLEAU: To be exact, the amount is $616,800.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How many tenders were received?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Eight or ten, or probably more.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Was that the lowest?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We had tenders from all part of the dominion—from Quebec, from the maritime provinces, from British Columbia and from Ontario.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What is the tonnage?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Unfortunately I have everything but the tonnage. The length is 214 feet; breadth, 36 feet; depth, 23·6; horsepower, 1,300; speed, 12 knots.

Mr. NEILL: Horse-power 1,300?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The horse-power is 1,300 indicated.

Mr. NEILL: How does it compare with the Lillooet in size?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not know, but it will be an up to date boat for hydrographic purposes.

Mr. NEILL: If it started out with the right name it would be all right.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps before naming the boat the minister read that most eloquent eulogy of the dead by Pericles, as recorded in Thucydides, that the memory of those who have died for their country shall not be forgotten. But there is something else that should not be forgotten: we should not forget the living. We should see to it that the living are well taken care of, and for this reason I would ask the minister to be careful about curtailing the number of employees in his department who are still alive, much as I admire his respect for the dead.

Mr. HEENAN: What was the lowest tender received?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The contract price was $616,800.

Mr. HEENAN: Was that the lowest tender?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That was the lowest.

Mr. HEENAN: And the next one?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The second lowest was about $40,000 or $50,000 more.

Mr. HEENAN: In letting these contracts for ships of this kind, there is one thing that should be taken into consideration before the minister recommends to the government the acceptance of a tender. The minister should take into consideration the difference in the wages paid. I understand that this ship is intended to ply in Pacific waters and tenders for its construction were called for and the lowest tender accepted. If there is only about $50,000 difference between the lowest and the next highest tender, I think it would be safe to say that the difference between wages paid in British Columbia shipyards and those paid in Collingwood would amount to more than $50,000. I am not strongly in favour of giving a contract to the lowest tenderer when it is manifest that the difference will be taken out of the labouring man. This practice is conducive to the payment of low wages, and is against the very basis of the fair wage policy of the federal government. Contractors should not be permitted to accept contracts on the cut-throat method, as we used to call it; they should not be allowed to make a low tender and then take it out of the pockets of the working man. I am quite satisfied that if the difference in wages paid on the Pacific coast had been taken into account, there would be found to be a difference of more than $50,000—perhaps even $100,000—in the total payroll. I think the minister should look into this matter to see that no contracts are awarded to contractors, manufacturers or construction concerns who pay the lowest wages.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Was a tender received from the Prince Rupert Dry Dock Company?

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my memory serves me aright, one was received but it was for a very high figure. I can give my hon. friend definite information in this regard if he so desires.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Was the fact that this company is owned and operated by the government taken into consideration? When future ships are to be built, especially the Pacific coast service, I think this dry dock should be considered as it is operating on the Pacific coast and is subsidized by the government.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be glad to bear that in mind.

Mr. HEENAN: Has the minister any information as to the wages paid to the various craftsmen employed by the Collingwood shipyard as compared with wages paid in British Columbia shipyards?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not that information before me. I may tell my hon. friend that the Collingwood shipyard has subscribed to the fair wage clause. The company has been in conference with the then Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) as to the rates of wages to be paid for the construction of this ship. We have always understood that we were obliged to accept the lowest tender, and that was the one received from the Collingwood shipyard.

Mr. HEENAN: The prevailing rates of wages at Collingwood might be 25 per cent lower than the rates paid on the Pacific coast, and consequently the workmen in British Columbia shipyards might be denied employment if this fact was not taken into consideration. When a ship is to be built for Pacific waters the contract for its construction should not be given to a shipyard in other parts of the country where a lower rate of wages prevails.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Especially when the government has a plant of its own.

Item agreed to.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, before the next item is called, may I ask the minister if he will agree to having items numbers 148 and 149 considered together, as they both relate to radio service?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have no objection.

Mr. POULIOT: I think it would facilitate discussion.

Radio service, to provide for the construction and maintenance of radio ship to shore stations and the general administration of the provisions of the Radio Act and regulations throughout the Dominion, $716,000.

Radio service, to provide for the general improvement of reception conditions to licensed broadcast listeners, $180,400.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, there are hundreds of thousands of radio fans in this country, and this year the cost of a radio licence has been increased from one to two dollars. These radio listeners are complaining about the fact that the service mentioned in item 149 is not what it should be. People purchase radios, some of them very expensive, and they are entitled to good service. The minister knows that the least trouble is a great handicap to radio reception, and that is why it was decided by the previous administration to organize a staff of part-time inspectors. Most of the present day radio sets are batteryless, they are connected to the lighting current and when trouble occurs in one machine, other machines on the same current feel the effects. These inspectors have special apparatus and they go throughout the community in an effort to eliminate trouble for the listeners. The licence fee has been increased, and of that we do not complain but on behalf of all radio listeners in Canada I would urge the minister to see that the number of radio inspectors is not reduced.

There is another matter—I have no personal interest in it beyond that of any other radio listener—and that is that those who will be working under this vote should be men well qualified for the work. In my home town the chief electrician of the city is doing this inspection work and doing it very well. He is provided with certain apparatus to help him locate troubles, and he is doing very well in eliminating trouble and improving reception conditions. I would ask the minister if it is his intention to retain the men who are now performing this work efficiently to the great benefit of all radio fans in the country.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The hon. member's remarks are quite in order. The licence fee has been increased from one dollar to two dollars. I agree with my hon. friend that the owners of radio sets who are paying a licence fee are entitled to first-class service, and my department will attempt to give the best service possible. When the estimates were brought before the house, I think, although I am not quite sure, that the licence fee had not been increased. I cannot make any definite promise to the committee, but if within a few days I come to the conclusion that the amount I am now asking the committee to vote is not sufficient to give a first-class service, I shall see that a certain amount is inserted in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will have to be approved by the Prime Minister.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for his kind remarks. I would point out that the number of those inspectors is small, there being only one I believe in each town, and if the number of inspectors is reduced, some of the towns in this country, which ones we do not know, will suffer. I have been told that the dispensing with the services of thirty-seven of these inspectors is under consideration. The Canadian people do not complain so much of paying a licence fee of two dollars instead of one dollar, but I do submit that they are entitled to receive just as good service when they are paying a two dollar fee as when they were paying one dollar. If there is not a good inspection service, interference may be continuous, with no one to stop it, and the least little trouble may sometimes cause the reception to be such that a radio is not worth listening to. I urge the minister therefore to reconsider this matter seriously. If at the time his estimate was prepared it had not been decided to increase the licence fee, I would suggest that now that the fee has been increased, conditions are different and the decision with respect to this inspection service should be different, in the interests of the radio listeners of this country.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have been asked by a number of radio users in my province to say something of the same nature as has just been said. Throughout parts at least of the province of Alberta, and particularly in the smaller towns and villages, where the use of radio has become very extensive, people have urged, and have asked me to place the matter before the minister, that their complaints as to interference are not receiving the attention they should. They had no objection to paying a licence fee, even a higher fee than had been charged, provided that they got the service, but they do feel, particularly the people in the smaller towns and villages, that the interference is too frequent and often from a cause which a qualified inspector would find trivial and could easily remove. Possibly there is not a sufficient number of inspectors; at all events adequate service was not given. They felt that they were not getting their money's worth. On behalf of these users of the radio I transmit this complaint to the minister, and now particularly as it has turned out that their anticipations of a higher licence fee were correct I would urge the minister, to see that the service is improved. As I have said, the people particularly in the small towns and villages feel that they are not getting the service to which they are entitled, that their complaints are left unremedied, and interference is allowed to continue.

While I am on my feet there is another matter I wish to mention. We all know that some aspects of the radio question are now before a committee of this house, and I would ask the minister if it is not possible that from the report of that committee recommendations may come and changes be made which would completely alter the whole aspect of things so far as the present estimates are concerned. Or is it more likely that any such changes will be for the future and will not affect the estimates of this year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think that the findings of the committee will affect in any way the estimates of this year. I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman has said with regard to interference troubles in the province of Alberta, and that the service should be improved, and it is the intention of the department to appoint a greater number of inspectors in that province.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am very glad to hear the minister say so, because the use of radio is increasing very rapidly in Alberta.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): We have one inspector for the city of Sydney, and I am in receipt of a letter from him to-day saying that his services are being dispensed with; consequently we will have no inspector in Sydney. I am anxious to know just what inspection service is being provided in a case like that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that the services of the part-time inspector in Sydney have not been dispensed with. He is still in the service and we are considering the matter. Whether in such cases we will provide the service by using a local man or by using regular men in adjacent towns and cities is under consideration. If we receive a larger amount for that service we will undoubtedly retain the services of the man to whom reference has been made, because I am told he is very efficient.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I understand he has received notice that his services will not be required after the end of the month.

Mr. DURANLEAU: He is still working for the department.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I trust the minister will continue his services, because I understand he is well qualified.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think we will be able to satisfy the hon. member.

Mr. TAYLOR: Can the minister estimate the amount of money which will be received under the new rate of licence fee?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can tell the hon. member that at the rate of one dollar per licence we received last year the sum of $510,000 net, commissions having been paid. At the two dollar rate we expect to collect about $1,200,000.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Then, so far as that part of the branch is concerned, we may conclude it is self-supporting?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. TAYLOR: Although there is a reduction of $44,600 in the estimate, the minister tells us the figure was struck before the government decided to increase the licence fee. Would he give us the assurance that since the licence fee has been increased his department will see that more attention is paid complaints regarding interference?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can assure my hon. friend that if we get the money we will give better service.

Mr. TAYLOR: The department will be receiving another $500,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: When will the new rate of two dollars come into force?

Mr. DURANLEAU: On April 1.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the minister see that proper advertising is given in the local press, not only in the county of Rimouski but throughout the district of the lower St. Lawrence river? In the constituency of Rimouski we have a newspaper called Le Progres du Golfe, and advertisement could be made in that paper. When the rate of one dollar was put into effect the people in the lower St. Lawrence district did not know to whom they were to pay the licence fees. There were no advertisements in the local press, and no posters in local post offices. Postmen were supposed to collect the fee, but unfortunately they told the people that they had no authority to collect. As a result an inspector came down to the town of Rimouski and prosecuted fifteen or twenty people who had not paid their licence fee because they did not know where to pay them. Now that a new rate is coming into force, I suggest that the minister advertise in the local paper, Le Progres du Golfe, and that posters be placed in post offices throughout the lower St. Lawrence district. I beg that this be done in the interests of the people of that district, and I am sure the department will benefit if they avail themselves of my suggestion.

At this time I should like to direct my remarks to another point. Two years ago the Department of Marine spent a great deal of money on new instrumentation of the Marconi station at Father Point. The new instrumentation was supposed to do away with static in the lower St. Lawrence region. The fact is however that conditions are worse than ever. If proper inspection of the new installations had been made by the department some of the difficulty might have been eliminated. I would ask the minister to issue instructions that inspection be made of the new installations to see if the condition can be remedied. The static is a nuisance to the radio fans in the county of Rimouski, and especially in the town of Rimouski. I assure him the whole population in our section of the country would be extremely obliged if he would have an inspection made with a view to improving conditions.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have no objection to recommending a further inspection. I am told however by the chief of my department that the trouble does not arise from the station, but is due to the fact that during the summer months static is caused by the foreign boats going up and down the St. Lawrence river. I am happy, however, to accept my hon. friend's suggestion, and will have the station thoroughly inspected once more.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the minister take the necessary steps to advertise as I have suggested?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, although I do not promise that we will accept the particular advertising mediums suggested by my hon. friend.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The newspaper I mentioned is friendly to my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We will take steps to inform the people in the St. Lawrence district, and in every other part of Canada, as to the amount of the licence fee and where it should be paid.

Mr. RYERSON: In my opinion the system of appointing part time inspectors at small salaries has not been satisfactory. I cannot conceive of a man receiving only $20, $30, or $40 per month having very much interest in his work. I think I am safe in saying that in my own constituency not one person out of a hundred knows there is an inspector in the district; they do not know his name. I do not think that we have received value for a great part of the money which has been expended for the services of part time inspectors. A system of appointing full time inspectors, even if they were fewer in number, would be far more satisfactory, and radio users would know to whom they must go when they experience trouble. To my mind, sir, a system such as I have described would be preferable to the present one.

Mr. SPOTTON: I should like to ask the minister this question: From what point is the county of Huron served, and from what centre does the trouble man come?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand the man who attends to the trouble in the county of Huron comes from Kitchener or London.

Mr. SPOTTON: I quite agree with the hon. member for Brantford City that since we are to derive such a large revenue we should get down to a system of county inspection. The cities of London, and Kitchener, Ontario, are from seventy to one hundred miles from some parts of my constituency, and I do not know that I have ever seen one of the trouble men who, the minister has told us, are located in London or Kitchener. I am told that the wagon passes through occasionally on fine days or holidays. We do not know who he is, we do not know where to send for him. I understood the minister to say that the radio licence was raised from one to two dollars to enable him to spend more to ensure radio listeners getting better reception. I contend that that was not at all necessary. During the first ten months of the past fiscal year the revenue of the radio department was $494,648.26 and the expenditure $167,053.65. So the department was able to donate to the exchequer a third of a million dollars. In the preceding year, 1930-31, the net revenue was $459,469.32, and the expenditure $221,655.90. I register my protest against the raising of the radio licence fee to two dollars, and I do so in a very orthodox fashion, because the minister will remember that as representing a county which I do not expect to have blotted off the map in favour of any other county, I asked him before any changes were made in radio policy to give me an opportunity of expressing my people's views in the matter. I believe that in my county of North Huron, regardless of politics, any person who has a radio, or expects to get one, objects to this increase in the licence fee, especially when the department had a surplus of a third of a million dollars for the first ten months of the past fiscal year. But not only is the increase in the licence fee objected to; this is only a start and we do not know where the minister or succeeding ministers may stop. In Ontario the government first imposed a war tax of one cent a gallon on gasoline, but they were not content with that and increased the tax to two cents, then to three, four, five and finally to six cents, and to-day they are actually apologizing that the tax is a cent lower than in some of the other provinces. As governments in the future look around for revenue I am just a little fearful, Mr. Minister, that the radio licence will be an awfully convenient place just to put on another dollar, and another year another dollar. I feel that my people have not been properly treated, inasmuch as their representative asked over a year ago that before any changes were made he should at least be given an opportunity to express their views to the minister. I do not propose to have the whitewash brush put over my constituency and any other constituency in the province painted red. I protest against this raise in the licence fee. It was not necessary to get more revenue to improve radio reception, for already you have far more revenue than you need. These are strenuous times, and if the department really wanted more money there might not be any very strong objection to an increase, but on the face of it there is no necessity for this increase and in any event we want to know exactly what the minister proposes to do with the additional revenue. While the radio committee is taking evidence I hope the minister is not a mile or two ahead of them and formulating a policy for which this increased revenue will be needed. Before anything of the kind is done, I for one wish to have an opportunity of presenting my views upon the matter.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. gentleman rightly understood my remarks. I did not say that we increased the licence fee to $2 because we needed money to give better service to radio listeners. After studying the question very carefully the government came to the conclusion to charge radio owners a licence fee of two dollars. Maybe it is to help the exchequer, but if so, I am sure the radio listeners in North Huron as well as those in other constituencies will gladly contribute.

Mr. SPOTTON: Is it to help the exchequer?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am confident that radio owners will gladly help the country in this difficult financial situation. The government thought that any citizen who owns a radio and receives good service and hears all kinds of interesting programs would not object to paying a two dollars licence fee. Of course, the additional revenue will be a great help to this country, and I think when he has considered the matter carefully my hon. friend will share the views of the government on this question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then it is a tax, because the minister does not need this increased revenue for the purpose of giving service to radio listeners; he has more than sufficient money for this purpose under the one dollar licence fee. This increase is a tax. Why not say so?

Mr. MANION: "A rose by any other name—".

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. REID: What proportion does the number of licence fees collected bear to the number of radio owners?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot tell exactly, but this year we have collected over $600,000 in radio licence fees. We intend to see that every radio owner pays the licence.

Mr. REID: I think it would be far better for the minister to see that the licence fee was collected from every radio owner rather than increase the fee to $2 to the willing payer.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We hope every radio owner will be willing to pay this licence fee. If we come to the conclusion that all those owning radios have not taken out their licence we will have our inspectors take the necessary steps to enforce payment.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: On that point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister that the present system of collecting the licence fee is not very satisfactory. It is left to the option of the individual radio owner to go to some person in the locality who has the sale of radio licences. But the honest man is up against this difficulty. The local licence distributor in the past was required to buy the licences in books of ten, valued at one dollar apiece, for which he sent $9 to some central office. He might have several of these books on hand for months without disposing of the licences, with his money tied up in the meantime, and this made him very reluctant to buy sufficient books in advance to meet the local demand. I know that radio owners in my constituency have found it very difficult to get a licence when they wanted it. The local distributor would not have any licences on hand, and weeks later those desiring licences would find him still without a supply. He put up the argument that it was not fair that he should be required to invest his own money in those books without knowing how many individual licences would be required. Now with a two dollar licence it is going to be even worse. I was wondering if this point had been brought to the attention of the minister, and if there is not some better way of administration so that the licences will be there when the individuals come for them.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Since the increase to two dollars the question of collection has been under consideration. It may be that the system in force up to this time has not been as effective as it might have been, but we are studying the matter. We will see that everyone pays for his licence this year, and if we have to change our method of collection we will do so. The matter is under consideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I should like to ask the minister just what machinery there is for collecting these licences at present. In Saskatchewan, where the police are partly federal and partly provincial, the mounted police undertake that responsibility, but what is being done in the other provinces where the federal government has nothing in the way of a police force? Surely there must be some machinery for checking up on these licences.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Licences are issued by the radio dealers, the banks, the post office branches and by any vendor who applies to the department for books of licences, as was mentioned by an hon. member a moment ago. Of the amount of $571,000 collected last year the radio dealers collected $416,069; the post office department $123,000 and the vendors $32,000. The radio dealers receive a commission of ten per cent; the post office staffs get a commission of five per cent, and ten per cent is paid the other vendors. This year we intend to allow a commission of 15 cents on each licence, which is at the rate of 7½ per cent.

As I told another hon. member, we are studying the question to-day in connection with the collection of these licence fees. It is a very important matter, and it is only fair that everyone who owns a radio should pay the licence. I hope to be in a position this year to collect the licence for every radio in Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It appears that at present the government provides only the machinery for furnishing licences, and that there is no machinery for really enforcing the law, except in the provinces where the mounted police operate. They are federal as well as provincial officers, but in provinces where there is only a provincial police force I take it that no one has any particular interest in enforcing the law. It means that if a citizen is law-abiding and takes out his licence everything is all right, but apparently there is no machinery for coping with the people who use radios but fail to take out a licence at all. That is the point to which I was referring.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As the hon. member knows, for the last two years the federal jurisdiction has been challenged by several provinces, including Ontario and Quebec, and during that period no prosecutions have been carried on. Since the question of jurisdiction has been definitely settled by the privy council, however, we intend to see that everyone pays his licence fee, and those who refuse to pay will be prosecuted in due course. Of course every opportunity will be given every citizen of Canada to pay his fee; if necessary, when a citizen is willing to pay we will give him ample time, but we intend to see that every citizen pays his licence fee.

Mr. POULIOT: If there were one hundred thousand radio owners in this country a fee of one dollar would bring in a total of $100,000. If the cost of administration of the department was $200,000 then I would agree that the licence should be increased from one to two dollars in order to give better service to owners of radios. On the other hand, however, if with $100,000 this department can be managed very well, I do not see why this increase should be made. The old Romans used to ask for bread and games, and human nature has not changed very much. Perhaps good radio service has done more than chapter 58 of 1931, for the peace, order and good government of this country.

I say that in lighter vein, but I am very serious about it. There are many poor people in the country who have very little to eat, who live in homes which are far from comfortable and who are consoled, while waiting for better times, by listening to concerts and speeches by my good friend the Minister of Marine and his leader, which come over the radio. These people are cheered, while waiting for better times, by being able to listen to the radio; when they feel depressed or distressed, to use a famous word, they turn the switch and hear a nice concert coming from Toronto, Montreal, New York or somewhere else. It gives them courage and helps them forget their trouble. This is a psychological fact, as everyone will admit, so I say it is very important to make things easy for the poor people in order to give them a chance to hear good music at little cost. So I say that if the increase is to improve the service I am in favour of it, while if it is to plug a hole somewhere else I am against it.

I have great regard for the Minister of Marine; I am sure he speaks in good faith when he says he will reconsider the matter of inspectors. I hope that if when he does so he makes a favourable decision and he will not replace the old, competent men with new, incompetent men. In conclusion may I ask if there is to be any decrease in the number of men operating the radio beacons in the St. Lawrence river and in the gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I may tell the hon. gentleman that there will be no decrease in the number of employees operating the radio beacons on the St. Lawrence, and I can also assure my hon. friend that competent inspectors who were employed last year will remain in our service during this year.

Mr. CAMPBELL: When this licence fee was first imposed it was generally understood by the public—and I believe the government made it clear at the time—that it was intended simply to provide service for radio owners. In the small towns and villages, throughout my part of the country at any rate, there is a great deal of trouble through interference from telephone wires, from small electric plants, and all that sort of thing. There are a great many difficulties in that way and it seems utterly impossible to get an inspector there to look into the situation. Inspectors, I know, are employed by the government, and when the radio owner pays his licence fee he expects to get in return just that kind of service. That was what the money was supposed to be for. In my part of the country we have found it impossible to get such service. I have personally complained to the inspectors at Regina and elsewhere, but I have not been able to get them to come to these little towns to investigate the trouble. In some small places, owing to imperfections in the lighting system, when the lighting plant is in operation it is impossible to hear anything. Will the minister assure us that in future we shall get, in return for the money we pay, some service that will enable us to use the radio under favourable conditions? Will he undertake to have these plants and telephone wires checked up so that the local authorities will know where the difficulty lies?

Mr. BARBER: Following up the remarks of the hon. member, I want to ask a question. When the inspectors discover such trouble as my hon. friend has mentioned, due to some power corporation or private plants, has the department the power to compel these people to remedy the condition that is causing the trouble, and are they doing so?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have no power to order companies to stop their operations if they are causing trouble, but I am told that as a matter of fact when our inspectors locate any trouble the companies are always willing to see that a stop is put to it.

Mr. BARBER: The trouble is chiefly with the small plants, and it would require little to remedy it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As a rule, the companies are quite accommodating. As to the service given in the province of Saskatchewan, we have to-day six regular men who go around in cars the year round.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Six men in the province of Saskatchewan alone?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Then it is strange we do not see them in our part of the country.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Perhaps there are no complaints from those parts.

Mr. CAMPBELL: There are complaints; I can assure the minister that I have made many complaints myself.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to look into the matter. I can assure the hon. gentleman that my department will give the best service possible in his part of the province.

Mr. HEENAN: I was very glad to hear the minister say that he would maintain an efficient radio inspection service. I received a letter this morning from the town of Fort Frances in northern Ontario, where the part time inspector has just received notice from the office of the department in Winnipeg to the effect that his services will not be required after April 15. There is no use repeating the arguments that have been made; suffice it to say that in that town and district we have a good deal of trouble. The town is about 250 miles from Winnipeg and about the same distance from the head of the lakes. I shall be glad if the minister will assure me either that a part time inspector will be kept on or that he will provide a full time inspector.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When the notice was given, the policy with regard to inspection had not been definitely settled, but we thought it advisable to give notice in order that we might be free to make any decision we thought fit. I can assure the hon. gentleman that Fort Frances will receive proper service. If it is necessary to keep on a part time inspector in that place, one will be maintained. At any rate, the matter will be inquired into to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The minister has said that since the privy council's decision his department will see that licence fees are collected without fail under the two dollar rate. I was wondering just what will be taken for granted with regard to the question whether a radio which has been installed is actually in use. I have been told that if a person has an aerial erected it is assumed that he is operating a radio. I would point out that at the present time in the west, in Saskatchewan at least, there are many aerials installed and perhaps many machines in the homes, although they are not in use owing to financial conditions. If that is the case, will the radio licence fee be required from such persons, irrespective of whether they use the machine or not?

Mr. DURANLEAU: If our inspector decides that the claim of the radio owner is bona fide, that he is not using the machine, no licence fee will be collected; but that claim must be bona fide. It happens sometimes that an owner in order to evade the law, disconnects his radio when he expects a visit from the inspector. As I say, his claim to have discontinued the use of the radio must be bona fide.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I hope the minister will broadcast that statement throughout Canada—that it is left to the inspector to decide whether the radio owner shall pay his licence fee or not.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not say it is left to the inspector, because every owner of a radio is presumed to use his radio, and in that event he must pay the fee.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The minister said that if the owner decided not to use the machine he had only to approach the inspector, and if reasons he gave were sufficient the licence fee would not be exacted. I ask the minister to publish that broadcast.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I say that if the inspector comes to the conclusion that the radio is not in use, I do not think he should charge the fee. I did not give that as a definite answer, because, as has been suggested, a man who does not use his radio should take it out of the house.

Mr. GARDINER: Where would he put it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Our inspectors are very fair; but, as I said, our intention is to see that every radio user shall pay the licence fee. It is only fair that everyone who is using a radio should pay.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Suppose a man who is in possession of a radio discusses with the inspector the fact that he is not using that radio, the decision should lie with the inspector who should be able to give a definite decision that in that case he shall not be compelled to pay the two dollars per year.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend knows that the inspectors are under the officials of the department.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will they receive instructions from the department to give a final decision?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The inspector probably will have to report to the department and say, "So and so says that he does not use his radio," and then it will be up to the department to decide. It would be a question of law and perhaps we may have to submit a case to the Department of Justice as to whether a man who has a radio in his house and contends that he does not use it, shall or shall not pay a licence fee.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): If he does not make use of it, one has but to take the tubes away.

Mr. REID: Would it not be possible to make it compulsory that a licence be purchased at the time a radio set is sold? I desire to associate myself with the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton), and I think this matter should be taken under advisement. If my memory serves me correctly, when these licences were first introduced it was said that they were not being introduced for revenue purposes but rather in order that the government might know where radios were located in case of war and so on. The fee has been raised to two dollars and I understand that the revenue is to be used to employ inspectors to go round and see if people have paid their fee. I maintain it would be far better to have left the fee at one dollar and made it compulsory that a licence be purchased at the time of sale of a set. A certain revenue would be received and it would not be necessary to have men going around the country in order to find out whether people are or are not using their radio sets.

Mr. SPOTTON: I should like to leave a suggestion with the minister that part time inspectors resident in the respective counties be employed. These men could check up on licences, be advised of local troubles and then call in the experts, the mechanics and engineers whenever it was necessary. I remember I had to telegraph the predecessor of the present minister complaining of two men who had come into my town who did not act courteously in entering the homes of the residents. We have instances of men who come to a home and say they are gas inspectors but who eventually prove to be burglars, and it was because of this that I complained to the former minister. Upon investigation it was found that licences were not readily obtainable in our locality, and this matter was corrected. I should like to see appointed in my county some person who is known to the people and who could be conferred with. At the present time, practically all of these men seem to come from Kitchener; there might have been a good reason for that during the old régime, but that should not apply to the present régime.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair, and the house took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS

AUTOGRAPHIC REGISTER SYSTEMS, LIMITED

The house in committee on Bill No. 31, respecting certain patents of Autographic Register Systems, Limited—Mr. Anderson, (Toronto-High Park)—Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur-Thunder Bay) in the chair.

On section 1—1921, c. 78, repealed.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the sponsor kindly explain the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): This bill is to repeal a special act of this parliament passed in 1921. The two inventions mentioned in the preamble had been in use for more than one year before the application for patent was filed, and therefore the patents could not be issued under the general act as it then stood. A special act was accordingly passed on June 4, 1921, empowering the commissioner to issue the two patents. In the same year the general act was amended and it changed the time limit during which applications had to be filed. This made the two inventions patentable under both the special act and the general act as amended, and the commissioner of patents in exercising his authority did so under the general act and not under the special act. Doubts have arisen whether the general act or the special act should be deemed to apply to the patents in question. In order to remove these doubts it is asked that the special act be repealed, and the patents will therefore be issued under the authority of the general act, under which, as a matter of fact, the patents were actually granted by the commissioner.

Mr. GARDINER: What will be the practical effect of the removal of the doubts?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): If the general act had been as it is to-day, the special act would not have been required. Authority was given to the commissioner to issue the patents under both the special act and the general act as amended, both acts being assented to on the same day. It seems to me that there must have been a misapprehension at that time. At all events, doubts have since risen in the minds of some of those using the patents, and possibly operating under them, as to which is the real authority, the general act or the special act. This puts it beyond all doubt.

Mr. GARDINER: Was there any difference in the time limit specified by the general act and the special act?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): No.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the sponsor of the bill in the house, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): No. This bill was passed by the railway committee.

Mr. SPENCER: Unanimously?

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Cowan (Port Arthur-Thunder Bay) in the chair.

Radio service, to provide for the general improvement of reception conditions to licensed broadcast listeners, $180,400.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to ask if it is the intention of the department to spend the total sum received for radio licences upon radio improvement or radio work in the department?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is the intention of the government to give the best service possible to the people of Canada. If there is a surplus it will go to the exchequer for the benefit of our country.

Mr. SPROULE: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I was not in the chamber when the minister was explaining the radio system. Several complaints have been received because radio owners did not know they were required to secure licences. In the rural districts some of the people have bought separate parts and put them together in an effort to build a small set, so that they may be able to entertain their friends in the evenings. Particularly in the rural districts, where storage batteries have to be recharged and the cost of radio upkeep is therefore greater, the licence fee is a burden. It may be that an inspector may come along, and seeing an aerial outside a house he will go in and ask the occupant if he has a licence. That person may reply, "No, I let my licence expire," or his answer may be that his set is not then in use.

I do not know that I have any very helpful suggestions, or that I am in a position to assist the minister, but in my humble opinion licensing of radios should be treated similarly to the licensing of motor cars. A man who can afford to operate a high price motor car has to pay a high rate of licence. Plenty of people on the back concessions are not financially able to buy good radios. There was a time when those people could afford to go and see a ball game or indulge in other luxurious pastimes, but to-day they have to stay at home and listen to their radios. Undoubtedly the radio offers a great deal of amusement to many people. True, they may be using a radio set somebody else has discarded; they have gathered the pieces together and put it into service. Undoubtedly the man with the cheap set should be taxed, but not as much as the man with the set costing $400 or $500. While radio listeners in the cities find that static interferes with reception, the people in the country have no difficulties of that nature. Some people own radios which bring in the programs from the most distant stations, while others can afford only those machines which have been discarded by the wealthier people and are capable of picking up only the nearby stations.

In western Ontario most of the programs come from Detroit. Programs from Detroit stations come in clearly at times when radio listeners can hear neither London nor Toronto. They never hear Ottawa. I suggest that the licence fee on high priced radios should be three dollars, and that the poorer people who have not money to buy licences should not have to pay as much. To my mind radios are in a position similar to cars in this respect.

I have seen radios that did not cost any more than $7 or $8, and it would be unfortunate if a two dollar licence were charged on such machines. There is some justice in the contention that if a man can afford to buy a good radio he should pay a higher licence fee. We know that the inspectors go round and visit the homes, showing their authority, and sometimes they frighten the ladies at the homes they visit. Whether the radio is used or not, however, the owner has to pay the fee.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence ship channel, dredging, including the maintenance and operation of Sorel shipyard, $3,518,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister tell us how they are getting along with this work?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The dredging of the St. Lawrence ship channel up to thirty-five feet is in progress. According to Sir Alexander Gibb's report and the information I have, up to date eighty-six per cent of the thirty-five foot channel has been dredged, leaving fourteen per cent still to be done.

Mr. SPENCER: When does the minister expect to complete the dredging of the thirty-five foot channel?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As the committee knows, there is a contract with the General Dredging Company for part of the dredging. That contract will expire on December 31, 1933. The other part of the dredging is being done by the fleet of my department, and we hope to have the program completed at the end of 1933, or at latest in 1934.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the estimated cost of the remainder of the work?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have to dredge about six million yards to complete our program.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the cost per yard?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It depends on the material encountered. When the material is soft the dredging is cheap; when it is hard material or rock, of course the cost is high. We estimate that the cost will be between seven and nine million dollars.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any figures to show what it has cost to dredge the thirty-five foot channel from Quebec up to the point where the work was suspended last fall?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not under my hand the information as to the exact cost of the dredging from Quebec up to Montreal and from Quebec down towards the gulf. The total cost up to March 31, 1930, was $23,868,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Is that from Quebec up to Montreal?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, that is for the whole ship channel from Montreal down to the sea.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the mileage from Quebec to Montreal?

Mr. DURANLEAU: From Montreal to Sorel, forty-five miles; from Sorel to Batiscan, not including lake St. Peter, thirty-six miles; lake St. Peter, twenty miles; from Batiscan to Quebec, fifty-nine miles—making a total of one hundred and sixty miles.

Mr. LUCAS: What width is the channel?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The minimum is about three hundred and fifty feet, and about six hundred feet in the curves.

Mr. LUCAS: I understand the work when completed will provide a thirty-five foot channel at low tide up as far as Montreal.

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is the program.

Mr. LUCAS: When the work is completed will the channel take care of the largest ships that are now in service on that route?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There are certain large ships that will not be able to come as far as Montreal, but all the Empresses will be able to reach Montreal.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Even the Empress of Britain?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I hope so.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am afraid the minister is mistaken.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When we have the ship channel dredged to a depth of thirty-five feet, all ships drawing not more than thirty-two and a half to thirty-three feet will be able to come to Montreal; but there are ships drawing up to thirty-eight feet.

Mr. GARDINER: What are you going to do with those ships?

Mr. DURANLEAU: They will have to go elsewhere.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister has stated that about fourteen per cent of the dredging remains to be done in order to complete the thirty-five foot channel up to Montreal. He has also stated that the estimated cost of the remainder of the work will be between seven and nine million dollars. He has not been able to give me the cost of dredging the thirty-five foot channel from Quebec up to the present point where they stopped last fall. I would ask him to secure that information, because there seems to be a feeling on the part of many people in Montreal that no money should be spent above that port for the purpose of improving navigation. I desire to get information as to what we have spent in order to provide this deep channel for the service of the port of Montreal more particularly, although of course it is also for the service of the country as a whole.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend any information available to the department.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any figures of what has been spent on aids to navigation between Quebec and Montreal?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is not possible at the present time to give any definite information.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I can get that later.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: In what year was the dredging contract entered into, 1930?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The dredging contract was entered into during the spring of 1930.

Sir EUGENE FISET: For how many years?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is for different sections of the ship channels, at so much per yard.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What is the name of the company?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The General Dredging Company, Limited.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Where are they located, Montreal?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think so.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The work these people are doing is based, I suppose, on the amount of money voted yearly by parliament?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course it is always conditional on the amount voted yearly, but they have a contract by which they are bound to complete the dredging in these sections by December 31, 1933.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It is hard to understand how such a contract could be entered into between the department and this company, extending over four years, when the amount of work to be done depends upon the amount of money voted by parliament each year. Why could not tenders be called for yearly to cover the amount of money voted by parliament? Why was a fixed price set in 1930, when I think prices were rather high? I believe a better price could be obtained if new tenders were called for each year. After all, the contract calls for so much per yard, in accordance with the kind of work to be done, and even though the contract was let by a Liberal administration I do not see why it covered a period of four years.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I might tell my hon. friend that this contract was entered into by the previous administration, and I might say further that when we came into power I asked the Department of Justice whether or not this contract could be cancelled. After due consideration the answer was that the contract was quite legal and could not be touched, so we had to carry on.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I have had a certain amount of experience in connection with contracts given for a definite number of years, and I know that such contracts are based entirely on the appropriation voted yearly by parliament. I do not see how the Department of Justice could give such a ruling, because there is nothing on earth to prevent the minister calling for new tenders at the beginning of the fiscal year, for a specific amount of money voted by parliament. If that were done now the amount of the tender might be much less than it is at the present time. The minister might be well advised, even at this late date, in view of the fact that the work cannot possibly start for a month or so, to call for new tenders. It is curious that such a large contract should be given one particular company for a period of years.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend is quite correct when he says the contract depends on the amount of money voted, but in order to stop work under that contract we would have to stop dredging entirely.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I think the work stops when the amount of money voted by parliament is exhausted.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When the amount voted has been exhausted it is the privilege of the department to give notice to the company that the amount available for the current year has been spent. If the company go ahead with the work following such notice they do so at their own risk, but if we vote similar estimates the following year their contract is still in force and they are entitled to go on.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Once the minister has notified the company concerned that the appropriation voted by parliament has been exhausted, when further money is voted the following year further tenders may be called for.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I had to comply with the opinion of the Department of Justice.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Usually an opinion given by the department complies pretty well with the wishes either of the minister or the deputy minister. That has been my experience in the past.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not prepared to accept the views of my hon. friend on this point.

Mr. POULIOT: I am under the impression that an opinion given by the Department of Justice on any question depends very much on the way the question is drafted. Here I see a sharp distinction is made between postmasters and contractors; postmasters are dismissed, but contractors keep their jobs. They are very fortunate. I should like to know who are the gentlemen forming the General Dredging Company, Limited.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I may frankly tell my hon. friend that I do not know the directors of the company. I know one or two of them but I do not know to what extent they are interested, and really I do not know who control the company. The contract was entered into before we came into power; I was advised that the contract was legal, and I had to carry on. I do know that subcontracts have been let by the General Dredging Company, but I do not know who are the owners of the other companies. If they do their work properly and in accordance with the contract we do not care who are the owners.

Mr. POULIOT: The reason I asked was that my hon. friend from Rimouski and myself wanted to know those names in order to write them a joint letter of congratulation on having kept their contract for so many years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask if the dredging in the lower St. Lawrence has been completed?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is almost finished, except for a few spots.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is not very much left to be done?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, only a few spots, and at high tide there is no interference with navigation.

Mr. LUCAS: Is the channel below Quebec being deepened?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Our program calls for a thirty-five foot channel from Montreal down.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What portion of this vote is used for the operation and maintenance of the Sorel shipyard?

Mr. DURANLEAU: About $300,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is that just for maintenance?

Mr. DURANLEAU: For maintenance and operation.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is any part of this money used for dredging in the port of Sorel?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The minister is sure of that?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: If the company does not do the work satisfactorily this year will the minister tell us if he will cancel the contract upon the report of his engineers?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think it is needless to say that if the dredging contractor does not comply with the requirements of the contract my department will take the necessary steps to protect the government and the exchequer. If we are entitled to have the contract cancelled by the courts we will do so. I will see that the exchequer is protected.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What prices are paid for ordinary clay and rock?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The prices vary according to the classes of material. For class A, which is rock, the prices are $8 and $7 in certain places; for class B, clay, they are 45 cents, 50 cents, 60 cents and 90 cents, depending upon the location.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It depends on the report of the inspector.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It depends upon the reports of the engineers as to the quality of the material.

Mr. POULIOT: Are Mr. Simard and Mr. Dufresne members or directors of the company?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I know that Mr. Simard is interested in the company; as to Mr. Dufresne, I do not know.

Item agreed to.

Lighthouse and coast service — agencies, rents and contingencies, $203,000.

Mr. SPENCER: What are these agencies?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Their duties include the administration within their districts of the aids to navigation, comprising lighthouses, lightships, fog alarms, buoys, steamers, wharves and so on, and generally they look after the interests of the department.

Mr. SPENCER: How is the decrease of $33,000 accounted for?

Mr. DURANLEAU: By the ten per cent reduction in salaries, and, perhaps, more rigid economy.

Item agreed to.

Construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $1,860,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Can the minister say why a lightkeeper by the name of Morin was dismissed at Pilgrims' islands, and whether he was submitted to an investigation? If so, what was the report of the investigator?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the record here and therefore I cannot answer the question. We have so many lightkeepers that it is impossible for the minister to remember the case of each one, but if my hon. friend wants the information I can supply it on Monday.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not want it for myself but for my colleague from Kamouraska, who is unavoidably absent. If the minister cannot give the information now, I would ask that the vote be allowed to stand until the hon. gentleman who is interested in it has an opportunity to discuss the matter.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not know that it would be fair to allow the item to stand until the hon. gentleman can be given the information. I can place the record of this man in the hands of his colleague at any time. I can say, however, that if this particular lightkeeper, Mr. Morin, has been dismissed, his dismissal must have come after a thorough investigation, and on the report of the investigator. At any rate, I shall have the record placed at the disposal of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret very much that the record is not available now that the vote is before the committee. It does not seem reasonable for the minister to ask that the item be passed without giving this information. I am well acquainted with this man Morin. I met him this summer and he assured me that he has taken no part in any election in a good many years. He was lightkeeper on one of the three Pilgrims' islands, where he was doing his duty conscientiously. He was very hospitable to all who went there either for fishing or for hunting. Indeed, he was quite friendly to all and he had friends in both parties. As a matter of fact, he did not bother at all with politics. He is a young man, very intelligent and capable, and had been appointed by the Civil Service Commission. Moreover, before the house rose at six o'clock the hon. member for Quebec East informed me that he had known the man's father, who had taken no part in politics. The minister is aware, I know, that the man was recommended by leading Conservative lawyers in Montreal whom it is unnecessary to name but who are influential with the department by reason of personal friendship and associations. All that has been ignored; why? Because of the hatred displayed by some Tories in Kamouraska county. That job was taken from Morin and given to a man who is well off, and who, I may say, is the most disagreeable man in his parish.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Who is he?

Mr. POULIOT: The minister knows him. Seeing that I have said something disagreeable about him, I do not wish to mention his name, but the minister knows to whom I am referring.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I should know by the record.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister cannot very well ask me for information when he has not given me any; I am not his deputy. Here we are voting this item blindly, and it does not seem reasonable. Usually when a minister brings items before the committee, and particularly a minister of the hon. gentleman's standing, he has full information with him; if not, his deputy should be able to supply it. I do not wish to blame anyone, but this is my eighth session in the house and it is the first time I have seen a minister unable to answer a pertinent question when he was piloting his estimates through the committee. I can understand that if, on the orders of the day, I ask a question of the minister in connection with the dismissal of a Mr. Morin on Pilgrims' island, he might very well reply: I will let the hon. gentleman know to-morrow or in two or three days. But the minister has had twelve months in which to prepare his estimates, and when he tells me that he will give me the information after the item is passed, I do not think he is treating me fairly. I would direct his attention to the example set by his colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart). When that hon. gentleman is dealing with his estimates and is asked a question, he gives a full answer and not a fool answer—there is all the difference in the world. The Minister of Public Works can be cited as a minister who will always deal fairly with his colleagues in the house.

The Minister of Marine does not come from Hudson bay or the Northwest Territories, he comes from the great city of Montreal. He occupies the honoured position of president of the Quebec Bar Association, of which I am a member. A man of his learning should know that when he is presenting estimates to the committee he should be prepared to supply all information required. I am very sorry, but I must put the blame upon the minister and not upon his staff.

The general impression in the district in which I live is that this man Morin has been dealt with unfairly. This opinion is held not only by Liberals but by good Conservatives who have never voted for me; it is thought that Morin has been dismissed for no good reason, yet when, in a polite and courteous way, I ask the minister for information in this connection, he tells me he will be ready to give it after the vote is passed. The minister may say that the hon. member for Kamouraska is not here. That is quite right; he is unavoidably absent, but I am asking this question on his behalf. I may not know all the minor details of the case, but I am fairly well posted thereon and I know that Morin has suffered an injustice. He has been replaced by another who is not worth what he is receiving. I ask a question of the hon. minister and he replies by answering another question which I have asked. Apparently he wants me to give him the details of what has happened in his own department; he wants me to tell what has happened in the dismissal of one man and the appointment of another. If I appointed a man, I would remember the details of his appointment.

This is a free country, and if the hon. gentleman does not give me the information I require I cannot do anything about it; but if the information is not forthcoming I cannot vote for the item. I have too much respect for the hon. gentleman to lecture him, but I am surprised at his declining to supply the information to which I am entitled and which has been asked for in the proper way, on the proper day and of the proper minister. I understand a return has been tabled in connection with this matter, and if that is so, it should be very easy for the hon. gentleman to obtain the information. I will let him in on one of the secrets of parliamentary procedure—if a return has been tabled, he can obtain a copy. If the file happens to be in the Hunter building he can obtain a copy from Mr. Horton, chief of parliamentary papers. A page could be sent to obtain the file. I do not know if this is the procedure in the Quebec assembly, but that is what is done here. I believe the hon. gentleman knows this, but he does not want us to know that he knows it. I asked the minister why this man had been dismissed, and whether such action had been taken after investigation, and he replied that if he was dismissed after an investigation it was not without good reason. We may have a different opinion as to the sufficiency of the reason. I have no desire to be disagreeable or to take up too much of the time of the committee; when we ask for information, it is not to cause delay or trouble, it is only to be able to answer the questions asked of us by our constituents.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is quite within his rights in asking for information with regard to dismissals by the Department of Marine. However, I take a different view from that of my hon. friend; as far as I am personally concerned, I have not the slightest objection to a member of the government in power or a defeated candidate recommending to a minister that a certain official be dismissed. The only objection I do raise in this regard is that this or any other government should be hypocritical about the matter. The Prime Minister believes in economy and is practising it to a certain extent, but I am going to ask him to go a little further in his practice. During the past year tens of thousands of dollars have been wasted by the different departments in investigating the actions of public servants. As I said a moment ago, I have no objection if a defeated candidate or a member supporting the government recommends to any minister that the occupancy of a certain office be changed; I sit back and take my medicine, and tell my friends that that is all that they are entitled to. But I do object to any minister or any government spending thousands of dollars for no good purpose. In the province of Nova Scotia, for instance, a number of lightkeepers, postmasters and others have been dismissed, and it is nothing short of scandalous the amount of money paid these investigators who go round and hold investigations with their minds made up beforehand as to what they are going to do—they know they are going to recommend dismissal. I say to the minister, to the Prime Minister and the government that they should stop that practice, and let the minister concerned take the responsibility and dismiss any Grit he wants to.

This vote is for the construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation, including salaries and allowances of lightkeepers. I note that there is a decrease in this vote from last year of $494,600, and I would like the minister after I sit down to be good enough to explain to the committee how that reduction is made up. He will notice that the first part of the item refers to the construction, maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation. Now, if there is one important service in this country it is that which has to do with aids to navigation, whether they are on the Atlantic coast, the Great lakes, in the river St. Lawrence or on the Pacific. I trust the minister will be able to tell the committee that in spite of this reduction no instructions will be issued to those in charge of our marine agencies that aids to navigation are not to be put where they are necessary, because the whole marine life of this country depends upon aids to navigation along our coasts and in our navigable waters.

