STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 31

1991 CANADA WINTER GAMES

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, from February 17 to March 2, 1991, the eyes of our nation will be firmly focused on my province of Prince Edward Island as 2,500 of our country's best young athletes will gather to compete in the 1991 Canada Winter Games.

The excitement and anticipation of the games are evident throughout the Island as 4,000 volunteers work together to prepare for this important event. In all, 68 communities will play host to competition as Islanders welcome Canadians to the place where our forefathers gathered to give birth to our nation in 1864. This will be a great opportunity for all of us to realize the potential of a united and cohesive Canada as we bring Canadians together in a common cause.

I encourage members from all parties, from all corners of our country, and all Canadians to come to Prince Edward Island to take part in this important national event. We can rest assured that the 1991 Canada Winter Games will be an exciting Canadian event.

ELECTION IN HAITI

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, December 16, a democratic election was held in Haiti. Father Jean Bertrand Aristide was elected with more than 70 per cent of the popular vote, after more than 35 years under a dictatorship Duvalier. As a friend of the Haitian people, I am glad the election process was orderly and democratic.

After electing Jean Bertrand Aristide, a personal friend and respected Haitian leader, this country will be able to make great strides towards democracy and justice. That is why I want to ask my government not only to increase material aid to this country but also to promote economic and political relations with a newly-elected government that will be more supportive of justice and open government, in a new, democratic Haiti.

CANADIAN MERCHANT NAVY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period last November 8, I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs if he would do the right thing and quickly introduce legislation that would give war veterans status to former members of the Canadian Merchant Navy who during World War II had sailed through dangerous waters.

The minister seemed to indicate that his department was looking into it. I understand the minister was telling not only me and this House but also the veterans most concerned with this question and the people of Canada that his department would be discussing with a number of veterans groups the possibility of giving veterans status to World War II merchant navy veterans.

We were wrong. Neither the minister nor anyone from his department has attended any meetings of the study group which the veterans groups have set up to study a number of questions including the matter of merchant seamen.

The minister should take the earliest possible opportunity to give war veteran status to Canada's merchant seamen who served our country during World War II. Surely this is an issue that has been studied to death and should be acted on immediately. But, if the minister insists on studying it a little more, he or his representatives should actively conduct that study with the assistance of veterans organizations including representatives of merchant navy veterans.

I hope the minister will tell this House and the people of Canada if he has completely rejected the possibility of giving war veterans status to merchant seamen. If he has not, he should at long last do the right thing and bring in legislation. We will put it through in one day and correct this historic injustice.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, last month it was the men and women of Air Canada who fell victim to the government's irresponsible economic policies; 2,800 jobs were lost across Canada, 240 in Manitoba. Two weeks ago the government's misguidance in other policies led to cuts to the CBC eliminating an estimated 40 to 50 jobs in Manitoba alone. This week it is the Royal Canadian Mint in Winnipeg; 29 more employees have been laid off with little hope, if any, of return.

When will this government learn to stop this brutal slashing of good jobs for Canadians and stop picking on western Canadians. Is there a minister in the government prepared to tell us today of the other job cuts Canadians can expect this winter as a result of policies such as high interest rates, the Canadian U.S. trade agreement, and the inflationary goods and services tax?

What a disgrace. Almost 5 million Canadians are poor, close to 2 million are on welfare, and over half a million are using overcrowded food banks. When will this assault on the working Canadian men and women cease?

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the 1991 Atlantic groundfish management plan clearly demonstrates that recent government measures including quota cuts have worked for the benefit of all Canadians, particularly those in the fishing industry. Increases in 4X and 5 cod quotas clearly indicate that we have turned the corner in the Scotia Fundy region.

I commend the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for his sensitive and sensible TAC for the vital 2J and 3K–L cod stock. The established figure finds a reasonable balance between allowing the stock an opportunity to recover while at the same time securing the social and economic needs of those fishermen and plant workers whose livelihood depends on the stock.

Suggestions from Cabot Martin of the Newfoundland Inshore Fisheries Alliance should be seen as a self–serving hypocrisy that they are. During the past week he has been the darling of the media calling for major cuts in the quota but of course intends that all the cuts should be from the offshore sector.

• (1410)

Today's announcement from the European Community for an excessive unilateral EC quota of northern cod should be condemned from all sides of this House and by all Canadians. Through the sound management of this government and this minister, our cod stocks will come back and secure a great future for the Atlantic ground fishery. However, 1991 may require new measures for dealing with our European friends.

POVERTY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, as Christmas approaches, I would like to draw the attention of this House to the shameful fact that poverty and malnutrition are affecting increasingly larger numbers of Canadians. One family out of five spends more than 50 per cent of its income on shelter. Sixty per cent of single–parent families, mostly headed by women, live below the poverty line.

In Montreal's disadvantaged neighbourhoods, 12 per cent of the children are born underweight, which is more than in many Third World countries. Fortunately, community organizations and volunteers are helping to deal with this problem.

I would like to pay tribute to these people today and ask hon. members to increase pressure on the government and do their share to provide a minimum of dignity for our poorest fellow Canadians.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the action taken by the CBC is no different from that taken by Radio-Québec in 1986, when it closed nine regional production centres, and earlier this year, when it closed its office in Gaspé.

Where the cuts are to be made is the exclusive responsibility of the president and CBC officials. Let them open their books so that members of Parliament and the Quebec public can see for themselves what their assets and liabilities are.

Mr. Speaker, instead of shouting at Conservative members from Eastern Quebec, PQ MPP Jean Garon should tell Quebecers what he ought to have done to prevent the closing of regional stations by Radio-Québec. This message also concerns the federal NDP and its Quebec wing.

BRITISH COLUMBIA MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, last week the MLA for Okanagan West, Mr. Cliff Serwa, a constituent of mine, was named the Minister of the Environment for British Columbia.

Having known Mr. Serwa for many years, I believe he will do an outstanding job. I know he looks forward to working with our Minister of the Environment as the green plan proceeds.

I am sure all members of this House join me in wishing Mr. Serwa well as he takes on his new responsibilities.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in Moncton today, nearly 2,000 Acadians will demonstrate to protest the cuts at the CBC. As a result of these cuts, there will hardly be any news about the performance of young Acadians at the Jeux d'Acadie.

In Timmins—Chapleau, in my riding, we have lost our voice, making our isolation even more obvious. The government spends several million dollars on a commission on national unity, and meanwhile, the Minister of Communications does nothing to prevent cuts in the CBC network, one of the very tools we need to promote dialogue and understanding among Canadians.

In the case of francophones outside Quebec, these cuts have made them even more isolated and vulnerable. If the Prime Minister is sincere about his efforts to promote national unity, he should ensure that his government supports his position instead of undermining it.

RURAL WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, rural weekly newspapers play a vital role in our communities, in our provinces, and in our nation. By communicating information within the community and informing people of the government policies and programs, they play a vital role in news gathering and dissemination. They play an important part in the whole democratic process in Canada.

Last week the Mulroney government declared war on these rural weekly papers by dramatically increasing the postage rates and taxes that these newspapers pay. This has caused an increase in costs of over 350 per cent for one weekly newspaper in my constituency.

The Manitoulin Expositor, a weekly paper on Manitoulin Island, will have its postage charges when combined with the GST tax increased from $17,000 this year to $57,000 next year. This is an unconscionable increase for this rural weekly newspaper. I am sure that many weekly newspapers will go out of business next year because of these new taxes and postage increases.

I call on the government to stop this destruction of our rural weekly newspapers and roll back these tax and postage increases.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, last week I had the privilege of attending two meetings of senior citizens clubs in my riding. I am referring to L'Âge d'or de Saint-Jovite and Le Cercle d'amitié de Lafontaine.

The number of senior citizens is increasing steadily, and seniors are becoming more and more active in a variety of areas. That is the case in my riding as well, and I am delighted. I am proud to see that senior citizens are trying to take the place that is rightfully theirs in the community.

I would like to pay tribute to all senior citizens who regularly participate in community activities. They have demonstrated that seniors are dynamic and are making a very significant and very enriching contribution to society.

MARGARET THATCHER

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, a remarkable era in British politics ended last month as Margaret Thatcher stepped down after serving as Prime Minister of that country for eleven and one-half years.

I rise today to pay tribute to this great world leader and remarkable statesperson. Mrs. Thatcher's pragmatic approach to complex issues, as well as her undaunting commitment to freedom and the free enterprise system, were trademarks of her political career that were best demonstrated by her valuable contribution to the ending of the cold war and the opening of eastern Europe.

Here in Canada, Thatcher's opposition to the common agricultural policy of the European Economic Community has been appreciated by our prairie farmers, given the economic consequence they have suffered as a result of that trade distorting welfare program.

Mrs. Thatcher never shied away from her iron lady image, which she earned from the Soviet media for her opposition to communism and unwavering support of the NATO alliance. I salute the iron lady. She is an inspiration to us all.

RACIAL TOLERANCE

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw your attention to the growing intolerance faced by Canada's Muslim and Arabic population.

As Canada and the west prepare to go to war with Saddam Hussein, too many commentaries and images have portrayed Iraqis and other Arab peoples as the new enemies of the west. This is racism pure and simple and must never be allowed to go unchallenged.

[Translation]

Statements inciting hatred against any identifiable group should be vigourously condemned by all members of the House. I want to ask the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) to take up the defence of Moslem and Arab groups in Canada. It is the very least we can do, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR DISPUTES

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government has really taken its lack of caring for the unemployed of this country to the limit. The infamous 85 per cent call-back rule before workers are entitled to UI has been turned down by a local board of referees, by an umpire and by the Federal Court of this country.

Not to worry, the government has not given up in its fight against the unemployed. It has appealed the decision to the Supreme Court to ensure that even when a labour dispute ends, workers will not qualify for UI.

I have received indications from labour lawyers and government officials that the Supreme Court decision may be lost by the government. However, faced with this possibility, once again it has demonstrated a total lack of compassion. The government is now suggesting that with the new improved Bill C-21, which supersedes the old bill which is even more stringent, it can disregard the ruling by the Supreme Court.

Through this manoeuvre the government is saying it is above the law of the land. The quality of mercy is certainly strained. Merry Christmas to the Tories from the unemployed of this country.

THE SENATE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, as the year draws to an end, it is difficult to forget the spectacle caused by the MacEachen group in the Senate. Amidst desk thumping rhythmics accompanied by a symphony of kazoos and efforts to gain entry into the Guinness World Book of Records for long-windedness, the reputation and the respect of Canada's chamber of sober second thought slithered to a point that defied definition. Let us hope that the credibility given to this Chamber by the Conservative senators becomes contagious and that the 20-plus government bills currently before them are dealt with in a manner that had previously been the expectation of that place.

And to the departing interim Leader of the Opposition, who with his credibility has provided wise, respectable leadership in the House of Commons, it is unfortunate for every point he gained for his party in the polls that his Liberal counterparts in the Senate cost him a point and one-half.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: I just want to say to all hon. members that they will note, because of the largess of the Speaker, all members who wished to make a statement today were allowed to do so. It is part of the Christmas spirit. Do not count on it during the new year.

Mr. Gauthier: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: This is stretching Christmas spirit far too far.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, in the same spirit, would you allow for all questions to be put and answered?

Mr. Speaker: Only on one condition, that not only the minister asked but all other ministers may join in the answer.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. members: Herb, Herb, Herb.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues for their applause and above all for their encouragement and support over the past several months. I certainly look forward to working with the new leader in the same co-operative and constructive spirit.

In that sense, I also want to thank the government for giving me such good material, which I say with some regret I forecast will continue to be the case in months to come.

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I ask this question because today the Canadian Manufacturers' Association published its year-end review. It confirmed that we are in a made in Canada recession, one it said was "precipitated by rising interest and exchange rates". In other words, it is due to the misguided economic policies of this government. The report says that this recession will result in "the loss of 180,000 manufacturing jobs, of which perhaps half will be permanently lost", and "the bankruptcy and closure of hundreds of manufacturing firms".

Why is the Minister of Finance the last person in this country to recognize the carnage being caused by his own policies to the economy and the people of this country and why will he not start doing something right now to stop this carnage and devastation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I recognized that we are coming into a difficult economic period in the budget of February, so it was something that we had anticipated. We felt it was coming, as I have indicated in the past. It is something that does happen when a country has gone through 7.5 years of very strong growth. It is happening in the United States, it is happening in the United Kingdom, it is happening in Australia, it is happening in some other countries. We are not alone in the difficulties we are experiencing.

We recognized this in the spring of this year when we started bringing interest rates down. Interest rates have come down more than 200 basis points. There will be a further reduction in the bank rate tomorrow, as indicated by the markets now. I think this is the best thing we can do in order to provide lower borrowing costs, freeing up opportunities for economic activity right across the country.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I regret I have to say that that answer simply will not do for the thousands of Canadians standing in the unemployment lines. It simply will not do for the thousands of Canadians standing in the welfare lines. It simply will not do for the thousands of Canadians standing in the food bank lines tragically, even in this holiday season right across this country, due to the misguided policies of this government.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association said that this did not have to happen. When will the minister wake up and start doing something new and meaningful for the thousands of workers who are losing their jobs permanently because of the recession caused by the policies of this minister? Why will he not do something right now for the innocent victims of his and his government's made in Canada recession?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that lowering interest rates simply will not do. He has been critical of high interest rates for some period now. I think we have been moving reasonably aggressively to get interest rates down. Now he says it simply will not do.

If it will not do, then what is the position of the Liberal Party? We have heard this time and again whether it is free trade, whether it is on the goods and services tax, now on economic policies. The Liberal Party of Canada is full of a lot of hot air but it is not full of any constructive alternatives as to how it would do things better or differently.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are saying to the minister and his government that they want an election and a new and better government, not unfortunately the government that we are looking at on the other side of the House. When the minister talks about high interest rates being brought down, Canadians know that what he has been doing has been too little too late.

Today, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association published its year-end report. I want to ask the Minister of Finance: When will he go to unemployment insurance offices across Canada and see all those people waiting in line? How does he think the unemployed are going to get through Christmas without any hope of better times in the New Year? Why are there not new policies for all these unemployed workers?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we acknowledged there are currently many weak spots in our economy, and we have reduced interest rates since last spring. The result will create opportunities for future growth. It is normal for the economy to slow down after seven and a half years of very strong growth. Furthermore, we have kept the inflationary pressures we had two years ago under control. There may be future reductions in interest rates, and that is the best answer for our economy today.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, in its February Budget, the government acknowledged that all the elements were in place for a recession. The Minister of Finance got his wish: the unemployment rate is rising while thousands of jobs are being lost every month. The bankruptcy rate in Canada has reached record levels, and we know we are in a recession that has engulfed the entire country.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: Is he satisfied with the results of his economic policy? Does the Minister of Finance believe it will be a Merry Christmas and a prosperous New Year for Canadians, thanks to his policies?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no one is happy about a recession. No one is happy about seeing people lose their jobs. No one is happy about seeing people go bankrupt. But these are things that happen in an economy that is growing faster than the capacity of the economy to meet that growth.

There are certain signs in the economy. If the hon. member would look at The Globe and Mail this morning, it says, "Robust trade month a surprise". There is a continuation of export growth in the economy. I think this is something we can take some comfort in, that it is not all the black picture which my hon. friend and the Leader of the Opposition seek to portray here. It is important to recognize that we talk about these things with a good deal of balance, recognizing that there are difficulties, but also recognizing that there are some positive elements in the economy today.

• (1430)

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the sharp drop in U.S. interest rates yesterday just widened the gap between our rates and the American rates.

Canadians are suffering the permanent loss of jobs in the manufacturing sector, and the minister knows that, and personal and corporate bankruptcies are reaching an all–time record in this country.

How does the minister explain to Canadian businessmen, who are facing high interest rates and a high Canadian dollar, how they are going to be competitive and how they are going to survive in this climate, that was created as a definite plan by the government and proposed in its February budget? What is the minister's answer to Canadian business, if he does not want to answer us?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me just point out that in the past couple of months we have seen a narrowing in the interest rate spread between the United States and Canada of 150 bases points. So, we are responding to the concerns that the hon. member has referred to just now. We talk a lot to business people and are hearing those same concerns but we have also responded.

My hon. friend has asked why we got into that position. In 1988 and 1989, it was a very clear picture that we were looking at of strong inflationary pressures in the economy. If we had ignored those problems, if we had let the inflation get out of control, as it did in the seventies and early eighties, those same business people would be facing considerably higher inflation rates today and considerably higher rates of interest and that would have resulted in considerably higher levels of unemployment.That, Mr. Speaker, is what we are trying to avoid with the policies we have been following.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ETHIOPIAN FAMINE RELIEF

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if I may say so I, too, congratulate the hon. member for Windsor West for his work as Leader of the Opposition and I think we all have appreciated his contributions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: My question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. It has been a very difficult year for Canada with high unemployment, a recession, and serious questions of national unity and we have all done a lot of soul searching in the House.

But I would like to take this time to look outside ourselves as well, because as a nation we do have a responsibility for people who are in much worse circumstances than ourselves and not ignore the fact that millions of human beings, around the world, are starving during this holiday season. I think we really should look at our role as a nation. There are some four million people starving in northern Ethiopia and it is suggested that what is needed, through Oxfam Canada, is $1.75 million.

Will the government commit to ward off this famine and commit now to that $1.75 million, so that the people of northern Ethiopia can have a happy holiday season too?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I, before I begin my response, add my heartfelt congratulations to the Leader of the Opposition on being relieved of that post. Some of us know what a great deal of satisfaction leaving that post can be. And may I also—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Explain.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Oh, I think there is room for a little ambiguity.

Let me also express to the Leader of the New Democratic Party our congratulations to her on her conduct as we draw near the end of the calendar year in which she has been serving as the leader of her party.

On the question of Ethiopia, first, the government certainly shares the very strong view that has been expressed by the member for Yukon with respect to our international obligations and we try hard to honour those. We try hard to honour those through ODA and we try hard to honour those through bringing an early and peaceful end to a conflict in the Gulf, whose principal victims are precisely the poor of developing countries who are faced with the double impact of high energy prices and the loss of remittances coming to their countries.

I am concerned and we are concerned about Ethiopia. There have been discussions raised by private members with regard to the value of a special trip by members of Parliament representing the three parties in the House to that region over the Christmas period. I believe that would be a useful undertaking. I intend to follow through on that suggestion.

We will then take a look at the specific recommendations that those members of Parliament may make to us upon their return.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I certainly appreciate the point of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that perhaps there is a place for an independent review of the situation in Africa which is very serious. I would applaud that initiative.

I would like to say that there is an immediate problem that we know about right now. Oxfam Canada has estimated that a million tonnes of grain is needed in northern Ethiopia and a million tonnes of grain in the Sudan. Yet, it is also estimated that right here in Canada we are sitting with 33 million tonnes of surplus grain still in farmers' storage bins.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture if the Canadian government consider purchasing that grain from Canadian farmers and donating it to those people who need it right now and cannot wait.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned, we are indeed concerned about Ethiopia. My hon. colleague probably knows that an agreement to reopen the port of Massawa was finally reached between the Ethiopian government and the rebels. I think this shows that donor countries did try to bring the two sides to reopen the port so that the greatest number of people could be reached and helped. I personally met, a day or two ago, with a coalition of NGOs returning from Ethiopia and discussed with them so as to respond effectively to the Ethiopian crisis in the months to come. We will also go on cooperating, as we did last year, with the international community and the Canadian ONGs through which most of our food aid reaches the Ethiopian people, to provide as much assistance as possible to the Ethiopians.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, our world has completely changed during the year now drawing to a close. But what we must realize as well is that the world is not only a big market but also a big family. I have just referred to the famine which is destroying certain regions of Africa while we here in Canada stare at huge accumulating wheat surpluses. My question is simple: Will the government give these surpluses to the people who are now starving in Africa?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Surely, Mr. Speaker, my colleague is aware that if we are to provide assistance and food to distressed people in Ethiopia the donor countries have to co-ordinate their efforts to make sure that food assistance does get to the people. That would be our first consideration. We have assistance budgets and, as I have shown in recent years, we are prepared to buy the food and ship it to Ethiopia. I am sure my colleague knows that the on-going war often made it impossible for us to reach the people involved. In the past few years we agreed to deliver food through the means available to us and other donor countries, either via the south road or through cross border operations. But it is not a simple matter of shipping more wheat and foodstuffs, we have to make sure assistance will get to the people.

This is why I sought the co-operation of non-government organizations to gather the necessary information and bring pressure to bear on the party involved. Our efforts have been successful in the case of the re-opening of the Massaoua harbour. This amounts to a major victory for the international community, because we know we will have new mechanisms to with which deliver the food supplies.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Over the past two years, 14,000 jobs were lost in 63 Montreal businesses. The rate of unemployment has now reached 11.7 per cent in Montreal, the highest municipal rate in Canada. Given this, is the minister prepared to meet Quebec government officials and the Mayor of Montreal to determine an action plan to create full time and indeterminate jobs? Is she willing to take these steps now?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, many steps were taken in Montreal, as in the rest of the country.

• (1440)

[English]

I would like to mention one industry in Montreal in particular which is doing very well and that is the pharmaceutical industry. Thanks to the legislation of this government, which the hon. member said was going to lose jobs, it has created hundreds of jobs in Montreal, including hundreds of research jobs in Montreal.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, that answer will not satisfy the unemployed in Montreal, the rate of which is higher than any other city in Canada, including St. John's, Newfoundland.

Next month, 1,100 workers at Pratt & Whitney in Longueuil will lose their jobs. They do not need training. They want jobs.

What is the minister going to do for these workers? They do not want to hear rhetoric, they want some action.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, training and jobs go together. That is why the pharmaceutical industry is such a good example. It requires skilled jobs. The jobs are created and we have the programs to train people to take those jobs. We cannot have one without the other.

We have in this country, not only a need for jobs, but we have a need for skills. We have a mismatch between those jobs that are available, and the skills available. Clearly, the hon. members on the other side, who have held up our capacity to do this for so long, do not want to listen because they just keep talking.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POVERTY

Mrs. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The National Council of Welfare, which is an advisory body to the minister, tells us that the vast majority of the 1.9 million Canadians who rely on welfare are children, disabled people and single–parent families with incomes up to 50 percent less than the poverty line. During that time, the government refuses to pay its fair share of the costs of welfare, especially in the province with the most new cases.

I would ask the minister to tell the victims of this government's economic mismanagement why it has given up on them.

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member were being at all fair and accurate, she would not use terminology such as abandoning people.

This year alone, some $5.8 billion will be transferred to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan. The hon. member will also be aware of the fact that since the Liberal government was turned out of office, a significant number of Canadians, almost 1 million, have risen above the low–income cut–offs and about one–third of those are Canadian children. In a number of important areas, this government has taken initiatives in order to improve employment opportunities for Canadians and improve social benefits for Canadians.

When it comes to dealing with the problems of the poor or of any socially progressive movement, the Liberal Party talks yes, but it votes no.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, this year, half a million Canadians turned to food banks each month in the hope of surviving the last two years of this government.

Will the minister commit today to visit some of the nation's 200 food banks during Christmas so he can see first-hand the poverty that his government has so callously ignored?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, not only do I make a practice of visiting facilities across the country which serve Canadians—whether they be food banks, child care centres or a whole range of other facilities—but I think it is important as well that the hon. member take advantage of the coming season to visit with some of the Canadians who have found jobs in the last six years.

The hon. member should meet some of the mothers who, for the first time, have been able to find employment, who have seen their children rising out of poverty, and who have seen a doubling of the child tax credit. She should talk with Canadians who for so long languished under Liberal complacency and who saw opportunities presented to them as more than one million Canadians have found new jobs.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, today yet another independent agency, the Toronto Dominion Bank, came out with a report that said: "This is the second worst recession since World War II". It blames, and again I quote: "federal government policies implemented by the Bank of Canada".

My question is to the Minister of Finance. Now that the United States has cut its bank rate to 6.5 per cent, even though the United States inflation rate is higher than here in Canada, will this government cut interest rates here in Canada in a major way so as to help the hungry and the unemployed in this period of despair as Christmas comes forward?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have been cutting interest rates on a very regular basis starting back in May of this year when the Bank of Canada rate was 14.05 per cent. Last week it was 12.01 per cent. It will be lower tomorrow when the treasury bill auction takes place.

We have been responding to the weakness in the economy with a continuous reduction in interest rates. As I responded to a previous questioner, the interest rate spread between the United States and Canada has narrowed by some 150 basis points during the same period of time.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of Finance. I think we have seen clear that this government has failed to protect those who will suffer from this recession in which we are living clearly.

Over 17,000 Canadians use food banks every day, 500,000 a month. That is up 30 per cent over last year. Over 1.9 million Canadians live on welfare. Instead of offering a helping hand to Canada's poor, this government has handed them a kick in the teeth by placing a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan.

At this time of Christmas, with a hard winter ahead and with poverty and hunger increasing dramatically in this country, will the minister just once change his mind, do just one thing to help Canada's poor and take the cap off the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan is a cap of an increase of some 5 per cent over last year in the three most prosperous provinces in Canada.

In his province, for example, there is no cap whatsoever on the Canada Assistance Plan. This year, we will be transferring to the provinces some $5.8 billion in terms of assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan.

It is time for members of the opposition to be honest with Canadians. In view of the fact that every Canadian has in their name in Ottawa a share of the national debt amounting to some $13,000, is it his recommendation, and the recommendation of the NDP that we should continue to run up that debt and simply pass on the bill to our children?

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. It concerns the sudden shutdown of the CBC television station in Sydney.

With the closing of VIA Rail, the Canadian Armed Forces base, cuts to Air Canada and the gutting of the Atlantic fishery, the economy of eastern Nova Scotia is in tatters.

The closing of this television station means the loss of dozens of jobs and deprives the people of my riding and that of all Cape Breton of a special link with the rest of the country.

Why is the minister so intent and determined to dismantle another national institution and take away more jobs from an area that is already suffering tremendous economic hardship?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, several study groups studied and recommended the reorganization of the CBC and the Corporation took steps to accomplish just that. I will be happy to explain in greater detail the basis of this decision tomorrow, when I testify before the parliamentary committee.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): My supplementary is to the same minister. The minister will know that the primary tool to facilitate and enhance national unity has been the CBC. Canadians in the poorer regions of this country want to know from this government how it will achieve this vital objective when, in fact, it shuts down those institutions that in effect bind all Canadians together. Why is the minister so intent and so determined to shut down this national institution, the CBC, which can and has facilitated national unity in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the government always looked upon the CBC as a government agency with an important role to play, as evidenced by all the programs made available to the Canadian people. With that in mind, the government always made sure that the average increase in the global revenues of the Corporation was higher than the combined average for government programs as a whole. However, this does not preclude the CBC—as any private network, newspaper and daily paper in Canada and in most Western countries—to adjust to market conditions because our nation may be predicated on unity, but it is also predicated on free market, Mr. Speaker.

HOSTAGES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

All Canadians have a great admiration for the character and determination showed by the Canadians who were held hostage in Iraq and Kuwait. I think we are all very pleased that they are now home for Christmas. I want to say that for many of them the trauma they experienced did not end with their release. Many of them are now suffering very serious economic hardship because they had to leave their jobs and assets. Some are having a very trying time making a personal adjustment after their difficult experience.

Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs prepared to offer services and resources by the government to help these very brave Canadians in their adjustment back to Canada, including writing off the travel costs which External Affairs has imposed upon them in terms of their return from Iraq and Kuwait? Could the minister give that undertaking in the House today?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that everyone admires the courage of the Canadians who were trapped in Kuwait. There is no doubt that everyone in this House is very gratified that the very strong and unflinching position taken by the international coalition led to persuade Saddam Hussein to release all of the hostages.

The hon. member raises a question as to whether or not Canada should, in this particular instance, change a policy that has been applied without variation since 1961, a policy that was applied without variation during circumstances when difficult questions arose while the member who poses the question was a member of a government which applied that policy without variation.

The member knows that the arguments made against changing the policy when he was a minister were as valid as they are today. I have considered the question as to whether we should change because of the unusual pressures upon these Canadians, a policy which the hon. member respected when he was a member of a government and which other governments have for nearly three decades now. My view is that we should not change that policy. Naturally, if there are some particular circumstances that the hon. member would want to draw to my attention, I would be prepared to look at them.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, to make the record correct, in our time in government we did not experience the kind of hostage taking that Canadians have experienced in the last period of time in Iraq and Kuwait. I think this is a special circumstance and I would sincerely ask the minister to reconsider his position and the position of the government. I ask him in specific terms if he would have his own officials undertake to contact each of the hostages and their families directly to determine what the nature of their economic and personal circumstances might be and whether in fact some resources, some help or some way of helping them to come back into the country can be offered and also gain from them the kind of information and experience that they had, especially in Kuwait in light of what we heard about atrocities and economic sanctions?

These Canadian hostages are a valuable resource to Canada. I think Canada should be treating them properly. I ask the minister to reconsider his position and give these Canadians the proper deference and the proper credit they deserve for what they did for this country.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have answered most of that question. I said that I have considered very seriously whether we should change a policy that was respected by the Liberal Party and by ours, respected by the hon. member when he was a minister, with respect to the principle that there would not be compensation for Canadians who were caught in extraordinary circumstances abroad. I also told him that I would be prepared to look at any serious proposal that he put forward.

With respect to the other part of his question, I think it would be very helpful to my department, and perhaps a subsequent report to Parliament, to consult with the Canadians who were prisoners in Kuwait and in Iraq. I have instructed my officials to undertake that kind of consultation, particularly with a view as to gaining their information on the situation in that region and their view as to improvements that might be made in the way Canada responds to circumstances of that kind should, God forbid, such circumstances occur again.

I think it is particularly important to do that, Mr. Speaker, in light of the recent report by Amnesty International, whose commentary upon the atrocities committed by Iraq in Kuwait should cause great concern to everyone in this House. Very often we neglect the fact that this crisis exists because a war was begun by Iraq against Kuwait and the most cruel kind of treatment is being imposed upon the people of Kuwait.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question with respect to the final, final round of the GATT negotiations which are now being arranged for Geneva early in 1991 to break the deadlock in the agriculture panel and in the services panels.

Is our government still working toward the inclusion of agriculture in the GATT rules? What changes to our October 15 position are we proposing in an effort to get an agreement? What other actions is Canada taking in order to resolve the current impasse?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I think has been indicated here this week, we are still of course fully engaged in attempting to resolve the problems that developed in the latter stages of the Uruguay Round at Brussels two weeks ago. That process is continuing. I am keeping in touch with other trade ministers, particularly from the United States, the European Community and other countries. I am hopeful that certainly by the end of February that the round can be successfully completed. Whether that will be so or not, of course only time will tell.

We have not changed our own position, but we are prepared certainly to review it. We are reviewing it and we are prepared to be flexible if other people are prepared to be flexible as well. That is what is necessary if there is to be a resolution of these problems.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, does the government prefer to have a solution that will freeze and reduce the export subsidies or is it seriously looking at the kind of proposal that Premier Grant Devine put forward of having a food tax to finance the further subsidization of food production in this country?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. gentleman is in favour of a food tax. When we mention taxes around here usually they turn purple in the face at the very mention of a tax. We will take the hon. member's suggestion that there should be a food tax imposed in Canada under consideration. But it would not be for very long, I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, before we would be forced to reject that.

With respect to the negotiations on agriculture, to have a solution to that, the GATT rules must apply to agriculture. We must have a definite position taken by the countries concerned with export subsidies, border measures and internal support, otherwise the final outcome could be negotiated. But the parameters are very clear. There must be a definite commitment with respect to those areas.

EXPORT AND IMPORT CONTROLS ACT

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the Minister for International Trade a question regarding a matter that has significant implications for Canada's defence industry. Provisions of the Criminal Code effectively inhibit Canadian industry exports to our friends and allies.

• (1500)

The government has been repeatedly requested by affected Canadian industry to bring forward legislation to permit these exports, subject of course to strict controls under the Export and Import Permits Act.

My question to the minister has two parts. First, will the government introduce such legislation and, second, if so, when?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is well aware of the problem that exists with reference to one of our export industries. I think one of those concerns is located in the hon. gentleman's district. He has been very diligent in bringing forward the problem and in urging a solution.

The answer is that legislation is prepared and will be introduced shortly after the House returns.

MEDICAL EMERGENCIES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Some 77 persons on average die world-wide each year of cardiac arrest while aboard commercial aircraft. Many European airlines provide the defribillaters for medical personnel aboard flights in case of emergencies.

What is the minister doing about the need for defribillaters and other life saving medical supplies on board our passenger airlines?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my friend raises an important issue which probably arises as a result of a very unfortunate incident this last weekend.

I have reviewed the situation, and I have asked my officials to begin to prepare the necessary amendments to the air navigation orders to require that flight attendants be trained in CPR.

My hon. friend makes an additional suggestion. I will take that up with my officials in the airlines and get back to him.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I direct my question to the Minister of Justice. Being aware of the speech delivered by the Prime Minister at Buckingham and the representations made by Jean Chrétien before the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, as the constitutional issue stands now, can the minister tell me whether they amount to the same thing? Could she tell me the difference between the constitutional position of Jean Chrétien and that of Brian Mulroney?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): This is a challenging question, Mr. Speaker, and I could respond in more detail if we had a few hours to spare. But the answer is simple, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister has a vision of Canada and he has always tried to achieve it. I think he made the necessary efforts to hold the country together during the Meech Lake Accord process and that he will continue to work to that end, Mr. Speaker.

SENATE REFORM

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I want to wish you a Merry Christmas. In that light I appreciate very much the opportunity from this row to ask a question and further the answer of the Minister of Justice as to the mandate of the Prime Minister.

Since there is no minister here for interprovincial or interfederal relations—that minister is in the Senate, wherever he may be—I ask the question of my old friend, the Acting Prime Minister in a semi-serious way. I hope that there will be some consideration of this question, as there are many things to consider over the break.

Since we have finished the circus in the Senate, with all of that disgraceful situation, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, the Prime Minister and/or whoever is the minister in this House for federal–provincial relations. I hope some day there may be a minister in this House for federal–provincial relations.

This is the last question before Christmas. Will the Deputy Prime Minister seriously consider something that is not going to ever be resolved unless we consider this question? The question is this: forget about constitutional reform, will this House of Commons, in the new resumed session after Christmas, decide to have de facto Senate reform by cutting off the Senate water, the Senate electricity, and the Senate money so that we do not have to worry about Senate reform?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: How that meets the spirit of Christmas I do not know, but the minister may want to reply.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to return the hon. member's wish to the House for good cheer and hope that he will enjoy his share of it in the course of the holidays.

I can advise the hon. member that it is not the plan of the government to do anything to try to deprive the members of the other place of any of the requisites necessary to do their jobs, however those may be defined.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I should like to take a moment to express to my colleagues—

[English]

A very sincere wish to all of you and to all of your families for a happy Christmas and a good new year and I include in that a wish for our country.

I thank you for your help and co-operation during the year.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL--SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, in both official languages.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence of the report this day also.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS--NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew--Nipissing--Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. In so doing, I would like to make the following remarks.

The ninth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, which I have the honour to table today, relates to serious weaknesses in financial management and control in the Department of External Affairs. In particular, the department has failed properly to control accountable advances to employees to such an extent that approximately $25 million in advances were outstanding on March 31, 1990. These advances to employees relate to a variety of purposes including vacation leave, family reunion travel, educational travel, medical travel, et cetera.

Half of these are overdue and in many cases should have been repaid long ago.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You are just tabling a report. I am sorry, I will allow the hon. member to bring it up to the table.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, if I may on a point of privilege, it is normal when tabling a public accounts report to give an explanation of that report.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, I agree, and the hon. member who has been here for a long time realizes that, and I realize that. But, it should be a short report.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I will abide by your ruling, but the records will show differently.

In these times of fiscal restraint and high deficits, the annual interest cost alone in these overdue advances may amount to $1.5 million. This is a burden that taxpayers should not have to carry.

The real problem is a lack of professional standards in its accounting operation within the department, and the department must ensure that these standards are achieved and maintained in all areas of financial management and control.

The committee has asked for an early response for the department by January 31, 1991 and has asked the Auditor General to assess this response on behalf of the public accounts committee.

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I also have a motion concerning travel for the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs as follows:

> That members of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs or their respective substitutes be authorized to travel to Brussels, Vienna, Bonn, Budapest, Prague and Canadian forces bases in Germany for a period of not more than three weeks between January 15 and February 15, 1991, in order to determine the implications for Canada of European security developments and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Consent on division. The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? A point of order, the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, there is something I do not understand. You are asking the House if the hon. member has unanimous consent. Somebody yells no and then you say it is passed on division. I do not understand.

If unanimous consent is required and there is somebody who yells no, then obviously it is defeated, is it not?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will put the motion again. Is there unanimous consent for the hon. parliamentary secretary to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no consent. The hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, surely we have the right to introduce a motion at this stage and to ask that it be put to the House. As I understand it, we are quite able to proceed. The answer could be that it is passed on division, but certainly that would be within our rules. I do not know if the NDP are refusing to let a committee travel. I would have some problems with that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am responding to my hon. friend who somehow implied that the New Democratic Party caucus was not supportive of this work. I take personal offence at that kind of comment because he knows it is not the case. The point is that when unanimous consent is sought, it must be obtained before we can proceed. If someone says nay, that ought to end the discussion.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the standing committees of the House were given special responsibilities under the reform of Parliament in 1985. One of those responsibilities involves taking any planned for activity involving the expenditure of public funds, and in particular travelling outside of the country, first of all, to the liaison committee of chairpeople which covers the span of this Chamber, to seek permission for a budget, and subsequently to go to the House leaders of the parties for permission to move a motion.

The House has reserved for itself the right to divide on the issue of whether or not those plans should be approved or not. But just as we believe that members have the right to introduce bills at first reading and should not be blocked in the introduction until we have seen it, all the parliamentary secretary is seeking at this stage is permission to share a motion with the House. If the House wishes to divide, then the House has that right.

Surely we do not want to block the introduction of motions relating to the work of the standing committees of the House. If we do not allow the motion to be put in one case where they have worked in a planning and development sense, they will have to cancel almost a year of effort on behalf of those members who intend to travel before this House will meet again. It is being blocked by somebody who simply refuses to allow the House to divide on the question. I suspect the will of the House is to approve it. But surely no one in this Chamber wants to block that kind of long-term effort on behalf of the standing committee. If we do the House is in a real pickle in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): As there was no notice given, I must request consent again. Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No. On division? There is no consent.

HON. JOSEPH SMALLWOOD

90TH BIRTHDAY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find agreement to deal with the following motion which it is my great pleasure to move, seconded by my friend from St. John's West, our benevolent and beloved trade minister, and my friend from Kamloops.

I also want to acknowledge the co-operation of the hon. members for Shefford, Beaver River and Annapolis Valley—Hants.

Joey Smallwood, the former Newfoundland premier will be 90 years old this coming Tuesday, Christmas Eve. I went to see him a couple of weeks ago. He is in great shape, good humour and very alert. At this time I want to give the House the opportunity to salute the man who played such a vital role in bringing together in 1949 two great dominions, the Dominion of Canada and the then Dominion of Newfoundland.

So, it is my pleasure to move:

> That this House, on behalf of the people of Canada, and particularly on behalf of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, express its esteem and its appreciation to the Hon. Doctor Joseph Robert Smallwood, the only living Father of Confederation for his distinguished career in the service of the people and for his historic contribution to Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry, the Minister for International Trade.

• (1530)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the motion just moved, of which I was a co-sponsor, I want to say that the person whom we are honouring in this motion had a distinguished political and public career in two countries, Newfoundland and Canada.

I am delighted to have the chance to join in this expression of goodwill towards him, even though at times in the past, he has addressed me most severely. I join in the general admiration of his contribution to this country and to his province.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party caucus, I am pleased to second this motion. We all remember vividly the work that Joseph R. Smallwood did on behalf of the people of Newfoundland.

As a man who had a vision in terms of bringing Newfoundland into the Confederation of Canada and a nation-builder in terms of Canada as well as Newfoundland, I think we would be well advised to recall the approach that he often brought to those difficult discussions at that time, particularly in this time of nation-building ourselves.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order or on the same motion.

Mr. Lapierre: On the same motion, Mr. Speaker, since you did not recognize my point of order for which I had the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member should know that there is such a thing as decorum in this House, and when a minister rises, I recognize the minister first before I recognize the hon. member.

An hon. member: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the hon. member rising on a point of order or is he replying to this motion?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I support the hon. member from Newfoundland, because Joey Smallwood was one of the first to use the referendum formula. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the Smallwood precedent will be followed in reverse, with far more conclusive results and with no need for two referendums.

[English]

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Like my friend before me, Mr. Speaker, I will be very short. I certainly support the motion. I was consulted beforehand.

What I want to let the House know—especially the other side of the House—is one of the reasons that Joey Smallwood, one of the original fathers of Confederation, is the character he is, is the fact that he reached across many political boundaries.

I know, when it comes to the Newfoundland, political boundaries sometimes merge and dissolve. I just wanted to compliment the mover of the motion and the seconder to let people know in the House, especially on the government side, that here we have, in the best ecumenical way, the member for Burin—St. George's moving a motion and the member for St. John's West seconding it.

In conclusion, most members on the government side do not appreciate that many years ago there was a fellow called Brian Peckford who put in nomination the name of John Crosbie to run against the man we are now honouring, Joseph Smallwood.

In terms of the Christmas season, it is interesting and educational for government members to know that there can be many multitudes of cross-currents, so that one does not have to live and die one way or the other.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: Brian Peckford put in nomination John Crosbie's name against a fellow called Joey Smallwood whom we are honouring today. I am glad we are, but let the government members not forget that there can be switches too.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Nowlan: Order, you say. The orderly way is what we have done today.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I would just make it very clear that it is not my intention to deny unanimous consent, but I know one of my colleagues from Newfoundland will know perhaps why I am rising.

I cannot personally support the motion out of respect for some of the activities of Mr. Smallwood over the years, but because it is Christmas I will not deny unanimous consent.

Anyone who has been a long-time member of the International Woodworkers of America will never forgive a premier who was the only premier in the history of Canada ever to banish a free trade union from the entire province of his jurisdiction. For that I will never forgive him.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, Joe Smallwood is a constituent of mine. Joe Smallwood is a man who I, as a very little boy and a student, used to visit just to talk about the history of Newfoundland and some of the things in the future.

Perhaps the biggest compliment that we could pay to him today is the nature of the debate we have heard in the last five minutes. For the man who is living on the Roaches Line in Newfoundland to inspire the controversy in the House some 90 years after he was born, this may be the biggest compliment to him.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent was denied three times during the last few minutes before this motion was agreed to. I would like to know why, when the Chair asks for unanimous consent and it is denied, the motion is carried just the same. Could the Chair indicate on which Standing Order its decision was based? We had no prior notice of these motions, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like the hon. member to come to the table so that I may discuss it with him and the clerks before we make a decision on it. It was adopted on division. He can come to the table and we can discuss it a little further.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, following the point of order that was raised by my hon. colleague, the member for Shefford, I, too, would like to raise a point of order. In explaining the Chair's position, as I understand it— and I may have misunderstood—the Chair stated that the reason that the member for Shefford was not recognized on a point of order was because the minister stood and every time a minister stands in the House, the minister must be recognized.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, and correct me if I am wrong, but in a point of order it is always the person raising the point of order who is recognized before the mover of another motion and, in particular, when there has not been a formal notice of motion given.

I may not agree with the point raised by my hon. colleague from Shefford, but the fact is that everybody in the House is supposed to be treated equally and, if somebody has a point of order, the point of order has to be heard before they can be denied out of hand. You cannot rewrite—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to say to the hon. member that I saw the hon. minister rise and I saw the hon. member for Shefford rise. I did not know whether the hon. member for Shefford was rising on this motion or on the motion regarding Mr. Smallwood. Therefore, I recognized the hon. minister in that respect. That was the reason I did it.

I will recognize the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls on the same point of order, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Baker: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, it is correct by custom that, when two persons rise in their places, from custom the Speaker does recognize the one who is a cabinet minister.

As far as the business that was raised concerning unanimous consent, perhaps if members could be a little quieter in the House the Speaker could hear them when they object to this request for unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the only thing that bothered me in the decision you made earlier, and I am sure Hansard will bear me out, is that you recognized me, you gave me the floor and then at your request I had to yield to a minister. I would like to know whether every time a minister asks to be recognized, you will ask us to yield the floor.

• (1540)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to thank the hon. member for Gander for his comments.

I would like to say to the hon. member for Shefford that that is not the way it happened. If he would like to come to my chamber, I will discuss it a little further with him. That was not the way it happened. We do have decorum in here.

I would also like to thank the hon. member for Hamilton East, but this is not the Ontario Legislature either. She has been here for six years. She realizes that when a minister does rise and a private member rises, as far as decorum in the Chamber is concerned, we usually give precedence to the minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: The house is my witness, Mr. Speaker. There might have been some confusion in your mind, but my microphone was on and I had the floor. I would not want precedent to be created by which a private member has the floor and you take that right away from him or her on a sign from a minister. I suggest we should refrain from creating such precedent in this House. I swear, Mr. Speaker, on my children's life, that I did have the floor and that the light on my microphone was on.

[English]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like some clarification. Notwithstanding the points of view expressed by anybody in the House, it is important that we have the same rules for everybody.

I am concerned that, according to the Standing Orders, when a point of order is to be raised during the debate, a point of order is recognized over and above any other debate in the House. That has been a long-standing practice of the House.

It seems to me that on more than one occasion, the Chair seems to have selective memory—

Some hon. members: Order.

Ms. Copps: —when it comes to points of order from the opposition and the government. It may be the Bloc Quebecois today and it could be another party tomorrow. All I am asking is for equal treatment for everyone. I am sure it has nothing to do with where I came from. I have been in this place for six years. I have seen Speakers who have respected equal treatment, and I want to see the continuation of equal treatment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to thank the hon. member for her comments.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH AND SEVENTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, the House does not seem to be in a very generous mood at this time, but if the House gives its consent, I move:

That the sixth and seventh reports of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Motion negatived.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

CONCURRENCE IN 19TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

That the nineteenth report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, presented to the House on Friday, November 23, 1990, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I asked for consent. I did not ask for unanimous consent. Therefore, if there was a no, could we take that as permission on division?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member needs unanimous consent because it was only presented today.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, there are certain procedures at hand that the House knows very well. If somebody gives notice that he or she wants to move a motion later this day, meaning probably somewhere down the pipe, they can do that. At that time, we do not need unanimous consent because he or she gave notice.

In this case, I take it the member did not give notice because he could hardly have done so. He rendered the reports today. But his own side, his own Tories, refused him unanimous consent, not us.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Mississauga sought the unanimous consent of the House for a motion for concurrence in a report from the justice committee, dealing with the Weir report and the escape of Daniel Gingras in Alberta.

You asked for unanimous consent, Sir, and let the record show that it was Conservative members of this House who denied the unanimous consent to deal with that important issue, an issue important to the residents of Alberta and, indeed, to all Canadians, and that was with respect to the massive failure of this government in the criminal justice system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there further motions? We will proceed to petitions.

PETITIONS

ABITIBI-PRICE RESEARCH CENTRE IN JONQUIÈRE

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise to table before this House a petition signed by almost 18,000 people. It was sponsored by the leaders of the union of professional and office employees of Abitibi-Price in Jonquière, which has Mr. Daniel Maltais for president. All these petitioners call upon the Parliament to ensure that the management of Abitibi-Price will maintain their research centre in Jonquière.

Mr. Speaker, I also join the chorus of the people of my riding and all the employees of Abitibi-Price to urge the company officials to suit the action to the overtures they made recently to the effect of carrying out in Jonquière high quality research to meet their needs.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of some 8,000 citizens of Windsor and area. I believe that these 8,000 names will be part of 40,000 tabled today alone from the people of Windsor.

The petitioners ask that whereas the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television station in Windsor is the only one located in the Windsor—Essex area, a region otherwise dominated by U.S. broadcast media and the station, therefore, provides a vital and irreplaceable service for the population of the area, the petitioners are urging this Parliament to request the CBC to do everything in its power to restore the television service to the Windsor area.

CANADA POST

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the distinct honour of presenting a petition on behalf of over 700 constituents from my great riding in northern Ontario, Parry Sound—Muskoka, with respect to the forthcoming closure of the Emsdale post office.

In approaching Parliament directly, the petitioners are expressing a widely held belief that rural Canada is being discriminated against by Canada Post's policy of rural post office closures.

The petitioners are humbly asking the Government of Canada to stop the further penalization of rural Canada by directing Canada Post Corporation to end its policy of rural post office closures. Further, in the rural areas already affected by the Canada Post policy, the petitioners respectfully request the reinstatement of the same level and quality of postal service in their communities as had existed prior to the implementation of the corporation's policy.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise today to present a petition from 6,300 of my constituents regarding the Young Offenders Act.

These constituents who are mostly around the town of Hagersville call on this government to revise the laws of Canada, to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated Juvenile Delinquents Act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. members on my right and then I will go to the left. The hon. member for Halton—Peel, and then the hon. member for Abitibi.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of rising pursuant to Standing Order 36 to table petitions containing the names of more than 50,000 people, collected largely due to the efforts of Mr. Gordon Domm.

These individuals are concerned about the increase of violent crime in our society. They ask this Parliament to pass legislation establishing mandatory minimum sentences for all violent crimes which would apply uniformly to all regions of Canada.

These petitions come from the following communities: Niagara Falls, Brantford, Kitchener—Waterloo, St. Catharines, Hamilton, Burlington, Simcoe, Guelph, Lancaster, Kincardine, Ripley, Campbellville, Cambridge and Dundas, Ontario.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, Mr. Speaker, I present two petitions from residents of Val-d'Or and Sullivan in Abitibi who ask that the Government of Canada shelve the project concerning the Parliament Hill sector. At a cost of $68 million, it provides for parking facilities and a shopping centre under the Canadian Parliament Buildings. They urge the government to consider the need to maintain as they are the environment and the historic character of the buildings and of the site of Parliament Hill in Ottawa.

The petitioners suggest that members keep their parking facilities as they are—parking spaces behind government buildings and outside like those of plant workers—and that the Canadian government has priorities other than building parking and shopping facilities on Parliament Hill.

FISHERIES

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition at the request of the right hon. member for Vancouver—Quadra concerning the quillback rock cod, which is a commodity of high culture value to Vancouver's Chinese Canadian community.

The petitioners are asking the government to reverse its plans to reallocate quillback quotas. They ask the Minister of Fisheries, following a request from the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, to remember the importance of the quillback industry to the Chinese Canadian community of Vancouver.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to share in petitions that are coming from Essex County and the city of Windsor. The residents there feel very much cut off from Canada with the cuts that have occurred in the CBC station in Windsor. They feel that they are inundated with American news broadcasts from directly across the border and in a very special way they have lost their contact with the local media, and local television.

They feel that the broadcasts out of Toronto are not answering local needs, nor giving the Canadian viewpoint to these residents. They humbly ask this government to do all that it can to restore the CBC station in Windsor. They ask the government to make sure the funding is available for them so that that station may be brought back, as well as communications throughout Canada to the level it should be.

HERITAGE LANGUAGE TEACHING

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition from hundreds of people concerning the cancellation of the cultural enhancement program of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship, a decision which will have a disastrous impact on the quality of teaching in our heritage language schools.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition signed by several members of the Ottawa area asking that Parliament reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in GST legislation and regulations.

VOLUNTEER FIRE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition in proper form. It is a little different perhaps than some other petitions in that it is in reference to volunteer fire departments, their members and the income tax receipts they are allowed, presumably to help them remain volunteer firemen. They do not get paid in that endeavour. According to section 61(b)(viii) of the Income Tax Act they are allowed to issue them with a receipt but the fact is that the receipt was $300. In 1980-81 it was raised to $500 and it has not been touched since. They petition the government to review that income tax procedure to allow volunteer fire departments to be issued with an income tax receipt, something that is appropriate to today's times. They often wear their own clothing. They do not go and pick up a uniform. That is the only pay that they get. In some small communities throughout this country volunteer fire departments are very often the service clubs in those villages and communities.

I would like the government to consider this seriously. I am not sure what it does with all these petitioners but I hope it will give this one some priority.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on behalf of residents of Mount Pearl, Conception Bay and St. John's, Newfoundland, who are petitioning the government to re-examine the decision to impose the GST on reading material in Canada. It is a violation of the concept of freedom of speech to tax the written word, to tax the ability of people to communicate with each other.

The petitioners call upon the government and all members of the cabinet, including the member for St. John's West, and the parliamentary secretary, the member for St. John's East, to find their voices to speak out against this ungodly tax on reading material and against books.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this would be in order in any jurisdiction, the Newfoundland legislature, here in Ottawa or even in Ontario where they may sometimes do things differently, I do not know. Perhaps the member from Hamilton can tell us.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, this is the second time today an hon. member of this House has made a disparaging remark about members from Ontario. Even though I have the greatest amount of respect for my friend and colleague and former rat packer, even though I have the greatest amount of respect for him, there comes a time when members from Ontario have to stand their ground.

Another member earlier made a comment about my friend, the member for Hamilton East. Even though at times she might annoy different members in this House, she has every right to sit in this House. Even though she has the misfortune of coming from Hamilton, it is not to suggest that all people of Ontario have the same inadequacies as my friend and colleague.

I would ask the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte to apologize to the people of Ontario.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I was merely reflecting upon a comment by the Speaker earlier when the Speaker said in response to a point of order that the member in question was not in the Ontario legislature now. I wanted to be absolutely sure in presenting my petition that whatever jurisdiction we were in, that the petition be received and that the word of the people of Canada be heard. I happen to believe that whether we are in the Ontario legislature, the Newfoundland legislature or the Canadian legislature, it is important that nothing be done to impede the ability of the people of Canada through their representatives to be heard.

I know my colleagues from Ontario appreciate that and agree with everything I am saying, in particular, my colleague from Hamilton East. There really ought not to be a distinction.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I rise on a petition but I want to state on the point of order that I am sure that the Speaker did not mean to reflect in any way negatively on members of the Ontario legislature when he made his comments. I am sure he recognizes that members of Parliament, whether they are elected federally or provincially, respect decorum and respect the rules of the House. I am sure that he would want to reflect on the intemperance of the statements made about the Ontario legislature.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, this is not a petition on the CBC cutbacks even though the government has viciously closed the one person bureau of the CBC in the city of Hamilton.

It is in fact a petition on the GST as it relates to beer. In the holiday season, I am sure Mr. Speaker, that my colleague, the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants will probably want to second this petition, the reason being that the petition of the undersigned residents avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance common. The Prime Minister and the Conservative government have ignored the wishes of the people and are imposing the goods and services tax. This is the important point, Mr. Speaker. The finance minister promised that the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax and the implementation of the GST would make Canadian industry more competitive and then, in the same breath, raised the excise tax on beer by 45 per cent to make up for lost federal revenues. This excise tax on beer displays disdain for small businesses that employ many people and have been taxed beyond reasonable limits. They will have to pass this tax increase along to customers and cut the number of employees.

Therefore we the undersigned humbly call upon Parliament to cancel the 45 per cent increase in excise tax on beer, which is designed only to recoup lost revenues as a direct result of the implementation of the unfair, regressive and crippling goods and services tax.

This is signed by more than 800 residents of the great riding of Hamilton East. It will be followed by many more thousands of signatures which I will personally be collecting over the holiday season.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Nunziata: From Hamilton to Hamilton.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, Hamilton is well represented in the House. My friend from York South—Weston may be surprised to learn the world does not rotate around Toronto.

I have the duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to represent a group of constituents from the Toronto area, seeing as they need people from Hamilton to support them.

The Government of Canada saw fit since Confederation and without hiatus to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books, and newspapers, et cetera. Since it is now including them in the GST, these petitioners from Toronto, Willowdale, and Arnprior are crying out to this government to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to take this opportunity to present a petition. I would like to read the recitals; there are just a couple of them.

The Prime Minister and the Conservative government have ignored the wishes of the people of Canada and are prepared to implement the unfair and regressive goods and services tax. As we know it is now implemented and is law.

The finance minister has promised in the past that the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax and the implementation of the goods and services tax would make Canadian industry more competitive. Then he suggested raising the excise tax on beer by 45 per cent to make up for the lost revenues.

The petitioners in this particular petition ask the Government of Canada to cancel the proposed 45 per cent increase in excise tax on beer, which is designed only to recoup lost revenues as a direct result of the implementation of the unfair, regressive and crippling goods and services tax.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, a great many residents of Arborfield, Saskatchewan have sent this petition for consideration by the Parliament of Canada.

They note that there have been many instances by this Conservative government of direct attacks against the rural way of life: cuts to communications systems, whether it is VIA Rail, the branch lines or CBC.

However, they are most immediately concerned that the government reverse its policy on the closure of rural post offices, maintain the rural post offices and postal services and, through this means, accentuate rural life in Canada.

FISHERIES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this is the third petition I have presented on this subject. They have been certified under Standing Order 36. It comes from hundreds of people in the Chinese Canadian community of British Columbia, many of them in my riding of Vancouver East.

The petitioners are very concerned with the decreasing supply of live rock cod fish, a fish which is of high cultural and economic value and provides food for some 200,000 Asian Canadians. It is a staple food for families, restaurants, and tourists.

The petitioners are concerned that the federal government's negligence and mismanagement have limited the supply of live cod to a three-month season, while sport fishers are allowed an unfair quota. Of course this is diminishing the supply of very necessary food.

Therefore the petitioners demand that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans recognizes the special value of these fish to the Asian community and to visitors to Canada and immediately initiates management action which will ensure that a year-round supply of live codfish is available. This must include adequate federal attention to the long-term sustainable management of these fish and fair allocation.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have both the pleasure and the pain to present to the House today part of a total of over 40,000 petitions from the citizens of Windsor and Essex county protesting to this government the cutbacks in the CBC which have led to the suspension of our local CBC station in the city of Windsor.

These petitions are signed by people who request Parliament to do everything possible to see to it that the CBC is given the sustenance and support to be able to carry forward its important task of providing local programming for the people of Windsor, Essex county, Sarnia, Lambton county—the people of that entire district who as a result of these cutbacks have been deprived of any local news service whatsoever.

In this country that is like cutting Windsor off and sending it to join the United States.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I have several thousand signatures on petitions from Windsor to present.

I would like to say that today, just today, 41,000 signatures have been presented from Windsor from all sides of this House. We appreciate the alacrity of the clerk of petitions in processing some 33,000 petitions overnight. That was wonderful, and it benefits the people of Windsor.

In addition to the 41,000 that are actually being tabled in this House today, 6,000 were tabled yesterday and some 10,000 or 15,000 have already been delivered to the House of Commons, and the people of Windsor still continue to sign.

The reason for this is that Windsor is a microcosm of what is happening to Canadians right across this land, as their institutions are alienating them from their own country.

I would like to quote clearly what the people of Windsor, Essex county, Kent county, and Lambton county are saying to this government. Wherefore we the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take all necessary measures to preserve local CBC television broadcasting in Windsor and in all areas deprived of such service by the Mulroney government cutbacks and by the decisions of CBC management.

These are people who are talking from their hearts and from their very souls to be allowed to remain Canadian in the face of American dominance.

PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I also rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to introduce to the House a petition signed mainly by people from Regina, Saskatchewan, though I notice as well that there are some from Vancouver, Vancouver Island, et cetera.

These petitioners point out the Canadian involvement as a result of the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq in the sending of military ships, planes, and ground communication to the gulf.

The petitioners also note the reports of military build-up in the gulf region. They note the statements by the Secretary of State for External Affairs about Canada's commitment to participate in any warlike activity that should arise.

• (1610)

Therefore the petitioners ask that the Government of Canada do all in its power to secure a negotiated settlement and withdraw Canadian Armed Forces from the gulf region.

I am sure as well the petitioners wish Canada and the House peace on earth and a good Christmas.

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition. I would like to say that the petition is the work largely of my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex who brought the matter to the attention of a number of people from across the country, including Newfoundland. This petition is from the greater area of St. John's, including St. Thomas, Paradise, and Manuels.

The petition addresses the issue of pollution being caused by automotive emissions. It calls on the government to take steps to reduce hydrocarbon emissions dramatically and recommends a way in which this can be done. The petitioners pray that government would see fit to make a minimum 3.2 per cent oxygen content in gasoline fuels mandatory.

I compliment my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex. I commend this petition to the House and hope the appropriate department will take the appropriate action. I have great honour and pleasure in supporting the petition without equivocation.

Mr. Sid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of 3,600 signatories from the area of Windsor opposing the CBC cutbacks.

The petitioners are strongly opposed to the cutbacks in the CBC. What this government is doing by failing to support the CBC is that it is tearing the very fibres of this country all to pieces.

This is a very serious issue. Because of the spirit of Christmas, maybe there have been some spirits going around the House. However, it is a pleasure to present this petition on behalf of the residents of Windsor who oppose these cutbacks.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a number of petitions concerning the restoration of VIA Rail services from the communities of Kaslo, Winlaw, Nelson, and Revelstoke within my own constituency; from Vancouver, Kamloops, Langley, Kelowna, White Rock, Port Coquitlam, and Burnaby in British Columbia; from Calgary, Alberta; from Regina and Estevan, Saskatchewan; from Winnipeg, Manitoba; and from Ottawa, Ontario.

First, the petitioners condemn the activities of this government that led to many cuts in Canada's vital passenger rail network and urge the government to restore, among other actions, VIA Rail services across the country, in particular The Canadian line through the heart of the Canadian Rockies.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to deliver over 2,000 signatures of residents of the Windsor area who, like people all across Canada, are outraged at the financial broad axe this government has taken to the CBC.

The petitioners ask that Parliament take all the necessary measures to preserve local CBC television services in Windsor and in other areas deprived of such service by the federal government cutbacks.

They ask that they be considered along with the over 40,000 signatures which have been submitted by other members of the House only today in regard to these devastating cutbacks.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 36, to present a number of petitions certified correct as to form and content.

The petitioners, all people from my own riding of Nanaimo—Cowichan, humbly sheweth that Canadians need Petro-Canada during this time of serious price instability in the petroleum industry to take the lead as a green energy company and to remain 100 per cent Canadian.

Therefore the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to defeat or repeal Bill C-84 and keep Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation acting in the best interests of all Canadians.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, and add to the almost 50,000 names a further 1,350 signatures against the cutbacks to the CBC, in the Windsor area.

Mr. Speaker, these names are simply a few of the hundreds of thousands of people across Canada who are outraged at this government for cutting back on that thread that keeps Canada together. I represent many people in my riding who, like these people from Windsor, want that funding returned to the CBC.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I rise to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by numerous residents of Edmonton, Alberta and Toronto, Ontario, who object to the goods and services tax in so far as it applies to books and the printed word.

Even though that tax has been adopted by the House, I am sure these petitioners will have noted the tax is such a disaster that the Minister of Finance has recently introduced a series of proposed changes to the act. One hopes he can keep introducing a string of changes that will relieve Canadians from any obligation to pay this odious tax.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have a statement. On Tuesday, December 18, 1990, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell raised a point of order regarding the acceptability of a petition which the hon. member for Kamloops had risen to present.

The petition in question contained, in addition to the signatures of Canadian residents, the signatures of several persons not resident in Canada. The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell rightly pointed out that it is not the practice of this House to receive petitions from non-resident aliens. Citation 688(1) of Beauchesne's fifth edition reads as follows:

> Aliens, not resident in Canada, have no right to petition Parliament.

This citation is based on a ruling recorded in the Journals for March 20, 1880 at page 165. The Chair faces a dilemma however. If this petition cannot be presented because it contains several unacceptable signatures, then those Canadians who signed the petition in good faith will be denied this opportunity to petition Parliament.

When Speaker Bosley was faced with a similar situation in November 1984, he made the following statement:

> On reviewing the Canadian and British precedents, I found no clear answer to the admissibility or non-admissibility of a petition which is signed by Canadian citizens and, at the same time, by non-Canadian citizens, not resident in Canada. In October 1983, Madam Speaker Sauvé ruled that a petition signed by American citizens was not receivable. That petition was signed exclusively by American citizens. Our precedents on petitions related to private bills indicate that petitions from foreigners have been accepted from time to time when the subject matter related to legislation or an area of jurisdiction of the Canadian Parliament. According since I could find no clear direction in our practice and procedure and so that those Canadian citizens who signed the said petition not be denied their ancient right to petition the House of Commons and since this is the first time this issue has arisen in this Parliament, I ask the House that the petition presented by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre be received by unanimous consent.

After having considered the problem, the Chair believes that the right of Canadians to petition their House of Commons would be better served if petitions, which are otherwise in order and have been so certified by the Clerk of Petitions, can be presented even if they contain the occasional signature of a non–Canadian not resident in Canada.

Such signatures would not, of course, be counted among the 25 signatures which a petition must contain in order to be certified. I therefore rule the petition which the hon. member for Kamloops intended to present on Tuesday, December 18, duly certified and presented to the House. I must thank the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for bringing this matter to the attention of the Chair.

PRIVILEGE

PROCEDURE FOR TABLING MOTIONS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have to raise this question of privilege now, because we will not have the opportunity to do so for quite some time.

During the course of this sitting, especially at the motions stage, I shouted "no" at the top of my lungs every time the parliamentaru secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House asked if there was unanimous consent to table motions for which notice was not given.

Mr. Speaker, our Standing Orders are very clear on this subject. Not only have you heard me say no but, each time, you declared: "Agreed on division."

This means not everybody said "yes". A couple of minutes ago, I checked with the Table and was told that nobody heard me.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time. So I would make a request: either you have a loudspeaker installed or you provide hearing aids to the Table officers and to the people who occupy the Chair from time to time. It was obvious to every witness in this House that the parliamentary secretary did not get unanimous consent to table his motions.

Mr. Speaker, I can only shout as loud as my lungs will allow me. If the acoustics of this room is defective and if the sitting arrangment is not right, that is your responsability, Mr. Speaker. It was your decision to line us up against the curtains.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that there have been several instances of hearing problems on your part. I do not wish to give you any advice, but this is a real problem because sometimes you heard us and sometimes you turned a deaf ear today. I for one, Mr. Speaker,—

[English]

An hon. member: On the same point of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The same point of privilege.

Mr. Cooper: Are you going to let him speak?

An hon. member: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Go ahead.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, he is not a minister, so you can allow me to finish.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that I feel my privileges were infringed upon by your deafness and that of the Table officers. I therefore request a major remedy, if not by our Standing Orders, at least for your ears!

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am very much intrigued by the hon. member's understanding of the rules and his insistence that this House act upon those rules.

I would like to bring to the attention of the Chair that one of the longstanding practices of this House has been first, that we pass a motion to allow committees to report when the House is adjourned and second, it is also a longstanding practice that this House approve committee travel when committees of this House choose to travel around the country.

I should also remind the hon. member that it is equally a convention that questions during Question Period are given largely to that side of the House, with a very small number going to the backbench on this side. However, it is not a rule. It is simply a tradition or a convention.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to keep in mind when the Chair rules on this point of privilege the behaviour that we have seen demonstrated by the hon. member this afternoon which has caused a great deal of frustration, not simply to this side of the House, but to every member-who sits on committees and who participates in those committees and this House of Commons.

The hon. member is approximately 1/255th part of any questions that should be allowed in this House of Commons. I hope the Speaker will keep that in mind because we have on this side some 130 members that would be more than happy to take his questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I want to thank the hon. member for Shefford and I want to thank the hon. parliamentary secretary.

I would like to say that the only time the Chair heard a no, and it was on division, was when the hon. member read the motion concerning the travel of members, and the hon. member for Mississauga West moved his motion. I distinctly heard no's but there is a lot of noise here this afternoon. I know it is the time of the year when everybody wants to leave.

I will check the record. I will then come back and rule, but I just feel the hon. member must realize that today is an exceptional day because we are closing down the House of Commons for the holidays and so therefore there was noise and I did not hear the hon. member. I am sorry, but I am saying to you the only two no's I did hear was the hon. member after the travel motion and also the motion by the hon. member for Mississauga West. I will look at it and then I will go ahead and rule. The hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: If I may make a point in reply to what the parliamentary secretary was saying—

Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary says I count for 1/295th, but unanimity is like pregnancy. There cannot be partial unanimity no more than one can be half pregnant.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is another topic. We are not going to get into that right now. I think that we should get on with Questions on the Order Paper.

Mr. George Corn, Hon. President, Czechoslovak Association of Canada, Past President, Canadian Ethnocultural Council Member, Executive Committee of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia, Auditor, Society of Czechoslovakian Arts and Sciences, Advisor, Czechoslovak (Toronto) Credit Union.	$3,234.72	$84.42	$58.80

a) Member	b) i) Transportation	ii) Accommodation	iii) Other Costs
Mr. Steve Dover, Special Assistant, Customs and Excise.	$3,234.72	$84.42	$82.71
Mr. Vic Little, Chief of Staff.	$3,234.72	$84.42	$58.80

STRAIT OF CANSO INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY (SCIDA) AND MR. LAWRENCE O'NEIL

Question No. 371—Mr. LeBlanc:

Did the Strait of Canso Industrial Development Authority (SCIDA) engage Mr. Lawrence O'Neil to act as a lobbyist and if so (a) by whom was he paid (b) how much was he paid (c) who did he contact (i) on what date (ii) for what purpose?

Hon. Elmer MacIntosh MacKay (Minister of Public Works and Minister for the purposes of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency Act): The Strait of Canso Industrial Development Authority (SCIDA) engaged Mr. Lawrence O'Neil through his law firm as a barrister and solicitor. He was not engaged to act as a lobbyist.

REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS (R.R.S.P.)

Question No. 386—Mr. Nunziata:

For (a) 1987 (b) 1988 (c) 1989 (i) How many Canadians made contributions to Registered Retirement Savings Plans (ii) How many Canadians cashed in their entire Registered Retirement Savings Plans or a portion thereof and what was the dollar value involved in each of those years (iii) What was the cost to the Federal Treasury in deferred taxes as a result of contributions to Registered Retirement Savings Plans?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): (a)(b)c) (i) (ii)

Taxation Year	1987		1988
	Number	Amount (000)	Number	Amount (000)
RRSP Contributions	3,483,648	$9,024,444	3.802,255	$10,599,878
RRSP Withdrawals / Deregistrations	428,821	$1,922,510	508,074	$2,556,916

Final data for the taxation year 1989 is not yet available.

The Department of Finance has estimated the cost to the Federal Treasury in deferred taxes as a result of contributions for both registered pension plan and registered retirement savings plan to be about $6 billion for the 1989 tax year. This amount is arrived at by projecting prior years figures obtained from a study undertaken in 1985 by the Department of Finance on the cost assistance for retirement savings. A separate figure solely for the deferral of taxes from registered retirement savings plans is not available.

*Question No. 403—Mr. Saint-Julien:

Has the Canada Post Corporation installed a supermailbox at a distance greater than 600 feet from the customer living the furthest distance from the supermailbox in the area served and, if so, was the distance between (a) 600 and 625 feet (b) 626 and 650 feet (c) 651 and 675 feet (d) 676 and 700 feet (e) 701 and 725 feet (f) 726 and 775 feet (g) 776 and 800 feet (h) 801 and 825 feet (i) 826 and 850 feet (j) 851 and 875 feet (k) 876 and 900 feet (l) 901 and 925 feet (m) 926 and 975 feet (n) 975 and 1,000 feet (o) greater than 1,000 feet?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): In 1985, Canada Post Corporation developed and announced its delivery policy including the use of community mail boxes (supermailboxes) as the equipment and mode of delivery that would be used in situations that would previously have gone to door to door delivery. The distance between customers served by the community mailbox and the equipment was established at 600 feet or 180 meters. Generally, this practice has been implemented for the largest majority of the 600,000 customers who are on the service as of 1990/91.

There are, however, circumstances where the Corporation cannot stay within the criteria due to the layout of the subdivision or municipality. In these cases, if Canada post stayed with the criteria it would result in the boxes being placed where they were in full frontal view of several homes on the same side of the street. In these circumstances Canada Post has moved the boxes to the ends of crescents or some distance away to a place where it could find a piece of property that would accomodate the box on easement without imposing on the homeowners adjacent to the equipment. There have been other circumstances where Canada Post has been petitioned by customers to move the boxes to another location and who agreed that they didn't mind walking the extra distance.

In other circumstances Canada Post has taken the initiative and surveyed its customers. In still other circumstances municipalities have asked the Corporation to place the boxes in certain situations which exceeded the 600 foot criteria and Canada Post has solicited and received the support of the customers involved. In urban centers where the Corporation has put such exceptions into service, generally, the customers don't have to walk any more than an additional 300 feet to their community mailbox. In all cases, the Corporation has entered into discussions with the municipal representatives of those serviced by the community mailboxes.

Where Canada Post has placed community mailboxes in cluster sites in suburban and rural settings, in most cases, a portion of the customers reside more than 600 feet from the equipment and therefore have to travel greater distance.

These exception have occurred in a number of cities and towns from coast to coast, in most provinces. Canada Post has endeavored to consistently apply the criteria. However, the Corporation has had to remain flexible in situations where it served the municipality, its customers or its approach to installation in a more practical fashion than sticking rigidly to the standard.

The specific information requested is not available.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. P–25.

DPA GROUP, INC.

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all documents related to the report prepared by DPA Group, Inc., entitled "A Study on the Reduction of Energy–related Greenhouse Gas Emissions", referred to in the House by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources during Question Period on Friday, May 4, 1990.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for Production of Papers P–25 in the name of the hon. member for Skeena is acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents.

In response to this motion, the government is tabling excerpts from all major documents relating to the report prepared by DPA Group Inc. entitled, "A Study on the Reduction of Energy–related Greenhouse Gas Emissions".

I ask that the other Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions of which you are not aware. As you will notice on the Order Paper, the first order of the day is Bill C–88. The opposition parties, at least the one which I represent, would like to give their consent to that bill being passed as soon as possible, so that we can get to the adjournment motion. Therefore, we will have only one speaker who will be very brief on Bill C–88.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I need to ask the House a specific question because on this particular bill there are two ways we can move: one is that the government could move at the report stage an amendment which would, therefore, require the consent of the House for us to proceed to third reading.

Perhaps I can ask the question. I am not sure that I am in order, but I would like to ask the question of the House whether or not there would be consent for us to deal with this technical amendment at report stage and then go to third reading.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no consent.

Mr. Cooper: On a point of order, I therefore want to indicate that the government will not be proceeding with the amendment at report stage. We will call for concurrence and third reading of this bill.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development as reported (with an amendment) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Charles Mayer (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

• (1630)

Hon. Charles Mayer (for Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak briefly to the bill today.

It is a bill I am proud to introduce because it is going to enable Canada to assist the people and the countries of eastern Europe in their reconstruction and their development. It is a bill that required co–operation from all members of the House that were on the committee dealing with it. Although we did hear some very credible witnesses, it was processed in a very proper and quick manner. I want to thank all members of that committee who co–operated with us in this endeavour. I think all parties in the House will be supporting this bill.

What is so important to us in Canada, and something which many people forget, is that so many of our ancestors have come from Europe. More than 15 per cent of Canadians can trace their ancestors back to eastern Europe. Probably more than most other Canadians, they recognize that eastern Europe is not a block, although there is a bloc of countries, and each of those countries is unique. Each of them is different than the other and each has problems that are unique.

In trying to address the problems that we all know that these countries have, the need has been recognized of the establishment of a bank to deal strictly with the countries of eastern Europe. This bank will be able to specialize in the needs of the people of these countries, along with the needs of their businesses and the needs of their governments. As well, in co–operation with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, it should try to assist governments in particular and businesses in these countries to get established and hopefully to prosper.

Their prosperity is important, not only to the countries of eastern Europe, but to all countries around the world and especially to Canada. In our trading relationships of the future, we will look with great hope to the emerging-trade that we know will come from the countries of eastern Europe.

The assistance by this special bank will also be critical in leveraging investments from private financial institutions. It will be through this combined financial effort that the various countries will find it possible to move from a state where they have been very centrally controlled. Although each one of these countries has been handled differently, they all seem to have a unified desire and need to move much of these state-controlled operations into private hands. It is in this way that the bank of eastern Europe will be able to assist.

I am very proud to have been able to play a part in its inception. I want to thank all those in the House who have worked with me.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased this afternoon to be able to speak very briefly on Bill C-88. With this legislation, Canada will be able to be a founding member of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

We supported this bill at second reading, as we did in the legislative committee. In fact, our party succeeded in getting the agreement to an amendment which I think all members will agree has made this bill more effective.

The original bill required the Minister of Finance, who is the representative on the board of the bank, to report annually to Parliament on the bank's activities. The amendment states that this report has to specify the progress that the bank made in areas of sustainable development and human rights, two areas that the bank must examine when making loans.

That amendment was made by my colleague, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, and I want to congratulate him for a very constructive amendment. I think all members will agree that it improves the legislation tremendously.

My colleagues and I probably could have made other improvements to this legislation, if the government had allowed us the opportunity to study the bill and to call further witnesses.

We were allowed four witnesses over three days. Certainly we are very grateful to those witnesses who came before the committee on such short notice. We heard from university professors and a lawyer whose firm has had extensive experience with the countries of central Europe. Of course, we also heard from federal government officials.

We wanted to hear also from business people who are actively involved with these countries. We wanted first-hand experience so that we would actually know what is taking place in the countries of eastern Europe. We would have liked to have called witnesses from the Canada-Soviet Business Council, as well as members from other business councils dealing with Poland, Hungary, and other countries.

This should have been possible because the government joined this bank in May. Instead of trying to get parliamentary approval immediately, it waited for seven months to do so. Then, in early December, we were told that it had to have this bill right away and we could only have very few witnesses. It was another way in which we could see the government's total lack of control and total lack of organization.

Certainly this new bank is a very important institution because the countries of Central Europe are suffering from tremendous economic and social problems ranging from massive debt to serious internal food distribution problems. They are really suffering the effects of 45 years of inefficient state planning and almost total state ownership. Converting from command economies to market-driven economies is certainly no easy task. If the people in these countries are willing to try, we have a duty to help them.

Certainly these people are already under tremendous economic strain, but their needs are not all economic. Some of the greatest needs are technical in nature, such as creating the proper business environment in order that business deals can be put together. They need advice on tax law, business contracts, foreign investment, and in many other areas.

This bank is also going to act as a catalyst because it is going to be able to bring business people together from the east and the west. It is going to be a catalyst toward getting business deals together. This kind of outreach from the west to the countries in central Europe will certainly benefit Canada and potentially even my province of Prince Edward Island.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that time is running out this afternoon and, as many of us have spoken extensively on this bill at second reading, I want to conclude my remarks by reaffirming my party's support for Bill C-88, which will allow Canada to play a very important role in helping the people of central Europe build their economies. I look forward to its passage today and to the creation of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development next April.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this bill which is before us comes from an initiative which was originally put before the international community by François Mitterand, the President of France.

It is a suggestion that is one of a number of important responses that we need to make to the dramatic and very welcome developments which have occurred in eastern Europe. We can see across eastern Europe a whole spread of democratic revolutions taking place which we expect will put into place in the future a series of societies and economies that much better serve the people of those countries than was true under the previous communist regimes.

This bill has Canada join in a small way in the process of trying to assist the transition of those economies from essentially Stalinist bureaucracies, in most cases, to economies in which it will be possible for privately-owned enterprises and state-owned enterprises to play an important role in interaction in the marketplace in meeting the needs of people in those economies.

We were particularly pleased to hear some of the witnesses who spoke to us in the legislative committee. They made the point very strongly that we are dealing with a difficult transition in eastern Europe which requires as much support as possible from the people of North America, the rest of Europe, and Japan. The establishment of this bank will be a step which will make that transition somewhat easier.

It is for that reason that we support this legislation and we hope very much that the bank will be a positive addition to the capital resources and the managerial resources of eastern Europe as it moves toward a more prosperous and, above all, a more democratic future for its people.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Questions and comments.

The Acting Speaker (M. Paproski): The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): The hon. member mentioned the desire for democracy expressed in Eastern Europe. I would say that with it came, above all, a desire for national identity. There were countries that wanted to free themselves from the yoke of the U.S.S.R. Within the U.S.S.R. we see republics that wish to express the fact that they are a nation. I am thinking specifically of Lithuania, Estonia and Latvia. If these countries decide to become independent, and considering the bill before the House, would the hon. member recognize the desire for independence of these three republics, for instance? Does he recognize the right of these three republics to self-determination? And should Canada, on this basis, help countries like the Baltic countries in their development? I would appreciate the hon. member's comments.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, obviously, I cannot answer for the Government of Canada. Personally, however, I think it is important to realize that a lot of changes are taking place in all European countries, and for instance, in the U.S.S.R., there are republics that entered into a federation about 60 or 70 years ago. The question is whether this federation will continue. I have no answer to that. I cannot predict whether the federation will be maintained. If there are changes that result in the dissolution of the U.S.S.R., I think it will be important for us as a country to help those countries, even if we are not happy with the dissolution itself.

Personally, I think that if the result is a movement towards independence by one or two or three of these republics, I think that is their right. And I hope—and I think this is important—that the bank will analyse the situation and conclude that it has a duty to help these new independent republics.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Duceppe: You also said that a very bureaucratic and centralized system within the Soviet federation had led to disastrous consequences, both for democracy and for the economy. I would like to know whether you see any useful lessons here for Canada. Canada is a federation. Don't you think that a very bureaucratic and centralized system within a federation will necessarily smother national or even regional aspirations?

• (1650)

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I think it is very difficult to consider these questions in the context of a debate on this bank. As I said in my remarks, the important thing is to avoid a Stalinist bureaucracy. There would be a number of issues to be raised if we were to refer to our own country, but it cannot be said that we have a Stalinist democracy. We do have a bureaucracy, of course, and I would not like to see an overly centralizing bureaucracy here in this country. Still, and I should think the hon. member would agree with me, we cannot say that we in Canada have a Stalinist bureaucracy, even with this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Shefford, for questions and comments.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the hon. member for his speech because I know he is familiar with the subject. But I would ask him whether he might not fear that Canada's participation in this European bank could be detrimental to the international assistance we have given in the past to other world nations in dire need. What I mean, is that a number of countries now receiving Canadian assistance—which is unfortunately too limited and has been declining over the years—may now be concerned that the Canadian participation might be taken from the same appropriations. Therefore, countries which until today have traditionally relied on Canadian aid for their own development may be wondering whether, as a result of the liberation of Eastern Europe, the funds which used to be earmarked for Africa and other Third World nations will be redirected towards Eastern Europe, often for commercial or political motives, to the detriment of the poorest countries of the world. While examining the bill, did the hon. member get the assurance that this will not happen? I realize he cannot speak for the government and that government members have precious little to say about this today, but I would like to know whether the hon. member shares my concern.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I hope there is no legitimate fear on that score. The question was raised in committee. It is a crucial issue and no one can predict what the government decision will be. For instance, it cannot be said that, after participating in this bank, the government will continue to be as generous as it has been so far with developing countries.

But I think this is an important bank. Since Canadian government assistance does not rank among the best, I do not think we ought to fear that Canada's participation in this bank might lead to a situation likely to create problems for developing countries.

[English]

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to have an opportunity here for the remaining five or six minutes to participate in this particular debate. I have to say that having spent the afternoon here in the House of Commons, I am not feeling in a particularly generous mood, nor do I feel very much of the Christmas spirit but I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you can identify with that feeling.

What we are involved in here is something that has certainly caught the entire world's attention. I can recall not so very long ago visiting the city of Berlin and looking at the wall. I can remember standing on the free side of that wall—if I can describe it that way—beside a beautiful German building, looking at this absolutely horrendous, ugly piece of construction that separated me from a couple of young soldiers just a few feet away sitting in a tower on the eastern side of that wall.

I can recall at that moment my feelings of anger and frustration at dealing with a situation that was absolutely impossible. I thought at that moment of the words of John F. Kennedy who stood there as well and spoke of the horrors of the wall and what it meant to the people of Europe and, in particular, the people of Germany.

Not long after standing beside that wall, I took the opportunity to walk through Check Point Charlie and go into the eastern part of Germany and experienced the absolute culture shock that anybody who has crossed the wall can identify with.

Here we were in western Berlin in a city that was so vibrant, so alive, an obvious tremendous economy, an air of excitement. Whether that was at three in the morning or three in the afternoon it was a city that was so much alive. You could feel the dynamics that were working within that city. When I walked that few feet to cross through Check Point Charlie, the atmosphere changed.

My first experience within about a block of the entrance was to come upon a small park in the middle of the city. I took a few minutes to stop and sit there. A young woman with, I assume, her mother and her two-year old daughter were in the park. What I found so fascinating was here we were in the middle of a city in an open park on a Friday afternoon and I am watching a mother and a young daughter and that little girl—like any two-year old—wanted to get up and play, have fun, and get into the excitement. The mother kept saying to her: "Shh-shh". Mr. Speaker, at the same time I had left at home here in Canada a two-year old daughter. I can imagine how I would have responded to her in a park like that in Canada. I could not by any stretch of my imagination suggest to her that she be quiet.

The reason I tell that story, Mr. Speaker, is because that picture of that young woman and her daughter demonstrated to me so clearly the significance of that wall, what that wall stood for, what that wall meant. We saw because of that wall a tremendous division of ideology, a tremendous division of opportunity, and a tremendous division of people. A wall that would divide people from one family could be living on either side of the wall—

Mr. Speaker, may I call it 5:00 o'clock p.m.?

Some hon. members: 5:00 o'clock p.m..

Mr. Cooper: Is it 5:00 o'clock p.m. Mr. Speaker?

I wish to continue my remarks after 5:00 p.m. o'clock.

Mr. Lapierre: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order because I was fully aware that the House had adopted a motion stating that at five o'clock we could vote on the adjournment, but that it was a conditional motion. Consequently, if the conditions are not met and that it is later than 5:00 o'clock p.m., I would like to know if the debate simply goes on and if the proceedings continue as usual? Is this the best course to follow, that at that point the motion is void?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I would like to respond for a moment to the hon. member for Shefford. I think it is important that hon. members and the public understand the procedural situation.

We are now bound by a motion granted by unanimous consent, which reads as follows:

> That, no later than 5:00 o'clock p.m. on Wednesday, December 19, 1990 the debate on Government Notice of Motion dated December 17, 1990 in the name of the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, regarding winter adjournment, be deemed to have been completed and all questions necessary to dispose of the said motion will be put forthwith and without further debate, provided that each opposition has had an opportunity to move an amendment or subamendment.

Given that I think it is appropriate to proceed. I ask hon. members to listen carefully because I think that they will see that this is proceeding appropriately.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made on Tuesday, December 18, 1990, the House will now proceed to Government Business No. 26 in the name of the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons regarding the winter adjournment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WINTER ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

> That, when the House adjourns on the day this order is adopted, it shall stand adjourned until 2.00 o'clock p.m. Monday, February 18, 1991 provided that at any time before the said date the Speaker may fix a time at which the House shall meet either in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 28(3), if the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time; or, after consultation with the Government, for the sole purpose of granting Royal Assent to any Bill or Bills, after which the House shall stand further adjourned in accordance with this Order; and
> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order of this House, if the House is not recalled pursuant to Standing Order 28(3) before Monday, February 18, 1991, the then scheduled adjournment in accordance with Standing Order 28(2) from February 18, 1991 to February 23, 1991 shall be cancelled.

I think the appropriate thing to do now is to give each opposition party an opportunity to move an amendment or a subamendment.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with your ruling, I would like to move an amendment that deals specifically with the question of timing.

We all know that this country and the world in fact face a very important deadline on January 15, when we will have to make crucial decisions about war and peace. We know that there is a great deal of apprehension among the Canadian public about that decision. It is a decision that should not be made without Parliament sitting at that time.

There is a number of precedents. The French Assembly has already decided to come back on January—

Mr. Speaker: I know that the hon. member will not be surprised if the Speaker rises to say that the object of the exercise of the hon. member rising is to present the amendment and not to present debate, important as his comments may be.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I did it only to assist the House in understanding the reason for this amendment.

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker is most appreciative that the hon. member's comments were only designed to assist the House, but I would ask the hon. member to put the motion.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "Monday" and by substituting the following:
> "January 14, 1991, provided that at any time before the said date, the Speaker may fix a time at which the House shall meet either in accordance with the provisions of S. O. 28(3), if public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time; or after consultation with the government, for the sole purpose of granting Royal Assent for any Bill or Bills, after which the House shall stand further adjourned in accordance with this order; and provided that, if hostilities commence in the Persian Gulf area or appear to be imminent, the Speaker shall immediately set a time not more than 48 hours thence for the House to meet".

This is a way in which Parliament will be allowed to present itself as the forum for decision making, not the cabinet, the ministers or the Prime Minister but the people of Canada, through their elected representatives.

Mr. Speaker: The amendment that the hon. member has moved is, of course, an understandable one. It is directed to meet a very serious matter which our country, along with other countries, faces.

I do not think it will come as too much of a surprise that the hon. member will find that the Speaker has to look very carefully at the wording in this amendment. Quite frankly, there are procedural difficulties with it. I am going to read the last four lines of the amendment:

> —and provided that if hostilities commence in the Persian Gulf area or appear to be imminent, the Speaker shall immediately set a time not more than 48 hours thence for the House to meet.

That may be a very commendable thing for the Speaker to do, but that is not he task I have to perform at the moment. I say, with full understanding of why this amendment has been put forward, that these lines introduce a new concept into the motion relating to hostilities in the Persian Gulf area. To my mind, the consequence of that is that it introduces a new concept and enlarges the scope of the motion. I am afraid I have to rule it out of order.

While there may be a number of citations that I could give the House, if hon. members will refer to the volume, Decisions of Speaker Lamoureux on page 313 and 314, they will understand why I have to make the decision that I have made.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, taking into account the time of year, I am certainly in no mood to challenge the learned and wise decision of the Speaker.

I would suggest that, under the circumstances, if it is only the last phrase that gives the Speaker some problem that portion of the motion could be deleted and the other part could be left standing. This would change the date simply to January 14, as opposed to February 18. While it does not give us quite the same scope, flexibility, or discretion for Parliament to act, I would still hope that Parliament would be prepared to come back on January 14, considering that would just be the day before Mr. Bush's January 15 deadline.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is probably aware that might be a very practical way of meeting the objectives of the hon. member and the Official Opposition, but it would require consent.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Lapierre: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not consent, so I cannot proceed further.

The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants on a quick point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: Very quickly, Mr. Speaker. Frankly I think the general purpose of the motion that is before the House will take care of any unfortunate eventualities that may occur. That is why we are here.

I have another sub-point of order which I perhaps would not want to try to get involved with here, but you talk about the opposition, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to be one—perhaps there are others—who question some of these motions which are agreed to by party consent. We have to think of other members besides the official recognized parties.

But in terms of the motion that my friend in the front row of the Liberal side has moved, the general adjournment motion takes care of it. It is then within the wisdom of the Chair, after consultation with leaders, as to whether the House goes back.

I will not presume on the House any further, but I have another point to raise later on.

An hon. member: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants.

I have had to make a ruling on the motion from the official opposition. I just want members and the public to realize that when I referred to the opposition I was referring specifically to Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition because this is the motion we are dealing with. There is no suggestion that I am not concerned about other members of the opposition.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg—South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If it is your decision not to accept the proposal, I am sorry. We could accept the proposal except some of our hon. colleagues behind us to the left did not want to give it consent.

Unfortunately, it seems that certain members from the Bloc Quebecois are not very cooperative today.

[English]

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, we do have difficulty meeting the condition of the adjournment motion and where it says that we have the right to move an amendment, I would like to be able to move that amendment.

We could perhaps find one that would be acceptable, but in order to meet the conditions of the consent order for adjournment, we would have to be able to move an amendment that would be acceptable to the Speaker in the House. I am sure that with the able assistance of the Table, we could find the right words to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's comment is greatly appreciated, by the Chair but needs unanimous consent at this time. Unfortunately for the member, it was not obtained and the decision is quite clear.

The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I think I found a solution.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That is what we need.

Mr. Gauthier: The order adopted yesterday states clearly that each opposition party will be allowed to move an amendment or sub-amendment. You just said that the amendment moved by my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre is out of order because it is beyond the normal scope of an amendment.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, you are correct when you say that the member for Winnipeg South Centre cannot resubmit another amendment, but the opposition has the right to submit an amendment.

I submit to you that another member of this House, in this case the whip of our party, could present an amendment which will be, I think, Mr. Speaker, acceptable to you.

• (1720)

Mr. Speaker: Before I rule on the intriguing question which has been put to me by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to draw one thing to your attention. The motion adopted on December 18 does state: "—at 5.00 o'clock p.m. at the latest."

It is now 5.20 p.m. Unless you go by Pacific time, I suggest it is even too late to table the said motions. We said "at 5 o'clock p.m. at the latest" and, as far as I know, unanimous consent was not given to ignore the clock either.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It may be the reason the hon. member has, but I am satisfied we are proceeding on a proper procedural basis. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I move that the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "Monday" and substituting the following:

"January 14, 1991, provided that any time before that said date the Speaker may fix a time at which the House shall meet either in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 28(3) if public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time, or after consultations with the government for the sole purpose of granting Royal Assent for any bill or bills after which the House shall stand further adjourned in accordance with this Order".

Mr. Speaker: The House can do anything it wishes if there is consent. There was not consent to accept the amendment. I have listened to the intriguing argument of the Official Opposition. My difficulty is that when looking at the motion, the exact words are "provided that each opposition party has had an opportunity to move an amendment or subamendment". I think I am pressed back into the position that my colleagues in the Official Opposition have had that opportunity. I have had to rule the amendment out of order despite how serious the issue is, but I do not see any way that the Chair can get around these words, "provided that each opposition party has had an opportunity to move an amendment or subamendment".

If the House wants to proceed in another way, I certainly am prepared to listen to comments if there was consent, but without that, I think I have to proceed.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the New Democrats would have been very pleased to support the Liberal amendments, so I am sorry it was not found to be procedurally correct. However, I wish to address one provision of the motion and move an amendment which enables the government to pass into law those bills that are currently in the Senate without the House sitting.

We reluctantly support this provision with the exception of Bill C–43. As you know, Mr. Speaker, Bill C–43 is not like the other bills in the House.

An hon. member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have to put her amendment. As I had to point out, the placing of an amendment at this time under the motion that was accepted by the House is not a time for debate.

I ask the hon. member to put her motion.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting the words "granting Royal Assent for any bill or bills", and replacing that with "granting Royal Assent for bill or bills other than Bill C–43.

Mr. Speaker: I find the motion in order. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

• (1750)

Before the taking of the vote:

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): On a brief point of order, Mr. Speaker. On the vote on the amendment, we will remember that Bill C–43 was a free vote. I wonder if we could not—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: That is not an appropriate point of order at all. The question is on the amendment.

The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The next question is on the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think there might be a predisposition to apply the vote just taken to this one, in reverse.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I was present for the first vote but I abstained. I would therefore like my vote recorded with the government side on the assumption will that we go ahead and apply the vote.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I would also like to have my vote recorded with the government. I abstained on the amendment.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, under other circumstances, we might have been willing to consider the application of the previous vote to this motion. It will be impossible for us to do so because we treated our vote on the previous motion as a free vote. Therefore—

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please rise.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of the third reading stage of Bill C–88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has asked that the House consent to proceeding with Bill C–88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. What the hon. member is asking is that it be now read a third time and do pass. That requires consent.

The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

• (1800)

Mr. Lapierre: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to point out that it is already passed 6 o'clock p.m. and that they will not find the required consent, because they did not have the courtesy of advising us of the motions they had to pass today.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think the motion was made under Standing Order 26. It is always admissible. If 15 members do not rise, then it is acceptable.

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: That's right.

Mr. Hawkes: That was Standing Order 26 that the member was using.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize that, but we are after the hour.

Let me make it very clear what is being sought here. The government wishes to proceed with a bill to third reading. Because we are after 6:00 o'clock p.m., that will require consent. Is the House prepared to proceed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief point of order. As the Speaker and hon. members of the House would recognize, we could move an amendment where we would try to clarify specifically that the House would be called back if there was the imminent conflict—

Mr. Speaker: I must say to the hon. member that that may be a very interesting thing to say outside the House, but it is not a point of order.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, when I rose on the motion, the business before the House, before we stopped at 5:00 o'clock p.m., was Bill C–88. I had the floor. You, Sir, had not risen to call it 6:00 o'clock p.m. to adjourn the House.

I would therefore argue that the House was still sitting. I had put the motion prior to you having called it 6:00 o'clock p.m.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I do think that the point is a moot point. It is not a weak one.

Standing Order 26 says the member must have the floor. As far as I know, the Clerk had not read the order that was to be discussed after the votes had been called for. The Clerk had just sat down.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, this party is willing to give the government Bill C–88 today. We will agree to extend the hours, but not all night.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has made a representation which I think in view of the response from the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, I do not need to go into.

What is being asked now basically is, will the House proceed with this bill.

Just so that all hon. members know exactly what is being asked, and so that the public will know what is being asked here, the government wishes to proceed and Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has agreed to proceed and we will take the consent of the House that Bill C–88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, be now read a third and do pass.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford is clearly indicating that he is not in agreement.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, what happened by way of House order was that during discussion of Bill C–88, the House stopped the proceedings to have a vote on the motion for adjournment and so on.

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Andre: Prior to that, my parliamentary secretary was speaking on debate. He rose prior to the adjournment and put a motion under Standing Order 26, extension of hours, which the Leader of the Opposition agreed would be appropriate.

Now, the question comes down to the clock. I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the Standing Order states explicitly that Question Period will start at 2.15. p.m. Today it started at 2.20 p.m. because the Chair showed some discretion in view of circumstances. The Standing Orders state explicitly that Question Period shall end at 3:00 o'clock p.m. but because there were members who wanted to ask questions, Mr. Speaker kept Question Period going.

It seems, Mr. Speaker, when you have the concurrence of the overwhelming majority of the House to recognize that at 6.01 p.m. or 6.02 p.m. we were still sitting, it seems appropriate at least to put the motion and whatever happens, happens.

Mr. Speaker: I want to respond to the hon. government House leader. As hon. members know, this House can do what it wishes when there is sufficient determination to do so. I certainly cannot find anything unreasonable about the suggestion of the hon. government House leader, especially given the response of the Official Opposition. But, it is not my place to get into that argument. We can proceed now and dispatch this bill in only a few minutes if there is agreement. If there is not agreement, we cannot proceed.

I am going to ask the House again: Will the House consent to continue the sitting?

An hon. member: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, one point has to be made clear. The Official Opposition is willing to support the wishes of the government. However, before we leave this place tonight, the government must understand once and for all—and this is said with no hard feelings—that all members of this House are equal and that, when there are deals to be made, all members should be consulted.

[English]

The only reason I could put to the House a very difficult point that required unanimous consent was because I went to see the then hon. member for Moncton, Mr. Jones, who was totally and adamantly opposed to what I was suggesting. He said: "Because you came and treated me as a member of the House who could say no, I give you my consent".

For future reference, maybe every member should be consulted when we need unanimous consent. There is no unanimous consent. We are ready to go ahead but there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker has decided that if there is not unanimous consent, we cannot proceed, therefore we should listen to Mr. Speaker and adjourn. Merry Christmas, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I listened carefully to the government House leader. It is true that earlier today I did not see the clock, but there seemed to be unanimous agreement that that was acceptable.

The hon. government House leader has indicated to me that there was not unanimous agreement and I should certainly be more careful in the future. Again, as long as the public knows exactly what is taking place here, the government has asked for consent to move and finish the bill.

It will require consent. There is not consent. As a consequence, I must say that as it is past 6:00 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, this House stands adjourned until Monday, February 18, 1991, at 2:00 o'clock p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.12 p.m.

RECONVENING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wish to inform the House that, in accordance with the order of the House made Wednesday, December 19, 1990, and after consultation with the government, I caused to be published in an extra edition of The Canada Gazette a notice calling the House to meet this day.

In addition, on Sunday, January 13, 1991, I sent an electronic message to each member of the House containing the substance of that motion.

I also wish to inform the House that, in accordance with the government's representations and pursuant to Standing Order 55(1), I have caused to be published a special Order Paper giving notice of a government motion on the crisis in the Persian Gulf.

[English]

I now lay upon the table a letter dated Saturday, January 12, 1991 from the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons in relation to that notice.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of the Hon. Jean Chrétien, member for the electoral riding of Beauséjour.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Mr. Jean Chrétien, member for the electoral district of Beauséjour, introduced by the Hon. Herb Gray and Mr. Marcel Prud'homme.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua, member for the electoral riding of York North.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua, member for the electoral district of York North, introduced by the Hon. Jean Chrétien and Mr. Sergio Marchi.

• (1110)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the serious international circumstances that prevail intrude on what is traditionally a light-hearted and respectful welcome to a new leader of any party and, of course, to a new Leader of the Opposition. I would have enjoyed that combination of tribute and welcome today. Most members would agree, and I know the Leader of the Opposition has already indicated to me that he would hope we err on the side of brevity this morning, which I will do.

On behalf of all members, I would like to extend a very genuine and a warm welcome to a very distinguished parliamentarian and a very fine Canadian, the Hon. Jean Chrétien.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the very distinguished parliamentary career of the new Leader of the Opposition reaches back over a quarter of a century. His very distinguished career in House of Commons is evidence of the fact that the very nature of the Commons is such that while strong disagreements can, and will always take place on both sides of the aisle, they do so with a fundamental respect for the rules of parliamentary procedure as opposed to any kind of violence, verbal or otherwise, that can inhibit and ultimately destroy parliamentary democracy.

I salute the hon. member for his contributions in the past. I know that we all look forward to his participation in debates of national and international significance.

[Translation]

As the new Leader of the Opposition is well aware, there is no shortage of challenges in this country. We are counting on the new member for Beauséjour and new Leader of the Official Opposition to contribute in a way that is both constructive and useful to the debate on the major national and international issues of the day.

[English]

I would like to say on behalf of all members of the House of Commons that we welcome Jean Chrétien back to the floor of the House. We wish him and his family well. We do not wish him all the success in the world, but as much as one can hope for the Leader of the Opposition. I remind him that he has already demonstrated extraordinary ability for that particular role. If he keeps it up, I know that Canadians will reward him further with a long stay in that particular position.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Good luck, Jean!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, with my colleagues, I have the pleasure of welcoming the member for Beauséjour and the member for York North back to this Chamber.

On behalf of my colleagues I would like to congratulate both members on their successes. I would also like to take the opportunity of congratulating the Leader of the Opposition on his election as the leader of his party.

The member for Beauséjour, as the right hon. Prime Minister has indicated, has much experience to bring this House, having been first elected in 1963, when Tommy Douglas was the leader of my party and John F. Kennedy was President. It is a time when we need that kind of experience in the House. We certainly welcome the wisdom that Mr. Chrétien brings.

I am sure the Liberal leader will join millions of Canadian men and women who, with us, want to find a peaceful solution to the crisis in the Middle East.

The House was recalled for members to consider the most serious issue that has been before this House in many years. This is not a partisan issue. It is not a matter of party politics. It is about the future of Canada and the whole world.

[English]

For that reason we are particularly pleased—and I speak on behalf of my party and myself—to have the Leader of the Opposition with us in the House on this important and sombre occasion. While I wish him well, I can only wish him limited success.

As well, I would like to say that we will miss the interim leader, the hon. member for Windsor West, who certainly also brought much honour to the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, while the Leader of the Opposition and I will share very different opinions at certain times, I can say with great certainty that, as Mr. Chrétien has shown in the past, we will all serve the interests of Canada to our best. I know the Leader of the Opposition has that interest foremost in his mind.

Welcome to the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am greatly moved by this tribute from the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

As the Prime Minister said earlier, under normal circumstances this would be a pleasant opportunity for some spirited exchanges and a lot of good humour, all of which would show that despite that which separates us here in this House, all members elected to the House of Commons have only one objective: the well-being of Canadians. Our objectives and viewpoints may often differ, and we may express them quite forcefully, but we have received from our constituents a mandate to show Canadians what the best way is to run this country.

[English]

I would like to say to the Prime Minister and the Leader of the New Democratic Party that for me to be back under these circumstances unfortunately takes away at a time when I would like to have some light exchanges. The Prime Minister is very good at that, as is the Leader of the New Democratic Party, but today is a difficult day and it does not call for that. I would like to thank the Prime Minister and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

I would like to offer my congratulations to the new member for York North who has done something unprecedented.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: He is probably the first member of Parliament in our history to walk down the aisle twice in the same Parliament. I think that is a very good precedent that will lead us to walk down the aisle very soon, but the other way.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I would also like to say a few words about my election.

[Translation]

First of all, I wish to thank the hon. gentleman, Mr. Robichaud—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: —who gave me the opportunity to take my seat today. I also would like to thank the voters in the electoral district of Beauséjour who placed their trust in me at a crucial moment in Canada's history. I hope I will be a very good member for my constituents and I will try to be as good as my predecessor, Mr. Robichaud.

• (1120)

Before I sit down, I would also like to thank the hon. member on my right who was the leader of this party for nearly a year and who did an exceptional job.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that I fully intend to offer the Chair the same level of co-operation as did my predecessor from Windsor West and another predecessor, who is still a member of this House but unfortunately not in the House this morning, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. Both are very experienced parliamentarians who always understood the very difficult role the Speaker of this House has to play every day, in sometimes difficult circumstances.

[English]

In conclusion, I would like again to say thank you for the graciousness of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the NDP in welcoming me to the Chamber. I want to offer to both of them my collaboration. As I said, we are all here to serve the nation the best we can. We are here in a very difficult time. It is the time to get into the business of the nation, of war and peace that is troubling the nation.

For this welcome, to all members of Parliament I would like to say a very profound merci beaucoup.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

ACTIONS IN LITHUANIA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been extensive consultations, carried out principally by the member for Scarborough Centre, and I think you would find there is unanimous agreement in the House to adopt, without debate, the following resolution which I would propose to move, seconded by my colleagues from Parkdale—High Park and Winnipeg Transcona:

Be it resolved

That this House condemns the brutal and unacceptable Soviet crackdown in Lithuania, and calls upon President Gorbatchev and

U.S.S.R. authorities to refrain from using further violence against the people and democratically elected governments of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia.

That this House appeals to the U.S.S.R. to adhere to its obligations under the Helsinki Final Act and the Charter of Paris, and to seek solutions consistent with respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms; and

That, recognizing the continuing Canadian government policy not to recognize de jure the annexation of the Baltic States, this House recalls its Resolution of March 1990 and continues to support the right of the Baltic peoples to determine their own future.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a short point of order.

Considering that we are about to launch into a very historic and important debate where the need for a maximum exchange of ideas is critical, there have been communications between the parties in terms of the proposal that we consider, after the first round of speeches by the leaders, entering into Committee of the Whole to maximize the positive and meaningful exchange between members.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you would seek the unanimous consent of the House to move to Committee of the Whole after the first round of speeches by the leaders.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, there have been resolutions on this subject passed twice in the House and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, where that kind of discourse with officials and experts has been going on and continues to go on.

We thought it appropriate for this very important subject at this very important and critical time that the formal debate procedures of the House of Commons would be the best way to proceed. But, in terms of any other modifications to our Standing Orders or procedures that might expedite the kind of discourse, I would certainly be prepared to engage in discussions with House leaders about that at a future time.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I take the remarks of the government House leader as a negative and that the government does not feel at this time time that the proposal put by the New Democratic Party requires its approval.

I regret that immensely because the Committee of the Whole would have allowed members of the House to have a dialogue with ministers on the other side. It would have also allowed for repeated questions to be put to the government and a more democratic debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops has put a suggestion to the House under motions. At the moment, there is not consent and it is now my duty to continue with Routine Proceedings.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

SUPPORT FOR UNITED NATIONS

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on August 2 Saddam Hussein launched a war against Kuwait. His invasion and subsequent annexation of Kuwait are grievous violations of the most basic principles of international law and of human decency. We are here today to reaffirm Canada's support for the United Nations' efforts to bring those violations to an end.

On October 23, the House approved sending Canadian Forces members, vessels, and aircraft to participate in the multinational military effort in the Persian Gulf.

On November 29, the House passed a further motion, supporting the United Nations and, I quote, supporting "the United Nations in its efforts to ensure compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and subsequent resolutions", notably resolution 678 co-sponsored by Canada and passed the same day at the United Nations. Resolution 678 gives Saddam Hussein one final opportunity to comply with the will of the world community as expressed in successive United Nations resolutions. The 47-day pause for peace provided for in resolution 678 ends tonight.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, as we consider this matter on the floor of the House of Commons, efforts continue at the United Nations with a proposal that contains elements that are similar to ideas advanced in writing by Canada to the United Nations Secretary-General last week.

• (1130)

Diplomacy has been and is still being given every chance. Following U.S. Secretary Baker's unsuccessful meeting with Iraqi Foreign Minister Aziz last week in Geneva, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Perez de Cuellar, made the second of two visits to the Middle East on this issue. His appeal to Saddam Hussein to leave Kuwait was callously rebuffed once again. Mr. Perez de Cuellar told journalists yesterday that he saw "no reason to have any real hope". He has reported that Saddam Hussein "never mentioned. . .that he was prepared to withdraw from Kuwait." No one could have failed to notice Saddam Hussein's contempt for international opinion, international law, and common decency.

[English]

United Nations resolution 678 authorizes member states to use all necessary means to uphold and implement the relevant UN resolutions on this crisis and to restore international peace and security in the area.

Resolution 678, approved by this House on November 29, also requests all member states, including Canada, to provide "appropriate support" for actions taken in pursuance of this important goal.

The choice of peace or war remains Saddam Hussein's, and only his, as it has been for the last five and a half months; but time is very quickly running out on him.

Regardless of how they cast their vote last November 29, members on all sides of the House hope that hostilities will not be necessary.

It was clear to all of us then that we might have to impose the ultimate sanction on Saddam Hussein, military force, if he did not withdraw his forces illegally stationed in an innocent member state.

The United Nations made the threat of the use of force to, persuade Saddam Hussein of the seriousness of the UN's determination to see him out of Kuwait. It was not an empty gesture.

The question before Canadians now is a simple one. If Saddam Hussein does not withdraw peacefully from Kuwait and the use of force is required, where will Canada stand? On this simple question of right and wrong, will we continue to support the international coalition, or will we stand aside and hope that others will uphold the rule of international law?

There are very significant and understandable differences of opinion on such an important and sensitive international issue that has impacts of all kinds—many of them incalculable today—on the lives of many Canadians and many people around the world.

I understand and I respect the views of all members on all sides of this issue as they consider such a profoundly troubling and difficult issue and the manner in which it can be best confronted while keeping in mind the national interest and our international obligations.

The Government of Canada and I, as Prime Minister, have reflected very carefully on all aspects of this problem as I understand them. Our entire policy of the government is similar to policies of previous governments when confronted with similar challenges.

Our entire policy has been designed to achieve a peaceful solution to it. If, however, Saddam Hussein continues to reject the will of the United Nations, Canada will join with the United Nations in expelling him from Kuwait by force.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Kuwait may seem a remote place geographically and culturally, but so did Manchuria in 1931, Abyssinia in 1935, and Czechoslovakia in 1938. While, in the thirties, these were little known places, in the nineties they figure in our history books as the stepping stones to World War II. In each case what has been described by a leading historian as "a profound pacifism, an almost doctorinaire insistence on peace regardless of the circumstances" led the League of Nations to turn a blind eye to aggression—and the world paid a price in millions of avoidable deaths in World War II.

What is happening in Kuwait has direct and substantial effects on Canada's interests. As a country with a comparatively small population, with two superpowers as neighbours, and with our own limited military capacity, Canada's most basic interest lies in the preservation of international law and order. The United Nations and its charter are essential to the rule of law and to the respect of the integrity of small countries by larger neighbours.

[English]

The architects of the United Nations—and Canadians were among them—were determined "to make absolutely certain", as Lester Pearson wrote in 1945, "that never again should an aggressor be permitted to strike down one nation after another before the peace loving nations of the world organize and take concerted action against it".

The fundamental purpose of the United Nations itself, as proclaimed in Article 1 of its charter, is "to maintain international peace and security" by taking "effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace".

That is in the founding charter of the United Nations itself. Those are the principles that we pledged to uphold when we helped found and subscribed to the fundamental precepts based on the notion of the respect for international law almost 50 years ago.

With the exception of Korea, the UN has been prevented by the cold war from either suppressing acts of aggression or preventing them, as the Suez crisis, Vietnam, Afghanistan and the Arab–Israeli wars, among dozens of other conflicts, make clear.

Today, with the extraordinary unanimity that has accompanied the relaxation of east–west tensions, the authority vested in the UN by its architects—including Prime Ministers King, St. Laurent and Pearson—can be exercised by our generation to preserve international law and order.

Saddam Hussein's challenge raises the stakes for the UN. Because, while this crisis provides an opportunity for the UN to play the role Canada has always wanted it to play, regrettably it also provides an occasion for the UN to fail to do so. And if the UN were to fail to do so, a large part of the principles, objectives and efforts of 45 years of Canadian diplomacy would have been for nothing.

Our generation, having ignored the lessons of history, could be condemned to re–live some of history's darkest chapters. Saddam Hussein would become an example for other potential bullies, making the world an even more dangerous place than it is already. Nations would be left alone to defend themselves against aggression and a new arms race would be launched.

The UN—designed to prevent a return to the rule of the jungle—could go the way of the League of Nations, and this at a time when international problems—from the environment to human rights to debt to development to drugs to the protection of children—can only be resolved collectively, and when a credible, effective UN has never been more necessary.

These are not abstract issues to Canada. They are not someone else's business. They are direct, vital Canadian interests, and they are engaged fully in this question. The UN cannot be allowed to fail at this critical moment in history.

[English]

The argument is made by some that Canada should hold itself back now in order to play a peacekeeping role later. Were Saddam Hussein to succeed in his annexation of Kuwait, he would be in a position to threaten the entire Middle East, and he is in the process of threatening individual nations as we speak.

With the time and the wealth he would acquire, he would add further weapons of mass destruction to his arsenal, including in all probability nuclear weapons. In what position would this put his neighbours? After Iran and Kuwait, what would be his next target? Saudi Arabia? Jordan? Would we hold ourselves back again, waiting for the latest atrocities to end so that Canada might then be invited in as part of a peacekeeping force?

Saddam Hussein has threatened directly to attack Israel with weapons of mass destruction. In the face of extraordinary provocation from Iraq, as evidenced by Foreign Minister Aziz' deplorably aggressive threat from Geneva last week directly to mount an assault on Israel, Israel has demonstrated remarkable restraint.

Should Saddam Hussein move against Israel, would we still hold ourselves back in the hope that we would be called in later to help keep what is left of the peace in what is left of the Middle East?

This course is a prescription for neither wisdom nor responsibility and it is not a course that Canada should follow.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: It is also argued that a peacekeeping role would be more in keeping with Canada's traditions. There is no reason at all, none whatsoever, to believe that a peacemaking role now disqualifies Canada for a peacekeeping role later.

Participation in the Korean War did not prevent External Affairs Minister Pearson from helping to create the United Nations peacekeeping function. Membership in NATO and NORAD has not prevented us from participating in every United Nations peacekeeping operation but one since the beginning of the international organization, and supporting right over wrong in the Persian Gulf does not preclude a peacekeeping role for Canada there following hostilities.

Like all Canadians, we are justifiably proud of Canada's peacekeeping traditions. But peacekeeping is only part of Canada's traditions. Standing firm for what we believe in and fighting if necessary is also a Canadian tradition and one that we remember most solemnly every November 11.

More than 1,700,000 Canadians participated in World Wars I and II and in Korea; 100,000 graves in Europe and Asia that bear silent but eloquent testimony to the courage and will of Canadians to stand for what we believe is right.

A terrible wrong is being committed by Saddam Hussein and I believe it is a terrible wrong which, if unchecked, could lead to horrific consequences for other nations in the region and indeed the entire world. A terrible wrong is being committed by Saddam Hussein, and I believe and this government believes that it is the moral duty of the international community to stop him now.

His motives in attacking Kuwait were self-aggrandizement and greed, nothing more difficult than that to understand: greed, money, territory, access to the sea, greed. That is the reason that for the first time one Arab state invaded another, a peaceful neighbouring state that had co-operated freely and generously with its neighbour.

To confuse international opinion, he has attempted to link the Persian Gulf crisis with the Palestinian issue. No one believes he invaded Kuwait to help the Palestinians. Everyone can see he is trying to rationalize his invasion of Kuwait after the fact and to undermine the multinational coalition now facing him. His attempt to portray the occupation of Kuwait—and the atrocities and murders he perpetrated on other Arabs—after all, he is the one who initiated such violence against his Arab neighbour—as somehow advancing legitimate Palestinian interests and concerns is both beyond understanding and beneath contempt.

Since we last debated this crisis in November, we have received the Amnesty International report detailing the extent of murders, rapes and brutalization in Kuwait. Torture and executions of non-combatants, including young children, have been wide-spread and accurately reported by the Amnesty International officials. I urge all members of this House to read this eye-opening and distressing report. Thousands of people have been subjected arbitrarily to arrest and detention. Hundreds of thousands of people have been forcibly evicted from Kuwait. A systematic effort is being ruthlessly carried out to erase the identity of a nation.

Notwithstanding these atrocities, some still make the argument that economic sanctions should be given more time to work. That is an interesting point of view and I look forward to hearing what the members think of that for, in my opinion, the most fundamental question we must ask ourselves is will sanctions alone work? The sanctions and the naval and air blockades have succeeded in stopping a great deal of Iraq's foreign trade. There is no doubt about that. They are also unquestionably having an impact on economic conditions and living standards within Iraq. Iraqi oil production is down substantially. At the same time, there is clearly leakage of foodstuffs and components through the embargo.

• (1150)

An appropriate question is, how much time will it take for sanctions to work: six months, sixteen months, sixty months? Obviously, no one knows. The essential point in regard to sanctions that we all must remember is that Saddam Hussein has demonstrated limitless tolerance for the suffering of his own people.

This is a man who put his nation through eight pointless years of a war that took almost a million lives. It was so pointless, in fact, that in August he gave back almost everything that he had gained from that eight-year war with Iran in order to purchase Iranian neutrality in this particular conflict to make sure that he was not attacked from another flank. Eight years of extraordinary suffering and devastation inflicted on two countries, hundreds of thousands of young lives lost, and whatever was gained was turned back in an instant to procure the neutrality of somebody who might attack him while he was engaged in attacking an innocent Arab neighbour.

While industrial production is down substantially because of shortages of imported goods, Saddam Hussein will always ensure that the Iraqi armed forces are guaranteed the absolute top priority to key commodities. He will not hesitate, as the evidence of history clearly indicates, to pass on any amount of suffering and deprivation to his own people. Their well-being and security is clearly the furthest thing from his mind. But there is no evidence that sanctions have caused a groundswell of public discontent.

In fact, there is no reason to believe that the sanctions are having the desired effect at all. The desired effect is not to inflict damage on the armed forces tomorrow morning, but to get Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait by tonight. His objective is different from ours. We want him removed from Kuwait and he very much wants to stay there.

There is every reason to believe, based on his most recent statements last night and this morning and confronted with the extraordinary resolutions of the United Nations, that he has not the slightest intention, at least not so far, to indicate that he will respect and honour the commitments of the United Nations. He is determined to stay. He shows every sign of trying to out-wait the international community in the hope that events sooner or later will split the United Nations coalition.

Given the volatility of world affairs, especially in the Middle East, his gamble might very well work. In weighing the arguments in favour of using force, it must obviously be conceded that the risks and costs of a war are literally incalculable but that they would certainly be substantial in lives and resources. How risky and how costly would depend on a number of factors. How long would the war last? How strongly would the Iraqi forces resist? Could war be limited to the Iraq-Kuwait theatre or would it spread? How much damage would the environment sustain?

These are fundamentally important questions which I acknowledge. Unfortunately, there are no firm answers from anyone anywhere to these questions at this moment.

But while we concern ourselves and properly so with these questions, we must also guard against the tendency to regard waiting as cost-free. The fact is that there are also absolutely incalculable costs to waiting. The destruction of Kuwait continues unabated. An entire nation is being systematically dismantled and destroyed before our very eyes and human rights abuses continue at a pace and on a scale with few precedents in modern times.

Furthermore, the international economy is being damaged, and the poorest people in the Third World are the most affected. The funds that are paying for a massive military presence in the gulf are not available to the fledgling democracies of Eastern Europe, with potentially critical consequences for their futures.

And all the while that we wait for sanctions to work, the Iraqi defences become increasingly formidable. If it requires hostilities to get Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait, the costs in terms of casualties among the coalition partners, including Canada, probably increase with every day and every week that passes. So, while a war is certain to be very costly, waiting to see if sanctions will work is very costly as well.

If sanctions failed at the end of the given period of time—16 months, 36 months, whatever—what then would be the guarantee that the coalition would still be united and able to fight 16 months down the road, let alone 60? And fight for what? Fight for the integrity and respect of the United Nations without which a civilized world cannot exist.

Were Saddam Hussein to succeed, the costs to Canadian interests—and I define Canadian interests very clearly to include the discrediting of the United Nations, the distortion of international order, the trampling of human rights—and the impact on the world economy would be unacceptable.

I have heard it said that Canadian interests are not engaged. When the United Nations is discredited, when a member state is invaded, when human rights are being abused, when people are being slaughtered, I say that Canada's rights and Canada's interests are very much engaged and must be defended.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: For all these reasons, the government believes that Canada should continue to support the United Nations in taking all possible measures to cause Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait.

Some allege that the government is simply following the lead of the United States administration on this issue. This is perhaps the most tired and threadbare accusation of all, because as Prime Minister Pearson wrote derisively in his memoirs: "a sure way to get applause and support at home is to exploit (Canadians') anxieties and exaggerate (their) suspicions over United States power and policies", and Mr. Pearson was right.

It should not be surprising or offensive to anybody that the views of free nations often coincide. In fact, in this case the views of all leading western nations led by governments of very different political stripes, including the United Kingdom, Italy, Australia, France, the United States, and Canada, are in harmony.

Why not? We all share the values of liberty, democracy and equality before the law. Our institutions all draw their validity from the free expression of the wills of our people. In foreign affairs, we all stand for the respect of international law.

It is certainly not surprising to members of this government that in light of the stakes on this issue these democracies, leading western industrialized democracies, all back the United Nations very strongly.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Canada worked hard to persuade the United States to work within the United Nations and to forgo unilateral action. The international coalition knows it must now be prepared to stand up for what is right.

Bob Hawke, the distinguished Prime Minister of Australia and leader of the socialist party in his country, the Labour Party, in weighing the same considerations we are weighing today, told his Parliament on December 4:

> —if conflict occurs of a kind which is contemplated and authorized by the (United Nations) resolution, (Australian) ships will be available to participate fully in actions with the allied fleet—

François Mitterrand, President of France and leader of his country's Socialist Party, has made clear his country's position when he said, and I quote: "France considers a complete withdrawal from Kuwait to be an inviolable principle. Moreover, (France) holds that the January 15th deadline cannot be postponed or extended for any reason whatsoever". The President of France concluded that: "If the conditions that have been set are not fulfilled, then France will be doing its duty."

[English]

In the United Kingdom, Prime Minister Major has been equally clear and consistent on this point.

Mr. Neil Kinnock, the Leader of the Opposition in the United Kingdom, said last week that his party, the socialist party, the Labour Party of the United Kingdom, "will not, in the interests of distancing ourselves from the government, distance ourselves from our forces or from our obligations to the United Nations".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: We know now that both chambers of the United States Congress have voted to support the administration in the implementation of UN Resolution 678 to get Saddam Hussein's forces out of Kuwait.

[Translation]

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, Canada's policy from the beginning has been a two-track policy: working relentlessly for peace, but preparing for hostilities if diplomacy failed. In fact, the record will show that from the day Iraq invaded Kuwait we have carried on very extensive, diplomacy designed to find a peaceful solution to this crisis. We have consulted widely in the region, and elsewhere, promoted the importance of the UN as the instrument of the world's response, urged a prompt withdrawal by Iraq, and counselled prudence on our allies. A full outline of all of our principal efforts since last August will be set out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he speaks in the debate later today. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that we, in Canada—as I believe every member of this House will recongnize after having heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs—have done everything possible to promote a peaceful outcome to this crisis.

[English]

No one wants a war, least of all those to whom it falls to fight. I am sure that I speak for every member of this House and for all Canadians in expressing my deepest admiration for the dedication, the professionalism, and the courage of the Canadian service men and women in the Persian Gulf today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I am sure that whatever our policy views, whatever differences we may have from time to time, we in this House will be unanimous in supporting these outstanding and courageous men and women. They are there in the defence of the values and interests of all Canadians. They deserve the country's gratitude and support. Both they and their families have the prayers of all members of the House for a safe return.

If war comes, Canadians will be at risk.

Saddam Hussein has openly and blatantly threatened to use weapons of mass destruction in the region and to sponsor terrorist activity abroad as well. We have, therefore, advised Canadians that they should defer travel to the region and, if they are already there, to consider leaving now. CSIS and the RCMP have increased their levels of alert.

On this point, I want to reassure Iraqi Canadians that they will not be subject in any way to illegal surveillance or unwarranted detention, as was the case in regard to other citizens during World War II. That lesson fortunately has been learned in this country.

The House has been recalled today, in these serious circumstances, to permit members to express themselves on the Gulf crisis in the full knowledge of the facts and of the government's position on them. We are asking that the opposition join, if possible, in re-affirming Canadian support of the UNin securing the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. This procedure is consistent with our tradition in the past.

In 1939, in equally serious circumstances, the then Leader of the Opposition stated in this House for example—no comparison is perfect of course, but I mention it as an example—that: "We are going through a very grave crisis,. . . it is no exaggeration to say that this is a war for the preservation of human liberty. So far as my party is concerned. . . there will not be. . . anything in the way of political manoeuvring or captious criticism."

[English]

In June, 1950, one of the most distinguished servants of this House, the Hon. Stanley Knowles, speaking on behalf of his party on the Korean crisis, pledged his party's "complete support of the principle of collective security and their readiness to carry their support of that principle into all it may involve".

Mr. Knowles went on to say that "the government has the concurrence of all of the groups in this House in its readiness to support the action"—the military action as it then was—"taken by the United Nations. That is clearly our obligation and that way alone lies hope." Mr. Knowles concluded by saying on the floor of this House, "If we can deal with this present crisis on that basis and demonstrate the effectiveness of collective action for peace we may yet achieve much more in that direction than at times we have dared to hope".

As it was in 1950, so it is today in 1991. The government is acutely conscious of the gravity of the situation. Canada is a peaceful country. Canada Day is an occasion for family gatherings and friendship and not for bombast and military parades. Canada is a country that stands for decency and peace and we are also a country that stands for principles, respect for law, freedom, and human dignity.

The fundamental truth in this debate is that if we want peace we must defend these principles for which the United Nations stands. We must be prepared to stand up for what is right. To do otherwise is to signal to Saddam Hussein and to all other potential aggressors that the United Nations is incapable of responding effectively to aggression. No moral superiority accrues to those who stand on the sidelines and let others defend their principles. Canada is a peaceful country, but Canada is neither a neutral country, nor a country that expects a free ride.

Most members of this House, including me, are too young to have had personal involvement in war. All of us, however, know the devastation that war has brought to too many nations and the sorrow that it has visited upon too many families in this country alone. As a result, for successive governments over decades, the avoidance of war has been the principal thrust of Canadian foreign policy. Over the decades Canada has made contributions to the cause of peace that have been substantial and effective. But we have always known, as Canadians, that peace comes to those who are willing to defend it.

Indeed, it is because our parents and theirs courageously resisted aggression in the past in places far away, that we today are members of this democratic parliament in a free and an independent country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we honour that heritage and we respect noble Canadian traditions of valour today by standing firm in support of the United Nations and all the hope and the promise that a rejuvenated and strengthened United Nations brings to the entire world.

I believe that we honour that heritage and respect noble Canadian traditions today by standing firm in support of the only international institution that can guarantee a durable peace in the world. If anything can, it is the United Nations and we must stand today in helping the United Nations to suppress aggression against an innocent member state. That has been Canada's tradition over decades and I believe that remains Canada's obligation today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I rise in this House today, I am saddened and concerned, as I believe all Canadians are at this time. We may be only a few hours away from a conflict, a war in the Persian Gulf.

[English]

A long and dark shadow, a shadow of death, hangs over the Middle East. A long and dark shadow, a shadow of death, hangs over hundreds and hundreds of Canadian women and men in the Middle East today. Therefore, today is a day for calm and it is a day for quiet deliberation.

Our duty is to promote peace, not war. The clock is ticking. There are only a few hours ahead of us. So all of us must move with caution, we must move with care.

I would like to say to the Prime Minister that we are not debating at this time the support of the UN. We all support the UN.

Some hon. members: Right on.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Today, we are debating war and we are debating Canadian participation in a war.

The problem we all face is why the Prime Minister has not chosen to ask the real question of the House today. This is the question with which the country is faced: Should Canadian troops participate in a war, perhaps at midnight tonight, between Iraq and the United States? That is the question we are facing at this moment and it is the question that we have to answer.

We all supported the government up to a point last November. On August 2, the Security Council of the United Nations passed resolution 660 after the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. We approved that resolution of condemnation of the action of Iraq. On August 6, there was another resolution of the Security Council asking for economic sanctions against this country that had invaded Kuwait. We in this House all supported the economic sanctions against Iraq.

Later, on August 25, there was another resolution of the Security Council to authorize military action to enforce the sanctions in the Gulf. We all supported that resolution. We all applauded the action of the UN at that moment because we thought that we were getting into a new order in the world, where it would be possible to have a collective action to act. We were happy. The cold war was over. There was a new hope that it was possible to act collectively to maintain peace around the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: We were all of the opinion that sanctions were needed and we were all hoping that sanctions were working. But suddenly, in November, resolution 678 was presented. At that time we had anticipated what was going to happen and we decided not to support the government. We realized that the decision made in August was a decision that called for embargoes and sanctions and it was going to take time.

I can quote the President of the United States and his Secretary of State who in October told the American Congress, before their elections there, that the sanctions were working.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Later in the fall, the same thing happened. The head of the CIA, William Webster, talked about all the problems that the sanctions and the embargoes were causing to Iraq. He talked about more than 90 per cent of Iraq's imports and 97 per cent of exports having been stopped. Industrial production in Iraq has declined by 40 per cent since August. All that was said in October. He talked about the problem of putting exchange restrictions so that they had no more money to buy anything to maintain their equipment.

That was in the fall. But within a few days, we did not hear about sanctions or embargoes any more. The question was about the resolution with a deadline. We said at that time and we say again today that we strongly reject the use of force now—

• (1220)

Mr. Chrétien: —because the embargo has not been given enough time to work.

Since November, military deployment to put pressure on Iraq has developed a momentum of its own which has outpaced the march for a negotiated settlement. The January 15 ultimatum has reduced the room for diplomatic activity because an ultimatum is not negotiable. We predicted at that time that we would be faced with this problem today, that the ultimatum would not work.

I would like to clarify something that is very important to all Canadians and that is what the Security Council has authorized in resolution 678. It has given licence to individual members of the United Nations to use force after January 15. That was the resolution. But, it has not activated the UN charter provisions which regulate the use of force by the United Nations. This is a fundamental difference in the debate.

Of course we participated in the group that enforced the embargoes. Thirty-one countries have joined us in enforcing the sanctions and embargoes. But today we are on the verge of war. How many of those 31 countries will go to war if there is a war tonight at midnight? How many? Eight or nine? Certainly not 31. What is so frustrating is that after the presentation of the Prime Minister today we are not sure if we will be in that position if confronted with war today. That is what is so embarrassing for us.

Over the weekend, while debate was going on in the United States of America, we listened to senators and congressmen talk about war and the participation of their people in war. They talked about the American interests in the Middle East. They did not debate the United Nations. They debated the participation of Americans in a war.

An hon. member: Right on.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Why are we not facing the problem in the same way here when there is anxiety in the Canadian people today? They do not know exactly what is going on. This is the problem.

For us, it is clear. The action of the government has put us in a position where it looks to me and members of this party that the Prime Minister has not stated clearly, if there is a war tonight, whether or not we will be part of that war. It is unacceptable.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: We said that military action is premature. We said that military action at this moment is unwise. It is very dangerous for long-term security in the Middle East and for the viability of the UN.

I would like to say to the Prime Minister that it is very, very easy to start a war, but it is very difficult to stop a war.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: My view and the view of my party is that it is premature to have military action today. We have to ask the United Nations Security Council to review and to report to the world on the effects of the sanctions and the embargo in an official, non-partisan way. But as the international body that can pass judgment as to whether these sanctions are working. We have not seen any official report from the UN so far.

Of course, if there is no war, our forces should stay there. They are present to enforce the embargo and the sanctions and they should be there. But if there is war tonight, tomorrow, or the day after—the minute there is war—there is no more embargo. The embargo becomes a blockade and a blockade is an act of war. If faced with an act of war, we say on this side of the House that it is premature and that our troops should not be involved in a war at this moment—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: —and our troops should be called back if there is a war, unless we decide to be in a war. But we have to have the time—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: After the cold war, we thought that we were entering into a new order in the world. We thought that military intervention would not occur because we believed that the international community could make sure that there would be no aggression tolerated and that the United Nations goals would be upheld. What is the fundamental principle of the United Nations? It is the peaceful resolution of disputes, not the initiation of wars.

Military action, so soon after we decided to take the course of sanctions and embargo, endorses the view that military action can be an instrument of preference and of early resort and not, as it should be, of last resort.

Why this war? What are our national interests in this war? When I listened to the debate which took place in the United States over the weekend, the Americans were not talking about the United Nations, as I said earlier. They were talking about American interests. Senators and members of the House of Representatives spoke and they divided very closely on this issue. I am sure, if there had been no ultimatum and if the President had not put the position so squarely for so long, that it is probable Congress would not have acquiesced to the resolution presented to it.

I say that the national interests of Canada are very different from the national interests of the United States.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Our national interests have been peacekeeping, a voice for stability, and a voice for independence in war, peace, and stability. We have always said that embargoes, sanctions, and diplomacy are preferable to bullets. We have to look back at what has happened in our history.

• (1230)

I am very pleased that the Prime Minister referred to some previous Prime Ministers of this land.

When war broke out in Korea, we did get involved but under the flag of the United nations. That is a basic distinction from the position now taken by the Prime Minister. The Security Council did not set up a United Nations contingent. It authorized countries to go to war with Iraq, but it did not ask any country to go to war with Iraq.

In 1956, when the Suez crisis took place, Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Pearson, respectively Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, took a fundamental position which has guided Canada's international policy ever since. What did they decide? Surely it was not easy for Mr. St. Laurent to tell France and Britain that the era of empires was over, but he did. It was then that Mike Pearson advocated before the United Nations the theory which we have always followed, namely that Canada and the United Nations must be agents of peace, and it was the first force set up by the United Nations to maintain peace. Canada was not only the initiator but also the first participant. Mr. Pearson was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize because he had taken that initiative.

I want to tell the Prime Minister that during the weeks preceding this debate I too tried to think what Mr. St. Laurent would do, and how Mike Pearson would act if he were here today. What is the tradition of this country, and what is the tradition of this Party? I came to the conclusion that in such circumstances, Mr. Pearson and our country's tradition require that we pursue our efforts to the end since we are committed to uphold the embargo and the sanctions and to make sure that all such avenues have been explored and all democratic efforts made. Only then can we resort to war.

[English]

I would say to the Prime Minister that with his attitude today, he is no Mike Pearson. Mr. Pearson would not have done it this way.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: After 1956 every prime minister of this country maintained that position of independence. Canada may not be a very powerful nation, but our main role would always be to maintain a credibility which would enable us to keep waring parties apart and work towards peace. This has always been the doctrine followed by Mr. Diefenbaker, Mr. Trudeau, and Mr. Pearson because that is the kind of role we Canadians have always wanted to play.

What should we do today? First, the war option is still open, and it will be tomorrow. As I said earlier, there may be circumstances where war may be the only option, but for the time being we must continue to seek peace and make sure that the sanctions, the embargo, the isolation, and the international community will make the Iraqis stand so alone that they will not be able to survive. Unbelievable though it may seem, the sanctions did work in October and even in November. What has happened? Now the election is over in the United States, suddenly sanctions no longer work. That is our point.

We feel that sanctions should be maintained for a number of months, six months or even twelve. What's the matter with maintaining the status quo? With the troops we have in the Middle East today, plus the embargo, we are convinced that Iraq, if it is not attacked now, will not attack at all. So there would no war. After six or twelve months of embargo and sanctions, a small country with the whole international community against it will not be able to go on. Where will they find the equipment to replace their own if they have problems? Where will they get the materiel they need to wage war if they are completely isolated? And if it takes six months more, what is the difference?

There have been situations where countries were invaded, unfortunately, and there have been others when the United Nations deplored these invasions. When the Chinese invaded Tibet, this fact was deplored by everyone, by the whole international community, but we did not intervene. What did we do when the Russians invaded Afghanistan? We deplored this action, but there were many like it. There were also human rights violations in those two countries and there was loss of life. We did not intervene.

In Cyprus, we censured what was done by Turkey but we did not go and invade that country. We did not participate. I could go on to quote dozens of similar cases. Many UN resolutions were not observed, but we did not go to war because of that.

I think that at this point we must give peace a chance. The Security Council should meet again, and we must ensure that the embargo and sanctions are maintained and reinforced, if necessary. Tonight, war is useless, it is dangerous and it will not solve the problem.

I simply wanted to say that there will be more situations like this one, and that we must be extremely careful. If every time there is an invasion, every time the rights of individuals or citizens or certain republics are destroyed by invastions, we have to go to war, does this mean we should fight in Lithuania? Today, it is the same problem, up to a point—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It's not the same problem at all.

Mr. Chrétien: Yes it is, up to a point.

When faced with the possibility of war, there is a fundamental question we must answer. I maintain that the government does not, in the circumstances, have the moral authority to put this country into a war situation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Is the Prime Minister rolling the dice again, this time with the lives of young men and women in the Middle East? Is he gambling with world peace?

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this government has the moral authority to bring Canada into war today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1240)

Mr. Chrétien: We have the feeling that the Prime Minister is rolling the dice again, but this time with the lives of the young men and women who are there and who might go there without giving a real chance for peace. This is the problem we are faced with.

[Translation]

A war entails enormous expenses and high risks. How many Canadians will lose their lives? How many billions of dollars will be wasted in an exercise which may prove useless, or at least premature? It might cause a lot of upheaval. What will happen to the oil situation? What will happen to the world economy? The Prime Minister refered to that earlier. What will be the results for the developing countries if all the resources of mankind are spent waging a war, rather than implementing policies which could improve these peoples' wellbeing?

I ask the Prime Minister, before committing Canada to a war, to remember that our country's role has always been to pick up the pieces whenever warring nations chose war over peace.

Mr. Speaker, our caucus held a meeting yesterday, probably the very best I have ever attended, and after four hours of deliberations, all those present unanimously felt that it would be premature to wage war now and we are opposed to war at this time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Let us give a chance to sanctions. Let us give a chance to the embargo. Let us give a chance to peace diplomacy. This is the role which the government should play now. I am afraid, however, that the government made commitments a long time ago and now has to pay the price. Canada's position is and must remain an independent one, one which should use to the utmost all avenues for peace. If one day all these recourses should prove inadequate, if there must be war, a war under the aegis of the United Nations, Canada will assume its responsibilities and support the United Nations. Today, this would not be a war under the flag of the United Nations but a war waged by an unknown number of countries, and Canada took the position in 1956 that we shall not be involved in a war if it is not under the flag of the United Nations.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I will repeat in English what I said in case some people did not understand.

We are opposed to this war at this moment. Canada has taken the position since 1956 that we shall not be involved in war if it is not under the flag of the UN. If there is a war tonight, it will not be a war under the flag of the UN. It might be under the flag of a very friendly neighbour, but it will not be the flag of the UN. The time has not yet come for the UN to move in a war situation. Let us give peace a good chance.

I move:

That the motion be amended by adding immediately after the word "Kuwait":

"through the continued use of economic sanctions, such support to exclude offensive military action by Canada at this time."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the hour I would like to propose, as a courtesy to the Leader of the New Democratic Party who will speak next, that the Chair not see the clock at one o'clock and that the Leader of the New Democratic Party be given whatever time she requires to complete her remarks.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the House has before it today a motion reaffirming support for the United Nations Security Council resolution authorizing the use of force by any country after the deadline of today and an amendment by the Liberal Party. While the motion of the government does not clearly state so, we must be clear in this House about what we are discussing. What we are discussing very clearly is whether Canada supports a declaration of war.

The question is purely and simply this: Is Canada going to support a declaration of war?

[English]

This is therefore a serious and historic debate. We have a grave responsibility to the Canadian people to be thoughtful and constructive, to articulate Canadians' concerns, and to choose a course which serves the interest of Canada and the world and which reflects the values of Canadians and the kind of contribution that Canada can best make to the world order.

I and my party have been listening to Canadians for the past weeks, in fact since this crisis began; to experts on international affairs; to foreign leaders both in and out of government; and to the statements of the Canadian government as the crisis has worn on. Today we have listened with care to the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

Our conclusion is this: War would be a tragedy, of unimagined scope. It must not be the next option or the second or the third option. War must always be the final option, the last resort.

It is our belief that, not only would war have severe political, economic, environmental and human costs that would be intolerable and unimaginable for all involved, but a so-called victory would not achieve the goal of peace. It would be as Dr. Litbach, a commentator from the Centre for Strategic and International Studies who has studied the Middle East, has said: "All we would do by war is give the wheel of regional conflict another turn". In other words, a military victory would not ensure peace but rather would lead to greater instability, greater hostility, greater danger, and greater conflict in the Middle East region.

• (1250)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: I rise therefore today as leader of my party and on behalf of millions of Canadians to say no to the government's proposal to support war, no to an offensive military role for Canada, and no to Canadian participation in an unnecessary and deadly war.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that today we are not talking simply about the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. No one here can deny that this invasion, this brutal occupation of a neighbouring country, is unacceptable.

From the outset, my party has squarely condemned the actions of Saddam Hussein. We have demanded and continue to demand Iraq's full withdrawal from Kuwait. We will continue to explore all possible avenues and we will not be satisfied until we succeed.

Our condemnation of Iraq reflects the principles that guide this party. The history of the New Democratic Party shows that we have always condemned, and always very forcefully, a country that attacks another country. We have supported the use of diplomacy, political action and economic sanctions in order to put an end to these wars of aggression.

[English]

Let us be clear that there are three options before us and that there are three options to resolve the dispute: first, sanctions to isolate the aggressor and to make it economically impossible to continue that aggression; second, diplomatic efforts to deal with Iraq and to address continuing Mid-East problems; and, third, war.

As politicians who must be faced with surely the most important decision that most of us will ever make in our political life or have ever had to make, we must ask ourselves whether, on the basis of all rational evidence, economic sanctions and diplomatic efforts have been exhausted, whether we are truly convinced that no option but war exists and that the attendant risks of war are now the only option.

I recall that Martin Luther King, whose birthday is today, once said about Vietnam that the bombs that explode on the foreign battlefield also explode at home. Is there anyone who does not believe that the bombs dropped in the Middle East will not indeed explode in every community in the world?

Our foreign policy must reflect Canadian values, respect for international law, the promotion of social justice and human rights, and the pursuit of peaceful means of conflict resolution. Canadians are a caring and peaceful people, but we do not shirk from our responsibility. We do not shirk from our international responsibilities. We must not think that we have no role to play but to accept what is determined elsewhere. We cannot simply be swept along by events that we accept are outside our control. As a middle power, we can have much more influence on maintaining peace than on winning wars.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: We have the moral responsibility to use whatever means we can to stop the madness.

In the case of Kuwait, New Democrats and Canadians have supported the international community and the Security Council resolution in the use of diplomatic pressures and economic sanctions against Iraq. We support the Canadian presence in the gulf, the role of our men and women there, and the enforcement of those sanctions.

My party has supported every United Nations resolution which advocated a peaceful resolution to the crisis. We have supported 11 out of 12 of the Security Council resolutions.

We have not, however, supported UN Security Council resolution 678 which imposes the January 15 deadline for Iraq withdrawal and which authorizes the use of force after this date. We opposed that resolution for a number of reasons. The January 15 deadline is an artificial and arbitrary deadline. There is no concrete reason why the possibility of war must increase exponentially on this date. The situation in Kuwait, however disturbing, has not changed or worsened significantly.

Seven days before Iraq invaded Kuwait, the U.S. Senate committee found that Iraq had engaged in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights, in disregard to the international law. In that debate, the State Department of the United States opposed any sanctions or punitive measures against Iraq. In fact, the United States was subsidizing food imports only seven days before the invasion.

I say this to point out to those who are listening in the Canadian public that the international community has been aware for a very long time of the serious breaches of international law by Iraq but that the Foreign Relations Committee, of the Senate of the U.S., seven days before the invasion refused to take any action then, seven days later, it changed its mind.

I say it also to suggest that nothing is sacred about January 15. The situation was intolerable before Iraq invaded Kuwait. It remains intolerable, and what we must debate is how best we can find a resolution to this situation and to the middle eastern problems in general.

It has been said in relation to previous wars that ultimatums are issued, armies are mobilized, and leaders desperately trying to avert war find themselves bound by the timetables of generals. I suggest that this is exactly the bind that we as leaders are in now. All members of all parties are trying to debate—and I say this in a non-partisan way—and find a way to avert war, but we are binding ourselves to the motion of the government, to the timetable of the generals. We are not past generals fighting past wars. We are politicians who have to look to the future as well as the present, at the realistic role that Canada can play today and in the future.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Today I implore the government to step back and to regain perspective. There are options to war. There are choices. There is no reason why Canada should give its approval to a declaration of war today. Sanctions must be given a full chance. International affairs analysts have argued this point very effectively and have also argued that sanctions are working.

[Translation]

The U.S. Secretary of State for Defence, Richard Cheney, admits that by Easter, the Iraqi army will start being short of spare parts.

CIA head William Webster has said that the Iraqi airforce will be in trouble three or six months from now. In nine months, the rest of Iraqi materiel will be in bad shape.

According to information received from Iraq, essential services, including water, electricity and gasoline, are at risk. The country's economy is a shambles. Well-informed sources have stated that 90 per cent of Iraq's imports and 97 per cent of its exports have been affected by the sanctions.

Saddam Hussein will not be able to ignore the sanctions. His country will not be able to survive. We must be very patient and wait. If patience means saving the lives of Canadian soldiers or Iraqi children, it is worth it. If being patient means that mothers, fathers, brothers and sisters will not have to shed any tears, it is worth it.

[English]

Along with sanctions, Mr. Speaker, diplomatic efforts must also continue. No one doubts—and I am sure there is no doubt left after this week—that Saddam Hussein is a difficult man with whom to negotiate. We are not naive, but negotiate we must. We must find all of those openings which would make peace a possibility.

Our friends in the United States government refuse to consider any conditions for negotiation. But the anti-Iraq alliance is divided on this point. European and Arab nations appear much more willing to seek a negotiated way out.

American Congress persons, a number of whom I met with yesterday in Washington and colleagues I have spoken to in Europe, are much more willing to seek negotiation. We have new proposals from Yemen and France. They should be looked at seriously by Canada, and not rejected out of hand. Rather than following the forces of war blindly, Canada, has an obligation to align itself with those countries seeking peaceful resolutions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: There are those, Mr. Speaker, who would argue that agreement to conditions of withdrawal means rewarding aggression. I suggest it means rewarding compliance.

There are those who argue that to agree to conditions of withdrawal means losing face. I do not accept that characterization, but I do say to those who do, if the choice is between losing face or losing lives, the choice should be perfectly clear.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Today the Prime Minister has said that Canada will join in using force against Saddam Hussein. He did not speak at length about the cost of war, or the implications of war. It is a disturbing subject, I quite agree. But surely it is our responsibility at least to raise these issues before the Canadian public.

There is widespread doubt that any war against Iraq would be limited in scope. There is much greater belief that in fact the war would spread to the Middle East and to many countries outside of Iraq and Kuwait.

There are more than one million soldiers in the Gulf, 8,000 tanks, 3,000 aircraft, chemical and biological weapons and, it is reported, over 1,000 nuclear warheads.

The impact of a war on the environment could be catastrophic. Projections have been that given a nuclear accident, or the threat of fire in the oil fields, fires could last for years with devastating consequences for the air, the ozone layer, and the climate here in North America and elsewhere.

Other analysts have said that, if our objectives are to preserve stability in the Middle East and the related advantage that stability provides for oil supplies from the area, then going to war will not preserve or further those objectives. Going to war will destroy those objectives.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the economic cost of war would be enormous. The rising price of oil would not only deepen our own recession, but take a terrible toll on the world's poorest countries.

The human cost, of course, the most important consideration, is impossible for many of us to grasp. We simply cannot know and we simply cannot project what might happen. It might be less serious than some people project; it might be more serious. Both military and political people are quite divided on that point, but we do know that there will be a human cost.

If we asked those people who served in the Vietnam or Korean wars, or those who have come to Canada as refugees about the reality of war, and if we should consider the war option before we are absolutely convinced that all other options will not work, we are sure what their answer would be. It is no surprise that the initiatives that are coming for peace proposals, for diplomatic proposals, are coming from those European countries which have felt war on their own soil and which, know by their very experience and in their souls what it means. We do not, except those people who have served in a war or who have come to this country as a result of a war in their own countries.

If we go to war now, Mr. Speaker, we will be haunted by each and every casualty. We will wonder if we had tried to wait for other options and if we had taken a pro-active approach to peace and not a reactive approach to war if that would have made a real difference.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: In concluding, I would like to make a suggestion. This dreadful war will cost us far too much. Worse, a victory will be no guarantee of peace in this part of the world. The defeat of Saddam Hussein in Iraq may make it even harder to achieve our objective: peace and security in the Middle East.

Look at the area, Mr. Speaker. There is no guarantee that the leader who would replace Saddam Hussein would be an improvement. If Iraq is destroyed, Iran may very well rise again as the dominant power in the region. If Iraq is destroyed, Turkey, Syria and Iran may decide to fight to control what is left of Iraq.

The Arab governments that decided to support the war will face the fury of their citizens. A holy war is a real possibility. Compare this scenario with the option of not going to war at all. If we wait, the worst that can happen by a year from now is that Iraq would continue to occupy Kuwait. I leave it to the House to decide which option is the riskiest and to choose accordingly.

[English]

The Prime Minister made the comparison to the League of Nations and also to the UN Charter which says that we are committed to working for effective and collective action. This debate is about not who is right but our version of what is effective collective action. The Prime Minister has said that doctrinaire insistence on peace is what led to the end of the League of Nations and to undermining the credibility of the League of Nations.

• (1310)

It is commonly argued that this crisis represents the first major post-cold war test for the United Nations, and I agree. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the crisis is about the future of the United Nations, and I agree. This is why we cannot allow the United Nations to endorse a move into war when all peaceful means have not been exhausted.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: I would like to explain that further, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is an extremely important point about the choices that are before the international community today.

Surely success would not be measured by the ability to use the United Nations to legitimize war. It should be measured by the ability of the United Nations to prevent war.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, there has been much talk of a new and just world order. I am sure it is an objective that all of us in this Chamber share. But the rush to war will simply represent the same old response the same old way. If we do what we have always done and declare war without looking at all of the options, we will make the same mistakes of the past. But we will have done it under the United Nations. This is not hope for a new world order. A new world order looks at new solutions, new ways and effective co-ordinated international efforts that try everything to avoid war, to have patience and give time, to exercise every option, if that is what it takes.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: The NDP is a party that has always supported the United Nations efforts, that has supported international co-operative action in international conflicts. If we cannot look back in one year or six months and say that the Security Council of the United Nations could not find a new way to settle disputes, we will not have found a new world order. We will simply be perpetuating the madness of the old world order.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: We are not debating today whether Saddam Hussein is taking evil action. He is. But to punish that evil and immoral action with tens of thousands of further mortalities does not make sense. It does not in any way diminish our sympathy, our sadness, and our outrage at what Saddam Hussein has done in Kuwait and what has been identified by Amnesty International.

War is not the answer today. War is not the solution. Canada has a role to support the United Nations charter, to seek effective collective action, and to participate in that. Canada has an important active role and not a reactive role.

I would like to suggest four broad options that should be pursued at this time. First, evidence suggests that sanctions are working. The continuing and tightening of economic sanctions—and there have been proposals in how those can even be further tightened—seems a very logical step at this point.

The furtherance of diplomatic efforts should be supported by the Canadian government. In fact, the Canadian government should be leading in these efforts.

Since 1983, the New Democratic Party has had as our policy that we must support international conferences on the situation in the Middle East. It is not a new idea that originates with Saddam Hussein, and let us stop pretending it is. Let us stop fighting over the words about linkage. Let us look at the reality because most of the Middle East believes that there are many outstanding issues beyond the actions of Saddam Hussein to be resolved. This party believes it and Canada should be supporting those initiatives.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Finally, we must develop a comprehensive strategy for conflict resolution in the region which includes every alternative to war. Such a strategy could include the settlement of border disputes through United Nations mediation or the International Court of Justice, promotion of democratization throughout the region, the establishment of a mechanism to reduce the arms trade and to eliminate weapons of mass destruction, and the negotiation of non-aggression pacts between nations of the region that could the framework for an over-all peace settlement.

The decision we are faced with today, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, may be the most difficult decision that we as politicians will ever have to make. People have spoken—and we listened to the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition—with great certainty about their position. As the Prime Minister himself has pointed out, all political parties are not united on their position on this, in Canada, in Europe, and in the rest of the world. Therefore, it is not a partisan issue.

It is an issue of conscience and an issue of supporting the least destructive method to resolve conflicts. It is an issue of how we see our vision of the new world order. If Canada's vision of the new world order is simply to launch into a war without having assured every Canadian that every option by this government and by other governments has taken place, then we should all be very ashamed because we have offered nothing for the 21st century.