The second part of the item refers to the salaries and allowances of lightkeepers. I assume that part of the reduction is made up of the general ten per cent cut in salaries. I would plead with the minister, with the Prime Minister and with the Minister of Finance, in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance was good enough on Wednesday last to move that the committee rise and report progress on the bill reducing civil servants' salaries, that before we proceed any further with that bill it be determined that no reduction be made in the salaries of lightkeepers. Do the minister, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance realize what these lightkeepers all along our coasts and in the river St. Lawrence have to put up with? Take my hon. friend from Cape Breton North-Victoria, in whose constituency I believe St. Paul's island is. The lightkeepers are out there in the gulf of the St. Lawrence, one hundred miles from civilization, with no chance for their children to go to school, isolated practically the whole year; yet the minister and the government are going to cut their salaries by ten per cent. Take the lightkeepers on Sable island, the worst place in God's world for any person to live; and yet the lightkeepers who are there from one year's end to another, sometimes coming back fit for no other occupation, are to lose ten per cent of their salaries. It is a shame and disgrace, Mr Chairman, that any government or parliament should dare to cut the salaries of these men. The same thing applies to every lightkeeper in the country. Some of them are doing this work for only two hundred dollars a year, and you are going to cut their salaries ten per cent. Some of the lightkeepers who were receiving salaries of $800 had their salaries cut last year to $420, and now the government proposes to cut them still further by ten per cent. I say it is not right. Surely the Prime Minister and the Finance minister, if they want to economize, can save in some other direction rather than that of taking the bread out of the mouths of the lightkeepers on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, in the gulf of the St. Lawrence and the Great lakes. I plead with the Prime Minister, the Finance minister and the Minister of Marine to allow this item to stand, or that the Minister of Marine bring down an item in the supplementary estimates so that the salaries of these lightkeepers shall not be reduced by one cent.

Mr. NEILL: I have much pleasure in supporting the suggestion made by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. Certainly the life saving service is the last place where we should try to economize. We might perhaps with the consent of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough substitute the lightkeepers for the lieutenant-governors in the civil service salary reduction bill exempting the lightkeepers from the cut and bringing the lieutenant-governors under it. I think the general public of Canada would appreciate that.

I would like to make a very mild protest at the remarks of my hon. friend from Témiscouata. If I understood him aright, he had the idea that the intelligence of Canada was centralized in Montreal and that the further you went from that city the less gray matter was possessed by hon. members. I do not know whether he applied his remarks to other individuals as well, but I presume so, and in that case I would suggest that he go west and examine some of the people as he goes along—and the examination might be reciprocal.

I would ask the minister if he has taken any steps to carry out the promise which he was kind enough to give us last year. He will find the matter to which I refer recorded in Hansard of May 21 last. I notice that I was supported on that occasion by the hon. member for Parry Sound, who spoke very strongly on the matter. Put briefly, the situation is this. The lighthouse keepers are, of course, civil servants, and there is an arrangement between this government and the provincial governments that if the lighthouse keeper meets with death or accident in his duties the Dominion government will pay to the workmen's compensation board of the province concerned, such a sum as, capitalized, will enable the workmen's compensation board of that province to pay the proper pension or compensation just as if the man had been employed in ordinary industrial work. But a case arises in which that is not possible, and that is the case of the lighthouse keepers' assistants. They are not paid by the Dominion government except indirectly, although really they may be considered as being paid by the federal authorities. The way it is done is this: the lighthouse keeper is paid a salary which is, supposedly, sufficiently large to enable him to employ one or more assistants. But the extra allowance for the assistant is so small that the ordinary lighthouse keeper cannot find an able-bodied man to do the work at the price, consequently he has to fall back on some member of his family, a growing boy or his wife—because the work is generally not very hard—or some old man he happens to know. The lighthouse keeper pays to such assistant a small sum, and it has been ruled that because of that, the assistant is not in the employ of the federal authorities. I brought the question up last year and represented that it was rather a hardship on these lighthouse keepers' assistants, who were subject to the same risks as the lighthouse keepers themselves, that if they were killed or injured in their occupation there would be no compensation or pension paid, and the suggestion was made by myself and the hon. member for Parry Sound that the government should pay the lighthouse keeper a few extra dollars—it would only be a few extra dollars a year, not a month—to enable the lighthouse keeper to pay to the workmen's compensation board the fee current in that province. It is always optional for them to do that even in occupations where the workmen's compensation legislation does not ordinarily apply. I am glad to say that the matter was fully discussed and that the minister spoke as follows:

> The question is very important and I will give consideration to it.

I should be glad to know if the minister has taken it into consideration, and if so, with what results.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: Answering my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, the question was discussed between myself and the officials of the department, and a solution has not yet been arrived at. It would mean an entire change in the policy of the department. The lightkeeper receives a full salary and has to hire the services of an assistant. If we were to pay a salary to the lightkeeper and one to the assistant we would have to change our policy.

Mr. NEILL: No, no.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understood that from my officials.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps the minister will allow me to explain. It is not desirable to have two salaries, for many reasons. In actual practice it has been found preferable to have the lighthouse keeper employ his assistant, because nine times out of ten the assistant has to live in the house of the lighthouse keeper. Naturally the lighthouse keeper should have some say as to who the assistant should be. The suggestion is that the department should pay the lighthouse keeper a little extra so that he might take care of the small sum to be paid as the workmen's compensation fee for his assistant. The sum would not exceed ten or fifteen dollars a year. There would be no necessity to upset the present system, which, I admit, has its merits. The lighthouse keeper, who is receiving so much a year, would be given very little more and he would have to take care of this particular obligation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend understands that to give compensation to the assistants by raising the salaries of lightkeepers would mean that we would have to ask the Civil Service Commission to increase the salaries of those lightkeepers. Their salaries are established by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. NEILL: It would be an allowance.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can assure my hon. friend the matter has been discussed two or three times with my officials, and has not yet been solved. We are trying to find a way out. The question put by my hon. friend is of a serious nature, and I am of opinion that the assistants should be helped. We will try to solve the difficulty to the satisfaction of the assistants and my hon. friend.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you.

Mr. DURANLEAU: In answer to the question of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough I may say that the reduction in the amount will not be on the salaries. Of course we will have to abide by the law so far as the ten per cent cut is concerned; if the cut applies to lightkeepers, they will have to accept it.

Mr. DUFF: It has not yet been passed.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There will be no other reductions, as to salaries or number of employees.

Mr. DUFF: The law has not yet been passed; that is the reason I appeal to my hon. friend.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I was referring to a time when the law would be in force.

Mr. DUFF: What will the minister do in the meantime?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The reduction in the estimate is in connection only with the construction works. Last year our construction program was $1,000,000, and this year it will be only $200,000.

Mr. DUFF: That sum is for the building of new lighthouses?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, in order to save money, we are cutting down practically all capital works this year. I am sorry I cannot supply the information asked by my hon. friend from Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: I am sorry, too.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I appreciate the fairness of the remarks of my hon. friend, and I should be very happy to give him the information he has requested. I know he is fair enough to admit however that it would be very difficult for a minister to have the files before him concerning 1,200 lightkeepers, and it would be even more difficult for a minister to remember the facts concerning all those lightkeepers. The name of Morin is not unknown to me, but I cannot recall the facts well enough to give the information to my hon. friend. I assure him that if a real injustice has been done I will reopen the case and see that any wrongs are rectified.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you very much.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall study the record, and correct any injustice which has been done.

Mr. POULIOT: That is very satisfactory.

Mr. MUNN: In this vote there is mention of maintenance and supervision of aids to navigation. Is it the intention of the government to remove Ripple rock in Seymour Narrows, which was discussed last year? Is there provision for that in this vote, or is it the intention of the government to have Ripple rock removed during the present year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As the hon. member knows, last year we had the report of a commission on the Ripple rock question. The matter is in the hands of the Department of Public Works, but I do not think the government intends this year to make an expenditure in that connection.

Mr. FOURNIER: On March 2, I made a motion for the production of documents in connection with way shoal traverse at Angers in the county of Hull. The complaint in this case was made by Mr. Beauchamp, the Conservative candidate in the last federal election in the constituency of Hull. His letter dated October 23, 1930, recommends that one Onezime Proulx replace Louis Mongeon, and is as follows:

(Translation):

To replace him, I recommend Mr. Onézime Proulx, who previously held this position, but was dismissed without reasons being given, in 1929, and replaced by Mr. Louis Mongeon.

An inquiry was held in this matter, and on May 20 Mr. Mongeon was dismissed because of political partisanship. Later on in the record I have before me there is a letter stating that Mr. Onezime Proulx could not again be recommended because he had been dismissed in 1929 for negligence in the discharge of his duty. His brother was appointed. In the record however one document seems to be missing. In this particular case the lightkeeper was receiving $150 per year, or $12.50 per month, and an inquiry was held at which lawyers and stenographers attended. A bill was submitted to the minister which I suppose was paid. That bill, however, is missing from the file I have before me. I should like to know if the minister will tell me the amount of the costs in connection with this inquiry. I see in the file that the commissioner, Mr. Tache, on the 9th of April, 1931, closed his remarks by stating:

(Translation):

I have enclosed my account in triplicate as requested.

"I am enclosing my bill of costs, in triplicate as requested." Will the minister tell me the amount of the costs in connection with this inquiry?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Chairman, the account must have been sent to the accounting department for payment and removed from the file accordingly. That is why it does not appear in the file as laid on the table of the house. We shall be pleased, however, to supply my hon. friend with any information we can. We will give him a copy of the account, if he desires to have it. I do not think that stenographers were employed.

Mr. FOURNIER: Yes, they were.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As a rule we do not employ reporters, so that costs may be kept down. The stenographers are the greatest expense in connection with inquiries. I shall be very happy however to supply the bill to my hon. friend.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the minister, in view of the gracious reply which he has given to my colleague from Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) would be kind enough to give me the same encouragement. He will remember that last year Mr. Thibault, the lighthouse keeper at the island of Bicquet in the county of Rimouski, a returned soldier, was dismissed on the recommendation of a commissioner who happened to be the defeated Conservative candidate in that county. The lighthouse keeper was dismissed on the evidence of three smugglers, who sought the protection of the court before they would give evidence. More than that, those three smugglers are the very same men who were supposed to have been protected by the lighthouse keeper when he was accused of taking part in smuggling while on duty. The minister will remember that last year I registered a protest against the fact of the two ex-Conservative candidates in the county of Rimouski being employed as commissioners on inquiries. I am glad to say that after my complaint no further inquiries were held in the county by those two commissioners. I think the government came to the conclusion that those two gentlemen had been engaged in electioneering to such an extent that they were not proper persons to conduct such inquiries in their own county. Will the minister kindly peruse the evidence placed before the commissioners in this case? I think if he does so he will find that the man was the victim of vengeance on the part of those people. It so happens that the man appointed in his place was a shirker during the period when the man dismissed volunteered for service overseas. I hope the minister will do me the kindness to peruse the evidence, for if he does so I shall be quite willing to leave the case to his own sense of justice.

Mr. POULIOT: I desire, Mr. Chairman, to express to the minister my appreciation of his attitude to-night. I desire to commend especially to his kind attention the case of the lighthouse keeper at Hare island. The island is situated in the middle of the river, which is between ten and fifteen miles wide at this point. Consequently it is very hard for the lighthouse keeper to attend to his duties in the spring and to leave the lighthouse in the fall on account of the ice. This man, named Dubé, is a very handy man, and during the fifteen years he has been lighthouse keeper he has saved the department a lot of money by doing carpentry repairs and painting, thus keeping the lighthouse in excellent condition, although his salary is rather small. This lighthouse, as the minister knows from his inspection, is on a strategic point in the middle of the river, and the light is of the greatest importance to those who go up or down the river. The man has never failed in his duty, he has, as I say, kept the lighthouse in a very good state of repair, and therefore I take the liberty of recommending his case to the minister in order that in due course this very deserving man may have his position improved.

Item agreed to.

Marine signal service, $99,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Do the beacons at Anticosti island and at West Point come under this vote?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No.

Item agreed to.

Administration of pilotage, $218,000.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret very much, Mr. Chairman, that there is not a school for pilots in this country. At the present time I know several young men who want to become pilots. I can recommend especially to the minister a young man named Pelletier who has been sailing the seven seas for several years. He comes from Notre Dame du Portage. The profession of pilot was very popular some years ago, and it would be a good opening for many young men to-day. That is why I am submitting to the minister my suggestion for the establishment of a pilot school for the training of young men.

Mr. LUCAS: What proportion of the vote is for salaries?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Salaries represent $85,000; operating and general expenses, $25,000.

Mr. NEILL: Ten per cent of $85,000 is $8,500; there is a reduction of only $7,000.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There may be a few increases in some of the other items.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): How many pilots are there in British Columbia?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There are thirty-four in the province.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Are any stationed at Prince Rupert?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Some are stationed at Prince Rupert.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and repairs to wharves, $5,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the minister tell the committee how many wharves are under the control of the Department of Marine?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot give that information offhand.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the minister prepare a list of the wharves, together with their location, and let me have it some time in the future?

Mr. DURANLEAU: With pleasure.

Item agreed to.

Steamboat inspection, $121,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before this item carries I should like to say a few words in connection with a matter which I think comes under it. I refer to the inspection of tackle used in loading and unloading ships.

The minister will remember that earlier in the session I placed a question on the order paper with regard to the intention of the minister as to the bringing down of legislation in this connection. The question was whether the minister had received from the Vancouver harbour commission a draft copy of safety regulations applicable to the loading and unloading of ships, together with the recommendation that these be made a by-law of the harbour board. The minister informed me that this communication had been received but that the by-law could not be approved by the department because they had obtained an opinion from the Department of Justice holding that the Vancouver harbour commissioners were not competent to draw up such a by-law.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, may I say that a large number of people are engaged in what we call longshore work, the loading and unloading of ships, and although their work is extremely hazardous, as I will show by statistics furnished by the compensation board of British Columbia, there are no safety regulations covering that work. The municipalities in which this work is carried on claim that they have no jurisdiction in the matter of making regulations; the provincial government says it has no jurisdiction, and now the Department of Justice maintains that the harbour commisisoners have no jurisdiction either. So we find that these men are working under conditions which are extremely dangerous, and there is no one who can enforce safety regulations.

Some time ago a conciliation board was considering an agreement between the waterfront workers of the city of Vancouver and the stevedoring association. One of the present members of the Vancouver harbour commisison, Mr. Thompson, was a member of that conciliation board, and that board recommended that such safety regulations should be made. I should like to read from a statement submitted to that board by the chairman of the workmen's compensation board of British Columbia in response to a request for information. This letter is dated June 18, 1930, and is addressed to Mr. J. B. Thompson, chairman of the conciliation board which was sitting at that time. Mr. Winn, chairman of the Compensation board of British Columbia writes:

> Referring to your telephone conversation today, we find on looking up our records that as far back as 1919, we endeavoured to obtain the appointment of a tackle inspector for this port. In recent years we have also taken up such an appointment with the Vancouver harbour commissioners.
> The board is without jurisdiction to deal with such matters as come under the heading of navigation and shipping, that being distinctly a matter over which the federal government, either through its various departments or through the harbour commission, has sole authority.
>
> It is, we believe, self apparent that an independent inspector having to do with the inspection of tackle, equipment and proper lighting and having authority to enforce regulations, is the one who should deal with all accident prevention matters.
> The chief efficacy of such an inspector is that he would be an independent arbiter as to the means to be used to safeguard the life and limbs of workmen. One cannot get the same independence of thought and action from an employee that one would expect from an independent official. We have undertaken to supervise,—

That is, the compensation board have undertaken to supervise.

> —without cost to the department or commission making the appointment, the work of such an inspector so as to ensure uniformity of direction as well as fair treatment to all. We have on our commission and staff competent engineers who, by reason of their accident prevention experience, would be able to hold a firm hand on any official so appointed, and in this way ensure competency. Inasmuch as our board is the one to collect funds and to pay for disabilities we are naturally more able to keep close supervision over those matters which go to accident prevention.

I should like the minister to pay particular attention to this paragraph:

As it is now, a foreign boat may come into the harbour with defective tackle and equipment; may employ its own longshoremen, kill or maim them and then leave (unless it is libelled by the injured workman or his representative), without in any way accounting for its casualties, thus leaving the cost to be borne by our citizens. The average longshoreman in case of serious disability—and I take it we would be in much the same position—does not think of his legal rights until he feels the pinch of need. By that time the ship has gone.

I should like to point out that in a case of that kind the injured person or his dependents would be entitled to no compensation whatever. On the other hand, of course, if a longshoreman were employed by one of the stevedoring companies having its head office in some part of British Columbia, he would be entitled to compensation. Mr. Winn points that out; he says:

On the other hand, if the boat in question employs one of our stevedoring companies then the stevedoring company and its employees are covered by the Workmen's Compensation Act, and the result is that in event of accident the workman is compensated.

Now I wish to give some figures with regard to accidents, and also to give illustrations of the causes that lead up to accidents. I have the figures from 1918 to 1930, but I will not take the time of the house reading them all. If it were possible, I should like to put them on Hansard without reading them, but if I am not allowed to do so I will content myself with quoting them in part.

In 1918, the first year on record, there were 239 claims. Of these there were seven permanent or partial disability awards and one fatal accident. The total cost in that year was $17,666. By 1923 the number of accidents had increased to 388, with twelve permanent or partial disability awards; there were no fatal accidents in that year. The total cost was over $36,000. I would observe here that up to 1923—I cannot speak for any point outside Vancouver—the longshoremen of that city were strongly organized, and in the fall or early winter of that year there was a strike in longshore work. The workers' organizations were defeated. Now I want to show what difference that made in the number of accidents that occurred in the following year when the men were without an organization to protect the worker. As I have pointed out, the total claims in 1923 were 388, with twelve permanent or partial disability awards; and there were no fatal accidents in that year. The total cost, as I have stated, was over $36,000. Now, in 1924 the number of claims totalled 536, with twelve permanent or partial disability awards and ten fatal accidents, and the total cost was over $119,000.

Generally speaking, from 1924 up to the present time accidents have been increasing, along with the cost; so that in 1930, the last year for which I have figures, there were 582 claims, with forty permanent or partial disability awards and three fatal accidents, involving a total cost of $152,000. It seems to me, in face of such a condition, that the minister should take steps to have the lives and limbs of men engaged in this sort of work protected.

The chairman of the compensation board of British Columbia stated that the only competent authority in the matter was the federal government, through some of its departments, and undoubtedly the Department of Marine is the one under which this should come. I hold that under section 674 of the Canada Shipping Act the minister has power even now to make regulations in that regard if he thinks fit. I shall read that section, and if it does not fully cover the situation, then I think that minor amendments could be made to render it applicable. It could easily be amended to serve the purpose intended. The section reads:

Every inspector may, at any time, visit any ship, whether registered in Canada or elsewhere, and whether propelled wholly or in part by steam, except ships belonging to His Majesty; and although any such ship is classed in Lloyds register of British and foreign shipping, or in any other corporation or association for the survey and register of ships approved by the governor in council, may inspect and examine the tackle, machinery or apparatus used for the loading or unloading thereof, and, if he considers such tackle, machinery or apparatus defective, so as to be dangerous to life, he shall report thereon to the minister, who may order that such tackle, machinery and apparatus shall not be used until permitted by the minister.

I suppose when the act says "may report" to the minister, that means either to the minister or to his representative in the locality; for it would be a very slow process if a report had to come from Vancouver or from Halifax to the department here in order that instructions might be sent as to what should be done. As regards the words "may inspect and examine", I should think that the minister might very well construe that as "shall", and that would serve the purpose.

Under that section of the Canada Shipping Act, the minister has jurisdiction and the necessary means to fulfil the requirements for safety. I believe that the Vancouver harbour commissioners are favourable to safety regulations. I understand that in November, 1931, they forwarded a copy of rather full regulations for the approval of the minister. They wanted to have these regulations approved as a by-law. I believe that, while the harbour commissioners have not the power to draft and enforce regulations, if these by-laws were approved by the minister they would have the effect of departmental regulations and could be made applicable under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act. I am not a lawyer but I take it that this could be done, once the regulations had the approval of the minister. There are twenty-five sections in these regulations, which were approved by the Vancouver harbour commissioners, by the workmen's compensation board, by the council of the city of Vancouver and by the waterfront workers themselves, through their association; so that they are opposed only by the stevedore companies of the province of British Columbia. The last section of the resolutions of the Vancouver harbour commission reads as follows:

The safety inspector shall have authority to inspect all loading and unloading berths and the equipment thereon, and shall have authority to prohibit work if he considers conditions unsafe.

I think that is a perfectly reasonable authority to give, and it should be given in this instance. In most other industries in the province of British Columbia the workmen's compensation board has authority and can enforce safety regulations. I have in my hand a copy of a letter addressed to the Minister of Marine by the assistant secretary of the workmen's compensation board of the province of British Columbia, and which deals with the matter I am now discussing. It is rather lengthy, but it gives a very good picture of the conditions which prevail. The minister may have forgotten having received this letter, and I bring it to his attention. It is dated November 14, 1931, and reads:

On or about the 23rd ultimo, we were informed that the Shipping Federation of British Columbia which, we understand is composed of employers engaged in stevedoring in or about Vancouver, wrote you opposing the appointment of an accident prevention inspector for this port.

Experience throughout the continent has emphasized the supreme importance of accident prevention as the surest and soundest way of curtailing human wastage in industry and to reduce for the employers the cost of accidents in lengthy time loss, medical attention, increased labour turnover, permanent disabilities and loss of life. Each accident prevented and each safeguard installed means not only a reduction of the strain on the funds of the industry but also the saving and preserving of manpower both to the province and to the nation. An accident prevention inspector would be continually carrying on an educational safety campaign, which could not help but develop a "safety consciousness" and therefore a more careful and efficient employee.

At times in the past we know that the Vancouver Harbour Commission has had a safety inspector, but his only authority, as we gather from him, has been to report to them any unsafe practices or unsafe equipment. He would also advise officials in charge of the work as to dangerous places and practices, but he had no authority whatsoever to insist upon any remedies.

The Vancouver harbour commission is trying to do whatever it possibly can in this connection, and, as is pointed out by this letter, it has appointed at its own cost a man to inspect the equipment used in the loading and unloading of ships. But this inspector has no authority to enforce any regulations after he has found a defect in the equipment used; all he can do is direct attention to such defect and try to prevail upon the shipping federation to discontinue the use of such defective equipment. The letter continues:

We know too that the shipping federation has had a safety inspector. In discussing the matter with him we were informed that his only authority was to advise his employers of the various hazards undergone from time to time by the workmen and to, at times, recommend an alleviation. He had no power of a definite nature to cause the remedy of any dangerous or faulty equipment, nor to insist upon the prevention of unsafe practices. It is apparent that he occupied an unenviable position, because from time to time he would be in the position of having to advise his employers that their equipment was faulty or that the vessels employing these firms to do their work had dangerous machinery or poor equipment. In advising his employers of defective equipment he would be, in effect, asking them to expend money to remedy such conditions. The possibilities were that his employers would not care to insist upon those in charge of the incoming vessels stopping work to repair or replace faulty machinery or equipment. If the inspector were active in accident prevention measures, it can be quite easily understood that he could not hope to hold his position for any length of time.

The holding of a position is an important matter in these hard times, and this so-called inspector would not be very keen to detect defective equipment. The letter continues:

From the foregoing it is apparent that a great part of the work of either of the above inspectors would be abortive by reason of his lack of authority.

The Workmen's Compensation Act of British Columbia has been in effect approximately fifteen years. When it had been in effect for about two years it became apparent from evidence taken in hearings on accident cases, from complaints received from workmen, from reports of accidents on our records, that there was a very great need for definite accident prevention measures in stevedoring work. In 1919 we started to take steps to bring to the attention of your department, through representatives, the necessity for greater protection on the Vancouver waterfront.

Although the minister has not been in office since 1919, I would direct his attention to the fact that since that year the workmen's compensation board has been drawing this matter to the attention of the federal Department of Marine, yet nothing has been done and the workers are being killed and maimed in accidents, many of which could be prevented. The letter continues:

Frequently since that time, as the opportunity presented itself we have joined with other interested parties in seeking to achieve the same end. We believe that as a result of these efforts the hereinbefore mentioned inspectors were appointed, but with their lack of jurisdiction of a mandatory nature it was realized that their efforts were mainly fruitless. It is true, however, that some faulty gear and some unsafe practices were remedied.

The Vancouver and District Waterfront Workers' Association, as our records indicate, endeavoured on a number of occasions to obtain the sought for objective, the federal appointment of accident prevention inspectors. They were joined in their efforts by the Amalgamated Carpenters of Canada;—

These carpenters are employed in lining ships to be used for the shipment of grain, and have to work under the same hazardous conditions as the longshoremen. The letter continues:

—the Canadian Merchant Service Guild, composed of captains, masters, mates, etc., operating in our coastal waters; the British Columbia Safety League, whose sole objective is the prevention of accidents, and the city of Vancouver.

Everyone connected with the business carried on in the shipping district of the city of Vancouver is interested in the drafting and putting into effect of regulations which will prevent accidents on the waterfront. The letter continues:

You will notice, therefore, that all of the bodies actively interested and vitally affected by the cost of the accident toll and its suffering —save the employers—have recognized the necessity of the appointment of an accident-prevention inspector with proper authority.

The members of our board have met the various affected labour organizations on a large number of occasions and discussed with them the Vancouver waterfront situation and agreed to the necessity outlined herein. We could not handle the thousands of waterfront accidents that we have; meeting the injured workman and discussing the type of accident with him; meeting business agents of the various labour organizations and meeting the various employers' representatives as well as others having a practical knowledge of the necessities outlined herein without coming to a very definite conclusion as to the needs of the situation.

We have on several occasions met the representatives of the Vancouver Harbour Commission and discussed with them the proposed accident-prevention regulations and have agreed with them that the regulations submitted were an absolute necessity; that while they are not sufficient to meet all possible contingencies, yet they are a fair start on the problem. It has been agreed with every representation that the proposed regulations are only those which a reasonable man would expect to see placed in effect.

I would ask the minister to take into consideration the reasonableness of what is asked in this case. The workmen's compensation board is not much interested in this matter except as regards the prevention of accidents, and may I say that they have done good work in reducing the toll of accidents in the industrial concerns in the province of British Columbia. Still quoting from the letter:

The board does not keep a list of accidents happening in any particular locality, but to prove the need we have, out of a mass of waterfront accidents, looked up the files and selected a few of the cases to which some of the regulations would apply. Attached hereto and under the number of the particular section of the proposed by-laws is a list of a few cases that have actually happened in the last few years and which could have been remedied had there been a safety inspector qualified and fully authorized to act as an independent arbitrator—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Spotton): The hon. gentleman has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. NEILL: I do not think so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacINNIS: With all due deference, Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that I have not spoken forty minutes, and with your leave I shall proceed. In any event I believe the information I am giving to the committee is of such importance that I should be allowed to continue even had I spoken forty minutes. Quoting from the letter—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: Have I the privilege of the floor, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Spotton): I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member, but according to the information I was given when I took the chair, his time would be up now. But if the committee are unanimous in the view that the hon. gentleman should be allowed to proceed, or if the information given me was not correct, I shall be glad to allow the hon. member to proceed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is an astonishing thing, Mr. Chairman, that in committee of the whole forty minutes should elapse in what seems to the rest of us to be twenty minutes.

I should like to impress upon the committee the seriousness of the situation which exists on the waterfront in Vancouver, though some hon. members may think the matter is of no particular importance. It is several years since I brought up this very question on the floor of the house and received assurances from the minister then in charge that something would be done. However, nothing has been done, and the situation is a serious one. It seems as if the responsibility for accident does not rest with any one party. At times it is the harbour board that is held responsible, at other times it is the Dominion government, and so on. To use the ordinary slang phrase, it is a case of passing the buck. In the meantime there are a great many accidents, and there is no safeguard for the waterfront workers. I speak rather feelingly in the matter because I know the situation very intimately. I know some of the men engaged in this work; I know how much they realize the need for protection of this kind, and I trust the committee will take seriously this letter which is being read and the representations which are being made. I hope the hon. member will now be allowed to continue.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am quoting from this letter, Mr. Chairman, because it puts the case much better than I could put it myself. All I am interested in is in making the best possible case for the waterfront workers, in the province of British Columbia in particular, but also in other parts of the dominion. I am not talking just for the sake of filling up time. I have never done that, and I have no intention of doing it to-night. Quoting from the letter:

> The board does not keep a list of accidents happening in any particular locality, but to prove the need we have, out of a mass of waterfront accidents, looked up the files and selected a few of the cases to which some of the regulations would apply. Attached hereto and under the number of the particular section of the proposed by-laws is a list of a few cases that have actually happened in the last two years, and which could have been remedied had there been a safety inspector qualified and fully authorized to act as an independent arbitrator in seeing to it that faulty gear and equipment and unsafe practices were not used or operated.

Then it goes on to give the cost rates charged to employers engaged in stevedoring work in British Columbia from 1924 to 1931. I shall not read all the figures, but simply wish to point out that in 1924 the charge was $4.87 per $100 of pay-roll, and in 1931 it had almost doubled, amounting to $8 per $100 of pay-roll. That is sufficient, Mr. Chairman, to show the increasing seriousness of waterfront accidents in the province of British Columbia. Quoting again from the letter:

> The above figures indicate the increase in number and severity of accidents in the last five years. As you know, therefore, no profits under workmen's compensation and moneys are only collected from employers as required to meet the cost of accidents. While it is true that these rates cover all of the stevedoring operations in the province, yet examination of the record of the various employers in and about Vancouver gives no general indication that their experience is in any way different from the experience of employers operating elsewhere. Substantially two-thirds of the accidents that happen in the stevedoring industry occur in the port of Vancouver. In the case of some of the vessels where serious accidents have happened elsewhere these same vessels in completing their cargo took a portion of it at Vancouver, so that, for example, if a workman's leg were crushed and possibly amputated by reason of faulty gear or equipment on the vessel at some other port, the same condition could have happened on the same ship in the port of Vancouver.
> During the arbitration between the Vancouver and District Waterfront Workers' Association and the Employers in the port of Vancouver in June, 1930, the whole situation was very fully discussed with Mr. J. B. Thomson, who was then chairman of the arbitration committee, and is now a member of the Vancouver harbour commission, and we are sure that he was very fully convinced of the necessity of the course outlined herein.

He was undoubtedly convinced to the extent that in 1931 he forwarded to the department for the approval of the minister the regulations I have already mentioned. Quoting again from the letter, I read the following:

> Our board, through its chairman, advised Mr. Thomson under date of June 18, 1930, that it was self apparent that an independent accident prevention inspector having authority to enforce regulations should be the one to deal with the inspection of tackle, equipment, proper lighting and all accident prevention matters, together with the necessary accident prevention education which would be brought about by his frequent visits to the various docks throughout this district. It was then pointed out that the chief efficacy of such an inspector was that he would be an independent arbiter as to the means to be used to safeguard life and limbs of workmen. It is quite apparent we believe that one cannot get the same independence of thought and action from an employee that one would expect from an independent official. The board's viewpoint has been concurred in, as outlined before, by all parties having to do with the actual work on the waterfront, save the employers in question.
> Might we suggest that the passing of the proposed harbour board regulations could not act detrimentally to the port of Vancouver. We fail to find a single regulation that can be said to be extreme or arbitrary or that would place any additional penalty on a vessel coming into this harbour other than is necessary to protect life and limb. There isn't any doubt in law but that a foreign boat may come into this harbour with defective tackle or equipment; might employ its own stevedores, kill or maim them and—unless libelled by the injured workman and possibly his dependents—might leave without in any way accounting for the havoc so created; thus leaving the cost of maintaining the injured workman or his dependents to be borne by our citizens. Is there any doubt but that in the average case of disability—and I take it we would be in the same position—a workman does not think of his rights until he feels the pinch of need, by which time the vessel might be gone from our shores.

There are some further paragraphs, Mr. Chairman, but I shall not take time to read them. I think I have read sufficient to convince hon. members of the extreme need for safety regulations in loading and unloading ships.

I now come to a few cases which the workmen's compensation board have pointed out might have been prevented had there been proper inspection.

Claim No. 344409—N. J. Donovan: Head injury—fatal. Defective hook on beam spreaders opened out, flew across deck and struck man on head.

The board claims this accident could have been prevented had section 8 of the regulations sent in by the harbour board been in operation.

Claim No. 338533—P. McDonough: Fractured arm. Derrick fell, striking man on arm.

This might have been prevented had section 7 been in operation.

Claim No. 298594—G. B. Sparrow: Head injury—fatal. Ring bolt in bulkhead gave way, snatch block fell, striking man on head.

This might have been prevented had section 8 been in operation. I think I have read enough to convince the minister that regulations are necessary in order to protect life and limb in the province of British Columbia, and I assume that conditions are no different in other parts of Canada. By approving the regulations drawn up by the waterfront workers and the Vancouver harbour commissioners, I think the minister could give effect to the clause in the Canada Shipping Act which I have quoted.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has occupied an hour's time in reading communications which are on the files of the department, and in connection with which those of us who are in close touch with this matter have full and complete knowledge. For the past few months the minister in charge, myself and others who have taken a direct interest in this matter—more than merely talking about it on one or two occasions—have been endeavouring to find a suitable way of dealing with this matter, for which we have been desirous of seeking a remedy. At first it was thought that the by-law of the harbour commissioners to which the hon. member has referred on so many occasions to-night might have been the proper way to deal with it. However, after the by-law had been formulated, forwarded to Ottawa, and examined by officers of the department, it was learned that the harbour commissioners did not have the jurisdiction which we had at first supposed. Under such by-law it would have been useless to appoint inspectors, because the first case challenged would of course have disclosed the weakness of the whole procedure. Then the minister, his staff and myself sought other means to deal with the situation. It was hoped that amendments to the Canada Shipping Act might have been prepared for this session. That procedure was delayed, however, as hon. members know, because of the very extensive nature of the changes due to the statute of Westminster, which was completed only a few months ago. During the past week or two the minister and his officials have been studying the matter, and only yesterday I was in touch with the Department of Marine in connection with it. Possibly the situation may be met in part by instructing the inspectors of ship hulls and boilers to enlarge their inspections so as to include tackle. Personally I think there is still some question as to the soundness of that procedure—I will not say the advisability of it, but as to whether or not authority goes that far. It is thought, however, that the difficulty may be met in that way until such time as the general shipping act is amended, or until power could be given to the harbour board to pass regulations.

I wish to assure the committee that this matter has been under close observation and study by the department, its officials, the minister and myself, and has not in any sense been neglected. It must be recognized that in matters of this kind a pious wish that something be done is not sufficient; there is the question of working out the constitutional and technical details. True, we sometimes express a little irritation at delays, but in this instance I think the delays have been warranted, and every possible effort has been made to meet the situation. I do not know that anything further can be said on the subject at the present time. The minister, I know, will support me in what I say, that without any unreasonable delay the matter will be completed. I might also add that there have been some changes in the senior officials of the Marine department which has made correspondence and discussions a bit awkward, because Mr. Johnston retired a little while ago, the deputy was ill for some time and the present acting deputy comes on the job without having knowledge of what has passed between myself and the other officials. This has caused delay, regrettable no doubt, but nothing further, I think, could have been done under the circumstances.

Mr. MacINNIS: I regret the Minister of Trade and Commerce had to go out of his way to find fault with the time I had occupied in bringing the matter to his attention, but I did not take even thirty minutes.

Mr. STEVENS: A solid hour.

Mr. MacINNIS: There were less than five pages in the letter, and I did not read the whole of it. I am not a very fast reader but I can read more than five pages in an hour. I pointed out that this matter had been before the department since 1919, that the present Minister of Marine had not been in office during part of that time, and that I was not finding any great fault with him, but simply drawing it to his attention. Surely we have the right to draw to the attention of the committee matters which affect the life and limb of workers in their daily avocations without being accused of taking up too much time.

Mr. NEILL: I heartily support the very able presentation of this case made by the member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis). I do not quite grasp what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said as to what action would be taken. He said they contemplated giving authority to the steamboat and hull inspectors by enlarging their jurisdiction to include the inspection of tackle, but I understood him to say there was some possible objection even to that. If that is the case, the obvious remedy would be to amend the Canada Shipping Act in its entirety this session. But while that might not be possible, it would be quite simple to pass what I might term an interim revision of such sections of the act as deal with this matter. Do not let us have any mistake so that after parliament has adjourned we shall find that for another year the government is prevented from taking the necessary action. It would be a very simple matter to pass an amendment. Indeed I understood the minister to say on another occasion he was going to amend the Canada Shipping Act this session dealing with some specific thing which he named. If that is so, it would be very easy for him to take authority to do what is required to give full force and weight to whatever action may be necessary regarding this matter. I agree entirely with the member for Vancouver South, that it is of no use to appoint a man merely to advise these people. Some of these tramp steamer people are not open to advice; they will simply laugh at him. The hon. member read some regulations, one of which said the inspector should report any case to the minister, and he assumed that that would not mean reporting to the minister at Ottawa. To my mind it would, and it would be highly undesirable to have the thing hung up while the report was going to Ottawa, because in that time the boat would be loaded, somebody might be killed, and the boat would have sailed. Surely we should give the inspector power to order an immediate change in the tackle or other equipment, if faulty, and then if his action is found to be too arbitrary it would be subject to revision later on. That would ensure safety for the men in the meantime. I am much interested in this matter because we have the same situation on the west coast, where we are loading a large number of ships every year. Port Alberni is now the third largest shipping port in British Columbia, which gives an idea of the amount of business done there. We are having too many accidents. But you cannot expect one ship to go to considerable expense if others are not compelled to do so. Put them all on an even basis and give the inspector ample powers.

The member for Vancouver South, spoke of the workmen's compensation board having a safety officer. I had an opportunity on one occasion to observe the action of such an officer. I was coming down from a logging camp some years ago, and even to my untrained eye the roadbed was in a horrible condition. I said to the lad who was on the speeder bringing me down, "This roadbed is in a rotten condition." He said, "Yes, that is what the safety inspector told the boss yesterday." I made inquiries and found that the inspector had condemned a mile and a half of that track, and he did not allow an engine to move over it until the track was put in a proper state. Probably that saved a bad accident. There is no kick among the lumber people, for those who are alive to their responsibilities realize it is a good thing, and in the long run, economical, to have a man in that capacity. He does not ask unreasonable things, but he is down on the men who, as they say in lumber circles, run a "haywire" proposition. That is the sort of power we want to give the inspector in connection with the stevedore operations.

Item agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Civil Government—Trade and Commerce—salaries, $554,310; contingencies, $40,000.

Mr. VENIOT: I note, Mr. Chairman, there is no reduction in contingencies, while in quite a number of other departments the contingencies have been cut down. Why were they not cut down in this department?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The contingency vote is a comparatively small vote for the activities of this department, and we found on carefully scrutinizing it that it was impossible this year to cut it down.

Item agreed to.

The Canada Grain Act, including management, operation, maintenance and equipment of elevators, administration of, $2,400,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the committee will remember, Mr. Chairman, that the Stamp commission report made a certain recommendation with respect to the appointing of a supervisor over the grain exchange. I wonder if the minister can tell us whether consideration has been given that recommendation, and if it is intended eventually to carry it out.

Mr. STEVENS: No action in that regard has been taken as yet.

Mr. LUCAS: Is it intended to take any action?

Mr. STEVENS: I could not give a definite answer at the present time. The matter is still under consideration.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Has my hon. friend any information with regard to a similar appointment made in Chicago? Does the inspector appointed there seem to be of any use, or is the appointment looked upon as a nominal appointment to constitute a certain safeguard?

Mr. STEVENS: We are not satisfied that the official referred to by my hon. friend is of any real value. Of course we would not offer any criticism of the action taken by a neighbouring country, but we are not satisfied that it is really of any great advantage. However, the matter is still under consideration.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice a decrease of $331,000 in this item. Could the minister tell us how he proposes to make this saving?

Mr. STEVENS: In the preparation of this estimate the Board of Grain Commissioners and the department must anticipate the possible requirements of the season. Of course it is quite impossible to make a precise estimate, because if the crop happened to be very heavy the services required would be much enlarged. It would be quite possible this year—and I would say it was quite likely—if we were fortunate enough to have an unusually large crop, that this estimate would not be sufficient. However, considering a normal crop we anticipate that the provision made here will be sufficient.

Mr. VALLANCE: Could the minister say whether it was necessary to use all the money voted last year for the operation of the act?

Mr. STEVENS: I think there is possibly $75,000 or $100,000 left, and of course out of the appropriation last year we paid all the administrative costs of the wheat bonus.

Mr. VALLANCE: What was the cost of the administration of the wheat bonus?

Mr. STEVENS: The administration of that bonus cost $107,000, or just about one per cent. It must be recalled that three million individual cheques were sent out, and I believe the cost of printing alone was about $40,000. The total cost for printing, mailing, clerical help and so on was about one per cent, or $107,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then in view of this decrease in the estimate are we to assume that it is not the intention of the government to continue the bonus this year?

Mr. STEVENS: At the moment that assumption is not germane to the discussion. As far as the Board of Grain Commissioners and their estimate are concerned, they have no instructions on that point. If anything of the kind is carried on this year an additional estimate will have to be brought down to take care of it.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of the short crop that was grown last year, and the fact that of the total appropriation of $2,731,000 only some $100,000 is left, the minister cannot anticipate similar legislation this year when he makes a reduction of $331,000.

Mr. STEVENS: That includes reductions in salaries, and there were some improvements and extensions to elevators which are not anticipated this year.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is the elevator at Churchill completed?

Mr. STEVENS: That is not under this department; it is under the Department of Railways.

Mr. LUCAS: Could the minister state how the revenue compared with the previous year?

Mr. STEVENS: The revenue is down, necessarily. We have not the figures to March 31, because all the accounts are not in, but to February 15 the revenue was $1,229,000, in round figures, as against $2,144,000 for the previous year. Due to the comparatively short crop the revenue is down.

Mr. TOTZKE: Is anything included in this estimate for the operation of the elevator at Churchill?

Mr. STEVENS: No; that comes under the railway department.

Mr. TOTZKE: The operation of the elevator also?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Has the minister before him the total number of bushels handled through the terminals last year, and the percentages of the five or six practical grades?

Mr. STEVENS: That is all reported in the crop year report, and the report of the grain commissioners for the crop year was laid on the table the other day. I will look it up and get the figures in a moment.

Mr. TOTZKE: In the meantime perhaps the minister would tell us why the operation of the elevator at Churchill should come under the Department of Railways instead of the grain commission. Is the railway department equipped for that sort of thing?

Mr. STEVENS: The Churchill terminals were constructed by the Department of Railways as part of the Hudson Bay railway scheme. It is very much the same as the elevators in Montreal, which belong to the port of Montreal. It is similar to the Prescott elevator, which is a railway elevator, and to the elevator at Port Colborne.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then am I to understand that these elevators mentioned by the minister are not under the control of the grain commission?

Mr. STEVENS: The inspection of grain, the grading, the weighing in and out and so on, as in any other terminal elevator, is under the Board of Grain Commissioners, but the ownership, the cost of operation and the management are under the Department of Railways.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why are these elevators mentioned by the minister under the Department of Railways instead of the grain commission? What peculiar thing is there about those elevators that there is not about the others?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will of course realize that there are a great many terminal elevators in the country owned by private companies, and others are owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and by the Canadian National Railways as part of their systems. It is a matter of very long standing. It has been going on for the last thirty years, and the National railways, now taking the place of the old Canadian Northern Railway, have carried on the policy of certain elevators being operated under their direct jurisdiction, just as the Canadian Pacific Railway did in years gone by.

Mr. TOTZKE: Then there is included a certain amount for the inspection and control of the elevator at Churchill.

Mr. STEVENS: In this vote?

Mr. TOTZKE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: There would be supplied under this vote the necessary inspectors and the usual officers of the Board of Grain Commissioners for the inspection and handling of grain.

Mr. TOTZKE: That comes out of this vote?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. TOTZKE: Then, in spite of the fact that the minister will have more expenditures this year, he is reducing the estimate by $300,000. Does he think he will have enough?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. We have cut down on any extension to construction, and we have, of course, the usual wage reduction of ten per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: Do the Canadian National Railways operate any other terminal than Churchill?

Mr. STEVENS: Possibly I gave the wrong impression. It is the Railway department that operates the Churchill terminal. The Prescott and Port Colborne terminals are under the Railway department. I will now give the information asked for a moment ago by the hon. member for Camrose. The volume of grain handled by the five elevators in 1930-31 was: Port Arthur, 3,537,500 bushels; Moose Jaw, 4,539,454 bushels; Saskatoon, 1,771,984 bushels; Calgary, 3,044,196; Edmonton, 2,619,897. This makes a total of 15,513,031 bushels.

Mr. LUCAS: Can the minister also give the number of bushels that have gone through the eastern elevators at Halifax, St. John and Montreal?

Mr. STEVENS: The elevators at Halifax, St. John and Montreal are under the respective harbour commissions.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any information as to the volume of wheat going through these elevators?

Mr. STEVENS: It is not in the report, so far as I can see at the moment.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I assume it is under the inspection department.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; my assistant will look it up.

Mr. VALLANCE: How many terminal elevators are operated to-day by the government?

Mr. STEVENS: The ones I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then all government-owned elevators are operated by the Railway department and not by the Department of Trade and Commerce under the supervision of the grain commission?

Mr. STEVENS: The elevators I referred to—Port Arthur, Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Calgary, Edmonton—are operated under the Board of Grain Commissioners. The terminals at Port Colborne, Prescott and Churchill are operated under the Railway department.

Mr. VENIOT: And Halifax and St. John?

Mr. STEVENS: Halifax, St. John and Montreal are under the harbour commissioners of the respective places.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Surely the Board of Grain Commissioners have supreme authority over the whole.

Mr. STEVENS: I have already stated that all of these, together with all privately-owned elevators in the country, scores of them, are administered under the terms of the grain act as regards inspection, grading, weighing-in and out and so forth. It is the ownership of elevators that we are speaking of.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I asked the question for the reason that for some considerable time Montreal was hesitant about recognizing the authority of the Board of Grain Commissioners. Does it fully recognize that authority now?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; I think it is working sweetly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It came along reluctantly.

[Mr. Lucas.]

Mr. GARDINER: As regards the terminal at Montreal, I notice that recently there seems to be trouble between the wheat pools and the commissioners of Montreal in respect to the using of pool wheat to fill orders belonging to other companies. What control has the grain commission over such procedure?

Mr. STEVENS: We have no direct jurisdiction over or knowledge of the point raised, but I understand—I am speaking now merely from hearsay—that there has been some dispute over something of that sort which is now in the courts. As I say, I am speaking with some hesitation because I am not well informed on the matter at the moment.

Mr. GARDINER: Probably the minister could give the committee some information with regard to the practice of the Board of Grain Commissioners in controlling the outflow of wheat from the terminals. Have they jurisdiction over the flow-out of wheat, apart from inspection, so that wheat that belongs to certain persons will not be shipped out to the order of some other company, other wheat being substituted?

Mr. STEVENS: The grain commissioners exercise fairly complete control over the output of the terminal elevators other than those in the east.

Mr. GARDINER: Other than those in the east? What is the reason for making an exception of those in the east, in view of the fact that they come under the grain commissioners? Why should there be an exception of the eastern as against the western terminals?

Mr. STEVENS: It will be recalled, of course, that up to a very few years ago the eastern elevators were not under the Board of Grain Commissioners—that is, so far as the full administration of the grain act was concerned. They now are, but the administration has not been carried to the point it has reached at Port Arthur or Vancouver. I am not able at the moment to give the reason for this. I presume it is a question of enlarging the jurisdiction of the Board of Grain Commissioners over the eastern terminals, and I am not certain that there is warranty for it. If the real necessity of it is disclosed there is no objection on the part of the board or of the department to arranging it or attempting to arrange it. Of course, we have to remember that the development of the grain export facilities in Montreal—we will speak of Montreal for the moment—is something that has grown up entirely under the control of the harbour commissioners and the authorities of the port of Montreal, and I should not like to say that we will step in and arbitrarily do this or that. Up to the present time the control exercised has appeared to be adequate and satisfactory.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the cost of administration of the Canada Grain Act being met by the charges made thereunder?

Mr. STEVENS: There have been deficits both this year and last year, largely due to the amendments of 1930 and the enlarged service which is now given as compared with the service prior to the last amendment of the act.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to come back to the question of terminals. It was my understanding at the time of the last revision of the act that the conditions applying to terminals other than at eastern ports would apply also to those at eastern ports. From time to time communications are received from eastern Canada, particularly from those cities where terminal elevators are located, upbraiding the western farmer for the fact that so much wheat is shipped through the United States. Only the last day or two such a communication was received from one of the eastern cities. If the harbour commissioners which are operating the eastern elevators object to coming under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners to the same extent as do the elevators in Vancouver or at the head of the lakes, I cannot see how they can expect the western farmer or the grain firms doing business in western Canada to have the same confidence in their elevators as they have in those under the control of the board. The minister has made the statement that these eastern terminals were developed by the different harbour commissions, and seemed to imply that because of that fact there was some reason why they should not come under the control of the Board of Grain Commissioners to the same extent as do the other elevators. The minister is aware of the fact that although the terminal at Vancouver was a government undertaking it was finally turned over to the Vancouver harbour commission, and for a very substantial period of time after it was turned over, the development of terminal facilities was carried on wholly and solely under the control of the commission. As far as I know, the harbour commission at Vancouver has not objected to being completely under the jurisdiction of the Board of Grain Commissioners; consequently I am at a loss to understand why the elevators at St. John, Halifax and Montreal object, if they do object, to coming under similar jurisdiction. I should like to know if they have raised any real objection. If the eastern ports desire to obtain a greater volume of Canadian grain they must instil the same confidence in those who will use their ports as is now felt in those terminals which are under the control of the grain board. Has the minister any information as to whether or not the harbour commissions at Montreal, St. John or Halifax have registered any objection to coming completely under the jurisdiction of the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. STEVENS: The ports of Halifax, St. John and Montreal are as completely under the jurisdiction of the Board of Grain Commissioners as is possible under the grain act as at present drafted. The mistake, if I may call it such, in the reasoning of my hon. friend is this: Vancouver, Prince Rupert and Port Arthur are what are known as inspection points at which inspection certificates are issued—terminal inspection certificates are not issued at the eastern outlets, as this would already be done at Port Arthur or Fort William. There is a question as to the advisability of making these eastern ports inspection points, and to do so would require an amendment to the act.

Mr. GARDINER: Do I understand that as far as outward cargoes are concerned, there is no inspection at any of these three ports?

Mr. STEVENS: That is right.

Mr. GARDINER: The certificate is merely transferred from Port Arthur or some other inspection point?

Mr. STEVENS: The certificate follows the grain.

Mr. GARDINER: What has been the experience with regard to complaints in connection with outward cargoes shipped from these ports, as compared with shipments from Vancouver or Prince Rupert?

Mr. STEVENS: For some years the conditions have been very satisfactory.

Mr. DUFF: Considerable discussion has taken place in the newspapers as to why more grain should not pass through the port of Halifax. It would be very informative if the minister could state to the committee the policy of the government in regard to endeavouring to have more grain shipped through that port.

Mr. STEVENS: The terminal at Halifax is not under the Board of Grain Commissioners, so that that information is not available at the present time. I shall try to have it by the time the committee next meets, unless it is the desire of the committee to have this item passed before eleven o'clock.

Mr. DUFF: I do not think the minister understood my question. I asked if he could state to the committee the policy of the government with regard to trying to arrange for grain shipments through the port of Halifax.

Mr. STEVENS: I will obtain that information.

Mr. VENIOT: What quantity of Canadian grain was shipped through the ports of Halifax and St. John in the winters of 1929-30, 1930-31 and 1931-32?

Mr. STEVENS: I will obtain that information. I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, April 11, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VACANCY IN REPRESENTATION OF MAISONNEUVE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received notification of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the electoral district of Maisonneuve in the province of Quebec, consequent upon the death of the sitting member therefor, Mr. Clement Robitaille.

I have accordingly addressed my warrant to the chief electoral officer for the issue of a writ.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Will Your Honour be good enough to state the date of that notification?

Mr. SPEAKER: My recollection is the document was received on the date it is dated, namely April 6, 1932.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Last Friday the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked a question with respect to the vacancy in the representation for the constituency of Maisonneuve. I find it a little difficult to understand why the inquiry was made in that form, inasmuch as the provisions of the House of Commons Act set out the method by which the Speaker is to be advised of a vacancy. Two members did sign a notice addressed to the Speaker regarding this vacancy on April 6; on April 7 the chief whip of the opposition addressed a letter to the Speaker of the house in the following words:

> Enclosed please find notice in due form signed by two members of the House of Commons, Messrs. St-Père and Deslauriers, advising you of the vacancy which occurred in the representation in the House of Commons, for the electoral district of Maisonneuve, by reason of the death of Mr. Clement Robitaille, K.C., of Montreal, member of the House of Commons for the electoral district of Maisonneuve, and asking you to issue a new writ for the election of a member to fill such vacancy, in accordance with the provisions of section 10 of chapter 145, entitled "An Act respecting the House of Commons," revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

In due course that letter was received by the Speaker, who on April 8 wrote the chief electoral officer enclosing the request in due form for the making out of a new writ for the election of a member to serve in the present parliament in the electoral district of Maisonneuve, Quebec. On April 9 the chief electoral officer wrote the Speaker acknowledging receipt of the notice. It follows that on Friday last, which was the 8th, the chief electoral officer had not acknowledged receipt of the notification of the death of the sitting member and of the direction to issue a writ accordingly, although the question was asked on Friday. It was not until the Speaker received the notification, which for some reason best known to hon. gentlemen opposite was not given previously, that the notice was sent to the chief electoral officer. The chief electoral officer was notified on Saturday last; to-day the Speaker made known to the house the fact that this had been done, so the government had no opportunity before Saturday last of learning that notification had been made as provided by law.

In the case of Athabaska the notice required by law was given by two members of parliament and, owing to climatic conditions to which reference was made, the writ was issued immediately for the poll. As hon. gentlemen doubtless have noticed, that poll was much larger than the one at the general election, and I was told—and I believe it is true—that it would be impossible to hold an election in that constituency during certain seasons of the year, owing to the difficulty of moving over the land when it is not frozen, or until it has dried out after the spring thaw. Therefore the writ was issued for that constituency in order to have the election before spring came on.

I think with this explanation it will be apparent to the house that not until to-day was the government in a position to take any action which might be desired with respect to Maisonneuve.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The statement just made by the Prime Minister would leave the impression that an obligation existed in law on the opposition to bring to the attention of the Speaker any vacancy existing in the House of Commons. The law is that any two members of the house may notify his honour the Speaker of the fact that a vacancy exists, and my question arose out of some surprise which we on this side felt that no member or supporter of the government had drawn to the attention of his honour the fact that a vacancy existed in the constituency of Maisonneuve and that the session was being allowed to go by with no endeavour made to fill that vacancy. The opposition took the course it did take at the end of last week because it became only too apparent that unless we moved in the matter the vacancy would in all probability not be filled, but there was no obligation resting on any member of the opposition to draw the existence of the vacancy to the attention of the Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: In order that there may be no misapprehension let me repeat that any two members of the house can give the notice, but I challenge the right hon. gentleman to name any case in which notice has not been given by the opposition with respect to vacancies existing in constituencies formerly represented by members of their party. That always has been done; it has become a sort of custom.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In answer to that challenge I may say that I remember many occasions during the time I was Prime Minister, having vacancies in constituencies brought to our attention, and where we took action as a government without waiting for the opposition to give the notification.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

STAMP COMMISSION

Mr. BEAUBIEN:

1. What was the total cost of the Stamp commission, appointed by the government to investigate the trading in futures?
2. What amounts were paid to each of the three commissioners: (a) for fees; (b) for expenses?
3. What lawyers were engaged by the government or any department of the government on the commission, and what was paid to them: (a) for fees; (b) for expenses?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to the first question, Mr. Speaker, is $9,218.22, but that does not include any expenditures by way of salaries to permanent officials of the Department of External Affairs.

In answer to the second question, no sum was paid for fees to any of the commissioners, but for expenses Sir Josiah Stamp received $2,120.57; Chief Justice Brown, $1,198.16; Mr. W. S. Evans, $1,101.73. Sir Josiah Stamp declined to accept any fee for his services, and, as has been intimated, a piece of plate was presented to him. Chief Justice Brown expects to be paid some small honorarium for his services, an appropriation for which will be included in the supplementary estimates, no amount having been determined.

In answer to the third question, the only legal adviser employed was Mr. S. T. Sweatman, K.C. He has not yet been paid for his services. For expenses he received $988.50.

That is the only information at the moment that I can give the hon. gentleman, except to repeat that the disbursements do not include the salaries of the permanent officials of the Department of External Affairs, who, especially in the person of Mr. Pearson, gave some services to the commission.

Therefore be it resolved that this mass meeting wire Premier Bennett, the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Labour, Sir Henry Thornton, and all Manitoba members of parliament, demanding the cancellation of the proposed reduction, and further demanding the establishment of the six-hour day, five days a week, in order to divide the work available amongst the present staff, and that we further desire them to understand that the officers of Division No. 4, who, without our vote or voice, put over both the wage reduction and the threatened reduction in staff, do not represent the shop employees of western Canada.

The question I wish to direct to the government is whether this matter is being taken into consideration and whether we may expect a statement in response to this communication.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): This matter has been brought up in the house at least half a dozen times by other members in whose constituencies shops are affected, and I have stated on every occasion that the matter has been taken up by the government, through myself, with the management in an effort to have the number laid off as small as possible. The management claim that they have done this and that they are laying off really only about half the number that was originally intended, because of the fact that they succeeded in getting the representatives of the men to cut down the number of hours per week worked by each man, so that they spread out work over more men. I think since Saturday there has been a committee of the management from Montreal dealing with the question in Winnipeg, and I heard indirectly, though it is absolutely unofficial, that they had come to some better understanding, though I am quite sure it will not be satisfactory to all the men, because the management claim they have a great many men for whom they cannot possibly find work. They take the attitude, naturally enough, that under present financial conditions they should not be expected to keep men for whom they have no work.

The government have done everything possible to have the work spread out, but the matter is entirely in the hands of the management. I have been asked by the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Sullivan) and by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Price) in regard to the shops in their constituencies. All the shops in the country are affected, but I am quite sure the management are doing everything possible to make it as easy as they can for the men.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONFERENCE OF GOVERNMENT WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to make a statement with regard to the conference of Saturday last with the premiers of the provinces, or if not, if he could indicate when such a statement might be made.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I do not propose to make a statement now, but at an appropriate time, when the resolution providing for additional legislation is before the house, a statement will be made.

INSURANCE TAX

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the government if its attention has been directed to the following communication which appears in the Ottawa Journal of to-day, and which is a Canadian Press despatch by direct wire from Toronto, dated April 10:

The Dominion government has decided to withdraw the proposed 15 per cent tax upon gross premiums paid by Canadian policyholders in British and foreign insurance companies, Colonel W. H. Price, Ontario Attorney General, said to-night.

Colonel Price made the announcement on his return from Saturday's parley between the Dominion government and officials of the nine provincial governments.

I should like to ask if that statement indicates the intention of the government and, if it does, whether in the opinion of the government an announcement of that kind should not have been made in the House of Commons before it was made in any other quarter?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I may say that it is news to me as to what is to be the attitude of the government with regard to this particular question. I can assure my right hon. friend that if there is any question of amending the proposed resolutions that action will be first brought to the attention of the house, which of course, is the proper procedure.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Another newspaper gone wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be noticed that nobody connected with the government made any statement with respect to it. No one connected with the administration made any statement; it was made by somebody else. In the same way, with respect to the conference itself, if there is anything to be said, it will be said in the house.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY—CAR FERRY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Railways. According to newspaper reports and a telegram I have received, with respect to the new time table for the Prince Edward Island railway, the second trip of the car ferry makes provision for passengers only as far as Summerside; no provision is made to carry them through, west. The same applies to the return trip in the morning; there is no connection west of Summerside with the first trip of the boat. This early connection was established to take care of the express shipment of live lobsters from that point as well as to accommodate passenger traffic. I would ask the Minister of Railways to bring this matter to the attention of the management in order that the same service that has been given for the past three or four years may be continued.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): As the hon. gentleman implies, this is a matter for the management. However, I shall gladly direct his remarks to their attention.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 5, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): At the very outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) my sincere congratulations on his attainment to the very important portfolio which he now holds. I also congratulate him upon what I may term the businesslike budget statement which he has presented to the house. That does not mean that there is not in that statement a good deal which I shall have to criticize. At the same time I do believe that the country will recognize in the hon. gentleman's budget generally a businesslike statement and one which succinctly sets out the position of the dominion as my hon. friend sees it.

It is somewhat unique that the hon. gentleman who moves the house into ways and means and the individual selected to reply should happen to be fellow townsmen. This, I suppose, is possibly a circumstance that does not happen in a lifetime. I want to say to and of my hon. friend that he and I have been personal friends for a good many years; as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I sometimes make the boast, or perhaps I should say the confession, that I am responsible for the hon. gentleman's entry into public life. Some twenty-four years ago he and I ran an election and I permitted him to get the most votes. Judging, however, by the situation in which he found himself the other day, I doubt whether it would not have been distinctly to his advantage had I insisted on defeating him on that occasion. He and I have never expected nor given very much quarter in political life so far as public records or affairs were concerned; and while I shall criticize, and I must say condemn in unmeasured terms, some of the matters to which he has referred, at the same time that shall not interfere with the warm personal friendship we have, nor with my regard for him as a distinguished Nova Scotian who has attained a high and important place in the councils of his party. My hon. friend has delivered what is supposed to be a résumé of the achievements of the government and of his party in matters which more closely affect the lives of Canadian citizens than any other, namely, the country's financial condition. I have heard of colourless budgets, and I want to say —and everyone who heard the budget or who has read it will, I think, agree with me in this—that this was no colourless budget; if any budget was ever a deep indigo it was the budget delivered by my hon. friend a few days ago. My hon. friend, as a competent advocate, endeavoured to extract some crumbs of comfort for the benefit of his followers in the house, and I was amused to observe the three occasions on which any applause was given his statement, except such as was vouchsafed him at the beginning and at the end. It was interesting to note the points on which the applause was given.

My hon. friend made some statement like this: that Canada had reason to look back with satisfaction on the past year in view of the fact that all external debts had been met. There was some faint applause from my hon. friends opposite, following this statement. But let me ask you, Mr. Speaker: Have we ever had to boast in this country about Canada having met her debts, either domestic, or external? Is there any particular reason for gratification that this country, with its resources, has at least been able to meet her external debts at this time? Is not the hon. gentleman's statement one which would rather create the apprehension that possibly we might not have been in the best position to meet our external debts?

I would point out to the house and to my hon. friend, who already knows, just how Canada did meet her external debts. Canada had $25,000,000 falling due on April 1 last, and paid that $25,000,000 in New York in cash. But what did she pay it out of? She paid it out of $100,000,000 borrowed the year before, $25,000,000 of which was set aside for the purpose of paying that loan. Canada also met $52,000,000 in, I believe, November last. How did she meet that? My hon. friend's budget statement shows that it was met in this way. It was met by refinancing seventy per cent of it under the conversion loan; which means that about $39,000,000 was taken up and replaced by long term loans, twenty-five year bonds, under the provisions of the conversion loan—not paid off, mark you. What was done with the balance? What was done in connection with the balance of $13,000,000 almost sounds like shoestring financing. That $13,000,000 was offered by tender to the public; $4,500,000 was all that was subscribed of that loan, the balance having to be finally paid out of the national service loan—another loan and another borrowing. I ask whether or not there was particular reason for applause on that statement from the Minister of Finance, which was one of the three points on which my hon. friend was applauded.

But I want to compare with that the record of the immediate predecessor, not of my hon. friend but of the government now in office. On August 1, 1929, there was due $60,000,000 on a loan. Was it paid by a conversion loan? Was it paid by a new national service loan? Did we have to ask for new tenders for a loan? That $60,000,000 was paid by the late Hon. James A. Robb, then Minister of Finance, out of the revenues of the country and was thus retired. That was the way loans were retired then. On February 1, 1930, there was an amount of $20,000,000 falling due. That $20,000,000 also was paid out of revenue; it was not financed by pushing it along twenty-five years or by putting a portion of it up for tender or having it paid for out of some other loan which had to be made; it was financed out of the revenues of this country and even after that was done, a surplus was shown.

My hon. friends may say that those were different times, but what about England? England borrowed $200,000,000 from the United States which was to fall due next August. Sometime early in March, or at least six months before that loan was due, $150,000,000 was paid back to the United States out of revenues which were raised under the British budget. I do not think there is very much to boast of in connection with the fact that so far our external debts have been met.

To what else did my hon. friend refer? What other bright spot did he find for his friends in his budget? I noticed he spoke of the conversion loan, which was mentioned also last year by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), when making his budget speech. At that time it was not a part of the financial record of the particular year which he was covering but he very properly mentioned it as it had taken place before his budget speech was delivered. My hon. friend mentioned it as being a part of the record of the financial transactions of the year which he was covering, and he pointed out that there would be a substantial saving in interest as a result of the financing which had been done by this government in connection with the conversion loan. I remember the applause which greeted his announcement that in 1935 there would be a saving in annual interest of $6,000,000 and I could not help wondering at the capacity of hon. friends opposite for being thankful for small mercies. If they had cast their minds back over a few years they would not have found much reason for congratulation in that statement. This conversion loan has been talked of a good deal, and I shall mention it further in a moment. In connection with this particular feature, let me remind the house and let me remind this country, if I may, that during the last five years of the Liberal regime $257,000,000 of the funded debt of this country was paid and this country was saved about $12,500,000 per year in interest. That amount was not saved by putting out a conversion loan for future generations to pay, it was saved by the simple expedient of paying off principal. That is a record which my hon. friends might emulate but unfortunately they have not been able to do so. They have already obliterated the debt reduction which was made under the previous administration by the increase which has taken place in the public debt since the present government took office.

While I am dealing with the conversion loan I shall mention another matter brought up by my hon. friend. I said that, generally speaking, his statement was businesslike, and it was, but I think my hon. friend's hand slipped a little when he was writing the paragraph in connection with the conversion loan. Let me read his statement, which is as follows:

> The time for this conversion loan was admirably chosen. Its execution was attended with outstanding success, and its effect upon our financial position has been marked. That this is so is due entirely to the vision of the Prime Minister whose conception it was and under whose guidance it was conducted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought that about this time there would come a reiteration of that faint applause.

I always had the idea that the people of the Dominion of Canada had as much to do with the success of the conversion loan as anybody. I have not heard either the Prime Minister in his budget speech of last year or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in his of this year, pay tribute to the people who agreed to convert their bonds and to take in return long term bonds. I submit that that statement is perhaps hardly fair to the people of Canada who held victory bonds which were selling at that time for 104 and 105, and who were asked to convert those bonds for bonds which are now selling at 92 or 93. I do not think they will altogether relish the idea that all they have done is simply to pay for a testimonial to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has reason to be grateful that their response was such as it was but the people who in April and May of 1930 turned in bonds then selling at 105 for bonds which are now selling at 91 or 92 and bearing interest of four and a half per cent have perhaps some reason to complain when six months later the Minister of Finance of this country offers bonds at 99 bearing five per cent interest. I think the people have a right to complain of this financing and to say that perhaps too much credit is not due to the Prime Minister in connection therewith. My hon. friends may applaud if they wish but I submit that it would have been only justice to the people of Canada had the Minister of Finance paid to them the tribute which was due and acknowledged the part which they took when they turned in their bonds for the conversion loan and not to give the Prime Minister the "entire" credit. These people accepted a loss and that loss has continued to grow as the months go on. I know quite well the difference between the prices of long term bonds and short term bonds, and I realize that the national service loan and the conversion loan were two entirely different things. I do not think the right hon. minister can give too much credit to the investors of Canada for their having put through the conversion loan.

Another thing to which my hon. friend referred and in connection with which there was some more faint applause was the matter of the balance of trade. My hon. friend's words were these:

> Notwithstanding this unfavourable aspect of our external commerce, a very distinct improvement has taken place in the conversion of an unfavourable into a favourable balance. Starting last June, our exports commenced to exceed the imports and a surplus of exports over imports has continued month by month to date.

With all due respect to my hon. friend, I say to him quite frankly that he knows that that means nothing at all; he knows that the mere fact that we happen to have a $15,000,000 or $25,000,000 favourable balance of trade means absolutely nothing under the circumstances of trade as they exist at the present time. My hon. friend has misstated the case. He said that exports exceeded imports but that is not what happened—imports were less than exports by reason of the fact that my hon. friends have restricted imports. Our policy always has been to obtain a favourable balance of trade by expanding exports; our hon. friends' policy has been to restrict imports. That is the difference.

Let me give a simple, homely illustration to my hon. friend. This matter of the balance of trade has been the subject matter of a good many pages in books on political economy, and there has been some discussion thereon in this house. I turned up the reference made to it in 1930 by the Prime Minister, and I found that it was one of the few times when he skated most gingerly around the subject. He declined to commit himself as to whether an unfavourable balance of trade was a good or bad thing; all he said was that if it was a good thing to have a favourable balance of trade then it must be a bad thing to have an unfavourable balance. That is as far as he went. I submit that that is not so, and I shall endeavour to demonstrate my point in a moment. A couple settles down in the bush. They have nothing to do but clear the land and sell the wood which they cut. During one month of his operations the settler sells five cords of wood for which he receives $15. At the end of the month he comes home to his wife and says: "Wife, I have sold five cords of wood at $15 and I have a favourable balance of trade because I have spent only $12; I have $3 to the good." His wife replies: "Yes, and I have lived on two meals a day and the children are barefoot and without clothes." Is it very much satisfaction to that settler that he has a favourable balance of trade?

I am going to deal with the situation in the light of the figures which the Minister of Finance has put on record and I want to show Canada's present position in this respect and how our services are being starved in order that we may worship this precious god of a favourable balance of trade about which my hon. friends opposite talk. An adverse balance of trade is a good thing if it indicates that the person against whom the balance is adverse has plenty of money to invest in foreign products and to bring them in. A favourable balance of trade is a bad thing if it means that the person in whose favour that balance is has starved himself in order to bring about that condition. When we come to look at the record which the Minister of Finance has put upon unrevised Hansard at page 1911, I do not think there is anything about which we should be very proud or concerning which we should make many boasts, in view of the downward trend of trade in the last three years. In the last three years the total trade of Canada was as follows:

Year Ending February 28, 1930
Total trade of Canada.. ..	$2,188,594,000
Unfavourable balance.. ..	82,002,000
Decrease..	.....

Nobody worried very much those days about the unfavourable balance because we had in this country plenty of goods to pay for it if the time ever came when we would have to pay for it in this way instead of in gold.

Year Ending February 28, 1931
Total trade of Canada.. ..	$1,591,940,000
Unfavourable balance.. ..	70,524,000
Decrease..	25%
Year Ending February 28, 1932
Total trade of Canada.. ..	$1,067,603,000
Favourable balance..	25.491,000
Decrease..	33⅓%

These last figures are found in the statement given by my hon. friend and applauded by his supporters as a desirable state of affairs. They show a decline of 33⅓ per cent from last year and a decrease of practically 50 per cent from two years ago; yet because we happen to have a small favourable balance of trade of $25,000,000, my hon. friends opposite consider this something about which to boast. This is the best way to test a balance of trade. Let me ask them: Would you rather be back under the conditions of February 28, 1930, with an unfavourable balance of trade of $82,000,000, but a total trade of $2,188,000,000, or under present conditions with a small favourable balance of trade of $25,000,000, but a total trade shrunk by one-half? There is only one answer. I do not think my hon. friends opposite will derive very much comfort out of this idea of a favourable balance of trade.

Let me deal with another matter which arises out of the budget speech. A year ago the present Prime Minister delivered his budget speech and as reported on page 2168 of Hansard of 1931, this is what he said:

> I now come to what probably to some is the most interesting part of our discussion, namely, to what ways and means we shall resort for the purpose of providing the money to carry on the public business. I shall come first of all to a statement of anticipated revenues and expenditures. I will admit that this is the first time for many years that this country has had a budget. . . . Will any member on the other side of the house say that last year there was any estimate given of expected revenues? Was there any estimate given of expected expenditures? Was there any word given of a $75,000,000 deficit? What did they do? What the then government did was merely to bring down estimates for moneys to be raised by taxation without any estimate of what was to be realized. I said frequently in this house in those days, and I now repeat, that not in any municipal council in this country would the people tolerate their mayor and councillors conducting business without giving an estimate of expected expenditures and revenues for the current year. It is the basis of responsible government, it is the basis upon which representative institutions have been established, and that responsibility can only attach when there is some estimate as to what is being received by the country from the taxation imposed and as to what expenditures are to be made. So I propose under the heading which I have given to draw attention to these matters. I shall ask hon. gentlemen to go through the record of my predecessors in that regard during the last seven or eight years and see if they can find any such record there. I could have easily escaped doing so. All I would have had to do would have been to follow the example of my predecessors during the past eight years, and I would have escaped all responsibility for giving any figures of what the proposed income and expenditure will be during the present year.

Then he goes on to say:

> On the basis of existing taxation rates, the anticipated revenues in the present fiscal year will be $325,120,000.

Then on the next page, page 2169, he says:

> On the basis of the present volume of business, it is estimated that these additional taxes will yield $94,000,000 in a twelve months' period.
> To give a comparison of the estimated total revenues for the present year, with the actual revenues of last year, the following is submitted.

Then my right hon. friend gives a statement of the actual revenues of 1930-31 and the estimated revenues of 1931-32. I shall read just the last column:

Estimated Revenues 1931-32
Customs duties	$ 122,000,000
Excise duties	59,500,000
Excise taxes	99,000,000
Income tax	63,500,000
Post office	32,675,000
Interest on investments	8,800,000
Miscellaneous revenue	13,776,000
Total	$ 399,251,000
German reparation payment and miscellaneous receipts	4,044,000
	$ 403,295,000

Then he goes on:

With estimated expenditures of $410,273,000 exclusive of expenditures on capital account and advances to Quebec Harbour Commission, but including the balance of $13,000,000 of the unemployment relief appropriation of 1930 and estimated revenues of $403,295,000, the deficiency in revenues under expenditures, based upon the estimates made, will be some $7,000,000.

But this is interesting:

The $13,000,000 for unemployment relief is a commitment actually made in 1930-31, and would more properly be considered in the accounts of last year, but under the government's system of book-keeping, the actual disbursements not being made until this year due to the time necessary for the usual accounting formalities, they serve to add to the expenditures of the present year.

Now:

Taking this into consideration, the figures presented indicate a balancing of the budget by a substantial margin in respect of expenditures properly applicable to 1931-32, after excluding capital.

Let us examine into this. His total estimated revenue was $404,295,000. In order to arrive at the taxation revenue, I deduct from that Post Office, $32,675,000; interest on investments, $8,800,000; miscellaneous revenue, $13,776,000, and German reparation payment and miscellaneous receipts, $4,044,000, or a total of $59,295,000, and I find that the taxation revenue which my right hon. friend estimated for in his budget was $345,000,000. I want to compare that with the statement made by the present Minister of Finance as reported on unrevised Hansard of this year at page 1897. My hon. friend shows there, in the annual statement of taxation revenues, that the amount of $273,348,000 was received in 1931-32. In other words, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was out in that budget he made—and in respect of which the principles of responsible government were going down to defeat if he did not carry them out—he is out the amount of $71,652,000. My right hon. friend also claimed it would be a balanced budget. I shall direct my remarks to that in a minute.

Then in order that I may do no injustice, I wish to compare his estimate of all revenues. So far I have dealt only with taxation revenues. His estimate of all revenues as contained in the 1931 Hansard at page 2169 is $404,295,000. At page 1898 of unrevised Hansard for the present session we find that the estimated revenue received for the year 1931-32 is $334,741,000. In other words the difference between the estimate made last year of the revenue and the revenue realized is $68,554,000. I mention that now, and I think we are entitled to bring the fact sharply to the Prime Minister's attention, in view of the fact that he has indulged in a great deal of criticism, condemnation and almost contempt with regard to the way in which previous Ministers of Finance have brought down their budgets. He has said time and again—and I notice in another debate he made this particular reference—that it is the essence of responsible government that these things should appear in the budget speech. He has tried it, and I want to ask this house with all due respect whether it is better to have a budget without an estimate as to future revenue, and at the same time have it come out on the right side of the balance sheet, or to have a budget with estimates which is $70,000,000 out of line.

I shall deal with a few individual inconsistencies. My right hon. friend figured that customs duties would produce $122,000,000. According to the figure of my hon. friend the present Minister of Finance, customs duties produced only $102,891,000. In other words, my right hon. friend was out about $20,000,000 on that item alone. Remember, Mr. Speaker, these were customs duties which were estimated on the basis of business continuing as it actually was at that time. He was boasting about making an estimate. All he had to do was simply to have a clerk in his office figure out the amount of moneys that had been brought in in that particular year, and then figure the same amount of business but applying the new rate. No magic wand had to be exercised to make this estimate. The thing that needed judgment, a judgment which my right hon. friend seemed to lack, was to forecast business conditions for this year, and to know whether or not the same amount of imports would come in as came in last year. That is where he lamentably failed. That is in reference to customs.

With regard to excise duties he estimated that we would receive $59,500,000. As a matter of fact there was collected only $48,688,000. I find more difficulty with regard to the sales tax. His estimate combines two figures. First he takes the figure of $38,000,000 which he shows opposite excise taxes on his statement of revenues collected for the year 1930-31, plus $52,500,000 which he shows as estimated increase in sales tax, making a total of $90,000,000 estimated revenue from sales tax. That is, of course, if the first item refers to sales tax alone. Actually there was collected for sales tax instead of $90,000,000 only $41,271,000. That means of course that the trade of this country has gone down, and at a later time I will deal more at length with that point. I should like my right hon. friend to remember that there is one of the best examples of the condition of domestic as well as import trade in this country. We find that the receipts from sales taxes drop off nearly 50 per cent, when the rate was increased from one per cent to four per cent. In other words there was an increase in rate of 400 per cent. With regard to the income tax my right hon. friend might have said this, in explanation, "Well, I made that estimate expecting the income tax would produce very much more than it did, because of the fact that I proposed to increase the income tax." Strangely enough however he is deprived of even that comfort, because after having left the income tax at its old rate and not having increased it, he collected practically as much last year as he estimated under the new rate. So he gets no comfort from that at all.

And then we find that he was about a million dollars out in his estimate in connection with the Post Office Department. Let me point out that he estimated there would be an increase in post office revenue of about $2,175,000. How was that post office revenue going to be produced? It was going to be produced by the increased revenue derived from the additional one cent tax on letters. What happened was that the receipts fell off to the extent of about a million dollars, or more accurately, about $900,000. In other words, about $900,000 less of one cent stamps were sold than my right hon. friend expected. The trade which used the post office had fallen off under the régime of my right hon. friend.

Let us survey the expenditures. First, I should like to give my right hon. friend credit; he was not very far out in connection with his expenditures. What was the situation? He is only $25,000,000 out, and that may be explained—and I am willing to give him the benefit of the doubt—that may be explained by the fact that there was an expenditure of $25,000,000 in connection with unemployment relief. The expenditures which he estimated were $410,273,000. The expenditures which were made were $454,246,000. Then we should add to his estimates the capital account, which he did not include, of $18,484,000, and for the Quebec harbour commission $1,700,000, making a total of $430,457,000, leaving an increase over his estimated expenditure of $23,786,000. As I say, $25,000,000 was spent on unemployment relief. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Finance said he actually included the $25,000,000 expenditure in last year's statement.

But what is the sum total of it all? The situation is this: My right hon. friend intimated in the statement which I have read that the figures indicated a balancing of the budget by a substantial margin, in respect of expenditures particularly applicable to the year 1931-32. Let us see how near he came to balancing his budget. The actual expenditures were $454,246,000. We will take from that the $13,000,000 for unemployment relief, leaving $441,000,000. We will take off another $25,000,000 for unemployment relief which he says he did not count on, leaving $416,000,000. The actual revenue which was to balance that budget, according to my right hon. friend, was not $416,000,000, but $334,000,000, or a shortage of $81,000,000. That is what my right hon. friend regarded as a balanced budget. I am mentioning these facts because I hope he will not again in this house throw slurs with regard to people who do not make estimates concerning their budgets. People who live in glass houses should not throw stones. I put these facts on record so my right hon. friend will find that it is possible even for him to make mistakes with regard to estimates, and to present to the country a statement which is entirely misleading, as the facts actually show when the time for reckoning arrives.

I should like to make comment on my right hon. friend's remark about this being a budget. "Now" he infers, "We are going to present a budget what is a budget"—as the Irishman says. In the light of the facts it would seem that this budget is a good deal more like a bedtime story than it is like any statement of facts upon which we could depend, or a real estimate showing the country's financial condition. Because, after all in his remarks on the revenue items of the budget his emphasis was on the ability to make predictions, and in those predictions he has entirely failed. Let me read an extract from the remarks of a gentleman who, my hon. friends will agree, is an authority in financial matters, the remarks of a gentleman in whom my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will perhaps place some credence. They are:

> The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in delivering his budget address in the British parliament, is always held to the strictest account to the extent to which he has been able to realize his expectations; and the extent to which his representations agree with the facts of the year under review.

Those words are found in Hansard of March 13, 1928, at page 1244, and they are the words of the Hon. R. B. Bennett when leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition.

On this point last session I said to my right hon. friend:

> Now let me say a word more with regard to my hon. friend's boast in regard to his budget. He boasts that this is a budget, and I presume he pledges himself to the estimate which he has made as being a fair forecast of what is going to take place with regard to financial operations this year. My hon. friend quotes scripture in this house occasionally, and I want to remind him of this scriptural injunction:
>
> Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off.
> Let us wait until next year and see whether or not his predictions with regard to revenue and expenditure will come true. I wish I could believe that his forecast is correct, and that only to the extent for which he has budgeted the revenues would be reduced, but I am afraid that will not be so. I warn him that people on this side of the house, and not only here but throughout the country generally, are very much concerned as to the situation in Canada and as to the policies which he has adopted towards our trade.

My right hon. friend has girded on the harness and he has put it off, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) is now taking the load of that office. I respectfully suggest that my right hon. friend cannot rid himself of the responsibility which he undertook last year when he criticized the budgets presented by his predecessors, neither can he escape responsibility for the forecast which he made on that occasion, and in view of what has actually happened since then I think it will be agreed that if what he presented really was a budget, he has not handed over the portfolio to the present minister a day too soon.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister has had a number of hobbies in his time—stabilization of economic conditions was one of his hobbies upon which he expressed himself very emphatically during the election; "blasting" as a trade policy was another hobby; "balancing the budget" was yet another, and he was also fond of expatiating on maintaining the balance of trade. There must be no mistake in the house or in the country that this budget is not a balanced budget. Some of our newspapers seem to have an idea that the budget has been balanced. Let me point out that my hon. friend was very careful in that respect. He was rather adroit, but he was quite frank when he said that balancing the budget would extend to the "usual current governmental services"; that was as far as he thought we should go. He added that as to financing, the Canadian National Railways and unemployment relief would have to be left to take care of themselves. He admits that the estimated expenditures do not cover the figures for unemployment relief or our indirect liabilities with respect to the Canadian National Railways. I do not find any fault with him in regard to the latter liabilities because this financing has been dealt with separately since 1922; but in regard to unemployment relief, I submit after the experience we have had during the last two years a halt should be called in rolling up like a snowball the debt of this country in connection with current expenses which are incurred by reason of the default of my hon. friends opposite to fulfil their election promises. They promised to end unemployment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Didn't they do it?

Mr. RALSTON: They promised work for all who were willing to work. They have not been able to make good those promises, and I am going to point out some of the reasons for their failure. I submit the reason why this budget is not balanced to-day is that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance—as a member of the government, not personally—has not the courage to face the people and endure the criticism he knows would be levelled at him if he imposed the taxes that are necessary in order to balance the budget. That is the situation, and the country might just as well understand it. Some people are saying of this budget, "Well, it might be worse." It might be, and the question is whether it should not have been worse if the government had done its duty. The government is throwing over to future generations the obligations for unemployment relief, which after all, is a current obligation—just as they did with regard to war expenditures, when they never levied a dollar's taxation to take care of those expenditures. I do not believe my hon. friend has done his duty in his first budget speech when he has not let the people know the exact position into which he and his government have driven this country—and the only way the people can know it is by paying taxes.

If my hon. friend expects there will have to be $25,000,000 spent for unemployment relief this year, it would take another five per cent excise tax on imports in order to cover just that expenditure alone. You will understand now, Mr. Speaker, why my hon. friend does not put on that taxation. There would be different comment in the press if he had imposed that taxation. This talk about the budget "not being so bad" would have vanished into thin air, for the people would have realized who are in power and into what position the country was being led. There is not in this budget anything in regard to the wheat bonus. There is no announcement of the government's policy in regard to this matter. Nothing has been suggested in regard to a bonus to the fishermen, although a strong delegation met the cabinet a few weeks ago urging assistance along the same lines as the bonus to the wheat producers of the west. There is no provision whatever for additional subventions in connection with coal, although my friend the acting Minister of Mines (Mr. Gordon) says the government are considering the matter. I submit that these matters should be in the budget, and we should know what we are going to spend this year, instead of just having the usual government services provided for, but these other expenditures left out entirely and will not be dealt with until probably just before the close of the session. So I submit my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has not done properly by the country, or perhaps by himself, in leaving these matters on one side and not making in his budget the provision that was necessary for them. He should have taken the house into his confidence with regard to all the expenditures which will have to be made, for after all these expenditures involve taxation.

With regard to unemployment relief, I find a great deal of difficulty—no doubt my own fault—in understanding exactly what commitments have been made. My hon. friend was good enough to instruct his officers to give me all the information possible, and I desire to express my appreciation of his courtesy, but I did not know of that until Friday or Saturday morning, and it was only this morning that I was able to get together some of the data I desired. I have not had an opportunity to digest some of the information in regard to unemployment relief. The information which I get from the budget speech does not seem to correspond with the information which was given by the Minister of Labour or the right hon. Prime Minister as to the commitments of the federal and provincial governments in regard to this matter. I am simply going to take the statements which have already been made in this house. By and large it has been said that the government has become responsible, either by way of contribution to the provinces and the municipalities or directly by way of dominion public works or for direct relief for about $50,000,000; the provincial and municipal authorities and the railways have become responsible for $96,000,000—a total of $146,000,000.

I deprecate this practice which has grown up whereby the federal government is loaning to the provinces certain amounts of money, and to some extent making the provincial subservient to the federal authority. I say the thing which should take place is a reconstruction of the financial relationship between the provinces and the dominion, so that the provinces will be supreme in their own sphere and the federal government supreme in its sphere. This idea of swapping cheques between the provinces and the dominion is not good for either party; when you find that $11,000,000 of the national service loan has been invested in treasury bills of one of the provinces and when you find that there is a loan of $22,000,000 on the books, it seems to me to indicate a state of affairs that is not good for our country if we want to maintain our constitutional relations, and it is not going to be good for the autonomy of the provinces either. Therefore I say there should be some adjustment and settlement of this matter. This conference which was held last Saturday should have been held long ago in order to make that adjustment and in order that this position of debtor and creditor, this position of subserviency of the provinces to the dominion, should not be set up as it appears in the public accounts to-day.

I leave it at that for the moment, and my other point is this: If the amount I have given is correct—and no matter if the amount should be reduced the principle still applies—it seems to me apparent that this system of affording unemployment relief by forcing the provinces and the municipalities to pledge their credit is basically wrong and is going to lead to financial disaster in this country. For two years my friends opposite have been working on the problem of unemployment relief. They promised to relieve unemployment, and in September of 1930 they brought down their $20,000,000 legislation. It was expected that in February or March of 1931 they would have a definite policy, but they came here and asked for the blank cheque and for full power, and they were given what they asked. They came again this year with no policy and asked for a makeshift renewal for one month. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that a proper policy to develop employment, which hon. members opposite promised, is long overdue; this situation whereby between the federal, the provincial and the municipal authorities the country has been plunged into debt to the extent of $140,000,000, is something which will be laid at the doors of my hon. friends opposite because of their lack of a policy and their lack of courage to deal with the matter.

My hon. friend omitted from his budget some items which have appeared in the past. One item to which I refer particularly is a comparison of the debt from year to year. My hon. friend said that the net debt of the country had been increased by $119,500,000. I did not hear any applause from either side of the house, but I took occasion to compare the statement of the funded debt of this country, as it appears in my hon. friend's budget statement, with the statement of the funded debt of this country which appeared in the budget statement of the right hon. Prime Minister a year ago, when he was Minister of Finance. I find quite a difference in the figures. On March 31, 1931, the unmatured public debt represented by bond issues on which the Dominion of Canada was directly responsible was $2,319,196,847.39. That appears in the speech of the present Prime Minister at page 2328 of unrevised Hansard for 1931. According to the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, the unmatured public debt of this country as on March 31 this year amounts to $2,501,782,733.23, so there is a net increase of $182,585,885.84, which is rather different from $119,500,000. I asked the Department of Finance for, and was furnished with, a reconciliation of those figures. I just received it before luncheon and I do not have it under my hand at the moment, but I think I can give most of the items. The reconciliation showed that something like $41,000,000 was owing by the Canadian National Railways; that this $22,000,000 was loaned to the provinces; that $12,000,000 was loaned to harbour commissions, and that there was a certain amount of cash on hand. But I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the way we figure the debt of the dominion when we come to find out exactly what has to be paid and what are our obligations. There is some doubt as to whether or not some of these loans will be repaid.

This question has been raised previously in this house; the real question is what is the solemn obligation of this country on unmatured bonds on which we have to pay interest, and that amount is the amount I just gave, which shows an increase of $182,000,000. I have pretty good authority for that contention, or at least I am sure my hon. friend will regard my authority as good. I quote from a speech by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in 1929. He said:

> We have never had very serious controversy about the funded debt of the country, but I am glad to note that in his speech last Friday the minister for the first time took serious account of what we know as the funded or bonded debt or, as he put it in his remarks, the dead weight debt of the Dominion of Canada. That, after all, is the important item in the financing of this country. The net debt is not a matter of the greatest consequence; in England they never refer to it at all. There they use the one term "dead weight debt," and I am glad that the minister has used that term on this occasion, because that is the debt which counts. It is the amount for which the government of this country has issued in solemn form its bonds and obligations, signed, sealed and delivered, which bonds are now held by people who have invested in our securities. These bonds have to be paid at maturity, and in the meantime interest must be met. They therefore constitute the real burden which the people of this country are compelled to carry.
> The net debt is comparatively unimportant; it is a matter very largely of book-keeping and depends upon how you see fit to estimate the value of your assets. We have assets that are certainly good liquid assets, but we have a lot of assets in this country which we carry as non-active assets, and if you want to transfer some of these non-active assets to the active list you can immediately decrease your net debt. It is, I say, a matter largely of book-keeping. But the debt which counts is the dead weight debt.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that on that basis the debt of this country, instead of being increased by $119,000,000, as my hon. friend suggests, has been increased by $182,000,000. I should like to show just how far hon. gentlemen opposite have gone in the matter of debt increase, and I should like to compare the funded debt as of March 31, 1930, when Hon. Charles A. Dunning delivered his budget speech, with the funded debt as it appears to-day. On March 31, 1930, the funded debt was $2,194,746,563.57; I have already given the figure for March 31, 1932, so under the administration of my right hon. friend the present Prime Minister, in the last two years there has been an increase in the funded debt of Canada of $307,036,168.66.

I am not going to trouble the house with extended references to the debt reductions made during the last five years of Liberal administration, except to remind hon. members that in that period reductions in the funded debt totalled $257,866,939. Now we see that this whole reduction has been wiped out in two years under this government and we are $50,000,000 worse off than we were before. Let me remind the house also that from 1921 to 1930, when the government of my right hon. leader was in power, the interest saving was $20,500,000, and of that sum $5,100,000 was saved through conversion loans. The Prime Minister seems to think that conversion loans are his own idea, but note this; that $5,100,000 was saved by the refunding of maturing loans at lower rates of interest; in other words, there were conversion loans even in the days before the right hon. gentleman became Minister of Finance.

There is another matter I wish to discuss, and on this point I wish my right hon. friend were in the house. I said that the Minister of Finance had made certain omissions with regard to possible expenditures for unemployment relief—wheat bonus, bonus to fishermen, subventions on coal and so forth. But there is a definite obligation he also omitted. The Minister of Finance has attempted to list the indirect obligations of the Dominion of Canada, and I do not find anything here about the seven or eight or ten millions—no one knows just how much it is—which has been guaranteed, so the newspapers tell us, by this government in connection with the Beauharnois project. Not a dollar is mentioned with reference to this matter; no information is given concerning it. The story is that there have been guarantees but they have not been mentioned in this statement which has been submitted by the Minister of Finance. Let me say, with regard to that project, that in my opinion the general feeling is that it is being bedevilled at the present time by the vacillation and the lack of policy on the part of my hon. friends opposite. There was a project which was a perfectly good one; that was the report of the engineers and of everyone who had anything to do with it. It is a project in which a good many small investors have money. But at the present time, for some reason or other, my right hon. friend who has taken hold of it is simply dandling it and nursing it, but he will give no information concerning the matter. No information can be obtained at all by those people who have their money in it and who naturally are interested in the undertaking. They do not know what is going to happen to what is probably the greatest power project in North America. I protest against the fact that there is no statement here with regard to what direct or indirect obligations we are undertaking in connection with this project, nor with regard to what policy my hon. friends opposite intend to pursue so far as Beauharnois is concerned.