There are people of my party, social democrats, who have a different position than I. There are Conservatives, Liberals, and people of many other parties. In all honesty, I have to say that I cannot stand here and say with absolute certainty that my position that Canada should not participate in any offensive action cannot be challenged. I cannot say that I have all the wisdom. But, having looked at the history of the region and this issue, the events leading to January 15, and the consultations that I have had—with people in the U.S. and Europe, with my friends, colleagues and constituents, and with other Canadians,—one must take a stand and say that there is more to be done. We have not exhausted all of the options. War is not an option today on January 15, 1991.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: It is not a question of whether or not I stand with the government or our forces in the Gulf. Our forces are doing the job they were sent to do and doing it well. It is not whether or not Canada is a good ally or a good world citizen. We are. The issue is whether or not after we make the decision we are making today—the decision about whether Canada will support a declaration of war—we can live with ourselves and know we have made the right decision. Perhaps we will never know.

As I have said, I and my party believe that all options have not been exhausted and that we have to take every one. Until then, I and my party cannot and will not agree to a war.

This is a situation that none of us can see into the future or how we will be judged by history. We stand here today in many ways alone, before the people we represent and not just as political parties. For that reason, I would encourage the government and other parties to hold a free vote on this issue.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: The arrogance of being able to say that even I, as a leader of a political party, am always right and my position is always right, in my view, is not leadership. It is dictatorship.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: If there was ever a more serious moral issue with which we have to deal, I do not know what it could be. It is for that reason that I make that point.

My heart is with all of those Canadian men and women who are now in the Middle East serving our country. My hope is for all of us today who will surely be judged by history on the decision that we take.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: It being past one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

The House took recess at 13.22 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, today we balance on the brink of war. No doubt every Canadian's thoughts and prayers are riveted on this issue. Later we politicians, with speeches in hand, will debate not UN resolutions, but war.

This is unlike any other debate. It should not be conducted in phrases that make us feel better or less terrified at the task ahead of us, for war is a final act in which a peaceful resolution is abandoned in favour of force, and the death and destruction that it ultimately brings in its pursuit of peace.

As we debate today, remember that participants in war are real. They are not numbers. They are young men and women. They have families, children, mothers, fathers and friends. They have committed themselves to serve their country, and in doing so have also committed their loved ones to the consequences of such service.

The situation in the gulf is not simple. It is real. I hope, and indeed pray, that the gravity of the reality of the choices before us are seen not in a partisan or clinical way, or one that protects us from the anxiety of our own decisions.

The debate today is one that takes into consideration the consequences of our decisions to act or not to act, but to have as our paramount concern those who serve and their families.

Most of all, I pray that all here are granted the wisdom to make the right choice.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to salute the Grain Safety Net Committee, consisting of some 34 producer and government representatives which has designed GRIP and NISA programs which target agricultural assistance more effectively, encourage sound management practices, and deliver similar benefits to farmers in all regions.

The Gross Revenue Insurance Plan, GRIP, will offer farmers both yield and price protection while the Net Income Stabilization Account, NISA, will allow farmers to stabilize their incomes on an individual basis.

The Minister of Agriculture will soon introduce these improved programs which will provide a permanent, predictable and truly effective safety net. They are effective because they are based on individual rather than regional conditions, and predictable because support is calculated in the spring. Therefore, farmers will know before seeding the guaranteed revenue per acre for each crop seeded.

GUN CONTROL

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, on December 6, 1989, forteen families were sorely affected by Marc Lépine's action. The families of the victims from Polytechnique united to turn a personal tragedy into a movement to have the gun control legislation changed.

These parents have grounds for being concerned about the gun control situation in Canada and the proceedings of the committee would have been seriously lacking if it had not heard them.

I stressed the importance of these families' testimony and I am pleased to report to the House that the members of the committee reconsidered their decision and that the families of the victims of Polytechnique were invited to testify. As a parliamentarian interested in gun control, I am very happy I could help make their participation possible.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the world stands today at the brink of war.

It is a matter of deep concern to people all around the world. We, in this House, are going to face a decision as to what Canada's role should be in that war. It is a difficult decision.

Canada has, in the past, been prepared to contribute to the defence of freedom. The terrible cost of a war must be weighed against the objective, taking into account that there is an alternative, that sanctions have every possibility of working. This morning there was a report in The Globe and Mail which stated that there is a nearly 100 per cent chance of success for sanctions. In that event, Canadian participation in a war would be an unspeakable crime and one which this House cannot endorse.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are shocked and apprehensive today. The very real prospect of war has created an atmosphere of unreality and disbelief. Since the Suez crisis we, as a nation, have taken great pride in our role as peacekeeper to the world. Now we watch as our country's great prestige is being bartered for base coin.

Millions of Canadians join in this plea. Do not throw away 40 years of international goodwill. Do not send hundreds of young men and women into a wasteful war. Take the path of sanity and sense. Sanctions are working. Let the embargo bring Hussein to a halt. If the bombs fall, take our people out of danger and show to the world that Canada seeks the peaceful solution. Maintain our historical position as peacemaker, not warmonger. Refuse to countenance insanity. This is not a movie set, this is real. This life and death. Do not opt for death.

In the name of peace, in the name of justice and in the name of Canada, do not throw us over the brink.

LITHUANIA

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, in recent days the world has reacted with disbelief at the violent acts of aggression imposed by the Soviet military on the people Lithuania and its democratically elected government. The threat has also been extended to Latvia and Estonia and yet President Gorbachev denies prior knowledge of these abhorrent acts.

Who is in charge of the Soviet Union? Mikhail Gorbachev or the military? What has become of the promised reform of the Soviet Union? Why has the Soviet Union reverted to force rather than negotiation to resolve the legitimate concerns of the Baltic States?

Canadian and, indeed, international assistance to the Soviet Union must be dependent on the answers to these questions. I urge our government to use every means at its disposal to impress upon the Soviet Union the urgency of an immediate peaceful resolution of this crisis.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday, 6,000 Montrealers demonstrated that, as far as the conflict with Iraq is concerned, Canadian unity still exists.

Like Canadians across the country, these Quebecers showed they were strongly opposed to Canada's involvement in a war against Iraq. A poll published in La Presse confirmed that 72 per cent of the people of Quebec are against Canada's involvement.

Quebecers are fiercely opposed to such a war because they know that all other options, besides war, have not been exhausted by an American Administration determined to go to war.

In time, the United Nations embargo would have played havoc with the Iraqi economy.

This embargo was not yielding results fast enough for President Bush. So, we find ourselves at the brink of a war our government wants our country to take part in.

This House has the duty to listen to the Quebecers and Canadians and to vote against Canada's participation in a pointless war which would have much more devastating consequences than what it is meant to correct.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, residents from both Canada and the United States came together in St. Stephen this past weekend to express their support for a peaceful resolution to the crisis in the Persian Gulf.

This non-denominational gathering held at the Holy Rosary Catholic Church organized by Mrs. Joan Jones, Mrs. Keay Halstead and others was intended to bring people from all faiths on both sides of the border together in a common expression of concern for those men and women who, in a matter of hours from now, may find themselves embroiled in a war in the Middle East.

This is typical of the growing movement on the part of people throughout the world that world peace be preserved and that international order be restored at the earliest possible opportunity.

I quote Mrs. Jones when she said: "The situation is frightening, and if we ever needed to pray together, this is the time".

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we heard the disturbing news that Radio-Canada French listeners and viewers will be getting second-class information as a result of the budget restraints forced on the CBC. And all that because the government is bent on destroying our national institutions.

We simply cannot accept the fact that, at a time when Canadians need to be told what is happening in the gulf, not by Belgian, American, French or other media but indeed from a truly Canadian perspective, they will not have their own teams of reporters on the scene.

[English]

Second, I ask Parliament to reaffirm freedom of the press and to protest the reported U.S. military plans to restrict the flow of news in the gulf.

The Canadian Association of Journalists has stated that imposing such rule will blind both TV and press reporters, and hide important facts from Canadians who want to and must know what is going on. This situation is unacceptable to Canada , and I hope Parliament and the government will do something to set things straight.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians should take pride in the effectiveness and success of our Canadian forces in the gulf.

Our service personnel are as good as exist anywhere in the world. Our men and women in uniform are professional and well trained to do their jobs. They, of all Canadians, do not look forward to war, but are prepared to do their duty. Furthermore, their families and most Nova Scotians stand with them.

One question that I am repeatedly asked by service personnel and their families in the metro area is why are the members of Parliament from Halifax and Dartmouth not standing with us and endorsing what we are here to do. That is a good question and one those members should answer in this House today.

S. O. 31

The Canadian navy has had a proud record throughout its history. Our sailors do not turn and run when the shooting starts. They do not want their government and their MPs to tell them to.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, today the world is perched on the edge of an unthinkable abyss. Calculating the loss of life which will result from war in the Middle East is horrifying.

Equally horrifying is the long-term impact on the global environment. Experts have determined that even if only one-half of the oil wells in Kuwait are set on fire, the wells will burn for months, producing millions of tonnes of ozone depleting and global warming gases. The resulting clouds of black smoke will create the effect of a nuclear winter.

The burning of the Kuwaiti oil fields would cause temperature extremes and alter monsoon patterns at tremendous costs to food production world-wide. It is estimated that over one billion people in Asia would face starvation as a result of monsoon failure. Even partial monsoon failure could cause more deaths than the population of Iraq, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia combined.

A war in the gulf would have disastrous environmental implications. I am not scare-mongering. I am asking, in light of these facts, how can we even contemplate a war as a solution to this crisis?

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the debate today, the choice seems to be to respect our commitment to the United Nations or to renege, to stand on the sidelines and wait.

But wait for how long? Until the threat of UN action against Iraq is no longer credible? Wait until Kuwait is destroyed? Wait until the death of every man, woman and child in Kuwait? Wait until Saddam attacks further? Wait until Iraq develops nuclear capability? Wait until a UN coalition breaks up?

Neville Chamberlain said wait. Saddam Hussein has defined our choice for us.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, January 14, on behalf of the centre of peace undertakings in Canada, President Frans Manouvrier handed to me and to my colleagues petitions bearing the signatures of 4,770 Canadian men and women opposed to a military intervention in the Persian Gulf. These petitions are addressed to the Canadian government and urge it to take a pacifist approach to the gulf crisis.

I take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Manouvrier, Mrs. Johanne Robitaille and all those who worked to gather nearly 5,000 signatures of people in favour of peace. I urge all the citizens of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell to sign similar petitions.

We must not intervene forcefully as long as there is still a chance to maintain peace in the Persian Gulf.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on August 2, 1990, without any warning or the slightest provocation, Iraq, a member of the United Nations, invaded and has since occupied Kuwait, a small country also a member of the United Nations. It is no longer simply a conflict between Iraq and Kuwait, but a conflict between Iraq and the rest of the world. Rarely has the international community shown such solidarity against an aggressor. Never has the United Nations reacted so efficiently, and never in the last 40 years has Canada felt such a need to react.

Our prime minister, the right hon. Brian Mulroney, and our Secretary of State for External Affairs, the right hon. Joe Clark, have used every diplomatic channels in an effort to resolve this crisis in a peaceful way, because, that is what all Canadians wish would happen before midnight today in the Persian Gulf.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Resolution 678 of the UN Security Council authorizes member states to use all necessary means, including a military offensive, to get Iraq out of Kuwait after midnight this evening.

Since the Prime Minister and his government supported this UN resolution, is the government preparing for a Canadian military offensive to get Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait? Is Canada going to war with Iraq? Yes or no, Mr. Prime Minister?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in my speech this morning I mentioned two important elements in connection with the matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition. First, the Canadian government was going to explore all existing possibilities for a durable peace, between now and midnight, between now and the expiry of the deadline. That has not changed.

Second, the government has also announced what governs the behaviour of our military, and there have been no changes so far. This morning I mentioned that the Government of Canada, failing a peaceful resolution in the form of acceptance or a signal from Saddam Hussein that he intends to observe the provisions and the resolutions of the United Nations, failing that, the Canadian government intended to join other countries that support the UN in order to get Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that Canada would support the United Nations if force is used to get Iraq out of Kuwait. But there is no United Nations military operation. It is the United States that will be leading the military operation.

When the United States goes to war with Iraq, will the Prime Minister order young Canadian men and women into war as well? Will Canadians be going to war in the gulf?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, inadvertently, no doubt, commits a very serious mistake in regard to his interpretation of resolution 678 because he persists in quoting but two paragraphs of the resolution.

The resolution demands that Iraq fully comply with the resolutions. Second, it authorizes member states to use all necessary means to uphold it. And third, it requests all states to provide appropriate support for the actions taken, namely actions taken to uphold and implement—

Mr. Axworthy: Not requires, requests.

Mr. Mulroney: No. My hon. friend is saying that it does not require. No. It does not require. The United Nations makes a specific request in the resolution asking all member states to act to uphold the integrity of the United Nations and Canada will do just that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Prime Minister that is exactly what is being debated here. We say that it is not the time for war and that there are other means such are sanctions, embargoes, and diplomacy.

The question I am asking the Prime Minister is, will Canada be at war against Iraq if the United States starts the war tonight at midnight?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: The Leader of the—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I think all hon. members realize the importance of the issues that are before us. This morning the conduct and behaviour of members was for the most part exemplary, given the very serious matters that were being discussed. I am sure that all hon. members would want to ensure that matters being discussed here are treated with the gravity which they deserve and that the courtesies which are traditional in this place be carried out.

The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, Article I of the Charter of the United Nations provides for circumstances during which members who freely associate with the United Nations may be called upon, in the interests of international security, to suppress acts of aggression.

Such a request was specifically made under Resolution 678 of the Security Council, a resolution co-sponsored by Canada, which was a member of the Security Council at that time. Paragraph No. 3 of that resolution states that, in the event of the failure of Saddam Hussein to respond to a reasonable request to withdraw from a neighbouring, innocent Arab state that he has invaded—and if he persists in his refusal—member states are requested to come to the aid of the United Nations to seek to enforce resolutions of the United Nations.

As Mr. Pearson said and as I referred to this morning in my speech, the fact of the matter is the United Nations must be defended because the absence of the United Nations means the absence of effective peace in the world.

An hon. member: Answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend wants to know whether we are going to defend the United Nations. We will not stand idly by. When the United Nations asks for support, we will support the United Nations because the United Nations supports world peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister while he is in the mood for honouring the United Nations Charter.

When the United Nations Security Council imposed economic sanctions, it established a special committee of the council to assess and report on the effectiveness of those sanctions. That committee has yet to report. Yet various experts, including the director of the CIA, have said that sanctions are having a very deep impact, including the war-fighting capacity of Iraq.

How can Canada commit this country to go to war when the United Nations Security Council has yet to decide on the effectiveness of sanctions, as it must do under the charter, before it initiates any further military action?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question as to how long one would wait for sanctions to take effect on Iraq, if they would ever take effect on Iraq, is an important question.

The hon. member knows, because he has been a member of the parliamentary committee before which these matters have been discussed, that it is possible to have reports. We have already had reports. Some have been circulated from the committee to which he refers.

There is no obligation, unless he has just invented one in his own mind, for that committee to make a report as a condition precedent to other decisions being taken by the Security Council. He knows that.

While we are speaking about evidence with respect to the effectiveness of sanctions, he will remember that when I appeared before the standing committee I made it clear that there was no evidence at all that economic sanctions were having an effect upon the economic—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —upon the capacity of Iraq—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: G.I. Joe.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, may I continue?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Secretary of State.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I indicated that we had no evidence to suggest that the sanctions program in place was affecting the capacity of Saddam Hussein to make war.

I asked the hon. member who holds to a different view and who bases his policy on a different view, specifically, to provide me with any information he has. Indeed, I said, he has a duty to provide that information. That was weeks ago. I have not heard from him. If he has any any specific information, I would be interested in seeing it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say to the minister that the duty is not mine. The duty is the United Nations'.

The government has talked about defending the charter. Under Article 42 of the Charter of the United Nations no military action can be initiated until the Security Council has decided on the adequacy or inadequacy of sanctions. The Security Council has not made that decision.

How can the minister and the Prime Minister send Canada to war when a fundamental principle and fundamental requirement of the charter has not yet been met? You are denying the Charter of the United Nations.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if Canada is denying the Charter of the United Nations, so, too, is Javier Perez de Cuellar; so, too, is the Government of France; so, too, is the Government of the United Kingdom; so, too, are all the members—permanent and those with two-year terms—of the Security Country; and so, too, are other countries which recognize, as the Prime Minister said so eloquently this morning, that the initial purpose of the United Nations when it was established by Mr. Pearson, among others, was to provide the capacity to talk as long as talk would work. But then, under the charter, when it became clear that talk would not persuade—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Article 42 under the charter is being evaded—which is to obey the charter, not evade it.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —it was in the interests of world order for force to be deployed. That is the charter. It has been decades since we have been able to realize the effectiveness to accomplish what Lester Pearson dreamed of.

We are now in a situation where it is possible for us to have the full authority of the United Nations Charter, the authority to talk and the authority to act.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister came to power, he said that he would change the face of Canada. Indeed, his government has done a lot to make this happen, but surely nothing equals what has been done in the past to the decision of the Prime Minister and his government today that Canada will support offensive action in the Middle East. The lives of hundreds of people are at stake.

We talked earlier this morning about sanctions and whether or not they are working, and what the options are. I think we have had the positions clearly on the table this morning. We know the Prime Minister's and the government's position. The New Democratic Party has clearly put out our position in opposition to Canada going to war.

I presume the Prime Minister has made his decision to involve Canada in a war based on information that sanctions and other diplomatic measures have not worked.

Therefore, will the Prime Minister support the New Democratic Party's proposition that immediately after Question Period the House go into a committee of the whole where we have an opportunity to hear witnesses—academics, military people, and government people—so that we can have a real debate and so that that will be available for Canadians who are watching closely what action we take in the House?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1430)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, raises a question that her House leader raised this morning at about 11.15 and was put to the House Leader of the Government. My understanding is that the Leader of the Government in the House proposed that this matter be considered by House leaders later on this afternoon. He will no doubt report back to me, and I will be happy to discuss it with my hon. friend.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his remarks. I hope that he gives his vote to support because I believe this is what we need so that all Canadians who are watching these proceedings have full information.

We are now at January 15, a date which has been set for the consideration of war, but many countries continue with peace proposals. Britain has made some, as has France and some of the Arab countries. There are initiatives being pursued even at this late date.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. What initiatives are being taken by his government today, January 15, to either participate or to initiate peace proposals and options to war?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the proposals that has come forward in the last 36 hours is a proposal by the Government of France that is being considered in the Security Council. It contains six elements. The most important is the first because it requires a very clear signal on the part of Iraq that it will take actions immediately to respect the Security Council resolutions.

The other five points in that proposal reflect to a remarkable degree the proposals that were contained in a letter written by the Prime Minister of Canada to the Secretary General of the United Nations, Mr. Perez de Cuellar, which I delivered to him the night before he left for Baghdad. Those proposals had been drawn from conversations that the Prime Minister and I, the Minister of National Defence, the Associate Minister and others, have had with various leaders of other countries, including several in the Arab world. One of the realities of which we are acutely conscious is that very often countries will say things to Canada that they will not say to superpowers or will not say to countries which are directly involved in negotiations.

As a result of that good standing of Canada, we were able to take these various proposals, synthesize them and draw from them what we considered to be elements of a potential proposal. Those elements were in the possession of the Secretary General when he went to Baghdad. He was deeply appreciative of the Canadian initiative. As I understand it, he did not have the opportunity to discuss those with Saddam Hussein because Saddam Hussein was not prepared to discuss at that time even the least adherence to Security Council resolutions.

Those same principles, with some changes in nuance, have arisen again in the French proposal. It may be that in these more public circumstances Saddam Hussein may be encouraged to respond to them. We hope he does. We hope that there is some movement in the hours that remain in this period that was deliberately established by the United Nations as a period for peace. We are supporting a proposal. We are discussing with the British a proposal that they have brought forward. We are waiting for results of conversations that the Yemeni have had to see if those conversations may lead to some proposal.

I will be taking part later in the debate and will be outlining a range of the other initiatives that Canada has taken over the last five weeks with a purpose which I believe is entirely shared in this House that we should seek to resolve this peacefully if that is at all possible.

Where we disagree in this House is what we do if it appears that peaceful means are not possible. Do we then support the United Nations as we want to do, or do we walk away from it?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that overview, but surely Canadians are looking for a government that is not prepared simply to hope but that is prepared to act.

[Translation]

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, there is no decision more critical or far-reaching than the decision to wage war. It is a matter of life and death. It is a moral issue, involving one's conscience. All of us will be judged by his or her conscience and by history.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Will he tell the members of his caucus that for this vote at least, probably the most important in their political lives, there will be a free vote on this war issue?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): The government follows a policy which is in the national interest of all Canadians, based on the responsibilities of an important country such as Canada. This morning I defined the parameters of these policies and obligations and the policy I stated this morning will be supported by all government members.

[English]

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Recently, a Canadian forces spokesperson confirmed that in addition to flying escort patrols over Canadian forces ships in the gulf, our CF-18s will also be flying escort for U.S. B-52 bombers.

How can a CF-18 that is flying on an offensive mission with a U.S. B-52 bomber be considered in a defensive position? What has this got to do with our ships in the gulf? Is this not a serious contradiction and a change from the defensive policy that Canada has been following in the gulf so far?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first, the hon. member is inaccurate when he says that a Canadian forces spokesman confirmed.

An hon. member: It is in The Globe and Mail.

Mr. McKnight: The hon. member says it is in The Globe and Mail. Occasionally, without any disrespect to that fine paper, it does make a mistake.

I would say to the hon. member that the Canadian forces officer whom he is referring to said he could make an argument that protecting assets of nations that were collaborating in enforcing UN resolutions could be argued to be defensive.

That in no way says there has been a change in role. We are not involved in anything except those responsibilities that were outlined when the CF-18 squadron was sent into the Middle East. The Prime Minister, in announcing that decision, said that that squadron was there to defend Canadian vessels and assets, and those of other nations co-operating in the United Nations sanctions.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I am assuming that the minister has confirmed that we have not, are not now and will not be flying escort for B-52 bombers. I understand that is what the minister has confirmed on the floor of the House today.

Let me ask him this: If war breaks out and if in addition to additional B-52 bombers, F-111s are sent, which our pilots have not been trained to escort, will additional CF-18s be sent to the gulf? Will our people be trained in proper procedures? Is this not still a contradiction and a change from the defensive policy that Canada has followed in the gulf so far?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in the first part of my colleague's question he intimated that I confirmed. I confirmed nothing, as to the future tasks of the Canadian forces in their role in putting forward efforts along with other nations in supporting resolutions of the United Nations. What I did say, and I confirm to the hon. member at this time, that the CF-18 Canadian forces squadron is involved exactly as it was when the Prime Minister announced its deployment.

I will say to the hon. member, because he referred to training, that he knows, as well as other members in this House, that the Canadian forces pilots and their role and mission in NATO is that which allows them to have the training he referred to, to have the capacity and the skill. They are among the best trained pilots in the world, doing on behalf of Canadians what I am sure Canadians want them to do, and defending the United Nations and its resolutions.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. There is in the Persian Gulf area right now quite an impressive array of force: 675,000 ground troops, 4,500 tanks, 150 warships, 1,500 combat aircraft and 13,000 combat vehicles for ground support. The co-ordination of such a force is an extraordinarily difficult task. Under the circumstances the method is recommended to be a United Nations commander with the United Nations chain of command.

Can the minister inform the House that such a structure and such a chain of command will pertain?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not too sure who the hon. member is referring to or who is making that recommendation that there be a United Nations commander and a United Nations command.

What I am saying, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is fully aware as to the structures of command. The hon. member is fully aware as to how the NATO structure operates, which is similar to the structure under which Canadian forces and forces of some 30 plus other allied nations are operating in the Persian Gulf area.

The command is a national command. Tactical control, as he is fully aware, is occasionally chopped by nations. That means that tactical control of some Canadian assets may be under other nation. Tactical control of other nations' assets may be under Canadian command, but at all times the Canadian men and women who are serving at this time in the Persian Gulf are under Canadian national command.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I have a supplementary. He did not answer the question.

The minister talks about the NATO structure. I am very familiar with that, but I would remind the minister that that NATO structure was designated. It exists, it is in place and it has been for some time. The operating procedures are very cut and dry. I and everybody involved understands them.

I can accept that while we have command and control in the Canadian sense in essentially a peacetime operation, although it is tense in a designated sector, in a predictable assigned task of three ships, 24 aircraft and 1,816 men and women. But war is unpredictable. I am not quite as convinced that with such an array of forces that even though we could have Canadian command of the forces in the gulf that we could in any way, shape or form have Canadian control.

I will ask the minister then, in the consequence of his attempt to answer my previous question, to now confirm that while the forces will definitely be Canadian commanded, it is possible that they will be under the control of the Americans or the Saudis.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is not my responsibility, nor would I attempt to explain to the hon. member tactical control and national command. I know I do not have to explain it. He understands it. He is nodding his head. Mr. Speaker, that answers his question.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people are deeply concerned that our government is leading our country into an American-led war which would have consequences in human, in ecological, in economic and in geopolitical terms, which would be absolutely disastrous and which could involve the use the nuclear, chemical and biological warfare.

In view of the fact that last night the chief of defence staff confirmed that our troops would be involved in defending American ground troops in Saudi Arabia in the event of war, will the Prime Minister not heed the concerns of Canadians who are saying to this Prime Minister and to this government: "we do not want Canada to be dragged into a war. If there is to be a war Canada should be playing a peaceful role. Our troops should not be involved in that war. We should be playing a humanitarian role and bringing our troops out of that theatre of conflict"? Will the Prime Minister not take that stand on behalf of all Canadians?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, even by his standards the hon. member is extreme in the statements that he makes.

For one thing, in his characterization of the countries involved in this conflict, he knows that much of the dramatic and dynamic leadership of the coalition comes in fact from Arab countries that have a particular worry about peace in their region precisely because it is their region, and also of course from other powers with great military capacity such as France, the United States, the United Kingdom, and others. I am sure he does not intend to mislead, but the consequence of his statement would be to mislead Canadians as to the nature of the coalition and I am sure he would not want that to happen.

He would also know, when he speaks of bloodshed and when he speaks of the terrible consequences of war, that there are terrible consequences to the status quo, to the situation now. That is not simply the situation in Kuwait where there has been a country pillaged in the process of being pillaged more. It is a consequence throughout the region sadly and tragically, I believe, that was evidenced last night by assassinations in another part of that region.

It also holds the threat for other nations, nations anywhere in the world where violence is possible—and those are legion—that if the United Nations cannot be effective here after all the actions that have been taken by the United Nations then those regions which are also hot spots that could explode will be left without the capacity of an instrument like the United Nations working with the authority to try to stop that kind of danger.

We are not choosing between a situation in which there would be bloodshed on the one hand and absolute peace on the other. That is a fairy tale. We are dealing with a situation of grave danger. What we have to do is find a way in which we resolve that danger in a way that not only—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should go on to the next question.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people remember that this same minister who is defending this action under the United Nations auspices is a minister who said three months ago that he did not give a damn whether the UN would support us or not; he would go to war anyway. They do not care about the United Nations.

[Translation]

My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The minister has told us that he finds the French peace initiative interesting and positive. It is a fact that economic sanctions and diplomacy should be given more time to work to avoid a catastrophic war. My question to the minister is very specific: Has the Canadian Government contacted all Security Council members, including the United States, Great Britain and the Soviet Union to encourage them to support the French initiative to avoid a catastrophic war?

• (1450)

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the first part of his question the member for Burnaby made an accusation which is false, which he knows is false, and which the record of the standing committee will demonstrate is false. I certainly am prepared to stand on the record of the standing committee.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I rather regret that he is not following the reasonable approach that was taken by his leader in her speech today when she spoke of the importance of keeping this issue something we discuss on its merits and in a manner free of partisanship or of pettiness. I would hope that he would follow her lead.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): As to the second part of the question, I can confirm that we are in contact with other members of the Security Council, including France, the United Kingdom and the United States, to determine whether the French proposal has a probability of success. But the reply that matters is not that of the United States, but that of Saddam Hussein, for it is essential, for the French proposal to succeed that Saddam Hussein recognize the need to comply with the United Nations resolutions.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

It is the view of many Canadians today that the effectiveness of the United Nations is being undermined by some member states that have distorted the UN charter to justify force to end the gulf conflict at this time.

In order to keep collective security measures within the bounds of the UN charter, will Canada press for the reconvening of the Security Council immediately to review and report to the world on the effectiveness of the sanctions to date and, if necessary, to recommend any further UN actions?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member who follows these things closely will know that the Secretary–General came back and met with the Security Council yesterday. They are meeting again now. They are discussing actions that should be taken on what is the last day of the extraordinary pause for peace that was deliberately placed in the Security Council resolution as not only an opportunity, which it was, but a final opportunity, which it explicitly was, to Saddam Hussein to opt for peace rather than to force the world to war.

Apart from the new theology of her colleague from Winnipeg, there is no requirement for the United Nations to take another decision with respect to sanctions. The sanctions proposal is now in place and I should say that the Leader of the Opposition this morning announced that his policy is to wait. The reality is that one in the real world cannot wait forever. There come times when one has to take decisions based upon principle.

Our principle is that we want to support the United Nations and that element of the charter of the United Nations brought in by Mr. Pearson when he said: "There is authority to talk and, when talk won't work, there has to be the ability to enforce the words of the United Nations."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister.

On November 28, the Secretary of State told us that it was the responsibility of "all nations to seek a basis for the peaceful acceptance of Security Council resolutions", and later in December he told Canadians that "our government is determined that no stone be left unturned in our efforts to find a peaceful solution to the crisis".

We have heard from the minister today about French, British, and Yemeni proposals. We are going to hear about what Canada has done in the last five weeks. What we want to know is what peace initiatives this government will pursue today and tomorrow to avert a war in the gulf.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Two things, Mr. Speaker. First, I should make it very clear, as I believe I did in the answer to a question from the New Democratic Party, that we are actively working with other countries to see if it is possible to make progress on some of the proposals that are now being considered, one of which,—the French proposal—reflects to a remarkable degree proposals that Canada itself put forward.

The point is not to have a number of proposals that we can wave around and say that we did this. The point is to try to have something that will work. There are some proposals that may work. I have already answered the question that we are using all of our energy, as we have through this period, to try to see if it is possible to make those proposals that are now on the table, that are now being considered, work.

But, as I said in French a moment ago, the question really is not a question for the United States, for France or even for Canada. The question now is a question for Saddam Hussein. Will he accept the condition precedent in the French proposal which is that he must signal clearly and unequivocally his willingness to withdraw troops from Kuwait and to begin to respect Security Council resolutions?

Finally, as I said to her colleague the other day in committee, we have no monopoly on good ideas. If the hon. member has a proposal that she believes we should pursue, we would be very pleased to have that. We have been pursuing—

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. If there is a war and we take part in it, our safety will be jeopardized, here, in Canada. We should not delude ourselves about that. The transportation system, particularly for air transportation, as well as systems supplying us with drinking water, will all become potential targets.

Can the government confirm that it has taken, in conjunction with the provinces, every step to ensure the safety of these infrastructures and of the Canadian people on our own territory? Can the Prime minister tell us specifically what he has done in that area?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the government is well aware of the risks the hon. member is referring to. Saddam Hussein and some of his colleagues even made direct threats. Mechanisms are in place to allow us to identify such risks that could be facing Canada as well as evaluate them and take appropriate action if need be.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, that answer is hardly complete. It is very clear, given the fact that the decision to go to war is a discretionary one arising out of the failure to allow sanctions to work. I am delighted to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs fully endorse the French proposal. I take it this is a new piece of information just provided us.

Be that as it may, it is crucial now to provide the civilian population with assurances that its security is being looked after.

What steps has the government taken in terms of public information, even more important in terms of public education, to prepare Canadians at home for possible acts of retaliation? Furthermore, what steps has the government taken in terms of those Canadians who are working abroad to provide them with contingency protection in case of war?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Again, Mr. Speaker, I want to reaffirm the fact that we have taken those threats very seriously. It is very important that not only Canada be vigilant but that all countries in the world be vigilant, because threats have been made to other countries as well.

We have services here in Canada that are specialized and do exactly that type of risk assessment. It has been done. I do not think it would be a very secure measure for me to disclose today what our security measures are all about.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like to turn the attention of the House for a minute to another tragedy unfolding, that which is unfolding in the Baltic states, and ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure I speak for all members when I say how concerned we are about the violence which we have seen, particularly in Lithuania, in recent days. We are very pleased, of course, that the House has been able to speak with one voice in the way that it did earlier.

• (1500)

Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs make it absolutely clear to President Gorbachev on behalf of all Canadians that a pre-condition for continuing good will toward Mr. Gorbachev and the Soviet Union is that the democratically elected governments of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia not be overthrown with Mr. Gorbachev standing idly by while this kind of thing threatens to happen?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member and others in the House for their agreement to unanimously support the resolution that was adopted this morning.

I think it is of fundamental importance that the Soviet authorities be under no illusion about the seriousness of the people and Parliament of Canada on this issue.

The hon. member asked me for an undertaking with regard to a communication with Mr. Gorbachev indicating how much was at issue here, how much Canadian co-operation would be affected. That has already been done. The Prime Minister's letter could not have been clearer. That letter was sent on Sunday. We expect a response to it.

With regard to other things which we might do to be of help in a practical way, I found it very helpful in the past that there was the degree of co-operation among private members who are interested in this issue. Many members of this House made proposals on which we were to able to act with respect to earlier chapters in the history of the Baltic states. I would certainly welcome those kinds of constructive proposals from the hon. member and others.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I say to the House that I had the opportunity, along with other members of this House to be in Lithuania just under a year ago for the election of the Sajudis government there. I cannot think of a more peaceful and democratic bunch of people. I say to President Gorbachev, if he permits their violent overthrow, then he should give his Nobel Peace Prize back.

I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of External Affairs. What does Canada intend to do at the United nations or in some other way to bring the issue of the Baltic states and its annexation by the Soviet Union into the international arena where it properly belongs?

We have never recognized the annexation of those three states. I think it is time that the government took some initiative to bring this into the international arena where the Soviet Union can have impressed upon it the fact that people regard the Baltic states as a special case.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think there are two areas to which it is most useful for us to turn our attention. I agree with the member that the dramatic changes and circumstances require us to approach this with urgency. One is the United Nations; the other is the CSE process. Neither is simple, because of the capacity of the Soviet Union with its rights to veto in a practical or formal way any such consideration.

I must confess to the member that the priority of my officials on this question is to try to be of help to Canadians and Canadian interests in Lithuania. We will be moving soon to see if there are ways in which we can act on the diplomatic front.

Mr. Speaker: I think there has been some consideration in the Chamber. I am going to look to the hon. leader of the opposition on a point of order.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we were deeply saddened to learn that the honorable C.M. Drury passed away last weekend.

[English]

Bud Drury was born and raised in traditional Westmount style, but he chose to lead a life that was anything but traditional. After completing his education at the Royal Military College, he chose to complete his preparation for leadership in Canadian affairs by making himself fully bilingual, an unusual step for a man of his background and generation.

During World War II, he rose to the rank of Brigadier at an unprecedented young age. At war's end, he attained a status of a genuine hero as the leader of the United Nations Relief Agency's work in Poland.

After serving as Deputy Minister of National Defence, Bud returned to his family business. In 1962, he came back to public life as the member of Parliament for Westmount.

In 1963, he was appointed Minister of Defence Production and Ministry of Industry, leading the negotiations that resulted in the Canadian–U.S Auto Pact.

In 1968, he became President of the Treasury Board and later served as Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology.

In 1978, he left Parliament to become Chairman of the National Capital Commission.

Bud Drury remained active and vital in his retirement, terrorizing the roads of the Gatineau hills in his red sports car, advising his children in modern business practices, and teaching his grandchildren the mysteries of the computer.

Although bodily ailments slowed him down physically, his inquiring mind remained clear and penetrating.

We join his daughters, Di and Leith, and his sons, Victor and Gib, in the passing of one who rejoiced so in life.

[Translation]

I had the pleasure of working with Mr. Drury for many years and benefited from his advice. He was a real gentleman and he served his country well. He served it as a member of the Armed Forces, as a very senior official of the government, and as a most distinguished member of this House. Here, as across the whole country, he had no enemies. We profoundly regret the loss of this great Canadian.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Prime Minister and members of the Conservative caucus, indeed the Government of Canada, I want to join with the hon. Leader of the Opposition in paying tribute the late Hon. Charles Bud Drury.

I had the privilege of serving in the House with Bud. I clearly echo the remarks and comments that were made by the Leader of the Opposition.

As the Leader of the Opposition indicated, Bud was a successful businessman and entrepreneur but gave himself to public life in a very unselfish and generous way. He had a very outstanding military career.

He had an outstanding political career, having served in the House from 1962 to 1978. He also served as a Deputy Minister. He played a key role in the work of the United Nations and a very key role in the advancement and building of the National Capital Commission here in Ottawa.

He had an array of portfolios in which he served with distinction, from Industry, Defence Production, Science and Technology, Treasury Board and Public Works. He discharged those responsibilities and obligations with distinction.

I also note, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition did, that he did have a very keen interest in the pursuit of liberalized trade. To that end, he was instrumental in the negotiations of the Auto Pact in 1965. I am sure that he would look back with a great deal of respect, satisfaction and admiration to the additional activities that the Auto Pact led to. I think he did really plant the seeds of liberalized trade between two of the greatest trading partners in the world.

Bud commanded respect in the House. He really was a House of Commons man. He treated all members with distinction and was always available to be spoken to about a problem. As one who came here as a new member, I found Mr. Drury always open and accessible.

As The Ottawa Citizen said, he wore many hats and he discharged his responsibilities with distinction.

On behalf of all of us on this side of the House, I want to extend our sincerest sympathy to his family, his two sons and his daughters. We, on this side, appreciate very much the significant contribution he has made to Canada and the business world in public leadership. Most important, as members of the House of Commons, we appreciate very much the class, the distinction, and the leadership that he showed here on the floor of the House.

While I am on my feet, I would like to also pay tribute as well to a former colleague of ours, namely, Lawrence Watson, who was the former member of Parliament for the riding of Assiniboia in the province of Saskatchewan. Lawrence served the House from 1963 to 1968. He passed away on December 22.

While I did not have the privilege of serving in the House with him, I got to know him as one who was a champion of rural affairs and the farmers of western Canada, particularly the wheat growers in the Assiniboia area. He was a big fellow and we used to refer to him as Hoss and he enjoyed that very much. He had a lot of friends and made a lot of friends here. He was a man who looked after his constituency affairs and certainly always had the interests of the farmers at heart.

We want to, on this occasion, send to his wife, Louise, and his family our deepest sympathy and to assure them, that the contribution of Lawrence Watson will always be remembered and treasured.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, I would like to join in the condolences to the families of Mr. Watson and the Hon. Bud Drury. While I did not serve with either of those gentlemen, I think the very wonderful recounts of those who did serve with them are a great tribute.

Perhaps the greatest tributes one can have from one's colleagues have been given today concerning those two parliamentarians, particularly the Hon. Bud Drury, who served in a number of capacities, over a number of years, under two Prime Ministers. We see a model that all of us could afford to emulate in taking an interest in a diversity of affairs to serve the Canadian people well and to be a role model for all Canadians. So, I too, would like to add condolences, on behalf of my party, to the families of those two great parliamentarians.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to express our condolences to the family and friends of the former member from Saskatchewan. He was certainly recognized across Canada as one of those farm leaders who took the bit in his mouth and fought on behalf of the constituents he represented. He will be sadly missed by all those who knew him.

I also rise today to pay tribute to a former member of this House, Larry Condon, who died last Friday and was buried this morning. Larry Condon was a member of this House from 1974 to 1979. For those who knew Larry, he was an enthusiastic person with boundless energy who loved his country and his family. He served his constituents well, in his former position as mayor of the town of Strathroy and as member of Parliament for Lambton—Middlesex. Larry Condon was a true friend of the working people. He will be sadly missed by his former colleagues, his friends, his family and all of those who were dear to him.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a true Canadian and a former member of Parliament, Larry Condon. Larry was the member for Lambton—Middlesex. Mr. Condon always had the interests of his community and Canada at heart. Larry is remembered as a likeable, non-partisan individual. On behalf of our government, I extend to his wife and family our sympathies.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I want also to add my condolences to the family of Larry Condon. There are few of us in the House from the class of 1974—two colleagues to my right and perhaps one or two across the way. We are very limited in number now.

We all remember Larry as being a very affable person, easy to get along with, friendly, congenial, and so on. We enjoyed his fellowship while we were here in the House. It is something that this House brings to itself that is quite remarkable.

I would like to join my colleagues in expressing our sympathy to his wife and to his family.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, I would like to add a few words about Larry Condon.

He was a member of Parliament from Ontario who served his constituents well and this country well. I sat in the House with him for a number of years.

I want to extend to his family our deepest sympathy and let them know that we appreciate the contribution he made to the country and to his constituents. He was a very understanding, dedicated, and sympathetic man who made a great contribution to Canada.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I also want to pay homage to Larry Condon.

I knew Larry Condon since he was about 10 years old. We grew up together in Montreal. Larry was from Verdun and we went to Loyola High School together. Larry was the goalie on the hockey team on which I played in high school and he was also the quarterback of the football team. I was the halfback at that time and not many would believe that.

I have known Larry for a long, long time and I was very saddened to learn of his death. I would like to extend my condolences to his family.

POINT OF ORDER

PROCEDURE IN HOUSE ON DECEMBER 19

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a short point of order.

I am sure that others as well have reviewed Hansard of December 19 and have recognized a number of procedural anomalies that occurred as that day wore on. Considering the day, Mr. Speaker, it is not the day to enter into discussion about some of the concerns that members would have about the rather creative use of procedure on that day. I would like to ask your willingness, Mr. Speaker, to set aside this discussion for perhaps another day to allow the important debate to continue this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the hon. member for Kamloops wants to raise as a point of order the proceedings, or some aspect of the proceedings, on the last day before we adjourned. I certainly will hear the hon. member and other hon. members. Perhaps I could contact the hon. member for Kamloops and set up an appropriate time. I agree that probably it is best not to pursue it this afternoon.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (p. 16984) and the amendment of Mr. Chrétien (p. 16995).

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by congratulating the leader of the New Democratic Party on the serious and thoughtful nature of her remarks. She clearly was attempting to be constructive and set forth in some very general terms other options which she thinks should be explored.

The hon. member and I may argue about what realism means, but I think that she would agree that the government and the world require much more precision as to other options than she was able to provide today. We look forward, very genuinely, to receiving any specific suggestions that she or members of her party might have, either during this debate or through the conduct of this crisis.

This is, as the leader of the New Democratic Party said, an extraordinary time. It requires all of us to do everything we can to bring forward the best practical advice we can.

The new Leader of the Opposition made essentially four points, as I understood his intervention. He wants to wait for sanctions to have effect, yet he gives the House no idea as to how long he proposes to wait and he gives the House not one iota of evidence that the sanctions program that we have mounted will affect Iraqi political leadership or military capacity. I want to return later in my remarks to the question of sanctions, but I hope that other spokespersons of the Liberal Party will be far more precise in indicating exactly how long they want to wait.

Second, the Leader of the Opposition pretends that the use of force in the Gulf would not have the authority of the United Nations. That is absolutely false. Resolution 678 of the United Nations is precise. Let me quote Articles 2 and 3:

> 2. Authorizes Member States co-operating with the Government of Kuwait, unless Iraq on or before 15 January 1991 fully implements, as set forth in paragraph 1 above, the foregoing resolutions, to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 660 (1990) and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area;
> 3. Requests all States to provide appropriate support for the actions undertaken in pursuance of paragraph 2 of the present resolution;

That was the resolution entered into deliberately after extensive legal advice and after extensive discussion with the Secretary General and with others. There is no question that the actions we are taking, the actions we would contemplate are actions that have the authority of the United Nations.

Third, he proposes, as I understand it, to call back Canadian troops. Well, certainly that is not the position of the government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Fourth, he makes the curious and, I find, alarming argument that because the United Nations failed in Tibet, because the United Nations failed in Cyprus, and because the United Nations has failed in solving other crises, we should not help the United Nations succeed in Kuwait. That is absurd and it is not a logic that this government accepts.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, 167 days ago, Saddam Hussein brutally invaded Kuwait, without provocation. That is how the war started. Today Kuwait is still occupied. It has been pillaged, and more than half the population has fled the country. Amnesty International has reported flagrant human rights violations. Saddam Hussein has declared that Kuwait is now, irrevocably, part of Iraq. A sovereign member State of the United Nations is about to be wiped out.

Since the beginning of this crisis, the international community has, with unprecedented unanimity and clarity, expressed its position. The UN Security Council has adopted 12 resolutions, most of them unanimous, condemning Iraq's act of aggression and demanding that Iraq withdraw from Kuwait, while imposing sanctions to force it to abide by the UN decisions.

Forty-eight days ago, on November 29, Saddam Hussein was given a period of grace. The purpose was to give diplomacy another chance and to try and convince Iraq that the international community was not bluffing and that it would use force, if necessary, as soon as the deadline expired. This resolution was clear. It indicated that as a sign of good will Iraq would be granted a period of grace to give it one last chance.

Yesterday, UN Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar returned from Iraq, discouraged and convinced that it was now practically impossible to hope for a diplomatic solution to the crisis. On the advice of the Secretary-General, European foreign affairs ministers decided not to send a delegation to Baghdad.

Since Security Council resolution 678 was adopted, Iraq knows perfectly well that the international community is not bluffing. However, its troops are still occupying Kuwait.

[English]

During these last 48 days, diplomacy has been applied to a degree rarely seen before. I indicated, as the Prime Minister did, that I would like to give some indication of some of the actions that were taken by Canada. I cannot recount them all for a variety of reasons, because some are still in train. I want to indicate some of the activities in which this country, on behalf of peace, has been engaged.

On a bilateral basis, and perhaps it was one of the most important actions that was taken early in this crisis, the Prime Minister was in Kennebunkport for a meeting with the President of the United States. It was a meeting scheduled before this conflict began, before the invasion of Iraq.

There were senior and respected Americans then counselling the President of the United States to engage upon a surgical strike. That was the advice he received. The Prime Minister told him on behalf of Canada that that kind of policy would not be acceptable to Canada and should not be followed by the United States. That gave the world an opportunity to pursue diplomatic and peaceful solutions to this aggression.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That was one of several instances in which we have used that bilateral relation with the United States, a relation which some members in this House revile, but which is after all an opportunity for unprecedented influence upon a superpower. We have used that relation to encourage the United States to work with the world in trying to resolve this problem.

A second area in which we have been extremely active has been with respect to the United Nations. Again, let me speak of American attitudes. As the House will know, members here raised their concern to us about it. When this began there was a strong inclination on the part of the Americans to go it alone and not to operate under the aegis of the United Nations. Again, Canada said that was wrong and that if this is to be done effectively and with authority, it must be done under the umbrella of and with the authority of the United Nations.

I would not claim that it was simply because of our counsel, but Canadians need to know that this country has influence upon others, including our great friends, on critical questions. For a variety of reasons, the United States took the decision to operate within the United Nations' context and that is why this debate today is not about what one nation might do. This debate today is about whether this country will support the United Nations in what it has decided to do.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We have also, of course, been extraordinarily active on the floor of the United Nations in the co-sponsorship of resolutions and, more importantly, in drafting those resolutions, in finding ways in which they can be acceptable and, indeed, in which other resolutions which were important to the progress on this issue could be made to be acceptable.

Because of our unusual situation as an industrial power with connection to the Third World, Canada undertook a series of initiatives based on the understanding that Saddam Hussein, if he would listen to anyone, may well be more prepared to listen to other Third World leaders than he would be to listen to the leaders of the developed world.

The Prime Minister met with Perez de Cuellar in New York when he was there to co-chair the Children's Summit. He made a proposal, based upon the reality that is clear to everyone interested in international development, that the principal victims of this invasion are not exclusively in Kuwait. They are also the poor of the Third World. They are the poor of Senegal, Zimbabwe, Bangladesh, and of other countries that, because their standard of living is so basic, depend more than we do upon secure and relatively cheap supplies of oil. Many of these people are Muslim. Many of these people are people whose cause should appeal directly to Saddam Hussein, but we understood that we could not make that case as compellingly ourselves as others could.

The Prime Minister was in touch with President Diouf of Senegal. He is not only the President of the Organization of African Unity, but also the incoming president of the Islamic Conference and the President of La Francophonie. President Diouf, at the behest of Canada and, frankly, with some help from Canada, convened meetings of other leaders of the Third World and a mission was ready to go. It was in Paris en route to Baghdad to try to make that kind of appeal when Saddam Hussein called and said he would prefer to have that mission deferred, delayed, until after the visit of Jim Baker, the visit that Saddam Hussein did not allow to happen.

We did not leave it there. President Traoré of Mali was the co-president with Canada of the Children's Summit and after conversations between the Prime Minister of Canada and President Traoré, his foreign minister went to Baghdad, tried to see if there could be movement, came back and reported to my colleague, the Associate Minister of National Defence, who was here over Christmas, and senior officials to see if there was some movement on that front.

Again we have been active through Commonwealth and francophone and other connections in the Third World because we recognize that we have to do everything possible to try to persuade Saddam Hussein to understand how serious this issue is and how serious the resolve of the world is.

In terms of peacekeeping it may be—it is part of the French plan; it was part of the proposal I submitted on the Prime Minister's behalf to the Secretary-General—that there will be a need for some peacekeeping presence if we are able to secure a withdrawal of Iraqi forces.

It certainly would be better if that were largely Arab. Clearly there would also be a need for the kind of expertise that Canada is uniquely qualified to provide. That was raised with us by Egyptian leaders. It was discussed by my colleague, the associate minister, when she was in the region. It was part of the offer made to the United Nations by the Prime Minister in the letter that I delivered the other night.

On the question of an Arab solution, which everyone was seeking during a period of this debate because we thought that other solutions may not work, Canada adopted an aggressive approach to try to encourage Arab leaders to work and to work together. That included, in our view, trying to overcome as a practical matter the difference that existed between King Hussein of Jordan and other Arab leaders because Hussein and Jordan are of fundamental importance in the region in any event, and also because it would be better if we had those nations working together rather than at cross-purposes.

That involved a number of conversations, contacts between the Prime Minister and the King, the Prime Minister and President Mubarak and a number of others. It also involved a visit I was able to make to the region and a long conversation with King Hussein during which we discussed explicitly and at length the question of the hostages and whether it made any sense at all for Saddam Hussein to continue to keep the hostages. I made the case and King Hussein made the case that it did make no sense and two or three days after I left King Hussein told me that he intended to go again to Baghdad. That was the trip when he went again to Baghdad that resulted in proposals from him, from Yasser Arafat and from others that resulted in Saddam Hussein's decision to let all the hostages go.

In terms of consultations, we are in regular daily contact with foreign ministers, heads of government, and a range of other countries, 50 or 60, not just the coalition partners, but others who might have some influence.

The Prime Minister in particular is in regular contact with President Mubarak, King Hussein, President Bush, Prime Minister Major, President Mitterrand and President Gorbachev. In his conversations two days ago with President Mitterrand, there was discussion of the proposals that we had put forward to the Secretary-General, proposals that were not then public, and President Mitterrand indicated at that time that there was a great deal of similarity in the thinking and the analysis of the French and the Canadian governments.

Those activities of course continue, as was indicated during Question Period, as we try to find if there are ways in the hours, now hours, that remain in this period that was established, this pause for peace that was established, to try to encourage Saddam Hussein to respond to someone.

I had hoped to have them with me and do not at the moment, but I propose later in the day with the agreement of the House to lay upon the table the French and English versions of the letter that the Prime Minister sent to Perez de Cuellar and which I delivered last week.

Those things have been done. They have done by Canada and they have been done by other countries. There has been an extraordinary attempt to solve this diplomatically. But today, January 15, at 3.30 in the afternoon, in Ottawa, we are at an impasse and we are approaching a turning point.

Peace still has a chance, but where once peace might have been an expectation, it is now only a hope, and that hope grows dim with every door that Saddam Hussein slams shut. Canada and the world must face the fact that Iraq may force a conflict.

There are, as we all know, no good wars. War is mankind's least noble invention. Everyone wants to avoid war. At this sombre moment we owe it to Canadians to determine as best we can if the course we are embarked upon is correct and if there are realistic, responsible alternatives. Not waiting, not running away, but real alternatives.

There have been wars in the past where patriotism has overshadowed logic, where pride has prevented peace, where emotion has overcome reason. We must be as confident as we can be, if this comes to war, that it is not one of those wars.

Forty-six years ago, the nations of this world formed an organization, the United Nations, whose primary purpose was to be the maintenance of international peace and security. The men and the women who designed that organization were not idealists. They were realists, realists worn by war, steeped in suffering. They had seen the futility of having rules without having a capacity to enforce those rules. That is futile. The experience of the League of the Nations proved it was futile.

They knew, as in societies everywhere, rules will only be obeyed if they are enforced and that will, if they are not enforced, will become meaningless, and societies themselves cease to be peaceful for anyone. With the sorry history of the League of Nations behind them and, with the awful consequences of appeasement to guide them, they crafted a charter that would give the world the right and capacity to deter aggression and to reverse it by force, if necessary, when it occurred.

Those purposes permeate the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations. But those purposes went unfulfilled for decades because a new war intervened—the cold war—a conflict which turned the United Nations into a mere shadow of what Lester Pearson and its other architects had intended.

So we had wars, dozens of them, conflicts which flourished, because the UN was frozen. With the easing of East-West tensions, old excuses have disappeared and new opportunities have emerged. An opportunity now exists to make the United Nations united, not simply in name, but in fact.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That has been our accomplishment so far in the response to this crisis. No sir, I say to the Leader of the Opposition, this is not Cypress. This is not Tibet. This is not an area where the United Nations failed, unless its members choose to make it fail. If we choose to make it succeed, we can make the United Nations succeed in this case.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Our accomplishment so far has been that the Security Council of the United Nations has worked as its architects had intended. The Charter of the United Nations has been acted upon. The process of seeking adherence to resolutions has been followed. We are approaching the moment where our words may have to become deeds. It is a difficult moment. It may be easier now to back away; to act not as we have resolved, but rather to retreat from our principles, to retreat from our promises.

To those who would have us back away, there are also troubling arguments and worrisome questions. Of what value would the United Nations be if we now said we were not serious?

After 12 resolutions, clear and unequivocal, do we say that after all, we were just bluffing? Do we say to future aggressors that all they need do is hunker down and wait us out? Are we hollow in our principles and in our words?

Does Canada, which is not a great power in the scheme of things, say that Kuwait, also not a great power, is expendable? Do we say there are rewards for the ruthless and prizes for the powerful? Do we attempt to justify a wrong by saying that we accepted wrongs in the past and did not act then? Do we say we can do no better than we have done, that the future will be as the past was: scarred by sacrifice, wedded to war?

We are contemplating the destruction of the United Nations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The right hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

I invite the right. hon. minister to conclude, unless the House allows him to continue. Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The right hon. Secretary of State.

[English]

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that extension.

I have just had handed to me the copies in French and English of the letter sent by the Prime Minister to the Secretary-General of the United Nations. If the House is agreed, I would like to lay them upon the table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, if we as Canadians say these things, we are contemplating the destruction of the United Nations and the international order that it now has the chance to build.

If we as Canadians say these things, we are betraying the efforts of Louis St. Laurent and Lester Pearson. These are men who had seen war. They were leaders and statesmen in times when 100,000 Canadians had died fighting wars which were undeterred and the origins of which lay in the unwillingness of the world to enforce the rules which all had claimed were universal.

We have to face realities about Canadian attitudes. Perhaps some Canadians are more comfortable with a United Nations that talks and not a United Nations that acts. Perhaps some see it as a place for soap boxes and for UNICEF boxes, and not as a place where the world comes together to take the hard decisions which peace requires.

I see some of, I think, my good friends in the New Democratic Party taking objection to that.

The reality is that the United Nations is a place where very hard decisions have to be taken. For years, it has not been possible to take those decisions.

We are now in a situation where we have acted consistently over time. We have set the stage. We are in a position where there is a need now to decide, and we cannot simply treat the United Nations as a talking shop because that was only half of what the Charter intended.

The United Nations was designed by Mr. Pearson and by others not just to talk, but also to act.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langdon: Are sanctions not actions?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Someone just across the House called out that we should wait.

I understood the member for Essex—Windsor spoke about sanctions not working and I will come to that.

If the question is are sanctions working to deter the war machine, the answer is no.

I have asked the member to provide evidence he might have and he has not been forthcoming. There are some who say that we have not waited long enough, that perhaps the message has not got through.

Saddam Hussein has had 167 days to contemplate the consequences of his actions. Saddam Hussein knows what he is up against. There was a period when we wondered if that was the case. There can be no doubt about that now because his Foreign Minister, Mr. Tariq Aziz, made that abundantly clear in his remarks to the press after the meeting with Secretary Baker.

If we were to make January 15 a mobile date and extend it to February 15 this year or February 15 next year, by what form of logic could it be argued that Saddam Hussein would treat the resolve of the United Nations more seriously then than he does now?

What about sanctions and giving them more time to work, which is the basic argument for delay as I understand it from the other side? That is an issue which, as the Prime Minister said, has been very seriously considered by the government. There is no doubt that if the international consensus held, the Iraqi economy might be seriously weakened if we waited six months or a year. If the international consensus held, it might in six months or a year, but that is not the end of the argument. There is no guarantee whatsoever that economic weakness would get Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. There is every indication from the words and the deeds of Saddam Hussein that thousands of Iraqis, men, women, infants, and thousands of those Kuwaitis whom we seek to liberate would be made to starve before Saddam Hussein would allow his army to suffer.

That regime of terror is not like Canada. It is not a democracy like ours. It is not a place where one regularly reads the public opinion polls; those do not have much hold on Saddam Hussein. In that regime of terror we cannot rely on popular discontent to dissuade a dictator. And during a period of further delay, the plunder of Kuwait would continue, and we could find ourselves trying to free a society which has ceased to exist.

There is a notion sometimes—it was expressed in Question Period—that the choice is between a peaceful present, a peaceful status quo and a terrible war. That is a dangerous, misleading illusion. There is no peaceful status quo.

The gulf region today, the entire Middle East, is incendiary. It is a time bomb of conflict, extremism, and terror. The assassination in Tunis yesterday of of Abu Iyad and Abu Alhol is an example, as was the terrible violence which occurred at the mosque in East Jerusalem in October, the bombings which led to the deaths of pilgrims at Mecca in 1987 and 1989, the riots which rocked Jordan in mid–1989, and the civil war in Lebanon. These, any of them, can become a fuse for frightening carnage and chaos. That tension is immeasurably more acute because of Iraq's aggression. As long as Iraq remains in Kuwait, the time bomb ticks and the world is playing Russian roulette with its own future.

Outside that region where the volatility is most acute, devastation and deprivation would continue and would accelerate if the world delayed. I am not talking about developed countries like Canada, comfortable countries like ours. I am talking about developing countries whose very existence as functioning societies is at stake. Terrible poverty is being made more and more unbearable. Governments in Africa are going broke and lurching toward disintegration.

When the Prime Minister met with leaders of the front-line states from Africa at the Children's Summit, the irony they were facing is that they had come to that conference to dedicate themselves to extra efforts to help their children, and the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq made it impossible not only to turn new moneys there but to keep old moneys there. Those are among the victims of the status quo which some would have us wait and extend.

Inflation rates in some of those developing countries are doubling and tripling. Deficits are ballooning. Basic human needs are not being met. Governments in Africa have asked Canada if they can convert money meant for education to funds to buy basic goods. Their development as societies is in jeopardy, as are so many of the international development programs that we have put in place and are so actively supported by members of this House and the non-governmental community across the country.

These are related problems and we should not blind our eye to one because we are concerned about the consequences of the solution to another.

In eastern Europe, the dramatic escalation in oil prices has become the singular reason why the progress they have made thus far and the progress that must be made in the future is in jeopardy. Finance Minister Klaus of Czechoslovakia told me in November that this crisis had gutted their economic reform plan and cost his country billions. Saddam Hussein does not simply destabilize the gulf. He destabilizes eastern Europe, Africa, Asia, and Latin America. Rather than delay, some people say deal.

An hon. member: There is more oil.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Yes, there is more oil. People are saying there is more oil, but as know what is happening with spot prices. We know what is happening with the cost of oil.

An hon. member: They are going down.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No, they are not going down. They are going up to a lot of the countries we are talking about. What is also going up is the incidence of people who come home, people who used to be working in the gulf and sending money back to help sustain economies in Bangladesh and elsewhere, and that is no longer happening. That is one of several consequences.

Rather than delay, some say deal. Let Saddam claim other victories to justify his aggression. But that, Sir, would be a reward for aggression, an invitation to other conflicts and other tyrants. It would be absurd to give a bank robber the money he had stolen or to take that money back and give him gold instead. Law and order would crumble if societies worked that way. It is no different internationally.

At this very moment plans proposed by France and others, as the House knows, are being discussed in New York. There are more active discussions since questions were raised an hour ago. Although there are important details to clarify, those plans have some very positive elements. As I have said and as the Prime Minister has said, they are similar to a proposal put forward in the letter that has been tabled in this House.

Our proposal contained the following elements, as the House will read: first, an international guarantee of all borders in the gulf area from attack; second, the initiation of a process to settle Iraq's differences with Kuwait, either through existing international agencies or through something created for the purposes; third, the departure from Saudi Arabia of all forces from outside the region and the creation of a peacekeeping force drawn primarily from the Arab states but with the participation of others if that were deemed desirable; and, fourth, a firm commitment in principle to a process to resolve other issues in the Middle East.

Those provisions are at the centre of the proposals now being discussed. What is missing now, indeed what has always been missing, is the trigger that could set all this in motion: an Iraqi commitment to and total withdrawal from Kuwait. The question that has to be asked is: Where is Iraq's response? What is Iraq's attitude?

We are told there are other ways to get Saddam Hussein out. This government and the world, for 167 days, have been trying to find a way to get him out without conflict. I say absolutely seriously if anyone in this House, anyone in this country, has a plausible plan—I am not talking here about a dream; I am talking about a plan—then this government and Canadians need to hear it immediately.

I want to conclude by returning to the fundamental principle at issue here: the defence and construction of a durable structure of international order. That is not a foreign cause to Canadians and it is certainly not a faked cause. That is a Canadian cause. That is a cause worth defending. We are not a great power. We cannot impose order just as we cannot ignore order. We have no choice but to build order with others and to do that co-operatively.

We need that order. We need a co-operative order in trade for our prosperity. We need a co-operative order in security since we cannot provide it ourselves on this huge territory in an age of nuclear weapons. Canadians need co-operative order because its absence would mean the power of the strongest always wins; the law of the jungle as the Prime Minister said this morning.

To build that order, we must work with others. It is not an accident that Lester Pearson and others were so active in drafting the charter of the United Nations and helping to make it work. It is not an accident that Canada has been such a strong proponent of a reformed NATO, a new GATT, a strengthened CSCE, an active Commonwealth, a more effective OAS, a vital la francophonie, and an expanded structure of security dialogue with the Asia-Pacific region.

No other country in the world has been a more active and generous and persistent contributor and supporter of the development of a United Nations system which works.

If the Persian Gulf situation is not resolved in the way the United Nations has demanded, if Saddam Hussein is allowed to keep the spoils of his conquest, then Canadians must accept a United Nations which will fail in the future, a United Nations which will be unable to deter or turn back further aggression, an organization seriously weakened in its ability to help develop countries or to help feed children or to help clean up the environment. The world has just begun to treat the United Nations seriously. Surely, Sir, this is not the time to stop.

In the Persian Gulf, the world has returned to the United Nations. It is not departing from the charter; it is returning to the charter. This is not contrary to peacekeeping. Peacekeeping was invented because the UN did not work, because the great powers did not want it to make peace, but only to supervise truces. Those who invented peacekeeping, Mr. Pearson included, lamented the inability of the world community to make peace. The gulf is about returning to the principle that the best guarantee of peace is the guarantee that aggression will not be accepted.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Other events fill in this picture. The United States, as I mentioned earlier, has returned to the United Nations. So have others, including the Soviet Union. In so doing, as they came back, national purposes have been modified, compromises have been made, and consensus has been built.

What possible incentive would any great power have in returning to that organization in the future, in making compromises, in seeking consensus, if now, after all of this, after one of the most naked acts of aggression in 50 years is allowed to succeed? What possible Canadian interests does it serve to have unilateral action rewarded whether by Saddam Hussein or other aggressors or by others who would respond to aggression?

I do not want to overstate the case. If there is war in the gulf, it will not be the war to end all wars. But neither do I want to understate the case. There will be no hope to deter aggression, no hope to reverse aggression, no hope to keep peace or to make it co-operatively, if the world fails the United Nations here.

In his memoirs, Lester Person records one of the saddest episodes of international diplomacy in the 1930s helped sow the seeds of the world war which was to follow. That episode was the consideration by the League of Nations of steps to be taken to counter Italy's unprovoked invasion of Ethiopia, another small country.

Mr. Pearson, who was a Canadian representation at the League of Nations at that time, describes the heady start and the hopeful consensus at the beginning that sanctions should be applied, that Italy's aggression should be reversed. He then catalogues the steady erosion of that consensus, the collapse of resolve as government after government became timid, preoccupied by narrow, self interest. What was to be the salvation of the League of Nations became its downfall and the world lurched toward war. Mr. Pearson concludes his commentary with the following observations, and I quote:

> For collective security to have real meaning for peace, all members must be prepared and willing to join in precisely the kind of action, economic and military, which is necessary to prevent or defeat aggression. Otherwise, an aggressor has nothing to fear from the international community but pin-pricks.

That was Lester Pearson on the League of Nations. I say to members of the House of Commons, particularly members of the party that sees itself in that tradition, that we cannot afford a return to pin-pricks that would incapacitate world order now in the way to which unhappily Lester Pearson was a witness decades ago.

Peace, Sir, has a price. Order is not automatic. Security must be secured. Lester Pearson knew that. Canadians should not forget it. I believe there are only two clear choices before us. The first is to defend our principles and in so doing, serve our abiding interest in building an international order which works. The second choice is to avoid conflict at all costs and in so doing, secure a peace which is temporary, a peace which will not endure, a peace purchased at the price of rewarding war. Let this generation, let this United Nations make the right choice, a difficult choice but one which future generations will respect and not ridicule.

I have been involved since the invasion began, intimately, as the Prime Minister and others have, in trying to find ways in which this can be stopped. The House and the country naturally want to know if there is anything more that the government can do. They deserve our best judgment; a judgment that is confirmed by the pessimism with which Perez de Cuellar came back from Baghdad, a judgment that is shared by world leaders and others who have been involved as intimately as we have in trying to resolve the crisis. That judgment is that we have worked as hard as we can. We have exhausted the realistic options. We have opened door after door which Saddam Hussein has slammed shut. I think that we can, in good conscience now, having done all that we can do to seek a resolution by talk and by diplomacy, be prepared to contemplate giving effect to that other capacity of the United Nations charter, the capacity to use force.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, at ten o'clock this morning I received a telephone letter from the students of Parkdale Public School. This is an elementary school. The ages of the students are from four to 15. This is what they are passing on to this House of Commons through their member of Parliament.

The letter reads: "Dear Mr. Flis: Peace is not a word. It is our future. War is a cowardly excuse for people's unwillingness to discuss positively our mutual problems. It is not the only way out. We hope that there is no war because we do not want any brothers, sisters, fathers or mothers to die. No war please. Give peace a chance." It is signed, "Yours truly, students and staff, Parkdale Public School."

I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in his response, what answer he would give these students. I think he partly answered the students concerns in his speech. He said that the United Nations is no longer a talking place. It is a place to act.

Are not sanctions a powerful action? He stated that our leader and our party are not providing any evidence the sanctions are working. I remind him when the three members of Parliament from all three parties returned from Iraq, they gave all kinds of evidence the factories that produced parts were running. Now after the sanctions, these same factories are standing still. Common sense would tell everyone that something is lacking in world leadership today. Common sense would tell you that if one allows these sanctions more, something that is lacking in world leadership today, time, they will suffocate Iraq. They will run out of parts to repair their tanks. Common sense would tell us to give the sanctions more time to work.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I believe I heard questions and not just commentary. I will try to answer both. I take very seriously, as I know the member does, the concern of children on this issue. It is obviously a matter which profoundly unsettles them more than it does adults. Everyone in this House wants to give peace a chance. The issue is how we can most effectively do this.

We have come to the view, not easily, that the best way to give peace a chance is to try to use the organization that is the only one we have and one which was established precisely for the purpose of trying, first, to direct the negotiations, for the settlement of this war by peaceful means and then to take other actions when those discussions appear not to work. Saddam Hussein would not go to see Baker or Bush, and when Aziz did, he would not even receive the letter from the President of the United States to be transmitted to the President of Iraq.

When the Secretary-General of the United Nations went on that arduous journey to Baghdad, he was turned away, turned away to the point that when he came back through Paris he spoke to other people who genuinely wanted to go if he thought that would be helpful and he said in effect they should not waste their time. The best way to give peace a chance is to use the instrument that we built to establish peace, which is the United Nations.

On the question of sanctions, unquestionably there has been some effect. But we are not aiming our sanctions at ordinary Iraqis who are working in the streets and who have enough troubles. Surely the target of our sanctions is Saddam Hussein and the military machine that he runs. I have seen no evidence—I have looked for it—that there is any appreciable effect upon his military capacity.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party, I believe, or someone from that party was, referring to observations by American officials—she has just been to the United States and has come back informed—referring to the possibility that something might begin to take effect in six months or in nine months, and that there might be some deterioration in some part of their military capacity. What happens during that time? We believe that sanctions are essential but sanctions are not sufficient. What we need is a combination of sanctions and diplomacy or sanctions and other actions when diplomacy has the result that unfortunately it has had, being turned aside so consistently by Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs for a very forceful speech. He was forceful 90 per cent of the time, unfortunately, in my view, to an argument that was frankly spurious. No one in this House disputes the need to deal with Saddam Hussein. No one in this House disputes the need to deal with Saddam Hussein as effectively as possible. The issue that divides us is how.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs in his last comment, in answer to the question just put to him, seemed to suggest, as I heard him, that there was no evidence that sanctions would have an effect on the military might of Iraq. With the greatest respect, that simply is not correct. The evidence before the United States Congress from the CIA, which has already been referred to in debate, suggests the contrary.

Even more recent evidence published this morning in The Globe and Mail, a reprint from the New York Times, which I assume the minister has had drawn to his attention, but if it has not then let me also put it on the record of the House. It is an article by Gary Hufbauer and Kimberly Elliott. It is a recount of a detailed study made of sanctions since the First World War. Of 115 cases studied, it was found that in 34 per cent sanctions were highly successful. It says in respect of Iraq that in all the circumstances sanctions would have an even greater chance of being successful. I quote:

> Since the estimated cost to Iraq—48 per cent of its gross national product—is so far beyond that observed in other cases, the initial results placed the probability of success at nearly 100 per cent. Even when the model is adjusted to account for Saddam Hussein's exceptionally tyrannical control, and the estimated cost is, say, halved to 24 per cent of GNP, the probability of success remains above 85 per cent.

They go on to say:

> Critics argue that sanctions are useless against a ruthless dictator who doesn't care what price his people must pay. Yet sanctions have been employed successfully against dictators of all stripes—

He then notes the regimes of Trujillo, Diem, Idi Amin and Somoza in the seventies.

They conclude:

> The evidence suggests that sanctions will begin to bite sometime in the spring or early summer, with a high probability of forcing Iraq from Kuwait by next fall.

The Manchester Guardian states: "All of the evidence is that sanctions can and are likely to have the effect of moving Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait if we just give time."

The minister says there is no guarantee to that effect. He said that in his speech. There is no guarantee that war will move Saddam Hussein or his ilk permanently out of Kuwait, that it will provide the solution to the region that is necessary in those circumstances.

How can the minister justify Canada supporting war at this time?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is very careful about language.

He would know the difference between evidence and a projection. He referred to evidence, as his leader had, from the CIA, and I referred to her reference to it. I think the timeframe mentioned was six months to nine months. I doubt that it would have been in the minds of the authors to suggest that that effect would have been appreciable. There is no evidence of any appreciable effect in the foreseeable future.

With respect to The Globe and Mail article, yes, I have seen it. It is a projection, and I am not here to dispute the social scientists' projections. In other fields, we have known what to do with projections, and it may well turn out to be correct.

It makes some assumptions about Iraq. One of those assumptions has to do with our capacity to maintain the extraordinary degree to which sanctions have been honoured. Among other things, it is a question of whether that willingness to enforce sanctions and adhere to them on the part of a lot of countries will continue.

There are cases, as the member knows, where that would continue if there appeared to be a weakening in the resolve of the United Nations, if it talked about a deadline tonight and then was looking for ways to avoid the consequences of its actions. I think that is an important question in the context of the basis upon which projections were raised.

To be clear, I am not saying that sanctions have had absolutely no impact. Obviously sanctions have had an impact on large elements of Iraqi life. They just do not get to where they need to get. They do not get to Saddam Hussein or his military.

Yes, it may in time, and that is precisely the question we have to deal with. How much time can we take? What happens in the interim?

An hon. member: What happens if war?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Of course, what happens if war. We have to ask those questions and we try to do that.

What I hope the House and the country will understand is that while we have some understanding, because of what we have grown up with and have seen of the terrible consequences of war, there are also terrible things happening now. A terrible thing happened to Kuwait.

I have seen intelligence estimates by a country whose government the hon. member would respect, suggesting there could be as many as two million new refugees thrown into an already over-burdened refugee system very soon as a result of this.

There are all sorts of grievous things happening now. I hope that as this House and this country consider what we have to do, we will look both at the investment Canada has always had in the effectiveness of the United Nations and the charter that we helped devise which authorizes force, and also look at the costs of waiting.

There are extraordinarily high costs of waiting just as there are, admittedly, extraordinarily high costs of acting.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, during the debate which started this morning, there was a conversation that kept coming back to me that I had with one of the Canadians who had been forcibly detained in Baghdad. He said to me in that conversation that one of the consequences of all this is that Canada will lose its innocence. He went on to explain that it would no longer be possible for Canadians to see themselves in a world where, by wearing a little maple leaf on our lapel, that we would be seen as boy scouts and that we would have open access. All of a sudden, we would have the scales drop from our eyes and we would now see ourselves in a world where there can be ruthless dictators detaining internationals.

I do not need anyone in the House to lecture me or tell me about how bad Saddam Hussein is, because I see it with my own eyes. My argument is not because I have any illusions about the regime in Iraq, or the nature of what they are doing in Kuwait, or in any way the kind of genteel society which he tries to run. It is none of those.

At the same time, the reality, that loss of innocence, has to bring about wisdom and it has to bring about judgment. It has to mean that you do not fall into old traps, that you use your brains and your mind to understand what is going on. You do not simply listen to the bell and respond in a Pavlovian fashion. You have to sit back and take a hard look at what you are facing.

I have here about 700 letters which I have received in the last three or four days from Canadians who are asking this government, and this Parliament to stop and take care, to watch carefully because they do not believe that the right role and direction for Canada at this time is to engage in hostilities against Saddam Hussein. They say very clearly that that does not represent Canadian values. When we talk about this new international order that has been bandied about in the House today they say: "Remember what it means to Canadians."

We are not a great power. We do not equate greatness with military might. We do not say that it is the right of our country to command respect by the force of arms, but more by the nature of our contributions for peaceful resolution. We are not a formal Imperial power. We are not a colonial power. We do not dictate, as the French and British did, the false boundaries of the Middle East.

If one wants to be a historian and go back to the problems of the Middle East, go back to the First World War when the Arab countries were induced to fight on the side of the Allies because they said they would get their independence. Then, they were treated with treachery by the colonial powers and were not given their independence at that time.

We do not reflect those values. In fact, we reflect the opposite. If there is anything contained in every single one of these pages, it is a plea for new thinking and a new approach. We do not see it in the debate that we have had so far from the government. It is falling into the traditional trap of preparing for peace by preparing for war. It does not believe in the philosophy that in this new world order one can prepare for peace actually by preparing for peace.

Members of the government cite Lester Pearson with great frequency. There is one phrase I think they should remember from Lester Pearson in his Nobel Prize speech. He said that nations prepare for war like precocious giants, but for peace like retarded pygmies. I can tell you that that phrase has run through my mind as I listened to the speech of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State this afternoon.

They have been so anxious and so concerned about knocking down, destroying, and eliminating the idea that there is another way to deal with Iraq, that there is another UN way of dealing with it, and that, if the only answer today is force, they have forgotten that they are trying to build up some kind of equation. In fact, Mr. Speaker, they have not been honest enough to say that they prefer force, but that those who have a different way and who also believe in the United Nations and collective security but do not happen to agree that military instruments are the only way of having the UN work or having collective security exercised.

Let us talk about the Pearsonian tradition for just one moment. In 1935, when Lester Pearson was a member of the League of Nations, what did he object to? The fact that they should abandon economic sanctions. Not that they went to war, but that they abandon economic sanctions. He also writes in his memoirs how economic sanctions could have worked, should have worked, and would have been an effective international tool to stop aggression, but the country let them alone.

Are we not in a similar case today? Are we not in a similar case when, in those halcyon days of August 2 and August 6, the world community said: "There is an act of aggression and we are going to stop it." Then we imposed economic sanctions and there was a commitment by a broad consensus of the world community to get behind it. Some 30–odd countries sent forces to the gulf to implement those sanctions. We really did believe that we were now turning the corner and that we were headed in a different direction.

Then, come November— I can recall the week well— first, there was an announcement by President Bush that he was doubling the forces in the gulf, from 200,000 to half a million. No explanation, but here they go. What was the reason? What was the rationale? Did he say then that sanctions had failed? No. He just said: "I am doubling the number of troops."

Then, the Secretary of State walked into the external affairs committee meeting and said: "Boy, sanctions are not good any more. They were great last week, but they are not any good this week. Therefore, we now have to contemplate the use of force."

What happened? What took place? What careful calculation went on in the White House, in the Department of External Affairs, and in White Hall to say sanctions were no longer working? They did not tell anybody, but that was clearly the demarcation line.

I want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, of something that is also very important about the Pearsonian tradition. Because of his experience, and because of the experience of other statesmen of his period through the League of Nations, when they came to be the architects of the UN Charter, they carefully prescribed the steps through the charter that one took if sanctions no longer worked.

Article 41 very clearly states that the United Nations has the right to establish economic sanctions. That is under the charter. It then states very clearly in Article 42 that the Security Council must decide that sanctions are no longer working and then consider other means. That is in the charter of the United Nations. Is that what has been followed by this government? Not a bit.

For all the patting on the back, the pounding on the chest, the raising of the flag, and the whistling of the tune about how we are supporting the UN, why are we abandoning the charter of the United Nations? Why are we abandoning the Pearsonian tradition? Why are we abandoning the lessons of the League of Nations that are clearly written under that charter? It is there for a reason.

Mr. Pearson and others understood very well that there has to be accountability in decision making at the international level. There must be legitimacy of decision making. You do not turn over decisions to some other country to decide for everybody else. Especially as a statesman of a smaller power, he recognized that the best protection for small and medium sized powers, was not to let great powers use international institutions as their camouflage their subterfuge to be able to manipulate and change the rules of those organizations to support their own interests.

That is the Pearsonian tradition, not what the Prime Minister was talking about and not what the Secretary of State for External Affairs was talking about. The real tradition is written in the charter which this government is now preparing to short–circuit and not follow.

When they got up in the House with all this crocodile kind of rhetoric about how they are prepared to defend the UN, they were not prepared to answer the simple question of why had they evaded the charter of the UN.

Why were they not a voice last November and December when there was a resolution coming forward to insist that any power that wants to use force, that thinks it is no longer appropriate, should use the charter as well? Where was the voice of Canada? Where were the inheritors of the Pearsonian tradition when it was saying to the United States and other great powers: "If you want to use the United Nations, use it as set out in the charter. Don't avoid it. Don't evade it. Don't short–circuit it. Give it legitimacy and credibility."

That should have been the role of Canada. That should have been the inherent tradition of our leaders at the time, but, of course, they were too busy answering the call.

I do not buy this idea that we must adhere to it, because beyond Article 42 is Article 43. It states that if one uses force, then one establishes a UN command and starts planning it. Then one makes specific requests of countries. There is a series of very well prescribed procedures by which the United Nations will finally make a decision to use military action against an aggressor, none of which are being followed today and none of which are being adhered to by our country or by other countries in the United Nations.

If we are really sincere in our adherence to the principles of the UN, then the first principle starts with the charter of the United Nations. That is why we object strenuously to giving blank cheques to the government to go ahead and do what it wants to do, when in fact it is clear that it has been guilty of a very serious error and sin of omission.

What I find incredible and disturbing to listen to, and about which I am distraught at the kind of argument, is the way members of the government have talked in such a facile and cavalier fashion about going to war.

The Secretary of State says there are some costs to pay. What kind of costs are we talking about? My God, when we are talking to Canadians about what they are facing in the next 24 hours or the next week, what kind of costs are we really talking about? Military casualties in the thousands. Civilian casualties of untold nature.

The Secretary of State says: "Look at the atrocities going on in Kuwait." I bleed for them. I feel badly for them. But what is worse? To kill them, to bomb them, to destroy the country? Is that a better solution? To totally wipe out their lives, and not just their lives but the lives of countless hundreds of thousands of others? Is that the preferred solution of the government? Is that really defending their civil rights and liberties?

With regard to discovering the reality, in terms of losing our innocence, we should be asking ourselves why it is that we did not hear the brave words we are hearing today a few short months ago when Saddam Hussein was gassing thousands upon thousands of Kurds in his own country. There were atrocities then and I did not hear any call to arms at that point in time. I did not hear any call to arms when Saddam Hussein was fighting against Iran and we thought he was a good guy because he was taking on those crazy fundamentalists such as Ayatollah Khomeini. We said: "Hey, go to it, Saddam. You're doing our job for us in the Middle East."

We were prepared to accept that, not only to accept it but we were selling them weapons and giving them food credits. The West Germans were helping him build his nuclear technology and the French were selling him jets. The Americans were having a wonderful time with him.

It was only two or three days prior to the invasion of Kuwait that Saddam Hussein had an interview with the U.S. Ambassador about the major borders dispute, and she said: "I am under instruction to tell you that that is purely an Arab matter in which we have no interest." Holy cow! Wow!

Where were the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State then? Why were we not standing up and saying: "My goodness, me, look at this affront to international law that is taking place. Look at what is happening. Quick, let's get out there. Let's get the troops mobilized." No, it was total silence. Nothing was said.

I am not saying that that past wrong should be repeated. What I am saying is let us recognize our own guilt and our own culpability as western nations in creating the Saddam Hussein's of the world by selling them arms and by giving them license to continue his kind of political adventurism without any restraint because he happens to be supporting our objectives at that time. That is what was going on.

How can we justify that kind of action now? It is not only human casualty and human suffering that will be felt. Just think of the political catastrophe that will occur. Do you think that by beating Iraq into the ground that all of a sudden there will be the gentle flowing of milk and honey down the Tigris and Euphrates? No, sirree, Mr. Speaker. The Syrians and the Iranians are going to be moving in to fill the political vacuum.

One of the questions we have to ask is, are we prepared to spill Canadian blood to help the Syrians and Iranians exercise further domination in the Middle East? Is that one of the objectives that the government is setting out? Let's hear from them. Is that what we are after? I tell you that political vacuum will be there and it will be filled.

What happens in terms of the Secretary of State for External Affairs saying: "Well, let us really consider how awful sanctions are that we have to wait and there will be instability and economic deprivation"? Do you think you can recreate and reconstruct the entire Middle East of Jordan collapsing within 24 hours by a full invasion of both sides? How much money will it take to rebuild that poor country? How much money will it take to rebuild the oilfields that will be destroyed within hours? How much will it take to repair the ecological damage that will be felt right around the world? When will the bills start being paid for that? How much are we prepared to pay and how much are we prepared to absorb in terms of trying to deal with a serious and sort of controllable problem of terrorism around the world?

How do we as a country, as part of a western community, say to the massive numbers of Arabs around the world that somehow this was an act of charity to go in and bomb the hell out of their countries? Are we prepared to suggest to them that somehow this war will be a solution to those problems? I would put this thesis on the floor of the House. Totally contrary to the arguments of the government that this is a way to defend the UN, I say this is a way that will bring down and erode the UN. How do you convince millions upon millions of people in the Third World that this is not simply another exercise of great power domination covered over and camouflaged to protect oil interests, to protect geopolitical interests, to protect national interests in the gulf?

The United Nations is not the private preserve of western countries. The United Nations belongs to every single group of people in the world and it must enjoy the respect of people in the south. No wonder the real dangers that we face in the years ahead is the growing division between north and south, the growing economic gap, the growing gap of poverty, and the growing gap of power. Do you think that by turning the United Nations over as a way of attacking on this issue, using force against people of this kind, that we will convince people of the southern part of the globe that we are sort of beknighted and benign? Of course not.

Let us take a clear look at the cost of war. Let us be honest and forthright and calculate what it means in human terms, in economic and ecological terms and basic political terms. I want to contrast that against the role of sanctions.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are giving me notice of time. I think we were courteous enough to give the Secretary of State for External Affairs some extended time, so I presume I might ask for the same privilege of members opposite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre shall continue?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of hon. members of the House and we will reciprocate on any occasion possible.

I want to talk about sanctions for a moment because this is where the crux of the debate comes in. This is not a debate, a nuance that has been presented of those who want UN action against those who are prepared to be pacifists and sit on the sidelines.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, I thought in quite a malevolent way, started saying "hey, folks, this is a choice between action or talk." No, no, that is not the choice. The choice is between what kind of action? What are the most effective action? What is the most effective instruments we can produce? That is the real issue. That is what it is all about.

Then he goes on to say: "Show me". Well, I want to turn it around. It is clear to me that the onus of proof for those who want to undertake military action about whether or not sanctions are working belongs to them. They must prove that sanctions are not working in order to justify the use of force. They must demonstrate that it is not working.

When sanctions were introduced by the UN Security Council, a special committee was established of which Canada was a vice-chair. Its job was to monitor and assess the effectiveness of sanctions. That committee has yet to report. It has not given an assessment yet, and I must say for all I respect the Secretary of State for External Affairs in terms of his experience, if not his logic, I am not prepared to take his word for it.

I do not think that Canada should be going to war on the opinion of the Secretary of State about whether or not sanctions are working. I want to see a very clear-cut assessment made under the Charter, because the steps are all set out as to whether the sanctions are properly being applied, used and effective enough.

I will offer my own personal opinion, and I would suggest that it may be just as good as the opinion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs because I was in Iraq. He was not. I put that on the table. I was there. I do not pretend I saw everything or went everywhere, but we were there for 12 days and we had a lot of time between meetings, and that was the question we kept asking.

Even the Secretary of State for External Affairs concedes our point that there is a substantial erosion in foodstuffs, in the economy, and in the industrial capacity of the country. Inflation is hundreds upon hundreds per cent. A can of beer costs $32. It is the best place to dry out in the world.

Unemployment is now 40 or 50 per cent. Why? All the factories are shutting down. They are cannibalizing cars and trucks to get spare parts. They cannot refine their petroleum. They no longer have additives, because everything is imported.

While the Secretary of State for External Affairs dismisses the Brookings study—he says: "Ah, it does not mean anything"—it points out very clearly the linkage between economics and military. I think I am being fair paraphrasing it. The argument is: Saddam Hussein is a ruthless dictator. He will let his poor people starve, and he is immune and isolated from any impact.

He is not immune from supplying gasoline to his army. He is not immune from aeroplanes that no longer have spare parts. He is not immune from the kind of basic wherewithal that makes an economy work.

Why, in the Second World War, did we have B–17s and Lancaster bombers leaving Great Britain every night to bomb the hell out of Dresden and Cologne, every major industrial city in Germany? Because we wanted to destroy its industrial capacity so it could no longer fight a war. That was the stated objective of the strategic bombing program for which countless Canadians, including one of my uncles, gave their lives in a worthy cause.

All of a sudden, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the military genius that he is, says: "That no longer counts for anything. There is no connection between the economy and the military. There is no linkage any more."

I think he is dead wrong. He is simply using that as sort of a canard, a false argument, because he realizes and recognizes that his only way of justifying military action which the government became committed to last November is that they can assert that sanctions are not working.

I am prepared to debate with the Secretary of State for External Affairs any place, any time and anywhere in this country about that. I will tell him something else. Let's not worry about it. Let us do it properly. Let's go through the United Nations, the way it is supposed to go. What is the use?

This is a government that says it wants to defend the UN. Okay. Let's work through the UN. That is what it is there for, but it has not been followed up to now.

To take it one step further, I challenge the government today—good citizens that we are internationally—to call a meeting of all the coalition partners, which are presently exercising a monitoring function in the gulf on the sanctions program. Let's bring them together and say: "Is it working or not, folks?"

Let's get their assessment. Let's get it out in public, and let's ask them: "How can we tighten it up? How can we improve it? How can we ratchet the pressure on? How can we squeeze them harder?"

Let's have a kind of international mission. The Secretary of State for External Affairs says he wants ideas. Okay. Let's take some initiative. Let's see how sanctions can really be put to work. He says: "We do not have time. We are in a rush. We are in a big hurry." He says: "It is too costly. We have to keep those people out in the gulf. It is going to hit our budgets."

From 1948 on, the western countries maintained close to 1 million troops in western Europe on the threat of a Soviet invasion. It cost Canada $1 billion a year. For 45 years we kept them there. We never used them, thank God, because we knew if we used them it could bring about nuclear exchanges and all their dangers.

We kept them there. We were patient. We realized it was a sacrifice and a burden, but we did not even have sanctions on the Soviet Union. We were selling them wheat at the same time.

What would happen if the United States reduced its troops substantially, had a defensive posture in Saudi Arabia, maintained the sanctions, put more squeeze on and said: "Okay, Saddam Hussein, hands up baby because we are going to get you. You are going to have to capitulate. You are going to have to give in because you cannot sell any oil. You have no more foreign reserves. It is just not only a matter of starving your people, but you cannot get your heart operations. You cannot drive your trucks. You cannot do anything any more." Mr. Speaker, I tell you that Saddam Hussein would be at the table soon enough. But he will not be there under 678 because we say that is an ultimatum. I guess if you know anything about Arab politics, and I do not pretend to be an expert, you do not force their backs to the wall, you do not say, "lose face", you do not say, "give in right away" and "Here is the time, and if you do not do it now we are going to hold a gun to your head". That is not the way to bring about a peaceful solution.

Just let the squeeze take place, just keep rationing going. That is the argument I would make and that is the kind of argument Canada should have been making during that period of time.

I could cite a variety of supports. There is one, though, which I would like to bring to the attention of the House. It was sent to me by a group of researchers at the Centre for International Strategic Studies at York University, and talks about the choices, sanctions versus others. Let me just comment on this because these are experts with no axe to grind.

They said an economic blockade and boycott have unique advantages over a military attack because, first, acquiring nuclear weapons are of little use against an economic blockade. Second, the target nation cannot reply in kind in any effective way. If you are Iraq, how the hell do you put an economic embargo on the United States? It is impossible to retaliate. Third, blockades and boycotts work slowly. This is an advantage as events are less likely to run out of control. Fourth, they allow negotiations to proceed even while economic pressure is being applied; military action interrupts negotiations. Boy, that is an understatement.

They go on to say that, fifth, they are highly reversible and one can ratchet the strictness up or down in response to diplomatic progress. That is an important point and let us not forget that. The good thing about sanctions is you can reward response and you can punish lack of action. We have not used sanctions that way. We have not turned the screws to tighten them and released them. For example, I make this case: there was a lost opportunity by this country and others when Saddam Hussein released the hostages. There was an opportunity there for us to respond, just a little bit. Maybe we could have said food and medical supplies could go through more freely. There were real shortages and a real squeeze in that country so we could have said: "All right, you are releasing the hostages, that answers one part of the UN resolution," a very important part.

That was the time to relent perhaps a little, ease the pressure. That might have got some kind of response but, no sir, that very day the President of the United States said: "Hey, the hostages are gone, good; now we can go in an bomb the hell out of Baghdad". That was the response not "Let's use sanctions as a way of giving it a little bit of a lurch, a twist a spin". No, no, he said: "Now we can bomb". So, Saddam Hussein said: "Hey, I just released the hostages. You have been asking me. You have had all these crazy parliamentarians coming here for months. We finally listened to them and let the hostages out." Why did we not show some response? Why did we not show some initiative?

The fact of the matter is, as I have just gone through this kind of analysis, that sanctions do have a lot of advantages. Perhaps the biggest advantage is that you do not kill a lot of people with sanctions. You do not destroy countries with sanctions. You do not destroy an entire region with sanctions. I do not care what the Secretary of State for External Affairs says, by any reasonable, logical, common-sense calculation, putting the balance sheet down in black and white, adding up what is the preferred method of getting Saddam Hussein to withdraw, I would say sanctions and diplomacy versus military action will win every single time.

To give up so early and so quickly and to abandon sanctions right now means that the international community can never use sanctions in the future because Iraq was such an ideal opportunity, according to the Brookings study, which showed that perhaps there is no country more vulnerable to sanctions than Iraq. In a sense, if you wanted a model to test, here it was and we have given up on it within four or five months. When are we going to be able to use it again? Does this mean that from now on, every single time there is an act of aggression, the international community is going to war? The entire world is going to be a garrison state. We will not just have conscription from 18 years old to 40 years old. Mr. Speaker, you and I will have to join up, simply to meet that kind of requirement.

An hon. member: We don't believe that.

An hon. member: Not to worry.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): My colleagues are suggesting that, for the sake of the Canadian Armed Forces, I should not join. I agree with that. That is the real calculation. That is what Canadians out there are asking about.

I just want to raise one final point about the condition that we face if there are hostilities in the next short while. I pray to God there are not. I pray to God that whatever is taking place this afternoon works. But if there are hostilities, when the judgment comes, what is the role of Canada? Should we march into the barricades waving the flag, not the UN flag but whatever flag it happens to be? We do not know which flag it is going to be. It could be the Saudi flag, the American flag, some flag, but not the UN flag.

I make this case to members opposite. The contribution we can make in a military sense is minuscule. We have got good airplanes. We have wonderful armed services personnel, but in the over-all weight of military action our contribution is small. It is small at least when we weigh it against the contribution we can make in the political, diplomatic sense. Wars have to come to an end. Cease-fires have to be negotiated, truces have to be honoured, peacekeeping has to take place, bridges have to be built, reconstruction has to occur, and that is the peculiar Canadian talent. That is the kind of capacity and ability we have nurtured and built up over the years. That is what Canadians want to support. For us to become a combatant, for us to be on the front lines, will destroy and eliminate the ability of Canada to play that kind of role.

The Prime Minister said this morning: "I don't see why we couldn't peacekeep". Do you think, Mr. Speaker, in the Suez crisis that the Egyptians would have accepted the French or the British as a peacekeeper in those circumstances? What kind of convoluted logic is the Prime Minister using? What kind of cuckoo-land does he draw his ideas from? You do not become a peacekeeper when you have been shooting at the other side. You have to be there as a neutral or at least as a non-combatant at the back side.

Certainly we heard this morning about the threat that might occur to Israel if there is a war. First, let us understand one thing about Saddam Hussein. He said: "I am only going to attack Israel if I am attacked". There is one way to make sure Israel is not attacked by Iraqi missiles, and that is not to have hostilities against Iraq. That is the way to prevent it from happening. But, if it does happen, then surely to God we realize that the conflagration is going to spread like wild fire and someone is going to come in and say: "There has got to be a cease-fire", someone is going interpose themselves and say: "We can't have a war."

Mr. Speaker, I make the case to you. Goodness gracious, this is what this country has been able to do over the years. At this crucial time in history, let us not abandon that approach. When they talk about the Pearsonian tradition, that is the Pearsonian tradition; not a great power, not a military band wagon, not something gargantuan that is going to throw its weight around, but a country that understands that bridges have to be built both in war and peace. That is what we want Canada to do.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs ended his speech with the question of what should we do. I suggest that he listen to Canadians. I suggest that he start reading his letters. I suggest that he start listening to his phone calls. I think he should start understanding that there are Canadians out there who are not afraid, who are patriotic, and who believe in the world order but who do not believe in going to war because it is not the Canadian way. It is not the Pearsonian way. It is not the kind of traditions that we have built up.

Thousands upon thousands of Canadians are writing every one of us. I ask Tory members to read their mail, listen to those calls and see what Canadians are saying. They are saying: "Do not go to war".

In the Gospel of Saint Matthew it says: "Blessed are the peacemakers for they will be the children of God". I say to you, Mr. Speaker, blessed are today's peacemakers because they will preserve and maintain the sanctity of life of the children of God all around this world. That is the way that we should behave as a country to protect the children of this world. The way that we can do it is to stay true to our traditions, our values, and our beliefs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House leader.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the three parties and as many of the Independents as I was able to contact. I believe Your Honour will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment until 12:00 midnight, in order to continue debate on Government Business No. 27 respecting the Persian Gulf crisis;
> That the proceedings on Private Members' Business be suspended and this day's scheduled item retain its place on the Order of Precedence on the Order Paper;
> That no dilatory motions or motion to adjourn the House or quorum calls be received by the Chair; and
> That at 12:00 midnight, the House shall adjourn until 2:00 p.m., Wednesday, January 16, 1991 and when the Orders of the Day are called, the House shall resume debate on Government Business No. 27.

• (1650)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to receive that motion?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, with one brief caveat. I think at three o'clock tomorrow there will be Routine Proceedings called first and, upon government business being called, the debate will be resumed. Otherwise, we are in full agreement with the motion.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, there is full agreement on behalf of the New Democratic Party too.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, this is not a caveat. I understand the parliamentary secretary's motion. I am in agreement because I guess the intent is to continue the debate until all members have had a chance to speak and we will see tomorrow at six o'clock what we do then.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm first of all that yes, we would follow the normal Routine Proceedings tomorrow afternoon at three o'clock. It is certainly our intention at this point to have this debate continue to give every member an opportunity to participate in it. It is an important debate, and that is precisely why we asked that the House be called back so that members could participate in it.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I gather there is unanimous consent to put the motion. The House has heard the terms of the motion presented by the parliamentary secretary. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is so ordered.

We will now proceed to the question and comment ten-minute period.

The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member.

[English]

I think the hon. member has given a very powerful speech and made a number of points. However, the points with respect to sanctions I find to be very strongly advanced. I find there is a great deal of validity in what the hon. member says about the importance and the role of sanctions in a situation like this one. I will return to this subject at greater length when I am speaking in this debate myself and pursue further the points he has made.

There is one area that I would ask him to clarify at this time, and that is with respect to his statements regarding the resolutions that have been passed by the Security Council of the United Nations and his apparent suggestion that these resolutions were somehow in violation of the UN charter itself.

Clearly these resolutions were not passed in any vacuum. They were passed after they had been drafted by members of the Security Council and examined certainly by the Secretary-General of the UN and his staff, his legal advisors whose responsibility it is to see that resolutions are not only in accordance with the wording of the charter, but in fact further the intent and purpose of the charter.

It is on this specific point that I hope that he would bring the same forthright expression of his views to bear as he has on the question of sanctions. I find it a difficult position for the Parliament of Canada to be debating the resolution we are when an argument is being advanced by a front-line spokesman for the Liberal Party and someone with a lot of knowledge about this subject, contending that these resolutions, which form the basis of the collective approach that all the nations are taking against the Iraqi occupation and annexation of Kuwait, are somehow inconsistent with the charter. I have a lot of trouble with that point. I ask him if he can clarify it.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for his comments. I will attempt to clarify the point I was making.

In my speech I did not say all resolutions. I said that the resolutions beginning with 660 up to those which require the different participating countries to monitor and enforce the sanctions for military purposes were in accordance with the charter, using article 41 under chapter VII. It is with resolution 678 that I have trouble, because under the charter article 41 clearly states that the Security Council is empowered to advance an economic embargo and that member states are required to adhere to it.

Article 42 states that the Security Council must then consider whether the sanction or embargo is working and, if in its judgment it is not working, it triggers articles 43, 44, 45, and 46, which is to engage in the development of a military action. This means the setting up of a UN military high command which then requests from individual countries contributions of both air and ground troops. It then puts that package together and says that it is now prepared to use military action.

That would have been both the preferred method and the method that we should have advocated as Canadians. First, it sets out a clear protection that accountability and decision making in determining whether or not sanctions are working are for the UN to make. Second, the decision on military force is again that of the UN Security Council, and the military high command is subject to it. That in fact was what took place in the Korean war.

What we are saying is that 678 is a hybrid resolution. I am not saying it violates. I am saying it is hybrid. It is outside that very clear-cut set of procedures under chapter VII in articles 41, 42, et cetera. That is what gives me great concern, in that we are sort of buying resolution 678 as being the answer when I think it creates serious problems for us as Canadians. First, there is no mechanism for deducing or judging whether or not sanctions are working and the UN has not in any way dealt with that issue. It has not given any kind of assessment, publicly at least, on that issue as it is required to do under articles 41 and 42.

Second, resolution 678 leaves it up to individual initiatives to use military force. That creates, as my colleague said today in Question Period, substantial confusion as to who is in command, who is in control, and who makes decisions. For many countries that are quite nervous about this fact it is turning over a kind of UN mandate to a couple of large countries to determine how to use it.

That is why I find 678 to be a maverick resolution and one that I think we should have objected to. I still think that we should have time to go back and say: "Now that the January 15 date has been met, let's bring the charter into play. Let's use 42, 43 and 44." That does not in any way back off from the clear message to Saddam Hussein that if sanctions do not work and he does not clear out ultimately there may be military action, but it will be done clearly under the UN charter and not outside it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, one of the most remarkable aspects of the gulf crisis is the unanimity of the international community on the need for ending the occupation of Kuwait by Saddam Hussein. There is no better example of the post-cold-war situation than the debates in the UN Security Council, where delegates from Canada, the United States and the Soviet Union voted together to support the most strongly worded resolutions to come out of the Security Council since the Korean War.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, this is how the drafters of the United Nations charter wanted the organization to function. Now that the paralyzing effects of the cold war have subsided, a new world order where collective security would play a major role is becoming a distinct possibility.

The invasion of Kuwait has reminded us that despite considerable improvements in East–West relations, wars and armed conflict are still a fact of life in many parts of the world. More than any other area on this planet, the Middle East has tended to be a focus for this type of conflict. The history of the area is rife with dispute and controversy. Unfortunately, mediation in this part of the world has proved extremely difficult.

Iraq's invasion of Kuwait is as easy to understand as it is unacceptable. What we have here is clearly a form of expansionism, a desire to gain supremacy over the entire area. A unanimous response on the part of the international community is the right way to deal with this kind of situation. The importance of the Middle East, where events have global repercussions, makes it necessary for us to be part of this joint response and thus for Canada to do its share.

I think most of us have a good idea of the major role events in the Middle East have played in the history of the world. For a long time, it was a meeting place of different cultures. The cradle of civilization was located between the Nile and the Euphrates. It was also the birthplace of three of the world's great religions. Our trading system is rooted in that area, not only because the great trading nations were born there but because it area is on the crossroads of trade routes linking Europe, Asia and Africa. As maritime trade developed, the waters in the area, first the Mediterranean and more recently the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf, proved essential for the future development of international trade.

The area has a wealth of national resources. Water was a decisive factor, as it is in major river systems throughout the world. The Nile, the Tigris and the Euphrates fertilized the land. Today, however, another resource has become particularly important: oil. More than 50 per cent of the world's oil reserves are located here. As we have learned through experience, any interruption in the delivery of oil from the Middle East would have an immediate and lasting impact on the world's economy.

Unfortunately, some of these aspects have made the region an area of endemic conflict. Its location, while giving birth to a whole civilization and trade, also attracted invasions and war, fire and bloodshed. Religious fanaticism lead to acts of violence and wars. In short, the area's tremendous wealth has been the object of everyone's desire. From now on, not only the reserves of oil might be at stake but also water which could become an increasingly rare commodity and therefore give rise to major conflicts in the area.

Nowadays, political and technological developments have made more complex the enduring features of that troubled region. The decolonization process was carried out more painfully than elsewhere, resulting in such problems as the fierce conflict between Israel and the neighbouring Arab countries.

Because of the superpowers' rivalry, the risk of regional conflicts turning into world wars is ever present. More recently, as a reaction against the West's culture and economic hegemony, Islam's fundamentalism introduced a new and volatile element in the policies of this region and even beyond.

Technological advancements, especially in the military field, have dramatically increased the risks of regional conflicts and greatly reduced the time the governments have to respond to critical situations. Political conflicts have now serious implications for the Southern flank of NATO—beginning with Turkey—as well as Africa, South West Asia and certain parts of the Soviet Union.

At a time when as a result of disarmament efforts the demilitarization of Europe is under way the Middle East is in the process of becoming the most heavily militarized region of the world. The outlook for the future is not at all encouraging because of the constant proliferation of mass destruction weapons and their delivery systems.

The current crisis in the Persian Gulf seems to have developed overnight, but appearances are deceiving the causes of the situation are to be found in the past. Since 1948, most of us have been inclined to focus our attention on the conflict between Israel and the Arab countries. It is essential, however, to remember that struggles between Arab countries also had a great impact on the modern history of the Middle East and the Persian Gulf.

The combination of Arab nationalism and Islamic renewal represents a somewhat new phenomenon. However the issue of Arabic identity in the modern world has been a much controversal issue for quite a while in all Arab countries. It is the main reason behind most divisions between these states. The desire for Arab unity and leadership, especially with regard to Israel, weighs heavily on the political culture of that region. Nevertheless these aspirations are but an ideal constantly eroded by a great many ideological and political undercurrents.

In the 1950s and 1960s, Arab policies were marked by intense rivalries, short of outright wars, between traditional Arab monarchies and the supporters of the more radical vision of Gamel Nasser, the then President of Egypt.

The tormented history of Iraq and the current state of things should be put in perspective. At first glance, the official philosophy of Hussein's regime contains very strong Pan–Arabic elements which could provide Iraq with a leadership role in the Arab world, which at least some could expect. However, the Iraqi regime's support of these ideals characterized by extreme radicalism and violence which have isolated Iraq from the other Arab countries. Nevertheless, Saddam Hussein is still trying to establish his supremacy over the region, of which the invasion of Kuwait was but a first stage.

The Iraqi President has tried to justify his aggression in different ways. He has presented it as an act of liberation of the Kuwaiti from a monarchy, as a territorial conflict, as a holy war against the West and its Arab allies, and, finally, as a means to ensure a more equitable distribution of wealth in the region as a whole. Close scrutiny of the reasons put forth reveals how false they are and shows that the actions of Saddam Hussein are nothing more than attempts on his part to impose a dictatorship in that region of the world.

The argument that Iraq was seeking to lend fraternal assistance to revolutionaries anxious to overthrow the monarchy in Kuwait proved to be pure fiction. Six days after the invasion the Iraqis demonstrated the inanity of this argument when they proclaimed their eternal and total fusion with Kuwait. This second claim stemmed from a territorial conflict between both countries which they thought had been settled in the early 1960s.

Now and again, however, Iraq continued to lay claim to two small islands in the north of the Persian Gulf. Under Iraqi control, these islands would provide Baghdad with readier access to the sea. The negotiations on these two islands do show the bad faith of the Iraqi régime. They went on until as recently as July 31 when Iraq suddenly put an end to them by stating that Kuwait was not seriously considering relinquishing the territories in dispute. Irak's "response" was to invade Kuwait.

Faced with the determination of the world community against the invasion of Kuwait, the régime of Saddam Hussein tried to pass the conflict off as a holy war between Iraq and its opponents on one hand and the West and their allies on the other hand. The list of countries party to the multinational effort, including nine Arab countries and a few other Muslim states such as Bangladesh, shows that the argument is sheer sophistry.

The second Iraqi attempt to restore a dignity of sorts to this action was to say that the monarchs of the gulf kept for themselves the oil revenues which in fact belonged to all Arabs. This argument would carry more weight if it did not come from a country which was not a major oil producer and which had not received financial assistance from the gulf monarchs during the eight years of war with Iran.

None of the Iraqi arguments can stand close scrutiny. The annexion by Iraq is nothing more than an act of aggression to dominate a region, an act which nothing can justify. If the occupation of Kuwait continue, it might have further consequences.

One of these can already be felt—higher oil prices. This increase would affect not only the economies of our trade partners in the most industrialized countries. A sharp increase in oil prices would be an additional hardship for the eastern European countries which are experiencing enough difficulties as it is in their transition to a market economy. The load would become almost unbearable for the developing nations.

This scenario has major ramifications as regards the security policy. The economic crisis resulting from a sharp increase in oil prices could seriously destabilize the political scene. This instability could jeopardize fragile new democracies in eastern Europe or cause disturbances in developing countries, in addition to the problems these nations are already faced with. Violent conflicts could then occur.

Another potential source of political instability is refugees and uprooted foreign workers, whose desperate situation is increasingly apparent. It is well known that this is a major problem in a country like Jordan. In fact, the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced a few months ago that Canada will provide assistance to the countries faced with this serious problem.

The response of the international community to the invasion of Kuwait is very encouraging. It carries the promise of better prospects for collective security as an integral part of the new global order. The potential for such cooperation on security issues is really the kind of peace dividend we were hoping to achieve with the end of the cold war.

Saddam Hussein attempted to darken these wonderful prospects by brutally invading Kuwait. The international community is determined to prevent him from succeeding. The situation in the Middle East is the fisrt test for the new global order which is emerging.

Peace logic, war logic: The hour of truth has come. Like their glorious predecessors, the Canadian servicemen and women are prepared to do their duty with courage and honour, alongside the troups from 30 or so countries advocating the rule of law, civilized standards, and a new international peace order. Canada is with them in heart and in spirit. We want them to know that we are proud of them and that we depend on them. This is the message we have for them in this grave moment for our country and for the rest of the world.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglington—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I have a few questions for the hon. member. I would like to get back to his reference to the sequence of events in the Middle East. I will proceed in English.

[English]

Both in reference to what he said and to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated is that Canada had exercised great influence on the world community starting on August 2. I think that the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that it was thanks to our Prime Minister that the Americans decided against the surgical strike in the Middle East. That augurs well for Canada because it suggested that we have enormous influence.

It also suggests that Canada, if it is going to act with any kind of balance and authority, has as well a credible plan in place in order to ensure that the kinds of actions that it is asking this Parliament to embark on are going to bear fruit for the international community and bring credit to Canada on behalf of long-term peace and stability, not only in the Middle East but elsewhere. These are factors that both the minister and the hon. member who just spoke have acknowledged.

The Canadian government is obliged to inform the House what the necessary steps are to ensure that we win peace, whether it comes about as a result of the government's initiative after midnight, or whether it comes about as we would propose, that is, by sanctions.

We have a right to know, and the Canadian public has a right to know. If it is going to consider seriously the motion that the government is putting before the Canadian public, what will be Canada's role in the process, both in terms of lives and in terms of resources.

For example, after midnight, will the Canadian government honestly tell the House whether it intends to use its forces in their current state and whether in fact they will continue blockading? Will it shift the commitment to provide defensive cover for front-line forces or will aircraft be used in an offensive and aggressive mode in the Middle East?

What will be done to ensure that Iraq will no longer be able, after our intervention, to take control of Kuwait again, to threaten the oilfields, or to threaten the Middle East and bring it to the brink again.

If a military intervention is what the government says is absolutely indispensable to the resolution of problems and to ensuring long-term peace after the destruction of Iraq, both in terms of its leadership, its economic capability, and its military, will the government tell us what intentions it has to maintain order, to feed the people that will be deprived of resources, and to prevent a power vacuum? How will it deal with the estimated 1.5 million refugees that will emerge from the conflict? The Canadian public needs to know the answers to these questions.

It also needs to have assurances that the government will not allow peace to emerge at the expense of interests of other nations in the area. I refer specifically to Israel. It should not be asked to sacrifice its national interest and security in order to arrive at an arrangement that will satisfy some members of the alliance.

It is only right that Canadians understand that the Canadian government has an over-all objective, after the conflict, after tomorrow, before we consider the motion that the government has presented to us. Will we get an answer to that from the hon. member?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I get the impression the hon. member is not really interested in the answer, since he used all his time to ask his question. I will try to be as brief as possible.

The plans to which he referred are in fact the approach we have taken from the outset. The hon. member seems to think we have a whole set of tactics and secret plans that will come into play at the stroke of midnight or five to, which it will be very soon.

Our plan in this country has been consistent. What I can't stand is the kind of hypocrisy I am seeing here. We discussed this in September and October, in the House. A number of resolutions were adopted. Your party and the New Democratic Party opposite said that they were prepared to support this kind of resolution, provided this is done under the auspices of the United Nations. This resolution is under the auspices of the United Nations, and still they don't agree.

Canada, unlike other countries which are not so far away, has always had a profound respect and has always worked very hard for the UN. We are one of the pillars of this organization. In fact, I think we are the fourth largest country in terms of contributions. We play a major role at the UN because we believe in the UN.

There are other countries that are more skeptical. There are other countries that would rather go it alone, and their game may have been upset by the action taken by Canada and certain other powers that got on board with people who got itchy feet at the very start of the conflict, in order to prevent a conflict from breaking out in August. It is now January 15, a fateful date, and we have progressed considerably since what happened in August, and we are getting there.

I still think that if we manage to get together and take up a strong position—not an armed position, but a strong position—we can make this dictator listen to reason.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of statements from President Bush, Secretary of State Baker, and the CIA Director Webster made in the early fall indicating the gravity of the impact of sanctions on Iraq. They talked about oil exports having been halted and virtually nothing getting in or out of the country.

I have more recently similar statements from Senate Majority Leader Mitchell and Senator Edward Kennedy. Debates were held last week in Congress.

Will the member opposite admit that sanctions could achieve the retreat of Iraq from Kuwait?

[Translation]

From what he knows and has heard, does he think it would have been possible to get Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait with sanctions alone?

Mr. Speaker, that would have been ideal, but I don't think it will get that far.

Currently, President Saddam Hussein has become an expert at letting the civilian population bear the brunt of the sanctions. The army is not affected by rationing and continues to get its arms and military equipment, while the civilian population suffers. This could go on for ages. I do not think sanctions alone would be enough to bring a government to its knees. However, sanctions were useful in sending a clear message to this president who was not open to any other kind of message.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I stand in the House today with a deep sense of humility and great pride. The humility is in the wake of those great Canadian orators and architects of our history who have stood here and shaped the course of Canadian history by the very debates and the decisions that they have made on issues such as this, on occasions when the debates have taken on the same amount of emotion, the same amount of dignity, and indeed the same amount of passion.

I stand here with pride which is in the reflection that this forum of legislative debate represents human liberty as we know it in Canada in its purest form yet devised. Here in the House of Commons, in Parliament, is centred the hopes and aspirations and the faith of the entire Canadian people. I know they are watching tonight, and I know they are trying to place semblance of order and sense in what is being debated.

I want to add also that I do not preach as an advocate for any partisan cause, because I believe the issues are fundamental and reach beyond the realm of partisan consideration on this side and on the other side of the House.

They must be resolved on the highest plain of national interest—and I stress "national interest"—if our course is to prove sound and our future is to be protected.

I trust that you, Mr. Speaker, and those watching and listening to this debate will do me the justice of receiving what I have to say as solely expressing the considered viewpoint of a concerned Canadian. Therefore, I address the House with one purpose in mind: to serve the best interest of our country.

For any civilized society to commence full scale war—that is what we are talking about here—surely requires that every viable alternative be exhausted first. Given the horror of destruction, disorder, and death that war necessarily entails by its definition, it must be the final resort.

I am not suggesting that the use of force should be ruled out. In fact, in the final analysis there are compelling circumstances that may demand a final, bloody solution to this crisis. But have those circumstances presented themselves yet? That is what this debate is all about. The issue is judgmental.

Although I was impressed by the speeches of the Prime Minister, my leader, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre on this issue, I have heard very little evidence that would convince me that the course of action that we take and decide today is clear and based on firm evidence that could be refuted in this, the highest court in the land.

The issue is what is in Canada's best national interest. There were a number of things in this debate that were in our interest. To begin with—I am not going to recite the history—it was in Canada's interest that the United Nations condemned the Iraqi assault on Kuwait. We in the House supported it.

It was in Canada's national interest to have multinational forces in the Persian Gulf. That received our support. It was in Canada's national interest to have economic sanctions against Iraq in a hope of convincing them to get out of Kuwait. We supported that.

It was in Canada's national interest to have the Canadian forces involved in the Persian Gulf to enforce these UN resolutions and that also received support from the House.

Now that Hussein, the master of brinksmanship, in the light of all this action does not blink, we want to resort to force. Is that in Canada's national interest?

No matter how I look at this issue and no matter how my emotions take me, whether it be to use force or to continue sanctions, because that seems to be the Y that we are at right now, I always have to bring myself back to the same question: What is in Canada's national interest?

To my mind, the debate on economic sanctions has not been satisfactorily resolved. I have evidence, suggestions, and ideas like others on what the embargoes can do. My latest information—you can draw your own judgment—is that the Bstockpiles in Iraq as of the end of September would last anywhere from four months to ten months.

Iraq had a bumper wheat crop this year and it is generally supportive in fruit and vegetables. The evidence that I have is that its economy is being crippled. How long can it supply a favoured element of the society, which in this case is obviously the military and its forces, at the expense of others? I do not believe it can continue to have 97 per cent of its exports cut off. I believe Iraq has a single commodity export largely. Its oil is not getting out, and 95 per cent of its imports are cut off. How can anybody say that it will not have an effect? That is a contradiction of terms.

The point is that it is judgmental. We are now using an argument that for the reasons that economic sanctions will not work in the judgment of the government, it has agreed essentially that Canada should join those other countries that believe they should resort to force.

I am not against the use of force. I have been trained for a life time in the use of force. It has been kind of a corkscrew feeling, if you like, where you train yourself to be the best at doing something you hope you never have to do, and that is true. I mean that. I would suggest that for those who are trained in the use of force and who understand the use of force, the more you understand it, the less you are disposed to use it. We are looking at here the unleashing of forces that will cause the world never to be the same. There may be a time when we have to do it but it has to be the last resort. Is this the last resort? I do not believe it is.

If we have to make a choice, let us weigh the positives and the negatives of each course of action. That is the way I have approached this. What if we go to war? This is not meant as a shock tactic. We have heard about a number of things. We have heard of the missile inventory that the Iraqis have, that they will be able to attack Turkey, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Qatar, where incidentally Canadian forces are stationed. Saddam Hussein has said that he will attack Israel, and Tel Aviv particularly. I do not have to call upon the imagination of the House to envisage what that will drum up.

It is well known that Hussein has in his inventory a frightful array of weapons, a lot of which have been used in previous wars. But it has been some time since the allied forces have witnessed the use of chemical weapons. It is my belief that chemical weapons more than likely will be used in this upcoming campaign.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, just on the chemical weapon side alone about the kind of thing that Iraq has and will use. It has mustard gas which causes burning eyes, blistering of skin, coughing, and bleeding of the nose. Death occurs within about one hour to 30 years, depending on the exposure. I am told by the medical people that death in one hour is preferable to a death in 30 years.

They have a blistering agent. The symptoms are very persistent, producing incapacitating blisters. This was developed from the mustard gas. Death occurs almost instantly if the vapours are inhaled.

Nerve gases produce these symptoms: malfunctioning of the nervous system, twitching, incapacitation. Death occurs rapidly, depending on the exposure. Nerve agents can be countered with antidotes and we have heard some discussion of some recent antidotes. This is one indication of what can happen once we make the decision to go for force.

The Prime Minister in his presentation said something that bothered me and perhaps subsequent speakers can speak to this. He raised the question of how time to allow the sanctions to work would have a cost. I agree with him. Nothing in this world is free. Every course of action we take will have a cost. They have to be measured. The alternative cost of war has to be measured against the cost of war.

The Prime Minister talked about the economic costs. He talked about other costs but the one cost that he talked about that concerned me was the cost of bringing Iraq closer to the possibility of having a nuclear device.

I am concerned about that. There is certainly evidence that Iraq has tried to convert the core of what it has now into an explosive device. In fact it purchased uranium from France in 1975. While it came up with some agreements, there is some question as to whether or not these agreements have been followed.

My best estimate from the judgment of those who know, and those whom I can contact is that at this point in time there is not an imminent threat from Iraq. Nor do they necessarily believe that it will happen in the immediate future. While they do not dismiss the wisdom of a continuing embargo, they do believe that whether or not it is in the timeframe is questionable.

I would submit to you that if we continue with embargoes and if they are as effective as they have been, and continue to be, then the possibility of a nuclear device will be hopefully no closer in six months, eight months, or four months, than it is right now.

What I am saying really is that before we resort to the use of force, we must measure the effect of going to war is going to have on this world, the Persian Gulf and this country. There are all kinds of reservations I have about the very business of going to war. I have a lot of questions. I asked one of the Minister of National Defence today.

My first question, is Canada ready for a war? My hon. colleague from LaSalle—Emard asked the question about the preparedness for war in the sense of civil and domestic aspects. I listened to the answer. I am not sure that I am convinced that we are ready.

I do not have evidence, despite the question I asked of the hon. Minister of National Defence in Question Period today, and despite some private notes that we sent back and forth, precisely what is going to happen to Canada's force in the Middle East, in the Persian Gulf, if offensive action breaks out. Who is going to control our force? There is no United Nations structure. There is no United Nations force commander, as there was in the case of Korea.

As you probably know, Mr. Speaker, General McArthur was the first United Nations force commander. Who is in charge of this operation? This House has not been told who is going to run the operation. These are reasonable questions. I am not being partisan. We deserve to know the answer. If the answer is unclear, perhaps we should not be rushing into the kind of conflict that we are getting involved in.

There are many other aspects of this. There is the aspect of what effect does moving into a war now have while options are still available for peace? What effect will this have on the economy of the world? I hear talks about oil at an outrageous price. Nobody knows for sure, but the figures are astounding. They are talking about $50 to $90 for a barrel of petroleum in the near future. What it means to us in the streets who buy gas is anywhere from 70 cents to $1 a litre in a short timeframe. That is not the driving force, but it is a consideration.

So the question I am asking myself, and the question I am asking the decision-makers is: Have we sat down and thought out all these implications and the implications of the wins, or the gains, and the losses, or the cost, by the course of action that we take. When I do that analysis with the information that I have, my judgment is that we should wait.

I am told by military colleagues and by people who are in the business that there is a window for attack. The closest window I guess is 45 days, and the far window is next fall. I am not in a position to make the judgment on how that window should be used because I do not have the information. The Minister of National Defence, the Minister of External Affairs, and the Prime Minister have at their disposal the intelligence information—to the military expertise that they get from the Departments of National Defence, External Affairs, and others—on which they can base these decisions.

Unless they have information that we do not have on this side of the House and unless they have information from the United Nations other than the unclassified information we have, I am not sure why the decision is being made the way it is being made. There are other alternatives available.

I said that I was here feeling somewhat humble and with a great pride at being able to do what I am doing, to get up and speak in the House on this. I also have great pride in the Canadian forces. They have sacrificed their way of life to be away from their families, especially at Christmas time with the future looking bleak and uncertain and with the thought of war. The unpredictable nature of what is going to happen in their lives is so much more close and so much more constant and a part of their very being and indeed their families than perhaps others who do not face this on a 100 per cent basis do.

I ask myself another question. It has been asked in the congressional debates in the United States that if there were congressmen and senators who had sons and daughters serving in the military, would the vote have been the same. I cannot answer that question. But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker. To those who are voting and making the decisions, I say: Ask yourself one question: Would you make the same decision if you had an immediate relative whose life would be put on the line when you believed in your heart of hearts that there was another alternative available and when there was another course of action that could be followed?

I support the United Nations. I do not believe there is a person in this House who does not support the United Nations. The reputation that Canada has had where we can accomplish peace without the resort to war would perhaps be an even better testament to what it is we do here in this House.

I am going to close by saying that during this debate we will discuss all kinds of matters, but we will essentially categorize them in time, as they did in congressional hearings. We will quote many people, from Winston Churchill to Theodore Roosevelt, and you name it. We will be talking about the histories of the past with the passions of today, but I believe we should do it with the concern for the possible tears for tomorrow.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception on his excellent speech. It differs from speeches made earlier by some of his colleagues.

In the course of his speech he said at least three times that he was not against the use of force. I realize he is a retired rear admiral. He was a member of the Armed Forces at a level very few people reach. Since his rank was the equivalent of a general in the army, if I am not mistaken. He is therefore well aware of the capabilities of the Canadian forces.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I was amazed that in his speech he seemed to doubt the ability of our Canadian officers to command our troops in the gulf. I found that somewhat surprising because I went to the gulf, during the week of November 11. I had conversations with army regulars, but I also talked to senior officers. I saw the kind of equipment they had, the quality of their training and their motivation. At no time was there any doubt in my mind about the ability of these officers to command our soldiers down there, or about the ability of the men and women we have in the gulf to fulfil their mission. I would appreciate it if he would clarify that part of his speech.

Furthermore, when he says that we have not explored all avenues, I wish he would tell me what avenues Canada has failed to explore so far.

Third, Canada which was instrumental in involving the Americans and the Soviets in recognizing the power of the UN as a common force. For the first time in the history of this organization, in the history of our planet, did he mean that 32 or rather 34 countries, if I am not mistaken, which are involved in the gulf, were all making the same mistake? Are the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party the only ones with a clear view of what should be done, of what the UN should be doing in the gulf?

[English]

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his point of clarification and his follow–on question. I am delighted to respond to it.

I would like to say at the outset that I am disappointed and almost upset that the hon. member, with whom I have worked very closely for the last two years on the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs would circumscribe the comments to portray what he thought they meant. I also want to say at the outset that there is nothing further from anything I wanted to suggest or anything that I said, I believe. I have the greatest faith in and pride in the Canadian forces.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not alone when I say that our young men and women, our officers and our leadership are if not the best in the world, among the best in the world. We have demonstrated that time and time again in NATO operations. Our air force comes out on top. Our maritime command quite frequently wins the trophy for anti–submarine warfare. Our ships in NATO exercises almost always come out on top. Our land forces are well known for their professionalism in NATO exercises.

I am under absolutely no reservation. There is not one element of reservation in my blood that would give me any cause for reservation of leadership and the ability to command within the Canadian forces. That is not the point.

The point is this: When you have an array of 675,000 ground troops in the Persian Gulf area, 13,000 combat vehicles, 4,500 tanks, 150 warships, and 1,600 combat aircraft from close to 30 nations, from one end of the gulf to the other, you have a different proposition when you go to war than you have right now in peacetime. We are exercising Canadian command and Canadian control over a designated force of three ships, 1,860 men and women, and 24 aircraft operating in a designated sector and carrying out predictable, designated tasks. Once you go to war with this great array of forces—and if you consider two sides you are looking at well over one million people, to say nothing of the highly technical force—the co-ordination effort becomes extraordinarily difficult. But there is one principle involved: there has to be somebody in charge. I am told—and I do not mean to be facetious—it is not conceivable at this point in time that a Canadian commander will be in charge of the gulf operation if we go to war with Iraq, not because we do not have the people who have the capability, intelligence or experience, but because it simply ain't going to work that way.

I have a question to which I want an answer from the Minister of National Defence. I have no doubt our troops will be commanded by Canadians. We have great leadership ability, and that is the way is has to be and that is the way it always has been. But I remind hon. members of Dieppe and other areas where Canadian troops commanded by Canadians were controlled by other forces and were led into disaster. That is my concern.

This House deserves to know the mechanics of what is involved in the operation of the Canadian forces however this vote goes when we take it. I want to know as a member of the House of Commons, as a Canadian, as a defence critic or in any capacity in which I stand here, the answers to those questions. Those are the questions to which the men and women in the Persian Gulf and Canadians want to know the answer. Until we get the answer to that question, I will not be satisfied. If the member needs any more clarification than that, I will get up and speak again.

On the second point, I think it is a fair question, but again I presume it is not a planted question because I do not believe the member opposite really wants to be overly partisan about it. But, Mr. Speaker, have a look at the United Nations resolutions. I have them all here. I will not go through them. I do not have time to do that. But this has been a model United Nations operation. We started off the sequence properly. We went through the resolutions identifying aggression, calling for compliance with non-military sanctions and compliance with military sanctions. No matter how we read the United Nations charter or no matter how we interpret it, does it say, that when all these measures fail will we then resort to the use of force?

There is something somewhere in the United Nations charter that I remember reading as a youngster which says that the purpose of the United Nations was to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, and here we are now taking that charter and tipping it upside down.

The hon. member referred to 35 countries that agreed with those sanctions. There is no evidence that those 35 countries will follow the United States into action. I have no evidence. I have asked the question. The Leader of the Opposition asked that question today. How many members of the force now in the Persian Gulf will follow the United States into this action? Will Russia be there? Will France be there? Will Japan be there? What happens if Israel is attacked? Egypt has already said that it may not follow. I worry about that.

I see my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I do not accept the premise the hon. member gives me that all those who are now involved in the peacetime operation will follow the United States on a path to war like we seem to be doing right now.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

AUTHORIZATION TO BROADCAST PROCEEDINGS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions and I believe Your Honour will find consent for the following motion:

That this House authorize the broadcasting, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, by the electronic media as represented through the House of Commons press gallery, of the meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, Thursday, January 17 at 3.30 p.m.; and that such broadcasting be at the discretion of the chairman of the committee and that the decorum of the meeting be preserved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead) (p. 16984) and of the amendment of Mr. Chrétien (p. 16995).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. I will now recognize the President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance).

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the subject before the House today is one that is extremely important, not only for the Middle East but for Canada and the whole world. Today there has been general recognition of the fact that the stakes are far too high and the potential consequences far too tragic for this debate to be coloured by political partisanship.

Although widely divergent views and philosophical principles are being expressed in this debate, which is perfectly normal, I hope we all agree on one thing, and that is that no one in this House is in favour of war. On opposition and government benches we find only peacemongers. What unites us as Canadians is our love of peace and order. In fact, peace and order are the cornerstones of our Constitution and our society.

To be a Canadian is to support peace and order. It is one of the glories of our history. It has been our goal within the family of nations and it continues to motivate our international initiatives. Today, Mr. Speaker, we are faced with a situation that may have tragic repercussions on a world scale.

Consider the facts. Iraq, a local, aggressive military power decides to invade its neighbour, Kuwait, a small country which, despite its rich oil reserves, is unable to defend itself. The events on August 2 were another unfortunate example of the law of the jungle.

According to numerous accounts by refugees and information from agencies such as Amnesty International, the Iraqi forces were not content to occupy their neighbour's territory. They have subjected it to the worst horrors of war: plunder, theft and rape. As we speak, those unfortunate men, women and children who were unable to leave Kuwait live under a reign of terror at the mercy of the Iraqi forces. We must not forget that it was Iraq that opted for war and aggression.

An hon. member: That's true!

Mr. Loiselle: Faced with these acts of violence, the international community cannot be satisfied with declarations made at the United Nations or elsewhere, no matter how strong they might be. We have to go beyond mere economic sanctions if they only make life more miserable for the Iraqis without changing the bad faith of the régime in Baghdad or putting an end to the occupation of Kuwait.

The impact of actions taken by the Iraqi government reaches far beyond the frontiers of Iraq and those of the Middle East. What are the countries most likely to be the victims of such violence? Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the weakest, the most destitute, and the most vulnerable in the world.

Soon enough, the situation in the Persian Gulf will have a destabilizing effect on the world economy, and especially on the economic well-being of Third World nations. More than ever they will have difficulties to find the funds required to build schools, develop their agricultural sector, improve their health care system, and upgrade their economic infrastructure.

In addition, an unstable world economy will make it even more difficult for these countries to lighten the weight of their international debt.

If we do not find a way to push back the Iraqi troops and restore Kuwait's territorial integrity, through diplomacy or otherwise, the weakest and most vulnerable countries stand to lose the most. Why? Because the international order and the collective security system exist precisely to protect the weakest, not the strongest. If we let Iraq annex Kuwait, who will prevent other aggressive powers which have territorial ambitions from following in the footsteps of Saddam Hussein?

Some people think that Canada should not get involved in the Persian Gulf issue. They disapproved of the role we played in this case within the Security Council of the United Nations. They voiced their opposition to our endorsement of the UN resolutions against Iraq. They were against sending armed forces to implement unanimous UN resolutions.

I do not question their sincerity or their goodwill, Mr. Speaker, but how can these people remain indifferent to the invasion and occupation of Kuwait? How can they stand the numerous instances of human rights abuse by Iraqi forces in Kuwait? Are they aware of the possible impact on the most vulnerable countries of the world if we do not make every attempt to enforce the international order?

In such a critical moment of the world history, we should not delude ourselves. Without the means or the will to enforce the international order, there will be no international order. The law of the strongest will prevail and, sadly, the Third World countries will be the first affected.

Canada has never buried its head in the sand in its international relations before and we have no intention of starting now.

Since the end of the Second World War, we have always been proud of our record and actions among the family of nations. Our governments, from whatever party, all gave themselves the mandate to put into place international structures in order to promote peace, order and international development. This government is no exception.

Canada put international interdependence to good use and always honoured its obligations at the international level. It is a matter of development. It is a matter of human rights. It is a matter of international trade. It is also a matter of peace versus war.

As full-fledged members of the international community, we cannot pretend that the gulf situation does not affect us. It does not concern only other countries. It concerns us as well.

Why has Canada become directly involved in the gulf crisis? The reasons are many and complex.

First, there is the matter of collective security that I mentioned. The invasion of Kuwait disrupted an already unstable area which is vital for our interests and the health of the global economy.

Unless the international community responds efficiently and fairly through the UN to restore the territorial integrity of Kuwait and the international order in that region, the very concept of collective security will be no more than an illusion with no bearing on reality. For the smallest countries of the world, the weakest and the most destitute, it would be a terrible and frightening future.

And so it is that countries like ours which play a leading role in international relations and which have the means to intervene, ought to assume their full responsibilities and do their share to restore peace and order.

Most important, our lofty notions and declarations must lead to concrete action, otherwise our collective security is little more than rhetoric and fiction.

Second, Mr. Speaker, the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq threatens the economic stability of the world as well as the economic and social well-being of a good many nations the world over.

Let us not forget that 40 per cent of the world's oil reserves are at stake. In addition, a sharp rise in oil prices would have a disastrous impact on inflation, economic growth, unemployment, international trade—in short, on—the world's economic stability and health. It stands to reason that Canada is not immune to the vagaries of the world economy.

As a matter of fact it has often been said that among industrialized nations Canada is probably the most dependent on international trade. Our standard of living, our jobs, and our health and welfare system are directly linked to our export performance. If our export markets decrease and if the world economy falters, thousands of our fellow Canadians will feel the direct and brutal impact.

Yet, what I have just described is only one aspect of the economic consequences of the gulf crisis. Not unlike in the case of collective security considerations, the weakest economies stand to lose the most in this crisis. Third World countries will be hard hit. As I pointed out earlier, because of the economic instability engendered by the crisis, these countries will experience ever more difficulties to escape from indebtedness, poverty, illness, and inadequate and underdeveloped infrastructures.

What about the countries of central and eastern Europe that have just been freed from the futile yoke of the Communist régime? They need us. They need our assistance and our support. A good many of these people are net importers of oil to heat their homes and to keep their industrial machinery going.

There is undoubtedly another and more important reason to take action, and it is our moral conscience. The ruthless invasion by a military and aggressive power of a weak and defenseless neighbour is inexcusable, unjustifiable, immoral and reprehensible. How could we remain passive and unconcerned in the presence of the systematic use of murder, theft, rape and plundering? We could not.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we must stand up and be counted. That is exactly what the government did following the invasion of Kuwait. That is why the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State External Affairs worked so hard to ensure that the international community's response would be through the UN. That is why we have supported the UN's resolutions against Iraq. That is also the reason we joined the international forces in the Persian Gulf area. We have supported all negotiations and diplomatic initiatives in an effort to find a peaceful solution to this crisis. As a matter of fact, as the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State indicated today, we continue to support them.

For the past five months, the international community has offered the Iraqi government various peaceful ways out, each time to no avail. The Iraqi government seems to believe that the coalition is fragile and that our determination is weak.

The Iraqi government is wrong. It is unfortunate, if not outright tragic, that such a government be blinded by cynical and grandiose ambitions. Needless to say, it is not the first time in the history of the world that such plans have been so grossly miscalculated.

We want our allies, the weaker and more vulnerable countries of the world, and Iraq to know that Canada will not shy away from its international commitments. When the time comes to re-establish international peace and order, to ensure collective security and the well-being of the weakest and neediest, the international community can always count on Canada.

That is why I ask all my hon. colleagues, from both sides of the House, to go beyond party considerations and support the effort of our great country within the international coalition. The purpose is not only to help the Kuwaiti government and people, but to safeguard the international order, the only guarantee for the well-being and security of the weakest and most vulnerable countries in the world.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I first want to congratulate the minister on his speech, and then I would like to take this opportunity to ask two questions.

My first question is this: Is his government in favour of a peace conference on current problems in the Middle East? Second, if Canada gets involved in this war, does the government intend to cut services and programs here in Canada or does it intend to raise taxes to finance our contribution?

Mr. Loiselle: I want to thank the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur for his questions.

With regard the international conference, I believe Canada has already indicated during the past months and years that there is a series of problems in the Middle East that should be dealt with. I believe that our country's position in this respect is quite clear.

It would, however, be highly inappropriate to establish a direct link between such a conference and our response to Saddam Hussein. We would be telling Saddam Hussein: "Dear Mr. President of Iraq. Since you leave us no other alternative and since you have invaded this country and destroyed its population and tried to erase every trace of most of its citizens, thus eliminating a member State of the United Nations, as a reward, and to show that we understand your message, we are going to change our attitude and call a series of conferences, as if the problems were elsewhere and not in Kuwait".

The crux of the problem is Kuwait. The country was invaded, and the president of Kuwait must withdraw. There are still a few hours left before the deadline set by the United Nations. After a series of resolutions, I hope that the last-ditch efforts that are being made, with our support, will make the president of Iraq review his position.

As for the cost of maintaining our presence in the gulf, I would say that at the present time, and I had a chance when the Estimates were tabled some time ago, to inform the House that our presence until March had been more or less financed by budgets within the Department of National Defence. There was a potential loss which had not been foreseen, since the crisis was unexpected, of abut $350 million, and at the time I explained how this money would be recovered. For the time being, those are the documents that contain the answer to the hon. member's question.

As for the future, I still hope we will quickly get a peaceful solution in this area. The world needs it, because in any case war is a poor solution. However, it may be the only one when one is dealing with people who make this kind of solution necessary. So I hope we will avoid this war as I said in my speech, and thus avoid the cost that will have an impact in various ways on all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, if I understood the translation of the hon. member's remarks during the course of his speech—and I apologize for my total lack of facility in French but if the hon. member will bear with me—he said, as translated, that Canada has been up to now passive and detached. He observed that the time was coming when we must intervene. The words "passive and detached" and "intervene" are direct quotes.

This seems to me to crystallize to some degree what has impressed me as a misunderstanding in the House to date in some quarters. Somehow there is the assumption that what is being carried out by Canada—and—other nations in the gulf at the moment is not the use of force.

It should be made very clear that Canada and the other nations active in the gulf at the moment are most definitely engaged in the use of force. What we have not yet resorted to is the use of murder, and what we are debating in the House today is whether or not Canada ought to participate in the use of murder. But let there be no mistake. To date, we have been engaged in the use of force.

The use of force to date in the opinion of many, including former directors of the CIA of the United States, has been effective in crippling Iraqi industrial capacity. In other words, the embargo has been effective, is being effective, and, in fact, is taking increasing effect within Iraq.

It seems to me that the hon. member must be able to say that sanctions are failing if, in humanity, he thereby proposes to proceed to say: "Thus, war is necessary."

I have a simple question. What evidence, if any, does the member have that he can present in the House that sanctions are failing?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, there is very simple evidence. For sanctions to function they would have to have an effect on Saddam Hussein and I would like the hon. gentleman to indicate to me any small indication that he would be prepared to move. The rest is, in many ways, irrelevant.

We also know that a lot of material is coming into Iraq through Iran. We know that sanctions were used in other countries, one being Rhodesia for a period of 10 years without giving much effect. At the time, the United Nations was weakened because of the cold war. This is something that has to be understood.

For the first time, we can give this international organization a chance to play the role it was built to play, now that it is not crippled any longer by the capacity of the veto by one or the other of the members. An international organization is now in a position to deal with such a problem. That is why the United Nations, through the Security Council, asked the members to adopt a resolution, after the one on the embargo, after coming to the conclusion that some other action was required. Why did it do it? Because it felt that it was not getting anywhere.

Here we are faced with the invasion of a small country by a big one. The world community unanimously is asking for action and we are saying: "Later." I tell the hon. gentleman that later will not change anything. We will still be faced with the same problem. If the sanctions were working, they would have an impact on Saddam Hussein. The working of the sanctions is where the proof lies, not in the fact that there are fewer fruits in the market, but the fact that the government of Iraq is taking notice. I have not seen anything to that effect.

When one sees the Secretary General of the United Nations being asked to wait for practically an hour to be treated with disdain, the representative of the world community, this is not an indication that one is dealing with somebody who wants to be reasonable. We know that if one is against crime, one should be against the crimes that have been committed over the last five months in that country. Do not forget them. This is why we cannot say to these people who are asking for help: "Just wait, we will make a few more speeches. Wait for a few more months." The crime has been committed. Five months have gone by and the time for action is getting closer. I hope we can avoid it, but I have my doubts.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to participate in this debate on what, as my leader has indicated, is literally a question of life and death. This is very likely the most important debate that all of us who have the honour of serving as members of the House and elected representatives of the people of Canada will ever participate in.

I must emphasize the fact that no member of this House has debated the fundamental issue facing us now, whether or not Canada should take part in a war. The last time Canadian parliamentarians discussed this issue was in 1950, and it had to do with the Korean war.

[English]

That makes all the more grave our responsibility as members of the House to examine the evidence and to look with care at the arguments that are made with respect to the proposal of the government that would have the effect of plunging this nation into a catastrophic war.

It also makes more important the reality that on a question this fundamental which goes to the very soul of this nation, and indeed to each of us as elected members, that we should be free to vote with our conscience and listen to the arguments that are made, and, as my leader pointed has pointed out, to vote in a free vote on this fundamental question.

The issue in this debate is not whether we condemn as a country, as a Parliament, and as Canadian people, the invasion on August 2 by Iraq of Kuwait. Of course, we condemn that. The community of nations has condemned that. With one voice we join in that condemnation.

I have met personally with men and women who have been in Kuwait and who have seen the devastating impact of that invasion. I met with those who are hostages held in Kuwait and with Kuwaitis themselves. There is a very significant Palestinian community in Kuwait. I have spoken with our very courageous staff from the Canadian embassy in Kuwait. There are people such as Bill Bowden and the men and women who displayed enormous courage, as did the Canadian hostages, in assisting those who were held there.

I and my colleagues have read the report of Amnesty International documenting the horrors of this invasion and annexation. That is not the issue.

The issue is how we as a community of nations, in this first challenge since the end of the cold war, respond to that aggression.

Others have talked about previous wars. They have talked about the period leading up to World War II and the destruction of life and the enormous devastation in World War II. There was the dropping of the bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Some have argued and, indeed, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has argued, that in some way the lesson we should draw from World War II is that we should plunge ourselves into another war. Surely the lesson is precisely the opposite. In the time leading up to World War II, the community of nations did not in fact use alternatives to war. Quite the contrary, as my colleague from Trinity—Spadina who is a veteran of that war has pointed out. The community of nations engaged actively in commerce with Germany. Indeed, many of the countries that ultimately went to war were those whose companies were supplying the Germans with weapons.

The lesson we draw from that is, surely, that where there is an alternative of tough economic sanctions and of diplomacy, that in fact is the alternative that we should be supporting.

This is in fact the first test.

[Translation]

This is the first time since the end of the cold war in the world. How are we going to respond to the aggression of one country against another?

[English]

I would argue that it is madness for us in this first test collectively of the world's response to resort to a weapon, war, which has been demonstrated to be catastrophic. Is this really the best that we can do? Surely, we must look at the alternatives.

There was hope early on in this process. The United Nations was in fact working effectively. On the day following the invasion, a resolution was adopted overwhelmingly, unanimously, condemning the invasion. We had real hope that with the end of the cold war that the United Nations might in fact be an effective tool for international diplomacy. That hope will be tragically betrayed if this country and other members of the coalition plunge into a war.

It is interesting that the minister had talked about the fact that if we wait it may be difficult to hold the coalition together. As Admiral Crow, the former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff of the United States, has said, it is hard to understand why some consider our international alliance strong enough to conduct intense hostilities but too fragile to hold together while we attempt a peaceful solution. And, Mr. Speaker, he is right. He is right.

There is an alternative and my leader and my colleagues in the course of this debate have spelled out, and will spell out, that alternative. That alternative is collective firm action through sanctions and diplomatic action. The minister has said that we do not know if sanctions are working and that we do not know if sanctions will work.

I know that my colleagues are going to be elaborating on this point so I am not going to go on at any length, but I want to draw to the attention of the House a couple of statements that have been made on this subject by people who are in a position to know.

The Director of the CIA, William Webster, in his evidence to Congress stated: "The Baghdad regime is inexorably running out of the commodity on which its future depends, money. Oil revenues are the drip-feed of Baghdad's life support system. Without them the dictatorship will inevitably perish."

If that alternative is available, why plunge us into a war? Why plunge the world into a war whose consequences we know? We do not have to speculate on what they might be. We have been told and I will come to that in a few minutes.

We have heard from many others. We have heard once again from retired Admiral Crow who said that "if in fact the sanctions will work in 12 to 18 months instead of six months, the trade-off of avoiding war with its attendant sacrifices and uncertainties would, in my view, be worth it".

As New Democrats, we say that in our view it is worth it as well and we must avoid the madness of war.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robinson: I could quote others at some length.

[Translation]

The House is aware that there was a very important and excellent debate in the American Congress. There was a very close vote in the Senate, the other house, and many senators and members of the House of Representatives who took the floor spoke of the significant impact of the sanctions, an issue which my colleagues will deal with later on.

• (1830)

We have to ask ourselves: What is the role that Canada has played in this conflict? More important, in looking to the future, what is the role that Canada even at this late date should be playing in resolving this conflict in a peaceful manner?

I would argue that each step of the way, rather than Canada playing a role within the context of the United Nations, seeking to speak with an independent voice, that we have been driven by a policy which George Bush has dictated to the Prime Minister of this country.

The evidence of that is very clear from the beginning. In fact our initial military response came immediately following a meeting between the Prime Minister and George Bush and before the United Nations had authorized the use of force to implement sanctions. It was to implement sanctions. We supported that decision of the United Nations, but it is important to underline the fact that our Conservative government responded not to the United Nations, but to George Bush. That is a betrayal of the independent tradition of this country of peacemaking.

I think we have to ask ourselves very clearly as well what was the effect of the actions led by the United States and the Security Council. We have to remember that later our Secretary of State for External Affairs and, indeed, the Prime Minister made it very clear that they really did not care whether the United Nations in fact was prepared to go to war if sanctions broke down or beforehand, as we are seeing now.

No, our Secretary of State for External Affairs said: "The United Nations might not work. There might be a veto. China might say no. If there is a veto, we in Canada are prepared to discard the United Nations and we are prepared to take unilateral action." I do not accept the fact that this government is now wrapping itself in the flag of the United Nations because it happens to be convenient for them to do so as it is for the United States.

This raises very grave questions about the future role of the United Nations. Rather, our actions have been from the beginning driven by a desire to do what George Bush has told this country to do.

I mentioned China. I want to say just briefly that, again, as a community of nations we have to ask ourselves what price has been paid to cobble together this coalition that authorized resolution 678, which was such a dangerous and open-ended resolution and does not talk about United Nations command. In fact it flies in the face of the fundamental principles of the Charter of Rights itself. How quickly is the United States forgetting those horrifying events in Tiananmen Square on June 4, 1989 in its attempt to build this coalition with China.

I could look at other nations and ask the same question. Others will do that, I am sure.

A question again that we as elected representatives of the people must ask ourselves surely is: What would this war be all about? What would be the objective of going to war at this point? Would it be to restore democracy to Kuwait, to Saudi Arabia, and other countries in the region? No, of course not. Kuwait is far from a democracy.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said last night, it is a semi-feudal society. We are not talking here about restoring democracy to countries which are sorely in need of democracy and respect for human rights.

Are we talking about the United States demonstrating respect for international law and being opposed to aggression? I do not think they have to look very far at the history of the United States in the world community to recognize that it has, far too frequently, displayed total contempt for international law, whether it be in East Timor with a genocide of over 200,000 people when Indonesia invaded, whether it be its active support for its murderous regimes in Chile or in El Salvador today, pumping in over $1 million a day, or whether it be its silence in the face of other invasions and the question of Tibet and Cyprus, and its involvement, as my colleague from Vancouver East has said, in Grenada and Panama. I think it is pretty clear that the United States has a rather selective view and a selective respect for international law which is demonstrated very well in its contempt for resolutions dealing with the occupied territories.

I want to note as well, and I think it is important in examining the history of this conflict, to note the position that the United States took, not in another country in another jurisdiction, but with Iraq one week before Iraq invaded Kuwait. There was a meeting between Saddam Hussein and the United States ambassador to Iraq, April Glaspie on July 25, one week before Iraq invaded Kuwait. We have a transcript of the meeting that took place between the United States ambassador and Saddam Hussein. This is what the United States ambassador said to Saddam Hussein during the course of that conversation one week before the invasion.

In talking about the effects of the price of oil dropping, she said:

> I think I understand this. I have lived here for years. I admire your extraordinary efforts to rebuild your country. I know you need funds. We understand that and our opinion is that you should have the opportunity to rebuild your country.

Then the ambassador of the United States said this:

> But we have no opinion on the Arab–Arab conflicts, like your border disagreement with Kuwait.
> I was in the American embassy in Kuwait during the late '60s. The instruction we had during this period was that we should express no opinion on this issue and that the issue is not associated with America. James Baker has directed our official spokesman to emphasize this instruction.

That was the signal that the Government of the United States of America was sending out one week before this invasion. The day before the invasion, the American administration said no to Congress in its request for economic sanctions against Iraq. We have to ask ourselves, what would this destructive war really be all about? It would not be to support the United Nations because there are alternatives to war. Rather, in a moment of candour, the President of the United States said this would be a war to preserve the American way of life, the consumption of oil. Well, we in the New Democratic Party believe that it would be profoundly wrong for Canada to participate in a war to support the American way of life and not to give sanctions time to work.

I want to point out as well that during the course of the debate in the American Congress, there was a very narrow mandate given, particularly in the Senate of the United States. A vote of 53 to 47, I believe. In this House I would argue that even if there is a vote to support Canada's involvement in military action, it is not good enough to send Canadian men and women into combat after a very narrow vote in a deeply divided House. To send men and women into combat in those circumstances was wrong in the United States and it would be wrong in Canada as well. It is particularly wrong and destructive when there is an alternative, particularly as my leader has pointed out.

I want to take this opportunity on behalf, not of just my colleagues in the House, but of all Canadians, to pay tribute to the role that the Leader of the New Democratic Party has played in attempting to find a peaceful solution to this conflict by going to Washington to meet with democratic leaders and in travelling across this land. I think all Canadians want to express their appreciation and respect for the leadership that she has shown in the search for peace.

I want to talk briefly about the alternatives that we have put forward and in particular that my leader has put forward, and then to make a couple of other points. I know that my time is running out. I believe there is some understanding with respect to an extension of that time and I will try to be brief.

The leader of my party and all New Democrats in the caucus have put forward an important alternative to Canada's participation in war. That alternative involves the continued use and indeed the tightening of economic sanctions, sanctions which are already costing Saddam Hussein over $2 billion a month. I say to anyone who suggests that somehow he is getting off scot-free, and that he is not paying a price, the price that is being paid by Iraq for its aggression, is devastating to the Iraqi economy. Let us continue that. Let us strengthen that.

But let us not plunge the region into a war which would see the entire world paying a devastating price. Let us have more diplomatic initiatives. The French initiative is a very important one. I received a note just a few minutes ago that tragically this initiative has now been withdrawn at the Security Council, that in fact the Iraqis have not responded positively to the initiative, and that the British initiative has subsequently been withdrawn as well.

Obviously, we are deeply disappointed in that. But surely that is not an argument for going to war. It is an argument for trying harder for peace.

My leader has pointed out the importance of an international conference on the Middle East. Some say: "Well, we cannot have linkage". If an international conference to deal with the tragic plight of the Palestinians, to deal with Lebanon and with other concerns, and to ensure that Israel respects resolutions 242 and 338 was right before August 2, as it was, surely to God it is right today as well. If that can help to resolve this conflict, we should be doing everything we can to promote and encourage that conference. Indeed, the United Nations itself has called for the conference to take place.

[Translation]

The United Nations said that at an appropriate time, after the unconditional withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait, there will be a conference on the Middle East. We support that.

[English]

I also want to take this opportunity to express on behalf of my colleagues our condolences to the families of those senior leaders of the Palestine Liberation Organization, Saleh Khalef and Hayel Abdel-Hamid, who were murdered yesterday. The cycle of violence continues in that region. All of us are devastated by that and certainly we would want to convey our sympathy and our regret to their families and as well to recognize—I think it is important to do this—that the effect of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait tragically once again is not to help the Palestinians, despite its protestation to the contrary.

The plight of the Palestinians in side and outside Kuwait, Kuwait, particularly in the occupied territories, is far worse after that invasion. That reinforces the importance of coming to an equitable solution to that tragic conflict.