Time is passing, but I should like to put on record one or two facts with regard to the Canadian Nationl Railways—facts which have been mentioned before but which it seems to me ought to be reiterated in the presence of those who have to do with the country's business and particularly with the country's finances as affected by this great national enterprise. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), even this session, has made two or three illuminating speeches with respect to the Canadian National Railways, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has put on Hansard some figures bearing on the subject. I venture to say, however, that even now it is not clear in the minds of the public just exactly in what the financing of the Canadian National Railways consists. In the first place, successive governments have advanced to the various constituent railways which go to make up the present Canadian National railway system—that is to say, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian National—something like $604,000,000, in addition to which there have been appropriations on account of government roads of something like $405,000,000, making a total of about $1,000,000,000. But there is also added to this—and this has been mentioned repeatedly in the house—interest on this amount as if the present Canadian National Railways would have to pay it. May I direct to the attention of the house the fact that the Minister of Finance, in the statement he has brought down, does not even include interest, in connection with these advances in the non-active assets. No mention whatever is made of it. With regard to the $604,000,000, this has been called a bookkeeping item by the Minister of Railways; it has been called a bookkeeping item by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie). Well, everyone agrees that it is a bookkeeping item. Nevertheless, that amount is being rolled over and over and is always being talked about.

Mr. MANION: To avoid any misunderstanding, will my hon. friend allow me to say this. There is another item which the hon. gentleman has not mentioned but to which he has alluded, namely, interest owing to the government amounting to $350,000,000. It is not in the Public Accounts, and no doubt that is why the Minister of Finance does not mention it. But it is mentioned, as it always has been mentioned, even under the régime of my hon. friends opposite, and mentioned continuously, in the books of the railways. That is where the figure appears.

Mr. RALSTON: I would point out to my hon. friend that that amount of interest is not even carried or regarded as a non-active asset, let alone an active asset. It is carried on the books of the railway to the prejudice of the railway. It never should be on the books of the Canadian National Railways any more than the $604,000,000 should be. The fact is, there has never been a definite reorganization of the capital of the railway, with the result that not only does the Canadian National system carry on its books that interest, but it carries principal as well. The Minister of Railways will agree with me also that there should be a reorganization of the corporate units going to make up the Canadian National railway system—there are anywhere from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five of them—so that people might be able to think clearly about them. The $604,000,000, the $400,000,000 for Canadian government railways, the $350,000,000 for interest, are items which we might as well forget all about so far as our public accounts are concerned. And what does that leave? It leaves the moneys advanced from time to time, since away back in 1878, amounting to $1,276,000,000, of bonds which have been sold periodically and on most of which the Dominion government is liable. That is what is called the debt to the public. That is the amount which is charged to the railway, and when there is a deficit in the railway accounts it is arrived at after the railway has been charged with the interest on these bonds. That is the situation with regard to the Canadian National Railways.

May I point out that even this year the Canadian National Railways more than met operating expenses. It had a balance of from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000; but when interest on the $1,276,000,000 is charged, you get a deficit.

Mr. MANION: That is not the money owing to the government.

Mr. RALSTON: No. I repeat that the money owing to the government we have put to one side. We have set aside both the money owing to the government and the interest thereon, because the interest is not even carried by the government as an indebtedness of any description. Let us forget it, because everyone has agreed that we might as well do so. As I say, the Canadian National Railways' operating account had a surplus this year of two or three million dollars, which is eaten up and much more than eaten up by the interest on the $1,276,000,000 due to the public. That statement will, perhaps, help to an understanding of the situation. The deficit, after you have charged that interest which is due to the public, is something like $52,000,000.

My hon. friend in one statement was not quite fair to the Canadian National Railways, and I presume it was a slip. In dealing with the finances of the country he said that Canada, in common with all other countries, had experienced a period of depression. But when he dealt with the Canadian National Railways he did not suggest that the Canadian National, in common with all other railways, had also suffered a period of depression. I want to give the figures to compare the Canadian National Railways with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the roads in the United States. From 1928 to 1931 the revenues of the Canadian Pacific Railway fell off 35.8 per cent, while the revenues of the Canadian National Railways —I have not the revenue figures but I have the traffic figures and they will be practically the same—fell off a little more, 37.65 per cent. For 1931-32, the revenues for the Canadian Pacific Railway fell off 23 per cent, while the Canadian National showed a falling-off of 20.3 per cent; and on all North American railways it was 20.7 per cent. So that the Canadian National railway system is entitled at least to this credit, that it is doing as much business as the rest of the railways; and it is in common with those railways that it is suffering this period of depression.

One thing more. It has been repeatedly said that there has been a large amount of capital expenditure on the Canadian National Railways. I referred to this briefly last year, but since then I have looked up the records of the special committee on railways, and I find that these expenditures, which were made, have been voted every year by that committee unanimously, without objection. I have here the record which I could read if I had time. I have the yearly record of the committee and the yearly reports which were presented to and adopted by this house. Everything was concurred in and passed by the committees and the reports were passed by the house. All of this in connection with capital expenditure. For the purpose of reference, I refer particularly to the journals of the house for 1926-27, page XIII; for 1928, report of the special committee, page VIII; for 1929, page IV and for 1930, page 3.

Last year I quoted the statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in which he boasted of the success of the Canadian National Railways, alleged that the real credit should be laid at the door of his former leader, the present leader of the Senate. I do not intend to bother again putting that on record, but I desire to sum up with regard to these roads which make up the present Canadian National Railway system. In the first place, they are a conglomeration of railways, obviously not built with the intention of being one system but which had to be put together in order to make one system. Secondly they are the combination of the policies of all governments. The other day someone intimated that the trouble was caused because three transcontinental roads had been built. It was the policy of everybody that three transcontinental roads should be built.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: In 1904 my friends voted to have a second transcontinental railway built as a continuation of the Intercolonial. In 1913 and in 1914 guarantees were given in order that the Canadian Northern might be completed from the Pacific coast to Montreal. Everybody agreed that there should be three transcontinental railways. There is no use of my hon. friends gainsaying that fact; there is no use of their going back into ancient history and talking about the past—everyone was vying with each other in order to have the railways developed, and it was only a question of method. The Canadian National Railways is a combination of the policies of all governments. Thirdly, the advances made by the government have been wiped out by common consent. Fourthly, the Canadian National Railways' capital expenditures have been approved by both parties in this house. Fifthly, the revenue losses on this road have been no greater than they have been on other roads. Sixthly, I ask the house to note this: The capital structure of the Canadian National Railways are not represented as they are in private railways by common stock on which no interest or dividend is paid unless warranted by the earnings. The capital is represented by bonds which are an annual charge against the road and which show up much more clearly than they do in the case of roads whose capitalization consists partly of bonds and common stocks. In other words, the Canadian National Railways is in a class by itself. Naturally, its financing is more difficult since the annual charges always come before the public in the shape of bond interest.

Seventhly, the management of the railways has been approved of by all parties, and in this connection I refer to the statement of the Minister of Justice. And, finally, there has been a surplus on operating account for many years.

But there is no doubt that the problem of financing is a difficult one. It must be faced squarely but I shall say nothing more in view of the fact that as the Minister of Finance has said that there is now a commission engaged in considering the whole railway problem of this country. I simply bring these facts to the attention of the house and the country.

I come now to what is the interesting but after all the most sombre part of my hon. friend's address, and that is in connection with the ways and means of finding funds to carry on government. In one fell swoop he provides that the twenty per cent discount on income tax put into effect by the former government shall be wiped out. He provides that there shall be a five per cent surtax on the tax on incomes above $5,000. He next provides, and I think this the most difficult feature to justify, that exemptions for married men shall be reduced to $2,400 and that this charge shall apply to last year's salary. What is the effect of this? I think my hon. friend sees and knows the result which will follow. An individual who received last year an income of $2,800 found it pretty close going for himself and family. He did the best he could to live within his income and made his expenditures believing that he would have no income tax to pay as he was exempt up to $3,000. However, this year he finds that notwithstanding the fact that he has spent his $2,800 earned last year, his salary is cut—he may be a civil servant or employed in a factory or anywhere else—wages are down, and he has now to pay a tax on his last year's salary out of his reduced salary of this year. This hits the man with a modest income and it falls particularly hard upon the civil servant. My hon. friend has said that he was picking out the civil servant in order to make a levy upon him; he is making a levy of ten per cent by reducing his salary and in addition he is collecting a tax on last year's salary. This tax will fall heavily upon a lot of people. My hon. friend has not given us the figures but he probably knows how many incomes there are between $3,000 and $2,400. I venture to say there is a large number and I question whether the collection of this tax will be worth the expense, my hon. friend probably has made an estimate. But he ought to realize that this tax falls heavily on the man receiving a small salary and who has to face a reduction this year.

What would have been the obvious thing to do? The obvious thing to have done would have been for the Prime Minister to have gone ahead last year with his income tax proposals instead of taking such a personal dislike to some remark which was made about one feature of the measure which favoured those who enjoyed large incomes. He jettisoned the whole question of income taxation. Had he not done so probably sufficient taxation would have been raised from the higher bracketed incomes to have made it unnecessary to reduce the exemptions this year. Because of a little pique, or considerable pique as a matter of fact, the right hon. gentleman dropped his income tax proposals; he would have nothing more to do with them, and the result is the burden falls not only on the man with the large income but on the man with the small income which has already been considerably depreciated. This rearrangement of the income tax will be difficult for my hon. friends to justify.

We now come to our dear old friend the sales tax. Two or three years ago this tax was roundly reviled by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and the Prime Minister termed it the poor man's income tax. This is what he said as appears on page 397 of Hansard of 1927:

And that sales tax is the poor man's income tax—the tax upon his clothes, the tax upon the commodities that enter into his everyday life—

In 1928 my hon. friends introduced a resolution asking for the abolition of the sales tax which was then only three per cent. At that time the Secretary of State said:

They then discovered that this rate was an intolerable burden on the country, increasing exorbitantly, as every per cent of it did, the cost of living. They first reduced it to 5 per cent, then to 4 per cent, and now they propose to reduce it to 3 per cent—just where they found it on attaining office. I think the opinion on both sides of the house is that when making their last reduction they should have announced the abolition of this tax, for thereby they would have done more than by any other single act of government to reduce the average cost of living in this country, which is so high in comparison with the cost of living in the same state of society across the border.

The Prime Minister is reported on page 1253 of Hansard of 1928 as saying:

We contend that the sales tax should be abolished. Why? The Minister of Finance asks, where shall we get the revenue from? If economy were practised in this country, if an annual sinking fund were put away—

Where is that sinking fund to-day?

—money being earmarked for this purpose when derived from the sales tax, then I could understand my hon. friends desiring to continue the tax.

The Minister of Justice is reported on page 1124 of Hansard of 1928 as saying:

I have only one other observation to make, and I have but a few minutes in which to make it. There is another aspect of the budget I do wish to mention, and it is in regard to what I call the iniquitous sales tax. On a former occasion during the present session I mentioned the sales tax, and I told the Minister of Finance that so far as it was in the power of an opposition to make demands upon the government, this opposition was going to demand the abolition of the sales tax during the present session of parliament. I regret that the tax has not been abolished; it has merely been reduced to that point at which it was seven years ago when the Liberal government took office. The sales tax was imposed as purely a war measure. The war has been over for ten years, but this administration still maintains that iniquitous burden on the people of this country. My hon. friend the Finance Minister may wave his hand and announce that he has made another cut in the income tax, and the wealthy men of Canada will appreciate that no doubt; but if he had wiped out the sales tax he would have conferred a benefit, not upon the wealthy, but upon the people of the dominion least able to bear that tax.

Then for a moment he turned aside to discuss the changes in the tariff rates on woollens and later he came back to the sales tax; it seems to have been on his mind. He said, referring to the Minister of Finance:

Now, cannot I warm up his heart in regard to the sales tax? I agree that ours is a cold climate in the winter season; people must wear woollen clothes. By retaining this sales tax of three per cent—

Only three per cent, mind you!

—a man has to pay an extra ninety cents on a $30 suit of clothes. Do the people of Canada yet realize that they are paying this iniquitous tax into the treasury? Do they know that this war burden is still in force? I know the complaint is made from time to time that the retail merchants are still keeping up prices, but do the people realize that on $100 worth of purchases of boots and shoes, clothing, furniture, everything save food, they have to pay to-day $3 into the treasury of Canada to help in the reduction of the national debt? I do not believe they realize that. Four per cent they paid last year, five per cent the year before, and 6 per cent for a while, and with what a grand flourish the ministers of the crown announced these reductions! Last year the minister said: We have reduced the sales tax 20 per cent. It sounded like a large reduction, but it is only one per cent as a matter of fact—one cent on a dollar. The other day the minister announced: We have reduced the sales tax 25 per cent. The ordinary people thought: It must be gone this time sure. But only another cent has been shaved off the top, and for every $100 worth of clothing, hats, mitts, boots and shoes, to be worn in this cold climate of ours, $3 must be paid into the treasury, although the war was over ten years ago. What did the minister say last session? "Why," he said, "how can I do it?"

Then the Speaker called time. I have no doubt my hon. friend will have a good deal of enjoyment in making that same speech in cabinet councils as they discuss the new 50 per cent addition to this iniquitous sales tax. Let me point out to him that if a family spends, say $750; they paid $7.50 sales tax under the rate as it stood when the Liberal party went out of power, whereas under the rate this year they will pay $45.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In this cold climate.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, in this cold climate, and I understand also some of the articles of food are going to be removed from the exempted list. But even that is not the worst of the situation. My hon. friend said: People do not realize this. He is quite right; the people do not realize how much they pay. Last year I noticed a letter sent, I believe, to all the members from the secretary of the Wholesale Grocers' Association, and this is the naive way in which he put the matter with regard to sales tax. He was arguing against the turnover tax. He said about the sales tax.

> It is being enforced fairly, working smoothly, and equitably, and seldom comes before the public eye as it is buried in the price of an article, and is almost an unknown and unheard-of quantity.

It is there just the same and the people will be paying it this year.

And besides that the government are going to be offending against another principle which was laid down by the present Prime Minister. In this house in 1927 he waxed most eloquent with regard to this matter of taxing a tax. Does he realize that the sales tax is imposed after the duty and, indeed, after the dumping duty are imposed on an article? This is what the present Prime Minister said as reported at page 402 of Hansard of 1927, it will be noticed that he had the cart before the horse, although I think this was just a slip of the tongue. He said:

> It is not sound to tax a tax, and under the present tariff regulations the sales tax is added to the cost of the article and the duty computed upon the sales tax and that cost.

He was wrong about that; it was just the other way about. The duty was added to the cost of the article and the sales tax computed upon the cost of the article plus duty.

> That is the present position. It would be in the interest of trade and the development of commerce that that should be removed if at all possible.

That is just one more thing with regard to which my hon. friends have made protestations, promises and professions and which they will have to face when the time comes. When the six per cent sales tax was imposed in 1923, we found the tax already pyramided; as everybody knows it was practically six per cent then. Further than that we had a legacy of debt which was the result of the previous administration and which had to be paid off. Our hon. friends have a legacy of surpluses, of reduction of debt, and still they are increasing the sales tax by fifty per cent in this year alone after increasing it from one per cent to four per cent last year.

I say nothing with regard to the nuisance taxes. They will probably be dealt with when the resolutions come before the house. I will say just this at the moment: Sometimes I think, in order to make people realize not only in budget speeches, but in other ways, just how difficult things are with my hon. friends in power, these taxes should be raised so high that we shall not be able to enjoy any more luxuries such as Pullman cars and that sort of thing. I am, however, making no protest now as regards nuisance taxes, something will be said about them on the resolutions themselves.

Let me come now to the matter of tariff. The subject of tariff and trade is perhaps the most interesting and certainly the most disquieting part of my hon. friend's speech; on trade depends the whole structure of our financial system. You cannot collect any sales tax if you have not transactions; you cannot collect any duties if you have not imports; you cannot collect income tax if there is not any income, and the amount to be collected on cheques, telephone messages and telegrams all depends on the amount of trade which is being done in this country. Further than that, you cannot make the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other railway pay if you cannot give them traffic. That is at the bottom of the whole trouble in Canada at the present time and the budget figures, viewed in that light, are most disquieting. What is the budget, when you come to size it up? Our trade has been depleted 50 per cent, and I have already spoken about the increase of debt, the deficits and the increased taxation. The government's statement amounts only to this: We have no remedy under the sun to suggest, but we are simply going to impose more taxes. There is not a policy, not a suggestion of improvement to throw a little light into the darkness except the possibility of something coming from the Imperial conference. I think the way in which my hon. friend put it was: We are near events which may have some sort of happy augury for the future.

The budget figures, as I say, show a reduction of 50 per cent in our total trade in two years. There is no need of this. My hon. friend began his address by indicating the present difficulties throughout the world. Let me point out this to him: Canada is in a unique position because she sells the necessities of life. She is therefore a country which should be in the best position to recuperate most quickly and to take advantage of markets because she has things which people absolutely must have. I want to protest as vigorously as I can for myself and those about me at the artificial barriers to trade which are being raised at the present time and which have been raised in the last year in this country. In 1930 the tariff was at an average of something like 24 per cent. This year, with the three per cent excise tax, it will be on an average of 35 per cent, to say nothing about the extraordinary ways which my hon. friends have of raising tariffs and to which I wish to refer. But the tariff schedules are only a beginning. Here are the methods which my hon. friends have of raising tariffs and of damming the stream of trade. In the first place they have the tariff items, but tariff items have these days become a mere formality. My right hon. friend does not have to come to this house to have changes made in the tariff. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) sits in his office, places values on articles, and thereby raises the tariffs 50 or 100 per cent, as the case may be.

Then there are the provisions under sections 36 to 43 of the Customs Act whereby either the minister or the governor in council as the case may be, may value articles for duty purposes, and may make such valuations as in their sole discretion—I think "sole judgment" is the expression used in a number of sections—as in their sole discretion they may see fit, and may collect duties on the values thus fixed. Hon. members may say that is going pretty far. Yes, but the government is going much farther than that. Under section 6 of the Customs Tariff Act not only may they impose duties on the higher prices they have fixed, but they may also impose a duty consisting of the difference between the invoice price and the arbitrary price which they fix, in order to bring the cost to the consumer or the importer in Canada up to the arbitrary price fixed by the Department of National Revenue. That is the way tariff is being regulated or manipulated in this country at the present time.

And if even that were the end of it, it would not be quite so bad. But soon after England went off the gold standard we in this country witnessed an exhibition of juggling with currency and prices the like of which had never been seen in any civilized country of the world. I have before me a list of the orders in council, and a survey of the steps taken at that time. On September 28, soon after England went off the gold standard, an order in council was passed providing that value for duty on British goods should be arrived at by computing the invoice value at the average rate of exchange current on the date of shipment. What does that mean?—because I do not think the people of this country understand exactly what was done. Let us say that on a certain day exchange was at $4. That would mean that the Canadian dollar would be worth five shillings, in round figures. One could take the Canadian dollar and buy five shillings' worth of goods in England. Then the order in council of September 28 said: "All right; the value for duty purposes, so far as currency is concerned, will be that we will take English goods and allow five shillings for every Canadian dollar." Fine; that is what it should be. Then, on September 29, the day after, we find the following regulations, "In computing value for duty, exchange is fixed at $4.86⅔"—that is just one day after. The Canadian dollar had thus dropped from five shillings to four over night, and that depreciation had come about through the action of the Canadian government. Notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian dollar was worth five shillings on the exchanges of the world, the Canadian government said "No; that dollar is worth only four shillings; in other words it can buy only four shillings' worth of goods. If you attempt to bring in five shillings' worth of goods and pay for them with the dollar, you will have to pay the other shilling to us." In other words, by paying the exporter in England four shillings and paying the government one shilling, the whole five shillings would be paid. The Canadian government deliberately depreciated the value of the Canadian dollar at a time when we had a favourable situation on the exchange market so far as sterling is concerned. In effect the government said, "We will not permit the import of British goods except at a rate of $4.86⅔." As everybody knows, there was an outcry. People said, "If we take our Canadian dollar to the United States we receive only eighty cents for it; we ought to have the opportunity to go to England and get five shillings for it." But the Canadian government said no.

Frequent meetings were held. A period of three weeks elapsed, and then what did the government do? They said, "This is what we will do: We will not hold sterling up to $4.86⅔, but we will hold it up to $4.40. We will make an arbitrary ruling that the sterling pound is to be worth $4.40." That is to say, a shilling is to be worth only 22½ cents, and there would be 4½ shillings to the Canadian dollar. That was a little better. But still the actual rate of exchange was $4 to the pound.

The Canadian dollar was at that time worth about five shillings, and this regulation meant allowing only 4½ shillings to our dollar. Then what happened? The government said, "Notwithstanding the fact that the pound sterling may actually be worth only $4, we say that it will take, $4.40 in Canadian money to represent a pound sterling. Then what will we do? If you import goods and the actual current rate of exchange is $4 we will charge you the difference between $4 and $4.40, add it to your bill or your invoice, and collect it at the customs office. The English exporter may charge $4.40 if he wishes, although the pound will be worth only $4. If he charges $4.40, that is all right,—but the difference between the arbitrary rate we have fixed and the actual rate of the pound sterling will be charged to you." That is the system which is in force to-day and to complete the picture my hon. friends opposite even issue orders in council from time to time—I do not know whether it is every two weeks or not—in which they fix what they say is the current value of the pound sterling as compared with that $4.40 rate.

I do not know what the pound sterling is valued at to-day, but we will assume it is $4. It is quite possible my friends would have fixed the pound sterling at $4.10, and the amount one would have to pay as dumping duty would be the difference between $4.10 and $4.40. Or let us suppose that a bill of goods was purchased when the pound sterling was $3.90. The government might fix the rate at $3.80. The importer would have to pay the difference between the amount the government fixed and the arbitrary figure of $4.40 which they have set. In other words, the government has in this way added to its powers to fix the dumping duty to an unlimited extent. The ramifications of the situation are endless. My hon. friends opposite can do anything they like with the pound. I doubt very much whether the statute gives them the authority to do what they have done. However, the government have done it, and sterling exchange is in that position to-day.

I should like to give the house one or two instances of the application of this exchange rate. First, however, I should like to say that the government has gone beyond all reasonable bounds, because these orders in council constitute taxation. My hon. friends have no business whatever to sit over there in the east block and impose taxes on the people of Canada under a blanket power. In the second place, it is not only taxation but it is taxation without any hearing, and is absolutely ex parte. Supposedly, my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue should hear the two parties to the transaction. He sits as Minister of National Revenue, but there is nobody present to represent the importer, who has no opportunity to be heard. The minister decides the conditions under which the particular goods in question are manufactured in their country of origin. He decides the market that is available for those goods in this country, and—supposedly, of course, because he does not actually do it—he decides whether conditions of production in this country justify protection to the industry and he makes an effort to find out a just rate of duty, although he has no tariff board. What is the result? I have before me a large number of memoranda and orders in council concerning valuations which have been made within the last year or two, and I suppose these represent only a very small proportion of the total. Certainly my hon. friend must have great ability; he must be familiar with the details of every possible business so that he may fix value for duty purposes or determine the tariff on all the goods mentioned in the following list:

Sheets of iron or steel, cold rolled; fruits; vegetables; peas; live stock; common and colourless window glass; bean pork; fir doors; nursery stock; high starting torque silent type electric motors; sheets of iron or steel, cold rolled; dried egg albumen; meats prepared or preserved; grapes; hats, hoods, shapes, bodies, and cape-lines; sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in colour; radio receiving sets complete; wicker furniture; single ply veneers of cedar; jute twines; cotton fabrics and artificial fabrics:

And so on. The list includes even thumb tacks and furniture nails. That is what my friend the Minister of National Revenue is engaged in doing at the present time. The other day my right hon. friend the Prime Minister treated us to a dissertation on the onerous labours of the cabinet and the fact that they were working twenty-four hours a day. When I look over some of these articles it seems to me really ridiculous to imagine any minister solemnly sitting down to calculate for instance the value for duty purposes of wiping rags, wire pot-cleaners, nursery stock and baby pants, but that is what my hon. friends opposite are doing—and they say they are working twenty hours a day. Well, heaven knows how they get any sleep at all. These orders in council are being made from day to day and from week to week. Where is the tariff board that my right hon. friend was going to appoint a year ago, that he insisted should be appointed, and in connection with which he refused to accept any amendment whatever? Instead of a tariff board functioning, my friend the Minister of National Revenue is making arbitrary valuations for duty purposes in connection with these goods.

I want to show the house a few samples of what can be done under this authority. I have here, for instance, one of these orders in council with regard to radios, an article in most homes in this country. Provision is made that there shall be only thirty per cent discount on the list price of imported radios. Take a radio imported at a list price of $100. The trade discount, I am advised, would leave the amount for duty at $42.75. At twenty-seven and a half per cent the duty would be $11.76. This would make the duty paid value $54.51. At four per cent the sales tax would be $2.18 and the one per cent excise tax 55 cents. Now we have the total for duty, sales tax and excise tax at $14.49 which plus the price of $42.75 makes the total cost $57.26 if there had been no order in council; but in this case the governor in council—not my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue—passed an order that the discount on radios shall not be more than thirty per cent. So that this $100 radio if imported now is going to cost $70 so far as value for duty is concerned. All right. Going down to the customs you say to the official there: "I have paid $42.75 for this radio." He retorts, "I don't care what you paid for it; the governor in council says the Minister of National Revenue is empowered to fix the price at $100 less thirty per cent—$70 is the value of that radio." "What duty have I to pay?" "You have to pay twenty-seven and a half per cent —$19.25." That makes the duty paid value $89.25. "What else have I to pay?" "You must pay four per cent sales tax, $3.57, and one per cent excise tax, 89 cents." You say, "That ought to be enough." "Oh, no, you're not through yet." "What else have I to pay?" "You must pay as a dumping duty the difference between $42.75 and $70. In other words, you have to pay another $27.25." So your radio is going to cost you $50.96 just for duty and taxes although its invoice price is only $42.75." In other words, you have to pay about one hundred and twenty per cent duty and taxes on that one article. That is what my friends opposite have done by order in council. The duty on that article which should be only $14.49, has now become $50.96, and the total cost instead of being $57.26 will be $93.71.

A number of other examples might be given. Take a lamp shade. The invoice value of the lamp shade is $3. Before the minister interfered you had to pay thirty per cent duty or ninety cents, making the duty paid value $3.90; four per cent sales tax, represents 16 cents, and one per cent excise tax, 4 cents, or a total for duty, sales tax and excise tax of $1.10. That used to be the total duty and the total cost would be $4.10. But now my hon. friends opposite have put in this new-fashioned duty, and they say the value is to be raised thirty-three and a third per cent, so that the value for duty becomes $4. At thirty per cent the duty is $1.20; sales tax at four per cent 21 cents; excise tax at one per cent five cents—$1.46. In addition you have to pay a dumping duty of $1, the difference between the $3 invoice price and the $4 arbitrary value fixed by the minister. In other words, you pay $2.46 instead of $1.10 on an article costing $3, or 80 per cent for duty and taxes, and the lamp shade which under the regular rates would have cost $4.10 will cost you $5.46.

One other illustration. On a shipment of tweed cleared from Great Britain, valued at £154, 4s. 9d., the value for duty purposes is $751; duty and excise tax $342.40, making a total value of $1,097.40. Thus the total duty paid on goods costing $642.32 is $393.71. How has the government done that? By adopting the expedient I spoke of a few minutes ago. They have taken the pound value at $4.40, although on that day it was only $4.14, and they have charged the difference between the $4.14 and the $4.40 as part of the duty. And in addition to that they have charged the tariff duty on the rate of $4.86⅔ even though the actual rate of exchange was only $4.14 to the pound.

I desire to put on record these examples of increases in duty on common articles that our people have to buy:

Excessive Rates Due to Increase of Tariffs—Arbitrary Fixing of Exchange Rate and Applying Dump Clauses (includes 1 per cent Excise Tax and 4 per cent Sales Tax)

	British preference			General tariff
	Old rate	New rate	Percentage increase	Old rate	New rate	Percentage increase
Woollen and cotton blankets	21⅓	94	350	35	167	400
Gloves and mitts	21⅓	43	100	36⅓	90	150
Children's socks and stockings	23¾	99	300	36⅓	161	350
Fabrics, wholly or in part artificial silk	19¼	75	300	36	133¾	300
No fabrics are more used to-day than these:
Printed or dyed cotton fabric	19¼	46¼	150	28¾	83	200
Linen tablecloths	19	41	110

I do not think there are many linen tablecloths manufactured in this country.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, yes, there are.

An hon. MEMBER: Not of that class.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think so.

	Old rate	New rate	Percentage increase	Old rate	New rate	Percentage increase
Cutlery, plated, not steel	21½	48½	100	36⅓	90	150
Earthenware dishes	19½	43	125	31⅓	76¾	133
Axminster carpets	23¾	86	275
Cotton sheets	16½	46	185
Pillow cases	16	45	175
Silk fabrics (France)	..	..	..	31	75	150
Silk fabrics (Switzerland)	..	..	..	30	75	150

I am putting those figures on record, Mr. Speaker, in order that people may know exactly how the tariff has been raised, because they will not find those figures in the tariff schedules. I need not say those figures include sales tax, excise tax, the exchange rate and the arbitrary fixing of the value for duty purposes by the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. STEVENS: How does my hon. friend justify the last two items, covering silk from France and Switzerland? I could not quite understand that.

Mr. RALSTON: I want my hon. friends to justify them.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend misunderstands me. I quite understand his compilation in regard to Great Britain, but how does he arrive at those increases with regard to the last two items?

Mr. RALSTON: I am giving the two rates; I have the actual computations here, taken from actual invoices, which I will let my hon. friend see.

That is the position with regard to increases in duty. The situation in this country is that a man does not have to ask for protection; he is given more than he would ask for. A letter was sent out some time ago, and no doubt received by other members as well as myself, signed by Mr. James R. Dickson, representing the automobile dealers of this country, and with regard to the amendment passed last year which prohibited the importation of automobiles this is what he says:

> The foregoing amendment goes further than had been generally requested or anticipated, and places this commodity on the list of prohibited goods under tariff item 1215.

Further on the letter states:

> . . . the government is being commended for the manner in which it has now so effectively met the issue, by going even further than was requested in the public hearing.

The request was only for an additional ad valorem duty of fifteen per cent. My hon. friends rush out to find people in order that they may give them the benefit of protection. It does not seem to be a case of asking for it, and there does not seem to be any idea of having anyone prove their right to it.

What has been the effect? Later on I shall show the effect so far as the increase in price is concerned. If my hon. friend wants to find out why the amount collected in customs duties this year is $20,000,000 less than it was last year, in spite of the astounding increase in the tariff at the last session, he can get his answer from just such instances as I have quoted. He is simply drying up the sources of revenue; people are not going to import goods. I would not mind so much if it had done the domestic industry any good, but I propose to show that it has not.

What else has it done? It has produced a state of uncertainty in this country among importers and consumers, and they have just as much right to be considered as people in special industries. The effect of this uncertainty is hard to estimate. There is not a man who, when he gives an order for goods, can be certain that the duty on those goods will not be changed overnight. There is not a man who can send out a traveller to take orders for goods which he has to import without making some sort of reservation, because he may be caught by the fact that while to-day the duty is so much, under the special power given the Minister of National Revenue the duty may be increased 100 per cent before the goods arrive. That makes for uncertainty in business. I remember very well the pledge of the Prime Minister during the election, "The stabilization of economic conditions and the freedom from manipulation of home and foreign tariffs." Could there be any greater chance of manipulation, or any opportunity of which greater advantage has been taken than is the case here, with my hon. friends opposite sitting day after day in the east block passing these orders in council?

I say this is producing a state of uncertainty which is leading to greater difficulties than exist with regard to industry itself. Probably there are ten thousand importers in this country, and perhaps they have more people employed than are employed in the industries themselves. These people form the backbone of our nation; the consumer has a right to be considered, but no one can get or give absolute quotations because at any time the Minister of National Revenue may raise the value for duty purposes.

What has been said about this power? This quotation has been given before, but a good thing is well worth repeating. Back in 1923 a provision was placed in the statute with regard to some fifty items of natural products on which the value for duty purposes might be increased. I think that power was used only once or twice in the whole Liberal régime, and finally the provision was repealed. What was said about it by the gentleman who to-day leads the Senate in support of my right hon. friend?

> There should never be an unrestrained discretion in the hands of any minister or any government. There should be some principle laid down by this house to which the government must abide, and beyond which they cannot go. That is sound, sensible legislation. That is the protective principle democratically and fairly applied. What is proposed here is the protective principle, autocratically, and perhaps unfairly, applied.
> For purposes of valuation the minister can fix the value where he likes, on any basis he likes, to suit any interest he likes, as low as he likes, as high as he likes, and when he likes.

[Mr. Ralston.]

In a word, this simply puts into the power of the minister the whole elevation of the tariff of this country.

The minister can put on any valuation he thinks fit. In other words, it virtually enables him to fix the tariff where he pleases, and the house is asked to support the minister in that.

That statement was made with regard to the fixing of values for duty purposes on about fifty items of natural products out of a tariff list containing some eleven hundred items. This present provision applies to every item in the schedule, and what is more, this power is being exercised every day, as these orders in council, memorandums and bulletins show.

So much for uncertainty, Mr. Speaker, and so much for excessive rates. Now what about the effect on prices? I want to be as serious as I can with regard to this matter, but with all due deference I do not think there ever was any greater joke perpetrated than the suggestion that you can raise the duty as high as Haman's gallows and still not increase prices. I do not believe anyone in this house or in the country doubts that prices are being kept up in this country because of the fact that the duty has been raised. Let me give one or two figures. In a letter issued by the Bank of Nova Scotia in March I find the following:

> At the end of seventeen months . . . .
> Following the depression of 1920.
>
> . . . . the index of Canadian farm products was 50·5 per cent below the 1920 maximum; the index of manufactured goods was 38 per cent below. . . . To date . . . .
>
> Since the present depression began.
> . . . . the index of Canadian farm products has fallen by 46 per cent—a decline little less abrupt than that of 1921; the index of manufactured goods has fallen only by 15 per cent.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what is keeping up the prices of manufactured goods at this time? The tariff is responsible for the prices of manufactured articles to-day, and the farmer, the miner, the fisherman, the lumberman and all the people on the streets of our towns and villages, the ordinary, everyday people, are buying these articles and paying these artificially maintained high prices. While the products the farmer and the other primary producers have to sell are down fifty per cent in price the articles he has to buy for everyday use are down only fifteen per cent. Let me refer to the figures issued by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to show the fall in the prices of a number of articles:

	August, 1930	February 29, 1932	Decrease
Grains.	64·3	43·1	21·2
Live stock. . . .	95	65·9	29·1
Dairy products . .	85·9	59·3	26·6
Textiles.	79·7	71·6	8·1

I have just read some of the duties imposed on artificial silk by reason of the power given the Minister of National Revenue to fix values for duty purposes. On artificial silks the price has actually gone up. The index figure was 62.4 on August 1, 1930, and 64.9 on February 29, 1932, or an increase of 2.5 per cent. In farm products the fall, as I have indicated, has been between 29 and 21 per cent. Take carpets; I also mentioned the high duties. The price figure was 92.4 on August 1, 1930, and 93 on February 29, 1932. In rolling mill products, the figure was 93 on August 1, 1930, and 92.2 on February 29, 1932. Take cast iron and steel: on August 1, 1930, it was 89.19 and on February 29, 1932, 84.19, or a drop of 5. In hardware it was 91.7 on August 1, 1930, and 88.6 on February 29, 1932, or a drop of 2.8. On wire it was 89.3 on August 1, 1930, and on February 29, 1932, 82.8, or a drop of 6.5. On boots and shoes it was 98.3 on August 1, 1930, as against 93.7 or a drop of 4.6.

The farmer sells his farm products, his live stock at 29 per cent less, and his grain at 21.2 per cent less, but he pays only 4.6 per cent less for his boots and shoes.

So much as regards prices. Let us look at the effect on domestic industries. Has the policy of putting a barbed wire fence around Canada helped the domestic industries and added to their number and developed trade as my hon. friends believed it would? Has the home market turned out to be the thing they boasted of? Employment is lower than ever in this country. Let us take employment by classes of industries, as taken from the Labour Gazette for March 1, 1932, page 328:

	Aug. 1 1930	Feb. 1 1931	Aug. 1 1931	Feb. 1 1932

Manufacturing.	110·2	96·1	94·7	85·9
Trade.	126·4	123·1	120·9	117·2

Has protection made us rich? Has protection developed the industries of the country? Has it had the effect which my hon. friends predicted and boasted of when they put into force this policy of building an impregnable tariff wall around Canada? Let us look at employment in those industries in connection with which imports have decreased. My hon. friends opposite have said that if you decrease the imports, stop them coming into Canada in competition with Canadian industries, we shall have more employment for Canadians in the industries so protected. Let us take two or three. Fibres and textile products is one industry that has been helped a good deal. According to Trade of Canada for the calendar year 1931, the imports in 1930 were $149,000,000, and in 1931, $90,000,000. Well, if there is that much less in the way of imports there must have been a correspondingly greater activity in Canada. But let us look at the employment figures. On February 1, 1930, it was 103.5, and on February 1, 1932, 96.3. The diminution in imports does not seem, therefore, to have added to employment in Canada. Take farm implements; the imports in 1930 were $21,900,000, and in 1931, $3,900,000, five times less; but the employment figure was 47.9 in 1930 as compared with 29.7 on February 1, 1932. In machinery the imports in 1930 amounted to $50,000,000, and in 1931, $29,000,000, whereas the employment figure on September 1, 1930, was 113.4 and on February 1, 1932, 81.8. In rolling mill products the imports in 1930 were $46,000,000, and in 1931, $23,000,000; but the employment figure was 102 in 1930 and 67.4 in 1932. In automobiles and vehicles the imports were $47,000,000 in 1930, when the employment figure was 97.9; and in 1931 the imports were $23,000,000, but the employment figure was 70.3. In electrical apparatus the imports in 1930 were $30,000,000 and the employment figure was 157.9 and in 1931 the imports were $16,000,000 and the employment figure 124.9.

These figures show conclusively that not only has the tariff done no good to domestic industries, but apparently employment in domestic industries has gone down instead of up with the decrease of imports in connection with these different manufactures. That is the situation with regard to the moveable tariff legislation of my hon. friends.

My hon. friends, since I have been speaking somewhat critically, will not expect any suggestions from me, but I do venture to tender one or two. I submit that they had the opportunity to make the first gesture towards remedying this situation, but they threw away that opportunity when the Minister of Finance, in his budget speech, informed the house that nothing would be done regarding tariff until after the imperial conference. There was a chance, if ever there was one, for my hon. friends to make a gesture towards imperial preference, giving a reciprocal concession for the concession which had already been extended by Great Britain. Great Britain had imposed a tariff upon certain articles, but she had provided that it should not apply to goods from Canada, and there was a golden opportunity, it seems to me, if my hon. friends opposite were really looking for an occasion to cement relations in anticipation of the imperial conference and to create an atmosphere in which a great deal of good might have been accomplished. The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has been far different from the policy which was proposed two years ago by the then Minister of Finance when he brought down his budget in anticipation of an imperial conference. What did we find in the budget at that time? There were decreases on 270 items coming from Great Britain and increases on only 11; 589 items out of 1,188 were made free under the British preference. Hon. gentlemen opposite suggested that it was only a paper preference, but remember that that preference applied to $200,000,000 worth of goods which were imported into this country. That, it seems to me, was the kind of gesture which my hon. friends might have made; indeed, Mr. Speaker, it would not have been any mere gesture but genuine evidence of their desire to cooperate with Great Britain and with the various dominions of the commonwealth.

And is it not worth while endeavouring to encourage such trade? I sometimes think, Mr. Speaker, that the people of this country do not appear to realize what sort of customer Great Britain has been to Canada; they seem to have the idea that we have been doing all the giving and Great Britain has been doing all the taking. Well, from 1921 to 1931 Great Britain bought from Canada $4,057,000,000 worth of goods. How much have we bought from Great Britain, British preference and all? We have bought $1,823,000,000; in other words, there has been a trade balance as between Canada and Great Britain of $2,234,000,000 in our favour. That is the sort of customer with whom the Hon. Charles Dunning and the government of which he was a member thought it worth while to deal; that was the sort of country toward which we deemed it wise to give preferences, and to adopt tariff schedules with definite provisions indicating our desire to trade with them. Let me quote to the house the words which the Hon. Mr. Dunning used on that occasion:

> In other words, we do not intend to meet the other countries of the British commonwealth in a spirit of petty bargaining, but rather in the broad spirit of willingness to become in ever-increasing measure good customers to those who treat us in like manner. This is the spirit in which we desire to meet all nations, but we believe that within the British community of nations lies the greatest measure of opportunity for mutual development of trade because of our common heritage, kindred institutions, and a common patriotism.

[Mr. Ralston.]

That was an expression of faith, but it was an expression of faith accompanied by very practical works in the shape of a revision of the tariff. My hon. friends are coming to realize that there is something in this method of approach. When the Prime Minister went over to the imperial conference in 1930 he was not in that attitude of mind; barter was strongly in his mind and a bargain was the thing to be striven for. He said:

> I offer to the mother country and to all the other parts of the empire a preference in the Canadian market in exchange for a like preference in theirs, based upon the addition of a ten per centum increase in prevailing general tariffs or upon tariffs yet be be created.

He accompanied his address with such expressions as these:

> Take without delay the steps necessary.
> No room for compromise.
> No possibility of avoiding the issue.
> Time for plain speaking.
> The day is now at hand.
> Decide once and for all.
> Delay is hazardous.
> The time for action has come.

> Other projects have been carefully canvassed and while we would avoid anything which might savour of premature condemnation, we are constrained to state that none of them can be accepted by Canada as alternatives at all likely to achieve the purpose.
>
> Universal acceptance.
> Deliberations must be governed by the time factor.
>
> If this change in our economic relationship is to be made, it must be made without delay.

These are the words he uttered when he left Great Britain:

> But if her proposal is thus to be contemptuously rejected Canadians can only accept the rejection and act accordingly by embracing other means at hand of further strengthening her economic position in the world.

I do not hear very much to-day from the Prime Minister along that line. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) has been on the road to Damascus, or at least on the road to Montreal, because in the issue of a day or so ago of the Montreal Gazette I find this expression:

> I hope with all my heart that no delegates to the forthcoming imperial economic conference at Ottawa will arrive with any quid pro quo attitude; nothing could be farther than this from the minds of the Canadian delegates.

And again:

> There can be no question of what each is to ask. We shall all gather with the mutual desire and determination to work out general principles on which the economic well-being of the empire might be advanced and put on a firm basis. In this working out matters of detail affecting many industries will require careful study and consideration.

That is apparently the most he hopes for from the conference; it will be a conference for the working out of general principles and the details will be settled later. The following is the important part of the minister's remarks:

> But the conference will under no circumstances develop into a market wherein bartering for terms will take place.

I hope that is to be so, and I hope that that indicates that my hon. friend realizes the situation. That is the only position which the Canadian government can take if it expects any successful results from the imperial conference. I regret that the government did not take the opportunity of holding out a hand to Great Britain and saying: We are not adopting a quid pro quo attitude; these are the terms which we are willing to give and which are shown in our budget immediately preceding the conference.

The Liberal party stands not only for the statement of principle which I have already referred to, but it stands on a record of performance going back to 1897. I refrain, as did my hon. friend, from discussing the imperial conference policy in detail, but I do want to say that the Liberal party will welcome in every way possible every arrangement which my hon. friends can make for the development of trade between Canada and Great Britain. That has been and will continue to be the policy of the Liberal party.

But let me remind the house that we want trade not only with Great Britain but with all the world. Keeping in mind the assurances of the Prime Minister during the elections, let me sum up just what has happened during the past two years. This government has had a substantial majority in this house to carry all its proposals; it has had a free rein in the working out of its policies; it has had the treasury of the country at its disposal, it has had unlimited power, but what have been the results? They are found in the budget speech and in the facts which I have brought out. We had a deficit last year in the net debt of $119,000,000, and we will have a deficit this year, at least to the extent to which unemployment relief has to be provided for and for expenditures in connection with other items not mentioned in the budget. There has been an addition to the funded debt amounting to $302,000,000, while the shrinkage in total trade has amounted to 50 per cent, taxes have been increased enormously and unemployment has been worse during the present year than at any other time in the history of the country. This is the record presented by this government to the people.

The government has tried every possible expedient. It has proved conclusively that the home market is not sufficient to make it possible for our producers to produce, to sell and to make a living. I ask my hon. friends opposite in all seriousness: Do they believe that Canada as a storekeeper can market the commodities she produces under their policy of restricting trade? The National Revenue report for February, 1932, gives the following as the principle items of export:

Wheat.
Wheat flour.
Fish.
Furs.
Meats.
Cheese.
Planks and boards.
Wood pulp.
Newsprint.
Automobiles and parts.
Copper (unmanufactured).
Nickel (unmanufactured).

That is what Canada has on her shelves to sell to the world. The only manufactured article mentioned is automobiles, and the export of automobiles has dropped from $15,000,000 in 1931 to about $3,000,000 in 1932, notwithstanding the prohibition of the import of used cars. Employment in the automobile industry during the same period has dropped from 87.9 to 70.3.

Do my hon. friends think that we can sell these natural commodities by putting up tariff walls? They have had two years in which to try, and they ought to know. They should know what the result has been and the reasons for that result. We might just as well talk of Canada selling commodities like these and finding a market behind the tariff walls which my friends have put up as to talk of a storekeeper solemnly barricading his front and back doors and sitting down in his shop to swap jackknives with his family across the head of a barrel and thinking he is carrying on trade. It cannot be done. My hon. friends have blocked up every possible chink; they have attempted to preserve the home markets for the sheltered industries.

They would be better employed to spend their time studying the tariff schedules to find out not how little but how much they can buy. They should realize that the more they buy, the more they can sell. The Prime Minister is fond of quoting from scripture, but I would remind him of the old saying:

> A giving that doth not impoverish, a withholding that doth not enrich.

There is a buying which does not hurt a country. My right hon. friend is also quite fond of quoting Gladstone, and I refer him to a recent book on Gladstone as a financier, which contains the following quotation from that great statesman:

Though we cannot in every particular case assume an immediate trade outwards when we create a trade inwards, yet it is manifest that upon the whole such is the law which must govern our commercial transactions.

Will my hon. friends get that idea into their minds? It seems to me that by this time they should have realized this fundamental truth. Last year I quoted references by great economists in various countries to the effect that high tariffs were strangling the trade of nations; I do not need to quote similar references this year because it can be heard on the streets, on the trains, in the clubs, or anywhere where men meet together. I do not know why my hon. friend does not realize the force of this truism. He should accept it, and his first step should be towards reversing the tariff policy which has been adopted by his government.

I have quoted Mr. Dunning's budget speech of 1930, and I submit that the statements which he made at that time as to Canada's trade policy hold just as true to-day as they did in 1930. They are even truer, because we have had the experience of my hon. friends dealing with the other sort of policy and making the mess of it that has been made during the last two years. This is what he said:

Canada will not engage in a tariff war with other countries.

I commend that to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), who has been so red-blooded.

The world shows at the present time too many examples of disaster following such a course. As a great exporting nation our course must be the contrary one of facilitating trade with those who facilitate trade with us. Those who raise prohibitive barriers against our products entering their markets must expect that we will extend favour to our own good customers rather than to them. I speak in no spirit of retaliation. I would much rather extend lower tariff favours to those who extend them to us than to impose prohibitive tariffs in return for like treatment.

Lower tariffs to those who buy most freely from us make for trade extension and wider markets for our products, while prohibitory duties to meet prohibitory duties generally applied would constantly tend to restrict our export markets.

These tariff favours to those who favour our products are not the result of any bargain with any other country but of an attitude in international relations which we believe to be mutually beneficial and are an expression of the spirit in which Canada will approach the Imperial economic conference in a few months' time.

In the light of that enunciation of principle, in the light of the bitter experience which we have had in the last two years and in the light of the very different experience which this country had from 1921 to 1930 and from 1896 to 1911, the policy that we on this side of the house advocate is one of expansion rather than restriction of trade. It is the policy of the prudent salesman dealing with a good customer; it is not that of the warrior trying to overcome an antagonist or of a sharp trader bartering for the most and giving the least. It is a policy which recognizes that there are no finer industries in this country than those of farming, fishing, mining and lumbering and that on those industries Canada depends for her basic wealth and prosperity. We believe in the policy which will set flowing again the stream of external trade which is the dominion's very life-blood. We believe in giving Canadian enterprise room to breathe. We believe in throwing open the windows. We believe that what Canada wants at the present time is the fresh air of trade upon the seven seas.

The Minister of Finance calls for courage and endurance. Canadians have plenty of both. In spite of all that this government has done, Canadians are still courageous and resourceful and can still endure. Canadians have not lost faith in their country, but if they are effectively to bend their backs to the burden of taxes, they must have the right and opportunity to produce and to sell. So they demand that the measures which for the past two years have stifled and throttled the country's prosperity, be abandoned, and that the government, even at this eleventh hour, recognize that in a policy not of simply imposing taxation and calling upon people to bear it bravely, but of stimulation and revival of trade and the resumption of production, lies our hope for improved conditions, for which this government piously hopes but which it does absolutely nothing to bring about.

Therefore, Mr Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart):

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion

"that increases made by the present administration in the customs tariff have been arbitrary, ill-considered and inordinate, and have had the effect of stifling agriculture and other industries, restricting trade and commerce, and increasing unemployment;

"that the fixing of values for duty purposes by orders in council is an interference with the inherent right of parliament to regulate duties and determine taxation, and has had an unsettling effect on commerce, a depressing effect on business, and has been detrimental to the interests alike of producers, importers, distributors and consumers;

"that a reversal of the present fiscal policy in relation to customs tariffs and an immediate resumption of parliamentary direction and control with respect thereto are essential to a revival of trade, and improvement in business, and to the ultimate return of prosperity in Canada."

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the house listened for two hours and a half to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) expressing in no kindly terms his opinion of the government and its administration. I followed the remarks of the hon. gentleman with care, and while with his usual facility of speech and capacity as a lawyer to place his case forcibly, he undoubtedly did well, as I listened to him I sought in vain for one syllable which would indicate the slightest appreciation of the difficulties which the government has to face and with which the world generally is confronted. Nor did I hear one word by way of analysis of the causes of the world's difficulties, or that would assist the government or this house in the solution of present problems. From my hon. friend's point of view the government could get credit for nothing—nothing at all. His was a subtle, bitter, and I might say petty criticism of the government's position and difficulties. That there is much to complain about no one will question, but surely, Mr. Speaker, somewhere within the ambit of this budget or at some odd moment during the last year and a half the hon. member could have found some common ground upon which the opposition and the government might offer something for the benefit of the country at large.

As a matter of fact my hon. friend's pessimism reminded me of Bernard Shaw's definition of a pessimist. He said that a pessimist was one who thinks everybody is as nasty as himself, and hates them accordingly. I confess as I listened to the bitterness of my hon. friend's denouncement and noted the total absence of constructive criticism, I was reminded of the observation of that cynic.

The hon. member presented an amendment to the house, and to that amendment I shall devote only a few moments of my time, because as I proceed with the remarks I have to offer I think much that has been complained of in the amendment will be answered. The amendment is divided into three parts, and in the first paragraph I find this observation:

That increases made by the present administration in the customs tariff have been arbitrary, ill-considered and inordinate, and have had the effect of stifling agriculture and other industries, restricting trade and commerce, and increasing unemployment.

Briefly I would say this: If action under extraordinary circumstances, where a government is called upon to face the most unexpected incidents and difficulties, is taken promptly, and my hon. friends wish to apply the term "arbitrary" to such action, then we confess that some of the actions of this government have been arbitrary. Necessity made them so.

As regards the "stifling of agriculture", in a few moments I shall show some of the real causes for that stifling. "Restricting trade and commerce"—yes, we restricted it; there is no doubt about that. We restricted imports when goods were entering Canada under conditions prejudicial to the interests of Canadian industry and the Canadian people. To the suggestion that we have increased unemployment I give an emphatic no, because we know and he knows that the measures he complains about have to a great extent actually maintained employment in many industries, and in some cases increased it.

The second paragraph states:

That the fixing of values for duty purposes by orders in council is an interference with the inherent right of parliament. . . .

Of course that is one of the stock arguments and cries of my hon. friends opposite. It does not matter what parliament may do by way of placing authority upon a government, if that government happens to be other than one composed of my hon. friends opposite, then when it exercises the powers conferred upon it by parliament it is interfering with the inherent rights of parliament. My hon. friend is most unhappy in that statement. He goes on to say—the government's policy had——a depressing effect on business, and has been detrimental to the interests alike of producers, importers, distributors and consumers.

We are familiar with those words. The use of them is an effort, by one sweeping statement, to gather to the support of his views all classes of the public. The last paragraph reads:

That a reversal of the present fiscal policy in relation to customs tariffs and an immediate resumption of parliamentary direction and control with respect thereto are essential to a revival of trade, and improvement in business, and to the ultimate return of prosperity in Canada.

I submit, and shall show during the course of my remarks, that a reversal of the action taken by this government during the past year and a half would result in precisely the opposite to what my hon. friend indicates in this amendment to be his desire. I shall not further analyse the amendment, but as I proceed with my remarks I hope to deal with practically all the points there raised.

Before addressing my remarks to the subjects I intend particularly to discuss I wish to deal with two or three matters raised by my hon. friend, and to dispose of them briefly and without labouring the points.

My hon. friend was put to pretty extreme limits when he went back to the old cry which years ago was proven to be false, namely, that the Conservative and Union governments during the war did not raise one cent from taxes for war expenditures. That statement has been disproved over and over again. It is well known that several hundred million dollars of the war costs were raised by taxation and paid in cash. I am surprised that my hon. friend would direct the attention of the country back to something which he thinks perhaps, the memory of the people being short, he would be able to get away with. I simply brand it as a statement absolutely without any foundation in fact.

Then he referred to the conversion loan in rather sneering tones. I think the people were proud of the achievements of the country and of its Prime Minister, its leader, in that conversion loan. My hon. friend went to great pains this afternoon to indulge in some not commendable quips about the Prime Minister n connection with that loan. The conceiving, he organizing, and the selecting of the time when that loan should be put out was a masterly stroke, I care not who did it. Furthermore, its absolute success is proven by the result. Now my hon. friend says, "Oh, but there are people to-day who are sorry they converted their bonds." I have not heard of complaints from any persons in Canada regarding the conversion of their bonds; there may have been some, but I have not heard of them. But what will that conversion loan mean for the country is the question to be asked; that is the test for the whole business. The result will mean a progressive saving in interest to this country of one, two, and ultimately around five or six million dollars a year. That is an achievement. That financing had been hanging over the governments of this country for several years. I recall very well a few years ago ministers of finance of the government of my right hon. friend opposite reminding the house that the time was coming when those large war loans were maturing and that some serious financing would have to be done. The "serious financing" was done, and it was successful largely because of the foresight and the skill with which it was handled by the right hon. leader of this government.

My hon. friend criticized the action of the government in coming to the assistance of the provinces. He was rather careful, he did not take the stand definitely that the government ought not to have assisted the provinces; he would not put in the form of an amendment a motion to condemn the government, but he hinted and insinuated that there was something sinister, something lacking in statesmanship on the part of this government or its leader in coming to the assistance of the provinces at this time. Mr. Speaker, we welcome manly criticism, criticism frank and open with reasons for it. My hon. friend gave no reasons this afternoon for his position. He simply suggested that in some way or other there was something sinister in the action of the government. What are the facts? They are clear and simple. The two old provinces, and indeed the maritime provinces as well, with their well-established methods of finance, have been able to finance themselves up to the present. It is true the federal government had in some respects to render them assistance in the movement of gold, but generally speaking those provinces have been quite able to look after themselves. When, however, we come to the four western provinces, new, young provinces where there has been an outpouring in very large measure of extravagant —shall I say?—costs in constructing roadways, public buildings and all that sort of thing for a number of years, the position was different. It may be charged that those western provinces have been extravagant, but the fact is, confronted as they were, in regard to three of them, with collapse in their main item of revenue, namely, the wheat crop, for three successive years in many places, and two years in others; confronted with that and other difficulties, they found themselves in the face of the collapse of the international exchange market unable to meet some of their obligations abroad except at costs that would be unwarranted. Rather than put them to that necessity, rather than force them into a position of delinquency—shall I say?—this government considered it was the part of wisdom in the interest of the credit of Canada to render some assistance to them. So because we were able on the markets of the world and within the dominion to secure funds for the purpose, we properly, and I think wisely, having in mind the credit of the country at large, came to their assistance and offered them some advances—nothing very extravagant up to the present. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite, if we are properly to be subject to the criticism of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth on this head, let those criticisms be put in the form of an amendment to the budget, thus placing themselves on record as condemning the government for their western financial policy.

My hon. friend also harked back to the transcontinental railways. In this he was unhappy, very unhappy. Seeking by the way merely to justify the position of his party during the years they were in office regarding the expenditures by the Canadian National Railways, he said in sweeping terms, "Why, every man in the house, every party in the house, the old government, the Borden government, all endorsed this measure, all stood for three transcontinental railways." They did not. Turn to the debates of 1903 and 1904—

Mr. RALSTON: I have.

Mr. STEVENS: —and read what Sir Robert Borden said. I recall it very well. I have not had time to bring those debates here, and I should not want to read lengthy excerpts from them, but anybody who desires can do so. What was Sir Robert Borden's proposal on behalf of the Conservative party of the day? I ask hon. members opposite to consider it and then give to that right hon. gentleman, that venerable statesman, credit for an insight into the future that is seldom found in any man. What did Sir Robert Borden say? He said: Secure the Canada Atlantic, extend it to North Bay and make it a common road for the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk; follow the Canadian Pacific from North Bay to the head of the lakes, double track it if necessary, but let that railway be occupied by the two systems that you propose; then when you get towards the prairies where the broad wheat fields are located spread your line out, have two or three railway systems there if you wish; then carry your line through the Yellowhead pass, to give you a good grade, down to Kamloops, two hundred and fifty miles from the coast; double track the Canadian Pacific from that point to Vancouver, and there again make it a common road. I ask hon. members this question: Had the people of Canada accepted the advice of Sir Robert Borden would it not have saved this country hundreds of millions of dollars of investment in railways? Of that there is no doubt. Sir Robert Borden and the Conservative members of the day did their best to persuade the then government against three transcontinental railways. I would not have wasted the time of the house to point this out but for the fact that my hon. friend brought up the subject and indulged in what I think was grossly unfair criticism.

Regarding income tax, he criticized the retroactive feature, and suggested that one of the reasons prompting the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in amending the income tax, in proposing the five per cent surtax and withdrawing the twenty per cent discount, was that we wanted to injure the civil servants of this country. He said that we had deducted ten per cent from their wages and increased the income tax to spite the civil servants of Canada. As a matter of fact those receiving under $1,200 will not be touched at all by the income tax proposals. Those who will be affected by the present income tax proposals of the Minister of Finance are those who, to use the common phrase, are most able to pay and most able to bear the burden.

In the course of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I shall refer to other observations made by the hon. gentleman, but I will not at the moment follow his speech further.

In presenting his budget the Minister of Finance gave to the country a clear, concise outline of the financial affairs of the country. There were no evasions and no equivocations. It was an unadorned statement of fact, and for this I think he should be complimented and commended. He fearlessly laid bare to the country losses in revenue, a falling off in trade and an increase in debt; he tells us that we must curb expenditures and increase taxation. All this may be very disagreeable, and it may be useful material for the destructive critic to take before the people, but it was necessary, and to my mind it was wise and courageous. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has discharged a difficult task with such marked ability that the country will share with us a feeling of confidence in his capacity to guide us wisely and safely through these troublous days.

Referring to the budget, with which I shall now deal briefly, my hon. friend (Mr. Ralston) indicated that the only safe way to prepare a budget was carefully to avoid making any estimate of revenue. The ministers of finance of the party opposite did not bring down budgets in which estimates of revenue for the coming year were given; they simply presented to the house abbreviated statements of past revenues and expenditures. Last year the right hon. leader of the government presented to the house certain estimates. It is now argued that those estimates fell short of what was actually realized, and to-day the right hon. gentleman is arraigned by my hon. friends opposite for failure to realize the estimated revenue of last year. In fairness to the government and to the Prime Minister I invite the house to consider the facts, and in doing so we are not seeking quarter from those who refuse to recognize any argument or any reason for the course pursued by the government. I do think, however, it is wise to consider the facts.

The failure to realize the amount of revenue estimated is due to certain causes. First there was the dropping off in commodity prices during the past year, amounting to at least ten per cent. I shall deal with that in considerable detail a little later, but for the moment let me point this out: The drop in commodity prices, under our system of revenue, with sales tax, excise tax and customs duties, necessarily must be immediately reflected in a falling revenue. There is no question at all of that. The only thing that remains is to analyze the causes of the drop, which I shall attempt to do later, in order to see if there is anything we can do to correct it. Then there was a drop in volume of business which was unforeseen. It may be argued that the government should have foreseen it; indeed, this afternoon my hon. friend stated very definitely that the government should have known what was ahead. I notice, however, that in no part of the world is there anyone who claims that he could foresee the extent of this depression, the drop in prices and so forth. Even some of the most skilled economists, who predicted in part something of this kind, never dared predict the length to which this depression would go. There was a drop in volume of business of from ten per cent to thirteen per cent, so these two factors alone, over which this government had no control whatever, account for over twenty per cent of the drop in the revenues of this country. I do not think, therefore, that it is the part of fair criticism to point a finger at the Prime Minister to-day and say that last year he failed properly to estimate the revenues of the country. The fact remains that we come forward and show what are the true facts, and we are quite ready to take whatever responsibility is ours.

If it were possible to do so briefly, and if I felt warranted in doing so, I might remind my hon. friends of how frequently in the past they measured the burden of taxation upon the people of Canada by the amount of revenue raised through taxation.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. BROWN: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes. When it suits their argument hon. gentlemen opposite frequently state that the rate of taxation is measured by the revenue produced or collected from the people. In my long experience in this house I recall having heard that argument frequently.

Mr. BROWN: That came from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. STEVENS: Be that as it may, here are the facts: Last year taxation produced $273,000,000 in revenue, or more than $122,000,000 less than was raised in taxes during 1928-29. I do not advance that as any argument to support the position of the government at the present time; I merely cite it as a fact. This is the point I wish to make; when there is a drop in commodity prices—which my hon. friend ignored this afternoon, and to which he gave no weight—it is reflected in a drop in revenue such as I have indicated. Inevitably it results in a lessening of taxation to that extent; there is no escape from that argument.

Mr. RALSTON: Except that there is an arbitrary value fixed upon which the duty is collected.

Mr. STEVENS: That has nothing whatever to do with my point at the moment; I will deal with that matter later. There is also the suggestion that there has been an increase in expenditure. Again I invite the house to look at the facts. My hon. friend said, quite truly, that the total expenditure was $454,000,000, but this included over $49,000,000 for unemployment relief and the wheat bonus, leaving a total expenditure of about $404,000,000. That represents an increase over 1929-30, the last full year hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, of about $6,500,000. The question may be, and is, properly asked: How does this government account for an increase of $6,500,000 in expenditure over last year? I will account for about $31,000,000 of it, and I think my hon. friends will see that the expenditure of this $31,000,000 which I shall now cite was unavoidable and inescapable.

First there were provincial subsidies, which were increased by $1,000,000. We took a census, and under the British North America Act the subsidies were arbitrarily increased by over $1,000,000. That is expenditure number one, unavoidable and inescapable. Then there was the old age pension legislation, which was introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite. Our share was increased to 75 per cent by the amendments put through a year and a half ago, and in consequence the direct charge against the federal government was increased last year by $8,700,000, another inescapable and unavoidable expenditure. Then let us take war pensions. Due to the legislation of 1930, in which the whole house and parliament generally concurred, war pensions were increased by $8,000,000. Then there is the care of ex-soldiers, a special charge upon the government, representing an increase of $2,700,000. Next, take maritime freight rates legislation introduced by my hon. friends opposite and concurred in by parliament, something over which we have no control whatever; the application of that legislation resulted in an increase of $3,800,000 last year, due largely to the decline in the movement of commodities over that section of the railways. Then take census and Canada Grain Act: these two account for another $3,240,000 instead of $3,500,000, or a total of $31,000,000 in increased expenditures, which neither this government nor any other could have controlled in any way. In others words, while we show an increase of $6,500,000 in expenditures, $31,000,000 was inescapable, which indicates at least a retrenchment of about $25,000,000 on the part of this government during that period.

Now I turn to the question of the public debt. Here again I think it is well for the house to be frank and fair in considering this matter. We find there has been an increase in the public debt; but during the period that hon. gentlemen opposite were in office there was an increase of guaranteed obligations. Prior to 1922, in very large measure the Canadian National Railways' obligations were absorbed into the public debt of the country in the form of estimates and payment in cash. My hon. friends introduced the process of settling these by guaranteed bonds, guaranteed securities. I am not complaining about it, but let us look at the facts. On March 31, 1922, these guaranteed securities amounted to $465,000,000; on March 31, 1931, they amounted to $954,000,000, or an increase of $489,000,000 in guaranteed securities, which were not reflected at all in the public debt as reported by hon. gentlemen opposite during their term of office. If we deduct from that sum the decrease in the public debt during the same period, it will show a net increase of the debt obligation to this country during their term of office of $329,000,000. I submit that it is only fair, it is only common sense, it is only wisdom for the people of this country to recognize that, because it has been by ignoring the piling-up of the capital charges of the Canadian National Railways that we find ourselves in the position we are in to-day in connection with that great undertaking.

My hon. friend referred to the deficit, and I am going to mention some of the items that went to make up the $219,000,000 to which he referred. Provincial Government Relief Act, $22,000,000: Were we wise or not in incurring that?

Mr. RALSTON: The sum of $11,000,000 was advanced to them in order to pay loans in New York, and $10,000,000 was on account of the relief act.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the same thing; the total is $22,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, but it is not all relief; that is a very different thing.

Mr. STEVENS: It is all in connection with the condition in which the prairie provinces find themselves owing to the failure of crops there at the present time, and it is all advanced to them on that account. Was the government right or wrong in that regard? That is the test of the whole thing. Ought we or ought we not to have done it? Are we to be condemned or are we to be commended for having done it? My hon. friends condemn us for doing it; they hold us up to public obloquy because we have done it. They say it is bad administration. Well, we assert that we were right and that it was the wise thing to do. The Canadian National Railways took $41,000,000, which appears as a cash advance by the Minister of Finance. Again I ask, were we justified or not? Should we or should we not have made that advance? My hon. friend would not offer an opinion on that—not for a moment. He does not condemn us and he will not condemn us now for making that advance to the Canadian National Railways. He knows perfectly well that it had to be done if the Canadian National Railways were not to be thrown into liquidation. Does he want the railways in liquidation? I think not. Do my hon. friends opposite want it in liquidation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is new about it?

Mr. STEVENS: Nothing new about it except that he condemned us this afternoon for this expenditure—

Mr. RALSTON: I beg your pardon.

Mr. STEVENS: —when as a matter of fact it was absolutely necessary.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. gentleman is setting up a straw man and knocking it down.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend made a long attack upon us in connection with this matter; he spoke bitterly about the $219,000,000.

Mr. RALSTON: I spoke about the increase in the funded debt.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, and the hon. gentleman took great care to leave the impression that there had been an increase of $219,000,000. Those are the figures he gave.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to show how that $219,000,000 is made up.

Mr. RALSTON: I said that the difference between the two net debts was $119,500,000, but the increase in the funded debt for the year is $182,000,000. There was no $219,000,000 mentioned.

Mr. STEVENS: The only reason I refer to this is that my hon. friend laboured it and had this very statement in front of him. He laboured the point and left the impression on the minds of those who were listening to him —the papers will undoubtedly show it tomorrow—that there was an increase of this sum.

Mr. RALSTON: I never mentioned that amount; I must correct my hon. friend. I never mentioned $219,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Then my ears played me false, although I listened with great care.

Mr. RALSTON: You are mistaken.

Mr. STEVENS: Now let me turn to the question of deficits. Last year there was a deficit for which we are being condemned here and now. May I, for one purpose only, invite the attention of the house to a consideration of the deficits of various countries of the world, and I do so not to justify a deficit in this country but rather to impress upon the minds of hon. gentlemen the fact that the causes of our difficulty are causes that are common to all countries; and if we are to remedy the situation we must seek the remedy amongst the different countries of the world rather than singly in Canada. The deficit of the United States for the current year is estimated at $2,123,000,000; Germany, $167,000,000; France, $120,000,000; Canada, $51,000,000; Belgium, $55,000,000; Italy, $47,000,000 for the first period and $176,000,000 for 1932. I cite these, not as an argument to justify a deficit in Canada but rather to show how worldwide is the crisis through which we are passing.

Now, my hon. friend used a most extraordinary argument in connection with exports and imports. I think I have him right in this, because I made a note of it, and I do not wish to be accused of misquoting him. The exports do not exceed the imports, he said; he declared that it is a misleading statement that the government is giving out, that during the last nine or ten months exports have exceeded imports. He says it is not true. He says it is grossly misleading to say that. The truth is, he says, that imports are less than exports. Can anyone make anything out of that? It is like saying that it is not right to say that black is not white, but that you should say that white is not black. That is exactly the form of his argument. As a matter of fact, there are some very interesting figures regarding the decline of trade. I shall cite these figures for a purpose which I shall show in a moment, namely, that this thing with which we are confronted is not something that can be lightly treated by this or any other country; it must be faced as an international problem. We find the following percentages of decrease in exports:

	Per cent
United Kingdom	39·9
United States	36·9
Canada	31·8
Germany	23·5
France	28·9
Holland	23·7
Belgium	11·5
Italy	17·1

I have a list of the figures applicable to other countries, but those I have given show the decrease for the leading countries of the world. It will be noted that there is a uniform decline in exports, and the same applies to imports and total trade, in almost the same percentages. I shall not weary the house with all the figures. There has been a decline of trade throughout the whole world.

The question is, what are we here for? Are we here to indulge in interminable bickerings on narrow interpretations of obscure points in international law? Are we here to discourse more or less learnedly on theories of social systems? Are we here merely to settle parochial disputes as to whether Jim or Tom shall have the appointment as fish guardian or locktender or what not? This is for the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot).

Mr. VENIOT: As my hon. friend has mentioned my name, I may remind him that it was he who took up so much time in 1929 doing that very thing.

Mr. STEVENS: I took up very little time. Rather, is it not our first duty to face courageously the economic problems which confront this country in common with others, and attempt to arrive at a solution? There is no royal road to prosperity any more than there is to learning; alike, the peer and the peasant must climb to its abode.

I think I have passed the controversial point in my remarks, and I invite hon. friends opposite to consider certain matters. The machinery of government is much more complex to-day than it ever was before; its contacts with commerce are much more intimate. Commerce, industry, agriculture and finance are all operating to-day with machinery much more delicate than that employed a few years ago. In my opinion, the chart of 1919, of which the right hon. the leader of the opposition has so often spoken, would not serve to guide the country to-day in the way in which he and others expected it would at that time. Times have changed, conditions have changed, contacts between government and business are altogether more intimate and critical than they ever were before. A question which we might very well ask is, what about the future? We hear a great deal nowadays about economic planning and I ask the question—can we plan for the future? I think we can. I do not think it can be done by laying down precise schemes in which all humans are to be treated as parts of a machine, to be fitted in here or there as the commissary or manager may dictate; it can be done by taking the known factors, now a part of our confusion and distress, and directing them so that the results of their operation may move towards orderly progress.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That sounds like the Ottawa Citizen.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend may laugh at me, but I am serious about this. If the editor of the Citizen or any other paper will face these facts and attempt to appraise properly the factors which are operating to-day, attempt to understand them and see if it is possible to guide them for the benefit of this and other countries, then he will be doing a service to this parliament and to the world which should not be laughed at.

There are four factors to which I should like to invite attention—price levels, debt, interest and trade. Price levels are admittedly the most disturbing factor to-day. If we could restore the levels of 1928 for wheat, copper, paper, lumber and fish, we would restore prosperity to Canada. I say to hon. friends opposite that it is not sufficient to reply to this statement by saying: yes, we were in power when those values obtained. The fact is that certain international factors have been in operation and price levels have been seriously affected. What is the cause of this drop in commodity prices? Prices are expressed in terms of currency, and in the leading countries of the world the value of currency is attached to gold. If gold is scarce or is being hoarded, if gold is in abnormal demand for debts, then inevitably commodity prices will fall simply because people will be anxious to dispose of their commodities in order to secure gold to meet their obligations. We are confronted with this situation and it is admitted by everyone that gold is scarce. To my mind that is perhaps the underlying cause of most of our troubles to-day. That there is a scarcity of gold is so clear and so definitely admitted as to make it unnecessary for me to pursue my argument any further. We must now admit, and I think it will be admitted, that the value or purchasing power of money does vitally affect commodity prices.

My next point is that the most injurious thing to the economic world to-day, or for that matter, at any time, is fluctuation in the value or purchasing power of money. As an illustration, I invite the house to consider this fact: The purchasing power of money is oscillating violently these days. In 1928 a ton of copper equalled two thousand pounds, and in 1931 it equalled two thousand pounds. In 1928, a ton of copper equalled $360, in 1931 it equalled $120. In other words, copper when measured in terms of money to-day is worth just one-third what it was worth three years ago, whereas in terms of weight it is worth exactly the same. Let us take wheat; in 1928 a bushel of wheat equalled 60 pounds, as it did in 1931, while in 1928 it equalled $1.20 and in 1931 only 60 cents. The weight or bushel measurement did not vary, while the cash value did. I shall ask a question which, although it may seem foolish to some is to me very important. What would happen to an economic system where the weights and measures fluctuated as do the values of money? In my opinion we are not giving sufficient consideration to the subject of the stabilization of the value or purchasing power of money. It seems to me that the first and most important step we should attempt to take is to secure the stabilization of the value or purchasing power of money. That is not something for which this government is to be blamed; it is of international importance, and I think the government and parliament should direct their attention to the study of the problem and along with other governments attempt to arrive at a solution.

Let me now deal with the question of debt, my second factor. The world is sunk in a veritable morass of debt. Of that there can be no doubt. International debts are overshadowing the relations of the various nations of the world, one with another, as no other influence is affecting those relations to-day. Let me put it in this way: Germany this year is not budgeting for the payment of her reparations; she says simply: It is not possible; I cannot do it. Why is Germany not budgeting for the payment of her reparations? Because the burden of debt incurred during the war being, due to the fall of commodity prices, increased by one, two and in many cases, three times what it was, she is unable to face the situation. Let us carry this a step further and look at it in the light of federal, provincial, municipal and private debt. The fact is that the weight of debt in this and other countries has been doubled due to the drop in commodity prices. Therefore the fluctuation in the price level is a vital factor in matters affecting debt.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: I notice my hon. friends angularly opposite, as we used to say, agree with me in this analysis. If the price level continues to fall, the burden of the debtor increases accordingly. If the price level rises, then the creditor loses. It is admitted that the present burden of debt is unbearable, not only as regards nations but in many instances as regards individuals. The question then introduces itself: How, then, can the debt burden be modified? My answer to that is this: it can be modified by a raising of the price level, and this in turn reintroduces the currency question.

May I give an illustration regarding the debt of Canada? My hon. friend this afternoon said: What are the things that Canada exports? He cited wheat, paper, copper and a few other items of that kind, and, he said, as these are the things that Canada exports, we should seek to open up markets for them in other lands. He overlooked this very significant point with which I shall now deal: Canada has to pay her debt abroad. She is paying it at present in the United States to the extent of $250,000,000 a year in interest. My hon. friend did not recognize that. He says: These things are paid for by exports. I do not think he said that this afternoon, but he will agree with me that ordinarily is a correct interpretation of his remarks. All right; we have to pay the United States $250,000,000 a year in interest.

Mr. ARTHURS: Not the dominion.

Mr. STEVENS: The whole of the dominion; that is for the $6,000,000,000 obligation we have over there. The price of paper dropped one-third. We export nearly all our paper to the United States; that is the way we pay our indebtedness to that country. In other words, for every ton of paper we ship over there we fell down, as compared with 1927-28 price levels, one-third in meeting that obligation. Copper is a very large item of export to the United States and its price has fallen to one-third of what it was; in other words, we fell down two-thirds in meeting our obligation in copper. The price of lumber has dropped to about one-half; wheat we do not ship over there; but if we take that obligation to the United States alone, my point is this; separating the United States for the moment from all other countries, we ought to be exporting to it about $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 a year more than we import from it. But what does my right hon. friend's free trade policy do for us in this regard? Supposing we wiped out all the tariff barriers between Canada and the United States, will they increase their buying from us? No, he must know they will not. His policy does not meet that difficulty at all, and before I finish my remarks I shall show how this works in regard to other countries.

Let me turn to the third factor, that of interest. I say this advisedly; I say it after a good deal of study and thought, and I ask my hon. friends angularly opposite to accept it in regard to not only agriculturists but industrialists and merchants, because it is only by having some degree of sympathetic contact among the different branches of activity in this country that we are going to make any progress. No agriculturist, no industrialist and no merchant can afford to pay ten per cent interest for the money he uses in his business; it simply cannot be done; normal business will not permit of that rate of interest. Moreover, no bank can afford to take a loan at ten per cent, because it is too risky. When a loan justifies a rate of ten per cent, in my opinion it is too risky a loan for a bank to take at all and ought not to be accepted. Whether or not that can be covered by arbitrary statutory legislation is another question. That can be discussed next year at the revision of the Bank Act. I am laying down what I consider to be sound business principles directly affecting our welfare, and the same principles are operating in every corner of the world to-day affecting the business of the world and affecting us along with the other countries. But I lay down the principle that a rate of interest around eight or ten per cent makes successful operation of the ordinary business activities impossible and unprofitable.

Let us look for a moment at a farm mortgage in the light of commodity prices. Again I come back to this one point, and I am going to invite my hon. friends opposite to join me in this study. Let us look at it in this way: on a farm loan of $2,000 at eight per cent, in 1928 the interest would be $160 payable in 133 bushels of wheat, whereas in 1931 the interest is still $160 but it is payable in 266 bushels of wheat. In other words—let us get this as clearly as possible—interest is not something that is made by money but something that must be taken out of the productivity of the country and paid upon the money that is lent. That commodity prices have dropped to the unwarranted levels of to-day simply means that the farmer, in paying the interest on his farm loan, must take 266 bushels of wheat to do what he did with 133 bushels two years ago. Precisely the same principle applies to an industry. Take one that has for its basic product copper, lead or zinc, operating in some manufacturing concern. Suppose they borrowed $50,000 three or four years ago. In the payment of interest on that money, where they formerly calculated an output of a given amount would serve to meet that payment, it would to-day take an output of two to three times as much to discharge the obligation. So it again becomes clear that the price level is the chief factor in all the economic problems with which we are confronted.

I turn to the question of trade, which is the fourth factor that I think should challenge the attention of the house. I have already intimated that Canada is a debtor country. Our borrowings abroad amount to $6,250,000,000 and our loans abroad amount to about $1,250,000,000, leaving, roughly speaking, obligations to be met abroad in interest and recurring principal renewals of approximately $5,000,000,000. This is of importance and must be recognized and remembered. It was ignored by my hon. friend this afternoon. It is ignored very largely by those hon. members presenting the policy of my right hon. friend opposite. We are a debtor country—let us understand that—and the fact that we are makes all the difference in the world and calls for a different policy, from that adopted by a creditor country. We differ entirely from England. England is and has been for generations a creditor country; the United States is a creditor country, and France is a creditor country. As I said a minute ago, Canada being a debtor country to the extent of $5,000,000,000, she must find $250,000,000 per year in interest alone, besides renewals and repayments.

It is said that we must buy if we are going to sell; I think my hon. friend said that this afternoon. Let us test that statement by the free trade theory which is the ideal of my hon. friends opposite. There is one strange thing about my hon. friends opposite. They are very strong on free trade theories, but they never come forward and risk their political existence on the doctrine they profess. They will not do it now, Mr. Speaker; they had a chance to do it, but they would not. They do not do so in this attenuated, emasculated amendment moved to-day. They will not do that. They have theories, but they will never stake their reputation or political existence upon them. As my hon. friends opposite are advocates of free trade I think I am entitled to put the following question to them: Assuming that a country with a depreciated currency were suddenly to commence shipping goods into Canada at prices obviously below the cost of production, and further assuming that such goods were on the free list, and that Canadian industries were threatened thereby, would Canada be justified in adopting effective measures to prevent such goods from entering to the detriment of Canadian industry? That is the question I put to my hon. friends opposite. Those are the circumstances which have been the basis for the action of this government which has been so bitterly condemned by hon. gentlemen opposite, and which is condemned in the amendment now offered to the house. I repeat the question: If a country with a depreciated currency were suddenly to commence shipping goods into Canada at prices obviously below the cost of production, and further assuming that such goods were on the free list and Canadian industries were threatened thereby, would Canada be justified in taking effective measures to prevent the influx of those goods? Would she or would she not?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Their answer is no, and they condemn us for doing it. Our answer, Mr. Speaker, is a decided yes. Canada was daily confronted with that problem.

This afternoon my hon. friend spent a great deal of time in an effort to leave the impression upon the public that the government headed by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister had dealt unfairly and falsely with British exporters of goods to Canada. He laboured the question. What are the simple facts? On September 22, I think it was—

Mr. RALSTON: It was September 28.

Mr. STEVENS: No; anyway it was in September last—

Mr. CAHAN: September 21.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, on Sepember 21, Great Britain unexpectedly went off the gold standard. The action of the mother country was not known to anybody—except the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie); he knew all about it. As the Prime Minister had said not even the leading bankers in New York or in other parts of the world had any idea or expectation of such action by Great Britain. They went off the gold standard, however, and what was the result? The result was that goods held in Great Britain at a pound value of $4.86 became available for export to other countries, Canada included, at a pound value of $4. $3.86, $3.76 or figures in that vicinity. That was a condition which no country could meet. Had we done nothing, what would have been the result? It would have been such as described by the writer of the memorandum from which my hon. friend quoted so freely this afternoon, the head of Robert Simpson Company, Limited; I recognized the figures he quoted. The result would have been highly satisfactory to that importer, because he could have imported goods, irrespective of the interests of Canada, at figures below what they originally represented in cost in the old country, simply because of the exigency of England going off the gold standard, simply because of a temporary financial catastrophe which overtook Great Britain. What did we do? Recognizing that there was an hiatus between the time that a country depreciated its currency, and the time the costs in that country could equalize that depreciation—recognizing there was an hiatus it became the duty of this government to provide safeguards against an absolutely inequitable and unfair competition. That is all we did.

Mr. RALSTON: No, you issued an order in council fixing the exchange at $4.86⅔, and then changed it next day.

Mr. STEVENS: And I will tell my hon. friend why we changed it; if he will contain himself for a minute I will tell him. We were faced with a condition, and it was impossible to estimate what the results would be.

Mr. RALSTON: You had had a week.

Mr. STEVENS: I am afraid my hon. friend is too restless; wait a moment. What did we find? We found that immediately certain large buyers of goods in this country were recognizing the fact that here was a chance to make very large and unwarranted profits.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: What I am telling is the truth.

Mr. RALSTON: The consumers might have had a chance.

Mr. STEVENS: No, they would have received no benefit.

Mr. RALSTON: They might, possibly.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to state the facts. Those buyers began cabling very extensive orders to the old country which would have flooded this country with goods during the period of hiatus I mentioned. In the meantime the pound had fallen to $3.86. The result would have been disastrous to Canada and unfair to everybody concerned. Very little if any benefit would have accrued to the consumer; great benefit would have accrued to the speculator. We said, "No, it is not going to happen."

Mr. RALSTON: No, you did not.

Mr. STEVENS: So we fixed the rate at $4.86.

Mr. RALSTON: No, you fixed it first at the exchange rate.

Mr. STEVENS: Wait a moment; having recognized these things about which I now speak, we fixed the rate at $4.86.

Mr. RALSTON: And you changed your mind again.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend was not interrupted this afternoon. I spoke to him once but he did not answer me. Then, we went on for a period of several weeks, knowing that some change in the situation was bound to eventuate, either that the pound would sink lower or that Great Britain would adjust her difficulties and the pound would recover. We expected it would drop lower; two or three weeks demonstrated that we were right in our expectation. We realized that $4.86 was too wide a spread between the actual selling price of goods, and the par value, and therefore we lowered the fixed value to $4.40. I wish to say that from experience and from trade records of the last six months, it would seem that $4.40 was about as fair, equitable and happy a figure as we could have chosen. It is true we could have kept on fluctuating through the whole winter, but we considered that $4.40 would serve fairly and equitably the purposes of Canadian industry and Canadian trade, and at the same time admit goods from the old country under conditions that were more favourable to them than they were before. Because the test is this; there was considerable increase in the export of goods from Great Britain under the fixation of price at $4.40.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I go a step further. My hon. friends say that raw materials should be on the free list, that there should be free movement. The right hon. gentleman has frequently used the phrase "We must buy so that we can sell." He has laid that down as a cardinal doctrine in economics. He also implies, as does also his party in their literature and their presentation of trade questions, that the more freedom there is to the movement of goods, as a result you get naturally an entree into the market of the other country. Let us look at certain commodities on the free list that are of very great importance to us—raw rubber, hides, silk, coffee, Egyptian cotton, pineapples. I could give dozens of other commodities, but these are rather important because their movement is fairly large. Take raw rubber. It is on the free list right across the board; anybody can ship raw rubber to Canada. Consequently, if my right hon. friend's theory is correct, we ought to have entry into the market where our rubber is produced. That is logical.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Some one says "no." That is not a Liberal "no." But I say it is logical. If there is any advantage in having the movement of goods as free as possible, surely if raw rubber is on the free list it ought to result in the movement of Canadian goods out to the rubber-growing countries in return for our imports of raw rubber. What are the facts? We import ninety-eight per cent of our raw rubber from the United States, where there is not a pound of rubber produced. Where does your free trade come in there? But that is not the whole story; here is the balance, and it is very, very fatal to Canada. The Trade and Commerce department have trade commissioners in the areas where practically all the rubber, ninety-eight per cent, is produced, that is, the Malay peninsula, the Dutch East Indies, and Burma. What do those countries tell our trade agents. "You buy no goods from us. The United States is our big buyer. Therefore we favour their goods against yours." That baldly is their answer to us. Is that a condition we are warranted in continuing? Roughly, we import 60,000,000 pounds of raw rubber, and yet for the purchase of those goods we get no access to the markets of the countries that produce them.

Now let me take hides. Hides come from the Argentine. We import them through New York. Last year we imported some $3,000,000 worth. During the same period our Canadian National boats running to the Argentine lost in operation $500,000; the hides that come to Canada from the Argentine were brought in American and other bottoms to New York. Those hides are on the free list. The Argentine is saying to us, "We should like to buy more of your goods, but you do not buy much from us."

Next I take silk. Roughly speaking, we buy about $5,000,000 annually from Japan. It comes in through New York chiefly; some may come in by Vancouver, but very little, most of it goes through the Panama to New York, whence it is merchandised into Canada. It is on the free list right across the board. Japan says to us, "We are buying from you about twice as much goods as you buy from us. We should like you to buy more." No credit comes to us for this $5,000,000 worth of silk. As I say, it is on the free list and moves to us from New York. The same thing applies to coffee and to Egyptian cotton. The latter we use in very considerable quantities. The same thing applies also to Cuban pineapples. My hon. friends from Prince Edward Island have been after me to get Cuba to take some of their potatoes, and we have been doing our best to secure the Cuban market for them. But although we buy thousands of dollars worth of pineapples from Cuba, she gives us no credit for those purchases because the pineapples are sold to American dealers at New York whence they are imported into Canada.

Now, the point I am making is this: Where is your doctrine of "Throw down the bars, put commodities on the free list so that trade can move freely, and so restore prosperity to Canada."

Mr. RALSTON: The bars are down to us.

Mr. STEVENS: Precisely, the bars are down and have been down for years, but the goods do not flow to Canada, they are merchandised in another country, and we get no credit for them at all; we get no return trade. It is very easy to stand before the public if you do not attempt to analyse your proposals and say that if you will just let trade flow in its natural channels you will have prosperity. I assure my hon. friend that where there is the fullest opportunity for goods to flow in their natural channels they are not so flowing and we are not getting the benefit of our imports for the marketing of our goods in those producing countries. What we ought to do, and what we must do in my opinion, is so to adjust our trade policy that we will get full credit in those countries from whom we buy so that we can sell to them in return. I have been told by some that I am foolish, that I do not know what I am talking about—

Mr. YOUNG: What do you propose in that regard?

Mr. STEVENS: Just a minutee. Let me quote in this regard Mr. Carlisle's address at the shareholder's meeting of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company. Mr. Carlisle is perhaps one of the most outstanding business men of Canada, certainly he is one who understands his own business, the rubber business, thoroughly, and a man whom all those who know him hold in the highest esteem. He said this, in part:

> The depression that we are in, is a world condition and can only be solved by world solution.
> Our export market was affected adversely—due to excess tariffs in different countries, some places prohibiting the importation of products, a decrease in purchasing power and a very keen competition.

Then he goes on:

> The export market at the present time does not look good. I think it will be decidedly poor for 1932. It is going to continue to be poor until we get a world readjustment, which will not come this year, next year or the year after.

I cite that part as the opinion of a thoughtful and practical business man of note. He goes on:

> Our progress is measured almost entirely by the amount of materials and articles which we export. To my mind, export business can only be improved through a closer contact in operating conditions within the British empire or commonwealth.

Then he utters these very significant words:

> It is rather surprising, if you make a study of this question, how many things we can buy within the British empire. We can buy one hundred per cent of our rubber without inconvenience or loss of profit and we can buy a lot of our cotton from the same source.

Then he goes on with some other citations of a similar character. The point I wish to emphasize in this respect is that here is an outstanding authority on this subject telling us that if we address ourselves to the problem we can buy this rubber direct from British sources and bring it to Canada direct.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: These are the opinions that this government is seeking to work out in anticipation of the Imperial economic conference. My hon. friend opposite and some of those associated with him sought to instil into the public mind and to send across the water to Great Britain the idea that this government is standing in a position of resistance against closer trade relations with the mother country. It is an absolute misinterpretation of our attitude and is not a fair interpretation of the efforts we are making. What we are hoping to do is this: In connection with many of the things we are now buying in other parts of the world, by readjustment of our trade facilities and trade policies we want to give to the mother country a larger share of those markets in Canada; we want to buy more within the British Empire, direct from the countries of production, and thus open a larger part of their markets for our business.

Now I must hasten, Mr. Speaker; I have one further thing to say and then I shall conclude. There is a great deal of talk of blue ruin, I was going to say; we are told that the country is going to the bow-wows, but there are still a few bright spots. I have a few here to which I should like to refer. Let us consider the production of gold which is up to a very marked degree. The 1931 gold production amounted to $55,000,000, and I think that is encouraging. Take leather footwear; in February, 1932, the total production was 1,500,000 pairs, an increase of 40 per cent over January, of 22 per cent over February a year ago and of 8 per cent over February two years ago. That is an industry of very considerable magnitude and importance, in which there is a steady increase in business. Take the export of bacon and hams; in February we exported 2,437,000 pounds as compared with 470,000 pounds in February, 1931, a marked increase. In February, 1932, we exported 23,000,000 pounds of copper, more than twice the amount exported during the same period in 1931. My hon. friend took dollar values. The dollar value of copper is only one-third what it was two years ago, but when you come to the quantity value you have double the export of a year ago. The export of concentrated milk products amounted to 1,300,000 pounds, a gain of 200,000 pounds over February of a year ago.

Mr. YOUNG: Could the minister give us comparative prices for the same period?

Mr. STEVENS: No, I cannot, but the price is very markedly down. What I am trying to do is show that as far as production and export are concerned, in some cases they have shown distinct gains. Take the export of flour to the West Indies. I have not the exact figures, but there is a marked increase in weight, though the value is down, of course. We are exporting more wheat this year than we exported last year or the year before.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. STEVENS: I think so.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the minister will find from his own reports that on December 31 the exports were about 17,000,000 bushels less than in the preceding year, while the value was down by $64,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I will not dispute that statement, but I looked up the figures a short time ago and at that time the exports showed an increase. I have not the figures before me, so I will accept the correction of my hon. friend. The export of butter for the twelve months amounted to 10,800,000 pounds as compared with 1,170,000 pounds during the preceding twelve months, and for the same period we exported 85,000,000 pounds of cheese, a considerable increase over last year. I just cite these few figures for this purpose: Undoubtedly the dollar value of exports and of trade in general has fallen tremendously, but the quantity value has not fallen to anything like the same degree.