The final point that my leader made in terms of our alternative to war is looking at collective means of resolving this dispute that falls short of war, for example, international arbitration through international agencies such as the International Court of Justice over questions of borders. Yes, there are disputes about borders, international arbitration, and Arab-Arab discussion and agreement over oil disputes. Yes, there were legitimate concerns about over production and under pricing, not just by Iraq and Kuwait, but also by the United Arab Emirates.

Certainly as a community of nations we must recognize the mad arms trade which fed this conflict. Remember that the Soviet Union, France, and other western countries were the major suppliers of arms to Iraq in its war with Iran and that Germany and German companies were the major suppliers of chemicals for chemical warfare. That arms trade, which has led to the possibility of chemical and biological warfare and of course the risk of nuclear weapons, must be confronted as well in that region if there is to be any lasting peace.

The people of Canada are deeply concerned about the prospects of this nation being drawn into a war. There have been demonstrations, rallies, letters, phone calls and telegrams. Particularly in extraordinary numbers are the young people at the rallies which I had the privilege of attending in Vancouver and Montreal. My colleagues spoke in other locations such as the hon. member for Victoria in Ottawa and others across the land. We met as well with representatives of peace groups, a wide cross-section of peace groups in Canada, including the Canadian Peace Alliance, the Winnipeg Co-ordinating Committee for Disarmament—

—artists for peace, people who belong to the Échec à la guerre group and who led the fight in Quebec against the folly of war—

[English]

—the Anti-Arms Race in British Columbia, Greenpeace, World Federalists, the Mennonite Central Committee, Project Ploughshares, Oxfam, the United Nations Association, the Canadian Labour Congress, Canadian Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War. All these groups spoke with one voice to us and through us to the government of this country. These groups are saying no to war, that we must give peace a chance. That is our plea today.

War is wrong from every possible perspective. From the human perspective, there is the risk of a loss of literally hundreds of thousands of innocent lives. The Canadian Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War have documented that very eloquently. My colleagues will be speaking on the possibility of environmental disaster, particularly the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands and Skeena. There will be devastation of the environment and economic destruction of many parts of the world. The price of oil increasing dramatically will hit hardest the poorest countries, including those countries in eastern Europe that are struggling to rebuild their economies.

The toll on refugees would be incalculable. We know already that if the Red Sea is blocked, the consequences in getting aid to the Horn of Africa are devastating. We cannot take that risk. That could lead to impoverishment and famine for millions of people.

There are the geopolitical consequences of a war. What would the region look like after Iraq has been bombed into submission? Who would be the key players in the region? Iran? Syria? Imagine the consequences of a region dominated by those countries with the rise in fundamentalism in those countries.

Another consequence, and one that we must not forget is the fact that Canadians, particularly those of Iraqi and Arab origin, are already facing a sense of insecurity. We must ask what is the role of CSIS and other government agencies in contributing to this atmosphere of insecurity. We must not repeat the tragic mistakes that we made during and after World War II with Japanese Canadians, Italian Canadians, Ukrainian Canadians, and others.

I believe that it would be profoundly wrong for Canada to participate in this war. I believe deeply that surely to God we in the latter part of the 20th century must have a better way of resolving conflicts between nations and resorting to war.

Therefore I feel that Canada in the event of an armed conflict should not be drawn into that war. We are there to support sanctions. We are there in that important role. I want to pay tribute to the men and women in the Armed Forces who have done that and done that well. That is not the issue.

The fact is that if the region is plunged into a war that embargo would then become a blockade and, in international law, an act of war. Surely, in the event that there is an armed attack, Canada's role should be one of peacekeeping, a humanitarian role. There is a variety of ways we can achieve that.

If there is to be war in the world, in Canada at this time, let it not be a war with catastrophic consequences, not just for the Middle East but for the entire globe. Let it be a war on poverty, on homelessness, on environmental destruction, on AIDS, on racism, and on sexism. Let it be a war on the obscenity of over a billion children on this planet living in poverty. Let that be the war that we collectively wage on behalf of the people of this planet.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Robinson: In closing, let me be very clear. We support the United Nations. We have always supported a strong and effective United Nations.

[Translation]

Ever since it was founded and even before, the New Democratic Party has always endorsed the principles of the United Nations. But, the best way to endorse the principles of the United Nations charter is of course to advocate a peaceful settlement, not war.

[English]

I want to close on a personal note. I had hoped that arising from this conflict, and from the end of the cold war, there might be a new vision, and a new role for the United Nations.

The last time that the United States was involved in a war was the war in Vietnam. It took a toll of over 55,000 lives and tens of thousands more scarred, injured. For what?

My family we lived in the United States during that war. My mother and father left the United States at great personal cost because they did not want to support an immoral war. They did not want their son to be drafted to fight in that immoral war. I fervently hope that Canada, 25 years later, will not plunge into another equally or even more destructive war. As Canadians across this country have pleaded with this government, let us give peace a chance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I congratulate the critic from the New Democratic Party on that emotional and very clear presentation of the position of his party. He reinforced something that the Leader of the Liberal Party said in his speech, that our troops are there now to enforce the embargo, to enforce the sanctions. "But once war is declared that embargo becomes a blockade", said our leader, and when he said that some members on the government side laughed.

I am wondering if the critic from the New Democratic Party whose profession is law, I would indicate on what basis he makes that definition of an embargo becoming a blockade and once it becomes a blockade our troops being in a state of war. Can he clarify to the House where he gets this definition of an embargo becoming a blockade and so on? I think this might educate some of the members on the other side.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, I want to emphasize first that this debate is not about legal niceties. This debate is about the role that Canada might be playing in a situation of war.

On the precise question, the issue raised by my colleague, we can look at any text on international law—whether it be Dicey or any other text of international law—and in the event of armed conflict breaking out, an embargo becomes in law a blockade and a blockade in international law is construed as an act of war.

More important, we have to look at the reality of the situation. If in fact the community of nations, or at least the coalition or members of the coalition, decide to abandon sanctions and to launch an attack, an attack which would involve aerial assault and land forces, quite clearly the strategy of sanctions would have been overtaken. Given the fact that Canada's role is there to enforce sanctions, surely we would recognize that we would not want to be part of that kind of military offensive in those circumstances. I believe that is the position the people of Canada would take, that we should be enforcing sanctions and not be part of a military offensive.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague and state how strongly we support the views that he presenting and those of our leader earlier today.

I would like to raise one point that has been niggling at me since the Prime Minister spoke this afternoon. If I heard him correctly, he used the Korean war as an example of a justification for another UN–U.S. armed intervention. I know he will recall that in that instance it was a UN initiative or a U.S. cloaked in the UN initiative. Canada participated as part of Commonwealth troops. The North Koreans succeeded in pushing the exceedingly well equipped U.S. forces, to the middle of Korea, which is essentially where it all began in the first place.

During that period many thousands of people were killed. There were massive numbers of refugees. I saw many people in hospital including Canadians who were injured. There were many orphans. A whole generation was affected. The war ended up in a complete no–win situation, which I think is where all wars end up. Korea was child's play compared to the gulf war with regard to chemical and nuclear threat.

Would the member like to comment on the fact that war is really a no–win situation from anyone's point of view and that there is absolutely no justification for the killing of men and women in the armed forces and for the many civilians who would be affected?

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, before responding to the specific question, I would like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Vancouver East and point out that as a woman she in many ways has represented very eloquently and forcefully the position of women across this country who according to the opinion polls in significantly greater numbers than men, are recognizing the madness of war. It is an interesting point that that is the case. I hope that we will hear the voices of many, if not all, women in this House before this debate is concluded.

Just briefly, I would like to agree with the point the hon. member is making. Korea is surely not an example of the success of the United Nations. Yes, there was a UN command, but the Soviet Union was not even present at the Security Council when the decision was made. It was outside the Security Council. Instead of looking backward at what has happened in the past—yes, we must draw the lessons from the past—surely we should be looking forward.

A challenge that faces all of us is to build a new collective security framework through the United Nations and through regional bodies such as the CSCE that makes the possibility of war unthinkable. My personal view is that that is exactly the situation: war would be unthinkable in the gulf and it should be unthinkable in any arena. Surely we have moved beyond the madness of war. As a community of nations through the United Nations, we must be able to come up with other alternatives including sanctions that recognize that no one ever wins a war.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, briefly I would like to commend my colleague, the member for Burnaby—Kingsway, on his very good outline of our position against the war.

I would like to invite him to comment further on the question of sanctions, which is the principle means that has been used until now to try to bring about a negotiated solution. Are there ways in which the member suggests the sanctions against Kuwait could be strengthened?

It has been suggested by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the sanctions may be effective against Iraqi people but not against the Iraqi ruler and military. Can the member comment on whether it is possible for even the most blood–thirsty government to continue military action, which he is doing now, with absolutely no support from his people?

[Translation]

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, I still believe that the economic sanctions already in place, can work without being tightened, and that their impact can even increase with time. Madam Speaker, we have evidence—

Mrs. Gibeau: What evidence?

Mr. Robinson: If it was not so, we could still tighten the sanctions. There are many ways to do so. But let's not forget, Madam Speaker, that economic sanctions have worked in other conflicts, such as in Rhodesia where they had quite an impact. They also worked in Nepal and in South Africa. However, to give up economic sanctions in favour of a catastrophic war would be pure madness.

[English]

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, today this House is debating the grave Persian Gulf issue for the third time in three months. The stakes are much higher than they were on October 23 and on November 29 because today, January 15, 1991 the world faces the passing of a critical, political and military deadline.

The shameful aggression by Saddam Hussein and the Iraqi army in a savage attack on their Arab neighbour, Kuwait, has been universally deplored and condemned by the world's nations in an extraordinary display of united condemnation.

Kuwait was ruthlessly attacked, conquered, and annexed by Iraq, a country with the fourth-largest army in the world. Saddam Hussein has been neither repentant nor apologetic. Rather, he has made it clear that Kuwait is only one of a series of conquests yet to come, despite the fact that most of its neighbours are, like Kuwait, full-fledged sovereign members of the United Nations.

All Canadians are pondering the enormous risks inherent in the decision we will take here this week. The consequences of war are staggering and abhorrent. It is precisely for this reason that I welcome this opportunity to express my views in this historic debate.

For a Minister of Veterans Affairs, the prospect of war in the Persian Gulf is especially painful, as the brutal aftermath of any military conflict is an every day reality in my department. On a daily basis, we deal with men who were blinded during the trench warfare of World War I. Chemical warfare is nothing new to them. We look after men and women wounded in mind, body and spirit who will spend the rest of their days in rehabilitation centres, hospitals, nursing homes or psychiatric wards. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, no Minister of Veterans Affairs could regard another war with anything but dread and apprehension.

In the constituency I serve our war veterans would be the last to treat our country's entry into military conflict lightly. They went to war and saw the blood, the suffering, the destruction first-hand and the deaths.

It is for these profound reasons that this government has pursued consistently and diligently a peaceful resolution to this crisis. The legacy of our remaining veterans and of their comrades buried in foreign soil is still with us. The memory of their sacrifices has ensured that Canada seek all legitimate avenues for peace. This we have done and will continue to do.

Remaining true to their memory, however, demands that we respect why our veterans fought for Canada so bravely—to preserve freedom, to establish a new world order, and to fight naked, barbaric aggression. To adopt a posture of peace at all costs would violate their memory and invalidate their sacrifices. This we will not do.

Ironically, most Canadians living today never experienced the hardships of war. Over two-thirds of Canadians were not born until after World War II. Over 55 per cent of Canadians were born after the Korean war.

Many of our veterans, indeed the Canadian populace as a whole, know that something extremely important is at stake in the gulf, and that is, how far should the world go in thwarting naked and brutal aggression by the bullies of the world.

There are some stark lessons to be learned by an examination of history. That is clearly shown in the failure of the League of Nations between the two world wars. The lesson learned was that appeasement and a reluctance to deal with aggression in the past ended with abysmal failure and may have cost more lives in the long run.

Therefore, after the Second World War the free world resolved to establish a new organization, the United Nations, which would avoid the errors and the weaknesses of the League of Nations. Canada was a founding member of the United Nations and has always been an enthusiastic supporter member-nation.

Today, in fact, we are a member of the Security Council of that organization. Standing 31st in population among member nations, Canada is fourth in financial contributions to the United Nations' efforts. Canada's support of the United Nations has not stopped there. We proved it in Korea 40 years ago with 26,000 volunteers. We have always been at the forefront of United Nations' efforts at peacekeeping. All Canadians are proud of the fact that Canadian troops won the Nobel Prize for Peace for our efforts and our contributions over the last 45 years.

We are being called upon to support the United Nations by supporting a simple, straightforward resolution, namely, "that this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait".

Five and a half months have passed since Iraq attacked Kuwait. Negotiations, talks, peace missions, diplomacy, economic sanctions, embargoes, and, above all, enduring patience has failed to persuade Saddam Hussein to leave the conquered territory.

The leadership of Iraq has been consistently intransigent and obstinate, despite the fact that most nations of the world are united in condemning their brutal aggression against another sovereign United Nations member-nation.

Twelve resolutions of the United Nations Security Council—several of them drafted and co-sponsored by Canada—have been totally ignored by Iraq. Over 30 nations have provided troops and materiel to enforce these resolutions.

Diplomatic efforts have thus far been unsuccessful and economic sanctions have been endured simply because Hussein has an uncanny ability to pass on their effects to the Iraqi poor, rather than to the political and military leadership of that country.

If a bully nation invades and annexes another sovereign nation and the free world ignores it, then world peace and world order is clearly in peril. Freedom, independence, peace and order become hollow and meaningless words.

Canada and other peaceful nations have much at stake here. The question is, simply put, will world order be sacrificed for political expediency, appeasement and lack of resolve when the going gets tough? I for one do not think it should. I believe the efforts of the United Nations and the 30 nation coalition deserve our unqualified support and the support of the Canadian people.

Canadians are a peace-loving people, respected world-wide simply because we have never been seen as a threat to other nations. Victor Suthren, Director of the Canadian War Museum, aptly described the Canadian psyche when he said:

> Canadians have fought as troops of France, of Britain, and finally, of their own nation. They have fought with a ferocious capability that has given them, a markedly unmilitaristic people, a military reputation far more respected than those of many nations who play more dramatically at the parade-ground chauvinism and machismo of overt militarism.
> Canadians maintain dedicated armed forces of minimal size, and get on with the peace, order and good government of a highly civilized and self-disciplined people. Forced to take up arms, they have done so to put an end to war or fighting. Having matched and beaten armed bullies, they put weapons away with little ostentatious crowing and get on with the nation's life. They do not, ever, (Canadians) play at war, nor do they see the gun as a solution to social injustice or personal failure—

Victor Suthren goes on to say that Canadians are and I quote:

> Men and women of a peaceable nature, able to live without war precisely because they can be so fearfully good at it without a shred of romance.

No rational person wants to see war unless every possible effort to preserve peace has been exhausted. At this crucial time in our history it would appear that, barring a miracle, the moment of truth has arrived. This is truly an hour of anxiety for our country and certainly an hour of destiny that we as legislators cannot escape.

It is for the reasons I have stated that I support our government and I support the United Nations. Having little choice but to vote for what could lead to war, I continue to pray for peace.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I am pleased that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has taken part in this debate.

Like him, I have talked to many veterans in my riding of Parkdale—High Park. Most of the ones I spoke to told me to come to Ottawa today to take part in this debate, but to fight for avoiding participating in any military action.

The advice they are giving me is that the sanctions should be given more time to work, that we should explore further diplomatic channels, but at all costs avoid going to war, I think for the very reasons the minister mentioned. They were in war. They shed blood. They lost their colleagues, so they know what war is all about.

The minister's government deals and rules a lot and makes many decisions based on polls. I would like to ask the minister whether his department or he himself has taken polls across Canada among our veterans, and what percentage urged the government to allow sanctions more time to work and other diplomacy, as opposed to military action.

There is a second question I would like to pose to him. He heard our leader make an amendment, to the government motion, because clearly as the resolution states it does commit our troops to an offensive role as of midnight tonight, January 15.

I am wondering if he could give reasons whether he will support the official opposition amendment. If not, would he explain why he could not support the amendment? With the amendment we might be able to support the government motion but, if the government refuses to accept our amendment, there is no way that our party can give the government carte blanche to commit our troops as of midnight tonight to be in an offensive mode versus the defensive mode they are in now.

Mr. Merrithew: Madam Speaker, on the first question the hon. member asked regarding whether or not we have taken polls, I should point out that this government—and I am not trying to be light-hearted here—certainly does not govern by polls. Perhaps we should, but we do not do that.

The important thing here is that I have talked to the leadership of the veterans groups. In fact I talked to them even as late as today. While I cannot speak for every single member of those groups, they do know the importance of standing the ground, standing on principle, and standing up for what they fought for and what their comrades died for, that is world order and a cessation of brutal aggression anywhere it happens around the world. They are our strongest defenders of peace and of world order. They support the United Nations and they support generally the United Nations efforts, and they have indicated that to our government in writing.

I would like to say, although I am not going to quote exactly the wording, that they are the most thoughtful people in the world when it comes to war because they know the brutality. They have seen it. They have felt it. They have heard it. They have tasted it. Therefore I treat their views with a great deal of respect.

The hon. member's second question, was do we support his leader's amendment as proposed earlier today in the debate? Obviously midnight tonight—and I made this very clear—has been a deadline that has been known for a long period of time. I have never treated lightly the importance of this deadline to the Canadian people or to the 30-country coalition that has staked a great deal on resolution 678 and indeed the other 11 resolutions of the Security Council of the United Nations.

I support personally what the United Nations is doing. Without it, where will this all end? Do we reward aggression? Do we say to Saddam Hussein: "You have done well; continue and go on"? Or, do we do something and provide a deadline and seek the support of other member nations around the world, which has been done, and say: "Look, enough is enough. This is the time and this must stop, and here is what must happen"? It is a very simple thing. They must clear out of the country they have conquered, the country they have annexed.

I think that is a fair thing. I support that view and I support the United Nations.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, I have just a few points. I would like to congratulate the minister on his speech. Coming from my home province, I am very proud to have him here as a minister speaking on this very serious issue. Although we belong to different parties and we have a different point of view, I think it is important that we all have a chance to state our point of view.

I would like to set the record straight because it is important that we let people know where all parties and all MPs stand in regard to the United Nations resolution. There seems to be a misunderstanding out there as to our position with regard to the UN. In closing the minister mentioned that he supports the United Nations. I have to state that the Liberal Party of Canada also supports the United Nations.

Let us look at the events. When Iraq invaded Kuwait we supported the resolution in the House of Commons on October 23, 1990 which was in support of UN Security Council resolutions 660 and 662. When it came time for mandatory sanctions under UN resolutions 661 and 670, we supported them as well. When it came to using military force to enforce those sanctions, we supported that. But there comes a point in time when we have to consider whether we have gone far enough, and that is where we differ.

I think that all members of the House, regardless of what party we belong to and what part of the country we come from, have the same object in mind, that is to force Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait. The difference of opinion is in how to do that.

I want to make sure that the minister knows well that we have the same intention that he has, but we have a different means of achieving it. We feel that sanctions should have been given more of a chance to work. Statements in the fall by the President of the United States, by the Secretary of State of the United States, and by the CIA commissioner indicated that the sanctions were working. Experts would agree that it takes roughly 12 months for those sanctions to work. We feel that it is very important that we give those sanctions time to work. I felt it very important that I put those comments on record this evening.

I would also like to say—and I am sure the minister would agree—that we support the military efforts over there, in the sense that our military has been very professional in the way it has carried out its functions in the gulf. I would like to applaud our military experts for the way they have carried out their duties in the second major crisis in the last 12 months. They are very professional and they have proven it again. Let us hope that we can avoid this war.

Mr. Merrithew: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the obvious sincerity of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur. I have known him for some time and I know that he speaks with deep sincerity on important issues.

The bottom line here is the fact that we have had naked aggression by one country over a neighbouring country. These people have used force, killed, pillaged, raped, driven out half the country's population, and annexed that country as a province of their own. That is the bottom line. Something had to be done. Somebody has to stand on principle. The United Nations and the 30-member coalition has done that, and they have given a deadline.

I know there is a good deal of argument—and I have heard a great deal about it in debate today—indicating that sanctions have not been given enough time. The fact of the matter is there is no proof and, according to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he has received no proof that the sanctions or the embargo have really worked.

Proof positive of that is the fact that Saddam Hussein has not changed his mind. He is not the least bit sorry. He is not going to leave the country he has conquered. What will change his mind is not the sanctions. Some countries have had sanctions applied to them for as many as 10 years. How much time are we going to give them to dig in deeper, to build more defences, to develop more arms and perhaps even nuclear weapons to kill our troops when the United Nations finally would decide to take action? There has to be a time limit. That time limit has been given. It has been five and a half months since that aggression, and I think it is time that he did that. I do not see any proof that Saddam Hussein or the Iraqi people are repentant or willing to get out. They are just laughing with disdain and impunity at the United Nations and indeed the whole world. He does not care what will happen.

The two major negatives in allowing him more time are the fact that it will allow more time for building defences and, the sheer principle that a deadline was given five and a half months after naked aggression and the conquering of another country. He has had lots of time to show some movement, some willingness to co-operate with what the world agrees is a wrongdoing by his country and by his people.

What happens if we keep backing off and rewarding Saddam Hussein by saying: "This is all right. Deadlines do not matter. Don't pay attention to the United Nations. Don't pay attention. It doesn't matter"? I think sometime free and thinking people have to stand their ground, have to stand on principle, have to take a stand on things like this. Today is that day, and I support that.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, the crisis in the Persian Gulf is attracting universal attention. It is almost impossible to go anywhere without hearing about the crisis and the threat of war.

As I was listening to the Minister, I heard him say near the end of his remarks that there was no evidence the sanctions were working. I just cannot understand that after I have heard the greatest world experts agree that the sanctions against Iraq are working. I could quote figures provided to the u.s. Congress by Senator Mitchell, a man held in high esteem there. Tennessee Senator Gore, Senator Edward Kennedy, and even the leaders of the CIA have clearly indicated that the sanctions against Iraq are really working.

In spite of that, there are people who still claim that these sanctions will not bring Iraq to its knees. Yet, our own colleagues in the House, more specifically Mr. Axworthy, the hon members for Winnipeg South Centre, Burnaby—Kingsway and Fundy Royal, and Mr. Corbett, have seen with their own eyes that the sanctions are in the process of beating Iraq as an aggressor.

It is a fact that the whole history of the Middle East did not begin on August 2. It was following the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq that public opinion suddenly became aware more than ever of the Middle East. This problem goes back a hundred years and represents a hundred years of injustice and exploitation of the people because there is oil underground. There are countries of the world which are determined to take over this wealth, even if it is not situated in their own country. But is it surprising that the Middle East crisis came finally to a head?

In the u.s. Congress, various senators have given concrete evidence that the sanctions were working. Of course, they are party to privileged information. 90 per cent of all Iraq imports have stopped. Even the Iraqi currency paper is printed in England. Does this give you an idea just how much Iraq is on its knees? It is a country without an industrial infrastructure. It went overnight from camels to Cadillacs. It has no infrastructure. It depends on world imports. Together with other countries, Canada has managed to maintain an embargo.

Since the November 8 elections in the Congress however, we have been hearing a totally different story: we should be taking military measures and risk causing a war which would have a very uncertain outcome at the price of a tremendous loss of innocent lives. What for, when we can count on the support of other nations in the application of sanctions? That is a fact. So, it is no use trying to make us believe that sanctions do not work. It just is not true! The record will show that, if there is a war, it will be a point against the countries that started it and that is absolutely not necessary.

[English]

The longer sanctions are maintained, the weaker the aggressor, Iraq, becomes. The aggressor is weakening and what can be more desirable under the circumstances? We do not fight and they get weaker.

Logically, Iraq cannot continue for an indefinite period of time. The aggressor, Saddam Hussein, has a short countdown against him that is in our favour. One does not have to be a military strategist to understand the precarious situation that Iraq is facing internally.

In listening to the American senators in Congress, it became obvious that no one could criticize sanctions. No one could say they were not effective because they know they are effective. They work. Iraqis have no industrial infrastructure and they have no industry to maintain their military force that is needed. The Iraqis are completely dependent on imports and, as I mentioned before, their paper currency is actually printed in England. Can you imagine?

Canada's role in this whole affair has been diminished. We are not a military force nor a deterrent, for that matter, but in the past we never felt diminished because of our reputation as a peacekeeper. We were trusted and we had an independent foreign policy. Other countries could look to Canada as a sort of moral authority, requesting our support in the United Nations. What has happened in such a few short months? How can we be part and parcel of the American military camp?

We belong with the community of nations, under the flag and auspices of the United Nations, resolutely determined to use all efforts to prevent war, to maintain international law, to use sanctions, embargoes, diplomacy, pressure from all quarters to bring sanity to the surface, to wear down the aggressor, demoralize the aggressor, and to deprive the aggressor of any means to continue or maintain any course of aggression. That is where we belong. That is where all peaceful nations belong.

The crisis in the Middle East is not unexpected. There have been years of turmoil and injustice, and God knows there has been injustice. As my colleague from Western Arctic mentioned, if there were to be a conflict or war in the Middle East, we would see the emergence of other Saddam Husseins to bring vengeance on what has happened. That is obvious.

Consider the injustice and the struggle to control that oil resource in the Middle East. There was the setting up of arbitrary borders in the past, the maintaining of undemocratic regimes of kings, princes, and emirs who monpolized the wealth for their own private benefit, much of which finds its way into the American treasury in the form of bonds, European banks, and investments in other countries—but not for their own people. We are supporting leaders like that.

Canada now faces a crossroads in our history. Are we now part of those nations that risk conflict abroad, citing national interests as a reason? We do not belong in that group. We see ourselves as peacemakers and we are not powder monkeys.

History taught us that when there is a conflict, the threat of war is not a solution. As some of my colleagues pointed out, in a war there are no winners, only losers. Some lose less than others, but there are only losers. In this Middle East conflict, I hope everybody will come back to their senses once they realize that sanctions are the best way to put an end to an agression.

For once in the history of humanity, we have the chance to prove that sanctions are effective. That is the biggest step forward we can make in our civilization, to prove once and for all that there is no need to start wars, to launch attacks, and to make innocent victims. Too many innocents have died in the Middle-East. Must we recall the sacrifice foreign armed forces have inflicted upon Lebanon? Must we recall the suffering of Palestinians who have been treated unfairly for years and years? Nothing was done for them.

Some hon. members: We are still doing nothing.

Mr. Assad: That is right, we are still doing nothing. But, if a country produces oil, however little, we are there in the national interest. That is the worse case of hypocrisy I have even seen.

Canada has had an established reputation in the world for years, under Pearson, Saint-Laurent, Trudeau and even under John Diefenbaker who, admittedly, made sure that Canada had its own foreign policy completely independent from that of the United States.

In closing, if ever I wished and prayed for something in my life, it is that Canada agrees to tell the United States and any other country joining it: "We will give the sanctions time to produce their effect, even if it takes months or a year." The experts say it is a matter of time. We have plenty of time. We have behind us 5,000 years of wars, injustices, sacrifices and killings. Why not wait another six months and allow civilization to take another step forward?

I would like our country to be among those who told the world: "We are for sanctions and against any conflict that could lead to war. We believe that in time, with the support of other nations, we will achieve our goal and preserve peace. For the first time in the history of humankind, we will put an end to armed conflicts and finally eliminate agressors from this planet.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, first I would like to congratulate warmly my colleague, an authentic Quebecer whose mother was a French Canadian from Quebec and whose father was Lebanese will. He is able to reason and understand as many men and women in Quebec what is going on in the Middle East.

I will not make a speech or comments in this period of response to my colleague's speech, but will rather will ask him a direct question. I want to congratulate him for his attachment and also his sense of continuity since coming here in Parliament. He is not a man who changes his mind from one day to the next. I want to congratulate him for that also. He has made a remarkable contribution to the discussion in caucus. We are not allowed to refer to that, but it has been admirable. I would like to put to him a simple question.

Would he please expand on his opinion that more than ever the time has come to announce an international conference on all the issues in the Middle East? That in such a case, the Prime Minister of Canada should, without fear, show leadership at the United Nations through his Secretary of State for External Affairs in attempting a last great initiative. I ask my colleague to comment in a friendly way on what I have just said.

Mr. Assad: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his very kind words. Of course, for years that we have hoped that some nations, be it from Europe or America, would finally decide to have an international conference on the situation in the Middle East. There is no doubt that it would have been the greatest pride my country could have given me if Canada had taken the lead and told the United Nations that the time has finally and inevitably come to have an international conference to solve the problems of the Middle East, to remedy the injustices of the past,—to ensure that the Lebanese live in peace in their country, that the Palestinians find a place to rest their heads, and that Israel be safe from aggressors within guaranteed borders. But as long as the situation is such in the Middle East that we tolerate countries that have no notion of democracy but have an extremely important resource, as long as we refuse to face the real problems in the Middle East, we cannot expect that this conflict will be resolved by miracle or force. Even if they blew up three-quarters of the Middle East, it would not solve the problem.

If there ever was a time, I say that this time has come, and maybe this is the message that the opposition—as much from the Liberal Party as from the New Democratic Party—would like to send to this government and to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, asking them to make this last effort, to take this initiative to the United Nations and say that if an international conference can help to settle this matter, than let us propose it. That is to be hoped for.

Mrs. Deputy Speaker: Other questions or comments? Resuming debate. The hon. member for Bourassa.

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Madam Speaker, the stakes of the issue we are discussing tonight are extremely high and I would like to say that I was struck by the sincerity, the seriousness and the thoughtfulness of the speeches of the members who spoke before me.

Most of the people in my riding of Bourassa, like most of our fellow Canadians, are not experts in international politics. They do not spend their days trying to grasp the nuances and the vagaries of international relations. They spend their days earning a living and trying to improve the well-being of their family. Nevertheless, they are well-meaning people who rely on common sense to judge what is happening. When faced with issues such as Canadian participation in the gulf crisis, they are in the habit of asking direct and practical questions. They want to know why Canada got involved in this crisis. After all, is it not a far region and is it not a conflict between Arab countries trying to gain control of a greater share of oil? Why should we put in jeopardy the lives of hundreds of men and women, some from Montreal North, for a question of oil? What does this mean for people in my riding of Bourassa, for Quebecers, and for Canadians?

Although it is always tricky to try to explain complex situations with analogies, they can often illustrate the fundamentals of a question. In my opinion an invasion is neither more nor less than a robbery. Taking control of the territory of a neighbouring country is like stealing from a neighbour, and even worse, it is like beating neighbour to steal his property.

In the case of Kuwait the neighbour in question supplied a good part of the oil the world needs. Consequently, the robbery is of concern not only to the two parties. It involves the whole community. If the community does not intervene to prevent the robbery and the violence, which neighbour is going to be the next victim? That is the crux of the issue in this debate.

We cannot tolerate such acts because of the consequences for everyone and because, according to our principles and moral values, such acts are unacceptable and intolerable. If we do not tolerate aggression and violence in our towns and cities, why on earth should we tolerate aggression and violence in the international community?

Over the years, we have developed a system of laws and regulations to protect persons and property, in other words, to ensure that our fellow citizens behave in a manner that is acceptable. On a world scale, there are certain conventions and there is a code of behaviour to which most countries generally adhere. There are rules to ensure there is peace and order in the global village. The agency responsible for monitoring compliance with those rules is the UN Security Council.

Since the invasion of Kuwait last August, the Security Council's approach has been balanced and decisive. It was able to maintain a consensus when adopting twelve consecutive resolutions. The UN has explored all diplomatic avenues, which includes the latest visit to Baghdad by Secretary-General Perez de Cuellar, to find a peaceful solution to the gulf crisis. The Government of Iraq has reacted with intransigence, insolence, and indifference.

Faced with this lack of co-operation on the part of Iraq, on November 29, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 678, according to which member States are allowed to use all necessary means to ensure compliance with the previous resolutions, and more specifically, to oust the Iraqi forces and restore Kuwait's legitimate government.

This resolution was adopted on November 29. But in spite of numerous efforts to solve the crisis by pacific means, the Government of Iraq did not show any sign of changing its politics and its attitude in the matter. Thus, it appears to be unwilling to collaborate. It knowingly chose not to respect the international order, the United Nations, and the UN resolutions. The Iraqi government is an international outlaw, no less. Like all outlaws, it must suffer the consequences of its actions.

However, there is quite a striking difference between the Iraqi government's situation and that of the common criminal who makes the headlines. The fact is that the international community offers a way out to the Iraqi government, and a pacific one at that. It is up to Saddam Hussein to choose his destiny. Will he leave Kuwait of his own free will, or will he wait for the community of nations to force him to do it? Will he choose a pacific solution, or will he persist in defying international order, thus forcing a tragic confrontation with the international community?

Faced an obstinate and intransigent aggressor, should the international community bow down itself or should it take the necessary means to force the aggressor to retreat behind its own borders?

I suggest that on the basis of these considerations, only one conclusion can be drawned. Yes, we must constantly seek diplomatic and peaceful solutions to the crisis. Yes, we must maintain the UN imposed sanctions. However, is there any evidence that these sanctions have had any effect on the Iraqi government? None, as far as I know. Although they may have caused serious problems to the Iraqi people, after five months, they do not seem to have charged anything in the arrogance and inflexibility of the Baghdad regime. How long should we wait? Six months, a year, five years? There is no answer to that. After all that time, what would remain of Kuwait?

The presence of Iraqi forces has already been detrimental to the people, the economy and the infrastructure of Kuwait. Moreover, if the international coalition does not act decisively and efficiently, the whole international order and the principles of collective security will be seriously jeopardized. Failing a decisive action, the United Nations, credibility and effectiveness could rank among the major victims of the gulf crisis. We do not want to return to a situation where the only law which would prevail in this world would be the law of the strongest.

We are dealing with collective security. The invasion of Kuwait has already destabilized an already volatile region which is of tremendous importance for our interests and the health of the world economy. Through the United Nations, the international community must take action to re-establish the territorial integrity of Kuwait, one of its full members, failing which the notion of collective security would remain a purely theoretical view. We would endorse that might is right. Our words must be supported by our action.

Moreover, the invasion of Kuwait has profoundly disturbed the economic stability as well as the physical and social well-being of several countries in the world. That region of the Middle East contains more than 40 per cent of the world's oil reserves and the disastrous repercussions of rising oil prices are felt throughout the nation-inflation, unemployment, slower economic growth, not to mention a number of other problems related to international trade. This economic instability directly affects Third World countries as well as Eastern Europeans for whom oil prices amount to a major obstacle to economic recovery.

Canada is a pacifist nation, but it is also a responsible people in the world community. We have thoroughly explored all diplomatic and pacifist options, all the while stressing that any initiative whatever would be taken under the banner of the United Nations. But the Iraqi government is not prepared to release its grip on the territory and the people of Kuwait. There is no indication of a compromise.

The moment of truth has arrived. But this moment of truth has arrived not only for the Iraqi government, but also for the United Nations, for international order, and for the promotion of collective security. Our duty is to protect the weak from the strong. We simply cannot allow Saddam Hussein and his government to benefit from his aggression against Kuwait. Sooner or later he will have to realize that the international community cannot condone such acts of violence and territorial aggression.

The survival of Kuwait is at stake, the future of the Middle East is at stake, and the future of international order as well as the credibility of the United Nations are at stake. The international community must be able to rely on Canada. In short, Madam Speaker, Canada has to be there.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I congratulate the vice-chair of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade on her presentation. I know she is very knowledgeable on this subject. She concluded her debate by asking an open question of us all.

We are looking at the future international order and we are looking at the future of the United Nations.

I would like to ask her whether the credibility of the United Nations and its ability to solve similar problems in the future would not be enhanced if this dispute were resolved without military intervention. If this crisis has to be resolved through military intervention, would this not undermine the future world order and undermine the future effectiveness of the United Nations?

Mrs. Gibeau: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague, who sits on the Standing Committee on External Affairs, for his question.

Obviously, the goal of the United Nations is to ensure the over-all protection of nations, that is the protection of their territory as well as their people. The United Nations promoted and proposed measures that would have allowed the invading country to withdraw of its own free will from the country it had attacked without any provocation.

These resolutions have not changed, and are still in force until midnight today. That gives us four hours. We can still hope for a miracle the one which allowed Saddam Hussein to release the hostages. He could have a vision telling him to start moving his troops out of Kuwait.

In 45 years of existence, the United Nations has made several attempts at getting to what we now have, that is an unprecedented coalition with forces coming from a great many countries and taking a united stand against an agressor.

I agree with you that a peaceful solution would be the best. Everyone would be a winner. However, in this instance, we do not get to choose between peace and war. Unfortunately, what we have to deal with here is an invading country guilty of pillage, rape and plundering againt a sovereign nation which had a legitimate governement and is a member of the United Nations. Given the circumstances, the United Nations, of which Canada is also a member, cannot afford to break apart at this point in time.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is for the member whose speech was an attempt to speak to the practical and day-to-day concerns of her constituents in Bourassa.

Estimates flowing from the United States practice attacks that have taken place in the Middle East against fortifications similar to those which are said to be in place in Kuwait and in parts of Iraq, place the casualty rate has been at upward of 50 per cent, of those who would have been killed in these mock exercises.

I have two sons—I have one who is 23 and another who is about to turn 16. How many children, how many young people from our country on ships, planes and on the ground in the Persian Gulf does she expect to die as a consequence of military action? Would she bring herself to answer that practical and down-to-earth question for her constituents in Bourassa? Would she bring herself to answer the question for constituents of all of us who face the prospect of sons and daughters dying in a war thousands of miles away, having to do with the price of petroleum, having to do with the national interests of the United States, and having very little to do with the national interests of this country? What is her estimate of the number of Canadians who will die in military action as a consequence of the armed recourse which she recommends?

Mrs. Gibeau: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has just managed to pull off a feat worthy of the great Greek tragedies. I would like to return the question to him: How many children is he willing to sacrifice in Kuwait? How many women and children is he willing to let starve through economic sanctions that we know are not 100 per cent effective because there are leaks everywhere. It is not only food that leaks into Iraq through Iran, but also military equipment. My colleague opposite knows that. Sanctions are not effective. Borders are not tightly closed. We are dismissing our responsibilities to save our necks. I am talking about mine and yours. How far will hypocrisy go to save whose neck?

The hon. member is saying that children out there are not important, neither those from Kuwait, nor those from Iraq and neighbouring countries seriously threatened because an individual has decided that starving his people to him.

I find it unfortunate that a person would use this House to raise fears that are real, but at the same time to hide behind those fears. And that person belongs to a party that claims to be responsible.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Bourassa. It is quite simple. We are being intellectually dishonest here. We are debating a motion, pretending that it deals with a UN resolution so that we can all feel good in this place. In actual fact, we are debating a motion to give approval to send Canadian men and women of our Armed Forces to war.

What I want to ask the member, clearly and cleanly is if she believes that an affirmative vote on this motion gives the Prime Minister of this country, without further recall of this Parliament, the authorization to order Canadian forces into a theatre of war, in the event that American forces go into Iraq or Kuwait.

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Madam Speaker, I have heard the words "intellectual dishonesty". I do not know to whom they apply. They do not apply to this side of the House. Maybe he wants them applied to himself. I have said in my speech at the very beginning that I had been impressed by the quality and by the seriousness of the debates heard up to now. I do hope we will not witness a deterioration as we get closer to the deadline.

My colleague's question has no link with the present debate. I fail to see why we are departing. The subject under debate refers to responsibility. Does Canada really pretend to belong to the international community? Will Canada really fulfill its commitments to the United Nations? Will Canada really respect its so-called principle that, all peoples are equal for the United Nations?

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak in this very important debate. The motion under Government Business reads:

An amendment was moved to the motion to add:

"through the continued use of economic sanctions, such support to exclude offensive military action by Canada at this time."

It is somewhat ironic and cynical to be debating this issue at this hour, 8.05 p.m., four hours less five minutes to the deadline. It is theatre of the absurd.

The die is cast. I do not know what that die will mean, but certainly Canada and this debate are not going to effect the changes that would be required if we wanted to have a different outcome.

It is unfortunate that we were not able to get into this debate in a much more enlightened way, and certainly sooner, in the course of the events that have led us to this moment.

I rise with a great sense of sadness, concern and yes, a degree of despair at the way events seem to be propelling themselves forward in the Persian Gulf. I know I share that view with many Canadians. There seems almost to be a sense of resignation in the air as the breakout of hostilities in the Persian Gulf appears imminent.

Canadians just have to turn on their TV sets to see the military strategies being played out time and time again, scenarios that must frighten men, women, children, mothers, sons and daughters. I fear that this war, if it comes, may have come too quickly, and I regret that this government did not fight with more strength and conviction when it held that important seat on the Security Council which would have enabled it to promote the role of sanctions to a much greater extent.

Sanctions have not been given enough time. For whatever reason, the coalition of countries is now backed into a corner from which there appears to be little room to exit. Under these conditions, Canadians feel very helpless. They see and sense a degree of powerlessness, and I share that sentiment.

I share that sense of being unable to change the course of history. I recall the feelings I had as I saw the faces of the school children describing their fear of what is to come on the television cameras last night.

To be sure, as the hours tick down toward the UN deadline, no stone can be left unturned, no avenue should be left untested, and no option for peace can be rejected out of hand. At the same time, we cannot afford to give up on the very reason that the allied nations began this whole effort, to turn back Saddam Hussein's aggression without condition, and to stop this madman without offering something in exchange, without giving him a reward for the atrocities that he has committed and without making a linkage to other situations in the Middle East, because that is absolutely ridiculous and is not related.

I believe that we can, even at this last minute, achieve effective change if there is the public will on the part of all the countries that have come together to apply sanctions and to tighten the belt. At least we have the moral obligation to try that first. It must be very clear so that we can never say that we did not try all the options, that we did not try at least until they proved that they could not function.

To date, many experts have said—and that includes the director of the CIA and former Secretaries of State of the United States—that it is far too early to expect evidence of the effect of sanctions. I say to the House, give this action some time, let this embargo continue, give a chance to Saddam Hussein to halt, if it even means for him to save his ugly face, and let us try to find a peaceful solution.

No one wants a war. No man, woman, child, mother, father, sister, brother—the whole family constellation whether close or far apart—have the right to express themselves to their country, would ever want to choose war. War is a very devastating and miserable experience.

We do not live in a perfect world. No one wants famine either, but look at what is going on once again in Ethiopia, in the Sudan, and in other parts of the world. Hunger and famine exist in this not so perfect world.

No one wants human rights to be violated, but look at what just happened within our television memory of a day in Lithuania. Human rights are being violated. We have already forgotten what happened in China in Tiananmen Square. But in this imperfect world of ours, these things happen. It does not mean we have to accept them. It does not mean we do not speak out against them, but we cannot be constantly up in arms. We have to find a new world order in which hopefully, please God, we will be in a position to move forward with some other kinds of answers. No one wants to see military force used here but it may well have to be. The sounds of war can be heard all around us. Hospitals right here in Ottawa have been put on alert. All of this is part and parcel of this very imperfect world in which we find ourselves.

Though imperfect, there has been some improvement since the last world war. There has been some improvement since the time of the League of Nations. We now have before us the United Nations where for the first time we are seeing the use of a collective action, the sense of a collective role and responsibility and that gives me some modicum of comfort, not total comfort, in this imperfect world.

I recognize that circumstances are different today. We have, as I have said, the support of most of the world's countries. We do have 30 countries out there in the gulf working together to apply those sanctions, to set that embargo in place and to maintain it. This is not World War II or just prior to it with the disintegration of the League of Nations when Lester B. Pearson decried the abandonment of economic sanctions as a lever to effect change.

But there is a sense of history here too. There is a sense that there are lessons to be learned. I hope that those lessons were learned and those economic sanctions will help.

I have to put into the hopper very serious concerns which are best expressed in a letter I received among the many faxes and phone calls I have received. I want to read excerpts of this into the record. It reads:

> Dear Sheila:
> I recall as a young boy, standing on a Saturday afternoon near the Rhine Bridge in Cologne, watching units of the Reichswehr marching across the Rhine River in defiance of the Versailles Treaty. That was the beginning of the West's subservience to Hitler, to be followed by the anschluss of Austria, the takeover of Czechoslovakia, the unprovoked attack on Poland and, subsequently, the Second World War with its loss of 25 million lives, including one-third of the world's Jewish population. I was witness to all this history, and will never forget it.
> Saddam Hussein's rape of Kuwait and his arrogance and bloodthirsty assault on world peace is a striking shocking parallel of past history.
> His hypocritical effort to manoeuvre the world into the issue of linkage with the Palestinian problem is, unfortunately, being bought by so many in the west and, naturally, in Mohammedan countries.
> It is very evident that nothing seems to move Saddam Hussein to back down on his position. The likelihood of the coalition holding against him long enough to have sanctions work would appear very slim.
> I hope, Sheila, that this lesson of history will be on your mind in tomorrow's debate on the gulf situation.
> Yours truly,
> Kurt Rothchild

I understand Kurt Rothchild and I understand the millions and millions of Canadians who have lived through this horror, who lived through the Holocaust and for whom this must be a very difficult moment.

But there were no sanctions then. I would hope that in supplying sanctions, we are not giving in and we are not giving up on the United Nations and on its resolutions. It is a matter of timing. I should say we do respect the United Nations. We adhere to the United Nations' principles, and we do respect the charter.

If we are on the brink of war, we can surely admit that mistakes were made along the road that got us here. Those mistakes brought us too quickly, to the brink of a conflict nobody desires. Those mistakes were real. They may very well have forced the hand of the United Nations coalition into the pending battle.

Of course, the first and most enormous mistake was Saddam Hussein's aggression in the first place. But were sanctions given enough time? I do not think so. Was adequate time given to search for peaceful resolutions while avoiding linkage with other issues? I do not think so.

With respect to Israel, as we look at the Middle East where the world's eyes are now focused, we see a region which has known more war than peace in recent times. My eyes, both as a Canadian and as a Jew, are also drawn to Israel. Naturally, Canada is a good friend of Israel. It, too, is watching Iraq's actions very closely. Israel has clear and definite security interests, but Israel has not sought to confront Iraq, nor attempted to enter the present crisis in the Gulf. Israel does not want war. Israel wants to see this aggression peacefully resolved as do we here in the House and as do all Canadians.

We are, however, aware of Iraq's stated intention to attack Israel if war breaks out. This kind of action would be unacceptable to Canada and Canadians. We share in the conviction of Israel's right to defend itself if attacked. It is the same right we maintain here in Canada. We also reject any linkage of Iraq's aggression to other situations in the Middle East.

We all truly regret the way events seem to be propelling themselves at this hour in the Persian Gulf. I fear, as do so many Canadians, that we are on the threshold of a war that nobody wants.

Finally, it is with sincere regret that we face the prospect of warfare in the Persian Gulf. I do sincerely wish that sanctions had had their desired effect before this time. I hope to God it is not too late. I hope the United Nations coalition will hold and will work.

All Canadians wish that we were not facing conflict, but most of all I wish that Saddam Hussein had listened to the world after these many months and had realized that his aggression would not be allowed to stand.

Let us not forget that, if war should come it comes chiefly from the intransigence of Saddam Hussein and his steadfast refusal to heed world opinion and retreat from Kuwait, and from his brutal assault on a small, unsuspecting neighbour. This small, unsuspecting neighbour—which was not much of a democratic state, itself—will, I hope, be returned to a life that would include a democratic life-style. I would hope that the untold atrocities of this man and his ilk will not be forgotten. I would hope that, where there is no sign of remorse and regret, the world will move to act.

There are no winners in a war. This one is just too horrible to contemplate. That being said, there is no question that, at a given point, one has to say that enough is enough. Circumstances, at a given point in to time, will not allow us to contemplate idly such injustice without action and we should certainly not expect that Kuwait should be the Czechoslovakia of 1991.

At this moment, I share with Canadians their concern and apprehension in these hours before the UN deadline. Instinctively, Canadians are all opposed to war. Intuitively, Canadians are peaceful people. Our frustration in this hour is real, the discouragement is genuine, and the concern is certainly grave. Along with all Canadians, I wish that this entire affair had not occurred, but we cannot change that. Short of that, Canadians, being a peaceful people, hope and pray that peace is swiftly returned to the Persian Gulf.

It seems insane that war should be the only solution should this world enter into the unknown—a nuclear holocaust, bacterial warfare, or chemical warfare. As a representative of thousands and thousands constituents who have suffered at the hands of Stalin in the Second World War, I am in a position to understand that intense desire for justice, a sense of desire for revenge, and the desire to go to war. People cannot stand the thought of the rape and pillage on the one hand and letting those who ravage go free on the other. Yet, I just cannot counsel war as the first option at this moment.

If the initial United Nations resolution and its evaluation has contained Hussein in his ill-conceived aspirations for leadership and power, perhaps just a little more time will allow the United Nations to verify how the sanctions are working and will allow Hussein to back off. It is the moral duty, however, of the international community to stop him. The question is, how soon if he still does not budge?

I would say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if ever we have to revert to a more aggressive action it is because there is no other way. God willing, let there be no war.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the member a couple of questions relative to her comments on linkage. Linkage has to be addressed in the sense of history and I address this to my colleague with some thought of history.

Currently, Syria has said as one of the members of the United Nations group that, should Iraq attack Israel and Israel responds in defence, Syria will walk out of the alliance. Is that the kind of Canadian partner that we are talking about when we hear the Prime Minister talk about Amnesty International?

The President of Egypt said in a recent interview that, should the Israelis respond to an unprovoked attack by Saddam Hussein, he too would consider leaving the alliance, although after that interview was published he softened his position.

They speak of linkage. They have already made linkage conditions to part of what we are playing. Let us understand that nobody's hands are clean in this whole area. They have put conditions on their partnership that this government has not talked about, nor has the United States. Where does that leave Israel? It is a good question to contemplate.

The other thing the hon. member addressed which I thought was appropriate in the letter was a question of comparing this to the anschluss. That has not been the line that has been attempted to be sold as an argument against Saddam Hussein. I make it clear that I hold no grief for that tyrant who has poisoned his own people with poison gas. But if we are going to talk in the terms of the anschluss and we are going to talk in terms of what the Prime Minister of this country said today about invoking Amnesty International's report—a correct accurate report on the brutality of Saddam Hussein's government's actions in Kuwait—let us understand where the host ground, Saudi Arabia, ranks when it comes to Amnesty International. My dear friends, nothing is pure, nothing is clean, and there is a linkage everywhere.

I would like her response to some of these partners and their linkage: Syria, as I have outlined; Egypt, as I have outlined; and now Saudi Arabia.

Saudi Arabia is a country where women are stoned to death for adultery. It is a country where a thief is punished by having his hand amputated. Women cannot drive cars or swim in the same pool as men. Bibles are forbidden and no religion, save Islam, is allowed. I wish the Prime Minister were here to listen to this because he is the one who invoked Amnesty International. Amnesty International reported that last year 111 people were executed, 16 of them political prisoners, and they had their heads chopped off. I do not advocate that for dealing with politics here. But when talking about linkage, remember we are linking ourselves with Saudi Arabia and, by the Prime Minister's criteria of Amnesty International, one cannot use it for one country and not another. Amnesty International does not have very much nice to say about Saudi Arabia.

There is linkage already defined by some of the partners, for example, Syria and Egypt. There is a request for Israel to shut up when a rocket comes over there and not respond. Linkage? That is linkage by the tacit message from the United States to Israel. When we talk about linkage, let us understand that there is heck of a lot more involved than just linkage around a reasonable peace treaty.

On the basis of that record and that linkage, not sparked by Saddam Hussein's actions, would it not be appropriate that the least we could expect is a regional conference in that area to deal honestly and in an up front way with every single one of the problems, rather than just going hell bent for leather to get into a war without understanding the consequences of the linkage we have already subscribed to?

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I would answer my hon. colleague that he has not missed the obvious, I am sure.

The linkage between Israel and its' responsibilities in this for part of the problems, as they have been expressed by Saddam Hussein, has absolutely nothing to do with Hussein's violent aggression against a colleague, against a country that supported him both financially and morally, a country for which he was a co-operative part of that whole Arab constellation of countries. He walked in and raped his neighbour. The difference is that Israel was aggressed by all its neighbours, won an almost impossible war and tried to give that land back in exchange for peace and no peace conference was forthcoming by the Arabs.

Do not make the inaccurate and incorrect linkage with that in that respect. Yes, Lebanon has been aggressed by Syria and Israel got accused of certain things. No one is absolutely blameless in any of that area.

With respect to the cultural practices in Islam and the cultural attitudes toward a lifestyle in the countries of that Arab world, I have no intention of asking or telling them how to change it. Its' own population should do that and it should be responsive to its' own population, to the women's movement in that area who no more want to walk around with those chadors and God knows what else. They want certain kinds of freedoms. I do not know to what extent they want freedom. I do not know how much, or how far, or what changes they want to make. They can be responsible for themselves. They are very intelligent. They are very capable.

The Arab people and the Muslim people are very intelligent and capable people if left without some of the power hungry idiot mongers out there, who are changing those people and their attitudes. Israel, Jews and Arabs lived as comfortable brothers and sisters together for generations. It is only in recent history that this is an aberration. It is because of the power hunger of their leadership at this date.

Please, let us talk about linkage perhaps, but not this kind of linkage at this time. Yes, there are many problems, but we cannot solve them all. The one we are discussing tonight—and it is almost the eleventh or the twelfth hour—is the question of Saddam Hussein and his rape of Kuwait. It is the impossible situation of the Kuwaiti people that has to be settled. We have to find ways to do that which do not put that whole conflagration into operation: nuclear holocaust, bacterial warfare, chemical warfare, and God knows what its impact will be on all of us.

We do have a moral responsibility. We have a responsibility as a people and Canada cannot walk away from it. We are not suggesting that we walk away from it. We are suggesting that we have to pick the proper time for Canada.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, this is an important opportunity in front of so many members here because I do not fundamentally disagree with what the hon. member is saying. She is pointing out the idealized goal. I am pointing out some of the inconsistencies of the current Canadian government's position. I think they have to be understood.

The Prime Minister is the one who invoked Amnesty International. I am the one who reminds the House that it was the Prime Minister who brought in Amnesty International as a touchstone for his definition of good works. One of our partners here does not stack up too well in good works.

The linkage I referred to is not the one that Saddam Hussein has defined. I agree with the hon. member completely that he is in no position to define anything. He is the aggressor. But some of our partners have defined linkage.

What I was bringing to the hon. member's attention is the linkage defined by Syria which is now one of our partners. Mr. Assad's linkage is that if Israel is attacked and responds, he will pull out of the partnership. What kind of partner it that? The same with President Mubarak of Egypt. Furthermore, these things do not happen in isolated arenas. Who was it that armed Iraq to the teeth? It was the Soviet Union, the United States, and France that armed Iraq.

I am just pointing out that there is linkage in other dimensions and I did not want that opportunity to pass without understanding that linkage has more to say than just one single definition, and I agree with the member.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, there is no question that war makes very strange bedfellows. Of that, there is no question. I would say that the linkage has more to do with power and power hungry persons, and leadership of the Arab world. It is not with oil, and that is why perhaps one might see Syria talking out of both sides of its mouth. That is why I think that there may be that kind of linkage problem.

With respect to what the Prime Minister is doing, I have no intention of referring to the unpopular Prime Minister. I have much more interest in referring to the importance of Canadian's sons and daughters who are in this war and what they have to look forward to, and what kind of answers we as parliamentarians and their elected representatives have as a moral responsibility.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to participate in this very important debate.

I would like to begin by making some comments on the remarks by the hon. member for Mount Royal, which I thought were very articulate and very heartfelt. She articulated the issue very clearly and in a very straightforward way when she said: "There comes to be a point when enough is enough."

Really, the question is: When is that point? What is so vexing about the situation which faces us in the Middle East today is trying to determine when that point is.

As a member of the government, I must say that I cannot imagine an issue more difficult. It is one that has certainly occupied us and preoccupied us for some time now.

I think it is important perhaps to review why we are where we are. The key decision made by the countries of the world was a decision to prevent Iraq from any further aggression after it had occupied Kuwait. This required not simply the imposition of interdiction of shipping in the gulf. This was, in many ways, after the fact, but involved the landing of land forces in Saudi Arabia to prevent the further extension of Iraqi military occupation.

Once that was done, the international community was faced with the question of how to resolve the situation. It is extremely difficult because the situation is very unstable.

The member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca pointed out some of the difficulties in that area. There is an enormous amount of tension. Politics does make strange bedfellows, and sometimes it makes estranged bedfellows.

The coalition that has come together uniquely and for the first time in our history to deal with the situation in the Middle East is a very fragile one, and when trying to identify the appropriate moment in history to decide that sanctions are not going to be effective and that it is appropriate to take additional steps to enforce the desire of the world to have order, and to deter aggression.

It is important to recognize that it is a very unstable situation. The cost of not acting is very high. Therefore, I think the actions of the United Nations made a great deal of sense when, after imposing sanctions, after countries of the world were prepared to go into Saudi Arabia to prevent further expansion of Iraq, the countries of the United Nations through the Security Council set a deadline because the situation was very clear. Either Iraq had an intention to abide by the resolutions of the Security Council, or it did not.

The problem with the analysis of sanctions is that there is an assumption there were sanctions in fact to intrude on Iraq's warmaking capability and that Iraq would withdraw from Kuwait. I think that is a highly questionable assumption.

On the contrary, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has pointed out that whatever the effect of sanctions are on Iraq, they have not been on its warmaking capability or on the strength of its military.

It is also naive to assume that were sanctions to begin to have that kind of effect and to begin to bite on the military capability of Iraq it would lead Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait. The coalition that is in the Middle East now to deter aggression is unstable. There are many conflicting issues. The Middle East conflict between Israel and its Arab neighbours is only one of them.

The tension between the Arab Muslims who live there and the non-Arab Muslims who are there as part of foreign troops is also part of a very destabilizing difficult situation. Saddam Hussein has everything to gain by time because it enables him to pick his moment to try to destabilize the coalition. I can quite imagine what would happen if he began to feel that things were getting a little bit tight in terms of the interdiction of shipping, and it is a very loose set of sanctions. There certainly are back doors and very large holes in the sieve in terms of key military capability. It is not at all clear that such a situation would not in fact lead Saddam Hussein to take a desperate military act in the hopes of destabilizing the coalition and making it impossible for it to act. The longer the international coalition waits, the more difficult it is to act with cohesion because the more its internal inconsistencies will come into play.

We have a very rare and fragile situation there. It is a situation that has been made possible by a reduction in tensions in the cold war. I was very touched by the member for Mount Royal's reading of the letter from someone who had witnessed the events before World War II. It is appropriate not to overdraw historical analogies, but it is also important to learn the lessons of history.

Will we stop and think that one of the reasons the United Nations has been unable to function as an effective deterrent to aggression for the last 45 years is because of the legacy of the cold war? That legacy of the cold war is a legacy whereby tens and tens of millions of people have lived under a dictatorship and under oppression in the countries of eastern Europe.

I was born in 1947 right after the war; I am 43. There are people my age who have never known freedom and the reason they have lived under those situations is a direct result of the inability of the international community to deter aggression in the late 1930s.

We talk about the cost of not deterring aggression. It is a cost that is worn often by generation after generation. It is that direct cost of failing to deter aggression in the late 1930s which subsequently rendered as a result of the post-war regime whereby, as a result of World War II, the highly undemocratic Soviet Union was able to take over much of eastern Europe, countries which had been democratic prior to the war.

It has taken my whole lifetime to change that. And in the course of my whole lifetime, the United Nations has not been capable of acting as its founders wanted because of the tensions of the cold war.

We are talking about a very complex situation and it is very difficult to try to read what will happen. None of us has a crystal ball, but it is important to recognize that we have a rare opportunity to establish a principle here. It is not precipitous of the United Nations to want to back up sanctions with force because it is a very realistic assessment of what is going to happen in the Middle East. If Saddam Hussein does not respect the ultimatum and the deadline of the United Nations by today, he is not going to respect it next month or the month after. In fact, the capability of deterring him and getting him out of Kuwait diminishes rather than increases because the capacity of the coalition to act decreases.

My intention this evening was not so much to address those particular issues, although I was very moved by the presentation of the member for Mount Royal and wanted to address some of those concerns because I have been part of the process of trying to deliberate this vexing and troubling issue.

As Minister of Justice I do want to talk a little bit about the legal framework in which the government has conducted its dealing with this particular issue. There are some important issues in terms of the law and the Constitution that should perhaps be put on the record.

The rule of law is the guiding principle of our domestic constitutional system and the ultimate reason for our longstanding commitment to the United Nations system. The issue today is the rule of law in international affairs and whether it can be made a reality and not just a pious hope.

We Canadians have special reasons to understand the crucial importance of the rule of law. It is the foundation of our democracy and of our fundamental rights and freedoms found in our Charter. Respect for the law has always been fundamental to what makes this country a safe and peaceful place to live. Canadians know that when the law is broken, it is society that is harmed not just the victim.

So, too, in the world at large. All countries, and all peoples are put at risk when the strong invade the weak. Fundamental values are put at risk. The world must stand by its principles and protect the rule of law as the basis for future hope for all mankind. Canadians would expect no less if we were the victims.

It is against this background that I would like to speak of the legal aspects of this crisis, both in Canadian and international law, and talk of the respective roles of the government, Parliament, and the United Nations.

[Translation]

Under Canadian law, the use of military force by Canada on its own initiative or as part of the United Nations collective security system has always been the prerogative of the Crown, as is the authority to sign treaties and to recognize or refuse to recognize foreign states. That is at the heart of the conduct of external relations. As recently as 1981, the Supreme Court of Canada stated that the power to declare war was part of the prerogative of the Crown. Our constitutional law experts share this opinion. An enforceable measure authorized by the UN is certainly a military intervention that does not go beyond the limits of traditional prerogative.

Section 31 of the National Defence Act deals with the situation of armed forces personnel. It provides that the Governor in Council may place the Canadian forces on active service in consequence of any action undertaken by Canada under the United Nations charter.

[English]

The House will recall that an Order in Council was passed on September 15, 1990 under this provision, placing the Canadian component of the multinational military coalition on active service. This measure was stated to apply not only to the implementation of United Nations measures that had then been passed. It also referred to participation in "such other actions as may be appropriate under the charter of the United Nations".

The government made sure that the House was aware of all the events that have occurred since the beginning of the crisis. We have done so out of a deep respect for the parliamentary system, democracy and the principle that a responsible governement must account to the House for all the important decisions it makes. Today, we put this question before the House for a third time because the situation is so critical that it is appropriate for the House to consider it.

[English]

Hon. members will no doubt recall the resolution passed on October 23 which condemned the Iraqi invasion, affirmed support for Canadian actions, and contained an undertaking on the part of the government to present a further resolution in the event of an outbreak of hostilities.

This was followed by a resolution of November 29 which supported the efforts of the UN under the original resolution and subsequent UN resolutions, including resolution 678. Notwithstanding that there has not been an outbreak of hostilities, the government has ensured that the House has been recalled to consider this motion as the expiry of the UN deadline draws near.

The measures the government has taken in bringing developments before Parliament go beyond what happened in the case of the Korean conflict. There Parliament was indeed informed and given an opportunity to debate the issue, but it was after the fact. Here the government has consistently brought matters to the House in a timely way.

Some people argue that the terms of the motion are too vague. Those people forget that we want essentially to support the UN and the action it has taken. We are not alone in this. We are participating in a collective effort with many other countries. The terms of the motion must not be too strict. They must provide for enough flexibility to be able to react to the events as they occur in the context of the UN.

Until now I have spoken only of the various initiatives Canada has taken and of the constitutional framework in which they have been taken. Allow me to give an overview of the decisions that were made by the UN, the order in which they were made, and the principles of the UN charter on which they are based.

[English]

In the exercise of its responsibilities under the United Nations charter to maintain or restore international peace and security, the Security Council adopted resolutions under chapter VII of the charter. The first resolution, resolution 660 of August 2, 1990, determined that there was a breach of international peace and security as regards the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait on August 2, 1990. It condemned the invasion, demanded immediate withdrawal by Iraq, and called upon Iraq and Kuwait to begin immediately intensive negotiations for the resolution of their differences.

Four days later, on August 6, in resolution 661, the Security Council, deeply concerned that resolution 660 had not been implemented and noting that the legitimate Government of Kuwait had expressed its readiness to comply with resolution 660, decided to impose economic sanctions under chapter VII of the charter.

According to the other resolutions, the Security Council declared legally invalid the annexation of Kuwait by Iraq. It asked Iraq to facilitate the immediate departure of third party nationals from Iraq or Kuwait, condemned the Iraqi agression against diplomats and diplomatic premises, and asks member states which had naval forces in the region at that time to take all necessary and justified measures under the circumstances to intercept ships and enforce the economic sanctions.

[English]

Finally, by resolution 678 of November 29, 1990, the Security Council, recalling and reaffirming its 11 resolutions relating to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and mindful of its duties and responsibilities under the charter of the United Nations for the maintenance and preservation of international peace and security, gave Iraq until the end of January 15, 1991 to comply fully with resolution 660 and all subsequent relevant resolutions requiring Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait. Failing this, member states are authorized to use all necessary means to implement those resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area. Furthermore, resolution 678 requested all states to provide support for these actions.

The overriding principle of the United Nations is the maintenance of international peace and security through collective action. The most fundamental principle of the charter is article 2, paragraph 4, which prohibits the use of force in international relations, especially aggression against the territorial integrity of any state.

Article 2, paragraph 5, requires all the members of the United Nations to render assistance to the organization in actions which it undertakes under its authority.

Article 25 stipulates that the members of the United Nations agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council. The House approved the charter and Canada's membership in the United Nations with all the obligations that entails by a motion passed on October 19, 1945, shortly after the birth of the new organization.

What this House is discussing today is no more and no less than the fulfilment of its obligations under international law and specifically under the charter of the United Nations to which Canada has committed its full support.

Prime Minister St. Laurent said in this House in 1950 in connection with the Korean action: "the whole prestige of the United Nations has been committed. It is not only the fate of South Korea that hangs in the balance. It is the fate of the United Nations, the fate of that organization upon which the hope of peace in the years ahead now rests."

To put it simply, this is an exercise in law enforcement. It is a repudiation of those such as Saddam Hussein who attempt to take the law into their own hands in an effort at the collective enforcement of the most fundamental principles of international law.

[Translation]

In brief, the authority and the legal responsibility really exist. Everybody knows that superpower rivalries have always harmed the general objectives of the United Nations charter. The first hopes were dashed, but the situation has evolved and new opportunities exist. The fundamental principle of non agression on which rests the United Nations charter could not be fully applied unless members states agreed to honor their solemn commitment to collective security. We all must be ready to defend our principles and to assure the security of innocent and law-abiding peoples.

[English]

Let me conclude by assuring this House that every step the Canadian government takes in this matter will be in strict conformity with both the Canadian Constitution and international law.

I would like to conclude by pointing out that I quoted Prime Minister St. Laurent speaking about the important implications of the Korean action and this country's participation in it. That was the last time that the United Nations was capable of acting in a concerted way to enforce international law. It happened because one of the countries that traditionally vetoed the motions of the Security Council which would have permitted that action happened to be absent from the Security Council on that day. The action in Korea was able to take place only because of the absence of a member of the Security Council.

It has been 41 years since the United Nations has been able to take concerted actions in the Security Council and to pass unanimous resolution upholding the rights of international law and upholding the action of United Nations against aggression. It should not be another 41 years before the United Nations can do that. It is a very important time in its history, and I strongly support Canada's participation in this action.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask the hon. minister a very brief question.

Inasmuch as I have heard this type of speech on several times this evening, would she tell this House if it is her understanding that a positive response to the resolution means in fact that the government will engage in armed intervention without further consultation with Parliament?

I will accept a very brief answer; a yes or a no will do.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, our troops that are in the gulf now and have been there—

An hon. member: They are not in armed conflict.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): The troops that are in the gulf to fulfil their obligations under sanctions have always been in a position where they might have to engage in combat. They are vulnerable and, if they had been attacked, they would have had to respond.

What I have tried to point out is that the constitutional, legal authority to change that mandate, which has not been changed, is the royal prerogative. That decision has not yet been made and it is why this debate is taking place. I want to say that as a member of the government I have been very grateful for the insightful and thoughtful comments that have been made in this House today.

I have tried to hear as many of them as I can, either directly or on television, because it is a very difficult decision. The operating mandate of our forces has not changed. It is a misconception on the part of some Canadians that their being in the gulf now to enforce sanctions means that they would not possibly become involved in combat. That could have happened at any given time and they would of course have behaved appropriately.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the minister.

I preface my question by pointing out that the minister has made reference to the conflict in Korea some 41 years ago. The minister will know—and I am surprised that she did not draw it to the attention of the House—that the troops engaged in that particular conflict were of course under United Nations command. That is not the case with the troops that would be engaged in the conflict if, God forbid, war breaks out in this particular instance.

I want to draw to the minister's attention the fact—and I am sure she is aware of it—that she is, as I am, from Vancouver, British Columbia. The minister will know and will recall that on the weekend literally thousands of British Columbians gathered in the heart of her constituency in front of the art gallery—young people, teachers, war veterans and others—urging this government not to plunge Canada into a war, to give sanctions more time to work, and to give diplomacy more time to work.

The minister knows that today some 2,000 high school and university students felt so strongly on this question that they demonstrated, peacefully, outside the minister's office.

How can the minister defend the policy of this government which could conceivably, within a matter of literally hours at this point, involve Canadian troops in a military offensive, no longer in the enforcement of sanctions but in a military offensive, in a war, the consequences of which would be absolutely devastating?

The minister has talked about what is happening to Kuwait now. Of course what is happening in Kuwait is very destructive, but what on earth would happen to Kuwait in the event of a war? It would mean the death of tens of thousands of Kuwaitis, the destruction of the environment, and the rise of Iran and Syria as the key players in that area.

Will the minister not recognize that the people of British Columbia, and the people of Vancouver Centre, are fundamentally opposed to our involvement in a war and want to give peace a chance? Will she not stand in her place, accept that, and speak out against the madness of war?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the daughter of two war veterans I do not have to be told about the horrors of war. I am deeply concerned about it and I share the concern of many people in British Columbia. Equally, there are many people in British Columbia who have indicated their strong support for the stand the government is taking. The difficult judgment that has to be made is what is the more costly route. It is true that war is a frightening possibility.

I would be curious to know whether it is the position of the New Democratic Party that the countries of the world should not have gone in to stop Iraq from going into Saudi Arabia because that, in fact, was the key action which has involved the international community. It was the decision of the international community that Iraqi aggression had to be stopped, and it could only be stopped by force. Calling Saddam Hussein and asking him kindly not to go into Saudi Arabia was not terribly effective. Neither in fact, have been the implications of world statesmen who claim to know and to have had a good relationship with Saddam Hussein.

No one perhaps has a better moral claim to Saddam Hussein's ear than Perez de Cuellar, who was so instrumental in helping to disengage the war between Iraq and Iran. It is obviously one of the great defeats and tragedies of his career that he has been unable to encourage or to convince Saddam Hussein to step back.

Once the decision of the international community was made to stop that aggression, we had taken an irrevocable step, and the question is where do we go from there? I would suggest that in this case there is no ideal solution. Establishing the rule of law and establishing peace is sometimes messy. Those young people who demonstrated in my riding today, and the young people who demonstrate everywhere, do so because a lot of young Canadians and other people were prepared to pay a very significant price to deter aggression. Sometimes force has to be exerted.

It has been an agonizing few weeks for the Government of Canada in trying to make those judgments. We are of the view, as are most of the countries of the western industrialized world, that sanctions will not only not work but that they are imposing a terrible, terrible cost on the world's poor, that they are increasing the destabilization of the Middle East, and that the ultimatum presented by the nations of the United Nations was in fact a reasonable notice to Saddam Hussein that his aggression would not be tolerated, would not be sustained, and would not be condoned by the world.

I would like to know if it is in fact the policy of the New Democratic Party that the world should not have gone in to stop the expansion of Saddam Hussein. I can find nothing to recommend him as a world leader. I can find nothing to recommend him as a liberator of Kuwait or any other country. I think that the international community was quite right in going in to stop him.

What is being suggested is that somehow that action could be taken with no further implications and that is not the reality. The world community has to determine what is the best way to resolve this situation, not what is the perfect way, but in a very imperfect world and faced with a series of very unattractive options, what is the one way that has the best chance of defending and supporting the principles of international order?

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, we are debating government motion No. 27 which states "that this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait". The government members who are speaking are not addressing the intent of the motion, especially the ministers. The minister did not answer the questions posed by the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence. I ask her again; What does the government hope to achieve by having this motion passed in this House? What powers, what authority, what flexibility will this motion give the government that it does not have now?

My second question is, this, and I want it on record; will the minister support the Liberal amendment which adds to the motion of the government "through the continued use of economic sanctions such support to exclude offensive military action by Canada at this time"? The key words are "at this time". We are saying that we may support military action in the future, but not at this time. Could she be very specific in her answer, and not beat around the bush?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, constitutionally in Canada, the resolution of this House does not change the power or the Crown prerogative to make the key decisions as to what the mandate of our forces will be and what we will do. This is a motion to express the will of the House, but it is not within the power of this House to make those decisions with respect to the disposition of military forces.

The point I made was that there are two constitutional principles here. One is where the power resides to make those decisions. I think members can understand why it is the prerogative of the Crown because of the kinds of decisions and the speed with which decisions have to be made.

There is also a constitutional provision called ministerial responsibility, the principle of responsible government, whereby the government, having exercised its prerogatives and its powers, nonetheless answers to those and is accountable for them to the House.

That is the purpose of this debate. It is a very serious purpose, because there are many decisions yet to be made. I want to tell the hon. member that the members of the government are listening very seriously to the concerns and views that are being expressed by all members of this House. It is a very important time and I think all of us agree that many of the points raised, for example, by the hon. member for the Yukon, the leader of the NDP, were very well expressed today.

These are questions we have been wrestling with and it was very appropriate for those questions to be put by the hon. member so that the ministers of the Crown could respond to them. What we have tried to do, in keeping with our particular responsibilities, is to put before the House the reasons and the rationale for the government's position.

As Minister of Justice, I wanted to clarify some of the underlying legal principles which guide us and I took the opportunity to talk about some of the other aspects as well.

This is a very important debate. It does not rewrite the Constitution, but it is part of the very important constitutional principle of responsible government whereby government exercises its prerogatives but in consultation with, accountable to, and answerable to Parliament.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice may have inadvertently given away the secret, if you like, of the reality that the government is asking us to accept. In citing the consensus out of which the government is operating, she referred finally, not only or specifically, to the United Nations, but to the western industrialized world, and the conclusions that world has drawn about what should be done in the Middle East with respect to the Iraqi invasion and annexation of Kuwait which we all condemn but on which we are going to disagree with each other tonight about how we deal with that invasion and annexation.

I say that I hope that in my comments this evening that I might in some way or another faithfully reflect what I believe to be the legitimate ambiguity and agonizing that Canadians of all walks of life have been going through, particularly in the last week as they saw January 15 approaching. This is a feeling I think that can best be described as having that sense of responsibility that Canadians have toward the world community and toward the maintenance of international law and order, having that sense of responsibility called upon by the government, feeling the tug of that training and of that ethic which is a good ethic, but nevertheless feeling that somehow they are being led down the garden path, that somehow their principles are being exploited, that they are being taken advantage of, and that their beliefs are being applied in a context which does not really deserve the full application of that responsibility.

I want to begin with some of the things that the Secretary of State for External Affairs said because I had something to do with the Secretary of State for External Affairs when I was the external affairs critic for my party in the summer when the Iraqi invasion first occurred.

The speech of the minister was at times a very eloquent appeal for unity. At other times, it descended into what I would regard as partisan politics and caricaturing of opposing arguments. But I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if he was interested in building a Canadian consensus about how Canada ought to respond to this particular event, why he did not do that on August 2. Why did Canadians, and particularly Canadian members of Parliament, have to hear about the decision to send Canadian ships to the gulf from the Secretary of State for External Affairs coming out of a NATO foreign ministers' meeting?

Why could that decision not have been made, if indeed that was the decision to be made, after consultation with Canadian members of Parliament, with the Canadian external affairs committee, with his counterparts in the House of Commons, or with anybody here in Canada who had a political responsibility? That did not happen.

I met with the Secretary of State for External Affairs early that week after the invasion and had a fairly long conversation with him. I had no inkling. No impression was given whatsoever, in fact quite the contrary, that Canada by the end of the week would be sending ships to the gulf.

I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that to come to us now and ask us for uncritical support at the conclusion of a process that time and time again he bungled by not taking Canadian parliamentarians seriously is the height of nerve. It is the height of nerve also when the fact is considered that time after time Parliament was asked to approve things after the fact, somewhat in the way the UN was constantly asked to approve things after decisions had already been taken in Washington or in Ottawa.

The Minister of Justice referred to the need to deter an invasion of Saudi Arabia. That was happening in the context of the bilateral relationship between the United States and Saudi Arabia. Announcing in August that Canadian ships would be sent to the gulf and be there by the end of September was hardly the thing that deterred Saddam Hussein from continuing on to invade Saudi Arabia.

The ships went on, as you know, Mr. Speaker, to become part of the UN legitimized enforcement of sanctions, but that again was after the fact. The ships were on their way and the government was saved from the embarrassment of having to make that decision and having it stand as a decision taken outside the legitimacy of the UN by the fact that the resolution was passed after it had sent the ships.

All the way along, the Secretary of State of External Affairs and the Prime Minister who now come to us with very high flown rhetoric about the United Nations persisted in doing things before the UN had legitimized them and even indicated on occasion that they were willing to go all the way with Washington whether or not there was UN approval of any military action in Iraq to get Iraq out of Kuwait. It rings just a little hollow for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to get up and talk the way he has to us about his great respect for the United Nations.

On the question of sanctions, I was very distressed to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs go on the way he did caricaturing the argument, the debate, which we are having in this House as an argument between those who simply want to talk and wait, and those on the government side who want to act. We maintain that sanctions are a form of action.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blaikie: Sanctions permitted to work are indeed the kind of action that is required and not an easy action. There are many legitimate worries—I accept that—about whether or not the multinational sanction effort would hold together. There are legitimate worries, but a much tougher course of action and a lovely precedent that could have been set if we had worked together as a world to say: "We are not going to solve our problems by war, but by God, we are going to solve them through the determined application of economic sanctions until such time as every country in the world knows it cannot step out of line or it will meet this same kind of determined isolation."

That is the precedent that we would have liked to seen set in this new post-cold war order that everybody is talking about so much. Not a precedent that the first time a crisis arises that we say: "Well, we tried sanctions for a couple of months. It didn't work. Let's get down to the business of war." It is caricaturing sanctions as talk, as waiting, as non-action.

It is a funny thing to hear from a minister of external affairs who has spent his entire career as the Secretary of State for External Affairs going around imploring people to bring about voluntary—not mandatory or comprehensive, but voluntary—sanctions against South Africa, and to give those sanctions time because they are working.

Indeed, the minister claims that they have worked and has said to the ANC and others: "No violence. Let sanctions work, and work and work." Now, we cannot even wait three months or six months, whatever the case may be, in order to try to solve what is obviously a very difficult problem without bringing on the conflagration that may indeed be brought on in less than three hours from now.

It is very difficult indeed for us and, I think, for a great many other Canadians to listen to this debasement of the sanction alternative, something which the minister himself has been such a great fan of with respect to South Africa.

The Minister of Justice, with respect to other things that have been said by the government today, and the Prime Minister and others, liked to make much of the analogy with the 1930s. I do not accept that this is analogous to the 1930s. I think we are in a new situation and I want to say more about that in a little while.

But the one thing I would say to the Minister of Justice about the 1930s, the one thing that is similar, is that in the 1930s the western industrialized democratic world did not do anything to help democratic Spain when it was under attack by fascism. Instead, it made money off the war effort and finally had to deal with the monster that it had created through its inaction.

If the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of External Affairs were to get up and say that that is a parallel with the 1930s that they see in their own actions with respect to Iraq and the arms trade there and the way in which we have created these monsters in the Middle East through our own participation in the arms trade, then maybe they would have a little more credibility when they stand up and ask us to accept their arguments.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the government has said a lot about the United Nations. Ever since the response to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, people have been pointing out the selectivity of the international outrage with respect to it. Everyone has their favourite previous event with which they want to contrast the outrage of the international community this time with the acquiescence of the international community in previous events, whether it be the Chinese invasion of Tibet, the Indonesian invasion of East Timor, or whatever the case may be.

All these things are helpful in so far as they point out the layer upon layer of hypocrisy that attends international affairs. But I agree with the government that we cannot achieve anything by simply telling old stories and pointing fingers at old culprits. We are in a new situation.

The United Nations post-1989, post cold war, post Berlin Wall coming down, is indeed a new United Nations. It is not fair to compare what the United Nations did not do in the past with what the United Nations may be doing now because we are in an entirely new situation. The question becomes not: "Why didn't the UN do this before?" That just goes to show how hypocritical and selective they are here now. The question becomes: "What is the appropriate action to take now in this new context?"

I will tell you what my greatest fear is for this new United Nations. It relates to the comment made by the Minister of Justice when she spoke about the western industrialized world. My greatest fear for this new United Nations is that it may go from a United Nations which was paralysed by the cold war and which could not do anything to a United Nations which, now that the north-north conflict is over—the north-north conflict that we called the east-west conflict—that is an opportunity for that new, united, or growing more united, north to turn its attention to its own collective self-interest in a way that will set the industrialized north increasingly against the south, increasingly against the Third World.

If we put aside the character of Saddam Hussein and all the evil things that he has done in Iraq and Kuwait, it is not impossible to see him as symbolic of a Third World reality that is saying to the western industrialized world: "We don't want to have the world run by the club that Canada belongs to any more. We want the club to be widened. We want more decisions to be made, for example, at international peace conferences to deal with the Middle East and in other international fora. We do not accept that the western industrialized world has any more the right to presume that its interests are what can compel the world to go to war."

That is the nagging doubt that I have about this new world order about which I had a great many hopes not just so long ago.

What we are seeing here, for all its warts on both sides, is a foreshadowing of a world increasingly divided between the haves and the have-nots. Saddam Hussein is a have-not with a significant army. This country is not part of the ruling club, if you like, and has set out on a path which I reject.

But I think there has to be a form of negotiation. There has to be a form of taking into account these realities that I am pointing to and war will not be the answer. War will only lead to the creation of new problems, new Saddam Hussein's, and new brutal regimes that arise out of the ashes, certainly not democratic regimes. That is one of the things that the government does not seem to be taking into account.

I say out of the ashes, and I know others will speak about this, but we also need to take into account the ecological dimension of this war. This may be indeed the same kind of war that we refused to fight in Europe for the last 45 years because the consequences were too terrible to contemplate. They were worse than the problem that the war was intended to solve. When we take into account the ecological dimension of this war, it may indeed be that we are faced with that same kind of very difficult choice. The choice that we have made in the New Democratic Party is that we do not want Canada to be part of initiating any such conflict.

The government says that the credibility of the United Nations is on the line, but it is a credibility cornered by the actions of the U.S. administration in sending so many troops to the Gulf, the amount of troops and resources that could only have been sent with the idea that there was going to be an invasion of Kuwait and Iraq, regardless of whether or not there was any UN acceptance of that.

We now find ourselves in a position that we are put in, not by the UN, but by the Bush administration. It went out on a limb, so to speak, and now wants the UN and all of us to save it by saying: "Yes, you gambled. You put all those troops in there. Now you don't know what to do with them. And now you want our backing in order to follow through with what you think is the only course of action left to you that will save your face." That is, Mr. Bush's face.

We need to get over this world in which it becomes so easy to caricature nations and leaders according to whether or not they serve our interests. I am tired of a world in which one day somebody is a good guy, the next day he is a bad guy, and the next day he is a good guy again. It all depends on whether or not he is doing what Washington, generally speaking, wants him to do. We need to get over that and we need to do that by demonstrating in this case that we are committed to peaceful solutions to very difficult problems.

With that in mind, I would like to move an amendment to the amendment. There has been a lot of negotiation about this amendment, as you might have guessed, Mr. Speaker, as to what might be regarded as in order, and as to what might not be regarded as in order. Therefore, I move:

> That the amendment be amended by deleting all the words after the word "sanctions" and substituting the following:
> "such support to exclude the involvement by Canada in a military attack on Iraq or Iraqi forces in Kuwait and to encompass diplomatic initiatives, including settlement of border and other disputes, through UN mediation or the International Court of Justice, the promotion of democratization throughout the region, the establishment of a mechanism to reduce the arms trade and to eliminate weapons of mass destruction, and the convening of an international peace conference to discuss all outstanding Middle East issues.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take into consideration the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona's motion, even though it has some prima facie reservations about the acceptability of such a motion. In any event, the Chair will certainly be in a position to come up with a final ruling about the acceptability of the amendment to the amendment.

Questions and comments. I recognize the hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona. He said that Canada should not get involved in any violent action in the Middle East at the present time. I can understand that. He says that on the contrary, we should attempt to negotiate new alternatives to avoid any possible confrontation now that we are at three hours, or rather two hours and half now, from the deadline to see what will happen or what Mr. Hussein might decide at the other end of the phone line.

Nevertheless, I would like my colleague to explain to me why Canada should not participate in such action since, for the last 45 years, we have made every effort to get the two superpowers to recognize that there are, on this place called Earth, middle powers of which Canada, England, France and Australia are part. Those middle powers, now together in the Middle East, are saying to Mr. Hussein that it is time to get with it. We have just ended 45 years of cold war. No more wars. After 167 days, a dozen resolutions from the United Nations and a near refusal to meet with the Secretary General, Perez de Cuellar, we are told again tonight: "Be patient; give sanctions time to have an effect if you want things to come about."

• (2130)

In the meantime, I want to recall to my colleague that people have been suffering steadily for 168 days in the Middle East. And Mr. Hussein doesn't give any sign, none at all, that he intends to go back home and to respect the fundamental international law that we want to enforce as of now.

I would like my collegue to answer the question I just asked him, and to throw some light on the points I raised.

[English]

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. There are two things I would like to say. He referred to the last 45 years and said that we have just come out of a cold war and really do not appreciate the fact that this peace is now being upset by the situation in Iraq and Kuwait. I can relate to that. I am not very happy about it either.

But let us take into account, as I said before, that there was a time stretching over 40 years when there was a war that we were not willing to fight for the liberation of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary, East Germany, Bulgaria, Romania, or Albania, because the consequences of that war were too horrible to contemplate.

What we are saying is that the consequences of this war may indeed be too horrible to contemplate. The difference is that those missiles are not pointed at us this time. Are we simply saying that we are willing to contemplate horrible wars as long as they do not affect us directly? If the horror of a war is something which has to be taken into account when we decide whether or not to enter into a state of war then I ask the hon. member to consider that these people whose suffering he is concerned about—and I believe him when he says that—may indeed suffer ten times more as a result of any war that might be initiated in that area that led to nuclear explosions or chemical warfare, or even the devastating effects of conventional weapons as they have come to be.

While I am on that theme of suffering which the member raises, let me say that the concern the government claims it has about the suffering of the Third World as a result of high oil prices really strains credibility. It especially strains credibility when you realize that we had to listen to this time and time again coming from the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has been responsible for two years of decrease in Canada's foreign aid, who is responsible for Canada's adherence to the structural adjustment programs of the IMF and the World Bank, a program which is starving children all around the world in order to save the banks, and when we know that the western industrialized world has never had any qualms about decreasing commodity prices in order to benefit its own economy and whether that plunged the economies of Zambia or Chile or other commodity-producing countries into absolute chaos, political instability and starvation.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): That's okay. That's the market.

Mr. Blaikie: That is the market, Mr. Speaker. If people die because of the market, well that is just the invisible hand of Adam Smith working its wonderful way in the world. Really, Mr. Speaker, you just cannot believe some of the things you hear in this place.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to comment on the hon. member's reference to my own comments on the western industrialized world and the suggestion he made that somehow Saddam Hussein is striking a blow for those who do not believe that those who belong to the club that Canada belongs to should run the world.

I think it is important to correct the impression that he has left that somehow—and I certainly had no intention of leaving the impression—only the western industrialized world was interested in this. We have, as a result of our wealth and well-being, some capabilities to do things in the world that other countries do not have, but I would point out that there are 31 countries in the gulf supporting the sanctions against Iraq and that those countries that are most dedicated to beating Iraqi aggression back are not members of the western industrialized world. I mentioned those countries in a different context and whatever the hon. member wishes to say, it is true that poor Third World countries are suffering.

One of the problems of the history of the United Nations is that the General Assembly, where countries of the Third World have considerable clout as a result of their numbers, has never been able to be matched by the kind of will that required the approval of the Security Council because of the cold war. We are now in a position where those countries which have the wherewithal to back up the resolutions of the United Nations are now in a position to do so and I point out that Canada, although number 31 in world population, provides 25 per cent of United Nations resources. Therefore, when I talk about the countries of the western industrialized world, I am talking about the democracies and those countries which have the capability to put some clout into the UN's decisions.

There are many countries that want that action but are not in a position to do it. I think that it is a totally misleading perception to suggest that somehow those countries which support the United Nations in this effort are not representative of all countries of the world. In fact, the Third World countries are very well represented. I do not have it handy but I have seen a chart which indicates all the countries which are involved in the gulf. It is an enormous range of countries, including many which have, probably for the first time in their history, had the opportunity to engage in a collective security operation.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I simply repeat my point that if the Minister of Justice, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and this government are as concerned as they say they are about the well-being of children and others in the Third World, then what they should decide to do is to take on the international economic order which dictates that children will die by the hundreds and thousands while we are debating this motion because we are not able to change the international economic system which dictates that they must die in order to satisfy certain sacred doctrines of the marketplace.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I think I speak for all members of this House when I say that the act of aggression perpetrated by Iraq against Kuwait is particularly appalling and deplorable. It is even more disgraceful because of the fact that it is an aggression not only against a small country, but also against peace, against the creation of a world order, and against the dreams and peace efforts of all men and women all over the world.

The world is now plunged into a situation where on both sides of this House, whatever our views on the conduct of public and private affairs may be, people will have to take sides for or against war, for or against peace.

Once again, democracies are put to the test. Here is this dictator who is willing to give up everything, who does not believe in anything, who is willing to expose his people to the worst insults, tempting democracy and confronting it with its responsibilities with regard to peace and war. We know full well that peace and war are not alike, yet they are so close.

Tonight, as we speak, it is a very thin line that separates peace and war, but at the same time, there is a huge gap between those who are in favour of the war and those who think that we must give peace another chance. I do not think it is appropriate to judge anybody's intentions. It is easy to understand the impatience of some people as a result of the events that have occurred over the last few months. It is easy to understand the indignation felt by those who do not accept—and I think it is everybody—the way truth, justice, peace and democracy are being treated.

That being said, since we are parliamentarians, since people expect us to make decisions, we have to take one side or the other.

First, let me say, however ironic this may sound, that something positive has come out of this whole situation. During the recent events, we have seen the growth of the United Nations. A new world order has evolved from the show of solidarity for the United Nations, this important, powerful, and prestigious organization that can still look frail at times. Many people still remember today what happened to the League of Nations in the thirties, after World War I and the Treaty of Versailles.

We know how frail the United Nations is. We know it is our responsability to do everything we can, not only to preserve the UN, its prestige, its responsibilies, and its moral authority, but also to help it grow and strenghten. The UN passed 12 resolutions during recent months leading to this debate tonight. These resolutions were meant to further peace, to impose a world order to a government guilty of wrongdoing and to demand the undoing of an unacceptable move.

This government presented a motion purporting to ask this House to support the UN, as if those who are going to vote against it, such as myself were against the UN. Obviously, we are going to vote not against but for the UN. We know full well that Canada, established a reputation by upholding international authority. It does not make sense for Canada to have a diplomatic and foreign policies if they are not based on a strengthening of the works and foundations of the UN.

Respecting the UN is above all respecting its resolutions. We are presented with the UN resolution 678, the last one adopted in November, and we are told that the Canadian Parliament should support this resolution, congratulate the UN and make it known that the UN is right when it wants this resolution to be implemented.

But this is not the meaning of today's debate. This debate is misleading in two ways, Mr. President, because the resolution presented to us is not the one which was passed. The UN resolution did not ask member states to make war. It said that after a given date, if Iraq had not completely withdrawn from Kuwait, these countries could take all necessary measures to ensure the Iraqi withdrawal. But, the government takes care to tell us that all necessary measures does not mean exclusively war measures and that they include the whole range of enforcement measures. Within that range, before war breaks out, there is room for diplomacy, for dialogue, all the initiatives that a peace-loving nation can imagine and Canada is such a nation.

Canada made its mark in the world. It illustrated its diplomacy with great men, such as Lester B. Pearson in particular. Many references were made to him today. It is true that Mr. Pearson enhanced Canada's stature in the world. It is true that Mr. Pearson, if he were with us today, would tell us: "Let us make a last effort for peace, and let us do it in the name of the United Nations."

The debate has been distorted in two ways, and I said that first because the meaning of the United Nations resolution has been altered. Second, the debate is not what it appears to be. The government is putting a virtuous resolution: Will you vote, yes or no, for virtue? We know very well that it is only appearance. What the government is telling us essentially or what it will want to be able to say after the resolution has been adopted is that the Parliament of Canada authorized the Government of Canada to make war. That is what it will say the day following a yes vote for the resolution.

This morning, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister made a speech that looked a lot more like a declaration of war or a speech made before entering the war than a speech by a Prime Minister or a head of government who must first seek the support of the citizens to try an ultimate attempt to save peace. I am sorry to say that I heard nothing in that speech which led us to believe that this government was seeking other alternatives to war and that, unfortunately, this governmenthas resigned itself to war. And I think a government should never resign itself to war until war is declared.

In the debate today, reference was made, especially from the government side, and my colleague from the NDP also just made reference to the World War II, to those horrible years preceding World War II. During which the European democracies submitted themselves, in an appeasement policy, to the fierce appetites of a dictator who was bad—it is difficult to compare dictators as they are all terrible—but a very successful, Hitler. From one demand to another he swallowed whatever was given to him and then asked for more the next day. Today, we judge very severely the statesmen, and political leaders who agreed to deal with Hitler in order to maintain peace.

Indeed, we can make this reference to World War II, but we can also go back to World War I and other wars before that. One wrong after another. In the days preceding the declaration of World War, everybody said in retrospect: The political leaders knew nothing. They acted hastily, feverishly, in the turmoil. They agreed to a war psychosis. They missed opportunities to resolve the small emerging conflict They did not foresee the enormous proportions that the relatively small episodes would take and they are now seen as warmongers. That is why, during the period after World War I, people were reluctant to be hurried into a war and why those same people are now being accused of having been too pacifist and of being less than brave. We must not forget, that the generation in power in European democracies at the time had seen an entire generation of young people, the best and brightest of countries such as Germany, France and Great Britain, mowed down in muddy trenches. They did not want those millions who perished to be followed by more victims in the forties.

Imagine how lucky we are to be able to look back, although I suppose it is rather ironic. In any case, these are things we must consider. We cannot afford to let ourselves be influenced solely by comparisons with the acts of aggression committed during the Second World War, while ignoring what happened before then.

We are perhaps only a few hours away from a war whose duration we do not know and whose negative impact, the loss of lives, we cannot estimate— As I was saying, we are only hours away from the threat of war, and I am sure we would all have liked to be able to rally around the government and support the Canadian position. At a time when Canada is going through a very difficult period and Quebec is trying to find its way with a great deal of difficulty, at a time when Canada's and Quebec's children are about to meet their destiny in the defence of peace, we would have liked to be able to stand together on the eve of these events. We in the Bloc Québécois would have liked to be able to vote with the government. We would have liked to see the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party do so as well.

Unfortunately, that cannot be, because the government has decided to depart from Canada's noblest and most admirable tradition, that of seeking peace above all. Looking back over the events of the past months, we do not see a government that is above all concerned with peace. We see a government that is very concerned about Canada's place in the world and about the credibility of its relations with its traditional allies. A government that is very anxious not to be seen as the odd man out. But we are not yet seeing, the courage that should have shown and that we must still show for our great tradition of diplomacy to prevail, that tradition that made Canada loved and famous the world over as a peace-loving country. It is the country that people love and respect and that they want to stand among the concert of nations. What other nations are expecting from us now is the invention, the boldness, the spontaneity, the open-mindness and the courage of a Pearson to try to propose other solutions.

I am not saying that we will devise some inspired solutions. Many ideas are already been set forth everywhere. We know, for example, of the idea of a peace conference. Some may come up with others ideas, but right now, the best idea which has been proposed is that of a commitment to a peace conference. Maybe I am naive, but I find very strange that people are uncomfortable with the idea of a peace conference on the problems of the Middle East, including the question of Iraq, the palestinian problem, and the conflict between Israel and the Arab nations. It seems strange to me, that there are two kinds of resolutions and declarations in the United Nations. There are, on the, one hand, declarations and resolutions which legitimaze the action that some countries are about to take, that is to break out in war, because it is important to respect the United Nations, and it is important to apply immediately the United Nations' declarations and resolutions. On the other hand, other resolutions have been adopted on a regular basis for some 20 years by the United Nations, and again as recently, as last December 20. These resolutions are calling for the implementation, at last, of a negotiation process as applied to the global problems of the Middle East with a view to bringing about peace in the Middle-East, and these go unheeded.

We know that our Israeli friends do not want such a peace conference for the moment. We know that they need to be recognized. We know that they need to sit down with people who do not wish to destroy them. We love the Israelis and, for my part, I love Israel. All my life I have admired Israel. I have thought that this country was one of the greatest epics in contemporary history. All my life, I have seen in Israel destiny, which is confirmed today in this country and which is the one we know, a long and sound loyality to what this country is. Who can be against the loyalty of a nation who wants to assert itself, who wants to be itself? At the same time, I believe our friends also have a commitment to peace, and it is hard to imagine we can some day find a solution to what is happening in the Middle East if, once and for all, we do not cut the Gordian knot. The warring factions, all those who have a difference of opinion, must at last sit down at the same table face the problems, and look for solutions. It cannot be done, as long as we do not recognize the evidence of a problem.

Palestine is a powder keg, and we know full well that Iraq is a small part of this huge tapestry which is casting a pall over peace in that very important region of the world. We know as well that this is the way international and world-wide conflicts erupt. We can see all the ingredients which may combine into an international conflagration from which even the eastern and western worlds might not escape unscathed, quite the contrary.

This is an international obligation. You will say: "Yes, but this conference can be held later, some other day." Sure enough, that is unavoidable, one does not have to be a great prophet to realize that some day there will be a peace conference in the Middle East where all nations will be represented around the table in a successful quest for solutions. I am sure of that. But why should there be so many people killed before that conference is convened? How many dead Palestinians and Arabs? How many casualties among Israeli men and women? How many casualties among the Americans, French and English? How many casualties among Canadians and Quebecers before people finally accept to sit around the same table, examine the problems, and look for solutions? This is called a peace conference. You might say: Yes, France tried today and yesterday but had to withdraw its proposal plan. Some might say: "Yes, but Canada agrees, because the Prime Minister wrote a letter to Mr. de Cuellar and there was a recent statement from the Security Council". We are all aware that these are nothing but tricks. A policy is something else.

The government claims that it has a policy. Nowhere in the resolution which defines the policy do I see the notion of a peace conference. It would be to the honour of Canada, even if it does not take place tomorrow, to write into a resolution that Canada wants a peace conference, that it wants it now, and not "in due course", a favorite expression among diplomats bankrupt of ideas. "In due course" is an expression which we find in all resolutions. Everybody is well aware that it vaguely means at some later point in time, if ever. We wish we had introduced such a resolution before the NDP did, but what matters is that it was done.

Let us, the Canadian Parliament, on the eve of looming catastrophic events, say in a resolution that we want a conference on peace, and Canada will then rise to the occasion. People will recognize that Canada had and still has the potential to show leadership. No matter who we are or however different our opinions, all of us in Canada, on the government side as well as on ours, want peace. Let us act so it will happen, Mr. Speaker.

I speak for myself and I think for the majority of the Bloc Québécois. Well, it is a free vote and, as you know, we vote freely. We hope for and will support the Canadian government's final attempt for peace, and we will vote for the government's resolution, completed by the Liberal amendment and made better still by the amendment of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Svend Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for his excellent speech, a speech that is clear and courageous. I also want to say that I agree completely with the comments of the hon. member on the importance of an international peace conference.

Indeed, when I was in Iraq, I met several people. In Jordan, I met with the Minister of External Affairs and, in Iraq, I met with Kuwaiti women, Iraqis, and Palestinians, including President Yasser Arafat. I did so because it seemed essential to me to underline the fact that Palestinians are also victims of what happened in Kuwait, and that Palestinians of the occupied territories are also victims. We have several victims. Yesterday, two PLO leaders were added to the list.

A conference was essential before August 2 and it is even more so today. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for pointing out this fact. I know very well that he was going to propose an amendment and I hope that his colleagues will support our amendement if it is found in order.

I also have a question for the member. The member knows very well that last Sunday, there was a very large demonstration in Montreal where more than 6,000 men, women, and children demonstrated for peace and against a catastrophic war. There were several groups. It was organised by the group Échec à la guerre and among participants, there were Artistes pour la paix, Lorraine Pagé of CEQ, Pierre Paquette of CSN, and several members of the Parti Quebecois. I had the honour to deliver a speech. Unfortunately, there were no representatives from the Bloc Quebecois, the Liberal Party, or the Progressive Conservative Party. Nevertheless, I would like to ask the hon. member whether he agrees with the demands made during this important demonstration? Does he agree with the men, women and children who shouted: "No war for oil. No blood for oil"?

Does he not agree as well that Quebec is also distinct in that a larger proportion of voters is in favour of a peaceful solution, according to polls? It is not a distinct society just from a linguistic point of view. It is also a distinct society from the point of view of the efforts we should make for peace.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, I think I can say we all agree about the package of demands presented by the coalition. However, there are nuances. I know that even among the coalition, there are friendly discussions to determine if Canadian troops should be pulled out immediately and permanently. Some think that they should not, and that they must stay there to insure the effectiveness of the embargo and generally speaking, we all agree on the subject. But on the whole, the answer is yes.

Is Quebec a distinct society, since it is more in favour of peace than other peoples? I don't know, Mr. Speaker. I think that all nations of the world are fairly pacific. I believe in fact that the Iraqi people strives for peace, but I do not believe that their leaders would allow it for the moment. I think that we are a pacific society, aware of its responsabilities, but I do not believe that pacifism and respect for peace is the prerogative of Quebec. We were not able to take part in this demonstration because we had a caucus meeting, but we met representatives of the coalition immediately after, and we have been able to exchange ideas. I must say that this encounter has been extremely profitable for us.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint–Denis): Mr. Speaker, I have just a simple comment as we have been asked and I know that time is running out fast.

Without beating about the bush and without any qualification, I want to thank the honorable member for the speech he has just delivered. It is a speech which has raised the tone of the debate to a higher level. This has been done without any partisanship and I cannot help being very sensitive to what the honorable member has just said to the House, since for so many years I have thought that one of the questions which should have been included in the international agenda is this Middle East international peace conference. So many murders, and so many tragedies could have been avoided!

We can go back to November 29, 1947, when the United Nations decided to create two separate States in Palestine. I accept this decision my country made on November 29, 1947, to create two separate States, one for the Israelis with the full rights of a state, including protection, recognition, acceptation, provided another State be created for the others.

I can tell you right now that tomorrow or probably the day after tomorrow, I will deal with this issue and I will be highly inspired by the remarks the hon. member had made because he touched upon nearly all the points on which my attention has been focused for the past 25 years. I am very pleased to say that finally—they say that we preach in the desert, but I do not think so. Without any bias in favour of the government or the opposition. The time has come for whoever is really seeking peace over there to address directly all the problems which are only growing more bitter and adding up.

We could easily develop an argument about this and it is the hon. member who gave me the idea when I listened to him very carefully, because if we address all the major problems in the Middle East, we can establish a relation between them and go back to the source of this major injustice which finally will have to come to an end one day at an international conference. I am happy and honoured to have heard the hon. member refer to Mr. Pearson. Personally, I am sorry for all those who came after him. I have always fashioned my parliamentary life on Mr. Pearson's, perhaps because he was Prime Minister the first time I came here.

[English]

I always said I was a Pearson boy.

In the area of international relations, I have always had the pleasure of identifying with Mr. Pearson and the tribute which the hon. member has just paid him showed, in addition to a lack of partisanship, a true knowledge of the history of this country, something for which I thank him.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also want to support the hon. member for Saint–Denis for what he has just said. I think that the member who made these remarks has put his finger on the essential aspect of the situation which now prevails in the Middle East, the injustice which has existed there for so many years.

People have asked for an international peace conference. It should have been convened a long time ago. I would suggest that a solution to the problem will remain quite elusive until such a conference is held. I think that Canada, ever a strong advocate of world peace, has the obligation to show leadership in that endeavour. We are not a nation known for invading other countries. The minister's resolution before us this evening would give free rein to the government to join the war in the Middle East.

I think we must first solve the problem of peace in the Middle East by doing justice to the Palestinian people and also to the Israeli people who must have security and feel quite safe within their own borders. Until we find that solution we will be trying to settle these issues by means which indeed are unacceptable to the world community, and I mean war. I want to commend the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean for his remarks.

[English]

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, tonight Canadians are afraid and they are rightfully afraid, of war. I am afraid of war. My local council sent me a telegram advising that "the council opposes Canada's involvement in a possible Middle East war, as further efforts should be made to bring about a peaceful settlement". The council is not in favour of war.

Mr. Eugene Clawson of Matsquie writes: "Please, please, don't let Canada contribute to a war in the Middle East. Death, destruction, and devastation are the results of war. Peace does not come by force. War will result in dying people. Death is humanly permanent. Death hurts, not only the one dying, but the loved one who remains behind. War will result in people being disabled physically, mentally, psychologically. What on earth could make us contribute to such death and destruction, not only to people from other nations whom we do not know, but people we send to the area to actually wreak such havoc. What is worth the loss and maiming of so many lives? Please don't let loss of life be dedicated by artificially set standards and deadlines. Please let Canada and Canadians be emissaries of peace, not perpetrators of death."

Most of the people in my riding do not want war. They want me to tell you that tonight. I am telling you that on behalf of the people I represent. I was impressed, having read the letter of the Prime Minister to the Secretary–General of the United Nations of January 9. The Prime Minister was speaking for all Canadians. He said: "This is sad news for all of us but we must not give up hope." He concluded by saying: "We should all go the extra mile for peace." The Prime Minister does not want war.

I heard an eloquent speech from the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada who has worked tirelessly for peace. He stood here today and told us: "The Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada does not want war. He wants peace." Every person who has stood in this House of Commons tonight has said: "We don't want war."

The United Nations said it does not want war. Even Saddam Hussein says he does not want war. Yet in less than two hours, we can be going to war. How can you, Madam Speaker, and I, and this government be such terrible failures that we, as politicians of the world, have failed to prevent war. Can the United Nations, which has not been able to bring a just and lasting peace to the Middle East, if we give it a mandate to go to war, bring just and lasting peace to the Middle East through this war? I do not think so.

Last fall we all felt a great euphoria. We felt good because the world was coming together at the United Nations. It was coming together to establish a consensus that could lead to new respect for the rule of law, a new world order and it would find the answer to get Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. We have never seen the nations of the world come together like that and probably have not had that good feeling since then. These things seemed so positive to us. If the results of the world coming together in a consensus is simply to cause war, is that success or failure? In my eyes, that is not success, that is the failure of the United Nations, as it is our failure.

Since the last great war to end all wars, what a vain and naive hope that man would stop fighting with man, nation with nation, what are the results? We established from those great wars the United Nations, and it is charged with resolving conflict and preventing war. That is what I was taught in school. That is what I believed when I studied the United Nations.

Since the birth of the United Nations it has not found consensus. It has been fight to fight, talk to talk, but very few successes. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said: "Now the United Nations is reborn again because it has consensus". Consensus for what? To fail at imposing sanctions, to fail at diplomacy, and now to find success through force and asking us to mandate them for this force.

From such a brave and positive start last fall, the world pulled together. The reason that it pulled together was because it was were against aggression, violence and force. The United Nations was against violence, force and aggression. How did it move from that position to recommending that a solution to the problem of aggression, violence and force was in fact a more massive scale aggression, violence, force, or war? I cannot believe we could be in that position in less than two hours, and it gives me great, great concern.

As we approach this war, I hear too often when a question is asked: "Well, we don't know what the result will be." That is a fair answer because we do not know what the result will be. We need to try to answer some of those questions with a little more certainty than I think I have heard to date.

What are the objectives that we hope to accomplish by this war? Are the objectives of the multinational force agreed upon as we enter this war? Do they know what they want to accomplish? Yes, they want to accomplish the removal of Iraq from Kuwait. Beyond that, do they want to see the total destruction of the nation of Iraq, the city of Bagdad and all the cities and all the economic development which has occurred there in the flush of the oil crisis of the seventies and the rebirth of technology and opportunity throughout the Middle East? Are we stopping at the borders of Kuwait or are we going in to crush Iraq? Are we going to crush the government or are we going to preserve the government? What are our exact objectives? If one does not know what one's objectives are or where one is going, you do not know when to stop.

We should have a clear understanding of what our objectives are so that when they are accomplished, we will know it is time to stop. If we do not determine the objectives before we enter the war, we will have the passions of war and will not know when to stop. This one kills this one, kills this one, kills this one and there is an escalation of anger. In that escalation of anger there is a loss of a capacity to reason. Before we do it, let us know how far we are going to go, what our objectives are, and, when this is completed, when it is time to stop.

How much will this war cost the Government of Canada? We know what it has cost us to date. How much will it cost us by the time it is finished? How many millions and billions of dollars did we pay for the planes? We did refit those ships. More important are the lives of the Canadians who are there. It is not just the Canadians but the other 500,000 from all of these other countries and the whole arsenal of war of the modern world which sits there, in readiness, to be field tested. How much will it cost every Canadian at the gas pump once the oil fields of the Middle East are on fire and the pipelines are disrupted, not just in Iraq and Kuwait but through the whole region? What will that add just to your dollar cost? That is a simple equation but, has anyone calculated that and added that into the cost of our proceeding into this war?

How many lives will we take before we say "that is enough" and cease firing?

We have decided in this House that we are concerned about the environment. Before this government embarks on any action, it is supposed to have an environmental impact assessment. I wonder, if we took the time, what the environmental impact assessment would indicate. How can we erase the human and environmental degradation caused by chemical, biological, and perhaps even nuclear contamination that could result? This may not be a result but there is no one here who can tell me that it will not be and there are many who have told me it may. How do we erase and repair that damage? How much does it cost, not just in dollars, but how much does it cost the globe on which we live?

Who will go in after it is over to support and heal the people and to rebuild the families, their homes, their businesses and their lives? I wish someone speaking in this debate could give me and those listening to this debate some kind of assurance or answers about these kinds of things.

It is easy to start a war. That is easy. We have all the equipment over there and all you have to say is "go".

• (2220)

Can anyone tell me how, where and when it will be stopped? Will it be a quick kind of efficient killing war? Or is it going to be the kind that drags on week after week after week, the gentlemanly kind of a war where we keep just shooting each other. Everynight on television, we will watch the death and destruction live, first hand, and see the people crying and suffering for months and months.

What cost to those who suffer? What cost to my child and your child who watches that on television night after night? We do not even know if we can accomplish the objective. They say we can accomplish an air strike, but once we get down to digging in, and the rainy season and so forth, we are not quite so sure. We think. We are not sure.

Can we accomplish the objective of the removal of Iraq from Kuwait? How many soldiers will it take? How many families? How much property destroyed? Is it 100, 100,000, or one million? How many lemmings are going to have to run off the cliff before we are willing to assess the abyss at the bottom? What is the bottom line on all of this?

I ask everyone listening in the House of Commons and across the nation: Are you willing to sacrifice your son or your daughter for the cause of removing Saddam Hussein? If any one of you vote for that, you are voting for a sacrifice of the families of Canada's young men and women who are there, and you are voting for the sacrifice of millions of others: Americans, British, French, Kuwaitis and Iraqis.

When I ask myself that question, I say: "I do not think I am ready." I have teenage sons, like many here. If I have to sacrifice my son and pay that price, I want to think again. I ask my son, and what does he say? He is a member of the reserves. He says: "Dad, if I am called, I am going." He will. It is pretty scary stuff when it hits that close to home, and we need to make it hit that close to home before we make any decision or before we stop trying to negotiate.

I am not willing at least at this stage—I do not think I ever will be—to commit my sons to a sandy, forgotten grave in the desert. If I am not willing to do that, how can I possibly commit the sons and daughters of other Canadians whom I am charged to represent here?

Timing could well be a factor. How much time is enough? Everybody has been arguing about how much time is enough. Who knows? Nobody knows the answer to that one either.

Before we sanction force, why do we not tighten up the blockade? What have we been waiting for here? Why are we not sanctioning Iraq, Jordan or Turkey into compliance with the land blockade? Canada seems to be doing a good job covering half the people of the interdictions in the ocean in the naval blockade.

If they cannot do the job of enforcing the land blockade, why do we not go in and help them? Why do we not tighten up that blockade? We should have tightened it up after the first month or as soon as we could see that in fact many products were getting through.

One of the speakers said today: "Oh, we cannot do that because the only one who gets hurt are the people. The army does not get hurt". Quite frankly, if I was in Iraq right now and was given a choice, of deprivation of food, and the other amenities of life or a massive bombing by the war machine of the entire western world, I think the choice would be rather easy.

I think that I would choose, of course, to recognize that that suffering is better than the loss of life itself. There are so many things yet to consider.

Madam Speaker, I am sure that you are aware that there is a panic in Canada right now. People are watching their television sets and they are switching from the channels in the United States, to the channels in Canada to the channels that are coming from Britain through their satellites. They are switching to hear the news of the world. They are switching and hoping that on that news they are going to hear somebody say: "We can resolve this without war. There will be no war".

When I talk to my wife on the phone about this, she told me that her stomach was sick and in cramps as she contemplated the horror and realities of this impending war.

I was impressed with many of the speeches today. I was impressed with the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I was impressed with the calm logic of is the Leader of the New Democratic Party. If that represents different sides, they did not really sound too much different, both of them wanting to prevent war.

Surely we can keep trying. We need to try once more, once more, and then once more again, because the alternative is too terrible to contemplate, let alone to have to vote upon.

If we should continue to fail, and by that I mean if war does proceed, I would hope that our government in Canada would be the first to call for a cease fire almost the moment it begins. I hope they will get that dirty deed over as quickly as possible and get on with the peace settlement as quickly as possible.

Let us be the last there to enter with guns. Let us be the first there to bandage and rebuild that which we have laid to waste. May we all be forgiven for not preventing the massive state sanctioned slaughter.

Mr. Prime Minister, may you go that extra mile for peace today, before the shot is fired, the day after the shot is fired, and on until we have secured peace and security in the Middle East and in the world.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I must commend the hon. member for Fraser Valley West on that thoughtful, compassionate, and passionate speech. I hope it touched the heart of every other member in this House as it indeed touched mine.

I would like very briefly to read excerpts from two brief documents to the member and ask his response to them.

A little more than 50 years ago, on September 8, 1939, in this House, J.S. Woodsworth rose to explain why it was he could not support Canadian participation in the Second World War.

Toward the conclusion of that speech, he related a little anecdote in which he said:

> When the call came for us to come to Ottawa, I was staying at a little summer resort near the international boundary south of Vancouver. Near Blaine there is a peace arch between the two countries. The children gathered their pennies and planted a rose garden, and they held a fine ceremony in which they interchanged national flags and sang songs and that kind of thing; a beautiful incident.

J.S. Woodsworth said:

> I take my place with the children. I know it seems very foolish, but as I talked the other day with a young woman whose proposed marriage was about to be postponed because her perspective husband might be called to the colours— I thought that for her the possibilities of life were fading away. Again I recall a talk the other day in my own city of Winnipeg to a group of young men who came to see me, some of whom have been unemployed for months past, who were wondering whether they should jump at this opportunity of getting a job. I do not care whether you think me an impossible idealist or a dangerous crank, I am going to take my place beside the children and those young people, because it is only as we adopt new policies that this world will be at all a liveable place for our children who follow us.

At my office in Edmonton this afternoon I received a copy of a letter to the Prime Minister. It is from my St. Michael's School. In its brief entirety, it reads: "Dear Prime Minister Brian Mulroney: This is a very serious letter. We just want to let you know that Canada has been famous for being a peacekeeping country, not a warmaking country, and we want to keep our country with peace and not start war. Please keep our soldiers here, don't get Canada involved in the war; besides no one forced Canada to fight so please understand that we are trying to ask as a simple favour. Please Bring Our Canadian Troops back home; don't get Canada involved with the war. We, the grade six class, are writing this on behalf of our whole school." It is thereafter signed by 18 names.

Madam Speaker, I too stand with the children. I ask the hon. member if he does.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, I think there is some kind of a song that says "let the children lead the way". Sometimes people say "Let the women lead the way, they are for peace", and that sort of thing. Undoubtedly, we do have to look to the children in their innocence.

The hon. member mentioned the great peace arch between Canada and the United States. There are two sides on that peace arch. There is an open door symbolizing the open border between Canada and the United States, two nations which do not even need weapons or guards on their border. You just pass through like an open door, that is what that peace arch stands for. It is a symbol of what the world can be and what national relations can be. On the top of that peace arch, it states "Children of a common mother", meaning children of a common mother of the United States and Canada.

The children of Iraq and the children of the world are the children of a common mother. They are children who need to be protected, cared for and preserved, not bombed, not the most innocent victims of the war. It is the children that are the innocent victims.

On the other side of the peace arch it states "brethren dwelling together in unity". These slogans, which I remember as a younger person sounded a little corny to me, but do they not sound real tonight? Is that not what the world needs, that open door, that peace arch, between us all? Hopefully, we can attain that. That should be the mandate of the United Nations and of this Parliament.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Fraser Valley West for his excellent speech. He touched the essence of the problem. People today believe that we can find a solution that would be peaceful. We do not have to go to war to find a solution in the Middle East.

For many years there was a proposal to have an international peace conference on the Middle East and some of the nations of the United Nations objected to it. They did not want to accept it. As long as there is not a global solution in the Middle East, I think we will have a powder keg there and war could break out at any time.

I hope that Canada, as a peace loving, nation, will show the world the way as we have done in the past by being peacekeepers instead of initiating war. I hope that some of the government members will vote against the resolution of the government because it is a ticket that allows the government to send our troops into war. I do not think we have exhausted all the possibilities there for peace.

Three weeks ago I was in Washington. I talked to a senator who told me that there are indications that sanctions are working, that Iraq's gross national product has been reduced by 40 per cent. It means that it would be difficult for Iraq to go to war in maybe six months. Let us wait and let the sanctions work. I think they are working.

We need to have an international peace conference on the Middle East at the same time to resolve the problems as they present themselves. I would like to ask the hon. member whether he would agree that there should be an international peace conference on the Middle East once there is an indication of withdrawal from Kuwait by the Iraqis.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, two questions were posed, the first one on the issue of the vote itself. In the last vote I abstained. I have not yet decided what I will do on the next vote because I believe in the spirit of democracy and parliamentary debate that has brought us here today. I have listened to the partisan and non-partisan speakers. From that I am drawing a conclusion. I think that is what is supposed to happen here. I hope that I did not come here, predetermined, my mind made up and that was all there was to it. Yes, I have an open mind and have not decided what I will do in that case.

I had some hope when the leader of the NDP call for a free vote. She said in her own group there were those who were dissident, who did not agree with her view. I asked who in the NDP will vote with the government. Well, nobody. So the NDP will pass a party vote. I expect the Liberals will pass a party vote, and the Conservatives will pass a party vote, and I am sorry about that. I am sorry that that is the way it has been since I came into this place and I am sorry to probably leave this place and have it the same way.

This place needs to move to non-partisanship. If we can have a free vote on abortion which is about life, on capital punishment which is about life, can we not have a free vote on the millions that will be killed by these kinds of decisions? Everybody calls for it but when the vote comes it will be by party. Unfortunately. I wish that it could be half here, and half here, and half here so we could get a bit of true expression.

The government leader has stated this is government policy so I will have to decide all of these things. I have not yet decided but I would like to see the evolution of our Parliament more in that direction.

A peace conference may or may not be the answer to the Middle East. I used to think that you could add it all up and find some simple solution for the Middle East until the ambassador from Jordan said to me: "Mr. Wenman, what is wrong with the status quo? Sometimes that is the best we can achieve?" If that is the best we can achieve, we should try to achieve that.

This war is not going to roll us back to the status quo. It is going to be as unstable after the war as it is now. Stability is not an outcome. A peace conference may be useful but certainly if our United Nations means anything it should get on with settling those issues in the Middle East, if not all of them at least some of them.

It is commendable that the NDP member stands up here as he reads the resolution, having new things added to it at the last minute. That is good. We should all do that kind of thing. But that resolution calls for all the problems of the Middle East to be settled at a peace conference. Well, really now.

The intentions of everyone here are good. We have to take those intentions and drive them with energy through the United Nations to another alternative other than war.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, the understandable tendency in such an important discussion as we are having today is to seek guidance from precedents, from earlier events in our history or in international relations which may in some way help to guide us.

We have had today a number of speakers draw attention to the traditions of Canada in peacekeeping, but others have reached back prior to those post-war years and looked to the inter-war years. The Prime Minister in particular and to a degree the Secretary of State for External Affairs. They argued that support for the United Nations by supporting military action today was in contrast to the ineffectiveness of the League of Nations in the 1930s. The need at that time for military action in their view evaded.

I want to say just one word about that before we turn to more recent events. The fact is that in the 1930s the ineffectiveness of the League of Nations was not simply because the member states of the League of Nations were unwilling to engage in military action against dictatorships intent upon expanding beyond their own borders, but rather because of two factors. The first, of course, is fundamental. The United States was not a member of the League of Nations. The League of Nations in that sense was not universal. That is not the situation today with the United Nations.

The United Nations embodies almost all the nations of the world. The League of Nations was fundamentally flawed and rendered largely ineffective by the absence of the United States resulting from a decision of the United States Senate.

The second argument that the government advanced in its historical parallels was that somehow the unwillingness of the League of Nations to engage in military action rendered it ineffective. It was not in fact an unwillingness to engage in military action which rendered the League of Nations ineffective.

It was not only the absence of the United States from the League, but the unwillingness to give economic sanctions a real chance against the aggression of Italy and Abyssinia, the unwillingness of the British to use the Royal Navy to prevent Italian shipping to reach Abyssinia, and the unwillingness in effect of the League to give economic sanctions a chance. That, should be the parallel drawn today.

It was not an unwillingness on the part of the members of the League to use military force but rather the failure to give economic sanctions the chance they needed to be effective.

The fact is that all of us on each side of this House would agree that the regime in Iraq is a regime that none of us would find attractive or appealing in any way, but that is not our decision. That is not our judgment. The sole judgment is that Iraq has seized the territory of another member state of the United Nations.

It is that question that we are addressing, and it is that question that raises the debate today. Why is Canada on the edge of war? Why is Canada on the edge of declaring itself engaged in war in the Middle East? Certainly, we have not heard the government advance the argument that it is to ensure that international oil prices remain low. It is not to bring about a longer term settlement in the Middle East, however desirable that may be.

The government suggests that it has only one purpose in engaging Canadian forces in the Middle East; that is, to support collective security. It bases its whole argument and rationale for the engagement of Canadian forces on the idea that if Canada and other like minded nations do not provide forces to participate in military action in the gulf, the United Nations will somehow collapse, fail and be rendered impotent.

Let us spend a few minutes on that proposition, because I think it is really the central proposition. In advancing that argument, in the historical sense of saying that if the member nations of the United Nations do not join together in military action, it will mean the collapse of collective security and the negation of everything that Canada, since 1945, has worked for in the United Nations. It will mean the rejection of Canadian goals in Canada's own seeking of that security in collective action.

If that is what the government's argument is based on, then the government perhaps understandably tries to polarize the argument. It says: "Either we engage in military action today, or the United Nations system collapses." "There is no choice," the government says.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister this afternoon offered that stark alternative: Either Canada participates in military action, and supports collective security through the agency of the United Nations or else that post war dream of security through collective action fades and dies.

Those are not the only choices. Why must Canadians think for one moment that we have to choose between either military action or the collapse of the United Nations?

The government narrows the alternatives. It suggests sanctions are ineffective and therefore force is the only remaining alternative. I do not think anyone on either side of this House would dispute that military force may eventually be required. That may be so, but we are far from that situation yet. We are far from a common determination among the member states of the United Nations that the only alternative is the use of military force. We are far, very far from any assurance among member states and among the people of the world that the economic sanctions, the embargo that has been placed on Iraq, have proven to be ineffective.

If we look at United Nations resolution 678, which is the latest resolution in series the Security Council about the situation in the Middle East, Iraq and the gulf, we find that the Security Council decision is somewhat different than that which the government has advanced in support of its argument that military action is now necessary.

First, the Security Council resolution does not address itself to all the members of the United Nations. It addresses itself to "member states co–operating with the Government of Kuwait." Obviously those who drafted the resolution had in mind that there are some states that are not of a mind of co–operating with the Government of Kuwait. Otherwise the text is meaningless.

There are some governments which, by the terms of this resolution, do co–operate with the Government of Kuwait. What are they called upon to do? They are called upon to use "all necessary means" to uphold resolution 660 which called upon Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait. "All necessary means" may well include military means, but it does not mean exclusively military means.

There is a range of others means available to the United Nations and to member states that are co–operating with the Government of and to bring about the implementation of the resolution calling for the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. Then it requests all members states to provide appropriate support, not military support, to those nations which regard themselves as co–operating with the Government of Kuwait.

There is nothing in that resolution and there is nothing in the traditions of the United Nations, where I had the honour of serving for five years in our diplomatic service, that requires Canada to engage in military action. It is a choice. It is a decision for Canada or for any other sovereign member of the United Nations whether or not it chooses to express its opposition to the occupation of Kuwait by Iraq in terms of military action or in terms of other forms of sanction. The Security Council does not say the United Nations is now setting up a military force, and utilizing the military committee of the United Nations to formulate a UN force to operate under the UN flag. Not at all. There is no UN force envisaged.

What is envisaged is that each individual member state, some that regard themselves as co–operating with the Government of Kuwait, will take a decision on whether or not it wishes to give expression to its opposition by military force or other measures following January 15. We shall know in the days ahead what states have come to the conclusion that only military force will achieve the expulsion of Iraq from Kuwait.

That is not a decision that Canada need take. Canada is a sovereign nation able to make its own decisions under the terms of the Security Council resolution. It is perfectly free to continue its support, as I very much agree that it should do, of the economic sanctions.

The question before us, then, is whether in the view of Canadians the economic sanctions have been given time to work or whether now military force is required to bring about the expulsion of Iraq from Kuwait.

The government, in response to our repeated appeal to allow economic sanctions, to work, has indicated repeatedly that sanctions have not worked. "Tell us how sanctions have worked", the government says to the opposition. That is not a question to ask the opposition. That is not a question to ask those who do not form a government. That is a question for the government itself to answer to the Canadian people.

Instead, the government itself is offering to Canadians the sole alternative of going to war, of using military force. It must justify that terrible decision with real evidence that sanctions have not worked. It is the government that should have access to the information about the efficiency of sanctions.

Surely none of us are so naive as to think that the intelligent sources of the major western countries are insufficient to honeycomb the Government of Iraq and with agents or, to put it at the other extreme, that the electronic surveillance of Iraq cannot sufficient to tell us whether the sanctions are working.

The United Nations itself has not come forward yet, as it is required to do under the terms of earlier resolutions of the Security Council and with a clear indication of the efficacy of economic sanctions.

Let us have that information. Let this government bring it forward if that is part of its explanation of why today military force is today necessary. If the government is arguing that economic sanctions are ineffective let it also, bring forward in concert with the other major western nations involved in this enterprise, methods of rendering the economic sanctions more effective.

The extraordinary ingenuity that goes into military action, equipment and organization surely could be applied in some small degree to rendering the borders of Iraq with Jordan and with Iran more or less permeable to sanction breaking material. Let us see how we can use technology and our collective ingenuity, to render the borders of Iraq closed to the imports of material which permits Iraq to continue, as it has been doing, to maintain its arms forces at some degree of readiness.

There is no question in my mind that the sanctions against Iraq could be redoubled, could be rendered far more effective than they are now, if we had a real commitment among member states of the United Nations to make those sanctions more effective rather than turn in effect to the easy solution of direct military intervention. Let us give sanctions time to work. We have, after all, began to see effect of sanctions. We know that they are beginning to work. We know that in four or five months they have begun to take their toll on the ability of the Iraqi armed forces to operate efficiently. We know that they are beginning to have their effect on Iraqi morale, equipment and industrial capacity. Let us give time to sanctions to work because the alternative in my view is virtually unthinkable.

The cliché is often used of unleashing the dogs of war but there is truth, as in all clichés, in that observation. Who knows where we shall be if war breaks out in the Middle East?

France has today offered yet another approach to a solution to the problems that have arisen as a result of Iraq's wholly unprincipled and unacceptable occupation of Kuwait. Among the six points in the latest French proposal are two that we should consider for a moment. One is the forecast of a need for a peacekeeping force. This is an obvious requirement in any situation which is likely to occur in the next weeks or months in Iraq and Kuwait, a need for a peacekeeping force. But is Canada going to participate? Is Canada be acceptable as a member state to engage in peacekeeping if we today commit our forces to military action in the Middle East? No. That traditional opportunity that has been embodied in Canadian policy since the Second World War to offer our forces, our technology, and our organizational capacities to support a peacekeeping force will be negated if we today were to engage in military action. By so doing, we are in effect, rejecting the sort of comprehensive approach that France and others have been urging.

Equally, the government tells us nothing about the idea of a general conference on the Middle East, another major point in the French proposals that have been brought forward in the last 24 hours. Has been much thought given to the idea of a general conference on the Middle East? How can anyone be immune to the idea that the Lebanon situation, the Israeli–Palestinian situation, and now the issue of Iraq and Kuwait can be resolved in other than a general approach to peace throughout the Middle East?

Again, what role is Canada to play in the advancement of a positive and constructive general conference on the Middle East, if we participating in military action?

No, the option for Canada is quite clear. It is not to engage in military action. It is not to convince itself that otherwise the United Nations is going to collapse and that collective security is going to be eroded if we do not engage in military action today. On the contrary, the best route for Canada to take is to engage in economic sanctions, to support our allies and friends in such action, and ensure through their full implementation the resolution of not only the problem between Iraq and Kuwait but of the whole Middle East situation.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Etobicoke North and seek his comment on the following statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He said: "We should not rule out the possibility that young Canadian soldiers, women and men, will not return to this country for celebrations, but will stay in the gulf for burial". This statement was made in October 1990. It requires only a little observation on the part of those who have expressed their thoughts on this important issue as the hon. member for Etobicoke North has done.

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, the bankruptcy of the government's approach to the wholly deplorable situation that has arisen in the Middle East is certainly exemplified by the statement which the hon. member for Davenport has just cited.

To conclude in October that there is no alternative for Canada in seeking to support the rule of law in the expulsion of an aggressor from another nation, that there was no alternative but the death of young Canadians, strikes me as the worst form of bankruptcy of international diplomacy. We are far from that situation. We can enforce sanctions. Along with the other nations engaged in the so–called coalition in the Gulf we can double our efforts to insure that they are more effective.

I do not doubt in the absence of any evidence that the government can offer that those sanctions can be more effective, not tomorrow, not the next day, but certainly in the time ahead. It is that route which promises the most effective means of countering the aggression that has taken place and contributing to the eventual resolution of the major issues that continue to dog our efforts to bring about lasting peace in the Middle East.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, let me compliment my good friend and colleague from Etobicoke for his contributions here this evening. His wisdom and years of experience in the diplomatic corp have shown through in the thoughtful presentation he made for us to consider.

We listened to the debate in the United States Senate over the past weekend in some detail, and we heard at some point today what we consider to be the vital national interest. At that time, it was the vital national interest of what the senators in the United States consider to be the national interest of their country.

I think we hedged around it today when the government tried to explain what the vital national interest of Canada is to embark on this catastrophic event of bringing this country to the brink of war, and perhaps within 55 minutes to the actual war. I ask my friend what vital interests are we protecting? In his opinion, what vital Canadian interests are we protecting by this move to which the government is bringing us in such a short period of time?

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon for his comment and question. I do not think any of us would dispute that Canada has long had and will continue to have a fundamental national interest in seeing that collective security is the best route to ensure Canadian security. I do not think any of us dispute that.

The question that the government has in effect posed to Canadians is, whether or not military action the only route to ensure that collective security. The answer is, patently, no. There is a spectrum of opportunity that faces the United Nations members and Canadians today to reinforce our collective security by measures other than military.

Resolution 678 of the Security Council does not say that the United Nations decided as of January 15 that military action will take place. It leaves to the member states, that is those member states that are co–operating with the Government of Kuwait, to decide what measures they want to take to implement the resolution calling upon Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait.

At that point it is not the United Nations that is taking the decision about what to do or when to do it. In this instance it is the Government of the United States which apparently is taking the decision that the situation requires military action. The United States, as a member state of the United Nations co-operating with the Government of Kuwait has decided that it is going to embark upon military action.

Because the United States government has apparently so decided, that is no reason why Canada, or Belgium, or Italy, or Argentina need make the same decision. We are sovereign, free to make our own decision how we want to contribute to the removal of Iraq from Kuwait. We can make our decisions about timing and about the method we wish to pursue in our own time and in our own way.

I would urge the government, as was so eloquently expressed by our leader today and indeed our critic for external affairs, to make that decision in terms of economic sanctions and not in terms of military action.

What will happen if we engage in military action in the next days or weeks in the Middle East? I defy anyone to foresee, where we come out of that in a month or two, or six. But I can tell you that if member states pursue economic sanctions vigorously and redouble our efforts to make them effective, the odds are much greater that an effective and satisfactory resolution of the dilemmas of the Middle East will be brought about. Sanctions offer far greater chances, than any military action is likely to result in.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his speech as well. I would like to ask him a question vis-à-vis sanctions.

We have heard reports for the last several days and weeks now about goods and products leaking into Iraq, especially through Iran. I would like to ask the member for Etobicoke North what his feelings are on that. How can we manage to avoid these leaks? We are looking at sanctions and how firm they could and should be, and we then hear reports about borders leaking and that Saddam Hussein is in fact getting many products into his country. I was wondering if the member could comment on that.

As well, could he comment on Resolution 662 by which the UN certainly asks for an early end to this conflict. Could he also comment on Resolution 674 where the UN Security Council is asking for the immediate withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait.

I was wondering how long these sanctions would be going on. What would the hon. member see as a timeframe for sanctions?

Mr. MacLaren: Madam Speaker, I wish I had access to the information that would permit me to hazard an answer to the member's question, but of course I do not have such information even nor does anyone on this side of the House. It may be that the government's information is limited.

As I said earlier, with the possibilities which electronic surveillance at the one extreme and human surveillance in the more traditional sense at the other extreme offer, I cannot think that it is beyond the wit—I was going to say mankind—of people to devise methods in which the sanctions can be rendered much more effective than they are today. What is lacking is a real commitment to make sanctions work because of the tendency on the part of some nations to use military force, to see military force as the quicker, easier option. But it is an option fraught with danger, fraught with consequences that none of us can you foresee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. The period for question and comments has now expired. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Portneuf.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, it is not easy for me to rise tonight to give my opinion on a resolution fraught with dire consequences. Often Canadian men and women wonder what kind of person they have elected and they often have the impression their members of Parliament can take decisions because they are not directly involved. I tell them that matter affects me deeply. Very few people know what I am about to say. I have a son who has just turned 20, the only child who survived out of the six my wife and I had. Needless to say the mere fact of discussing a matter that risk getting our country into a conflict, which sooner or later, could involve the only child we have left moves me greatly.

However, when I decided to run in politics, I also accepted the challenge of making decisions, decisions that are not always easy to make, that often have important ramifications, but that must first and foremost be absolutely fundamental to the future of our country.

We should remember, that at the end of the last World War, Canada was considered as having a very important national defence. Indeed, the Canadian Navy was the third best in the world with almost 400 ships and three aircraft carriers. Our country was important for its national defense and for world-wide security. However, Canada quickly realized that the two superpowers of the day—the United States and the U.S.S.R.—were becoming more and more important and were depriving lesser countries such as France, Great Britain, Australia, Canada, and others of more and more say in international decision-making.

That is why Canada put so much effort in founding an organization called NATO, and it succeeded through contacts and relations it had with various countries in influencing the charter of that organization. It also helped set up the defence of the North American continent. Canada knew that it was caught anyway in the firing line between two large powers, the United States to the South and the USSR to the North.

During the 1970s, Canada reflected on its situation. Everybody remembers the October missile crisis when on one side Mr. Khrushchev had the option of pushing a button and on the other side Mr. Kennedy had the option to do the same. At that time, Canada realized that in spite of the United Nations Organisation which existed at that time, and in spite of NATO, NORAD and the Commonwealth which existed and to whom it belonged, something was missing.

Smaller countries did not have much influence on these two giants. That was when Canada started to work very hard with European countries, several NATO members and some countries from Eastern Europe to establish an organization called the Commission on Security and Control. This Commission was set up to find security and control measures that would protect the various States from one another, and ensure that no neighbouring country would invade them.

Canada became renowned within the CSCE, particularly for its work on human rights. Our country firmly and vigorously fought for freedom of movement. We argued that any citizen of one country had the right to move from one country to another without any difficulties or too much red tape. That is what Canada has worked for.

Canada ranks seventh in the world as an economic power while ranking 31st in terms of population. But Canada is fourth in terms of its economic contribution to the UN. Why? Because for 45 years, Canada has been a firm believer in international authority, in an international forum that would be capable of setting landmarks for nations, rules that are acceptable to all democratic nations on this planet so that we can live together on this speck of dust that travels the universe, our planet Earth.

Many of my colleagues spoke of environmental matters. Environment is indeed important. It seems that our climate is warming up and that there are many more problems. The UN should be able to take action and be effective at some point in time. After 45 long years, this day has come.

I felt it was a miracle to see the five countries which had a veto refusing to use it for once. There must not be two blocks any more, the good and the bad, whites and blacks. We have to sit down and work together in a reasonable way to find peaceful solutions. Almost at the same time, a country which had just ended an eight-year-long war with its neighbour, a war that cost nearly one million human lives and during which nearly 40 000 persons were burned and thousands of others were killed by the use of all kinds of toxic gas, decided to attack Kuwait. He moved into that small country. Of course, that country may not have been as democratically advanced as we are, but the process of democratization was under way. It is a country which was moving in the right direction, which wanted to give its citizens more autonomy, more social justice. He invaded that country.

It is a country which had never done any harm to Iraq. But Mr. Hussein, on behalf of his people, decided to invade it. I do not hold a grudge against the Iraqi people because they do not know what is really going on. It has no information whatsoever. Mr. Hussein and his entourage, Iraq's leaders, control the information to their people. If his people knew exactly the ins and outs of the present situation, Mr. Hussein would already be out of Kuwait. He would have gone out rapidly. If Mr. Hussein had informed his people about the risks involved in the invasion of Kuwait, he would never had invaded that country, never. Would we be here debating? I am not so sure. Must Canada use force if necessary? Some have asked if Canada had the right to declare war. Canada has been in a state of war for several months already. When this House agreed to support the UN measures, when we agreed to send our ships in the Persian Gulf, to send our aircrafts to protect them, when we agreed, as a nation, to support the economic embargo against Iraq, we have put our country to the service of the UN in a state of war. That's the truth.

Last November I was in Qatar and Bahrein. I met with Canadian soldiers who were there, real professionals, men and women of outstanding quality, the best we have in this country, people who are greatly appreciated by the residents of Qatar and Bahrain. Why are Canadians so appreciated over there? Because they are not seen as conquerors and invaders. Quite the contrary, they are considered as friends who come to lend them a hand, who come to help them protect themselves against a man who has attacked a small country like theirs.

This also marks the first time at the UN that people are so united, regardless of religion or language. Never have so many countries, so many different flags, or so many different nationalities formed a common front against a single individual.

Mr. Hussein did all he could to suggest it was a holy war and to rally his own blood brothers. They said: "No, Mr. Hussein, we do not agree with the way you are acting. This is no longer legitimate behaviour on the eve of the 21st century. We want peace in the Middle East. Mr. Hussein, you are leading us to war."

Madam Speaker, the moment a country like Canada decides to get involved in an international organization it has to be fully aware of the fact that it will have to live with its own decisions. This evening we are asking ourselves whether Canada will be compelled to resort to the necessary force. Let me put the question in a different context.

When an individual or a group of individuals goes into a bank or a building and takes hostages, how do we react when we hear about the incident? We call the police. We say: "There are people who took others as hostages, who do not respect our laws. We ask you to do your job, to get them out of there and to free the hostages." That is what we do in Canada. Everybody understands that. People in Canada do not ask themselves: "Are the police going to use their weapons? Could the hostages get injured or killed?" We do not wonder about that. We say: It is normal that the police do their job. We do not ask ourselves if a policeman could get injured or killed. We ask him to do his job, to protect us, because there is someone who does not respect the law in our country.

And when we get to the international level, then we say: No, it is not the same. Well, I tell you that Canadian military people in the Gulf play exactly the same role as a policeman would in Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver. It is a policeman role that our people play over there. It is strictly that. And we say to Hussein: You took people as hostages in Kuwait and you will free them, otherwise we will do it ourselves. Except that the issue is not the same. We are not talking about three or four individuals and we are not using hand guns or small weapons.

Weapons are much bigger today and they are also much more effective. But the issue remains the same. The same reality exists but on a different scale, a monstrous one. The decision we must make as parliamentarians is whether or not we should enforce international laws. I say that we should, Madam Speaker. I think that with all the efforts that Canada has made for the cause of peace over the years, now is the time to act and to show other countries of the world that the UN is a serious concern and that its laws are serious and credible. We cannot shirk our duty and say: "Well, we will see once the hostilities break out". It is now that we must determine our course of action. We must not wait for the problem to come up before acting, but we must be on the spot to prevent it from happening if possible. It has not been possible to anticipate the problem this time, to prevent Mr. Hussein from invading Kuwait. But his action must be stopped. He must withdraw his troops from that country fast.

I understand the people who are demonstrating across Canada the young and, the not so young, people who are worried, who are against war and who came here in the visitors' gallery today to show us they were against war, who were walking up and down with signs that stated: No blood for oil. That's fine. Except that when Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait, his troops killed babies in their incubators, not breaking open barrels of oil. The women who were raped, were not barrels of oil. The men who were hanged, the hundreds of thousands of people who were herded into the desert, without water and without food, were not barrels of oil but human beings. Is Canada going to sit on its hands? Are we going to do nothing?

Is Canada going to say: Keep up the good work, Mr. Hussein? We have done everything possible and imaginable in the way of diplomatic approaches. We tried to impress him by moving in a huge multinational force something unheard of in the modern history of this planet. He did not budge. It is like talking to a wall. No reaction. The most respected man on this planet, Mr. Perez de Cuellar, the servant of the UN, a born peacemaker who has been working hard all his life to pacify this planet was kept waiting. He kept him waiting in the hall as if he were a beggar. Is that the kind of respect he shows for the UN? How can we hope to convince him? I say there may yet be a possibility to be convinced. We have half an hour left, and I think there are three hours left until midnight in the Pacific, so we may still have three hours left until the deadline.

Maybe we will manage to convince him, maybe at the last minute he will touched by the Holy Spirit who will wake him up and say: "Saddam, you've got to get out. If you don't, you will be responsible for the largest cataclysm ever to happen on earth." I do not despair. I feel I do not have the right, as a representative of this country, as a member of this House elected by people I love, some of whom are presently in the gulf and whose relatives worry and call me. I understand their feelings and tell them that their sons or daughters have made a choice. I never wished that our military personnel be placed in such a situation, but when I met with them, they told me: "Mr. Ferland, don't worry about us, it's our job. We are going to do what we were trained for, but it does not mean we like it and are not scared. We too feel the pain, but we will do our job because world security is what we are here for. We will see to it that the UN commitments are respected and we will make sure that Canada is ably represented in the gulf, that the work to be done will be carried out as expertly as we know how, in a professional manner."

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, let me say that the this was not an easy decision to make, and I did make a decision. It was not easy to make, but I will stand to vote. When the question is put I will vote for the resolution because I think that Canada has to support the United Nations resolution and continue the work that has been accomplished over the past 45 years. Canada is morally bound to be logical with itself and, if need be, to take action.

I am still hopeful, Madam Speaker, that God will inspire Mr. Hussein in the next few hours and make him understand that he must get out of that country.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I have a very brief question for the hon. member. Of the 31 UN member states currently engaged to some degree of other in the imposition of the economic sanctions against Iraq, can the hon. member identify 10 that have betokened their intention to join the United States in offensive action against Iraq, if necessary?

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I do not have to identify 10 states for the simple and good reason that I do not have to decide for the other States which are currently involved in the Gulf. The issue which is raised here tonight is to know whether or not Canada must fulfil its commitment with the UN. It must stick to its commitments and yes, Canada must carry them out fully.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary North East): Madam Speaker, I was very much interested in the remarks the hon. member has made. He dealt with justice and international law, as well as the fact that Canada must follow the directions of the United Nations, or rather the United States.

What I was most interested in is the fact that for years, more specifically since 1947, the United Nations have had resolutions concerning the Middle East, especially Palestine, Lebanon and Cyprus. Has the hon. member a double standards? Is there justice where there is oil, such as in Kuwait which owns 10 per cent of the world oil reserves but which is not a democracy, compared to Lebanon which was a democracy, with a population of three million and where 600,000 people worked as slaves to support the sheik's high standard of living. It is also a country where the Parliament was abolished three years ago. It was a dictatorship, while Lebanon, which was invaded, was a democracy. Why did they not take action in the case of Lebanon? Why take action in the case of Kuwait?

There is also the case of the Soviet Union which has attacked Lithuania and wants to abolish its duly elected government. Will he also be sending Canadian troops to protect the Lithuanians?

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his excellent question. However, concerning the first part of his question, I must say that I do not agree with him at all when he says that Canada tags along with the U.S. I find it ridiculous that in Canada, parliamentarians continue to make people believe that Canada is always trailing behind the United States. If he had listened carefully to the speech given today by the hon. Joe Clark, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he would know that Canada has had a great influence on its southern neighbour, convincing him, for once, not to repeat the traditional blocks pattern but to play its rightful role within the United Nations, like all the other countries of the world.

With regard to Lebanon, Lithuania, and all those countries, we could also talk about many others as Czechoslovakia, and Afghanistan. When Lebanon for instance faced those problems, and was invaded, the UN could not do anything at that time because we were in the middle of a cold war. There were two block, two giant powers facing each other. If one said: "I am going in there," the other would say "OK, go ahead, I will go in another area soon but do not come and bother me." The cold war is over and it must not come back.

The reason why it is important for Mr. Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait is that we will be in position from now on to tell the Lithuanians and the Lebanese that we will be there as an international body to help them out of their troubles. That is the role of the UN, the role it will play in the future, a role which Canada has been wishing for that organization for the past 45 years. And I, for one, will not accept that one Saddam Hussein perverts the rules of the game today at the beginning of the year 1991. We are going into the 21st century. I want my son to enjoy the same freedom I have enjoyed myself for 46 years. I want more for him. I want him to live on a planet where life is good everywhere, where people of all colours and creeds can feel free and at home under a democratically elected government. That is what I dream for every country of the world.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, I want to start by making it absolutely clear that we in the Liberal Party fully support the charter of the United Nations and we fully support the role of the United Nations in preventing and resolving international conflict. We support the United Nations in its peacekeeping and its peacemaking roles. But just because we support the charter, this does not mean that we support every UN resolution and we certainly do not support Security Council resolution 678, which is the resolution which authorizes offensive military action against Iraq in 22 minutes from now.

The reason that we do not support that resolution is that we do not believe, as many others in the world do not believe, that it is the proper time. We maintain, as was pointed out by my leader this morning, that not enough time was given to the working of the economic sanctions, which in themselves were put forward by the United Nations in a Security Council resolution, not enough time for those sanctions to bite, and not enough time for diplomatic initiatives.

For the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to suggest that we do not support the United Nations simply because we do not support this or any other resolution is total nonsense. There are all sorts of UN resolutions that have not been implemented. There were many cases before the United Nations of aggression against other states which were condemned by the United Nations but for which there never were any economic sanctions or threats of war. My hon. colleague from Calgary just mentioned one of them. Lebanon was invaded by Syria and by Israel and nothing was done.

An hon. member: And Cyprus.

Mr. Allmand: My hon. friend mentions Cyprus and I could mention even cases of the United States in Grenada, Panama, and so on.

When the Prime Minister stands up in his place, as he did this morning, and when the Secretary of State for External Affairs stands up and talks of principle, it rings a bit hollow. It is no wonder the world looks at this with a certain amount of doubt and suspicion. There is a great credibility gap in what is happening at the United Nations with the initiative of the United States.

Nobody believes that guff which is being delivered by the Prime Minister and by the Conservative party that just because we do not support this resolution, we do not support the United Nations. The Liberal Party has supported the United Nations from its very beginning and our former leader, Mr. Pearson, won the Nobel Prize for his innovative work at the United Nations. We support the charter of the United Nations but we do not support every resolution, nor does the Conservative Party. Nor does any government in the world support every resolution passed by the United Nations.

The reason we do not support this resolution 678 is because not enough time has been given to other methods to resolve the conflict. If one reads the charter of the United Nations closely, one will see in chapter 6 and 7, and it makes it very clear in those two chapters of the charter, that military action by the United Nations should only be used after other methods to resolve a conflict have been tried and failed.

The United Nations in the month of August approved of resolution 660 and other resolutions which provided for economic sanctions and military action to support the sanctions. These are now being tried, but they have not been proved to have failed. As a matter of fact there is a lot of evidence to the effect that they are beginning to bite and to bite hard.

I was at the United Nations for five days last week. I spoke to a medical team which had just returned from Iraq and I was told that the medical system in that country is in very bad shape as a result of sanctions. Others have returned from Iraq and will confirm that the Iraqi government is having a difficult time obtaining spare parts for its military equipment and military vehicles, for its aircraft, and for its tanks. The major source of income for Iraq is oil revenues and they are not selling their oil.

I have an article written in The New York Times of yesterday, January 14, 1991. The headline of the article is: "Sanctions will bite and soon." In this article the writers refer to a study being carried out at Harvard University in which they have used an economic model to determine the effectiveness of the sanctions. They say that the sanctions are working and will work in a very strong manner. The article states: "Far from inconclusive the evidence suggests that sanctions will begin to bite sometime in the spring or early summer with a high probability of forcing Iraq from Kuwait as early as the fall." It states: "War may resolve the situation more quickly but with unpredictable side effects, including the loss of thousands of American lives."

I pointed to the resolutions of the United Nations in August. These resolutions authorize the sanctions and military action to support the sanctions. I said that if you read chapters 6 and 7 of the charter, it is absolutely clear that you only resort to military action after all other methods to resolve the conflict have failed. If one looks even beyond chapters 6 and 7 of the charter and look, at the preamble and the first chapter, which deals with the purposes of the United Nations, it is very clear that the purpose of the United Nations is to pursue peaceful means in resolving conflict. That is its principal goal. It must make every effort to seek peace through diplomatic and other measures and avoid war.

There certainly is nothing in the charter which would authorize "kicking ass", as the President of the United States suggested. At midnight on January 15, he would have the authority to go over and "kick ass" in Iraq and Kuwait. That did not impress the world and did not impress those who are seeking peaceful solutions to this very difficult situation.

I want to refer to an article by William Pfaff, a syndicated columnist for the Los Angeles Times, also on January 14, yesterday morning, in which he examines again whether or not this potential war is justified. In making his analysis, he refers to the moral rules that have been referred to over the centuries for judging whether or not a war is morally justified. He says that trouble begins with the third criterion for a justified war. He says that that is what the great debate in the United States Congress and among the public is about.

> An important part of the allied camp, and of congressional and public opinion in the United States, thinks that sanctions should be given more time to work, that the alternatives to war have not been exhausted. This latter clearly is true.

Of course, that criterion that he refers to for a justified war is that it must be the last resort after all peaceful measures have been exhausted.

William Pfaff asks in his article: "How did the United States get itself into this situation?" He points out that the American ultimatum and the deployment of so many troops, military equipment and forces to the area have placed them in a position now where they feel they cannot withdraw without losing face.

One knows that one of the very basic tenets of negotiation is that the top man does not make ultimatums at the very beginning of the resolution of the conflict. The President of the United States or the President of Iraq never says at the very beginning that this is the ultimatum for solving the crisis, so that neither side can back out, so that there is no door to escape by.

William Pfaff says that the American ultimatums and the deployment of so large an American and international force have created conditions with gross built-in penalties should Washington change course. That is the problem. They have themselves so far committed to war down the road that now they feel they would more or less embarrass themselves to back down. Again, Pfaff analyses that particular policy of the United States. He states:

> That puts the United States in the position of justifying immediate war to redeem its own unconsidered commitments.

But he says: "The critical moral commitment lies here. The Bush administration should never have put the United States into this position. However, it does little good to say that now we are where we are... Intellectual failure, is also a moral issue. Leaders are elected on their claim to know what they are doing. In this case they didn't know what they were doing."

The President of the United States and the administration of the United States, in making those ultimatums and in committing so many troops at an early stage of the situation, put themselves into a position now where they make war almost inevitable and they are trying to justify it after the fact. Unfortunately this government is backing them all the way on that particular effort.

It is true that the Security Council approved resolution 678. It is interesting, when we look at that particular vote, to see that such a wide diversity of countries actually came together in approving that resolution, countries such as the Soviet Union, France, China—

An hon. member: Not China.