In conclusion I should like to read from an article which came to my notice some time ago, and I have a brief comment to make in regard to it. This article is entitled "The Lesson of the Day," and reads:

> It is a gloomy moment in history. Not for many years—not in the lifetime of most men who read this paper—has there been so much grave and deep apprehension; never has the future seemed so incalculable as at this time. . . .
> In France the political cauldron seethes and bubbles with uncertainty; Russia hangs as usual, like a cloud, dark and silent upon the horizon of Europe; while all the energies, resources and influences of the British Empire are sorely tried, and are yet to be tried more sorely, in coping with the vast and deadly Indian insurrection, and with its disturbed relations in China.
> It is a solemn moment, and no man can feel an indifference (which, happily, no man pretends to feel) in the issue of events.
> Of our own troubles no man can see the end. They are, fortunately, as yet mainly commercial; and if we are only to lose money and by painful poverty to be taught wisdom—the wisdom of honour, of faith, of sympathy and of charity—no man need seriously despair. And yet the very haste to be rich, which is the occasion of this widespread calamity, has also tended to destroy the moral forces with which we are to resist and subdue the calamity.
> Good friends—let our conduct prove that the call comes to men who have large hearts, however narrowed their homes may be; who have open hands, however empty their purses. In time of peril we have nothing but manhood, strong in its faith in God, to rely upon; and whoever shows himself truly a God-fearing man now, by helping wherever and however he can, will be as blessed and beloved as a great light in darkness.

This article, Mr. Speaker, appeared in Harper's Weekly of October 10, 1857. I read that for one purpose only, to indicate that while times undoubtedly are difficult, while we are labouring under stress and discouragement and in some cases almost despair, the fact is that the world has experienced conditions of this kind in the past. Little will be gained by merely attacking the one or the other, by seeking to load upon any government the full responsibility for all our distress. On the other hand, perhaps out of the depression and despair of these dark days we may learn principles of fortitude and of economy that will be of advantage to us in the future. But the solution of these troubles will not come from the efforts of any one nation; it must be found in the cooperation of the nations of the world, and to that end I say, as I have already said during the course of my remarks, that I invite study on the part of the house of the problems with which we are confronted so that the government may be guided, assisted and supported in its efforts to deal with these problems in conjunction with governments in other parts of the world.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon and this evening the house has been privileged to listen to two excellent addresses, both of a very informative character. I wish to say that with some of the remarks made by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) I am in hearty agreement. When he spoke on the question of international debts and price levels he received no greater encouragement and support from any part of the house than he received from this corner; in fact it was rather surprising how little support he did receive from his own party when he dealt with those two very important questions which so vitally affect our everyday lives.

There was another part of his speech on which I wish to commend him and with which I very heartily agree. I refer to that part of his address in which he dealt with the assistance given by the federal government to the provinces during these difficult times. I think one of the unfortunate parts of the address this afternoon by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) was when he inferred that it was wrong for the federal government to give financial backing to the provincial governments. I do not know what the provincial governments would have done during the past six or twelve months if they had not been assisted by the federal treasury. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth said that one of the reasons why the assistance might have been withheld was that constitutional difficulties might ensue. I wish to make just one observation in that regard. When people are hungry, when they are starving, all these constitutional technicalities are of very little consequence, because constitutional technicalities will not feed anyone. In this instance the federal treasury was the only source from which the provinces could obtain assistance, and I think that the federal government was fully justified in giving that assistance to the provincial authorities. If there is one thing for which I would commend the government, one of the few points on which I do agree with hon. gentlemen opposite, it is in regard to the assistance they have given the provinces in these difficult times of stress and strain through which they are passing.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. gentleman will read in Hansard just what I did say, but I can assure him that I did not say what he attributes to me.

Mr. HEAPS: I am very sorry if I have misrepresented the hon. gentleman's point of view, but that was the impression he left on my mind when he spoke this afternoon, for I remember his having dealt with the constitutional difficulties that might arise in consequence of the assistance having been given by the federal government for purely provincial purposes.

Mr. RALSTON: I pointed out the desirability of a financial rearrangement with the provinces so that that situation would not arise.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: It is difficult for me to interpret my hon. friend's point of view, but I will say this, that when the provinces were not in a position to obtain funds on their own account there was only one source from which they could get assistance to carry them through and that was the federal treasury. However, I leave the point there.

Let me now refer again to some of the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He spoke of the tremendous dead weight of the national and international debt and showed how that would have to be adjusted before we could approach more prosperous times. To a certain extent I am in sympathy with that view; yet, when I ask myself what hon. gentlemen opposite have done in that regard, I find that they have done exactly the opposite of what we have been told they ought to do. In fact, they have not only increased the debt by enormous sums, but they have done something for which I cannot forgive them. When they wanted money recently they offered the highest rate of interest ever known in the history of this dominion, and that rate of interest on federal bonds reflected itself in all other classes of bonds in Canada. We find, therefore, that this action of the government in offering 5¼ per cent interest on gilt edged securities of the federal treasury meant the adding of millions upon millions of dollars to public debts in this dominion; because the moment the federal government issued bonds at 5¼ per cent our provincial government had to pay 6 and 6½ per cent on money it wished to borrow. The securities of the city of Winnipeg are second to those of no other city in Canada; yet in Winnipeg they had to pay 6⅔ per cent before they could borrow money. In other words, they had to increase the amount of interest charges by approximately 50 per cent before the banks would lend them money.

Very commendable as have been certain aspects of the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, it seems to me that both hon. gentlemen who have spoken today have approached the budget statement in exactly the same way as a director or a financier would look upon a bank statement. But may I point out that in government there is something more than finance; there is more than that in running the affairs of a country. There are in this country ten million human beings, besides the financial interests of Canada, and when the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that we should study our social problems I would add that in my humble judgment the needs and desires and the well being of the ten million inhabitants of Canada have a prior claim over the financial interests of the dominion.

I wish to offer a few words of comment on the budget statement made to this house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). Last year the house was treated to what was commonly called a real budget. This year no such description has been used of the budget, but the result of the first real budget we had in 1931 is that we find ourselves now with a deficit of $55,000,000; and in order to make that deficit as low as it was the government found it necessary to cut the estimates by $55,000,000. Now hon. gentlemen opposite come along requesting great increases in taxation. I am not going to blame them for making these increases; it seems to me that if they wanted to balance the budget, increases were absolutely essential. And how are they going about these increases? Of the $55,000,000 that they propose to raise, approximately two-thirds will come out of taxation of the necessaries of life by way of an increase in the sales tax or by a two per cent increase in the excise duties. I do not disapprove, in fact I approve of the action of the government in increasing the income tax. I realize that if they had to balance the budget, they have taken, under the system which now prevails in this country, the only logical course which it was possible for them to take—that of increasing the income tax. It was stated by the Minister of Finance when he introduced the budget that, with one exception, he did not intend to make changes in the tariff structure of the country. I think that there was one very important change in the tariff, however, and that was when he increased the excise duty from one to three per cent. I regard that as a very fundamental change in the whole tariff structure of the country, because an increase from one to three per cent means, on the average, roughly speaking, an increase of about ten per cent in all protective duties in Canada. In 1922, when the Liberal party were in power, they found themselves in somewhat the same position as the present government now find themselves in, and they resorted to almost the identical methods which the Conservative party are adopting to-day; that is to say, they increased the sales tax to six per cent. It is quite true that subsequently it was reduced until it reached a level of about one and a half or two per cent, but now we find the sales tax back at the figure it was about ten years ago.

If capitalism demands a balanced budget, then I say that there is practically no alternative to what has been done by the government on the present occasion. To me, however, the only other alternative is to make a complete break with the existing economic system. But in this house we find very little desire on either side to break with the system. What do we find further? We find that the government, in following out the policy of curtailment in expenditures in the attempt to balance the budget, are merely following the dictates of the financial interests of the country. I go a little further and say that parliament finds itself under the nominal control of those institutions which control the finances of this and other countries of the world. Our municipalities, our legislatures and even this parliament can hardly move without their consent. Our provincial governments find themselves more or less at the behest of the financial institutions; they are being told to balance their budgets, otherwise they will not be permitted to do any more financing.

Where does the real power lie? Does it lie inside of parliament or in the hands of a comparative few outside? We boast of our democratic institutions; perhaps we have good reason to do so, but they are being successfully challenged by those who own and control finance. We claim that we are living under a form of democracy, but I contend that we are living under a form of political democracy which exists side by side with a financial autocracy; in other words, we are half a democracy and half an autocracy. These two forms of government cannot continue to go on indefinitely side by side; sooner or later one must give way to the other. I think it was Lincoln who said during the civil war in the United States that that country could not exist half free and half enslaved. We cannot exist in this country one half a democracy and one half a dictatorship; the one must ultimately give way to the other. I am satisfied that when democracy comes to grips with financial autocracy there can be only one ultimate end to the struggle.

I come now to some of the desires expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and I shall deal with some aspects of the social question. We have been told that we are suffering from certain financial difficulties. At various times during the present session hon. members have discussed the fact that in this country we have too much coal. Other hon. members have told us that we have too much fish. We have been told we have too much wheat, too much meat, a surplus of railway equipment and too many railways. On another occasion we were told there were too many doctors; we have been told there are too many lawyers, and I suppose some day we will be told there are too many politicians. To-day we have a famine of too much of everything. On other occasions we have been told we have too much money—our bank deposits to-day are greater than ever in the history of the dominion. We have been told about idle capital, and finally we are told that we have too many human beings—I mean that at the present time hundreds of thousands of our fellow Canadians are out of work, unable to obtain a means of existence. It seems a strange anomaly that we should be suffering from too much of everything.

In spite of the excellent presentation offered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, during the whole course of his remarks he uttered not one word of encouragement as to how we were to overcome the difficulties with which we are faced. In spite of the fact that we have too much of everything, he did not tell us how there was going to be a little more of that too much of everything spread amongst the great masses of the people. Industry has practically ceased to function, yet the minister did not offer one word of hope as to how the government was going to make it function a little better.

For a moment or two I should like to deal with what the government has done during the past year or two and how it has endeavoured to cope with the problems it promised to deal with when it came into power in 1930. There is not the least doubt that the government was elected to end if at all possible the economic crisis which existed in the summer of 1930. The government accepted the challenge to cure unemployment, and I give it this much credit: in its own way it has attempted to deal with the problem and if the remedies proposed have not proven effective, then all I should like is for the government to admit that such is the case.

In the special session of 1930 the government submitted three proposals to the house. The first was $20,000,000 for relief; the second was laws and regulations to prevent dumping into Canada. Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce realize that comparatively speaking there is no country in the world which has done more dumping during the last two or three years than Canada has? To-day we are probably the greatest dumpers in the world. Every bushel of wheat which goes out of this country is sent abroad at a price which might normally be termed a dumping price. When the farmer sells his wheat at fifty or sixty cents a bushel he suffers a loss of approximately twenty cents per bushel, and if other countries adopted the attitude of the present government, hardly a bushel of wheat would have left Canada during the past two years. The third proposal was a highly increased tariff. These were the panaceas offered in 1930 as a cure for the unemployment problem. After that there followed the imperial conference in London. The ministers went over in a rather bombastic way with that Canada first policy, and they came back with little more.

We come now to 1931. Less than a year ago, under the peace, order and good government regulations, the present government had a completely free hand to do almost anything it desired to deal with unemployment. There was no limit to the amount of money it could spend to cope with the situation. Again let me give credit to the government for attempting to cope with the situation; within the confines of the capitalistic structure I do not think the government could have done much more than it did during the past six or twelve months.

I come now to 1932 and I examine what the government has done to relieve unemployment. After a year and a half of these palliatives, everything seems to have changed; instead of a policy of spending money freely, the government has embarked upon a policy of strict and rigid economy. Every time the government practises economy it means that so many more people are put out of a job. After eighteen months the policy of the government has been completely reversed. It has now come forward with another three proposals. The first is to balance the budget; the second, to balance trade, and the third, to balance the dollar.

It may be very important from a government's point of view to balance a budget—I will not for one moment deny that—but it is a thousand times more essential that the hundreds of thousands of heads of families in this country should be first permitted to balance their budgets. Those who are out of work or working on short time find it impossible to balance the budget on what they have coming in every week or every two weeks. In fact, in spite of all the efforts made by the government, our unemployment problem has now become a national tragedy. It is with us in a more aggravated form than ever before, and the actions of the government in the past few months, especially since the beginning of the session, have done a great deal to aggravate the situation. From statements made in the press to-day, and on account of the policy of rigid economy which is being practised by the government, it appears that public works are to be discarded, and further that the government are going to care for the unemployed by the creation of a vast chain of soup kitchens from the Atlantic to the Pacific. If there is one thing that I have always opposed in the house and shall continue to oppose as long as I am a member of parliament, it is the giving of a dole in that form to hundreds of thousands of our people. That is no way of dealing with the unemployment problem. It seems that the government, after having for the past eighteen months dealt with this problem as they have, have now thrown up their hands with regard to it; they say: We do not know what to do with it, but we shall do the best we can to keep the unemployed fed in some way or another while this situation is with us, and in the hope of its diminishing. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce has suggested that we should give thought to these social problems, I say again to him: What have the government to propose in regard to our unemployment problem? Hardly a constructive proposal was given in the budget, nor was one submitted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speech this evening.

Let us see further how the government have dealt with the unemployment situation. First, they slashed $55,000,000 off the controllable expenditures of the Dominion. By that one act I believe they put more people out of work than actually received employment through the whole activities of the government during the past nine or ten months. Second, in order to cure unemployment they made a slash of ten per cent in the wages of civil servants, and while they did that, interest charges on our national debt increased by ten per cent. In other words, they were slashing the wages of their employees in order to be able to pay the higher interest charges to those who have lent money to the federal government. Third, as another method of dealing with unemployment, they have been responsible for the laying off of large numbers of employees throughout the whole Dominion. Will such methods lead to a solution of the problem? No; I think during the past few months our unemployment situation has become considerably aggravated by the activities of the government, and to-day they come to parliament without a single suggestion to offer as to how they are going to deal with the question.

I shall give credit to the government for this much: I am not going to blame them altogether for the economic conditions which prevail. I do not think any one government is really to blame so long as it is an upholder and defender of the economic structure as it exists at present. Depressions and periods of so-called prosperity are not really created by governments, but the governments themselves or the parties supporting them must assume responsibility for depressions when they are placed in power. Probably it is the fortune of political warfare that to-day one party happens to be in power and the other in opposition. In this country with its limited population and its boundless natural resources, that have so often been referred to in parliament, there are at this time approximately a half million people out of work. That to me is a most appalling situation. Moreover, when one considers that these men have nothing to look forward to in the immediate future, surely they have a right to expect those who sit here in parliament, the central authority within the dominion, to do something to deal fundamentally with the situation.

I should like to refer to some of the activities of the house. When parliament first met there were times when we had to adjourn because we had really nothing to do. It is a sad commentary upon our parliamentary institutions that in a time of economic crisis, of stress such as that through which we are passing, when parliament should be bending every energy towards solving the unemployment and economic problems that confront us, we should sit here with practically nothing to do. It appears further that within a few short weeks parliament will prorogue because there is nothing for it to do. We shall have had one of the shortest sessions in the history of the house, and that in spite of the fact we are confronted with probably the gravest economic crisis in our country's history.

During this session, however, we have been busy in another direction. We have committees galore working on all kinds of questions. We have a committee considering the civil service, one on the price of gasoline, another on the beet sugar industry and another on radio control. We have another committee which has met and considered certain statements made rather foolishly and extravagantly by a former deputy speaker. Then we have a committee on election funds, a railway committee, and finally, only last week the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) formed a bankruptcy committee, a rather appropriate proceeding under the conditions in which we to-day find ourselves. But although we look around and consider the hundreds of thousands of men and women out of work, and the economic questions that are facing us, there is not a committee of any kind considering either the unemployment question or the prevailing economic conditions. What hope is the government holding out to those who at present find themselves out of work? The Minister of Trade and Commerce waxed eloquent when he was pointing out that world conditions are to an extent responsible for our internal situation. In a sense it may be quite true that to-day no nation can live entirely unto itself. But may I put this question to the minister and the house: Is it logical for one to assume that because we cannot sell our wheat and other food products to Great Britain, China, Japan, France, Germany, Roumania and other countries, if all these other countries are too poor to buy the products which we have in superabundance, is that any excuse for our people going hungry and barefooted? If our elevators are crammed with foodstuffs, and the people of China, Japan and the other countries I have mentioned are unable to purchase them, is it logical for us to assume or to say that we should deny those commodities to our own people in Canada who are producing them with the sweat of their own labour? These are facts to which hon. members might give their attention, and if a committee of the house had been set up to deal with them I think both the house and the country would have received more advantage than they have from the efforts of the committees I have just enumerated.

We are told again and again that conditions are bad in the United States. I am quite ready to admit they are bad, but poverty and chaos in the United States are no excuse for a similar condition in this country. Even though world conditions may to some extent be responsible for internal conditions in Canada, the government responsible for the affairs of the nation must accept responsibility for conditions in our midst. I resent very much being told constantly about what is happening in the United States. While I may have a great deal of respect for some activities south of the boundary line I am not one who is always anxious to go to the United States for illustrations of what we should do.

I am reminded of a statement made a few days ago by a well known English economist who told of the impressions he had received upon a trip to the United States. He said that in that country people were losing faith in institutions and in public men. I hope this government will not ask us to follow the example of a country in which conditions of that kind prevail. This afternoon at the close of the speech by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and the peroration of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, fine language was used and great heights of oratory attained. They were most eloquent as to what conditions should obtain, but not as to how those conditions were to be brought about. I remember some of the expressions used by each hon. member. From the Liberal side of the house we heard the statement that they desired a removal of the restrictions on commerce and a freer interchange of commodities. Mr. Speaker, anything that removes artificial barriers between nation and nation so as to allow a freer flow of commerce has, generally speaking, my approval. But we must have something more than that. Free interchange of commodities is one thing, but the great masses of the people should have freer access to the commodities which are produced. Free exchange of commerce is one thing, but it is another thing to have a fairer distribution of products. Unless we have a more equitable distribution of wealth, in my humble opinion there is no hope of solving our economic problems. Again, in my opinion the solution of our difficulties is not to be found exclusively in either raising or lowering tariff barriers. May I here interpose this remark: If those who attend the Imperial economic conference in July next believe that by a process of tariff barriers or tariff adjustments they will bring about a state of prosperity, we must expect a certain amount of disappointment. So far any efforts to bring about a state of prosperity by tariff adjustments within the empire have proved more or less disastrous to the Dominion of Canada. I refer to trade treaties made by the previous and present governments between this country and Australia and New Zealand. An illustration of what may happen is to be found in the despatches appearing in this morning's papers. One of the Australian delegates has stated that the empire will be disrupted if some satisfactory tariff adjustments are not made between its various component parts. It is my firm belief that closer relationships within the empire cannot be brought about by a process of tariffs. Trade flowed more freely in the years 1928 and 1929 than it flows to-day. In those years we had unemployment; vast numbers of men and women were seeking work. Restrictions in those years were not as high as they are to-day, and yet at that time we had exactly the same fundamental principles to deal with as we have now. We had wealth on the one hand and poverty on the other. In spite of the fact that we have somewhat changed our fiscal policy, prosperity has not returned to us.

While hon. members in this corner of the house welcomed some of the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, we must say that up to the present time the actions of the government have not given us very much encouragement; they have not held out any hope of dealing effectively with the problem of unemployment. So far their efforts to adjust the tariff have been more or less a failure, and I sincerely hope the statement made this afternoon by the minister to the effect that we should study these social questions is not addressed to hon. members in this corner of the house but to his colleagues in the cabinet. I trust he is asking them to deal with these fundamental problems.

The minister referred to the crushing burden of our national debt. May I point out that in 1914 the interest charges on that debt amounted to 8·5 per cent of the national revenue? In 1932, according to the figures submitted by the Minister of Finance, the interest on our national debt has increased to $135,000,000 per year—in other words, from 8·5 per cent to 35·6 per cent of the national revenue. It is this crushing burden which is preventing our return to more normal times. One way to bring about the conditions the minister desires is to tackle that problem and see that our interest charges are restored to the position of 1914.

The ACTING SPEAKER: (Mr. Cowan, Port Arthur): The hon. member's time has elapsed.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, in this debate I propose to base my remarks on the fact that in its budget for 1932 the government has maintained intact the tariff enactments of the budgets of the short session of 1930 and the regular session of 1931. During the recess, to ascertain the extent of stimulation in industry brought about as a result of tariff enactments, I made a survey of employment in industry in many Canadian centres and in several of the neighbouring states, in the latter to derive firsthand information concerning the effects if any, of the Bennett tariff on American industry. It is my purpose to submit data showing that in spite of worldwide economic dislocation, employment in Canada, although below normal, is better than it would have been had it not been for the tariff enactments of this government. Four of the major objectives sought to be attained by budget legislation with respect to the stimulation of employment in industry are, first, more jobs for Canadian workers; second, greater purchasing power; third, contentment; fourth, increasing to the greatest possible extent towards 100 per cent the Canadian content, both material and labour, in goods manufactured in Canadian factories by Canadians for Canadians.

In spite of the present worldwide economic dislocation the government has achieved something worth while towards the realization of each of these objectives. The Toronto Industrial Commission has issued a circular stating that since August, 1930, some sixty-seven new industries, mostly small, have been started in the Toronto district, and Industrial Canada and the Bureau of Statistics give the names of fifty-two other companies, mostly small but a few are large, that have been started throughout the country. I know most of these industries are small, and consequently the pay-roll is not heavy; on the other hand the increased employment in the aggregate is considerable. The large majority of these new industries have come from the United States; a few of the largest are of British origin. But, large or small, the figures pertaining to these new organizations are in my humble opinion worth consideration, and I have carefully tabulated them. These new industries occupy a floor space of 4,095,000 square feet; the capital invested in them amounts to $34,125,000; the Canadian content of material and labour—mostly labour—is sixty-seven per cent; the number of employees, 8,950. Anyone acquainted with industry knows that for every man or woman engaged in any manufacturing plant another employee is engaged outside providing the raw material and the one thousand and one articles that enter that industry through the receiving office. So in addition to the 8,950 men engaged in these 119 new factory branches, it may be taken for granted that another 8,950 workers are engaged outside. But as many of these new plants are branches of United States concerns, I will place the additional number engaged outside at 50 per cent or 4,475, so as to be well within the mark. I submit that that is something to be proud of.

In addition to that a further considerable amount of employment has been provided existing Canadian factories producing goods for the Canadian customers of United States companies, goods that now cannot be shipped in here owing to the tariff regulations made by this government. Thereby employment is provided in Canada for Canadian workmen that otherwise would be provided for the workmen of the United States. Let me give a number of instances of individual plants. The John T. Hepburn Company, Toronto, has invested many thousands of dollars in equipment for the manufacture of goods hitherto made by American firms. The president told me that twenty-five per cent of their men are now engaged in making goods for Canadians that were formerly made in foreign plants by foreign workmen. The Gray Forgings and Tool Company is another concern that has invested many thousands of dollars in machinery to turn out a complete line of tools for motor cars, and to-day they are making a set of forged wrenches that hitherto were not made in this country, but were imported from Massachusetts and Connecticut. Those two plants are located in the riding which I have the honour to represent. Then I might cite the Canadian General Electric Company—a very large concern—the Gold Medal Furniture Company, the Easy Washing Machine Company, the Canadian National Carbon Company, the Patons & Baldwin Textile Company, the Hamilton Gear and Machine Company; all these companies are manufacturing goods not hitherto made in Canada, and which would still continue to be made in foreign plants were it not for the tariff regulations enacted by the government in 1930 and 1931. The Corman Engineering Company, Toronto, one of several small companies, make a long line of repair parts for foreign machines, parts that formerly we had to import. This company during the last nine months have had twenty-two machinists working full time, and on three days of the week they run two shifts. In addition to repair parts they make a variety of new equipment not hitherto manufactured in Canada, and which but for the present tariff regulations would now be imported to the disadvantage of Canadian labour. The management of the company told me that fifty per cent of their employees are now engaged in making equipment that otherwise would be made across the line. In addition there are twenty-two men outside the company engaged in making the brass and iron castings and the long line of equipment used by the company.

In south Toronto there is a large boiler and engine works, and in east Toronto there is a large link belt factory; I refer to only these two of the many in Toronto which I could mention. Both these companies are making asphalt plants. I will not discuss that item further at the moment because I will come back to it later in connection with another firm. The manager of the boiler and engine factory told me recently that sixty per cent of the men engaged in that industry are making equipment which, but for the tariff enacted by this government, would be made by foreign workmen in foreign plants and shipped to this country.

Now let us go outside Toronto, to one or two other industrial centres. In the city of Brantford there is another large boiler and engine works, which also makes large asphalt plants for a company in Milwaukee. These plants are very large and are worth approximately $30,000 each, while the labour content built into each one is the equivalent of three thousand man-days. I am told that five of these machines have been made in Canada already. In other words, as a result of the tariff enacted by this government, in those five machines alone fifteen thousand man-days have been gained to labour in Canada.

In Dundas I visited a very large plant of which every Canadian might well be proud, and just here I might say that in discussing these matters with the heads of these different companies the talk was about employment and entirely non-political; I did not want politics to be dragged into my discussions with those gentlemen. The plant to which I refer is one of the largest, if not the largest, of its kind on the north half of this continent, and there I found Canadian workmen making four lines of large machinery for mines, oil wells and so on. To give hon. members some conception of the size of one of those machines, the day I visited the plant the machinists of the company were lathing a forging made in Welland, Ontario, the largest ever made in Canada. It was a shaft for a hoist, and the finished article weighed seventeen tons. Fancy the size of the completed hoist for which the shaft was made; I may tell the house that it weighs 135 tons and will lift 12,000 pounds from the bottom of a mine 4,000 feet deep. That equipment is a credit to Canadian management, Canadian workmen and Canadian industry, and it demonstrates what Canadian industry can do when it is given a chance. Those four lines of equipment are giving employment to many men who otherwise would not be employed; thousands of man-days enter into the construction of each machine.

Now for a short time I will pass from individual factories to groups of factories, and I will commence with the washing machine industry. The tariff enacted in the spring of 1930 by the previous government reduced the duty on washing machine parts to 10 per cent, and made the whole industry in Canada merely an assembling proposition. The present government raised the duty to 35 per cent and the result has been romantic, if one may use that word in speaking of business. What has been the result? Thirty thousand tubs, the clothes part of the washing machine, either of nickel plated copper or enamelled steel, which formerly came from Warren, Ohio, are now made in London, Ontario; twenty thousand clothes wringers formerly made in Erie, Pennsylvania, and Woonsocket, Rhode Island, are now made by Canadians at St. Mary's, at Hamilton, at Toronto, at Farnham and other Canadian centres. Thirty thousand gear sets and twenty or thirty odd lines that enter into the construction of washing machines are now made in Canadian plants by Canadians, providing 250 new jobs, where formerly they were made in foreign lands by foreign workmen. I say, Mr. Speaker, that is something of which any government can be proud.

Take the printing industry. I have here a list of forty-seven United States magazines now being printed in Canada, and what has been the result? The printing plants of Canada to-day use from 175 to 200 tons of Canadian paper monthly to print these magazines, and that paper is worth from $12,000 to $15,000 a month. The postage and express in connection with the mailing of these magazines is estimated at another $5,000 a month. The ink used is worth $1,700 a month, and better still 175 new jobs were provided for Canadians in the printing industry, and those 175 Canadians receive $25,000 a month. The publishers tell me that the whole new business adds to the national wealth of Canada about $1,000,000 a year. I say that is something worth while, and something of which we should be proud.

Now take the electrical line, covering a great number of plants. During the last two years electrical plants in Canada have invested $2,000,000 in order to equip themselves for the manufacture of a long line of material formerly imported. In Canada we now make motors ranging in size from one as big as a ten cent piece, such as operates yonder clock, to one of 54,000 kilowatts or 75,000 horse power. Large sums of money have been invested in equipment necessary to manufacture several new series of motors such as used in house appliances, washing machines, vacuum cleaners and so on, hitherto made in the United states. A complete line of switches is now made here, ranging in size from the small wall push button to the great circuit breakers that automatically cut out a current of 75,000 horse power, or any one of half a dozen generators of 75,000 horse power. Canadian emplayers and Canadian workmen have demonstrated that given the chance they can turn out finished articles to equal anything made anywhere in the world. To-day the electrical business in Montreal, in Toronto, in Peterborough, in Hamilton, in Brantford, in St. Catharines and in other places is employing 750 men who, if it were not for the tariff regulations enacted by this government since coming into office, would be unemployed.

Now I pass to the steel industry, the steel manufacturers and the steel workers, because you cannot separate one from the other. What is good for the industry is good for the employee, and what is good for the employee is good for the industry. The steel industry has benefited very materially by the tariff enactments of this government. In Hamilton a new school of commerce building is being erected. When I saw it, it was half up, and in the framework of that building 970 tons of steel are being used. Thanks to the patriotic fervour—for in my humble opinion it is nothing less—of the Hamilton board of education, the architects, the engineers, the steel manufacturers and steel fabricators, every ton of that 970 tons being used in the High School of Commerce is being made in Canada by Canadians, and had it not been for the tariff enactments of this government, perhaps not a ton of Canadian steel would have been used therein. A new hydro electric building is being erected in Toronto, and 1,000 tons of steel to be used in that building are to be made in Canada by Canadians. A viaduct is being erected in the city of Sarnia, and in that construction there will be 300 tons of steel made in Canada by Canadians. These three jobs have given the Canadian steelworkers 25,000 extra man days which they might not have had had it not been for the tariff enactments of this government.

The making of steel is one line which adds to the national wealth and which benefits labour to a very marked degree, because about eighty per cent of a ton of steel represents labour. We are now making steel ingots in Canada, from which steel plate is made, representing from eighty to ninety-five per cent Canadian content. Plates, from a quarter of an inch thick and up to 78 inches wide, are made from ingots of ninety-five per cent Canadian content. In other words, for every hundred dollars' worth of these steel ingots used in the making of plates ninety-five dollars are added to the national wealth, because the money which is paid out is circulated in and remains in Canada. On the other hand, when we send fifty dollars out of Canada to bring in steel plate, nothing is added to the national wealth. I am quite aware, of course, that in addition to that fifty dollars sent out of Canada to bring steel in, there is an additional fifty dollars spent in Canada to finish the product; but that fifty dollars spent on labour in Canada merely offsets the fifty dollars sent out, so that in reality nothing is added to the national wealth.

There are a number of steel buildings projected at the present time, and my sincere hope is that public bodies having control of these projects, whether church boards or school boards or other boards, and architects and engineers, observing the great benefit that accrues to the country from the use of steel made by Canadians, will specify flat that the steel to be used in the structures under their control shall be if at all possible made in Canada. In Canada riveted steel girders and uprights are made out of plate and channel iron and angle iron. I am quite aware that in the United States they use H-beams and I-beams, but they did not begin the use of these beams there until they had passed the one hundred million mark in population. We Canadians have to look out for ourselves. There are only ten millions of us, and, in my humble opinion, sound tariff legislation that encourages the manufacture of steel plate, angles and girders in Canada, goes a long way towards increasing the national wealth.

My time is going, and forty minutes is hardly long enough to tell even one-fourth of the achievements of this government towards providing employment since it came into office. I have surveyed the textile and leather industries, both of which are running from 90 to 100 per cent, but I do not propose to discuss either of them except to say this in regard to the textile industry. There are at present engaged in Canada in the textile factories 109,575 operators, and the authorities in the textile industry inform me that were it not for the tariff legislation of this government in connection with textiles, one-third less would be employed therein. In other words, this government, as the result of tariff enactments in favour of Canadian employment, in the textile industry, deserves direct credit in that one industry alone for the present employment of over 36,000 operators. Will anyone say that the employment of 36,000 operators is nothing? I do not for a moment try to argue that business is as good as we should like to have it; it is not. I do not think that conditions are as good as we would like, but they are a lot better than they would have been had it not been for the tariff enactments of this government.

The March issue of Industrial Canada gives a list of some 628 new lines of material manufactured in this country since this government came into power. I am well aware that a great number of these are very small items, but added together they make an aggregate which is commendable. The government deserves credit for encouraging the manufacture of new lines, and in the total employment in this country, according to our own Bureau of Statistics, there are about 900,000 or more engaged in industry at the present time either wholly or part time. I thought I would make a survey to ascertain the value of part time employment, and I obtained the figures from 125 cross-Canada firms all nationally known. Of the 125, sixty-nine replied to my questionnaire, and of that 69, nineteen had no part time employees. I gave them two dates, asking for part time employment on March 1, 1931, and part time employment on May 15, 1931, because I wanted to make a comparison with a similar survey made in Washington, to which I shall allude in a moment. In Canada on March 1, 1931, the part time employment in the balance of these Canadian industries was 30.18 per cent and on May 15 of the same year it was 30.54—very little change. The part time results in the United States were by no means equal to that. In Washington a circular letter was sent out to 750 cross-country United States firms of which 250 replied, and the part time employment in the United States on March 1, 1931, was 33.5 and on May 15, 1931, 40 per cent. That clearly shows the superiority of Canada and bears out the statement we so often read and hear that conditions are better in this country.

Someone asked some days ago about the number of plants in Canada that had closed since this government came into power. The July, 1931, issue of Industrial Canada contains the advertisements of 340 cross-Canada concerns, and I am very happy to say that as far as I can ascertain everyone of those firms is to-day doing business in Canada. That speaks volumes for the integrity and business ability of Canadian managers and speaks well for the workmen in the plants.

During the course of this debate someone has suggested that nothing has been offered for the improvement of conditions in Canada. I suggest to the government that practical and technical cost accountants, men conversant with industry be delegated to survey the imports coming into this country. After they have compiled their statistics and presented them to the government, it could then determine what could be economically manufactured in this country with a view to increasing employment and at the same time preventing the exploitation of the consumer. It is not a difficult matter for any government to prevent the exploitation of the consumer. If industry were treated scientifically and considered with a view to the natural resources of a district, its topography and geology, its climatic conditions, its proximity to water or other transportation facilities for the handling of raw and finished products, and its proximity to markets, power and labour supply, I am firmly convinced that millions of dollars could be invested in this country in the erection of new plants to provide increased employment.

It is the duty of the government in power to create employment if possible. The investment of capital, the extension of existing industries and the building up of new industries creates more and more jobs. Considering the economic dislocation and the distress which exists in the world to-day, the government of this country has done a great deal to provide employment for Canadians. I know of no better way to provide employment than by the erection and operation of factories. Having been associated so long with the business life of this country, I know full well that men working in industry and receiving fair wages are contented and happy. There is no other way to encourage the erection of factories and the investment of capital than by adequate tariff regulations. I take this opportunity to congratulate the government for maintaining in the budget of 1932 the tariff regulations adopted in the budgets of 1930 and 1931 which resulted in so many additional man-days' employment.

During the years 1926, 1927, 1928 and 1929 this country imported $40,000,000 worth of steel plate and structural steel—I do not refer to rolled steel—and had one-half of this been manufactured in Canada by Canadian steel makers it would have given them an additional 3,600,000 man-days' employment. I suggest to the government: maintain the fiscal policy adopted in 1930-31 and proceed along similar lines with future budgets. The result will be most beneficial to employment in this country.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, if it is agreeable, I ask that it be called eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 12, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, may I draw the attention of this house to what I conceive to be a breach of its privileges and refer for a moment to an article which appeared on Wednesday last, April 6, in L'Illustration, a Conservative, French Montreal daily.

In order to be fair to the minister concerned, I notified him by letter on Thursday, April 7, that unless a satisfactory retraction was published on Saturday last I would bring it up on the following Monday—yesterday—as a matter of privilege. As my letter is still unanswered, as no retraction appeared on Saturday, yesterday, nor to-day, and as that paper is mailed to my colleagues, English-speaking as well as French-speaking, I will read a translation in order that my correction may be understood by all. The first four paragraphs are a preamble to the lies which abound in the latter; therefore I should deal with it not only paragraph after paragraph, but line after line, and almost word after word. This is what was printed after I had said "all was over":

> Mr. Pouliot and Slander
> Shall we believe that Pouliot, the Liberal member for Temiscouata, has at last realized that he often goes too far in his daily outbursts in the house.
>
> During the sitting of yesterday, when Mr. Gordon, Minister of Labour, was submitting his estimates, Mr. Pouliot attacked him in the most injurious way.
>
> Mr. Pouliot accused the minister of lack of tact, of being an ignoramus, of not answering intelligently to question, etc.
> But as soon as Mr. Pouliot resumed his seat he realized that he had gone too far and that he had behaved rudely.

Shortly afterwards he invited the Hon. Mr. Gordon to his office, asked for the stenographic copy of Hansard and made all corrections demanded by the minister.

The facts are as follows: The minister was gracious enough to come to my office without receiving any invitation from me. He did not demand any correction whatsoever; he simply requested me to strike two lines off Hansard, and I did not hesitate to comply with his request. What I said was not ruled out of order, but having agreed to strike it off I will not repeat it. The article continues:

> Mr. Pouliot went afterwards to the press gallery beseeching the correspondents of the papers to soften his utterances in order that they should be decent, at least in the press.

I have been to the press gallery, true; but I have not besought any one to soften my utterances; I thought it fair to notify the members of the press gallery that I had agreed with the minister's request to strike those two lines off Hansard. That was the only thing I told them about it. The article concludes:

> One cannot crawl more cowardly after having played the braggart.

It is to be hoped that in the future Mr. Pouliot will not be obliged to apologize so pitifully when he speaks in the House of Commons.

I did not crawl because I never put myself in a position to crawl, and I did not apologize because I had no reason to apologize.

This is the second time that the same individual has published a slanderous libel against me; the first one was a circular sent six years ago to the Tory organization in my county. As it was not distributed, I did not pay any attention to it. This time I have settled the matter with him by telling him personally what I think of him. Should he offend a third time, I would not say that there would be murder because that would not be parliamentary, but there will surely be a K.O. that will be O.K. In accordance with Roosevelt's advice, we shall go to it with a soft voice and a big stick.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 41, to amend the Bankruptcy Act, have the honour to present the following as their first report:

Your committee recommend that they be given leave to print from day to day as required the minutes of proceedings and evidence taken, and also such papers and documents as may be directed by the committee to be printed for the use of the committee and members of the house; and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Your committee also recommend that they be given leave to sit while the house is in session.

Mr. HACKETT moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF HON. GEORGE B. JONES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the resignation of Hon. George B. Jones, member for the electoral district of Royal.

This is accompanied by the following letter:

Ottawa, April 12, 1932.

Dear Sir:

I am the principal partner in the firm of Jones Brothers, carrying on a general store business at Apohaqui, New Brunswick. The store is not operated by me personally.

For some time past, the Indian medical director has been in the habit of giving to needy Indians residing near Apohaqui orders for merchandise which have been filled by the firm of Jones Brothers.

Yesterday afternoon, I learned, for the first time, that in the House of Commons Act there is a provision against goods, wares, and merchandise being sold to any department of the public service by an unincorporated firm of which a member of parliament is the proprietor, in whole or part, and that if goods are sold by such a firm, the interested member of parliament thereby vacates his seat.

I therefore find myself in a position where I have vacated my seat in parliament. I enclose herewith my resignation as member of the House of Commons of Canada for the electoral district of Royal in the province of New Brunswick.

I need hardly say how deeply I regret that my lack of knowledge of the provisions of the law relating to the House of Commons has placed me in the unfortunate position where I am compelled to resign my seat in parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

George B. Jones.

His Honour,
The Hon. George Black, K.C., M.P., Speaker,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay upon the table of the house orders in council passed pursuant to the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, numbers 789, 793, 794, 795, 796, 810, 811 and 812, all relating to the payments of money under the statute.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 44, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, the first two clauses of the proposed bill deal with the scope or functions of the Board of Railway Commissioners and are recommendations made in the report of the royal commission on maritime claims, commonly called the Duncan report of 1926.

In numerous appeals which have been made to the Board of Railway Commissioners for a reduction of freight rates, they have been met by argument on behalf of the railway companies, that due to physical and other conditions it was very necessary for the railway companies to have tariffs or rates greater in some sections than in other sections. The Board of Railway Commissioners have, I believe, made it clear that there is no authority in the act to allow them to render decisions on broader lines such as to develop business. Section 320 of the Railway Act provides:

In deciding whether a lower toll, or difference in treatment, does or does not amount to an undue preference or an unjust discrimination, the board may consider whether such lower toll, or difference in treatment, is necessary for the purpose of securing, in the interests of the public, the traffic in respect of which it is made, and whether such object cannot be attained without unduly reducing the higher tolls.

I have suggested the following amendment to section 320, subsection 1:

In deciding whether a lower toll, or difference in treatment, does or does not amount to an undue preference or an unjust discrimination, the board may consider whether such lower toll, or difference in treatment, is necessary for the purpose of securing in the national interest, both producing and consuming, the traffic in respect of which it is made, and whether such object can be obtained without unduly reducing the higher tolls.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the change suggested is the deletion of the words "in the interest of the public" and the substitution of the words "national interest, both producing and consuming." My argument can be better summed up by reading from the report of the Duncan commission, at page 24:

In addition, the cases which the maritime provinces have already submitted to the railway commission also raise the question of handicaps arising from the geographical position of their natural products, and their distance generally from central markets. If we were satisfied that under their present power the railway commission could adequately deal, on appeal, with the broader aspect of the maritime cases before them, we would make no further comment. Previous judgments of the railway board, however, lead us to fear that they will not feel competent to deal with such broad considerations as are still involved in these maritime claims.

Then the report cites three cases, of which the first is the application of the district board of trade of Coalhurst. In their judgment in that case the board said:

The board under the Railway Act has no profit and loss responsibility, and its intervention in the matter of rates must, as has been indicated, be concerned with matters falling within the categories of reasonableness and unjust discrimination, and not with a policy of the development of industries through rate adjustments.

The second case referred to is that of the Imperial Rice Milling Company vs. the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, in which the board say:

The board has no power to regulate tolls, for the purpose of equalizing cost of production, or geographical, or climatic, or economic conditions.

The third case is that of the British Columbia News Company vs. Express Traffic Association, in which the board say:

It is not the board's function, as delegated by parliament, to make rates to develop business, but to deal with the reasonableness of rates, either on complaint or of its own motion. . . . As it has not been established that the rates as charged are unreasonable the board is not justified in ordering the installation of the experimental rates asked for.

The Duncan report proceeds:

The conclusion to be drawn from these extracts seems to us to be that the railway commission does not feel itself empowered to pass under its review, when appeals are made to it, the same wide range of business considerations which railway companies themselves can take into account in forming a judgment as to the extent to which they should develop trade and business.

I will pass over some of the comments I had intended to make, in order to condense my argument. The Duncan report further states:

At present the work of the railway commission is circumscribed within the two considerations, viz:—

(a) Reasonable compensation to the carrying company, and

(b) No unfair preference or unjust discrimination as between traders.

Section 320 of the Railway Act seems to give the wider powers that we have in mind to the railway commission, so far as the question of undue preference or unjust discrimination may be involved.

Mr. SPEAKER: Surely it is not necessary for the hon. member to read that whole report in explaining his bill. Usually these explanations are very brief.

Mr. REID: I feel it is necessary to give this finding of the Duncan commission in support of the proposals I have included in the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to shorten his remarks as much as possible. I did not understand that the introduction of the bill was a controversial matter.

Mr. REID: My argument will not take very long, Mr. Speaker. I quote again from the Duncan report:

. . . we feel that, if the intention was to have larger national interests in mind, the section should be made clearer, and instead of the words "in the interests of the public" (which might be interpreted as in the interests of the "consuming" public) the words should clearly state that it is national interests (both "producing" and "consuming") that are in mind. If this was not the original intention of the section, we suggest it is the intention which should now be imported into it. We feel further that a similar extension of authority should be imparted to the railway board in regard to the question of reasonable compensation. It would then be competent for the railway board to make a survey of just the very character that the president of the Canadian National Railways testified as being part of his function (as the business head of a railway); and if from public policy they felt that an experimental rate should be conceded, they should be free to constitute the rate, even although it might not, at the time, or of itself, give reasonable compensation to the railway company.

That has to do with the first and second changes proposed in the bill. The third and last change proposed is in regard to the rates on grain and flour moving west. It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that in 1925 a bill was introduced to amend the Railway Act of 1919, and that bill included amendments touching the Crowsnest pass agreement. It is hardly necessary for me to recite the history of that agreement, which has often and ably been presented in this house by many hon. members. From what I can gather, however, the reason given in 1925 for introducing further legislation in connection with the Crowsnest pass agreement was that a supreme court decision had been rendered confirming the stand, taken by the Canadian Pacific Railway, that when the agreement was first entered into in 1897 the territory covered included only those points that were in existence at the time the agreement was made. This judgment brought about a somewhat chaotic state of affairs as far as freight rates were concerned, because of the fact that adjacent towns were obliged to pay the higher regular rates.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. REID: I think it is necessary to give this explanation, Mr. Speaker, so that the house may have a clear conception of the purposes of the bill. At that time it was argued that three courses were open to the government in regard to the Crowsnest agreement. It could have been left as it was, in accordance with the judgment of the supreme court; it could have been entirely done away with, or the third course, that followed by the government, could have been and was adopted. It is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, to suggest what might have been done; the fact remains that the Crowsnest pass agreement was altered and changed. By that change the prairie provinces gained something—though they lost something as well—in having the Crowsnest pass rates on grain and flour fixed to all points east, while it was also contended that the railways gained something by the removal of the Crowsnest rates on certain commodities.

Mr. SPEAKER: Cannot the hon. member continue his remarks on the second reading of the bill? These motions are not usually debated at such length.

Mr. REID: Some hon. member asked for an explanation of the bill. The change suggested is to give the same rates by law to British Columbia as those given to the east.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROCEDURE IN NOTIFICATION OF VACANCY IN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in discussing the vacancy which exists in the representation of the constituency of Maisonneuve a question was raised as to the proper procedure in the matter of notifying the Speaker of any such vacancy. The Prime Minister took the view that it was an obligation on the party to which the member had belonged to notify the Speaker that a vacancy existed. I stated that I did not hold that view at all, that I thought it was the duty of the government to see that vacancies were filled and to see that the Speaker was notified accordingly. The Prime Minister then said:

> . . . I challenge the right hon. gentleman to name any case in which notice has not been given by the opposition with respect to vacancies existing in constituencies formerly represented by members of their party. That always has been done; it has become a sort of custom.