Mr. Allmand: My colleague says: "Not China". It abstained. It certainly did not vote against it. It almost passed unanimously. It was not vetoed. There were only two dissenting votes by countries that did not have a veto.

In any case, it is true that they got that approval, but once again the fact that this group of nations approved of that resolution does not mean it is fully in accordance with the United Nations charter.

• (2350)

As my leader pointed out this morning, when we look at the key words in the resolution, it states that the Security Council authorizes member states co-operating with the Government of Kuwait to use all necessary means to uphold and implement Security Council resolution 660 and all subsequent relevant resolutions and to restore international peace and security in the area. It is authorizing member states to do all those things. It is authorizing the United States, Syria, Saudi Arabia, and Egypt as individual states to take what action they believe "all necessary" means, including war, to uphold and implement Security Council resolution 660 and to restore international peace and security in the area.

As we asked in the previous debate, what is meant by the area? Does this mean invading Israel, Lebanon, or Egypt? What does it mean to restore peace and security in the area?

It was a very wide open resolution. We voted against that resolution in this House at that time which would have supported this U.N. resolution because we said that it was too early, that sanctions had not been given enough time, and that diplomatic initiatives had not been given enough time.

I want to make clear that we do not support the actions of Saddam Hussein in his invasion of Kuwait. We voted for the first government resolution early in the fall which condemned that attack on Kuwait and asked the Iraqis to withdraw from Kuwait. We also supported the economic sanctions and the military backup of the economic sanctions. We still support those resolutions and we still condemn Saddam Hussein for his attack on Kuwait, but we do not believe that war is the answer at this time.

Again I get to the major issue which I thought was referred to in a very convincing way by the leader of this party this morning when he said that the resolution which should be before this House, if the government were really being honest with the Canadian people, should be a resolution which determines whether or not we should go to war with the United States against Iraq. That is the question that is to be decided. That is the question that was decided in the U.S. Congress. That is what was debated in the U.S. Congress. They made a decision, a very close split decision, in which both the House of Representatives and the Senate approved supporting the Government of the United States in taking military action against Iraq. That is not what we are debating in this House, but it is what we should be debating.

The resolution that the government put before this House that we support the United Nations, is a very general, vague sort of resolution. It does not say anything. It does not deal with the real issue. The amendment to the resolution that we have put to the House makes it very clear that while we condemn Iraq for its invasion of Kuwait and while we support the economic sanctions, we will not support an offensive war at this time against Iraq. It is too early and the economic sanctions have not been given enough time to take effect and diplomatic initiatives have not been given enough time to work.

One of the nations that supported resolution 678 at the Security Council was France. From my point of view President Mitterrand made very constructive proposals that might resolve this issue. They were rejected out of hand by the United States and Great Britain and it seems by Canada as well, because we have not heard from Canada on that particular point. But they certainly have not come to the defence of Mitterrand and the French proposals.

Again to refer to the charter of the United Nations wherein we are supposed to pursue all diplomatic and all non-military methods before we go to war, we should have given the French proposals at least a chance. The United States and Britain say that they cannot support the French proposals because they link the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq to the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and the Palestinian territories. I think that is unfortunate. I do not accept the point that Saddam Hussein invade Kuwait because he wanted to help the Palestinians. I do not accept that for a minute. The fact of the matter is that part of the difficulties in the Middle East is involved with the situation in the Palestinian occupied territories which have been occupied for a very long time, contrary to UN resolutions, without much being done. On the other side, most Arab states do not recognize Israel which is called for in UN resolutions as well. Wrong on both sides. That has been left outstanding for years and years. There have been no economic sanctions and there has been no suggestion of military action to resolve the situation.

While I do not like the fact that this is linked to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, I do believe that the reality of the situation suggests to me that if we want to solve this matter in a peaceful way we should at least pursue President Mitterrand's proposals. We should at least give serious attention to the French proposals. I am saddened by the fact that they were rejected so quickly by the Americans and by the British.

When I listened to the Prime Minister this morning, I thought for a moment I was listening to a new version of Dr. Strangelove. The Prime Minister in analysing the situation said: "Well, it is true that there will be risks if we go to war with the Americans and there will be casualties but, for the sake of principle, it is necessary perhaps that we accept these casualties." What principle, Madam Speaker? What is the principle that Canadians, Americans, and other young men from many countries will die for in this particular situation that could not be resolved by waiting out the sanctions?

If the Prime Minister was living in the 13th or 14th century and he decided to go to war with President Bush, both he and President Bush would have to get on their horses and lead the troops into battle like Henry V did in the Battle of Agincourt and so on.

Some hon. members: That is a good idea.

Mr. Allmand: He would have to put his own life on the line with all the men behind him. But, no, we have a situation where politicians, diplomats and generals decide to go to war and risk the lives of a lot of young men who do not know what the issues are all about while they sit in their comfortable offices in the capitals of the world.

As I listened to the Prime Minister this morning say that there may be a few casualties, I thought this is the new Dr. Strangelove.

I see that my time is coming to an end, but I want to make a final point. War is not a romantic escapade. It means the destruction of many innocent lives and it leaves its scars on families, nations and environments for generations to come.

Everything possible must be done to avoid war. In this case that has not happened. Everything possible has not been pursued. If we really honour the United Nations charter then more effort has to be made in pursuing non-military solutions. It is the government, not the opposition, that does not trust the United Nations.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce a question. Five and a half months ago, Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait and that is when the war started, if he wants to use this expression. More recently, former hostages told us that a week before their release fresh eggs were available on the free market in Kuwait and Iraq. Newspapers revealed that military equipment made in Germany would also be delivered to Saddam Hussein in the weeks to come.

Canada has played a key role in the application of sanctions. Navy personnel on board our three ships intercepted almost 1,600 ships, in other words, they have done more than 25 per cent of the work, while accounting for only about 10 per cent of all troops deployed to control sanctions.

A while ago, I heard some opposition members say that we could control all transborder exchanges and material transfers by way of satellites. I want to ask to the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce how he sees the problem, what are the means he would propose to control and prevent smuggling going on right now between Iran and Iraq, and how he would protect the borders, between Iran and Iraq and between Syria and Iran, when we have absolutely no right over these territories. We know that these countries have borders that are absolutely impossible to secure completely. We have an extraordinary example of this in the fact that Canada and United States have signed the most perfect treaties to prevent drug circulation between our countries, but our borders are absolutely impossible to control. How would he manage, personally, to do it over there?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member will have to wait until a little later today to answer these questions.

It being midnight, pursuant to the order made previously during this sitting, the House stands adjourned until today at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at midnight.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday more than 500 people in Val d'Or took part in the first pacifist demonstration in the area against the war in the Persian Gulf. Demonstrators, most of whom were students, accompanied by teachers, representatives of associations, unions, native communities and the people of Val d'Or quietly walked for three kilometres.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that this march for peace in my riding was organized by a first-year student at the Polyvalente Le Carrefour of Val d'Or, 13-year old Tommy Saucier, who has every reason to be proud of this success.

TEST BAN TREATY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, since January 7, an important conference has been taking place at the United Nations in New York. This is a special conference to convert the partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty and thereby ban all nuclear tests.

At the present time only underground tests are permitted, but there have been over 1,000 of these tests since 1970, and the number of nuclear weapons increased from 20,000 to 50,000. Unfortunately, the United States and the United Kingdom are opposing this conference and Canada is not supportive. This is hard to understand, since some of the states involved in the Middle East crisis are pressing to develop nuclear weapons and a comprehensive test ban would retard this development.

Before this conference ends on Friday, I would ask the Canadian government to support the continuation of the conference and a comprehensive test ban. Stop the development of nuclear weapons.

EL SALVADOR

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, at this time of war threat caused by a bloody dictator, the death squads of El Salvador openly claim the right to absolute power.

For 10 days after Christmas, my wife Alice and I, with others, visited El Salvador. We met many unarmed people who are risking their lives to repopulate the rural areas, build a movement for peace in El Salvador, and contest the March 10 national and municipal elections.

One of them, whose father, the rector of the University of El Salvador was assassinated by the death squads in 1980, returned from exile and is running as a candidate for the national assembly.

Two days ago the Globe and Mail reported the broadcast by the death squads, claiming to represent "a superior capitalist class (that)—has a duty to exploit—and even exterminate the inferior classes when the benefits of capitalism require such".

I call on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to demand that President Cristiani of El Salvador suppress the death squads.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the debate we are engaged in now is not an easy one. We are debating the future and whether or not Canada should stand with 30 other nations against the aggression of Iraq.

After hearing the talk in this House of Commons, Canadians have a right to be confused. Perhaps it would be useful if we all asked ourselves some simple questions. Is this a war about Kuwait, Iraq, oil supplies, Texaco's profits, or is it about preventing a global nuclear war?

Can Canada or the world stand the risk of having a holy war waged against Israel, where pilots now are sleeping in their cockpits? Most importantly, can we afford to wait any longer? Each day of sanctions, and not action, is a day that Saddam Hussein digs in deeper, a day he prepares to pollute the environment with crude oil and makes a larger war more inevitable.

Saddam Hussein wants this House to vote against this country supporting the United Nations. I think Canadians should ask themselves exactly why that is.

LITHUANIA

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the world was shocked, saddened and profoundly disappointed by the turn of events last weekend in Lithuania.

The brutal attack on Lithuania's broadcast facilities, resulting in the deaths of 14 people and injuries to 163 others, has raised concerns about the future of perestroika and glasnost and indeed the future of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. There are real fears that the Soviet government is losing or has lost control when events of this nature can take place without the apparent knowledge of Mr. Gorbachev and the Soviet leadership.

For the sake of all the people in the Soviet Union, I hope and pray that the savagery we witnessed last weekend will not be repeated. Continued progress toward democratization and economic reform must continue. But it must continue with the historic recognition by the Soviet Union that not all of the constituent republics freely accepted their original participation within that union.

The only way in which peace, stability, prosperity and freedom will come to Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia is for the Soviet Union to recognize fully the principle of self-determination and allow the peoples of those republics to determine their collective futures by democratic means.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, by invading Kuwait, Iraq provoked the worst international crisis in recent years.

This act of aggression is a genuine challenge to the international community, at a time when the end of superpower rivalry has opened the way to using dialogue and co-operation to resolve international problems and preserve peace and security.

The main issue here, is how we can build and protect a durable new world order.

Saddam Hussein has had 49 days to act on the resolutions taken by the nations of this world.

Our collective security may require the use of force to safeguard order and peace in this world, when all other attempts to reach a solution have failed.

Our support for this resolution, which was adopted by the vast majority of members of the Security Council, where both small and large countries are represented, arises from our commitment to the United Nations as the preferred instrument for maintaining international peace and security.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, six months ago the Sureté du Quebec attempted to storm Mohawk barricades at Oka, igniting a summer of native protest and armed response which tarnished Canada's reputation around the world.

When hostilities subsided last September, a $4 million land claim had escalated into a $200 million military action.

It appears that Canada learned nothing from last year's conflict. Continued police harassment of Mohawks at the Kahnawake reserve has led to violence in recent weeks. Yesterday's news that the Quebec government is purchasing three Leopard tanks to use against the Mohawks at Kanesatake has outraged not only Canadians, but also members of the European Parliament who are investigating our human rights record toward aboriginal peoples.

Canadians want to know when the Government of Canada is going to exercise its constitutional jurisdiction and its fiduciary obligation to protect Quebec's natives from the Quebec provincial police. They also want to know if the government is going to permit the SQ to acquire the kind of weapons which will transform them from a police force into a military force.

UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Jean–Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, today the whole world is holding its breath, faced with the imminent risk of armed conflict in the Persian Gulf. A world that a few months ago had found new hope after the end of the Cold War now faces the difficult task of restoring order and security, after the serious violations of international law by Iraq.

Since the beginning of the crisis, the United Nations has been the preferred instrument of consultations on a world scale, aimed at restoring peace and order by peaceful means. The fact that the nations of this world are prepared to work through the UN, to decide on ways in which peace can be restored, is a sign that there is still hope for a world based on mutual assistance and co–operation.

If we are to build a new world order, the efforts of the United Nations must be successful. The whole world shudders at the spectre of war, but failure to respond to this act of aggression conjures up an even worse spectre, that of a world dominated by misunderstanding and injustice, a world in which our hopes for peace and freedom would be dashed forever.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, clearly the majority of Canadians believe that Canada should not go to war, that there is still a chance for a peaceful resolution of the gulf crisis. Canadians also believe that our troops should be supported in their present role of enforcing sanctions. Until an impartial study concludes that sanctions have not worked, there is no need to engage in war. Experts tell us that sanctions may require at least 12 months to starve Iraq's economy and its capacity to wage war.

We on the Liberal side therefore believe that we are a long way from the point when a war effort would be required. Should such a time come, such effort should be under the United Nations flag. While the artificial deadline has passed, there is still time for Canada to take initiatives to pursue a peaceful solution. Every day, every hour, every minute counts. It would be a terrible mistake to assume that war is still inevitable.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, some journalists have been speculating already about the possibility of a draft of young Canadians to participate in a gulf war. Such speculation can only be described as unnecessary and inappropriate fear mongering.

Let us consider the facts. Some 2,000 Canadians are now in the gulf. There are another 83,000 regular and 30,000 reserves in the Canadian Armed Forces, a substantial number of whom have already volunteered for gulf service.

Twenty–five thousand Canadians served in the Korean war. They were all volunteers. Over one million Canadians served in World War II. In 1944, after four years of hostilities, the King government, after a national referendum, instituted conscription and eventually some 13,000 conscriptees went overseas, though not all of these people saw action. Similar numbers exist for World War I and, of course, only volunteers served in the South African war.

We still hope to avert a gulf war. However, there will be no conscription for a gulf war if it comes. No talk or speculation of such is warranted or helpful.

IRAQ

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs inaccurately apply remarks made by the Nobel Peace Prize winner and former Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson. They stated yesterday "that Mr. Pearson always maintained that once talk was over, et cetera. What a careless depiction of his wisdom.

This government did not allow for the exercise of Pearsonian diplomacy. Article 42 of the UN charter clearly states that should the Security Council of the United Nations consider that sanctions have proved to be inadequate, it may take other actions, which are possibly about to occur. Our own government has not offered any proof that sanctions have not worked.

A Harvard University test model on sanctions policies has shown that the likelihood of eventual success from imposing sanctions on Iraq, especially with the current physical enforcement of them by many nations, the 48 per cent of Iraq's Gross National Product would be lost, resulting in an over 85 per cent success rate for the sanctions policy.

The Prime Minister says that war is now our moral duty. What Mr. Pearson actually meant is that our true moral duty is to ensure all avenues contributing toward the de-escalation of tensions are given our utmost support. Give peace a chance.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the issue that challenges the world as we know it, the Persian Gulf crisis. It challenges each and every one of us as parliamentarians.

On a global basis the crisis challenges the new international order which we have been so actively attempting to build following the end of the cold war. Also, it fundamentally challenges the role of the United Nations as a key guarantor of that order.

As parliamentarians, the crisis challenges us to go beyond partisan politics. It also challenges us to respect the views and emotions on all sides of this issue. None of us can be said to have all the information and all the answers. Yet, based on what we feel is informative and accurate, we must in the end formulate our opinions and stances.

Irrespective of where we stand, I know that each and every one of us prefers a peaceful resolution of this crisis. Indeed, I personally remain hopeful that peace can still be achieved, and I pray that it will happen.

I would like to take this opportunity to call upon the world leaders to continue their diplomacy and efforts toward a peaceful resolution. No avenues or opportunities can be left unturned.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, since last August, events in the Persian Gulf have slowly but surely edged towards the fateful deadline of January 15.

The deadline has passed. The government claims that diplomacy has failed, and there is a real possibility that the conflict in the Persian Gulf will turn into a genuine conflagration.

[English]

In fact, a war will have catastrophic consequences for the inhabitants of the Persian Gulf region and unimaginable repercussions for international peace and world security.

Has the government considered the human cost of our involvement in such a war? Furthermore, what social programs will be cut to finance Canada's involvement?

The government has failed to provide the leadership which Canadians have come to expect. Instead, it has chosen to follow blindly the Americans into the heart of a conflict, which outcome no one can predict.

Peace and sanctions must be given a chance to work.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday in his speech the Prime Minister referred many times to Lester B. Pearson. Well, Mr. Speaker, I knew Mr. Pearson and I think that if he were Prime Minister today he would be working for a peaceful solution to this crisis.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: He would have phoned the American President and urged him not to go to war at this time.

Has the Prime Minister spoken with President Bush since the deadline and, if so, did he urge President Bush not to go to war now?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have to admire my hon. friend for a number of reasons, not the least of which is his capacity to discern what might be in Mr. Pearson's mind today. That is truly a gift and I congratulate him on it.

Mr. Andre: Like Mackenzie King.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: It was the House leader who said Mackenzie King, not I.

But we can only go on the record with the contributions to the cause of peace of Mr. King, Mr. St. Laurent, and Mr. Pearson, all of which were very substantial and which contributed a great deal to establishing the traditions which we are respecting today.

I have been in regular communication with leaders around the world in regard to this important issue. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and I maintain at this very moment the pursuit of all possible alternatives that might give rise to a peaceful solution.

Mr. Gauthier: Like what?

Mr. Mulroney: The House leader for the opposition says: "Like what?" Like, for example, Saddam Hussein saying to the world: "Yes, I will respect for once the call of the world community. Yes, I will give an affirmative answer to the United Nations, thereby placing the world on a course to peace."

The obstruction does not come from France, Canada, the Dutch, or the Senegalese. The problem is with Saddam Hussein and he must say yes.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I put a question to the Prime Minister, and I want a very clear and very simple answer. Since yesterday, did the Prime Minister get in touch with the President of the United States, George Bush, and did he ask Mr. Bush to wait before starting the war and give peace a chance in the Middle East? And, is war the Prime Minister's only alternative?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition is no doubt aware, we are constantly in touch with our allies on this matter.

As for his suggestion regarding Mr. Pearson, this is what Mr. Pearson said in similar circumstances in the House, on September 4, 1950:

[English]

> It has been suggested that we could have made further efforts in regard to mediation and the employment of pacific measures in the Korean dispute. That, of course, as I see it, is not a realistic suggestion. Because, even when it was tried—and it was tried in the earlier days of this dispute—the aggressor treated that suggestion with contempt.

Mr. Pearson was right then. Canada had to act because the aggressor in 1950 treated them with contempt.

Today, Saddam Hussein is treating the world with contempt. Even at this late moment, we ask him, personally and we ask his government—to send a signal to the world that he will comply with the resolution of the United Nations. If he does, he will enable us all to seek and obtain a peaceful solution to this extremely difficult matter.

Some hon. members: Hear. hear.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Prime Minister that in 1950 the government of the day and Mr. Pearson, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, insisted that the troops going to war in Korea had to be there under the command of the UN and under the UN flag. It was not an American war. It was a United Nations war.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: If the Prime Minister does not want to tell us whether or not he talked with the President of the United States, will he tell us if he has taken any initiative today with the Secretary–General of the United Nations; yesterday he was still making efforts to find a peaceful solution and there should have some discussions with the Secretary–General in order to find a peaceful solution? January 15 was not the date to start the war. We could be in a war position, but we are not yet in a war position. Can peace still have a chance?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have two brief comments in response to the Leader of the Opposition, one having to do with the question of a flag.

The Leader of the Opposition invented a false principle, in effect, a falsehood, yesterday with regard to the question of the Canadian flag—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I am sure he did it inadvertently—with regard to the question of the Canadian flag, when he said that Canadian troops never serve except under a UN flag. Does he not know about the multinational force of observers in Sinai where Canada is serving? If he wants to speak symbolically, does he not know about Canada's participation through the years in NATO under the NATO flag? What is at issue is the authority of the United Nations and there is no question at all about the authority of the United Nations being vested under Resolution 678.

With respect to the Secretary–General of the United Nations, the Leader of the Opposition should know, if he was watching the Secretary–General's appeal yesterday, that that appeal reflects very largely the points that were contained in the letter from the Prime Minister of Canada to the Secretary–General of the United Nations, suggesting a negotiating position that might be followed with Saddam Hussein. I tabled that letter in the House of Commons yesterday.

We are encouraging the Secretary–General and others to continue to persevere in those kinds of efforts. But the Prime Minister makes it abundantly clear, and the world knows this—President Mitterrand made it clear for France today—that the person whose response is required is Saddam Hussein.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The majority of Canadian men and women are opposed to the government's actions in the gulf crisis. They ask that economic sanctions and negotiations be continued, in order to reach a peaceful solution. Does Canada intend to ask the Security Council and coalition members to take the time to look at other, non–military means to get Hussein out of Kuwait, such as reinforcing economic sanctions?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talked about time. The Security Council and the world gave Saddam Hussein a period of grace, 47 days during which every day, every minute, Saddam Hussein had a chance to respond. Every time he refused. He shut the door on every initiative taken by the Secretary–General of the UN and others.

[English]

When members of the opposition speak of giving Saddam Hussein more time, let them ask themselves: What use does he make of this time? What use did he make of the period of a pause for peace? During that period he was building a trench across Kuwait to allow himself to take oil and move it through that trench to pollute the Persian Gulf, to undertake and commit, in effect, environmental warfare. How much time does the opposition party want to give Saddam Hussein to carry forward this kind of activity?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions in turn for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Number one, why is the government refusing to listen to Canadians who are saying: "Take the time to make the sanctions work to get Hussein out of Kuwait by not going to war"? Why does the government not listen to Canadians who are trying to tell them something?

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, why does he not listen to Canadians who say that you do not have to destroy a country? you do not have to kill people, you do not have to destroy a region to stop aggression?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I naturally do listen to Canadians. I listen to the evidence that is given by intelligence experts. I would very much listen to the hon. member if he would begin to accept my invitation of some months ago that he make available to us any information that he has that sanctions are working.

I will be writing to the hon. member because we do not have time in the House to correct all of the false impressions he leaves upon the record of Parliament.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should move on. The hon. member for Yukon.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He is aware that this morning, I sent the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition a letter asking that a free vote be held on the question of war. It has become increasingly clear that for all Canadian men and women, the decision whether or not to go to war is a personal one. It is a matter of conscience and also a matter of the kind of information available to each person.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: The decision each and everyone of us must make is the most non-partisan decision we will ever have to make in our lives. My question for the Prime Minister is: Will he hold a free vote on this question?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question yesterday. As far as the government is concerned, the policies we adopted were approved after full and vigorous debate in our national caucus, a debate that started in August last year.

I have not asked a single member—not yesterday or the day before and I will not do so in the future—to vote along any kind of line on this issue. Our members will confirm that after these vigorous and interesting debates in caucus, I go out and defend the interests of the government as I see them. I admit that a number of important and personal questions have been raised by a number of members, including several members on this side of the House, and I did not ask anyone how he or she is going to vote.

I assume that considering the fact that members were personally and actively involved in preparing this important policy, those members will support the government. I have not asked for any guarantees or opinions of any kind whatsoever. However, I realize the hon. member has a position she would like to make quite clear and it is one that I respect.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I presume the Prime Minister and his government took the decision to have Canada participate in a war in the gulf based on some information. When the United States Congress voted on its resolution, which certainly passed narrowly, authorizing the use of military force against Iraq, it added that the U.S. President must come before Congress and both give reasons why sanctions had not worked and what other information was then available.

Presuming that the Prime Minister made this decision and took the position based on information available to him about whether economic sanctions have worked or not, will he table that information with this House so that we may also have access to that information?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party will know that there was a lengthy hearing of the standing committee that dealt with the questions of sanctions. I presented a very full presentation. I indicated I would be prepared to have confidential briefings with others for further information. I made it clear that the information we had that was in confidence was not different in its effect from what was being presented to the committee.

I can tell the member now and the House that there continues to be very broad international respect for sanctions. It is one of the most effectively adhered to programs in the world. That is on the outside. The question is. What is happening on the inside? Is it affecting the military capacity of Saddam Hussein? The answer sadly is that there is no evidence that it is. There is a problem, Mr. Speaker, a problem that would be very troubling to the Leader of the New Democratic Party, that is that no matter how tight these sanctions of unprecedented tightness are, foodstuffs and strategic imports such as chemical additives, lubricants, water purification chemicals, and spare parts are reaching Iraq undetected. They are needed in relatively small volumes and they can be transported by air or overland by truck or pack animal, or by small boats capable of eluding naval interdiction.

In other words these elements which can be used to build a war machine are still getting in despite the tightest sanctions we have. How long would the Leader of the New Democratic Party—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we should move to the next question.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, obviously the minister responsible for external affairs is telling us in this House that we can put people on the moon but we cannot stop material going into Iraq by air, we cannot stop material going into Iraq by sea, and we cannot stop material going into Iraq by land.

Why then would we embark on economic sanctions in the first place because we would have known that? Also, where does he get this information, and will he table the source of his information today?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the Leader of the New Democratic Party because she lives in a world of wish. She wishes that it were possible for humankind to be able to develop absolutely airtight control of human behaviour.

What I am telling here is that we have the most airtight system of sanctions the world has known and yet even with the most effective network of sanctions we have known, there are strategic imports getting into Iraq. They will continue to get into Iraq because if there is a change in the effectiveness of sanctions, if we weaken the United Nations, that will be a change not to make sanctions more effective with more countries participating, but to make sanctions less effective.

So how long does she want to—

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The government has decided to send a field hospital to Saudi Arabia.

Can the minister tell us whether this will serve only the British forces or will it serve Canadian forces as well? Does he have any plans in mind for sending other Canadian forces to the gulf, such as land forces, for example, and will this indicate any change in the position of the Canadian forces from defensive to offensive?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not think my hon. colleague was calling a field hospital an offensive force.

Canada received a request from the United Kingdom to provide a field surgical unit. They believe two things. Because of their additional commitment to the multinational force is presently serving under the UN Resolution 678 that they did not have the capacity to, one, provide their medical support, and two, the capacity as the Geneva Convention calls for to provide medical support to prisoners of war.

Canada has the capability of providing a self-sustained field hospital unit. It will consist of some 550 Canadian personnel. It will have the medical support side which will be made up of some 170. The other support staff will make up the balance, including an infantry company which will provide perimeter defence to the unit. It will be under technical control of the United Kingdom and it will fly the Canadian flag.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, it should be clear that this party has no opposition in principle to the sending of medical services and personnel. But what Canadians do want to know is the role of the Canadian forces now in the gulf, and those Canadian forces that may be committed to the gulf. Can the minister say what he has in mind exactly? Can he say today, clearly, what he has in mind for the role of the Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions over the last number of days the hon. member has talked about ground troops. I have said that the Government of Canada has no plans, secretive or otherwise, to send a brigade group into the gulf area.

I would like to know whether the hon. member agrees with his leader now that he says in principle the Liberal Party supports the sending of a field hospital unit. Does that include the statement his leader made yesterday, that if hostilities start all Canadian troops should be withdrawn?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. I want to get back to this business about who is running the show.

Yesterday the Minister of National Defence suggested to me that in the absence of a United Nations force commander that the principles of the well established NATO command and control structure could apply. I would remind the minister, of course, that NATO is headed by a military committee, as he well knows, and a chairman of that committee. The chairman is the boss.

In the Persian Gulf situation, who is going to be the equivalent? Who is going to be the boss? Who is going to be in charge?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the function of the multinational forces has taken place since August 2 when several nations, now totalling some 30, made a decision to support the United Nations resolutions, starting with resolution 660.

The coordinators, equivalent of the military committee in NATO, have been the national commanders representing their countries in that area.

If the hon. member wants to draw an equivalent to SACEUR, the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, who is an American general, it is an American general who is co-ordinating in Saudi Arabia in conjunction with King Fahd, the protector of the two holy mosques.

In the other areas in the gulf, because of the presence and the size of the assets that are there, the co-ordination is done by an American admiral.

• (1440)

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his response.

If I understand it properly, McArthur ran the Korean war, Eisenhower ran the D-Day operation and I think there is an example there. One cannot run a war without one person being in charge. I am still not sure who is in charge.

I would like the minister to clarify it for the Canadian people. Are we working for the Americans, the Saudis, or just who is going to run the show?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, since the outset of the Saddam Hussein attack of Kuwait on August 2, Canada has been working toward peace and security in the world, and we are serving the United Nations and the people of Canada at the present time in bringing that about.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to the question of the role of Canadian forces in the gulf.

The minister has not clearly answered the question. He has ruled out a brigade group but he has not dealt with specific and clear questions, particularly in respect of the role of the CF-18s. Senior military officers say the role has not yet changed. The Minister of Justice has said that no decision has been made as to a change in role.

Will the minister tell this House and the Canadian people whether there will be any change in the role of the CF-18s to a role in support of the military attack that is now being contemplated against Iraq in Kuwait?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if hostilities commence, the Canadian forces personnel in the fighter squadron will continue to do the job that they are doing at the present time. That is, flying combat air patrol over Canadian vessels and those assets of the allied nations or the collaborating nations in the region.

Mr. Benjamin: What are the assets?

Mr. McKnight: An hon. member asks what the assets are. They include everything that happens to be in the gulf and everything that happens to be an asset on land in Saudi Arabia.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the minister has confirmed by his last answer that this government is plunging Canadian troops into an offensive war that is immoral, that is wrong, and that does not have the support of the Canadian people.

When will the government listen to the Canadian people?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member about collective security, if I could.

The hon. member is suggesting that Canada has changed its role. Yes, there has been a change in the circumstances. Up until January 15, last midnight, there was a pause for peace which started with resolution 660 of the United Nations and went all the way through the 12 resolutions, concluding with resolution 678.

What has changed is Saddam Hussein did not take advantage of that pause for peace. What has happened is that the brutal aggression that took place on August 2 and the occupation of a country and the destruction of a people continuing.

The United Nations and the issue of collective security has to be enforced. The opposition can make decisions that are not responsible. Unfortunately, this government has a position to make and it must be responsible. We accept that responsibility. God help Canada if his party ever has to make that responsibility.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As world attention remains focused on the gulf crisis, the tension in Lithuania and the other two Baltic states increases by the day.

At the opening of the Conference for Security and Co-operation in Europe in Malta yesterday on the peaceful settlement of disputes, and I repeat, the peaceful settlement of disputes, I was pleased to learn Canada made a statement condemning the crackdown in Lithuania, calling for a restraint on further violence.

I ask the minister: What recommendations did his government make to the conference? If he has not already done so, will he pledge to increase humanitarian aid in the form of medical supplies and/or food directly to Lithuania and to the other states, as already requested by many Canadians of Baltic descent?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that even in the teeth of the grave crisis we face in the gulf the hon. member and other members of the House would cause the Parliament and public of Canada to focus again on what is happening in Lithuania, actions that are entirely unacceptable to us.

That has been communicated to Soviet authorities by a letter from the Prime Minister to Mr. Gorbachev and by the eloquent and I hope effective resolution adopted unanimously by the House yesterday.

With regard to medical supplies, we are prepared to do everything we can. We have had conversations with members of the Baltic communities in Canada, the Baltic communities in their entirety, not simply Canadians of Lithuanian origin. We will speak with others.

We will do everything we can to continue to ensure, because the hon. member knows that we were able to get medical supplies in earlier, that medical supplies get in. There may be some new limits on our capacity. There will be no limits upon our will.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his party and members of all three parties for giving unanimous consent to the resolution that we passed in this House yesterday.

There is a fear that similar military action that occurred in Lithuania will soon occur in Latvia and Estonia. Will the minister confirm today if he has sent a strong message directly to Moscow that Canada will view such action as totally unacceptable, that such action would have dire consequences for the relations with the Soviet Union and could rekindle the east-west cold war, which none of us want?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that was certainly clear in the letter that was sent by the Prime Minister to Mr. Gorbachev.

As the hon. member will know, there is now a new foreign minister in the Soviet Union who has been to Canada, whom I have met and I think others have met. I will be in touch with him shortly, and among the points I will be making will be precisely the two points the hon. member has raised: first, our concern about that unacceptable behaviour extending to other Baltic republics; and, second, the inescapable fact that if the Soviet Union continues upon that path with regard to the Baltic States. That is bound to have an impact upon not only the official policy of this government but also the attitude toward the Soviet Union and toward the goals of reform articulated by Mr. Gorbachev that had been so strongly supported by so many Canadians of eastern and central European origin, of origin in the Soviet Union, including the Baltic peoples. But those peoples, those Canadians, cannot be expected to support an idea of reform by an administration that carries out activities of the kind we have seen in Lithuania.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence.

Before the Persian Gulf crisis came along, the minister was sending out signals that substantial cuts could be expected in the numbers of the Canadian forces personnel and other areas of the defence department as a cost saving exercise.

In view of the varied and valued expertise of our forces, does the minister still have plans in place to cut the Canadian forces after the gulf crisis is over?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as long as this party has the authority and the responsibility of providing security for Canada, we will continue to spend the appropriate amount of taxpayers' dollars to provide that security.

I am not too sure with his present leader whether that would be necessary if his party formed the government.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the same minister. The government has proposed cuts in the Public Service of Canada to help pay for military operations in the gulf. That is the kind of financial commitment this government has.

How does the government now plan to pay for the Persian Gulf operation in addition to those measures already stated? For example, will the government increase the deficit or is the Minister of Finance opposing that step?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, since the gulf crisis which started with the attack of Iraq on Kuwait on August 2, I have had the total support and commitment of my cabinet colleagues, from the Prime Minister to the Minister of Finance and my caucus.

• (1450)

I can say to the hon. member that Canada in the past has never made a decision to defend world order and bring about peace and security because of the cost. It has done it because it has been right.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The human and environmental consequences of any war are self-evident. Scientific projections of the environmental implications of Iraqi threats to destroy Kuwaiti oilfields if attacked reveal the potential for devastating climate change.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs alluded to environmental warfare. Does the government not recognize that this war is too horrible to contemplate? Why is this government following this insane course?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have just indicated to the House that Saddam Hussein has used the last period of time that was given to him to construct, I said, a trench. In fact it is a pipeline, the purpose of which is to create terrible environmental damage. That is happening now.

If there is a point that I am seeking to have communicated to the people of Canada, it is that the status quo we face now is a status quo that is full of peril and full of damage.

Ask any Kuwaiti. Ask anyone in Saudi Arabia whose water purification processes would be corrupted irretrievably by the way that Saddam Hussein has used the time.

The choice is not between some kind of peaceful status quo and the terrors of war. Of course war is horrible, but so is allowing aggression and so is allowing Saddam Hussein the time to do other terrible things.

What do you think he is doing with his chemical weapons? What do you think he is doing with his biological weapons? He is using that time in ways that the New Democratic Party should not be supporting.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The definition of collective security seems to be limited to military security. Given the scientific evidence of the global ecological implications of war in the gulf, will the government broaden its definition of collective security beyond the narrow view of military supremacy?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that was done some time ago, not only in the speech I had the honour to deliver on behalf of Canada to the last General Assembly of the United Nations, but most profoundly in the green paper brought down by my colleague, the Minister of the Environment.

ALTERNATE FUELS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the Persian Gulf crisis has again underscored how dependent the western world is on the fragile oilfields of the Middle East. In response, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Can the minister tell this House exactly what steps this government is taking to encourage seriously the development and use of alternative fuels like methanol, ethanol, propane, and natural gas?

Surely, if there is a time that we should think about running our cars on alternate fuels, it has to be now.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question.

I think the important point is, despite the gulf crisis, that the government has been involved in alternate fuels and fuel switching for some period of time. That has been the MILE program, the natural gas program that we have initiated, for example the agreements that we have signed with General Motors with respect to the methanol use and with the Ford Motor Company, also including transit buses.

I appreciate what the hon. member is saying as well. Within the green plan there is an initiative for further expansion of methanol, ethanol, and natural gas, compressed gas. I say to the hon. member that we will continue redoubling our efforts on it, but it has been going on for some period of time.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am convinced that the decision to go to war can only be made on the basis of a deep conviction that the sanctions just could not work. I do not think that you have managed as yet to establish that.

I sent yesterday to your parliamentary secretary the results of an analysis of 115 cases which The New York Times published yesterday, where experts found that, in view of the exceptional effectiveness of the sanctions against Iraq there were 100 per cent chances that in the long run the sanctions would succeed and that even—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member please come to his question?

Mr. Tremblay (Rosemont): What can you reply to that?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I missed the question, if there was one. Perhaps the hon. member could repeat it very briefly.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): What can you reply to the experts who carried out this analysis?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I believe the hon. member is referring to an article in The Globe and Mail and The New York Times where a number of social scientists carried out projections on the probability of success of the sanctions. As I said yesterday during the debate—I do not know whether the hon. member was here at the time—

An hon. member: No, he was not here.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): He was not here? I clearly indicated then that there was a difference between concrete evidence and social scientists' projections. We have no reason to believe that the sanctions in place against Iraq will have an impact on its military capacity before at least six months, maybe nine; perhaps much longer than that. As I have just told the Leader of the New Democratic Party, it is quite clear that even with the most stringent sanctions in the history of the world, strategic material can still get to Iraq thus allowing Saddam Hussein's to increase its military capacity.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Today the minister would have us believe that he is concerned over the human repercussions, but in his speech yesterday he did not refer even once to the serious environmental consequences of the conflict.

Can the minister tell us to what extent Canada considered the environmental impact before making its decision? And can he give us today his assessment of the terrible environmental degradation we can expect if war does break out?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): One thing for sure, Mr. Speaker, is that Saddam Hussein did not bother to analyse the impact on the environment, on human rights, and on world security before launching his attack against Kuwait. Another thing for sure is that he did show he is quite capable and determined to use and create war tools which might lead us into an environmental war. This has already been demonstrated. If we continue to give Saddam Hussein the time asked for by the Liberal Party, it is clear that he will seek other means to launch an attack against the world environment.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have the right to expect from their government a far higher degree of concern than is being shown by Saddam Hussein.

The environmental fallout from this war is simply going to be devastating, far greater than anything that Saddam Hussein could do on his own. The effect may well be to destroy the food chain far beyond the immediate regions involved. It will certainly turn the Persian Gulf into another Dead Sea.

Given this and given the hundreds of thousands of deaths that will surely occur, the question this government must answer, the question this government has not answered is: Why take the fatal and irreversible step of committing to war before it is clear beyond any shadow of a doubt—and it is not clear beyond any shadow of a doubt—that the most comprehensive set of sanctions that have ever been imposed in modern history will work?

• (1500)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the most comprehensive set of sanctions ever devised in human history, and I agree with the hon. member on that, are allowing now the passage into Iraq of chemical additives, lubricants, water purification chemicals, spare parts and other things that can be used to build the war machine. The time that is being demanded by the Liberal Party is allowing Saddam Hussein to devise new means of environmental warfare, to perfect his capacity to conduct chemical warfare, and to perfect his capacity to conduct biological warfare.

Mr. Speaker, with regard to other impacts, let me quote from the report of Amnesty International. It reported on December 19 that the violations of rights within Kuwait by Iraq include arbitrary arrest and detention, without trial, of thousands of civilians and military personnel, widespread torture of such persons in custody, imposition of the death penalty, and execution of hundreds of unarmed civilians, including children. The member should stop pretending that there is some kind—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs may want to table that document.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I would be honoured to do so.

REQUEST THAT DOCUMENT BE TABLED

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may pose a point of order.

We are asking The Secretary of State for External Affairs, as a senior minister, should know the traditions of this House, that when he cites from and reads from a document in this House, he should be asked to table that document so that all members can share the information.

I am not referring to the Amnesty International document; I am referring to the document and piece of paper he was reading from in reference to sanctions. Would he please give us the piece of paper and information from which that was drawn?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at one time I believe the hon. member was a minister of the Crown and he followed the practice of occasionally referring to notes. He knows that the practices of Parliament, which he has just cited, are practices which apply to documents which were quoted but not from notes for Question Period. He knows that.

The Speaker, quite properly, suggested that I should lay upon the table the Amnesty International document from which I had quoted, and I am very pleased to do that. I hope many Canadians will read that document in detail, so that they will understand what Saddam Hussein is doing to Kuwait.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the minister did not bring the documents to the House from which he is citing. Considering the importance of this basic debate about the validity of sanctions, will the minister be prepared to table in this House, and make public the documents from which he drew the information and presented to the House today?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure about the propriety of this exchange but I am, as always, in your hands. I made a commitment to the standing committee that I would make available to the standing committee a great deal of information. I did that orally when I was there to answer questions.

I told the hon. member, who was present and, through him and through members of the committee, the whole House that I was prepared to make available briefings on a confidential basis of other matters that should perhaps not be put for valid reasons, in a situation such as the present situation, in the public domain. That follows the long, unvaried traditions of Parliament.

The hon. member asks me to repeat the undertaking I gave in the standing committee; of course, I do that. And I am prepared to give him access, in his capacity as a Privy Councillor with all of the obligations that involves, to information with respect to the effectiveness of sanctions. I also repeat my request to him. If he has any information suggesting that sanctions work, let him present that to the people of Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs cannot be half in and half out on this matter. If he has information on sanctions, he has to table the document he was quoting from and give us the sources. Otherwise there will be a question as to his credibility and the credibility of the government on this important—

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members know what the rule is with respect to tabling documents. As I saw it, the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs was reading from the report. I suggested that it was appropriate to table it. He has done that.

If there are other matters that need to be discussed, perhaps they could be raised at another occasion, after there has been some discussion. This is now turning into debate and I think we have to close it off.

The hon. member for Yukon.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I was also going to request that the minister for external affairs table the document which he cited in his answer to my question.

I am pleased that the members of the opposition have continued to pursue that question as well.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, on this point, to be very precise, I was not at that point quoting from a document. I was referring to notes.

We do have assessments available. I shared them with the standing committee when I appeared at an earlier time in this debate. I am prepared to share that information again with Parliament. There is not a document as the hon. member is talking about. There are my speaking notes to which ministers habitually refer, but I am certainly prepared to make any document available on the basis that I outlined in the committee. That basis was that those that can be made available publicly will be made available to the committee. Those that require people to be sworn to an oath will be made available to members of the Privy Council.

That is one of the reasons why the government was so pleased that the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party was prepared to accept a swearing to the Privy Council, because it allows someone in her party now—

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty of the Chair is that this is leading into a debate. However, hon. members have raised the matter. The right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated his willingness to co-operate and it is now my duty to continue with Routine Proceedings.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 47 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my honour to table petitions on behalf of my constituents of Parkdale—High Park.

The petitioners say that whereas the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq is unacceptable and cannot be tolerated, and as a result that the United Nations sanctions may be slow in coming, and foreign nationals are still being detained; and whereas Canadian troops are currently in the Persian Gulf and their presence may be required for an undetermined length of time, they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to commit that any Canadian involvement in military action be solely at the command of and under the auspices of the United Nations.

MATERNITY BENEFITS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the next petition is on parental leave. The petitioners are very concerned. They are pleased to see that the current legislation on maternity benefits has been extended as of November 18, 1990 to include an additional 10 weeks of parental benefits for the mother, and a new 10-week claim for parental benefits for the father.

Unfortunately, there are a number of women who are currently enjoying their right to 17 weeks maternity leave under the former legislation. These women have been informed that they will be obliged to return to work at the end of the 17 weeks, work for another 20 weeks, during which time the new baby will have been weaned, have been part of a child care program under the care of the mother and/or father.

They call upon the government to recognize the difficult situation in which these women find themselves, and allow them the option of running a new claim for the additional 10 weeks, immediately after the claim under which they are currently covered.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a further petition on another subject. The petitioners want to highlight to this House the continuing gross human rights violations in Iran.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to bring to the attention of the Government of Canada reference to the fact that since last year the situation of human rights has deteriorated and the use of terrorism by the ruling mullahs expanded dramatically.

They request that the Government of Canada actively participate in introducing and passing resolutions during the current 45th session of the United Nations General Assembly condemning the severe violation of human rights in Iran, as well as paying tribute to the memory of Professor Rajavi.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed at a demonstration against Canada participating in war in Iraq.

The petitioners ask Parliament to prevent Canadian Armed Forces from being used to attack Iraq. They point out that 87 per cent of Canadians are absolutely opposed to the Prime Minister of this country and that the majority of Canadians oppose the use of Canadian Armed Forces in this war. In fact, probably the major impediment to exercising the wishes of Canadians on this matter is the Prime Minister and the Conservative Government.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which calls on Parliament to recognize that, whereas international economic sanctions have had a demonstrable effect on Iraq, and whereas the military strategy of blockades is preferable to war, the shedding of blood and the loss of human life.

Wherefore, the undersigned, the petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to give economic sanctions against Iraq a chance to work and withdraw all but peacekeeping Canadian military from the gulf. That is signed by 48 people from coastal British Columbia.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition under the provisions of Standing Order 36.

The first petition is from residents of Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto and other smaller places. It expresses their opposition to Canada's participation in the gulf war in any military attack against Iraq because of the unforeseeable amount of harm that would be done to the region and even the world because the United Nations has imposed massive and effective economic sanctions.

They request that Parliament withdraw all Canadian forces from the region so that we can be assured they will not be employed in any offensive capacity, but solely as is necessary to make sanctions effective and to use our tax dollars for useful and social programs such as child care, pensions, health care, education and not for military adventures in the Middle East.

Mr. Speaker, the second petition gives the same reasons for saying in effect, we, the undersigned, ask that the Government of Canada use all means available to it to encourage UN member states to give sanctions a chance to work, to refrain from offensive military action against Iraq.

They further ask that the government not commit Canadian Armed Forces to offensive action against Iraq.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have under Standing Order 36, a 24–page petition signed by people from Maple Ridge who have indicated that as a country we have built gradually a reputation as a dependable advocate supporter of the United Nations. We are recognized world–wide as a peacekeeping nation.

The petitioners therefore call on Parliament to resist strongly war in the Middle East at all costs and to allow time for economic sanctions and pressures from within Iraq to influence Saddam Hussein to withdraw his troops from Kuwait.

ETHANOL

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of several hundreds of people in communities in the greater St. John's, Newfoundland area such as Kelligrews, St. Thomas, Chamberlain, Long Pond, Manuels, and so on.

The petitioners point out that Canadian cities are being polluted by automobile emissions and that there is a solution through the use of ethanol blended gasoline which would have the effect of boosting the oxygen content of the fuel. In that context, the petitioners call upon the House to make a minimum 3.2 oxygen content in gasoline fuels mandatory.

I have great pleasure in supporting the petition on behalf of those petitioners and ask that it be referred to the appropriate department for action.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 343, 347, 363, 383, 384, 396, 409, 414, 418 and 421.

"CENTENNIAL FOUNTAIN COINS TO SUPPORT ASSOCIATIONS FOR CANADIANS WITH DISABILITIES"

Question No. 343—Mr. Nunziata:

Did the government issue a press release on April 10, 1990 entitled "Centennial Fountain Coins to Support Associations for Canadians with Disabilities" and, if so what was the cost of (a) production (b) mailing (c) courier delivery?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Yes. The government issued a news release on April 10, 1990, entitled "Centennial Fountain Coins to Support Associations for Canadians with disabilities."

(a) The production cost was $402.80 to print 5,500 releases in English and 5,100 releases in French.

(b) The mailing cost was $2,439.20, which included the cost of envelopes to mail to municipalities in Canada.

(c) The courier delivery cost was approximately $60. This cost included sending 900 English releases and 500 French releases in bulk to the parliamentary distribution centre for distribution to senators, members of Parliament and members of the Parliamentary Press Gallery.

THE PROCLAMATION OF THE CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

Question No. 347—Mr. Caccia:

Since the proclamation of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, how many new inspector positions have been (a) created (b) filled, in each of the provinces and the two territories?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): The Canadian Environmental Protection Act was proclaimed on June 28, 1988. At that time a total of 108 inspectors were designated for the purposes of this Act. b) As of October 1, 1990, a total of 271 inspectors were designated for the purposes of this Act. The following outlines the allocations for each of the five regional offices and Headquarters of Environment Canada:

Pacific & Yukon (province of British Columbia and Yukon)	28	57
Western & Northern (provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Northwest Territories)	18	42
Ontario	14	29
Quebec	17	72
Atlantic (provinces of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island)	27	57
Headquarters	4	14

MASTER PLAN DEVELOPMENT EXPENSES FOR RIDEAU HALL AND 24 SUSSEX DRIVE

Question No. 363—Mr. Milliken:

For a) 1988–89 b) 1989–90, were expenses incurred by the National Capital Commission in the development of the "Master Plan" for Rideau Hall and 24 Sussex Drive, as listed on page 18 of the Third Report (Summer 1990) of the Official Residences Council and, if so, individually, what were they?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works):

EXPENSES INCURRED TO DEVELOP MASTER PLAN

RIDEAU HALL	1988–89	1989–90
Buildings architectural and engineering studies (27 in total)	$257,005	$164,382
Grounds partial study (88 acres)	2,924	0

24 SUSSEX DRIVE	1988–89	1989–90
Buildings architectural studies Phase 1 and Phase 2, Part 1 (5 in total)	$36,625	$52,301
Grounds studies (4 acres)	26,569	8,864
Total	$63,194	$61,165

TRAVEL POINTS

Question No. 383—Mr. Blackburn:

Since 1984, for a) government b) Crown corporations c) agencies d) commissions, are public servants eligible to collect travel points gained from travels paid for by taxpayers, and, if so, in each case (i) how many have gained points (ii) what categories of public servants are eligible (iii) how many accumulated travel points for their own use (iv) how many points have been used (v) what is the total monetary value of travel points used (vi) had these travel points been handed back to the government, what would have been the value to the government?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): (a) Public servants can only use these points for further government business travel. Private use of these points is strictly prohibited. This policy predates 1984.

(b) This policy does not apply.

(c) Policy applies only to public servants for whom Treasury Board is the employer.

(d) Policy applies only to public servants for whom Tresasury Board is the employer.

(i), (ii), (iii), (iv), (v), (vi) The government does not keep statistics on travel points.

PUBLIC SERVICE 2000

Question No. 384—Mr. Stupich:

For Public Service 2000, what are the a) salaries of the director and seconded staff b) estimated cost of person days charged against PS 2000 by deputy ministers heading subtask forces and any others contributing to PS 2000 c) cost of current promotion campaign d) cost of implementation?

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): a) As of November 6, 1990, there were three employees on the strength of the secretariat (which is attached to the Privy Council Office)—the manager, an administrative assistant, and a clerical officer. The salary cost of these, since January 1, 1990, is estimated to have been $161,853.

A further 20 employees have been on secondment from various departments for various periods of time. The salary cost since January 1, 1990 for all these staff is estimated to have been $529,331.

b) Public Service 2000 is a Public Service–wide initiative and it would be very difficult to put a meaningful value on the time spent by deputy ministers and other staff on the task forces.

c) It is not clear what is meant by "the current promotion campaign". Since the beginning, press releases, speeches, articles in Public Service and departmental publications, reports, fact sheets, et cetera, have been produced and distributed by the central agencies and by departments. This kind of activity will continue as an inevitable and essential part of a major administrative reform.

d) Since the government has not yet taken a position on most of the many PS 2000 recommendations, it is far too early to give a meaningful response.

DISPOSAL OF TAILINGS FROM ABANDONED URANIUM MINES

Question No. 396—Mr. Pagtakhan:

Has the Atomic Energy Control Board of Canada or the Government of Canada ever approved a policy for the permanent disposal of the tailings from abandoned uranium mines and, in any case, who is responsible for managing the tailings from abandoned uranium mines where the former or original owner no longer exists or cannot be located?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): In 1975 the Atomic Energy Control Board (AECB) started directly regulating uranium mining in Canada. In addition to ensuring that the mining activities do not pose any undue risks to members of the public and to the environment, the AECB has established a policy regarding financial responsibility for the decommissioning of uranium mining facilities, including the tailing areas. The operator of a mining facility must submit to the AECB, at the earliest stages of operation, a plan outlining the financial assurances for all decommissioning activities in the short term as well as in the long term. Since no mining facility subject to AECB regulations has been abandoned, no AECB policy has been developed to date for disposal of tailings from uranium mining facilities for which no owner may be identified. There are no known cases of uranium mines which ceased operations before 1975, where it is not currently possible to identify an owner who would be responsible for the proper decommisioning of the site. In the event that a responsible owner could not be identified, proper decommissioning of the site would lie with the federal and provincial governments. EMR is currently discussing this matter with various governmental departments and agencies.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) 1990–91 NATIONAL DEFENCE VOTE 20B EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS—CONTRIBUTIONS

Question No. 409—Mr. Milliken:

In the Supplementary Estimates (B) 1990–91, under National Defence vote 20b—Emergency Preparedness—Contributions, were any natural disasters the cause of the requests for payments, and if so, which disasters?

Hon. Bill Hunter McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Two payments were made for natural disasters under disaster financial assistance arrangements. They were:

1) 1988 Flood in Manitoba

2) 1983 Storm in Quebec

COST OF COURT ACTION

Question No. 414—Mr. Fisher:

What was the cost of the court action which followed the 1989 Public Service Alliance complaint pertaining to essential services designation?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): It is estimated that these costs were approximately $35,000. About $1,000 of the amount was spent on court filing fees, travel costs of Employer's witnesses in PSSRB proceedings, and printing costs. The rest of the amount represents salary costs incurred by Department of Justice lawyers, Treasury Board Secretariat and departmental employees who worked on the files, as well as the associated clerical and secretarial help. All counsel involved on the Employer's side were Department of Justice lawyers. There were no expenditures of funds to engage private sector lawyers.

PENSIONS

Question No. 418—Mr. Harvard:

Will representatives of the Armed Forces Pensionners'/ Annuitants' Association of Canada be invited to become part of the current committee of public servants in Treasury Board who are preparing a new Pension Reform Bill?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): The government considers the ongoing consultative process an important part of the Public Service pension reform process. Very careful consideration is being given to the many representations being made by or on behalf of various groups to the President of the Treasury Board. The association referred to has also provided its views to the Associate Minister of National Defence who has passed them to the President for consideration.

GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSE TO THE THIRD REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE ON ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS

Question No. 421—Mr. Skelly:

Did Mr. Bud Neville of J.F. Hickling Management Consultants Ltd. write a background report for the government's response to the Third Report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and, if so, was Mr. Neville a former employee of the Department of Indian Affairs and, if so, during what time was he employed by the Department?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Bud Neville was the principal consultant, chosen in consultation with Makivik Corporation, for the background report, prepared by J.F. Hickling Management Consultants Ltd., for the government's response to the Third Report of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs. Mr. Neville was employed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development between 1957 and 1971.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 406. Due to the length of the response, I ask that it be printed in Hansard as if read.

PARTNERSHIP LOSSES

*Question No. 406—Mr. Breaugh:

For each year from 1986 to 1989, a) how many taxpayers claimed partnership losses from real estate investments b) what was the total value of partnership losses claimed from real estate investments c) what was the cost to the government in terms of tax revenues lost due to partnership losses claimed from real estate investments?

Hon. Michael Holcombe Wilson (Minister of Finance): Data on partnership losses resulting from real estate investments are not readily available as taxpayers are not required to identify the source of partnership losses on their tax forms. While financial statements and tax calculations relating to the partnership must be included in the income tax return of each partner, the sources of partnership income/losses are not transcribed by Revenue Canada, Taxation. Consequently, answers to the questions are not available.

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise under an application pursuant to Standing Order 52, seconded by my colleague from LaSalle—Émard, to ask leave to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the turmoil in the Baltic states.

Although the debate over the next few days should focus on the gulf situation, we cannot neglect the seriousness of recent events in the Baltic states and their implications on world peace.

My request is based on the need to ascertain Canada's response to the recommendation that the matter be referred to the United Nations Security Council and dealt with in the context of an emergency world conference or some other appropriate forum.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I agree completely with what the member for Parkdale—High Park has said. There are a couple of other important points to be made.

There are seven Canadians registered as being in Lithuania, six in Latvia, and two in Estonia.

There is the question of our $150 million line of credit to help improve distribution and our technical assistance, both of which were based on Mr. Gorbachev's undertaking to the Prime Minister that there would be no crackdown in the Baltics.

There is the concern of many thousands of Canadians of origin in the Baltic states, all of which I agree with when my friend suggests having a debate at a suitable time to discuss this very important issue.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have heard both the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast on an application for an emergency debate relating to events in Lithuania.

I want to remind hon. members that yesterday in the House by unanimous consent, it was resolved:

> That this House condemns the brutal and unacceptable Soviet crackdown in Lithuania, and calls upon President Gorbachev and U.S.S.R. authorities to refrain from using further violence against the people and democratically elected governments of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia;
> That this House appeals to the U.S.S.R. to adhere to its obligations under the Helsinki Final Act and the Charter of Paris, and to seek solutions consistent with respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms; and
> That, recognizing the continuing Canadian government policy not to recognize the de jure annexation of the Baltic states, this House recalls its resolution of March 1990 and continues to support the right of the Baltic peoples to determine their own future.

• (1520)

I depart from usual practice to bring that to the attention of the House because we have here significant development in that there is a unanimous motion dealing with the subject and, of course, hon. members know that it has been dealt with and may well be dealt with in the next few days again in Question Period.

Under the circumstances and given the other things that must be debated, it would not be appropriate to move today to a special debate. But I do want it made very clear how all members of this House on both sides are treating the matter as one of very great urgency and importance and also that they have passed a very strong and unanimous resolution.

I thank the hon. members for raising the matter.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

The House resumed from Tuesday, January 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead):

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

And the amendment of Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre):

> That the motion be amended by adding immediately after the word "Kuwait" the following:
> "through the continued use of economic sanctions, such support to exclude offensive military action by Canada at this time."

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce will have the floor and I will come to him in a moment. Before that, I am required to present to the House a ruling on the sub-amendment.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Last night, during the course of the debate on the motion of the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, and on the amendment of the hon. Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona proposed to move an amendment to the amendment. The text of that amendment reads:

> That the amendment be amended by deleting all the words after the word "sanctions" and substituting the following:
> "such support to exclude the involvement by Canada in a military attack on Iraq or Iraqi forces in Kuwait and to encompass diplomatic initiatives including settlement of border and other disputes through UN mediation or the International Court of Justice, promotion of democratization throughout the region, establishment of a mechanism to reduce the arms trade and to eliminate weapons of mass destruction, and the convening of an international peace conference to discuss all outstanding Middle East issues."

The Chair took the proposed subamendment under advisement, and I am now prepared to rule on the matter.

Beauchesne's fourth edition, Citation 202, paragraph (3) states clearly:

> Since the purpose of a subamendment is to alter the amendment, it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment—if it is intended to bring up matters foreign to the amendment, the member should wait until the amendment is disposed of and move a new amendment.

Furthermore, Beauchesne's Fifth Edition further clarifies the concept of a subamendment at Citation 438, paragraph (2), which states:

> A subamendment must attempt to explain the substance of the amendment and may not substitute an entirely new proposal.

[Translation]

Another important criterion is explained at citation 441(2): A sub-amendment must be relevant to the amendment it purports to amend and not to the main motion.

The amendment, now before the House, proposed by the Hon. Leader of the Opposition reads as follows:

> That the motion be amended by adding immediately after the word "Kuwait" the following:
> "through the continued use of economic sanctions, such support to exclude offensive military action by Canada at this time."

[English]

The amendment to that amendment which the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona proposes to move goes far beyond the terms of that motion. It introduces a variety of entirely new concepts, for example, the notion of democratization in the area, the elimination of weapons of mass destruction, and the idea of an international peace conference.

While these concepts are perhaps germane to the very complex issue being debated, nonetheless, from a procedural perspective, they stand well beyond the terms of what could be considered an acceptable amendment.

Accordingly, the Chair must find that the proposed subamendment is not in order and cannot be proposed.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as you know, I am continuing my speech from last evening which was interrupted by the adjournment at midnight. Since that time, the critical hour for war in the Persian Gulf has arrived.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may, just to put things in the right order, we are now in the 10-minute question and comment period following the hon. member's speech. There are eight minutes left in that period.

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, I understood that. Last night a question was asked by the hon. member for Bourassa. After she asked the question, and before I had the opportunity to answer it, you stood up and called the adjournment.

Since that time, the critical hour for the war in the Persian Gulf has arrived, but fortunately both sides are holding their fire and there is still some time to pursue a peaceful settlement.

As I stated, at the end of the debate last night the member for Bourassa asked me why I continued to support the economic sanctions to settle this dispute with Iraq when there were leaks, according to her, along the Iranian and Syrian borders. Consequently, she said that the sanctions would not work.

Today, during the Question Period, the Secretary of State for External Affairs made similar statements. He told the House, without giving us the sources of his information, that the sanctions could not work as far as impacting on Iraq's military capacity. That is one view of the sanctions. That is the view of the hon. member for Bourassa. Obviously, it is the view of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There is another view with respect to that question.

In my speech last night, I referred to the study carried out at Harvard University which was reported on Monday of this week in The New York Times which stated in effect that the sanctions were working and they would bite even harder as we went into the spring.

Also, in my remarks last night— and I will repeat it—I referred to the debate in the American Senate and House of Representatives. A good number of senators and congressmen said their information was that the sanctions were working. They challenged the American government to give them evidence to the contrary and the American government failed to do that.

I also referred to the statements made by the CIA and the American administration before the American elections in November. At that time, the CIA and the United States administration said that the sanctions were working. After the election, they changed their tune and resorted to military alternatives.

Finally, in answer to the member's question, three members of this House, one from each political party visited Iraq. They said that from their observations the sanctions were working. If there is doubt with respect to the sanctions, if there are leaks as alleged by the hon. member for Bourassa and the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, then surely the answer is not war. The answer is to refer this matter back to the Security Council to re-examine the issue, find out where the sanctions are lacking and how they can be strengthened.

When the Security Council established the sanctions in August, it also established a committee to monitor those sanctions. That committee has not yet reported back in an official manner to the Security Council, which should be done. If there is division of opinion as to whether the sanctions are effective or if there are leaks along the Iranian and Syrian borders, that should be examined by that monitoring committee of the Security Council. It should be officially reported to the Security Council. Then the Security Council can decide what should be done. Either it will make further recommendations to strengthen the sanctions to block the holes or then it could decide to go to war.

Unfortunately, in my opinion, contrary to chapter 7 of the charter of the United Nations, it proceeded to the powers under article 42 without thoroughly exhausting the powers under article 41. It says very clearly in the charter that you cannot resort to military action until you are assured that non-military means to settle a dispute have been tried and failed.

No report has been officially given to the United Nations by the monitoring committee on the sanctions that they are not working. I say to this House that the decision to take military action before that was done is wrong.

If the member for Bourassa is right, if the Secretary of State for External Affairs is right that there are gaps in the sanctions, that they will not impact on the military strength of Iraq, then that should be taken up by the Security Council. They should ask for a report from the monitoring committee and then deal with this in the proper way.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, in congratulating the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce on his very fine intervention last night and this afternoon, I would like to ask him to comment on the following statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs last October when he said: "We should not rule out the possibility that young Canadian soldiers, women and men, will not return to this country for celebrations but will stay in the gulf for burial". This statement was made in October and I would seek the hon. member's comments on this stand taken at that time.

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister made similar statements in his speech. He said that in going to war against Iraq there were risks and that there very likely would be casualties and human lives would be lost.

That statement by the Prime Minister and the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs last October, referred to by my hon. colleague, in my opinion are cold, callous assumptions with respect to this war. Last night I described it as a revisitation of Dr. Strangelove, a new version of Dr. Strangelove. Here we have politicians, diplomats and generals playing with the lives of millions of ordinary men and women who are being sent to war, but they are not risking their lives themselves.

I said in my speech last night that in former days, in medieval times, when kings and princes decided to go to war, they at least led their troops into battle and risked their own lives with the lives of the people that they sent to war. Here we have the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs talking about Canadian lives as if they could be dispensed with like that, especially when they have not tried sanctions to the very end when many, many people in the world have said that sanctions will work, will continue to bite and will bite even harder as we move into the spring and the summer. For them to talk about Canadian lives, Canadian boys and girls being sent home in body bags, to me is a cold, calculating and callous approach to this whole matter. It indicates that they are not living in the real world and they are not listening to Canadians.

What they should be doing is still pursuing peaceful means in settling this conflict, and they have not done that. Today our leader asked that they attempt to get the Security Council recalled to deal with the committee that is monitoring sanctions. If the information given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is true, that information will go before that committee and will be verified.

Then we will know. It will not simply be opinion. It will be verified by an official committee of the Security Council of the United Nations whether or not those sanctions are working and whether or not we can continue with them.

For the moment war is premature and simply to dispense with Canadian lives in the way that has been done by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs is unacceptable.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I noted that the Speaker has ruled out of order the comprehensive subamendment which the New Democratic Party had introduced in the House. It will be my intention in a minute or so to introduce a briefer subamendment which I trust will be in order and will permit our particular views to be tested in the House.

I will get to that at the conclusion of my brief remarks.

I would like to take this opportunity to make two or three comments on this historic and frankly depressing situation in which we find ourselves. Canadians coast to coast to coast are deeply concerned about how we find ourselves, how the world at the end of the 20th century finds itself in the position of entering into what will only be a catastrophic and terrible war.

The catalogue of the cost in pain that this war will cause has been listed by other members of the House. But let me just summarize.

There will be the loss of the lives of the Armed Forces on both sides, and there are over one million troops now facing each other in the Persian Gulf. There will be thousands upon thousands of young men and women killed or injured in the war that is about to take place. Their families and societies will be affected. There will be thousands who will spend the rest of their lives in pain.

There are thousands upon thousands of innocent civilians who will be hurt. We have heard the catalogue of ecological disaster. It appears that no one has contemplated the geopolitical damage and how the world and that region are to operate once this action is completed.

Canadians are voicing this concern in many ways. Each of us, as a member of Parliament, has been inundated with telephone calls, particularly in the last few days. In every constituency young people—in fact, people of all ages—are conducting vigils, are marching, are trying desperately to express the horror they feel at what is about to take place. It is unbelievable to the world. It is unbelievable to Canada. It must be unbelievable to every member in this House that after the pain and agony of war in this century we find ourselves once again ready to go to war.

The government has tried to defend its role in the past and the role that it is now contemplating once war begins with the flag and the resolution of the United Nations.

While I respect the fact the government has come to the conclusion that it has and respect the fact that there are many members on the government side for whom this must be a very difficult decision, let me say that it is completely wrong to rely on the United Nations as a justification for the war that is about to be unleashed in the Middle East.

Let me first say that the charter makes it absolutely clear that the fundamental purpose of the United Nations is the avoidance of war. The structure of the charter makes it very clear that before war can take place there must either be clear self-defence, which would have justified Kuwait defending itself, and does justify the world community standing by Saudi Arabia and other neighbours of Iraq in defending against any further aggression.

But before military action can take place against Iraqi positions in Kuwait, the Security Council must find that sanctions have failed and are inappropriate and inadequate.

As has been demonstrated over and over again in the last two days, the government simply does not have the evidence that sanctions have proved inadequate. The very resolution on which the government relies, resolution 678 of the Security Council, says not only that other means may be used, but it is very specific. It only authorizes all necessary means.

The clear implication of that resolution is that military force is not justified if sanctions still have the potential to work. I say "only the potential to work" for there is no certainty in these matters.

Until sanctions have demonstrably failed, as they clearly have not, it is counter to the charter. It is counter to resolution 678. It is counter to the experience of this generation, to the people of this century. It is counter to simple humanity that war can be even contemplated in the Middle East at this time.

Our people therefore ask: "How did we get here? How did it happen?" I suggest—and I try to use these words calmly—that the United States has blackmailed the countries of the United Nations into wrapping the U.S. actions and policy in this area in the flag of the United Nations. The U.S. has made it absolutely clear to its friends that if the United Nations did not provide at least a fig leaf of support, the U.S. would go it alone.

It is clear that the United States made the decision in November that it was going to war in the gulf and nothing would stop it, despite all the efforts of the world community.

Now we sit at the brink of war. This House has only one choice on the resolution before it. This House must vote against war in the Middle East. We urge the House to treat this as a free vote. We do so solemnly and understand its significance.

This is an historic vote. This is a vote that will put our young men and women to war. It is a vote that has only taken place twice before in the history of Canada; in 1939 and again in 1950. It is a vote in which all members must express themselves as they honestly and clearly believe.

In order to make our position as clear as we possibly can, it will be my intention in a second to move a subamendment to the Liberal amendment which effectively would have Canada not go into offensive military action at this time. It leaves open the possibility that tomorrow, the next day, the day after that, Canada could participate in offensive military action.

The word "offensive" in the Liberal amendment has been already defined by the military in this country, and I suspect by the government, as referring precisely to attacks on enemy positions and does not include the support of attacks on enemy positions.

Government spokespeople have said that is defensive action, that it is defensive to accompany B–52 bombers on an attack on Iraq or Kuwait. To make it absolutely clear, I will move the following amendment:

> That the amendment be amended by deleting all the words after the word "sanctions" and substituting the following:
> "such support to exclude the involvement by Canada in a military attack on Iraq or Iraqi forces in Kuwait".

I would ask the House to give this subamendment its serious consideration, and I would ask all members of the House to support it.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could have a few short minutes of the time of the House to comment, if I might, and make a commentary on the subamendment proposed by our colleagues in the NDP. Of course we agree with many of the sentiments: their concern about the use of military action and the real demand that sanctions be applied.

However, I want to make clear why we will have to vote against the amendment. The hon. member cited the charter. We have based much of our argument on the charter as well. We have said that if there is ever to be a policeman role in this world, it has to be through the United Nations and according to the rules set out by the UN charter.

The hon. member properly cited article 41 of the charter when he indicated that the United Nations has the right to establish an economic embargo. Article 42 of the charter then goes on to say that when that embargo, in the judgment of the Security Council, is no longer effective in deterring aggression, the Security Council has the right to call upon members to participate in a military force organized by the UN under the UN command and under the UN flag.

We have been arguing in this House that if there were ever to be use of force against the Iraqis to expel them from Kuwait, it must be within the proper procedures and rules of the United Nations charter.

That is why the amendment we proposed was very careful in its wording at this time, because there may come such an occasion, which we cannot predict or prophesy. There could be other attacks upon other countries. No one can tell what will be in the mind of Saddam Hussein. He certainly has been somewhat unpredictable up to now. We do not want to totally exclude that possibility forever.

Therefore I want to say simply that the hon. member and I have exchanged views on many occasions in the last week. He expressed sentiments, eloquently, I may say, in terms of the need to impose sanctions, to reinforce them, and attacked the government for not giving us any evidence whatsoever other than the somewhat hyped-up evidence the minister tried to give us today.

In the short time remaining I simply want to say that the charter does give the United Nations the right to make a decision about sanctions and then to decide whether a UN military force would be required. We would like to adhere to the charter and that is why, with regret, we will vote against this subamendment.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, the Liberal critic for external affairs has attempted to justify the Liberal failure to support the subamendment which we put forward.

Our subamendment has the effect of deleting what I can frankly only describe as weasel words "at this time" and the insertion of the term "offensive military action". The Liberal amendment is so vague when one examines the word it uses that it in fact permits even those in the Liberal Party who would have CF-18s support B-52 bombers over Kuwait and Iraq to be able to justify their support for that military action. It also permits the day after hostilities break out Liberals, who would want to participate in supporting at least in a defensive capacity the so-called land based assets to which the Minister of National Defence referred, to support that.

We simply say that is not good enough. It is important for each member of this House to stand up and be counted on the fundamental issue: Shall Canada send in its troops to support the U.S. led military attack which we can expect momentarily against Kuwait and Iraq?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

Before the taking of the vote:

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I wonder if you would seek unanimous consent to see whether there is not a disposition, as we did with the capital punishment vote, to vote row by row as we would do in a free vote.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamloops. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment to the amendment which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, the matter which has brought the House together today under an emergency session could not be at once more sombre or more momentous.

Our words here by themselves will not decide war and peace, yet we in this House should not in any way diminish the importance of what we say. Above all, we should not diminish the importance of where Canada stands in these very grave days.

• (1650)

Let us be clear from the outset. All of us in this House are united in our desire to see Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. While we may have differing views as to how that should come about, we are all agreed on that objective.

Madam Speaker, I am glad that the government recalled Parliament. As parliamentarians we have important decisions to make, but each member, like each Canadian, has a moral problem. We are all convinced that war is frightening and we have always been in favour of peace. But at what price? We can say that collective security is at stake and that we must act quickly, but then we can also plead for more time to make the sanctions work. We all know that Iraq has rejected any diplomatic initiative, any compromise, any avenue for a potential settlement, whether it comes from France, Jordania, Yemen, the United Nations, Javier Perez de Cuellar, Egypt, Algeria, and so on.

I think that the members who spoke before me gave a good description of the horrors of war, but the basic question is this: What alternative is left if sanctions, diplomatic moves and threats fail before the intransigence of Saddam Hussein? As a nation we have always defended the principle of the sovereignty of our country. We have been and still are among the highly respected members of the United Nations, so how could we choose to ignore our commitments in this instance?

[English]

The matter which seizes us today transcends the merely personal, the merely partisan, and the seeking of political advantage.

This Parliament and our country, Canada, are faced with a clear choice. We can continue to stand behind the United Nations and its resolutions for which we voted and which told Iraq what it must do to avoid war.

We can remain an integral part of the most determined demonstration of collective political will ever marshalled by the United Nations to stand up against aggression. In my view it is the choice which all our history and the long tradition of Canada's support for the United Nations oblige us to make today.

To do otherwise would repudiate the votes we have unfailingly cast in support of the United Nations resolutions. It would also repudiate our commitment to internationalism and to the United Nations, the hallmarks of the Liberal Party and Canada's foreign policy for decades.

At the very moment when the United Nations has moved itself to take a strong, unambiguous and collective stand against a brutal aggressor, Canada should not break solidarity with the nations that are standing united against Iraq.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): To do so would give Saddam Hussein what he has been trying unsuccessfully to achieve by every desperate means these past months and weeks.

It has been said that Canada should not stand up to Hussein because this is a dispute about oil on the other side of the world, that it is not in Canada's interests to become embroiled.

Others have compared a war in the gulf to Vietnam, saying it would be an American war for American interests. It has also been argued that the Persian Gulf countries were the creation of occupying colonial powers and many of these nations are mere fiefdoms with capricious and arbitrary borders.

The most persuasive argument against the use of force is that sanctions should be given more time to work.

In my view all these reasons are in the end invalid. None of them justifies any weakening of the collective will now mustered to hold to the United Nations resolutions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Yes, there is oil at stake in this dispute. If this aggression were allowed, Hussein would control nearly one-quarter of the world's supply of oil. The prospect of being in thrall to him for oil is particularly ominous. To the United States, to Canada, and to other wealthy countries with their own oil supplies, it is a little more costly and inconvenient; to Europe, a little more serious; to Japan, it is vital; to the Third World, it is disastrous. Those are the countries that would be least able to pay ransom prices that would be imposed.

The United Nations has not stood up to Hussein for the sake of oil. The stake is much higher.

What about the Vietnamese comparison? The critical difference between what happened in Vietnam and what may happen in the gulf is that now the United States is not acting alone, though it is ready to bear by far the largest burden. The nations of the world have arrayed an unprecedented military alliance against Iraq under the auspices, through, and with the authority of the United Nations.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The United Nations, not the United States, set the January 15 deadline. Anyone who knows the United Nations and knows that institution, knows that it is very jealous in being master of its own destiny. Nobody pushes the United Nations around, not even the United States. No one nation, especially not the United States, is able to impose marching orders on that institution.

No, this is not an American adventure. It is a United Nations action in collective security, one of the greatest historic developments of our time, certainly in my lifetime, since the Second World War, one with enormous impact for the future.

The credibility of the United Nations is at stake. You do not have to know much about history to know that the League of Nations, after it failed to respond to Manchuria and failed to respond to Abyssinia, was finished. Its credibility was sapped, diluted, gone. This is one of those important moments in history.

I know there are those who want to limit Canada's role to peacekeeping. The fact is peace must be established first and unilateral aggression repulsed before peacekeeping can be effective.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The whole history and tradition and commitment of the party to which I have belonged for 35 years has been in support of the United Nations. Our people were there at the beginning, upholding the principle of collective security and supporting the resolutions and actions of the United Nations.

This is a crucial test for that international organization. This is a crucial test for the United Nations, and Canada must support it. This is a crucial test for collective security, and Canada must support it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1700)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the failure of the United Nations to act upon its resolutions would lead eventually to instability, to non-credibility and perhaps to international anarchy.

Aggressors would have hope of profiting from their aggression. Saddam Hussein would sponsor other Husseins, aggressors who would use chemical warfare on both the enemy and even on their own people as Hussein has done, aggressors who would use nuclear weapons should, God forbid, they possess them.

As to how the Persian Gulf states came to be, that makes an interesting historical study. I believe that history is irrelevant today. What is relevant is that there is a sovereign country, or was a sovereign country called Kuwait, which was brutally invaded by a neighbour for no other reason except that it was coveted.

Even if the case for sanctions could be made, and it is a strong case, the issue today is not sanctions. The issue today is whether the United Nations resolutions will be obeyed. It was the United Nations that decided the date. It was the United Nations that decided not to wait for sanctions and it was the United Nations that imposed its own deadline.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, the issue before us, before the House and before the world, is whose will is going to prevail: the ambitious will of Saddam Hussein who would hold, at the very least, the Arab world under his thumb, or the collective will of the world expressed as uniquely as it can be expressed within the forum of the United Nations with a rare singleness of purpose never in my lifetime seen by an international body.

If the alliance against Iraq were to fall into disarray from good intentions, from walking too many last miles, the impact upon the future of the United Nations would be devastating to the future efforts of collective security. The United Nations would be fatally exposed as the League of Nations was so ruthlessly, as being simply incapable of standing up to aggression, even to a brutal bully like Hussein.

Canada has had a proud role in the United Nations right from the beginning. This country has stood by the United Nations even when other countries, including the United States, lost faith in that organization.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): It is no accident that we have relied as Canadians upon the fiat of international institutions, the International Monetary Fund as the Minister of Finance knows, the General Agreement on Tariff and Trade, and I will leave that argument alone. But with the United Nations we have believed in internationalizing our institutions. We have never treated the United Nations as irrelevant. We have never treated it as merely a talking shop. As Canadians we may have lost some idealism but we never lost faith in the United Nations.

This issue is one on which I had to break silence. Since June I have remained quiet except for the odd lecture at a university. I felt the question before the House was paramount for us as elected representatives of the people of Canada for our country. I felt that each member must speak out as a Canadian, and more than that, as a citizen of the world, because the future of the world order is at stake, and stability and future peace.

I believe that this Parliament has a duty to support the United Nations resolutions as those texts are written, and therefore, the resolution before this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, this is not an easy situation but in life—this is a comment I am making—there are difficult situations. But when one is firmly convinced about what one is going to do and should do, well one does like the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra just did, one speaks out.

But there are others who are just as convinced about what we are going to do and what we must do, and this is why I will make only a brief comment.

Hon. members are aware of my great respect for the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra who has been my friend for 35 years.

[English]

I also have belonged to the Liberal Party for close to 40 years. The Liberal Party I stand for is a party that is about to vote against this motion. I can give many explanations which are contrary to those of my right hon. friend. This is not a United Nations declaration of war. If that were the case we would have different kinds of speeches.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Prud'homme: The reading of the situation by my right hon. friend is a reading that I do not share. Therefore I will sit down. I regret it, but I had to say it. Accordingly, with great regret, because friendships sometimes can be broken—I will not break my friendship with my right hon. friend—I will say that I honestly, profoundly, and totally disagree with his reading of the situation.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, I feel that the process of democracy has been enhanced by the fact that people can speak so freely in this the highest institution in our country.

The fact that I may disagree with the previous member does not detract from the seriousness and importance of each one of us taking a decision, not only to reflect the wishes of our constituents, but to reflect what is utmost in terms of conscience, and to bear the heavy burden of what is involved in war, the possibility of war and death.

Might I ask the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, for whom all of us in this House have tremendous respect, whether he feels, because in his words the ultimate question is support for the United Nations, not a question of war, not a question of whether sanctions should go longer, that the United Nations itself is being denigrated by the fact that all the provisions of chapter 7 have not been followed in the pursuit of this effort by the multinational force, that there is not a flag of the UN, that the military committee has not been appointed in accordance with articles 46 and 47. Does that not denigrate the role of the United Nations itself?

• (1710)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my answer to my good friend is no.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I have been a member of this House for six years and I would like to put a question to the member for Vancouver Quadra.

On a number of occasions, while he was leader of the Liberal Party, we had occasion to vote in this House on matters that some of us considered matters of conscience, in particular the votes on the Meech Lake Accord and on cruise missile testing. At the time the member said it was essential that the party stick together, even though some of us felt that we ought to express our own point of view.

I would like to ask the member for Vancouver Quadra what has changed. What makes this matter of conscience any different from other matters of conscience that this Parliament has had to deal with? Can he explain, if his views are so strongly held, why he did not attend caucus over the last six months to explain to his colleagues—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would find it rather difficult to apply the question, which the hon. member has just asked, to the intervention made by the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. Resuming debate, the hon. Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I have been a member of this House since 1979. I have heard people make speeches because they should make speeches. I have heard people make speeches that were important and will be read. I have just heard a fine speech from the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and one that will be read not only in this Parliament in later years, but in others. I want to thank him.

I do not thank the hon. member, Madam Speaker, on my behalf of my party, but I thank him on behalf of other Canadians. I thank him on behalf of the men and women who are serving Canada today in the Persian Gulf and will serve Canada tomorrow in others areas of the world, continuing to bring about peace and security and a more peaceful order so that we all can have the kind of world that we wish. Those men and women will appreciate, I am sure, the depth of the hon. member's feelings, not just from the way he delivered his address, but from the decision he made to deliver his address.

We gather here in a very serious and difficult time for the world. Last evening the deadline established by the United Nations in resolution 678 had passed. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, "The opportunity to bring about peace or war was that of Saddam Hussein". It was his decision to make. He initiated a crisis in August by his naked aggression against Kuwait. He could have ended that aggression in a peaceful manner.

From the outset Canada has played an active role in the management of this crisis. Canadian forces ships and aircraft have been on patrol in the region for the last number of months. We sought to have a peaceful end to this crisis. No one in this House, no one in this Parliament seeks war.

What we seek is justice for Kuwait and order in that region of the world.

Members of the House should understand part of the sense of why Canada is in the gulf, and why we will continue to do our part to support the United Nations and the international coalition that has been assembled.

I want to take the next couple of minutes to review some of the activities that have taken place and how this crisis came to cause Canadian men and women to be deployed in the Persian Gulf region.

I want to address the central issue. The central issue of this crisis is pure and naked aggression, brutal and unprovoked. The central question for the world is can we allow that aggression to remain unchallenged. I want to remind the House how this crisis started and why.

On August 2, when Iraq launched a massive invasion in the middle of the night against its much smaller neighbour, Kuwait, it used a force of some 150,000 military personnel, some 12,000 tanks, and some 1,000 armoured vehicles. It used those against the people of Kuwait who had a military force of some 20,000, one-fiftieth of the military force of over one million that Iraq has.

Iraq not only captured Kuwait City, but began a systematic ravaging and pillaging of the country's resources and its most precious resource people.

The human tragedy of Kuwait has been documented by Amnesty International. It has been mentioned in the House. It does not need repeating. But this is the ugly reality of today. Today, as we speak and debate what Canada's part should be, that ugly reality continues and a nation of people are being destroyed.

There has been much said about the impressive array of international forces that have been assembled. There has been much discussion that this is an American-led initiative. There has been much discussion in the House about Canada following instructions, false as those accusations are, of another country.

I want to remind members of the House that in 1939, when it sent its young men and women into battle, Canada did not follow the instructions of the United States. I want to remind the men and women in the House that in 1940 Canada did not follow the lead of the United States. I want to remind them that in Korea Canada did not follow the lead of the United States. Canada has made its own decision over its history as to how to take part and how to contribute to world order. It is making that decision today, independent of any other thought because it is right to make that decision.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKnight: Nine Arab states are part of the international force. The newly emerging democracies of eastern Europe—Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Poland—are making a contribution to world order. Two states from the African continent, Niger and Senegal, are making a contribution. Why?

The right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs both identified in their addresses to the House the damage, harm, and deprivation that this naked aggression by Iraq is causing the poorest of the poor in the world.

There has been discussion from Iraq and an explanation put forward to the world that in some way this would assist the Palestinian cause, or in some way this was to resist economic aggression by the small country of Kuwait. This aggression took place for no reason but pure greed and power on behalf of Saddam Hussein and his wish for himself. That is what caused the crisis that we are debating today. It is power and profit on behalf of Saddam Hussein.

There is no difference between what we see in the response of the United Nations today and how it has attempted to respond in the past. I say to hon. members that there is a new reality in the United Nations today. It is because of the end of the cold war. It is because of the resolution between the two superpowers that both the United States and the U.S.S.R. will use the United Nations now as an instrument of world order.

When we sent Canadian men and women to the gulf to enforce the embargo against Iraq authorized by the United Nations, we had hoped, as all citizens of this country and other countries had hoped, that the sanctions would bring about the withdrawal of Saddam Hussein.

Some 12 solemn resolutions of the United Nations, from 660 to 678, were all designed to bring about the removal of the aggressor in Kuwait. It has to be remembered that during that time Saddam Hussein, even in the pause for peace, continued to build up his military strength, to occupy the country of Kuwait, and to brutalize the people of that nation.

When we take a look at what would happen, I found it very difficult yesterday when the Leader of the Liberal Party in his address said: "What is wrong with the status quo at this time?" What is wrong with the status quo is that a country is being occupied, its citizens are being brutalized, and a region of the world is in disorder. Order has to be restored.

The pillage and the occupation continues, and the international community has made a decision on a resolution co-sponsored by the United Kingdom, the United States, the U.S.S.R., and Canada. That is resolution 678 which demands that Iraq withdraw from Kuwait by a deadline. That deadline has passed and the Security Council said if that deadline has passed, states were authorized to use all necessary means to bring about Iraq's withdrawal.

It does not constitute any change in the objectives of the Security Council from the start, from 660. Resolution 660 called upon Iraq to remove itself from Kuwait. Every resolution since that, including 678, wants to bring about and is designed to bring about the same thing, the removal of Saddam Hussein.

I have heard in the House that there was something wrong with the drafting of the UN resolution. As much as I admire the intellect of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle, I do not believe that their intellect is superior to that of the United Nations assembled, to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and to the legal staff of the United Nations body.

I have heard from both opposition parties that this is somehow a maverick resolution, that this is somehow something that is illegal. This is beyond my comprehension. As intelligent as the individuals we have in this House may be, their combined intellect and their combined desire for justice does not exceed that of the United Nations assembled to bring about order to this world.

Two generations of Canadians, because of geography and because of our neighbours, have grown up believing that Canada's role in restoring order is that of peacekeeping, which Canada has done and will continue to do in a very efficient manner. Despite Canada's fortune in geography and neighbours, we cannot forget the history that Canada has. Even in peacekeeping there are severe risks.

The Leader of the Liberal Party, in his address yesterday, said: "What did Canada do at the invasion of Cyprus? It did nothing." I want to remind the House that in that invasion, Canadians were there as peacekeepers. They became involved in a confrontation. Two Canadians from the first commando in Quebec died keeping the peace. Two Stars of Courage and eight medals for bravery were awarded to Canadian men and women who were there keeping the peace in Cyprus.

Another thing that I found strange about the address yesterday by the Leader of the Official Opposition was the statement that it has been the policy of Canada, since 1956, only to enter into military combat under the United Nations. That belies the proud history of his party in bringing Canada into NATO, bringing Canada into a NORAD agreement, and bringing Canada into a world body such as the United Nations.

A country structured like Canada cannot provide its security independently. That is why collective security for the people of Canada is the only kind of security that can be procured. That was recognized 40 or 50 years ago: If Canada wanted to be secure we had to join with others in providing collective security.

We forget sometimes that the first aim of the United Nations was to spare succeeding generations from the scourge of war. The preferred means is a peaceful, diplomatic resolution to conflict. The United Nations founders recognized, shortly after 1945 following the Second World War, that it could not just be a place to talk, that it had to be able to act.

Canada has been very active in talking and supporting in the United Nations but we have to be prepared to act. Everything that we have said, through successive governments of different political parties, has been to use the institution to bring about a peaceful resolution to world conflict. If it cannot be brought about peacefully, the United Nations found a way in its resolutions to bring it about by collective security, by joining together, using force and waging war.

I have some difficulty when I have to reconcile in my own mind why someone would suggest that only 50 per cent or 60 per cent of the population of Canada are against war. I know a lot of Canadians. I know a lot of people on both sides of the aisle in this House. I know some of them well. I do not know any of them who want war. I do not know a Canadian who wants war. Most of all, with my responsibilities for the Canadian forces, the people who least want war are those whose duty and responsibility it falls upon to fight.

There comes with the responsibility of governing and the responsibility of service in the Canadian forces the responsibility to make decisions. The Government of Canada has to make decisions. If we do not take that responsibility and understand it, then the people who voted for us, whether they believe today that the people who voted for us voted improperly, voted for us to make a decision as a government.

We have made a decision not inconsistent with decisions made by previous governments and governments of different political parties, but we made a decision. That is what comes with the responsibility of government. That is what comes with the responsibility of leadership and that is what comes with the responsibility as a Minister of National Defence to advise his cabinet and his Prime Minister. It is not easy. But, when you ask for advice and you ask the men and women who serve and who are professionals in their careers, if the government makes a decision, can you fulfil a commitment made by the government, the answer is yes.

We have had a debate about the roles and future roles of the Canadian forces. I can say to the House with all sincerity that the roles that the Canadian men and women who serve in the Canadian forces will undertake, whether today or in the future, will be roles that they are capable of taking. They will be roles that they trained for and roles that will minimize the risk, if you can minimize risk in a war.

That is what a government does. It makes a decision, maybe not for today, maybe the decision that we made is for tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow. I believe it is. I believe that the opportunity to contribute to world order. A responsible government that leads a democracy and a government that has the country of Canada and the history of Canada to support it, has the responsibility that we have taken.

We on this side of the House, basically as parliamentarians and partisan politicians, have to look at what we do after this debate.

After this debate, if the motion that is before the House is supported, the Parliament of Canada has spoken and the government has made a decision. In our system of democracy and our parliamentary system, it is difficult not to be partisan after a debate. It is difficult not to continue to carry on the political debate after the votes have been taken. We are able to do it as persons with one another but we are not able, in most cases, to do it as political parties.

If there is one thing that I admire about my cousins south of the border, it is that after the debate and after the decision has been made and the political points have been made, what do Republicans and Democrats do? They go ahead and they say: "I was involved in the debate and I did not succeed in convincing my colleagues but my country needs my support, my President needs my support, and therefore I will do it and I will support my country." That is what we ask. That is what the men and women who serve Canada and what the population of Canada deserve.

Madam Speaker, I would like to move under Standing Order 26:

That this House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of adjournment to continue the debate on motion 27.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

And more than 15 members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a short point of order. There have been discussions for most of the day to attempt to arrive at a suitable debating schedule on what has to be the most important debate this House has seen in decades.

We offered earlier today, without any question, to sit until at least midnight to discuss these important issues, as we did last night. I am not certain of the wisdom of sitting in the middle of the night, considering many people are watching these debates and want to watch these debates. There are a whole set of questions to be asked.

I want to make the point that continuous negotiations between the parties have occurred during the day. All of a sudden, out of the blue, comes this initiative that, in a sense, is rigged in favour of the government. I do not know whether the government wants to get out of debating this issue as quickly as possible. I do not know whether it wants to go on a holiday as a result of the embarrassment of its position, but I do not understand this initiative.

We are prepared to debate for days and days. We are prepared to debate late at night and early in the morning. While we are saying that we are not prepared to debate around the clock so that the debate will in a sense be curtailed, we are prepared to discuss further, if it is the wish of the House leaders from the other parties to see if we can come to a decision on a debate for the rest of the day. If that is not to be done and we have no assurance of that, then I am afraid that the debate will be ending at six o'clock.

• (1740)

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I find the New Democratic Party's position somewhat perplexing. We just heard this party refuse to allow the House to extend the debate past the usual time of adjournment at 6 p.m., in order to give all members of this House who have not yet had a chance to speak an opportunity to take advantage of their democratic right to speak freely to this important issue. And now, after denying us this opportunity to extend the sitting of the House past 6 p.m., it now wants to sit until midnight.

We are prepared to sit until midnight. However, we would have preferred to continue the debate so that all members of this House would have an opportunity to speak. I do not see why hon. members will not give us that opportunity. They refused to do so yesterday, and they are again refusing today. In any case, the House has our unanimous consent to sit past 6 p.m., until midnight.

Subsequently we may have a chance to make further arrangements with you, Madam Speaker, meaning that when it is the Liberals' turn to speak we intend to ask for permission to share speaking time and have two periods of 10 minutes, thus giving more members a chance to speak.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I would perhaps like to make a couple of suggestions. It is our intention to provide an opportunity so that every single member of Parliament who wishes to speak on this issue has that opportunity.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riis: As a matter of fact, Madam Speaker, earlier today my leader indicated that we are prepared to start earlier in the morning, to speak until midnight every night, to speak on the weekends, Saturdays, Sundays, if that is what is necessary so that everyone has an opportunity to make a serious speech on this issue.

The question is that at this point I want to seek unanimous consent—we can discuss this later into the evening in terms of facilitating debate so that all members have an opportunity to speak—and at least agree now that the House sit until twelve o'clock tonight to continue the debate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I must say that I am surprised by some of the comments of the House leader for the New Democratic Party who implies to this House—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cooper: I am sorry. I listened quietly and patiently while your member spoke. Please do me the same courtesy.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If negotiations between parties have to be done on the floor of the House of Commons, maybe we should do it with courtesy.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I am surprised when the House leader of the New Democratic Party rises and says that he was surprised by the motion put by the minister. He, of course, was not. I had advised him that that was going to happen and that we were quite prepared to discuss and negotiate any terms and, in fact, we have been carrying on those discussions since early this morning.

In fact, Madam Speaker, you will know that this side co–operated as did all members of the House, in making sure that the New Democratic Party had an opportunity to move a subamendment when its first subamendment had been ruled out of order. We do not need to take any lessons in terms of co–operation and fairness on this side of the House, and in fact I think all members of the House.

We are quite prepared to sit until two, three, four or five in the morning. We are prepared to sit all night because we would like every member of this House to have an opportunity to participate in the debate, including the independent members with whom I have spoken and who have indicated that they are prepared to sit through the night to have an opportunity to participate in this important debate as well. We are prepared to do that.

I do want to signal, Madam Speaker, that we are prepared to sit until midnight in the hopes that the New Democratic Party members will co–operate not just with the government side, but with all members of this House who wish to speak tonight and that they will reconsider their position and allow this House to sit beyond twelve o'clock this evening because, as they know and all of us know, we have a large number of members who wish to participate in this debate.

Miss Grey: Madam Speaker, I would just like to intervene briefly to say that it was my impression, especially from the NDP, that this House was called back to debate the gulf issue. I find it very ironic—and many other people do too, I am sure—to say: Why would we then cut it off at midnight?

If we are here to debate the gulf issue—and it is in fact that important—I would certainly recommend that the NDP reconsider and say: if this that important, let us continue and not just break at midnight.

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, I would like to say as an ordinary member of Parliament that I do not know what the House leaders have talked about or what agreements or disagreements have occurred.

I want to speak before the fighting starts. I am prepared, and I dearly hope that opportunity is afforded to me. I will come at midnight. I will come at three in the morning. I will come at five in the morning. But I want to speak about what is in my heart and what my constituents want to hear in the House of Commons before it is too late.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, one of the responsibilities of Whips in all three parties is to determine the amount of time needed for all members to speak. If every member is to be given 10 minutes, we will need at least 60 hours of debating time.

I would like to suggest that part of the reason for negotiations is the fact that we do not want the government to stop debate arbitrarily, whether it is tomorrow or Friday, and move on to government business not having brought the motion to a vote, while at the same time working to ensure that our members, Liberal members, government members, and Independent members of the House have the full opportunity to speak. We do not want to take a chance on the government giving extended hours with unlimited time and having the vote collapse, or arriving tomorrow at Question Period and finding that the government does not bring the motion forward. We want some guarantees that the people of Canada will have the right to hear from every member of Parliament on this issue.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I share the views of my friend from Beaver River. This is a special session called to debate this issue. I have listened to my hon. friend from Thunder Bay—Atikokan. He is a very interesting individual and very ingenious.

I find it passing strange that we are debating such a fundamental issue in such a very serious way. We are going to work the clock, push the clock in at twelve o'clock and then adjourn and come back and back and back, when the people we are talking about who are very involved in this explosive situation are not working any clock.

I find it even more passing strange that the United States had a two-day debate with extended hours. The American senators and congressmen who found time to go until two and three o'clock on at least one night, if not two, all had a chance to speak.

I say to the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons that I cannot understand why there would be any objection, since we are here on the second day when the Americans who have a heck of a lot more involved in this than we have were able to conclude their debate within two days, and since we do not have the extended hours to go all the way and fit the desires of all members to make sure that we all have a chance to speak, end it, and get the vote over before the whole thing is totally redundant.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: It seems one thing is quite clear. All members in this House seem to agree that this issue should be debated.

In fact, we are now involved in negotiations which would normally take place behind the curtains.

If I am not mistaken, there seems to be consent, at least for now, for continuing debate until midnight. I suggest that we first accept this motion and members will then have a chance to discuss it. Any additions or other arrangements will be taken care of at that time.

Do I have unanimous consent of the House for extending this sitting until midnight?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will therefore proceed with the period for questions and comments following the speech of the Minister of Defence.

• (1750)

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the Minister of National Defence.

The Minister of National Defence said: "We seek justice for Kuwait." The minister continued by stating that we cannot continue to let this aggression go unchallenged and by indicating the amount of tanks and the amount of personnel that Saddam Hussein unleashed on Kuwait. The minister kept on reminding the Canadian public what Canada has to do.

However, I am finding very disturbing this government's statements. It condemned the action against Kuwait, and yet this same government does not condemn actions against other such nations that are small and weak and wherein aggression has happened.

I found it very disturbing that the Ontario caucus chair of this government suggested that the United Nations peacekeeping forces should be withdrawn from Cyprus. Where is the justice? This government sends 2,000 men, 24 planes, and 3 ships. It is going to cost us over $400 million, and yet the government wants to cut 600 soldiers out of Cyprus. When that is done, the whole balance of Cyprus will collapse. The minister said that we lost two lives in Cyprus. I wonder how many lives we are going to lose in Kuwait.

My question for the minister is: Why the double standard? Does the minister not consider the aggression of Turkey toward Cyprus similar to the aggression of Iraq toward Kuwait? What is the difference here? Is it oil that is the difference? Or, is it that our bosses down in the states say that Cyprus should be divided so that we can have the status quo and the Embassy of Russia can be right across from the Embassy of the United States and they can look at each other?

My question is very simple, and I hope the minister will answer it without any rhetoric. Will he indicate today that the United Nations peacekeeping forces of Canadians will stay in Cyprus at their present strength of 600 men, that he will not move them out of there regardless of what suggestions come from his party? Yes or no?

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, I understand the hon. member's concern, and I understand why it would appear that he was maybe putting his case in a more forceful manner than would be necessary.

What I said in my address was that the leader of his party had said that Canada did nothing when Cyprus was attacked in 1974. In 1974, Canada had a small contingent of peacekeepers in Cyprus when Turkey attacked—

An hon. member: They moved to the south.

Mr. McKnight: The hon. member says that they moved to the south. I will inform the hon. member that they received fire from both sides, both Turkish and Greek Cypriots. Canadians who were there at that time attempting to keep the peace received fire from both Turks and Greeks on the Isle of Cyprus. During that time, two Canadian soldiers were killed, not by Canadians, I can assure the member, but by the people who were on the island at the time.

The Canadian peacekeeping commitment in Cyprus, I remind the hon. member, is not assessed through the United Nations as are other peacekeeping commitments under the UN auspices. Canada has been supporting that peacekeeping effort for 27 years. That is a commitment to peace. It is a commitment to peace that Canada will carry throughout the world.

The member is asking a question. They are there now. There is another rotation scheduled and there may be another rotation scheduled at that time. I tell the hon. member—I know he must know this—that the mandate is renewed every six months. Therefore there can be a change. But, there is another rotation scheduled, and there is another rotation scheduled, and there may be a change. There may be a change in the United Nations.

The hon. member is asking us now to act outside the authority of the United Nations. I know he does not mean that, and I will sit down at this time.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I am sorry that I missed the first part of the minister's speech. I will read it carefully in Hansard. There was certainly excitement in the speaker preceding him which attracted certain attention out in the lobby. I apologize to him for that.

There are many issues we could discuss in this brief period. Let me raise two, the first being the field hospital. I am frankly a bit disappointed that the government did not announce this in the House or provide us with the background information in advance of the announcement. I do have, therefore, a couple of questions about it.

First of all, could the minister indicate to what extent there remained, after the disposition of the field hospital resources in response to the British request, other field hospital resources available to the Canadian forces? What alternatives were explored, in particular, in view of the anticipated casualties among civilians on both sides, among the nationals on all sides in this matter? Is Canada looking at any other requests, or is it considering any other disposition? Will it be able to respond to these?

We see the situation of the refugees, the situation of the migrant workers. Many civilians will be hurt in this war. What exploration did the government make of the possibility of UN supervision or organization of this, or the International Red Cross? The International Red Cross has generally in the past been involved in these kinds of activities.

It seems to us that the accession to the request, humanitarian though that may be, is another step, another escalation of this government's involvement in the assault on the Iraqi positions in Kuwait and Iraq. We understand the government believes that is important, but the government creeps toward this commitment and it gives us great concern.

I may have asked too many questions to be answered in a brief period of time. It may be the minister will find some other opportunity to do it. I guess as I framed the questions I realized it was probably impractical to ask the minister the second question, but I will give him notice that I hope at some point to discuss with him the government's understanding of what is to happen after the forces go into Kuwait and assuming they are successful. What regime will be established afterward? What steps are being taken? What estimates are being made of the future?

If he gets a chance to answer those last questions, I would appreciate it now, but basically I would appreciate it if he would focus on the field hospital first.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is accurate. He asked several questions, and I was not able to write them all down. If I forget to answer some, I am sure that he will remind me.

We received a request from the United Kingdom originally for some 600 beds for a surgical hospital. We had to staff it. We did not have that capacity in Canada.

• (1800)

As we staffed the request, it became apparent that we would be able to assemble a field hospital of some 100 beds, totally self-contained and totally sustained by a complement of 550 Canadians.

We were able to find the transportation methods. We were able to acquire a Ro-Ro ship, and we made the announcement today because it was important it be made as early as possible. I made it via press release prior to Question Period, but I was certainly prepared to answer questions in the House.

The hon. member can inquire but I am not sure of how many other countries were approached by the United Kingdom to provide field surgical hospital support, but I would assume that it was not just Canada that they made that request of.

As to whether we consulted with the International Red Cross, no, we had not. When the International Red Cross feels a need to call upon countries, it initiates requests to countries if it believes it could receive the contribution it desires. We did not receive a request from the International Red Cross.

We received a request from members of the Government of the United Kingdom. Because of their increased commitment and their increased complement they did not feel they would be able to handle anticipated casualties. They would not be able to handle what they anticipated would be the prisoners of war who would need medical attention. Under the Geneva Convention they have a responsibility as do other nations. Therefore, they put out a request. We were pleased to be able to comply with that request.

It is, as the hon. member says, something we have not been doing because we believed that by January 15, Saddam Hussein would listen to the United Nations, listen to the resolutions, and remove himself.

The Prime Minister in his speech yesterday said that if he had not complied by midnight last night, Canada would use every effort, including force, to have him removed, along with the other collaborating nations. That, unfortunately, is where we are today. But Canada has made every effort. Other countries have made every effort. I have listened to two days of debate in the House and I have not heard any suggestion that I had not heard before.

I will conclude, Madam Speaker, as I know it is six o'clock. My colleagues should put forward suggestions. There are suggestions that sanctions have been working. I just want to tell the House that air sorties by Iraq from November to now have increased steadily by some 30 per cent. So there is no shortage of military parts and there is no shortage of aviation fuel.

Mr. Gauthier: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. We will be offering the minister some comments on his comments tonight. I am sure that he will appreciate—if he stays around—that we have made suggestions. We will make some more suggestions.

In that context, my caucus members would like to speak on this motion and therefore we would like to split our 20-minute allocation of time when the time comes around to the Liberal caucus into two 10-minute speeches, followed by a period of 5 minutes for comments and questions. In that way, we will get twice as many members of the Liberal caucus to speak. We hope the minister will stay around and listen to us because we have a lot of good suggestions to make to him.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I am very grateful to have the opportunity to address the House on this most critical issue that is before us today.

For months we members of the opposition party have been trying to find the answers to many questions from this government, but to no avail.

We agreed with many things that they did. We agreed with the government's imposition of mandatory, economic sanctions against Iraq. We supported the use of military forces under the authority of the UN, to ensure sanctions are upheld but we strongly disagreed with this government's decision to dispatch these forces before the UN authorized such action.

The government announced the dispatch of forces on August 10 and the UN Security Council only authorized such action by its member states on August 25. In addition, this was done without the recall of Parliament.

We called on the government to recall to Parliament so that this crisis and Canada's role in it could be debated. The government refused to do so. We now have the dubious honour, in the Parliament of Canada, of being the only western democracy not to have recalled its national legislative body or to have otherwise extensively consulted with legislators.

What does this mean, besides being an embarrassment to all Canadians? It means that Canadians were not granted the democratic freedom of having their elected officials bring their very real concerns to the floor of this House on an issue of this magnitude. We in this party believe that the government should have made an explicit commitment to Parliament not only to consult it but to also allow the House to decide, by way of a vote, whether or not Canada should actively participate in or otherwise support, an offensive military action against Iraq, before such action occurs.

This did not happen, nor is it happening with this debate on this particular motion. About the only thing the government motion before the House and its subsequent debate are allowing is, quite literally, an eleventh and a half hour airing of feelings.

Thousands upon thousands of people have collectively written or phoned their members of Parliament to show that they want peace. We keep talking about war. What is wrong with talking about peace? They are sending a message to this government that Canadians do not want war.

Of the dozens of constituents who have contacted my office in the past few days, only two have said they support the motion of this government. All the others are saying: give diplomacy, give sanctions and, therefore, peace a chance; we do not want war.

I would like to read from a few of the letters which came to my office. From a letter to the Prime Minister, I read: "Dear Mr. Mulroney: We would like to encourage you to continue a peaceful, non-military settlement in the Middle East. We believe the enforcement of sanctions must be given a chance to work. Canada must be courageous for peace". This letter was signed by 150 parishioners of the City View United Church, in the city of Nepean.

The second letter comes from a person, whose name I will not give, for obvious reasons. He says: "Canada has built a strong reputation with the United Nations as a country of peacekeepers. Let's keep the reputation; we are not aggressors. As a member of the Canadian Armed Forces, I am proud to be a peacekeeper and that doesn't mean being on the offensive. Have we given enough time for the sanctions imposed to work? I don't think so. Do we have to be American followers? I don't think so. Let us be a country that believes in peace and not commit ourselves to war".

I have a letter from another gentleman and, again, I will not give his name, starts off by saying, "While the leaders play ego, the innocent pay with their lives in the Arabian gulf. What I am seeing and hearing in the news has driven me to come out of my silence and share a side of the story of Iraq that has been totally ignored. I will speak for the innocent Iraqis. I defected from Iraq over 10 years ago and came to Canada. I do not have any empathy with the ruling regime but I certain do for the Iraqi people. The Iraqi people have barely survived, over 20 years, under the oppression of the ruthless leadership of Saddam Hussein. I have chosen Canada as my homeland for it represents the principles I hold dear. I feel that those ideals are being betrayed by the present Canadian government. One of the reasons I chose Canada was because of its even-handed approach and tolerance in dealing with international problems but, by aligning ourselves in a wartime stance, Canada and the Government of Canada is violating that stand".

This is from a Ken Toews from Nepean. "I am writing to express my dismay at our involvement in the escalating war in the Middle East. I agree that Saddam Hussein is an evil man. There have been many invasions in the past 10 years where more people were killed and brutalized worse than the Kuwaitis. The Americans did not get involved. The reason? They did not have an economic reason for it. Perhaps if we had not sold the Middle East so many arms they would not be fighting this war today."

This is from Jean Godt, also from Nepean. She says: "Eventually we are going to have a peace conference in the Middle East and we will have to address many of the demands Hussein and his supporters are making. So, why not bypass the war and have the peace conference now rather than satisfying the war-mongering hawks in the U.S." Doesn't that make sense? It is so simplistic. Let's have peace, forget about the war and sit around a table and talk.

This is from Caroline Fitzpatrick of Nepean would like to have more talks about peace and less about war. She says: "The resolution of the UN did not say go to war. Give sanctions a longer try." "Appalled at the thought of going to war", comes from Isabelle Muir. Leslie Arnold says: "Only supportive of war if UN votes to go to war and the UN has not voted to go to war". This is contrary to what someone said earlier here today.

Having prepared a 20-minute speech and now being told I have to make a 10-minute speech, I am having to jump a few pages. I would like to speak about who is going to win in this war. I do not think that anybody is going to win. Surely, it is not going to be us as Canadians.

There has been no clearly defined national Canadian interest in attacking Iraq. Iraq is not the winner, not with the military build-up that is set against it. It would be obliterated. Israel would not be the winner in a war if Iraq is attacked. Saddam Hussein has promised to launch a massive strike against Israel. Surely Kuwait is not the big winner if a war breaks out because it would, in all likelihood, be the scene of the hard fought, bloody trench warfare.

The Secretary of State and other government members opposite have suggested that we should participate in war against Iraq because of the human rights violations perpetrated by Saddam Hussein against the people of Kuwait and indeed his own people. We have seen this man wage one of the bloodiest wars in history against Iran. We have seen him conduct ruthless experiments with biological and chemical weaponry on his own people. We have seen him mercilessly gas the Kurds. The international community has been hesitant in the past to condemn his actions, perhaps because members of the international community have had an agenda in which Saddam Hussein and his oil played the major role.

As my colleague, the member for Winnipeg South Centre, so eloquently pointed out in an earlier speech, all of us can carry some of the blame for the present situation. The world community has helped supply Saddam Hussein with the very weapons which he could well turn back on to us. What goes around comes around. What is the hurry now for Canada to enter a war without first giving sanctions and diplomacy a proper chance.

The government has suggested that sanctions, if given proper time, will not affect Hussein, because he will starve his own people before shortages would ever be allowed to reach his troops. They like to use the imagery of starving children. I have heard this argument over and over again. In other words they say, rather than starve the people, let's go in there and blow them all to kingdom come. I guess this is going to be a more humane way for these children of Iraq to die. This is absolute nonsense.

I say peace begotten of peace would be lasting and that future generations of children in the Middle East would benefit from a peaceful approach as profoundly and wonderfully as would this generation of children from the Middle East.

As Senate majority leader, George Mitchell, said: "War is such a grave undertaking, with such serious consequences, we must make certain that war is employed only as a last resort."

In closing, I would like to quote an excerpt from a November The Ottawa Citizen editorial, as well as yesterday's: "The resolution that Canada is considering voting for would be a double tragedy.

Not only would it start a war that is totally unnecessary, it would also administer a major defeat to the United Nations. The sanctions program is strictly a UN operation, controlled and directed by the Security Council. The military action under the proposed resolution would not be a UN operation. It would be an independent operation authorized by the Security Council but not supervised by it. Any war fought essentially by the U.S. and its allies would not be a UN war. There would be no blue helmets and no direction from the UN.

A peaceful resolution of this crisis will produce complications, granted, but not so many complications as would a war. We should not be fighting a war not of our own making, a war that might have been prevented and a war that may well create as many problems as it solves.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, I am pleased that we are finally debating this issue in Parliament. We have been calling upon the Government of Canada to recall Parliament since last fall, since last summer in fact. I am glad that we are finally having this debate. Since the beginning when the Canadian forces were committed to the gulf initially to enforce sanctions, the government has treated Parliament as a rubber stamp, treated it with something close to contempt. I am glad that we are finally having this debate so that parliamentarians can express their views.

The resolution that we are debating today is really not the issue. The issue before Canadians now is should Canada be going to war or not. I think that it is worth reading into the record, as I have 10 minutes only, and as this makes many of the points that we had been making on this side of the House, the position of the United Nations Association in Canada, because what Mr. Geoffrey Grenville-Wood is saying, as the national President of the United Nations Association in Canada, is exactly what this party has been saying all along. I am going to read it into the record:

> The world awaits, with increasing trepidation, the expiry of the deadline imposed by the United Nations Security Council for the withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait.
> I believe that the Security Council Resolution, number 678 of November 29, giving the authority to use force was a bad resolution, bad for the United Nations and bad for world peace. In my view, it was not necessary. Sanctions should have been given a chance to have an effect.

He says further:

> Also, the resolution was arguably wrong in law in that it did not comply with the requirement in the United Nations Charter that sanctions had "proven to be inadequate", before force could be used.
> As recently as last month, the Director of the CIA told the U.S. Congress that given a reasonable time sanctions would have a crippling effect on the Iraqi economy.
> This resolution is bad also because it permits the United States and the others in the coalition to consider that the UN has now authorized them, in George Bush's words, to "kick arse". Well, the UN is not about (that). The organization was created at the end of the Second World War to save the peoples of the world from, in the words of the UN Charter, "the scourge of war". The Charter sets out a very clear step by step process that is to be followed to suppress aggression. The emphasis throughout this document is on the non-violent resolution of disputes.

His statement goes on:

> It is important to remember that any offensive action that might be undertaken will not be taken on behalf of the United Nations. This will not be a United Nations war.
> Yes, the Charter does permit the use of force, but only in very restricted circumstances and only as a last resort. I do not believe—

He says, as head of the United Nations Association in Canada:

> —we were at that stage when this resolution was passed, in November. And, in fact we are still not there.

Today, our House of Commons will be meeting to debate Canada's response to the latest turn of events. I ask all Members of Parliament to examine very carefully their position

In light of the dubious validity of Resolution 678, Canada should confine itself to continuing sanctions enforcement at sea and in the air, to providing emergency humanitarian assistance to the refugees inevitably created by the commencement of hostilities and to the provision of a field hospital, as recently requested by the United Kingdom.

Let Canada join with others in continuing the search for diplomatic solutions.

He concludes:

War is not necessary. Ask yourself, what will have been gained if literally tens of thousands of lives are lost in order to remove Iraq from Kuwait? Will the price be seen as worthwhile, if we can not be certain that the same objective could have been achieved without the loss of any lives?

Perhaps the time has come for a pause of good sense, for all our sakes.

That is the position of the United Nations Association in Canada and indeed, the position of this party. The government is not proposing to send us to war as part of a UN force. My colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception has made that point repeatedly in the House of Commons.

We have, as Canadians, fought under the UN flag before. We have fought under the NATO flag before. But this is not a NATO flag. This is not a UN flag. The time now is not the same as we have seen in the past. We believe that sanctions have not had time to work. There was an article in The New York Times as recently as two days ago which said that sanctions will bite, and soon, and referred to evidence presented to the President of the United States by the CIA recently.

We believe that sanctions can work given time and that they should be given that time to work. We support those sanctions and have from the beginning. We have supported the presence of the Canadian forces in the Gulf. As one of those who has visited the Canadian forces, I want to say that we are proud on this side of the competence and the professionalism that the Canadian forces are showing in the gulf. Three per cent of the ships are ours, are Canadian ships, and yet we are doing 25 per cent of the interceptions.

We believe this is the course of action that we should continue and that the Canadian forces should not be put on a different footing at this time, that war is not inevitable. The position of this party is not that there should be peace at any cost, but that at this time it is not necessary to commit this country to war.

Indeed, the Government of Canada has not made the case for Canada going to war, not made the case that it is in Canada's best interest to go to war at this time. That appears also to be the public opinion in this country. We have seen a Gallup poll within the past day or so that shows that 56 per cent of Canadians believe that war is wrong for Canada at this time. Those figures change across the country. They are very strong in my part of the country and they are very strong in the province of Quebec. But 56 per cent of all Canadians feel that now is not the time for Canada to go to war.

I suspect that one of the reasons they feel this way is that they feel that historically the role of this country has been peacekeeper and not war-maker, and that inevitably when the conflict, if it should come, is over then there will be a need for peacekeeping and Canada will have a role to play. Canada will undoubtedly have lost a great deal of the credibility that we have had in the past and therefore we will have diminished our capability of playing the role of peacekeeper.

The position of this party is clear. We believe that war is an option always and we cannot rule out forever the option of war. But we believe this is not the time for this country to commit itself and its forces to war. We believe there is another course of action. We believe sanctions should be given more time to have their effect and that is the course of action that the government should be following. That is why we oppose this resolution.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I was wondering if the member would really categorize Canada's contribution as warlike.

We have three ships in the gulf patrolling to make sure that an embargo is enforced. We have 24 airplanes that will be patrolling air space over the gulf itself, according to the Minister of National Defence, to make sure that the military assets of the alliance are not attacked. We are possibly going to have a hospital there of which the hon. member approves.

Where is the warlike action by Canada that the member does not approve of? Where is the warlike activity that Canada is undertaking? Does the member not agree that as a peacekeeping group we ought to enforce an embargo, that we ought to make sure that those who are enforcing the embargo are protected from the air and that those who may be involved in hostilities are looked after in hospitals and protected with respect to their health and their physical being?

Is that not the kind of thing he ought to stand up and say: "Hear, hear. Canada ought to do this"?

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, the position is quite clear.

This party supports what the Canadian forces are doing in the gulf now, and has. It supports the ships, the role of the aircraft in patrolling for those ships and the presence of a field hospital. We have no problems with enforcing the sanctions and with Canadian forces helping to do that.

What we object to is the course of action that the government is on. The course of action the government is on is quite clear. I quote from the Prime Minister's speech: "Canada will join in expelling Hussein by force."

In those words, it is quite clear to all of us that the Prime Minister has committed the country to the course of war. This party is saying we do not agree with that. We think there are other options. We think there are other ways in which the Government of Canada should be acting. We do not agree with the words of the Prime Minister: "Canada will join in expelling Hussein by force."

That is not the position for Canada to be taking at this time. That is why this party objects.

Mr. Blenkarn: I am most interested.

Is it the view of this member, then, if the 30-odd countries that have forces there—including Britain, France and the United States—start hostilities in accordance with the UN resolution, that Canada should pick up its hospital if it is there and take it home, pick up its ships and take them home and send its aircraft home because we do not want to be part of what might be evicting Saddam Hussein by force?

Or, is it his view that simply being there as we clearly intend to be if force is used by our colleagues in the alliance, and enforcing and making sure that hostile actions do not take place against our allies in a defensive manner is in fact the kind of thing that we should not be involved in, that we should turn tail and run home? Is that the way he would have us support the United Nations?

Mr. Rompkey: First of all, Madam Speaker, the hon. member may have information that I do not have, but I do not have information that 30 countries are going to go to war against Iraq.

If that is what he is saying, he obviously has information that I do not have. I have no information that 30 countries are going to go to war against Iraq. If he can tell me which countries have declared war against Iraq, or which countries are going to, then I would listen to that argument.

From our point of view, we do not know which countries have taken those decisions.

Furthermore, it is our position that if we were to use that course of action it should be under a UN flag. We have no objection at all to supporting a UN force, as we have in the past Canadians have supported UN forces, but there is no UN flag here. There is no UN force at the moment, and therefore nothing for Canada to join.

• (1830)

Mr. Blenkarn: I presume the member has an objection to the Canadian flag; the Canadian flag should not fly over our forces but a UN flag, or a NATO flag, or somebody else's flag, but not our flag.

Is it the position of the Liberal Party that we should take our Canadian flag home, make sure it does not fly when there are hazards in the world enforcing UN resolutions? Is that the position of the Liberal Party?

Mr. Rompkey: I was happy to reply to the other two interventions because at least they had some substance but I am afraid that that particular intervention is just too silly to warrant a response.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I would like to indicate to the House that we on this side would now like to break our speeches into the tens and of course the fives. However, I am sure that the House would agree, in the event there are no questions that perhaps what we could do at that point would be to move the third speaker into that third 10 minute spot in the normal 30 minutes allotted to our side.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): On a point of clarification, what the parliamentary secretary is proposing is not to do away with the 10 minute question and comment period but if there are no questions or comments, simply to expedite the debate by using it for another speaker. That is fine, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is adopted. Resuming debate. The Associate Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, as I rise today to participate in this most grave debate, I think we are all aware that the situation in the gulf has become very serious indeed. The Canadian government joins with all Canadians in sadness that a peaceful solution to the Persian Gulf crisis now appears improbable.

The questions that we are discussing during this debate, and the questions that obviously need to be answered are: Why is Canada involved? What is the Canadian interest? What are, if any, the opportunities for diplomacy or sanctions to work? If hostilities break out, what would be the role and the participation of the Canadians who are serving there with the Canadian Armed Forces?

Let me make it clear. In terms of the Canadian interest and why Canadians are involved, in my mind there is only one course. The only course is for Canada as in our tradition, as in our history, to stand with the world community in our resolute opposition to the brutal invasion of Kuwait and the disruption of order and stability in the Middle East that has followed.

Yes, such resolve does bring the risk of armed conflict, but in my mind the failure to stand as one with the world community would stand not only as a tragic betrayal of our history and of our collective security but would also devastate the United Nations as an instrument of global security.

I would ask my colleagues to reflect on the nature of the Hussein regime. We have heard others speak of this as well. This is a government, as we all know, that has not hesitated to use chemical weapons against its own population. It has promised to do the same if not worse, to Israel and Saudi Arabia. This breaches all international protocols and shows a complete disregard for the civilian populations of the region.

Iraq's quests for weapons of mass destruction is unhappily married to an approach to foreign policy that could only be called duplicitous.

If we in Canada do not oppose this callous use of force, I really fear that we will condemn the world to an environment where weapons will have triumphed over law, and the security and the well-being of all countries will be left to the forbearance of other men like Saddam Hussein. We will have turned from the rule of law to the rule of the jungle. This ominous future is simply unacceptable and must be spurned.

In trying to resolve this crisis since August 2, there has been more diplomacy, more symmetry, than we have probably seen ever, certainly in the history of this century. It has all come to naught.

It has come to naught for one reason because Saddam Hussein has slammed the door on every effort to try to find a peaceful resolution to force him to withdraw from Kuwait in a peaceful manner.

I congratulate all those who have been involved in those efforts. We heard last night from the Secretary of State for External Affairs about the role that he and the Prime Minister have played, along with other world leaders in making these efforts. But it all appears to have been to no avail.

Perhaps not surprisingly, because when I was in the gulf region just over the last 10-day period, I met with leaders in the gulf countries. They reminded me of one elemental thing that perhaps sitting back here in Canada we may find hard to believe. They said: "You can't treat Saddam Hussein like a statesman. You can't deal with him as you would with rational leaders and try to negotiate. He is not motivated by statesmanship. He is only motivated by terror and fear." That is the way that he has run his regime. So it is with sadness that we have seen that diplomacy has not worked.

What about sanctions? We have heard in this House so many members say that if we would just let sanctions work, that in and of itself would somehow persuade Saddam Hussein to get out of Kuwait. In my heart of hearts, I wish that were true, but wishing does not make it true. I think we have to look at the reality that we are faced with.

First of all, let us recall that when Saddam Hussein and his forces invaded Kuwait they pillaged that country. The savagery that they have displayed—the plundering, the executions of innocent people, the rape of women, and the murder of children—is something that quite honestly I never dreamed would exist in this century. I had really thought, naively perhaps, that the civilized world had come to a point that this would not happen.

It has been, I guess, one of the most shocking realities that I have had to come to grips with as I read the Amnesty International reports, read the publication "The Rape of Kuwait", and met with Kuwaiti refugees, as I did recently when I was in the Middle East. They said to me: "How can you let this continue, while you sit back comfortable in your own living rooms in your own countries saying let sanctions work? If this continues, our country is destroyed. Our people are being destroyed. We have asked for your help. Please help us now".

We know with our own participation in our naval forces, they have done an outstanding job. In fact, it is their assessment that they have blocked probably 95 per cent of all the traffic coming into the Persian Gulf. Our own ships, in fact, have done about 25 per cent of those interceptions.

We do know through other ways and other methods that certain goods have been able to get into Iraq. What we really do know is that it is not having an impact on Saddam Hussein's military might. Ordinary people may be suffering. They may not be getting through. Women and children are the victims of this brutality in Kuwait and in Iraq. The military is being looked after. They are getting food.

While I was there he announced a big increase in wages for the military and the officers were all going to get cars. The Minister of National Defence mentioned that the number of aircraft sorties has increased significantly. It is not having an impact on his will to support this military. Again, when I was there and talking to people in that region who have dealt with him, who know him and know that regime, they were quite honestly saying: "We appreciate the sanctions. We appreciate that that has brought together the international community, but they won't work". They were beyond any discussion about the possibility of sanctions having any impact.

I listened to them and I must admit that it was after that trip that I came back with a much different view about the possibilities of any kind of a peaceful resolution for the dispute in that region. Diplomacy has been tried and sanctions have been tried, but to no avail. We are now dealing with a situation where, through the United Nations, we have said that we are prepared to use force, if necessary, in order to get Saddam Hussein to comply with all the other resolutions and perhaps now the time has come.

I believe that Canada has to back its words with action. We have over there over 1,800 Canadians, three ships, a squadron of CF-18. We have medical personnel on the U.S hospital ship Mercy, we have a headquarters in Bahrain. We have announced today that we will also be sending over a field hospital unit to support the United Kingdom. Those men and women there with whom I met are very proud of their professionalism. They do not want war any more than any of us want war but they know that they are capable of doing their jobs and they are prepared to do their jobs in the interests of Canada and in the interests of international peace and security.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think, in fairness to the House and to the associate minister, I should let her know that on television, live, right now, is a report from Baghdad that the American troops have started their offensive action in Baghdad. I think that it is fair to the minister to let her know that. Perhaps she may wish to reflect on that or perhaps change her remarks.

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing that information to the House in this very timely way but, no, unfortunately that does not change my remarks because, quite honestly, I have been prepared for that eventuality as I think the men and women who serve in the forces have been. I in fact am not surprised, quite honestly, that it would happen at this time. I think what we all have to do now is hope and pray for our people and for their families. I know that they will do what they have to do, and we hope that they will come home safe and sound. I hope all members in the House will show support for our Canadians who are there.

When I was there, they told me that what was really important to them was receiving the good wishes and the letters from people across the country, and it was very important to them to know that they had the support. I know the hon. member, along with so many in his riding, has shown that support to them.

One can only hope, now that hostilities have broken out, that they will be able to achieve an end with minimal loss of life and that, as a result, we will be able to achieve the objective of restoring peace and restoring law and order, and that through the united action and the auspices of the United Nations and the countries that are involved, generations in the future will say to us: 'Yes, those were very difficult decisions for the leaders at that time but those, indeed, were the right decisions for the future security of the world".

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a very difficult point in time for all members of the House, and in particular for me, because hostilities having commenced. I probably have 400 to 600 families in my riding with husbands, sons, daughters and wives serving with the Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf.

This is probably the most emotional moment of my life and I want to ask the minister this question, very clearly, because the level of anxiety is very high. We have over 1,800 Canadian personnel, I think it is, in the gulf. Can the minister please respond and tell me: what is the intention of the Canadian government? Could we kindly stop debating this senseless resolution about sanctions? I know that she is concerned about the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces and she feels very strongly about the role of Canada. But, for God's sake, if war has broken out, will she stand in her place and tell us what is the role of the Canadian Armed Forces? Can she not drop this facade of talking about enforcing UN sanctions in the gulf, and tell the men and women, who are serving in the gulf and their families, what it means, if indeed it means that her government is now ordering them to be part of the war and what their role will be? Let us stop this nonsense of a debate on UN sanctions and debate the real thing, that is the role of the Canadian Armed Forces and the fate of our men and women who are serving this country so gallantly.

Mrs. Collins: With the permission of the Speaker, I hope I will be given the time to respond to that, because I was going to come to it in my remarks when I had the opportunity. It is very important for members of the House to understand what we anticipate will be the role, not knowing when this will happen, and to be able to explain it to them.

We have ships and aircraft there. We have ships in the southern part of the Persian Gulf. They will continue to be in that area in support of the replenishment group, that is the ships that provide supplies. Our ships will provide escort to those ships. That is the role they have been involved in up to now and will continue in that role.

Our aircraft will continue with combat air patrols over the gulf. This is something they have been doing since they arrived. They will continue to protect the shipping and all assets in that region. As hostilities break out, that will continue to be what they will be asked to do. If there are other roles or tasks that they may be asked to do, that will be considered by cabinet. No other decisions have been made on that point at this particular time.

I have been asked if I could inform the House that cabinet will be meeting this evening at 8. I advise my colleagues and Canadians of that this evening. At the conclusion of my remarks, I have been asked to move:

That the question now be put.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, like the rest of my colleagues, I am in somewhat of a quandary to understand the events of the last few moments, what impact they will have on this debate and, indeed, what it means to the rest of the evening. However, I will begin my remarks by quoting from a speech in the House of Commons yesterday made by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. He stated that it is very easy to start a war, but it is very difficult to stop one.

In view of what has transpired, it becomes extremely apparent that the war the hon. gentleman was referring to started on August 2 when Iraq invaded Kuwait and, in view of what is happening now, it becomes even more meaningful. Obviously, those remarks would have been better directed at Saddam Hussein than to the House of Commons.

A war has been started and the complications of this war started by the Iraqis on August 2 obviously could be absolutely devastating. The complications of this war to the Iraqis themselves are incalculable.

• (1850)

It has become apparent by the events in the last few minutes that we now can assume that nothing less will be acceptable other than the total destruction of Saddam Hussein and his political apparatus. Apparently nothing else will suffice. What a tragedy.

The country of Iraq itself is beautiful. It is a land of historical significance that goes back to the Garden of Eden. Noah and his sons built the ark in that land. The ruins of the city of Babylon about 100 kilometres from Baghdad attest to the historical significance of the region. It is the land of Christ and Paul.

The city of Baghdad itself, which is apparently now under siege by the allied forces, played a significant and historical role in the development of world commerce and trade. It was the crossroads of civilization at one point. It played a key role in that part of our recent history when the Arab world was the most significant society known to the world encompassing much of Europe and the entire Middle East. It has a proud and noble history.

Baghdad's people are proud. The country has progressed by Arab standards significantly. The city of Baghdad itself is a modern city based on western technology.

I, along with a couple of my colleagues from the House of Commons, was in Baghdad not that many weeks ago. The first thing that struck us as we drove from the airport into Baghdad was how the country had suffered under the ravages of a costly war in terms of hundreds of thousands of lives of young men and also in economic terms. That war cost a lot.

It struck us how a country that had undergone such tremendous pressures could have developed throughout all of those eight long years of its war with Iran to the point where it was. The highways were immaculate. The infrastructure, the universities, the schools, the hospitals and the bridges are significant and impressive.

The country of Iraq maintained that rebuilding program throughout all those years, again at a significant cost to the society. A huge debt was built up.

That debt has contributed significantly to what we have seen today because, obviously, had the country been able to put the dollars that were available to it through its oil revenues to building even more of its society than to the war it had with Iran, then indeed it would have been even that much more significant today than it is.

I want to talk just about the enlightenment of the Iraqi society. Much of the movers and shakers, the people who are the doctors, the lawyers and the professors have been educated in western society. A lot of them have been educated in this country. A lot of them have been educated in the United States.

I feel confident by saying that what has transpired since August 2 has been a terrible embarrassment to these people to know that they are associated with a regime that could be as cold and calculating as it has been that would wrought such destruction on a neighbouring state.

How many times did I say during the period of time with the Iraqi–Iranian situation what a comfort it would be to know that those dollars and costs in terms of lives could be better expended in bringing peace and harmony to the region rather than sacrificing them in the manner that they were.

That apparently is the mentality of the people who Saddam Hussein has put in positions of authority under him.

I have met many Iraqis who are honest and good and sound and solid people. I have a great deal of respect for them. I have a great deal of respect for the ambassador to this country, Mr. Al Shawi, whom I know to be a decent and honourable person. I would like to caution that we, as Canadians do not react to what is taking place now, categorizing all Iraqis and the people of Iraq because of the madness of one individual who is in power and is controlling the machinery of war in that nation.

Iraq has had some legitimacy. Iraqis do feel that they have had some legitimacy to do what they have done. Prior to 1916 Kuwait was a part of that country. It was only petitioned by the British.

We have come to the point where those people who were in a position to know the difficulties of the sanctions that were passed and authorized by the United Nations in August, October and November, what impact they were, or, more important were not having. They took the decision to move ahead because they felt that the price we would have to bear would be too costly. It was my intention and it will be my intention to vote for this resolution that is before the House because I support the United Nations.

I support the United Nations in its role regardless of whether it is in the passage of resolutions to condemn the illegal occupation of Kuwait or whether, through resolutions of the United Nations, to condemn the illegal occupation by Israel in the occupied territories of the West Bank. I cannot be hypocritical about this matter. I will support Canada's decision, and rightfully so, to support the actions and activities of the United Nations. We are the fourth largest contributor to that body. We have no reason to believe that we should at this point abandon the principles of that organization.

When this is all over and said and done with, the fact of the matter is that we will have to look for new ways of ensuring that all the problems of the region are dealt with. Make no mistake about it, although Saddam Hussein had no legitimacy in linking his invasion of Kuwait with that particular issue, until the Palestinian issue is dealt with under the resolutions that have been passed which we as a country have supported, those being resolutions 242 and 338, there will be no lasting peace.

I leave this message with the people of this nation from my perspective and my constituency. I am supportive of the actions and the activities that have been undertaken by this government to support the United Nations resolutions. I want to give my assurances to the men and women serving in that theatre that we as Canadians have a grave concern for their future and must do everything we can to ensure their safety, and that they return home to a country and a world that have much better served because of their integrity and determination.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a comment and a question to the hon. member.

In my riding of Scarborough—Agincourt I had the opportunity to poll over 2,000 people. The vast majority of them were saying we should give sanctions more time to work. They were gravely concerned about our young men and women in the gulf. As we just witnessed, hostilities have erupted in the gulf. The theatre of operation and what will happen in the gulf bring a new perspective. This government will be asking our young men and women to put their lives on the line. My colleague is from Dartmouth which has roughly 600 families, of which 450 have men and women in the gulf. They are gravely concerned. The Canadian people are gravely concerned. The Canadian public wants to know what the is mandate of the Canadian forces, what is the engagement, and what are their orders.

• (1900)

Is the hon. member aware of any of those questions? Does he agree that the hostilities should cease and desist? Does he agree that the safety of our young men and women in the gulf is first and foremost in the mind of every Canadian?

Mr. Corbett: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comment. I can only say that I am too much aware of what the circumstances are in the Middle East, what circumstances are in Iraq, what circumstances are in the entire region.

I have been a watcher of the Middle East for a good number of years. I am extremely and deeply conscientious of the role that we as Canadians have played as peacekeepers in the area and the reputation that we have developed throughout the years as a peacekeeper.

When I became aware that Canada was supporting the United Nations resolutions to impose sanctions against Iraq for its illegal occupation, its illegal invasion of Kuwait, I was extremely hopeful that indeed that would work, that the activities undertaken by the world community would have the desired effect of averting a war.

It has been said in this House many times during this debate that nobody wants a war. As the Minister of National Defence stated earlier, he has not met a single Canadian, nor have I, who is in favour of war.

The fact of the matter is we have a hostility that has erupted. There are declarations of war. Canada has a proud and noble tradition of supporting what is right. We are not in favour of aggression. We are not in favour of actions against fellow members of the United Nations. We have pledged ourselves by being a member, a full participating member, a first world nation, to support the United Nations in the efforts it has undertaken and in resolutions it undertakes.

Our history is one we should be proud of. The men and women of our Armed Forces are people who are first-class in the work they have determined they want to undertake. I have every confidence in their ability to deal with their activities from a professional standpoint. I am sure that they understand their duty to this country and their duty to the world. They are prepared to undertake those responsibilities in a very serious manner, anticipating that they will be returning to this country leaving the world in better condition than they found it because of their interest.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, as I rise tonight let me indicate that I have just received news that hostilities have in fact broken out in the Persian Gulf. That brings to mind a question as to the very nature of us as human beings. What perverse creatures we are if the first collective act after the end of the cold war is to make war. Our party has had a long history of support for the United Nations, the body that is there to prevent war.

The charter of the United Nations says that the purpose of the United Nations is to maintain international peace and security. As I said, we have a long history of support for the United Nations, and how perverse that the United Nations is now being used as an instrument to make war. How can we accomplish the goal of the United Nations to maintain international peace and security by making war? We must see the contradiction in that.

It can be argued that UN resolution 678 is a contradiction of the UN charter, because it is a licence to make war, but it could also be argued that in the very language of resolution 678 it says to use all necessary means. All necessary means have not yet been exhausted.

I hope those news reports that are just now coming in are wrong. I hope that it is just a test, another way of bringing the nerves of the Iraqi forces to the verge. If it is in fact true that the bombs are dropping, I remind this House there are human beings under those bombs.

The United States claims to be supporting international law and opposing aggression. That rings hollow when we look at the history of the United States concern for East Timor, Cyprus, Lebanon, the occupied territories, Grenada, Panama, and Nicaragua.

Canada must respect international law as embodied by UN Security Council resolution 660, but that respect cannot be selective. There has been a curious selectivity of outrage. I think that this House in this debate should be peeling away those levels of hypocrisy. To date this government has squandered Canada's historic opportunity as a member of the Security Council to play an independent peacekeeping role and peacemaking role in the gulf.

I want to turn my comments now to focus on reputations. Reputations either personal, business, organizational or national are the currency by which we are judged, are the currency by which we are held in esteem, are the currency by way we make progress.

Canada's international reputation—and I speak from experience because I have travelled internationally both as a member of Parliament and prior to becoming a member of Parliament—is enormous. Canada's international reputation is as a peacemaker, as a peacekeeper. Canada's Armed Forces have always been used to this effect.

Now this government has taken that role and perverted that historic role of the Canadian Armed Forces by engaging in this war. This resolution that we are debating here tonight, make no mistake about the kind of wishy-washy language of the resolution, is the government's way of asking for our permission to make war. That is not what we want to do.

I have just been handed a note, Mr. Speaker, and the White House has now confirmed the war has started.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Ms. Hunter: Canada's international reputation has just changed dramatically. I urge those government members, who feel as I do that this is a perversion of Canada's history, to vote against it.

• (1910)

I am going to focus my remarks now on the environmental consequences. The Secretary of State for External Affairs talked earlier today during Question Period about environmental warfare. That apparently is what we are in. Iraq has proclaimed that it will destroy the Kuwaiti oilfields if attacked. Kuwait has over an estimated over 1,000 oil wells. I think I should be permitted an emotional digression here.

The International Council of Scientific Unions and other scientists estimate that 10 million barrels of oil a day could burn if Iraq carries through on its threat. Smoke produced from burning those oil wells could change global temperatures by several degrees, disrupt African and Asian monsoons, and devastate world harvests. Smoke would result in local and regionalized ozone holes. Temperatures in the area of burning wells could reach 160 degrees where human beings are, while temperatures underneath the massive smoke soot layers could plummet 68 degrees.

This is environmental warfare and we are part of it if this government goes ahead. Again I urge government members to remember Canada's role in history, to remember our peacekeeping and peacemaking role, and that we are the ones who act between combatants and we have done it with distinction.

Global warming could be accelerated by 30 years. This is not going to be a quick, surgical strike. Oh, no, what is going to happen is going to devastate our world environmentally.

A year long oilfield conflagration is quite possible because the oil wells in Kuwait pump up the oil automatically. They do not need a pump, so once they start burning we cannot put them out.

The onset, duration, intensity, and character of the monsoons in Asia will be affected. Failure of the monsoons could impact over one billion people. Those people depend on those rains for crops and for water. Even a partial monsoon failure would cause more deaths than the total populations of Iraq, Kuwait, and Saudi Arabia combined.

That is what we are into. That is the madness that we have embarked upon.

I know a lot has been said about the evil nature of Saddam Hussein. I think most of us in this House would absolutely agree. But, make no mistake: we are not doing a nice, quick, surgical strike against Saddam Hussein. We are going against a population. Some 45 per cent of the population of Iraq and Kuwait is made up of people under the age of 15; children, Mr. Speaker. Those are the people those bombs are raining down on now; children.

I am not naive about war. I have seen it. I am one of the few members of Parliament who has seen it. I have been part of it in Africa when I was working for Oxfam Canada, so war is not an abstract thing to me. It is very real. Being part of a war is not like watching it on television, in movies like Apocalypse Now or Born on the 4th of July, although those were hard–hitting and certainly brought forth very real emotions. When it is actually yourself in a bunker with the ground shaking and shells going off around you, it is real, it is not a movie. I have experienced that. I wish that more members of Parliament had, because I do not think they would go for any part of war if they had actually experienced it.

This is an historic day in the House. I urge government members again to please reconsider. Look into your souls and see if you want this on your conscience, for Canada to be part of this conflagration that we have begun tonight.

What we are contemplating here is not abstract. We have to realize that the environmental consequences of this war are extensive, the global warming is probably just the most benign consequence, that just the U.S. forces alone have over 1,000 nuclear warheads in the Persian Gulf. What happens if any of those nuclear warheads are hit even by accident? Do the so–called experts know what happens if the Iraqi nuclear generating station is hit? Do the experts know that? This again is not going to be a limited war. How can we be so sure that it will be a quick, sharp strike and then we will get rid of this brutal dictator? There are other brutal dictators in this world. I wonder why we have not focused our attentions on them before now. I think Canadians who are watching here tonight know darn well why, because it was not in the economic interests of the United States up to now. This is apparent.

This is why I go back to how I started my comments. It brings questions to my mind about the very perversity of human nature. How can we secure international peace and security by making war? It is obscene.

I will conclude my remarks by once again urging government members to look into their souls and consciences, to look into their pride of country. The historic development of Canada has been one of pride in being there between the combatants and to contribute to peace in the world. By voting for this resolution they are departing from that history in a very tragic way. So please reconsider and vote against it. This war is too horrific to even contemplate, and apparently we are now in it. We must vote against this resolution. We must. Although the war has begun, our international reputation must be used to effect to stop it, to act as a mediator, to get us out of this horrible, horrible mess.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have two motions to put before the House. The first one rises from negotiations that have been ongoing throughout the day.

I move:

That this House continue to sit beyond the normal time of adjournment to continue the debate on Motion No. 27, that during this time no dilatory motions, no motions to adjourn this House, nor any quorum calls shall be accepted by the Chair.

And that when no member rises to speak, the question shall be deemed to have been put and the vote deferred until an agreed upon time by the three House leaders.

In the event that the House is still sitting at 10.59 a.m., Thursday, January 17, 1991, it shall stand adjourned until 11 a.m. that day and resume debate on Government Order No. 27, after Routine Proceedings and continue until no member is rising for debate.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am agreeable to the first motion. I am happy that members will have a chance to speak to this very serious matter.

I would only hope that when this order is adopted that other arrangements will be made for all caucuses to meet prior to resuming debate on this most important question.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I believe I understand the motion my hon. friend has put forward but, just to ensure that I understand him, we will continue to debate for as long as it takes, until all members of Parliament have had an opportunity to speak. Essentially what we are doing is breaking for Question Period, if necessary, on Thursday, or if the case may be, even for Friday, but we will continue to sit until the last member of Parliament has completed his or her remarks with the exception of Question Periods.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, without getting into the technicalities of all the procedural rules, yes, I can confirm that that is essentially what we are talking about.

Mr. Gauthier: I do not want to rub it in, Mr. Speaker, but I take it the NDP House leader knows exactly what we are doing and agrees with what we are doing and will not change his mind.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, being one of the members who is not subject to party discipline, I would like to know before I either give or not give unanimous consent—I do not know what my colleague for Beaver River will do— whether the government, and I see there are several ministers here, has a statement it would like to make. I think the members are entitled to know before we give unanimous consent, at least those of us who can deny it, what the rationale is for not continuing the debate.

Mr. Cooper: May I indicate to the hon. member that the purpose of this motion is to continue the debate and to make sure that everybody has an opportunity to speak to the issue.

The second motion that I indicated I was going to suggest to the House is that the House suspend to the call of the Chair for a period of time to allow members to brief themselves on what has now happened in the Gulf to give them an opportunity to have a look at the issue, to be briefed among their caucuses and then at the call of the Chair, return to the House.

I do not know what amount of time we are talking about, about an hour and a half to two hours, perhaps an hour. But at that point I would expect a statement from this side of the House which would bring the entire House up to date on the latest developments. It would give all of us a chance to caucus and, in the hon. member's case, at least an opportunity to take some time to look at the news and see what has been happening.

It is not our intention in any way to stifle debate, but rather to give everyone an opportunity.

Mr. Kilgour: If that is the only explanation the member can give, I think that this debate can continue. I realize that basically we all have the same knowledge base. People like the member who just spoke so eloquently against the motion should be entitled to go on speaking.

Mr. Cooper: The hon. member was not in the House at, I believe, a few minutes to six.

I want to make sure he understands that unless we pass the motion I have just suggested to the House of Commons, in fact, the debate adjourns tonight at midnight. There would only be that amount of time and the hon. member, himself, would not likely get to participate.

The idea for this motion is to allow us to sit around the clock to make sure that members like himself and other members of this House have an opportunity to express themselves on this very important issue. It is not in any way, to shut down debate, but in fact by not adopting this motion that is what happens.

By the agreement earlier, the House would rise at midnight.

[Translation]

Mr. Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): With all due respect for the hon. member who just spoke, I must tell him that I was not born yesterday.

[English]

The parliamentary secretary is perfectly capable of walking out and bringing in another motion that does exactly the same thing with respect to giving all members a chance to speak—there are many of us on all sides of the House—without the provision that we now have to go back to watch the television sets.

I would respectfully suggest that in the interests of giving everybody a chance to speak, supporting his view of letting him sit around the clock, if we simply continue to have the debate now he can go out and draft another motion that would allow those people who wish to speak to continue speaking for the next hour and a half. Then we have the right to speak after midnight.

On the basis of what I just said, I will not give unanimous consent to allow this to happen.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the hon. member that there is a rather simple solution to his concern.

First, why not agree to the motion to extend the sitting? That means we continue debating from that moment on.

The second part, which we have not yet discussed—I think we should give everybody in this House an opportunity to do so—is whether the House should suspend for a period of time to allow the caucuses to caucus.

That is the second element, and it has nothing to do with the first motion. If the member agrees to the first motion, he will in fact accomplish his goals, and then he can express himself on the second. If he fails to do that, I am afraid what he has done is put us in a position where debate may end at midnight tonight. I do not think anybody on either side of this House wants that.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): If I understand correctly, two motions have been introduced by the parliamentary secretary. Perhaps we might dispose of the first motion.

Does the House agree with the first motion pursuant to which the hours would be extended so the House would sit through the night if hon. members so wish?

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion is adopted.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his co-operation. I now would suggest to the House that we consider, in the light of what has just happened, that we suspend the House for a period of time to the call of the Chair to allow members to caucus, to discuss what has happened and, to give them an opportunity to reflect on it. Then we will come back to the House to continue the debate for whatever period of time we agree to.

I hesitate to put a time limit on it only because I know that cabinet is meeting. I would like to make sure that cabinet has an opportunity to complete the deliberations and report back to the House.

I personally would have no problem saying an hour and a half to two hours, but I simply do not know. I can give hon. members my personal assurance that our intention is not to adjourn the House and forget anything happened, but to give everyone an opportunity to be briefed.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I am following the conversations here quite carefully.

Our difficulty with the proposal before us is that I do not think Canadians watching the deliberations of the House tonight realize we are in a very tight spot.

War has started in the Middle East from the information we have from our TV. I would appreciate it very much if the government would come into the House in the next 15 or 20 minutes and make a statement confirming that fact for us and giving us the government's information as to what the situation is with regard to the 7.30, 7.45 or 8 p.m. situation in the Middle East at this time.

• (1930)

After that we will want to caucus with our members individually, collectively in our various caucuses, at which time we could suspend the House after the statement and come back later on for the debate. I do think it is very important, that the House be given the information officially from the government, not from CNN, not from the TV, but from the government. The world is struck with a very difficult situation called war and this House will have to deal with that situation.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, simply I want to add my voice of support to the point just made by my hon. friend, the House leader of the Official Opposition. We are obviously at a very crucial moment.

We have also agreed to no dilatory motions, no quorum calls, in other words, virtually everyone from the House can go out and watch television to get an update on the proceedings or discuss with their caucus members without at this point adjourning. My suggestion is that we simply continue on and for those people who want to become updated as information becomes available, they will have an opportunity but we should not adjourn the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Saint-Denis on a point of order.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, there are times in life when one must have a very clear and very cold mind. This is one such occasion. I did not consult any of the leaders—but the government is meeting now to discuss the situation. If it is not doing so, it should, immediately.

[English]

It is a proposal that I think could meet all of the difficult times we are going through together.

It would seem to me more logical to allow the cabinet to meet, to ask the Prime Minister to come to the House and make a statement, and to suspend the House again, so that caucuses could meet for difficult discussions. Then fix an exact time, and I leave that to the Whips of each party to decide under the direction of the leadership of their party, to come back. But I cannot understand why, at this very unbelievable time in the life of the Parliament of Canada, members would keep talking while we should bow silently, suspend the House, agree that the Prime Minister could come back here at a certain hour, make a statement, suspend the House, and then come back for discussion.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Saint-Denis, but I draw the attention of the House to the fact that we ought not to launch a debate. The parliamentary secretary has asked for unanimous consent. I agree that a number of members should be allowed to express their views, and again I recognize the parliamentary secretary.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I have heard the sentiments of the House and I think at the present time that it would be wise that we just continue with the debate. If the need arises we can revisit this question at a later point.

Mr. Prud'homme: And you know that I tried to get above partisanship.

I would like every colleague, the Canadian people and every colleague to watch what is going on. It is not enough for me as a responsible Member of Parliament to know that we can go on debating without knowing exactly at a certain time. Surely, the leadership of this Parliament, the leadership includes you, Monsieur, each of the parties and the Independent members, has to know. Can we not agree, in a cool fashion, because at this hour it is not time for emotion?

It is time for cool minds to prevail and to know at what time if possible we could be informed if the Prime Minister, my Prime Minister—because at this hour he is my Prime Minister—can come back and make a statement. Then we would debate with each other. Then we would come back and take our responsibility. I think it makes sense.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think the messages got through on both sides. There seems to be agreement to continue the debate. After the intervention of the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, we are now at the questions and comments period.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a comment. Perhaps the time I take to make this comment will be sufficient to enable some members to obtain more information and convey it to the House.

[English]

I heard and listened with tremendous attention to the speech made moments ago by a colleague, the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands. I want to congratulate her on her speech.

I would like to say that I share very much some of the concerns she has expressed. Many of the things she has said I agree with.

Perhaps what I want to say more than anything else is that I hope she is wrong, and I am wrong, because of the events that have occurred over the last few minutes.

It could very well be—as a matter of fact I understand it has now been confirmed by the White House—that the military intervention, call it for what it is, that war has begun. The very grim picture of that war that has been described by members so eloquently earlier on is in many ways an eventual situation that I also foresee as possible.

I want to reiterate how wrong I hope we both are in this view, not because politicians usually like to be wrong but, more important, because the lives of so many people are at stake and because those hostilities, that war has begun.

This is not really a question, but I would like to make a comment to which our colleague may add a further comment. I still believe this action that has been initiated was not the proper one, but that should not in any way be mistaken or misinterpreted to suggest that if our troops are in a war situation I would not support them.

This does not mean that I like them being there because I do not.

Hopefully within the next few minutes someone from the government side will be able to brief this House on the current situation.

I think you will appreciate that almost anything we say at this point without that briefing is academic. The question is no longer. Are we or are we not in favour of military action, if the action has already been authorized moments ago by this government? I hope that is not the case but, if it is, the debate will have to change.

I am very saddened about what has happened in the last few minutes and perhaps all Canadians over the next few minutes and hours should pray that at the very least the hostilities will be short-lived, if they are in fact occurring as we believe they are, and that as few human lives as possible will be lost in that process.

• (1940)

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am saddened that presumably war has started in the Persian Gulf. We knew when we started this special session of the House of Commons that every Canadian in the country is familiar with the burden that the Canadian nation is faced with.

My leader, when he spoke on debate on this motion to persuade the government not to declare war, said that the "threat of death hangs over the Middle East and its people". Now that war has started, as reported, that fear is becoming even more real.

I am not a military expert but I have some idea what war can do to a human body. The human body is not made of steel or shatterproof glass or armour. It is living and fragile. I ask: How will the bodies of our young soldiers survive an attack of poison gas? Sources say our troops do not have enough protection and I hope that is wrong because, in the event of use of poison gas only a gas mask intervenes between the life of our Canadian soldier and death. The skin will be penetrated by this gas. I am truly saddened, and although I have prepared a series of arguments to convince this government not to go to war, I would like to end on a note of extreme sorrow. I share the sorrow of all Canadians that we have not been able to prevent the onset of war.

I am reminded of the great right hon. Lester Pearson who orchestrated peace at the Suez Canal in 1957. In accepting the Nobel Peace Prize he said: "The grim fact is that we prepare for war like precocious giants and for peace like retarded pygmies."

I am really saddened and I hope the devastation of war that I fear shall not come to pass.

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, to conclude this question and comment period, I would like to respond. I think that it is important to note the obvious: that bombs do not distinguish between Canadians, Iraqis, Kuwaitis or Americans. They do not distinguish nationalities. They also do not distinguish between soldiers and civilians. They do not distinguish between adults and children.

This is a terrible day for the world.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, we obviously are at a very precarious moment in the history of Canada right now. Although I certainly had my remarks prepared long before my time was due to speak, right now we must be aware of what we have seen on TV in the preceding 20 minutes or half-hour or so.

This truly is the most difficult moment in my entire life. I was born long after World War II ended. As a Canadian citizen right now seeing what is happening in our country, it is truly devastating and very frightening.