I replied, speaking at the time without reference to the Journals of the House:

> In answer to that challenge I may say that I remember many occasions during the time I was Prime Minister, having vacancies in constituencies brought to our attention, and where we took action as a government without waiting for the opposition to give the notification.

I have since looked up the Journals of the House and by a hasty glance I have come across the following, which are among the number of cases where the Liberal government of the day notified His Honour the Speaker with regard to vacancies which had arisen in constituencies which were represented in this house by Conservative members. From the Votes and Proceedings of January 31, 1923, it will be found that the notification with respect to the death of the Hon. John A. Stewart, a member of the Conservative party for the constituency of Lanark, was made to His Honour the Speaker by the Hon. George P. Graham and the Hon. D. D. McKenzie, both members of the Liberal administration of the day. In the Votes and Proceedings of February 5, 1925, it will be observed that the notification of the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. John A. MacKelvie, Conservative member for the constituency of Yale, was made to His Honour the Speaker by the Hon. Ernest Lapointe and the Hon. James Murdock, both members of the Liberal administration of the day. In the Votes and Proceedings of January 26, 1928, it will be seen that the notification of the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. James K. Flemming, Conservative member for the constituency of Victoria-Carleton, was made to His Honour the Speaker by the Hon. P. J. Veniot and the Hon. Fernand Rinfret, both members of the Liberal government of the day. In the Votes and Proceedings of June 5, 1929, it will be seen that the notification of the vacancy created by the death of Dr. R. F. Preston, Conservative member for the constituency of Lanark, was made to His Honour the Speaker by the Hon. J. C. Elliott and the Hon. W. D. Euler, both members of the Liberal administration of the day; and in the Votes and Proceedings of the same day there is record of the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. Dr. J. W. Edwards, Conservative member for the constituency of Frontenac-Addington, and the record shows that His Honour the Speaker was notified of the vacancy by the Hon. J. C. Elliott and the Hon. W. D. Euler, both members of the Liberal administration of the day.

A little earlier, in the course of his remarks, the Prime Minister said that in the case of Athabaska the notice required by law had been given by two members of parliament. Undoubtedly, my right hon. friend was aware of who the members of parliament were who had given notice in regard to the constituency of Athabaska.

I have in my hand the Votes and Proceedings of Thursday, February 4, 1932, and I find the following communication there recorded:

Electoral District of Athabaska

Dominion of Canada }
To wit } House of Commons.

To the Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons:

We, the undersigned, hereby give notice that a vacancy hath occurred in the representation in the House of Commons, for the electoral district of Athabaska, in the province of Alberta, consequent upon the death of the sitting member therefor, John Francis Buckley, Esquire.

Given under our hands and seals, at the city of Ottawa, this 21st day of January, 1932.

George H. Perley (L.S.),
Member for the electoral district of Argenteuil.

R. Weir (L.S.),
Member for the electoral district of Melfort.

Both hon. gentlemen who signed that notification are members of the Conservative administration of which the Prime Minister is head. I find, also, looking over the records, that not only was notification sent to His Honour the Speaker by members of the administration with regard to that particular vacancy, but that notification of all vacancies which have occurred since the present government has taken office, with the exception of the one mentioned the other day, in the constituency of Maisonneuve, has been made by members of the administration of my right hon. friend. In the electoral district of Three Rivers-St. Maurice, where a Liberal member had formerly occupied the seat, notification with respect to the vacancy appears in the Votes and Proceedings of March 12, 1931, and is as follows:

Electoral District of Three Rivers-St. Maurice

Dominion of Canada }
To wit } House of Commons.

To the Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons:

We, the undersigned, hereby give notice that a vacancy hath occurred in the representation in the House of Commons, for the electoral district of Three Rivers-St. Maurice, in the province of Quebec, by reason of the death of Arthur Bettez, the sitting member therefor.

Given under our hands and seals, at the city of Ottawa, this 10th day of March, 1931.

Arthur Sauvé (L.S.),
Member for the electoral district of Laval-Two Mountains.

Maurice Dupré (L.S.),
Member for the electoral district of Quebec West.

Again, both hon. gentlemen who signed this notification are members of the administration of which the Prime Minister is head. Also, with respect to Hamilton East, notification was made by the Hon. Hugh Guthrie and the Hon. R. J. Manion, both members of the administration.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I should again direct your attention and the attention of the house to the statement which the Prime Minister made in refutation of what I said at the time. The statement was to the effect that in all cases vacancies existing in constituencies formerly represented by members of the Liberal party had been made by members of this party. He added:

That always has been done; it has become a sort of custom.

As a matter of fact, it has never been done as a custom. The Prime Minister, in making that statement, was misleading the house, and I say that he was misleading the house deliberately.

Mr. MANION: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that so?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The concluding sentence uttered by my right hon. friend was distinctly against the rules and order of this house—flagrantly so. I ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. BENNETT: He has got away with it so long he thinks he can continue.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) will agree that he should not accuse the Prime Minister or any other hon. member of deliberately deceiving the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am using language with respect to the Prime Minister which he repeatedly uses with respect to members on this side.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Prime Minister did not know he ought to have known, and there is every reason to believe that he did know, because he referred to Athabaska in citing his instances.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say that the statement made by the Prime Minister was not a correct statement; it was not an accurate statement. He ought to have known it was not an accurate statement, and he should not have made the assertion he did unless he was prepared to prove the statement he made.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: All that the right hon. the leader of the opposition has now said is parliamentary. I object, however, to his saying that the Prime Minister or any other member has deliberately deceived the house. The right hon. gentleman knows as well as any other hon. member does that that is not parliamentary, and I must ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the Prime Minister uses the expression—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let him speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: Even though the Prime Minister may on any occasion have used such language, it would be none the less unparliamentary, although I cannot recall his having done so. At any rate, that would not establish a precedent.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the Prime Minister uses the words, "That always has been done; it has become a sort of custom", he is speaking deliberately, and I say that in making the statement he did make, he was making a statement which is to be regarded as a deliberate statement. I say that the Prime Minister must have known or ought to have known that it was not correct at the time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is not whether or not it was a deliberate statement: that is perfectly parliamentary. Either the Prime Minister or any other hon. member may be mistaken in making a deliberate statement. But to say that the right hon. gentleman makes a statement deliberately to deceive the house is unparliamentary, and again I ask the right hon. the leader of the opposition to withdraw that accusation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, it was a deliberate statement calculated to mislead the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If you prefer me to say that it was a deliberate statement, well and good.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish the right hon. gentleman would not quibble. He must either withdraw or refuse to withdraw the language he has used. He is too good a parliamentarian not to know that the statement he has made is not parliamentary. The statement was that there was a deliberate intention to deceive the house. It is unparliamentary in character and in the interests of parliamentary procedure and good order in the house I ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not use the statement "to deceive the house," I said, "to mislead the house." However, if Your Honour rules that any particular words have been unparliamentary, so far as those words are concerned I am quite prepared to bow to your ruling. That is all I have to say.

STAMP COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, may I refer to a question answered yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) with regard to the Stamp Commission. His answer reads:

In answer to the second question, no sum was paid for fees to any of the commissioners, but for expenses Sir Josiah Stamp received $2,120.57; Chief Justice Brown, $1,198.16; Mr. W. S. Evans, $1,101.73. Sir Josiah Stamp declined to accept any fee for his services, and, as has been intimated, a piece of plate was presented to him. Chief Justice Brown expects to be paid some small honorarium for his services, an appropriation for which will be included in the supplementary estimates, no amount having been determined.

I should like to inquire of the Prime Minister if Mr. W. S. Evans, one of the commissioners, is to receive any fees for his services, and I should like to know also when we may expect to know the amount which Mr. Sweatman is to receive for his services in connection with the commission.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): So far as I know, no fees are payable to Mr. Evans. I fancy the account of Mr. Sweatman will be paid at a not distant date but I am not now in position to say exactly when.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: This is the first instance I have known of a lawyer delaying to render his bill.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

APPLICATION OF TEN PER CENT DEDUCTION TO POSTMASTERS PAID BY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have an inquiry to make of the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauve), but as he is not in his place, possibly the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) can give me the information I desire. If not, my question can stand as a notice to be answered to-morrow. I have received a letter from the postmaster at Plato, which is in my constituency. This man is paid on a commission basis and because of abnormal conditions the revenue of his post office has decreased over 16 per cent while his own revenue has decreased over 12 per cent. He understands that he will be subject to the ten per cent reduction in addition to the decrease in revenue. My question is: Are postmasters paid on a commission basis to be subject to the ten per cent reduction as provided in Bill 19 and, if so, will special consideration be given to those who have already received a drastic cut in their revenues?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Unfortunately, I did not hear the first portion of the hon. member's question but I will look it up in Hansard and give him an answer to-morrow.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he will be prepared to make a statement on Beauharnois?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Just as soon as I am possessed of sufficient information to enable me to do so. I have not the required information and there have been delays in obtaining it over which I have no control.

Mr. BOURASSA: Is there anything left?

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the valley of humiliation is still left.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We would be content with a partial statement.

Mr. BENNETT: That is just what I do not want to make.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not understand my right hon. friend's position; of course, he can refuse to make a statement, but this is of great importance to some hon. members. I should like to have an answer to the question I asked three weeks ago as to what amount had been guaranteed for advances to the Beauharnois company.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, April 11, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of way and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, my first word also will be one of congratulation to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) on the very excellent and handsome manner in which he delivered his first budget to this house. Of course, this is said without prejudice to anything further I may say in connection with the substance matter thereof. I think it is all right also to extend congratulations to my colleague, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) for I am sure that all hon. members in this house believe he delivered a very excellent and even brilliant speech. I think he made it very difficult for the hon. gentleman who followed him to do full justice to the share he took in the debate. The other two hon. gentlemen who spoke were too remote from where I sit to be heard distinctly, but from what I did hear, they were both quite all right from their respective viewpoints.

Before I go on with my own little story regarding the budget, I should like to refer to two or three outstanding points raised by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). He has fallen into the error into which so many others have fallen of assuming that at one time the policy of the Liberal party had been in favour of free trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just a minute; hon. members will not have much at which to laugh in a little while.

The hon. minister took the ground that the hon. member for Yarmouth was very ready to theorize about free trade but he had never risked his reputation or risked a political fight on that issue. I did not look up Hansard to get the exact words of the hon. minister but they were to that effect. Is his memory so short that he has forgotten the reciprocity fight, the biggest measure of free trade ever offered by any party or any government since confederation? That measure embodied free trade with the United States in all natural products. We risked our political lives on that issue, and we went down to defeat.

The hon. minister does not need to go back that far for another such example. What about the elections of 1930? What about the Dunning budget and the measure of free trade which was embodied therein? There were some fifty items which were non-active but the Tory party took the fullest opportunity to belittle the whole of it. I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce speak over the radio during the last election and I never heard anything like it in all my life for gross exaggeration. Take those fifty non-active items out, add fifty more to them and you still have four hundred items which were either free or nearly free from Great Britain. Yet we are challenged that we never risked our political lives for the principle of free trade. While we have never been for absolute free trade as a collective policy of the Liberal party, we have always been for freer trade. That has been indicated not only by our policies but by our practices ever since 1896.

The hon. minister did not seem to like the manner in which the hon. member for Yarmouth criticized the budget. I liked it all right, so that would seem to be just a matter of opinion. The minister said that the criticism was small and caustic and not at all constructive. I think the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth made a very constructive comment when he referred to the fact that an emergency tariff had been brought down by the British government only six weeks ago, in which a decided preference of 10 per cent was given to dominion goods. Canada in this budget should have reciprocated by giving a similar free list to Britain. This is the first time in nearly one hundred years that the British government has provided for such a tariff. This tariff was of considerable proportions, it imposed a ten per cent duty mainly on foreign goods but still left free entry to nearly all Canadian farm products. That was a friendly hand offered prior to the conference which is to take place in this city on July 21, and it might well have been grasped by Canada. She should have replied to Chancellor Chamberlain: Yes, we will accept this preliminary offer embodied in your emergency tariff and reciprocate in kind. As indicated by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, a reasonable number of articles put on the free or near free list, and included in this budget would have been a nice answer to have made to the British government prior to the Ottawa conference. If that and nothing else were done at the coming Ottawa event, at least it would not be the dud of 1930 and the "duckegg" that resulted from the London conference of that year. It would have been a good start and the proper attitude to take; but it was not done. If they want to, however, they can do it yet; in fact, there is an intimation to the effect that they have already started to retract. The Hon. Mr. Price; of the Ontario government, has indicated through the press that something of the sort is to be done regarding the cancellation of certain insurance companies' taxation. The finance minister did not deny this, so I assume that is the first back-up. Why not back up a little further yet and make a free list of, say thirty or forty articles in the British preference schedule. The Hon. Mr. Dunning issued a list of 300 or 400. Why could not this government, I repeat, put thirty or forty articles on a low preferential tariff list in favour of the home government as a quid pro quo. If they are in favour of reciprocity, why do they not reciprocate instead of doing the very opposite, namely, hitting the mother country another swat in the eye by an increase of two per cent on all imported goods from all countries as a sort of preliminary welcome to the conference? Do you notice, Mr. Speaker, the old country papers are very silent on this budget? So far as I can find out, they are as silent as the grave. No wonder. They have been looking for some tariff response on this side, but they never expected to get another tariff or import tax swat like the one they received in 1930 and later on in 1931. So much with respect to those two matters.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke in a disparaging way of high prevailing interest rates. Who is at present the most responsible in this country for interest rates being high? Who is giving such high rates on domestic issues of government bonds? The great borrowing public that have still some credit in the banks find themselves in competition with a high interest rate on government bonds and which they cannot meet or pay. Nevertheless one member of the government, looking in a sympathetic manner towards the Progressive corner as if he were catering to them, moralizes that interest rates generally are too high. The same thing is done with regard to the stabilization of the currency question. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has a very nice delivery; I read his discussion on this subject in Regina and because of the excellence of his speech he nearly mesmerized and captivated the entire city. But when we come to analyze his speech, what is there in it that is practical to-day? How much is it going to help us at this time? It is a fine thing to divert the public attention from the agony and dismal character of the budget. There may be something in it to a limited extent, but how are we to bring about stabilization of currency? The Minister of Trade and Commerce says: It is an international matter. I am glad the government are getting away even this much from that miserable so-called "Canada first" policy, meaning themselves alone and to you-know-where with everybody else. They are getting away from that at least in the matter of stabilization of currency. Apparently we are progressing in regard to bringing up the government. They tell us now that stabilization of currency is an international matter. Well, as I see it, we shall be able to stabilize currency when we can stabilize mass psychology and mass fear, and not until then. I hope all hon. gentlemen heard Sir Josiah Stamp the other day. We should all be prepared to sit at the feet of Sir Josiah and learn something of economics, but I am afraid the Minister of Trade and Commerce was not present on that occasion or did not listen to and digest what was said.

Mr. PORTEOUS: What did he say about trade balances?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think I heard a remark somewhere. Do I spy a stranger in the gallery?

Mr. PORTEOUS: What is that swat?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is like some sepulchral sound one would hear at a funeral. Last Wednesday there certainly was a funeral-like story, but it is over now. I desire to draw the attention of the house, if I may, to some of the remarks made in the speech from the throne. Because of the hopes that were held out in that speech, I think we should have expected to receive a brighter and better budget. Let me read a few extracts from the speech from the throne:

> This period of trial has shown the Canadian situation to be fundamentally sound.

If it is, what are we worrying about?

> Canada still maintains its high place in world commerce.

I am just afraid that statement is not quite correct. My colleague, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, told us that the foreign trade of Canada had been cut nearly in two during the last two or three years, reduced from $2,000,000,000 to nearly $1,000,000,000. Yet this is put into the mouth of His Excellency, notwithstanding that horrible decline. It is easy to satisfy hon. gentlemen who can congratulate themselves on having one-half of the world trade that they used to have.

As regards this last quotation, I know what we would have called it when we used to go to school, but I cannot say it in this house.

> The provisions made at the last session of parliament for unemployment and farm relief are proving effective.

The effective nature of it is that the situation is getting worse; it is effective in that respect; it is becoming progressively worse. I notice members on the other side are disappearing gradually. That last quotation is a real corker. If these statements were all warranted, surely we would have had a different kind of budget; that is the reason why I am drawing attention to them. This is another paragraph in the speech from the throne:

> You are successfully meeting difficult domestic problems.

I think the rank and file of Canadians are, but I do not think the government is.

> Conditions are gradually improving.

I think that is the climax.

I come now to the budget. I shall say this much for it: it is much less objectionable and offensive in some respects than the last one, and more so in others. It will be remembered that I took fairly strong exception to the income tax outrage of last year, and I want to commend the Minister of Finance upon having this year corrected that taxation horror against which the whole country rose up in arms, and properly so. From the Atlantic to the Pacific there were strong protests with respect to the income schedules first proposed last year and then rather ingloriously and reluctantly withdrawn. The withdrawal came about as freely as a cat does when you pull it by the tail, but it came, and that was the main thing. I have before me the income tax schedule of last year as first proposed. All multi-millionaires who had more than $137,000 of taxable income had their tax gradually reduced under that schedule. I can read it if anybody disputes my word. As to the relative badness of the two budgets, relatively this year's budget is very much less bad than the one of last year. We find that last year the reductions that were proposed to be made in income tax or taxable income over $140,000 ran from $163 to $116,000. I am giving this in round figures. Then a great noise was made last session about quoting income tax rates in regard to those who had or might have $1,000,000 of taxable income. Our hon. friends opposite wanted to confuse the issue last year so they rose on their hind legs about it, yet the same income tax schedule is provided for in the budget of this year from zero to $1,000,000.

On an income of one million dollars the tax is $113,730. But assuming that there are none such and that there are some in Canada with a taxable income of half a million dollars, then the difference between last year's initial budget and this year's is that last year the original proposal was to reduce the tax on incomes of half a million dollars by $41,000, and this year the initial proposal is to increase the tax by $51,000, making a difference between the two budgets so far as the tax on an income of half a million dollars is concerned, of $92,000. That is quite a snug sum, and that concerns only one taxpayer with a taxable income of half a million dollars. How ungracious it is for them to return evil for such good on our part! Look at the money we saved the treasury by exposing the horrors of the government's proposal last year, and now in return they are going to cut our indemnities. Why, we saved enough money to the treasury to enable the government to pay our full indemnities right along and still be in pocket. Man's inhumanity to man makes countless M.P.'s mourn. That is what we get for having saved the treasury between three and four million dollars last year. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) does not make the same mistake, however, that his predecessor did. He works on the principle of a graduated tax right along except with regard to one matter. The surtax is not graduated. He is leaving that until next year, to correct, I hope. You could not expect him to swallow it all at once on behalf of his predecessor. He will have to develop his larynx and his esophagus, gradually swallowing a little, until later he will be able to swallow the whole of it. It is simply a matter of adjusting his swallowing capacity, and he is doing pretty well. The Minister of Finance is so absolutely right in graduating the tax on incomes that I wonder if he could not see his way to applying the same principle of graduation to the civil service salary cuts, and if when he rises to reply he will explain just where the difference is which makes graduation inapplicable to the salary cuts I shall be appreciative. Of course, Mr. Dunning and Mr. Robb did not graduate the surtax, but we found the surtax there and we simply tolerated it for three or four years the way it was, and then it was cancelled. In my opinion the surtax should be graduated as well as the salary cuts. But in those days we were apparently not so particular about the niceties of saddling the burden of taxation just where it should fall, because there was relative abundance all around; but to-day we want to see to it that the man who is capable of bearing the taxation burden is given the burden to bear.

Talking of the principle of graduation, why is it not applied to the stamp tax on cheques? This tax has been raised from two to three cents. That is not much. It is inconvenient hunting around for a stamp of another denomination, I think it was a good move on the part of the government to increase that tax, and further I think the tax should have been graduated so that every hundred dollars would pay another three cents stamp tax. Why should the man who writes a cheque for one hundred dollars be taxed as much as the man who writes a cheque for one thousand dollars? I think so long as the tax did not exceed say fifty cents on one cheque, the principle of graduation should be applied just as it is to the income tax. The government of which I had the honour to be a member did have a graduated stamp tax up to one dollar or more, but the Minister of Finance in the working out of that tax found that those Canadians living along the boundary line were sometimes inclined to transfer their accounts to American banks across the line where there was no graduated tax on cheques. I accepted that as a good reason. I would place the tax now somewhere between what we had it then and what the minister is now proposing, and graduate it up to a maximum of fifty cents. If my hon. friend would follow out that principle, he would find that he would get a lot more revenue, and he would at the same time be more consistent in his attitude towards the graduation of taxation generally. I do not know whether it is a coincidence or an intuitive desire to save their own epidermis, Mr. Speaker, but whenever hon. members of the government start a graduated tax they seem to shrink into themselves when the graduation would begin to apply to themselves. To be fair we should now commend the government for adopting this year a graduated income tax. Let them also come across similarly on the stamp tax on cheques and on the salary cut. The principle of graduation is sound in all three cases. If the government will do that, we will have more words of commendation for them. But the government go slowly in that direction when it hits themselves. Big men financially and otherwise should not permit themselves to be put in the wrong in that way. Let not their good be evil spoken of. I do not care who or what the government is, if the members thereof conduct themselves in this manner they must be suspected of what I have indicated. They were last year, and they hopped to it very quickly to correct the blunder, and I hope they will hop to it with equal celerity another year and graduate not only the stamp tax on cheques but also the surtax on incomes.

In addition, the one per cent tax on imports, sometimes miscalled an excise tax, has been increased from one to three per cent and applied to practically all imports with a very few exceptions, such as hospital supplies, Bibles and such like. That tax was imposed last year for the first time, and now it is being applied against all and sundry, against our kinsmen, foreigners and everybody else. The Chamberlain budget in Great Britain, with its preference of ten per cent, has been met by our government increasing this import tax by two hundred per cent. Is not that a wonderful way of preaching one thing and practising the very opposite? See how they graduate that tax, Mr. Speaker. Last year it was only one per cent against British goods, but this year it is three per cent against British goods, and that on the very eve of the Ottawa conference. What will this tax be next year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And that is in addition to the tariff.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. The tariff was not imposed gradually at all, but with ghastly suddenness. At the special session the British people were given not simply a swat in one eye but all over the face by this government jacking up the tariff sky high on many British commodities, followed by a further raise in 1931, and now they are following last year's imposition of a one per cent import tax by an increase this year of two hundred per cent, and applying that tax to all commodities no matter where they come from. How can the government defend such a horrible piece of hypocrisy, preaching intra-empire trade and practising exclusion? Really I have no language with which to describe it adequately. I shall have to get a new vocabulary, Mr. Speaker, to express what I think of it. When the government were in the midst of doing these things here is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said at the special session of 1930. The government put up such a magnificent bluff on that occasion that we all thought that they were going to do something, that they were not going to make blooming asses of themselves. Here is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> But we are going there—

That was to the Imperial conference.

> —also in a spirit of good will.

If I gave my colleague to my right a cuff on the ear, Mr. Speaker, would he call that good will?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Certainly not. But that is what the government call good will. The minister went on to say:

> We are going there prepared to open negotiations with our sister dominions and the mother country for the most friendly cooperation in order to bring about an increase of trade between them and us.

Going to increase good will by putting up a trade barrier and treating our kinsmen in that unfriendly manner! Why, it seems to me that in their heroic endeavour to balance the budget they have succeeded only in unbalancing themselves, because nobody outside of a mental hospital would conduct himself as these hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches are doing with regard to this question.

Having raised the tariff in September, 1930, they gaily took the boat for the old country. Inside eight days after they got there the right hon. Prime Minister made a speech, not to the conference but to the whole world, in which he stated in effect the British government's propositions were not worth a hoot. Then he spent the rest of the time chasing the Right Hon. J. H. Thomas trying to round him up because he called Canada's proposals "humbug." Well, that may not have been diplomatic language, but it was true.

Now I come again to this three per cent import tax business. If there ever was an opportunity, as was so rightly said by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth yesterday, this government had that opportunity last Wednesday to redeem themselves by making a reciprocal preference offer to the mother country prior to sitting around the conference table at Ottawa in July next. Then it did not matter what might happen, the conference could not be a failure, with the wheat quota on the British side plus the ten per cent preference in the Chamberlain tariff. However small the offer it would have been a big thing for hon. gentlemen opposite to make, because as yet they have not made any budget preference offer to Great Britain. But the government missed that opportunity. It can be recovered yet by their backing up once more. We have had a lot of newspaper criticism regarding the little preparation that is being made for the coming conference. These hon. gentlemen opposite are preparing wittingly or otherwise, to make the Ottawa conference another failure. There is lots of preparation in this budget of the wrong kind. At one time we thought, Mr. Speaker, they were playing the wise part of putting these duties up to dicker them off when they came to close quarters. Well, you cannot fool the Right Hon. Philip Snowden in that fashion, you cannot fool the people in the old country who have been making diplomatic exchanges with foreign countries and the overseas dominions since way back; they know that part of the bargaining game and discount it accordingly. Are the government going to try to dicker this three per cent off in exchange for something? What is that old saying about setting a net in the sight of the bird? Well, that is what the government are doing, setting a net in the sight of the bird, and thinking they are going to fool the "bird" by taking off this increase when they sit around the conference table. That may not be their purpose, but if it is not, what is their purpose at this particular time in placing further restrictions on inter-empire trade? I cannot denounce that too strongly. Is not that the offspring and spawn of Toryism intensified? Isn't it just what you would expect from a small-bore Tory government preparing to enter a great inter-empire conference—something that the whole world is watching? But what is the use of pursuing the subject further?

We are told, Mr. Speaker, that you cannot see spiritual things with the natural eye. It is just as true that you cannot see Liberal things with the Tory eye. That is what makes the big difference between the two parties, and yet superficial people will discuss these things and say, "Well, there is not much difference between the two old parties." But every day since this government has come into power the gulf has been getting wider and wider, until the two parties to-day are poles asunder. You cannot mix one with the other, neither can one understand the other. I suppose as I am talking now my hon. friends opposite are wondering if I am not a proper subject for a madhouse.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Didn't I touch a responsive chord? That is exactly what I am thinking of—their policies, and sometimes themselves. Therefore there is no use trying to reconcile the two viewpoints. They have their views and they are entitled to them; we have our views and we are entitled to them. The electors will decide between us in due course.

An hon. MEMBER: They did decide last time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, I do not know that they will decide just quite the same next time, but we shall see.

The budget itself is therefore more odious than the budget of last year in the above respect. So much for the ways and means of getting revenue. The objective of the government is to balance the budget. They do it in two ways, by imposing new taxes and by reducing expenditures. How are they going about their policy of reducing expenditures? I see my good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) in his seat. I am not going to blame him a bit more than the rest of the government in what I am about to refer to. Agriculture is staggering as it has never staggered since Confederation; it is down at the heels and out at the elbows as it never was in my lifetime, and yet in the face of that, the government comes down with estimates reduced by three and a quarter million dollars with respect to agriculture. Is that the way to hold up the chief industry of Canada, an industry that occupies nearly half the people and feeds them all? Is that the way to treat it? This is the avenue by which we are to come back to normal conditions of development. How are our industries to progress when agriculture is on its beam ends, also mining, lumbering, paper and pulp, and fishing? These are the primary industries of the country, and the major one of them they have swatted to the tune of three and a quarter million dollars, in the face of the government election promise, oft repeated. "We will put the power of the dominion exchequer and of the government behind the cause of agriculture." The right hon. Prime Minister said that in Woodstock, New Brunswick, he said it all over the land, and yet when it comes to a showdown he cuts the agriculture estimates right to the bone, so much so that many of the services to agriculture will have to be dispensed with or else paid for by the farming population. I do not know where they will get the money for the purpose. Down in the maritimes they depend very much upon inspection of their certified potatoes to hold the market in the United States, but that service is threatened to be cut off, or else charged for. Potatoes to-day are worth about twenty cents a bushel or less and the government are asking the potato growers of the maritimes to bear that load. I know the Minister of Agriculture was not a party to that, I feel sure he must have protested against it. Perhaps he might have gone further with his protest, but he is a new member and a new minister, and my sympathy goes out to him. But I wonder if he could not stir things up a bit before the supplementary estimates come down. Could he not also do something for our winter fairs? I know he is a genuine live stock lover himself. The government of which the Hon. Martin Burrell was Minister of Agriculture, and all the governments that have followed between that day and this have been anxious about promoting the prosperity of our live stock industry as the chief cornerstone of agriculture. Why take away their grants at this time and leave them not only with loss of money but loss of morale, because of lack of sympathy on the part of those to whom they have the right to look for encouragement? That is the story of how they are trying to "save" money; what they cannot get from agriculture they are skinning off the poor civil servants, to the tune of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. If all these prognostications contained in the speech from the throne had come true the government would not have had to resort to these questionable methods of getting revenue in order to balance their budget, which is not balanced and would not stay balanced if it were, so long as these hon. gentlemen remain in power and keep on destroying revenue by prohibitive or high tariffs.

Then I come to another matter. Hon. gentlemen opposite say we are making no constructive suggestions. Is there nothing constructive in the suggestion that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) try to remove himself and the government from the charge of being more unfriendly to agriculture through that one act—reduction of the agriculture estimates—than was the case with any previous administration within my memory? This has been done at a time when agriculture is least able to stand it. It is like kicking a man in the ribs when he is down; in fact it is like kicking a man all over, in the ribs and everywhere else. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will respond to this appeal; he must realize the situation himself. If there is anything I can do I will be glad to help him, although I do not see how I can render much assistance except by giving hail columbia to his leader and colleagues, which I am trying to do now.

I do not think the previous government could have made the progress it did make in agriculture if we had not had a sympathetic Liberal prime minister. I do know who is responsible for the building in which the Department of Agriculture is now housed; I do know who is responsible for that fact that for the first time since confederation the department is under its own roof, and that is the leader of the Liberal party. The present Prime Minister is the gentleman who is guilty of slashing the grants and estimates for agriculture. I can just imagine him dismissing his cabinet some night, telling them to go to their offices and come back the next day with their estimates reduced by so many millions of dollars. It would not matter where the reductions were made; it would not matter who was hurt, whether it was a primary industry, whether it was the militia, the flying corps or anything else. That is the way they apparently made up their estimates over there, from all the evidence we can gather. We have no spy in the cabinet to tell us these things; we never hear a peep outside from hon. gentlemen opposite, but those who have been in cabinets before can read the evidence in the estimates and between the lines.

So much for that; I do not hear hon. gentlemen opposite jeering very much now. Now let me for a moment refer to the Hudson Bay railway, which was nearly ruined once by the Tories, who located the terminal at Nelson. I say that advisedly, that the mongrel Union government, which was in power part of the time, and the Tories almost ruined that road at that time. The Liberal government is responsible for moving the terminal to Churchill. The road can be ruined again, and it is no wonder hon. members from the west who are anxious about this road have some misgivings as to how friendly this government is to that undertaking. Of course it is finished; it was completed to salt water before the government changed, but the Tories got all the hurrahs when the first loads of wheat were sent out last year. But the insurance is so high as compared with the St. Lawrence rate that I do not see how we are going to develop trade via the Hudson Bay route unless these and other rates are lowered to those of competing points. It takes a long time and a great deal of effort to switch trade from an established route to a new one. Hon. members will recall that when the Vancouver route was opened, via the Panama canal, it took many years to develop it, and that port is open all year. It will take more effort and a longer time to develop a route which is open only four or five months during the year, so the insurance rates and other rates must be reasonable in the early stages at all events or the development will be disappointingly slow. Just think; we have a new port on the plains of the west to which we have been looking forward for fifty years. It was started by the Liberals and finished by the Liberals, but then hon. gentlemen opposite came along and by means of high tariffs and everything else put all the obstructions imaginable in the way of trade over that route.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton): The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, after observation of the first budget presented to this parliament by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) I am in hearty agreement with the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), chief critic of the Liberal party in this house, at least in one respect: I think it is a clear-cut and concise business program. The splendid style in which it was presented to parliament is further evidence of those excellent parliamentary qualities for which the hon. minister has been distinguished in his native province as well as in other parliaments.

I do not propose to follow very closely the somewhat rambling remarks of my hon. friend from Melville (Mr. Motherwell). I have the highest personal regard for the hon. member, and during his years in this house we have listened to him on different occasions with great interest. It is somewhat remarkable, however, that his speeches are becoming more conspicuous for the entertainment they provide than for the logic they contain.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

In this country to-day we have very great difficulties confronting the present administration; the great economic crisis that has prevailed throughout the world has brought about unprecedented problems within Canada which have made the task of government more difficult than it has been at any time since confederation. It is not my purpose to contrast at any length the policies of the present administration, faced with these difficulties, with the lack of policy shown by the former administration under much more favourable circumstances. However, I venture to state that during those days that have been properly referred to as an era of prosperity, Providence smiled on Canada and with bountiful harvests and favourable world conditions the producers of this dominion secured rich returns. But I think it must be admitted that this temporary prosperity was something over which the previous government had no control and for which they should claim very little credit.

One recalls that immediately after the last election it was found necessary to call a special, emergency session of parliament to provide $20,000,000 for the relief of unemployment, which was supplemented by a similar amount provided by the municipalities and provinces. Something over $7,000,000 a week was spent in order to care for the thousands who were unemployed at that time.

We have heard a great deal with reference to low commodity prices, Mr. Speaker, and it is rather interesting to note that agricultural commodity prices have dropped by over fifty per cent. However, it is equally significant to observe that these commodity prices dropped almost forty per cent between December, 1929, and the beginning of 1931, during the greater part of which period the party sitting to your left had charge of the government of this country. Therefore I doubt if hon. gentlemen opposite can find much glory or comfort in these difficulties through which we are passing, when we remember that they failed even to recognize the problem before going to the country, and failed to offer any reasonable solution for the unemployment problem or for the prevention of the unfavourable trade balance then in sight.

Many problems are confronting the government of the day, Mr. Speaker, but I believe they have been adequately met. Our financial obligations have been met one hundred per cent, and through the enthusiastic cooperation of the people of Canada and the skilful management of the former Minister of Finance, the present Prime Minister, our financial integrity has been maintained in spite of the trying conditions which have existed during the last couple of years. There are many other problems facing this government at the present time. There is, for example, the problem of transportation, which has been well described as the second national debt of Canada, and there is the problem of balancing revenues and expenditures. The problem of balancing our trade has been met in a way that promises a substantial trade balance in our favour in 1932. Transportation is one of the major problems before the government at the present time, as every citizen must admit; and encouragement has been given the management by the present government with a view to curtailing apparent extravagance in the conduct of the road. As a result of the encouragement which has been given to industrial activities in Canada by the "Canada first" policy of the government, we find that 142 new industries have been established in the dominion, and when normal times return —and I believe they will return sooner in Canada than in any other country—a good deal of assistance will be afforded our unemployed.

I know there are thousands to-day in this dominion who are praying for a return of the prosperity they enjoyed in stock market days, that era of plenty; but there are many more who are becoming more and more fearful for their very existence. We are no doubt passing through a serious economic crisis. There are those to your left, Mr. Speaker, who charge this government, and particularly the Prime Minister, with having made promises. Well, we know that the leader of the opposition has broken promises in the past, but there is one leader whose promises no one has doubted in these times of trouble. We have from him the assurance that he that tilleth the land shall have plenty of bread, and the unemployed in this dominion must in future establish their homes and seek employment on the land rather than in highly industrialized factories. In this regard I would refer you to the development that has taken place in this country during the last ten years, in which time the hon. member for Melville, was what one might call the manager of our great enterprise in Canada, namely, agriculture. Agriculture, as he has said, employs directly and finds homes for approximately forty-six per cent of the people of Canada. It has been well said that possibly two-thirds of the rest of the population depend indirectly upon agriculture and its allied industries, or at any rate are indirectly affected thereby. The general progress of the dominion depends upon the success of agriculture. If that is true, then one is reasonable in assuming that upon the soundness of Canadian agriculture depends the future prosperity of this country. It has often been said that agriculture in Canada is the producer of one great commodity; but may I point out that after all agriculture embraces a multitude of important industries in this country. Some of these branches of our agricultural enterprise are capable of much greater expansion than others. Some are capable of vast expansion by means of improved machinery, while others can expand only by the employment of man power.

Before the war, in 1913, Canada produced five per cent of the world's wheat, and at that time she had ten per cent of the exportable surplus of the world. Since that time she has increased her production by 122 per cent, the major portion of that increase having taken place between 1920 and 1930. To-day she produces over ten per cent of the world's output and supplies over thirty-five per cent of the exportable surplus of the world—that is, exclusive of Russia. The Argentine, the United States and Australia, have had, of course, similar increases ranging anywhere from twenty-five to seventy per cent. Taking these facts into account, we find that the world's production in that ten-year period has increased by approximately twenty-five per cent, or 700,000,000 bushels in one year. It is not surprising, therefore, to find in 1930 double the world's exportable surplus on hand, or double the world's normal carry-over.

One would hesitate to hazard the opinion that this is an over-expansion, in view of the very nature of the product itself, because so much depends upon the weather conditions in the countries that grow wheat extensively. I do say, however, that it makes uncertain the marketing of wheat independently of world depression, in view of the increased acreage, which has been about 30,000,000 acres since 1920. The consumption increase has been much less, and therefore only a failure of crop in certain parts of the world ensures the safe marketing of wheat in the future. But I repeat that one would hesitate to say that we have had over-expansion. If we had an increased yield per acre of two bushels, next year there would be 600,000,000 bushels of extra surplus, or 100,000,000 bushels more than we have ever produced, and that fact must be taken into consideration.

Great encouragement has been given the production of wheat in this country. Special freight rates, for instance, with both railways, approximate $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 of advantage to grain growers in certain years. Then there are terminal facilities, seed grain and so forth, all of which has considerably benefited the trade of Canada. I believe that in peak years it has approximated almost half a billion dollars, representing new wealth in this dominion.

We have had, to some extent, an unbalanced development throughout this dominion. I am not attributing this all to the government that is no longer in power, for world conditions and the prices of wheat have in no small way effected that change. We find, again, that it is possible to produce more wheat in Canada with less labour than it has been at any other time in our history. It has been estimated, according to figures at Washington, that in the United States 20,000,000 acres of land have been released for the production of wheat as a result of the change from horse to mechanical power. The ground formerly used for the production of fodder, hay and oats, to feed the horses that were used for power purposes, is to-day, owing to the substitution of mechanical power for horse power, released for the production of wheat, and as I say, this represents 20,000,000 acres. On a smaller scale, the same change has been evident in Australia and in the Argentine. It has been estimated that the full time employment of one man can take care of from 1,000 to 1,500 acres of wheat ground in Australia or the United States. I presume the same could be done in certain sections of western Canada if modern machinery were available. It is therefore reasonable to assume that 100,000 men could produce the total output of Canada's wheat at the present time.

I mention this to show what has taken place. Even in eastern Canada we have felt the trend of things in the west, for peak labour in western wheat production is no longer required. Not a single train left eastern Canada in 1929 for the wheat fields of the west, and I doubt whether one has left between that year and the present time. The combine and the tractor have played their part in this change. The rapid advance that mechanical science has made has also affected industrial as well as agricultural activity. So that it is not fair to compare the numbers employed to-day in any line of production with those employed five years ago. It is not uncommon to-day for a manufacturer to tell you that he can produce more at the present time with fifty men that he would have thought possible five years ago with one hundred. Machinery obviously has played its part in industry generally in Canada as elsewhere. But there is one field in which machinery cannot interfere with the labour man, one place where it cannot rob him of his labour. I refer to mixed farming. Consider the districts that have been growing wheat for a number of years, having had to combat the stubborn sow thistle, tumbleweed, mustard, and so on, and you will realize that the rotation of crops is absolutely necessary. Every agriculturist in Canada realizes now that rotation of crops is becoming an increasing necessity. I know there are certain sections in this country which will be retained for many years to come for wheat production, but I know also that there are other sections where farmers are endeavouring to grow wheat which would be better adapted to mixed farming. I doubt if there is a farmer in this house who will deny that statement. Rotation of crops means that barley and other coarse grains which can be sown later in the spring allow for a longer cultivation of the ground in spring. Some fibre is given back to the soil by this method and I venture to say that if this step was taken we would have a larger live stock production and much of this grain would be consumed. I believe it is possible to consume in Canada over thirty or forty per cent of the present exportable grains such as barley and the lower grades of wheat. That is the surest and safest market, at least for the low grade wheat and the coarse grains which we are now finding difficult to dispose of in the markets of the world.

Wheat has not always been our main export. Even back in 1920 Canada exported $133,000,000 worth of live stock and dairy products, which was $16,000,000 more than the value of the wheat exported last year. I direct the attention of the house to the fact that despite these hard times the dairy industry produced last year $35,000,000 more than the value of the total wheat produced. I need only contrast these two phases of agriculture in order to impress upon the house the importance of the live stock industry, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Melville.

However, it is a rather peculiar coincidence that during the régime of his friends, from 1920 to 1930, we saw a lopsided development in agriculture. In 1920 we were in the export market and we sold to the United Kingdom 26 per cent of her requirements of bacon, while Denmark supplied less than 12 per cent. In 1930, ten years later, Canada sold 1½ per cent of the requirements of the United Kingdom, while Denmark supplied 60 per cent. Sixty years ago Canada sold to the British market almost three times the amount of bacon she has been selling in recent years. This market should have been properly nursed and encouraged and at least maintained to a degree.

I appreciate the world conditions which have contributed to the change as well as the neglect of the former government. In 1910 we found that the production of thirty years previous had been increased by two or three times, and by 1920 this production had been increased again by five times. However, in 1930, instead of exporting to the United Kingdom twice as much as did Denmark, we exported less than 9,000,000 pounds while Denmark exported 600,000,000 pounds. It must be quite evident that a lopsided development has been carried on in this country, and I suggest that this market should have been retained for Canadian products.

Perhaps the house will pardon me for going into details but I think what I have to say is of national importance at this time. The live stock industry should be developed in order to solve to some degree our unemployment problem. This market in Great Britain which was properly our market, should have been retained. I have discussed this matter with leading manufacturers and pork packers, and I doubt if there is a farmer or packer in this house who will deny what I have to say. My information is that the processing of one hundred hogs into bacon will give employment to two men. It would require 2,500,000 hogs to supply the bacon for one half the sales in the United Kingdom which we have lost to Denmark, and this processing would give employment to 50,000 men.

The dairy industry is another factor to be considered in this matter. I am not going to say that we should properly develop the export butter market; I know that has been said by hon. members opposite. I know that farmers of this house agree that the development of cheese would relieve the butter market in Canada and would automatically be of interest to the dairy industry. In 1904 we sold the United Kingdom 234,000,000 pounds of cheese, while last year we sold only approximately 85,000,000 pounds. In 1903 our sales of butter amounted to 34,000,000 pounds, and this market was maintained until 1925. I shall not go into the reasons why this market was not maintained and why we were finally forced to import over 50,000,000 pounds; we all know this story quite well and those who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, must be tired of it. Had we retained our market overseas for the dairy products of this country, 400,000 more cows would be required in production to-day. As one who has sometimes milked a cow, I say —I leave it to the dairymen in this house to decide whether or not my statement is reasonable—that the feeding, stabling, housing and milking of eight cows and all that is involved in the production of butter, cream and cheese so produced, would give employment to one man. The 400,000 additional dairy cows needed would give employment to 50,000 of those who are now waiting for government assistance.

If we had an assured market for the products of mixed farming, more people would be employed than the total number required to produce our wheat crop. I am in full accord with everything that has been done for the production of wheat—every year, one-third of the land cultivated on my own farm has been in fall wheat—but we need a more diversified production in agriculture. This method of agriculture offers an elementary existence to the people who are now hungry. It is the only industry which offers any apparent expansion; it is the only place to which a man can take his family and be sure that he will obtain a living. He can kill a pig or a chicken and will be able to obtain a living, at least until the sheriff drives him off his land.

I know it has been said that once we enter the export market, prices will be reduced and hardship caused to those on the farm. I admit that since we went on the export market with certain lines of our products prices have dipped enormously, there is no doubt about that. It has been stated in this house that the only way to solve unemployment is to have fewer people, the only way to increase prices, is to produce less. Canada has a staggering debt and a tremendous transportation problem, and these matters will always remain difficult of solution if those theories are carried into effect. My own personal opinion is that some assistance should be given to mixed farming. If such a plan were evolved it would encourage this type of agriculture. Take the production of bacon, for instance. Our exports last year amounted to 11,000,000 pounds; if this amount was increased even to 30,000,000 pounds, it would cost the treasury of this dominion only $600,000 to establish an export bonus of 2 cents per pound. If our exports of live beef were bonused by two cents a pound, allowing an increase of 25 per cent, it would cost $700,000. An amount of $1,000,000 spent on cheese would allow for a similar increase on that and an expenditure of $60,000 would allow for a bonus of three cents a dozen on eggs. This would mean you could establish a bonus system which would encourage the sale of our exportable surpluses at satisfactory prices, automatically stimulate the market at home and return to the mixed farmers throughout the dominion approximately $30,000,000 by the increase in prices of farm products. I believe it should be administered by an export board and should be allowed only on high grade products and automatically eliminating itself when domestic prices reached a certain point.

I know there are those who would oppose any form of bonus; I know there are those who say that it is artificial restoration, but the mixed farmers and agriculturists generally have been subscribing to artificial restoration ever since the days of the formation of this dominion. We have subsidies for iron and steel, subventions for coal, special freight rates and cash bonuses on wheat. The precedent was established in the mother country 150 years ago when fifteen cents a bushel was given on wheat and eight cents a bushel on barley to stimulate and encourage the industry of agriculture in that period of her history. I feel satisfied that what I have suggested would stimulate agriculture in this country in no small degree.