I certainly believe that all Canadians are in agreement with the world-wide condemnation of the unprovoked and unjustified invasion and subsequent annexation of Kuwait by Iraq. I think it is important that Canadians acknowledge and recognize that we support the United Nations Security Council and its objective of ensuring that Kuwait is re-established and that Iraqi troops are removed from it. It is necessary to assess adequately and exactly what requirements and sacrifices Canadians will be called upon to make in order to meet these objectives. I will just put a P.S. on my remarks here. We in fact are in that conflict right now. I think that all of us in this House need rise above any partisan interests we may have and say, are, regardless of what our feelings are about this issue, and all of us have deeply held and very strong views about it—that we must band together and not pay any attention at this point, to what political party we belong or what our persuasion is. We are Canadian citizens. We know that this has in fact begun. We must stand together and say: "We are Canadians and we must abide by what is going on right now, whether we like it or not".

It is important that beyond the principle that Kuwait should be sovereign we as Canadians certainly are aware of what are these options to achieve Kuwait sovereignty. On the cost of these options, certainly we have to ask the question whether they are economic or military. I dare say that they are a combination of both.

Unfortunately, again, because of recent developments, we are speaking in the middle of this incident as it is in fact unfolding. We are aware, world-wide, that Saddam Hussein has not been influenced in any way to comply with the UN resolutions to leave Kuwait peacefully. Of course the main tool to date has been economic sanctions. Many will say that those sanctions have not had a chance to work.

Those of us who have been following the news hour by hour in these last several days, have seen Saddam Hussein and his entire Iraqi Parliament standing up and chanting: "With our blood and with our souls, we will die for this cause and go to death for Saddam". We are seeing the painful results of that tonight as we are participating in this debate at this very moment.

All of us would have wished that this would have resolved itself peacefully. Obviously nobody has wanted to or would continue to want to resort to force. But again, as I have thought about this personally and politically over the last few days, the question begged to be asked: How long do we keep economic sanctions going and when would we ever have broken Saddam Hussein? He acknowledged right up to the end, until we are in this position right now, that he would not back down and that he would carry on.

There is the question about sanctions: What good have they done? What have been the costs of the economic sanctions? There certainly have been painful repercussions for Kuwaitis because they have been occupied for some five months now. There has also been the cost upon those nations which are enforcing the sanctions. We in Canada have felt the effects of it as well, as we saw budget cutbacks of government spending of about $350 million some weeks ago.

Turkey has been facing $3 billion worth of direct assistance taken away. I read in a magazine recently that it has cancelled tourist bookings and is facing incredible problems because of the sanctions it has tried to impose and keep up with.

Jordan, of course, is in a very tenuous position right now as it is basically a supporter basically of the allied nations but is very frightened about what is happening in fact now, as we look at the clock at 7.50 p.m. on this night some eight hours ahead of us in the gulf.

I said again just a few minutes ago that we all would have wished this would have resolved itself in the most peaceful manner. In fact now that we have begun, we look forward to this being resolved with the least human cost possible.

I want to say as a Canadian citizen and as the member of Parliament who represents the riding of Beaver River in which we have two air force bases, CFB Edmonton at Namao as well as CFB Cold Lake, one hour north of my house where we deployed the CF-18s from, that we are very concerned about this. In fact, my neighbours are family members of those who have left CFB Cold Lake and are on active service now in the gulf. Many people in this House will have people for whom they feel directly responsible in terms of family members, friends, as well as members of Parliament, as this is the only place in this whole land that represents every square mile of this country. All of us in this Parliament of Canada will be touched in one way or another by this war which is now taking place.

There is no doubt in my mind as the member for Parliament for Beaver River representing these air force bases, that those people who are serving in the armed forces right now, all of whom are volunteers, joined the forces because they were proud to do so. They will do their duty and they will obey their orders regardless. They will do what they are told to do no matter what process is followed. Unfortunately, it does little to enhance democracy and broaden public support when these decisions are made perhaps after the fact.

No one in the House tonight should get into any kind of partisan wrangling, which I mentioned earlier, and say what the government should have done or what we thought should have happened. We are at this point in our history, and in fact it has begun. We need to move forward now and say this is the position we are in, but nonetheless we have to ask those questions. I daresay we will be asking them of ourselves for years to come.

Military force is always a last resort after all other reasonable alternatives have been explored. Again, my remarks were prepared earlier. They are out of date because they were written only a few hours ago. We have crossed that boundary now in the world. The right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra earlier today said we are global citizens and we have now crossed that boundary and we are involved.

Let me just say in wrapping up my remarks that I believe at this point there is really very little that we actually can say in terms of what we should have done, could have done, or might have done. I have said that we have crossed that threshold. Whatever the motives are, or were, for this war, we could be critical and say it was just oil. We could also be critical as global citizens and say that we as human beings lust for money and power. I think that is a world-wide characteristic of the human condition.

Let us put that aside and say yes, perhaps oil was a factor. I daresay it was not the only factor, but certainly a factor that all of us have to agree, whether we like it or not, is a part of our life. If I may get really personal for a moment, I know how much gas I use, because my riding is 28,000 square kilometres and I am one of those people who uses a great amount of petroleum products. I appreciate that, because it enables me to travel the length and breadth of my constituency and get together with people.

The United Nations Security Council, as we are watching it now, is doing something that we have not seen happen for a very long time. We are seeing countries coming together, Russia and the United States for instance, where even a year ago or a year and a half ago such a thing would never have happened.

One year ago in this House we all celebrated the breakdown of the Berlin wall. What an exciting moment that was for us as Canadians as well as members of Parliament, to celebrate that freedom. No sooner do we turn around than we are facing another enemy in a different place. The people of Kuwait, the people of Iraq, in fact those forces that are now participating in the gulf are going to pay a cost, and I have to ask myself the question: Will it be worth it? Can we let these people go on unchecked? Earlier I mentioned briefly about the human condition. I think that analogy shows us it is, very difficult to assume that the world will get along as friends forever. Let us work toward world peace. Let us work together as global citizens to try to achieve those ends.

My final comment is to the people in this House whom I have come to respect as colleagues and many as friends. I am in a particularly unique position in this House because I sit independently as the only member of the Reform Party. As I alluded to earlier, we are Canadian citizens and we must band together as members of a country that is part of the UN. As hon. members speak tonight, I would encourage each and every one of them to be as non-partisan as possible and to remember the fact that we are not just facing each other on opposite sides of an aisle. We have a responsibility to our country and whether we like it or not that is our responsibility. No matter what position each of us takes, personally and politically, let us rise above that and be considered to be that nation which is peace loving and peacekeeping.

I would hope and pray for the safe return of all Canadian and UN forces and for a quick resolution of this situation. I would ask each and every one of us to search our hearts tonight, to respect each other, to respect all Canadian citizens and certainly the UN and to be very grateful for what the UN has stood for. I hope that we would support what is happening now and pray that we would have a speedy resolution to this, and that we will be able to look at and learn from the lessons this painful war has taught.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, this is truly a sombre moment in the highest court in the land, the Parliament of Canada. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the eloquence of my colleague, the hon. member for Beaver River. I commend her on her comments about the members of the Canadian Armed Forces who serve so proudly from her riding.

I think it is important at this point in time that all members in this place, and Canadians who must feel somewhat apprehensive as they watch what is unfolding, remember something. I want them to remember the tens of thousands of men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces who have served this country so proudly in times of peace and now in what appears to be a time of war.

I am very lucky because I probably have one of the largest military constituencies in the country. We have a strong naval tradition in the riding of Dartmouth. I know the type of anxiety that has been felt up to this point by the families, the children, the friends and the neighbours of those men and women who are serving in the Canadian Armed Forces in the Persian Gulf. I cannot imagine that emotion that they are feeling right now, the feeling of helplessness, as they wait to see what is happening to their loved ones.

I think if there is anything important for Canadians who are watching now it is to remember, especially in my riding of Dartmouth. I hope that there are a lot watching. Look down your street and you are going to find a family of one of those people because there are about 600 of them. Look around your neighbourhood and offer support and compassion to those men and women and their families because they desperately need it tonight.

I am going to be selfish, Mr. Speaker. To my constituents in the riding of Dartmouth who believe very strongly in the role of the Canadian military in our riding, in our economy and in our country—and it is the same for the member for Beaver River—I urge those Canadians in this time of uncertainty, fear and anguish to reach out and to touch those families and to tell them, as best you can, that you care and that you understand what they are going through. But, most of all, give your support because the members of the Canadian Armed Forces are doing a great job for the people of Canada. The least we can do at this time of uncertainty is to give them the support that they deserve.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to second the comments of my colleague for Dartmouth. I also want to compliment the member for Beaver River on her remarks.

I think many of us came to this House tonight prepared for speeches, knowing that hope springs eternally for peace. There were members of my riding who came in as late as today from petitioning in church with hundreds of names signed. There were many others from the riding. None of us here in this House can really have the full sense of appreciation or imagination that is required to get the real feeling of what is going on right now.

Three years ago I spent half a summer in Riyadh and Kuwait. I spent three weeks in Kuwait. I have many friends there right now. I cannot imagine how they are feeling at this moment, but I think that the point the member for Beaver River made is that we are now global citizens and we as Canadians must all work together and hope that peace will return soon.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say my appreciation to my friend and colleague from Broadview—Greenwood who was very instrumental in making me feel comfortable in this place when I came down here as a bit of a loner.

I recall that we were part of the left-handed corner in the House. I would just like to say now that he has moved down to the other end of the House that I miss his support and his input.

I would like to affirm what these two members have said in terms of what we are now in. We do not have any option any more. Regardless of whether people thought they should be there or should not be there, it does not matter now. It is immaterial.

Let us stand behind these forces. Those people whom we see who have no experience in sending their husbands away to war. Young wives, my age, with young children, have no experience to draw on, about letting their husbands go away in an F-18, which is dangerous enough at best, on routine flights over northern Canada and CFB Cold Lake. We are in this now. The arguments that led up to it are irrelevant.

As I mentioned earlier, we must look forward and ask what will happen once this over. Let us pray that it is over quickly.

My friend talked about us being global citizens. Kuwait has not been a democratic nation. Kuwait needs to have democracy.

I would just like to put on the record that I believe, as a Canadian citizen, that once this war is over we should put pressure and encouragement on the United Nations for Kuwait to have a United Nations' sponsored and supervised elections, democratically held elections, and that we see it move from a non-democratic state toward democracy as we have seen all across eastern Europe in this last year and a half.

Let me recommend to my colleagues here and anybody watching from the galleries or across Canada: let us not be complacent, as I believe we Canadians have been for so long. Let us not be complacent and assume that things are going well all across the world. Let this be an example that we must be careful. We must initiate and pursue peace always and not just assume that it is going to happen without us putting all our energy toward those ends.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I find it my duty to bring some news to this House which I learned from my home. As we speak, right now, Turkey has proceeded with three submarines against Cyprus. They have landed four divisions on the island and have four frigates offshore.

Mr. Speaker, that was heard live from Greece and if that continues, Greece and Turkey could be drawn into a war and we could be in for a global conflict.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I shall continue in this debate.

On August 2 Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait. That was when the war began—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to make a very brief statement if I might.

I want to confirm that after the failure of diplomacy an attack on Iraq began tonight. In accordance with discussions and extensive consultations that occurred over the last several months, the Prime Minister of Canada was informed by the President of the United States, before the Americans began their action of the American intentions.

The cabinet is meeting momentarily to discuss the situation. The Prime Minister of Canada will be in this House later tonight after that meeting to report to the House of Commons.

[Translation]

I would like to say a few words in French. I can confirm that an attack has begun against Iraq. The Prime Minister was informed before the attack by the president of the United States. The Canadian cabinet will meet a few minutes from now, and the Prime Minister intends to be here to address the House of Commons after the cabinet meeting.

[English]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that reason must prevail. We must have cool heads. It makes so much sense to me, and as I said personally to my friend, the hon. member of Edmonton Southeast, it would make so much more sense if we at this time adjourned the House, suspended the House, until a time when our Prime Minister would come and speak to the House. Then, again, suspend the House so that caucus could meet.

I do not know what the Prime Minister is going to say but we would at least like to have intelligent discussion with our colleagues from each party as to continued debate on this matter.

It would seem to be so logical to suspend the sitting of the House, get an indication as to what time the Prime Minister of Canada will come to the House and speak, then suspend again until an agreed-to time. The Whips and House leaders are here to discuss the matter and decide if we should come back to the House, and then decide the kind of speeches we might make.

I humbly say that on this occasion—

• (2010)

I submit, with respect, that in the circumstances this is the best and most intelligent way to proceed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): If I am not mistaken, and for the benefit of those who are listening, we seem to be reverting to the motion tabled earlier by the parliamentary secretary, namely that the House be allowed to suspend its business with unanimous consent. The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. Kilgour (Edmonton—Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the hon. member just said. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has already made the announcement, and if the Prime Minister has something to add, I think it is very important that we should hear it.

I was told earlier that all caucuses are now meeting to discuss what may be the most important question we have ever debated in our lives. Although I think the debate can go on, I respect the opinions of members on both sides of the House. Since I am the only independent member present at this moment, except for my hon. colleague who will probably have a few words to add, I am quite prepared to accept the motion moved by my hon. friend.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate that we as members on the government side had agreed to this earlier. In fact we encouraged it.

We want to suggest that probably what we should do is suspend the House to the call of the Chair, with a 15-minute bell to make sure that members have an opportunity to be alerted of the House coming back.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, we agree, but we would like to have some indication as to approximately what time. I was told ten o'clock earlier this day. I was wondering if it could be confirmed that it would be around ten o'clock.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm to the House that it would be our intention to come back at approximately ten o'clock. I hope the House will forgive me using the word "approximately". Since cabinet is meeting, I have to have some allowances. Certainly it is our intention to come back around ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The sitting of the House will therefore be suspended until around 10 p.m. The bells will ring for 15 minutes to announce that the sitting has resumed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 8.13 p.m.

[English]

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 10.10 p.m.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will know that military action began in the Persian Gulf today, as announced at 7 p.m. Eastern Standard Time.

President Bush called me beforehand to apprise me that he had authorized such action. We understand at the moment that the participants of this first wave included forces from the United States, the United Kingdom, Saudi Arabia, and Kuwait.

The fighting is a direct consequence of Saddam Hussein's determination to maintain his brutal occupation and his illegal annexation of Kuwait in defiance of world opinion. He has chosen to ignore the numerous opportunities that were open to him to withdraw. He has had 167 days since his illegal and brutal invasion of Kuwait on August 2, and 48 full days since the United Nations Security Council passed resolution 678 on November 29.

In all of that time, with all of the requests, with all of the appeals from leaders around the world, his answer has been no. Resolution 678 provided a pause for peace and gave Saddam Hussein one final opportunity to comply with the will of the world community, as duly expressed through the United Nations. He refused again and again to take that opportunity. Diplomacy has been given every chance to end this conflict peacefully, but regrettably has failed in the face of Saddam Hussein's intransigence. That same intransigence and his indifference to the suffering of his own people, especially the children, made it clear that sanctions alone were not going to force him to leave Kuwait.

There has not been a single iota of interest on his part in complying with the United Nations directives. The time has regrettably come therefore to act in the interests of preserving world order and in safeguarding the effectiveness of the United Nations. A failure by the world community to act would have undermined the United Nations, turned a blind eye to naked aggression, condoned violations of international law and encouraged other potential aggressors to defy world opinion in the pursuit of their own criminal ambitions. If Canada had stood aside, we would have betrayed our own national interests, repudiated our own responsibilities and dishonoured our own traditions.

Canada did not stand aside in two world wars and Korea. Canada, and in particular the Secretary of State for External Affairs, did not stand aside from the hard work of seeking a peaceful end to the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait and, Mr. Speaker, Canada is not standing aside tonight from giving effect to the United Nations resolutions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: We have joined with other UN members in expelling Saddam Hussein from Kuwait by force. At this moment our CF–18s are flying combat air patrol in the northern Persian Gulf, protecting Canadian and allied ships and personnel in the gulf and the Arabian Peninsula. Canadian ships are now engaged in the company of others, in playing a vital role in assuring the support of the seaborn arm of the coalition in the Persian Gulf.

Earlier this evening, the cabinet met and gave the Chief of the Defence Staff, General de Chastelain, authority for the Canadian forces to carry out sweep and escort missions over Kuwait and Iraq, if necessary and appropriate. All Canadian forces in the gulf will nevertheless remain under Canadian command.

I profoundly regret, as I am sure, do all members of this House, that it has come to this. It is with no satisfaction that we take up arms, because war is always a tragedy, but the greater tragedy would have been for criminal aggression to go unchecked.

I am sure that the safety of the Canadian service men and women in the gulf is uppermost in the minds of all members. Our hearts go out tonight to those families with loved ones, fathers or mothers, sons and daughters, and brothers and sisters, on duty in the Persian Gulf. These courageous men and women are braving great danger in the defence of the values and the interests of their entire country. They have our gratitude and our respect, and especially tonight, our prayers.

Now is the time for all Canadians to put aside their differences and rally to their support. I am sure that all hon. members join me and all Canadians in praying that this war will end quickly and that all Canadians will welcome home our brave fellow citizens who defend freedom and the cause of peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I rise in the House of Commons tonight, my heart is filled with a deep sense of foreboding. Like every Canadian, like the mothers and fathers of those men and women representing us in the Persian Gulf, I am worried. I had hoped that it would not come to this.

[Translation]

This evening, Canada is at war. Operation Desert Storm has begun. This evening, Canada is anxiously following the course of events in the Middle East. Canadian men and women are watching their TV sets, hoping the missiles will spare their families and friends.

[English]

While I am Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Liberal Party, I am also a father and a grandfather and, like the millions of Canadians now sitting clustered around their televisions and radios, I am trying to come to terms with all of this. Tonight, diplomacy and negotiations have given way to bullets and bombs and I am sad about that. But, as the Prime Minister said, I hope that this will be reversed very quickly. As all Canadians who have followed this crisis know, the Liberal Party has urged the government not to go to war. We urged the government to allow more time for the sanctions to work before putting the lives of thousands of Canadian troops at risk.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, diplomacy and negotiations have given way to armed intervention, and I regret this deeply. The Liberal Party has always been opposed to war. No one likes war and no one likes to go to war. All we can hope now is that Iraq will withdraw its troops from Kuwait and that there will be as few victims as possible. The war must not be allowed to go on forever.

On behalf of the families and relatives of our Canadian soldiers, those men and women who perform their duties so bravely and valiantly, we can only hope that this war will be a short one. The price of war is always far too high.

[English]

We regret that our request that a search be made for a peaceful solution has fallen on deaf ears but, at the same time, we will support the efforts of our men and women in the Persian Gulf. We are at war, but all of us have to make sure that we are not losing the Canadian ambition, our historic quest for peace. We hope that this war will be short. We hope that all efforts will be made to find avenues to have a cease-fire quickly, in order to make sure that not many men and women lose their lives in that process. We hope that this operation will be successful; we do not think it was necessary. Let us all hope and pray together that it will be short and that those valiant Canadians who are there will be able to come back to their families, as the Prime Minister has said, in good health.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I want to ask the Prime Minister and his cabinet to do everything in their power to restore peace in the Middle East as soon as possible. As we have said before, it is sometimes much more difficult to end a war than to start it. We hope that we will have peace again very soon, because we sincerely believed a few months ago that a new international order had been established.

• (2230)

The cold war being over, we felt that it would be possible to find peaceful solutions to world problems and now we find to our dismay that a real war can start so quickly.

We are all Canadians and we must support our brothers and sisters fighting for peace. I rise tonight to say that all Canadians have the obligation to stand united under such circumstances.

[English]

As Canadians, we have differences. I said that it was not the right way, but we are at war and we have to be united because Canadians are fighting right now. I hope that none go down in fighting. We have to back them up.

It is a different way than the way we would have chosen, but they are fighting for peace. We hope that they will be very successful in a very short order.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, our first thought tonight, like all Canadians I am sure, is for the men and women who are in the Middle East and the families of those men and women.

It is surely, whatever one's opinion is, a great tragedy for Canada and for those people. It does not in any way undermine the fact that they are there, that war has become a reality and that our thoughts and prayers are with them.

[Translation]

My party and I are proud of the contribution made by Canadian men and women in the Middle East to enforce the sanctions against Saddam Hussein and Iraq. Tonight, our thoughts first of all go to them and their families.

Now a state of war exists. It demonstrates the full extent of our failure as politicians. The world has gone mad. We should not share Saddam Hussein's folly. One does not fight madness with madness.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, we agree that Saddam Hussein must be stopped. The new world order under which we thought we could thrive is being jeopardized by a tragic war. This is our first test since the last world war and we have failed miserably.

[English]

When I say "us", I do not just mean anyone in this House or any particular world leader, but as a world community. I think we can all agree that this is a failure.

It has been said that sometimes the first casualty of war is the truth. I have to say this with honesty, and perhaps others may share this feeling.

It is a feeling of betrayal for those of us who had hoped that economic sanctions would be given a chance, that there would be a true commitment by all world leaders, that all diplomatic efforts would be tried, and that war would be considered only as the last resort after all of these measures had been exhausted.

I have said it in other debates, Mr. Speaker, so I will not repeat it here, but we do not, as a party, agree that all those efforts were exhausted before this measure was taken—but, there is a war.

Today, in fact, our party unanimously supported an amendment to say that we should not participate in an offensive action against Iraq and we maintain that position.

I still believe that rather than saying Canadians should step aside, we should see what role we can really play—a role that would leave open the options not to not participate, but to participate in a meaningful way. Canada is a compassionate nation. We should exercise that compassion through our humanitarian work, through the kind of work that we see as being most useful to further the peace effort.

It is not a question of abdicating responsibility. It is a question of taking that responsibility in the most useful way possible, in the way that would lead to peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: I share the comments of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition that we support our troops who are there. Of course we do. Of course our hearts are with those troops. Of course we feel that they are in danger and that we want to see the best for them. We want them to return home.

We hope the predictions that have been made about a long war will not be true. We would be quite happy to be proven wrong in this event.

The question is: how best do we support those troops? I would have to say, that in my view, the party's view, we support those troops by making sure that they are employed in actions that will truly show that Canada, as a compassionate nation, is prepared to participate, not within the theatre of war, but rather in a compassionate and humanitarian role for both civilians and non-civilians.

That is not non-participation, just as participating in economic sanctions was not non-participation. Let us be realistic that that view will not prevail. But I want to state clearly that that is our view.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: I wish to speak directly to those men and women, those young people whose lives are so directly affected by this from coast to coast to coast. I speak to those people who have spoken out about their concerns of a war, about Canada entering into a war and I say that you have not been defeated in your views tonight. I am sure that everyone in this House will work to bring about as quick a peace as is possible. But you must continue to express your views as all Canadians must, to give politicians the directions that we too need to reflect the best interest of Canada.

I say to these groups and individuals: we are with you. The New Democratic Party will continue to speak out against the madness of war.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, the choices have been made. They are not our choices. We will, each of us, live with the results of those choices. Each of us have taken, in our view, the most responsible position. We do not accuse those who disagree with us and we refuse to engage in debates about who has the greatest degree of morality.

• (2240)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Our disagreement is with the government's position. It is most assuredly not with the Canadian forces. We will be judged by history, but I want to assure Canadians and to assure this House that we will remain committed to a new world order, a genuinely new world order, and a new vision of a world in which war is no longer contemplated, a world of peace.

On the eve of war this may sound naive. This does not mean that Canada in any way abdicates its responsibility, but rather that Canada and the New Democratic Party will work for peace and international peace, to take our responsibilities seriously. We will not abandon the Canadian men and women in the Middle East. We will not engage in debates that are simply about who is right, but we will pursue that international vision based on a new world order, a new way to do things. We are committed to that.

In conclusion, I would simply like to say that I think everyone in Canada tonight is aware of the difficulty of this evening for everyone who must make decisions and those in particular who must bear the responsibility of our decisions. I say that our hearts are with them, our hearts are with their families. We, too, will work with the government, with the Opposition, with any country, with any group to search for peace as soon as possible.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I had begun my comments just before the House suspended and we are now, I assume, continuing debate. With your guidance, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I apologize to the House but I do think that most of us feel this moment to be one of momentous importance for the world and for Canadians in general.

We do not want at this time to engage in partisan debate on the motion before the House. I think the situation is very serious and we would like to have time to gather our thoughts, to really get the facts, come back to the House in due course and debate this very important situation tomorrow.

This for us is a momentous moment and I would ask the government to please adjourn the House which would give us a chance to get our facts together.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I understand the feelings of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, but I too would like to have an opportunity this evening to respond to the speeches of the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party to say that, whether we like it or not, we are all at war regardless of our political affiliations. Our differences and nuances are theoretical and our alternatives are hypothetical.

In these times of great sadness I believe we all hope that the hostilities will end soon. We all hope that our sons and daughters, with the Iraqi civilians, will be able to avoid as many casualties as possible. We hope this war will not be for revenge but rather for the supremacy of international law. This evening we pray for all the men and women who are involved in this sad tragedy.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Before I hear any further points of order—and I will certainly hear the hon. leader of the government—I remind hon. members that we are bound by the rules here.

This is an extraordinary day. Perhaps hon. members will want to deal with the situation in their own way. However, what I am dealing with now is a suggestion made by the hon. member for Ottawa–Vanier. The House leader of the Government wishes to have the floor.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, certainly the circumstances this evening have changed substantially, to put it mildly. The rules we had put in place and the special orders and so on may well have caused us to reconsider the procedures. There are of course not just the major parties but the Independents and people's desire to speak. I suggest to the House leader of the opposition Party and to the Leader of the New Democratic Party and other members that perhaps we can commence the continuation of the debate, use that time during the first speaker to discuss between ourselves and reach an accommodation that would allow us to meet.

Mr. Speaker I wonder if hon. members, keeping in mind what is taking place today, would give the House leader of the government a chance to respond fully.

Mr. Andre: I was suggesting this procedure as a result of not just the official parties but the Independents. Certainly, if you were to put the question and there was to be agreement, we would have no opposition.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I can certainly say that on behalf of the New Democratic Party we think that to proceed now with the debate would be not only inappropriate, but almost bizarre. I would like to suggest that we seek unanimous consent of the House to terminate the debates for tonight. The House leaders can meet early in the morning to decide on the process for the next day, but I suspect that to proceed now would be totally inappropriate.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I do agree with the suggestion of the House leader of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Speaker: There seems to be agreement. I notice some of the other members are nodding in the direction of the Chair. It is so ordered.

Accordingly the House is adjourned until 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The House adjourned at 10.47 p.m.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to several petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

REQUEST FOR BRIEFINGS

Mr. Speaker: Statements by ministers.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, seeing no minister rise, I want to clarify a matter with the government House leader. Is it the government's intention that on appropriate days the Minister of National Defence will be making statements to keep the House and the people of Canada apprised of Canada's developments in the Persian Gulf?

It seems this would be an appropriate way, and perhaps the most simple way, to keep Canadians briefed on what is happening.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of National Defence has offered briefings to both parties this morning.

It would be my intention to discuss with the House leader of the New Democratic Party, as well as the opposition House leader, a means by which, on a daily basis, briefings could be held with appropriate representatives as well as to look at some mechanism whereby all members of Parliament could receive daily information on events in the Middle East. Perhaps it would be more appropriate if we had those discussions in private as the morning progresses and we can reach some mutually satisfactory arrangements.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Standing Orders provide that every day a minister may make a statement to the House. I would have thought that the government, considering the seriousness of the situation, would be willing to come and give a summary of the situation, not only for the benefit of the House and its members but also for Canadians. I do not see why we have to sit down and negotiate arrangements beyond that.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, this morning, the Liberal caucus did indeed receive the offer of a briefing on the situation by the Minister of National Defence, to be given at 11.30 a.m. I thought it was possible for all members of my caucus to be there. However, it is impossible, Mr. Speaker, to be there today, since we are here in the House. Could I ask the minister to give us the assurance that every day there will be a minister's statement on the situation, a situation that is so important to us?

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, as we determine the appropriateness of communicating, not only with members of Parliament, as the government House leader has indicated, but also the people of Canada on a regular basis, the suggestion that perhaps a ministerial statement would be one way. There are other ways perhaps as well to apprise Canadians of the situation as it evolves.

These are very tense times, tense also in the House. Since we have arranged briefings for the caucuses later this morning at a time when the House is sitting—in a sense to our surprise—we need an assurance that the government would not produce any dilatory motions or anything that would upset the normal flow of the House while, presumably, the Liberal caucus and the New Democratic caucus are being briefed by a representative of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I certainly have no difficulty at all in giving my assurances. As the debate proceeds, it is solely for the purposes of providing members on all sides, and independent members also, an opportunity to get their views on the record. There will be no dilatory motions or an attempt to take advantage of the fact that membership on the other side may be light because of the briefings that are going on.

• (1110)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, presumably we are going to continue the debate in the House prior to the opposition parties being briefed by the Department of National Defence. Would it not seem more reasonable in terms of an informed debate for us to suspend the sitting for a couple of hours so that—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to make a case for the most informed, intelligent debate possible and that requires information. I realize the government has had an opportunity to be briefed, presumably by the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister. We have not. I am simply making a case to my friends opposite that this is a very critical moment.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: I am taking some offence at the laughter with regard to this proposal, Mr. Speaker. It is a serious suggestion to my hon. friend, the government House leader, that we consider suspending this session for two hours—goodness, what is going to be discussed for the next two hours is not going to be necessarily earth shattering, I suspect—to allow the opposition to be briefed and then commence the debate immediately after Question Period.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, and we have had these discussions in private, I would like to take advantage of this time to provide opportunities for those members, both on our side and independent members, to put their views on the record. Again I repeat, members have my assurance that during that period of time there will be no attempt by anybody on this side of the House to take advantage of limited numbers on the other side with any dilatory motions. That assurance is given.

I think we can proceed and provide this period of time for members who wish to get their views on the record and I would suggest that we proceed in that manner.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I happened to hear that briefing sessions were offered by the Minister of National Defence to two caucuses. Does this mean the sessions were available to all members? I find it hard to understand, considering the fact that it is now 11.10 a.m. and the briefing was supposed to be for 11.30 a.m., why none of us was informed.

Mr. Speaker, all partisanship aside, I think we should realize that there are now a number of independent members in the House, and if co-operation and good will are to exist in a forum that is so faithful to tradition in times of crisis and war, I should hope the government would able to show a little more sensitivity and co-operation.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say to the hon. member that I will certainly discuss with him and with the Minister of National Defence the provision of briefings for all members. That was not the intention. The intention was to have the briefings in a different atmosphere than in the adversarial system we have in the House. In so doing, hon. members could be apprised of all of the information available. This institution, because of its adversarial nature and what have you is frequently not the best place in which we could have those briefings. That was the intent, nothing more than that.

I will talk to the hon. member, and I am sure that arrangements can be made to ensure that he and other independent members who are interested are provided with the same sort of briefing that will be transmitted to the other caucuses.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, with respect, our message is clear: All members of this House are entitled to this information. I fully agree with the hon. member for Shefford that, to obtain that information, we can use a provision of the Standing Orders that allows the minister to come and make a statement.

This morning we asked—it was not offered—for a briefing session by someone in authority in the government, so that we could be informed as government members were informed in caucus. They have information we do not have, Mr. Speaker. It is unfair to have a debate when someone has all the information and others do not.

All we asked was for the sitting to be suspended until 2 p.m, so that Liberal, NDP, independent and other members could obtain the information available. That is not too much to ask, Mr. Speaker, but the answer was no.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, my proposal last night was that we should have these discussions among ourselves prior to suspension. That did not happen because of the request of the opposition that we suspend.

We are now here in session this morning. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, we carry on. We can have the kinds of discussions I offered to have last night with opposition House leaders and anybody else.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway is rising. Given what I am going to say, it may not be necessary for other members to get into this debate. I would ask the attention of the House.

The situation that we are in today is that, as a consequence of consent of all parties—all of it being sought last evening—we adjourned until 11 o'clock today. We are now, according to the rules of this place, in Routine Proceedings. The exchange that has just taken place may well have been helpful but it is certainly unusual at this point in Routine Proceedings.

I am bound by the rules, as are we all, and, in the absence of consent or some kind of arrangement, my obligation is to continue with Routine Proceedings until Routine Proceedings are completed. I want everyone to understand that, unless some arrangement is made for something different to happen, I will call Government Orders and the hon. member for Kitchener will have the floor. Now that is the procedural position that we are in.

Given the fact that there seems to be some disagreement among members as to what we might or might not do, if Routine Proceedings or other things later on today are to be changed, I would ask the co-operation of hon. members to let me proceed with Routine Proceedings.

Members may want to have discussions. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway may very well want to have those discussions, but I must say that there should be some limit now on what is beginning to turn into a debate and getting well beyond a point of order. I will hear the hon. member very briefly.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief.

I wanted to raise a very serious matter that certainly flows from the previous discussion and that is with respect to the right of members of the House to be informed in a serious way about what is happening in this very, very serious war.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member makes a point probably which is agreed to by all other hon. members, but as I said, if I am going to indulge one hon. member, I will have to indulge other hon. members.

I think that it is appropriate now to seek the co-operation of the House and to let me proceed with Routine Proceedings. Members can discuss this matter among themselves. I am not so sure that, at this point, anything is to be gained by negotiating across the floor of the House, at least for a few minutes.

I intend to proceed with Presenting Reports from Inter-parliamentary Delegations.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to committees, if I may, just very briefly.

I have just learned that there is a strong possibility that the commitment that was made earlier for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence to appear before the Standing Committee on External Affairs this afternoon may be denied. Surely, Mr. Speaker, Canadians and members of the House are entitled to be briefed by the Minister—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The chairman of the committee has asked the Chair if he could be recognized to respond to that problem. It might solve the whole thing.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let that go by.

Yes, as chairman, I have asked the opposition critics whether they wish to proceed with this afternoon's meeting. They have said they wish to. I have advised them, and I think it is entirely proper to advise them, that I have been advised by ministers that under the circumstances they may be compelled to be at other places in these circumstances.

I would assume from what was said last night in this House that, if ministers advise us under the circumstances that are before us in this terrible crisis they may have other obligations at a specific moment in time, we would be understanding in this crisis.

Mr. Speaker: I know hon. members will realize that this is not a matter in which the Chair can intervene, at least not at this point.

PETITIONS

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of petitioners who point out that most of the nations involved in the UN coalition are not involved with offensive actions against Iraq or Iraqi forces in Kuwait.

The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to use all its ability possible to encourage the government to not continue to commit Canadian Armed Forces to an offensive action.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to present a petition today signed by a large number of individuals at a peace demonstration in Powell River on the weekend.

The petitioners ask that the Canadian Armed Forces not be involved in the war in Iraq. They point out that the Prime Minister, in committing the armed forces, enjoys the opposition of 88 per cent of Canadians. The majority of Canadians do not want this action undertaken. The government should adhere to the wishes of Canadians and have the troops removed from the theatre.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by several hundred people representing, I am sure, millions of Canadians who are appalled by the action that we are currently engaged in.

The petitioners call for Canada to continue to use its forces to enforce the sanctions which the UN had declared, to declare its absolute commitment to a peaceful resolution of the Middle East conflict, and to oppose any military action against Kuwait.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and obligation to present on behalf of petitioners from the Fraser Valley a petition which calls upon Parliament to implement the results of the equal pay study and end wage discrimination in the federal Public Service.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have to present a petition from a number of Canadians who lay out quite a lengthy list of suggestions. Essentially, they are calling upon Parliament to declare its absolute commitment to a peaceful resolution of the Middle East conflict.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured once again to rise in the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition from the constituents of Kent.

As a last ditch effort, the petitioners humbly pray that the government axes the dastardly GST tax.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

SUPPORT FOR UNITED NATIONS

The House resumed from Wednesday, January 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead):

That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

And on the motion of Mrs. Collins:

That this question be now put.

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, colleagues and fellow Canadians, speaking in a debate on an occasion like this invites obviously some perspective on not only the present with which we are being bombarded with instant communication, but also the past and the future. In the moments given to me I would like to reflect on the past five falls when I have been a member of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations General Assembly in New York.

During those five years I have seen dramatic changes from the intractability of the cold war period, through the gradual move and thawing in relationships, to the point where in the last two years resolutions about world order and world peace have been jointly moved by the Soviet Union and the United States.

Many of us in the House and many working for peace across the country have been dreaming of the day of the new UN. Dreams that were once only that suddenly have come to fruition. We have begun to see the possibility of the UN being a forum for conflict resolution. This has suddenly become a reality.

But this change in the UN has come suddenly, almost overnight. Alvin Toffler, writing almost a decade ago in his book The Third Wave, warned us that we needed new institutions and processes as we moved into the 1990s. He anticipated that in the third millennium our society would need new machinery, a new wave forward.

In my constituency office in Waterloo, from across Waterloo region and across Canada, I have received, just as all members of Parliament have, calls, letters, and delegations from schools and universities. Our young people, particularly those age 13 through to 20, have been showing a tremendous concern about these issues. Their message is that they are disappointed and upset that we do not have the machineries in place and that we are back to using old models of war and violence to settle international disputes. At the University of Waterloo in my riding, in Conrad Grebel College under the Mennonite aegis, the Centre for Peace Studies has been trying to develop models as to how we could move forward.

What are the lessons that we can learn as we pray for a quick end to this conflict, a recovery period, and a resumption of the efforts to bring about an interdependent world community?

Obviously had we had these machineries in place, Canadian troops in the gulf today would have been serving under blue berets and the UN flag. The fact is that the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations has not been instituted. It has rusted out over the last 40 years of east-west confrontation and we have not had machinery in place.

The fact is that the force in the gulf, while American led, is under UN mandate. There was no other machinery there present in order to follow up the UN will. The United Nations itself does not have a capacity to mount a force. And so there never was a realistic expectation that the UN could have responded to the invasion of Kuwait without designating a lead role to one of its member states.

• (1130)

The tragic events that we are now witnessing remind us that we know how to make war, but we do not know how to make peace. We have very few models for peacemaking. Canada has led in peacekeeping, but peacemaking is a new art, and one that surely calls to all of us in the light of the present situation.

The lesson of this crisis is the need for new mechanisms, possibly the establishment of a permanent UN force. Sir Brian Urquhart, the former Under Secretary General of the United Nations says that the lessons of the gulf war call for, first of all, the development of a military staff committee to respond to expected emergencies and, second, an emergency fund large enough to support immediate protective or peacekeeping efforts.

These are the kinds of initiatives, surely, that Canada will want to be looking at seriously as we seek a cease-fire and an end to hostilities in the gulf and a move to new models.

Today, as we meet here in the House of Commons in Ottawa, and as the world's attention is riveted to the gulf, at the United Nations in New York, delegates representing 118 nations are debating proposals to convert the existing partial test ban treaty into a comprehensive test ban treaty.

The partial test ban treaty was signed in 1963 by American President Kennedy and Soviet Premier Khruschev. As members will know, this bans all nuclear weapons testing in the atmosphere, in outer space and underwater, but not underground.

Parliamentarians from all parties in this House and from 38 legislatures around the world, in an organization Parliamentarians for Global Action, have been playing a substantial role in encouraging the convening of the UN conference. For two weeks now delegations have been in New York. Despite the lessons and the threat of nuclear capacity, chemical and biological weapons, on the part of Iraq, this conference seems only likely to agree that it may meet again some time in the future.

In light of Canada's support for the UN and the effort under way now, the evident need for constructive multilateral dialogue and collective security, and the development of the chemical, biological and possibly nuclear weapons by Iraq, it is appropriate and hopeful that the UN is gathered, seeking to move an end to nuclear testing.

So, in the House today, I ask, as we seek peace in the gulf, why is Canada prepared to vote not only against the amendment clause calling for a comprehensive test ban treaty, but against efforts to bring the nations back again to try next year to move the conference forward? I have asked both privately and publicly that the secretary of state review the instructions he sent to our Canadian delegation at New York and invite them to take a constructive effort to end the nuclear threat. Surely the lessons of Iraq are evidence of the need for Canadian leadership in this area.

Let me raise one other issue that is in the hearts of many Canadians, particularly from our multicultural communities which have their relatives in Third World countries. One of the very dramatic, and yet downplayed, elements of this crisis has been the impact on the so-called Third World. We have seen the floods of refugees, but we have not seen as visibly the effect on the economies of already debt-ridden countries. On behalf of the House, I have had the opportunity to chair a subcommittee which has reported to our external affairs committee on the debt crisis. We have tried to underline, in an all-party report, the urgency of the situation.

This report was tabled before the gulf crisis, before the standing committee heard from President Mugabe of Zimbabwe about the effect of the crisis on his people and before the Interagency United Nations Committee on African Recovery met in Ottawa last month, reporting that those economies, already bankrupt, are suffering in terms of all of the basic services such as health care and education. In a country concerned about AIDS, the epidemic of AIDS across Africa continues to move dramatically because governments are without any capacity to offer services or help. These developing countries now have a debt that exceeds $1.3 trillion and the indebtedness of these countries threatens all countries.

In conclusion, I would like to make three proposals for those of us who wish to work for peace now in the gulf and for peace in the future. I propose that Canada convene a high-level political conference to look at what mechanisms should be put in place to permit the UN to act more effectively. This conference should relaunch "the spirit of San Francisco", the lofty idealism of the framers of the UN charter. Second, I call upon our government to vote for the comprehensive test ban this week in New York. Third, I urge the government, in the light of the human cost to women and children and others in the Third World, that as we prepare our budget, we maintain CIDA's budget, our development assistance to those least able to help themselves.

Hopefully, out of this agonizing time we can advance concrete proposals for both strengthening the United Nations, to which we are all committed, and world peace.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Waterloo for his speech because it reflects, I know, much more than five years of work that he has been doing in these matters for peace and for disarmament for the countries which are burdened with what we call the Third World debt and for aid to the needy.

I fully support the question that he has launched in this House as to why Canada opposes an amendment to the partial test ban agreement that would convert it into a comprehensive test ban agreement. I agree with him that had we got such a comprehensive test ban agreement before, at least the present dreadful situation in the gulf would be a little less dreadful.

I would like to ask him what he thinks about the situation in the gulf where it is reported that more than 1,000 nuclear warheads are sitting, mostly on American warships, but not all of them. We do not know whether Saddam ever produced any. We are fairly sure that he did not, and that his capability to do that may have been destroyed.

We do know two worrisome things. One is that there have been accidents with nuclear warheads. All the countries that possess them have had experience of accidents. Second, the concentration of nuclear warheads in such a small area could increase the danger. We know that last night the President of the United States made a statement that is rather open-ended. He said: "It is not like Vietnam. This time we are not going into the fight with one hand tied behind us." He did not explain how he means that one hand was tied behind him in Vietnam, but for many people we do know that there was talk of using nuclear weapons in Vietnam and that fortunately that possibility was rejected by the country that could have used them, the United States.

My question to the hon. member is, has his government asked for a commitment from the United States and the others who possess the nuclear weapons that are in the gulf, a guarantee, that under no circumstances will they be used offensively in the gulf?

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina for raising an important issue. The government has assured the foreign affairs committee, of which I am a member, that nuclear weapons are not to be used in the gulf.

One of the arguments and concerns about the importance of taking military action was to prevent the further development of nuclear weapons on the part of Iraq. Therefore, if this is the argument for force at this moment, and many of us had hoped it would not come to this, surely logic follows that we should be seeking a comprehensive test ban at the United Nations.

Canada has through the years had this as an objective of our foreign policy. But the question is of putting it into overdrive rather than going step-by-step, and responding with 118 countries which recognize that if Iraq soon has these, what about India and Pakistan? What about Argentina and Brazil? What about a world loaded with nuclear weapons? Into which corners will Canadians be called time after time as regional conflicts break out? What about a situation where the UN does not have machinery to respond to these and we go at them in an ad hoc way? So, part and parcel of the order that we all seek in our world is to have renewed machinery, to see that we use the UN in a dialogue way, in a treaty-making way, in a negotiation way, and that we start today, even as we participate in the gulf, with dynamic leadership in the UN to see that this kind of incident does not occur again and that we redouble our efforts.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for question and answers is now expired. There was a five-minute period of question and answer. Resuming debate.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I think it is fair to say that most members of the House today are feeling somewhat uneasy and concerned about what is going on around us. Yesterday, when I was prepared to speak on the motion before the House, I was having a great deal of difficulty. I was concerned about a lot of things that I will not mention today because it is not the time to do it. So, when I was told, on short notice, that this debate would be resumed, I had to sit down and cleanse my thoughts because events have taken a decided turn. I have to wonder whether or not this House right now has a hell of a lot of relevancy for Canadians. We are sitting here after Canadian troops have been engaged in a war. We are still debating a motion which was put before this House, which I said at the beginning of the debate, was an intellectually dishonest motion.

An hon. member: That's right.

An hon. member: Right on.

An hon. member: A fraud.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I will try my level best not to be partisan here because it is not a place to be partisan, but I think the people of Canada have to question the role of parliamentarians, of every political party, and of the relevancy of this institution.

We were on the brink of war up until yesterday, with every heart, every mind and every soul in Canada praying and hoping for a peaceful resolution. That is what everybody here wants and it is not a matter of party line. I know my colleagues in this House. Not one of them sought war. But the debate did not take place.

We still have this motion put forward and I am supposed to speak to it today. The motion talks about UN sanctions, UN resolutions and all this kind of thing. In actual fact, Canadians as well as members on all sides of the House were hanging by their fingernails when we should have been debating the potential role of Canada in the Middle East conflict. That is what we should have been doing, but we did not do it.

We were elected by our people to govern this country, in opposition or in government. I think one of the most important decisions we will ever make is whether or not we as parliamentarians send people to war for whatever reason: good, bad or otherwise. We were not debating it; we were debating some motion that had no relevancy.

I have received more calls from more people in my riding who are absolutely disgusted with what we have done in this place. They wanted to know why we could not for once drop the partisanship. They wondered why in the name of goodness, when we are dealing with life and death issues, we could not for once have a real debate here.

It is not a debate on GST, which may be important. We all wound ourselves up for that great debate, did we not? It is not a debate about taxation or about fiscal policy. It is a debate that has the real and irrevocable consequences that somebody, because of our decision, may lose his life or could come back injured. It is not something we can change, once the decision is made.

We are at war today. Suffice it be for me to talk about the frustration felt by me and I think by every member of Parliament over our inability to control those circumstances and situations that happened thousands of miles from here.

Our troops are at war. I and my colleague from Halifax come from an area that has a strong military tradition. As I have said before, men and women who were first sent over by this government to participate in enforcing the sanctions against Iraq primarily live in this area. They may not be from our area, but we have them based there. This is where the Canadian navy on the east coast is based. They have contributed greatly to the economy in our area and to the community.

When the sterile debates about what goes on take place, it is hard for me to raise myself above it and just say it is a matter of right or wrong, because it is a matter of people. I see them every day. When I go shopping, I see them.

What we need to do now is to understand truly what these people are doing for our country and for the Parliament. They have chosen to serve and are serving proudly. They are in the Middle East. Their families are terrified. Their kids are scared. But they understand that this was an eventuality when they joined the Canadian Armed Forces. They are serving proudly. I have talked to some of the families this morning. They are happy to see for once that the Canadian Parliament is unanimous in supporting the activities of those men and women in the Middle East.

I think it is a time for us all to reflect. It is a time for us to reflect on the impact of our decisions here in this place. We do not know how long this war is going to take. We hope it is over now. We pray that the loss of life is minimal. We want our men and women of the Canadian

Armed Forces, who are doing a job for us and for the world, to come home safe and to come home now.

• (1150)

This problem in the Middle East is not going to be solved by bullets, although the immediate problem may be. It will not be solved by bullets, by missiles being lobbed at each other or by blood being spilled all through the Persian Gulf. The war has started, but the process of peace must also be started now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces, in support of the Americans, are playing a role in the gulf and they are serving proudly. It was a decision of this government, for which we all must share some responsibility collectively, and we do. This government has a responsibility at this point in time not to sit back and wait for military activity to bring a resolution to this crisis.

The government must not stop until every stone is unturned and until ever square centimetre of possible common ground is explored so that the United Nations can progress from this point on and that true lasting political peace, not merely militarily imposed peace, is found in the Middle East. This is the great challenge to parliamentarians.

We all woke up this morning at little stunned, I think. I did not think when I ran for election, nor did anybody in this place, that we would have the issues before us that we have had. My goodness, we have had the Canadian government face to face with our native peoples in Oka. I thought it was pretty traumatic. We have debated things like the abortion bill and Meech Lake. We are wondering if this country has to political will to stay together. Each and every time these issues came up, I think we all sat back and said we never thought we were going to be elected to sit and participate in these big decisions.

This is the biggest decision we have ever faced. This government has to find ways, and our party will support it as it tries, for peace through the United Nations. We would like to see this government, in the finest tradition of Canada, be innovative, be creative, be the bridge builders and find political solutions where none seem to be.

We have a tremendously strong tradition, and it is not one we should let fall now. It is a tradition of trying to find a common interest. It is a tradition of pursuing peace at almost any cost. My colleague who spoke earlier talked about the United Nations and the new world order. Think about the tumultuous times we live in. We have been celebrating over the last year the thaw in the cold war. We saw the Berlin wall fall. I guess maybe we thought everything was going to be easy from this point on.

Do you know what we found out, Madam Speaker? The easy part was the cold war. The hard part is trying to establish a new world order. Canada has a role to play. Its role is to redefine in the United Nations the acceptable parameters and the rules of the game by which we now must play in order to ensure sanity as this world changes dramatically. What are the rules of engagement? Surely to goodness, force has to be the final option that is used. This is new territory for us and we must pursue it vigorously. We must participate and we must initiate as a government and as a country.

In the coming days, there will be much debate in this Chamber. There will be debate about the resources given to the Canadian Armed Forces. There will be many questions asked about the role of the Canadian Armed Forces. There will be pleas to the Canadian government, in the finest tradition of Pearson, to get involved and find those political solutions and to do it as quickly as we possibly can. There will be accolades for the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces who are serving us so proudly in the Persian Gulf now.

I would hope that during the course of the debate we do not lose sight of the major tasks ahead of us. The major task ahead of us is to stop the war, stop the guns, and stop the bullets in the Middle East. The major task ahead of us is to ensure that Saddam Hussein is driven out of Kuwait. The task ahead of us is to make sure that Saddam Hussein, who has terrorized the Middle East, does not have the capability to do it again. The task ahead of us is to ensure that a true and lasting peace is attained in the Middle East. They are big tasks, but I know that Canada is up to the job.

It is going to be up to parliamentarians to shed a little bit of the partisanship we all too often see in here. This is not a partisan issue. Let me make it very clear: the position of the Liberal Party is that, if we had our way, sanctions should have been given more time to work—and we still firmly believe it—and that bloodshed and force had to be the very last options.

But now a decision has been made and circumstances have overtaken this strange debate and this funny motion or unreal, surreal motion we have before us now. Events have overtaken it. Each and every member of Parliament must support those individuals who have been ordered by the Government of Canada to participate. We must make sure that Canadians in every part of this land do not turn their television sets back over and get disgusted once again and that the level of cynicism, which is probably justified against politicians and parliamentarians right across this country, does not rise.

I for one member of Parliament am probably as partisan as anybody in this House. I know this comes as a great shock to you, Madam Speaker, but I also know there is a time to do one's duty. This is such a time. We can change the opinion Canadians have about this place. We have a real opportunity here to drop those phoney lines of party policy, party ideology, and party names and for once to work in the best interests of Canada and the world.

If we can achieve this, then perhaps we truly have changed something substantial. Perhaps we will start back on the road to making this place a relevant place for debate on behalf of Canadians. We will have all kinds of time for partisanship. We will have all kinds of time to score in Question Period because other issues still go on. Life does move on.

On issues such as this, I urge every one of my colleagues here not to grasp quickly and easily that tool of partisanship we use so effectively and to act truly in the interest of Canadians to find a resolution for this place. Maybe just for once, when we finish in this place, we can all go home and feel we have contributed to the well-being and the development and the future of this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, this was an interesting speech. It largely echoes the words of the Prime Minister in attempting to enlist the entire House in the adventure he has laid out for Canadians in the Middle East.

I am surprised that the members would not have taken this opportunity to stand up and say to stop shooting and that this House does not feel there should be one more bullet fired in the Middle East. The objectives of the Americans have largely been achieved. They have smashed the military infrastructure of the Iraqis. Now the program becomes one of butchery. We hear reports of 150,000 casualties. Are we as Canadians going to participate in the butchery? Do you want our CF-18s participating in the same manner?

We do have another option other than the one the Prime Minister has laid out. We cannot join with him. It must stop. He should be standing in this House today calling on the American President to end it, to give the Iraqis a chance to consider the kind of wreckage that been visited on them and to surrender, and to begin to talk about a peace treaty that would see demilitarization and disarmament go on.

The hon. member could have stood in his place today and said that we as Canadians likely have dirty hands in creating that monster. Certainly the French sold them the nuclear reactor that began the task of building atomic bombs for the Iraqis; the West Germans sold them plants to build the chemical weapons that they would have visited on us. The Americans built them up as a weapon against Iran.

• (1200)

The member could have stood up and said that we need a longer term view, that we should stop the war today and be calling out to the American President that enough has been done. The infrastructure is smashed. Give them a chance for peace and negotiate a demilitarization of that region. We do not need to participate in butchery.

If that is the position of the Liberal Party, and that is the position of the Conservative Party, we do in fact divide.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, unfortunately I think that my hon. colleague has shown how easy it is to become too partisan so early in this debate.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): End it today.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I hope that my colleague has listened to my remarks. There will be plenty of time to debate. There will be plenty of time for your party, my party and the government to put their points forward.

But my God, there is a war on, and there are Canadians serving over there. Perhaps the hon. member could put his name on his caucus speaker's list, but at the current time I am trying to address what he has asked me. I would like to hear from him.

What I have said is clear. I did not have four days to get up and to give all the solutions that I think would help. I will have plenty of time for that. What I tried to do in my remarks was to give a message to the House of Commons. I did not come here to start debating whether or not I think the government has done the right thing. We have already debated that in this House. I brought a message. I would hope that if he did not hear me clearly, he would get the "blues" and read them. That is what we should be here for today—to stand united behind those individuals whom we have sent to the Middle East. I am talking about the Parliament of Canada.

What I did was appeal to this government and members on all sides of this House to find those peaceful solutions. I did not just talk about war. I talked primarily about peace. I talked about peace that probably would be better developed through less partisanship in this House and more co-operation for the sake of world order.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for what I thought was an outstanding speech today, a speech that I think sets the tone that all of us would be wise to adopt, given that the eyes and ears of Canadians are on us for as long as this debate continues.

The fact of the matter is that we are beyond a debate about whether or not Canadians ought to be involved in a war. We clearly said they should not be, but we are beyond that. War has begun. Canadian troops are now committed. Whether one agrees or disagrees, there is an action, a war theatre, that exists. I could not concur more with my friend that at this stage no member of Parliament should want to undermine those troops, those young Canadian men and women who have answered the call of their country. I am not suggesting any member of Parliament would want to do this.

As a young lady from St. John's who is in the forces was quoted yesterday, "I signed up. I signed on the dotted line. I am here. I will do my duty". I think we better think about that. I thought the leader of the NDP spoke well yesterday when she said, "no party has a licence on morality".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: No party has a monopoly on morality and no member ought to question the morality—

An hon. member: I think somebody did.

Mr. Tobin: —or, Madam Speaker, should the intention of any member who speaks in this place from their bones, heart and soul be questioned.

I think the NDP member who just spoke from the province of British Columbia would do well to reflect upon the words of his leader. Then if he needs reinforcement, he should reflect again upon the words of my colleague for Dartmouth who just spoke in this House in an eloquent, responsible and very enlightened manner.

Members should know that this member comes from a constituency together with my colleague from Halifax, where a great many of the people who serve today in the gulf reside. He comes from a constituency where today, together with my colleague from Halifax—and a great many of those are former Newfoundlanders—a great many wives, and in some cases husbands and children, mothers and fathers, brothers and sisters are waiting at home, glued to their television sets, not to this debate, but wondering whether or not our troops have been involved in battle, whether or not we have taken casualties, and whether or not their loved ones, God forbid, are involved. If we wrap our minds around that reality in this debate, I think we can erase and flush partisanship from this House. I thank my friend for his remarks.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): I just want to offer a brief closing remark. I have a brother Paul who is a member of the Canadian Armed Forces. He chose that career and he serves proudly. My father served in the Second World War and served proudly, as have other members of my family.

Quite clearly, what we have to understand is that soldiers do not make wars, politicians make wars. Like it or not, we are the politicians in the Canadian Parliament at this point in time, and those men and women who live in my riding are at war. They are serving this country proudly, and I am not for one second—and I could care less if anyone in this House likes it or dislikes it—am not going to cheapen their commitment to this country by allowing the circus that normally happens here to take away from the importance of the decision that they made to serve this country because I think it would be an absolute shame. I for one will conduct myself for the rest of this debate with those things foremost in my mind.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. member on his speech. I feel strongly as well about the importance of members of the House coming together in objectivity and in constructive debate. It is also important that we do not let hyprocrisy become the order of the day.

I have been extremely conscious in this debate of the charges of following the party line and subjugating myself to the will and whims of others. I would like to make it very clear that I stood throughout this debate with the government. In November, I spoke solidly in favour of the government's position and I continue to support that position.

I have some difficulty with the speech of the hon. member today. I applaud him for his position but I cannot quite accept the conversion to constructive non-partisan performance. I witnessed his leader three days ago support a statement that said upon the outbreak of hostilities the Canadian forces should be withdrawn from the theatre of war. That is hardly an act of unity. Frankly, that is an act of belated hyprocrisy.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): There was a debate taking place, and my hon. colleague full and well knows it. There was a debate taking place in this House about what would be the preferred option if we were in charge in this place—just give me a second, I have listened to you and perhaps you could listen to me.

Let us not try to change the record. The debate was about what we would do. As a party we said that we thought peace should be pursued through the continued enforcement of existing sanctions, that sanctions should have a greater chance to work. We thought that that should have been the role of Canada. We said if that was the role of Canada and if that was the stated policy of the Government of Canada—because that is what the stated policy would have been if we were the Government of Canada—if hostilities broke out, Canadian forces should move back out of the immediate theatre of war. That is what we said. Don't try to twist our words on this. We lost the debate. Wake up and smell the roses. Last night war started and the Canadian forces are involved in that war. We lost the debate, and whether we like it not Canadian forces are there. The statements that I have made during my speech in response to the other questioners stand, and I will stand on those statements.

• (1210)

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak in this Chamber today on the most heart-wrenching issue that has been debated in many decades.

Last evening we heard the tragic news that Iraq has been attacked and war has broken out. Notwithstanding this sad news, I still want to participate in this historic debate, put my views on record and explain why I will, vote in favour of Motion 27 which reads:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

While I have made up my mind on the motion before this House, I am far from comfortable. As a matter of fact, I am uncomfortable. I am uneasy and I worry about the fact that many thousands of lives will be lost in this war.

I will be voting in favour of the motion before the House, but I would like to say that I reached this conclusion only after a difficult and exhausting thought process of examining all possible options. I have discussed the crisis with many people.

I have spoken with two families in the riding who have sons serving Canada in the Persian Gulf. Dr. Peter and Janet Van Nostrand's son John is serving on the HMCS Athabaskan. Mrs. Van Nostrand said that although she would prefer a peaceful solution, she believes the UN resolution must be honoured by Canada. She believes Saddam Hussein must be stopped.

Janet also said that she has a great deal of respect for our service people who have maintained good spirits throughout their ordeal. She also has great respect for and confidence in our senior military officials directing this operation.

I have also heard the views of Harvey and Tina Meek of Markham. Their son Harvey is a jet pilot with 439 squadron in Qatar. Tina believes strongly that Canada should be involved. Like the Van Nostrands she, obviously, would have preferred a peaceful solution to have been found.

However, Mr. and Mrs. Meek believe Canada must honour its commitment to the UN resolution. Tina said Harvey has chosen this profession and is well-trained to do the job he has been asked to do. "He is an excellent pilot" said Tina "and is proud to have been chosen to go." Both Janet Van Nostrand and Tina Meek conveyed a strong sense of pride in their sons. They believe our service people should have the full support of all Canadians as they carry out their ominous responsibilities in this tragic war.

Last Sunday afternoon I attended a special prayer vigil for the Persian Gulf crisis. It was an ecumenical service organized by churches in the Stouffville area. Approximately 150 to 200 Christians were in attendance. We prayed for the leaders of all nations involved, including Saddam Hussein. We prayed for the military personnel and civilians on both sides of this conflict. We prayed regarding our own response to the prospects of war. Also, we prayed to celebrate Christ's sovereignty and Lordship.

Since Monday of this week I have had 23 concerned people in my riding call my constituency office in Unionville. Fifteen people believed that Canada should not be involved in an armed conflict and eight said that Canada should support United Nations' efforts to stop Saddam Hussein.

I, too, wanted a peaceful solution and I, too, did not want Canada to be involved in a war. I did not want John Van Nostrand and Harvey Meek to be involved in an armed conflict. I would have liked to have seen an absolute end to war on this planet. Mankind should be capable of achieving this.

In my view, the United Nations is the only vehicle or process through which world-wide peace can ultimately be achieved. When Kuwait was first invaded by Saddam Hussein last August, I understand that the United States was on the verge of declaring war on Iraq and going it alone to drive Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait.

Through the efforts and interventions of our Prime Minister, President George Bush was persuaded to act under the auspices of the United Nations.

The Iraqi issue has been the moment of truth for the United Nations. The usefulness of the League of Nations was dashed when Italy was allowed to invade Ethiopia in 1936 without a mobilized and co-ordinated effort by allied nations to force the Italian aggressors out.

Thanks to the end of the cold war and the dramatic changes in the Soviet Union's economic and military policies, we now have witnessed for the very first time the U.S.S.R. voting with the United States and other members of the UN Security Council to condemn, in effect, the actions of Saddam Hussein and take military action, if necessary, to drive the Iraqi forces out of Kuwait. If the Security Council had not passed resolution 678, I believe the value and purpose of the United Nations would have been permanently crippled.

We are witnessing the most remarkable chapter in the history of the United Nations. It will be a chapter which will send a strong statement to would-be aggressor nations for decades to come. I believe it will be a strong deterrent to the leader of any country which might consider attacking or invading another country. Such a leader can no longer assume that he would capitalize on having two of the world's superpowers on opposite sides of the conflict. Such a leader would have to be cognizant that in 1991 the U.S.S.R. and the United States voted in unison to condemn Saddam Hussein's brutal invasion of Kuwait and that on Wednesday, January 16, the United Nations' contingent attacked Iraq.

Over the past few weeks, like many Canadians, I have struggled with the question of whether sanctions would work. Only a few days ago, I thought that we should consider recommending an extension of the period for sanctions to work. However, I have been persuaded that with a tyrannical regime, such as that in place in Iraq, sanctions would not work. I believe Saddam Hussein and his army would have continued to be well fed. I also believe that thousands of average Iraqi citizens were undergoing grave hardships regarding lack of food, safe drinking water, medical supplies, and proper sanitation. However, there is not the remotest chance that these people could have risen up and demanded that their leader reverse his position and pull out of Kuwait.

Saddam Hussein has carefully orchestrated his Iraqi invasion to be seen by his followers as a religious crusade. Saddam Hussein has also very cleverly fuelled the flames of hatred by the Iraqis against the United States of America.

We have, in Saddam Hussein, a stubborn, fanatical leader who I now believe would never have had the moral courage and wisdom to withdraw peacefully from Kuwait.

If sanctions had been allowed to continue, one has to ask what action Saddam Hussein would have been taking. He would certainly have had time to increase the mobilization of his men and equipment. As the right hon. Joe Clark said yesterday, there was some indication that the Iraqis were building an oil pipeline to the gulf. This would have made it possible to pour millions of gallons of oil into the gulf which would not only have created an environmental disaster, but, if torched, could have created a horrific holocaust. Also, more time would have permitted Saddam Hussein to build up his arsenal of chemical warfare and perhaps nuclear weapons.

I also would like to say a few words about Israel. Saddam Hussein has threatened to attack Israel and to establish a linkage with Kuwait and Israel. Israel has demonstrated a commendable restraint over the past few months. However, if the United Nations had not used force to stop Saddam Hussein, does anyone think he would have stopped with Kuwait? I do not.

All diplomatic efforts by many world leaders over many months did not yield results. Saddam Hussein summarily rejected every opportunity for a peaceful solution to the crisis. I thought he might change his mind. I prayed he would. But in the absence of any movement by Saddam Hussein, the United Nations forces decided to initiate armed conflict to free the citizens of Kuwait and protect the fundamental viability of the United Nations.

Such action will send a chilling message to the world that armed aggressive actions such as Saddam Hussein's unprovoked invasion of Kuwait will not be tolerated by member countries of the United Nations.

In closing, I pray that this war will end very soon and that Saddam Hussein will surrender quickly to minimize the loss of lives.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, as always I listened very carefully to what the hon. member said, and I would like to ask him two very specific questions.

I would appreciate it if the hon. member would give us his views, quite frankly as always, on two proposals. It is a fact that when a war starts, we must also have people who are prepared to talk about peace, disengagement and cease-fire. We cannot just wage war. We also need people who will say how to stop the war. So what kind of diplomatic means will it take? Do we have any ideas? Do we have any suggestions? I have several that I would like to submit for comment to the hon. member. For instance, how about starting right now with representations to the United Nations, with suggestions for a plan that at the time was mentioned by Saddam Hussein himself, when he was otherwise engaged against Iran and shortly afterwards, concerning a conference on bacteriological, chemical and nuclear disarmament, in other words, to make this vast area which is the world's powder keg—The hon. member knows my thoughts on that. For 25 years I have been saying: It is going to explode. It's a powder keg, getting bigger all the time. Bigger and bigger.

• (1220)

Aside from Saddam Hussein, whom we condemn because of his invasion of Kuwait, does the hon. member believe that the time is ripe for considering the possibility of a conference on nuclear, bacteriological and chemical disarmament, involving all countries in the area, and I would include a friendly country, Israel, especially with respect to nuclear arms?

Second question: How long does he think it will take to call this international conference, to set aside all the hypocrisy and lies that prevent us from looking reality in the face, a real international conference, so that we can stop talking about the Middle East, about those incredible tragedies in Lebanon, the Golan heights, and the Gaza strip. Would the hon. member care to comment?

[English]

Mr. Attewell: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member. He has a long history and a great knowledge of the problems in that part of the world.

I have no hesitation in wanting to support any initiative that would end the threat of nuclear weapons. I think we should embrace such an initiative. I would not know all the parameters or guidelines to put on such an initiative, but perhaps a new chapter will open up after this conflict which we are now in the middle of. Perhaps it will bring many more countries to the table to discuss exactly such a proposal.

Most of us here in the Chamber have children. I have five grandchildren and another one coming next month. This world needs global attention now. It needs global co-operation, specifically on the issue the hon. member brought forth.

How long will the world community wait for such action? Again, I think this conflict is going to make everyone impatient that we get along and get moving on such an initiative. I thank him for bringing this to my attention in the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

An hon. member: Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question and comments period is only five minutes at this point, so it has expired. We are going to the second 10-minute period. The hon. Minister for Employment and Immigration, on debate.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Don Valley North, spoke briefly of his friendship with and his commendation of the State of Israel. I want to elaborate a little bit, if I may, on those comments today.

Let us be clear, Madam Speaker, on a number of things that have happened recently in the Middle East in ways that have created a tragic situation for the world. Like other hon. members, I am anguished that the peace and stability in the world, which seemed within our grasp with the fall of the Berlin wall and with the recent fall of other symbols of repression and the atmosphere of hope so many of us had for the future of the world and for international peace, has come to such an abrupt end with what we have seen happening in Iraq and in Kuwait. There is not a single member of the House who would have chosen this to happen, particularly in contrast to that period of hope.

I do want to pay tribute to an ally of Canada's and of the western world who has been put in a particularly appalling position by the state of affairs that has occurred. The politics of the Middle East are steeped in traditions and enmities that very few of us in the House and in our country can comprehend. They go back for centuries. I would not attempt to have a full knowledge of them, and I do not think any of us would.

It does seem to me that there is a very large difference between what is happening in the gulf today and those historic tensions in the Middle East that have been building up for so long and over so many centuries.

Saddam Hussein is a phenomenon unto himself. He is a devil of his own creation. He arose over a period of the past 10 years to become a threat to all of us. He would have done so, in my view, whether or not there had been tension between the Israelis and the Palestinians, and whether or not there was that ancient tension between Arabs and Israelis.

Saddam Hussein waged a war against Iran. It is problematic, but I believe he would have done so, whether or not those ancient tensions with Israel existed. He invaded Kuwait, and I believe he would have done so, whether or not there were those historic tensions with Israel.

Having said this, I want to state publicly that I regard the patience and constraint that Israel showed in the circumstance as being exemplary and I pay tribute to it. Imagine if we had been debating in this Chamber under conditions where we were threatened with an attack and a conflict that essentially had nothing to do with us. Iraq invades Kuwait and the leader of Iraq says that if he is attacked, he will attack Israel. What would we do if we were in such a position? Our Prime Minister referred to it briefly the other day in his speech when he talked about the context in which these threats were made against Israel. Would we have been able to sit still and not pre-empt such an attack? We may or may not have.

I think the fact that the State of Israel, a country that is 42 years old—younger than many of us in this Chamber—and smaller than Vancouver Island, was able to do that is worthy of our commendation. This does not mean, in my view, that the tensions between Israel and its neighbours do not have to be resolved. But I do think we have to understand the context in which they must be resolved and that the parties in the region have been historically and recently at a stalemate, that something is going to have break open that pattern. It is still my wish that the parties in the region could resolve that.

• (1230)

I would also remind hon. members that there was tension with the Palestinians before Israel entered the Gaza Strip following an attack upon Israel itself, that the refugee camps that were established in the Palestinian region were established essentially after the founding of the State of Israel but before Israel moved into those territories in response to an attack upon its territory.

The complications around these issues are large and it is incumbent upon us not to over simplify them by suggesting that a simple action or outside pressure on one party or the other, or on both, is going to resolve those. That is still for the future to decide.

We are all in this Chamber I think sensitive to the fact that what happens in that region affects all of us. I do think it is incumbent upon us to recognize that we have some allies who have supported us in other situations, that we must try to come to grips with what those threads are that have wrought such a black fabric in a region that is fraught with tension before we make judgments upon what those solutions may be.

I think there have been provocations on both sides in this dispute. I do not think anyone would argue that. I do not think any friend of Israel would argue that. But I do want to assure many of the friends of Israel in Canada, many of those in the Canadian Jewish community with family in that region, that many of us are daily conscious of the decisions we take and the impact that they will have on those families and on that nation.

Of course, there are other nations involved and of course there are other people at risk, not least of whom are our own who are there defending the values that we stand for and the United Nations and are doing so at risk to themselves. But I want to say to those people in the Jewish community in Canada that whatever is happening in the Middle East, there are many of us in this Chamber who are thinking of them, their friends and relatives and their support for that region, and for that state, that many of us have also shown.

I watched the people in the region as they prepared to deal with a gas attack. One of my very early memories is of my father, who was going overseas during World War II when I was a very young girl. I tried on his gas mask just before he sailed away on a ship from Halifax harbour. I have been thinking every day since of what people in the region of the gulf and in Israel are facing. Those memories are very strong in my mind as I know they are in others who actually dealt with and were in battles in Europe during the war, which I certainly was not.

But I think that for all of us who desire peace and for all of us who value our friendship with states in the region that we wish a speedy end. That is what the government has stood for and that is what we continue to stand for.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I have only a comment to make. I just want to take this opportunity to thank the minister for the very sensitive manner in which she has looked at the issue. I think that one broadens not only for the Israelis, for whom of course my heart is very much there, but for all ethnic minorities who live in that area. It is a very trying time. For all the families who have extended family in that region, I know that that is where our heart lies and that is where our concern is.

I can only hope that with Godspeed and our prayers we will have a very short-lived war and the problems that come from it will see the kind of resolution on a bilateral basis that will make good sense and bring the harmony that we are looking for in that area.

Mrs. McDougall: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for her support. Certainly, by my statement, I did not want to suggest that there were not others at risk, and I know she is not implying this. Clearly, there are many lives and groups at risk. I wanted to say that many of us believe that Israel is in a special situation because it had been singled out as a first target, and that in standing aside, the government and the people of Israel have done a service to world peace and to all of us. I say that not in an effort to be trite or to minimize the efforts that others have made.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on the speech I just heard.

I agree that the people of Israel have been calm and patient to an admirable degree. In this respect, I share the sentiments of the hon. member for Mount Royal. However, when someone says that Mr. Hussein is his own creation, that Mr. Hussein is a phenomenon, that I cannot accept. Saddam Hussein is a creation of ours, of the United States. We must understand that when you start doing business with dictators because a dictator happens to be the enemy of your enemy, you are playing with fire.

What is particularly disappointing, and I say this as a former military man with a son in the U.S. Navy, is the failure of diplomacy, which obliges our soldiers to go over there to solve the problem we created here in the House and elsewhere.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, I hope we will learn a lesson and the lesson is this: When we support dictators because it suits us, we do so at the expense of the innocent, whether we are talking about Iraqis today or young people, soldiers in the armed forces that have to go over there to correct a problem that we created.

[English]

Mrs. McDougall: Madam Speaker, once again, what I was trying to point out, and I stand by this, was that the situation in that region is a complicated one and I do not think one can say that a regime has been created by another. There were many factors that gave rise to the politics in this region. We, in this country have stood for, and our allies have always stood for, an attempt to find peace in that region.

Occasionally, we take people as we find them. It is not always in our interest to walk away from situations when we do not like what we find. There is no question in my mind that what has happened in Iraq, and the recent history of Iraq, has a lot to do with a single individual and his horrifying ambition, that he was not simply cut out of whole cloth. To suggest that there has been some evil Machiavellian attempt on the part of the United States or our friends and allies I think is to go well beyond the reality of the region, and to insert something into the discussion which I think may be out of keeping with the atmosphere in which we find ourselves today.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise in this House today feeling very nervous about the state that we are in. I must say that before I came to the House, I referred back to a text from Prime Minister Trudeau when he gave a speech on October 27, 1983, at the University of Guelph. The title of the speech was "Reflections on Peace and Security".

He, of course, during the speech went through Canada's history and participation in NATO and its support of the UN. I want to quote the remarks he made early in his speech. "The difficulty all of us experience in trying to know what is going on in the world—to know it and to understand it in a manner that is accurate and that provides the ground for useful action. Too often our knowledge and our judgments are true and false at the same time. This is often the distinctive sign of rapidly changing realities which tend to elude our understanding".

We as Liberals on this side of the House have wanted to come back to this House and talk about this issue for many weeks now for precisely that reason. We have wanted to get accurate information and try to understand exactly, to the best of all members' ability, what is happening.

For the last two years the thought processes of members in this House have been working on a new world order where war was just totally out of our minds in terms of a real possibility. I think I can best describe it by referring to some comments I made last year at this very time when I was in Moscow. I was so proud to be speaking on behalf of the government at a Soviet–U.S. Citizens Summit on the environment.

I could not get over the feeling that I had that there we were, all working together, exchanging ideas, and our whole thrust was not measuring our strength as nations by the money we had or the armaments we were building up, but that we were measuring our strength by the mouths we could feed and the environment that we were all trying to protect.

For all of us in the House, our systems, our thought processes, have been working along these lines for the last couple of years. Now, all of a sudden, to be involved in war is a tremendous shock because there have been so many peaceful changes in the world during the last couple of years, so many positive elements.

In my riding of Broadview—Greenwood, I must tell you that I have been receiving hundreds of names on petitions. Holy Name Church personally delivered petitions last night. Many people have been writing, people in my riding, members who have family in the Armed Forces who are in the Persian Gulf right now, but who were hoping that we could put our minds to work over the war machines.

We on this side of the House have been trying and hoping that there was some way, some idea or some different approach which would maybe trigger an action that would cause Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait.

As our motion said, we did not support what was going on at that time. However, now we are at war, and I still believe that we should be continually putting our minds to work at ideas to stop this war, because it is going to be a lot harder to stop it than it was to start it.

I hope, as many members have said today, that we can keep the tone in this House directed toward peace and creativity. We should not get caught up in the fact that when we listen to the CNN or to many other broadcasts it is the military might that seems to be getting the pre-eminent play. We should be hearing more from people with ideas on how we can somehow have a diplomatic way of stopping Saddam Hussein.

Our leader said last night that we support our troops over there. There is no question of that on this side of the House. Now that the action has begun, it would be absolutely foolish for us to try to send a signal which would in any way, shape or form give anything but a sense that as Canadians we are all together.

As I mentioned last night, three summers ago I had the experience of staying in Kuwait for almost three weeks. I have friends there. Some of them have immigrated to Canada. We are not without feeling for what is going on in their homeland. We know that he is an absolute madman, but we also know that many of the 450,000 Kuwaitis who are still there are probably now at greater risk than ever.

I say to you, Madam Speaker, and I say to all members of this House that none of us here support war. We must put our collective thoughts together whereby we can somehow break through or influence others who are senior politicians around the world to cause this war to end very soon.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Madam Speaker, I want to applaud my good friend, the member for Broadview—Greenwood. He is trying to reflect not only the concern, worry and wishes of his own constituents but those of all of us on this side of the House including myself.

I have received hundreds of calls from my constituents in London East. It is a very sad day not only for Canada, because in fact we have embarked on this military action, but also for the Middle East and the world. We all understand that war at any time tends to erode that human fabric that holds all of humanity together.

War is not a solution, and that is what I think my hon. my friend was saying. War is not a solution to the problems not only in that region but to the problems of the world that we all have to work toward solving.

We on this side have been very frustrated that in fact a peaceful solution in diplomacy was not given a proper chance until the ultimate military weaponry had to be used.

• (1250)

We all agree that the dictator had to be removed, but are we all satisfied that the means justify the end? Will in fact a military victory bring peace to the area which the minister was talking about in a very complicated region of the world? Will the ultimate military victory bring peace in the world?

The other Arab countries in the area are also victims, I suggest, just like Israel. They did not want this dictator moving in on a sovereign state, because now what we have is perhaps further instability.

I want to ask my hon. friend what he believes are some of those things that can be done now that in fact armed conflict has commenced? Wars, as our leader said, are easy to start, perhaps too easy to start, but much more difficult to stop and for peace to be given as chance.

Can the member perhaps share his knowledge of the area and tell us some of the things that can be done as of today so that no more human blood has to be let on both sides? In the end, we all have to live with each other. We all have to build this world of co-operation which seemed so promising about a year ago. I wonder if I could ask my hon. friend those questions.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I want to say to my colleague, first of all on the issue of sanctions, that it is a question of judgment. This is what I meant when I quoted Mr. Trudeau. One can be right and wrong on this issue. Quite frankly, I personally believe that maybe it was because we did not have enough knowledge that we not give sanctions a much longer period of time. In my judgment, and as many members have said, this is an issue of conscience. I did not get a sense that we had given it enough time.

We all know that this is one of the most complex areas of the world and that the relationships and the tensions go back for centuries. I do not have a magical solution. I humbly submit that this is why we must, as the member for Dartmouth said earlier, try to avoid partisanship. None of us has any sort of special ownership on this issue in terms of whether we are right or wrong. This is why we have to let down our guard and speak to each other in a way that somehow we will collectively come up with some kind of solution, and that is the best I have to offer.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I apologize because a moment ago I could not rise to speak after the remarks of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I should like to direct a question to my colleague. Members of the House and the minister know that in my party, in all parties, there are great friends of the State of Israel. This fact is well known, it was referred to earlier, and most of the minister's speech related to that. Indeed we all know that Canada is a friend of the State of Israel. I would have liked to direct my question to the minister, but since I cannot I will put it to you. I wonder whether time may have come for the friends of Israel to realize that as long as the Shamirs, the Begins and others refuse to admit that if they do not find a solution to the Palestinian issue and to the creation of a Palestinian state—that is what Canada voted for on November 1947—should the people who claim to be the friends of Israel not remind them that the greatest friends of Israel are not blind friends but friends who bring them back to reality?

You know, I have probably known all the Middle East heads of state. When people try to scare me with Saddam Hussein I could tell them all about Mr. Assad, the new Syrian leader who has now become the new ally of the Americans, if you can imagine that. Until very recently, Madam Speaker, Mr. Reagan and Mr. Bush were telling Americans that Damascus was the nerve centre of Middle East terrorism. Now he is our ally.

I do not want to be mean, but the young college and university students who are listening to us need to be brought back to reality. One of the first terrorists was the current Prime Minister of Israel, a man we welcome here with open arms and who is called Mr. Shamir. He was one of the leading Polish terrorists with Mr. Begin, but now he is Prime Minister. The fact remains that he was once a terrorist.

I want to ask my colleague whether he believes that the Canadian government should admit that the time has come? My colleagues may agree with me that this war may be deplorable and unacceptable—war is war—but it may finally open our eyes to the Middle East reality and force us to come to grips with the problems generally. This will take time, but we have to start from the beginning, and the beginning is that the Palestinian state will eventually see the light of day. Would my colleague care to comment on that?

[English]

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I would say to my colleague straight off that I absolutely believe that if there were ever a time when all of us should become more fully aware of all accurate facts in the history of this region, it is now. Obviously that would lead, in my opinion, to us sitting down at some kind of conference wherein all these issues would be resolved.

My answer to the member is yes, absolutely, correct. I think that would be serving Israel in the long term.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I have a question for my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood.

Right now we are in the midst of war. It is very heartbreaking for many Canadians that we are in this situation. However they are—

An hon. member: You look very hurt.

Mr. Karygiannis: I would like to let my colleague from Scarborough Centre know that we have a lot of room on this side of the House for her.

However, returning to reality, there are many people in Canada from the Middle East who are seeking refuge: people from Syria, people from Iran, and even some people from Iraq.

I noticed previously that the Minister of Employment and Immigration was present in the House, but I would like to ask my colleague a very specific question. Does he believe, as I do, that the cases of people seeking refuge in Canada from that part of world should be expedited and looked at very carefully so that if there are any terrorists among them they will be weeded out? Does he believe that those particular cases should be brought to the forefront and dealt with as expeditiously as possible because those people could end up being stateless?

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, first I would like to say to my colleague from Scarborough that I have written to the minister on this issue several months ago, not only in terms of the areas the member has mentioned but the entire backlog situation. I think we should all be deputized to assist the minister of immigration to expedite the process, especially right now for the countries the member mentioned.

The member reminds me of our mutually good friend, Bishop Sotirios, who has mentioned no doubt to him as he has to me and our colleague from Saint-Denis, that we are very nervous about Cyprus right now. We are nervous that there may be a chance that the government is thinking of withdrawing its troops. In this period of deliberation and debate, we had better make sure that we reflect on all the facts and make sure that does not happen.

GULF CRISIS

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, now that it has come to war, I believe the top priority of this House must be the safety and well-being of Canadian troops and civilians in the Persian Gulf.

I know that the thoughts and prayers of all Canadians are with our citizens, Armed Forces and civilians alike, in the Middle East. We all hope for their safe and speedy return.

My thoughts are also with those Canadians who have family members and loved ones in the gulf. I would urge the government in the strongest possible terms to make provisions immediately for family members to be kept abreast of unfolding events in the Middle East. It is simply not enough that these individuals be forced to rely on the media for information as to the status of their loved ones.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to establish a toll-free, nation-wide hotline so that family members can receive up to the minute information on what is happening in the gulf, especially as it pertains to Canadian troops and civilians.

I also urge that regular communications with family members be initiated by the government and that these communications be as open and frank as possible.

Our troops and civilians currently in the Middle East deserve the best possible support we can provide for them and I strongly believe the same consideration should be extended to family members here in Canada.

I would strongly urge the government to get with it in this regard.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Premier Robert Bourassa of Quebec will be announcing today an important economic recovery plan of one billion dollars to counter the effects of the recession in Quebec. Mr. Bourassa said yesterday: "The economy obviously remains the first priority."

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that Mr. Bourassa is doing well. We need him in these difficult times in Quebec because, as far as I am concerned, he is a great Quebecer as well as a leader.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians greet this day with deep sorrow and sadness. We have failed to resolve international problems by peaceful means. People, as I speak, are being killed by a war that we helped to initiate.

As a Korean veteran, I want to say that war and killing are never a solution. During past times of crises and tight security in Canada, civil rights of Canadians have been threatened. Canadians of Jewish, Ukrainian, German, Italian and Japanese origin, et aussi les Québécois can attest to this.

It must not happen again. Just as we will support families of our Armed Forces, we also must support families of Arab and Middle East people living in Canada. We must widen our understanding of their culture and religions, prevent discrimination and prepare to open our doors to refugees.

Above all, we must work together to end this war now. Canada must find peaceful alternatives to help resolve Middle East problems.

GULF CRISIS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the grim reality of war brings many solemn thoughts to each of us. Three of them especially come to me today.

I know, for example, that I speak for every constituent in Fredericton—York—Sunbury in expressing deep and abiding concern for the men and women in Canada's Armed Forces now in the Middle East and for their families here at home.

This has intimate implications for a great many people in our riding, particularly those at CFB Gagetown.

As a member of Parliament, of course, I share the torment which each of us must feel as we accept the risks and responsibilities of decisions relating to war.

I stand firmly with the Government of Canada but obviously it is tempting to be on the side of the angels when one is not required to confront the devil. As a Canadian concerned for the unity of our own country, the war-torn tragedy of the Persian Gulf magnifies for me the absurdity of separating Canada in any form and intensifies the challenge for all of us to make sure that never happens. Let us commit to that challenge as we have also committed to restoring the peace in the Middle East.

GULF CRISIS

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, watching the events unfold last night, faces of Canadian servicemen and women kept flashing through my mind. I commend their courage. I mourn the loss of their youthful innocence and I pray for their safety.

The many calls I have received from my riding of Hamilton Mountain clearly show that although Canadians did not want this war, their hearts and prayers are with our military.

While we are trying to come to terms with all of this, we must focus our minds on looking for a cease fire and for ways to deal, with fairness and justice, with the horrendous consequences of war. Now is the time to assume Canada's traditional humanitarian and peacekeeping role.

GULF CRISIS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, as ye sow, so shall ye reap. Mr. Hussein's war has entered a new phase and multinational forces have now entered the fray to expel Iraqi forces from occupied Kuwait. This multinational force is acting under the authority of the United Nations to implement resolution 678.

It is appropriate and proper that Canada and its forces should participate in support of the alliance for three reasons: first, international peace and security are in Canada's national interest; second, the maintenance of the international rule of law is in Canada's national interest; and, third, the United Nations is the best and one vehicle for the attainment of international peace and security and the rule of law.

As the former Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition said so eloquently in this House yesterday, Canada has never failed to stand by and support the United Nations. It would be an abandonment of our history for Canada not to stand by the UN in this great moment of need.

I commend the current Prime Minister and Government of Canada for having the integrity and courage to do what is right for Canada, the United Nations and the world. May the conflict end quickly with minimum casualties and may all Canadians stand by and pray for our forces and their families.

GULF CRISIS

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, during the last few days members of this House have had the opportunity to make speeches and debate the issue of Canada's role in the gulf. I would like to add to the debate the voice of children from L'École Intermédiaire Sacré-Coeur in Timmins and St. John's School in Sault Ste. Marie. Our youth, whose future is at stake, must have a say in this matter.

[Translation]

Katrine Sauvé from Timmins tells us: "War is destructive for everyone. What is going to happen to us, the young?" "The thought of war is scary and troubling as I think of my future and that of others. Please, make peace, not war", says Christine Savage.

Vicky Saint-Denis is 13 years old. She says: "No war. The alternative is peace, love and justice. War frightens us. It gets us killed, decimates our families and our homes. Please, let there be no war. Let us have peace instead."

[English]

Candice Day from Sault Ste. Marie wants us to know that she is 13 years old and that she would like to live until she reaches the age of 14. She tells us that, "If there are cures for diseases, why are there not cures for war?"

Time is lacking for me—

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. member's time has expired.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, the past few hours were a time of fear and incertainty all over the world. Canadians are stunned and afraid to see Canada engage in war. I find it hard to understand the need to come to such dramatic decisions as declaring war in order to restore global order and bring about peace.

I never thought I would have to take part in making such a decision in my political career. However, deep down inside me, it is clear that Canada must be alongside its allies. Saddam Hussein cannot be allowed to endanger the fragile world balance. No state or head of state has the right to take a neighbouring country by force. Saddam Hussein must understand that he has to get out of Kuwait.

GULF CRISIS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, this is a sad day for Canada. Canadians know that my party wanted our troops withdrawn if war with Iraq were to begin. We lost that debate.

Now that the government has decided to involve our troops in military action, we will do everything in our power to support our men and women who are now in this war, thus ensuring their security and safety. However, my party stands united in considering this an unnecessary war at this time.

What do we do now? Stop the war as soon as possible. Seek a peaceful solution to this conflict. Anticipate the problems that the war will create, such as care for the injured, the emotional trauma which will be suffered by combatants and non-combatants, the economic and social insecurities which will be brought to that area of our planet, the environmental impact of the war, and averting other wars and conflicts.

GULF CRISIS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in the last few days every member of Parliament has had to decide whether or not to vote for Canada to support the United Nations resolutions regarding Iraq.

I truly understand those that have called for peace not war. The problem is it never was a question of peace or war. There already was war, a war of the worst kind in Kuwait. The question really was would Canada become involved or not.

Canada did become involved and I support that decision.

The awful truth is there will probably always be a Saddam Hussein, maybe a little better, maybe a little worse, but there will always be someone like him. The difference now is that the Saddam Husseins of the world will face and know they face the prospect of unified forces of the countries of the world under the United Nations.

The contributions being made by the multinational forces right now will go a long way to ensure peace in the future and they all have our support and prayers.

GULF CRISIS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, for young Canadians this is the first time they experience their country being at war. It can be a time of confusion and disillusion. It can also be time for new hope.

We in the Liberal Party join our voices with all Canadians calling for peace by way of an early cease-fire leading to negotiations to settle the current gulf crisis. It will take strong and skilful leadership qualities to achieve an early and lasting peace. We all urge the Government of Canada to persist in the pursuit of the road to peace. It will be a difficult path to follow but one which Canadians, young and old, will support unanimously.

Give peace a chance. That is the Canadian tradition.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, many attempts have been made to find a peaceful solution to the crisis in the Persian Gulf. All diplomatic initiatives deployed since the beginning of the invasion of Kuwait and intensified during the past 48 days have failed because of the intransigent attitude of Saddam Hussein. Mr. Hussein has flouted international law and order. Unfortunately, the war is now a reality, a sad reality that gives no one cause for rejoicing. We all hope that this conflict will be brief and will be followed by a long and lasting peace.

On behalf of all my constituents, I want to say that we fully support and wish the best of luck to all Canadian military men and women who defend, with pride and dignity, the rights, freedoms and principles we hold dear. We think especially of their families and friends, and we hope they will soon return home safely.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, just one month after the government gutted the CBC, the cash-strapped network is off to join the pools of international reporters currently providing coverage of the gulf war.

While millions of Canadians are glued to their TV sets, we are severely disadvantaged by witnessing censored American coverage through American eyes.

With U.S. networks estimating coverage of the crisis at $1 million per week, where is our national broadcasting service expected to find the necessary funds. CBC employees and local stations can only fear it will be at their expense.

Canadians, as a caring and peaceful people, are concerned and want to learn what is happening in the gulf. Coverage of our forces' involvement in the gulf crisis can only be objectively provided by our own reporters.

Cabinet has made the decision that Canadians will now play an offensive role in the gulf. Will this same Cabinet provide the funds required for the CBC to provide adequate coverage so that Canada can come to understand the tragedy of war through Canadian eyes?

LITHUANIA

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, considering the sad events now taking place in Lithuania, we must condemn outright the use of force to smother the legitimate aspirations of a people. This kind of armed intervention is particularly odious, coming as it does after the Lithuanian people had democratically expressed their legitimate aspirations.

At a time when Quebec, for the second time in 10 years, is also preparing to exercise democratically its inalienable right to self-determination, we feel a special solidarity with the Lithuanian people, having experienced the intervention of the Canadian army in 1970, as a result of the War Measures Act.

I hope that Lithuania will be able to continue on its peaceful and democratic way towards freedom. I also hope that the will of its people is respected by the entire international community.

Furthermore, I hope that in the not too distant future, our two countries, Quebec and Lithuania, will be able to work together as sovereign nations.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, last night Canadians sat in their living rooms and listened with shock as reports confirmed our worst fears, that war had begun in the Middle East.

Now that the United Nations effort has begun we, as Canadians, have to come together in support of our soldiers, men and women, who have placed themselves at risk to restore world order.

The world through the United Nations has taken a stand against the naked aggression of Saddam Hussein. We must stand together to ensure the principles as set forth in the UN charter are upheld.

Former Prime Minister John Turner perhaps put it best when he said that we are all citizens of the world. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we all have a responsibility to share in the collective security of our world and the action which began last evening was the first step to realizing that objective.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Today, for the first time in 40 years, Canada is at war. During the past few months, the Liberal Party has urged the government not to choose the war option. Today, now that the war has started, we will do everything that is necessary to support our Canadian military men and women who are fighting today in the gulf. We want to see them safely back in Canada as soon as possible. I therefore want to ask the Prime Minister: Could he inform the House whether Canadian forces were directly involved in the military operations against Iraq? If so, could he tell us how many casualties there were, if any?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, unless there has been some last minute information, no, there was no involvement of Canadian troops and as far as I know, there were no casualties at all. My hon. friend referred to there being a war option. Canada did not choose that option. It was Saddam Hussein who started a war against his neighbour on August 2. Canada, after entirely admirable attempts with other countries, sought peace and all our efforts supported a lasting peace. However, every attempt was rebuffed by Saddam Hussein. At the very last minute and once the die was cast, Canada joined the other countries defending the interests of the United Nations and in so doing defended the interests of peace in the world.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is encouraging to learn that there have been no Canadian casualties so far. As I said, while we had hoped that Canada would not be in this war at this time, we will, as Canadians, do everything we can to support the Canadian men and women who are fighting in the gulf.

In light of that, will the Prime Minister report to members of Parliament and Canadians on a daily basis on how the Canadian forces are doing in the Persian Gulf?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will of course be happy to report, not only today, but many times as the relevant information becomes available to me.

We also have offered, and I will be happy to repeat the offer, regular confidential briefings for the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party in regard to developments in the gulf, the details of which it might not be in the public interest to divulge at a given time. We will share with the opposition.

I understand that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be responding to invitations from parliamentary committees. We would look forward to the co-operation of all members of Parliament. To that end we will share with my friends, the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party, any and all information that we can. I will make any reports that I can make to the House and the country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Prime Minister for his answer.

As the Prime Minister knows, the United Nations Security Council was in emergency session overnight last night.

Can the Prime Minister advise the House exactly what Canada is doing in the United Nations to bring about an early cease-fire? What is Canada doing today to seek an end to this tragic conflict as soon as possible?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, earlier today, following a cabinet meeting, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs to be in direct touch with Perez de Cuellar, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, both in regard to the peace plan, elements of which were submitted by Canada in writing as a possible initiative last week and also to consider any possible alternatives even at this late hour which might bring an end to hostilities.

The fact of the matter is that all that is required to end the hostilities is a clear signal from Saddam Hussein that he, even at this late moment, is in the process of withdrawing from the illegally-occupied country. To this end, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has communicated earlier today with the Secretary-General of the United Nations and I know he would be happy to respond to any question in the House in regard to details.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could follow up on the statements made by the Prime Minister in regard to that.

In addition to the contacts made with the Secretary-General, we know this morning that the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the United States, General Powell, indicated that there would be no cessation of the bombing until they had completed their program in order to undertake any kind of diplomatic initiative.

Has the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs been in consultation with our allies in this coalition, not just on military matters but to see whether there could be diplomatic initiatives that would secure the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait so as to end the loss of life before it becomes too extravagant and to exaggerated and there are far too many people killed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that the comment to which my hon. friend refers at the head-of-government level came from Prime Minister Major. He indicated a strong disinclination by Her Majesty's government to cease hostilities at this time in the absence of a clear signal from Saddam Hussein. The British, like all of us, fear that he would use that time to regroup and to mount an assault against allied troops. That we will not have.

But if there were a clear signal from him saying that finally, after all this time, he was going to respect the will of the United Nations, then Canada would immediately pursue the call that my colleague made to the Secretary–General of the United Nations earlier today, and energize plans that hopefully would arrest the growth of hostilities and bring them to an end.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could ask the Prime Minister or the secretary of state to qualify that even further.

The Prime Minister says that they are awaiting a signal from Saddam Hussein. In order to have a signal, one has to have an open line of communication. We are wondering if the members of the coalition, including our own country, have maintained diplomatic contact with the Iraqis in order to maintain that line of communication to determine if there is any willingness—

Mr. Crosbie: The CNN.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): No, not the CNN. I am not sure that that is the appropriate means for these initiatives to take place.

The fact of the matter is: Are we maintaining those open lines of communication? Have we determined from our allies, particularly the United States which is leading this coalition, whether they are prepared to undertake diplomatic initiatives to secure the withdrawal, which is the stated end, without continuing the conflict and the military action so that we can have an end to this very severe and tragic loss of life?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been clear for some time that the purpose of the coalition has been to have Saddam Hussein respect the Security Council resolutions and get out of Kuwait.

I think the hon. member and the House would agree that, whatever our expertise, it would be very risky for Parliament to try to make, on the floor of the House of Commons, the kinds of military decisions that the hon. member is talking about.

He is, as I understand it, asking us whether we have suggested, now that a military operation has begun, that we should interpose a pause before there has been a response from Saddam Hussein. If he is not recommending that, I am relieved, because I think the House would understand that that would be a very counter productive policy in the circumstances.

He asks if lines are open. Yes, lines are open. The situation is, as it has been for some time, that the responsibility to respond rests now with Saddam Hussein. I think that the member would agree, and I think most Canadians would agree, that it would be unwise for the rest of the world to act on an assumption that Saddam Hussein would respond any particular way without having heard from him. He is the aggressor. He is the person who can end the aggression. After yesterday, he has extraordinary reason to end that aggression. We hope he will send that signal.

Lines are open both to Canada through the Holy See and to other members of the coalition. We hope he will avail himself of that opportunity. Then, as the Prime Minister has said, certainly Canada would be prepared to move very quickly.

As was clear in my conversations today with Secretary–General Perez de Cuellar, the United Nations is putting itself in a position to be able to respond very quickly.

The House would have wanted me to, as I did, ensure the Secretary–General that Canada would be prepared to co–operate in any way and as expeditiously as possible with further initiatives by the United Nations.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it has been announced that Canada will be one of a minority of countries among the multinational coalition to place its troops on active combat duty. My party opposed its action yesterday afternoon. We did so last night, and we continue to oppose this action today.

I would suggest to the Prime Minister that, rather than being a symbolic presence for war, why should Canada's role not be to be an effective force for peace?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Would the Prime Minister not consider removing Canadian troops from combat duty in the gulf and re–deploying our forces to provide the military assistance that will be required to deliver humanitarian, medical and food aid to the region?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with respect, I have difficulty in understanding the argument of my hon. friend.

She indicates that Canada is a symbolic presence for war. Canada is not a symbolic presence for war. Canada has a real presence designed to enforce the reality of the United Nations. We believe the United Nations is the only international body that can procure a durable peace. That has been a consistent policy of the House for over 40 years and we plan to respect it. With regard to the symbolism of the G-7 nations, Canada has the fourth largest deployment of forces in the region of the entire G-7. That is because we believe that strongly in the United Nations.

• (1430)

We believe, reluctantly but of necessity, along with the rest of the industrialized world and apparently most other people in the world who believe in freedom and liberty, that the cause of liberty and the cause of freedom is best served, given the absolute intransigence of Saddam Hussein, by the actions taken to enforce the will of the United Nations yesterday.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I agree finally with the Prime Minister on one item, and that is, that the United Nations should be the force for enforcing and finding an enduring peace—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: —and I believe it can be as long as it does not operate solely on the old world order and does truly become a new world order.

I would like to pursue further the point that I made earlier to the Prime Minister. I have been in contact with a number of international aid organizations today and they all say that there is an urgent need for a number of humanitarian activities which now require military assistance. They require air and sea escort to protect ships bringing medical and other humanitarian aid to the region, to protect refugees in the region and to ensure that food reaches the some four million starving people in the Horn of Africa.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Will he make our military resources available to accomplish these very important objectives which are also life and death objectives?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what the hospital arrangements of this government deployed yesterday are in the process of doing.

Ms. Mitchell: That's not possible.

Mr. Mulroney: The NDP says no. But we are there to assist allies. We are there to assist all in the area. We are there to respond to the requirements of the Geneva Convention. Surely, that is at least something that the NDP should applaud; that Canada provides hospital facilities to look after the injured or wounded. Surely this is in keeping with our humanitarian traditions.

My hon. friend says—and I think I am quoting her accurately—"The United Nations should be the instrument to enforce the requirements of peace". Indeed. But how do you do it? How do you do it when confronted by a brutal aggressor who refuses to withdraw? You either make speeches or you stand up after a period of time and say enough is enough and the civilized world has said to Saddam Hussein, enough is enough, and you must leave Kuwait.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, when it is a question of whether we take the risk of war or we take the risk of more talking, I would suggest that we should take the risk of more talking.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Ms. McLaughlin: My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Although the Prime Minister did say last night that obviously all diplomatic avenues must be explored, it is not too late—quite the contrary—to stop this war, and Canada can and must play a role. Will the Prime Minister use his good offices to work towards peace and instruct our United Nations diplomats to begin the formalities required to convene an international conference on the Middle East?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, again in the preamble of the question of my hon. friend, she makes an interesting statement.

The leader of the NDP says we must take the risk of war or the risk of more talking. But the war began on August 2 when Iraq invaded an innocent neighbour state. It was a declaration of war on an innocent fellow Arab nation. That was what began the war, not anything that the United States, the United Kingdom, France or Senegal or Canada has done. We are in there to protect the peace. Saddam Hussein is responsible for the war.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: Now, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the second part of my friend's question, as I just said, the Secretary of State for External Affairs did get in touch with the Secretary-General of the United Nations this morning. He told him that Canada is quite prepared to initiate fresh diplomatic propositions or to devise political action on the four basic elements already transmitted to the Secretary-General last week. As soon as the world gets a clear signal that Saddam Hussein will abide by the provisions of the UN resolution and withdraw from Kuwait, the United Nations would be prepared to respond with the active support of Canada.

[English]

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Canadians will want to know exactly what role Canadian forces are playing in the gulf now, specifically what missions they will be carrying out—both the planes and the ships.

Can the minister tell us what that role is, will be, and exactly what danger it is likely to put our forces in now and in the future.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, since hostilities commenced, as the January 15 deadline established by the United Nations had passed, the role of Canada's fighter squadron has been that of combat air patrol, the same role that was provided before January 15, before the change in circumstances. That was the responsibility of the Canadian forces last evening. For the near term, I anticipate that to be the role which they will take.

The authorization of sweep and escort for the Canadian fighter squadron does not mean that they will participate in that role, but it means that they are available to the tactical commanders to participate if they can assist in removing Saddam Hussein from Kuwait.

As to our naval task force, it is assembled to provide defensive support and resupply among a group of other nations. The two destroyers are providing, along with vessels of other nations, air defensive support to the combat logistic group. They, as the hon. member and others are aware, would not operate in the very northern tip of the gulf. They would operate in providing resupply at sea in a less hostile area. They, along with the Canadian destroyers and air defence vessels of other nations, are providing the defensive task force or the grouping for those Canadian ships and ships of other nations.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. Will any further Canadian forces be going to the gulf, specifically CF-18s? Have any been requested from other countries? Have any been recommended by the Chief of Defence Staff? Has the government offered any further Canadian forces, specifically CF-18s, to other countries?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, I know, is aware that the addition of the six CF-18s, plus the Boeing 707 air refueller into the Persian Gulf area, is part of our air squadron which allows the squadron to now maintain a combat air patrol on a 24-hour, seven-day a week basis. The provision of the Boeing 707 refueller allows for opportunity of refuelling for other nations.

There has not been a request, Mr. Speaker, nor was there a request when we provided the additional aircraft. It was provided on the advice of the Chief of Defence Staff. The answer to the third question is no, there has not been a recommendation to provide more CF-18s. We believe that the 24 that are there with the support staff and supply personnel and form a workable squadron are making a contribution and doing good work.

I can say to the hon. member that if at some time some of those assets or personnel are lost, we are prepared to replace them, and replace them on an ongoing basis.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Given the reaction of the Secretary General of the United Nations after hostilities commenced last night, and given the announcement by White House spokesman Marvin Fitzwater that the coalition forces have joined the United States in the liberation of Kuwait, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the government considers what is going on now in the Persian Gulf a United Nations controlled operation, or does it not?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, part of the answer to the hon. member's question is that the authority for the activity that is taking place now, that of hostility and the use of force to remove Saddam Hussein from Kuwait, falls under the auspices of the United Nations and the authority of the United Nations to the collaborating nations.

As the hon. member would know, Canada has tactical command of assets, materiel and personnel of other nations. That being said, the over-all command of the assets of all the collaborating nations involved in the hostilities in enforcing the UN resolution 678 to remove Saddam Hussein fall under the over-all command of General Norm Schwarzkopf. That being said, we must recognize that when Canada accepts tactical control and command of assets and personnel of other nations, naturally Canada has assigned the tactical control of its assets to the over-all command.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I do thank the minister for his answer to my question. I believe I understand the interpretation.

I would like to ask the minister perhaps in another way, does the Government of Canada intend to ask the Secretary General of the United Nations to invoke the necessary measures in the United Nations charter to make this a UN-controlled operation?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the answer to the hon. member's first question dealt with the authority, he knows the only appropriate instrument to my knowledge within the United Nations charter at this time for this event happens to be the military committee. I think he realizes and understands the military committee of the United Nations has been inactive for several years. Because of the cold war, that may change in the future, but it has not changed at this date.

I am sure the hon. member would agree with me that having national command, Canadian command of Canadian men and women and assets in the Persian Gulf, is much better than abdicating the command to a committee.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Many Canadians, while praying for the safety of our forces in the gulf, deeply believe that this war and Canada's participation in this war is a tragic mistake.

I want to ask the Prime Minister the following question: George Bush said last night that this war would not be another Vietnam. In view of this statement, will the Prime Minister urge Canada's allies, and in particular the United States, not to use nuclear weapons in any circumstances in this war? And will he further urge the United States and our allies to withdraw all nuclear weapons from the area to avoid the possibility of a devastating accident?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the particular hon. member becomes more irresponsible and more outrageous every day. He knows that there has never been any question of the use by the coalition of nuclear weapons in this conflict. He knows that, but he hopes that he might be able to create some fear among Canadians and so he poses that irresponsible question in this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. He will surely recognize that if what he says is accurate there should be no nuclear weapons in the theatre of war.

Earlier in Question Period the Prime Minister stated that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be appearing before the external affairs committee today or tomorrow. We welcome that assurance that he will be before the committee at this very critical time.

I want to ask the minister to confirm the earlier statement of the Prime Minister that he will be appearing before the external affairs committee today or tomorrow and to ask the minister specifically: Will he call for an immediate end to hostilities, for a pause for peace in this tragic war, if indeed the Iraqi offensive capability has been eliminated and wiped out, as the United States says?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that discussion of committee business is in order on the floor of the House in Question Period.

The committee knows that, because I have some responsibilities that arose from developments overnight, I am not able to take part in a committee hearing today. It also knows that I have regularly made myself available and intend to continue to do that.

With regard to the positions that have been put forward by the hon. member, I hope he will, in his questions in committee and in his conduct in this House, remember that his responsibilities as a member of Parliament go beyond using this place as a forum. They extend to accepting some element of responsibility for protecting the reputation and advancing the interests of this country.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

I have considerable concern about his response to my colleague's question about the role of the UN. This government has insisted that our collaboration at this time in the war in the gulf is under UN operation. At this time the UN system is on the knife edge of success or failure.

I would like the minister to clarify for us right now what his statement was. It sounded as if he were saying that Canadian forces under Canadian command, with U.S. tactical over-all command, was better than UN command. Is that so?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not what I said. I said in this case that there was nothing I was aware of that was available under the UN to command Canadian forces, except the military committee of the United Nations.

• (1450)

As the hon. member and her colleagues know, the military committee of the United Nations has not functioned over the past number of years. I would also suggest to the hon. member that the safety and opportunity for success of that command of Canadian men and women serving Canadian will to reinforce the resolutions of the United Nations is much better under Canadian national command than under the command of a committee.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

It is quite disturbing to try to understand what this government's commitment is to the United Nations. I believe that war must be always seen as failure. Conflict resolved by war is not a recipe for peace. Canada has traditionally played a role as peacekeeper, yet at the present time we find ourselves as combatants in the present crisis.

Can the Prime Minister tell us if there is active planning at this time for Canada to play a future peacekeeping role at the United Nations?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs discussed that point specifically with the Secretary-General of the United Nations earlier today. The Secretary-General of the UN was, as has already been reported to the House, particularly gratified by not only Canada's support but Canada's interest in putting forward some innovative ideas to try to be helpful.

My hon. friend raises a very perplexing question. She says that it is troubling to understand our commitment to the United Nations. What could be clearer than the commitment of this government and this House to the United Nations, when the United Nations at the moment of its greatest challenge invited as a result of a Security Council resolution all members to come to the aid of the United Nations? They sent out an appeal for aid to the United Nations to sustain the United Nations at the moment of its greatest challenge. Canada heard the appeal and Canada responded in the manner that I indicated last night.

Perhaps I may just very briefly respond to the important question raised by my friend and by some of her colleagues in regard to the United Nations in earlier circumstances and the command structures. Since there seems to be some people who take offence at the involvement of an ally, the United States, in these matters, I refer my hon. friend to a statement made by Prime Minister St. Laurent in this House in regard to Korea and the command structure there. He said on September 1, 1950: "They (the Americans) were the only ground troops available to render immediate assistance to the arms of the South Koreans themselves", and I think it is important to underline this. Mr. St. Laurent said: "they have done it in such a magnificent and heroic manner that it makes it, I think, all the more encouraging for other members of the United Nations to follow under their leadership". That is what Mr. St. Laurent said.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): The UN flag.

Mr. Mulroney: The UN flag. Mr. Pearson said in regard to the United Nations command: "We know of course that the most important member of the United Nations in this particular matter is the United States. It is the country best able to intervene in this matter as an agent of the United Nations and it has already acted effectively".

That was Mr. Pearson's position. That was Mr. St. Laurent's position, and that is the position of the Government of Canada.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since the long-range goal for the gulf region must be peace and stability, it is essential, even in war, to prepare an environment which can produce that peace and stability after the conflict.

Consequently, I want to ask the minister: What is the government doing to minimize attacks on civilians and the destruction of civilian targets? Has the minister conveyed this view to the United States and to other allies in the coalition?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may make two quick comments in response, one is that again I think that while it is perfectly appropriate for us to debate the consequences of some of these matters in a House like this, none of us would pretend to be military commanders. Decisions have to be taken as to the most effective way in which an end can be brought most quickly to an aggression.

Second, I would remind the member and the House that the victims of this aggression in Kuwait were very clearly civilians. They still are. I laid upon the table of the House yesterday a report of Amnesty International, now old, which is to say that it has not caught up to date with some of the continuing atrocities involved with the occupation by Iraq of Kuwait.

I certainly agree with the member. We must do everything we can to bring this to an end as quickly as possible. That means a very effective military action. That has begun. It also means that the world must be ready very quickly to move to re-establishing a peace when that opportunity arises. It was precisely that that I discussed with the Secretary-General of the United Nations when I called him earlier today.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I did not find the minister's answer very assuring. Two wrongs don't make a right. I hope that everything possible will be done to minimize the killing of civilians and the attacks on civilian centres.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, considering our hopes for a speedy end to this unfortunate war, is the government, together with the United Nations, prepared to initiate a plan for peace for this area, a plan that will guarantee development and justice for these peoples once the war is over?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is not quite clear whether the hon. member is referring to the gulf area. That is the area we are talking about? Fine.

Yes, we are prepared to consider ways to ensure peace and provide a basis for prosperity, if these countries are willing to support a more democratic system of government in the area. I think everyone will understand that after the war, this area will undergo profound changes, whatever the nature of the resolution may be. In future it will no longer be possible to maintain the kind of regime that existed in certain countries in the gulf. Canada is prepared to play an active role in bringing about those changes.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House, the hon. member for Abitibi spoke eloquently about a demonstration in Val d'Or for peace in the Persian Gulf. This demonstration attracted over 500 participants, including Quebecers represented by this Conservative member, people who are against war and against this one.

Will the Prime Minister listen to his own members from Quebec? Will he announce in this House today that the Canadian Armed Forces will take no part in offensive actions in the gulf?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well that last night the government announced an international policy consistent with the actions initiated last August and September by this government. I believe that last night the Leader of the Opposition indicated that his party intended to support the government in this respect, considering the turn of events.

The hon. member mentioned the position taken by a member for Quebec. There is a wide range of views in Quebec. We find them in my own riding and in the hon. member's riding, and they are all valid. Someone mentioned 58 per cent of Quebecers are against war. I think that ought to be 100 per cent. Personally, I am against war, and I think we all are.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: However, there comes a time when we must stand and defend the interests of the United Nations. In doing so, we are defending the interests of lasting peace in the world. Since you mentioned one Quebecer who is against the war, I will mention another one who supported the government yesterday, Premier Bourassa.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Chambly, for a very short supplementary.

• (1500)

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. One sure thing is that the Prime Minister knows there is a number of alternatives. His member for Abitibi knows there is a number of alternatives. As a former service man I know we have several alternatives other than war, and war with the active participation of Canada in offensive manoeuvres. Here is my question to the Prime Minister: Why would the Prime Minister always insist on an offensive role for Canada when our traditions call instead for a humanitarian role in such conflicts.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on August 2 last there was an act of aggression against Kuwait on the part of Iraq. This was a declaration of war by one Arab state against another. Canada joined the other members of the United Nations in deploring this initiative and attempting by every peaceful means to find an acceptable settlement of the conflict. Despite all attempts, despite all efforts made by Canada and a number of other countries, they were all unhesitantly rejected by the President of Iraq. Following a United Nations decision setting the deadline for last January 15, the countries that defend the interests of the United Nations decided to act in the interest of peace, of freedom and of human dignity which is being vilified by troops under the command of Saddam Hussein. Canada is there, not to play an aggressive role but to uphold the basic interests of the United Nations because the government believes that without the United Nations there will be no lasting peace in the world. That is why we are defending the interests of the United Nations.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I notice that the hon. Leader of the Opposition is seeking the floor, but I must advise the House that it is after three o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister would not want to mislead the House, and truth ought not to be the first victim of the war but—

Mr. Speaker: Is the Leader of the Opposition rising on a point of order?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. the Leader of the Opposition.

STATEMENT MADE BY RIGHT HON. LOUIS ST. LAURENT ON JUNE 30, 1950

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to point out to the Prime Minister that on June 30, 1950, Prime Minister St. Laurent said in this House, and I quote: "It would be our part in collective police action under the control and authority of the United Nations for the purpose of restoring peace to the area where an aggression has occurred"—I repeat: "— our part. . .under the control and authority of the United Nations."—That is not the case at the present time.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Prime Minister St. Laurent may have said that in June. I have no problem with that. But, on September 1, 1950, he said this—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: He made the following statement to this House on September 1, 1950:

[English]

> They (the Americans) were the only ground troops available to render immediate assistance to the arms of the South Koreans themselves, and they have done it in such a magnificent and heroic manner that it makes it, I think, all the more encouraging for other members of the United Nations to follow under their leadership.

That is what he said on September 1, 1950.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are debating a very important point here.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien: The Prime Minister is trying to imply that when the Canadian troops participated in the war in—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I have to say to hon. members that I have no authority to allow this to move into a debate.

Before asking hon. members to deal with the usual Thursday question, I understand the hon. member for Nepean is seeking the floor.

POINT OF ORDER

ARAB CANADIANS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have unanimous consent to propose a motion to be put forward without debate or amendment.

The motion is moved by myself and seconded by the members for Vancouver East and Pierrefonds—Dollard. It reads as follows:

> That this House continue to have confidence in the loyalty of Arab Canadians and in their support of Canada at this time of global crisis; and
> That this House condemns unequivocally any attempt to portray these communities as less than full members of Canadian society.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could have from the government at this time any indication as to what it intends to call this afternoon, tomorrow, Monday and possibly Tuesday of next week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will continue with the motion under debate.

In terms of the rest of this week, next week, and beyond, as usual I would not think of making proposals to the House until I have had conversations with my counterparts opposite that we usually have. I hope we can have those conversations very shortly.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary to the point of order of the House leader, I tried to get your eye in the latter part of Question Period, but I understand the problems thereto.

Uncontaminated by House leaders' meetings, I would like to have asked during Question Period what the government House leader's thoughts are in bringing to a conclusion this most redundant debate that we are presently involved in.

In view of the hostilities last night, should we not have a vote to see who is on the side of the United Nations and who is not, so that we can then get on with other government business?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andre: As usual, the hon. member has the substance of the real question concerning further business. We have been debating this motion for some time now. It is a replication of two resolutions already passed last October and November. It is appropriate that it be brought to completion as soon as possible.

• (1510)

We usually do this during House leaders' discussions, but I will certainly involve the independent members in the discussions to find some way of bringing about a resolution. Appropriately, that should be sooner rather than later.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, this morning the government House leader made a commitment to the effect that we would be advised about the briefings. Perhaps I should raise this as a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, because I was not so advised. I am told there were briefings for many members, Mr. Speaker, but as I speak I can tell you that I was not given access to the same information. I deeply regret that.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I know the matter was raised before. If the hon. member wants to raise it as a question of privilege, I, of course, have not had notice. The hon. government House leader may wish to respond.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I will respond very quickly. I have had assurances from the Minister of National Defence that he, and/or his officials would be in contact with the hon. member as soon as possible. If that has not happened, it is because, understandably, other things are going on. I can assure the hon. member and other independent members that the briefings will be offered very soon.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, my office was notified about 12.35 p.m. that, as an independent member, I was to report to Room 253-D for a briefing from defence officials at 12.45. So I put on my coat, went over to that room and walked in on the NDP caucus. Obviously, there was a problem.

We may treat this lightly, but I believe that we, as independent members, have every right to be notified by the Minister of National Defence's office. I made requests of somebody in that meeting, and I was told that if I wanted to book a room, all the independents would be able to get a briefing.

Mr. Speaker, you can appreciate that it is not my responsibility to get hold of all the other independent members. If somebody was not available, then I could be accused and criticized of keeping them out of it. I believe that the Minister of National Defence's office should have phoned me back immediately. In fact, all the other independent members with whom I checked, many of their offices had not been contacted. This is not adequate.

On behalf of the independents, I would like to say that we would appreciate hearing as soon as possible from the Minister of Defence's office so that we can be informed as quickly and clearly as possible. It is simply not acceptable to be cut off.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's intervention. I must say to the House that this is getting beyond something that be can necessarily be settled across the floor of the House. The hon. Minister of Defence is seeking the floor. I will, of course, recognize him.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief.

I do apologize to the hon. member for Beaver River. As soon as we had the opportunity to provide briefers, we informed her. Unfortunately, the briefing before hers was for the New Democratic Party. They kept the room to caucus in. We apologize. We will arrange a briefing as quickly as possible.

We also attempted to contact all other independent members. When we phoned several of the independent members from the province of Quebec we reached an answering machine. If they would check their answering machines, I am sure they will find that notification.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I fully support the comments of the hon. member for Beaver River. We are in difficult times, unusual times, so I am not casting stones. There is not an answering service in my office but we got the call at 1.28 p.m. or whatever.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

SUPPORT FOR UNITED NATIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead), (p. 16984) and the motion of Mrs. Collins (p. 17150).

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to be taking part in this debate at this very important time.

I would like to point out that since my election in 1980 as the member of Parliament for Athabasca I have often found myself visiting the Memorial Chamber in the Peace Tower. I have very seldom looked at the Korean Book of Remembrance and I was unable to recognize the name of someone now buried in the UN cemetery in Pusan in Korea. These were Canadians who took part in an earlier UN action, the Korean war.

Some of us, as young men, joined the special force for Korea because we wanted adventure and because we were too young to participate in the Second World War. We really thought that we had missed something. But my experience was that, very soon after arriving in South Korea, this feeling of adventurism disappeared when we saw the poverty and the homeless Korean people, men, women, and children, refugees in their own country. Many were homeless and living by the roadside, but they expressed in many ways their sincere appreciation for our being there. Sometimes they offered to share their meagre possessions, perhaps an egg or an apple. That touched us deeply.

But the most important thing going for the troops in Korea at the time was the support we received from Canadians, letters, parcels, visits to the theatre by members of Parliament, visits by the defence minister of the day, and newspapers from home expressing praise in our efforts. There was unanimous support.

The feeling of adventurism changed to one of real pride and the realization that we were there to preserve world security and world peace as a member of the United Nations. We all seemed to walk a little taller and with a great deal of pride.

We fought alongside other forces from other countries with that multinational United Nations group. We fought alongside British regiments, Australian regiments, New Zealand artillery, the Turk regiments, American marines, American cavalry, Scottish regiments, Irish regiments, Welsh regiments, and the Korean regiments themselves.

I am absolutely convinced that if we had not had the 100 per cent support of our government and if we had not had the 100 per cent support of Canadians from coast to coast, this pride I talked about would not have developed. Our schools, our hometowns, and our families were all supporting us and expressing pride in what we were doing with the special force under United Nations sanction in Korea.

Today we have become involved in a United Nations sanctioned war in the Middle East together with a multinational force, over 30 of our allies. Madam Speaker, can you imagine for a moment—and I would ask all members in this House to imagine for one moment—how our troops will feel if there is continued division in this House of Commons? Can you imagine how families of the men and women of our Armed Forces in the gulf will feel if we do not leave this debate with less than the 100 per cent support of the House of Commons?

We must leave this debate with constructive, non-partisan, 100 per cent support. We must give total support, without reservation of any kind, to Canada. We must make sure our troops have the very best support and equipment possible. We must leave no question whatsoever in the minds of our forces that we stand 100 per cent with them.

I urge—indeed, I plead—with all members of the House to end this debate. Put partisanship behind us, regardless of our differences, and give 100 per cent support to our government and to our country, Canada.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment and pose a question of my colleague.

Certainly, I would like to remind my colleagues that three decades and three years ago, when accepting the Nobel Prize for Peace, Mr. Lester B. Pearson, one of our greatest Prime Ministers, said: "The grim fact is we prepare for war like precocious giants and for peace like retarded pygmies." Sadly, Mr. Pearson's words ring true today as this government has chosen war to end the illegal occupation of Kuwait by Iraq.

There is no question that the House and all Canadians have condemned the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. There is no question that the United Nations has condemned this invasion as well and we have supported the United Nations resolutions. But I would like to remind the House that the United Nations resolutions have given us two broad options: the peaceful approach to peace and the war approach to peace. Now that we are at war, let us not forget that peace is still obtainable through methods other than purely military. I would like to underline "other than purely military".

Therefore, Canada must continue to explore peaceful methods of diplomacy and cease-fire to hasten the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. Let us keep all the channels of diplomacy open.

Would the hon. member agree to suggest to his government that the Security Council of the United Nations must be revisited to ensure a new order of world peace that is durable and secure for all generations to come? That is my first question, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize for stopping the hon. member, but this is only a five-minute period of question and comments. The hon. member has made a very thoughtful comment and has already asked a question. Perhaps we should allow the hon. member to answer his question.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I do not believe for one moment that all members of the multinational force under the United Nations are not seeking through the United Nations and making every effort possible to put an end to the war that is there.

I would remind my hon. friend that the Korean war started out as a peacekeeping mission. It was a function of peacekeeping. One country—North Korea—had invaded another country—South Korea. A peacekeeping force was called a peacekeeping action at the time.

I am suggesting that this is absolutely not any different. It is a peacekeeping action. It is one to restore peace and stability in the Middle East. It is one to maintain collective security in the world and we are functioning under the United Nations to do exactly that.

Of course, the countries contained in the multinational UN force at the present time are making every effort to see that this is brought together in the quickest time possible.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I am very interested in the comments of the hon. member. I know that he had personal experience with the Canadian Armed Forces and the Commonwealth forces in Korea, where I also served but as a civilian. I well recall the many Canadian boys who came into hospital with legs chopped off and many other terrible things that happened.

I revisited Korea, as I am sure he did, on the 35th anniversary. The thing that hit me going back was the question of what was achieved in that war? That is what I want to ask him.

There were hundreds of people killed—thousands if we look at all the Koreans. We had terrible situations with refugees. A whole generation of children had their lives put in terrible risk. Yet, now, if we go back to Korea, the people are sitting exactly on the demilitarized zone, almost at the spot where they started. There is still a military presence there. This was a civil war that we intervened in.

I would like the hon. member to explain to me, for goodness sakes, what was the value of that war? What was achieved, aside from devastation and death?

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I would like to very humbly correct my hon. friend. After the Second World War, Korea was divided into North and South Korea. It was two countries: one country under the communist domination, and the other one under western domination. It was not a civil war in the sense that she would portray it.

What we had was exactly the same case. We had one country, North Korea, invading another country, South Korea.

What was achieved? I would suggest that North Korea was pushed back, after the Chinese entered the conflagration, to exactly the line that was drawn after the Second World War, the 38th parallel. North Korea now exists under communist domination and dictatorship.

South Korea has gone very far in the democratic process. It has an elected democratic assembly. We see it is now prosperous. I think the people in South Korea were very appreciative—and still are appreciative when I visit South Korea—of the contribution that was made by the United Nations forces, and particularly Canadians.

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, two days ago I sat down and prepared a 20-minute speech to make on this occasion. I was then ask to amend it and make it into a 10-minute speech.

Before I could make that speech, war broke out, so I thought I would have to make another speech. But I looked this one over and really there is no difference. There is no difference between what I was going to say two days ago or yesterday and what I want to say now. The reasons have not changed. The reasons are the same, I feel, for us being where we are and engaged in this war. I would like to share some of those reasons with members of the House.

Most countries in the world hold to the concept that taking territory by conquest is unacceptable international behaviour. Most states operate by the principle that smaller independent neighbours have the right to exist. Most states also abhor the use or even the manufacture of chemical weapons. A great number of the world's nations, a growing number in the past two years, are dedicated to democracy, a free market economy, and the human rights for their citizens.

Then, there are the Saddam Husseins. The Saddam Husseins of this world are the bloody tyrants at home who cling to power through the use of terror and torture and are ruthless bullies and marauders among their weaker neighbours.

Last year at this time, the world appeared to be poised on the threshold of a new and promising era when we could finally say that the cold war had ended. Saddam Hussein brought myself and a lot of other people back to a hard, grim reality that this world remains a dangerous and volatile place, where petty dictators armed to the teeth with sophisticated conventional weapons and weapons of mass destruction pose a serious threat to their immediate neighbours, and more and more to the world in general.

There is no doubt in my mind that the world is at a crossroads. Either we quickly and decisively continue to co-ordinate our response to these increasingly dangerous breaches of international peace, or we stand back and allow regional dictators to establish and abide by their own rules.

Since August 2, Saddam Hussein has had 135 days to withdraw from Kuwait. He used that time to take hostages; pillage Kuwait; violate the people of Kuwait; threaten Israel, Saudi Arabia and any other country which condemned the invasion; and built up his military forces in Kuwait and Iraq.

Let me dwell for a moment on what Saddam Hussein has done in what he now calls Iraq's nineteenth province. Reports coming out of Kuwait and from refugees and departing hostages indicate that the invasion was followed by widespread looting, rape, and murder. Amnesty International estimates that 7,000 people may have been killed and that another 20,000 are missing. After crushing all but minor pockets of resistance, Iraqi forces began systematically dismantling Kuwait and removing equipment, food, luxury goods, captured weapons, et cetera, back to Iraq.

Eyewitness accounts of the conditions of detainees taken into Iraqi custody and later released also suggest the widespread use of torture. Scores of detainees are reported to have simply disappeared. The rape of Kuwait is all the evidence I need that we are dealing here with much larger issues than protecting oil supplies for the west or blindly going along with the Americans to help protect U.S. strategic interests in the gulf.

It is nonsense and intellectually dishonest for anyone to suggest that this is some sort of American adventure or some manifestation of U.S. imperialism. The British, Egyptians, the French, Syrians, the Dutch, Qataris, Australians, Pakistanis, Saudis, Soviets, Argentinians, Bangladeshis and forces from about 20 other nations are actively contributing to the international effort to get Iraq out of Kuwait.

The multinational response undertaken last evening underscores that the gulf crisis is much more than a threat against the security of nations of the west. Certainly, it is this, to be sure. But it is also a threat against moderate Muslim regimes across the Middle East and North Africa as well as to Israel, western Europe, eastern Europe, the Soviet Union, the United States and even Canada. Above all, it is a threat to the poorest nations of the world, which are much more dependent on gulf oil than the United States and much more vulnerable to hostile actions by their larger neighbours than are the wealthy industrialized nations.

Over the years, Canadian soldiers have justifiably won a tremendous reputation as peacekeepers. But there is more than this to being a supporter of the principles of the UN. There are occasions when to be a good peacekeeper, one must be a peacemaker. This is what I hope and pray is taking place right now.

It is clear what Canadian forces are doing in the Persian Gulf. As of yesterday evening, we are helping "to maintain international peace and security", as outlined in Article I of the UN charter, by preventing further aggression by Saddam Hussein. As of yesterday evening, because of the intransigence of Saddam Hussein, we are in a position to fulfil the other facets of the first principle, which is "to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace".

Critics have argued that taking action against Saddam Hussein is a cynical double standard and that the world in general and the west in particular have not seen fit to respond to acts of aggression and breaches of the peace and international law in the past. Are they saying we should do nothing now? Should we not seize opportunities to uphold international peace, security and law when possible? If not, when? If not Canada, our allies and others who believe in international order, then who will be left to maintain the peace on these occasions?

I have never doubted that in the end, if Saddam did not back down, Canadians would be there to play their part. I for one know that the Canadian men and women in the forces in the gulf will do their jobs well and with courage when they are called upon to fight. Diplomatic moves were attempted in an effort to resolve this crisis. Unfortunately, they were rebuffed by Saddam Hussein. Saddam Hussein must not profit from aggression and he must not be seen to profit from aggression.

We are unfortunately forced to use all necessary means, as resolution 678 states, to implement the will of the international community. We know that Saddam Hussein did not back down. I think it would be unconscionable now to allow such a dictator, who is armed with more than 5,000 main battle tanks, modern fighter aircraft, artillery, ballistic missiles, chemical weapons and a one-million-man army and who has a track record of aggression, brutality and terrorism both at home and abroad, off the hook now.

The multinational UN force simply had no choice. Saddam Hussein has shown a willingness to use force to grab territory, to intimidate his neighbours, to attack his own people and his enemies with mustard gas and cyanide and to blackmail every nation in the region within range of Iraqi missiles.

What we know is that Saddam Hussein must be stopped. We know there is no chance of peace in the Middle East if every well-armed dictator is given a free hand to satisfy his territorial, economic or political ambitions or to coerce and intimidate their militarily weaker neighbours. We also know that if Saddam is not wholly checked now, then Iraq will go on increasing its military capabilities and developing chemical and nuclear weapons to be used against any rival or soft target, even against his own people.

Kuwait sustained and supported ordinary Palestinians on the West Bank when poorer Jordan decided it could no longer afford to do so. This support has inevitably ended since Iraq's invasion. Iraq's petro dollars have not been going to keep Palestinians alive; they have been going into Saddam Hussein's war machine.

At the same time, Saddam Hussein has done all in his power to avoid coming up with any reasonable initiatives to settle the Middle East problem once and for all. Saddam's policy has been to milk the plight of the Palestinians for what it was worth to him; nothing more. This is the enemy the international community faces and under which the Iraqi people themselves have lived for 22 years. This is the enemy the world is confronting and whom the Canadian men and women in our forces in the gulf, along with the other members of the international community who have rallied against Saddam Hussein, must confront.

Madam Speaker, they must not fail. We in this House must be very careful also not to fail them.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, it seems to me there is a flagrant inconsistency in the hon. member's presentation.

[English]

The inconsistency in his position is as follows: He did address the issue of not having acted before when there was aggression toward another neighbour. But why did we not intervene when the Russians went into Afghanistan? Why did we not intervene when the Chinese went into Tibet? Is it not because clearly they are giants in the world? Consequently there is not a great deal we feel we could have done. Or if we had chosen to do something, we would have been really up to our necks in very great difficulty.

With respect to arms of destruction, why is it that we are not going after the U.S.S.R., China, Japan, France, Israel, South Africa, Libya or Syria? They have arms of massive destruction and they are not all countries we consider our allies.

I would like to focus on what we should do now that we are in this conflict. Will my hon. colleague tell me whether or not he believes his government's priority will be to find a peaceful solution to this particular war now? Surely this has to be our focus today, tomorrow and until we find that solution.

Mr. Hicks: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague across the floor for his question. As I have thought many times, all of us in this House attack this one problem from many different angles, but really everyone in this House wants precisely the same thing.

Getting to the point he asked regarding whether or not we are going to make a proposal, we have been proposing peace for 135 days. Not only Canadians and not only our Secretary of State for External Affairs, but also the Americans and, as you know, the Secretary General of the United Nations as recently as two days ago have done everything over the last 135 days. But all it did was prove that there was no possibility of resolving this matter by peaceful negotiations.

An hon. member: What about when the conflict began?

• (1540)

Mr. Hicks: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend asks what about when the conflict began. To the best of my knowledge, attempts to resolve it were begun immediately. He also made reference to the other countries that have all these destructive weapons. He made reference to the Soviet Union, which has all these destructive weapons.

What the hon. member did was to show to the House and to everybody a good example of where peaceful negotiations did work. The reason we are sitting down with the Soviets and the reason some of us can go to Moscow and sit and talk to the Soviet minister of national defence is that negotiations have worked. The Berlin wall is down. All of the other countries with the massive weapons of destruction to which he alludes have those weapons, but they did not use them in the way Saddam Hussein decided to use his.

I do not know whether I have addressed all the questions of the hon. member, Madam Speaker, but I have tried.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member. Although his speech was prepared a couple of days ago, he felt it was still relevant today. At that very time, over 100 students from the high schools in my riding were in my office writing letters to the Prime Minister and to the hon. member's government. I have just two of the 100 letters here from which I would like to read a couple of lines. Then I will put the question.

Becky Bourque writes:

> We are about 100 of B.C.'s youth. We—I personally would like to live my life to its fullest, not having to worry about war or having to bury 3 of my family members that are in Saudi Arabia right now.

There is a second letter to Mr. Mulroney:

> We have spent the last 2 days protesting the war in front of Municipal hall. Around 400 people walked out of school and walked 6 miles into town to say what we had to say. Unfortunately so far it has not done any real help. We are the youth of this world and we will be the ones to live with your mistakes. Please don't make us have to live with this one.

It takes courage to stand up for peace like that when you are a student.

We have had some incredible reports on the results of the first strikes that took place. For example, the surface-to-surface missile threat to Israel has been successfully eliminated, they believe. The Iraqi nuclear, chemical and biological production complexes are expected to have been damaged or destroyed. Virtually the entire Iraqi air defence system seems to have been successfully disrupted.

My question is: With those pieces of information, would it not seem to make sense to take this as now being an opportunity to move for peace and to ask Mr. Hussein to consider peace, instead of beating this into the ground to the point where there is absolutely nothing left in terms of the individual people? I am not concerned about Mr. Hussein, but I am certainly concerned about the men and women who live there.

Mr. Hicks: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her comments and her questions. As I said, we all want the same thing. We are going about it in different ways.

The question she just posed was whether it would be better for us to seek peace with Saddam Hussein. Who phoned Saddam Hussein the day before the attack? President Bush spoke to him personally, according to reports in the press yesterday. He phoned in a last-ditch attempt to plead with him to attempt to come to a peaceful solution. I think we all want peace, and I think everyone has done everything possible. She talks about—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I will have to interrupt the hon. member, as the period for questions and comments has now expired.

[Translation]

At this time, pursuant to Standing Order 38, I might advise the House about the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment: the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona—Lithuania; the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James—Justice; and the hon. member for Hamilton East—Energy.

[English]

Resuming debate, the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, before I get to the main burden of my remarks, I would just like to take this opportunity to set the record straight in respect of the views and contribution of one of the most respected members ever to have served in this Parliament, the Hon. Stanley Knowles who presently serves as an honorary officer of this House, regarding the issue.

The Prime Minister seems incapable of avoiding partisanship, even at these moments. In his effort the other day to try to bolster his case he quoted first from past Liberal Prime Ministers in order to suggest that they would have supported the government's policy in this respect. Then he went on to quote Mr. Knowles from June 1950. He said, among other things of Mr. Knowles' views, the following, as reported at page 16990 of Hansard:

> Mr. Knowles went on to say that "the government has the concurrence of all of the groups in this House in its readiness to support the action", the military action as it then was, "taken by the United Nations. That is clearly our obligation and that way alone lies hope".

Then he proceeded to quote Mr. Knowles further from June 1950 and his comments in respect of the Korean crisis.

The clear implication of the Prime Minister's statement is that Mr. Knowles and the CCF at that point supported the military action and would have supported the military action today.

He added words in the course of his statement that Mr. Knowles never used, namely the words "the military action as it then was". I say that is a mark of complete disrespect to Mr. Knowles. I think the Prime Minister owes Mr. Knowles and this House an apology.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brewin: I should say that through a family connection Mr. Knowles is quite close to me personally. In fact he married my wife and myself in his capacity as a clergyman. I feel very close to him. He phoned me the other day and commented on this issue. He asked me to convey to our caucus and to the House his deep feeling that this war in the gulf was wrong and that this House should oppose the war.

The Prime Minister compounded his error not only by misquoting Mr. Knowles in 1950 but using Mr. Knowles, who is not able to speak for himself in this House, to buttress his argument when in fact Mr. Knowles continues to be a passionate spokesperson for peace.

I rise to put our party's position on the floor of this House today, the first day after hostilities have finally broken out in the gulf. My feeling last night—and I am sure it is shared by all Canadians and I know by all members of this House—was that somehow we had failed, that war is failure. This war, in particular coming as it does at the end of a century that has seen the most devastating wars in the history of humanity, is a war that simply should not have happened. This war is a terrible, serious and tragic mistake.

Mr. Crosbie: Speak to Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Brewin: The Minister for International Trade rises and says: "Speak to Saddam Hussein". Whatever one's views as to how we got here and how we are getting out of here, the fact is that the war is a terrible mistake. The question before us now—

An hon. member: You know why it is.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member deserves the courtesy of being heard and listened to.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, one would think in the seriousness of the issue before this House, that the minister could give all members an opportunity to put their views on the table.

• (1550)

I have not attacked the personal views of the members opposite. I have simply said that this war was a tragic mistake. That is a view which I say is shared by all Canadians. It is a view that I think causes us all to approach the issues in front of us, I would hope, with a sense of sombre contemplation.

The issue before us now is simply: What are we going to do with it? The war has started. It is a terrible and tragic war. The question now is: What can Canada's contribution be to bring this war to a swift conclusion? What can we do to prepare for the day when the war and hostilities end in the Middle East?

We have four basic positions to put to the House. I say, before I launch on the four points, that in our view the war is a mistake and wrong. This view we held before the war began and it is a view we hold now. We oppose this war and we oppose Canadian participation in the war.

The first thing the government and this House should consider is a peace initiative. Clearly Canada is not the centre of the universe. Canada, acting alone, cannot change history and cannot ensure peace. However, Canada is a respected member of the United Nations, has contacts throughout the world, and can begin to work with all other countries of the world which share the objective that this war must be brought to an end quickly to try to explore any possible avenues for peace.

The American generals tell us that last night's raid on Iraq and Kuwait devastated the Iraqi air force and Iraq's capacity to engage in offensive action. If that is correct, now is the time to take at least a brief pause and see if there is a possibility of getting a response from Saddam Hussein. It is clear that Saddam Hussein did not respond to the threat of war. It is a major miscalculation, I may say, by the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada among others.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Government of Canada initially supported the build-up of troops because it believed mistakenly that that threat would cause Saddam Hussein to back away. The alternative response of preparing the world to accept long-run sanctions was really never given a chance as the governments of the world believed that the threat of force would have the desired effect on Saddam Hussein. That did not happen, and Iraq has now lived through 24 hours of bombing from the United States and the other countries in the region.

The time then comes to say whether the opportunity should be given to Iraq, perhaps through the agency of other Arab countries, perhaps through the agency of such countries as even Canada, to give some indication of the conditions under which it would withdraw from Kuwait and satisfy the objectives of the United Nations. That is the first initiative that should be taken.

Second, Canada must begin to prepare to provide humanitarian assistance to the victims of war in the region, to the victims of this crisis in the region. This humanitarian assistance may be required during the period of hostilities, or it may be required when hostilities are over. But the world is going to have to prepare for the eventuality of dealing with the victims of this war.

There are already migrant workers trapped in Iraq. There are refugees in Jordan. The people of the Horn of Africa are suffering a completely unrelated famine and because of the war, relief supplies are unable to get through. We have heard reports from various relief agencies that they simply cannot get the shipping through to bring relief to the starving millions of the Horn of Africa. It is the responsibility of this government and of the people of Canada, as well as other governments, to seek ways to get that relief through.

Third, it is important that we plan generally for the aftermath in the region. This war must end some day, hopefully sooner rather than later. The issue then becomes what happens? How will the area be governed? How will the area be policed? Clearly it is going to be important, in repairing the terrible damage in human, environmental and geopolitical terms that this war has created, to be able to have governments and other agencies move in quickly and in a planned way to provide the necessary relief and to begin to clean up the damage, either directly under the United Nations or perhaps through other agencies and other organizations.

It ought to be possible to bring in engineers to deal with the damage: rebuilding highways, bridges, damaged buildings, water systems, and sewer systems. It ought to be possible and we ought to be ready to move in quickly with medical supplies and services to deal with the injuries and disease that will occur in the region. Simple food, water, shelter and supplies will be necessary, and Canada should begin today to plan for that.

We had a briefing this morning from Department of National Defence officials who had to confess to us that this was not the major issue on their minds at this stage and that very few resources were being made available for this kind of planning. I say it is an important role for Canada, a far more important role than to be involved militarily in this serious, mistaken war. Canada should begin preparing along with other nations through the United Nations for the aftermath. Let us simply deal with the geopolitical damage that is being done, which is another reason I may add for our not being involved as active combatants.

Bombs from the United States of America, France, Britain and other countries are being dropped on the people of Iraq and the people of Kuwait. This will exacerbate the feelings of intense hostility that the people of that region already feel toward the western world. It will be essential, if we are going to repair the rift that this will cause between the Arab world and the rest of the world, particularly the western world, that countries like Canada be ready to move in quickly to demonstrate that countries from the west do not simply involve themselves in bombing the people of that region, but that countries of the western world are ready to help in a humanitarian way. We must be ready to plan that help. We must be ready to work with whoever are the survivors politically in beginning to rebuild the political structures of that region. We must be ready as well to work to achieve some of the long-range solutions to the problem.

There has been a lot of talk about an international peace conference and about linkage. That issue has now passed because of the beginning of hostilities, but the problem remains and will have to be dealt with, with compassion and vision.

The fundamental hyprocrisy of the western world through the United Nations, in moving so quickly on this issue when it has simply failed to deal with the just demands by the Palestinians in that region to deal with the resolutions of the United Nations calling on the state of Israel to act, cannot last past the end of this war. It will be essential that the world community begin quickly to deal with that. Canada must play a role.

Finally, let me say that we must look at a particular and a new role for our troops in the area. The motion that we put to the House yesterday asked for the House to approve the view that Canada must not be involved in the military action against Iraq and the Iraqi positions in Kuwait. This remains our position. It is therefore necessary in our view that our troops become disengaged from the role of combatant in the area.

• (1600)

The government is moving in exactly the opposite direction. It was made clear today by General de Chastellain, the Chief of Defence Staff, that our troops are in fact engaged even more actively than before in the assault on Iraq; that is to say, they have offensive roles in assisting the bombers going in, giving them escort and providing other support for the assault troops who are attacking the Iraqi positions.

Whatever one thinks of the involvement in the past in support of sanctions, it now becomes essential that Canadian military activity disengage itself from involvement in this war, which is itself arguably a breach of the charter of the United Nations. We must therefore redefine the role of our troops. I submit that in the agenda I have laid out on behalf of our party, there is ample role for the troops and for the forces we have in the area.

Instead of becoming involved in the war, they must begin to prepare to be involved in the peace. Instead of being involved in attack, they must be involved in humanity and must be ready to assist those who are the victims of war, rather than to create war itself. These are solemn obligations, and this is a difficult period for Canadians.

Canadians understand the terrible cost of this war. The overwhelming majority wanted our government to speak more clearly against the war. The war has now started. Quite naturally, Canadians remain unhappy with this war and outraged that this should happen. They want our government to make a clear statement that Canada simply does not accept that this war is either necessary or justified.

Canadians also have great admiration for the professionalism of our men and women who are there. All of the comments we have made are not intended in any way to detract from it or from our personal concern for their safety. We do not ask for a new role for our troops because we want to remove them from an area of danger. Canadians, throughout our history, have been prepared in appropriate cases to risk their lives for the values this country stands for. Ever since the end of the Second World War, under the flag of the United Nations, our troops have served in dangerous peacekeeping missions.

We do not ask for a redefinition of their role in order to protect them. Rather, we think that as representatives of this country, our forces have a better role to play than to be aiding in the bombing of Iraq and Kuwait. It is for this reason that we call on the House to urge and direct this government, even at this hour, to change from the course it has been set on, to listen to the Canadian people and to restore Canada's place as a peacekeeper in a world that so sorely needs it.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, let me begin by assuring the hon. member that there are many colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party, including myself, who for many years have monitored the situation in the Middle East. I personally have travelled to Iraq, I have spoken to Iraqi officials over the years, and I have visited the parliament. When I hear of bombings in Baghdad, it has real meaning to me. I know the situation there and I know the people there.

The member has said this action is neither necessary nor justified. I want to direct a few comments to this point because he has indicated the dire consequences of war. I hope he does not suggest for one minute that any member of this House of Commons is not aware of the dire consequences of bombing, death and destruction. He does all of us a disservice if he suggests for one minute that anybody in this House of Commons or anybody across this nation looks favourably upon that kind of activity. Of course it is abhorrent to us all. The question is whether this action is justified.

I want to say this to the hon. member and to all members of the New Democratic Party: I have heard President Saddam Hussein characterized by Stephen Lewis, former Ambassador to the United Nations, as a psychotic person. I have heard him refer to Saddam Hussein time and time again as a madman. The leader of the New Democratic Party herself admitted that at some point in time force may be necessary.

I want to direct the hon. member's attention to this: His party and others argue that sanctions might work, that they should be given time to work, and that approaches should be made by other people, other places and other times in order to change the course of this action and in order to deny the need for any forceful action. One of his principal party supporters has described Saddam Hussein as a psychotic personality. His own party members have described him as a madman out of control. How does he expect to appeal to that kind of psyche? How does he expect to appeal to that kind of person to end hostilities and to listen to reason? How can you reason with a person whom you have characterized as being psychotic?

Does the hon. member not realize that the Speaker of the Parliament of Iraq has said that 18 million Iraqis are prepared to die in this cause because they are believers? How can he talk about peaceful initiatives? How can he talk about sensible presentation? Why will he not admit that this is a situation that cannot be coped with in those ways, get on to justifying what has to be done and back the United Nations actions?

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the interjection from the member because it does really get to the nub of the issue between our position and that of the government.

The real issue is how to deal with Saddam Hussein. The issue is not whether Saddam Hussein is a psychotic. We accept that definition. We accept that anyone who would use chemical warfare on his own people is psychotic. We agree that he has one of the worst Amnesty International records. The mere question perhaps implies that the member somehow is more fervent in his opposition to Saddam Hussein than we are. This simply is not the case.

The issue is how to deal with Saddam Hussein. How do you deal with Iraq? That is the issue, and the member agrees. The question then is how to deal with him in a way that is as consistent as possible with the United Nations charter. While it fundamentally calls for peace, it understands, however, the need to escalate the various efforts that the world community can make to enforce world law and the rule of law internationally.

This brings us very quickly to the issue of sanctions. Again we all agreed initially in this House that sanctions were valuable and important, so sanctions were imposed. In terms of the compliance with those sanctions, they have proven to be the most effective sanctions ever imposed in the history of the world.

There are 115 cases of sanctions since the end of the First World War. A very learned study published in The New York Times and again in The Globe and Mail demonstrates in detail—if the member would do me the courtesy; I gave him the courtesy—that these are the most effective sanctions since the First World War and in fact since sanctions were recorded.

These sanctions operated on a country that is particularly vulnerable to sanctions. It has one major export, which is oil. The member shakes his head. It is really interesting that there has been simply no evidence placed on the table of this House of Commons or before a committee that would contradict the fundamental conclusions of this study.

Let me just deal with how it deals with dictators, which is the final point I wish to make. It has been suggested over and over again that dictators would not respond to this and that somehow Saddam Hussein would not respond to sanctions. Benito Mussolini is said to have confided to Hitler that, had the League of Nations included oil in its sanctions against Italy in 1935-36, he would have been forced to withdraw from Ethiopia in a week. This study concludes that if sanctions had had time to work, this war would not have been necessary. That is why we say this is an unnecessary war. That is why we say this is an unjustified war.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Victoria with great interest. As we have seen, Iraq, under the leadership of Saddam Hussein, invaded its southern neighbour, Kuwait, a smaller country. While this is a major concern to the world and to all Canadians, we are looking at this with interest. It attracted great world attention and resulted in an aggression by other countries against Saddam Hussein.

However, there are similar cases in which such things have been done. A prime example is Cyprus. In 1974, Turkish troops invaded the island of Cyprus and succeeded in taking over one-half of the island, resulting in many deaths and more than 2,000 disappearances. The United Nations has passed numerous resolutions condemning the Turkish action but did not even go so far as to impose sanctions or other punitive measures on Turkey. I have repeatedly questioned the government on the double standard.

I would like to know from the member for Victoria what his party's position is regarding the issue of Cyprus, because I have not heard it. Maybe they have commented on it, but I would like to hear with my own ears what his party's position is regarding Cyprus and what they are proposing to bring to this House in order to resolve the situation, which has been ongoing for 16 years.

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, I simply am not going to respond, much as I would love to do so and get into a discussion on Cyprus. Generally, our party has always supported any effort to bring peace to that troubled area as well as Canada's work in peacekeeping. We have sent delegations and so forth. But this is not the day to debate the question of Cyprus and to come to full grips with the issue. We believe there are many troubled areas in the world, but today the area of the world that needs our attention is the gulf. I would hope this House would keep its attention to that subject.

Mr. Karygiannis: You have no position on Cyprus.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, just referring to the gulf, would the member for Victoria tell us: Does the NDP's position of non-involvement extend to the situation in which Saddam Hussein carries out his threat and attacks Israel? Does it mean the NDP would not allow Canadian forces to attack Iraq in order to end that type of travesty?

Mr. Brewin: Madam Speaker, I very much appreciate the question because it permits me to clear up what may be a misconception, one I hope is not fostered by the hon. member. I am sure he is looking for information. Let me clarify it.

Our position as a party has always been in favour of collective security. It goes back to 1939. It goes back to the comments I earlier quoted by Mr. Knowles in support of collective security, and we support collective security to this day. We say it is entirely appropriate for forces to be in Saudi Arabia to prevent further aggression by Saddam Hussein. We have had no difficulty with that, and we entirely support the right of the State of Israel to defend itself. We say that the international community should be ready to defend the State of Israel from attack. This is what collective security means.

Our position, and I thought it was that of the Liberal Party as well, is: How do you roll back aggression that has already happened? When Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait on August 2, it became a fait accompli. How do you then roll it back? Fundamentally it gets down to two choices. Either you move military might in to roll back Iraq and to "liberate" Kuwait, or you use sanctions and you apply pressure through sanctions that will change the behaviour of that government.

All the studies we have referred to have said that such action as economic sanctions would have been effective to change the behaviour of that government and to secure the objectives of the United Nations by removing Iraq from Kuwait. Our argument is that military force was not the appropriate way of righting the breach of international law on August 2. But we fully support the use of force to further protect countries in the region, and we have always been in favour of collective security.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was prepared to speak yesterday, but the circumstances under which we were prepared to speak have changed. However, the motion that we have before us has not changed.

The motion states:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

I might say, Madam Speaker, that Canada is at a crossroads in its life as a nation. Many people have spoken about whether or not we should be part of this United Nations force in the Persian Gulf. I, for one, am in full agreement with it. I was in agreement last fall. I was in agreement last summer. I am still in agreement now that fighting has commenced.

Canada continues to be an active participant in the UN. We are part of the international community and as such we have certain responsibilities that we must meet.

The Prime Minister stated quite clearly and rightly that the violation of the sovereignty of one state by another is of national interest to Canada. We must remember that the UN was created at the end of the Second World War to foster international co-operation and to provide a forum through which disputes could be resolved and, hopefully, war prevented.

An act of aggression has taken place. The sovereignty of a nation has been violated. This violation contradicts the accepted principles of international affairs. It flies in the face of the international world order that is represented by the UN.

The world has expressed its outrage through the UN by saying that this aggression cannot go unchallenged. Order has been disrupted and it is in the world's interest and in Canada's interest that this order be restored. Unless we act to preserve the order that allows countries to deal with one another, we face chaos.

The UN continues to be the appropriate vehicle by which sovereign states can govern their relationships. Canada is committed to the UN because the UN reflects the belief that Canadians share, the belief in the need for law and order.