The chief concentrate, however, of such products is made up of grain and therefore this would react to the benefit of the grain growers just as much as to that of the live stock producers. When you consider that in the production of milk twenty-eight pounds of grain is required to produce 100 pounds of milk, you can readily see that 10,000,000 pounds of grain could be used in the production of the milk to which I have referred. More than 30,000,000 bushels of grain would be required to feed the hogs I have mentioned, and it is reasonable to assume that at least 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 bushels of those low grades of wheat and cheap grains could be used in that way. The result is therefore bound to be to the interest of agriculture generally. It was said by the late Adam Smith—and I know those sitting opposite will not deny that he was pretty nearly always right—in that famous world classic, the Wealth of Nations, that the condition of any well cultivated area in any extensively agricultural country depends upon the live stock that is kept on the land. Therefore, while there may be in the west certain districts that some may believe will never forfeit their power to produce indefinitely, yet I believe by all the signs of the times nature is demanding that something be returned to the soil for the great production she has yielded, if it is desired that that productivity shall continue. Millions of dollars have been spent on fertilizers throughout the dominion for this purpose. I wish to make this brief statement in order to give an idea of what my suggestion would mean in the way of artificial fertilizer to the soil of this country. From scientific estimation it is figured that from the production of 1,000 pounds of pork the value of fertilizer is equivalent to $23 in artificial phosphates and nitrates. Similarly the return given by a dairy cow annually to the soil is worth $25. The figures I have mentioned would return annually to the soil $22,000,000 that it has cost the farmers for artificial fertilizers. There is not a farmer in eastern Canada who does not agree with that, and in western Canada they are coming to realize the same. I find in the forty nine census divisions of western Canada, twenty-three show a rapid increase in mixed farming, and as regards those who are making a success in western Canada over 80 per cent of those who are farming on less than 160 acres own their land, while less than sixty per cent of the larger operators own their farms. There are approximately 700,000 farms in Canada at the present time and over 500,000 of them are less than 200 acres, and adapted to be turned into mixed farming or what might be termed agricultural factories. At this time they are the only factories that show any satisfactory expansion for employment. To prove this all we have to do is to consider what the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) did last year when he placed 42,000 men on mixed farms when every other factory in this country was reducing staffs and the government of the day were paying millions of dollars to feed men who were out of work. Every agriculturist in the country knows it is not sound business to place all your eggs in one basket. It is not wise to do that to-day, nor is it wise to depend absolutely for the nation's prosperity upon trading in one commodity alone and to stake our fortune against the weather of Australia or the social experiments of Russia or the crop failure of Argentina or the crop success of the United States. My suggestion would mean our people would find a livelihood more within themselves.

It is reasonable to assume that the day will soon come in this country when we may hope to develop that type of agriculture which will consume at least half of the grains we are at present having difficulty in marketing. The forthcoming Imperial conference offers encouragement in the prospects of increased markets. We know that Great Britain imports $5,000 worth of foodstuffs every minute. She buys $2,500 worth from foreign countries every minute. She buys more bacon and butter in one month from one foreign country than she does from Canada in one year, and she purchases that from a foreign country that has a favourable trade balance against Britain of approximately $200,000,000 annually. The forthcoming Imperial conference offers possibilities in that regard. When we who inhabit the largest area, the richest in resources, that any 10,000,000 people in the British Empire have the privilege of inhabiting, go to that conference and receive the benefits we expect to receive, we must realize that to every privilege there is attached its associate obligation, and I would suggest that our associate obligation will be that Canada must have a new immigration policy of some kind; she must accept more people from Great Britain. I am speaking only in anticipation. I know hon. members will agree that Canada, having a population of only 10,000,000 and the British Isles becoming more congested every year, if we receive a great deal, we must expect to give something; we must give a home in Canada to more people. Therefore the employment of our people is most essential at the present time, and I am satisfied that with sound development, when prosperity returns to any country in the world, it will return to Canada. I am satisfied that no other country is at present better situated to benefit by an improvement in world conditions.

I well recall the immigration policy of those, Mr. Speaker, who sit to your left. I remember, when they came into power, the immigration policy they had. They said they would send to all corners of the world for immigrants; they would welcome to our shores thousands and thousands of people from all countries, of all races, and that all would be made good citizens; but when they came to Canada and endeavoured to become good citizens, the then government continued to sell the raw products of our great resources and to buy the finished products of foreign countries. We heard an ex-Minister of Immigration, on going out of office, say in the Senate: We have managed to drive more people out of Canada than we have brought in during the past year.

The speaker who preceded me mentioned that agriculture is at present in a stagnant position. Canada was in a stagnant position when this party took power; the world depression had something to do with it, but the weakness of the former administration also had something to do with it. However that position was brought about, I believe that the test of our economic soundness lies in our days of great depression. That has been realized in the British Empire, in the motherland, as much as here. Great Britain at present is more susceptible to policies she heretofore opposed. She has lately adopted policies she once condemned. With a spirit of cooperation unprecedented in any other country in the world, she now promises a return to prosperity more rapidly than that of any other country. I only wish to say to the party who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, that they might adopt some of those policies in this country, because we have a leadership at the present time unparalleled in Canada's history. The other great force associated with leadership is fellowship and cooperation, and we solicit that of them. The Imperial economic conference to be held at Ottawa during the coming summer will make Ottawa the most conspicuous place in the world at that time. Ottawa will be the council chamber, as it were, of the empire's most important trade agencies. The Prime Minister of this dominion will be the host of that gathering and will probably supply many of the main proposals for its consideration. He is the one dominion representative who stood out at the last imperial conference, and courageously declared that a closer imperial trade relationship must be arranged in order to save Britain from the possible collapse which threatened many other countries. Those in the old country who then condemned him now to some extent at all events praise him.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that Canada has contributed in no small measure to this new empire scheme, ably led by the present Prime Minister. When conditions improve I am sure such service will justify her place in the empire's progress and certainly will justify our present Prime Minister's place in British history.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I listened with rapt attention to the speech which has just been delivered by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). I was especially interested in his remarks touching the price of farm products, and in his admission that we were bound on an exportable basis to have low prices for farm products, especially for butter. I was just wondering whether this was the same gentleman who visited the province of Quebec last summer and some parts of the maritime provinces two years ago, encouraging our farmers to pass resolutions condemning the Liberal government for the very low prices prevailing at that time for farm products, and laying stress especially upon the price of butter, which was then selling at 35 cents a pound and is now selling somewhere around 18 and 20 cents a pound. I wonder if the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat would dare go into the eastern townships of the province of Quebec to-day with the story he is telling now. I wonder if he would go down to Prince Edward Island, which he visited, and to Nova Scotia, and induce the farmers to listen to his plea. I wonder if he would say to them now: In order to get a reasonable price for your butter I appeal to the government in power to-day to bonus you. My hon. friend is in favour of the bonus system to-day. Why? Because the system adopted by the party which he supports has not brought about results that he anticipated. Consistency is a jewel; there is no question about that, but I fail to see many jewels on the other side of the house. They certainly do not shine if there are any.

An hon. MEMBER: I see an emerald.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend is thinking of the emerald isle.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): He means a dandelion.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish to refer in passing to the speech delivered last night in this house by an hon. gentleman who dealt with the industrial situation in this dominion. He set forth the argument that because of an increase in industrial establishments in Canada under this government, unemployment had to some extent decreased. But the hon. gentleman forgot to tell the house how many factories and industries in this country have closed their doors since the present government came into power. He said that he made a tour of investigation to satisfy himself by so and so and so and so. I wonder if he toured the maritime provinces and went into the city of St. John, where in the last ten months some three industries have closed, throwing out of employment over twelve hundred men. If my hon. friend had wanted to be honest in his argument he would have also shown us the other side of the medal. He would have shown how many industries have dwindled and disappeared since this government came into power, as well as how many have been reported as being established in the dominion.

Before I undertake, Mr. Speaker, to give my reasons for opposing the method adopted by the present government to balance their budget, I wish to pay my compliments to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). Last evening he made a speech in this house, and it was one of the most laboured attempts to defend the government to which I have ever listened, or which it has ever fallen to his lot to deliver. We all appreciate the ability of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and when I saw that he had been chosen to reply to the financial critic of the opposition I certainly expected something sound. I expected that he would be able to shoot holes through the argument of the opposition critic, but he failed, and failed utterly to do so. What did we find him doing? We found him rather attempting to attack and also wishing to have sympathy from this side of the house. His first utterance was this: "We are here to face courageously the economic problems which confront the country, and so far the government had received very little assistance in the form of constructive suggestions from the opposition." Let me ask the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, what use would it be for the opposition to offer constructive suggestions to our friends opposite? What have they done to prevent us from doing that which they blame us now for not doing? They have taken out of the hands of parliament the very powers under which we could sit here and offer and discuss constructive suggestions. They have taken the power, which we on this side of the house have strongly opposed, to legislate, not as in the past, aboveboard and before parliament, but in the secrecy of council, and there to adopt and put into force policies without reference to this parliament. We on this side of the house at the present time cannot find entry to the executive council; therefore we cannot offer any constructive suggestions in that way. But notwithstanding that, let me attempt to prove that the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not confine himself to the facts when he stated that the opposition offered no constructive suggestions. What is the record? Let us go back to the record of the Liberal party since we have been sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker. At the special session of September, 1930, the opposition strongly advised the government that the sky-high tariffs they were proposing to introduce would not remedy unemployment. We pointed that out to them in the strongest parliamentary language. To-day I will not say it is a matter of satisfaction to us to know that we were right; no, because it should not be a matter of satisfaction to think the government have acted in such a way as to render the situation worse to-day than it was when they took office. But, sir, we can point to our friends opposite and say: On a certain date we suggested to you that the methods you were proposing to this house to meet the unemployment situation would not operate successfully. Our honoured leader suggested that a non-partisan commission be appointed with power to administer whatever relief the government was prepared to give to the unemployed, either in co-operation with the provincial government and the municipalities or alone. The government did not accept our view. But what do we find to-day? We find those very gentlemen to whom we again appealed in the session of 1931 to adopt a different and a better means to meet the situation, and to whom we gave the benefit of our views on that occasion, are themselves so convinced that their methods were too expensive and did not bring about the results that were anticipated that to-day they have called a conference of the provinces—the very advice which was given to them by our honoured leader in 1931, and which they then flouted on the floor of this house. We find they are in conference now with the provincial premiers, and if we are to believe the reports in the press we must come to the conclusion that our hon. friends opposite are about to abandon their unemployment policy of the past and are groping in the dark for a new policy. And yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that we have offered no constructive suggestions. If time permitted I could give several other constructive suggestions offered by the opposition to our friends opposite, but not listened to and certainly not adopted by them.

In reading the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I have discovered what I consider to be a gem, if I may use that term. I am going to quote it. Referring to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), he said:

> His was a subtle, bitter, and I might say petty criticism of the government's position and difficulties. Not one syllable to indicate the difficulties which we are facing, and not one word on the causes of our troubles.

Those words fell from the lips of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce last night. Knowing him as I do, having listened to him for six years in this house delivering speeches in criticism of the Liberal government, I was somewhat surprised that he should complain of any bitterness in the criticism of others, because no public man in Canada ever used such a bitter tongue as the hon. minister used when, seated to your left, sir, he rose to criticize the Liberal policies of that day. But now that he is receiving in return an application of the very medicine that he applied to the Liberal government, we find him cringing under the lash. I thought the hon. gentleman was more of a sportsman, I thought that he who has been held up as bold and courageous in defence of the government could take a little criticism without pleading that the opposition was not treating him and his party right. Thin-skinned indeed must be the hon. minister when he cannot listen to criticism which compared with his in the past is but eulogy. And yet the hon. gentleman has the effrontery to tell us that our criticism is bitter! I find that the hon. gentleman also gave a definition of a pessimist. I am not going to quote it, but if that is a true definition of a pessimist, then, Mr. Speaker, we are in the presence of a wonderful artist who can paint his own portrait without having to use a mirror.

Now I come to the budget. My experience in the administration of public affairs has convinced me that, if at all possible, every government should balance its budget. It is necessary to do so to maintain the credit of our country both at home and abroad, but when we have to use the means adopted by the government to balance its budget, the imposition of very onerous taxation, taxation that weighs especially upon the shoulders of the masses, when in order to balance the budget we have to introduce taxation that will take away the purchasing power of our population, then I think it would be better for this country if there had been no balancing of the budget. Because the moment you burden the people with too heavy taxation, the moment you place them in the position where their purchasing power is gradually but surely disappearing, that moment you retard the development of the internal industries of the country.

In that respect let me ask this question: How does excessive taxation affect us at home? I cannot better express my conviction on this point than by giving the following quotation:

> Where trade is hampered or restricted by excessive taxation it follows that the measure of profit which may accrue to those engaged in it is correspondingly less, and that the cost of living to the individual becomes correspondingly more.

I agree with every word of that quotation, while I do not always agree with its author. The words I have just quoted were uttered by the present Prime Minister in 1927, and if that statement was true then certainly it is even truer now, but the Minister of Finance, in delivering the budget address, condemned the very policy laid down by his present leader just a few years ago. The right hon. gentleman went further in that speech; he added that increased purchasing power means increased trade, and surely if that is so the reverse is so also, and diminished purchasing power must mean a diminution in the trade of the country.

Starting with that principle, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Minister of Finance could not find some way to balance his budget without imposing these heavy taxes. I am not the only one who differs with the minister; there are those in his own party who are very strongly opposed to the principle, but for some reason or other they support the minister. Let me quote the Montreal Star of the day after the presentation of the budget in this house. It said:

> This is the poorest time in a decade to tax the Canadian people. We need every penny we can raise to get business started again.

Further on it said:

> When we come to discuss the new taxation in detail there is something to be said against every item, and a lot will be said.

But the Star wishes to pat the minister on the back a little; it does not want to hit its friends too hard, so it says:

> On the whole, it will be difficult for critics to suggest better alternatives.

I intend to deal with that later. Again, the Star says:

> In every case taxation of this kind stuns public confidence, saps energy and reduces enterprise.

The Star then goes on and questions whether the government, in its endeavour to balance the budget, has practised in the past the economies that it should have practised. I know it has been a common practice for hon. gentlemen opposite to say, "Well, if you criticize why do you not offer something constructive?" It is my intention to offer something which I consider constructive; it may be too late for hon. gentlemen opposite to change their budget, but if they had possessed sufficient foresight they would not have had to place before parliament such a budget as that to which we listened last week.

For instance, if the estimates for 1931-32 had been pared as the estimates for 1932-33 are being pared at the present time with respect to public works, contingencies, salaries and other controllable expenditures, there would have been no need to increase the sales tax. But instead of practising economy when they came to power in 1930 we find that the estimated ordinary expenditure for the year just ended, 1931-32, was $410,457,000, exclusive of $20,000,000 for unemployment relief, as against an expenditure of $393,980,000 in 1930-31. The expenditure for 1931-32 should have been at least $35,000,000 less than that of 1930-31, instead of some $17,000,000 in excess, and if that course had been followed the sum now necessary in order to balance the budget would have been only one-quarter of the $55,000,000 which we are told is required.

The Minister of Finance has told us that the reduction in ordinary controllable expenditure this year will be about $35,000,000 as compared with last year, and we are told that the controllable expenditure this year is about $143,000,000. The minister further informed the house that last year the controllable expenditure amounted to about $179,000,000, but last year we were not able to make any reduction, while with a controllable expenditure of only $143,000,000 we are able to practise economy to the tune of about $35,000,000. That alone, Mr. Speaker, should be sufficient proof that at least in the year gone by the then Minister of Finance had not sufficient foresight to see that economy must be practised if the people were not to be burdened with extra taxation.

I feel that I should congratulate the present minister on having been able to reduce the controllable expenditure by $35,000,000, when the total controllable expenditure of the country is only $143,000,000. What could have been done if an earnest effort had been made in 1931 to practise economy, when the controllable expenditure was $179,000,000? I said these figures proved my contention, but they do more; they prove that the government did not measure up to the occasion. They began to grasp the situation too late, and now they jump in with a system of what might be called panic economy, by which they are disrupting the whole economic structure of this dominion.

Sir, I have pointed out how this government could have practised economy, and I have shown that if they had done so they would not be forced now to impose these excessive taxes. When the Prime Minister saw the result of his miscalculations, referred to so strongly the other night by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston); when he saw that the estimated revenue had fallen, in six of the principal sources of income, to the extent of some $91,000,000, and when he realized that he had to face that embarrassment, he decided that something extreme must be done if they were to balance the budget. And there is no doubt that he was a party to the imposition of these excessive taxes that have now been placed before us.

Let me go one step further and take up the estimated revenues now before the house. It will be noted, when you read the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance, that he religiously avoided making any comparison between the estimated revenue for the current year and the estimated revenue of 1931-32. He contented himself, in both estimates and expenditures, with making a comparison with the year 1930-31, and I do not blame him for that because, knowing as I do that he is always actuated by a spirit of leniency, it could not be expected that he would wound the feelings of his leader by making a comparison between the estimates of the present Minister of Finance and those which the right hon. gentleman made last year and which have proved such a failure. I can understand why that was done. The present Minister of Finance has given to the house the estimates for 1932-33, and I find that in customs duties, based on last year's range of business and taxation, he estimates only $100,000,000; excise duties, $45,000,000; excise taxes, $70,000,000; income tax, $48,000,000; Post Office revenue, $32,000,000.

A comparison of the estimated revenue now before the house with the receipts of the last fiscal year reveals an astonishing state of affairs. It proves conclusively that this government is shamefully falling down in its attempts to improve conditions. It clearly exposes the incompetence of the government to meet the deplorable condition brought about largely by want of stability and lack of proper administration on their part. The Minister of Finance, in laying these estimates before the house, made this statement:

> With revenues estimated at $310,100,000 and the usual current expenses of government, amounting to $369,900,000, it is clear that increases in the rates of taxation are necessary.

He then points out that the contemplated increase in taxation will give $55,000,000 more revenue; but—and I do not blame him for this, for I think he shows wisdom in this regard—he avoids telling the house, or forgets, or perhaps deliberately omits to tell the house what each source of revenue affected by the increase in taxation will bring to the treasury. He dare not estimate it. Why? Because by the figures he shows here he gives absolute proof of his want of confidence in the future business of the dominion. He then proceeds to give an estimate of the revenue for 1932-33.

Now let me analyze the estimated revenue. Take the revenue from the postal service. The minister tells us that he expects a revenue of $32,000,000. This is an increase of only about $300,000 over the total revenue of 1931-32. If the postal service does as much business in 1932-33 as it did in 1931-32, then that estimate should be $34,000,000 and not $32,000,000. Surely the minister does not look forward to a falling-off in the revenues of the Post Office Department, because to my mind the activities of that department, the receipts from that branch of the public service, constitute one of the best barometers of the prosperity of the country. If the minister has closed the door, so to speak, and instead of estimating a revenue of $34,000,000, estimates $300,000 more than we received last year, notwithstanding that the increase in postage had been in operation only seven months, whereas now it will be in operation for a full year, then I claim that under these conditions the hon. gentleman, not by word of mouth but by the submission of facts, proves the inability of the present government to meet the situation as it is developing in Canada to-day.

Upon the same basis the minister estimates the excise duties to be $45,000,000, or a falling-off of $3,688,000. There is in the budget nothing to show that there is an increase of taxation in excise duties and therefore I take it that the Minister of Finance is basing his estimate of revenue upon what took place last year. And what do we find? We find that his estimate of the revenue for 1932-33 is $3,688,000 less than the revenue of 1931-32. Here is another evidence of want of confidence on the part of the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in Canadian industry and Canadian return to prosperity. Why should there be such a large falling-off if the minister is otherwise convinced? Take excise taxes last year. Under the operation of the increased taxation, excise taxes last year brought $41,271,000. The minister estimates that this revenue, with the increased taxation this year, will bring $70,000,000; that is to say, around $29,000,000 more than the revenue of last year. In other words, the taxation which bears heaviest on the masses of the people the minister tells us will bring in the extra $29,000,000. I wonder whether the minister is thinking of using this excise tax in order to cover up the loss of revenue from imports, a form of taxation, if you wish to call it so, which weighs correspondingly on everybody who has purchasing power. The excise and other taxes under that heading fall unreasonably upon the masses of the people.

I shall now take up the income tax. Again basing his calculation upon the system of last year and the amount of business done, the Minister of Finance stated that the expected revenue for the current year was $48,000,000. No increase in taxation took place last year but there was actually collected $61,000,000. The estimate was that $63,500,000 would be collected, and that was the only estimate made by the Prime Minister which came anywhere near the mark. In the face of a revenue last year amounting to $61,000,000, in the face of increased income taxes, this year the minister budgets for only $48,000,000. Surely the minister must have some reason for making this estimate, and I shall be obliged if he will give it either when closing the debate or in committee.

The other day I heard Sir Josiah Stamp speak at the luncheon given by the Prime Minister. After hearing his magnificent speech, I was proud indeed that I had been invited. In dealing with discouragement and encouragement, Sir Josiah told of a visit which he had paid to the United States and said that the one thing he noticed was that public men seemed to be losing faith in their institutions. Had Sir Josiah Stamp been able to listen to the Minister of Finance deliver his budget address, I feel sure he would have applied those same words when speaking of the Canadian government. When we criticize we are told by hon. friends opposite that we are preaching blue ruin and pessimism, but if ever there was evidence of blue ruin and pessimistic feelings, it is to be found in the present budget and in the methods adopted by the Minister of Finance to try to balance the finances of this country.

I have given the reasons why I believe the budget could have been fully or at least nearly balanced without the imposition of this heavy taxation. In view of the figures given, have I not the right to ask: Where is that increased home market promised by the Prime Minister and which was to stimulate to such a great degree the internal business of Canada? Where are the new foreign markets into which he was going to blast a way for Canadian products of all kinds, and which together with the increased home market was to put an end to unemployment? Where is that great market for our agricultural products, to create which he was going to make the increased tariff fight for the farmer? The Prime Minister's increased tariff has failed to fight for the farmer and now the government comes along with increased internal taxation, perhaps in the hope that it will do some fighting for the farmer. I am afraid the only result of the fight will be to put the farmer out of business and keep him out of business just as long as this government is in power.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, before I begin to discuss some of the proposals upon which I desire to say a few words to-night, permit me to take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) upon his splendid presentation of the subject matter which he laid before the house last week. Realizing that he has been occupying his present position for only a short time, and taking into consideration also the immensity of the task under present conditions, I think it is quite proper at this stage to congratulate him upon his excellent presentation. It does not follow, however, that I agree with everything in the budget proposals, but I shall come to that later. The subject matter really before the house is the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), with which I propose to deal later in my address, because it appears to me that a statement from this corner of the house should be made concerning it.

The subject matter of the budget is, as was stated by the Minister of Finance, discussed under five headings. As a matter of convenience not only to me but to the house generally, I shall cite them:

1. A brief reference to events which have so profoundlly disturbed international finance and the consequent reactions on our own situation.
2. The financial operations and accounts of the dominion for the fiscal year ended March 31, and in this regard it will be understood that the figures are not final but represent the closest estimates that can be made.
3. Canada's trade and commerce.
4. The estimated revenue and expenditure for the fiscal year 1932-33.
5. Ways and means for securing the revenues required to meet the estimated expenditures.

Subdivisions 2, 3 and 4 do not require much consideration from me to-night. Number 5 is very important, because it provides for ways and means by which the revenues are to be raised, particularly as it takes into account the deficit during the last fiscal year. But I should like for a few moments to discuss subdivision number 1, which deals with the breakdown of international finance and the consequent result upon conditions as we have them in Canada.

There is no doubt that international finance plays such an important part in the welfare of nations that we cannot avoid taking it into consideration. It would appear, however, that at present no country is taking any measurable steps to control international finance in order that we may eventually emerge from the conditions from which we are now suffering. Unfortunately for the Minister of Finance, in dealing with that particular phase of our economic problems, he did not even intimate to the house or to the country that the government was looking into this matter very seriously to see if it be possible for the government or parliament to take action having for its purpose the clearing up of the international exchange situation so that trade between different countries may flow more freely than it is now doing. If the government is not paying heed to this important question, it is evading a serious duty, one which the government of every civilized country should undertake if we are to try to prop up the present economic system which is on the verge of total collapse. As I stated before, the government has given no intimation whether it is considering this matter, let alone whether it proposes to take action for the purpose of dealing with it. If the government is not doing this, it is evading a very important duty and responsibility.

Without doubt we are to-day in the midst of such a depression as we have never before experienced. It has been prolonged, to such an extent, indeed, that many people now feel there is no hope of recovery. I am, however, optimistic about the situation—not so optimistic that we shall be able to prop up this system so that it will function more efficiently than it is doing at present, but as regards the welfare of the masses of the people I can see a decidedly optimistic outlook when one considers the possibilities within our grasp. On many occasions we have discussed both in and out of the house our valuable heritage in natural resources, a matter which, so far as Canada is concerned, is one for congratulation. Very few countries on the face of the globe have to-day such a wonderful and varied heritage in natural resources as we have in Canada. It is true we lack some that we need, but on the whole we have a tremendous number which can be used to provide all our staple necessaries of life. That being so, the people of Canada are in a very happy position if only we have the intelligence to make proper use of those natural resources. Furthermore, we have in this country, in proportion to population, an industrial plant second to none in the world. It is true in other countries there may be industrial plants that are larger, but for the immediate needs of the Canadian people we have more than sufficient of plant and equipment to utilize our natural resources so that every man, woman and child in Canada may be made comfortable by being provided with all necessary food, clothing and shelter. Given these two important factors, why is it that to-day hundreds of thousands of our people are on the verge of starvation? Why is it that we have to provide sustenance through governmental and charitable agencies in order to keep people from starving? It would appear from these facts that our system has failed adequately to provide the people with what they require, and that we must give some consideration to that problem if we are to avoid disaster. Before I have finished I hope to be able to place some proposals before the house which may be of value in this direction.

Another matter that is of grave importance is the debt situation. We probably hear more discussion to-day about external debts than internal debts, but in my judgment our internal debts are just as important as are our external debts, and unfortunately these internal debts are growing and no doubt will continue to grow just so long as we work, at least in part, under the present economic system. The interest upon the national debt, for instance, which was created because of the war, has amounted in the period between the close of the war and the present time to practically the total principal of the original debt, and we have not reduced that debt by one iota. There is a problem that should engage the attention not only of members of this house but of the people of Canada, and more particularly that class of people who are interested in social matters, in order that we may devise ways and means not only to pay the interest charges on this debt but to reduce the debt from year to year so that it will eventually be wiped out. When it is remembered that a sum of money invested at five per cent and the interest reinvested every six months will double itself in fourteen years, it will readily be agreed that the statement I made a few moments ago with regard to our national debt is approximately correct. I may be a little out, but not very much; that is to say, we have already paid in interest charges on the war debt a sum almost sufficient to pay off the war debt itself provided we had not had those interest charges to pay. It would therefore appear to me that there are many fundamental defects in our economic system.

I was glad indeed to listen to the address which my good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) made to the house last night. May I congratulate him on the manner in which he discussed some of the questions he brought up, and more particularly that of price levels and that of interest rates? If I may be permitted I should like to quote just one sentence from his speech of last night and then to make some comments upon it. At page 1910 of Hansard of yesterday the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said, speaking of interest charges:

> No agriculturist, no industrialist and no merchant can afford to pay ten per cent interest for the money he uses in his business; it simply cannot be done; normal business will not permit of that rate of interest.

You will notice that the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that ten per cent was too high a rate of interest for agriculturists and business men to pay. That is quite true, but I wondered, when I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce make that statement, why he placed at ten per cent the rate which it was too high for agriculturists and business men to pay. Why did he not, for instance, say five per cent?—because under our present financial system, in my judgment it is almost as hard—I will go further and say it is just as impossible—for any agriculturist or business man to pay five per cent for money as it is to pay ten per cent and hope to keep away from the creation of debt. That we probably can never do. I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has given this matter consideration, and I think it would be in the interests of Canada as a whole if both members of the house and the people outside gave this question more study than we have been giving it in the past. My judgment is that any interest rate which is higher than the actual cost of the service can never be paid in full. It creates a debt which can never be paid under our present financial and economic system. If we were to take the time to analyze the situation I believe we would find that that statement is absolutely correct. Under our present financial system when our institutions lend money, particularly our banks and especially those banking institutions which are responsible in the first instance, for permitting money to go into circulation, if they charge a rate of interest that is above the cost of the service, I submit that we are creating a debt which can never be paid off; in order to meet those obligations in the past we have simply had to borrow more money to pay the interest which could not otherwise be met. Such is the nature of our present financial system. In the cost of the service in so far as our present banking system is concerned I include office costs, salaries, rentals, taxes, and even dividends to shareholders. I submit that when the interest rate to be charged to the customers of our banking institutions goes above that cost, we create a debt which can never be repaid under our present financial system. That is the main reason why our debts are growing and will continue to grow and accumulate just as long as we retain the particular financial system that we have at the present time.

Hon. members may ask, what are you going to do about it? My judgment is that there is only one remedy for that condition, and when we do remedy it we shall begin to make an inroad into some of the other conditions which arise out of it but do not seem to be closely connected with it. The only system I can see that would be effective would be the nationalization of credit and currency to be used in the interests of the Canadian people, with the Canadian people having the use of that credit and currency on a basis of cost—because it would make no difference, even if we did nationalize the credit and currency of this country and made it a government monopoly, if the interest rate was higher than the cost of the service. We would then be in exactly the same position as we are in now, with the exception that the government would be making a profit and the people would become indebted to the government instead of the banking institutions So that even under a policy of nationalization of the currency and credit of this country we ought still to stick to the proposal that currency and credit must come into circulation at all times on a cost basis.

Last night my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave us some very illuminating examples with regard to price levels. He was quite right in stating that the currency and credit system of this country was at fault in so far as our present price levels are concerned. But what can we expect otherwise under our present financial system? The people who run our banking and financial institutions to-day are not considering first of all the welfare of the Canadian people; they are considering the profit which they can make out of their business. And we cannot blame them. Therefore, if my good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has any idea at all of being able to control price levels by virtue of the volume of currency and credit in circulation in relation to the volume of goods and services in circulation, then I am afraid he will be very much disappointed at the outcome of such a policy unless nationalization of our banking and financial system takes place before that idea is tried out. Why should the people of this country be called upon to pay interest charges above the cost of the service for the very necessary medium of exchange that is required to distribute goods and services? One would naturally think that with the tremendous productive system we have at the present time, and the tremendous demand for the goods of this productive system, one of the things essential both to producer and to consumer is a medium of currency which will flow equitably and ensure that these goods are properly distributed. And when we put our finger on the profit which those make who are engaged in permitting money and credit to come into circulation, we put our finger on what is the most important problem of all. I hope my good friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will follow up his studies still further, and that next session he will have seen the light just the same as we in this corner of the house believe we see it, and that we shall have his assistance in advocating and demanding the nationalization of our banking and currency system.

Other things besides the control of currency through nationalization are essential to make effective our present productive system. A year ago my good friend and colleague from Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) placed before this house a plea for national planning. I submit that one of the most important things after nationalization of the currency of the country is national planning—planning with the idea in our minds of providing the Canadian people with all the necessary food, clothing and shelter which they require from the natural resources of the country by our present machinery of production. Some system then, of national planning is essential, and the sooner we start on the job the better in my judgment, because if we do not do so, and if this depression continues, there is no telling where humanity will land by reason of our inability to plan nationally to take care of the interests of our people. Therefore I suggest again that it would be well for the government to take into consideration very seriously the creation of an economic research council such as was advocated by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) in the resolution which he placed before the house this session, and which was half-heartedly accepted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on behalf of the government. Such a research council to-day is absolutely essential, a council composed of the best brains of the different elements of this country, men who will set themselves to the task of planning nationally, not in the interests of a few people, but in the interests of the whole Canadian nation in order that eventually we may get away from conditions such as we have at the present time.

I might take a few minutes, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of hon. members to what might might be termed the development of the capitalistic system. Unfortunately many people in this and other countries think that the capitalistic system has been in existence for many centuries. As a matter of fact it is the shortest lived of any system we have ever had on the face of this globe as far as any records show. It may be said that the capitalistic system had its birth in the discovery of steam and its application to driving the machinery of production. With that discovery the present capitalistic system became possible. Let me say before I proceed further, in case hon. members may misconstrue my meaning, that in my judgment the present capitalistic system under which we are working has done more for the human race than all other former systems combined of which we have any record. The capitalistic system is certainly very efficient so far as production is concerned, but when we come to distribution it falls down, and falls down very badly.

Tracing briefly the history of the development of the capitalistic system, we find that with the application of steam to driving the machinery of production the inventive genius of the human race reached out to produce better and better machinery, so that this machinery to-day is capable of producing more and more than was possible with the machinery of former days, and with less labour. And how well has the human race achieved its objective! To-day we have a machinery of production so productive in comparison to the labour power required that its possibilities almost overwhelm the understanding of the average person. Undoubtedly so far as our present system is concerned there is no question about production. But I want for a minute or two to deal with one phase of the system which in my judgment the Minister of Finance should have given some consideration when he was proposing to this house the ways and means by which the necessary revenues of the public service might be provided. If you study very carefully the development of our present system you will find that in order to provide for the machinery of production the people have to take a certain portion of their consumable goods and turn them into permanent plant and equipment. In the past this has been done by what we call savings. Savings may be composed of profits or of actual savings from salaries or wages, as the case may be. These savings, however, represent purchasing power which the owners do not require to provide them with the necessaries of life. Therefore they have looked around and no doubt found that they could invest their savings to provide new plant and equipment which would be more productive than the plant and equipment used heretofore. That is the method by which we acquire the plant and equipment that we have in this and other countries the world over.

That being so, sir, let us look at the world situation as far as plant and equipment are concerned. Great Britain was the first country to develop the machinery of production to any extent, and very soon those who were making that machinery found they could not sell it all in Great Britain, so they sent it to other countries and exchanged it for whatever those countries could produce, or for money as the case might be. Eventually other countries became industrialized, so that to-day every country in the world, with the exception of three, is highly industrialized.

That is a condition which this country never had to face before. So we have a new problem facing us. Within the borders of each country, with the exception of three, there is enough plant and equipment to provide for the needs of the people living in that country. What then are we to do with the surpluses produced in this and other countries, when other countries are capable of producing everything they require? It is true that in Canada we do not produce rubber or cotton, but we produce more than enough wheat and other commodities which can be exchanged for those goods. Even allowing for the exchange of these surpluses we still have the situation of the world having become industrialized, a condition with which the human race has never had to cope. This is brought to our attention more forcibly than ever because of the depression.

What is the situation in this country? We have noticed recently, that many loans have been floated by the Dominion government, by the provinces and by different municipalities. It is true that they have paid enormous rates of interest on those loans but, sir, if you look up the bank returns you will find that to-day there is more money on deposit in our Canadian banks than ever before in the history of this country. Why is that? It is because the people who in the past made profits or who saved from their salaries or wages cannot under present conditions find profitable investments for those savings. Generally speaking, there are only two sources of investment, either bonds of governments and municipalities, or new plant and equipment in order to produce more goods. Since we have more than ample plant and equipment in this country to-day, and since that condition obtains also in almost every other country, we are faced with the problem of what we are to do with these savings of the people.

It must be remembered also, Mr. Speaker, that these savings represent purchasing power to supply which there are goods already in existence, but just as long as those savings remain in the banks those goods cannot move. Therefore our industrial plants and equipment are slowed down, creating more and more unemployment and making a condition with which we are finding it increasingly difficult to deal. I submit that the Minister of Finance might have taxed those savings into circulation. If he could have devised some method of doing that, probably the depression from which we are now suffering would begin to lift a little, but just as long as those savings remain in our banking institutions, and as long as they are not used for the purpose of providing new plant and equipment in the development of what we might term our capitalist system, I venture to predict that there will be no improvement in the depression now existing. It cannot be done. I have stated on more than one occasion, although not in this house, that if I were Minister of Finance just for long enough to bring in the budget I would take the attitude that under present conditions we are justified in taxing those enormous savings into circulation. I would even go so far as to say that in these days of depression we would permit the people with large incomes to enjoy an income of say $20,000 or $25,000 a year, but that we would take 99 per cent of all above that for the use of the state in order to improve conditions in this country. By virtue of such action the government would put those savings into circulation, through public works and services which are needed in every corner of this country, if it could not be done in any other way. I submit that the Minister of Finance missed a golden opportunity to do a real service for Canada, but I appreciate the fact that, having occupied his present position for only a short time, probably this was a little further than he dared go.

My time is nearly up, Mr. Speaker, and we still have to deal with the matter really before the house, that is, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. I have read and studied this amendment with a great deal of care, and there is at least one paragraph I can support, but the other portions of the amendment I consider very much exaggerated. Consider the last paragraph, for instance:

> That a reversal of the present fiscal policy in relation to customs tariffs and an immediate resumption of parliamentary direction and control with respect thereto are essential to a revival of trade, and improvement in business, and to the ultimate return of prosperity in Canada.

I assume the hon. member, speaking for the party he represents, suggests in that paragraph that we should go back to the fiscal policy in effect at the time of the last general election. May I direct attention to the fact that this depression started before the previous government went out of office, so the policies which they advocate in this paragraph appear to me very weak so far as their ability to meet the present depression is concerned. If these policies, in which no doubt they firmly believe, are as effective as they are claimed to be, why were they not effective in 1930? At that time they were not able to stop this depression, and we do know that even before July 28, 1930, the day of the election, we had a tremendous unemployment problem facing us. I do not know whether or not I am to understand from this amendment that this is the only policy suggested by the Liberal party to meet the present condition of depression; if it is, then I say it is totally inadequate to meet the situation. So, while as I stated before there are one or two statements contained in the amendment with which I quite agree, I think the policies suggested by my hon. friends are totally inadequate.

Representing an agricultural constituency, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I will always support lower duties on goods coming into this country. The primary producers cannot benefit from tariffs; that has been clearly demonstrated in the last two years, and we have only to consider some agricultural commodities to realize the truth of that statement. Furthermore we must always remember that the primary producers are the ones who create the new wealth which Canada enjoys each year. Under those circumstances, therefore, I will always vote for a lower tariff in order to reduce the production costs of the primary producers of this country. To that extent I will go, and I shall always be in that position of being able to support such a policy. But after all is said and done, I maintain that even that is not sufficient to overcome the depression which we are passing through at the present time. Something more drastic, something more fundamental is required than is contained in the amendment moved on behalf of the Liberal party in this house. Being unable, then, to accept the amendment, I am going to move a subamendment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth):

That all the words after the word "that" in the said proposed amendment be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

Whereas, in Canada there exists an ample supply of natural resources to provide for all primary needs, and

Whereas, we have developed an efficient industrial machine capable of producing more than sufficient of the requirements of our people, and

Whereas, notwithstanding this our external and internal debts are increasing enormously—large numbers of our citizens are in dire need and exist through governmental and charitable relief, and a large proportion are faced with declining purchasing power involving a lowered standard of living, and

Whereas, in our opinion these conditions are attributable to fundamental defects in the present economic system, and

Whereas, it is therefore necessary that parliament, the agency with the widest legislative powers, should take the initiative in the task of reconstructing national production and consumption with a view to the widest possible use of commodities on a basis of human needs, and

Whereas, the control of finance is a basic element in such reconstruction, affecting as it does industrial plant establishment and development, the distribution of goods and the price level of goods and services.

Therefore be it resolved, that in the opinion of this house, as a first step towards general economic reconstruction, our financial system should be nationalized, and provision be made to issue immediately sufficient money to bring the value of the dollar as speedily as possible to that point at which the major portion of our debts were incurred during the war; stabilize the dollar at this point internally and thereafter manage credit and currency issue to secure and maintain a stable price level within Canada.

Mr. J. A. SULLIVAN (St. Ann): This is my first address in this house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SULLIVAN: —and I am certainly very much impressed by the applause I am getting from the other side.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Your policy is wrong but you are a good fellow.

Mr. SULLIVAN: After listening to masters of rhetoric and dialectic I was reluctant to address the House of Commons, but this wonderful reception is certainly heartening. It brings to my mind a comment I read a few days ago by a French author upon another house of representatives of the people. Describing the play of passions and prejudices there, he ends by saying: "Car chaque jour on se plonge dans un bain de haine"—"For each day they plunge into a pool of hatred." No doubt the author has drawn upon his imagination and perhaps upon his resentment for these words; but one thing is sure, and that is that the description certainly does not apply to the House of Commons of Canada. We may sometimes have had displays of passion, but on the whole we work together in perfect understanding and harmony for the happiness and prosperity of our fellow citizens.

May I be allowed to say a few words about the division which has honoured me with its vote? St. Ann is the oldest division on the island of Montreal. On its shores three centuries ago Chomedy Maisonneuve founded Ville Marie, and his monument, erected in the very centre of the division, speaks of his heroic deeds. St. Ann is the headquarters of finance, of railways and shipping in Canada, and we also boast three most important newspapers, the Montreal Star, La Presse and Le Canada. But we boast more particularly of the mutual understanding which exists between the different races that compose the division and which are an example to the rest of Canada of what we must do to make of this dominion a great nation.

We are now discussing the budget. The other day we heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) in this great pronouncement which the nation has accepted, and on Monday we had the pleasure of listening to another very distinguished member from the maritime provinces, my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). I have always had a great deal of admiration and esteem for the hon. gentleman, especially since he has chosen to have his office in St. Ann division. He proceeded to criticize the budget, and he did so by comparisons all along the line. He spoke of the conversion loan, credit for which the Minister of Finance had given the Prime Minister. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth would not give him any consideration. He said that the people of Canada made this conversion loan possible, that in fact 50,000 people in this country subscribed amounts of less than $1,000. Sir, this is the greatest compliment that could come from the people to the Prime Minister of Canada, because in subscribing as they did they expressed their loyalty to their country and their faith in the Prime Minister.

The hon. member was scandalized because we had voted $20,000,000 at the last session and because we were responsible for the spending of $140,000,000 to relieve the unemployed. During the last election, I said, as many others did, that we had spent hundreds of millions to save our allies. We said we were ready to spend millions to save our own kin, our own Canadians; that is what we did and that is what we are ready to continue doing.

In order to understand the feelings of the people it is necessary to have their opinions. I have before me clippings from different newspapers in Canada, and I find that La Presse, which cannot be considered to be a Conservative paper, says of the budget "le budget est bien accueilli." La Patrie says that this is the best budget given to Canada in many years. Sir Charles Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal, has stated that the government has taken the best step possible under the present circumstances. Mr. John T. Foster, president of the Montreal Trades and Labour Council, says that this is a commendable attempt to balance the budget and is pleased to note the new surtax on incomes. The Conservative party, which has always been accused of being a friend of the big interests and corporations, is commended by the president of the Trades and Labour Council. Mr. Beaudry Leman, president of the Banque Canadienne Nationale, a very distinguished gentleman who is perhaps not a Conservative, says that this is a courageous budget. Mr. John Irwin, president of the McColl-Frontenac Company, says that it is a good budget and should serve its purpose.

I have stated before that my constituency is the headquarters of navigation in Canada. The Gibb report has been tabled by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), and I presume this important document will be discussed at a later date. It is very important that the questions affecting the St. Lawrence river should be studied. In 1825, after the completion of the Lachine canal which completed the waterway between Montreal and the great lakes, the government in deciding to make a deep water seaport of Montreal arranged to dredge a channel in the St. Lawrence river 14 feet in depth by 150 feet in width from Montreal to the sea. In 1850 the citizens of Montreal took it upon themselves to make this channel more suitable to the shipping needs. The government refused to guarantee the principal or interest on the bonds and the commissioners had to borrow money from the public in order to provide the proper facilities for shipping. It was only in 1889, after many protests had been made, that the government decided to take the matter in hand and work was proceeded with until 1910. In that year the government decided to dredge the channel to a depth of 35 feet and increase the width to 400 feet and although the work has been proceeded with up to the present day, it is not as yet completed. The sum of $34,000,000 has been spent on this work, which includes $13,000,000 for equipment, and over $200,000,000 has been spent by the government on the different canals between the great lakes.

There is no question as to the advantage of having large vessels coming to Montreal. This city is the greatest transfer point between the central states, where there are fifty millions of population, and European countries. But Montreal has lost this trade and something should be done. I appeal to the Minister of Marine to complete the channel between Montreal and Quebec, because every improvement made for the benefit of the port of Montreal is an advantage not only to the city of Montreal but to the whole of Canada. Because of the non-completion of this channel the rates of insurance on vessels coming to Montreal are more than double those charged on vessels going to New York. Based on the number of boats and the tonnage handled, this additional insurance amounted last year to more than $3,000,000. This is a tremendous discrimination against the harbour of Montreal and prevents many boats from using the St. Lawrence river route.

The speaker who preceded me stated that the economic system of Canada must be wrong, but what about that of other countries? It has been stated repeatedly in this house that unemployment this last year was worse than it was two years ago. Unemployment may be bad in Canada, but there is no gainsaying the fact that the present government has done everything possible to relieve this condition. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has proceeded by comparison. May I be allowed to proceed by the same method? What is the difference, as regards unemployment, between Canada and other countries in the last two years? I have under my hand some figures which came from the organ of the American Federation of Labour in the United States, and the figures for 1930 and 1931 are, in round numbers, as follows:

Country	Year	Number of unemployed
Germany	1930	4,300,000
	1931	5,600,000
Australia	1930	104,000
	1931	118,000
Denmark	1930	74,000
	1931	91,000
Great Britain	1930	1,853,000
	1931	2,262,000

The mother country, where they have the dole, where they had a Labour government for so many years, and where they passed all possible labour legislation which may be invoked and which our good friends in the far corner opposite are trying to put on the statute books of this country, had 1,853,000 unemployed in 1930, and just one year after, in spite of all this legislation, in spite of the socialist government in power at that time, the number of unemployed had increased to 2,262,000.

Country	Year	Number of unemployed
United States	1930	5,000,000
	1931	8,000,000

A number almost equal to the population of Canada. Unemployment is a universal condition; it exists not only in Canada but in every other country in the world, and so long as we are willing to devote our best attention and energies to the solution of this problem, no one can say we are not working in the best interests of Canada and of our unemployed.

In the course of the last election we were asked: Whom are you going to send to the imperial conference? The people of Canada gave us their confidence and we sent the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). During the election campaign he had toured the country, saying "Canada first," not in the narrow sense that Canada would not trade with any other nation, but broadly. He went to the imperial conference and there, in the face of all England, he repeated those same courageous words "Canada first." Was he wrong when he was giving interpretation not only to his own sentiments and those of Canada, but to those of Australia, New Zealand, the Irish Free State and every other member of the British commonwealth of nations? Is it possible that only the opposition and Mr. Thomas were right, and that all the others were wrong? The Prime Minister said "Canada first." Mr. Thomas said "humbug." The Prime Minister returned to Canada and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) said "humbug." Every member of the loyal opposition said "humbug." What has been the result? Was this a political slogan? No, it was an economic rallying cry. If it had been a political slogan, the people of England, who are essentially politicians, would not have accepted it; it would have fallen of itself. The result was that within one year there was a change of government in England. The further result is that the imperial conference will sit in Ottawa in the month of July and that this city will be the capital of the world for one month. The Prime Minister has been compared with many men. The dictator of Italy has been compared with him, and this was a great honour to Mussolini.

I do not wish to speak about the imperial conference, as it is a thing of the future, but I have great hopes of it. One sure thing is that the Prime Minister has been doing well for this country. I am sure the judgment of impartial history will be that the Prime Minister of Canada has deserved well of his country and of the British Empire and that he was one of the great men of the world.