The UN and its members are necessarily concerned with the violation of the sovereignty of one member state by another. International order has been jeopardized and as such the UN has taken action to express its firm belief that Iraq has acted in an unacceptable manner. The UN has taken action to restore international peace and security and to restore international order, and has given its permission.

Canada has joined in an international effort in support of the UN resolutions by committing personnel and materiel. We have sent the Canadian Armed Forces to the gulf to signify our support of the UN and our opposition to the violence and atrocities being perpetrated by Iraq upon Kuwait. Canadian lives are in jeopardy.

Yesterday there was the threat of war. Today there is a war. Canadians could well be casualties. Iraq's aggression upon Kuwait is a very serious matter. The UN's response, Canada's response, is a very serious matter.

I sit in this House to represent the views of the constituents of Fraser Valley East and to represent the views of Canadians. Canadians have expressed their concern, a concern I share. We are concerned about the lives that have been lost to date and the lives that could be lost. The lives of Canadian forces men and women are in the balance and we have called upon the Armed Forces to lay their lives on the line. We have done this because we recognize that without the principles of law and order and without tangible values society devolves into barbarism and civilization self-destructs.

At this point I would like to say something about our Armed Forces personnel serving in the gulf. They follow an honourable profession and are doing what they have been called upon to do because that is their duty.

These men and women have volunteered to join the forces, not from some Rambo-type motive, but because it is in this way they feel they can best serve their country. In times of peace they are often ignored, but in times of war we seek them out to defend us. They have never let us down and will not do so in the hostilities that are taking place now.

• (1620)

Let us not underestimate what we are asking them to do. While I am sure each of us and every one of them has always known they might be called upon to take part in a war, until now it has seemed a remote possibility. However, now that war is a reality, we are asking them to fulfil the hardest part of their obligation to Canada. In doing this, we have a commitment to them and it is that we support them both with the means to carry out their duties and by our moral support. We have to make sure they know we back them wholeheartedly.

I want our servicemen and women in the gulf and around the world to know that they are always in our thoughts and that we thank them for taking on this onerous task. Their professionalism and dedication to duty is not in doubt and, whatever happens in the coming days, we all pray for their safety and a speedy resolution to the conflict. To the Canadian forces, I say, thank you.

Canada enshrines its beliefs in our bodies of laws. Our institutions reflect who we are and what we stand for. Our support of the UN and the actions that we have taken to date on the Persian Gulf are an extension of this.

In Canada, we have safe institutions which protect our citizens because we have a society with certain values by which we live. When we support the UN, we act upon our beliefs, we achieve a peace of mind, and we give meaning to our beliefs. What Canada is doing, in this United Nations action, is putting into practice our pretension as a nation.

We, in this Chamber, are aware of the costs involved with this war. We are also aware of the costs should Iraq be allowed to benefit from its violation and aggression of Kuwait. We do not take this decision to support the United Nations lightly. Should we fail to contain aggression between states in this conflict, we will signal to other renegade leaders that their blatant disregard for the sovereignty of others could go unchallenged.

We will signal that the only cost to be incurred in violating another state and in perpetuating atrocities upon the citizens of another state is a tongue-lashing by the international community. In good conscience, we cannot allow this kind of message to be sent. If we fail to back our beliefs with actions, our beliefs become worthless. All the good words in the world are meaningless without action. Our credibility is on the line. I do not mean our credibility as a world actor, although that is a consideration, I mean our credibility as a society. It is our credibility to ourselves that we are preserving.

Canada acts within the UN because that organization reflects our beliefs in civilized order. I do not view this situation lightly but we cannot turn our backs on Kuwait. We cannot allow Iraq's aggression to go unchallenged. I am well aware of the gravity of this situation and it is with this awareness that I lend my full support to the motion that we are debating here today.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the debate appears to be centred on whether or not the sanctions, if they had been given more time, would have driven Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait, as opposed to the current military action.

I wonder if my hon. colleague would respond to the following. The former Chief of the Defence Staff has said: "Nothing is getting in or out of Iraq by sea. . .There can be no doubt that the swift and united action of much of the world. . .is deterring Iraq from further aggression and increasing the chances of a solution to the affair without further aggression." That was before the war was started.

Addresses by U.S. Senators Mitchell and Kennedy identify testimony from President Bush, Secretary of State Baker, and CIA Director Webster indicating that sanctions are working.

Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs stated in a letter to John Bosley, on December 28, 1990, that "these are the most effective and comprehensive sanctions ever applied by the international community".

General Schwarzkopf, Commander of the U.S. Forces in the Persian Gulf, and U.S. Senator Sam Nunn have also issued statements in support of continued economic sanctions.

Finally, in a study of over 100 cases examining how well sanctions had performed, Gary Hufbauer and Kimberly Elliott wrote in an article in The New York Times just a couple of days ago that "Sanctions Will Bite—and Soon". "Far from inconclusive, the evidence suggests that sanctions will begin to bite some time in the spring or early summer, with a high probability of forcing Iraq from Kuwait as early as the fall."

With all of that evidence that sanctions and the embargo were having a very detrimental effect on Iraq, how does he respond to this evidence that I just shared with the House?

Mr. Belsher: Madam Speaker, I must point out to the hon. member that he is dealing with some of the motions that were before us yesterday which we voted on in the House. The motion that we are debating today is whether or not the House will continue to support the actions of the UN. That is the motion before us. We are dealing with the motions that were in the UN, number 660 right through to 678.

The debate today is not whether or not sanctions had been given long enough to take further action, but whether or not the House is supportive of the actions and the motions made in the UN last fall and last summer. That is what I was debating and that is what I was talking about. I am in full support of us endorsing those motions.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, I, too, would like to question the member for Fraser Valley East, if I may.

He has indicated in his speech that we have looked at slapping these people on the wrists when they ignore United Nations resolutions. I take exception to that remark because in fact there was a lot more than that done.

Again, I would like to refer to the information from the intelligence service: "This assumption ignores the striking evidence given by the Central Intelligence Agency, Director William Webster, before the U.S. Congress," as reported in The Manchester Guardian Weekly of December 23. The CIA director said "that Iraq exports had been slashed by 97 per cent, even greater than the cut in imports which had been reduced to a mere 10 per cent of the trade before Saddam Hussein annexed Kuwait. The Baghdad regime is inexplorably running out of commodity on which its future depends, money. Oil revenues are the drip-feed of Baghdad's life support system. With them, the dictatorship will inevitably perish." That is the comments of the CIA.

Here we are debating a United Nations resolution which we have supported with regard to the sanctions and giving them an opportunity to work. We have now reversed that decision as a country and gone to war.

I say to the hon. member when I question him, is that merely a slap on the wrist, or should we have not continued on with those sanctions to bring this dictator to his knees?

Mr. Belsher: Madam Speaker, the hon. member raises a very worthwhile question. What the hon. member must remember is that sanctions can only work for so long and that we also have a coalition of countries that were supportive of the resolutions that were passed in the United Nations. We have no way of knowing as to whether or not these sanctions would have taken the desired effect within the foreseeable future or within years as to what was going on.

We do know that Kuwait was still completely under the domination of the Iraqis. A country had been invaded. We know that the surveillance was indicating that they were strengthening and fortifying themselves in Kuwait. They were setting themselves up for a very, very long stay in the country of Kuwait. Action had to be taken in order to bring this to a halt and to get Iraq out of Kuwait. That is what this is all about.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, the tragic reality of hostilities which commenced in the Persian Gulf last night have made this resolution and debate very much redundant today.

• (1630)

This is particularly so because all members have quite properly and patriotically pledged their support, hopes and prayers on behalf of Canada's Armed Forces now engaged in the conflict.

It is important that such a spirit of united concern be displayed for our men and women who are serving there and for their families remaining here at home.

I take considerable pride that on such a serious occasion and for such a compelling purpose, partisan lines of conflict can be set aside and we can come together as parliamentarians in common cause.

Having said that, I think it is also important to be clear about our positions as we have led up to the circumstances in which we now find ourselves.

The hard decisions of commitment are now behind us. There has been vigorous and legitimate debate as those decisions have been reached, first in November when the government's position for Canada to support the United Nations in the Persian Gulf was adopted and, more recently, in the past two days as that position was to be reaffirmed.

The record will show clearly how views were expressed, and I will deal only with my own. I am not naive about the party system, and I have had extensive experience with and respect for the necessity and values of party discipline in financial matters and on normal policy issues.

Frankly though, I have been troubled by the implications of opposition calls this week for a free vote as though to say that members of any party would be willing to subordinate themselves and their consciences to the party line on such a high moral issue of principles such as this.

The facts are that no self-respecting member of Parliament should be easily led between war and peace. From the government side, I can only tell you that the leadership has been superlative both on the public stage and in the privacy of caucus.

The performance of the Prime Minister, of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and of the Minister of National Defence have been exemplified in their respective presentations to this House of Commons over the last few months about these matters but never more full of logic, conscience and commitment than in these most recent days.

If there is unanimity on the government side about the difficult decisions which have been made, and I can only assert my own position, it is because those decisions are believed to be the right ones and not because they have been imposed. Free vote or not, I repeat that the choices between war and peace cannot be forced upon the integrity of any individual unless he or she is prepared to accept them.

In the original debate, on November 28 to be exact, I spoke in support of the resolution for Canada's participation in the United Nations actions to expel Iraq from Kuwait.

With time and events now having overtaken us, I can say again with conscience and conviction that Canada has no alternative but to act with its allies in the United Nations to stop Saddam Hussein's aggression now or to risk a greater catastrophe in the future.

In that first debate, I stated very clearly my own instincts to work for peace at almost any cost and to avoid conflict, except as a very last resort. I said with equal clarity, however, that although peace is the goal we all seek, history has taught us that sometimes to ensure peace or to restore it, we must even be prepared to fight in war.

Such a peace was lost, and such a war was started by Saddam Hussein on August 2, 1990. Now, finally, more than five months later on January 16, 1991, Canada has joined with other members of the United Nations to turn his invading armies out of Kuwait.

I supported that role for Canada when I spoke in November, and I continue to support that role now.

There were personal decisions that I did not reach easily or without deep, personal reflection. However, I want to make it abundantly clear that they were my own and were not in any way imposed upon me.

During the intervening weeks over the Christmas season and into the new year, I have watched and listened anxiously along with all other hon. members and with all Canadians as events have unfolded in the Middle East.

In so doing, I have continued to search deeply for any contribution I might be able to offer toward resolution of the Persian Gulf crisis. Regrettably, I have not been able to much improve on the position which I took in the original debate.

Simply put, the order of law must be preserved throughout the world. The United Nations is the best vehicle for accomplishing that goal and armed force must be used to do so as a last resort in the failure of all other alternatives.

Last night the combined wisdom and judgment of the leaders in the United Nations coalition, led clearly by the United States, which has by far the greatest tangible commitment to the mission, determined that the balance of other alternatives had failed in Kuwait and decided to proceed with the final option of armed force.

I have respect for the concept of collective security represented by this unprecedented alliance under the mantle of the United Nations and, therefore, albeit with despair and regret, I accept and support the judgment and decisions which have been made and are now being exercised.

There has not really been much division in this House about the order of law or about the importance of the United Nations. Where we have had difficulty, and the issue which has really been before us is the course of ultimate action that must be taken to live within those principles of law and order and the work of the United Nations. How is the order of law to be preserved, how is the United Nations to accomplish that purpose? To a very considerable extent there has even been a consensus in the House for the unwelcome prospect that armed force would ultimately be contemplated to preserve the order of law when clearly there are no other effective alternatives.

I seem to have heard, or at least have gained the impression from listening to the leaders, that all parties in this Parliament would agree that at some point aggression must be met with force if there is no other way to stop it.

The Liberal Leader even hedged his earlier amendment with a proviso "at this time". The NDP Leader has also said clearly that she could conceive when force would be a final option. Surely, therefore, that means that no member in this House has a monopoly on the commitment to peace, nor does any member hold absolute purity about the prevention of war. We all share the quest for peace, but we all do seem to agree that force must ultimately be used if necessary to preserve that peace.

What we really have been debating are the questions of when and how the ultimate sanction of armed force should be used. That also puts the debate within the context of risk and responsibility for which there is a distinction within this House because only one party, the government, can make the final determination of risk and exercise the final act of responsibility. In the final analysis, the hard decisions must be made by the government, and that is not to complain, that is the government's duty.

Where there still does remain division in this House now that the time to use force has been determined is in whether Canada should remain committed to collaborate with its allies in the application of that force. I reject that we should withdraw our forces to seek only a peacekeeping role. Canada is not a neutral country. We must do our share to fulfil our responsibilities and our commitments in full alliance with other members of the United Nations coalition, particularly the United States.

Frankly, it is a practical matter of fact that decisions for any action against Saddam Hussein, even the imposition of economic sanctions, would have been sterile without the major participation of the world's leading economic and military power. Let us all be realistic and acknowledge that we are fortunate to have the United States committed so completely to this mission for peace as otherwise it is doubtful that Saddam Hussein would be stopped at all.

Therefore, nothing could be more natural and responsible than to join those allies under the mantle of the United Nations. In fact we are told that Canadian leadership did as much to build that alliance as to follow and support it. It would be the height or irony, of irresponsibility, and perhaps even of cowardice for Canada to renege or back away from its commitments to this alliance in any way. Most certainly, it would be humiliating for us to do so, particularly for petty reasons or false pride about who will be in tactical command of operations at any given stage or any given time.

It is clearly a coalition and a partnership of autonomous nations which have committed themselves to a common and united cause. In my view, it is the best ever manifestation of the ultimate vision of the United Nations which was founded so long ago, one which has been so badly frustrated and fragmented by cold war circumstances so as to have never been truly operable until now.

The involvement in which we find ourselves is absolutely consistent with our historic traditions and our world reputation.

• (1640)

In fact, the coalition against Saddam Hussein would be severely weakened with Canada's full participation, diplomatically, economically, and even militarily. That is among the strongest of reasons for my support of the resolution last November and for my continued support of Canada's position today.

So, Madam Speaker, with no sense of enthusiasm or light heart at all, but in fact with a great sense of discouragement and apprehension, I remain convinced that our complete commitment to the United Nations and our allies in it is the right course for Canada at this time in our history.

We are pursuing a course for world peace and for world order which is absolutely fundamental to the best interests of our own country and should be to all other nations. It is a mission that cannot be characterized as beyond our values or our vision because in the world we know today even the Middle East becomes a close neighbour. We cannot isolate ourselves from reality, nor can we retreat from responsibility.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague indicated that he was supportive of military action, and I think I am quoting him correctly, "under the mantle of the United Nations".

I am wondering if he, like myself, is supportive of the United Nations and so committed to it that he would be prepared to recommend to his government that this multinational force be under the command and direction of the United Nations.

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, as I said in my remarks, I would not criticize or condemn the coalition in the manner in which it is campaigning for peace in the Middle East on the basis of petty reasons about who is in command of tactical operations.

I believe that this is a much more realistic approach to the operations than perhaps would have been possible or operable under the flag of the United Nations. I have heard words to the effect that the United Nations force was not so effective or well managed in the Korean War, for example.

What is unique here is that each nation has been able to retain its autonomy while collaborating within what we are told is a concept of national command and designated or delegated a technical operation.

I would think that this is a very reasonable and appropriate approach to the hostilities in the Middle East at this time.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I would like to say that this motion reinforces the force mandate of the United Nations and sets another precedent for the use of force. Does the member believe that the United Nations should be strengthened with a new force mandate and new precedent of this nature?

If you go to history, China invaded Vietnam. Vietnam invaded Cambodia. The United States invaded Panama. Israel and Syria invaded Lebanon. The Soviet Union invaded Czechoslovakia and Poland. If today the Soviet Union invaded Czechoslovakia or Poland, or China invaded Vietnam, would the United Nations then be justified in using force? Does the hon. member believe that the United Nations would go against China or the Soviet Union with a force mandate and a war to remove them from those countries? Is that where we are headed with world government?

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, I believe that the resolutions which were taken in advance of the actions in the Middle East by the United Nations did establish the mandate for force. It appears to me that the unprecedented alliance which has been created and the successful action which I contemplate—although with considerable apprehension as do all members from present operations—will establish for the first time perhaps the reality that the United Nations has the power of force to support its diplomatic mandate, and having the power of force and having demonstrated the will and capability to use it, may obviate the need ever to use it again.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I must say that, contrary to common practice, it would be difficult for a member to stand up today and state that he or she has the pleasure of taking part in this debate, for this is a very serious matter we are debating, a matter with serious consequences for our country, for our young people and perhaps also for the universe.

The Prime Minister recalled the House of Commons to discuss the situation in the Persian Gulf, but he did so at the last moment, Madam Speaker. He waited until last Thursday night, merely four days before the January 15 cut off date, to recall the House for consultations on the actions Canada should take against Iraq, following the invasion of Kuwait on August 2.

What is worse, Madam Speaker, is the fact that the government put a motion proposing something entirely different from the real reason we are here today. Instead of asking us whether or not Canada should take part in this war, the Prime Minister and his government decided to ask us, by way of a motion, if we supported the United Nations.

[English]

Had we been asked the appropriate question, which is of course should Canada go or not go to war, I would have nevertheless voted against it. But I think I had a right and my constituents had a right to have that fundamental question posed and to have all of us speak on the question that should have been before Parliament.

When I said that we commenced this debate at the eleventh hour, that is not just an expression, for as we were debating the motion in question in this House war did break out. Last evening I had temporarily left the House of Commons to have dinner in the Parliamentary Restaurant when my colleague from Mount Royal suddenly entered the restaurant to break the news to us who were there that the war had begun. While I was grateful for the initiative of my colleague who chose to come and inform us of the news, I must tell you, Madam Speaker, that it is not exactly news that I was looking forward to.

None of what we say today should be interpreted in any way as to suggest that we do not find anything wrong with the invasion by Iraq of Kuwait. I think that all of us in this House deplore and condemn the action of Saddam Hussein who invaded the oil rich and very tiny nation of Kuwait last August 2. Neither should we pretend that we are here to defend that great bastion of democracy, Kuwait. That is not so either. What we are discussing is that a sovereign country was invaded by another.

It was a short invasion in terms of time and a bloody one. Kuwait, with a population of approximately a million people, was certainly no match for Iraq, which, according to the London based International Institute for Strategic Studies, has the fourth largest army on the face of the earth of some one million people. The invasion itself only lasted some three hours, and a few days later the government capitulated. We have all heard of the atrocities. We have seen reports on television of babies being killed in hospitals, of other similar incidents, and of the country of Kuwait being devastated by the Iraqis after the invasion.

• (1650)

The point I am making is that none of us in this House, whether we agree or disagree on the military action, differs in terms of our condemnation of the action of Kuwait.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the question is not whether we support the United Nations, as the motion before the House implies. Of course we support the UN, but we are under no obligation to support all its resolutions. In fact, the Canadian government has not always done so. After all, we are a sovereign state, and we are free to make our own choices.

The question is not whether we are against Saddam Hussein, his government, and the brutal invasion of Kuwait. Of course we are. We have said so, and we will continue to say so, loud and clear. The question is not whether we support our Armed Forces who are now in the Persian Gulf. As was said clearly by the Leader of the Opposition last night, of course the Liberal Party supports the military forces in Kuwait at this time.

Madam Speaker, the question, although it may now have become somewhat academic, was whether together with the United States and other countries, we were in favour of declaring war against Iraq. That raised and still raises objections from Liberal members. However, Madam Speaker, it is more or less water under the bridge, since we have already passed that stage.

[English]

Regrettably, in my opinion, there has now been a military aggression. War has been initiated, and I deplore that. Regrettably again, our country has decided to participate in that war. But, now that that is done, I think it is incumbent upon all of us to support the forces that we have sent over there, even though I am not one of those who thought that it was a good idea to send our forces into active combat to start with. That is done and we cannot, as far as I know, undeclare war, regrettably.

What we must do, then, is support our forces. I think we must pray that our forces will be spared casualties, that this situation will not last any longer than it has to, and that our troops will be able to come home as soon as possible.

I want to return to this whole business of sanctions and why my colleagues and I thought that was the proper avenue to follow, even though of course, as I say, events have overtaken them. Canadians still have a right to know what it is that we thought was the appropriate course for our nation. We believe that diplomatic channels could have continued their work. We also believe that the trade embargo could have continued.

In response to a question by the member for Winnipeg South Centre, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in the House of Commons yesterday, I believe it was, that there was no proof the trade sanctions had their desired effect. The minister was asking the opposition to demonstrate proof of that sort. The question was backward. The Secretary of State for External Affairs should be giving us proof and should have given us proof prior to the military action being launched that the trade sanctions had not worked. That proof was never provided to members of this House or to Canadians generally.

William Webster of the United States Central Intelligence Agency, not one of those folks known to be a dove, said less than two months ago before the U.S. Congress that 90 per cent of Iraq's imports and 97 per cent of its exports had been stopped. Has that changed since then? If it did, by what measure did it change? What is the proof that it has changed? Why was that proof not given to me and to our colleagues in the House of Commons? Why was that not shown to us prior to the military decision being taken? I do not know the answer to that questions.

James Schlesinger, former secretary of defense of the United States, said that we needed approximately a year for the trade sanctions to work and to be able to identify how they had worked. Why is it, then, that all of that advice, again not from people who are known to be peace activists, was not followed?

I want to remind the House of a speech made in the United States Senate on January 10, 1991, in which Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts said the following:

> I urge the Senate to vote for peace, not war. Now is not the time for war. I reject the argument that says that Congress must support the President, right or wrong. We have our own responsibility to do what it is right, and I believe that war today is wrong.

Similarly I say to our colleagues in Parliament who are supporters of the government that they had the same duty; that the argument for members across the way to support the Prime Minister, right or wrong, is itself wrong; that we have the responsibility as well to do what is right. I wish that they would have agreed with me that the declaration of war itself was wrong.

In the few moments I have left, I just want to indicate that the Canadian Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War and a group in the United States calling itself the U.S. Centre for Defence Information have warned that the casualties from this war could be indeed quite severe. They talk of casualties including deaths of some 200,000 people and indicate that 80 per cent of them could be civilians.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I would like to say, in the few minutes I have left, that I hope the statistics are all wrong, not because parliamentarians enjoy being proved wrong but because I hope those lives will be spared. I also hope, and this notwithstanding my objections to this declaration of war, that now that war has been declared, our military forces will be spared and that they will all come back from the Persian Gulf, without exception. It may be wishful thinking, but I can still hope and pray it will happen, Madam Speaker.

I also hope the war will be very short, that Saddam Hussein will withdraw from Kuwait, and that subsequently, the nations of this world will be able to ensure there is stability in the Persian Gulf. We can only hope that never in our lives, not in yours or mine, nor in our childrens lives, we will ever face a similar crisis.

• (1700)

[English]

As the father of two teenagers, Madam Speaker, I must tell you that when war did break out last night—and still today, so long as it is there—it really brings the message home. When one has a son of 19, one thinks even in times of peace about the possibility of war. I am sure we all think of that in any case, but we think of it with a particular focus in mind. It brings just one additional concern to all of us. It does to me as a father.

In closing, let us hope that the hostilities will be very brief, that Saddam Hussein will withdraw from Kuwait and that we will restore long-term peace and stability in the Persian Gulf area.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

SUPPORT FOR UNITED NATIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead), (p. 16984) and of the motion of Mrs. Collins (p. 17150).

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. member who just spoke and the House some feeling from my own riding on the west coast of Canada. I have a petition and some comments that were submitted by the Como Lake High School in Coquitlam, British Columbia, wherein the students expressed deep concern over the position Canada has taken with respect to the crisis in the Middle East. They are opposed to war. They were encouraging their member of Parliament, in the strongest possible terms, to speak on their behalf, to use dialogue and other sanctions to bring a peaceful end to this crisis. I received a similar message in a petition presented to the Port Moody High School Student's Council through Lisa Buckley and Chilwin Cheng. They presented to me a petition with 1,000 signatures, so I have 1,266 signatures from the students at Port Moody Senior High School and Como Lake High School.

I bring this to the attention of the hon. member because this was really done before the outbreak of hostilities. I think the hon. member and other members would agree with me and with these students that there is a deep concern among young people in Canada against war. They are right; they are against war.

I will just ask the member to comment on this matter. I feel that after the shooting is finished in the Middle East—and hopefully that will be soon—the real challenge for the world will be to make peace. We will need a Middle East peace conference to build confidence, security building mechanisms, co-operation, and a feeling of security among all the countries so that this will never happen again.

I am pleased to present those views on behalf of myself and the young people in those high schools. I would ask the hon. member and other members to comment about that position.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his question. Actually he reminded me of something I should have raised myself, that is the fact that yesterday, young people from l'École secondaire de Plantagenet in my constituency came to my office with a four-foot by eight-foot plywood postcard. Members whose offices are in the West Block might have walked by my office and have seen the postcard advocating peace addressed to the Prime Minister. I see our colleague from Simcoe across the way. Her office is just across from mine. She has obviously seen the postcard. It is very impressive, with all the work that was done by those young people.

I want to tell my colleague who just raised that question and brought the petition to the attention of the House that it is no coincidence young people in large numbers signed it. Wars are not fought by people my age or the age of most members of this House, excluding yourself of course, Madam Speaker, because you are far younger than most of us, wars are fought by young people. It is not a coincidence that they have a particular concern about war. Earlier I alluded to that in my remarks as a father of two teenagers and to the totally broader dimension that it brings. Generals themselves are not largely on the battlefields; it is the soldiers who are on the battlefields, the able seamen and other people who are not officers and who are also the younger ones.

Finally, I would like to comment on the last item that our colleague brought to our attention, the whole issue of restoring peace to the general area afterward. This morning I watched the news on television. Dr. Henry Kissinger, a well-known personality in the area of foreign affairs, brought to the attention of everyone listening the fact that when all this is over things must be reconstructed in a way that will achieve long-term peace in the area.

If Iraq is totally devastated in such a way that nothing can be reconstructed, if devastation can be that severe, countries such as Iran and others in the area are potentially attracted toward invading that country. If that were to happen, of course the same process might happen all over again. How unfortunate that would be.

Those who are charged with fighting the war in Iraq should remember that as part of their military strategy, because the devastation will result from that. I suppose that is part of war, regrettably. They should remember that if the devastation is to such an extent that virtually nothing can be salvaged, it might encourage less stability in the area rather than more.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I wonder what the member's feeling is on a related subject.

I just received a call from Canadian Press. The parliamentary secretary, if he still holds that position, might also be interested in this. A ban was placed as of an hour ago on all Canadian reporters in the area with respect to speaking to any soldiers, airmen or navy personnel aboard the ships or in Qatar. I wonder what his reaction is to this ban with respect to freedom of the press.

I have also received another call with respect to coverage of French language television. The reporters are there, but the camera crews are not there on the French CBC side, Radio-Canada.

[Translation]

So there is some concern about the potential of camera crews on the French side and the freedom of speech of reporters. Would you care to comment?

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, the great concern—and I am sure it is a concern that will be shared across the way as well—is that there is a tendency in war to embellish the result that one wants, shall I dare use the word, to propagate. The obvious concern is that people could then put what is known as the spin that they like on the news. In other words, they could orchestrate the news in such a way as to give the appearance that they want, rather than informing the people about what is actually happening.

There is another concern that I have. It is in relation to the United States way of doing things. I do not criticize the United States in at regard. It has its own way of doing things; it is just not my way. The United States military generally operates in that kind of fashion, which is the one my colleague from Mount Royal has just described. I am concerned about the following two possible scenarios and I hope that someone on the government side is able to react to them. I am wondering if the United States military is now controlling Canadian access to information in regard to this war or, alternatively, have we as a country adopted its way of controlling access to information? Which is it?

I am reminded by my hon. colleague from Mount Royal that it has been said many times that the first casualty of war is truth. No doubt if there is that kind of control on the media, that casualty will definitely be first again.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, as many know, I have been anxious to return to the House of Commons to receive the most up-to-date information, to discuss, and to speak on the involvement of Canada and Canadians in the gulf conflict.

The war started before I was able to speak today, but I have listened to the most up-to-date information and certainly I have listened to a lot of discussion that has taken place in the last few days.

I am still pleased to be able to speak publicly and have the opportunity to do so about national interests, international law and security, and political and economic stability, as well as the fate of our international order.

For my part this is a very difficult, momentous and personally concerning consideration. Supporting the government motion is a vote of reaffirmation of Canada's vote in favour of 12 United Nations resolutions, ending with Resolution 678 that set the deadline of January 15 to use all necessary means to uphold all the prior UN resolutions.

Essentially the issue that is before us is what are we doing about Saddam Hussein and his troops, and what are we doing, how are we doing and how are we feeling about getting him out of Kuwait.

I believe that no one in the House disagrees with the need to deal with Saddam Hussein and his Armed Forces. Rather, it seems what has divided us has been the best means of how we go about doing it.

I do not think the choice is simply between war and peace. I cannot believe that any of us honestly opt for war if we did not have to end aggression. We do not want it, but he has brought it upon a small country next door.

What has really been at issue is the best viable means to go about having Saddam Hussein move out of Kuwait. I am fully in support of peace. I do not relish the thought of warfare that is going on or the loss of any human life. I am like the Prime Minister of Canada in that we believe that all diplomatic means must have been looked at and examined before January 15 and up to to January 16, the day the war started.

In my riding of Sarnia—Lambton, one does not have to go far to find support for this line of thought. On Monday of this week, about 100 local residents demonstrated in front of my constituency office calling for a peaceful resolution of the crisis.

Throughout last week, I have also met with a number of other constituents, with ministers of congregations, and received a number of telephone calls, and facsimile messages, all echoing the—

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I apologize for interrupting the hon. member on this point of order, but there was an announcement that 350,000 Iraqis have been killed so far.

I wonder if the government might come forward to confirm that number of casualties for us and that those casualties are still accumulating. I think the House needs to know that information.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not think this is really a point of order, but I take it that what the hon. member is saying, and I am sure that should it become necessary, the House will be kept informed.

The hon. member for Sarnia—Lambton.

Mr. James: Madam Speaker, on the other side of the coin, a number of my constituents has also expressed support for compliance with UN resolution 678 to restore international peace and order in the gulf area.

On an issue of this magnitude and complexity, none of us can be said to have all the information or all the answers. As such we must respect the views and the emotions of all sides of this issue.

As parliamentarians we have to make decisions on the basis of the information available to us from all sources. We listen to our constituents, experts and other Canadians; analyse the information provided to us by the government; read the newspapers; and watch all sorts of coverage and information we get our hands on.

Sometimes, coupled with gut feelings, experience and instinct, we put things on the balance sheet and assess the pros and cons. In looking at this issue in this debate, we must begin by understanding why Canada is involved. Historically Canadians have been happy to have their government support NATO as a participant and as a leader. Why? Because of our size and our lack of military might. International order is of utmost importance to us.

The essence of our position is to support the United Nations in its resolutions. We are involved in defence of our own interests in the United Nations and in the invasion of any small member state. We are not involved in a unilateral initiative, but in a collective initiative involving more than 28 countries.

In particular, Canada is concerned about the Iraqi aggression as an affront to international law and a critical challenge to new international order of which Canada is such an advocate.

First, we had to consider economic sanctions and continued diplomacy. Assuredly, this was everyone's first and preferred choice. No one wanted to use force and everyone fears the madness and the cost of going to war.

Second, over the past months we have witnessed the systematic dismemberment of Kuwait. The December report by Amnesty International has already outlined the horrors and human rights atrocities experienced by the people of Kuwait: the reports of brutalization, rape, torture, forcible ejection, and so on.

What would be left to liberate had we waited too long?

Third, were the sanctions effective? Certainly, international trade has slowed. Yet, who is being most affected? Even Maude Barlow who had visited Iraq said on TV that only the poor were being affected. Saddam Hussein has stated openly that he would not deprive the armed forces and the government of what is required.

Equally important, one must also ask the questions: What would have been the difference some six, twelve or eighteen months from now? Would Saddam, by having more time, have developed new capabilities? Would he have fortified his defences? As a result, would the casualties have increased as we waited? Who would he attempt to annex next?

In the end, my decision to support the motion before us has been primarily shaped by eight principle considerations.

First, the international order is Canada's objective through our United Nations participation. The prohibition against aggression which is a fundamental principle of the UN charter can never be really effective unless its members are willing to deliver on their own solemn commitments to collective security.

Second, when asked whether it should give support or walk away, it would be extraordinary if Canada was not participating in a UN action under the charter.

Third, there has been no change in Canada's approach to foreign policy. There is no contradiction between its present role and the peacekeeping role which it has undertaken in the past. Both support international efforts to maintain order and peace through the United Nations system.

Fourth, I am confident that I have been provided straight, accurate and in-depth information that substantiates that international order is being challenged.

In this respect, through external affairs, intelligence is telling us that the sanctions were not working; that the poor are being hurt; that the defences were being built up; and that it was certainly the time for us to enact a time date and carry on.

Any significant deal on the terms of Saddam Hussein—and I say any deal—could have been an extremely bad example and weakened the United Nations for years to come.

• (1740)

Seventh, human nature dictates the need for a deadline. In its absence, would we have had all this shuttle diplomacy that we had in the last two weeks? I doubt that very much.

Eighth, there are strong signals from our Armed Forces of their readiness in terms of training and their mental state-of-mind and, if need be, they are confident that they can carry out the task for which they are ready.

On the basis of these considerations and after looking at all available information, it is with a great deal of concern and consternation, and certainly deep thought, that I support the motion presented that supports the 12 United Nations resolutions.

This is a most difficult and certainly an emotional decision for many members of Parliament on all sides of the House. But failure to vote for this motion would repudiate Canada's support for the major resolutions and for international order that is so important.

So, I pray that this war will end quickly. My heart is with our Armed Forces who are defending freedom and peace in the gulf, as well for their families and relatives at home in my riding and in many places across the country. I wish the Armed Forces a speedy and safe return from the conflict that is taking place.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I ask the hon. member one question about his own personal approach and, I hope, the approach of every member of Parliament.

If the primary objective to destroy all Iraqi military infrastructures has largely been achieved, that the capacity to fight the size of force that has been accumulated against them has been removed, and that the cost of that was a third of a million Iraqis, if that bombardment continues from this day onward it is butchery. It is butchery of the poor, of the people of a Third World country. It is the most disgusting and despicable thing that could be imagined.

Would the hon. member join with us in the House in asking the Prime Minister to ask the President of the United States to stop the bombardment. A madman is being asked to take the responsibility for a nation and stop this battle, but that madman is probably incapable of assessing and responding correctly to what is happening around him. It is the Iraqi population, half of which is under 14 years old, that is paying an enormous and unnecessary price.

Would the hon. member agree that if the casualties are that great and that in three days we see a million casualties and that that infrastructure is gone, that our Prime Minister should contact George Bush and say: "Stop, pause. Give the population a chance to take this into their hands and end the insanity"?

Mr. James: Madam Speaker, certainly I cannot answer according to the figures he presented. I do not know if that is the number of lost lives.

I do know, however, that my constituents and the government feel very strongly about Iraq leaving Kuwait. Certainly, I understand that the offensive action taking place was initially surgical; to remove the ability of Iraq to continue in warfare.

The United Nations has asked Hussein to leave Kuwait. It is in his hands. I understand he is a madman. I have that feeling from the news I heard a while ago where it was announced that they were going back to Baghdad. Probably now they are attempting to work on the people to try to overthrow this madman. It certainly appears to be that that kind of thing might be what they are attempting to do. Hopefully, the people of the country will take a hold of this situation.

It is certainly not the intention of myself or of anybody in the House to see the loss of life of even one person, but we know that in armed combat that is going to happen. I just hope and pray, as he and everyone here does, that either the President of Iraq or those who can take hold of this guy, hopefully from within, have him see his way and quickly move the troops out of Kuwait.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is only a minute left so it will have to be very quick.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): I listened attentively to my hon. friend. We talk a lot about the new international order, and I agree. Would it not be the time now to start sending international signals as to the next step while the war is still on, a war with which I disagree of course? It may have been different, last week, before war broke out. But now that war has broken out, it is not more linked anymore. We should say, internationally, and Canada should be one of the first to start saying: what is the next step?

I know Sarnia—Lambton and I know there are a lot of leaders of multicultural groups there who strongly believe that the time has come to start, not linking, I agree, because it unpopular but to start talking about an international peace conference. It will even talk about the respect for the multitude of the United Nations Security Council on Cyprus and start talking to Turkey saying: "The time has come for you to respect the multitude of resolutions and to get out of north Cyprus" which it has been occupying against every resolution. Would the member care to comment for 30 seconds. I am sure we can give him a few seconds.

Mr. James: Madam Speaker, I hear what my hon. colleague is saying and I know of his great interest in that particular part of the world. Certainly, I would hope that the international order, that what has happened here with the United Nations, with the resolve, with the coalition, and with the allies coming together, will make some very strong signals that resolutions that were put in place will be picked up and carried on with in other places and resolved. As he said, he is not talking linkage and I am not talking linkage, but let us hope that this initiative will then show the way and show an example, being brought to a final resolve in the right kind of way where international order has been restored, and so it will show an example. I hear what he is saying and would agree.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I spoke in this House on November 29 on the original UN resolution to use force, if necessary, to drive Saddam Hussein from Kuwait. We are basically, for the people at home, debating the same resolution. If I may, I will read it, Madam Speaker. It reads:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

That is the issue that we are debating. We are debating a means of getting an individual out of a country that he has simply marched into and has taken over by sheer force, nothing more and nothing less.

On the evening of November 29, when I was speaking on the resolution, I pointed out that if there was a common theme to all that was said in the House that evening, it was the fact that we sought peace, all of us. We all have differing views on particular issues and circumstances but the common theme was simply that we wanted a peaceful resolution to the crisis in the gulf. Obviously, that did not come about. We have used every means at our disposal, all countries of the world have. The United Nations has just worked undyingly to solve this thing peacefully, as has our Prime Minister and as has our Secretary of State for External Affairs, but to no avail.

• (1750)

That evening I got into the personal side of conflict, the personal side of war and what it is like for individual members of Parliament. That evening I spoke of my son's involvement in the gulf, not knowing at that particular time whether or not war would come about but certainly hoping and praying that it would not. But as I speak, he is positioned about 80 miles from the Kuwait border in Saudi Arabia. So the issue becomes very much personalized for me as a member of Parliament. I guess, when I speak, I am speaking not only as a politician, a member of Parliament, but also as a father.

I think that in a sense is what every member of Parliament in this place has gone through. Not all of us have a son or a daughter in the gulf, but all of us have friends and neighbours and associates that do have sons and daughters, men and women, in the gulf. Someone pointed out to me that every soldier is someone's son or someone's daughter. That is certainly true. Those human emotions have certainly come through here in the last couple of days.

I think every member of Parliament has been on an emotional roller coaster, not knowing even at the 11th hour, the 12th hour, whether or not it was going to come to this, come to war, but it has.

Just to review history a little bit, if we take a look at what happened about a year ago in Europe and what was happening around the world, it appeared that peace was at hand in a sense, if we can use that term, that the walls in Europe were coming down; that some of the old traditional barriers that have troubled us for years were tumbling. It looked as if there was going to be a new world order. The cold war in a sense evaporated and we were into a new time of peace.

But on August 2, that vanished. On August 2, Saddam Hussein moved into his neighbouring country and simply took it over in the most brutal fashion known to mankind. He spared no one. Women and children, young and old, they all perished at the hands of this international madman.

Why did he do it? It was simply thievery carried out at the grandest level. One anthropologist told me when I was going to university that that is usually what brings about war, theft at the grandest scale, one country attempting to take over another country, in fact stealing that country. He did not do it for any ideological reason. He did it simply to take it because in the taking of Kuwait he would be in possession of about 25 per cent of the world's known oil reserves and using that economic tool to inflict more pain on other nations as time went on and to take over other neighbouring Arab states at his own free will.

That is what the western world faced on August 2: How do we drive this individual out of this country?

We have used all peaceful means to do that, even at the 12th hour. This individual simply had to pick up the telephone and say that he was willing to negotiate, that he was willing to go back to his home country, leave these people alone and restore international order.

He simply did not do that. He had no intention of doing it. It is the same individual, the same madman, who put his own people through eight and a half years of war with his neighbouring country of Iran, at a cost of approximately one million people.

And then what does he do? He attempts to neutralize the country that he attacked and some of his neighbours who he fought for eight and a half years only to keep them neutral in this conflict that he is in now to do so, and gave up every single piece of territory that he gained in that war.

That is what we are dealing with. We are simply dealing with a madman.

Yesterday in the House of Commons, our former Prime Minister, John Turner spoke very eloquently to attempt to explain to the Canadian people the situation in the gulf in relation to the United Nations. He was very convincing. In his words, it is simply a war that has been sanctioned by the United Nations to drive out a common enemy.

To quote Mr. Turner yesterday: "No, this is not an American adventure. It is a United Nations action in collective security, one of the greatest historic developments of our time." It is one of the few times in modern history when virtually all the countries of the world have come together against a common enemy.

It is unprecedented in history that that would happen. Unprecedented. It is very important that Canada support the world view. We are living in a world that somehow seems to be filled with individuals like Saddam Hussein in various parts of the world from time to time. Madmen.

We have supported the United Nations over the years, and it is very important that we continue to do the same thing in this House.

A vote will take place on this, Madam Speaker, and you might say that it is academic, but it really is not. I think we need to have an overwhelming show of support for our position in the United Nations.

Again, as the former Prime Minister mentioned last evening, we are citizens of the world, and we have a collective responsibility to act as citizens of the world against an aggressor nation. That is simply what Saddam Hussein is: an aggressor who has picked up on his power and ability to inflict torture on others.

If I may, I would like time to finish. Saddam Hussein has spent a lifetime inflicting torture on others. Other members opposite mentioned the cost of the war that we are presently going through. What is the cost of waiting? How many lives have been lost in Kuwait in the last six weeks? We will never put a number on that. Never.

The suggestion is that it is in the hundreds of thousands. We will never know. That is the type of individual that we are dealing with. There has not been peace since August 2, so it is not a question of war and peace.

The question of war began on August 2 when he entered a neutral country and took advantage of it, decimated it—men, women and children. It is up to us to take action against Saddam Hussein. We have done it, and we are very proud of our position.

• (1800)

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, at the outset, the first question that has to be asked of the hon. member who just spoke is how many lives have been lost in just the last 12 hours? Over 100,000 at least. Maybe as many as 350,000 to some counts.

The hon. member who spoke before him spoke of sanctions. The hon. parliamentary secretary quoted Maude Barlow as saying that sanctions only affect the poor. But we have to discuss this in an honest fashion. How many sanctions have been recorded? How many do we know of? How many examples are there? How many missing pieces are there to that sanctions puzzle?

The Centre for Strategic Studies in the United Kingdom told us and then showed us on network television the shortages of metal for bullets and shells, shortages of petroleum, refined petroleum, gasoline, cars and trucks in the line-ups, people waiting hours for their gasoline.

We are discussing a motion:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

That argument has gone on in this House. We put forward an amendment. We lost the amendment.

Now we have our men and women in the Armed Forces at war. These men and women have much pride in the duty they have to perform in the gulf. I know somewhat of the pride they feel. I grew up through the cadet movement. I was a second lieutenant in the Armed Forces for a period of time. So I understand what it is to be proud of that uniform.

My question for the hon. member who just spoke is this. We know what the situation is today. We know how many lives are being lost and will be lost. The question is, what are we going to do from this point on? Is the hon. member aware of any peace initiatives being carried out today? Is the hon. member aware? He certainly has the chance to tap one of the 13 members of the war cabinet on the shoulder and say, "What are we doing now?". I would welcome some information from the hon. member on what he is doing, not only personally, but what he is aware his party is doing to initiate these important peace initiatives that must begin now.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, the hon. member's question was quite lengthy. It goes into the question of waiting, as originating in the hon. member's statement.

One thing that I wanted to point out during my speech is a document entitled "The Price of Waiting. Amnesty International. Iraq Occupied Kuwait on August 2". It is a list of atrocities that were perpetrated on the people of Kuwait, as well as his own people.

This document is available from Amnesty International. I would suggest to the Canadian people who are watching that they send for it. It pretty well documents the type of individual that the world is up against.

That is the price of waiting. Hundreds of thousands have died, sometimes on a daily basis, waiting for this guy to move out. But, Madam Speaker, do you know how peace can be achieved this very night in the Middle East? No bombing or suffering. Saddam Hussein can pick up the telephone and just simply say, "I withdraw from that little country of Kuwait and I will go back into the hills of Iraq". That is all he has to do.

We know what the UN has gone through and what Canada has gone through to preserve the peace over the years. The question is: Can we deal with a madman? We cannot on the terms that he wants to deal. It is simple as that. If he wants to sue for peace this evening, peace will come about. The United Nations and the rest of the world are bent on delivering peaceful decades to come in the Middle East. We will work to achieve that. Canada will work alongside the United Nations to achieve that, as we are this very evening.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, like many of us in this House of Commons, I had prepared notes in the days—it seems days ago—it is only two days ago that we came back to Ottawa to debate the motion that the government put forward. I prepared notes on why it was wrong to go to war and why it would be such a mistake. The fact is that now this country, my country, Canada, is at war.

I find those words very difficult to say. It is not something that I ever dreamt in my lifetime that I would ever, ever say: Canada is at war. My colleagues tell me that the news tonight starts with Peter Mansbridge showing a missile launching. Today in 1991, what have we learned. We have learned nothing. We are at war again when we said war was obsolete.

I have listened very carefully over the last two days to the speeches that have been made by the Prime Minister, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I have read them again. I do not doubt their conviction. I cannot doubt their own conviction. Surely no one in my country could take us to this position if they did not firmly believe what they were saying. What they are really saying—and when I read through the speeches again—is that we must have war to have peace. It makes no sense.

Did we give the alternatives the time they needed? I do not believe we did. Did we give every diplomatic option a chance? I do not believe so. Did we give the sanctions enough time? No. We knew that it took about 18 months for the sanctions to work in Namibia. We only gave sanctions five and a half months. There was evidence, contrary to what the government has said, that the sanctions were working. Until August, Iraq derived 98 per cent of its export revenue from the sale of oil. But under these sanctions the exports have dropped from 2,800,000 barrels of oil per day to 60,000. That represented a foreign exchange loss of $2 billion a month to Iraq. We must see that they were losing by the sanctions. Could we not have made sanctions more effective if that was indeed a problem.

Another thing that I have been struck with during this debate is the use of language. Maybe that is something that women notice more than men, I do not know. I have been struck by the language that the government has used and even the language that various members of the opposition parties have used.

One of the phrases that has really grated on me and I have found so hard to understand is this term "a surgical strike". It sounds like a medical term. What is a surgical strike? What is it really? It is launching missiles on people. It is killing people. Why don't we talk about what we are really doing in this place. Why don't we speak about what it is we are really taking part in today. I have heard people talk about Canadian assets in the Middle East, that is Canadian assets going to Kuwait and going to liberate—that is the other term—Kuwait. What are these assets? These assets are our children, our own young people who are being sent to war, being sent to the desert.

I listened to the member for Fraser Valley West and I heard him say that he was not prepared to send his son to die in the desert sands and that unless each one of us was prepared to send our sons and our daughters to take part in this war, that we had no business to vote on this. I agree with him.

I have three sons who are at the age of the people that we are sending there, the people who are going to war in the gulf. I would do everything in my power to prevent my children from fighting in this war, everything. So how can I support the war? How can I say that someone else's sons and someone else's daughters should go and fight this battle? I cannot do that. I do not want anybody's children to die in this war, not just my own. I do not want anyone there fighting for something so bizarre when we could have used diplomatic measures and sanctions, I believe, to a greater effect and for a longer time.

We have heard also the term the new world order, that we have entered into a new world order. What is this new world order? It seems to me that war is a very old world order. It seems to me that wars fought particularly in this region of our planet have been going on for a long, long, long time and war has nothing to do with a new world order. War is a failure. War is a defeat. I think we must say we have suffered a great defeat for the whole global community by entering into this war.

Have we learned nothing in all of our history, in all of the world's history? Have we learned nothing from the wars that I have seen in my time, the Korean war, the Vietnam war. How many times have we heard in this House of Commons that the war that my father participated in for Canada, the Second World War, was the war to end all wars. Yet there have been countless wars in this world since the end of the Second World War, wars that we have not taken to the serious degree that we are now taking this one, nonetheless wars where people died.

What is it that we are going to do now? What is it that our government is going to do now? We are at war now, but what is the responsibility of the government, of the cabinet, of our Prime Minister, of our Secretary of State for External Affairs? I think that there are options now. I think that the war can be stopped, but I think that Canada must return to the role that Canada has played in past conflicts in the last number of years, where Canada has played the role of a peacemaker, where Canada has had a proud tradition of standing somewhat apart from the conflict but saying there must be nations which are there to build the bridges between nations.

We heard earlier that there are unconfirmed reports that the death toll in Iraq at this point is 350,000 people. If that is true, in the space of less than 24 hours, 350,000 lives gone, is that possible? My colleague tells me that is five times the number of deaths in Vietnam. Is that possible? We asked if there was confirmation coming from the government. This is horror. We are living through a horror. The government has an obligation now that we are in the hostilities, now that the hostilities have begun. Our government must take that role that Canada and Canadians have been so proud of in the past, take that role for diplomatic actions, take that role as a world leader for peace, end this madness, end it now. There is nothing when we talk about support for our Armed Forces. What greater support could we give them than to end the hostilities and end the war before they are hurt or killed?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Black: I spoke about my own family and other members who have talked about their own children, but is it enough to think only of your own family? Is it enough for us to think now only of Canadians, Americans, and British?

We must think of our globe as our village. We have heard this said before, but the destruction that is going on now in the Middle East is going to have implications for a long, long time in our history. If we worried about the destabilization of the Middle East before—my God, even if the war ends tomorrow, what is going to happen in that area of the world? How are we ever going to build those bridges that I spoke of earlier?

I want to urge our Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the members of Parliament on both sides of the House to look toward the diplomatic measures, the peace-leading role for Canada, the role that we must find and that our government must find in order to end this horror in which we are in the midst. The war must be stopped. There are no alternatives than to work towards peace. It is the only sensible alternative and it is the one in which our government should have been taking a leadership role, in all of the ways that I mentioned. I can only urge the government to take that role now and take it quickly.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby on a very fine and moving speech.

When my hon. colleague from British Columbia says that war is a defeat and that war is a failure, she is right. Can you imagine, Madam Speaker, a greater failure on the part of political leaders around the world when they say we have failed to resolve an issue. We have failed to remove that brute Saddam Hussein and now we must turn to the young men and women of the worlds to sacrifice their lives so that they can succeed where we failed? That is the message from the political leaders of the world. We have failed and now young people must spill their blood. I take that very hard.

It is not only we adults and parliamentarians who realize the horrors of war. Just the other day I got a batch of letters from a Sunday school class, grades four and five of Sturgeon Creek United Church in my riding. Do you want to hear what they say, Madam Speaker? These are young children. "I do not want a war because people die." "I do not want war because it kills people." "If it would stop hurting people by war, I would say I would be very happy."

We are dealing with a great issue. I think that we, as parliamentarians, particularly in the opposition—and I respect the decision of the government—have an opportunity and a responsibility to provide an alternative. The alternative to war, in my opinion, is to continue with sanctions.

• (1820)

Why does my hon. friend from British Columbia think they gave up on sanctions? There is ample evidence that they were working, if they were only given time.

Ms. Black: I would like to thank my colleague from Manitoba for his question and his comments.

As to why they gave up on sanctions, it was a mindset from the beginning to go to war. It is very clear now.

I want to read into the record comments that were made in the House of Commons on September 8, 1939. That was a very significant date in Canadian history. It is a comment made by the founder of the CCF, the predecessor of the NDP, Mr. Woodsworth. He said:

> While we are urged to fight for freedom and democracy, it should be remembered that war is the very negation of both. The victor may win; but if he does, it is by adopting the self-same tactics which he condemns in his enemy.

I think those words are as relevant today as they were in September of 1939.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. Before I do, I would like to quote from a couple of articles which appeared a week or two ago in newspapers.

An article in The Globe and Mail of December 19 states: "—forms of torture and abuse, including beatings with canes, metal rods, whips, hoses and other implements, breaking arms, legs or ribs, extracting finger and toe-nails, cutting off tongues and ears, gouging out eyes, castration, and the rape of women and young men. I know definitely about a young Kuwaiti friend who was taken out of the family home at night. Then the family was taken out of the house and forced to stand there while brothers and cousins were shot."

One of the things that bothers me about the sanctimonious speeches we are hearing from that member and her party is the suggestion that there was no aggression and that by waiting there was no price.

How long was the hon. member prepared to wait? If she wanted to suggest that there should be no aggression, I would like her to respond to these reports because, while they may be to some degree unconfirmed, we know there was aggression going on. We know that Saddam Hussein, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated yesterday, was making further preparations for war. How long was the hon. member prepared to wait and see these things go on? Was she prepared to wait forever?

Ms. Black: Madam Speaker, I do not believe that my speech was sanctimonious at all and I take great offence at that comment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Black: I spoke from my heart and I spoke to my beliefs. It was not sanctimonious.

I would ask the hon. member, if he speaks for the government, if 350,000 have been killed in the space of 24 hours, how long will this madness go on? We must find a solution to the madness of war.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I would just like to make a comment on the hon.

member's speech. I would agree with her that sometimes, when we want to help those who have been hurt, we do the same.

I would like to mention what happened in the Second World War. At the end of the war the American Air Force bombarded Dresden and over half a million people were killed. The war was over and the Germans were no longer able to fight. What happened? Half a million people were killed in three days.

I think if we wanted to help the people in Kuwait, we should have continued with sanctions. Sanctions were working. There are all indications that it was working.

As I said yesterday, I had spoken to an American senator who just come out from a briefing with President Bush. The CIA had informed them that the gross national product of Iraq had diminished by 40 per cent. It means that sanctions were working. The war machine was slowing down. We should have waited. This was the way to go, and not to start bombardment of innocent people and children.

So, I do agree with the hon. member and I would like to congratulate her on her speech.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I say again, if I may: "The victim may win; but if he does, it is by adopting the self-same tactics which he condemns in his enemy."

What I have heard Mr. Hussein accused of most in the House is butchery. What we, with our allies, are engaged in in Iraq, is butchery.

I would ask the hon. member, this House and this nation: How much more butchery will we commit before we say: "No! The war must stop!"?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member, too, for her speech. I really do think it was from the heart.

The hon. member was present in Question Period today and heard the Minister of National Defence say explicitly that he felt that it was better to fight under an American flag, rather than under the flag of the United Nations.

I am hearing from people in my constituency that they support what is going on because they felt that what is going on was under the auspices of the United Nations and that the fighting was under the flag of the United Nations.

I think the House was shocked today when we heard the Minister of National Defence say that he felt it was better to be fighting under the flag of the United States. Does the hon. member agree with that?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Black: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

I would like to comment on the comment that was made about Dresden. Is this what we are going through again? Are we going through this madness and overkill again when we are being told by the media and by the Pentagon that the whole infrastructure of Iraq—the war machine in Iraq—is gone and destroyed? Is this what we are going through again? Is this genocide that we are actually seeing?

In answer to the question about the war and the flag, we must stop the war. We must stop the war.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate and to support fully and unequivocally the motion before the House. I offer this support for three reasons primarily.

First, I believe that international peace and security are in the best interests, not only of the world, but of Canada.

Second, I believe in the sanctity of the rule of law as a principle for relationships among the nations of the world, as well as within nations.

Third, I believe that the United Nations is the best vehicle, indeed the only vehicle, for the attainment of international peace and security and the rule of law among nations. Without an effective United Nations and without the maintenance of the rule of law and international peace and security, who knows what kind of chaos the world would degenerate to? The will of the mightiest would prevail. For small countries such as Canada, this could be indeed very perilous. Who knows what such a circumstance would yield for us?

Canadians enjoy a marvellous quality of life. We are an affluent country with abundant resources. In a chaotic world, who would know what the future would be like ahead for us?

It is important to understand and important to remember that this debate is first and foremost about whether or not Canada is going to stand with the United Nations as it has for 45 years. It is important to understand the powers and the role of the United Nations that were attributed to it by its founders in 1945. The predecessor to the United Nations was the League of Nations, and it failed. In the final analysis it could only tell aggressors what to do. It lacked the power to enforce the decisions that it made.

The founders of the United Nations learned the lesson of the League of Nations and its failure. They learned that there was no point in the new United Nations having rules unless it had the capacity to enforce those rules. They recognized that the role of the United Nations must be to arbitrate, to conciliate, to negotiate and to impose sanctions. In the final analysis, if necessary, if all those previous processes failed to achieve the objective to impose its collective decisions by force and it did, in Korea, some 40 years ago with the full support of Canada.

So it would seem the world and the United Nations have again been faced with an aggressor, an aggressor who will not listen to reason, who scoffs at United Nations resolutions overwhelmingly supported by the countries of the world, who allows sanctions to starve his poor, his people, but not his armies, who arbitrarily and without provocation invades another country, declares it his own, steals from its people, wreaks rape and pillage and murder upon them. In the interest of all that is right, this man must be stopped.

If the United Nations can do no more, then tell him to behave himself or tell the nations of the world to wait until he stops, hoping that sanctions might work, then the United Nations is reduced to ineffectiveness. But the United Nations does have the authority to go the final step and declared, some 50 days ago, that January 15 was the deadline for withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait. Because that withdrawal did not occur on time, there was simply no alternative to the option of force, to remove the Iraqis, free Kuwait and re-establish international order.

If the nations of the United Nations, including Canada, are not prepared to back up the United Nations in action like this, then we ourselves become the destroyers of the United Nations. Quite frankly, it is as simple as that.

Since the founding of the UN in 1945, no nation has more consistently supported the UN than Canada because Canadians believe in the UN and what it stands for. It is both obvious and appropriate that Canada should stand with the UN on this issue as it has on so many others.

It is interesting to note that 29 countries of the world have not only supported the resolutions of the United Nations concerning the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, but have sent forces to the gulf where they are now on active service. The countries represented in the gulf are from all the continents of the world, from varying political persuasions such as Liberal, Democratic and Socialist; countries as varied as the United States and Bangladesh, England, Czechoslovakia, Senegal, Italy, Argentina, New Zealand, Australia, France and of course, Canada. Some have suggested that if the shooting started, Canada should have walked away and withdrawn. Indeed, I had a few phone calls from people in my constituency suggesting this course of action. They stand for peace at any price it would seem.

In 1938 that was called appeasement. Those people's views are sincerely held. Their representations were made to me in a sincere manner. I respect their views, but I believe they are wrong. I believe the majority of Canadians agree with me and will support the position taken by this government on this issue. So long as you give into the bully, you will live at his mercy and be controlled by it. You will no longer be a free person or indeed, a free nation.

To those, including those opposite, who by their posturing and proposals for inaction recommend appeasement, I say you are wrong, as do those Canadian people who remember 1938 and 1939 or who have studied their history or who believe that the United Nations is the best vehicle for the preservation of international peace and security. The rule of law will judge you so and will say that this government, this Prime Minister and the majority in this House have indeed shown leadership and have acted in the best interests, not only of the world but of Canada.

There is a second message that goes out from our support of this resolution today. That is the message to the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces, both those now in the gulf and those who may soon be called upon to go. In so going, they will put their lives at risk in the fulfilment of their chosen professional responsibilities. The message quite simply is that we as Canadians are proud of you and are with you all the way.

At least half of those Canadians now serving in the gulf are residents of Nova Scotia. I can say to those courageous and professional Nova Scotians that my party and my government support you all the way. We are proud of the record of performance you have shown during the first five months of this crisis, a record of effectiveness second to none in the gulf.

We know you did not want a war. We know it is a time of fear and challenge for your families, and we know indeed it is a time of fear for you. But we also know the courage and the determination you are demonstrating in carrying out the responsibilities and actions for which you have undergone training, in some cases for as many as 20 or 25 years. We want you to know that Canadians are proud of you. Canadians thank you and your government will stand with you. We ask all Canadians to think of these people and their families and to support them. And we ask the Almighty to make this conflict one that will last no longer than absolutely necessary.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the hon. member for South Shore. I listened to a number of members on the government side today talk about the atrocities in Iraq, all of which are deplored by every member of this House.

There is no question that every member of this House deplores the activity of Saddam Hussein, deplores the human rights violations and the unmitigated savagery that has taken place. But some of us who have a very strong feeling that sanctions were not given a chance also have some difficulty with our so-called allies under the United Nations. I do not think anyone in this House would be prepared to say that membership in the United Nations gives a certain cachet that would be in keeping with the beliefs and the standards that most Canadians hold.

I would like to ask the hon. member for South Shore, in his party's delineation of the atrocities perpetrated by the Iraqis if he could tell us about the actions by, for example, President Assad of Syria, our alleged ally in this endeavour.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague from Halifax for raising these important questions. She spoke of the atrocities and the fact that all members of this House condemn the atrocities that have been going on in Kuwait and committed by the Iraqis.

She said more time should be allowed for sanctions to work, and that raises certain questions with me. First of all, the longer you wait for sanctions to work, the atrocities continue in Iraq. I believe that those atrocities have gone on long enough and should be stopped.

Second, we have heard evidence presented before this House by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the effect that there is no evidence whatsoever that sanctions are having any impact on the military capability of Iraq. There is no question. Sanctions are hurting the people of Iraq. There are young people starving. There are old people starving in Iraq. The sanctions are hurting the people of Iraq but they were not negatively impacting the army and that in the final analysis is why it was time to move on to the next step, even though it was not one that people would likely or willingly choose to proceed with.

There is a second question that should be raised about sanctions. From the date that resolution 678 passed the United Nations, a resolution thoroughly supported in the United Nations, it was well known from that day that January 15 was the date upon which either Mr. Hussein would have his forces out of Kuwait or which there would be military action.

There is no question who made the decision. It is great for members opposite to blame the governments of the alliance for the outbreak of hostilities in Iraq, but let us not forget the record is unequivocally clear that the line was drawn and if you start moving the line, you simply allow this man to continue the desolation he was committing to Kuwait and who knows where he was going to go next. My hon. friends suggest we should have given more time for sanctions. Would that not be interesting. The sanctions continue, the war begins.

I would like to hear from them the logic of having Canada continue the sanctions while the other 28 nations go to war. Are they suggesting that Canada is the sole decision-maker in this situation? We are talking, quite frankly, about the fact that several months have passed, several resolutions have passed. The nations of the world are united on this issue unequivocally and Canada seems to be the only one in which there are opposition parties that have wisdom that go beyond the wisdom of the nations of the earth, including the 28 or 29 nations that presently have troops in the gulf.

I think the comment was made earlier this day in this House that some of our friends opposite live in the ideal world but regrettably governments live in the real world, must govern in the real world, and thank goodness for Canada that we have a government that has the courage, the integrity and the commitment to do what is right for Canada and right for the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. I will now recognize the hon. member for Peterborough, for a ten-minute speech.

[English]

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start out by reminiscing back to the thirties and forties, a time which many of us in this House can remember. While attending school I can remember the war starting. I can remember the war finishing. The thing that stands in my mind at this time when I am trying to assess the position I would take in this particular war is what happened during the thirties and what happened during the forties.

I recall that the United States, the one that seems to be getting the brunt of the criticism here from some opposition members, was very slow to get into that war that we are all so saddened with, having lost relatives in the war, and how much better it would have been if one of the strongest world powers would have had some interest in getting into the war two or three years sooner than it did.

What is happening today is just the opposite. One of the strongest world powers today, the United States, a member of NATO, a member of the United Nations and a strong supporter of the United Nations, is getting into the war as one of the first, one of the 28 countries in the United Nations, to my knowledge, that presently have a force over in that country which we are debating.

I think that it is in retrospect a better comparison that our friend, one of our best friends, one of our best allies, our major trading partner, if we want to discuss economics for a moment, from whom we both enjoy, Canada and the United States, a long relationship of friendship. I am pleased that the United States is our ally and is part of the confrontation that is going on now over in the gulf.

I think that history repeats itself in many ways. I remember back in the thirties, prior to the war, when over in the United Kingdom they were taking plebiscites. There were peace activists out marching in the late thirties and they were urging the United Kingdom to disarm and set themselves up as an ideal situation, sort of an idealistic view. We have heard some of those here today as well whereby because they disarmed and because they would not participate in war, somehow or other that would stop some of the atrocities that were happening in Europe.

We watched then a dictator, an almost if not totally, insane person walk over many of the countries in Europe while we all sat idly by, except the Commonwealth. We are fortunate in one respect, in retrospect, that Churchill would not disarm. We are fortunate that he thought that they needed air power and ships. Canada at that time was very strong in those areas too. We were one of the largest, if not the largest, commercial shipping countries with warships is the world, a great contribution to a Commonwealth gathering.

But then the League of Nations was sort of in disarray. The League of Nations did not have the power that the United Nations has today, did not have the support of as many countries as the United Nations has today.

This is a difficult subject for me, because I have lost friends and relatives in wars. I feel much better today than I felt as a student back in the 1930s and 1940s when our greatest ally the United States was slow to act and become involved. The League of Nations was literally inoperative from a combatant position.

What we are really doing here today is looking first at the position of the government. Each of us, in his or her own heart, is trying to determine whether we support it.

I will tell you right now that I am voting with my conscience, as I do on a lot of issues. I am not known to be an avid supporter of every bill that our government brings in. I have been in opposition and in government, both about the same length of time. I find that I can live with myself if I vote with my conscience on the issues that I support, and I vote against the government from time to time, if necessary, on matters that are not financial. I think that is part of our Commonwealth system.

Here I am toying with whether I would be more comfortable personally by voting for the motion or against the motion. I honestly feel that I would be doing a great disservice to law and order, to civil liberties, and to the power of the United Nations if I voted against the United Nations' decision to set the deadline with 31 countries supporting it and 28 of them over there with troops.

We are not a major contributor to the armed forces at the moment over there, but based on the size of our country we are making a considerable contribution on behalf of the resolutions supported by the United Nations, including the eastern bloc. Who would have thought I would have said that I am on the same side as the U.S.S.R. five or six years ago?

Who would have thought that many of us in this room would have said that, except maybe a few? This is not an easy decision to make. I have come to the conclusion in my own mind that, rightly or wrongly, we are partisan. We are in politics, and I take political positions.

I have analyzed the political positions of the Official Opposition. I have looked at the positions taken by some of my friends in the NDP and I have taken a look at our Conservative position. I am going to support the Conservative position because I think it is the right one.

What is the Official Opposition position? It depends which of the right honourables you listen to in the Official Opposition, Mr. Speaker. We have the fortunate opportunity to assess two leaders as the opposition does of us. We have two right honourables in the House of Commons. They have two right honourables in the House of Commons.

Mr. Duhamel: We only have one right honourable.

Mr. Domm: I thought they had a former Prime Minister leader and I thought they had a present former Prime Minister leader.

Mr. Duhamel: But only one right honourable.

Mr. Domm: Which one then, sir, of yours is the right honourable?

An hon. member: Mr. Turner.

Mr. Domm: All right. You have one right honourable and perhaps one former?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Domm: You have one former right honourable and one present—

An hon. member: Only one.

Mr. Domm: Only one leader.

Let us take the two leaders of the Liberal Party, and let us look, first, at the position of the present Leader of the Official Opposition.

In a quote from a very recent Hansard dated January 15, the present Leader of the Official Opposition said:

> —and our troops should be called back if there is a war—
> Of course, if there is no war, our forces should stay there. They are present to enforce the embargo and the sanctions, and they should be there. If there is a war tonight, tomorrow or some day later, the minute there is a war, there is no more embargo, and they all come home.

• (1850)

A former leader in the House of Commons, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said that:

> Even if the case for sanctions could be made, and it is a strong case, the issue today is not sanctions. The issue today is whether the United Nations resolutions will be obeyed. It was the United Nations that decided the date. It was the United Nations that decided not to wait for sanctions, and it was the United Nations that imposed its own deadline.

He went on a little further to say that we have never treated it as merely a talking shop.

As Canadians, we may have lost some idealism but we never lost faith in the United Nations.

The issue is one of which I had to break silence. . .I believe that this Parliament has a duty to support the United Nations resolutions as those texts are written and, therefore, the resolution before this House.

I admire men like that. I have to say that, and I have never said that before about a member of the opposition while sitting in this House, but I have to admire a member of the House of Commons, no matter which side of the House he or she is on, who has the fortitude to stand up in the House of Commons and tell people—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must ask the hon. member to conclude since his time has now expired.

The hon. member for North Island—Powell River has five minutes for questions or comments.

[English]

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the term bully has been thrown around numerous times and without the opportunity to justify anything that Hussein has done, it would have to be pointed out that two billion people in the world at this moment are arrayed against 17 million led by the United States. The United States is the major participant, along with Britain and France. They have now killed 350,000 people and destroyed the military infrastructure of Iraq. Iraq cannot respond.

In 24 hours, more Iraqis have been killed than all the Canadians since the start of the century in wartime. We are looking at a situation where it will be 650,000 or 700,000 tomorrow, and a million the following day. The capacity to commit atrocities is gone. The capacity to fight a war is gone. The only thing that can happen from here on in by the policy of this government to support the United States in continuation is butchery.

Would the member who stood up communicate immediately with the Prime Minister and ask him to phone George Bush and ask him to stop the bombardment?

We are dealing with a madman. The madman does not understand the nature and quality of the acts that have been besetting him. Allow the Iraqi people time to put him out, sue for peace, and prevent the needless slaughter of Iraqis. Half of that population is under 14 years of age. That is who is being killed now.

Would the member communicate immediately with the Prime Minister to verify the casualties to date and ask the Prime Minister if he will phone Bush and stop the insanity? If that does not happen, we have to ask who is the madman, or madmen?

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I do on occasion, as often as I can, communicate with the Prime Minister. The last letter I wrote to the Prime Minister was on December 18. At that time I said that I had in my hand the report of Amnesty International.

Amnesty International details how Iraqi forces have tortured and killed many hundreds of victims, taken several thousand prisoners, and left more than 300 premature babies to die after looting incubators from at least three Kuwait City main hospitals. The report catalogues 38 methods of torture used by the Iraqi military, including cutting off people's tongues and ears, shooting them in the limbs, applying electric shocks to their bodies, and raping them.

Now, you answer your question as—

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate the response. Could the hon. member explain qualitatively what the difference is between what the Iraqis did on a smaller scale and killing all the people. Is it revenge he seeks?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is not a point of order.

Mr. Domm: Well, I do not argue with the hon. member's right to want to debate. I am sure he will be given an opportunity to debate. In fact, I have heard him speak once already in support of the Iraqis in trying to save that country from further atrocities by stopping the war.

I wonder how many atrocities we could have stopped in the Second World War if we had not participated, if we had all become peacekeepers, and if Hitler was allowed to march from one end of the world to the other. The point of the issue is this: When in world history—I say this to the NDP—have we had unanimity on an international body including the eastern bloc, the western alliances, NATO, and NORAD? When in our history or our lifetimes have we ever seen such unanimity in bringing this man to a stop? I am talking about Saddam Hussein.

I think we are doing, contrary to what the hon. member feels, exactly what the majority of the Canadian people want us to do. I intend to vote for the motion. I know the hon. member has no intention of supporting war if he was doing the same thing as he has been doing since last August, and no matter if he did it for another decade I know his objectives. I have been raised and lived with them, but I do not support them.

I think there comes a time for law and order. There comes a time to protect human rights. There comes a time when we need to unite as a force strong enough to repel the aggressors, the dictators, the people who want to rule the world.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I want to mention a couple of facts on which there is agreement.

No one in the House on either side of the House wants war. No Conservative, no Liberal, no New Democrat. None of us in the House want war. We all agree on that.

We also agree that Saddam Hussein is a brutal dictator and he must leave Kuwait. We all agree on that.

We also agree now that the government has made the decision to join the hostilities to enter into the war, all of us—to the last man and woman in this House—support our troops. We support our troops and I challenge anyone in the House to say that I and particularly my fellow Liberals do not support our troops. We do.

I found it a little disconcerting when I heard earlier today a member from the government benches express concern about division in the House because it might be construed, particularly by our military, as a lack of support. Let me make it absolutely clear that I have far more faith in our soldiers than that kind of remark indicates.

I know in my mind that Canadian soldiers understand very well what Parliament is about and what the House of Commons is about. This is a place to debate issues, to deal with our differences, and to propose alternatives. This is what the House is about.

When it comes to a major issue, an issue that commits this country to war, an issue that commits our troops to a conflict where their lives are at risk, of course there are going to be questions and of course there are going to be disagreements. But that in no way casts any doubt on the ability of our soldiers, and casts no doubt whatsoever on the support that we give our soldiers, sailors, and airmen as well. Everyone in our military deserves full support, and they have our support.

Let us get to the matters where there is disagreement. First of all, international forces comprised of approximately 30 countries have decided to wage war. They have decided that sanctions were not working. They decided that the only way to get rid of Saddam Hussein, to get his troops out of Kuwait, was to wage war. That is where we Liberals disagree.

We disagree that this is the time to wage war, because there is nothing more horrible than the decision to wage war. War is murder. War is mass slaughter. It is carnage on the grandest scale. It is the method of settling disagreements. It is the method of last resort. In our conscience and in our hearts, we firmly believe the time has not come to wage war. It is as simple as that.

We looked at the results of sanctions and came to the conclusion that the sanctions, the embargo, had not brought Saddam Hussein down; he was still in Kuwait. We saw a strong indication that sanctions were working. They were warranted to continue and they should have been given more time. That is our position. That position is held firmly.

War, as one of the earlier speakers said today, is an indication or example of defeat and failure. War does not have a good track record. We know that there have been times in history—the Second World War is a good example—when there was no alternative. I suppose it was the best of a bad lot. But anybody who is a student of history, even a student of the rudiments of history, will understand that war is horrible and a failure. We should learn something by looking at history. We should learn, if nothing else, to search for something better than war.

We on this side, in a heart-felt opinion, feel that the use of sanctions in this particular case was an alternative and that sanctions deserved a good try. We should have exercised patience. That is why we disagree. It has nothing to do with canards that come sailing from that side of the House about possible lack of support for the United Nations. We support the United Nations to the hilt. I challenge anyone from the government side to say otherwise and to prove otherwise.

There is a second area of disagreement. I respect the government. It is a judgment call. I am quite sure that members of the cabinet had difficulty reaching the decision. The decision was to commit our troops and nation to war against Iraq, to enter into hostilities. That is the responsibility of the government, and the government has exercised that responsibility. We respectfully—and I underline the word respectfully—disagree with the decision. Why? It is because I look at this country and I ask the question: Who are we? Who is this country? What is this country called Canada? What is our history? What are our traditions? Where do we come from? What is our track record?

I have only to go back a few years. It might be embodied in what is called the Pearsonian tradition, a tradition established by a Prime Minister of this country, an absolutely outstanding Secretary of State for External Affairs back in the 1950s. If that man had chosen the easy way out, he could have supported the British and supported the French at Suez, but he showed some strength, some vision, and said to the world: "There must be a better way". He chose a better way. He articulated a better way, and the world saw wisdom in that better way. And Lester Bowles Pearson won the Nobel Peace Prize for that effort. That is where the Pearsonian tradition started.

Mr. Pearson was the Prime Minister of Canada, when the President of the United States, Lyndon Baines Johnson, decided to escalate the Vietnam war. Did Mr. Pearson join the Vietnam war with alacrity, with enthusiasm? No, because he saw a better role for Canada, a better alternative.

I think it is very easy to align with a superpower, to align with what is perhaps, at the given moment, the popular opinion. It takes guts and it takes toughness to offer something that is different, something that is perhaps not that popular at the moment. But Mr. Pearson offered an alternative and he showed wisdom.

That is just a part of our tradition. Let us look at it another way and remember that I asked the question: Who are we Canadians? We are a small country. As a military power we are diminutive, tiny. We are small potatoes when it comes to a military power, particularly when we compare our military power to that of the United States or the Soviet Union.

When it comes to a world problem like the conflict in the Persian Gulf, should we choose a military role? Is that the role where we can make the most significant contribution? I suggest not. Given the size of this country, the resources of this country, the tradition of this country, and the history of the country, we should be peaceseekers. We should be looking for a peaceful solution to this conflict and now to this war. It is not easy. It will try our patience, but I think it is absolutely compelling on the part of this country to choose that kind of a role.

Another thing is that there are many dimensions of war, not just the fighting dimension—and this has been pointed out by other members of this House—such as the military dimension, the humanitarian dimension, the negotiating dimension, and the possible truce dimension or the actual peace dimension. There is a whole range of dimensions. That is where we as a country should be fitting in.

As far as I know, the war is not going to go on forever. Somebody is going to have to engage in talks. Somebody is going to have to engage in negotiations. If there is a truce effected, somebody will have to be a party to that truce. Somebody will have to maintain the true and help with that truce. The same goes with peace.

Is there a better country in this world than Canada? I suggest not. I think about the government's decision and, as I say, I respect the government's decision. But, truly, I say to myself: given our history and our traditions and what we might be able to contribute and offer, I think we have let ourselves down and the world down. I expected better. I wanted better.

Let me address for just a moment the application of war which I have said earlier is an example of defeat and failure. Another thing about war is that there is absolutely no guarantee it will produce the desired result. There is no guarantee that when we enter into war, we are going to get what we want.

When it comes to this war, even though I do not share in the decision, what do I want from it? Just like the Conservatives across the way, I want it to be short, I want it to be decisive, and I want Saddam Hussein out of there. I pray to God that there will be few casualties, that all our men and women in that theatre of war will come home alive, and that none of them comes home in a so-called body bag. That is my desire. I am sure that that is the desire of every individual MP in this House. Is there any guarantee that that is going to happen? There is no guarantee.

I wanted to point these things out because there seemed to be an indication floating from the other side that these things would automatically come about because we are all powerful, we are right, and God is on our side. The fact of the matter is that this war could be very protracted. There could be thousands upon thousands of casualties. If early reports are any indication, there have already been thousands and thousands of casualties on the Iraqi side.

Aside from the military part of it, is there any guarantee that we are going to get the political result that we want? Sure, we could knock off Saddam Hussein. We could destroy his armies. We could have an Iraqi pull-out from Kuwait. We could win that particular battle. But, can we win the political war in the Persian Gulf? Can we win the political war in the Middle East? That is in doubt. When I look at what is taking place in the Persian Gulf or in the Middle East in the last 40 years, I say that it is problematical at best. My worry, after we unleash the dogs of war, is that there will be an unbelievable destabilization of politics in that particular part of the world.

God only knows where war will take that region of the world. I do not know, but it worries me sick. In roughly the last 40 years, there have been what, five wars in the Middle East? Is this number six? Could there be a seventh, an eighth, a ninth?

I simply remind hon. members of this, because there is just no guarantee that we are going to get what we want out of war.

In my final remarks, I want to say that, as a member of the Liberal Party and of Parliament, I wish we were not a party to this war at the moment. I think we could have found a better way. It is a judgment on my part, but I think that we were on to a better way and should have continued with economic sanctions.

I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, my thoughts and my prayers are with every man and woman in our military operations in the Middle East. I say: Godspeed. I wish you luck, and I hope you come home soon and in good health.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I have watched this debate throughout the past several days, and I have had a great amount of difficulty in putting down on paper the words that I think most appropriately express one's true feelings with respect to the subject matter at hand.

As a result of that, I will not likely take the opportunity given to me to formally make a presentation to the House of Commons.

I would just like to make some comments that to a degree parallel the comments made by the previous speaker. I am not aware of any residents from my constituency who are directly involved, which should not for a minute make the trauma of the subject any lighter. As we have heard in the House, there are people whom we know and whose families are directly involved. As a result of that, we share the emotions that they must certainly be feeling.

There was a comment made earlier about how people intend to vote on this and how they are inspired to vote. I have given that some thought, and my comments relative to that particular subject are that essentially my hands are tied as to how I will vote. They are tied by my conscience and nothing else.

I have not been asked or told to vote in any particular way, but I think really and truly if one sits back and analyses where we are today and deals with the subject matter before us seriously as we must—if it was not before us seriously I am sure we would not be talking about it—we must, I think, vote with our conscience.

Those who have fought in wars before this one have paid the price. All the costs when rolled up together either by way of loss of life, psychological well-being, the loss of family, or the loss of family time together nevertheless spell a cost that has been paid for by and given toward wars of the past. For what purpose? For the purpose of peace, I say to you, Mr. Speaker.

Peace is not the sort of thing that, once attained, can be maintained without some additional costs. We are experiencing one of those costs unfortunately and regrettably today.

In the war that is currently going on, I understand that some references have been made to some rather significant losses of life. I further understand that these losses of life are directly attributable to military action on both sides, not that that loss of life therefore is justified any easier.

For those who are trying to put emotion into the debate and are saying that this represents a loss of life of children and of those not affected with the military conflict when all is said and done, we do know the facts. We will find that perhaps a major portion of the death is attributed to the military. I do not feel any better having said that, but I just simply to explain it. I believe that if you were to take everyone's position on where we are today, you would find no major divergence of opinion as to where we should go from here. There is some divergence of opinion admittedly, but I think essential the matter before us suggests that perhaps blame should be associated to those that got us where we are today. I do not think that is productive and I certainly will not pursue that avenue at all because I think it is a waste of time.

• (1920)

I think that the solutions that have been placed before us by some people are based on an environment outside of an issue that we are familiar with and perhaps should be taken somewhat lightly. I think we have the integrity of the United Nations which has been placed before us and which has under its control the finest military force in the world. As a result of that our confidence should be placed in those who are making those kinds of decisions.

You are encouraging me to put a question before the speaker, and Mr. Speaker I intend to do that right now. I would like to ask: Have the solutions that have been proposed before this House of Commons in these past couple of days been based on poor, little or no information of the actual reality that exists?

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I am not exactly sure whether I am clear on the question. If he is asking the question of whether the government has based its decision on certain information and certain documents, of course I am in no doubt whatsoever that it has had talks with people all around the world, is privy to certain information and has decided for better or for worse to join hostilities to commit the country to war. I said earlier that I respect the decision. It is a judgment call.

If I had been, say, the Prime Minister, I would have said: "No, that decision should not be made now. Maybe sometime down the road, I do not know when but maybe we would have no choice". But at this particular juncture, in my considered opinion and certainly in the considered opinion of the Official Opposition, despite anything we have heard, the war option was the first choice at this time.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, by way of commentary I find myself in agreement with many of the points made by the member for Winnipeg St. James, specifically his opposition and our opposition to this war at this time. We believe that sanctions should have been given time to work. But there is no question, as the hon. member pointed out, that we are in full support of our young men and women in the gulf who are not only carrying the Canadian flag but carrying our hopes that they will be coming back safe and sound.

The point that we are debating here, support of the UN resolution, is a moot point because now our nation finds itself at war. Of course, we all support the United Nations. I doubt very much if there is anyone in this House who would oppose the objectives of the United Nations. I for one over the years have championed the cause of this august body.

I find that there are some problems arising. I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James perhaps to address two questions that I might put to him. I believe myself that the effect on the peacekeeping ability of Canada will be impaired because we are belligerents in the Middle East and that it will have an effect on our ability to be the peacekeepers a little later on. I wonder if he could address himself to that point.

Second, I wonder if the hon. member would be in agreement with me that there should be a Middle East conference to discuss all of the problems in the Middle East, including the Palestinian-Israeli problem at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold for his questions. Let me deal with the first; whether our peacekeeping ability has been impaired because of this decision. Of course, it has been, because we have become belligerent. When the time comes for negotiation, and for bringing about a truce and maintaining the peace, we cannot be there. Who is going to accept us? I would doubt very much whether the Iraqis would accept us. I think I would be very, very surprised. So, some other country around the world will have to be found. Yes, I agree with the hon. member, I think our peacekeeping ability has been impaired.

On the second question, which is a bit more sensitive because of the word linkage, I would answer it this way: I do not think there is a doubt in the world that if genuine peace is ever to come to the Middle East, before that genuine peace comes, there will have to be talks. Enemies will have to talk to each other. There will have to be negotiations and, yes, some time down the road there will have to be a conference. I do not know how you can change things without first discussing the matter. However, linkage conjures up all kinds of things.

I do not favour, and I eschew, or I would avoid linkage at this particular time because if you link the settlement in Iraq with the wider problem in the Middle East, it will appear that Mr. Saddam Hussein has been rewarded. If I will go into Kuwait, I will get the Israelis to negotiate. I will get somebody else to negotiate. I will be rewarded. And so, I would say that under the current circumstances I would like to avoid linkage. Some time down the road when things are settled down, yes, nations, diplomats and politicians will have to talk to each other.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out some of the facts involved in this Middle East crisis.

As we know, the Middle East has been a powder-keg of conflicts for many, many years, a powder-keg of conflicts when first the United Nations created the two states, Palestine and Israel. The Israel nation was born there and the Israelis have created a homeland for themselves. But the Palestinian people were not given the opportunity to have a state of their own. As years passed by, many resolutions of the United Nations suggested that its original resolution should be respected and the Palestinians should be given a homeland.

In 1967, Israel occupied the West Bank and Gaza and took away the homeland of the Palestinians. The United Nations had many resolutions to create a home for the Palestinian people. There was always an objection from Israel, complaining that it did not feel secure in its borders, and from the United States that vetoed in the Security Council the formation of a Palestinian state. Many nations requested that there should be a peace conference on the Middle East and there was always a veto in the United Nations.

• (1930)

Many years later, Israel invaded a democratic country, one of the forward-looking countries in the Middle East, Lebanon. The United Nations condemned that invasion, but nobody seemed to want to help the Lebanese.

So Lebanon, for the last eight years, has been in an unstable situation. Before that, it was called the Switzerland of the Middle East. It had a thriving economy and an excellent banking system. It was a country that was an example of freedom of democracy in the Middle East.

We can ask ourselves why countries, which today seem so outraged by the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq have created a war that is devastating for Iraq as well as for Kuwait. If the reports are right, I have just heard that Tel Aviv has been hit.

Why did those countries refuse a dialogue, a peace conference on the Middle East? Why did the United States and Israel not want a solution to the problem that exists in the Middle East?

Iraq, by the annexation of Kuwait, certainly committed an international illegality. But we should have waited for the sanctions to work. The sanctions, imposed by one of the first resolutions of the United Nations, were working.

I had the occasion three weeks ago to meet a senator from the United States in Washington who had just come out from a briefing and a talk with President Bush. He indicated to me and others that the sanctions were working; that the Gross National Product of Iraq had diminished by 40 per cent; and that this was a country where the sanctions really could work because Iraq had no access to the sea and very limited access to the gulf. It has Saudi Arabia on the one side, Jordan on the other, and Turkey and Iran. It is a country which can be closed. Therefore, it was an ideal situation for sanctions to work.

But those who opposed a peace conference in the Middle East—especially Israel and the veto in the United Nations Security Council—wanted to go to war. This is what happened.

Now one can say that the Middle East crisis is taking place at the same time as the Soviet Union is returning to a much harsher political system. As we know, the Soviet Union is now fighting the democratic governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

Why is the world not outraged by the actions of the Soviet Union in the Baltic states? Those Baltic states were annexed by the then dictator of the Soviet Union, Joseph Stalin. He annexed those countries and we, in the west, have never recognized that annexation.

What we hear from the government side is that we have a new order and that the Soviet Union is supporting the United States in the Middle East. Certainly, it is supporting the United States in the Middle East because the United States had to withdraw most of its armed forces from Europe to send them to the Middle East.

The same thing happened in 1956 when Hungary was looking to a democratic society. At that time, the Soviet Union invaded Hungary and crushed the new democratic government of Hungary, and the west abandoned Hungary because it was preoccupied with the Suez crisis.

The same thing is happening today. The western powers have concentrated on the crisis in the Middle East and the invasion of Kuwait. At the same time, the Lithuanian people and the new democratic governments of Latvia and Estonia are being crushed by the tanks of the Soviet Union.

Even so, the Government of Canada and the House had a unanimous resolution to condemn those actions of the Soviet Union. It is only lip service. Is the Canadian government and the House going to ask the United Nations Security Council to debate the question of Lithuania? I hope we do, but, as somebody said, we have the Soviet Union onside on the question of Kuwait and Kuwait has 10 per cent of the oil reserves of the world. Naturally, Iraq, by invading Kuwait, now controls 20 per cent of the known oil reserves of the world. Why are we fighting in Iraq? We are fighting because there is oil and there does not seem to be any oil in Lithuania, Estonia, or Latvia.

We are fighting there because the American President believes that there must be a security of supply of cheap oil for some nations.

Are we defending a democratic country in the Middle East? Are we defending democracy there? I say that Kuwait is controlled by a family, a sheikh who abandoned and closed down the democratic process and parliament three years ago. This same sheikh who has invested $100 billion in the United States is able to buy the defence of his own country.

But this same country, Kuwait, had over 600,000 foreign workers and many Palestinians living there for 20 years who were never given the same rights as the Kuwaitis. They were exploited. The United Nations should have asked the government of Kuwait to give those people the right to vote and to participate in the administration of that country. Some of them have lived there for 20 and more years.

As we know, Kuwait was established by the British in 1961. Before that it was part of the Ottoman Empire and part of the province of Basra. This is why Iraq claimed that this was part of its territory.

We have been supporting Iraq, and the United States and the western powers have been arming Iraq when it was fighting the Iranians. One of biggest supporters of Iraq was Saudi Arabia because it was doing the dirty job for them, fighting the fundamentalism of the Muslims as it was practised in Iran.

We have a certain responsibility because we helped Iraq to get arms. We used the Iraqi people and we helped Mr. Saddam Hussein. Suddenly, once he had done the dirty work, he became an enemy. Mr. Bush has now associated himself with a dictator in Syria, one known to have been a terrorist all over the world. Now he is a good man. Suddenly he is helping Saudi Arabia and the United States, and he is our friend in the fight against the Iraqi people.

As the war progresses, there is more and more damage done to the economy of the Middle East and it will take many years to rebuild that economy and the instability is going to continue.

I would like to come back to the question of the link between the Middle East conference and the question of Kuwait.

I have the impression that the world, if it wants to be peaceful, has to see the problem that exists in Israel, which wants to be secure in its borders. I agree it has to have security, but it has to understand as well that it cannot live peacefully as long as there are camps in the West Bank in Gaza; as long as there are refugees in camps in Jordan.

I had the occasion to meet Mr. Arafat and talk with him. He told me he would be ready to have a state even without an army for the Palestinian people as long as it would be the Palestinian state that was created by the United Nations in 1947.

So, Mr. Speaker, I hope that those who are engaged in the fight in the Middle East, our Canadian troops, are going to come home soon, and that there will not be any casualties.

Let us hope and pray that there is going to be a peace conference to end this war as soon as possible.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, while my colleague was speaking—I do not know if he was aware—but through CNN, a rolling SCUD missile they called it, dropped on Tel Aviv. Chemical warfare has been launched by Saddam Hussein against a country that I think showed incredible discipline, was not involved in financing Mr. Saddam Hussein, who in turn marched in and raped his neighbour. He deliberately attacked a country that had not been involved. There was no link to what was going on between Saddam Hussein and Kuwait.

I watched as the announcers and the reporters, with a great deal of bravery and some sense of foolheartedness, spoke without their gas masks on. Then they were advised to please put on their gas masks. It was with no great ease that they put these things on their faces. I thought it was supposed to be easy to protect yourself in this chemical warfare situation.

My heart is pounding. My stomach is sick. I cannot even cry, I am so numb.

Israel has not retaliated as yet. But I ask you, if you were a minister of state, if you were a member of the Knesset, or a minister of that state, what would you advise your cabinet and what would your constituents be saying to you right now? What would be the Israelis' expectation of their cabinet ministers and their leaders?

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I was informed just before I started speaking that there was a missile attack launched on Tel Aviv. I am really saddened to hear that it is chemical warfare.

This is why I personally felt that we should not start a war in the Middle East, but rather work with sanctions because sanctions were working. There certainly were very positive results from those sanctions, and I as a person who was born in Europe and who lived through war, know that once the war starts, you never know how it ends, the casualties and sacrifice of people, and the families that are being killed.

• (1950)

You ask me what would be my advice if I were a cabinet minister and I were in the Israeli government. It is a fair question, but it is not a question that is easy for me to answer. As you know, I am an outspoken person. I would say you have to react. I would not blame you if you did. But I still believe that those who are responsible for starting this war, whether it is Hussein or our neighbour to the south, are those who said we are going to do a surgical job. As you know, there is some information that already 300,000 people have been killed in Iraq. I answered your question, I think.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I too want to make a comment at this time. This will probably be known by many Canadians as the night of madness. The forces that have been unleashed tonight on Tel Aviv by Saddam Hussein will do incalculable damage not only to Tel Aviv.

Someone said earlier in the debate that Canada lost its innocence when it entered as a belligerent in this war. I suggest to you that the world is permitting itself tonight to be crucified. My colleague earlier asked a question. My question is not so much to the member from Calgary because in a way it is a rhetorical question. What happens to those children who cannot get on their gas masks? What happens to the men and women who are caught in the street and cannot get into a sealed room? All of us have spoken against the terrible sin of war and here tonight we all stand condemned.

We stand condemned as parliamentarians. The parliamentarians of the world stand condemned because we could not find a solution to this age old disease, the disease of war. I hope that the beginning of this madness will end before the whole world is sucked into the vortex of an incalculable slaughter.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the hon. member. There is no doubt about it, we have unleashed powers that we now have difficulty controlling and this might be just the beginning.

I agree that we should pray that this comes to a quick end, that peace can be restored and that some sanity is brought to the minds of politicians so that we can find peace on earth and stop the hatred between people.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, it is an extremely painful experience for me to rise in the House and speak in this debate, at a time when from minute to minute, we hear the conflict is escalating, attacks are becoming more frequent and casualties are rising.

In this context, the resolution we have been debating for many hours has become very meaningful indeed.

Mr. Speaker, in November and December I had the privilege of being at the United Nations when they were discussing resolution 678, which led to the debate we are having today.

I remember, with the delegates of the Canadian mission at the UN, that there were fierce and furious discussions on the issue.

Faced with this alternative, Mr. Speaker, the reaction was that they would not let the situation deteriorate to that point. However, after experiencing this new and different atmosphere at the UN after the Berlin Wall was brought down and the eastern block and communism were dismantled, we felt and we still feel the incredible strength and will of this forum, constituted as the United Nations. We felt it was the right instrument to deal with these problems, whether it was apartheid, the Middle East or, more specifically, Iraq.

What I found so impressive and convincing about the Canadian position, Mr. Speaker, was that Canada as such is an intermediary power. It is neither a superpower nor a small power. Among the 159 member states at the UN, the vast majority are small powers, countries that do not have the capabilities of the superpowers, meaning the economic and military capacity and the prestige that those powers have.

A few moments ago I heard the hon. member for Calgary East say that Kuwait as an oil-producing country had about 10 per cent of world production and was thus an important country. Doesn't the hon. member realize that the small powers I referred to which are members of the UN are always the first to be affected by the threat of rising energy prices? These small countries, members of the Commonwealth or the francophonie with whom Canada has close links through its external aid programs, tend to suffer most as a result of these conflicts and threats. Countries that lack economic resources and a certain degree of military capability are the same countries that are hard pressed to maintain their democratic system of government. It is those countries, Mr. Speaker, that appeal to powers like Canada to intervene in these world conflicts because if no one intervenes before the problem escalates, the many small powers of our planet will be the first to fall victim to the invader.

• (2000)

Mr. Speaker, there is something I find hard to understand. Of course, we have to say that war is absurd. That is obvious. I never saw anyone either here in the House of Commons or at the UN say that war was the answer. Everyone agrees that war is absurd. But there was also a consensus, Mr. Speaker. In the Security Council, except for the five permanent members, the remaining members, the other ten, are basically small countries. Whether we are talking about Ethiopia, Zaire, Ivory Coast, Malaysia or Colombia, they are all small powers and they also voted because they are the first to be at risk as a result of such conflicts, because of the threat to their energy supply and their democratic systems.

Today, in the present conflict, these smaller countries are appealing to more important powers like Canada to help maintain a balanced situation. That is the meaning of the resolution adopted on November 29 at the UN and here in the House of Commons. It was exactly that.

It is easy for someone who does not have to make decisions to say: You should have said or done this or that. However, there is one man in this world who is not in a position to say that, and that is Saddam Hussein.

During my experience in New York, I had a feeling of great hope and optimism as a result of this development. I had a similar experience before in New York and Geneva and elsewhere, but this time, Mr. Speaker, I found that tremendous progress had been made towards achieving a world wide awareness of human problems.

Today's failure is indeed just that, Mr. Speaker, but these things do not happen in a vacuum. What we have to look at, what we have to do, I think, is not condemn those who made the decisions, because what we had was a huge majority that was necessary to reach this kind of decision, and everyone was hoping it would not come to this.

We learn from what we are taught, we learn theory, and we also learn from experience. It seems to me that past experience has not helped us avoid such conflicts but it would also seem that aggressors, that invaders like Iraq have failed to realize that their predecessors in similar situations were not successful.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in the present situation, we will be able to use this organization, an indispensable instrument for the development of world peace, to draw from this unfortunate experience any benefits that are to be had.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. I would like to hear his reaction to this quote from an article by Alain Dubuc published in La Presse of January 14, 1991, under the title: "Canada should remain an ambassador of peace", in which he says: "Why should we send our young people over there to be killed? Why should we let the federal government spend billions of dollars to finance this undertaking? This reluctance is also understandable because of some deeply rooted traditions. Canada is not a military power, and the modest role it has always played on the international scene has tended to be that of a peace ambassador". Do you agree with this quote?

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the distinguished editorial writer of La Presse is entitled to his opinion.

However, as I just said, Canada's present actions are no reason to conclude it is a warlike country. We must conclude that Canada is acting consistently with its military traditions. It is true that Canada is not a military power, but Canada is an intermediary power, and for some of the countries I mentioned earlier, the small powers, it has been a country that was able to support their claims. In this case, it has put us in an unfortunate situation, but that does not make us a warlike country.

Canada is not a neutral country. Canada is a country with honour, a country that is able to defend principles, alone and with others. And the principle applies, in this case, to Canada and to the global community. The resolution was passed. A consensus was finally reached in the Security Council. It was backed by 159 member States, none of whom appeared to make any objections. Basically, the whole world was in favour of this tactic, if I may use this term, but some countries were hoping we would not have to go that far. However, these things do not operate in a vacuum. There is also the aggressor. You see how things develop. It was with that in mind that the resolution was passed in November 1990.

Canada is not a military power and it is not a warlike country, but Canada was there in 1914 as it was in 1939, in 1950, and again today. It is a member of the United Nations and when you are a member of the UN and there is a consensus like the one we had on November 29, you cannot pick up your chips and leave when going gets tough. We have to be consistent, the same way that Canada as a country is consistent.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. What is his attitude to the Middle East problem and the possibility of a peace conference that would of course include Israel, the Palestinians and now also Iraq and Kuwait? Would he be in favour of such a conference?

• (2010)

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, without this conflict with Iraq, the international community would probably be holding this conference. Canada supported it from the beginning. It had the support of virtually the whole world, with the exception of one power. However, it is true that both situations need not be linked and there is still the need for such a conference.

We all hope this conflict will be short and that it will soon be followed by such a conference, since the United Nations have now the credibility allowing it to claim to be the forum that will bring about a solution to Middle East's problem.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. I apologize, I forgot the hon. member for Lotbinière spoke only for 10 minutes and I recognize the hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I certainly have to compliment the hon. member for Lotbinière for his excellent presentation of what is obviously a very important issue for all of us here in the House and for all Canadians.

Back in 1988, when I was asked what were all the issues that I would stand for and represent when I ran for election, this was not one of those issues on which I was asked a lot of questions, nor was it one to which I gave a lot of thought. I do not think that two years ago, if I had been asked what would be my views in such a circumstance, I would have have said something to the effect that I would cross that bridge when I came to it and hopefully I would never have to. We all know now that we had to.

Why do we have to make this decision? It is very clear why we have to make this decision. Some 170 days or so ago, a sovereign country, the country of Iraq, decided to invade another sovereign country, the country of Kuwait. A country of 17 million people, with over one million people serving in its armed forces, invaded a country of only 700,000. The war was started by Iraq with its total occupation of Kuwait.

The UN reacted, as it should have. It reacted almost immediately; it demanded an end to the hostilities and the removal from Kuwait of the Iraqi forces. The official hostilities ended not because Iraq left Kuwait but because it had successfully managed to conquer Kuwait and seize it as its 19th province. Sanctions, appropriately, were put in place by the United Nations and almost all commerce with Iraq was stopped. I say almost all, because there is clear evidence that some things were still getting in from Jordan, Iran, or by way of various other border points that may have been available.

It was said sanctions were having an impact, but were they? What were the results? Iraq is still in Kuwait, so obviously sanctions did not stop that from happening. We also know that today the armed forces of Iraq are greater in number than they were 170 days ago. Many reserves were called up to strengthen the very forces that were used to invade Kuwait. In Iraq, if top officials dissented with what Iraq had done, for some unknown reason they were executed.

If we think sanctions are not having an effect in one fashion, as I have just described, I will quote an article from the Toronto Globe and Mail. I think the comment is appropriate. It is always interesting for us to hear the views of many people from other parts of the world. Here is what a Canadian said about the shortage: This article appeared, I believe, on January 11 and read in part:

> Contrary to Western belief, the international embargo on Iraq is hitting hard, she said, and is particularly manifested in shortages of milk and medicine. "As always, the pressure is hurting the women and children—not the people it's supposed to hurt."

The person speaking was Maude Barlow, someone whose views I generally have no support for on many of the issues, but that is her view of what is happening in Iraq. I cannot in my conscience accept that that is what we want to achieve with sanctions. I do not believe that our role is denying women and children the necessities of life.

Canada can be proud of its heritage, particularly as it responds to desperate situations around the world. When assistance is needed regardless of where it is needed, Canada has been there in the past. It is there at the present time, and usually where is it? Where brutal dictatorships exist. Look at the countries in Africa where the people are starving. The brutal dictatorships are functioning, and the people are starving. We are there to help the people, not the dictatorships.

It has happened in Africa. It has happened in Asia in the past. It has happened in Central and South America. We can be there, but I cannot support a situation that will only aggravate the circumstances of citizens in Iraq who are innocent probably of the very atrocities their leadership and their military have foisted on the country beside them. Because of a guy like Saddam Hussein, his citizens will suffer, but not just his citizens. The citizens of many countries around the world, the poor nations, the ones who have to import all their energy supplies, the ones who have to import many other factors will be influenced by the lack of stability in the Middle East.

Of course Iraq claims that Kuwait is now a province, its 19th province. We have provinces. I would like to quote the minister of information for Iraq who said: "Kuwait is Iraq's 19th province and not an inch of it can be relinquished". "Everything they think could be used or valuable is taken by the Iraqis," said Abdullah Shayeji of Kuwaiti University's faculty of commerce. Is that how we expect a province to be treated?

If one is in Baghdad, one will notice that most of the police cars on the streets are in fact from Kuwait. Is that what happens in Canada? Obviously not. We have not attached one province and stolen all of its possessions and hauled them somewhere else. It is clear to me that Iraq is not treating Kuwait as its 19th province. It simply went in to pillage and plunder. We certainly do not hear about those kinds of things happening in the other 18.

I have a number of other quotes I could use about the various atrocities in Iraq, but I think I will pass those by because we have certainly heard them from others and I do not think they need to be repeated. It is clear the atrocities have to stop.

We have heard people say: "Wait. Give sanctions more time." Yet we have not heard how long we should wait or for what, or if they would ever support military action. There is no doubt in my mind that a year or two from now, after the sanctions have proven that the people suffer more and that the military dictatorship has not suffered, we would have to use military forces against them. Then of course we have to deal with the fact that Iraq may be much stronger. However, one thing is certain: Iraq has proven it has no respect for the United Nations.

I am also concerned when I hear people say that this is not a United Nations effort, that this is in fact a U.S. effort, and that we are all teaming with the U.S. There are certainly a lot of nations on the Security Council. Do they really believe that all those nations are simply puppets of the United States? Do they really believe that China or the Soviet Union as members of the Security Council are merely following orders from the United States? When the call for military forces went out, the Liberal and NDP coalition would have the country believe that only those who responded were those in the control of the U.S. Can we imagine Afghanistan, Bangladesh, France, Morocco, Pakistan, Syria, and the United Kingdom all being puppets of the United States, all with forces much greater than anything that Canada has sent there?

Or, can we believe other countries like Argentina, Australia, Bahrain, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, and Germany all being puppets of the United States? I certainly cannot, and I do not think they can either.

I would like to comment on our role in this regard. We are part of the United Nations. Many years ago we were part of another group of nations that liberated a country. Canada played a role. Our role was significant enough; we were important to the country of Holland. We can ask our veterans, those who served in Holland, whether their contribution was useful. As someone who was born in Holland, I can say that although the contribution of Canada in the over-all scheme may not be significant, the Kuwaitis today will greatly appreciate the support in freeing Kuwait supplied many years ago to provide opportunities of freedom and advancement to other countries in the world from its terrible invaders.

I am sure I could go on, but I recognize the time constraint. Clearly we have to support the United Nations in its resolution to deal with the Iraq-Kuwait conference.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be recognized so many times.

I have a question for the hon. member. Could he indicate how he feels about the fact that the Soviet Union at the present time is supportive of the action against Iraq but does not want to respond to the world community as far as freedom in Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia is concerned?

As he knows, the Soviet Union in 1956 during the Suez Canal crisis invaded Hungary. When the west was turning to the Middle East, the Soviet Union acted at that time in Europe. The same thing is happening right now.

Mr. Gorbachev seems to work against the democratic processes that are taking place in the Baltic states. What are his feelings about it?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. There is a substantial difference in the question that he asks and the resolution that we are dealing with today.

The resolution we are dealing with today is one in which all countries of the United Nations have condemned an invasion of one country by another. It does not mean I necessarily support what has happened in some of the places he has talked about, but that is not what we are debating.

We are debating a United Nations action unanimously endorsed. We finally have the nations working together. We have in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics a leader who is showing that maybe he is prepared to turn around some of those things that were wrong 20, 30, or 40 years ago.

Clearly, what we have today is a United Nations resolution that we, and every other country in the world, have been asked to support. I guess that is the difference in the scenario that he describes. He has not got that kind of resolution, and how can we as a country today jump on the internal affairs of another country?

We may not like how that country was created. It may have been created 50 years ago, but under the logic that he would propose, if we go back far enough, Iraq was part of the Persian Empire and Mr. Hussein believes that the Persian Empire should be recreated from the Mediterranean to India, down through the Red Sea and Saudi Arabia. Are we going to say, then, that Iraq is right, that it should be allowed to expand its borders to the maximum because it existed 50, 100 or 300 years ago? Obviously not.

We are dealing today with the United Nations resolution between two sovereign countries. One invaded the other clearly in contravention of everything the United Nations stands for. We are members of the United Nations. To deal with those things we have to support within the United Nations.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, there are few occasions when members of this House are asked to rise on matters of such colossal importance as the matter which is before us today. It is impossible not to be moved by events as they are unfolding and to be deeply troubled by the prospect of what awaits the world in the days and weeks ahead.

My first thoughts are with the brave men and women who are currently in the Persian Gulf region. They face the agonizing uncertainty and doubt which only the reality of war can present. My thoughts are with the families of those Canadians who must now live with the unceasing fear that they may never see their loved ones again. Some of these individuals are my constituents. I cannot forget this. In fact none of us can forget for a single moment that the fate of the Canadians who are now in the Middle East may very well be decided in the next few hours and days. There is no room for outlandish partisanship at this time as too many lives hang in the balance.

Canada and this House have faced moments like this in the past. Throughout our history as a sovereign nation, Parliament has held the ultimate responsibility for the well-being of Canadians when we and other nations have found ourselves facing the prospect of armed conflict. It is vital then that we as parliamentarians have the opportunity to debate fully the life and death situation in which Canadians in the Middle East currently find themselves.

The government must present the choices squarely and honestly. It must be straight with Canadians here in the House of Commons and across Canada. It must not hide its intentions or camouflage its decisions behind nebulous words. Unfortunately, I fear that with the resolution before us the government has done precisely this. The resolution asks that this government reaffirm its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

All members of this House support the United Nations. We have reaffirmed our support time and time again over the last six months. We supported UN Security Council resolution 660 and 662 condemning the Iraqi invasion and the annexation of Kuwait by Iraq. We supported resolution 661 and 670 imposing mandatory economic sanctions against Iraq. We supported the use of military force under the authority of the UN to ensure sanctions are upheld and the use of Canadian Armed Forces to contribute to the enforcement of these sanctions. We condemned Iraq's detention of foreign nationals as hostages and the other brutal violations of human rights.

With the exception of resolution 678 endorsing the use of military force if sanctions had not achieved their objective by the arbitrary deadline of January 15, Liberals on this side supported all of the resolutions against Iraq.

But that is not the issue before us. The request before us, which has been rendered academic by the multinational attack on Iraq and Kuwait as of last night and by Canada's immediate agreement to participate militarily, is for the House to support the participation of Canadian military forces in a military operation led by the United States, an operation carried out under the vague parameters of a UN resolution but which has not been a UN operation. That was as clear as crystal last night as we watched events unfold on television and as we listened to the President of the United States tell the world that Operation Desert Storm had begun.

When the Prime Minister announced the government's intention to engage our forces in this operation, the whole point became moot. The deed was done. Canada was at war. My leader and other members of my caucus have already made clear our answer to the question: Should Canada participate in the military conflict in the gulf? The answer was no. We felt that sanctions had not been given enough time to work. Alternatives short of war to persuade or pressure Saddam Hussein to give up Kuwait had not been fully exhausted.

That was the message this government should have carried to the President of the United States. We felt and still do, that Canada should not abandon so quickly its margin of independent action by following the United States directly into this war, that there was a more constructive role, a role more consistent with our traditions for Canada to play.

That is how my party and I would reaffirm our support for the United Nations. That is how we would choose to contribute to the unprecedented, collective security effort mounted by the United Nations in the face of this act of aggression.

• (2030)

I share the outrage of millions of Canadians at Saddam Hussein's blatant and brutal assault of Kuwait. I agree that this action cannot be tolerated by the world community. For a petty dictator like Saddam to be allowed to gobble up a less powerful neighbour would send the gravest signal to would be aggressors elsewhere, particularly in the Third World where any number of reasons can be dreamed up to question the boundaries and modify the existence of a neighbouring state. To allow people like Saddam Hussein to redraw the world map by brute force would send much of the world into anarchy. Opposing Saddam's actions is vital to peace and security.

But why did it have to be war? Did we really exhaust all possible options short of war, or have we acted prematurely? Must we now purchase with blood what perhaps another few weeks or months of economic sanctions might have accomplished, namely the withdrawal of Saddam Hussein from Kuwait?

What happens if, God forbid, this war drags on, if the conflagration spreads to other countries in the Middle East, to citizens around the world through wanton terrorism, if it leads to the use of chemical, biological, environmental warfare? If we are obliged in the heat of battle to resort to ever more sophisticated weaponry, what happens to our resolve once the casualties begin to mount, once the international media begin to relay back to our livingrooms and to the front pages of our newspapers the images of the war, the carnage and inevitable atrocities? Will we be able to sustain our commitment? Can we be sure that our reasons for entering this conflict are absolutely above reproach, that as we look back, alternatives have actually been exhausted?

There is no question that there are compelling strategic reasons for expelling Saddam Hussein from Kuwait. He is clearly the aggressor. Without by any means wishing for Canada to play the same role, I concede the important and generally favourable role that the United States has played as the defender of freedom and democracy. But the role as the most powerful nation carries with it powerful responsibilities, and it is not always clear that the conduct of U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East has always been above reproach.

I recently had occasion to read an article by Janis Gross Stein, a professor at the University of Toronto and one of Canada's leading international relations experts. In her article entitled "The Challenge of the Persian Gulf Crisis" she analyses the events which have led us to this war and tries to discern how and why events unfolded as they did.

In a very straightforward and honest manner, she poses the question: could the use of force have been avoided through more effective strategies of crisis prevention? Her answers are quite surprising, especially since she documents the events leading up to August 2 when Iraqi forces rolled into Kuwait.

She argues that for the last 10 years the United States and other nations have actively pursued a course of trying to establish Iraq as a major force in the Middle East, ostensibly to offset the perceived dangers of Iranian expansionism. She points out quite correctly that in 1977 Iraq's Armed Forces stood at 188,000 and that barely 10 years later this number had risen to over one million troops.

Professor Stein contends that in the few days and weeks prior to Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, the Americans played a very dangerous game of what she terms deterrence and reassurance, that is to say the U.S. government sent conflicting messages to Iraq about how it would react in the event that Iraq invaded Kuwait. She cites U.S. defense secretary Richard Cheney's comments to journalists on July 19 of last year that America was committed to come to the defence of Kuwait in the event of Iraqi invasion. Only five days later on July 24, a spokesperson for the U.S. State Department remarked, and I quote: "We do not have any defence treaties with Kuwait. There are no special defence or security commitments to Kuwait". Only the next day the U.S. ambassador to Iraq reportedly said to Saddam Hussein personally: "we have no opinion on the Arab–Arab conflicts like your border disagreement with Kuwait".

Many have contended that Saddam Hussein miscalculated how the world, and specifically the United States, would respond if and when he invaded Kuwait. Madam Speaker, it seems he may have had some help from the Americans in this regard.

I want to emphasize again, however, that I find any armed aggression on the part of one country against another totally unacceptable. This is especially true of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, more so when one looks at the atrocities committed by the Iraqi invasion. Nonetheless, our conduct in international relations, and particularly the conduct of the United States, has to be by virtue of its power and the responsibilities it holds absolutely above reproach.

I fear we have not all been lily-white in this. Neither has the United States, and by extension, neither have we. We must all share a portion of the responsibility for events as they have transpired, although none more so than Saddam Hussein. The government's willingness to support the Americans wholeheartedly in whatever they do, something they have demonstrated over and over again, is frustrating and ill-advised. I think it is one of the major reasons why our government has failed to provide a more constructive role in the quest for peace in the Middle East.

The government has been far too caught up in the international game of brinksmanship to realize that we are plunging headlong into war.

Madam Speaker, this is not our war. But now that the war is here, we shall not shun it. Let us be clear about how this war came about. Let us be equally clear in stating that this could have been avoided, perhaps as early as last August.

No one has successfully made the case that sanctions were not working, particularly given the horrible consequences of resorting to war to achieve the desired effect of Saddam Hussein's ultimate withdrawal from Kuwait, given enough time. The imposition of the January 15 deadline was premature. I fear that the government's support of that deadline was shortsighted, that by doing so, Canada has forfeited a great deal of its credibility as a peacekeeper and as a peacemaker.

Whoever is to blame, there is no denying that war has arrived with a vengeance. Early signs of optimism have to be kept in perspective as we witness rumblings of discontent throughout the Arab world; as we see on our television screens tonight the terrible bombings of Israel; as we start to see the extent of the damage inflicted by the initial bombing of the multinational force and of the missile attacks by Iraq on western targets.

The Palestinian factor is still a grave threat to regional security. It is doubtful whether Saddam Hussein has been crippled to the extent which most of us would like to believe.

Therefore, the quest for peace must continue. The point of this war is to drive Saddam Hussein from Kuwait. Yet we should remember that there is still room for diplomacy in achieving that goal. In fact, diplomacy is essential if we are to find any of the long-term solutions to the problems that exist in the region and which have been aggravated over recent days.

Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait will be but the first step on the long road to peace in the Middle East. Thus, this government has a unique opportunity to redeem itself as a peacekeeper; as a nation which still will go the extra mile for peace.

Above all else, we all must remember that first and foremost, the well-being of our troops and our civilians in the Middle East is our No. 1 priority. Likewise, the families and loved ones of our troops and civilians in the gulf must be accorded the kind of consideration and access to information which they so clearly deserve.

That is why I proposed today in this House that the federal government introduce a special hotline so that families can communicate directly to someone with knowledge about the whereabouts and well-being of their relatives and friends who are directly involved in this conflict in the gulf. I hope the government, particularly the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will accept that recommendation which I made to him this afternoon.

• (2040)

We owe as much to our people who find themselves in the Middle East in the middle of a war that they did not ask for but must now fight. We owe it to those whose devotion and commitment to Canada gives them the strength and the courage to fight for it and for the principles they believe in. We owe it to those who may never see their loved ones again and for whom the desert will be an unmarked grave. Let us resolve to do whatever we can to focus on peace to end this conflict as quickly as possible. Let Canada be the leader in achieving a constructive conclusion to this terrible conflict.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's speech. I would like to emphasize that there were signals given to Mr. Hussein by the Americans which certainly indicated that the United States considered the border dispute between Kuwait and Iraq none of their concern.

I would like to quote the United States Ambassador to Iraq, April Galspie, who saw Mr. Hussein on July 25, just a week before the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. In discussing that matter with Mr. Hussein she said and I quote: "We have no opinion on the Arab-Arab conflicts like your border disagreement with Kuwait". Naturally this was a very strong signal to Mr. Hussein that the Americans would not get involved in that conflict.

So there is certainly a responsibility of that ambassador in giving the wrong signal to the Iraqis and now we see the tragedy. I hope that in the future ambassadors are going to consult the State Department before giving such an opinion.

I would like to ask the hon. member what his opinion is on the question of a Middle East peace conference that has been requested for many, many years by the world powers, including the Soviet Union and the Arab world. Does he feel that this problem of a peace conference in the Middle East would have prevented the tragedy that we have today in the Middle East?

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for his question. Before coming to the last question he posed, I would just like to make a few remarks to elaborate the point that I was trying to make with respect to the behaviour of the United States immediately prior to the August 2 invasion of Kuwait.

The point that I want to make is not a condemnation of U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East or anywhere else, but U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East for many years has been exercised in the form of signals and nuances. That is the way it has been carried out, presumably, to achieve some form of regional stability. It has obviously not always worked. The point I wanted to make is when we contemplate an action such as that which was undertaken last night, we have a very difficult problem in generating and sustaining the commitment against the hostilities that may result. In democratic countries we have to deal with that problem. The United States felt it in spades in Vietnam in the 1960s. That is point I wanted to make, particularly in terms of the decision to go ahead and launch this attack and for Canada to just jump right in afterward.

To return to the peace conference question, the peace conference which has been proposed for many years as a vehicle for achieving a resolution of the Palestinian question is, of course, the thorny issue at the centre of the Middle East problem. I endorse it as a good idea, independent of whether in fact there was a conflict and independent of the Iraq invasion of Kuwait. I think the peace conference is a good idea but it is not at all linked to what has happened in Kuwait.

I believe that when this is over, a peace conference should be proposed and all participants should be willing to achieve a final resolution of this issue to ensure some kind of secure boundaries for the Palestinians as well as for the State of Israel. I think that is consistent with the UN resolution 242 and others. Ultimately, we have to achieve something like that before we will have lasting peace in the Middle East.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I apologize to my colleague. I did not arrive until the last five minutes of his speech, but I know him to be a very sincere individual who has once again shown that to be true.

In these kinds of situations I usually turn to Tommy Douglas and see what he had to say about war, peace and a whole host of things. We are talking about American foreign policy here. Tommy Douglas said that the Americans have their hawks and doves and the Canadian politicians have their parrots.

Another indication is that this war is about oil. It is about power and it is about money. A wise journalist in the United States said that if Kuwait was full of coconut trees and date palms, the Americans and the other coalition of nations would never have invaded Kuwait.

The President of the United States has tried on many occasions, as has our Prime Minister, to explain the rationale for this war. He started out by saying: "We have some national American interests in Kuwait". That was not acceptable. He then said: "We are going to lose jobs". That was not acceptable. So he turned to the aggressor stance. "Let's get after Saddam Hussein".

Last night was a surgical manoeuvre. Tonight I think it is resulting in a malpractice suit. I would like the hon. member to comment on American policy and Canadian corroboration, co-operation or just the following of American foreign policy in the Middle East.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member again for his kind words and for his question. Canada and the United States are two very different countries and we can and should pursue our interests and our responsibilities on the world stage in very different ways.

For Canada to simply follow the United States, whether the United States may be pursuing its own interests or world interests, is invalid. I believe that Canada has a role to play by being independent of the United States; by maintaining its margin of independence; by maintaining its freedom of action and by not marching locked step.

A precise example is that we are not opposing the United Nations or we are not against the United Nations because we do not do exactly what the United States does, but we actually could be supporting the cause of peace and the cause of world stability by acting independently and differently than the United States.

• (2050)

American foreign policy, because America is the giant that it is, pursues a whole range of different interests. I am not the one who would be the first to dump all over American foreign policy. Obviously, in Kuwait there are some strategic interests, not only to the Americans but to everybody else.

I do not see why Canada cannot pursue an independent role in the Middle East, particularly with this conflict, and be very constructive without having to embark on a war. Certainly, I do not believe that necessarily it is a wise course for the United States to have got into this war at this time. I think it is dangerously premature.

I think it is an error in judgment that the American government has made, quite frankly.

Mr. Shields: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, before the debate starts. I am wondering if it is possible and whether there is agreement in the House to allow our pages who are first year university students to leave tonight, and maybe just keep a skeleton staff to man the phones and let the rest go home.

They have studying to do, and we are keeping them very long hours.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his suggestion.

We will do some kind of negotiations behind the curtain, and I am sure that we will come to some kind of an agreement very soon.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver): Madam Speaker, I honestly wish I lived in the world that is envisioned by some of the members of the opposition.

I wish I lived in a world in which all things were negotiable, where all people were reasonable, where discussion could take place and solutions could be arrived at with dispatch and where everyone was amicable to the result. Unfortunately, I do not live in such a world. Nor do they, and they do not seem to know it.

Let me talk about Saddam Hussein for just a moment to begin with. This man, with his uncle, killed his first man at the age of 15. At 20, he headed up the execution squads of the party. At 25, he placed himself in a position where he was in charge of security for his government and then, by murder, finally achieved the dictatorship which he now controls in Iraq.

This is not a man whom you can negotiate with. This is not a man who deserves consideration at all. There has been six months of so-called diplomacy with Iraq. He said exactly the same thing at the end of the six months as he said to begin with despite peace proposals and conferences of all kinds proposed by all people.

Finally, in desperation, the United Nations passed resolution 678, which meant that after January 15 there could be force used to remove him from Kuwait.

The major argument I hear is that the sanctions should have been allowed to work and that they should have been continued. It might take another six months, another year or year and a half. Even those who most firmly believe in sanctions were not prepared to set a time limit on it. That, or war.

If we have sanctions, of course there is no war, no great piles of dead and no great war machine moving into action. It sounds good, but let's also look at what sanctions mean.

In the small countries such as Senegal, from one day to the next its energy bill doubled, which meant hardly any money left over for health or education. That happened in many Third World countries.

Let us talk about Kuwait itself. We have seen six months of brutalization, rape and pillage take place there, and it is continuing. All right, if you want sanctions, you must be prepared to see that total kind of destruction and suffering in the rest of the world, you must be prepared to see Kuwait utterly destroyed as more and more citizens are killed, and so on.

There is no easy answer here; there is no easy answer at all. Sanctions mean suffering to some other people and, quite frankly, if you feel as I do that sanctions would never work with this kind of barbarian, this jackal, as he is called, then I think you understand that sanctions also mean tragedy in Iraq itself. It will not be the military that suffers, it will be the poor people of Iraq that the sanctions will affect. You pay your money, you can have your choice. I prefer what has now happened, with an attack on Iraq by the United Nations, by the four major powers. There is an old line that states: "All that is necessary for evil to triumph is that good men do nothing". Well, we did everything we could for six months; it amounted to nothing and now something else is taking place.

If we go back in history to Manchuria, 1931; if the League of Nations had done something then who knows what the world would be like today. In 1935, in the case of Ethiopia, had the League of Nations been able to act, we might not have had the Second World War. In 1936, the Rhineland, and on, of course to Czechoslovakia. Had the major western powers acted at that time, history now tells us Hitler would have been destroyed, he would have backed down and been replaced and we might not have had the Second World War. You can appease but if you do you threaten to repeat history.

I am slightly annoyed, more than that I think, with many of my colleagues who wish to damn the Americans. My only thought is, thank God for the Americans. Without the Americans in 1950 in Korea, without the Americans today, fighting in Iraq, without their great strength, I do not know what the world would be like. I would also point out that some things they do we do not like but they have not been empire builders. They have gone into countries but they have come out and left those countries to run their own affairs. This is not the case in terms of Iraq and Kuwait. Frankly, this barbarian must be stopped; he must be destroyed.

The attack with nerve gas, as reported in Israel tonight, is another indication of the kind of individual that you are dealing with. You are not dealing with the Iraqi people, you are dealing with a despot and a total barbarian. I only hope he can be destroyed and destroyed quickly, with a minimum loss of life so that the world can continue on.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, my very good hon. friend, who has a very good knowledge of history, has given us good examples of how the outcomes might have been had the world acted differently. Would he very kindly comment on another historical fact that took place and tell me where the world would be tonight when, on November 29, 1947, the United Nations, that all of this party is so pleased to acclaim today, and rightly so, decided that the time had come to create in the land of Palestine two states, one for the Jew and one for the Palestinian. Would my friend, who is highly knowledgeable about history, care to comment and tell me if the world today would not be safer and more sane?

• (2100)

Mr. Cook: I would love to comment on that because the hon. member has a rather coloured picture of the history of that time. However, remember this: Israel was a peaceful country, and the Jewish state when it was formed was attacked by all of its Arab neighbours. They fought them off, established lines—

Mr. Prud'homme: In '48?

Mr. Cook: We are talking '47 and '48. We are also talking about the Arab countries that persuaded the Palestinians to leave their villages and to leave the Jewish state. We are talking about those leaders in the Arab world that set up those refugee camps and maintained them for years for political purposes, not in the best interests of the Palestinians.

The Palestinians have been hard done by the Arab world, not by the Jewish state. The hon. member shouldn't ever forget that when he talks now in terms of the world being different if we did not have a Jewish state. Thank God Israel is there.

Surely, sooner or later, perhaps the Arabs will quit fighting among themselves and allow the Palestinians to take their proper role in the Middle East. It is the Arab world, not the Jewish state, that has contributed to the great suffering of the Palestinians over the past 40 years.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for North Vancouver said at the opening of his remarks that he wished he lived in a world so that all things were negotiable. He suggested that somehow those on this side of the House were naive because we believe in negotiation.

I liken negotiation in this instance to two young tough guys fighting it out in the school yard. What we have is one beating the other one up very badly. He has the other one on the ground with his hands around his neck and is banging his head on the ground saying: "Do you give, do you give?" But he will not take his hands off his neck long enough for a yes or a no. You cannot negotiate unless you allow the other one to answer.

I am responding to that comment from the hon. member because we now have a situation where, after last night's attack, the question has not even been asked: "Do you give?"

I know the hon. member has been in the House waiting for his opportunity to speak. He will be happy to know that the latest report is that the warheads that struck Israel were not chemical warheads. I am sure he shares with me a great deal of relief about that.

The hon. member asked: "Can you imagine how sanctions would hurt the people of Iraq if they continue?" I think I am quoting him correctly. My question is: Could he tell me if he does not believe that the action last night very much hurt the 350,000 people who died?

Mr. Cook: Madam Speaker, there are two quick caveats. I am curious as to where the figure 350,000 came from.

I am delighted that they were not chemical warheads that struck in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem tonight.

As far as the rest of it is concerned, we have had six months of solid diplomacy and negotiation and got absolutely nowhere with this barbarian. There comes a time when you must take action. I repeat the line I gave in the speech. "All it takes for evil to triumph is that good men do nothing." The time is for action now.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Madam Speaker, on August 2, 1990, Saddam Hussein brutally invaded Kuwait, a fellow Arab nation. His purpose was simple. He wanted to extinguish Kuwait as a nation and systematically acquire its wealth. What he did not count on was the united condemnation of his actions by the United Nations.

Saddam Hussein turned a deaf ear to the world and quickly massed his troops along the Iraqi and Kuwait borders with Saudi Arabia. In a rapid response some 30 nations, including Canada, sent military personnel and equipment to the region to deter any further aggression. This was not simply a collection of nations acting individually and unilaterally, but instead a united stand against Hussein's actions under the umbrella of the United Nations.

The United Nations Security Council condemned Iraq's naked aggression on the very day of that invasion. Subsequently, 11 more resolutions have been adopted by the Security Council, culminating with resolution 678 which authorized the use of force if Iraq did not withdraw by January 15, 1991.

The most startling fact about this situation is that we have walked down this road before. Over 50 years ago, the world was faced with this very type of naked aggression. At that point, that fork in the road where apparently small decisions marked a very critical choice, the results were a very different result for mankind.

British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain talked about peace in our time. He and much of the world put their trust in the policy of appeasement. The world wrongly assumed that if it appeased aggression, the aggression would end. History has shown us the horrible price of that policy.

The original intent of this motion before the House tonight was to show whether we had learned that lesson from history. Actions taken by the international community against Iraq indicate that we have. I believe that the United Nations and Canada in its own role—I am convinced, in fact—is that Canada is taking the most appropriate path.

Last November 11, Remembrance Day, I was in my constituency in the town of High River, Alberta. There was an edge of emotion to that day because it was the first time for a considerable period of years when Canadian forces were on duty, away from home, in an area that could potentially become a war zone. That emotional edge came through that day. Canadian forces were moving toward the gulf. There was, of course, the recognition of those who had made their sacrifice in previous world events. But the master of ceremonies also made reference to me, giving me a message as a member of Parliament, and that message was make the right decision, but try all possible diplomatic alternatives to solve this situation.

The speeches made here the day before yesterday by the Prime Minister and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs outlined in intricate detail the countless diplomatic initiatives all sadly rebuffed by the regime in Iraq. The choice of the right path for the United Nations and for Canada, because we did have a choice, was clear.

No nation and no leader takes a decision to use force or to enter war without knowledge of the potentially horrendous consequences. While early reports were encouraging, I have no doubt that the United Nations forces will face very great challenges. Nothing can be taken for granted. Reports even in the last couple of hours suggest that the State of Israel has suffered a missile attack of, as yet, an uncertain impact and also of an uncertain but potentially volatile result.

We should not be surprised by a volatile circumstance like this, for the risks and the uncertainties are legion and dangerous, but the objective remains the same as it was yesterday and the day before. The objective is the rejection of naked aggression, united action by united nations, and a world order where peace is an enduring possibility.

Many constituents have asked me why we are in the Persian Gulf. Canada is in the gulf because of our commitment to the United Nations. We are a founding member of the UN and have always supported the role it has played in the international community. The UN has seldom been more effective in unity than it is today. We need a UN which secures world stability.

The cold war has melted away. With the bipolar world of the U.S. at one side and the U.S.S.R at the other—each maintaining control within their own spheres of influence—having dissipated in the last couple of years, we need an instrument, a means, to keep the peace in the world. Clearly, the United Nations is the body through which that can be achieved.

We, as Canadians, cannot accept the benefits of membership in the United Nations without also accepting the responsibilities that come with that membership. My conviction is that we must act as Canadians, not as boy scouts or girl guides in the international scene, but as a nation of commitment and a nation prepared to step forward and play its appropriate role.

In light of our stand in this crisis, where Canada chose the path of principle, our standing, and the standing of the United Nations as a result, is strengthened in the long-term search for peace.

In other circumstances, people speak of the effect of victimization. One person may be the victim of a particularly disastrous and destructive act of another. It is not just the individual that that happens to. It is not just the victim who is victimized. So are the members of that person's family who suffer with the consequences.

In the family of nations, particularly small nations such as Kuwait and Canada, when one nation is a victim, all nations are victimized. None can afford those immoral results.

In reverse, when there are heroes, we pay tribute to the courage of those heroes. The families and the loved ones of those individuals are heroes as well.

I conclude by paying tribute to the bravery and courage, not only to the Canadian Armed Forces men and women, but I pay tribute to the families of those men and women, for they, in their own private ways, are heroes by association.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, quite often in the debate tonight we have reflected upon the essential point of the need for the economic sanctions which were previously imposed before the United Nations alliance came to exercise its final options.

A critical point that many members in the opposition have made, including our Liberal colleagues, is that insufficient time was given for those economic sanctions to take bite; that in fact President Bush drew an arbitrary line in the sands of times on January 15 and set that as the deadline.

There is ample evidence to suggest that, given time, those economic sanctions would have indeed proven to be most effective in convincing Saddam Hussein to reconsider his unnecessary aggression against Kuwait.

For the digestion of the member opposite, I want him to consider the comments that were made by the United States CIA director, Mr. Bill Webster, before the U.S. Congress, back in December.

He said: "Iraqi exports had been slashed 97 per cent and imports reduced to 90 per cent of the trade before the annexation of Kuwait." He went on to say that the Baghdad regime is inexorably running out of the commodity on which its future depends: money. "Oil revenues are the drip-feed of Baghdad's life support system and without them," he concludes, "the dictatorship will inevitably perish."

I would like to submit, on behalf of my colleagues on this side of the House, for the member's consideration that that is very strong evidence and that, given time, those economic sanctions would have and could have done the job. The reality that we face today, with the carnage we see developing in the Middle East, with the decision to pull the pin—the trigger—is that those economic sanctions have not been given the opportunity to work.

Mr. Hughes: Madam Speaker, my hon. colleague opposite me asks the question: Was there sufficient time for the sanctions to work?

The answer to that will become clear with history. The evidence in the public domain suggests that those people who would suffer most under sanctions are the people in Iraq least able to look after themselves. Those who would be the last to be affected would be the armed forces of Saddam Hussein. The first people to suffer are the children like the Kuwaiti babies who were brutally murdered when Saddam Hussein moved into Kuwait.

What was worse was that Saddam Hussein was using this time to stall, to build up his armaments, to position himself in Kuwait, and to prepare himself for the battle that was coming. He was preparing for environmental disaster.

My friend opposite, I am sure, believes that we could afford to wait and to try to negotiate time after time. That is what has happened over the last months since August 2. There has been attempt after attempt, by country after country, culminating in the several attempts by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, to respond to this crisis and to appeal for some signal from Saddam Hussein that he was genuinely prepared to sit down and talk, and to relinquish property unjustifiably seized from Kuwait in a brutal act last summer.

I think that the evidence is clear.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, this is a very difficult debate to participate in at this stage since things are changing very rapidly in the Middle East.

We have to ask ourselves the very fundamental question; that is, should Canada have gone to war? Should we have been a participant in that war? Should the American-led forces have declared war yesterday? My answer to that is no.

I think sanctions should have been given more time to work. Diplomacy should have been given more time to work. It was a mistake to go to war at this time. This war will cost thousands and thousands of lives. Already thousands of people have been killed, many of them innocent civilians, children and people who have no responsibility whatsoever for Saddam Hussein.

At the same time, I, like anybody else in the country, agree that Saddam Hussein is a madman, a person who has been a very destructive person, and that he has to be stopped. The question is: How do we stop him? I maintain—and I think a lot of people in this country maintain—that the way to do that was through sanctions.

First, I want to talk about the war. The question is, should this country go to war? If we believe this country should go to war, then I think, as the politicians who make that decision, we should believe that our own children, if they are of age, should go to war.

I want to personalize this for a few minutes. I have a 17-year old son and I do not believe he should go to war in the gulf. If I do not believe he should go to war in the gulf, how can I vote for any resolution that would ask another Canadian young man or young woman to go to war in the gulf? I ask members to reflect on that. To personalize it, the Prime Minister has a couple of children around the same age as my 17-year old son, Jason. He has a boy and a girl of roughly that age and he should reflect on that. We should all reflect on that.

I received a Christmas card from a constituent in the little town of Invermay who said that her son is with the CF-18 squadron in the gulf. She is extremely upset that Canada is involved in this war. She asked me in her letter, if Joe Clark had a son the same age as hers, would he be so gung ho about going to war. These are some very personal questions, but I think we have to answer them honestly as to how we would react about our own families and the people who are close to us, and then try to expand that to other people in the country because we are all Canadians. As a matter of fact, we are all citizens of the world, not just Canadians, and war is a devastating thing.

Some 22 years ago when I was first elected as a member of Parliament in 1968, I was one of four members of Parliament who over a three-year period volunteered to be an observer in the Biafra-Nigeria war. I spent seven days in the war zone. I saw bombs dropping. I saw people attacked by MiG fighters that flew over us in the middle of the night. I saw anti-aircraft fire on the MiGs. I saw people dying in hospitals because they had been bombed and shelled. I was in sick bays where people were dying of starvation, mostly women and children. I saw the effects of war and how these people had been ravaged by war. It was an experience that profoundly changed my life in terms of how I look on the consequences of war.

That Saddam Hussein is a dictator and a madman, we all agree. But there are a lot of little kids in Iraq and in Baghdad and all across that country who are not responsible for Saddam Hussein. They have been killed already, will be killed tonight, killed tomorrow and the next day. There are kids in Tel Aviv, innocent people in Jerusalem, who are under attack tonight because of the consequences of that war, people who have no responsibility whatsoever.

What has happened is fundamentally wrong and I think our country made a very serious tactical error when it decided to participate in an offensive mission in the gulf. We should have participated as we did in the enforcement of sanctions, but we should not have engaged our military in any offensive way. Instead, we should have been using that military for humanitarian purposes and in a peacekeeping role, a role which has probably now been sacrificed because of our involvement against Iraq in this particular war.

We should have pursued sanctions. There was some evidence that sanctions were beginning to work. Ninety-seven per cent of Iraq's exports had already ended because of sanctions. Some 90 per cent of its imports had already ended because of sanctions against that country taken by the multinational forces. Industrial production in Iraq had declined by some 40 per cent since August last year, and the gross national product in Iraq had declined by 30 per cent since the month of April. The largest suppliers of arms and parts to Iraq had totally stopped supplying Iraq.

It was a mistake for our country to become involved in an offensive military way. It was a mistake for the United Nations forces, led by the United States, to attack at this particular time.

There is a lot of killing. There will be a lot more killing. There is a very serious possibility that this thing can escalate a lot more than has already happened in the last 24 hours.

We should reflect upon the failure of humankind to be able to resolve our disputes through peaceful and non-violent ways and some of the hypocrisy that we see around the world. Only a few months ago the Americans were supporting Iraq. The Soviet Union and the French were supplying Iraq with arms to balance off Iran two or three years back. There was the Soviet involvement in Afghanistan and how we all condemned that, but of course there was no force used against them. The Americans talked about a new world order after their involvement in Nicaragua, Panama, El Salvador, and Vietnam. Some people said: "Well, sanctions would not work because we tried them for four or five months in Iraq," and yet we had sanctions working in places such as Rhodesia and South Africa.

If we had given sanctions a few more months, even a few more weeks, or maybe a year or so, we may have avoided killing tens of thousands, and maybe hundreds of thousands of innocent people all around the world. I do not say only in Iraq, I say all around the world. When you drop a bomb on Iraq, that bomb reverberates in the ghettos of New York and may reverberate in Yorkton, Saskatchewan, or in Montreal, or any other part of this country.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, since this afternoon we have heard frequent references by government members to peace and to Mr. Pearson. All I can say is that as a result of recent events, it will be very difficult for us in Canada to maintain our position as peacekeepers, a position we earned at great cost. From now on, we will no longer be perceived as neutral peacekeepers. As they say in English:

[English]

—"When you unleash the dogs of war, you never know on whom they are going to turn."

[Translation]

Today's events prove the situation is becoming increasingly horrifying and catastrophic. I deplore the fact that Mr. Pearson's approach no longer prevails, and I must say that what worries me most, Madam Speaker, is the question of the government's agenda, its political and its military agenda.

My comment is this: Why didn't the government recall Parliament at the beginning of January or the end of December? Did the government know something about the military agenda and did it arrange its own political agenda accordingly?

We see that Canadians are torn on this issue, at a time when we should be united. We have a Parliament that is torn. Members contradict each other. They express all kinds of opposing views, at a time when we should be united, because today, this evening, the situation is catastrophic in this country. In concluding, Madam Speaker, I want to tell the government and government members that I have the impression they have developed a political agenda around their knowledge of a military agenda.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments. Is there rebuttal? The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I do not have time because my friend from Edmonton wants to make a few comments, but I will pick up on one of the comments made by my friend from Ottawa. He made a comment that Parliament should have been called back in December or January, and I certainly agree with that.

This is a very serious situation. I believe that Parliament should have been called back. I believe that there should have been a question put before the House of Commons and the question should have been along the lines of: Does the House of Commons agree with the proposition we should send Canadian soldiers to war in the gulf?

That question was never put to the House of Commons. We should have had a free vote on that question by all three parties in the House, plus all the independents of this House; that the members of this House of Commons should have voted according to their conscience or according to the wishes of their constituents. I think that is what we should have done.

The most important issue we are ever going to face in Parliament is the issue of peace and war. When we decide to send young Canadian men and women off to a war in a different part of the world, then surely to God it should not be the government of the day making that decision in the cabinet rooms without the full and free debate and consent of the House of Commons, regardless of what party that member of Parliament represents.

That has been a fundamental failure in this process. The Canadian people deserve nothing less. "Deserved"—I will put in the past tense—nothing less because the decision has already been made. Canadian people deserve nothing less than the Prime Minister coming into the House of Commons, putting on the Order Paper the question of whether or not we would participate in offensive military action in this country. He should have put that question on the Order Paper and we should have had a free vote of all members of the House of Commons.

Now surely that is the least we could have expected from the Prime Minister of Canada. I just wish that the government backbenchers across the way would have screwed up the courage and insisted that their leader allow a free and democratic vote on this issue. They did not do it, and now the country is going to pay for it.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, Canadian participation in the war in the gulf is a terrible and tragic mistake. Indeed the war itself is a terrible and tragic mistake.

In every forum that I have had made available to me for the last several months, I have argued that point. The fact that war has been declared does not now make what had been the prospect of a wrong war into, now, the reality of anything other than a wrong war, a terrible tragically mistaken war.

Before I get into the question of what is wrong with this war, I would like first, however, to salute and to declare my complete support for the brave women and men serving in the Canadian forces in the gulf. To them we owe a debt that we cannot ever pay for they are preparing to incur on our behalf horrors—and perhaps final horrors—that we can never experience. At least, I pray we never have to experience them.

What I have to say tonight about the war in no way reflects on the high esteem in which I hold the women and men that we have sent there to fight on our behalf. Indeed, Madam Speaker, the women and men of all of the forces fighting in the gulf, and of all the civilian population living there, on them are the horrors being visited about which we only talk.

The government has advanced three and a half arguments for Canada's participation in the war. I would like to deal briefly with each in turn.

The first is that we must engage in this attack on Iraq and this war, or we will have failed to support the United Nations. That is bunkum. It is bunkum from a couple of points of view.

The first is that the resolution that authorized this war, resolution 678, states in its all-important paragraph 2 that the Security Council "authorizes member states to—use all necessary means to uphold and implement—" resolution 660 and so on, having to do with removing Iraq from the gulf.

It "authorizes" the member states. It does not compel them. But it authorizes them to use all necessary means. It does not specify the means. To say that we are compelled by resolution 678 to engage in a war is false. It is utterly and completely false.

Because it is false you will find that the active combatants in the gulf thus far number precisely five. Of those 31 member states which we have been told repeatedly in this House are among those states enforcing the actions of the United Nations in the gulf, precisely five are engaged in hostilities.

Among those others that have been named, Argentina, which by the way is there with war ships and 100 troops, has said that its troops will not fight in any offensive role.

Czechoslovakia has sent 200 anti-chemical warfare troops. They have no offensive capacity. They are there in a strictly defensive capacity.

Denmark sent one small frigate. This ship was sent to enforce sanctions and will stay if war breaks out, but it is not playing any offensive role.

Italy, with eight Tornado fighter bombers, has required that a parliamentary vote be held before any of its forces go into action. That vote has not been held and is not anticipated.

New Zealand sent two C–130 transport aircraft and a medical team. They have no offensive role envisaged for these forces at this time.

Norway sent one coast guard ship. Again, this coast guard ship has no offensive capacity.

Even of those states involved in the enforcement of sanctions in the gulf, the overwhelming majority are not involved in offensive action in the gulf. This is to say nothing of the literally scores of good upstanding members of the United Nations who are not even in the gulf enforcing sanctions. One thinks of Germany, for example.

So that argument is nonsense.

The second argument is that sanctions are not working, and this has two sub–arguments. The first: proof that sanctions are not working is that Hussein has not withdrawn, so obviously the sanctions are not working. That argument could have been made the day after the sanctions were imposed. You impose the sanctions, you wait a day and Hussein has not withdrawn. Therefore the sanctions do not work. That is the logic that we are being asked to eat here tonight. In fact, that logic holds right up until the day before the sanctions do work.

Setting that aside, it has been argued in this House that strategic goods are getting through and that Mr. Hussein's forces are being built up despite the sanctions. This argument has been made most forcefully by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He has refused to cite the sources on which he bases his argument, but let that pass for the time being.

Let us consider, not taking my word for it, the word of some fairly knowledgeable Americans, including the former secretary of defense and former CIA director James Schlesinger who, appearing before the U.S. Senate Armed Forces Committee on November 27, said, and I quote: "The embargo, backed up by a naval blockade, is the most successful ever achieved aside from time of war. Early on, it was officially estimated that it would require a year for the sanctions to work. It now appears to be working more rapidly than anticipated. In three months, civilian production in Iraq is estimated to have declined by some 40 per cent; oil exports are essentially nil; and export earnings have dropped correspondingly."

He says as well: "the probability that the economic sanctions will result in a satisfactory outcome is very high."

Or, if you don't like him, try Admiral William Crowe, the former chairman of the U.S. joint chiefs of staff, appearing before the same committee on November 28, said: "The embargo is biting heavily in my judgment. Given the standard of living Iraq is used to and the increasing sophistication of Iraqi society, it is dead wrong to say that Iraq is not being hurt. It is being damaged severely. That also, I believe, goes for the Iraqi military, which depends on outside support."

If that is not enough I have another quote from William Crowe: "I would argue that we should give sanctions a fair chance before we discard them. . . If, in fact, the sanctions will work in 12 to 18 months, instead of six months, the trade–off of avoiding war with its attendant sacrifices and uncertainties would, in my estimation, be more than worth it."

Or, how about General David Jones, former chairman of the U.S. joint chiefs of staff, quoted before the same committee: "the risk is that the problems inherent in maintaining the offensive military option could create—", I am sorry, that is an argument I do not have time to make tonight. However, still quoting the same gentleman, General Jones: "its his industrial capacity", that is to say Hussein's, "the fact that he is losing $20 to $30 billion in hard currency per year, that he is not getting military supplies. It is the fundamentals of his country, as opposed to the food. And as his hard currency dries up, the smuggling will—you know the smugglers want hard currency." So, the sanctions were working before they were so heedlessly abandoned.

• (2140)

The last major argument that the government has is that we must go in because Kuwaitis are being wiped out and nothing we could do could be anywhere near as bad.

I quote from an article in today's Edmonton Journal: "Brothers pray for safety of parents still in Kuwait". I quote from the article:

> Two brothers from Kuwait prayed for their parents' safety Wednesday night, listening to the TV in horror as American bombers attacked Iraq.

> Said and Sadi Karaman left their parents, a brother, and a sister in Kuwait City when they came to Canada on student visas in January.
> Although a letter two weeks ago indicated their parents were fine, repeated attempts to reach them on the phone Wednesday night failed.
> "I just want my parents here," said Said, 21, his voice shuddering.
> Although he was angry when the Iraqis invaded, the Kuwaiti people could have solved their own problem, Sadi said.
> "(The attack) isn't going to liberate Kuwait. It's going to be war. The peaceful solution would have been better."

That is the only Kuwaiti I have seen directly quoted in my hometown newspaper.

The last argument the government may have used is that the Canadian people were behind this. But, they are not. They are opposed to it. In my riding I have had 36 phone calls; three favour war, 33 are against. I have had six letters; one was for, five were against, not counting the letter I read into the record the other night.

In conclusion, and I am sorry I have not been able to lay before the House all the evidence I had hoped to in these brief 10 minutes. I would just say that what Canada is embarked upon at this time is a terrible and tragic mistake. It was wrong two days ago. It was wrong yesterday. It is wrong today. We must withdraw from that war and we must do everything we can to bring that war to a halt as quickly as possibly we can.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, in congratulating the hon. member for Edmonton East for his very impressive speech, I would like to ask him to expand for a moment on his concluding remarks when he was pulling his argument together and tell the House and the people watching this debate whether, in his opinion, we would be in this terrible mess tonight if the sanctions would still be applied tonight in the Middle East.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. Had the sanctions been allowed to continue to bite ever deeper—first into Saddam Hussein's national Iraqi economy, but more importantly, into his ability to maintain his war-making capacity—there would have been no need for war.

The current director of the CIA, in testimony in the United States, two former chairmen of the CIA, two former directors of the American joint chiefs of staff, all testifying before various congressional committees, said the sanctions would in all probability work. In fact, they were already working. For whatever reason, that considered and informed opinion was deemed wrong. I have yet to hear any opinion expressed in this House to the contrary to which I would lend anything close to the same credibility.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would tell us what kind of a serious situation we might face in a year if we were to give Saddam a year or perhaps two years in order to prepare his war machine, to continue to prepare for a battle which he seemed to be prepared to take on regardless of the consequences.

I am surprised to find a gentleman of that party at probably the only time in my life that I will hear him quoting such sources as the CIA and the joint chiefs of staff of the United States of America as his authorities to build his arguments. But, perhaps it occurs to the hon. member that things change, that the statements he was quoting earlier were subsequently proven incorrect. No, I do not suggest that the hon. member would ever listen to that kind of an argument.

Madam Speaker, there are members in this House, including members of the party of the member who just spoke, who say that this is not our war.

When is it our war? Is it when they move into Saudi Arabia? Is it when they move into Jordan? Is it when they try to move into Israel? When is it our war? When is it that the interests of Canada, of the United Nations and of world peace are not our interests?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I attempt, whenever I am mounting an argument, to cite the most credible sources I can find. That is how I attempt, logically, to examine a question.

I am sorry, but again I say I have heard nothing in this House that bears anywhere close to the credibility or indeed the fullness of the testimony of these gentlemen before the various American congressional committees. And, as to the question of what would happen in a year, I would just give him two brief quotes. One is from General David Jones, and I quote:

> In the area of military hardware, we and our allies can repair and replace our equipment as needed, while time works against the Iraqi armed forces.

The current director of the CIA, William Webster, said in his testimony of December 5, and I quote:

> At current rates of depletion, we estimate Iraq will have nearly depleted its available foreign exchange reserves by next spring.

It is the foreign exchange reserves they use to buy the bootlegged, strategic material on the black market which the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs was talking about. If they do not have the foreign exchange, they do not have the means to make war.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I submit to this House that Saddam Hussein is an evil that has advanced so far the world could wait no longer to take decisive action.

I know all Canadians tonight are thinking of our Armed Forces, men and women who are certainly putting their lives at stake in defence of freedom and in defence of world order. Certainly this is not a case, as the opposition and a great many others would have us believe, of a war for oil only.

On August 2 of this past year Iraq brutally invaded Kuwait, deploying more than 150,000 soldiers, 1,200 tanks, and some 1,000 armoured vehicles. Swiftly capturing Kuwait City, Iraq began a systematic ravaging of Kuwait's resources and population.

In fact the independent human rights organization, Amnesty International, recently documented a long list of cases of torture, rape, brutality, and so on inflicted on the Kuwaiti people. Canada is part of the United Nations sanctioned alliance which has been sending a clear message to Saddam Hussein that acts of armed aggression are no longer tolerated by the international community.

Over a three-month period, the United Nations Security Council has adopted 12 resolutions with respect of the Iraqi aggression in Kuwait. The debate in the House of Commons that began on Tuesday is on a government motion reaffirming Canada's commitment to United Nations resolution 678. I support whole heartedly the motion. Canada, as a member of the United Nations sanctioned alliance, has sent a message to Saddam Hussein that it would use military force if Iraq did not withdraw from Kuwait. As of last night, the United Nations coalition moved to make good on that pledge.

I strongly disagree with the Leader of the Loyal Opposition who indicated that at the first sign of military action Canada should withdraw from the gulf. With your friends you stand shoulder to shoulder, especially in hard times, and I can assure the House that Canada is not a fair weather friend. Prior to the outbreak of hostilities in the Persian Gulf, many voices were raised saying that any military action in the gulf would be a United States action. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The force present in the gulf representing more than 30 nations is sanctioned by the 12 resolutions of the United Nations Security Council and is backed by near unanimous support. The world is united in its condemnation of the Iraqi aggression against Kuwait and the Iraqi aggression against the rule of international law.

Canada's role in the region and its support of resolution 678 are based solidly on our historical commitment to the United Nations as the preferred instrument for preserving international peace and security. Indeed, the actions of Canada and all nations currently in the Persian Gulf have been under the auspices of the United Nations. In terms of the military action that commenced January 16 under UN resolution 678, the charter of the United Nations clearly provides for the kind of action which has been taken in the region in the past. The United Nations was unable to undertake such measures because of the constraints of the cold war. The effect had been to prevent any direct intervention by the United Nations.

As it stands now, there is no contradiction between Canada's present role in the gulf and the peacekeeping roles we have undertaken in the past. Where Canadians are having a problem with Canada's present role is that Canadians are not used to sending ships, planes, and soldiers to areas where conflict threatens. We are used to our military forces putting on blue United Nations helmets and going to places where cease-fires had been declared and where we were enforcing a truce and not preventing a war.

However, just as the United Nations role is evolving in the post cold war period, so is Canada's role as a peacemaker. Interestingly enough, the idea of peacekeeping as Canadians have come to know was at one time new. When Lester B. Pearson designed the first United Nations force which helped to end the Suez crisis, there were many voices raised opposing what Canada was doing in that particular situation. Those same voices said that Suez was none of our business. The voices of doubt were wrong then, and they are most certainly wrong now. From the courage shown by most Canadians then a great United Nations tradition was born and a long and honourable Canadian commitment was made to peacekeeping.

The crisis in the gulf is taking place in a new international climate brought about by the end of the cold war. The acquisition of territory by brute force has represented a dangerous behaviour for most of this century. Iraq's actions represented a fundamental challenge to the international community in an era where the end of the old superpower rivalries had opened the way for a more co-operative and harmonious approach to resolving international problems and protecting peace and security.

At the present juncture, Canada and the world community, working through the United Nations, have invested heavily in a collective international response to Iraq and with good reason, apart from forcing Saddam Hussein to comply with international law, the success of the current undertaking could serve as a model for future meaningful collective security actions.

The United Nations followed a balanced, carefully considered course of action and sought Iraq's unconditional withdrawal from Kuwait, preferably as a result of political and economic pressure. With the passing of the January 15 deadline, the United Nations sanctioned alliance took decisive action.

Those who still insist that the United Nations alliance should have waited for economic sanctions to work have their heads buried deeply in the sand. The bottom line is that Iraq had no intention of withdrawing of its own volition from Kuwait.

Canadians are by nature a peaceful people and beyond any doubt did not want to see a war in the Persian Gulf. The prospect of war in the gulf disturbs me deeply and personally, as I have three grandsons who are of military age: 18, 19, and 22. Believe me, nothing would have been more welcome than a resolution of the crisis without conflict.

However, what has to be seriously considered is the fact that peace is not accidental. It must be constructed and maintained, and sometimes at a tremendous cost. The protection and maintenance of international law and order and the containment of a dangerous renegade country are interests worth fighting for. What is happening in the gulf will work in the way its founders envisage.

Canada's role in international conflict has been one of creative diplomacy tied to the United Nations. Our most creative diplomacy has been in the building of international institutions founded on shared principles, on the rule of law, and on the creation of collective powers to respond when these principles were violated.

These are the achievements of our diplomacy that we must now defend. If we do otherwise, our diplomacy will have failed, not just in this current crisis but in what we have been doing for 45 years.

Some Canadians wish we were not in the Persian Gulf. We all share that sentiment. We wish Iraq had not invaded Kuwait, but responsible nations must deal with facts, not wishes. Regardless of how well intended, Canada is a responsible nation. The fact remains that the peace was not kept. Iraq did invade Kuwait. Canada, along with over 30 nations, is in the gulf to seek peace and defend order, just as we have done in the past.

Iraq's invasion of Kuwait is a crucial test of the United Nations in the post cold war world. Anything less than full support for United Nations resolution 678 would betray over 40 years of hope for the United Nations charter and its collective security provisions. If we succeed in the gulf, the signal will be clearly sent for all to witness that war as an instrument of foreign policy will not work.

What is at stake in the Persian Gulf is not territory or oil, but the preservation of the rule of international law. For these reasons and more, I am supporting our government's motion reaffirming Canada's commitment to United Nations resolution 678.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, we all know where the question and comment come from, since we are in that period, when I say: Ask not what the country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country. What we can do for our country tonight and in weeks to come is probably put aside our partisanship politics and speak as one voice in this House in support of our troops who are there.

I am pleased that all members who spoke from the three parties, as well the independent members, have been doing that. If they did not verbalize it, I know it was in their hearts because I have spoken to them outside the House also.

The question is: How can we support our forces now? I am glad everyone is recognizing the danger that our troops are in and the importance of showing them that we are solidly behind them. However, there are other foot soldiers there who maybe we have forgotten. It reminded me of the foot soldiers when we were watching the TV in the lobby last night. A CBC reporter from a hotel in Baghdad was reporting, and all of a sudden the TV went blank. Immediately everyone was horrified that the hotel was bombed or struck and that this reporter's life may have been in danger. Thank God his life was not in danger.

• (2200)

Watching in the lobby today, similar incidents are happening. Reporters with gas masks on are reporting to us that 10 missiles landed in Israel. In our support of the troops let us not forget these other important foot soldiers who are there, men and women. If it were not for them, we would not know what is happening in the gulf today.

I want to ask a question of the hon. member, though. Has his government given any support to the media personnel who are over there reporting to us in this excellent manner?

Mr. Darling: Madam Speaker, as far as support, I am not privy to what has been taking place over there. I certainly pay great tribute to the people in the media who have been giving us a very vivid and frightening picture of what took place last night, today and I guess tonight. If there is any need for support, there is no doubt that the government will do everything possible.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I want to ask a question of a very respected colleague. I am sure he truly believes in what he said, but I will say that I vociferously disagree with he has said. That is certainly allowed.

I understand that this day is soon going to draw to a close, but I want to touch on the the issue of sanctions one more time and whether they would work, did not work, or could not work. My colleague from Edmonton gave more proof as to the plausibility of sanctions working. Certainly the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that undetected products were going through and therefore the sanctions were not working. This depends on reports from an ambassador from Asia. It did not cite the country, nor did the minister.

Sanctions are working no matter what anybody says. The government said that it is time to end the sanctions and that one of its reasons is that with sanctions Saddam Hussein would take the food from the children and give it to the soldiers. I guess our response to that is: let's bomb the heck out of them, let's just bomb them and continue to bomb. Is that the solution to the problem?

Given the choice, most people would prefer hunger to death. Once again, I ask the member, as we have asked so many people: What was wrong with sanctions? What was wrong with giving them the appropriate time, whatever that time might be?

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, sanctions do work but they do not work very fast. In this particular case, there have been months in which sanctions have been applied, in which every opportunity was given to Saddam Hussein and his government, although he is really a one-man government and a real dictator. Apparently he felt that the coalition of the United Nations was bluffing. Every action was taken.

What is Canada going to do? Canada has made a modest contribution of 2,200 personnel, give or take, none of whom are ground troops. Our navy and our air force are there to protect and to assist.

I would point out to hon. members and to that saintly group in the corner, who seems to think that it has a corner on all morality, that a great many other countries are supporting the position Canada has taken. Canada has 2,200 troops at stake there. The United States has probably a half a million. Even the opposition in Great Britain, the Hon. Neil Kinnock has supported the present situation of using force. Australia, another Labour government, socialist government, has us supported it whole-heartedly. But the saintly NDP would have us withdraw our troops and sit back like cowards, and then, when the war is all over, we would get up and wave the Canadian flag and say: "Now we are able to help you. Wipe the blood and sweat of your face", and so on.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Madam Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to speak to the people of Canada and to the residents of the riding of Saint-Maurice.

First, allow me to offer my best wishes and congratulations to the new Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Beauséjour, who was recently elected to the House of Commons. As you know, he represented my riding for 23 years. He is a close friend whom I have known for 20-odd years, and I want to offer him my best wishes on his return to the House of Commons.

Madam Speaker, I know that in your capacity as member for Saint-Hyacinthe you too would like to express your heart felt sentiments about the war that has broken out in the Middle East. I know you would be able to reach deep into our hearts by your humanitarian observations. Knowing you as we do, we are also convinced that without political partisanship you would be in a position to tell the House how important it is that international order be maintained.

That being so, Madam Speaker, I should like to point out two things. This House is made up of three parties and a few independent members who have already expressed their views. Some of our colleagues took a partisan approach, others were more generous in their remarks.

However, my father taught me that great occasions in life enable us to differentiate men from children. All partisanship aside, Madam Speaker, I became aware of that after the appeal of the Prime Minister as I watched the behaviour of the three main parties. The Canadian public has been able to see how the government, the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party behaved.

They found that the members of the Liberal Party of Canada who make up the Official Opposition were able to a certain extent to rise above partisan politics. Through their leader, they said that what really mattered, under these very serious circumstances, was Canada's reputation.

In this respect, even if I do not usually share the views of the Official Opposition, I must recognize that the members of the Liberal Party were able to show restraint.

I wish I could say the same thing about my socialists colleagues of the New Democratic Party. Unfortunately, again, they decided as usual to criticize the government's position. They proved to be unable to show common sense and to recognize that Canada's national interest transcended partisan considerations. Such was the behaviour of the New Democratic Party of Canada today. That, Madam Speaker, is the kind of medicine the citizens of Canada must sooner or later evaluate in relation to this whole matter of concern to them.

I would like to state briefly some of the feelings I experienced last August when I had the opportunity and the pleasure to travel to the Middle East with the hon. member for Western Arctic. On that occasion, we visited Israel, Palestine and Egypt at the very moment when Saddam Hussein was threatening Kuwait with possible sanctions. We went through some extremely difficult situations in that country.

One thing I learned, Madam Speaker, is that it is very difficult to separate the good from the bad. We met with Israelis and Palestinians, two peoples living in the same country but with very different objectives. They each had their own reason for wanting to live peacefully in the Middle East. Some will consider the Israeli as the good guys and the Palestinians as the bad guys. Others will do the exact opposite. But the truth is probably not that simple. What we are going through tonight seems even more complex, when we realize Israel did not reply to the first attacks againt its state.

Madam Speaker, for more than 40 years, experts have been predicting this war. For over 40 years, throughout the world, experts have said that some day the situation in the Middle East will get extremely explosive. This crucial time has come. And in this crucial crisis, Madam Speaker, our government and our people are left with but one option. We have the option of regrouping around our common denominator, the United Nations.

The United Nations have in their history gone through extremely difficult periods. However, they assured Palestinians in occupied territories minimal living conditions at a time when they were in a most difficult situation.

The United Nations Agency for Palestinian Refugees is largely financed by the Government of Canada which is one of the largest contributors of the United Nations for Palestinians.

I think our government, in the last few years, was able to show flexibility. We are friends of Israel, of course, but we are also capable of compassion towards Palestinians.

Today, in spite of Canada's diplomatic action, in spite of the tens of millions of dollars we spent trying to insure peace in the Middle East, in spite of the Nobel Peace Prize awarded to the late Lester B. Pearson, in spite of all our efforts over decades, Madam Speaker, we have come to a point of no return. Saddam Hussein is putting us in a position where we cannot go back. Canada, America, the United Nations and the world have no choice. We have no choice in the matter and I think the position taken by our government and the one of the Liberal Party—and I will close my comments on that—is that of reason in supporting our troops and our government. I think that the New Democrats should, in all conscience, review their position, which is too partisan and, for now, totally out of synch.

Madam Speaker, I know my time is up. I thank you very much.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I give the floor to the government House Leader, for a point of order.

Some hon. members: Questions and comments.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton–East will certainly wish to tell me what to do, but I recognized the government House leader on a point of order, which has precedence over questions and comments. The hon. House leader has the floor.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the House is aware, earlier this evening Iraq initiated an attack against Israel, a country that is not part of the coalition that is acting in concert to get Hussein out of Kuwait.

As a result of that heinous act, the opinions and sympathies of the Government of Canada have been made known to the Government of Israel. The Prime Minister had hoped and expected that he would have sufficient information about the events to come to the House and report on the circumstances. As it is, the information is rather fragmentary. It is still incomplete and, for that reason, he is unable to come this evening.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, in view of the circumstances and the fact that the debate we are now having keeps changing in its parameters, hour by hour, minute by minute, I was going to suggest that, after discussions with the House leaders of hon. members, perhaps there might be a mood to suspend the sitting, as we did last night, and to return tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

That was the purpose, simply to inform, because some people had expected the Prime Minister to be here. He would have been here but, for the reasons I have just given, he was unable to do so. I rise on a point of order for the purposes of making that suggestion, for which there has been discussions among House leaders and on which I understood there was some agreement.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, we on this side of the House share the distress of Canadians and I take the proposition of the government seriously.

We accept the fact that the Prime Minister will be here tomorrow morning to answer questions. We also accept the fact that we should maybe go back home and reflect on this very serious situation.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, we, too, recognize the horror which has occurred this evening and, in light of the changing situation and the unfortunate situation now, the escalation in hostilities, I think it is only appropriate that, until adequate information is made available, that we suspend until 10 o'clock. Presumably, we would then resume the debate at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

[Translation]

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I would like more information about the proposal. Are we going to carry on with the debate on the same subject tomorrow at 10 o'clock? If so, I agree; otherwise, I refuse my consent. Could the Government leader answer this question?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, it would be my intention to proceed under the existing Order tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, which would mean the same question.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I rise because I feel that we are going to go through. Many would like to leave now, maybe tomorrow.

In all humility and as kindly as I can, I say to the House leader that next time that he wants to make a statement, it will only confuse and make life more difficult in the House. Just come and say so.

We are not fools. We will accept your making a statement. We know what is going on. But I do not think that using a point of order to make a statement is the right way.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Prud'homme: Well, you do what you want, but you may need a lot of agreement. I say, kindly, to all of you, you may need a helluva lot more agreement than you think to terminate or to continue the debate. That is not the way to proceed.

You may disagree. Instead of saying, "come on," just listen. You may say, "I disagree," and that is it. I do not understand this kind of putting off any members with whom you disagree.

It is a tough enough time just to have an orderly debate, and I feel it get more and more difficult. That is all I am trying to put to the House.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The honorable member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, the Government leader said: "it would be my intention". I want more than his intention, I want a certainty.

[English]

Mr. Andre: In view of the hour and so on, I have given my assurance to the House. As is customary in this House, we accept each other's assurances.

As I said before—and I should not have to repeat this, the hon. member should accept my word—we will return to this existing order of the House tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

• (2220)

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Madam Speaker, I think that these lessons of morality are out of place tonight.

[English]

If the House leader wants to play smart ass, he will not get anything.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I may be able to help the House and we would not need to end this evening with words that some of us may regret later.

The Government House Leader came to the House, in the normal way and as it has been done in the House forever. When that type of an announcement has had to be made, it was done by making a point of order.

[Translation]

It is really on a point of order that the Hon. minister came to the House. He called the attention of the Speaker in order to communicate these details to the House and then to move a motion. So, I do not believe that that was unusual.

The motion, as moved by the minister, asks that the sitting of the House be suspended tonight. That means that, tomorrow, we would simply pursue the same business. I think that I have perhaps clarified the situation for some members who feared a change in the order tomorrow morning.

In these circumstances, is there unanimous consent for the House to suspend its sitting now until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning?

Mr. Kindy: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary Northeast on a point of order.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I am not quite sure yet that we will resume this debate tomorrow. I would like the leader of the government to confirm that tomorrow morning we will be debating the same subject.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Calgary Northeast would care to wait and listen, I will try to reassure him. The sitting is not adjourned, it is suspended. Consequently, tomorrow's business will be a continuation of today's business. Is there unanimous consent to suspend the sitting?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since there is unanimous consent, the sitting of the House is suspended until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

At 10.23 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 17, 1991

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Volume A.]

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 10 a.m. on January 18, 1991.

Mr. Speaker: So that hon. members are clear as to where we are this morning, the sitting was suspended last night. We are carrying on with the sitting and will resume debate.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as you have just indicated, technically it is still yesterday. We want to assure the House that it is not our intention to interfere with Question Period and to allow members' statements. I believe there would be unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That notwithstanding the order made Wednesday, January 16, 1991, Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31 be called this day at 11 a.m., followed by Oral Questions at 11.15 a.m., followed by resumption of debate on government business No. 27 at noon.

Mr. Speaker: Before hearing the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, may I ask the hon. parliamentary secretary what has been the arrangement with respect to Routine Proceedings.

Mr. Cooper: I think at this point that we could probably proceed without Routine Proceedings, but if it is the wish of the Official Opposition or others to have Routine Proceedings, we would not have a problem with that.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, you anticipated my question. I think we would agree to treat today as an ordinary day in terms of procedure. At eleven o'clock we would go to Statements by Members with the usual Question Period followed by the Routine Proceedings of the House and then resume whatever order is called.

In the motion put by the parliamentary secretary, the last few words are that the Question Period would be "followed by resumption of debate on Government Business No. 27 at noon". That was not part of our negotiations, Mr. Speaker, but if it is part of the motion, then I guess we will have to have further consultations at this time.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as being one of the others, as the parliamentary secretary referred to us, first of all I want to acknowledge that this Question Period and opportunity to present statements is the result of some generosity on all sides. I want to say on behalf of the New Democrats we appreciate the generosity that made this possible.

We support the notion of having Routine Proceedings immediately following Question Period, as we would normally do on a Friday. That is probably appropriate in light of the issues before us. Perhaps further negotiations can take place as to what transpires later on in the day.

We support this proposal enthusiastically, Mr. Speaker, and I simply want to acknowledge to my colleagues our appreciation of their support for continuing with Question Period today.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary might clarify whether it was implicit in his comments and his motion that Private Member's Business will not be heard this afternoon. I hasten to say I have a private member's bill which I think would involve some leadership by all the MPs to do something about our obscene pension plan. I would like to know whether his motion implies that private members' bills will be swept away too.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, this has nothing to do with the words used by the hon. member, to wipe out Private Members' Business. Technically, as much as my watch shows that it is Friday, the table clock tells me it is Thursday. It has been a long week and I could believe either one of them. In fact, Mr. Speaker, what we are doing is trying to make an exception to the order to cover both Members' Statements and Question Period.

To meet the concerns of the House leader for the Official Opposition, we would be prepared to remove the last sentence from the motion which says, "that followed by resumption of debate on Government Business No. 27 at noon". I do not have a problem with that particular sentence.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, again the member from Edmonton anticipated what I was going to ask. I think that if the government removed the last few words of the motion, it could possibly accommodate the member from Edmonton. I said "could" possibly accommodate the member from Edmonton.

• (1010)

Mr. Speaker: Before we get into a great debate on that, let me, as I understand it, make clear what the procedure is. No matter what the calendar may show, we are still on Thursday and, as a consequence, unless the House wants to do something about it, we would proceed today as if it were Thursday. That ends the issue with respect to the hon. member for Edmonton East, no matter how important his bill may be.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am seeking clarification. There were suggestions that we delete some phrases; I am not certain which phrases, before we are asked for our consent for this motion. Could I have a clarification from the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader? What exactly is the wording of the motion we now have before us, for which there is a request for consent?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to be really clear. The intention of this motion is to allow the House and the members of the House to have the normal members' statements, which would take place on a Friday, and also the normal Question Period which would take place on a Friday. I can read the motion again, as it would be now, having removed the last sentence.

> That, notwithstanding the order made Wednesday, January 16, 1991, Statements by Members Pursuant to Standing Order 31 be called this day at 11 o'clock a.m., followed by Oral Questions at 11.15 o'clock a.m.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for taking the time of the House but, since this is the first time I have seen this sheet and the first time I have had this discussion, I want to be clear what we are agreeing to.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary a question. Does this mean that we will cease discussion on the motion, prior to Question Period, that the House will then be suspended and we will resume on Monday? I am not clear as to what we are saying, in terms of the future of this debate.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am finding myself drawn into a rather interesting bit of negotiations and discussions here. I want to be very clear. As the situation is right now, if we do not agree to this motion, then we will continue with Motion No. 27 which would be uninterrupted until that debate collapses.

What I am suggesting to the House in making this offer is that we would interrupt debate to have members' statements and Question Period and then, at that point, we resume Government Orders and we have the traditional opportunity for the government to call whatever at that point. I say that simply because I would like to be in a position to not have the negotiations on the floor but to talk to any and all members, when we proceed at this point. I am not trying to restrict members. I think that Question Period has always been important to members of Parliament, on all sides of the House, and we do not want to take that away from members today.

Mr. Riis: I believe that the wisdom that went into the drafting of this motion earlier was great and that the wording that is before us ought to be the wording that we now agree to. This provides us with a flexibility but, at this moment, I cannot agree to a motion that could end the debate on this critical issue.

I am willing to negotiate, as we always are, around the clock to try to facilitate the business of this House in a meaningful way and I would suggest that he seek unanimous consent for the motion that is in writing before us now.

Mr. Kilgour: There seem to be some misunderstandings. I think it would be better if we had the the next speaker. Then we could perhaps negotiate involving all of the parties, including the independent members, and come up with something we can all give unanimous consent to.

Mr. Speaker: There has been a certain amount of anticipation of other people's helpful interventions already this morning. I might say the hon. member has anticipated the remark that I am about to make, which is a suggestion that we proceed with debate. We have an hon. member seeking the floor. It seems to me that hon. members may be very close to a resolution of this.

In view of the fact that there is not actually consent at the moment for the motion, I would propose to proceed with debate.

I am sure the parliamentary secretary, the House Leaders, and other members could have a discussion and they might be able to indicate to me at some appropriate point in a little while what has been agreed to.

Mr. Prud'homme: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The last speaker last night was the the hon. member for Saint-Maurice. He had just finished his speech and we were just about to enter questions and comments. Even if he is temporarily absent, I had indicated I wanted to make a comment or two on the graciousness of his speech.

Madam Deputy Speaker, who was here last night, has just reminded me that there were two or three minutes remaining.

Mr. Speaker: I have some sympathy with the hon. member's request. I think that hon. members will remember that it has been customary in such cases when there is a break in the proceedings and at the recommencement of the proceedings, if the hon. member is not here, then we have to proceed to the next hon. member.

If it is any comfort to the hon. member for Saint-Denis, he has indicated what he would have like to have said. Perhaps there will be another occasion or another place where he can speak.

Mr. Prud'homme: I have no questions for him. It is just a comment.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that, but the hon. member is not here. He is no doubt on other business.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, last night I was about to speak when the House adjourned and this morning I was about to speak when we were interrupted by House procedure discussions. I feel as if I have been called back to the starting gate for the third time.

This has been a very emotional debate in the House. I appreciate those speakers who have stated that there should not be any politics involved in this issue and that we should be hitting the high road in this debate.

As I listened to the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka last night, who is my neighbour geographically, I could not help but feel that our listening audience and our ratings last night would be considerably low because for the first time in history people are watching an actual war unfold. It is quite a change in modern technology.

My regret is that this debate did not take place last week. We were brought back here a week too late. A serious debate took place in the United States Congress a number of days ago and it voted last week. That is what we should have done. Nevertheless, we did not do it.

People wonder why there should be different points of views on this entire issue. We should not be surprised that there are because in the United States Senate the vote was very narrow: 52 to 47. Yet, when it was over, they joined forces to support their military community and those who are working to bring about a settlement of the Middle East situation.

There has been a great debate on this issue as to whether or not sanctions worked. I have a list here of the ways the sanctions were working. Others say they were not working. Others say there were extenuating circumstances that required the bringing about of the war at an early stage. However, that is all passé now. The event is upon us.

With regard to diplomacy, how can you practise diplomacy when you have a dictator who does not want to give in on anything? Therefore, the only thing we really had a hope of practising was the sanctions. As the war goes on and as the tyrannical dictatorship in that country finally realizes that it cannot continue, that is when you will get diplomacy.

We have had a long debate in the House, but I am sure that everybody, to the last individual, will support our forces in their efforts to bring about a settlement to this issue.

In speaking about our forces today and for the past number of days, the second field hospital unit, which is located on Base Petawawa just three miles from my home, has been getting ready to go to the Persian Gulf. I understand from reports there will be possibly over 500 people who will go with it from all across Canada. We in the House want to say to them that we wish them well. We are proud of the way they are serving Canada, and we are proud of the way our Canadian forces always exercise three key points.

There is their ability as military personnel. The idea some people may have is that as soon as "military" is mentioned, that everybody is agressive. That is not the case. Our military is a professional community.

The forces are very good at diplomacy as well, and they have proven that time and time again in their United Nations work.

The third parameter is rather an odd one to attribute to people wearing the Canadian forces uniform, but it is true to a degree. That is, they are politicians too, because they have to work with people from other countries and they have to work to settle problems that face them from day to day, and month to month, individually. They have to provide advice to the civilian leadership of this country and they do it very well.

We have ships in the Middle East and have had them there for some time. We have 24 CF-18s there and a large number of ground support. To those people, we extend our appreciation for what they are doing. There is a lot of warmth in Canada for the service people who are over there now and certainly for those who will go hereafter.

Before the break at Christmas, I visited the town of Arnprior and associated my remarks and support with a group that was sending Christmas packages to the entire crew of a ship. There are people as well who are organizing other events of communicating with our forces who are over there. I hope that will go on and I would encourage Canadians right across this nation to do that sort of thing. Get the names of people over there and send them letters and gifts of various kinds from time to time. It is very important to their morale.

This is a serious and a solemn issue and must be treated as such. We in the House must continue to take a very high road in that regard.

What we are witnessing today in the Persian Gulf is a high tech war of the kind that has never taken place before in world history. We are going to see more of this unfold in the days ahead.

As I was preparing this talk, I could not help but let my feelings wander back to the days when I was very active with the NATO parliamentary group here. I still am, but at that time I was leading the parliamentary group to international conferences with the 16 NATO countries. That was a tremendous experience because it taught me how to understand the culture of other nations, their political systems, the special things that affected them in relation to their economy, and, of course, their customs.

If we are going to be effective in the international community, the first thing that we must know is something about the other person's way of life. That is the bridge that we need in international affairs.

As I prepared this speech, I could not help but think of the tremendous amount of high tech military equipment that has been developed by precision science over a number of years that is in the NATO alliance and also situated within the Warsaw Pact. Nothing has had a greater impact on world history than the sudden collapse of the communist states in eastern Europe. It has brought about a relaxation of those horrendous groups, one facing the other in Europe. As we see this high tech unfolding today, can we imagine what we have been delivered from if a war had broken out between the NATO Alliance and the Warsaw Pact? It would have been devastating on world society.

I could not help but think of that great biblical verse that "God works in mysterious ways, his wonders to perform". I think that He has delivered us from that catastrophe.

Now, today, having been given the gifts to think, to work constructively, to work with other people on the face of this earth, we must bring forth our greatest qualities and our best efforts to improve the United Nations organization. We must put it in place as a very effective world referee-negotiator, diplomat, and the organization that will continue to support human rights, international boundaries, and international protocol.

This ongoing international issue in the Persian Gulf and the Middle East is one that has consumed every member of the House and, indeed, all Canadians. There are many times in the affairs of the human race when peace does not come easily. I do not say this in a way that I mean to be insensitive nor, in any way, would I say it in order to create fear, because we do not need that at this time.

I had the honour and the privilege to travel to Dieppe for the anniversary of the Battle of Dieppe with the Hon. George Hees and a delegation from this Parliament. I believe it was in August 1987. The way that generals in those days ordered those young people to go into Dieppe in that raid was an inhuman act.

• (1030)

The veterans who were back there at that time were remembering that day and how real it was to them. The question mark is still on military minds as well as on everybody else's minds as to whether that raid should have even been ordered.

As one sees the markers of those young people, 18, 19, 20 and 21 years of age, it brings one back home with the sincere and deep feeling that we who hold the responsibility of public office, backed up by those well meaning people across our country, should be doing everything we possibly can to bring about effective diplomacy in this world. That is one of the most important things that this nation can practise. We must work with others to put even more teeth into the United Nations.

As I outlined, the high-tech military materiel is in place today, and will be in place in the future to a greater degree, and nothing is going to be more important to the human race than to have sensible people who can bring about a world policeman who is effective and who can settle disputes. Indeed, when force is necessary in the end, they must be prepared to support that too, as a world police organization.

We visited Normandy and Holland. Think of the impression that we can have on the world as a Canadian nation. On one of our NATO visits we had a Remembrance Day ceremony, even though it was not Remembrance Day, at a major cemetery in Holland. It was out in the country near a number of beautiful trees. As we looked down those rows of markers from the cenotaph where our ceremony was taking place, we saw coming in from the fields of the community the Dutch farmers in their farm clothing, with their hats in their hands. They stood around the cenotaph with us as we performed our wreath-laying ceremony and said our prayers.

Those are the things that have a great impact on an individual. Again, they send you home with the idea that you must try to be a better and more constructive person in the politics of your nation.

We have some great people in this House, on both sides. I wish this debate had taken place a week earlier, because it is now almost redundant, with the exception of the following through and the questioning of what is going on from day to day.

Let us make up our minds today, as we have in the past, to move forward in a constructive and effective way to be ready to practice diplomacy when the moment is right. Even now, we must look forward to the day when this war is over so that Canada will be in the forefront in an attempt to tone down and settle some of these horrendous problems in the Middle East that have been going on for 5,000 years. That is going to be a major role for this nation.

In the Korean conflict we joined with the other UN forces under the United Nations flag. That event was a success. In the Suez crisis we went in again under the United Nations flag. That proposal was brought about by that outstanding Canadian, Lester B. Pearson.

Lester B. Pearson was Prime Minister when I entered the House. He was a personal friend of mine. I had great admiration for him, and to me he was almost like a grandfather. He had a great effect on my thinking as a young parliamentarian. I have never forgotten many of the things that he said because he was a man of great common sense. Indeed, it was he and the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent who can be credited with a major input into the founding of the United Nations organization in San Francisco on October 24, 1945.

We have to build on what they started. Indeed, it has been a tremendous achievement for Canadian statesmanship. That must go on and we must be prepared to tackle these issues seriously. Today, it is Iraq. Tomorrow, it will be someone else. The machinery must be in place, both from the human point of view and from an enforcement point of view, to settle those problems.

The United Nations was brought in with the idea of building a new world order. The respect for international boundaries became paramount and is still paramount today. That is what this present war is all about, that and economics. So, we must remain strong to the principles of international order, respect for international boundaries and international protocol in the years to come.

Last night we saw the attack on Israel. It is madness, yes, but it is part of the failure of the human race. You cannot negotiate with a tyrant, but you can do everything possible to maintain international law.

I mentioned the other battles in world history where the UN flag was used to cover the entire forces which went into battle. I sincerely hoped that this present war could have been carried out under the United Nations flag. As it is, each nation is there under its own flag. In future, in order to strengthen the image and effectiveness of the United Nations, we should have these international conflicts under the command of the UN.

We can still have generals. We will have key people in place, but it will be an international order emanating from a unified group of nations under the UN. It will have to be a commitment on the part of all members of the United Nations, and their expertise and their input will have to be used to settle international problems.

I want to end with one very realistic saying. Tied up in the improvement and the sponsorship of UN forces in the future is the saying that I have heard on many occasions: "Wars are started by old men and fought by boys." Today, wars are fought by both boys and girls.

As we debate this issue of the war that is presently going on, let us look beyond the horizons and fully prepare ourselves for the challenges in the future. There will always be someone looking for world power. There will always be someone greedy. So, let us commit ourselves to improving the United Nations and international order in the world in the years to come as well as now.

• (1040)

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I have a question for my very good friend who has many years of experience here. I listened to his speech with interest, particularly to that part about the United Nations and the honour Mr. Pearson brought to Canada with his participation in peacekeeping.

The purpose of my question is to try to clarify some of the confusion I see in this very serious issue in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Is it the hon. member's position that, if the allies were there under the formal blue flag of the United Nations then some of the disagreement in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition about the motion of the government would disappear and thus there would be more of its members in favour of the government motion?

Mr. Hopkins: Madam Speaker, when I mentioned the governments, I did not put a Liberal label on them when I was talking about the United Nations and the input into it. I was trying to be broad and a bit statesman–like on these very important issues.

It was a Liberal government that committed forces to Korea under the United Nations. It was a Liberal government that asked that the Suez crisis be settled with the use of a United Nations force. I, and I am sure many others, would feel much more comfortable if this event were carried out under the United Nations flag. Having played a major role in the founding of the United Nations, if we do not support that organization and its flag over the years in these world controversies, then we are letting down those great statesmen before us.

I stated very clearly in my speech that in future contests I would prefer to see all forces under the United Nations' flag. We can still use the great expertise from those many nations to handle the UN force.

The hon. member was a classmate of mine. We came into the House together and he is very sensitive to this issue as well. He is very close to some of those great issues.

Canadian work within the international community over the years has been very important and it is important that we continue to support the UN flag. I would say to my hon. friend that it is not just a symbol I am talking about here. The message I am really trying to get across is that when we go into an international conflict without being under the United Nations flag, while our operations can still be very effective it tends to weaken the image of the United Nations organization in the eyes of the world. Our main aim under the United Nations is to pull all nations and people of the world together to settle these conflicts.

We all know that half of the problem in settling disputes is that people will not talk to one another. However, if we have them in a major organization, then they will have to talk to one another and many of these disputes would not arise in the first place.

I am convinced that every party in the House should be aiming toward supporting the UN flag because that is the international organization we want to see handling all these great issues in the years to come.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my colleague has been in the House of Commons for a long time. As a result of this experience, I wonder if he would give me his comments and reactions to the following.

It seems to me that few people talk realistically about the casualties of war, how many people die, and how they die. For example, the Pentagon often refers to war with words such as outcomes and scenarios. I would like to compare that with recent remarks by Brigadier Patrick Cordingley, commander in chief of Britain's seventh division who said, while referring to this particular conflict:

> It is going to be the sort of warfare people never realized, or could have expected. The public is not prepared for what is about to happen. And we have got to prepare the—public for a particularly unpleasant war. They should be told there will be a lot of casualties.

I am assuming that he is talking not only about soldiers, our own and Iraq's, but as well about children, seniors, and many other people who will be the victims and casualties not only in terms of death but in terms of injuries.

A final quote from Admiral Gene Larocque of Washington's Centre for Defence Information, a military think-tank which opposes the gulf war. He has estimated that there will be several thousands of casualties for the Americans and the allies, but that the over-all casualties will probably exceed one-quarter of a million.

I am wondering if my hon. colleague would give me his reaction to those comments.

Mr. Hopkins: Madam Speaker, that is an excellent question and those are excellent comments, because they fit right into the main thrust of my speech.

I said that what we are watching today is high-tech warfare. I mentioned what an horrendous calamity it would be for the human race if the war in Europe between the communist east and the free west had broken out because of all the high-tech equipment positioned within both of those camps over the years.

There is no question but that the person he quoted from the Pentagon was right on, because with the great destructiveness of high-tech equipment today tens of thousands of people can be killed in very short order. I do not think the nation has come to realize that the precise bombing going on with high-tech equipment, for example against Iraq today, is being done in order to try not to have great casualties in the civilian population. But that is not very much comfort. It is just lessening the problem a bit.

If there were some World War I veterans listening to my hon. colleague's question today and my remarks, they would probably say to us: "World War I and World War II were no picnics either". We cannot downplay that statement because the trench warfare in World War I was a disaster. We had people coming home who had been gassed. They had lung problems and physical problems the rest of their lives, lost limbs, and so on.

War is hell, no matter what generation it is in and no matter what kind of equipment is used. Today, we have equipment that can really destroy a whole nation and indeed the world. This is why I am saying what I am thinking today and that is why that I have changed the thrust of my debate.

I have tried to bring a different perspective to it by saying that it is time all free nations and responsible nations of the world get with it and decide that they are going to support a very strong United Nations organization, and that organization must be prepared at all times to police international problems and to negotiate international problems.

Yes, at some stage down the road force may become necessary in any event, but at least the best we can do as human beings is try to lessen the problems. No matter how hard we work to bring about a world order, we are not going to get perfection. But, if we do not try, we will not even come close to it.

I thank the hon. member for that very important question because it really ties in with the great destructive forces available to mankind today in a war.

If ever there were a time in the world history that we need sanity among people, responsible leadership within our nations, responsible members of Parliament who are willing to stand up and be counted on the issue of enforcing international law through the United Nations and to support the UN and indeed reform the UN, if we can make it a better body, than it is now. We must be looking at that as well.

That is why I emphasize the importance of Canada being at the forefront and centre in any conferences or meetings that take place to try to lessen the problems in the Middle East and bring about some solutions. We are not going to be perfect at that either, because other people have not been perfect for 5,000 years, but at least we can improve the situation. The important thing is that we all act like responsible individuals, bring world order back, and be prepared to settle these issues in the future.

Finally, the underlying factor is that under the UN flag the nations of the world must commit themselves to the United Nations and add strong support to bring about future peace in the world. If we do not have peace, if we are going to stand alone out there, we all are going to go down together if we do not act responsibly from this day on with high-tech warfare.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, when I stand today to talk about the motion before this House, I find it very difficult. Obviously the situation has changed tremendously from when this motion was first brought forward.

I know everyone in this House and in this country wants us as members of Parliament to do everything possible to bring peace to the world. Really, that is what we are talking about today and that is what we have been talking about for the last few days: to bring about an international order which will bring peace to this world. When we talk about this motion, we are talking about bringing peace to the world.

We must recognize that it was almost six months ago that Iraq breached the international peace agreement by invading Kuwait in an unqualified and unprovoked act of aggression. That was when the war began. That was last August 2.

The UN Security Council, the international group of nations empowered to maintain law and order in the world, passed a resolution at that time condemning Iraq, demanding that Iraq withdraw from Kuwait and that both sides negotiate. That was the initial reaction. That was back on August 2. Iraq did not comply. We are all aware of that today.

That was followed by economic sanctions and the authority given to the allied forces and member nations to enforce those sanctions. I for one was a firm believer that those sanctions were going to work. I think everyone in this House believed those sanctions were going to work.

However, most of us recognize the ineffectiveness of those sanctions, the fact that those sanctions were hurting the civilians. They were hurting many people, but effectively they were not doing anything to the military powers within Iraq.

As we have gone along in this course of events, many resolutions have been put forward by the United Nations. In fact there have been 12 in all. They relate to the unacceptable breach of the UN, the holding of foreign nationals, Iraq's liability under the fourth Geneva convention as it relates to war crimes, altering the sovereign position of Kuwait, and destroying Kuwait's records. Those are atrocities that the international peacekeeping organization and the world cannot tolerate.

Canada has been very involved in those resolutions and those attempts to bring peace to the world.

Mr. Cooper: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That, notwithstanding the Order made Wednesday, January 16, 1991, Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31 be called this day at 11 o'clock a.m., followed by Oral Questions at 11.15 o'clock a.m. until 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could there be a decision whether we resume debate after Question Period?

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I can confirm that immediately following Question Period at twelve o'clock noon we will be returning to Motion No. 27, the one presently before the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand there is unanimous consent for the parliamentary secretary to move the motion, and I understand that there is consent to approve the motion. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cole: Madam Speaker, I think Canada as a country has been very involved in this process of negotiation, debate and attempt to resolve this problem peacefully. Canada was a co-sponsor and co-draftee of virtually all those motions. Canada has played a very responsible role as a member of the UN.

The UN agreed by resolution 678 to allow Iraq one final opportunity, a time frame when Iraq would not be attacked. As a gesture of goodwill by the international community, Iraq was allowed seven more weeks to comply with that August 2 resolution to withdraw from Kuwait.

The UN as the keeper of law and order in the world was forced to respond. Canada is a member of the UN, in fact a founding member, as has been mentioned quite often in this House recently. Yet, as much as we dislike the actions that will have to be taken—in fact I do not think it is too strong to say that we hate the actions taken—we have an obligation to maintain law and order in the world.

Force is not something that is taken lightly, nor can it be offered in a way that it implies an empty threat. I think that is one thing we must recognize. It is a last resort. I feel we have explored all the options possible to us. When we look at the events which have taken place over the last days, weeks, and months; when peaceful negotiations were taking place; when discussions were taking place to try to resolve this situation; when leaders of nations on an individual basis and even collectively, and even Secretary-General of the United Nations, Javier Perez de Cuellar, said there was no reason to have any real hope, Iraq had never mentioned it was prepared to withdraw from Kuwait.

There are questions that we as Canadians must ask ourselves. What course is right for Canada in the cause for peace? Will Canada stand and be counted? Will we continue to support the international coalition, or will we stand aside and hope that others uphold the rule of law?

Collective security is what this crisis is all about. It is important to be clear that it is not about the defence of democracy. It is not about oil, nor is it about supporting Washington. The principle at issue is simple and straightforward. Collective security and the defence and construction of an international order where aggression is rejected are what this principle is about and what the United Nations resolutions are all about.

Canada does not have a policy of war.

• (1100)

Canada has a policy of peace. Our policy has been designed to achieve a peaceful solution to the international crisis. If we check the speeches of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs of the other day, which stated all the things that have been offered and all the attempts that have been made, there is only one person who can realistically offer peace to the world today. That man is Saddam Hussein.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. He can continue when debate resumes.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

GULF CRISIS

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise today on behalf of an overwhelming number of my constituents who support the government's action in the Persian Gulf and to say how proud they are of our armed forces personnel who are involved.

What concerns me is that the member for Okanagan—Shuswap, who has often criticized us for not listening to the majority of our constituents, is toeing his party line and is not supporting the United Nations action.

In a poll done in his constituency yesterday by radio station CJIB, when asked the question: "Are you in favour of UN action", 390 people said yes and 43 said no. That is 90 per cent in favour. When is the member going to listen to the overwhelming majority of his constituents?

APPEAL FOR PEACE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, as this made-for-TV war unfolds, the still, small voice for peace becomes harder and harder to hear amid the din of guns and planes.

During the first few days of conflict, it has not been the voice of Saddam Hussein that has been silenced, but the voices of an unknown number of innocent men, women and children.

Therefore, I would like to read from a letter sent to our Prime Minister by the Mennonite Central Committee on January 11.

"If now, in the hope filled post-cold war era, non-military methods are abandoned so readily, then the prospects for resolving other disputes by peaceful means are greatly diminished, allowing militarism to continue with its exploitive, destructive and death-dealing effects".

These are the words of a people who have done much thinking about the issues of war and peace over the last 450 years. I beg all hon. members to pay them some heed.

ISRAEL

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, on hearing of last night's attack on Israel, my first thoughts were for friends in Israel, that they and other Israelis had not been hurt.

We now know, of course, that innocent victims have died and our hearts go out to them and their families. We hope that Israel and Israelis will be spared further attack.

This unprovoked aggression reminds us of the tremendous price Israel pays simply to exist, and I am sure that everyone in this House supports Israel's right to defend itself.

Yesterday morning, we were hoping against all hope that this would be a short war. Today, things are not so optimistic. Saddam Hussein has now had the opportunity to see the destruction that this war will bring. Is it too much to hope that he may now be open to appeals to withdraw from Kuwait and bring an early end to this war?

ISRAEL

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Madam Speaker, nothing more graphically illustrates the international necessity of stopping Saddam Hussein than his reckless and cynical attack on Israel, its cities and its civilians. Saddam is callously trying to provoke a broadened war, one that could lead to a global conflagration.

Yesterday we heard some eloquent speeches in this House about the reported losses of Iraqi lives. While all members of this House are concerned about casualties and loss of life, be they Iraqi or otherwise, the deaths of his own people are of no consequence to this man.

Only the destruction of this man's military capability will restore international peace and security. I commend the Israeli government for its restraint to date, the courage of its people not to retaliate and urge them to continue to show restraint. The United Nations coalition will deal with Saddam, and the sooner the better for all.

ISRAEL

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, last night SCUD missiles from Iraq rained down on Israel, proving Saddam Hussein is a man of his hateful word. He had sworn to attack this country which offered no other provocation than to exist. I vehemently condemn this villainous attack on Israel. This further act of aggression by Saddam Hussein is not going unanswered by the allied forces. Reports say the Iraqi Scud launch sites have either been destroyed or are under further attack by the allied forces, and rightly so. I commend Israel for her courageous restraint not to retaliate at once. I hope and pray Israel will continue to place her faith in the allied forces. I further pray that her citizens are not placed in greater peril. World sympathy goes out to the families of Israeli citizens lost last night. Our thoughts are with Israel and the allied forces striving to protect her.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, earlier this week, St. Thomas University in Fredericton established what they have called a Third Age Centre, under their Chair in Gerontology. Its mission is to give meaning to life at all ages but, particularly, to emphasize that as we get older we nonetheless continue to grow in value and potential as human beings.

In a recent essay, Rabbi Gunther Plaut of Toronto has warned against some attitudes that seem to say, in a society where new is considered better, the elderly are seen as so much extra baggage. In reality, the reverse is true. Never before have senior citizens had such an opportunity to exert their influence towards a better world.

There is truth about the wisdom of age. Never before has the world been in greater need of wise and mature judgment based on long and growing knowledge from real life experience. Especially in these recent days, as hostilities have erupted in the Persian Gulf, there is a world-wide frustration and dismay that mankind has not yet learned some of the most tragic lessons of history.

ISRAEL

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, in response to the unfolding events in this tragic war in the Middle East, I want to express my personal and party's concern over the unnecessary and unwarranted attack by Iraq against the State of Israel. It is a shock to all of the people in Israel and certainly to the diaspora as well.

I want to comment, frankly, on the remarkable restraint shown by the leadership of the State of Israel in response to this attack. This restraint is a model, I think, for all of the nations involved to ponder and consider, because the most vulnerable, democratic country in the whole region is the only one that is apparently showing the kind of restraint necessary at this time.

I have members of my own family living there. They have been pioneers in that country since the early 1920s. I share, with other families, a deep concern not only for Israelis but for every human being in that region. Let us hope that the restraint shown by the Israeli government will be a model for other nations in the region. Let us hope for a swift peace and let us hope for a peaceful future.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I know I am joined by all members of this House and, indeed, by all Canadians in conveying our deepest respect and appreciation at this special time for our young men and women in the Canadian Armed Forces who are serving in the Persian Gulf. As well as those in uniform, there are National Defence civilians in support of this very delicate operation, whose dedication and sacrifice have served us so admirably and we are sure will continue to do so.

From all of us, I am sure, well done.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Madam Speaker, Canadian forces are now taking part in operations in the Persian Gulf. These men and women are outstanding in their professionalism and have a tremendous sense of duty. We have every reason to be proud of our people in the forces who are performing their duties with great zeal. I urge all Canadians to support our troops by sending them words of encouragement so they will feel truly supported by the Canadian people in their desire to carry out the missions with which they are entrusted.

ISRAEL

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, it was my experience on July 12, 1990, as my colleagues and I sat on the Mount of Olives, overlooking the city of Jerusalem, that I had come to a land of beginnings, a land of great history. It was there that I truly felt the greatest sense of peace and personal satisfaction I have ever experienced in my travels around the world, never believing that this would be, as it is today, a land of anxiety, fear, confusion and chaos. I guess it is best reflected in the words of Dwight D. Eisenhower when he said: "When people speak to you about a preventative war, you tell them to go and fight it. After my experience I have come to hate war. War settles nothing."

• (1110)

To those who have the responsiblity for leadership in this war and the ceaseless quoting of the Pearsonian diplomacy, here is what he said: "The grim fact is that we prepare for war like precocious giants and for peace like retarded pygmies."

I have great hope for peace in the Middle East at this time. I would like to share my sorrow about what has happened there. Perhaps if tolerance persists as it is today, then we might have answers to this problem.

SADDAM HUSSEIN

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, the unbelievable consequences of power in the hands of a madman returns to terrorize the free world. Saddam Hussein's unimaginable atrocities against innocent adults and children, his senseless eight-year war against his neighbours, and his continued refusal to respond to the diplomatic peace efforts of the past five and one half months, have pushed the free world into war.

It is my wish that others in the world who may be contemplating a similar course of action will learn of the senselessness of acts of aggression towards humanity.

I wish to commend the Israelis for their restraint in this crisis. The Israelis position is one that can best be appreciated by those currently immersed in the destruction caused by Saddam Hussein. Our prayers go out to them.

To the men and women of Canada's Armed Forces, a team which has continued to maintain a high level of military competence and tolerance, I offer my prayers as well. May they return home be without incident.

APPEAL FOR PEACE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, for decades Canadian women, in solidarity with other women around the world, have worked to encourage the use of non-violent strategies of conflict resolution and to end oppression and violence in all their forms.

Women have historically been the victims of war. Women have historically not had a voice in the decisions about wars in which they are the victims. They are the mourning mothers, here at home, or those with their children who are in the horrors of the theatres of war. Women have shown their commitment around the world to peace; women at Greenham Common in the U.K., for example, or Mothers of the Disappeared in Central America.

Today, women across Canada, through demonstrations, through writing letters, through attempting to contact their parliamentarians and through raising the consciousness of others in Canada are appealing to our government to include them in the decision making.

Members of Parliament across the country have been approached by women in Canada who are concerned and want their voices heard for peace. It is time all of us listened to the women of Canada.

ISRAEL

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, when I woke up this morning I was sure that the news would tell me that Israel had retaliated against Iraq, resulting in a dramatic expansion of this horrible war. It did not happen.

I want to recognize the restraint shown by Israel by not responding to the attack by Iraq. There was no threat to Iraq from Israel. The attack was not even at military targets, but at highly populated areas in the heartland of Israel. The attack was simply an attempt to provoke a further expansion of the war.

We should remember that this restraint is even more profound and meaningful when we consider that since events during the Second World War, one of the main principles of Israel has been "never again". Never again will they not respond to aggression against the Jewish people.

The whole world breathed a sigh of relief when Israel broke that principle in the interest of containing this war. I know I speak on behalf of many Canadians when I say I am truly grateful to Israel, and I strongly urge them to continue to show this strength, even in the face of more attempts to provoke.

GULF CRISIS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, at this stage, we have to conclude that the government has dissipated Canada's reputation as a peacemaker in the world. That is a very sad conclusion.

It seems to us, now we are in this unwanted war, that our military efforts should be on the side of providing health, hospital and field medical services. Our role should be one that will increase and not demolish our credibility once the hostilities are over. This is a war. The solution of the problem in Kuwait is not by means of war and it is not a solution that a majority of Canadians support.

Canadians would want to see Canada involved in diplomatic efforts in order to bring an end to this unwanted and terrible situation which is deteriorating by the day.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Last night Canadians were horrified to learn of the unprovoked attack by Iraq on Tel Aviv and Haifa, the two largest cities of Israel.

I am sure that all members of the House and all Canadians will share with me in expressing our deep sympathy and solidarity with our friends in Israel. It is clear that Israel has shown remarkable restraint in the face of a very real threat to its own people.

Will the Prime Minister tell the House what decisions his government has made in response to the attack of last night?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as the government indicated earlier this week, one of the reasons we have been supporting and been part of the international coalition, and the reason why Canada has stood steadfast with the United Nations, was to make sure that an unmistakable clear signal went out to Saddam Hussein about the resolve of this nation to defend international order. That includes standing firm against anybody who attacks a friendly state, such as the State of Israel.

Last night, in the face of this unprovoked attack, I communicated with the Government of Israel and then sent a letter to the Prime Minister in which I said:

> You may be aware that I have strongly condemned Saddam Hussein's missile attack on your country tonight. However, I am writing to you to express my profound sympathy to you and to the people of Israel.
> Canada deplores this criminal and unprovoked act. It demonstrates, if anyone was still in doubt, the threat that Saddam Hussein poses to international peace and security.
> The attack on Israel was a clear attempt to provoke retaliation in order to bring your country into the war. I know this will not escape your government.
> Our thoughts are with you tonight. I wish to express the sympathy of the Canadian Government to the victims and their families. I convey the best wishes of all Canadians to them for a speedy recovery.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been in touch with the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Israel. I spoke earlier today with the President of the United States. Canada will take all appropriate action to make sure that Saddam Hussein respects international law and order and the prescriptions of the United Nations, or suffers the consequences.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): We are glad to hear that the Prime Minister sent this message on behalf of the entire House and the Parliament of Canada, because yesterday's attack was entirely unjustified. We feel very deeply about these attacks that were absolutely unprovoked, and we were particularly impressed by the attitude taken by the Israeli government, both during the past few months when faced with verbal threats and yesterday, when those threats were actually carried out.

However, I now want to ask the Prime Minister whether a decision has been made by the government to make available the kind of humanitarian aid Israël and the Israeli people might need in the present situation.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, late last night I spoke to the Israeli ambassador, and I told him that the government was prepared to provide any humanitarian aid Israel and the moderate Arab States affected by the situation might need.

This morning, the Secretary of State for External Affairs communicated directly with Mr. Levy, the Israeli Minister of Foreign Affairs, to express Canada's sympathy and offer any humanitarian aid his country might need to deal with problems caused by attacks by that dictator, Saddam Hussein.

• (1120)

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have another question for the Prime Minister. As a result of last night's tragic attack on Israel, there were seven casualties. All members of the House know there are many Canadian nationals in Israel at this moment.

What steps has the government taken to ensure the safety of Canadians who are presently in Israel?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, in Israel and elsewhere in the region, there are some 14,000 Canadians now.

We are naturally in more than daily contact with our embassies and posts. We have established a system of wardens, whereby members of the Canadian community in each of those countries, including Israel, help the Canadian Embassy keep track of the location and requirements of Canadians.

My information, as of this morning, from Israel and from other countries in the region is that no Canadians have been injured. All Canadians know how to have access to their embassy.

We have, in addition, yesterday established and published an 800 number in Canada for use by Canadians who have relatives or friends in the Middle East. That 800 number of course will work around the clock. I can report to the House that understandably it was very actively used last night. By that means we hope to be able to respond immediately and fully to concerns on the part of Canadians who have family or friends in the region.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to raise a question with either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The tragic attack last night in Israel demonstrates how this war carries with it the real potential of escalation and broadening of the conflict.

I would like to ask either of the two front-benchers: Will the United Nations Security Council or other agencies of the UN be seized of this particular issue, and will the Security Council be convened immediately to address this new escalation and broadening of the war which adds a new dangerous dimension to the whole conflict? Can the Secretary of State advise us of what role the United Nations and its agencies will be playing in response to this new development?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Secretary of State for External affairs was in touch yesterday with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, as we have been on a fairly regular basis from before the outbreak of hostilities, with a view to finding a formula that would persuade Saddam Hussein to respect the decisions of that international body.

We maintain that, if a signal from Saddam Hussein would have been his intention to respect the law and withdraw from Kuwait which he illegally occupied, it would have had a beneficial effect on the attitudes of the members of the Security Council. But we are now engaged in a campaign now and Canada is there with other members upholding the United Nations, making sure that his war machine will never again be used against innocent neighbours and against states in the region such as Israel.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, we have heard that response before.

My more specific question is: Would the new dimension added to this conflict as result of the attack last night bring about a convocation of the Security Council to address that and to determine what means might be employed by the international body to try to limit the conflict?

In particular, in Canada's own case, in response to a question I raised yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that the Government of Canada was interested in maintaining lines of communication so that signals could be transmitted.

We understand that the Secretary of State has ordered the expulsion of Iraqi diplomats. I would ask if he could confirm that. If that is the case, can he tell us what lines of communication the government would then be continuing so these signals might be passed back and forth so that whenever it is appropriate we can find a way of bringing this conflict to an end?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, it may very well be a surprise to the hon. member, but it is a surprise to few others that there is a capacity for escalation in the activities of Saddam Hussein. He attacked Kuwait. That was an escalation. It is highly probable that had he not been stopped, he would have gone on to attack Saudi Arabia. He has made lethal threats through the peace against the State of Israel. Last night he began to carry out those threats. The hon. member should not pretend to be surprised by this escalation.

That capacity for escalation is precisely the reason that the United Nations was already seized of the grave threat that this aggression by Saddam Hussein posed to the world and was determined to take actions to stop it. We had hoped that we could stop it peacefully and diplomatically, but we were determined that we would stop it in any event.

When it became clear, first, that diplomacy had gone as far as it could and, second, that the time the people sought for the use of sanctions was being used to perfect chemicals weapons, to perfect biological weapons, to pollute the Persian Gulf, and also to extend the network of terrorist possibilities available to Saddam Hussein, then we believed it was time to act. That is the view of the United Nations. That is the view of the Security Council. The way to stop escalation is to stop Saddam Hussein.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. We join all members of the House and did so last night in decrying the particularly unjustified attack on Israel and, indeed, sadly the predictable attack. It has been one of the reasons why this party felt that getting into this war without having exercised all other options was exactly what this could lead to.

I want to add my voice to those who have said very sincerely to Israel that we admire their restraint and their contribution to the world community by trying to exercise restraint.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: As has been mentioned earlier, of course, there are many Canadian families who have relatives and friends in Israel, as there are others in Canada who have relatives and friends in the region. I was pleased that the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned that there will be an 800 number.

I would just ask the Prime Minister again if there is other assistance that is being given to all those in Canada who have relatives and friends in the area? What is the Canadian government able to do for those people to allay their fears and make sure that communication is available to them?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think that the consular number, the 800 number, is one important step because that allows individuals to identify precisely their concerns and allow us to respond.

But I think that the Leader of the New Democratic Party refers to another important element of this. There has been great restraint shown by Israel and the House respects and encourages that.

It also has to be said that there has been great restraint shown by the Arab countries and indeed by those of Arab origin in this country and that, too, should be encouraged by all of us in the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): This should be recognized by us.

We have our consular people established as a task force, available to do everything that we can. This is not a traditional situation. If there are new or other things that need doing, I would hope that the Leader of the New Democratic Party and, indeed, others in the House, would suggest them to me. Within the range of our capacity, we will do everything that we can.

As the Prime Minister has said, in terms of humanitarian assistance, we have communicated immediately to Israel and also to Jordan the willingness of the Government of Canada to be of extra help with regard to humanitarian requirements.

• (1130)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Madam Speaker. I appreciate the information the minister has given. I think it is useful, not just to us but to Canadians watching.

Of course one of the tragedies of this war is the displacement and hardship on civilians, all those who have not been involved in the conflict but certainly are victims.

We understand that Jordan has opened its borders and there are a number of refugees fleeing now and some who have fled there in the past. I understand that the United Nations has estimated there could be about 1.5 million refugees as a result of this war. I understand also that the United Nations has undertaken an augmented relief fund.

Can the minister tell the House what other humanitarian measures the Canadian government is going to take to assist these refugees, to assist victims of this war so that we can play our part in that aspect of humanitarian need?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The House will know that when this crisis was caused by the attack by Saddam Hussein against Kuwait, there were immediate impacts upon third countries, particularly caused by the outflow of refugees and the movement of displaced workers. Jordan was one of those and Egypt was another.

The package of actions the Prime Minister announced in early August included contributions in the neighbourhood of $75 million by the Government of Canada for humanitarian purposes. A little more than a third of that was directed to Jordan and a little less than a third of that to Egypt and contributions to other places in the world. That has already been done.

I am seeking to reach the foreign minister of Jordan by telephone this morning to communicate directly to him the Prime Minister's message to King Hussein, asking the Jordanians to indicate areas in which it would be helpful for Canada and, indeed, the rest of the world, but for Canada specifically, to offer further help. We think that it is in these circumstances most efficient to respond to needs as they are identified by the countries which have to deal directly with the problem. We are doing that and we are prepared, again with in the limits known to the House, to consider other initiatives that would be helpful in the circumstances.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have the following question for the minister. As he said in his reply to my colleague, there is a war on, and Canada supported that war. At the same time we must plan for peace, for the end of the war. I want to ask the minister whether Canada is now taking part in diplomatic initiatives within the United Nations or with other countries, first to find a way to end this war and second, to promote peace in the region in the future.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, with respect, I must correct part of what the hon. member said. Canada supported the United Nations. Canada is supporting international law and order.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What Canada supports is the integrity and security of Kuwait, Israel and other countries that may be attacked by Saddam Hussein.

As for what may happen after the crisis, after the conflict, I have already had some conversations with the Secretary–General of the United Nations, in the course of which I advised him that the Prime Minister and myself were interested and determined to maintain close liaison with the Secretary–General and the United Nations on the subject of seeking ways to make speedy progress after the end of conflict.

This morning, I spoke to Dr. Abdel Mejuid, the Egyptian Minister of Foreign Affairs. We discussed the situation in the region and other issues but we also talked about what would have to be done once peace is restored. A peacekeeping activity was mentioned in which Canada might play a role, and we also touched on other political and humanitarian questions.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, as my leader and this government has said, we admire the incredible restraint that has been shown by Israel at this time in the face of, really, unprovoked attack.

I think that in the interests of peace in the Middle East, they even deferred their right to self-defence. That is quite an incredible undertaking, and I would presume that all of you as leaders, particularly sitting in the cabinet or ex-cabinet ministers, must know what it means to let their constituents down in a sense.

That is what the sense in Israel is right at this moment. I think and I hope they appreciate the interests of world peace.

I was listening carefully to the Minister of External Affairs whose courtesies I have appreciated. Can the government tell this House what further steps are being taken militarily and diplomatically by the United Nations to ensure that no further attacks will take place against Israel and to ensure the safety of Israel, which is presently being held hostage in the Iraq-Kuwait war?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I should tell my hon. friend that, as she might have noted from the response of the Government of Canada last night and from my remarks in the House of Commons some three days ago, this government has always taken as a matter of policy that the ultimate objective of Saddam Hussein would be an attack on Israel.

I conveyed to the House that this would be unacceptable to the Government of Canada. I indicated why it would be unacceptable. I indicated why we would resist it in all circumstances. For that reason, I communicated this morning with President Bush and had a lengthy conversation with him in regard to the present security status of Israel.

My hon. friend is quite right. Israel has exercised remarkable restraint. That restraint is not eternal. The coalition forces have, since that incident and will today, be taking action of such a persuasive nature against Iraq that we believe and hope that will obviate the need for the state of Israel to respond at an early moment.

I have always recognized that no one has the right to tell the state of Israel when and how it must defend itself. A nation of its suffering and of its extraordinary heritage, Israel always has the right to defend itself, and always has. I hope in the circumstances that the response of the great coalition, which seeks to preserve fundamental values, will persuade Israel that perhaps waiting at this moment is in its interest and in the interest of the cause of peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I believe the government has noted Israel's tremendous patience. Let it not be tried any more.

[Translation]

The Canadian tradition has always been to help war victims. Sadly, innocent Israeli families are now in this tragic situation.

Does the government have other plans to help the people of Israel?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): This morning, the Secretary of State for External Affairs called Minister Levy of Israel to let him know that Canada is prepared to offer all available humanitarian resources, and that we would do so gladly and immediately.

The minister also told Mr. Levy, who voiced his appreciation, that the government also intended to offer its assistance to King Hussein and had also mentioned this to the Egyptian Minister of Foreign Affairs. Not only did Minister Levy agree but he was delighted with Canada's decision to maintain and intensify its humanitarian aid to Israel, Egypt and any other non-belligerents in the region.

• (1140)

[English]

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last night in response to the unjustified, unprovoked and callous attack upon Israel the Prime Minister said that Canada may play a new role with its allies in retaliatory action aimed at Iraq. I want to give the Prime Minister an opportunity now to tell Canadians specifically what he had in mind and if perhaps today he has issued new orders through the minister of defence to the chief of defence staff that could involve a change in position or mission for the Canadian forces or could, perhaps, mean sending additional Canadian forces to the gulf such as CF-18s or ground troops. Would he tell Canadians more specifically what he had in mind when he made that statement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the government has not, following a meeting of the cabinet this morning, issued new instructions to the military. We are examining all possibilities with our intelligence and military officials and with allies around the world. I referred to a conversation with President Bush this morning. There were conversations between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the foreign minister of Egypt and with the foreign minister of Israel earlier today. We are examining all possibilities that would allow Canada to assist in a constructive and helpful way the prosecution of a very important initiative now under way in the Middle East.

Canada is not a superpower. Our military means are limited and we use them traditionally only with the greatest of care and reluctance. But I have no reluctance in telling you that while the mandate has not been defined because we are presently examining all of the options, Canada will not sit idly by in the face of unprovoked attack upon friendly countries. We are an ally and full partner in the coalition set up by the United Nations to drive Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. We will play a full and, if need be, a growing role and commit the necessary resources to ensure that justice is brought to that area of the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, the attack on Israel last night gives to that nation one of the most difficult dilemmas any country can face. It is a Hobson's choice. If they restrain themselves as they have and do not defend in order to protect the multilateral coalition, they may be encouraging Iraq and/or other countries to aggress or take advantage of the situation.

Might I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he has called in the ambassadors. If he has not, will he call in the ambassadors from the neighbouring states and tell them that any sign of harm or taking advantage of Israel's restraint will be taken most seriously by Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, both the Prime Minister and I last night communicated directly to the ambassador of Israel. I am now in the process of calling not the ambassadors, but the foreign ministers of countries in the region. In the conversation I have had so far with Egypt, certainly I was struck by the appreciation on the part of Egyptian authorities of the restraint that has been shown by Israel, indeed the admiration, the sense that what Israel is doing in these circumstances, far from being a sign of weakness is a sign of the strength and maturity of that country.

Those are not just the sentiments of Canada. Those are the sentiments expressed this morning to me by the foreign minister of Egypt. But I will consider the proposal made by my friend and convene a meeting of the ambassadors to Canada of countries neighbouring Israel. They share, as we share, a profound interest in the integrity and stability of Israel, as they share a profound interest in stopping the one force that now most threatens to destabilize Israel, and that is Saddam Hussein.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question also to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We appreciate very much the statement he made earlier in answer to my leader that Canada is already reaching out to offer additional humanitarian aid to those countries that are immediately faced with such devastating humanitarian problems.

I would like to pursue that a little further. It has been estimated that about $1 million per day is being spent on this tragic war. I know that everyone in this House, regardless of our differences, pray for an early peace.

Since it is estimated by UN officials that about 1.5 million people may be displaced, coming I believe just from Iraq and Iran alone, and of course there are other humanitarian issues in that general area, will Canada plan to contribute at least as much as we have to the war effort, or perhaps more, to assist people devastated by war in those countries that are going to bear the brunt of the immediate refugee problems? Will we be able to provide practical help as quickly as possible by such means as transportation of personnel and direct assistance for teams of workers in refugee camps, as well as relief agencies?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we are naturally looking at means by which we can help deal with a new refugee problem. The estimates she cites, in my judgment, may well be low. I think that the results of Saddam Hussein's aggression could well, with respect to refugees, be more than 1.5 million displaced persons of which she speaks.

I have to say that the hon. member, and I hope members of her party, should stop citing just half the costs. Of course there are costs to war, but there have been extraordinary costs, not least to the Third World, as a result of this invasion of Kuwait by Saddam Hussein.

Among the things that happened were that thousands of people, people from the poorest countries, from Bangladesh, from the Philippines, from Sri Lanka, from countries in Africa, who were depending upon work in that region were forced to quit that region. That is causing right now immense problems. The longer Saddam Hussein is able to stay, the more time it is giving him. Time is what my hon. friend was asking for last week. The more time that it is given him, the longer those costs accumulate.

Obviously I cannot undertake to make the kind of expenditure the hon. member talks about, but I can certainly give her a commitment that Canada will play an active role with respect to response to the refugee problem.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I completely agree with the minister. Of course there are great humanitarian costs, and we do not begin to know them, sitting in our comfort here in Canada. We are just as concerned as he is with all aspects.

Just thinking ahead, as I know he is, and I am sure the Minister of Immigration is as well, I would like to ask this question. We know from past experience that the countries which receive refugees in the first and second stage of refugee movement are usually the countries left with permanent refugee camps and with stateless people. This is a great tragedy. I would hope that we would plan now—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member please put her question? This is getting into debate.

Ms. Mitchell: Yes, Madam Speaker. I am asking the minister if we will begin to plan now to be pro-active to try to prevent this from happening in the months ahead.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I think that Canada's history has been one of being pro-active and helpful in refugee and refugee-like situations.

We are following this very carefully, and I stated that we would regard any humanitarian requests in a positive way.

• (1150)

We are, as my colleague has said, working with the UN Disaster Relief Organization. For the most part I believe that the UN is looking at potential repatriation as opposed to resettlement. But we are in constant touch. The situation is of course evolving all the time. It is our intention to continue to work with the United Nations on the humanitarian aspects and the refugee aspects, as well as in the military coalition.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

I am sure the minister knows, as does everybody in this House, that there are other Canadians who are deeply involved in this conflict. They are the families of the men and women who are bravely serving for Canada in the Persian Gulf.

I would like to ask the minister if he could give us his assurance in the House that the proper amount of planning and resources have been allocated to deal with the real needs of these families and help them cope with the anxiety. Could the minister give us some information on that?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I would be glad to respond to my hon. colleague, because I know he is very much concerned for the families in his area.

I am pleased to say that we have a family support system in place through our department. They have been operating for some time in Halifax, Esquimalt, and Cold Lake where the majority of personnel come from. That support system is working very effectively. I visited with them not long ago. They have counselling resources. In addition, each of the ships has set up a special group of the families related to those ships. They are providing support for the families. The spouses are meeting together.

I think it is working out very effectively. When I visited with them recently, certainly their response was very appreciative. We have also indicated to them that if additional resources are in any way required we will ensure that those are received.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The whole world held its breath last night, and thank God there was no use of chemical or nerve gas warfare in the attack. The next time we might not be so lucky.

My question therefore is for the Prime Minister. The Israeli Embassy today confirmed that there are people on the West Bank in the Gaza, men, women and children, who have not received gas masks.

[Translation]

We know there are men, women and children on the West Bank and in the Gaza strip who have not been given gas masks. Could the Prime Minister inform the House whether he is prepared to join his allies in seeing to it that gas masks are distributed to these men, women and children as soon as possible?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I do not have a specific response. I am aware of a Supreme Court decision, I believe in the State of Israel, which required that all citizens be provided with the necessary equipment. I know that the Government of Israel and the people of Israel are very principled—it is a very civilized country—and will want to make every effort to make sure that everybody receives these masks.

I can check into it immediately afterward and I would be happy to advise my hon. friend. The position of the Government of Canada, as conveyed officially, always was that the same benefits, of course, must apply to all citizens. We will look into it for the member and get back to her as quickly as we can.

NATIONAL SECURITY

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and it concerns national security in Canada.

Can the Solicitor General indicate to the House whether it is the intention of the Government of Canada to invoke sections of the emergencies act, and more specifically those sections dealing with international emergencies and war emergencies?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I do not foresee that possibility at the moment.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General.

I was advised yesterday by the President of the Canadian Arab Federation, Mr. James Kafieh that Canadians of Arab and Iraqi origin are, to quote Mr. Kafieh being "harassed and badgered" by the Security Intelligence Service.

Will the Solicitor General give his assurance that the Government of Canada, through the Security Intelligence Service, is not targeting for investigation Canadians solely on the basis of their ethnic or religious origin?

Can he reassure Arab Canadians that their rights will be protected and that they have not been placed under special surveillance by the Security Intelligence Service?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I should perhaps respond to that, because I gave the assurance my hon. friend seeks in my speech to the House of Commons three days ago.

I indicated then that the invocation of the War Measures Act in the Second World War, which had imprisoned unfairly Japanese and Italian Canadians, was something that we had corrected and would never happen again. I gave Arab Canadians, particularly Iraqi Canadians, the assurance that that blot on our national history would never be repeated. I indicated to the House that the laws would apply fairly to all Canadians.

There will not be any special edicts of any kind and certainly no illegal, arbitrary or capricious actions taken against Canadians of Arab extraction, all of whom are deemed to be, like all of us, first-class citizens.

GULF CRISIS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the UN resolutions on which this government has based Canada's involvement in this war were strictly limited to removing Iraq from Kuwait and to restoring the Government of Kuwait, as well as freeing the hostages and reparations.

In his statement the other night, George Bush clearly added to those objectives: to destroy the economic, military and political structure of Iraq and some say the agenda really is to destroy Saddam Hussein. Which is the agenda of this government? Is it George Bush's agenda, or is it the United Nations agenda?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, there may come a day—and I hope it is soon—when the NDP will rid itself of this reflexive anti-American position on everything. I say it in all respect to my hon. friend. Well, for example, there is chuckling from the NDP. The socialist leader in Britain, Neil Kinnock, said that in the interests of distancing himself from the government, he did not propose to distance himself from his obligations to support the United Nations.

I say to my hon. friend that the United Nations has spoken clearly and effectively. Perhaps my hon. friend may care to read the objectives of the UN. Confronted with the intransigence of a dictator who invaded a friendly neighbour Arab state and who proved his criminality even further last night by attacking Israel, Canada is going to join with all members of the coalition to drive him out of Kuwait and to make sure that if we in the world community deals with him again, it will be in a position of his acceptance of the rule of international law. He will be held responsible for everything that is taking place.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, this party has stood with him—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brewin: But, when the United States is wrong, this party and this country should stand and say to the United States that it is wrong. That is the situation we are in in this case.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Brewin: Yes, I have, Madam Speaker.

My question is for the Prime Minister, whatever our differences on this issue, U.S. commanders are now saying that the control, communications and capacity of Saddam Hussein to wage war have been destroyed. Will this government join with all of us in this House and ask the United States administration to take a pause in the destruction and seek peace with Iraq in this war?

• (1200)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, is my hon. friend suggesting that with an attack against Israel last night, we should take a break and ask Saddam Hussein to be nice? This is absolutely preposterous.

What is even more serious is the suggestion that somehow we are in violation of resolution 678 and that the United States is doing something illegal. The resolution passed on November 29, 1990 does a number of things. It demands that Iraq comply fully with the resolutions. It authorizes member states co-operating with the Government of Kuwait to restore international peace and security in the area. It requests that all states provide appropriate support to restore international peace and security. That is exactly what we are in the process of doing. We have rallied to the call of the United Nations which is saying at this critical moment in the life of our organization, "Step forward those of you who believe in durable peace and freedom, step forward and defend the interests of the United Nations", and that is exactly what Canada is doing.

NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, 118 nations are gathered at the United Nations seeking a comprehensive test ban. Canada is among them.

In light of the critical situation and the sensitivity to testing a new generation of weapons, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate to the House how Canada will vote today at the United Nations on this important issue.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that Canada's view has been that it is important to maintain integrity and progress within the non-proliferation treaty regime, and that will guide our actions today.

I think the hon. member will share my amazement at the suggestion by the New Democratic Party in the question just posed, that the response of the Government of Canada should be to say that after Saddam Hussein attacks Israel, he should be rewarded with a pause in the counterattack against him. That is absolutely unacceptable policy for any respectable Canadian.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns the tragic situation in the Baltic states.

Could he indicate to the House whether he has taken any steps at the United Nations to have this question raised at the Security Council of the United Nations?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member was perhaps absent, one way or another, when I responded to that question the other day.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

ISRAEL

TABLING OF LETTER TO PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have, in both official languages, a copy of my letter to the Prime Minister of Israel which I sent last night. I would be happy to table both of them in the House.

POINTS OF ORDER

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, earlier today during statement period, the member for Okanagan Centre made references to my service of my constituents' wishes.

I do not at this time have the specific quotation as published in Hansard because Hansard has not in fact reproduced his particular words.

Madam Speaker, at this time I would request your consideration for me to reserve my right to rise at a later date in this House on a point of privilege to clarify the specific comments that were made by the member for Okanagan Centre.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The point made by the hon. member has been taken. Point of order, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Nunziata (York South–Weston): Madam Speaker, during Question Period the member for Calgary Northeast, an independent member of this House, asked a very serious question about whether or not—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nunziata: Members continue to laugh. He asked a very serious question about the situation in Lithuania. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, supposedly a senior member of the government, made disparaging comments and attributed motives to the member for Calgary Northeast.

The member may be an independent member and not a member of that particular caucus but he is deserving of some respect in this House. I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to withdraw those comments about the member for Calgary Northeast.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I can only conclude that the hon. member who has just spoken has an unrelieved allergy to former Prime Ministers.

Mr. Nunziata: You keep it up, you're not going anywhere.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs continues. Not only is he insulting Canadians of Lithuanian origin and showing contempt for that particular—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Madam Speaker, I regret that the normal rules do not apply to the hon. member for York South—Weston. If there was some suggestion that I was slighting or causing concern to Canadians of Baltic origin, let me be clear on what I said. I said that the hon. member had not been present when I had answered precisely that question put by our colleague from Winnipeg—it used to be Birds Hills—or whatever the constituency now is named.

The record is clear as to what I said both to the former member and in this House today. To refresh the memory of the House—

An hon. member: Your nose is growing.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —what I indicated in answer to the earlier question was that we were looking at the possibility of pursuing that issue both in the United Nations and in the CSCE, that there was a problem in both of those cases because the Soviet Union possesses a formal or an informal veto. I believe that is virtually word for word the answer I gave to the member for Winnipeg when that question was raised two or three days ago. I thought it would be better, given the time that the question came, at the end of Question Period, to respond with brevity rather than at length to that question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That's not what you said.

Mr. Riis: Why don't you apologize?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do realize that this is Friday. It has been a very difficult week on everybody's nerves and everybody's emotions.

• (1210)

I am very sad that this afternoon we would get to a point where harsh words would be shouted across that would be regretted by members who utter them. This could get the House into a situation which, to my feeling, would be very difficult for the rest of the country who is watching us.

There is a conflict in the Middle East, and this should not be a reason for us to create more of a conflict in the House of Commons.

I will recognize the hon. member for Calgary Northeast who has been most concerned with what has been going on in the last little while.

I see the hon. member for York South—Weston whose words I have chosen not to hear at one point. I think the wise thing for me to do would be to listen very quietly to the hon. member for Calgary Northeast and then for the House to resume debate.

Hopefully, the hon. member for York South—Weston will listen carefully to what his colleague from Calgary will have to say. Hopefully, he will change his mind about "not being finished".

I think that we should resume debate on the subject that is in front of the House.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I would like to correct the record in the sense that I was present when the question about Lithuania was posed.

Therefore, I wanted to pursue the matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask him what new developments have occurred since that time.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Madam Speaker, if the House agrees to a brief extension of Question Period, I would certainly take a moment to indicate that we are continuing to look at whether or not it is possible to make—

Mr. Riis: Why don't you apologize?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I am trying, Madam Speaker, despite shouts from the NDP, to respond to the question that was placed.

We are looking at ways in which the matter might be brought before either the CSCE or the United Nations in a way that would not encounter a veto by the Soviet Union.

In addition to that, the Prime Minister has written to Mr. Gorbachev. I have just written to the new Soviet foreign minister requesting an explicit and early response to the Prime Minister's letter. I am planning meetings in the next two or three days with representatives of leaders of the Baltic communities in Canada.

I know there have been meetings involving members of this House interested in this issue and the leaders of the Baltic community in Canada to see if there are practical ways in which we can bring our influence to bear on the Soviet Union.

There is now—at least there was at 11.30 and I think it is now in progress—a meeting involving three members of this House representing three parties with the Soviet ambassador to make it clear that the representations I had made to that ambassador that the failure of the Soviet Union to change its approach to the Baltic people will have an effect upon the range of its relations with Canada.

That is the message that I communicated, and that is the message being repeated by members of three parties in this House. I know the member's interest in these things, and I will naturally try to keep him advised as to developments in the issue.

If he has suggestions that would be constructive to the government, I would naturally appreciate hearing from him.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to listen carefully, because this concerns him.

I do not have a broad experience of parliamentary debate in times of international crisis or wartime, but I am told that traditionally, for instance in Great Britain or France, when there is a crisis of this magnitude and those countries are involved, there is a refreshing lack of political partisanship. We see this happening across the world in other parliaments, with the exception of this one.

Perhaps the Chair could arrange for a meeting with certain leaders or certain groups.

I thought now that Canada was involved in a war, the debate in the House ought to rise above partisan considerations. Today, Madam Speaker, I am amazed to see that those partisan considerations are still there, especially in the attitude of the minister responsible. I would like some indication of what the precedents are in this respect. Madam Speaker, we have done everything we could to rise above partisan considerations. We have tried to be co-operative. Madam Speaker, I don't understand why what is happening in the rest of the world is so different from what is happening here. What is going on?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I believe that yesterday, more specifically, the Minister of National Defence organized a number of briefing sessions for various groups, and I think independent members were also able to take advantage of those sessions. So I do not think there is a partisan approach to organizing the stream of information coming from the various departments. Perhaps we could now resume debate. The hon. member for York Simcoe.

[English]

The hon. member for York South—Weston is rising now on a question of privilege. I will of course listen to him, but I would ask him to make his point very brief and tell me where he feels that his privileges have been taken advantage of. Very quickly, the hon. member for York South–Weston.

PRIVILEGE

ANSWER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, with the greatest of respect, the tone of your comments would seem to suggest that you have already predetermined my point of privilege. I would ask that you keep an open mind with respect to the points that I am about to make.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I want to say to the hon. member that the tone of his remarks are not very pleasant for the Chair either.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I will improve my tone, if you will improve your tone.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nunziata: I will state my point of privilege, Madam Speaker. During Question Period today the member from Calgary asked a question about the situation in Lithuania. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, a former Prime Minister in this House, answered that particular question by saying that the hon. member was absent one way or another.

The members on the Conservative side of the House then proceeded to hoot and holler and laugh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I cannot see how this exchange, which I am not going to qualify in any way, has done anything to breach the privileges of the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: I have not finished my submission.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House will now resume debate. There is no prima facie point of privilege.

Mr. Nunziata: You're not letting me make my point. I have a right to state my point of privilege and you cut me off. You are not giving me an opportunity to make my point. I insist on making my point.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not see a prima facie case of privilege in the words expressed by the hon. member for York South—Weston. We will now resume debate.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

SUPPORT FOR UNITED NATIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead), (p. 16983) and the motion of Mrs. Collins (p. 17150).

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, the failure of the United Nations to handle this crisis—

• (1220)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for York South—Weston will at one point realize that the accusations he has made are really not warranted and are not fair. The hon. member may want to withdraw his comments before he is given the floor again. He may want to consider it and let the Chair know. Resuming debate.

Mr. Cole: Madam Speaker, the failure of the United Nations to handle this crisis would have severe impacts on the world. It might never again be able to play an effective role in responding to aggression. Success in this effort will provide a real prospect for collective security in the future. It is critical for countries like Canada even though we are a long way away. It is very critical for countries with small populations with two superpowers at their borders, but we have very limited capacity. We must preserve international law and order.

This is an opportunity for the United Nations to play the kind of role it was designed to perform. But it also puts the United Nations at risk. If the United Nations fails to live up to those principles, objectives and efforts for which so many people have fought so hard for so many years, what is the future for world peace, law and order? It is critical for the world order that we have peace in this particular situation.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, we are at very profound pass in the events in the Middle East and in the world.

We have had throughout this debate some fine moments of leadership. We have had excellent contributions from both the leaders of the parties involved and from private members as well. There have been most thoughtful contributions. Some of the contributions have been absolutely historic. We have had non-partisan contributions. We have had bipartisan contributions in the very best Canadian tradition. I wish to congratulate those who are responsible for the conduct of Canada's foreign policy.

Today, Madam Speaker, I propose to examine where we are, how we got here, the reaction from our riding and tell a couple of incidents about a young Canadian and a young Palestinian and to reflect on the Arab Canadian population of our country. To begin with, where we are. Israel today is exercising remarkable restraint. There is moral strength in exercising restraint.

As the Prime Minister correctly said today, Israel should not be unduly put to the test. However, I have been brought up to believe there is moral strength in exercising restraint and self-discipline and I congratulate the State of Israel for doing so.

I wish to associate myself with the Prime Minister's statement on the attack on Israel and I salute the Secretary of State for External Affairs who throughout this has exercised statesmanship of an historic character, particularly when he said: "the way to stop escalation is to stop Saddam Hussein and his ilk."

How did we get here? We got into the situation we are playing in the Middle East in the best Canadian tradition. I salute the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra for his historic and courageous contribution to the debate the other day in this House.

There are those who suggest that we are illegitimately with the United Nations. I quote the distinguished Canadian columnist, Jeffrey Simpson who wrote in today's Globe and Mail:

> Keeping the peace under UN colours can involve a unified UN command, as in Korea, with strategic and operational authority given to the leading contributing country, the United States. Or it can be, as in the Persian Gulf; contributions by member states working together under UN resolutions but without a unified UN command.

Madam Speaker, the reaction is beginning to come in from across the country. I have here a letter which was faxed to my office two days ago, and I quote:

> Suggesting that we should agree to link withdrawal to the discussion of other regional issues is nothing short of agreeing to negotiate with terrorists and hostage takers—no matter how "legitimate" these grievances may be.
> Even more unhappily, the thought of allowing the deadline to pass without following it with speedy and decisive action would lead us to contemplate an even more horrific problem—
> While we all wish there were another outcome, it seems evident that the only action that could avoid the current confrontation is our own capitulation which would most certainly only delay an even more horrible future outcome. Those who blame Mr. Bush and the western nations for these circumstances are like those who blame the victim of rape and burglary for the crime perpetrated by the real guilty party.
> I know this went on a bit long, but I wanted you to know that there are thoughtful people who support what you are trying to achieve and we do not always show up on the evening news.

I will quote a second fax which came into my office yesterday.

> Too many Canadians have died in wars in history to have this country turn its back on the need for a co-operative United Nations effort in the Middle East. To not fulfil the obligations and initiatives of the United Nations would reduce Canada to a less than mediocre entity in the world community. Canadians have died for civility, for justice, for individual rights and the United Nations is the manifestation of the ideals for which they gave their lives.

I said that I wanted to talk briefly about a 19-year old wounded in the trenches. This happened in Sanctuary Wood on June 2, 1916. It was a story which I did not hear until almost 75 years later when the man who was wounded in those trenches attended a reunion of his regiment in Calgary and for the first time told his family the story of the bloody experiences, the mindlessness, the banality and the horror of war.

I am very grateful I was with him that particular day because as as a child I had begged him to tell me of the glory of war and he had always refused to say anything about it. But my father who was hit by a shell in Sanctuary Wood on June 2, 1916 taught me what no movie or history book could tell me about the absolute horror and the stupidity of war. War he said, is sometimes the only course of action when you are dealing with a bully and someone who abuses the rights of others.

I also would like to mention a 24-year old Palestinian whom I met in 1959 while travelling on a train from Gaza to Cairo and who became a close friend. This man of Palestinian origin, Salah el-Dim Subaih, was a teacher who was being resettled in Kuwait, where he served for many years. After he settled he invited me to his wedding. I was not able to go, but I sent a gift and we became fast friends by correspondence.

• (1230)

Later in the 1967 war I served as the post office for his family in Gaza who were sending letters to relatives in Cairo. There was no mail going back and forth until the Red Crescent and the Red Cross set it up.

From that came waves of gratuity and friendship which I think is really the only basis on which the new world order, of which many have spoken in this House, can be based.

There is something to be said about Arab Canadians. The Prime Minister referred in Question Period to their situation today in response to a question, as he did in his speech the other day.

It is perhaps not a well known fact that in my city of Edmonton, approximately 10 per cent of the Canadian Arab population resides. It is a slightly different profile from the general profile in the fact that generally speaking, Christian Arabs outnumber those of Muslim and Druse origin by three to one in our country, but the majority in Edmonton are of Muslim or Druse origin, although there are substantial numbers of Christian Arabs as well.

We have, as well, a growing Jewish community in Edmonton, largely due to immigration from the Soviet Union. I salute those leaders of the Jewish community in my city, along with the Arab community, led by the example of Professor Baha Abou-Laban, who have engaged in dialogue from the beginning of the time of the intifadah. They have tried to establish, and successfully I believe, the practice and the belief that we here in Canada wish to separate ourselves as much as we can from the quarrels abroad. But that can never entirely be done.

In the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who spoke in this House on August 19, 1914, when this House was debating the question of the first World War, and in a reference to fellow citizens of German origin at that time, he said at page 10 of Hansard:

> They are certainly among our best citizens. They are proud of the land of their adoption, which to many of them is the land of their birth, and they have shown more than once their devotion to British institutions. But, Sir, they would not be men if they had not in their hearts a deep feeling of affection for the land of their ancestors, and nobody would blame them for that.

Madam Speaker, those words can apply to Arab Canadians today.

In the words of the Prime Minister speaking on Tuesday, January 15, 1991, on the subject, he said at page 16990 of Hansard:

> On this point, I want to reassure Iraqi–Canadians that they will not be subject in any way to illegal surveillance or unwarranted detention, as was the case in regard to other citizens during World War II. That lesson fortunately has been learned in this country.

I wish to associate myself with the words of the Prime Minister and to pledge on behalf of the Government of Canada that that pledge and that undertaking will be upheld, and that restraint will be the order of the day. We will not repeat the mistakes that were made during the Second World War when groups of Canadians of various origins were isolated and were dealt with unfairly.

These are turbulent times, but those who have lived through times of war and times of the formation of history tell us that this is the stuff of history. How do we sort our way through the confusion?

The best way is to commit to the rule of law and to the rule of order, and so therefore I proudly associate myself with the resolution before this House, which I strongly support, and with the conduct of Canada's foreign policy in supporting the work of the United Nations in the Persian Gulf, and I pray, humbly, along with I am sure all members of this House, that the conflict will come to a swift and final end and that a way can be found to establish a permanent and lasting peace based on the principles of the three great monotheistic religions throughout the Middle East and throughout the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, my question to the hon. member concerns the situation in the Middle East.

I wonder what his position would be on an international peace conference on the Middle East once hostilities have terminated; whether he would support a homeland for the Palestinians and the resolution of that difficult situation for those people; and whether he would support the re–establishment of an independent, not occupied Lebanon.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, it is a rare privilege, and I mean that sincerely, to have the opportunity in this House to engage in dialogue with the hon. member.

I do indeed support the principle, once peace has been established in the Middle East, of whatever effort can be made toward finding a lasting peace, as I said in the conclusion of my remarks.

If détente between the two superpowers can be preserved and if indeed the cold war has ended, many of the objections to convening such a conference will have been removed. I think that President Bush has recognized that in some of his statements over the past 12 to 18 months and indeed, such a conference would be appropriate.

With reference to a homeland for the Palestinian people, it is my belief that the UN resolutions, not the series that we are debating here today, but the earlier resolutions on Palestine and the preservation of the state of Israel, which is a condition precedent in my mind to an establishment of a Palestinian homeland, ought to be followed. The answer is a qualified but strong yes to the hon. member.

With reference to the Lebanese question, yes, I believe that as soon as possible and as soon as security can be established the occupation of Lebanon ought to cease, and that wonderful country which, when I knew it over three decades ago, was referred to as the Switzerland of the Middle East, can once more find some serenity and peace within itself and security from its neighbours.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my friend across the way for his comments and afford him the opportunity to add his comments on the following review prepared by the United Nations children's organization, UNICEF, which, in a gulf crisis advisory on January 15, wrote: "The situation of Children: In the event of war in the gulf region a number of factors, apart from damage and destruction to buildings and infrastructure, will affect the welfare of children and women in the region. There will be serious shortages, particularly of food, water, medicines and energy supplies. Services will be severely curtailed due to diversion for emergency and military needs. Prices will spiral upward and the economic situation could be complicated by the devaluation of local currencies, especially in the majority of the countries of the region which import about half of their essential needs. Widespread environmental degradation resulting from war-related pollution and climatic changes will have unpredictable effects on the local population. The situation will be worsened by the possibility of breakdowns in water and sanitation facilities, especially in urban areas."

I know the member will want to respond with concern for those innocent victims of this conflict and I welcome his comments on that analysis by UNICEF.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I know that the time is limited and I will try to respond as well as I can. I agree that that assessment is probably very accurate. I have not seen it. I thank my hon. friend for mentioning it.

I wish Saddam Hussein could have been listening to the hon. member this morning. I wish he would realize that this is what he has put in train. It is in train and at some point it will come to an end. After it comes to an end, then the world, probably financed by petrodollars because they are available in that area, must commit itself to a rehabilitation program for the entire area. This is not only for men, women and children but to restore the infrastructure of the area which will be severely damaged for the entire Middle East. Perhaps it will be time for a Marshall plan for the entire mid-east with participation and collaboration by all parties, perhaps hand in hand or perhaps following a peace conference and a settlement.

There has to be change, and there has to be removed from the scene in the Middle East the sources of discontent that give fuel to the engines of madmen like Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, the world is a much sadder place since January 16, 1991, because the demons of war have been unleashed and absolutely no one knows where this war will lead. Absolutely no one knows what problems, if any, will be resolved.

I think that point was captured very well by William Johnson in an article in The Gazette today entitled: "War's initial success—". Will it boost the government's chances?

It is really extremely sad when one believes that a military action that will destroy literally thousands of lives could in fact do that.

The most pertinent points are the following, but can peace be won? "Will the military victory be followed by a political and diplomatic triumph?" He goes on to point out that it may have some effects in that direction, but he also asks the following. "It could also usher in an era of renewed terrorism, of deepened Arab sullenness, of a growing rift between the nations of Islam and the heirs of Christendom". Therein lies one of the critical issues.

[Translation]

When I was elected on November 21, 1988, I had anticipated a number of issues I felt I would have to come to terms with. I had done a lot of reading and research on the trade agreement with the United States and I had forseen the negative impact on working men and women throughout Canada in various industries.

I had realized also that the tax reforms which the government was contemplating would cause serious hardships to Canadians, especially those in the low and middle income brackets.

Those were major issues. I had throroughly anticipated them. But never had I foreseen that, as a member of this house, I would have to deal, as today, with a war. Neither this war or any other war.

As an idealist, I thought we had established a new world order whereby new peacefull solutions could be developed to such problems as poverty, hunger and sickness in the world without.

Unfortunately, I was wrong. Unfortunately also, technological progress exceeds by far the mechanisms which have been developed to implement peaceful solutions.

[English]

I say not at all in a partisan sense that it is unfortunate the Prime Minister had not recalled us earlier so that we could have had this debate, hopefully before hostilities began so that everyone's positions could have been put on the table.

Again, I think in a non-partisan way that while the Prime Minister would like us to believe that he is in close and significant contact with President Bush, it is a grossly exaggerated claim.

For example, why would President Bush, knowing full well that the Canadian Parliament was in the process of discussing this question, not withhold hostilities for a few days? Why could he have not respected our democratic process? Surely, if he had come to the same conclusion, he could have reached that two or three days later.

I must add that I am extremely proud of my party's position and of my leader's position on this issue. We condemn Saddam Hussein. We condemn what he was doing in Kuwait to his people and what he did last night to Israel. Let there be no doubt about that. We condemn him and all people who act as he does.

But there is a double standard. There are people who have committed as great an atrocity, and we have simply verbalized our discontent. That is unfortunate. We too applaud the great, great patience that Israel has shown and the restraint it has demonstrated. I was pleased to hear today that the same comment was made with respect to a number of Arab nations, because they too have shown restraint, and a number of Arabs throughout the world have done the same. I pray that this will continue.

My party supported sanctions, an embargo and diplomacy. We provided proof that those were working in spite of what was said. We had an array of credible individuals from the political scene, the military scene, and a number of other sectors who showed unequivocally that sanctions were working, not only affecting the civilian population but getting at that military infrastructure.

We brought forward evidence that has never been refuted. There is no way under any circumstances that any member of government has ever provided even a slight percentage of the evidence that we put forward.

We had little doubt that if we had been more patient we could have come up with different kinds of solutions. We requested additional time. Perhaps the best indication of how we went about it was the addition of the amendment to the current motion which has been debated, asking whether or not we support the United Nations.

Of course we support the United Nations, but it does not mean we have to follow it blindly. It does not mean that we cannot bring some precision to its position. We offer the following amendment:

> That the motion be amended by adding—"through the continued use of economic sanctions, such support to exclude offensive military action by Canada at this time."

We felt that more time could have given us an opportunity to explore the effects of sanctions, greater diplomacy, and perhaps solutions that we had not thought about.

Our party's first option in case of hostilities was to withdraw our troops from the theatre of war. That did not mean we could not be supportive in other ways. Quite to the contrary. We lost the decision, as the House well knows, when the Prime Minister and his government decided to go to war.

Our support of the United Nations has been unequivocal. Member after member has mentioned it. We believe so much in the UN that we wanted this multinational force under its command and control.

Canada is now at war. What are we as a party doing in this situation? Are we for or against this war? Clearly, unequivocally we are against it. We have said it time and time again. Is it a necessary war? We consider it an unnecessary war at this time. Are we united with the government? In terms of providing the adequate support for our troops to ensure their safety and security, yes, absolutely. We want them to have the best in order to protect themselves against possible death and injury. Are we united with the government on the supposed need for war at this time? No, we are not.

As a result of the Prime Minister's decision to go to war, as some members have mentioned, Canada has now lost its innocence. Whether or not we like it, we have, according to many people in the world, become an aggressor.

People will say: "Are there times when we need to go to war?" Yes. Absolutely. Unfortunately! When our people are at risk, there is no doubt in my mind. When our country is at risk, there is no equivocation. But is it not sad that, in today's society, we have not developed mechanisms that would permit other alternatives than mass destruction?

• (1250)

We are at war. What do we do now? We must stop the war as soon as possible. There will be massive destruction of the infrastructure, of buildings, of roads, of bridges, of hospitals, and of schools. But what about the massive destruction of people? It is not only soldiers who are being killed in Iraq. There are little girls, who are not terribly different from little Canadian girls. There are young men in their teens, who are very similar to young men here. There are moms and dads. Whether you are a mother or a father here or a mother or a father in another country, surely it has the same kind of significance. There are grandparents and other relatives.

We need to seek a peaceful solution as quickly as possible. Surely this continued brutality is not the ultimate solution. We need to anticipate the "fallout" that will have been created by this war, the problems that will be there that were not there before. We all know that by supposedly resolving something we often create a series of unanticipated other problems.

What might some of those be? There will be emotional trauma not only felt by the civilians, by the boys and girls, by the moms and dads, by the seniors and by other citizens as well, but by our own servicemen and women, by our own soldiers. There will be massive economic and social instability for Iraq and for other nations.

What do we do now in terms of trying to respond to that particular difficulty? And what about the environmental impact? Have we thought of that? Have we thought of the difficulties in any significant kind of way? Are we starting to identify those now so that we can react, hopefully tomorrow or very shortly, to those particular challenges? What about the difficulties in bringing about a just solution?

We have talked of linkage. We have talked of peace conferences. We have talked of a number of other alternatives, but we need to put those on the table so that they are ready when the time comes. We need a just solution. As I pointed out before, a military conquest will not resolve those problems.

What are we going to do in terms of attempting to avert war in other troubled areas of the world? Or, having been "successful" in a military way, do we continue to operate this way, or do we come forward with different kinds of solutions or mechanisms other than war that might work?

What about potential additional conflicts because of this war? As was pointed out, this is a massive war where there will be massive destruction and loss of lives, but there will be additional conflicts. Will other countries, for example, that feel as if they have not been treated fairly by Iraq want to seize a particular opportunity? Will Iraq, assuming that it has been devastated and conquered, carry away this feeling that it must get even? And who will be the victims of that kind of behaviour, that kind of attitude?

I suggest that as a first step in responding to those problems we need to bring the conflict under UN command.

I want to point out another major concern that I have, and that is the managing of information during conflict. It would appear thus far, if one has looked at what has occurred, that it has been open; but I wonder how true that is. Has it been "managed" rather than "open"?

Do we know the truth about what has occurred? What are the implications of that management, assuming that it has occurred, on news information for us as Canadians in the future? Not only in theatres of war, not only during conflicts, but what questions does that raise? I think there is no one here, if we want to be fair about it, who would not suggest that the military is trying to put the best light on what has occurred thus far. Why all the coverage, and why those particular scenes as opposed to others? What are the implications of that? Are we being made to think in a particular way in order to support a decision that has been made? I think so.

There is great sadness because we have not developed other mechanisms but those of war in order to resolve problems and because we have made massive and intriguing technological advances, not only with war machines but throughout society, and juxtaposed against those technological advances it seems that we have not moved forward at all on other fronts.

Let us look at our country very briefly. Poverty affects almost five million Canadians, most of whom are women. Many of them are single parents, but there are over one million children affected. We have two million people on welfare today. Over one and a quarter people are unemployed, and about 500,000 people are going to food banks. Those are the critical problems.

If we are having those difficulties in a country that is as rich and powerful as ours, what about those other countries in the world who have less? What about countries devastated by war or affected in a very serious way?

It is sad that our technological advances far outstrip our ability to work out problems such as poverty, employment, appropriate distribution of wealth and responding to the unemployed and those in great need.

[Translation]

In our society, war spells failure. It is not a solution. Of course, there will be a "winner". But this "victory" will cause in turn many new unknown problems which simply cannot be anticipated.

What is being done today, if anything, to address the serious problems which will affect not only Iraq, but other countries of the world?

As Liberals, we were prepared to go to war if we necessarily had to, for instance to protect our country and our people. But we strongly believe that war should only be considered as a last resort. Nobody should go to war without having exhausted all possible avenues.

[English]

The path of war is much travelled. We know that. Whether we talk of large wars or small ones, it is still war. It is still destruction, the loss of lives, and the maiming of men, women and children. The path of peace is much, much less travelled. It is time that we explored and started to travel the path of peace much more frequently than we have in the past.

I would hope, whatever our religious sides, we are still believers and—

—that we will all pray in our own way for peace, a new world order where problems can be solved without war, where our own children and those of the rest of the world can feel secure, where men and women will accept to work together to build a new society based on friendship, love and co-operation.

• (1300)

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I listened to the closing remarks of my colleague. I agree with his last remarks to the effect that all of us must work together for peace, love, friendship, and harmony between nations. I would simply ask him, considering the seriousness of the situation and the fact that war has broken out and that the House is debating a resolution concerning our support for the United Nations, the former leader of the Liberal Party clearly stated, and I quote:

[English]

This is a crucial test for the United Nations and Canada must support it. This is a crucial test for collective security and Canada must support it. Does he agree with that declaration?

[Translation]

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for her comments and her question.

She quoted the former leader, and that is precisely the case—a former leader. But now we have a new leader. I clearly explained the position of my new leader. As a former deputy minister, I am not one to go and tell people with whom I used to work how to handle their own affairs. We have a new leader and a policy which has been fully explained not only by the leader but also by my colleagues and myself.

The debate does not relate to the fact that Mr. Hussein has committed unacceptable acts, not al all. The fact is that war engenders war. Perhaps the war will end in a military victory, but it will create other problems.

I agree with my colleague that the problem is very serious. The diverging views have to do with the fact that we would have waited a little longer to see if sanctions might not produce the same results, or if other much more creative solutions might not have been found. That is the difference. I am not being mean when I say that. You are the government, you have the right to do what you are doing and I respect the fact that you have that authority.

But you know, Madam Speaker, and I said so at the beginning of my remarks, we had offered evidence from a wide variety of very credible people that the sanctions did affect the people and were also beginning to undermine the military infrastructure of Mr. Saddam Hussein. The government did not disprove these facts.

I even have a quotation from Mr. Clark dated December 28, if memory serves me right, when he wrote to his colleague to convey the same point of view. Today is January 18, which means he said that three weeks ago. Thank you for your comments and question.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member from Saint-Boniface with great interest and I would have a question for him.

We are presently debating a motion which reads:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

One thing is not clear in my mind. Did he say he was going to vote for or against this motion?

Mr. Duhamel: My hon. colleague knows full well that I said nothing on that subject. What I did say, and I will repeat to refresh his memory, is that we Liberals support the United Nations.

Mr. Lapierre: And this motion?

Mr. Duhamel: Now, wait a moment. I am getting to it. You sometimes take a little time to get to the point. I want the same privilege. I said that we Liberals support the United Nations. Indeed, I said that one can support an organization, whether the United Nations or any other, and not agree with every proposal it puts forward. I did not say whether I supported it or not. That is a surprise. I did say, though, that we had moved the following amendment:

> That the motion be amended by adding immediately after the word "Kuwait" the following:
> "through the continued use of economic sanctions, such support to exclude offensive military action by Canada at this time."

If my hon. colleague wants to know if I support the United Nations, the answer is unequivocally yes. As regards my support to the proposal, I will think about it.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I am extremely concerned that my colleague made a speech without having an opinion on this motion. I want to go back to this point.

Today, we have a few thousand servicemen and women out there who cannot afford to pussyfoot about like he seems to want to do.

Does he, as a Canadian and as a member of this House which collectively sent thousands of our fellow countrymen and women up to the front, have as much guts as these people or does he plan on pussyfooting much longer?

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question. I don't dance. I don't waltz. Am I as brave as the troops? I don't know. I am not a military man, and quite frankly, I don't envy their position at all.

Sure, theoretically, you can say we sent them, but I didn't send them. You may have sent them, but I certainly didn't. Certainly not.

Am I evading the issue? I said I wanted more time to think. If you ask me what I would do if I had to say yes or no today, I would say no, without adding the amendment. I made that clear.

Do I support the United Nations? Yes, without reservations. I don't understand what the hon. member is trying to do. It seems to me his questions are not very logical. Surely, he cannot be serious.

In fact, I am rather disappointed, because I used to have a pretty good opinion of him. He is often quite fair and quite charitable. He tries to be rational and objective. I suppose like all of us, he has his ups and downs.

Mrs. Bourgault: Madam Speaker, a political party that intends to run the country some day must show what side it is on. Its members must have guts and be able to say: When there are serious decisions to be made, I will set aside my party affiliation and make the decision that is appropriate in the circumstances.

What we are asking the hon. member for St. Boniface, who, by the way, is extraordinarily fluent in both official languages, is whether or not he will vote in favour of supporting the United Nations in its efforts to get Iraq out of Kuwait.

The question is straightforward: Yes or no?

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for her question. We do not see ourselves as a party in waiting that may come to power some day. We shall come to power, and very shortly. I just wanted to make that clear.

What about guts? I suggest the hon. member ask the people with whom I have worked whether I have guts. You want to know how I intend to vote? Wait until the vote is taken. I will cross that bridge when I come to it.

With respect, I think it is too bad the hon. member is trying to suggest things that are just not so. I thought that, especially on an issue as serious as this one, she and her colleagues on the other side of the House would have been fairer in their comments.

But don't worry, we will come to power. Don't worry, we have the guts. And above all, don't worry because I intend to vote the right way, and I know what the right way is. Just wait and see.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, it is obviously with deep sorrow that I rise today in this House. As a member, I had never thought that I would see the day where I had to speak to a motion dealing indirectly with a declaration of a war which is already under way.

Madam Speaker, if I may as a posthumous tribute I would like to talk about my father. In 1939, at only 23 years of age, he was already a member of the Royal 22nd Regiment. My grandfather died the same year my father was called to duty. My grandmother was left with 18 kids and since my father was single, he became head of the family. Consequently he was exempted from active duty. During my childhood, after the war was over, my father always said he would have liked, even after becamimg head of the family, to contribute to the war effort and, as a Canadian and fellow countryman, to go up to the front line to fight for the fundamental rights of Canada during the 1939–1945 war.

Madam Speaker, I believe most Canadians do not understand the origins of this conflict. Since the outbreak of hostilities, I have been carefully watching the news and I would like to take this opportunity to commend the many reporters still in that region who have been doing everything they can to accurately report on the events in the Gulf. I would like to wish them the best, and my thoughts go to their families. Several citizens have called "open lines" to express their views, and the vast majority of them have admitted not understanding the very nature of the conflict dividing that region of the Middle East. I think as Canadians we should try harder to understand what is going on elsewhere in the world, because those events do affect us. We have the evidence right here: there is a war and some of our fellowmen and women are in the theatre of operations ready to fight for our values and a world order.

Not only about the Middle East but also about other regions of the world, I would urge my constituents to widen their horizons by examining what is going on elsewhere so as to appreciate the motives and the historical reasons at the root of dissidence between Arab nations. As for Israel, I did go there as a member of a delegation with the Canada–Israel committee, like most other members. Those who have not yet been invited should soon be, or if they were invited perhaps they could not go. Anyway, I went there and I think it is a beautiful region. I would like to visit other countries, I have Arab friends whom I have not seen for some time and who often come to Montreal. I know them very well. I have a lot of affection for those people. I met them quite often. We stand to gain by understanding and getting to know their culture and traditions. Once I even smoked that famous water pipe which Arabs enjoy after a meal.

Madam Speaker, utterly unbelievable as well is the fact that we are watching the war on television, wondering whether it is real, whether it is a dream, or whether it is a movie. But it is reality, there are bombings, people are scared, anxiety prevails. Just imagine that you are a citizen of Jordan, of the West Bank, or of Saudi Arabia, and asking yourself whether the missile aimed at a base is not going to hit your area or your house. We can only feel very deeply for all these men, women and children who have to live under such incredible conditions.

Another thing that is different in 1991 is that women are now on the front line. Women did their share during the 1939–45 war, but they worked in hospitals looking after the sick and wounded.

But now there are 67 Canadian women involved in this war as members of the Canadian Armed Forces. It was felt that women should avoid at all costs being involved in a war, because they had to look after their husbands during World War II, but today, some men are watching in front of their television sets perfectly aware that there wives are serving in the gulf area. It is unbelievable. I wish to pay tribute to the 8,000 women who are members of the Canadian Armed Forces and tell them how proud I am of their colleagues who are over there involved in all sorts of operations, handling military equipment, to defend values which are dear to our hearts, Madam Speaker.

Should the fact that Israel has chosen not to launch a counterattack be interpreted as evidence of weakness or of strength? Madam Speaker, I suggest it is unquestionably evidence of strength. By refusing to retaliate is kind for the sake of this vast land and for the sake of their fellow citizens. Israeli leaders are showing extraordinary and remarkable composure, and I hope they will show the necessary fortitude and good sense in telling their fellow citizens to be patient. In short, having visited this region and having met Mr. Shamir personally, I plead with him—I am sure he is not listening to what I, the lowly member for Argenteuil—Papineau, may have to say to him who is involved in such a serious conflict—not to do anything which could endanger an already explosive situation.

Madam Speaker, I am sure some of my constituents are wondering today: "What could I do personally to take part in this war effort? How can I help? Can I send money? Can I send food?" I wish to tell them that they can use my county office. I wish they would phone me to say: "I wish to send this or that". I promise to do everything I can to send their offerings directly through the various organizations which will look after the serious problems which will arise following this war. I feel we do not insist enough on the fact that the minute this conflict is over, tomorrow or the day after, we will find that houses have been destroyed, that there are women and children—families—without shelters, wounded and handicapped people with all sorts of horrors which I refuse to contemplate today, Madam Speaker.

So, if my constituents want to do something concrete, they can communicate with my office and I promise to look after this personally. For instance, if a person asked me what he or she could do personally back home, I would say: "If you are a smoker, do not smoke a package of cigarettes for two days; or if you eat sometimes in restaurants, stay home and keep the money in order to use it for the war effort." Canadian men and women have shown over the years that they are extremely generous, not only in time of war, by also in time of peace helping hungry people in developing countries deal with their problems.

I will certainly support this motion, in spite of the fact that, like many honourable members from both sides, I feel that war is a failure. I suggest it is above all the failure of a man who decided that he would control the world. It is also the failure of international leaders who did not realize that this man was stockpiling weapons and arms. I am sure I speak for all Canadian men and women when I ask: Should we continue watching people earning a living by manufacturing war equipment which someday can be turned against us?

Madam Speaker, these are very difficult choices which the government had to make under the circumstances. But as I was saying earlier to my friend the hon. member for Saint-Boniface, making this type of decision required a lot of guts. We made this decision. I am in perfect agreement with the motions which support the United Nations and their efforts to bring this dictator to his knees.

Madam Speaker, I hope that the war will end soon, I offer my best wishes to our fighting men and women over there and their families, as well as to the journalists. They can count on my prayers.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for York South—Weston requests the floor. After the unfortunate exchanges we had about an hour ago, I think some gesture on his part would be appropriate before I recognize the hon. member for debate.

I will therefore give him a chance to make that gesture, and I hope he will do so. Otherwise I will have to recognize someone else.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, in the circumstance I would ask the opportunity to meet with you in your chambers to discuss that matter. In the interim, I would ask that you recognize me on legitimate points of order and privilege.

But at your earliest convenience, I am prepared to meet with you in your chambers to discuss the matter and then to return to the House and indicate my position on the record.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will be replaced in the chair some time in the next hour. As I have been the occupant of the chair since 10 o'clock this morning, I think everyone will understand that I will need to refresh myself and maybe have a little bit of food.

At that time I will certainly meet with the hon. member. In the meantime I think that it would be right for me to recognize other members. Once we have spoken, we will settle the matter. I appreciate the hon. member coming forward with the suggestion at this time.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Saint-Denis, for questions and comments on the speech by the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I hope that the exchange that will take place later today will be held according to the best parliamentary traditions that bring us together today.

I would like to thank the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau for her comments, to which I listened with great interest. I particularly appreciated the fact that she really thought about the issue, saying that she found this war difficult to accept, and explained why. That is a rarity in our parliamentary system.

She told us it was hard for her to vote on this kind of motion because there were other reasons she would have liked to include, but that in the circumstances, she would vote in favour of the motion if we ever voted on this issue. This is not a confession but it is an almost embarrassing expression of honesty.

As I said before, she really thought about the matter. She said she didn't know what could be done. There were so many people suffering. I heard all the statements that have been made since yesterday. As you know, and the hon. member said as much, she was a guest of the Canada-Israel committee. She saw part of the what the Canada-Israel committee wanted to show her. However, she is aware there is always another side to these issues. There are millions of people in the Palestinian territories that have been waiting 45 years for people like her to get up and say: It seems to me something has to be done. And that is why I want to act as a witness to what she just said, as a witness who listened very carefully. I feel she has a good heart and is prepared to think about what will have to be done later on. What are we going to say once, this terrible war is over. We can go off to the crusades, to war, but meanwhile, parliamentarians have to do their job. If we don't take the trouble to think about these things, what are we doing here while the war is going on?

I will not talk about the essence of the issue, since that would be making a speech. But I want to say there must be parliamentarians. If we, as parliamentarians of the world, of the western democracies, limit ourselves to reflecting on what could be done—In that, I thank her for shaking me up, but not too roughly—people must understand that terrible tragedies will follow, not only in a small part of the world, but everywhere in the Middle East, horrible tragedies. Did we try to picture these two or three million refugees who are leaving because they are afraid, or because they are kicked out? They are living in tents, waiting for people like her try something, to find a solution or suggest something. I greatly appreciated her speech.

Mrs. Bourgault: If you don't mind I will first answer. I wish to thank my hon. colleague for his good words. Clearly, it is because I know people from that area that I might have a more open mind. What I was pointing out is that Canada should open itself to the world. There is war in the Middle East, but there might be wars elsewhere in the future, and if we are ignorant of traditions in those countries, it will be difficult for us to judge the reasons for those wars.

The hon. member raises an important issue and I congratulate the Canada-Israel committee for the way in which they showed us the country. I went to Bethlehem and in the occupied territories. I think, Mr. Speaker, that we should do the same with other countries in the Persian Gulf area, that is visit them to try to understand them and find solutions to this problem.

[English]

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, we were recalled to the House of Commons last week to debate a resolution to reaffirm Canada's commitment to the United Nations resolution 678 which authorized member nations to use all necessary means to bring the crisis to a successful conclusion.

Needless to say, all of us here have taken this responsibility very seriously. This is an emotionally charged issue for all Canadians, and for me personally I can honestly say that I have never before been called upon to take part in such a difficult decision for all members of Parliament.

In the name of peace, a brick was thrown through my constituency office window. In the name of peace, I have been told that we should bomb Iraq. In the name of peace, I wish we could all lay down our arms and use this energy to help the homeless and the underprivileged.

In the name of peace, I wish Saddam Hussein agreed with me. He can still join the forces for peace.

Since the United Nations inception some 40 years ago, I do not believe it has ever had to face such a difficult crisis. Throughout its history, the United Nations has been instrumental in resolving conflicts in restoring and keeping peace in many regions. However, the effectiveness of the United Nations as an international body of dialogue is now being put to a test where its future effectiveness may rest on the outcome of this war.

• (1330)

I believe that everybody wants peace. I do not know of a single member of Parliament who is in favour of war. What we are really debating is the most effective method by which we can achieve a lasting peace. Of course, we should try to avoid war. I believe that is what we have tried to do since Iraq invaded Kuwait in August.

Sometimes war cannot be avoided. That was one of the lessons we learned from the Second World War. World War II also taught us that we can wait too long before we move to stop an aggressor. Chamberlain's politics of appeasement did not work in 1939.

What I feared most is that in our quest for peace we would allow Saddam Hussein to develop his arsenal of war to such a level that in a few months or a few years we would be facing an even more dangerous aggressor. How would that serve the international community and the cause of peace more effectively? I have trouble with that concept.

Before the outbreak of war I heard that at the first sign of fighting Canadian troops should pull out. But in all good conscience, how can we? What do we tell our allies, "Get on with the job. I'm 4,000 miles behind you"? If we do, how will our commitment to upholding world order ever be valued again? How moral is it to cut and run?

Canada has earned the respect and the trust of all nations because of the effectiveness of our Armed Forces, not only in battle during the First World War, the Second World War, and the Korean War, but also because we have been an effective member of the United Nations peacekeeping forces. Our history is not one of following the United States into battle.

After the First World War, Canada has always made these decisions at home and that is the tradition we are still following today. Canada has always stood for freedom and Canada has always stood firmly with her allies wherever freedom has been threatened. We have never run away and left our allies to do our fighting for us and we are not going to do that today.

The United Nations was formed to provide a forum for resolving international conflicts. Our presence in the gulf is in response to the collective voices of 28 member nations calling for a solution to end the conflict initiated by Saddam Hussein when he used his military might to invade and occupy Kuwait.

Until January 15 we were there to monitor the sanctions imposed by the United Nations. I was always hopeful that a last-minute diplomatic effort might bring a peace, but all diplomatic efforts failed. Saddam Hussein is not interested in dialogue or negotiating and I do not think he shares our concern for peace, justice, and human life.

To those that feel we should wait a little longer for sanctions to work, all I can say is that if Canada had been invaded I think we would all be praying for freedom-loving nations to come to our aid. We would be hoping that others would send their sons and daughters to liberate us. I hope the United Nations would respond to our cries for help, as we have responded to the cries for help from Kuwait.

This is not a time for our allies to have to question our support for the United Nations coalition but, more importantly, it is a time for our young men and women in the Armed Forces to know that we are with them 100 per cent. Their families must also know that we do not take their commitment to world order lightly.

If ever there was a time to show a united front, it is now under the leadership of the United Nations. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that we must follow through on our resolve and support the government decision to stand with our allies and take whatever action the United Nations forces determine necessary.

We know that our forces are engaged in a war. I say this with a heavy heart and much sadness. I have lived through war and I do not wish the experience on anyone. I pray for peace and I pray that this war is over quickly.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's speech with great interest. However, I noticed that she said if Canada was invaded from other countries, we would not cry to our allies.

The question I have for the hon. member is: Where was Canada when other smaller countries were subjected to aggression? Where was Canada when other smaller countries were being trampled upon by invaders? Where was Canada when Cyprus was invaded by Turkey? Or is that another story because there is no oil there? There is no interest. We were not invited by President Bush.

Why does Canada only speak out against other aggression but do nothing? Why the double standard? Why should we not form a unique policy and stick to it? Or is it that this time we have particular interests? Or is it that at this time we have to heed what President Bush says?

Let me not be misunderstood. I am with our forces 100 per cent. But I question the double standard of the government and the party which she represents.

Mrs. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his question. I would like to say that the United Nations was formed 45 years ago to unite countries and to assist in keeping peace in the world.

We went through quite a period of time with the cold war. The cold war kept the actions of the United Nations suppressed. It was not able to carry on and protect many of these countries. Now, with the cold war diminished, we had every hope that this body of nations would work.

I must admit at the time that Cyprus has been helped by our peacekeeping forces and that was under a Liberal government. However, I think that the United Nations is still the body to work with for peace and international law and order.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, earlier today an hon. member stated, and I quote: "Too many Canadians have died in wars in history to have this country turn its back on the need for a co–operative United Nations in the Middle East. To not fulfil the obligations and initiatives of the United Nations, it would reduce Canada to a less than mediocre entity in the world community. Canadians have died for liberty, for justice, and for individual rights and the United Nations in the manifestation of the ideals for which they gave their lives."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Sobeski): Excuse me. Is the hon. member on a question or debate?

Mrs. Feltham: It is a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Sobeski): Well, would you please ask the question?

Mrs. Feltham: Mr. Speaker, in reliving some of the things that happened pre–World War II, I would like to ask my colleague if she sees a parallel between what happened in pre–World War II and what has happened over the last year in Iraq.

Mrs. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, the situation that led up to the present situation is very similar to what happened before World War II. There were a lot of people who were frightened of war. They did not understand what we were getting into. I can understand that fear. It is not an easy thing to address to oneself.

• (1340)

However, we stood behind our soldiers and we helped them by standing behind them. It was so very important for them to be assured that we were for them, thinking of them, and praying for them. I think this is behind every situation like this.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, with what a tremendous hope this country entered 1990 and with what a shattered hope we are now entering 1991.

This is a war that was to be swift and definitive. Yesterday, on one channel that I watched as I joined other Canadians in trying to keep up with the news, Mr. Bush was reported to say last night that this war will not be short, nor will it be easy.

I join every member of the House in feeling tremendous support for and tremendous pride in the young men and women who are representing us in the Persian Gulf. I also join with those in the House who believe they are heroes already because they are there, prepared to do what their country asks of them. But I do not agree with the role that their country is asking of them.

That does not mean, for a moment, that those of us who do not agree with the role, do not support the men and women on the front. But I am terribly concerned. In 24 hours, we have gone from President Bush pumping up the world, preparing it for a war that would be short and "clean", to saying now that we are facing a war that will not be short and will not be easy.

This war is a mistake. Like most Canadians in the last three days, I have left meetings and I have left the House, and I have gone home and been glued to the television set. That, in itself, is different for us as Canadians, when it comes to war. I have been glued to the television set hoping that I would get the news and that the next little piece of the story would tell me more about what is happening.

Like other Canadians, I have sat riveted to the television set late into the night for the last three nights and two things have struck me. First, because we are getting live reports as events unfold, we are operating on unverified information that changes from minute to minute. The whole country and the whole world is on a roller–coaster. As we saw last night as the bombs were dropping in Israel, there were all kinds of rumours about what was happening. That struck me as being the new way in which we will view the war. We will all be there with a picture window on the theatre of war every night.

But the other thing that struck me was when I was watching CNN at around six o'clock last night, was a caption that said "authorized footage from the American military". That made me think and it struck me that every night on television we see footage very quickly of other skirmishes around the world in other wars around the world. We have seen some pretty horror–filled stuff, starting with the Vietnam war, through the eyes of television.

But when I started to think about that, I had a sense that I was watching pictures of pilots getting into planes, pictures of pilots getting out of planes, pictures of troops being moved one way and the other across the desert. I was seeing a lot of file footage. I was on the roller–coaster because there is a voice background about what people think is happening. Yet, I felt that I was not being shown the truth about the impact of what had happened. I think Canadians are starting to feel that, and are going to increasingly feel that.

It is true that in the first three days we have not seen the impact, but we cannot be protected forever from that impact. If we have the technology to be there, then why should we start censoring what Canadians are going to see?

I am very concerned about the kind of sense that that is going to leave Canadians with. Today on CBC radio, when I was driving in this morning, there was a psychologist talking about how we as Canadians are responding to what is happening in the gulf.

In talking to some people I have found that they were made to feel embarrassed about feeling anxiety about this war because there are those who say: "If you think we've got it bad, think about those in the gulf."

It is normal for people faced hourly and continually with an unknown quantity like this war to feel anxiety. It is important for us as Canadians to talk about that and also to think it through to come to a conclusion about what we as Canadians believe we should be doing about this great and horrific unknown.

What troubles me about many pieces of this debate in the House is that there are references to only talking about half the story. If somebody is talking about the humanitarian side, somebody gets up and says: "You're only talking about half the story," or "You're only talking about the people in Iraq. Why aren't you talking about the people in Saudi Arabia? Why aren't you talking about the innocent victims in Saudi Arabia? How can you just talk about innocent victims in Iraq?"

In the time we have nobody can cover the whole blanket. But we do all have concerns and we are trying to cover the whole blanket collectively. If one speaker talks about innocent women and children dying in Iraq, it does not mean they do not care about the innocent women and children in Saudi Arabia. If one person speaks without mentioning Israel, that does not mean we are not terribly concerned about people in Israel.

An hon. member: A good point.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, we do not have the opportunity in Question Period, for example, to expand our argument to be all–inclusive. We have to focus to one area. Yet we have responses, both from ministers and members on the other side of the House, suggesting that when we are trying to deal with one issue, somehow we are excluding all the others. That I think is a tragedy. It is a tragedy that the Canadian people will soon start to figure out. It is mischievous and it is deceitful. It is an example of how the government with its disdain is starting to show itself to Canadian people. It is with disdain that the government in fact has shown itself to hold Canadian people.

I would hope that as we continue this debate, late into the night to ensure that we all have an opportunity to speak, people will believe that there is not one parliamentarian in Canada who does not feel a tremendous level of patriotism and that we all are terribly concerned. We may not agree. I may profoundly disagree with the government's position on this very important issue. But because we raise issues of concern, we are not somehow less patriotic or somehow less committed to our young men and women in the gulf.

One of the things that has been missing in this debate is input from Canadian people.

The hon. member on the government side of the House who spoke before me mentioned that she was doing things in her constituency to ensure that people could make contributions to the war effort. I had hoped I would have had an opportunity under questions and comments to question her because, while it is very laudable that she is encouraging people in her constituency to bring donations and so on— and that is another piece dealing with the whole question of the war and its impact— I had wanted to ask her if she in fact believed that at this point a pause for peace would not have made a tremendous impact.

Today, the hon. member for Victoria during Question Period indicated to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that U.S. commanders had said the air raids which involved more than 1,000 sorties by American, British, French, Saudi and Kuwaiti aircraft had broken the back of Saddam Hussein's air defence system, command control, and communications organization. He said to the minister that he would urge the Prime Minister to urge the United States to consider a pause for peace.

The howls from some members on the government side were shocking. Even more shocking was when the Secretary of State for External Affairs said: "We are not going to reward Saddam Hussein with a cease–fire."

Well, a pause for peace is not a reward that anybody is asking for, for Saddam Hussein. A pause for peace is a reward to the allies. It is a reward to the victims, the women, and the children in Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Kuwait, and Israel. It is a reward for the families and friends of those who are serving Canada in the gulf, and it is a reward for the world if it ends the war.

The suggestion that a pause for peace was suggested to reward Saddam Hussein I think is shocking and despicable. It was meant only to discredit somehow what was said in a genuine way by an hon. member of the House.

I said that I was concerned and sad that Canadians have not had the opportunity to input to the government their true feelings. Indeed, many Canadians have not determined yet what their true feelings are about this war.

I was very fortunate, as we were being recalled to the House of Commons, to be at a meeting where there were a number of my constituents. I quickly took out a pen and some paper and asked them to tell me as I came back to Ottawa what in fact their feelings are about the war. These letters are a week old and many events have unfolded since then, but I do not think the sentiments of these constituents have changed.

The letters begin: "I have asked Joy Langan to tell Brian Mulroney my feelings about the Middle East crisis." That is all it says. I did not try to guide their thoughts. These are a couple of them and I would like to put them on record.

The first one, from a woman named Bernice Gehring from Maple Ridge, states:

> My aunt, Dogney Anderson of Craigmile, Alberta was named the first mother of the year because she lost her three sons to the Second World War, all within three weeks.

She died in her eighties believing that Canada would never again enter into or be supporting war.

You have a responsibility to her and to all of us.

Respect our belief in peace.

Bernice Gehring

I have one from a gentleman in my riding which states:

Mr. Mulroney, I, Lou Schillaci, am a naturalized Canadian citizen. My former nationality is a United States citizen. I served in that country's armed forces from July of 1967 to October of 1971 when I received an honourable discharge from the U.S. Air Force. I moved to Canada in search of employment, having married a Canadian citizen in 1971. In August 1980, I chose to become a Canadian. I live here proudly and one of the reasons I have stated as a reason for my decision to adopt Canada as my country is that Canada is a peaceful nation. Their army is used for peacekeeping services, not war. The problems in the Persian Gulf should be negotiated, not solved by intimidation and threats of war and Canada must lead the way to peace. Your government's position in this situation is not reflective of my own and I beseech the Members of Parliament to withdraw Canada's support for the war in an offensive manner in the Persian Gulf.

I have a lot of these. I will not try to read them into the record. I will, as I promised these people and as I promised the students who wrote letters and came to my office, have them delivered to the Prime Minister because I believe those Canadians have a right to be heard.

The night action began in the Persian Gulf, I listened to the news late into the night. About the time I went to bed, I think they were estimating that about 150,000 people had died. Later we heard it was 350,000. Some people said that was right and some said it was wrong. It is not relevant; I could not imagine the horror and the carnage that would kill 150,000 or 350,000 people. I could not conceive how horrid that slaughter must have been. I do not for a moment defend Saddam Hussein but I do believe that if there were ever a dream and if there is a dream now, that one moment of peace for negotiation or for reconsideration or resolution of this problem is worth our egos, whether it be the President of the United States or the allied forces, who stop this from continuing.

I noticed another thing on television and I am quite concerned about it and it is not the kind of thing that grabs the headlines. I noted when I was watching the air raid on Israel last night, pictures of children putting on gas masks with gaping holes because they do not fit properly and mothers putting plastic bags over and around the gas masks and pictures of a child in a crib with ordinary plastic over the frame.

We have the technology and the money to spend a million dollars on a cruise missile. I am absolutely flabbergasted that we do not have gas masks to fit children. Maybe we have run out, I do not know. I am asking the question. Maybe the government will be able to tell us. I was just astonished by the tragedy of children having gas masks placed on them that do not fit, using plastic bags to hold it together and the trust on the faces of parents thinking that would protect them.

This war, I think, is the biggest heart-break for all of us. For every mother and father who has a child in the Middle East and for every mother and father living in the Middle East with children; for every one of us who believed and dreamed a year ago that we were, in fact, entering a new world order, that it was going to be a world in which we could talk to each other and resolve our differences, a world that could grow up and get away from the school yard style scrapping and the egotistical, "I am bigger than you" or "might is right" or all the things that were part of the old world order. For many, many of us that dream is shattered.

• (1400)

I will ask one more time, as I am sure my colleagues will before this debate is through, please, Government of Canada, ask the President of the United States to pause for peace, to give this war an opportunity to end before the horror continues.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully and thoughtfully to the words of the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam. I have two very specific questions to ask her, but I wanted to say a word or two before asking them.

I do not think any of us in this House could possibly fathom the horrors of war. We all share the feelings, fears and frustrations of the families and of the victims of the present hostilities in the Persian Gulf region.

While I was listening to the hon. member, I was going through my signature book and I, too, came across a letter from one of my constituents, a Mr. Raymond Dewar of Richmond, British Columbia.

I would just like to read the very short words of Mr. Dewar. He says:

> Today's Vancouver Sun reported the campaign being launched by a large number of groups under the general caption of "Peace Organizations".
> Similar "Peace Organizations" in Britain during the 1930s were able to intimidate the government of the day. The result was a failure to take action when action was possible. They helped to make Hitler's early conquests possible and made it certain that World War II would occur.
> Certainly the United States has made mistakes in previously supplying Iraq, and certainly there are economic considerations involved in preventing the control of oil. But it is also clear that unless Iraq is stopped there will eventually be a Middle East war, probably with Jordan joining Iraq and invading Saudi Arabia and the other small states. They would then turn to exterminating Israel, and Israel would use its atomic weapons and all other means. The time to take action is now.
> Please, stay firm in the resolve of the Government.

This leads me to my three simple questions. I hope the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam would take note of these, because they are quite fundamental, practical questions.

My first question is: Why were the people in Tel Aviv last night wearing gas masks? Which nation upon this earth has chosen to use poison gases and perhaps biological weapons in an attempt to exterminate another neighbouring country?

Second, while I appreciate this is a hypothetical question, I would ask the hon. member and all members opposite: Had Kuwait not happened, had the war not been started by Saddam Hussein last August 2, had the first hostilities been an attack by ballistic missiles on Tel Aviv last night, what would the position of the New Democratic Party be in such case?

Shall we sit back and wait for more missiles to fall? Would Canada stand idly by? Would we have a pause for peace today? That is a very good question that I think the New Democratic Party should answer.

Third, had the counteroffensive against Kuwait been launched unilaterally on August 3 or 4 by the United States, or had a counteroffensive been launched last night by Israel against Iraq today, what would be the plight of Israel?

If the counteroffensive had been launched by the United States without the support of the United Nations and this country, if the counteroffensive had been launched last night by Israel, how much greater would the possibilities have been of a huge conflagration in the Middle East, one which would be surely stopped because of the combined efforts for peace by the United Nations coalition of which Canada is proud to be a member?

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, first I have to say to the hon. minister that try as I might to write down those three questions so I could give him a response—and I am not going to invite him to repeat them again—he said three questions, the last question was about five questions in itself.

I would point out to the minister that I made a very serious speech. I asked some questions in my speech, questions about fact and they were answered by the minister by asking me rhetorical "what if" questions.

Mr. Siddon: This is the time for you to answer questions.

Ms. Langan: That is right. I am trying to answer but the hon. minister wants to argue with me, Mr. Speaker.

But I will stand here and I will address as best I can this long list of questions. The minister said, "Why were the people wearing gas masks last night?"

An hon. member: Right now.

Ms. Langan: That is fine. I am in the House. I am sorry, I am not watching a television monitor. I am in the House and I am dealing with my knowledge when I came in the House.

The question is, why were they wearing gas masks last night. My response to that rhetorical question is, we all know why they were wearing gas masks last night. That is a silly question. The question is: Why are there not gas masks to fit children? Why are we standing here asking questions about why are they wearing gas masks instead of saying, would it, could it be possible that there could be dialogue for peace?

Mr. Siddon: Six months.

Ms. Langan: The hon. minister said "six months". We had six months and nothing happened. We have struck a very, very horrific blow against the people of Iraq as well as Saddam Hussein. Nobody in this room is defending Saddam Hussein. We are saying, let us talk, let us think, let us see if we cannot at least among ourselves talk about a way to start toward peace.

The second question was also speculative: Had Kuwait not happened, what would the position in the New Democratic Party be? First of all, when we take positions we are dealing with positions based on what did happen, not "but if this did not happen our position would have been". Really, I think the minister is just a little bit confused in his questioning.

I appreciate that the minister sat in the House and listened to my speech. I would appreciate it very much if he would think about what was said in my speech. Rather than trying to trap and trip each other up, we should look at ways to resolve the crisis in the Middle East.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, first of all I think the last point the member made was exceptional. That is the point to be taken. We say we are going to be non-partisan but we still get into one-upmanship, or the feminine gender of that, and "we are more moral than you". It was very evident today in Question Period. Let us try to outdo one another and let us try to insult colleagues and try to make restitution or perhaps an apology later, but not likely.

In any event, I want to say that the member brought a human face, a very poignant message, so I do not think anybody should try to trip her up and say, "What about this, what about that" and what about a hypothetical question.

My question to the member is a serious one concerning the cost of war. We can look at it in two ways. First, the cost in human lives. She mentioned the numbers 150,000, 350,000, one million. Where will it end? We have no idea of the human cost as of yet. Second is the monetary cost. Some people say in the prelude to this war, in 1990, it has already cost $30 billion. The Globe and Mail cites today the Congress of the United States saying it may go to $86 billion, a $2 billion a day war. At what cost do we continue this war? Why did we start it and at what human cost, what monetary cost? Could we not spend money in a more beneficial way in this world in this present day?

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague's question almost begs the answer. Of course, the cost is incalculable, both in this war and in a continued way, both to the Middle East, to the world, to the environment, to the people, to our parents in Canada who have children in the war, and to children in Canada who are watching television and who are frightened. The cost is incalculable. We can go all over the world and we can find places where this war is taking its toll, whether it is monetary or emotionally.

Mr. Speaker, just one last word, because I was trying to answer the three specific questions of the minister earlier. I neglected to answer his comment about peace organizations in England intimidating the government from taking action in the Second World War. He referred to his constituent's opinion. I would like to remind Canadian women today that women in Canada are taking action for peace today and we should not be frightened.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I think, like most members this week, we have entered into this debate with a very heavy heart, and obviously, as far as I am concerned, with a very troubled mind. It is not easy. Frankly, I have gone through a mental miosis this week as to just where I was going to come down.

I have to say that on Tuesday when this debate started, and this may surprise some members, I thought the Prime Minister gave one of the best and strongest speeches that he has given since he has been leader of the Conservative Party and certainly since he became Prime Minister.

Certainly during Question Period that day the Secretary of State for External Affairs, much to my surprise, because I have often differed from him from time to time, I thought again showed a grasp of the situation, and in his contribution to the debate it helped, believe it or not, affect my thinking.

Earlier in November I voted against the government motion and supported the amendments against the government motion because I honestly believed then that there was more time for these sanctions. Having heard the Prime Minister and the debate here in the House from other conscientious colleagues, I started to shift. I still wondered, but the wonderment and confusion was gradually being erased from my mind.

I am not going to go over all the horrors and cost of the war. There is a cost of war in bodies. There is a cost of war in dollars. For most of us in this House, the only reason we know about war is watching television and the Vietnam war. We have read books and we know it is not good. That is what makes it so difficult. The public out there is for peace. We are all for peace, too, and against war, every member in this House.

Obviously, as we listen to different members, we have different ways to approach those two fundamental basic issues. But to try to cloud the word and try to trick other people and pretend to the public that there is not a member against war and not a member for peace, that does a disservice to the member who is trying that.

Having said all that, I think the Prime Minister was correct. His speech was powerful. I slowly shifted. I said in November that I did not want my two sons to go to fight in the shifting sands of the Persian Gulf, where the sands themselves are symbolic of the shifting alliances and the shifting allies that have been there for hundreds of years and/or even in recent years. But, I started to come to the conclusion that one must look at what happened in Manchuria, Ethiopia, and Spain was not mentioned earlier, Austria, Czechoslovakia, and finally the line was drawn at Poland. After all the periods when the so-called free world in the thirties did not move, in my own mind on Tuesday I thought that "Well, Patrick, you have to face up to this, you cannot hide behind a party label because you are an independent member now". Frankly, I thought at one time it was going to be easier if I could have hid behind a party label, but I knew I could not. I was slowly coming to the conclusion that, boy, the chips are getting pretty close. You have to support the reality that there have been mistakes. I am going to review some of the mistakes, but we do not have too much time in this debate. Quite frankly, I wasn't even going to speak.

My first point is that I have come to be embarrassed that this House is still debating this motion. What would I do if I were in the Persian Gulf serving with the forces that we have been so laudatory about. We are supporting them so well. We are all with them and the allies, and we are all against Saddam Hussein. If I were a little Canadian over there in the Sinai Desert, in Arabia, in Qatar or in any such interesting place, if I turned on the old CBC international before the government cuts it off—but that is a digression—and I heard that the Canadian Parliament was in the fourth day of debate to approve a resolution to support military action and the action of the United Nations in getting Saddam Hussein, if I heard that members were still debating this mission, I would say that is the whole reason the public thinks this Parliament of Canada is full of hypocrites and out of touch with reality; especially if I found out that the United States of America, from talking to the GI Joe over there, took up the debate in its Congress, with 435 congressmen and 100 senators, for two days. Fundamentally they are the ones who are the most involved in this matter with some 400,000 troops, let alone all the dollars involved.

They came to a decision in a very divided House because their country is divided. We know what the debate was. I was amazed that the Senate, run by the Democrats, did not vote against the President and/or the House of Representatives, almost two to one Democratic. It voted very solidly for the President.

There I am a Canadian with this GI Joe, and he is saying: "What is your country doing debating the resolution? You have 2,000 people around here and three ships out in the sea". Then I find out that Great Britain voted in one day. Of course it has different parliamentary procedures but it voted very fundamentally in one day. It had its debate—and we know there are different rules over there—but with a heavy, very definite socialist Labour opposition the vote was 534 to 57.

Then we come to President Mitterrand of France which has troops in the Middle East. They in their Parliament in a day voted 523 to 43 to support the United Nations. Then we have the socialist government in Australia and the Government of Netherlands which has a lot of socialist members. Again they supported—and I do not know the numbers— the United Nations. Yet we are still debating this resolution.

Let me deal with the last part of the Prime Minister's speech. Frankly, I give the member for Vancouver Quadra full credit, as I give full credit to my former colleague, the member for Fraser Valley, for speaking from the heart. Even though they took different positions, I empathize with the member from Fraser Valley because I said some of the same things in the debate in November. I know we had anguish in that debate in November because he wanted to speak, but there were different suggestions that perhaps he did not speak then, and he had the guts to speak on this debate.

We then had the former leader of the Liberal Party, the member for Vancouver Quadra, come into this House in a most dramatic way and make his presentation. After all the years I have been in this House it was one of the more dramatic moments I can remember, other than the Munsinger affair in the second year I was a member here in 1966. One of my colleagues was here. His name was Mr. Justice Cardin. He was standing over there and throwing out the name Monsignor affair, when he meant the bishop in Quebec. That got everyone involved in a two-day vote of privilege. That was one of the more dramatic moments that I can remember when the member for Vancouver Quadra made his presentation on such a large issue.

What are the guts of it when we shake it all down regardless of the mistakes that have happened before? George Bush and I have not agreed with all the moves of the government that have got us here. Let me turn to the speeches of the leaders on Tuesday. I listened to the leader of the Liberal Party. Frankly I respect him and like him as a person, but I got totally confused in terms of the policy of the Liberals on this motion, having known a little about Mr. Pearson and a little about the history of this country. It was listening to the leaders that day that started to switch me, but, if I had any doubt, it is when the bombs started to move and the fighter planes took off that night. That is the time when I think you have to put up or shut up.

With all the reservations, this is not the first time that there has been a multinational force in the Middle East. Good gracious, as far back as 1,000 years ago, under the cross of Jesus, the Crusades came into the Middle East and they did not solve much. In fact, one could perhaps argue that what happened then, in terms of trust and mistrust, has left behind some of the fundamental problems we find in the Middle East today.

If we have to worry about that, let us talk to that romantic character called Lawrence of Arabia and all the promises he gave to the Arabs in the First World War to try to inculcate and make sure that the Arabs fought against the Turks and, in so doing, against the Germans. Those promises were not kept and we know other things were done after the First World War, with the creation of the State of Israel.

All of these things are part of history and we are in a very real quicksand in this situation, with all of that history. That is why I have had the fundamental concern about going to a war in the Middle East and not exhausting all the problems of sanctions.

Then, we get into the presidential policies and/or the policies that have now been supported by all the members of the coalition, the deadline of the United Nations and no discussion until there is a full withdrawal. These are the sort of elements from the Second World War of unconditional surrender. And all historians say that it was the policy of the allies of unconditional surrender, which seemed so good at the time, that prolonged the Second World War for anywhere from two to three years, with all the consequent loss of lives and loss of dollars.

We were getting into that position. I could not understand, from reading the papers and listening, especially to CNN and other broadcasts, as we headed into the United Nations debate and on the days afterward, up until January 15, why the west, the allies, the coalition of which we were part, which is bigger by millions than the country of Kuwait which has a population of 17 million, had to worry about saving face. It is an irony that hit me. Good gracious we get into this situation of ultimatums, withdrawals, no negotiations, the charade that there is no linkage, and here we have the 17 million against all the other millions in the coalition and the irony that here that part of the world believes so much in face and we believe more in lives.

As this debate began at the first of this week, I was certainly ready to opt for the lives, forget about face, and make sure we had a conference. And whether there was a blink or a wink, to come up and say that, as I guess people tried to do in the last two or three days, after Tuesday when the bombs and planes started to fly. I could not believe it because what concerns me, regardless of the history that I have recounted and the shifting sands of the Middle East which are completely symbolic with the shifting allies you have in that country, is that with all the history I am not seduced at all. I am very concerned about the slogans about the surgical strike.

Mr. Speaker, you and I may be mild historians, but in the Civil War the slogan was "One week to Richmond". In the First World War it was "Three weeks to a victory parade in Paris" and in the Second World War it was "A Month in Normandy and Berlin by Christmas". All these things we do not even have to think about, but we should and I hope leaders thought about the situation when the United Nations last acted to get itself involved in military action, i.e. Korea. Korea moved like a piece of cake until we got to the Yalu River and started to make a fundamental miscalculation, which involved the whole Republic of China and all the consequent loss of life there that was needless and unnecessary and perhaps would not have happened, if there had not been some miscalculations. Perhaps, for different reasons, Israel, that we all looked at last night with such anguish, may be the Yalu River. Who knows? For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am most concerned indeed. I believe we have the power and the American technology for this war. There is no doubt about it.

In watching CNN this morning, the laser bombs going down air vents, tremendous, but horrible. Yet, all that technology could not even keep out radar bugs and a fellow called Noriega when the Americans visited little Panama. I hear Noriega is going to be in the Supreme Court for the next two or three years, hopefully long before this crisis is over.

We have all these things. Sometimes technology does not do it, and I am concerned. I do not believe this war is going to be over in two or three weeks. I think it is going to be much longer.

I do believe, as a lot of the experts I have listened to have said, power versus patience. What concerned me from the start in this thing—and it has not been touched much—is that it has not really been examined again in the United States, and perhaps it would be unpatriotic to do it.

The biggest problem I have with this is the American ambassador to Iraq, eight days before the invasion when she, April Glaspie, had an audience with President Saddam Hussein. Among other things, he said: "You people are weak. You cannot sustain 10,000 bodies in a battle". That shows you where patience is going to be against power and that is what we have in this crisis.

But the worst thing that was said is that when he, the president asked her: "What is the position of the United States with Kuwait?" She replied—and she was echoing American middle eastern policy that was examined by the subcommittee on middle eastern affairs, chaired by Lee Hamilton three weeks earlier—"that is a long-standing boundary problem between your country and Kuwait. It is an Arab conflict, and you do not have to worry about the United States on that".

That was the worst signal to send because it was eight days later on August 2, that the invasion occurred. After all of that we now are where we are today. I do agree that we should have called Parliament earlier and had a debate in a more general atmosphere when we were not in battle. There is no doubt about that. When President Bush escalated the whole equation the day after his American election by 150,000 troops, not being a great military genius, but starting to realize that this was going to be more than just a smouldering problem, I knew in my mind that we were on a one-way street. But I still thought the leaders of the alliance, for example the President and/or Saddam Hussein with others trying to influence him, would not get everyone boxed into a position so those planes had to fly.

Having said all that, what I could not understand about the Liberal position without getting too political was that in effect once hostilities were brought out, they were going to bring the people home. If it was a UN flag, it was fine; but if it was not an UN flag it was not very good.

I can tell you that long before the member for Vancouver Quadra spoke, but after I heard the Leader of the Opposition speak Tuesday, I thought of Mr. Pearson. I honestly thought Mr. Pearson, who had such a contribution to make for peacekeeping and his interest in the United Nations, would be rolling over in his grave.

I know my time is moving very quickly, Mr. Speaker, but I just could not believe this: they were there to do a good job, but if hostilities break out we have to run for home.

Without going into a lot more history, some members may remember, although I will bet you that the majority does not remember, that in the Second World War when I was a little cadet I went to camp. On the first weekend pass, I ran home and told my father that I had met some of the finest men in the world. They were soldiers up in camp. It was pretty full; it was wartime. My father asked me who they were. I am not going to say the regiment, but I did give him the name of the regiment. I was a kid then, 16 years old. I should not have been in cadets because I was two years too young, but I was six inches too high and got in. My father said: "Oh, son, they are very good people, but these are zombies". I said: "What do you mean, zombies?"

• (1430)

"Oh, those zombies. They are fighting for Canada. They enlist, but they are not to be sent overseas." That was the condition without getting into all the internal and domestic politics then.

That was the Second World War. I did not believe, until I heard the leader of the Opposition yesterday or the day he spoke, that in effect his position on the troops retreating if hostilities broke out, the Canadian forces were going to be international zombies and the laughing stock of the world.

Mr. Speaker, you are telling me that my time is almost up. I have not really got started, but I know time is precious here.

I just want to say that when the chips are down, the planes start to fly and the fighting breaks out—coming back to where I started—I cannot believe that, if I were a soldier over there hearing that we were still debating this, I would think that debate was in my interest.

Saddam Hussein may be listening to a little of this. He has heard some funny things in this Chamber, but it certainly has not upset him.

In conclusion, I want to say that I agree—because of those two speeches—with the member from Fraser Valley and, obviously, the member for Vancouver Quadra. I repeat what the NDP tried to get here. I think it would be interesting. I think we should, as a public duty, have Opposition members and other members take out their spleen on the government, because it is not in good repute.

I really think if the Gallup polls were not reflecting some of the things that they do reflect—that is reality—that this debate may not have continued as long.

Let's have the vote. Let's have it a free vote and just see where everyone stands on this.

I think I am going to conclude with what really shifted my thinking before the bombs and planes started to move because, then, I certainly did believe that we have to stand united. Otherwise, at the least, we are really going to be misunderstood.

I want to quote a sentence from the historic debate in the United States last week by Senator Danforth and by those who have watched the debate. Evidently, Senator Nunn and Senator Danforth gave the real classic contributions on both sides of the issue, and they were very close.

I came down, and I wish members would come down on this as I read it. It pertains to the United States. It is a very short quote, and this is what switched my mind before I heard the Prime Minister and the bombs:

> The key to peace is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time is over. It is question and comment period.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Annapolis Valley whether he could give us some quotes that might have taken place in the debate in the U.S. Congress that he feels might further elaborate upon the position that he was getting to.

I am wondering whether the hon. member would have any notes.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, naturally, I am very appreciative of the perception of the hon. member for throwing that question to me.

I would just like to read the quote of Senator Danforth. I think it is fundamental:

> The key to peace is maintaining a credible military threat, and this is precisely the point our pending votes will address. I cannot vote to deprive the president of the credible threat of force. It is indeed a supreme irony that it is only through the threat of force that a stable world can be maintained. But that is an irony that we have recognized ever since World War II.

In conclusion, to supplement that quote—I do have a minute or so on the answer—this is what has happened this whole year with the walls coming down and eastern Europe opening up. It was because there was a credible military force- NATO and the allies-that these things happened.

Some of the same people who are wanting to take a pause now and who always want to talk about peace, and not of military deterrent, were taking that same position in some of those times.

What really boggles my mind is that I understand the importance of the UN flag, but this position of some people and perhaps the Liberal position at the moment—I do not know what its position is—is to take the exception and say: "Oh well, if the coalition under the UN resolution was under the blue UN flag, that would make it all right."

Since the UN flag is not there, they can stand back and talk about more time for sanctions. This, to me, is not very logical. The last time the UN flag was used, it was a blue flag. There was an American commander, General McArthur.

I bet you some people in the House, if we debated that, would perhaps have been against the punitive UN commander whom we knew was going to be the commander: General McArthur.

Here, we have many UN resolutions. The allies under that UN resolution had many problems in coming to that, with all the dangers in that area. I do not believe that this war is going to solve the problems. I think we are going to be left with all those historic problems unless we do have that conference and we do admit the linkage.

But to try to hide behind a vote, to delay a vote, and to hide behind the argument, "Oh well, more sanctions", when bombs are flying, and not to come up with a vote to support our troops there now, and by this interesting specious argument of UN resolution, yes, but no UN flag, no, when in effect we now have an American commander in the Middle East without the blue flag but UN resolution, I just cannot understand it.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I will give a chance to others in a minute. I would just like to say I listened with great attention to the good speech made by my hon. friend. Historically it is never bad to say that I had the honour of knowing and sitting with his hon. father in this House so many years ago. I can recognize a great talent when I see one. The member has delivered quite an effective speech I must say. I would just like to be on record to say that I am delighted to see that some members, I may vote differently I do not know yet, agree that linkage and an international conference are the types of things that we should have looked into a hell of a long time before we reached the very sad time we are going through.

I will read again his speech. He went from I would say almost around the clock in his emotion on that debate from one position to another. To me, this is what Parliament is all about. This is what independency should be all about, regardless of how we will vote on this issue. I appreciate very much what I just heard.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate those words coming from the dean of the House who also served here when my father was here. I know we do differ from time to time on specific votes, but we do not differ in the respect that we both have for this institution and for the respect that you can have for members even though you can violently disagree with their positions.

If I may, I forgot to get this on the record, Mr. Speaker, because, again, I have gone on a roller coaster this week, as a lot of other members have. If it were not President Bush, it was President F.D.R. where polls are so fundamental, television is so real and there, that it makes it even more difficult perhaps for trying to pull together a coalition and all the things that are necessary when you get involved. I know we have to admit that those are things in the past now. We are in this battle.

I am all for the new order but unfortunately we have new orders but we have old dictators. That is perhaps part of the historic problem.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to congratulate the member from Annapolis on his speech, not because we are seat mates but because, as the member from Montreal indicated, it was an excellent speech.

The resolution we are debating is:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

I agree fully with the member that it would be almost preposterous for us to have a vote on this. Which member in this House could find himself or herself voting against a resolution like that. I may be wrong but I think a lot of members who were for sanctions before would find now, since we are in the thick of the fray, that to vote against it now would seem to be a knife between the ribs for the men and women who are serving on behalf of Canada in that part of the world.

I wonder though, and this is the question to the member, whether there may be an unintended benefit to this debate, which is that it gives the chance for members to make points as time goes by. Had we adjourned yesterday, and we did not, thanks I believe to the member for Calgary Northeast, the House would have been out of session. I think it is important that the House stay in session, even if members get up every day and give speeches on some aspect of the war or on latest developments. I wonder if the member might not agree that is the reason why this debate might reasonably continue practically indefinitely so that members from all corners of the House may speak. It seems nonsensical now to have a vote on it.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my hon. seat mate here. I know he shares many of the thoughts all members have this week.

I agree. I think if the House were to adjourn, the public would say the members are out for another holiday, even though we have come back before February 18. There is a real problem here. At the moment there is no business on the Order Paper. Realistically, I do not know what this House of Commons is going to be doing legislatively. But, yes, it does afford an opportunity for Questions Periods. The big point is this debate. I do not know if I agree with my hon. friend that all members will be voting for this resolution. I think the resolution should be put and the debate should be over with so that the Canadian in the Middle East is not embarrassed by other nationals asking what their Parliament is doing. "Is it still debating? You have a great bunch of wierdos. They cannot get together. They all preach United Nations support. They all say they are against Saddam Hussein. They all say they are for peace and against war. What the hell are they talking about?" Get the debate over, have the votes and then I do agree that between House Leaders there has to be an opportunity for the public to be involved.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I too think that this House should vote on this motion. We are three days into this war and I think that once all hon. members have had an opportunity to express their opinion that the question should come to a vote.

As the previous speaker mentioned, I think our Canadian soldiers and I am sure the international community will be looking for a signal as to just where the Canadian Parliament stands on this important issue.

There are some important principles involved in this debate and this whole question. They began with the invasion of Kuwait in August last year. That was an unprovoked attack. All members of this House, I am sure, agreed with the Canadian government when it condemned that invasion. At the same time, I am sure many members of this House did not believe that the condemnation by Canada or, indeed, other peace loving countries would be enough to reverse the flow of events in the Middle East. Condemnation alone was not going to work.

I believe it was very proper, therefore, that Canada in conjunction with many other countries of the United Nations invoked sanctions. Sanctions can do a number of things. I can tell you that at the time Canada invoked those sanctions, I had some doubts as to whether they were going to drive Iraq out of Kuwait, but I did believe it would put pressure on Iraq and hopefully that pressure, along with pressure from other countries in the world would convince them to pull out of Kuwait. At the time I did not think this would reverse the course of events. I am not making a categorical statement that sanctions can never work or should never be tried again. Of course they should be. Just as a condemnation by Canada the day after the invasion of Kuwait should be tried, so should sanctions.

The only question now is whether we should move beyond sanctions and support our soldiers and, indeed, all those fighting pursuant to the United Nations resolution. Should we give them our support now in forcibly expelling Iraq out of Kuwait? Obviously, we have different opinions and they have been heard in this House. There have been a number of reasons put forward, usually several in one argument as to why we should forcibly try to expel Iraq from Kuwait.

In a number of those arguments, I have seen individuals make the point again and again about the boundaries of Kuwait. I quote from one newspaper article which said that "the boundaries of Kuwait were arbitrarily set by a colonial power," as if that somehow lessens the legitimacy of a particular country.

I would be very hard pressed to come up with more than a handful of countries whose boundaries were not either set, influenced, or in some way shaped by colonial powers. Indeed, Canada's boundaries were shaped and set by a colonial power. That gives no other country in this world justification to invade Canada. That does not call into question the legitimacy of this country, nor should it for the State of Kuwait.

As well, I have had a number of people say to me that this is all about oil. I have had letters on that. Indeed, I was approached in church one day by someone who said that this was just about oil.

From my point of view, I do not support the United Nations resolution, nor have I supported the actions of this country involved with this because of oil, nor should anyone ever commit Canada or ever suggest that is the reason why Canada would go to war, because of oil.

While the lack of oil causes some discomfort for Canadians in terms of higher prices and I know that it has a very bad effect on the Third World in increasing prices, that should never be the justification for war.

There are those who continuously hammer and make the point about United States' leadership and the position of President Bush and the American Congress and that somehow this calls into question the legitimacy of trying to force Iraq out of Kuwait. I disagree with those individuals completely. Their dislike of either the American administration or the United States should not in any way cloud their opinion as to what is right and what is wrong. That has nothing to do with it.

I appreciate the fact that the United States is supportive of this. I appreciate the fact that the United Kingdom, France, Italy, and others are supportive of this. But, regardless, this does not change the principle as to whether or not Iraq should be in Kuwait.

Hon. members have made the point again that, if Canada is so worried about Kuwait, how about other examples? To that extent, I guess I agree with them. I believe the world did fail Ethiopia in 1936. We failed Ethiopia and we failed Czechoslovakia a couple of years later. I agree with those individuals who recognize and understand the fact that the cold war for almost all of my lifetime paralyzed the world and the United Nations into doing what is right. I would only suggest to them that, yes, we have made mistakes in the past. It does not mean that we have to make mistakes in the future.

One of the critical things as to whether or not we should go beyond words and sanctions was contained in a report that was released by Amnesty International a few days before Christmas. I believe that the Secretary of State for External Affairs tabled that report in the House of Commons within the last couple of days. I will refer to a news release which I would be happy to table because I intend to refer to it. It contains comments by Amnesty International, which I believe has no particular axe to grind other than to get at the truth, and it helped to convince me that we are dealing with a country that will not listen to sanctions, words, or condemnation by the United Nations or any of its members.

This is the news release that was released one week before Christmas, December 18, 1990. According to the investigations of Amnesty International, they detail how "Iraqi forces have tortured and killed many hundreds of victims, taken several thousand prisoners and left more than 300 premature babies to die after looting incubators from at least three of Kuwait City's hospitals. The report catalogues 38 methods of torture used by the Iraqi military, including cutting off people's tongues and ears, shooting them in the limbs, applying electric shocks to their bodies and raping them." It goes on to state: "Time and again we were told that the most common way soldiers killed people was to take the victim to his family's door-step, have his relatives identify him and then shoot him in the back of the head."

What is interesting about this is the Iraqi government never denied it. I was waiting for some sort of indication that this was not true or that they disputed this. I never saw that.

Any country that is prepared to invade another and start looting incubators and indiscriminately killing people is one that should be met with the force of Canada and every other peace-loving country in the world.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I agree with others who have spoken in the House that war is ugly, hideous, and horrible. Many people lose their lives.

At this point, the war in the Persian Gulf is but a few days old and the full extent of the damage is not known. I am not speaking of physical damage. We know that there will be considerable physical damage done to Iraq, now Israel, and perhaps other countries in the Middle East.

Does the hon. member recognize that there are hundreds of thousands of people who could lose their lives? I am talking about innocent Iraqi civilians, Israeli civilians, and civilians in other countries in the Persian Gulf who may lose their lives. Indeed, we know now that a significant number have lost their lives because of an international principle; that principle being that an aggressor should not be rewarded.

Has the member approached this very serious matter from a human perspective to understand what it may have felt like for innocent Iraqi civilians living in Baghdad, just as the innocent Israeli civilians living in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, when the bombardment started and as the bombardment continues? Does the hon. member feel that these hundreds of thousands of people who will lose their lives—and we do not know the full extent of the human damage that will be done until the war is over— really care about international principles?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the hon. member. He began by asking if I realized that, in pursuance of this international principle of the United Nations, that one country cannot arbitrarily invade another, and do I understand that people will be killed.

If we take that comment of his to its logical conclusion, then we are hamstrung, because we could never act. We could not have acted in 1939 because the same question could be posed. He could have said to me: "Mr. Nicholson, don't you know that if you try and stop Adolf Hitler now that individuals would be killed?"

I guess I would say to the people of Iraq that they should have been putting pressure on their government for these last six months to change course.

The hon. member is asking me from a human perspective. I guess I put myself in the position of those parents whose children have been violated in Kuwait, through no fault of the Kuwaitis. Kuwaitis were not at war. They did not provoke the war. They had done nothing to have this inflicted upon them. I guess I look at it from their point of view, the indiscriminate killing that has been taking place in Kuwait, and I say that should be condemned. It should be stopped. The international community should come together as one to drive those invaders out of that country.

That is the human perspective that I bring to this and I would ask the hon. member about the position of his party, that we should get out of there now. This is a bad one, a very bad one, and I hope that he would rethink that and say: "Look, we are here. We could get this job done. Let's get it done as expeditiously ask possible." That is possible. If this coalition sticks together, we can get this job done and I think that Israelis, Kuwaitis, and I am sure people of that part of the world will say: "This world is a better place to live in if Saddam Hussein is not a threat to this region."

Mr. Soetens: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask a question about the orders of the House.

The member who just asked a question earlier today used some very unparliamentary language and processes in the House. Madam Deputy Speaker was in the Chair and she indicated he would not be recognized until such time as he had done the parliamentary thing.

My question to you is: Does the position of the Speaker apply, or is it the position of the individual Speaker in the chair who is going to decide whether the member is going to issue an apology to the House for the manner and methods in which he spoke to the Chair?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have to admit that I am not aware of any such ruling on the part of the Deputy Speaker. I will inquire.

The member for York South—Weston was the only member who stood up for questions and comments and, since I was not aware of the incident just pointed out to me, I had to apply the rules and recognize the member.

That being said, I appreciate the comment and will inquire as to what should be done. If need be, I will follow up on this. I know the member in question met with the Deputy Speaker.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Hamilton East.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, like many other members of the House and like many other Canadians, I have watched the events of the last 72 hours with the range of emotions, with the heart-pounding, with the adrenalin coursing, and with the sense of fear and foreboding about what this war might have in store for us as Canadians, and also what it might have in store for the world.

I had a prepared speech, Mr. Speaker, and I had a clear position prepared in advance of the decision of the United States to attack Iraq. The events of the last 72 hours have rendered that speech and, in fact, this resolution redundant. They have rendered it redundant because, like it or not—

[Translation]

Canada is at war.

• (1500)

While I am sure during this extremely emotional and difficult period for all of us it would be pretty easy for some of the government members to poke holes in the positions that have been taken by opposition members over the last number of days, I, speaking as an opposition member, personally. Have gone through the range of emotions and I have to tell you that whatever the outcome of this war, and I fear the outcome will be felt for many years to come, it was the wrong time. It was the wrong time because, in the emerging of a new world order, we did not give the opportunity for economic strangulation and for economic sanctions to work. Yes, it was the wrong war. And yes, last weekend I marched in my own community, side by side with members of the human race, representing Canada, Israel, Iraq and Kuwait, none of whom wanted this war.

The member for Niagara Falls spoke earlier about the atrocity of taking a baby from an incubator. Who, in his right mind, could ever condone such atrocity? But the atrocities that we are potentially about to witness will be wrought upon innocent victims. I do not speak only of women and children; there are innocent men, women and children on all sides of this conflict who will die as a result of the decisions of men to take us to war. I marched on the weekend with an Iraqi constituent in my riding who said to me that Saddam Hussein is crazy. That is why this person left that country. He could not have the input into direct foreign policy that he would like to have in a democratic country. But he has brothers there who have children and he has cousins, all of whom are under potential threat of imminent and innocent, individual death. In a war, there are no winners and no losers.

I think about the First World War when my grandfather watched his own father die on the field of battle not knowing it was his father and what that did to him. He was given six hours to live, his body was riddled with shrapnel; that was in the First World War. There is no war in which you have long-term winners and losers and one of the emerging truths of the 1990s was that we were supposed to be entering a new world order, where civilized countries would find civilized ways to deal with human nature. We are seeing that civilization break down, not only in Kuwait but also in Lithuania, Latvia, in the Baltic States, and in many other parts of the world, where the international recourse has not been, at this stage, to war.

All those arguments can be made and they can be made in a very direct way. But the fact of the matter is that the Canadian government has committed Canadian men and women to the battlefield. My sister-in-law may be called up. As a former air force doctor, who retired from active duty last year, she is still on the list of recall and may be called over. I know how frightened she is and how she dares not pick up the phone when it rings, in case she is called up. I know as we speak how powerless we are in this House to affect the nature of this war. There are thousands of Canadian families who are looking to us, as members of Parliament, for support for their loved ones.

How abhorrent war is, how much I have opposed this government's and, indeed, the American government's early use of force when, in fact, the avenue of sanctions had not been exhausted. I cannot in good conscience turn my back on the Canadian men and women who have been sent over there to represent our country in a conflict that could have unlimited and continuing implications.

While government members may probably experience the same doubts, fears and forebodings that we feel on this issue, it seems to me that this particular resolution at this stage is redundant. Indeed, under the circumstances, perhaps the wisest course of action would be a withdrawal of this resolution I agree that we cannot send a message to our women and men in the Armed Forces that in any way equivocates our support for their actions.

Whatever we as individual members and indeed as parliamentarians thought about the reasons—some legitimate, some illegitimate—that conceived this call to war at this stage we must send a message of full and unequivocal support to those women and men whose lives are at risk; to those families; children the age of my daughter, watching their mothers and fathers go off to war; and also to those children on all sides of the conflict who will undoubtedly lose their lives as a result of this war.

I cannot give any lecture on the military nature of what our actions should be from this point forward. I am no military expert. Perhaps one of the greatest feelings that we have felt in this Parliament is a sense of powerlessness. International events are unfolding so quickly that we in this chamber or in the other place really have virtually no influence on the agenda that may unfold.

We huddled around our television sets last night as the retaliatory bombs came forward and we saw the fear ingrained in the eyes of that CNN reporter in Saudi Arabia who feared the possibility of a nerve gas attack. We saw the fear gripping a nation, the nation of Israel which has used, I believe, calm reasoning in deciding not to retaliate. I am not sure that under the circumstances I would have been as calm and as reasoned.

But there are ways that we in our own way can influence this agenda. I think it is important in the context of the House of Commons that we continue to press the government with its allies to try and find a peaceful solution. We must press on the issue—as I did this morning—that not only are there Israeli children who could very likely be killed in this conflict, but there are Palestinian children in the West Bank, in the Gaza. There are Iranian children; Iraqi children and Kuwaiti children. Perhaps in an as non-partisan way as we are able, we can continue to keep the government agenda and an agenda for strength through peace.

In the longer term, Mr. Speaker, our objectives have to be to re-examine the notion of civilization in the context of the new world order because as the bombs drop—and so they will on Iraq—we are seeing not only destruction of Iraqi installations, but also the destruction of one of the world's most ancient civilizations.

• (1510)

The very notion of statehood when in the Middle Ages the people agreed to the state of serfdom, they did so because their lords were to provide protection. The very notion of civilization and statehood has been developed so that we could, in fact, protect ourselves.

[Translation]

But in the national context, Mr. Speaker, we were able to do that, if we look at Europe, for instance. Until 1945, Europe had always been at war, 2000 years of war. But after 1945, after experiencing the horrors of war, as they were experienced in Japan, from that moment onwarde they realized that a civilization's real progress is not predicated on war but on peace. And that may be why, Mr. Speaker, we are seeing a new order in Germany, because they realize the Berlin wall was useless.

[English]

I think it is about time that, in the over-all context we examine what we mean by "new world order". Why is it that in national and individual contexts we have been able to develop for ourselves, by which people can solve problems in a legitimate, non-aggressive way, that very formula that has escaped us once again in the international arena?

The First World War was supposed to be the war to end all wars. Yet, within a very few short decades we moved into another war.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, who would have thought that we, in Canada's 34th Parliament, would be here to vote on war? I could never have imagined that. Who would have thought that my three year old daughter, when I was feeling really down and disappointed yesterday, would say: Mom, is the war making you so sad? She is not yet four, Mr. Speaker. But what can we give our children?

[English]

In the long term, we have to look for new solutions of diplomacy and economic sanctions that justly recognize that the problem of the Middle East is not going to be solved merely by eliminating Saddam Hussein.

There will be other Saddam Husseins. With the coalition as fragile as it is, if it splits apart, the potential for international disorder is even greater as a result of actions that have been taken in the context of the United Nations.

How do we look to this new world order?

I would like to speak for a moment to what I perceive to be, not only in this House but across the country, the so-called gender gap of war. It has never been my intention as a person in politics who happens to be a woman to suggest that, as women or men, we have the divine right to see the world differently.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if you discussed with the women members on all sides of this House you would find, as you would if you spoke with women across this country, that there is a radically different way with which we approach this issue of war.

I do not think a woman leader would claim that we were going to go in and "kick ass". I think that is the kind of terminology that belies a misunderstanding of the need to exercise all avenues of diplomacy before moving to war. In that context, I truly believe that women and men who are out there on the battlefield and also those here in Canada must begin to share more our collective wisdom and feelings.

I think you will see, Mr. Speaker, over the course of this debate that women in this House have risen perhaps more emotionally than many of the men.

Yesterday we heard the hon. member for Mount Royal and the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands speaking with eloquence and from the heart, but in a way that brought a particularly individual perspective to the issue. I happen to believe that for all the emotions we share, for all the feelings we have and for all the reasons that we have to be together on this one, it is so critical that in the arena of war we take a step back and reflect upon the real meaning of war. Some will criticize me for this, but I would like to think that perhaps the nurturing and creation of life which is unique to womanhood has given us a perspective which makes us much less likely to send our sons and daughters to war.

[Translation]

I say that, Mr. Speaker, not because I think the feminine perspective is better than the male perspective. I say that because of the way women have been socialized, with their ability to create life, they are far less inclined to take a life.

I think that in the new world order, whatever the outcome of this war—and it is expected to be short with as little loss of life as possible—we must learn from this perspective. We must learn from this ability to create life that a new order, a new civilization cannot call itself civilized if killings and wars are the way we solve our problems.

Mr. Speaker, that is the duty of this Parliament, because obviously—a few members in this House are not going to affect the course of events taking place in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf.

Mr. Speaker, if we as parliamentarians, if Canada and the rest of the world want to recreate some of the hope we had at the end of the Cold War in 1990, we should have chosen new instruments to improve our ability to settle our international problems, whatever they may be.

Mr. Speaker, that is why, although I hate war, as I hate the fact that innocent people will be killed on all sides, I believe that despite the fact that I deplore this government's decision to involve us in this war, we are in it, nevertheless.

We must be prepared to give our full support to our men and women who are over there, and who are working for us all.

But at the same time, Mr. Speaker, in this House we must focus on the most important question of all which is the creation of a new order that shares the responsibilities, aspirations and hopes of all citizens of this world.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have probably heard more speeches from that hon. member than any other member in this House. I say that because of course I think most members will know that I have known the hon. member probably longer than any other of our colleagues here. I have to tell her that whether she realizes it or not, she has probably given the best speech she ever has given. I think that the tone of the House listening to her is a testimony to that. The House, as all members will know, but Hansard does not record, was dead silent listening to the member's remarks, and with good reason.

• (1520)

I want to tell her as well that when she spoke of the powerlessness that we feel as members, that if her discourse today is rewarded, as it should, that it should have an influence on members of this House in terms of what their position is on this issue. I say that from the bottom of my heart.

I want to raise with her this whole business of the powerlessness that we feel as legislators on this issue. It is one that I share, and I raised it in my speech yesterday. We are debating a motion which basically asks us if we are in favour of United Nations' motions which have already been placed into effect and have already been caused to happen; in other words, the motion is redundant. Even if it were not redundant, the motion was structured in such a way and presented at such a time that if you voted for it, you were voting in fact for war and if you voted against it, you were voting against the UN.

I find it deplorable that this issue, as gut-wrenching as it is, was presented to this Parliament in that way. Instead, we should have been presented a motion that asked us point blank, before the hostilities began: Do we or do we not, as a country, want to participate in those hostilities when they do begin and if they do begin? I would have still voted no to the proposition. But I think I had a right to hear the proper question, as opposed to the one that we did hear.

Second, now that the hostilities have begun, I do believe that what we should be asking, notwithstanding the fact that I disagree with what has been done, is whether or not we support our forces which have already gone over there, not whether or not we should be voting on a motion which is redundant and which was wrong even before it was redundant.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I will take the member's compliments as intended. It is true that the member and I have spent a lot of years together and we have fought a lot of wars, but none of them have been of the nature of this war. They have all been political wars.

I would have to say that notwithstanding the member's comments and notwithstanding the nature of the resolution when it was first presented, I think the responsibility is upon all of us right now to put our political battles behind us, to cease and desist from the natural temptation to score political points on this particular issue. I think in that light it is important that this resolution be withdrawn because I think it is a redundant resolution which, whatever the vote, is going to send potentially the wrong signal to our armed forces.

In the light of the delicate nature of the situation right now, I think we would be far better off to speak to a resolution upon which we could all unanimously agree to give our full 100 per cent support to those Canadian women and men who have been asked by their country to serve in our interest in the Persian Gulf. That is why I hope that this resolution will be withdrawn and we will be able to bring forward a resolution that will meet the test of unanimity of this House which is obviously going to be very crucial for the morale of those soldiers who are over there fighting on their behalf.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I thank and commend our colleague from Hamilton East. I would like to make a comment and ask her a question, if I may.

The member for Hamilton East said that, in war, there are no winners and no losers. I suggest, referring back to what is being taught in our administration schools, you are either in a win-win situation or in a win-loose situation, and in the latter case, there are always loosers. Unless both sides win, they both end up loosing. I thought I had heard the hon. member for Hamilton East say that there were no winners and no loosers. She may wish to take this opportunity to make a correction.

My second comment, which is also a question, deals more directly with her position on the issue. We know where she stands as a woman. It is indeed pretty unusual—and she mentioned the risk of giving rise to criticism—to talk about the value, and more particularly about the fundamental difference between male and female. So that everything is clear, I wish she would use the time she has left to reaffirm the fact that recognizing individual differences does much more for personal growth as well as that of nations than playing on similarities and that relying too heavily on the concept of similarity involves a notion of levelling the base. So, by recognizing individual differences, we do not necessarily address what must be something else than levelling the base.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hamilton East has one minute and a half to answer.

Ms. Copps: Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was quite right when he said that there is an exception to every rule. For instance, when comparing men's and women's different attitudes, a colleague mentioned Mrs. Thatcher. It is clear that to a certain extent, Mrs. Thatcher was not typical of the sensitive individuals I was referring to earlier. Having said that, I suggest it is important to recognize our differences. I have always insisted on the differences between Francophones and Anglophones, men and women.

As far as winners and losers are concerned, it is true that we may win in the short-term if Saddam Hussein, confronted with the forces of the United States and their allies should withdraw. It would be a short-term victory. But what about the long term? I mentioned my grandfather because I saw how his life changed following World War I. We had come out the winners, but my grandfather remained a loser. He could never find a job because he was unable to work, as a result of the injuries he had received in the service of his country. Mr. Speaker, there were also losers on both sides following the Vietnam War: traumatized Vietnam veterans, broken families, dead children. In such a context, in the long run, there are neither losers nor winners in a war, just a forum from which to start a new war. That is what I am concerned about: If we succeed in destabilizing the Middle East, there might be winners in the short run, but in the long run, what will happen to that international forum which was already shaky before Saddam Hussein started this war?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Outremont has the floor for the next ten minutes.

Mr. J.-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to use some of my time to reflect on the comments made by the hon. member for Hamilton East. Of course, there is never a winner and a loser in a win-win situation where the adversaries must either both win or both loose.

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker, I did not think I would have to take the floor. My position was known. I had other means to keep in touch with the people of Outremont.

Recent events force me to speak. I want to address my remarks to the Jewish community of Outremont, Quebec and Canada to offer them my sympathy and my prayers.

Hon. members know that the riding I have the honour to represent is home to people from various ancestries and that multiculturalism is thriving in that small microcosm. But as I said, I think it is important and necessary for me to rise and offer these people my sympathy and my prayers. Very humbly as well, Mr. Speaker, I would extend my sympathy to the people of Israel.

If I may I should like to comment on the dynamism of the situation we are experiencing. From the onset I felt—and I still feel—that there was no hesitation and that the position had to be clear. The Prime Minister made this statement in the House on January 16, and I quote:

> The Time has regrettably come therefore to act in the interests of preserving world order and in safeguarding the effectiveness of the United Nations. A failure by the world community to act would have undermined the United Nations, turned a blind eye to naked aggression, condoned violations of international law and encouraged other potential aggressors to defy world opinion in the pursuit of their own criminal ambitions.

Allow me to quote him:

[English]

> "The time has regrettably come therefore to act in the interests of preserving world order and in safeguarding the effectiveness of the United Nations. A failure by the world community to act would have undermined the United Nations, turned a blind eye to naked aggression, condoned violations of international law and encourage, other potential aggressors to defy world opinion in the pursuit of their own primitive ambitions. If Canada had stood aside, we would have betrayed our own national interests, repudiated our own responsibilities and dishonoured our own traditions."

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this is why I thought there would be no need for me to rise and that my position was known as a stong supporter of the motion now before the House.

[English]

Entering a war is never easy, at least not for Canadians. We are by nature a passive people and we have a long history of promoting the peaceful settlement of disputes, both at home and abroad. Why do we value stability? Why are we recognized internationally as people who cherish peace? It is partly due, in good part, to our multicultural landscape. Canada was founded by immigrants and new immigrants continued to inject new ideas and new vitality into our society. But we learned long ago that we had to be sensitive to each other's needs in order that Canadians of different origins could live peacefully and side by side. We had to be willing to listen and talk, negotiate and compromise, and as a result we have become "experts" in resolving conflicts with a minimum of violence.

We have another principle which has allowed us to be seen as a peace-loving nation. It is our unfailing support for the United Nations, an organization that stands for peace. Canadians have to create a United Nations as we know and we have continued to support it financially, materially and militarily at a level which far exceeds our relative strength in the world.

Although the United Nations is a peace organization, it recognizes that sometimes force must be used against the most blatant acts of aggression. This is perhaps not easy for many of us to accept since the cold war prevented the UN from exercising its peace and security function for so long. But the principle of collective security against aggression is at the core of the United Nations charter. To deny this fact is to reject the very raison d'être of the UN and to accept the law of the jungle in international affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, life is not what it used to be. Everybody says so, or at least that is what we hear practically everywhere we go.

Older members of society like to talk about the good old days, when everything was so much better. According to them, there were no wars, no murders, no thieves. Not exactly, but there was a lot less.

In any case, the facts say otherwise. It seems this is not true at all. There have always been wars, there have always been murders, there have always been thefts and storms and people dying.

We have every reason to believe that today, life is more satisfying and more enriching than it has been for many centuries.

The leisure society appeared a few decades ago, because we had attained a more acceptable standard of living. If the leisure society could have appeared earlier, it would have done so, and earlier generations would have benefited.

As this leisure society evolved, society became more compassionate as our social conscience became more sophisticated.

Mr. Speaker, in a family there are all kinds of personalities. Some are more aggressive, others are more passive, while others are more creative.

Many families, especially Quebec families which tended to be large, had what was commonly referred to as a black sheep. This was a child that often just did what it felt like doing, unlike its brothers and sisters.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is running out, and I want to thank you for letting me know. I will have to conclude. What I meant is that the child that was considered the black sheep would get special attention from the other children. Often, one of the smarter siblings was able to discipline this child.

• (1540)

I use this particular example because the present situation is actually just that: one of the children of our international community has asked the other children of the family to take care of what is considered to be a black sheep.

And since you asked me to conclude, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I support this motion without any hesitation, and I do so with my knowledge of personal and group psychology and with the honesty I also found among my fellow members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the last words said by the hon. member for Outremont. He said: "I give my full and entire support and I do so knowingly as a psychologist and expert on human issues".

As you see, I am quietly preparing part of the speech I will probably make, I am not sure. But that is the main aspect I intend to discuss in my speech.

As an expert on human issues—and I agree—would Dr. Hogue be so kind as to tell me, while these military operations are going on against the unacceptable invasion of Kuwait by Saddam Hussein, at a time when a number of nations have decided to start a military operation, and I will not comment on that in my question to the hon. member—

However, doesn't he think it is time to send some messages as soon as this conflict is resolved militarily, it is obvious that the people who are now trying to get Saddam Hussein to surrender or withdraw will win, I think that is pretty clear. Isn't it time for Canadian to send a message? To, all those people who are in desperate straits in that part of the world? I am thinking of our friends in Jordan, because I remember what our Prime Minister said when His Majesty King Hussein came here to address the House.

I remember what was said by the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada when President Herzog of Israel came and also addressed the House on that very spot.

There are other questions we have to start thinking about. And we will have to do that before these people become so desperate they get involved in disastrous schemes—I am thinking of those 1.5 million Jordanians of Palestinian origin, 60 or 70 per cent of the population of Jordan, where hatred now looms so large that every solution is doomed. And the same applies to the people in the northwest territories and Gaza, who say there is no hope left.

Would it not be time for Canada, while the government does its thing, and I will not pass judgment on that—to send messages that Canada is determined to get this over with as soon as possible but we then have to take care of all these loose ends?

The hon. member who is an expert on human psychology is aware that these loose ends have been around for quite some time in the Middle East.

The Acting Speaker (M. DeBlois): The hon. member for Outremont has two minutes.

Mr. Hogue: I want to thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis, in the riding next door to mine, for a question that is intriguing but difficult to answer.

I will try to marshall all the intellectual honesty I possess, and of course this includes my deeper feelings on the subject.

Generally speaking, the answer is yes. To do so, however, we will all have to do more than just tolerate each other. We have to accept each other, and I am sure you realize I have no illusions about this. The notion of belonging is fundamental. At the same time, there is also the notion of trust which is just as fundamental. No one in this House, starting with yourself, would believe that the Prime Minister or the Minister of External Affairs take a position because they feel like it. They do so because they have what they feel is the best possible reading on the matter, and of course I don't have to speak on their behalf. The best possible reading required that the decision be made but, on the other hand, perhaps we should go through a specific exercise before getting that far, and the exercise that we are seeing here in the House is not one that stresses our weakness.

I feel it shows our strength and our ability to take a position and at the same time not only address the people of Israel but also the Palestinians and peoples all over the world to tell them that the Parliament of Canada, on whatever side we happen to be in this Chamber, is a responsible body and that at the same time we try to be fully aware that there is a fine line between peace and war—

The Acting Speaker (M. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Drummond.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, by invading Kuwait on August 2, Iraq provoked the worst international crisis in recent years, in a region that for a long time has been know as particularly explosive, with profound enmities exacerbated by poverty and economic disparity, muffled hostility between religions and countries and the resulting extremism and blind hatred. This is a region scarred by eight years of war between Iran and Iraq, an unending civil war in Lebanon, repeated confrontations between Arabs and Israelis and violent disputes between Israelis and Palestinians.

The act of aggression committed by Iraq was a direct challenge to the international community, at a time when the end of the old adversarial relationship between the superpowers had opened the way to legal recourse, dialogue and co-operation to deal with international problems and safeguard peace and security.

We are going through a time of extraordinary change in the world. In eastern Europe, people are throwing out communist ideology and embracing the freedom and responsibility of democracy and a free market economy. In Western Europe, the process of political and economic integration is accelerating. In 1991, 340 million Europeans will finally form a single market.

The invasion and annexation of Kuwait by Iraq has destabilized the world order, disrupted development projects in the Third World, upset the transition towards a market economy in central and eastern Europe and will continue to affect political and economic systems throughout the world.

Since the beginning of the crisis, the international community has spoken clearly, with an unprecedented consensus. Now that the cold war is over, the United Nations organization could build a lasting international order. It is therefore very important, Mr. Speaker, to remind Canadians of the fundamental reasons behind the government's position in the Persian Gulf crisis and its involvement in the war.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall briefly the events that have taken place since August 2. On that day, the Iraqi army invaded Kuwait with a major and impressive military force consisting of more than 150,000 men, 1,200 tanks and 1,000 armoured cars, shocking the Arab world as well as the rest of the international community, which immediately condemned this invasion.

This invasion, which came without provocation, went well beyond any resistance that Kuwait could have offered. The Iraqi forces quickly took over the capital, plundering the country's resources without the slightest restraint and persecuting its inhabitants. After six days of unequal and bloody combat, Saddam Hussein declared that Kuwait had been annexed to Iraq.

The UN Security Council, of which Canada is a member, demanded the immediate withdrawal of Iraqi troops. An economic, financial and military embargo was also ordered in the Persian Gulf against Iraq and Kuwait, an embargo observed by Canada which agreed to become part of the international strike force.

As I said earlier, the reaction of the international community was fast and clear. The UN Security Council adopted 12 resolutions to put an end to the unwarranted occupation of Kuwait by Iraq.

More than 30 countries took part in this multinational action, including the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Austria, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Syria, Pakistan, Bangladesh and the U.S.S.R.

The action also included African countries like Niger and Senegal, and new democracies in Central Europe like Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and Poland.

After the period of grace granted Saddam Hussein by the UN Security Council, there was no indication, unfortunately, that Saddam Hussein was prepared to withdraw his troops from Kuwait. In fact, his position seemed to harden from day to day, supported by the Iraqi Parliament.

A meeting between Secretary of State James Baker and Iraqi Minister of Foreign Affairs Tariq Aziz, as well as conciliation efforts attempted twice by UN Secretary General Mr. Perez de Cuellar, failed to advance the cause of peace and a diplomatic solution to the problem. Armed conflict became a possibility.

Mr. Speaker, we must review the reasons that caused the Government of Canada to provide military aid. We must not forget that our military participation is consequent on a series of resolutions adopted by the vast majority of members of the UN Security Council.

Our membership in this organization is above all an act of faith in all the ways in which we can possibly guarantee peace in this world. Many people who condemn the use of force included in resolution 678 fail to understand that the UN charter contains not only statements of principle in favour of peace but also provisions respecting to collective security.

Drafted following the atrocities of World War II, the Charter provides for the measures needed to enforce its provisions, should these be ignored by a given nation.

Everyone, including myself, hopes that international conflicts are resolved peacefully. All Canadians share that hope, I am sure.

However, when a situation may worsen to the point of being the threat to international security, and when all persuasive arguments seem to have failed, what then?

Wait until an entire nation is massacred and decimated? Stand by while human rights and the rights of a nation are violated unrestrainedly, without any reactions from the rest of the world? That is the crux of the problem.

What made this situation intolerable for the international community, Mr. Speaker?

We knew that Iraq had upgraded its military forces and that it continued to reinforce its facilities in Kuwait.

Mr. Speaker, Canada must fully support the position of the UN. If we were to dissociate ourselves in any way from this agency whose first mission is universal peace it would be tantamount to suspending our belief in humanity.

If at a given time, a group of human beings no longer believes in understanding, tolerance and trust among nations, should we in the name of a precarious peace, let them go ahead and destroy their neighbours?

It is regrettable that the Persian Gulf crisis led to war rather than a peaceful settlement. There is no such thing as a good war. War is humanity's least noble invention. We all want to avoid it. Saddam Hussein remained deaf to the pleas for peace until the last minute and, by refusing to withdraw from Kuwait pursuant to the UN ultimatum, he opened the door to war. The main thing to remember is that if we want peace we must uphold the principles enshrined in the United Nations charter. We must be prepared to defend what we perceive as being the good cause. By acting otherwise we would be telling Saddam Hussein and other potential aggressors that the UN is unable to respond efficiently to aggression.

On January 16, unfortunately, the time had come to take the measures required to restore world order and maintain the efficiency of the United Nations.

In the United Nations charter, the peoples declare their solemn resolve to live in peace and unite their strengths to maintain international peace and security.

Under the terms of the charter the Security Council is primarily responsible for the maintenance of international peace and security, and for the peaceful settlement of conflicts.

Since their inception the United Nations has often been called upon to prevent a dangerous situation from degenerating into real war, to convince adversaries to use the conference table rather than resort to arms, and facilitate the return to peace, or at least end the fighting when hostilities do break out.

Despite failures and setbacks the UN remains ever more prepared to restore and maintain peace in the world.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I hope the war will be short so that our fellow citizens who are defending freedom and the cause of enduring peace will soon return home.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments, five minutes. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Scarborough—Agincourt.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a very important motion put forward by the government. Basically, we are debating whether we should go to war or not go to war. It is redundant. We already engaged in war two or three nights ago when my colleague from Dartmouth came rushing in to let the House know that we had engaged in war.

Calling the House back to debate it is redundant, because we have already engaged in war. However, I want to put on record not only some of my feelings and thoughts, but also those of my constituents.

We called over 2,000 constituents over the last weekend and Monday and asked them whether they felt Canada should participate in the gulf situation in an offensive role or whether the sanctions should be given more time. The results of this poll were overwhelmingly that more than 70 per cent of my constituents were opposed to an offensive role being played by the Canadian forces. I would like to read for the record some of the comments of my constituents.

Mr. Goldthorpe said, "I hate war and senseless killing of our young people. It is just terrible, and I think they should try and negotiate peace".

Mr. Jaffray said: "My understanding was that the Canadian troops were only supposed to be a defensive force and not supposed to take any part in the attacking of Hussein. I would rather see the Canadian troops operating under the flag of the United Nations".

Mrs. Beath said: "Canada's stand should be to support the United Nations' position of sanctions, but should take the initiative on the Palestinian issue and call for the United Nations to continue with sanctions until such a time as they have proven not to be working".

Mrs. Akers said: "I think sanctions should be given more time. You cannot back someone into a corner; it has got to stop. There cannot be a war; it is going to affect us over here. Please, no war! The sanctions need more time".

Mrs. Bloemink said: "I don't think this war is a thing that is desirable. I think we have been led into it. Our boys should not be sacrificed to greed and profit, which is what the whole thing is about. It's a hypocritical situation". Mr. Guildys states:

> The economic blockade which the Government of Canada and the rest of the world has been pursuing in the Middle East, is probably the right way to go.
> As far as war is concerned, I have always been against war because innocent lives will be threatened.

I listened very carefully to what my constituents were telling me. I met with my constituents and I listened very carefully to what the Canadian people are saying. The constituents of Scarborough—Agincourt could be wrong. I could be wrong. However, they are not in favour of war.

• (1600)

If the Canadian people are saying no to war, how can we as parliamentarians say to the Canadian people: "We are deaf and we are not going to hear you. We are not going to pay attention to you. We are going to put you in a situation where we are going to engage in war". If we look at the history of how the Canadians forces were sent there, if we look at the events that led to our young men and women being engaged in war, we would see that at no time were we clear with the Canadian public. We would see that at no time did we come forward and say, "Canadian public, this is what we are going to do".

Iraq invaded Kuwait on August 2. The House was not recalled immediately in order to debate the very important question: Should we send Canadian troops? Should we commit Canadian military equipment into the gulf? Should we commit young men and women of our Canadian forces into the theatre of war?

The Prime Minister made the decision. The Minister of National Defence went off to Halifax to see the three ships go out. There was a big hoopla and a big hurrah, and they thought, "Maybe we will go up in the polls for taking the same stand as Maggie Thatcher in the Falklands". Then the House came back.

Of course, this House was led to believe that we are there enforcing sanctions under the United Nations resolution. We can clearly see how even that great body, the United Nations Security Council, was arm-twisted and taken out of context and forced so that the vote happened when it did. It is very important to know when the vote did occur. The vote occurred in the United Nations the last week that the United States was the chairperson. Everybody there had an interest again. The Russians voted with the United States.

Let us examine for a minute why they voted with the United States for the deadline in order for war to take place. Because right now the Russians are in chaos in their country and the United States has promised them food and aid. The Chinese abstained from the vote. Why did they abstain from the vote? It is important to note that. They wanted to be on the side of right for a change, and not the wrong side as they were in 1989 when the tanks rolled in Tiananmen Square. All of the other countries supported the U.S. because they had a lot to gain. It is my opinion that sanctions, if they had been given a little bit more time, would have worked.

We must first of all take a hard look at why this debate is Necessary. Iraq under the leadership of a madman, Saddam Hussein, invaded its southern neighbour Kuwait. While this is a major concern to the world community, it must be taken in the context of recent world history. There have been instances of a larger country taking over a smaller country, some of which attracted the attention of the United Nations and resulted in punitive action to the aggressor country.

One example of that was Cyprus, in 1974 on an August morning.

Millions and millions of people all over the world were watching an aggressor, not less powerful than Saddam Hussein, not less crazy than Saddam Hussein, and not less militarily viable than Saddam Hussein, invade a smaller country, a country where three nations were supposed to be protectors; Turkey, Greece and England.

Yet one of those countries that was to be the protector invaded the Island of Cyprus. What did the Cypriots have to fight off the Turks? They had an army which was made up of a minimum number of forces, guns and hand grenades that dated back to World War II. They had no oilfields. They had no money. Because they had no oilfields and no money, they had no friends.

Yet, if we were to parallel the two countries, the population of Kuwait is about the same. They occupy about the same place in the Middle East. They have about the same temperature. There is one difference between the two countries. One country is rich in oilfields. The other country is not.

Yet the rest of the world, although it condemned the occupation of Cyprus, and although the defence minister said that valiant efforts were put forward by Canadian troops acting as peacekeeping forces, we did not see the Americans send 450,000 men over there. We did not see the French come to their aid. We did not see the British react. We did not see anybody take any action. We did not see Canada send three ships and 2,000 men. Why not? I go back to my original calculation and conclusion. There was no oil. Maybe it served their particular interest to have that island divided. I question why the double standard.

There are reasons we should have given sanctions more time to work. We must first of all take a hard look at why the sanctions would have worked. History shows us that if you put enough pressure on somebody, he will react one way or another. Maybe what happened to Benito Mussolini, another madman in World War II will happen to Saddam Hussein and maybe the world will be at peace. The Italian dictator told his good friend—another dictator, Adolf Hitler—that if oil had been included in the economic sanctions imposed by the League of Nations in 1935–36, he would have been forced to remove his troops from occupying Ethiopia.

There have been other instances, Madam Speaker, when sanctions have been applied with extreme effectiveness. I would like to explore a few for the members of this House who say that sanctions would have not worked.

American sanctions applied in the early 1980s were instrumental in forcing the Polish government to free political prisoners. The Indians' partial blockade of Nepal in 1989 to 1990 caused widespread disruption in that country which resulted in a change of government that was sympathetic to India.

When I was growing up, I remember a little country called Biafra. In the late 1960s the world watched with great interest sanctions applied by Nigeria which had a devastating effect on the economy and the social infrastructure of Biafra. If we are to learn anything from the past in regard to sanctions, it is that for them to be effective, they must be applied as strongly as possible and must be given enough time for the effects of them to be felt.

I noticed the other day that the Secretary of State for External Affairs said our sanctions are not working. Things were getting through. When he was challenged, he could not back that up.

The first part of this has, without a doubt, been achieved. The world community at large had acted as one of the most effective trade blockades ever seen. The only part missing in these sanctions was time. History has shown that sanctions of a few months are not effective, but given a reasonable amount of time would likely have resulted in the crippling of Iraq. It is indeed unfortunate that the Americans did not have the will to give sanctions a chance.

• (1610)

There is an old song sung by the Beatles of the 1960s that says: Give peace a chance. Had we given sanctions a chance to work, maybe we would not have seen what happened. Maybe there would have been no casualties. Maybe the madman would have moved back. As we speak today, maybe there would not have been Scud missiles fired into a third neutral country that has nothing to do with this war. However, Saddam Hussein wants to drag it into this in order to split the United Nations coalition under the leadership of the United States.

Had we waited another month or two, the world would not have stopped. Had we waited until February 15 or March 15 before aggression, nothing would have changed.

The clock of Armageddon would have been at 11.55 even today. As we speak, that clock is ticking closer and closer to 12 o'clock.

Other members in this House have said that they have seen war. In my background there were people who were under occupation for almost 400 years. In the country I came from, before I made Canada my home, there were five years of Nazi occupation. In World War I my grandfather was wounded while fighting. In World War II, I lost two uncles while fighting as partisans. So I am not new to family losses. I am not new to watching people fight for their country. If the call came to defend our country, I am sure every member of the House would do the honourable thing and enlist. So let us not detract by saying that giving sanctions more time to work means we are not supporting our forces in the gulf.

People of the government are trying to get the message across to the Canadian people that we on this side of the House are not supportive of our men and women in the gulf. I say that they are wrong. I mention women because in conventional warfare it is the first time we have seen pictures in newspapers and magazines, on the front and back pages, of a man carrying a gun, with a woman beside him. These pictures are not something set up in order to confuse or please the folks back home. They are real pictures.

I am the father of four daughters. The thought that we might have to go to war and that possibly some time in the future my daughters might be in the front lines is certainly something that sends chills up and down my spine.

I am an advocate of peace and I believe that peace should be given a chance. I believe we have to talk about peace and when you exhaust all possible avenues and when sanctions have been given a real chance to work, then take up arms.

Speaking of taking up arms, it is interesting to note from history, as we sit here on a Friday afternoon, well past our sitting session, talking about peace and war, I would like to talk a little more about one part of the world that has been occupied for the past 16 years. Some of my colleagues might say that I am very partial to that part of the world. Maybe it is because of my background. It is because of our backgrounds that we grow and are proud to contribute to this great country of ours that is called Canada. For the past 25 years, and I want to put this on the record, Canada has acted in Cyprus by means of a peacekeeping force under the United Nations flag. We have lost 29 men and it is costing the Canadian economy about $30 million a year. I questioned the Minister of National Defence the other day about some references in the The Toronto Star. The Conservative caucus leader, the hon. member for Ontario, was quoted as saying that he was going to bring up to national caucus that they might withdraw the forces from Cyprus in order to cut costs.

When I asked the Minister of National Defence if he would withdraw the forces from Cyprus, he danced all around the issue and he did not clearly say no. I want, also for the record, to state in this House that when the United Nations, on December 15, 1990, voted as to whether peacekeeping forces should be kept on Cyprus, there was one country that abstained. There was one country which has been there for 26 years that decided, under this government, to say, "We don't give a damn about the island anymore". Madam Speaker, that country, I am ashamed to say, was Canada. That country, I am ashamed to say, under the Conservative government, abstained from sending forces into Cyprus. Why? Because the government believes we will save 30 million measly dollars. I suggest to members across the way that they visit Cyprus because while we are talking about walls coming down, like the Berlin wall, there is one in Cyprus which is called the green line. That is still there; it has not fallen down. That still exists and yet Canada has not taken any initiative or made any plans, except the plans in 1978 for peace negotiation on the island.

So what are we going to do? We are going to turn chicken, turn tail, and we are going to get out of Cyprus because it is not a win situation. It is costing us money. I see an hon. member across the way and I think that maybe he agrees with me. I suggest to members across the way that they visit the green line and see the last existing wall that divides two peoples and then come back to this House and stand like the Minister of National Defence and say that we are going to pull our troops out. And where are we going to take them? That is a very important question. We are probably going to send them to the gulf. Why? Because there is oil there and because Bush got on the phone and said: "Send us your forces".

It is interesting to note, for the record, when the first strike was made. Out of the almost 30 countries of the multinational force, which were the countries that actually led the first strike? Let me put this on the record. They were the United States, Britain, the Saudis, Kuwait, and Canada.

I know that I only have a few minutes but I want to analyse this. The United States, why? Because it has interests in oil. The same thing applies to Britain. The Saudis were protecting themselves from aggression. In the case of Kuwait, it was because their country was overrun and Canada because we have a Prime Minister who does not know the words "foreign policy". We have a Prime Minister who does not know what Canadian foreign policy is. When the President of the United States picks up the phone, it is: "Yes, Sir, we will do it. Yes, Sir, we are going to send the 24 planes to the gulf. Yes, Sir, we are going to send our three ships".

You are going to say three ships and 24 planes make a hot lot of difference to the multinational force that is there. It is the aspect that we are there so the Americans do not raise the flag as in an American war. They say: "Oh, we had Canada with us".

Well, I would say it is about time we look at a foreign policy which is made in Canada. I say that it is time we look into other aggressions such as in Latvia, Lithuania, Sri Lanka, and throughout the world. Through the years of Mr. Pearson Canada was truly and honestly a United Nations peacekeeping force. Aggression, yes, when it is needed. Fighting, yes, when it is needed. But first and foremost sanctions must be given a chance to work. They have proven time and time again that they work. Therefore sanctions should come first and foremost before we pick up and push the button on the doomsday machine. That is what is happening. We are pushing the button.

We are not any better than Saddam Hussein. He is a madman who killed millions of children and women. He pillaged. One can say that we are killing. One can say that had we given time, maybe another two months, that would not have been done.

I am going to close by saying that I am supportive of our troops 100 per cent and I join with other members of this House from both sides in praying and wishing them the best so that they will rejoin their families. No–one can stand up and listen to the cries of a six–year old when he says: "My daddy might die".

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, if I understood the member correctly he indicated that Canadian forces were part of the first strike. In light of the fact that that is not my understanding, I would ask him if he could provide me with any supporting evidence he has.

Mr. Karygiannis: Madam Speaker, when war broke out the minister of state for defence was speaking and my colleague from Dartmouth came into the House and asked if the minister could explain the role the Canadian forces were engaged in at that time. She used a particular term "sweep and escort". Those were her words. Maybe "sweep and escort" is not the right meaning—I am not a military man—but from my reading of the newspaper I understand that they would escort or sweep in front of the bombers. They would be flying in protective cover. So if you are up and you are flying when the others are attacking what are you doing? I might have misunderstood, Madam Speaker, but when the Prime Minister came in and said that we were at war I clearly understood that.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint–Denis): Madam Speaker, needless to say I am pleased that a new member of this House has raised the question of Cyprus.

I have raised that question for years and years, but I did understand that the world was such that Turkey, a great allied military power in NATO was our strongest wing in NATO against the Warsaw Pact. I understood that, even though I disagreed that because of that we should do nothing.

Now we have what we call a new international order where we ask everybody to respect the decision of the United Nations. And we see that our friend Turkey is with us today in this new adventure. I asked once, I asked twice, I begged privately: Are you now saying that there is a new international order whispering at least to the ears of the Turkish, saying "the time has now come to get out of Cyprus." I was in Cyprus, I know Cyprus as well as I know Lebanon. I call it honey on earth.

[Translation]

The honey of the world—Cyprus and Lebanon. But because they were denied help from the beginning the situation gets worse.

[English]

Cyprus has a population of 600,000 people with 200,000 refugees. Who cares about Cyprus? Who cared about Lebanon at the very beginning? Who cares about the Palestinians? I do not agree with the invasion of Iraq and Kuwait.—I do not support Iraq attacking Israel last night, destroying a few houses. It could have been a monstrosity. But do you see the same paranoia on CNN television when every day people in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are being humiliated, deprived of school, university and college, deprived of water and deprived of freedom? Oh, we will solve it. Read the speech made by my Prime Minister to his Royal Highness King Hussein of Jordan when he spoke here. Read the speech of His Royal Highness begging us to understand. Read the speech of the President of Israel who spoke right there. I listened like a gentleman, as I should, to his speech. There were promises and more promises. There was no action during that time. People got desperate and more desperate. Hate is building. Who knows now if King Hussein, who we used to call our friend, will not be the next victim because of people who have no more hope.

I am asking that government and I am asking my colleague to make a comment. The time has not come to make war, but it is a fact of life so I have to support my Canadians soldiers. Do you think we are a bunch of kooks? We pray for our Canadian boys and girls who are there now. We are not going to deprive them of money or anything they need to come back healthy. I beg of my country, Canada, and at the same time send signals around the world that we will look after all these injustices that have been going on. Is it asking too much from a Canadian?

Mr. Karygiannis: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Saint-Denis for giving me a chance to express maybe something that is called hatred, maybe something that members of this House have not been alluding to. Greece was under Ottoman occupation for 400 years, until 1821, when they rose and kicked the conqueror out. Since 1821 to this day, children in Greece are taught to hate the Turks. The children of Turkey are taught to hate the Greeks. I was part of that growing up. My children are also part of that and their children, because of their heritage, will also be part of that. This hatred gets passed on. The hatred in the Middle East gets passed on. With the children of Cyprus the same thing gets passed on. Let's stop discussing war and start discussing peace.

Some of my colleagues in the opposition are saying that war has started.

• (1630)

With the discussion we have here, we are the only Parliament in the world that is still discussing war or peace, or this or that.

I say to my colleagues that it is very important that we are here continuing this discussion even if it has to sit 24 hours.

If my colleague from B.C. disagrees with me, I say to him—

Mr. Barrett: I did not say anything.

Mr. Karygiannis: I am sorry if I misunderstood you.

It is important that we sit here and discuss the machinery that can be unleashed upon human beings. How many of you have seen people killed in war? Children?

I was in Cyprus, and I have seen the work that our Canadian forces can do. I know what they are capable of. I am proud of them. I say to you, Madam Speaker, that we should supporting our Canadian forces in peacekeeping roles, not in acts of aggression.

Acts of aggression must be stopped once and for all here, today.

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to address the motion by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and seconded by the Deputy Prime Minister.

Since the debate began, the circumstances have regrettably deteriorated to hostilities in the Middle East. I believed at the outset that this would be the most difficult decision I will make in this Chamber. It is more difficult than others because of the consequences of any war.

I cannot claim experience in war except as the son and nephew of a World War II veteran. As many considerations are involved in every decision by members of Parliament, I have tried to view this from numerous perspectives.

The motion is straight forward:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

I wish, first, to address the motion from an international perspective and not so much from a war analysis. As the world continues to undergo rapid change, including a move towards a more global community, I believe it is important to protect our only instrument capable of international order and peace: the United Nations.

As other colleagues in this Chamber have indicated, four to six years ago, the nations of the world formed an organization: the UN. The UN's primary purpose was to be the maintenance of international peace and security.

The charter would give the world the right and the capacity to deter aggression and to reverse it by force if necessary when it occurred. It was organized for the circumstances we are faced with today.

As the former Opposition Leader said: "This is the crucial test for the United Nations." The UN has adopted a total of 12 Security Council resolutions since Iraq attacked Kuwait on August 2. As a member of that Council, what does Canada now do in view of its disregard by Saddam Hussein?

As a founding member of the UN, does Canada now withdraw because the situation is becoming tense?

Second, I had planned to speak as well from a national perspective, because we all have to answer the question: What course is right for Canada and the cause of peace?

Having been in touch with various leaders in my constituency to debate and assist me in determining my position in response, I had to resolve this very personally. I have always said in other conflicts that I do not advocate violence and that I value life.

Some constituents have stated their opposition to the war. My 7 year–old daughter cried because of her own fears of war. These made it more painful for me to come to a conclusion on this motion.

Because I have been involved, although in a small way, with the United Nations, I had to reflect on my own personal beliefs. I recall the day, as a Canadian delegate to the General Assembly of the UN in New York when resolution 678 was being discussed.

It was then that the sudden chill and realization of the real potential of war was made upon me for the first time. Since then, I spent much time in thought, in agonizing about what was to be my position if the circumstances that face us today were to occur.

Throughout, one view did not change, and that is my position in support of the United Nations. As one who has been to both Geneva and New York at the UN on several occasions, I had come to believe that the UN could do very great things for human beings; things like the establishment, the confirmation, and the protection of rights of all peoples.

Now the question comes at a time when its very role is challenged by Saddam Hussein. Do I abandon support? Or do I reaffirm the support as the motion calls for in continuing support for its purpose.

Having considered arguments on both sides of this very difficult issue, there are still those all over the world who rely on the UN for the protection of their rights.

Madam Speaker, allow me to digress for a moment on another, but related, concern. What do we do now? What should we do for the future? What positive considerations had to be given for post–war initiatives? I humbly suggest two recommendations for consideration by this House. First, pass this motion at the earliest opportunity to reaffirm our support for the United Nations. Second, and as important, establish a peace mission immediately, perhaps either through UN Security Council meetings or through Middle East peace talks under UN observation.

I believe as many other colleagues have mentioned earlier, even a few minutes ago, that now is the time to address peace with every effort possible.

I believe also in the defence and construction of a durable structure of international order. I will be voting in favour of this motion because I support our troops. I support Canada, and I support the United Nations.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments. The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, the hon. member and I are from the same province. We both have training as lawyers, although I know that that is an unpopular profession. Next to a politician, perhaps the most unpopular.

I wonder, though, if the member has not very much oversimplified the matter. Is he, for example, aware of the article that was written by a highly respected economist, Mr. Gary C. Hufbauer, and co-authored by him, pointing out in part that if ever there was a place where sanctions would be likely to work, for geographic and reasons, Iraq is it, given the fact that half of Iraq's GNP is involved with oil. Had we given sanctions another few months, according to the article, by the summer or fall there was an excellent probability that Mr. Hussein would have left Kuwait.

While he is answering that, perhaps he could also deal with my second point which is that it is estimated that half of the people who are going to die in this war are going to be Iraqi children. Because of the war with Iran, Iraq's population consists of about 45 per cent children under the age of 15.

I wonder if he might also tell us whether he thinks it is really good for the United Nations, when it could have used this model of isolating and embargoing with truly effective sanctions, for it now to become part of the Pax Americana which seems to be evolving because of the problems in the Soviet Union. I realize those are three questions, but maybe he would deal with any one he cares to.

Mr. Littlechild: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the very difficult question.

First of all, I am not thoroughly familiar with the article he mentioned, but the information I am aware of is by the allied forces and the United Nations on whether or not sanctions in this case are working. It is my understanding that they were working on the wrong people. Sanctions in this case, were working against the poor people and the children in Iraq, but not against the military. I think the collective information and the collective decision of allied members of the United Nations certainly must be better than the information I have. It was their decision that sanctions were not working and I support that.

With respect to the number of Iraqi children who will die, that is one of the reasons I said in my presentation that it was a difficult decision for me to make. In my opinion, no war is good because of the impact on innocent lives.

In terms of other situations around the world, I can only call on this House to consider any kind of peaceful resolution or mechanism to deal with existing conflicts anywhere in the world with respect to children. Any contemplated use of economic sanctions should not be necessary to begin with.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak to one of the most important issues in Canadian history. Canada's commitment to the United Nations during the Gulf Crisis will undoutedly be recorded among the most significant aspects of our history.

This debate is a discussion about war and peace, a debate about right and wrong. This debate is about standing up for what is right, about taking a stand and fighting against evil. Canadians from sea to sea know that now is the time to reflect on Canadian history, Canadian traditions and Canada's ongoing commitment to peace.

Canadians from coast to coast also know that now is the time to contemplate and decide our future as part of the international community. From an international perspective this debate is about Canada's commitment to peace and peaceful nations. From a national perspective this debate is clearly about leadership.

There are those who say the aggressor must forcefully be dealt with. Others say wait until Saddam Hussein is struck with a feeling of peace. What can peace mean for Saddam Hussein? Does it mean more time to prepare for war? Peace is, indeed, an elusive, valuable and oftentimes fragile treasure. In recent history, world peace has been to a large measure attained by the United Nations, an organization founded specifically to pave a path to peace. For decades the UN has been successful as a team of peaceful nations joined together to protect the weakest among its members from aggressive bullies like Saddam Hussein.

Saddam Hussein has continuously demonstrated, by his words and by his deeds, that he rejects peace. The evidence against Saddam Hussein tells a fearsome story: use of poison gas on his own citizens, wake of death and destruction when Iraq invaded Kuwait, development of biological and chemical weapons. It tells of attempts to develop nuclear weapons, and other weapons of mass destruction, associations with terrorist groups and of the recent missile attacks on Israel. On August 2, Saddam Hussein started a war with the international community. His actions and statements have continuously demonstrated a disregard for human life, international law, property, and his own personal integrity.

To ensure the continued success of the United Nations, it is extremely important for Canada to honour our commitment to the international family, within the United Nations, and stand together against the evil of Saddam Hussein. Canada cannot accept the benefits of the United Nations and then, when times are tough, reject its responsibilities. Canada must play a prominent role in the United Nations, not only when times are easy but, more important, when the situation becomes more difficult, as it is now in the gulf. Canada must continue its commitment to paving the path of peace, now in the gulf and also in the future. Through the United Nations, Canada must continue its efforts to expel Saddam Hussein from Kuwait and ensure the enforcement of international law.

As in the case of some others, my age limits my experience with war. I, of course, remember television reports of the Vietnam war and I remember hearing stories of other wars. In my family, my grandfathers had committed part of their lives to military service and, during the Second World War, my father served overseas as a member of Canada's Armed Forces in the Signal Corps. I recall, as a small boy, becoming focused on war every year, during the Remembrance Day ceremonies. In our home, the ritual every November 11 was a memorable one. Early in the morning, my mother would busy herself by assisting my father, shining and preparing his war and military service medals and, while they discussed memories of the war years and Dad fitted and adjusted his navy blue Royal Canadian Legion beret, I am sure they reflected on the years during the 1940s when, as newly weds, they found themselves thousands of miles apart and, although hopeful, they were somewhat uncertain about their future. After the small town parade, religious service and gathering of veterans, my father would return home to respond to questions from my brother and me.

Year after year, as a boy, I asked about war seeking, perhaps, a comment about heroism or glory. Year after year, I received the same lecture. War, I was told, was horrible. War, he told me, meant fear and terror. War was dirty. War meant unbelievable destruction. War, he described, was an awful experience to be avoided whenever and wherever possible. But he also lectured me about responsibility and commitment and about duty to Canada. Although the concepts of responsibility and commitment were less difficult to comprehend, I only began to understand the meaning of duty when I learned that, even though an old leg injury of his offered him an easy escape from conscription, my father enlisted as a volunteer to serve the interests of our country because he believed that it was his duty. Canada has a duty to support the efforts of the United Nations in the Gulf. Canadians from coast to coast must all join together to express our strong support to those who are on active duty in the Persian Gulf as members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, at the outset I would like to say a few words about my constituency which rarely has the opportunity of being in the news that is now on everybody's mind during this current situation. I have the honour of representing Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca which includes the largest Pacific coast naval base of the Canadian Armed Forces, as well as other contingents of our armed forces and of course, represented by the only armed force anywhere in the world that has won a Nobel Peace Price. This price for peacekeeping was awarded to the Princess Patricia Light Canadian Infantry based in Victoria.

I was struck by the reference to one's parents. Since this is probably one of the few speeches I make toward the twilight of my career, I will do something I have never done in my 25 years in public life and respond similarly for a few minutes.

My father was born in this country, raised in Winnipeg, Manitoba and in his first year of university volunteered to go overseas in the First World War. My father spent 10 months in the trenches, was wounded twice and suffered through a gas attack, and finally and ultimately lost his eyesight permanently in the fifties as a consequence of his service to this country.

My mother was a peace activist. My mother was responsible in her day for having me swaddled in bandages in 1936 as a victim of the Spanish Civil War protesting the rise of Fascism at that particular time. So the bona fides that all of us Canadians have of similar histories are important to reflect upon.

My father also talked to me about duty and devotion, as the other member spoke, but my mother and father also spoke to me about responsibility of conscience. I am Jewish, but I had the great opportunity of having two wonderful parents, and then attending two Catholic universities. I spent six years with the Jesuits and was exposed to Christian philosophy. I majored in Thomastic philosophy. A strange combination, a Jewish Thomist but nonetheless, here is the product.

The consequences of that amalgan in my background heightened the awareness that flag-waving and jingoism are indeed important for all of us at any given time in our life. But the most important thing for any one of us is to understand that we, as individuals, are responsible for our own actions. We serve a nation and we are proud to be Canadians, but this country is not great on the basis of some symbol or jingoism; it is great on the basis of individuals being responsible to their own conscience and then expressing that through the democratic process that we have, ultimately leading to this Chamber.

So there will be differences of opinion and no one must be diminished regardless of party on the basis of that difference of opinion. So far, this debate has been marked by a minimum amount of partisan activity, except that it has broken out regrettably from the government front benches in a way that has dismayed me, and today was a bit of an example of that. I hope it is the end of that, but it has broken out and I need to mention that.

This problem is presented as if it was an either/or situation. But we have to reflect just a little bit of how we reach this point.

Who sold the technology to Iraq? Did the Iraqi scientists spend Gross National Product of their country in developing surface-to-air missiles? Where did the Scuds come from? Where did the mirage airplanes come from?

The very panoply of a ray of arms against Iraq is a reflection of the arms they were able to buy from the Soviet Union, France, the United States and anyone else who wanted to sell it. We talk about the missiles zooming through the air, the Iraqis having this, that and everything else. Who sold it to them?

What was available on the market? To castigate members of the Liberal Party or my party for not following an absolute ginglism demands we examine whose hand has been behind the scene in preparing the material available for Iraq. The Soviet Union's hands are dirty. The United States' hands are dirty. Yes, this country, too: Its hands are dirty.

Not one western nation stood up during the time of all of these sales or in the great debates during the League of Nations, was against arms and arms embargoes. It was necessary for the Prime Minister of this country to sell his point and to be selective about his comments on history, and he has not done this House a service.

I thought it dismaying that he did not mention those people from this country who fought for freedom who have still to be recognized by Canada officially. Those are the brave young men of the Mackenzie-Papineau brigade who volunteered from Canada, served in Spain and gave their lives there against Fascism. Still, they have not been recognized by this country because there is a political division.

Nobody's hands are clean nor am I a saint, but I do read history. Who sold the guns to El Salvador that killed those six Jesuit priests and murdered those two innocent women? Who made the arms available for Salvador Allende to be murdered in his presidential office after he was democratically elected? Who was it who invaded Panama or Grenada for that matter, or Afghanistan?

While we talk about this new co-operation at the United Nations—God help me. I hope it is a reformation in the minds of those international leaders who now sit at the Security Council, including China with its hands at Tiananmen Square. Remember, they sit and deliberate without a clean background.

We are human beings, and we do make mistakes. Alas, I think we have made another mistake. This is a great testing time for the United Nations, but what a terrible test. We should have given more time for the embargo to work.

I find it ironic that I quote a former head of the CIA. To give strength to my argument, it was nonetheless the former head of the CIA in the United States' hearings who gave the evidence that Sanctions would work had we waited a bit longer.

The speech of the Leader of the Liberal Party and that of my own party clearly made that point. They represent, combined, a higher percentage of vote reflected in the general population than the government's.

We have a legitimate point of view that we have to present without the partisanship. I wanted to comment about the force of international law. The Prime Minister says—we all agree—that international law must be regarded. The court in The Hague was appealed to just within the last 10 years by the Government of Nicaragua to stop it from violating the sovereignty of that nation by placing mines in the Managua harbour.

When the Government of the United States was faced with the possibility of losing the case in the court in The Hague, it announced that it would ignore the decision in the court.

It is not good enough. I am hoping now that all the words, jingoism and statements by the big five and the Security Council means that never again will they be selective of when they decide the rule of law should apply to them as a nation. I hope out of this experience the Soviet Union will never again move in and crush the people of Lithuania. I am thankful that they have agreed to a referendum. I hope that imperialism of the extreme left will never show its hand again and the imperialism of the right will begin to stay its hand based on the rhetoric that is now being applied to this current situation.

• (1700)

I have some personal comments about this current situation. Five years ago, with the advent of Mikhail Gorbachev I spoke to a Catholic priest who is a very good friend of mine and I said: "Explain to me how this phenomena happens." He said: "Dave, the only answer I can give is that it is a gift from God." Being a bit of an agnostic, I was willing to accept that explanation because I was pleased with what I thought was happening. We saw the beginning of the end of the cold war. We saw the alliances, both in the Warsaw Pact and in NATO, being forced to question the necessity of their continued interests. The military and Soviet Union and some of the military in the west felt threatened by the thaw of the cold war. Certainly the military industrial complex that General Eisenhower warned us about also got very frightened.

With the cold war ending, we have to look at our parts of the economy, as the Soviets looked at their parts of the economy that were essentially built on the arms trade. The only way the arms trade can be sustained is by having a war. We have got one now. It is too simple to say that this war was arranged to sustain the arms race but it is pretty convenient. We have moved now from the cold war to the new crusades. Why do I say the new crusades? Because the magic trigger words used in the cold war were anti-communism or anti-capitalism. Those two trigger words have now become passé in world history and we have reduced ourselves to finding new trigger words; anti-Arab, anti-Jew, anti-Christian.

The fundamentalist Muslims have been appealed to in this debate to rise up against the infidel. Saddam Hussein has defined this aggression, that he initiated, as being a jihad. He is the one who added the dimension at this point of a religious war and there is fertile ground for what he is saying. On our side, we have witnessed in the Middle East serious attempts by serious people, both in the Palestinian community and in the Israeli community to get an international peace conference going, only to see it scuttled time and time again.

If nothing else comes out of this series of tragic events whose catalogues of loss of life have been described far more adequately and passionately than I can, by hon. members in this House, I want to believe and understand that this government will be in the forefront demanding an international conference on all that regions problems and everybody at the table.

Not only is the first casualty the truth in a war, but reason and logic and a perspective that is necessary for picking up the pieces afterward. I wanted the embargo to work. Now that we have a war. I hope to God it is over as quickly as possible with a minimum loss of life.

This is not a football game. This is not the NHL on television. You don't just turn off the channel and think that it is over. Unbelievable human, economic, and social carnage will be left there. What have we got to put in place when Saddam Hussein is gone, with a population that is full of hate and anger against the Christian infidel and the west? Do we think that some benevolent person is going to come in and rule Kuwait with an understanding hand? He or she will be murdered within one month. We are going to be in a quagmire there and anybody who thinks we will not have to put peacekeeping forces inside Iraq and Kuwait perhaps, but certainly in Iraq, is right out of their mind.

The peace and tranquillity of that nation as it goes through a major transformation will require that. I hear commentators on television saying that: "oh, no, it is surgical and, bang, it is over". Do not kid yourself.

Not only must we be ready to participate in a peace conference but we must also be prepared to understand that part of our budgets must go to playing a role in that peacekeeping force.

We talk about this war being over. I mention Iraq. Then we look at Syria. Assad today could have been yesterday's Saddam Hussein. He is in the same situation. It is ironic and I do not say this with humour but General Noriega and Saddam Hussein were very close friends of George Bush when he was the head of the CIA. I want to warn any would-be dictator who is heading out into the future to avoid a friendship with the President of the United States because within a few years look what history has shown us.

Hussein is Syria. What are his hands clean with? Nothing. What are they dirty with? Take a look at Lebanon. Take a look at his vision now of his opportunities and our worry that he may break in this fragile coalition—and he may break. Thank goodness Israel has had the common sense not to retaliate in the last 24 hours. Thank goodness for that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: We look at Mr. Mubarak in Egypt struggling to hang on to power, graciously forgiving a $7 billion debt by the Americans. Some cynics would suggest that they bought his support for his role in this. Not me, because I am too young to be a cynic. But when I look at his position and know that the population in his country is ready to hear the siren call of a jihad then I worry.

Then we look at the Soviet Union above Turkey, Azerbaijan, and right across the southern part of the Soviet Union, fundamentalist Islam has become the rallying cry against Moscow domination and we have seen visuals of people being murdered because of religion inside the Soviet Union. Again an example of the new crusades.

Fundamental Christianity, fundamental Islam, fundamental Hebrew, fundamental Judaism, fundamental anything, all have the problems of being absolutely right with no vision that perhaps someone else has a point of view as well. If we allow ourselves to be tied in continuously in this war on the basis of the new crusades, then the Soviet Union is in for turmoil, we are in for turmoil, and international terrorism will be based on "remember Iraq; throw another bomb".

I do not think that has been thought out over there. I came to this Chamber surprised that deputies never even sit next to the cabinet ministers. Where are the experts? Where are the people who advise this government? Even in Question Period, sure it is the opposition's role to make questions available that might jab the government, but it is not the government's role to be facetious in response. It requires statespersonship over there. I do not see much of it and it worries me. Lester Pearson did not act that way. Louis St. Laurent did not, and John Diefenbaker did not.

I have a few more things to say but perhaps I will get to say those in response to questions and answers. But I want to conclude my formal remarks by quoting the Pope's statement of three days ago. He said it in a framework that there are no winners and no losers. He said: "The whole world has lost over what has happened this last week".

• (1710)

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member might have a few more comments to elaborate on the information that he was giving this House.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, I have not said anything that is uniquely mine. I have only reflected wiser heads who do not have a political base which requires them to be more confined. The only thing original in what I have said is my perception that we are really in the new crusades. Everything I have spoken about has led me to believe that.

If there ever was a time for the religious community leaders of this world to provide alternate leadership, this is it. It is a time for the Chief Rabbi of Israel, the head Muslim mullahs and the Christian leaders of the world to call their own special inquiry or their own special World Council of Churches meeting, because we all pray to the same God, and we had better make that sure to all our relative adherents. We all pray to the same God, and I hope she understands our wavering when we do this. The reality is that it would be a good alternative and it is also extremely important for salving the egos of males who are involved in this kind of thing to understand that there is a higher course to deal with. I suggest the Canadian government be the first to appeal to the world's religious community leaders on an ecumenical basis to perhaps provide new leadership in problems that are fraught with religious differences above everything else.

This debate is important. How we vote is not important. I do not want anybody to go out of here believing the jingoism that we have to vote for being in the war. We are already in the war. What I had to say before the war started is a heck of a lot different than what I have to say now in dealing with that reality. The Liberal Party understands that and so do we. Our position is clear.

We are opposed to any aggressive role by Canadian forces. But, we must be there to offer humanitarian alternatives. We must be there so that we never again see the visuals of refugees in the water looking for ships. Do you remember those visuals from Vietnam of kids and mothers, regardless of race, creed or colour, looking for a boat or a haven, and how it took the world quite a while to respond? We must never let that happen again.

We have to help Jordan pay a little bit of the bill for those refugees even though they are having an internal fight about whose side they are on. We have a lot of work to do. Let Canada begin to work. Let this government understand the reflections, the desires and the demands of the average man and woman in this country who do not give a fig about Tories, Liberals or Conservatives, but want peace and leadership from this country to deal with the very real human problems that have been created by this disaster and a warning to all those nations who led us to this. Your hands are not clean. You want clean action now, you had better, never behave the way you did in Afghanistan or Vietnam or Panama or elsewhere again.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca had started to explain the many layers of casualties that occur in a war situation, the layers of casualties with regard to truth and our attempts to try to grip the situation by reverting to simplistic arguments to think that we have some control over this. One of those simplistic arguments that is put forth against our party is that we are anti-military. Well, nothing could be further from the truth.

I would like the member who represents the riding wherein the largest naval base and the Princess Pat Light Infantry, the recipients of a peace prize are located, a neighbouring riding to my own, to talk about the role of the military, the distinguished role of the military throughout Canadian history, and how we can now go on from here with that reputation for Canadian military action. Our position is not criticism of the military. I would like him to expound on that.

Mr. Barrett: Madam Speaker, within the last two weeks I had, in my responsibility as a member of Parliament, to be on one of our naval ships, as we saw the crew leaving for the east coast. I was participating in the military ceremony. The captain on the ship was incredible. He allowed us to talk to crew and go wherever we wanted.

The debate among the crew is the same as the debate here in this House. It is no different. They had Liberals, Tories, and New Democrats in uniform. They all had similar opinions. But, the one basic condition and foundation they had in dealing with each other was the genuine desire to be a different kind of service in the Canadian military, based on the traditions my colleague mentioned.

Let no one believe that our men and women who are in uniform for this country are jingoists or rambos. We have the most responsible military force ever in our history. They are well educated, well trained, philosophically based, and understand their traditional role as peacekeepers. They will do what is asked of them. They are doing what is asked of them. We are proud of the fact that they will do what is asked of them. But they will also do the work that we have them for in Cyprus, in Israel, in Lebanon, and in other areas. They are trusted, believed in, and respected.

When this is over, let us understand that Canada is ready for an extension of our role internationally to continue using our military forces for peace.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier today there was an exchange between you and I. Following our discussion in chamber, I would like to unequivocally offer to you my apologies and withdraw the comments I made about you.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would very much like to thank the hon. member for doing the honourable thing.

[Translation]

This honourable gesture really has a particular effect: the House of Commons as an institution emerges with greater stature from a difficult moment. On behalf of all members of this House I thank the hon. member very sincerely.

[English]

SUPPORT FOR UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, much has been said throughout this debate about the role that Canada has played in the past, what we as a nation should be doing now, and what our role will be in the future.

Canadian forces were actively involved in both World Wars and Korea. As a nation we have paid a high price for freedom and I think sometimes that we have come to take it for granted. Over 100,000 Canadian lives were lost in those wars. How much different history might have been today if our allied forces had not made that ultimate sacrifice to fight and die in a senseless war. I think we have all agreed that all wars are senseless.

We are reminded of this every November 11 when each of us, as members of Parliament, attend the services and see that diminishing line of veterans who appear each year, those who have served their countries in the past. There are very few from the First World War, if any, and some from the Second World War and Korea.

With those reminders to all of us of the role that Canada has played in past wars, it has given us the opportunity to enjoy some of the freedoms that we have: the freedom each of us has to run for elected office and to speak out freely whether it be in the House of Commons, on the street, or in the media.

A lot of people gave the ultimate so that those of us who enjoy the benefits are able to live the lives we do in Canada. Sometimes I think we take too much of that for granted. We see perhaps at times fewer and fewer people at Remembrance Day services. We dust off our memories once in a while to remember those who have contributed to Canada's role as a nation and the respect we have earned throughout the world, both in serving in active duty and the peacekeeping role that has been talked about so often during the debate in the House.

As a young child growing up during the latter years of the war, my most vivid memories are from the small prairie town of Medicine Hat, which at that time had a population of about 10,000. We had a prisoner of war camp on one side of the town and a military training base for the air force on the other. Young men from countries all over the world came and trained there. We also had young men in that prison camp, many of whom were little more than teenagers. They had probably fought in a war wondering why, as many young people do, they were in it; what cause they were fighting for; and if they were going to get back home and see their loved ones. At the end of the war there were more prisoners in that camp than there were people living in the city.

Young men came over from the British Isles and Europe to train and fly planes and then went back home, not knowing whether or not they would ever be coming back to Canada again. Some of them did, and that has been a remarkable part of our community. People from both sides have come back: those who served in the war and others who were prisoners. They have made their homes, raised their families, and somehow between themselves resolved some of the differences they had.

It certainly is not easy for any of us in this House to discuss the situation we are now into, knowing that almost by the minute that it is changing. Television is running almost 24 hours a day now. It is an experience that none of us has had to go through. It has been distanced in the past, but this focuses it very closely on what is happening in today's world.

The Canadian Council of Veterans, in commenting on the present situation, remarked that Canada's veterans have worked long and hard for peace but that there comes a time when the principles and ideals for which we fought in previous wars must once again be defended. This is such a time.

I believe that Parliament has a duty to support the United Nations resolution as it is written, and therefore the resolution that is before this House. That we must use this terrible method of attempting to secure peace and stability throughout the world is a sad reflection on the ability of mankind to resolve our differences.

At the San Francisco conference that gave birth to the United Nations there was a vision of keeping the peace and collective security. This vision was strongly endorsed by Canada and resulted in articles being written into the United Nations charter, enabling member states to aid one another and repulse aggression if necessary by military means. Canada was there at the beginning, upholding the principle of collective security. The Persian Gulf is a crucial test for the United Nations and Canada must support it. With the benefits and security that hopefully go with membership to an organization such as this one also must go the responsibilities.

It was the failure of the League of Nations to respond effectively to aggression that led to its demise.

When Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait on August 2, the war in the gulf had effectively started. Reason and diplomacy were apparently not options that he was ever to consider seriously.

I think every effort was made. The United Nations, through its leadership, attempted every avenue open to it. There was diplomacy used here which gave Saddam Hussein every opportunity to stand back from the position he had taken and give the pause for peace we had so much hoped would occur. There was no indication that he would end the aggression and every indication that it was just a matter of time until it escalated.

While sanctions may have had an impact if applied rigidly and long enough, there was no guarantee that economic weakness would get Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. He appeared willing to let thousands of Iraqis and those in occupied Kuwait suffer before any effect would have been felt by the military.

I know there have been untold accounts of what may or may not have happened to improve the situation, to extend the deadline that was set. I have read a number of articles. I will quote from The Gazette of Montreal for Thursday, January 17, 1991:

> Those in Canada and elsewhere who suggest that the world faced a choice between war and peace missed an important consideration: peace now—if it did not include Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait—probably would not have meant peace forever, or even for very long. It would have meant complicity in Iraq's aggression, and the setting of a precedent that would encourage new aggression elsewhere. It would have meant acceptance of Saddam Hussein's evident plan to dominate the Middle East, regardless of the wishes of its inhabitants. Israel and Saudi Arabia had reason to fear his intentions. But Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, whose major sin, it seems, was to have lent Iraq a large sum for its war effort against Iran, shows that even Iraq's friends were not safe.
> Indeed, the choice probably was between war now and war later—against a stronger Iraq that could well be equipped with nuclear weapons. Economic sanctions have not worked, despite the fact that they succeeded in cutting off Iraq's oil exports, nor is there convincing reason to believe they would have worked quickly enough.
> The United Nations is about peace. But it is also about collective security. Canada would have been wrong to shirk its responsibilities.

Margaret Thatcher commented the other day that dictators never surrender but must be defeated. There will no doubt be continuing disputes between nations long after the events of the Middle East have come to pass, if they ever do. I think we must weigh in our own conscience our values and our love of this country. We must hope and pray we can resolve a difficult situation which has been made much more difficult by the fact that war has taken place.

Setting that aside, the UN with all of its imperfections is our last best hope for the security of the world.

Canadians everywhere have a right to express their feelings. I know that all of us, in our hearts and our wishes, hope for the same result, whether it is those of us in the House, people throughout the country or, I am sure, in other nations, that we can conclude what has taken place. War is probably the result of human frailty. Perhaps all of us have failed to a large degree, and some in smaller ways. But I guess all of us show that this is a result of failures by those of us in various levels of government, right across the scope of countries from one end of the world to the other.

• (1730)

I only hope and pray that soon all of us can look back on this and realize that there has to be a better way of conducting the affairs of the world. My sincere hope is that the United Nations is the avenue open to all of us.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I would ask the member who has just spoken, for whom I have a lot of respect, if he wishes to make any comments to the House about about how those nations, which form part of the allied force, will speak to the Arab world, the world of Islam, after the war.

While he is at it, I wanted to ask the Prime Minister today about an incident that took place this morning on a bus in Ottawa. A young person who is, I believe, of Arab origin, possibly Iraqi, got a bloody nose. Somebody who was on the bus says it was a very nasty incident. I wonder if he has constituents of Iraqi origin or other parts of the Arab world. Does he have any thoughts for them today as well?

Mr. Porter: Madam Speaker, I would like to say to my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast, that certainly I do believe we have some. There is not a large community of Arab people within the constituency, although I know of a number. Certainly incidents such as he mentioned are the types of things that all of us deplore.

I mentioned earlier about the prison camp and the people who are serving the military on the other side. I guess I have reason to feel that at that point in the hostilities, feelings perhaps were running as high as they are now. Yet I have seen a coming together or a melding of those societies. Young men who were prisoners of war came back to live in that community, and others who had served in the forces have come back and have learned to live and work together.

The scars are going to be deep; there is no question about it. I think if the situation remains as it is, with Arab forces on either side, there may be some hope for resolution afterwards. I think the more it goes on, the more we escalate the war that is going on. Should those forces become involved, it is going to make it much more difficult. I am sure right now for those people, the Arabs on either side, it is going to be very difficult. I do not know if there is ever a healing process. I guess there is not a healing process from the Second World War.

If one talks to the people in Lebanon, their views on what happened there, I am sure, will go on for generations. I am sure, as the hon. member has indicated, what is taking place today will probably remain. The views of those people regarding the way they view the rest of the world and perhaps the way they view us will probably be changed indelibly.

As for incidents such as the hon. member mentioned, it is my hope that we could rise above that kind of thing. I think we are Canadians first. We all come from different backgrounds and different walks of life. The fact that we came from somewhere else that is involved in a situation like this is, I think, something that any Canadian should be able to overlook at this time. I do thank the hon. member for his question.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Madam Speaker, this debate is fundamental, it is significant, and it may have consequences that none of us can foresee now. We are discussing a decision on Canada's support for UN resolution 678 and, most particularly, the involvement of our Canadian Armed Forces personnel in a military conflict. We are discussing a war that, like all wars, means death and destruction.

The decision was a perplexingly difficult one because it was so far removed from the usual Canadian sphere of experience. Today I believe you could count on the fingers of one hand the number of MPs in this present House of Commons who have served in wartime in Canada's Armed Forces, during either the Second World War or the Korean conflict, which ended more than 37 years ago.

This in itself says a great deal about our country, its role and attitude in world affairs. Our knowledge of war is either as a very distant memory or as history. By tradition, Canadians are not a militaristic or warlike people. Traditionally our peacetime armed forces are small in number and too often neglected, but also extremely professional, as they are once again showing at present.

I do not consider myself a hawk or to be in any way hawkish in my approach to international affairs; quite the contrary in fact. During my brief two years in the House, I have had the honour of representing Canada at discussions in Japan, which led up to the United Nations Agreement for Verification of Disarmament and Arms Reductions. I have made statements in this Chamber commending initiatives towards disarmament and for the reduction of nuclear weaponry. Recently, I was one of the country's representatives at the meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's parliamentary group in Britain.

The role of NATO has often been misunderstood. While it is essentially a military organization, it was never intended to be an aggressive force. NATO was founded, with Canada's renowned peacemaker Lester Pearson playing a leading role, as a means of guaranteeing peace through co-operative security agreements between the member nations. In that respect, NATO provided an unqualified success through the 40 years of the cold war. Though it is not recognized as such, perhaps Canada's greatest contribution as a world peacekeeper may well have been in helping to create and maintain the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Canada's reputation as a world peacekeeper goes back as far as the aftermath of the Suez crisis in 1956. We developed an enviable record in that regard in the Middle East and elsewhere in the succeeding years. Many have questions on whether we now might jeopardize all that through our present role in the Persian Gulf.

Here it is significant to look back to another important aspect of our nation's history. Though I have stated that by tradition we are neither warlike nor militaristic, Canada has been faced with the necessity of war and has been ever ready to do all or more than we were expected to do.

This was true particularly in the two world wars during the first half of this century. More than 600,000 Canadians participated in the First World War and one in 10 did not return. Our role in 1939 to 1945 was such that at its conclusion Canada had for the first and, we hope, the last time in our history a complete, full-scale army in Europe.

We had what probably was the world's third largest air force and fourth largest navy. This was no small commitment of achievement on our part because at that time we had approximately 12 million people. I do not speak boastingly of this, of course, though it should be a source of pride for Canadians.

• (1740)

My point is that Canada does have a proud tradition in peacekeeping and also of rising when necessary to join other nations in resisting aggression. I believe a similar necessity now faces us today.

I have listened especially to the arguments of those who claim that economic sanctions should have been given more time to prove their effectiveness against Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq. I wish I could agree with that view but, in my view, reality shows it to be different.

There are those who say that we should have attempted further negotiations with the Iraqi leader. Again, I personally and most sincerely wish that this was possible. But how can there be negotiations when he refuses to even discuss the basic demand of those arrayed against him that he leave Kuwait and restore it to its sovereignty? In recent days, he has rejected or ignored all the reasoned appeals from world leaders pleading with him to avoid an armed confrontation. Last night's unprovoked attack on Israel is a clear indication that peace and negotiations are not on his agenda.

This is not a crisis of blood for oil, as some would have us believe. "Blood for oil" is a catchy but dangerously simplistic slogan, an attempt to reduce the gulf crisis to a ridiculous common denominator. While the value of Kuwait's oil undoubtedly was a reason for the Iraqi invasion, that oil is of minimal importance to us in Canada. World oil prices have been affected, but no responsible world leader, and certainly not the United Nations, would confront Saddam Hussein just for that.

One disturbing effect of the whole discussion on the crisis in this chamber and elsewhere is the claim that our government is marching to war in some sort of lock-step with the United States administration in Washington. Sadly, I am coming to believe that there are those in Canada who, for whatever reason, so dislike our next-door neighbour that, when considering foreign policies, they first determine the U.S. position and then take the opposite. To such minds, if you agree with the U.S., you are therefore automatically wrong and are a lackey of Washington.

In the current situation, of course, this totally ignores the fact that the U.S. is one of 28 nations, as is Canada, supporting the United Nations in acting to thwart an act of naked aggression. As the largest and most powerful nation in the present world, the U.S. consequently has accepted a leading role in the gulf. The United States is not the villain; let us be clear about it. Nor is it the author of the current crisis in the gulf region. To suggest otherwise is to play into the hands of Saddam Hussein and his skilled propagandists.

Personally, I think we should be grateful that the United States has been willing to accept such a large portion of the responsibility and, as a democracy, has the ability to do so. I also personally think that we in Canada might be grateful that we have such a nation as our neighbour. Canadians would be thinking quite differently if we lived beside a regime such as that now governing Iraq.

I am sure that no one in this government or in this Parliament is at all comfortable with a decision such as this one committing our Canadian Armed Forces personnel to service in the region under armed combat. However, there comes a time when such decisions are necessary. If we are to fulfil our responsibilities and our obligations as a member of the United Nations, this is such a time.

It is a sad time, particularly when you think back to the sudden optimism we shared just one year ago. That was when the Berlin wall and the Iron Curtain came down. Nations of eastern Europe were emerging to enjoy new-found liberty. There were some who even wondered if there would be any future role for our armed forces. There is and it is that which we are now discussing.

Through the history of this country there have been many ifs, like haunting sign posts along the road as aggressors march to their rise in notoriety. What if Hitler had been blocked when he marched into the Rhineland or when he later demanded Czechoslovakia? What if Mussolini had been stopped from seizing Ethiopia?

Today we have the unique situation in which through the United Nations countries of the world are confronting and seek to turn back another such aggressor. Canada has a clear role and as parliamentarians we have no honest choice but to accept it.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I want to say I listened to my hon. colleague's comments and I know that he was speaking from his heart when he said on behalf of all of us we hope for a swift and very complete end to these hostilities.

He mentioned in his presentation that there are 28 countries involved in the American-led forces, or in the coalition in opposition to Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait, Canada being one of them. At the beginning of the combat there were four countries involved and now we are seeing others come in. I think the latest involvement includes perhaps nine different countries out of the 28. Right from the very beginning Canada had indicated its support militarily for the United States-led initiative and, of course, we have now seen in the last number of hours the commitment to CF-18s in terms of flying with the American B-52s in their carpet bombing of parts of Iraq.

My question is actually very straightforward to my friend and that is: Does he understand or perhaps what is his opinion why Canada was so quick off the mark as one of the handful of countries out of the coalition of 28 to get involved in a military commitment with the American forces?

Mr. Stevenson: Madam Speaker, at a briefing this morning, it was indicated that Canadian aircraft still have not taken part in any new role in the Middle East. They are still flying escort, if you will, for the shipping in the northern Persian Gulf. At the briefing today there was no request for Canadian aircraft to change their role. It is not clear at this point whether they will be asked to change their role.

I think it is significant that under the direction of the government and the Prime Minister the Canadian aircraft were obviously requested to stay out of the first waves of bombing that went over Iraq.

But we cannot back away from the fact that Canada has played a significant role in the United Nations for many years. We have fought in Korea along with other nations in an aggressive stance. We have taken on many occasions, as the member well knows, the peacekeeping role in other assignments in other parts of the world.

This is one further such assignment. Canada continues to play its role in the United Nations to support resolutions that were passed by all its members.

• (1750)

I trust that Canada will continue to do the same. I see no reason why Canada cannot, in the future, play a significant peacekeeping role in the situation after this war is over, and certainly in other future situations around the world.

This, in my opinion, will not change Canada's significant position in the United Nations currently or in the future.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his contribution in this particular debate.

I believe it essential that members of Parliament indicate their feelings and express to their constituents their particular perspective in this most serious situation.

We are, however, debating a resolution that reads as follows:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

The resolution itself, it seems to me, is not relevant because hostilities have indeed broken out. This particular resolution, of course, was put on the Order Paper before hostilities broke out a few days ago.

I would like to ask the hon. member whether he agrees that the resolution is academic at this point? Would he not agree that, at some point soon, this House should pass a resolution—hopefully unanimously—indicating its support for the troops that are presently in the Persian Gulf?

Mr. Stevenson: Madam Speaker, of course as the member says, we are reasserting the motion in front of us. We are reasserting support for motions that have been passed in this House on previous occasions.

We had discussions along the same lines in November. In fact, this Parliament was one of the first seats of government to pass such a resolution, and this is here now only to allow us as individual members to again express our views should we wish to.

This is not taking any particularly new position as far as this House is concerned. Certainly, I think most members here in their discussions have stated their support for our armed service personnel currently in the gulf.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, in July of 1990, I went to the Middle East.

I was rather uneasy but very consumed by anticipation and curiosity. I was going to the Holy Land. Little did I know that this was to be the journey of journeys. Little did I know the experience I would have, the emotions that would stay with me and, most of all, the people I would meet and the knowledge I would gain.

We all know that the Middle East question is one that is composed of a multiplicity of complex circumstances and factors some of which are so fundamentally ingrained and inextricably intertwined that even close examination is not sufficient to truly appreciate and understand the whole question.

I really did undergo a major political metamorphosis as I sat there that morning on the Mount of Olives overlooking the city of Jerusalem. I felt a great sense of personal peace and appreciation for the countryside.

I thought—as I stated earlier—as I stared over the landscape and spoke to the people with me on this day that I had come to a land of beginnings, enormous history and culture, never knowing that I would be facing a day like today when the city is filled with fear, anxiety, confusion and chaos. I was at a loss for words to describe my feelings as I was travelling throughout Israel. I met many people and went to many places; Beitzhour, to Ramallah to Beirzhit, the universities that were shut down for 36 months, to Jerusalem, to Bethlehem and to Jabalayia, to the heart of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to the refugee camps where 1.7 million people live in the most over-populated conditions.

It was to be a journey I would never forget. If I read about it or heard about it, or maybe if I had spoken to someone about it I might have doubts about what I saw, but from what I was already told, I had pictures floating by my eyes as we travelled through the refugee camps. When you see those things for yourself, when you see those conditions, and when you talk to those people, and break bread with those people, and you open your mind not only to your sense of history but to the present circumstances and conditions and the future expectations of those people, all of those diverse groups, it really is quite a different story.

You feel the sense of alienation. You feel the sense of frustration. You feel the sense that these people have a struggle, that each and every one of them is involved, from the youngest child who can walk to the oldest person who can carry something, they are all involved in the human struggle for survival.

And I wonder as I stand here today, Madam Speaker, why all the bravado? Why all the rhetoric about power and about war? Why all the euphoric mesmerization with war? Why is it that we look at the science of destruction and see it as something to be admired, when leaders who have had experience with war and who have probed the questions of how to obtain peace have questions remaining and have lived their lives without answers to questions like places in the Middle East?

Madam Speaker, there are many people involved in this war, including us who have been thrown into this situation. There are people there now who are Canadian citizens and my caring thoughts are with those people and their families. I have a press release here from the Grand Chief of the Mohawks, Chief Joe Norton and he says the Mohawks of Kahnawake have approximately 22 men presently in Kuwait fighting with the United States Armed Forces against Saddam Hussein's Kuwaiti army. These men were among the first to be sent to the American lines before Christmas. As well there are a number of Mohawk men in the Persian Gulf with the United States Marines.

He goes on to say that the United States Army initiated a huge recruiting drive to persuade Mohawk men to join the U.S. Army in 1990. Mohawk men, according to the U.S. Army recruiting officers are sought by the Americans because they are known for their fearlessness, fighting capabilities, and bravery.

There are many such Canadians and other people over there who have been thrown into this war, who have had put before them some very difficult questions.

I guess I should say that those Canadians are watching this debate in Parliament with anxiety and fear as we have watched the events unfold in the gulf. I guess it is good to say we are involved in a debate that few of us have experience with because we have no experience with the previous world wars. Many of us have no experience in understanding the goings on of military activities and the strategies thereof.

But we have an appreciation for two things perhaps. One, we have an appreciation for the fact that we live in a peaceful country, that we have peace in Canada. We live in a democratic country. We have people out there. It is not just the military and the families that are out there, we also have journalists. There is always the friendly battle between journalists and politicians; we have people like Eric Rankin. We have people like Jim O'Connell and Brian Stewart. These people, in doing their jobs, risk their lives. They go out there to bring us the message and to bring us the news. I know journalists. Their oath is to the truth and to bring the facts to us. Those people are also out there.

Here we are debating the crisis in the Persian Gulf, but I feel that we are a bit late. I also feel that this particular motion is redundant. I believe that we should have been here within the last 10 days, not within the last three days. I believe that many of the things we have wanted to say have been cast aside because circumstances have so drastically changed.

I believe that Parliament must be given explicit right to debate a governmental action to commit Canandians to a potential war zone "before"—and I underline and underscore—"before they are dispatched". I believe that Canada has more to offer to peacekeeping than to war. Perhaps it is my fault. Perhaps it is the way I perceive things that will not allow me to accept anything other than a true struggle for peace. In my heart I believe that peace has to be our objective.

Canada's longstanding commitment to multilateralism and support for international institutions has given Canada a level of credibility matched by few countries. That is what we have to offer this arena.

You heard the Prime Minister today, Madam Speaker, say, "We are not a superpower. We are not a major deterrent". That is what the Prime Minister stated today.

Just look at the lead role taken by Pierre Trudeau and his peace initiative in 1983 to 1984. Let me quote Mr.

Trudeau. "If our future depended on Canadians alone, we could be confident that it was safe and sound. But no nation today holds its future securely in its own hands. We share this planet with about 160 other nations, all of whom interact with us in a global system, embracing our security, our economy, the health of our environment and the quality of our lives."

I do not want to focus on hindsight at this point but the question is on many of our minds. Did we really put enough effort into diplomacy? Will we ever know? We never had a report from the United Nations telling us that we had exhausted all possibilities.

Those statistics were not released to us or to our Canadian citizens. We will not know. How can we disprove what the government side has to say? How can they disprove what we hold as our position that perhaps we should have held out for more negotiations and for diplomacy to work and for sanctions to work. We will never know. That is the sad situation we are in today.

Only a year ago, citizens throughout the world had high expectations for peace. I had phone calls from Germany the night before the Berlin wall came down. We were at the German embassy, having supper, discussing the possibility of the reunification of Germany. What an exciting debate that was. The next day the wall came down. The cold war was coming to an end.

Today we are faced with a crisis in the new and short lived international order. The Berlin wall is down and the cold war is ended, but just a short year later on August 2, within three hours the situation was quite different. Iraqi troops accomplished their objectives. The Government of Kuwait was overthrown and Iraq was in control.

During the Vietnam War it took a considerable period of time for the American public to come forward in peace rallies to really wrap their minds around what they wanted and what they did not want with the Vietnam war. We had numerous peace rallies across Canada. It did not take that long. We had one that I hold dear to my heart because 10 students in my riding got together and organized a peace rally. We had 400 people in Yellowknife at minus 40 degrees Celsius in support of peace and many calls and letters from my constituents. My constituents believe that war was not the only option left to us in the Persian Gulf. That is a belief. That is not something that I am using to hurt anybody or to insult anybody. It is something that people believe in. They believe as I do, that sanctions and diplomacy could have achieved our objectives.

Are we so short on leadership, hope and ideals that we have forever rendered the use of sanctions and diplomacy useless? Can we ever expect them to work? Will there ever be the credibility to try and force them in the future? That is a huge question. We have run the risk of losing that particular tool in a crisis in the future. It is interesting to note that today there are numerous peace rallies being held all over the place and people have questions. I ask myself, what will this movement be like if the war becomes unmanageable or has it become unmanageable?

What we have seen in the initial operation is that this war in the Persian Gulf will be like no other war. It will be unparallelled with its intensity and furore. We saw the television clippings of Baghdad lit up like a Christmas tree. There is no joy in that. American power will be unrestrained this time. This time I believe there are no limits. We know that there have been at least 100 bombing runs. This is the beginning of the air portion of the campaign. There has yet to be a ground operation which I feel could be much more devastating in terms of casualities. I believe this is only the beginning and that we have sadly underestimated the capacity that is there for the destruction of human life and for the destruction of a civilization and for the impact that it has on the world psyche in terms of peace.

Canada needs to provide a humanitarian role. Today, there are thousands of refugees running from Iraq. They are fleeing to Iran, of all places. After an eight-year war between Iran and Iraq those refugees are fleeing to Iran. War does not make sense. Refugees need our assistance. Canada must also provide food aid.

I want to take a few minutes to look at the issue. It is not black and white like many have portrayed. I believe that the Secretary of State learned when he travelled to the Middle East that there are some legitimate concerns within the region, such as Iraq's access to the sea. On the other hand, we are dealing with Saddam Hussein.

Saddam Hussein, as everyone knows, has gone to war twice in the past 10 years. He is a man who has grown up with the mentality of a revolutionist and he still is. That is the approach he has endorsed. That is the thinking of this man. In the countryside of the Middle East there has always been the opportunity for violence, and there still is, even when I was in the Middle East last summer.

When Hussein was a young teenager he joined the revolution and I believe that he has stayed there ever since. We have seen Iraqi TV showing pictures of him as a defiant person the day after rallying his troops. He is a Third World leader who wants his hands on the economic jugular of the entire world. He is determined to dominate the Middle East. We knew about his greed for money and for power. That is why the world united in supporting economic sanctions and very eloquently so. I cannot believe that we have done such a fast turnaround. I simply cannot believe the words that were expressed by a number of people, especially leaders in the States, who first endorsed economic sanctions and who—including Senator Edward Kennedy—said to Canadians that we had to give sanctions a chance. The President and Mr. Baker were people who sincerely endorsed sanctions and appealed to everyone involved to give sanctions a chance. Well, we have gone beyond that. We know it. But I believe in my heart that we will never know for sure because we have taken that pre-emptive step in aligning ourselves with our neighbours.

Although you will not hear it from those who wanted to proceed immdiately with military force, the economic sanctions were working to minimize Hussein's power. His exports were all gone; 90 per cent of his imports had been stopped and Hussein was quickly running our of revenue and currency.

We also need to understand that there will be thousands of casualties, maybe tens of thousands. Canada must provide medical and support services to those victims.

We also need to understand the ecological impact of this war. There are over 1,000 oil wells in Kuwait, 350 of which are pressurized, which means if they cannot be blown out and capped they will cause very intense fire storms; 10 million gallons of oil will burn daily; 500,000 tonnes of ash will move to the upper skies adding to the the carbon dioxide buildup, creating holes in the ozone, obstructing sunlight which will force the temperature down.

Canada has the technology and must help to manage these environmental disasters.

It is certain that the financial cost of war will be billions and billions of dollars. The quote I was given is that it costs $3 billion a day.

In conclusion, I would like to end my speech by reading a quotation I think is quite effective.

Canadians know that our security cannot be achieved in isolation or the security of any country, but we have the responsibility to ensure that all our global problems are tackled, not in a combative mode, but through co-operation.

War is the science of destruction and it cannot be stated better than this. A great world leader once said:

> When people speak to you about a preventative war, you tell them to go and fight it. After my experience, I have come to hate war. War settles nothing.
> Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I appreciated very much the speech by the hon. member. I do agree with her that war does not solve any problems. I think we should have let sanctions take their place and work. It may have taken about six months and at that point Mr. Hussein would have probably given up.

I would like to ask the member a question. Does she think the Americans gave the wrong signal to Iraq, when the American Ambassador, April Glaspie, said to Mr. Hussein, and I quote:

> We have no opinion on the Arab conflict, like your border disagreement with Kuwait.

This is what the Abassador of the United States said to Mr. Hussein on July 25. Did she think this was a signal to Mr. Hussein that he could invade Kuwait and is there a responsibility on the part of the United States that this happened?

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, I must admit that I would be one who would be the last to ever be able to understand how the Americans make their decisions and how perhaps someone like Saddam Hussein would respond and would have motive to respond. I must say that I have a lot of questions of my own that are similar. I do not know if the wrong signal was given but I feel in my heart that if we are going to talk about what we might term motives, then from the very onset of this whole conflict American involvement is something that I fail to understand. I have failed to fully appreciate it, if I might put it that way.

I always felt the Americans would strike first. I felt particularly sad because I felt for countries like Jordan that are compromised or countries like Israel that would become targets.

That is why I felt so strongly that perhaps we have underestimated the capacity to have prolonged peace instead of starting wars by not allowing diplomacy, the full range of whatever leadership capabilities there are, to take on an effective role and for sanctions to have worked to have allowed that. If that was not happening, why were we not told specifically and explicitly that it was not working and the reasons why?

In terms of this specific question, I cannot pretend to guess at what the motives of the Americans are. I can only look at what has happened. I cannot look back to even the Iraq-Iran war. My colleague, Mr. Barrett, who was here over half an hour ago—

An hon. member: Who made a fantastic speech.

Ms. Blondin: —talked about the Iraq-Iran war and motives not just of the Americans, but of the Soviet Union, in a number of places throughout the world. I cannot say that I fully appreciate. I cannot say that that was the reason why, but people do have questions about why there is involvement. People do have questions about how many perpetrators there are in a war. There is not just one. There are many. How many fingers are on the trigger of the gun? There are many.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I appreciated the remarks of my hon. friend. They were timely and very thoughtful. I was particularly moved by her comments on how this whole horrible mistake was a reflection of missed diplomatic initiatives and her concern that perhaps enough attention had not been given to sanctions, but also a wide range of other diplomatic initiatives that hopefully could have convinced Saddam Hussein to remove his forces from Kuwait.

I think that she will share with me a feeling that the United Nations has missed an opportunity. We were relieved at the end of the cold war and felt that the United Nations hopefully could play a different role in terms of really seriously solving these international disputes when they came up.

I wonder if she would share her views. Does she feel, as many of us I think do, that the United States in a sense uses influence to such an extent that resolutions are moved in the United Nations that some feel are not only inappropriate but go against the charter of the United Nations. Further, that really we missed an opportunity by simply going to war, by mobilizing allied forces to go in and crush in such a brutal way the Iraqi military and that we raced in as we have done in the past. We know that we do not solve the problems. We perhaps even make greater problems for the future by doing that. Yet we have missed an opportunity with a revitalized and more meaningful United Nations because of this particular action.

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the very poignant questions and comments that my colleague has made and I must say that there is an uneasiness about the role in which key players have engaged in this whole crisis. The United States is one of them, but Canada is another. We are thrown into a situation where I really believe we will never know for sure the opportunity that was missed, but I guess you can say that we live to fight another day and to see other opportunities.

The United Nations and our government have the responsibility to encourage member nations to engage in activities that would perhaps reprofile the activities that the United Nations engages in for the security and freedom of countries and the maintenance thereof. I think that is something for which we would hope. Perhaps it is time for a conference as one of my colleagues stated. I have believed, since I went to the Middle East, that the United Nations could spearhead a conference on the Middle East that would deal with very difficult questions. They are not simple, they are very, very difficult questions. The Palestinian question, I believe, is not just a problem for the Palestinians; it is a problem for the world, for all of us to try to work at and with which we can deal.

In this particular crisis, we have indeed missed an opportunity and I believe there was ambiguity. I believe that many people have very many doubts about why that ambiguity existed, whether it was self-serving on the part of one member state.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I am grateful to the member who was on the government side who did not stand up just now although it was the government's turn to debate and to the Liberal member from York South—Weston who was to speak and who let me go ahead because I have some ill children at home.

Despite its very imprecise wording, most Canadians probably think that we are here debating whether our Armed Forces should be an active part of the invasion against Iraq. Given that some of the 1850 of our fellow citizens present in the gulf are already taking an active part in the war that is fully under way, we all pray that it is almost over. We saw last night in the case of the missiles sent to Israel that anything can happen and we all pray that anything will not happen.

I think that many Canadians must think that this debate has become so superseded by events as to have become irrelevant, redundant and ludicrous. The reason that the debate continues, I believe, is that enough of us here feel that somehow as the debate winds and turns and twists with changing events in the war,—and I think we are all very grateful to the hon. member for Calgary Northeast because I believe it was only he who prevented the House from adjourning last night,—but somehow as the debate carries on and turns and rolls, it gives us a chance to keep sitting here as legislators and elected people from all across Canada to continue to debate the dominant issue of our time.

I think many of us feel that we should be here rather than home. We should be here sitting every day, questioning the government during Question Period and somehow try to address our minds to the issue that is dominating Canadians from sea to sea to sea.

Under a House order, I understand that when nobody else gets up in this debate whether tonight, tomorrow morning, Sunday morning or whenever, the debate is over. A vote is to be held only if all three party leaders agree sometime next week.

Whenever it will happen that the three party leaders agree, of course, remains to be seen. On the issue of the vote, I am one of those who thinks that it would not be useful to have a vote on the matter, but it is not my decision to make.

I might put on the record my understanding of what some legislators elsewhere have done since war began among the members of the coalition. I only have a few to bring information on, but the House might be interested to know that the United States Senate voted, as I am sure most members know, 52 to 47 in favour of authorizing the President to go to war before the war began.

A vote held in the last few days—I believe it was yesterday—was 98 to zero in favour of going to war. The House of Commons in Britain remains in session as the war proceeds, and I think that is of interest to all of us. I hope ours will, too, one way or another.

The House of Commons in Britain voted 600 in favour of war and 57 against. I am told that Italy and France have done the same sort of thing with the same sort of numbers, but I do not have the figures. Italy voted yesterday. France also voted.

You may say: "What about Japan and Germany?" Those countries have no forces on duty there, and neither of those Parliaments have held a vote on the issue.

People wonder how Parliament gets involved in the requirements of the National Defence Act and our new Emergencies Act. I am told and I believe that the declaration of a state of war must be done by a proclamation of the Governor-General of Canada. Similarly, the invoking of emergency powers is legally done by cabinet order.

It appears that the cabinet intends to do neither of those. The Solicitor General indicated today he did not foresee, at this point, the Emergencies Act. Is it not all academic now that up to 2,000 planes a day are flying over Iraq? What about the lives of those 1,850 fellow Canadians who are exposed there?

Now that hostilities have begun and we are fully involved, how can any of us vote against this motion if it comes to a vote in the very vague, ambiguous language it is in. Maybe that is a good reason for not having a vote. I know there is a strong difference of opinion on that.

Every member of this House from every seat and every corner of the country wishes all the members of our Armed Forces a safe return to their families and homes in this country. They will have our full and unanimous support now, I hope. If a withdrawal of Canadian personnel were to create greater risk for personnel from the other countries involved, I think they should now stay.

It may be of interest for you to know, Madam Speaker, that opinion against Canada taking an active part in the war was running strongly against in Southeast Edmonton. My calls were about eight to one against having Canada participate actively in the war.

An estimated 2,000 Edmontonians attended a rally near Edmonton City Hall against the war over the last weekend. Thousands of others have demonstrated across the country, including Ottawa.

There was an audience of almost 200 at a conference on children at the University of Alberta last weekend. I asked if they would indicate by a hand vote how many of them favoured Canada participating in this war actively, and not a single person raised his or her hand.

• (1830)

Presumably, one of the reasons why the people at that conference were opposed to it was the sentiment by the Canadian Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War that more children than soldiers will die if war breaks out as, of course, it has. I understand that almost half of Iraq's population, because of the Iran-Iraq war and other factors, is now under the age of 15 years and it would appear that the physicians are correct, far more children will die than soldiers.

Those of us in this Chamber who were opposed to the adoption of the unamended motion, before war broke out—I took the motion to read in the context before the multilateral forces could begin war in Iraq—should not fudge on the horrors since August 2 in Saddam Hussein's self-declared 19th province of Kuwait. To the best of my knowledge, the consequences for Kuwaiti citizens and other residents have included more than 500,000 of them fleeing the country. Amnesty International says that Iraqi soldiers have murdered hundreds of unarmed residents and hundreds more have vanished in detention. There are 38 different methods of torture used by the Iraqi occupiers according to Amnesty International. More than 300 premature babies, and I think this has probably bothered Canadians more than anything, are believed to have died when the invaders seized their incubators for shipment to Baghdad. In short, the military followers of Saddam Hussein, in recent months, have forfeited sympathy from people of good-will everywhere. They have violated every principle for which Canada, the United Nations, and public international law have struggled for decades.

Why then was I not able to bring myself to support the use of force against such a madman a few days ago? First, because I think war should come only after there is no further reasonable hope that sanctions will work. Until war began, we could still hope that a full economic embargo and blockade would force Hussein to leave Kuwait completely. I would cite here some of the conclusions in a recent article, co-authored by the highly respected Gary Hufbauer. He writes: "The available evidence indicates that UN sanctions will begin to bite by this coming spring or early summer with a 'high probability of forcing Iraq from Kuwait, as early as the fall'. War might prove quicker but the costs of an attack include the costs probably of thousands of lives", mostly Iraqis, I suspect. Hufbauer went on to say: "Iraq is highly vulnerable to sanctions because of its geography, the nature of its economy and the full, unprecedented co-operation of the sanctioning nations. Specifically, Iraq's only export, as we all know, is oil and that product constitutes nearly half of its GNP. Despite Hussein's exceptionally brutal and complete control of his people, therefore the probability of success of a complete embargo over time", in Hufbauer's view remains over 85 per cent.

Contrary to the view which we have heard much of here, Madam Speaker, that sanctions do not move tyrants, they have been used successfully against ones of many different strips. In the early 1980s, American sanctions contributed to General Jaruzelski's decision to release political prisons and ease regression in Poland. Economic sanctions have also contributed, at least to a limited degree, to the downfalls during the 1960s of Trujillo in the Dominican Republic, Ngo Diem in Vietnam and, during the 1970s, to the fall of Idi Amin in Uganda and Anastasio Samoza in Nicaragua. Mussolini is believed to have confided to Hitler that, had the League of Nations included oil in its sanctions against Italy in 1935-36, he would have been forced to withdraw from Ethiopia within a week.

Finally, a very important issue is that of the United Nations institution and its role in the world today. I believe too many people in the world think that this is a United Nations war; it is not. It is true that the United Nations charter allows the use of force but only as a last resort. In this case, I believe that the Security Council resolution 678 of November 29, 1990, should not have been passed unless and until the sanctions had been given a reasonable chance to work. Geoffrey Grenville-Wood, the National President of the UN Association in Canada, put it very well, the other day when he said: "It was a bad resolution, bad for the United Nations and bad for world peace".

There are so many possible consequences to the position in which the United Nations now finds itself. For one, instead of using the situation for the United Nations as an opportunity to bring in a permanent policy of isolating and embargoing tyrants and invaders, this will become a precedent for the United Nations using violence, killing children and all kinds of horrors that go with war. As somebody who believes strongly in the United Nations, I am profoundly unahappy that that is what is likely to happen.

I might, Madam Chairman, point out here that the United Nations Association in Canada, which ironically enough seems to be the most vocal critic of the United Nations role in this matter, is an organization to promote the UN. In our country, it is strongly felt that it has become a very effective critic of the United Nations, particularly of the Security Council resolution I just referred to.

This association wrote yesterday to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I do not know if it is proper for me to quote from the letter. It is addressed to him. He is not here to speak to the matter himself, but let me say in fairness, that the United Nations Association in Canada is profoundly unhappy with what is happening, how it is happening and how the United Nations performed in this matter.

I do not know that there is much more that I wish to say. In conclusion, we are now in a war. I know that my friends in the New Democratic Party think that you can draw a distinction between the less than 10 nations who have already participated in the air attacks on Iraq. They and others in this House, I suspect, do not want Canada to be involved with air attacks on Iraq.

As I indicated in my talk, I am afraid that now that we are into it, as much as many of us in this House—at least on this side—did not want to see war break out, I salute the Leader of the Liberal Party for having withdrawn his position that the Canadian troops should withdraw if an act of war broke out. I do not think now, as much as I said in my speech, it is going to be children and civilians that are going to die in the greatest numbers because of this war.

Mr. Hussein said that they are going to fight to the last child. I understand that as of today his wife and children have been moved out of Iraq. I am sure that the last child to die in Iraq will not be one of his. It is always one of the tragedies of dealing with tyrants of this nature.

I think what it comes to is that if a vote is held on this matter, I will vote for it but subject to the points I already have made.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I guess it is a comment and a question.

I am interested in the hon. member's conclusion. I do respect the sincerity of the member's comments, but obviously the nation of Iraq under the control of the madman we have all heard and seen, Saddam Hussein, has inflicted untold misery on his people over the years. In fact, they tell us that during the eight and a half year struggle with Iran—a war that he inflicted on his own people in a sense—cost the two countries something in the order of one million lives. They tell me that it has been ongoing torture for his own people since 1968 when he took control of that country.

My question is simply this. How do we as an international group, and citizens of the world, like the right hon. member of Quadra said the other day react with to madmen such as this, if it is not through a united effort and indeed, Madam Speaker, through the United Nations?

• (1840)

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his question and I know from television last night that he has a son who is engaged in the war and so his position is all the more significant than those of us who do not have children in the war. If I had a son or daughter in the war I guess I would be all the more tormented than I am sure he is. I respect very much the sincerity with which he holds his view.

One point that is probably worth making is that if the west, and there are a number of countries which I do not need to name, had not provided arms, the latest weapons, the uniforms, the jets, the fighters, the bombs, to both sides—as the member I am sure knows, some countries were providing it equally to both sides—during that horrible war, maybe that war would have been suffocated. Some countries in the west have a very direct involvement in that because, in effect, they were stoking the fires.

We should be ashamed of that. I knew a man—he is dead now—who was a Muslim who said to me one day that if the west wanted it could stop that war in three weeks. But we did not, we did nothing as far as I can see. For every one of those people who died in the war some countries in the west have a direct responsibility for that.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for his very candid remarks. It is a very difficult deliberation that we endure in dealing with this issue.

I would like to ask him, with his experience as a parliamentarian, how much latitude he feels Canada will have in engaging in peace initiatives and engaging in a role as peacemaker and mediator if need be in the whole crisis or perhaps in a post-war scenario. What role will Canada be able to perform or be welcome to perform if we do not cease the kind of rhetorical bravado we engage in in our condemnations? Is that the role that we should continue to play? Should we continue to make our pronouncements so provocative and so inflammatory that it would limit perhaps our opportunity to resume our traditional role of peacemaker and mediator?

Mr. Kilgour: That is an excellent question, Madam Speaker. Another way of saying it is if we win, we lose. What is going to happen to Canada in the region? Assuming that Iraq is beaten quickly there is going to be a turmoil, instability, enormous nationalism, enormous animus against the countries that participated in this coalition. Is Israel going to be better off after this? Is Syria going to take over part of Iraq? Who knows what genii are going to come out of what bottles after this happens, after Mr. Hussein is removed.

I agree that we should tone down the rhetoric. I mentioned before, and I do not know if the hon. member was here, the young person who was beaten on a bus in Ottawa. I have constituents from Iraq and I am sure that most of them came to Canada to get away from Saddam Hussein.

Canada's role is going to be diminished by this in terms of being a peacemaker. Our stature is going to fall in the world. There is no doubt about it. We are going to be seen as being simply the little brother or the little sister of pax Americanna. We cannot tell our men and women there now to get out, leave your tents and get on the next plane back to Canada. We would be the laughing stock of the 28 countries in the coalition and of the world if we did that. I guess I can be permitted to mention that the words inscribed on the stone out there by John McCrae from In Flanders Field. He happens to be my grandmother's brother and our family hero. He is our biggest family hero, I think. Those words "if you break faith with us who die, we shall not sleep though poppies grow in Flanders Field". How can we live up to John McCrae's wish for Canada if we tell our people now they have to get out?

On the question of whether we can tell them not to take an active part in the raids over Baghdad, and I am inclined as the member knows to think we should not be taking an active part with the CF-18s and that kind of thing. We would be accused of cutting and running now and I am glad the hon. member for Saint-Denis seems to agree.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I have the greatest admiration for my colleague from Edmonton Southeast who has just spoken. I particularly listened to the philosophic point of view that he is able to bring with his wonderful background and knowledge. Frankly, it is Friday night, the Sabbath has fallen and normally I would be with my family having cooked a Sabbath meal and lit the Sabbath candles and said our prayers. I really cannot go today and my family, my husband, my mom and dad will have to manage with their own soup and matzo balls, regretfully is all I can say.

I really feel that this in a sense is where we should be trying to find what the next step, the next move is going to be for the hon. member for Saint-Denis and myself, the hon. member for Mount Royal, into some discussions that are not going to be easy, but hopefully will be fruitful. I certainly say to you in this House and to you, the hon. member for Saint-Denis, that I appreciate and I understand the role and support you give to your Palestinian perspective. I know you will accord me the same right and I think we both respect the rights of all peoples, Israeli and Palestinian, to live in peace and harmony together. I know that he has spoken in that respect in the international arena. As I was standing here and thinking about this, I was wondering—

Mr. Prud'homme: The honourable lady said I understand the feeling of the hon. member for Saint-Denis for the Palestinian. That is a debate. You must understand my feeling for Israel, too, because if I let an hour go by people will say there is one sided Prud'homme versus one-sided lady, and you know I will not accept that. I am a Canadian. I believe in peace and justice for all and in the Middle East peace and justice for all means all! She was with me internationally when I made sure Canadians try with 1,000 international people to vote you know how. If you accept this, you should be complete. Members voting against Iraq for having used gas, I am the one who did that. It is not other members. Be complete but do not put me in this debate with you.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think it would be wise for hon. members to get into debate as our rules suggest.

• (1850)

As we know, it has been like this all day, nerves are very frayed and emotions run very high.

Mr. Prud'homme: Oh, no, I am very cool.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will not comment on the hon. member's comment.

Mr. Prud'homme: But I will not let anything go by anymore.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Actually, the period for question and answer is over. I would ask the hon. member for Mount Royal to conclude very quickly, please.

Mrs. Finestone: I had no intention of misquoting my colleague in any way. I was really trying to get from my hon. colleague, the member for Edmonton Southeast, who was speaking if he sensed that same feeling of powerlessness that I feel sitting here tonight at a moment when the whole issue of this debate is redundant. We are at war. Israel is at risk. Those families who should be sitting down to a happy Sabbath dinner are wondering if the bomb is going to fall, when, where and how. I cannot stop it and it is of great concern and I wonder if he feels as powerless as I do?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Rather quickly, please. The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, I do. The terrible thing is that it is a high holiday today. Knowing the person who is pushing the buttons to send the missiles, if he has any more mobile Scud missiles, what is he going to do tonight? Is he going to send chemical missiles, if he has any left? It is hard to contemplate that these kinds of things could be going on at the end of the 20th Century.

May I just add before I am cut off that I personally was delighted to see that the member for Saint-Denis, was reaching out, perhaps not in a gentle way, but to try to show that he was not in dispute with the member for Mount Royal. I hope that as time goes by those members will continue to reach out to each other. I salute both of them for doing it. I hope it continues in the future.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I want to begin by saying that I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate, although I wish, as other members do, to be very frank, that this debate was not necessary.

It has been a very difficult and very disturbing week for all citizens of the world, for Canadians and certainly for members of Parliament.

I would like to begin by reassuring all Canadians, particularly those from Brandon—Souris whom I have the honour to represent that the decision on this motion is not one which any member of this Parliament, irrespective of party, takes lightly.

I am certain there is no one in this country who wants a war. The reality that as of the other evening that we are again at war, is one which has spawned an obvious sense of mental fatigue and mental depression here on the Hill and elsewhere in the country.

The coming down of the Berlin wall occurred so quickly it was almost an unbelievable achievement. That led many to conclude and to hope that the type of hostilities which had characterized the earlier parts of the century, the 1930s and the 1940s and since then the cold war, Korea, would not again be necessary. The despair that has resulted from the fact that we are now at war is evident in the House. I think it has been evident today because we have not had our finest moments in this House today, I am sorry to say. It is evident in the faces of members in the House. I sense it in the employees of the Hill when I talk to members of the maintenance staff. I sense it in the faces of the young people who serve the House as Pages.

I would like to note categorically the fact that much of the world is again at war is evidence of failure. It is evidence of our failure as nations and as people to resolve our differences by other means. I think this is a particularly difficult failure for many people to understand, and particularly for young people to understand. Twice during the course of the week there were large groups who came to visit my constituency office. I wanted to say to them that I understand their apprehension with what was then the possibility of war and with the reality of war that is here now.

One of the things I guess that troubles me a little bit about this debate is the fact that to a significant degree those of us who are participating in this debate are perhaps older than we would wish to be, and perhaps we are conscious of our age at a time like this because we are conscious of the fact that chronologically we are not able to represent in a physical sense, particularly those young Canadians who are so concerned.

To them I would say I believe I understand their fears and apprehensions and maybe try to say that I believe that because I too was once young. I remember being very young during World War II, watching with nervousness the events there, even though I was only a child who was well aware of the fact that my uncle was there; he had been wounded and had malaria; and the immense excitement when I found out he was coming home. I remember following the Korean war with a great degree of detail, even though we did not have the communication devices available to us then as we have now.

I think I can understand in that sense the feelings of youth. I would also say that when I approach this debate I am very conscious of the fact that I speak as a father. I am very proud to be able to say that my two daughters are in the gallery watching as I speak.

So to my youthful constituents, I am very sincere when I say that I understand their concerns and I hope that we can prove that we understand their concerns even though we may not always agree.

There is something particularly numbing about this war, due to the fact that it is so vivid before our eyes. As I sat in the lobby this afternoon, I watched live television from Tel Aviv and from Jerusalem, two communities I have had the opportunity to visit. I watched the journalists live as they listened to the sirens, sirens that they could hear and I could hear, thanks to television. I watched them put on the gas masks and then with relief remove them again because the alarms tonight so far at least have proven to be false.

Live television certainly brings us closer to the war than we, as Canadians, would otherwise be. I think we have to be conscious of the fact that, however, while the war seems to be taking place in our living room, we are still distant from it. Fortunately for us we are distant from the grossness that is war and may we always have that privilege of being distant from it.

I am conscious, however, that there are residents of my constituency somewhere in the Middle East, somewhere in the Persian Gulf. Some have been there and came back, having volunteered to go. I am conscious of the fact that I have a constituent in Brandon who has family in Baghdad as of this moment. He, who is from that city, watches with a special fear and awareness as to what the reality of the war may be.

I am also conscious of the fact that although we are devoured by this particular crisis, and indeed it is a crisis of immense proportion, there are other wars occuring in the global community today that we should not forget, even though we tend to do so. I had plans now changed because of the crisis in the Gulf to be visiting part of the horn of Africa next week. There are civil wars in Ethiopia, in Somalia, in Sudan, to name but three as well as famines in those areas which may take many, many lives. In our resolve to deal with the crisis in the Persian Gulf I hope we are reminded of the fact that there are other ongoing conflicts which need our attention, even though we are not inclined to be as conscious of them.

We must also pay some attention to the question, why is this struggle and debate taking place and how should we be responding to it. The key point on which we all agree is that we wish there was no need for war. However, the war to which we refer really began on August 2. The question in many countries of the world, despite what the newspapers may have been telling us these last few days, was not whether or not some nation would commence a war but is how we would respond to a war that began some five or so months ago. That war began for a variety of reasons when the Iraqi forces led by Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait.

I firmly believe that the real key to world security and peace lies in the principle of collective security. I believe—and I know there are differences on this point within this House—that the principle of collective security has been tested these last few weeks and days. The principle of collective security, as I understand it, requires that all members of that community who are part of that pact respond to those who are in need and to those who are the victims of aggression.

One of our difficulties in Canada these last few days has been the fact that Kuwait is a long way away, that most of us know nothing of this nation which was invaded last summer. I suspect many people had almost forgotten about the invasion, forgotten about the occupation and forgotten about the aggression. The principle of collective security to me suggests that we, as members of the United Nations, or as members of the global community, have a moral responsibility, as well as a military and political responsibility, to respond to those who are the victims of aggression. If we turn the other cheek and ignore this invasion, as some of my constituents have suggested we should, not only do we fail those who live in Kuwait and those who are victims of this aggression, but we would fail the very principle of collective security, we would fail part of the undertakings which we accepted when we joined the United Nations.

As I think about the events which have been unfolding these last few days, I am reminded of my own historical studies. I spent a fair amount of time studying European diplomatic history. Curiously, my masters thesis at the University of Oregon was on British pacifism which was so closely interrelated to the appeasement policies of 1930s. In my mind it was directly related to the outbreak of war in 1939. As I look at this part of history, I cannot help but remember the great future which so many people felt existed for the League of Nations at the end of World War I. They dreamed that we could put together a new world community to help ensure that the holocaust that was World War I would never have to be relived again.

One of the great difficulties of a world organization such as the League of Nations or the United Nations, is the fact that it places upon its members obligations to come to the assistance of others who may be distant or not well understood.

To some degree, it requires a willingness on the part of those nations to give up part of their sovereign decision making powers. When the League was tested, as it was on several different occasions in the 1930s, and when the world community was tested by the aggressions which occurred then, the world community failed to respond.

In our failure to respond to the invasion of Manchuria in 1931, in our inability to respond adequately to the invasion by Mussolini of Abyssinia or Ethiopia in 1935, in our failure to deal with the Hitler of 1936 at the time of the occupation of the Rhineland, or later when he invaded Czechoslovakia in 1938, a serious mistake was made. Not only did those who were making decisions at that time, in my mind, fail their brother nations elsewhere in the world, not only did they fail to respond adequately to the aggression which was occurring, they also failed the very principle of collective security. In doing so, they helped destroy whatever hope remained for the League of Nations.

The tragedy of those several failures was that those aggressor nations clearly were encouraged by the failures of others to respond to their aggression. They concluded in that lack of response that those who would oppose them were weak, and they were encouraged to continue with their aggressive policies. Tragically, the end result was that at a later time and at a much greater cost, the nations of the world had to respond to a Japan, to an Italy and to a Germany.

The cost in human life was immensely greater in the period from 1939 to 1945 than it would have been if the nations of the world had joined together in 1931, 1935, 1936 or even in 1938. I draw a parallel between the diplomatic challenges of the 1930s and the challenge which faces the world in 1991. In doing so, I am not trying to equate Saddam Hussein, the individual, with the evil that was Adolf Hitler. I am not in the position to draw that parallel, to know whether it is an adequate, accurate or appropriate one.

I think, however, there is a very definite parallel in the challenge facing the members of the United Nations today as there was to the League of Nations in the 1930s. I share the views of others who have suggested there is something bizarre about us here in Parliament debating an issue that has now been out-distanced by events.

I do believe that the issue before us, to a very large degree, is whether or not we are going to provide support to those members of the United Nations—in this case, Kuwait—that have asked for it. Are we going to fulfil what I consider to be our moral obligations to assist a member state in a time of difficulty?

I would prefer, for all sorts of obvious political reasons, that the United Nations flag was flying there in the company of the Canadian flag, but I understand why that is not possible at this time. I would urge members of this House not to dwell on that unduly. Resolution 678 of the United Nations, in which members of the Security Council freely participated, clearly gives us the mandate to proceed as we have. I am satisfied that we are there as part of the United Nations community. I have no difficulty with the question of who is in command.

I am sad, however, that the debate is necessary. I am sad and depressed that there continue to be the Saddam Husseins of this world who, for whatever reason, are determined to make their mark in history at the expense of others. I am sad that they, in their Machiavellian and diabolical manner have concluded that their best military defence is an attempt to bring Israel into a war by the unprovoked attacks which occurred last night.

As others have done, I would like to commend the Israeli government and the Israeli people for the immense discipline and self-restraint which they have demonstrated since then. I do not know, if I were responsible for such a decision, that I would have the will to restrain myself under those circumstances.

I am saddened by the fact that the diplomatic community, the world community, has once again failed. But I believe that there are times in our history, and this is one of them, when we must, given this scenario which has unfolded, respond to certain individuals and to certain communities with force because they seem to know no other language. I had hoped that the massive build-up which has occurred in the Persian Gulf would act as a deterrent to Saddam Hussein. Perhaps it would have to any individual who is more rational than he.

Now that we are there, now that we are at war, my concluding message, and I would hope the message of this Parliament, would be to all who are participating in the Canadian forces, to all who are participating in the forces of the coalition, that we are proud of them. They are willing to serve on our behalf, they are willing to put their lives at risk in support of the traditions and beliefs which are theirs and which are ours. I would hope also that this Parliament would send a very clear message, even though we may disagree on how they got to be there, that we are with them in spirit and in fact. We hope the war which is now taking place will prove to be a very short one and that the cost to human life will be as minimal as it possibly can be. That is my hope, that is my wish.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I listened with attention to the hon. member's speech and I was distressed by parts of it. He is trained as an historian and has worked as an historian and it is perhaps the lack of a sense of history that is one of the great burdens most of us carry today. If I heard him correctly, he made a number of comparisons between Mr. Hussein and Mr. Hitler and then, at the end of about four minutes of his speech, said something to the effect that he was not in a position to say whether the one is like the other. Where I come from, with respect, that is called sophistry. If he is going to make a case that one is indistinguishable from the other, he should have the courage at the end of his arguments to draw that conclusion.

I would ask him if he has read the article that was published widely by Gary Hufbauer and Kimberly Elliott on the question of sanctions. It includes the quote that I referred to in my talk about Benito Mussolini having confided to Hitler that, if the League of Nations had included oil in its sanctions against Italy, he would have been forced to withdraw from Ethiopia in a week.

Lastly, I would ask him why it is that the United Nations Association of Canada, Douglas Roche, our former ambassador for disarmament, and many other people, I think it is fair to say, are quite distressed—a mild word—as to what has been done in terms of sanctions, and what is being done by the United Nations?

Why is it that he thinks that the United Nations Association of Canada, headed by its president, Jeffrey Grenfell Wood, is so concerned about what is happening? I would ask if he would speak to those matters?

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, I have two or three points in response.

What I suggested during the course of my remarks was that I saw a very real parallel between the diplomatic challenges that faced the League of Nations in the 1930s and what faces the United Nations and member states in 1990–91.

I said I did not believe I was in a position to determine whether Saddam Hussein had the same type of destructive personality as did Adolf Hitler. The hon. member seemed to be disturbed by that, but perhaps he has a greater knowledge of those two individuals than I do.

I think I understand Adolf Hitler fairly well, having read most of the biographies. I have not read biographies with respect to Saddam Hussein.

With respect to the question of sanctions, as the hon. member knows, sanctions have been employed as a first step in many instances. Sometimes they have been employed as a final step. Their record of success is not as great as we would wish. I see no evidence that sanctions employed to date with respect to Iraq have had an effective impact on the military capacity of the Iraqi government.

Without doubt, there has been a very substantial impact on the citizens of Iraq. If, indeed, that were a democracy, where there was some form of opportunity for expression of public opinion, then the impact of those sanctions on the citizens of Iraq might have been able to have made itself felt through the political system on the Government of Iraq.

But in a society where there is no such democracy, where cabinet ministers have been removed with apparently no evidence whatsoever and executed at the will of Saddam Hussein; where chemical warfare has been used on the citizens of the country, I think there is no opportunity whatsoever for an expression of popular discontent as a result of sanctions to have any kind of political and/or military effect.

I see no evidence that they have succeeded. I see the Iraqi Force, having invaded a sovereign state, having no inclination to withdraw whatsoever.

I see an immense amount of injustice that has been done to a nation and to its people. I am aware, however, of the historical differences which exist in the Middle East with respect to the difficulties of drawing boundaries, et cetera, but irrespective of the fact that there is a history of outstanding difficulties. There is nothing in those difficulties; nothing in my understanding of how nations and people should respond to each other that in any way justifies the actions of the Iraqi government in the invasion of Kuwait.

There is nothing in those difficulties and in the historical problems which have existed that in any way in my mind absolves us as Canadian people, or absolves us as a Canadian government, or absolves us as a Canadian Parliament from accepting what I consider to be our moral obligations; to come to the assistance of that same country—Kuwait.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I am very impressed with the parallels and with the sense of history that the hon. member for Brandon—Souris has, and with his ability to bring that out in his course of debate. I think his credentials speak for themselves in that area of history. It is most interesting to note that his thesis was on the appeasement policy of Britain during previous wars. It was very, very impressive.

• (1920)

One of the things on which I want to question is the point he made that we have been outdistanced by events in this war in relation to the debate that is taking place this evening. Some hon. members yesterday, for example, pointed out that the question is perhaps academic or moot in the sense that we are engaged in war, and why are we debating it?

I feel personally that it is very, very important that we as a Parliament show the same sort of solidarity that has been shown in Britain. I would simply like the member to comment on that sense of solidarity and us being behind the world community in this effort to rid itself of a demon.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, first of all, I want to make it very clear that I accept the fact that there have been and continue to be important differences of opinion on this matter. I impugn no motives whatsoever to those who would differ from the positions which I have expressed.

I believe it is important to make certain that those who are fighting abroad and are prepared to fight abroad, understand very clearly that they are doing something which has the support of the people back home, because if they do not have that support, the most logical question in the world which they will ask themselves is: "why am I here?"

If I may say so, and perhaps I am entering into an area that I should not, I am aware of the fact that the hon. member who has just asked me the question has a son in the military within 80 miles of the Kuwaiti border. I would think that the hon. member's son and those who are there with him need that kind of inner contentment that comes from believing, not only that they are doing something which is right, but that other people believe they are doing something that is right.

On behalf of myself and my colleagues, I would like in a very personal sense to ask if you would convey our message of support to your son.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I could not agree more with the hon. member when he says that we have to convey to our troops in the Middle East our unanimous support for their efforts in what they are doing there.

Can I ask the member how that is achieved by a resolution that says that this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations and ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait? Would he not agree with me that it would be far more beneficial and far more direct, if his intention is to express support for the troops in the Middle East, to adopt a motion unanimously in this House stating in clear language that that in fact is the case?

Are you asking the troops who are putting their lives on the line in the Middle East to interpret from this particular motion, this redundant motion that was put on the Order Paper before hostilities broke out, to read into this particular motion, a motion that says that we support the United Nations, support for them?

Would he not agree that it would be far more prudent, far more reasonable, if he wants to achieve his objective, to withdraw this particular motion and to replace it with a motion that will have the entire House unanimously show its support for the Canadian troops in the Middle East?

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, as you will recall, there was a similar motion placed before this House in November which passed the House but did not have the support of all members and/or all political parties. Those who are there serving in the Canadian forces know why they are there and they in my mind, interpret the failure of this House to support this resolution as a lack of support for their commitment. Having dealt with this motion, other members of the House I am sure, under House rules, are certainly in a position to introduce motions which they would wish to present.

The item before the House which we have been debating for three days and may debate all night is clearly that this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending aggression by Iraq against Kuwait. That is the motion which is before the House as you know well, Madam Speaker, and that is the motion on which hon. members will have to decide whether they will vote yea or nay.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am very glad to rise in opposition to Government Order 27 which is:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

The NDP caucus and in fact the party through its executive after good discussion has opposed this war and this motion since all of us in the House and outside the House know the motion means authorization of this war and the motion was entered before the war began. Now that Canada is in this war we still oppose it and in fact what is happening deepens our reason for opposing it even more.

This war is already doing serious damage far beyond Baghdad and Iraq through creation of refugees and other disruptions of the economy. There was an attempt last night by Saddam to extend the war further by another unprovoked attack on another nation not participating in the war by a missile bombing of Israel. His goal of course was to bring more Arab nations to his side.

So far, thanks to the truly heroic self-control of the government and the people of Israel that move by Saddam has not succeeded. I salute Israel for its courageous patience and I salute the 3,000-year history of its ancestors up until this time in its struggle to live in peace.

There is still a danger that this war can become a renewal of wars that have lasted for centuries; wars between the Arabs and the Muslims on one hand, and between the peoples of European origin on the other, the new crusades as my colleague from Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has put it. All the more reason then to negotiate an end to this war now; to bring together a conference on peace in the Middle East which the United Nations asked for, particularly to resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute. Canada's struggle is different than Israel's because of its place in the world. However, I believe the same principle of restraint must apply to Canada. I believe that by pursuing this war it is most likely to cause much more harm than good to the people of Kuwait, the people of the Middle East, and to the whole natural world.

Saddam was certainly wrong to invade Kuwait, entirely wrong. Even if he had a legal dispute with Kuwait, which he may, he should have negotiated it or gone to the world court, not start a war.

The U.S.S.R. was also wrong to arm its ally or colleague, Saddam. The U.S.A. was also wrong to sell him arms, to make him its protégé against Iran. France was also wrong to sell him arms. Canada was also wrong to sell components for the U.S. helicopters that were sold to Saddam. President Bush was wrong to signal to Saddam a week before the invasion and, more than that, was wrong to not concern itself, right up to the time of the invasion, with a so-called Arab-Arab border dispute. He was wrong to refuse his congressional committee's recommendation at that time in July for sanctions to be imposed to stop Saddam.

• (1930)

However, our nations have contributed to the creating of Saddam, the brutal invader. There was an attempt to use sanctions to deprive Saddam of the revenue and the material means to maintain his war. Sanctions were starting to do that, cutting off 97 per cent of his revenue. After the U.S. election, the U.S. doubled its military in the gulf and carried on some commercial deals with some of the other countries concerned. The momentum for war became unstoppable. Now the war is on. Many Canadians still oppose this war, many of all ages, who are not in this House.

Yesterday, the major churches of Canada issued statements on this war. For example, the Most Reverend Michael Peers, leader of Canada's Anglicans, has rejected the notion that war in the gulf is justified. He said yesterday:

> It is beyond dispute that Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait, in flagrant violation of international law and with its foul atrocities against the Kuwaiti people, is unacceptable and contemptible. Nevertheless, the decision of the Canadian government to commit our forces to war and the call today from Canadian politicians to close ranks and support the war effort is deeply problematic. There are issues here upon which religious leaders have a duty to comment.

He proceeds then to list the traditional Christian criteria, the six principles of a just war, and to measure the present war by their standards. He concludes:

> This war in the Persian Gulf does not meet the tests provided by Christian tradition for a morally justifiable engagement at this stage. The Prime Minister has commented that Canadian participation in combat roles in this conflict is both reasonable and moral. I reject his sentiments and his reasoning—. I call upon all Canadians of good will to pursue all efforts to bring about peace and the cessation of this destruction.

Madam Speaker, he has found the war lacking on those grounds.

So does the General Secretary of the Canadian Council of Churches, Dr. Stuart E. Brown, in a statement endorsed by the heads of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada and the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, the Primate of the Anglican Church of Canada, the Moderator of the United Church of Canada and the Moderator of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. The statement says in part:

> War cannot resolve the Gulf Crisis. We call on Canada to work urgently at the United Nations to dissuade the Security Council from authorizing the use of force, either to try to expel Iraq from Kuwait, or to depose Saddam Hussein's government in Iraq. We urge Canada to work through the United Nations in support of economic and diplomatic measures toward peace and justice for all people in the Middle East—.

> The most effective instrument with which to register the unacceptable character of this invasion of Kuwait is economic sanctions—.
> This is not the time for ultimata; rather it is the time to search for non-military solutions, even if that means compromise and a less-than-ideal resolution. War will most certainly not produce an ideal solution.

I quote also from a letter today sent to the Prime Minister from Monsignor Robert Lebel, Bishop of Valleyfield and President of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, with copies to the leader of the Liberal Party and the leader of the New Democratic Party. Referring to the bombing of Israel by Iraq last night, he says in part:

> This latest act of Iraqi aggression is not sufficient justification for Canada to escalate its participation in the military conflict.

He said he had heard it was being considered in the cabinet.

He continues:

> We maintain that this is a war that should never have been started. Economic sanctions coupled with diplomatic efforts by the international community were simply not given the time required to be effective.

He calls on the Prime Minister and the Canadian government to do three things:

> (a) refrain from any further military involvement by Canada in the Persian Gulf War;
> (b) urge the UN Security Council to initiate steps for a cease-fire and a resumption of negotiations for a peaceful settlement;
> (c) concentrate energies in developing an international plan of action for humanitarian aid and assistance regarding all affected countries in the Middle East.

Here is a statement by the Right Reverend Dr. Walter Farquharson, Moderator of the United Church of Canada:

> We deplore the bombing of Baghdad and the claim that it was a success. It is, in fact, a tragic failure, even as the invasion of Kuwait by the Iraqi forces was a failure—.
> We reject the claims of our leaders that there were no alternatives. We remain committed to the principles of a just world order and to the United Nations, but in light of modern warfare and the technological changes in weaponry, we are convinced that ultimately world order is only effectively pursued by non-military means.
> Human beings are capable of creating terrible weapons and of wreaking unthinkable destruction. They are also capable of resolving their conflicts, reconciling with enemies, and healing wounds. They must take responsibility for the good or evil effects of their actions.
> In the wake of these terrible events, we implore the leaders of all countries to draw back from inflicting even greater destruction on the people of the Gulf region and from placing our own relatives serving in the Gulf in greater danger—.
> We commit ourselves before God to the dreadful but sacred task of laying on healing hands for all who have been wounded in these terrible events. We have no other choice because we believe God's intention for all of us is the lowering of every clenched fist and the healing of every wounded nation.

We of the NDP opposed this war before the bombing of Baghdad, and we oppose it now. We say to pull back our troops out of the theatre of war and find better peacemaking roles for them; to plan with the United Nations members for a peace conference, including an Arab-Israeli one; and to start now helping to provide urgent medical, food and other help to the refugees and displaced persons of this war.

As my final comment, Madam Speaker, some have suggested that a stand such as my party's is too partisan and partisan at an inappropriate time. I say no, it is not partisan.

I have been working for peace since the late 1940s. It was the result of my experience in World War II, in which I had to ask myself how we got into the fix in which Christians considered it their duty to God as well as to the king to kill Christians. How did we get ourselves into that fix? I came to the conclusion that it arose principally from the economic conflicts between countries, which need to be moderated before they break out in war.

I was active in the peace movement for 10 years before I joined the CCF-NDP. I would not have joined if I did not judge it to be a parliamentary party committed to peace. I continued active in the peace movement.

• (1940)

I was very happy to represent my party yesterday afternoon at a rally of about 2,000 people in downtown Toronto opposing the war. I believe the movement is growing.

We are not taking this stand against the war to distance ourselves from the government, with the idea of advantage in the next election. We are taking this stand as Canadians. Many of us are taking this stand on the basis of our religious convictions, which I, for one, held before I became a socialist and continue to hold and continue to practise. We are taking this stand as loyal Canadians trying to serve the best interests of the Canadian people and as citizens of the world, believing that in the best interests of all the peoples of the world, now and in the future, the thing to do is to end this war. We are saying to stop the war now and do all that is possible and necessary, along with other countries, to build peace now.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I have listened to the comments from our colleague and I have had many occasions to speak with him in the past about his feelings on such issues. I can understand his feelings and sympathize with them a lot. I know that our colleague is a man of the cloth and he has very strong feelings on issues involving peace. I congratulate him for those. I do not always agree with him on his views, but I think Parliament needs someone who has that kind of a view to constantly remind us of the importance of peace. I want to tell him that even on those occasions, albeit rare, when I do not totally agree with him, he is nevertheless a conscience for this House in those issues. Again, I congratulate him.

I want to get to a specific point with regard to what is happening today. In my opinion, we are discussing a motion that I believe was wrong when it was presented to this House. It is not what the government wanted as an answer. The government really recalled Parliament to find out whether or not Parliament would agree to a Canadian participation in a war effort, should there be one.

I would have disagreed with that proposition; I would have voted against it. I still think it is the question that should have been put. Nevertheless, that being said, it would be redundant now anyway. Would our colleague not agree with me that the motion we have before us was the wrong motion to put to start with? Even if he does not agree with that proposition—although I think he does—it is redundant in any case. There is absolutely no meaning in discussing today whether or not we agree or disagree with resolution 678 of the United Nations, once it has been placed into full force, including the military component of it. This is just slightly worse than redundant. Could he comment on that, please?

Mr. Heap: I thank the hon. member for his encouraging remarks and for a very pertinent question. Yes, the resolution was a wrong resolution because it was clearly asking for an answer to a question it does not state. It stated a motherhood question: whether we want to support the UN in stopping aggression. Of course we do. But this was not the issue. As the member has quite rightly said, the issue was whether we support war as the means chosen by the United States and others within the United Nations.

It reflects the point that has been made by some previous speakers as to the methods used by the United States to win certain allies to its cause, including the fact that Canada—or rather the Prime Minister—as a reward for loyal support in war, now seems assured of a seat in the Mexico trade talks.

There are other deals with other countries.

On the question of withdrawing the resolution to find a better one, I would say by all means the government should withdraw it. If it wants to put one in that would ask for support in the war, I would oppose that.

If it wants to put one in that divides the questions and says whether we support the war, the decision of the politicians to make war, or whether we oppose the decision of the politicians to make war, we still give all support we can to those individual men and women who under orders, having trained and become competent in their work, are risking their lives to carry out this government's orders. I would certainly continue to support those men and women, but I do not support the war to which this government has sent them.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully and attentively to my colleague's speech and I want to tell him that I too put a great deal of faith in peace and do not like, and indeed dislike, war and states of war.

Every now and then, he mentioned that his speech was not partisan and that his decision was dictated much more by his conscience. I respect that, because I think that it should be taken for granted that each of us has to live with his or her conscience and is allowed, in this country, to make decisions according to it.

Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, when responding to my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, he could not refrain from playing politics and showing his anti-American bias. I did not expect that from him and it clashed with the general tone of his speech.

I cannot help but wonder why, after making an excellent speech, and convincing at that, my colleague apparently was unable to set aside his partisanship while dealing with the critical situation presently facing Canada and particularly the people who are in the gulf.

[English]

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, the hon. member may be right. In fact, I have rewritten my speech several times, or replanned it and rewritten it entirely once in order to make the point that I made in the speech.

Speaking more extemporary, yes, I did take a swipe at the activities of the President of the United States. I entirely believe in what I have said, but if the hon. member feels that I have spoiled a good effect of my earlier speech, then it is quite possible that he was right.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I am amazed when some of the opposition members and members of the New Democratic Party refer to the resolution and the motion in question. It reads:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

If they were to read the motion, it would be clearly understood. The member knows full well that this House voted on the original motion on November 29. That vote was won, with two to one in favour of the motion. It is simply reaffirming our support for the United Nations.

If we are indeed a citizen of the world, what does he expect us to do? Are we to back away from the United Nations or not act collectively with the rest of the world against Saddam Hussein, which basically is what it comes down to? It is the rest of the world, with the exception of a few, versus Saddam Hussein. Do we remove ourselves from international responsibility? Do we remove ourselves from a sense of collective responsibility? That is the question that I ask of the member.

• (1950)

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I must say that the member who questioned me appears to be confused about the meaning of the resolution. Paragraph 2 of the demands says that the United Nations authorizes member states co-operating with the Government of Kuwait to use all necessary means to uphold and implement resolution 666 and all subsequent relevant resolutions and restore international peace and security in the area.

It does not say that we have to go to war to do that. It does not say that. It is this government, of which the hon. member is a supporter, that interprets that as saying we go to war.

There are two major faults with that use—or abuse, I would say—of the UN resolution. First of all, the UN resolution did not say that it is time now—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I did not interrupt the hon. member. They did not give any report. There was no report from the monitoring committee on sanctions. They did not resolve the question of the effectiveness of sanctions; they simply left it vague. That was a very faulty resolution. But as it stands, it does not order us, or even ask us, to go to war.

Second, if it did intend, without saying it, that we should go to war, it did not provide any democratically controlled United Nations command. There was no authority of the United Nations. It is not a matter of whether there is a blue flag. It is not a matter of whether the American general is to be called the United Nations general. It is a matter of whether the action is under the authority of the United Nations and under the control of the United Nations. It is a matter of when the United Nations will say when to stop. What this does is to encourage any member who says he is co-operating with Kuwait to do anything that he thinks he might do and claim the United Nations justification.

That is a fraud, Madam Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 17, 1991

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Volume B.]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Madam Speaker, I have been a member of this House for approximately six and a half years, and by far this is the most important and most serious matter that has been considered, in my view, in this House in the last six and a half years.

As I speak here tonight, my country, your country—our country—is at war. I do not believe that Canadians fully comprehend and have come to grips with what it means to be at war today.

We are not debating a resolution; we are discussing the fact that Canada is at war. The resolution before this House—and I would like to read it for the record—reads:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

This particular resolution was put on the Order Paper before war broke out. A lot has happened in the last few days. It has been a most remarkable week, a week that many people will never forget in all their lives.

This Parliament was reconvened on Monday because Tuesday happened to be January 15, the artificial deadline that was imposed, after which the United States and other member states of the United Nations had the authority to use whatever means necessary.

There was a meeting a few days before between Secretary of State of the United States, James Baker, and Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz of Iraq. As we know, those talks did not produce a peace, and a few days later the Secretary-General of the United Nations tried one last time to convince Saddam Hussein to quit Kuwait. It is academic now, the whole question of whether we should have been called back earlier. This House started its discussion on Tuesday. We debated throughout the day. The deadline came and went on midnight a few days ago, January 15. On Wednesday night this House was in session and debating this particular resolution, and the bombs started to fall on Baghdad, the bombs started to fall in Kuwait and Iraq.

Following that initial bombardment the night of January 16, the stock market went up and the price of oil went down. All the economic indicators went in the complete opposite direction than the experts predicted. There was a sense of satisfaction in the United States of America, and indeed throughout the world, that somehow that particular bombardment, that particular military operation at the beginning of the war, was successful. People were talking about a quick resolution, a quick ending to this particular war.

But just last night, once again there was horror in the Middle East, this time in Israel. Scud missiles were launched from Iraq, an unprovoked attack on a non-participating country in the Middle East. It was clear what Saddam Hussein was trying to do, but the Israelis—the people of Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Haifa—had to suffer through the unspeakable horror of the possibility of a chemical attack, chemical warheads on those Scud missiles. We thank the Lord that chemical warheads were not used. We thank the Lord that casualties were not more severe.

Those people who were so positive on the night of January 16 became a little more pessimistic on the night of January 17 because the so-called dogs of war were unleashed. We went to bed last night not knowing whether there would be a Middle East today. We did not know whether Israel would retaliate as a result of the unprovoked attack. We are grateful that Israel has shown so much restraint so far in this particular case that it has not embroiled itself in the conflict as well.

As we speak in the comfort of the House of Commons in Ottawa at almost eight o'clock in the evening, I must make the point that there are millions of people in Israel and in Iraq who are absolutely, utterly, and completely terrified. Picture for a moment the many Canadians who are sitting tonight in the comfort of their own homes or in safe places somewhere in Canada, but think of the millions of people in Israel, in Iraq, in Jordan, in Saudi Arabia, and in Kuwait who do not know what is happening. The people in Iraq are hearing the bombs. They are hearing anti-aircraft fire being returned. Think of our children. Think of all the children who are listening to what is happening. This unspeakable horror that is taking place will be forever etched on their minds.

On Monday we saw the deadline. On Tuesday we saw the bombing of Baghdad. On Thursday night we saw the bombing of Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, and Haifa. What is happening tonight in the Middle East? What is going to happen tomorrow night? When will this war end?

I think it important that we step back for a moment and ask ourselves why.

• (2000)

Hon. members opposite say there is a good reason why our country and other countries are involved in this brutal, hideous war. They say there is an international principle, that an aggressor must not be rewarded.

Madam Speaker, do you really believe that the thousands upon thousands of people who have already lost their lives as a result of the bombardment really care about any international principle concerning aggression? Do you think the millions of people who are suffering and will suffer really care? Members opposite and others argue that war was necessary in order to stop what Saddam Hussein was doing in Kuwait. He was plundering and raping the country. Civil rights were being denied and people were being brutalized. Yes, they were. We know they were. Cases have been documented.

What could be worse than the constant bombardment? Tune in to CNN and watch the satisfaction when the briefings are given at the Pentagon that there are 1,000 or 2,000 sorties a day. What does it mean? What does a sortie mean? It is not a pleasant walk in some pleasant park under pleasant sunshine. A sortie means a bomber, whether it is an F-14 or an F-17 or an F-18 with hundreds of pounds of explosives that are being dropped. Yes, on military targets or strategic targets. Knock out command and control, knock out the Scud missiles, the mobile launchers. Only 80 per cent are successful. What effect is it having on human lives? What scars are being left on those who will survive this particular war?

All too often over the last number of days during this particular debate and before, people seemed to have almost forgotten the cost of war in human terms and what it all means. They have not asked themselves why Americans, Canadians and British are involved in this particular war. Why are we on the eve of destruction? The implications of what is happening are far-reaching because the Americans say that Saddam Hussein must not be rewarded. The aggressor cannot be rewarded and he must be removed from Kuwait.

I understand why millions of lives were lost in World War I, the war to end all wars. Unfortunately, it did not. Many millions of lives were lost in World War II and Hitler came close to defeating the British.

I had the opportunity during the summer to travel through France and to visit some of the sites of some major battles of World Wars I and II. I walked for hours along the beaches at Dunkirk. I walked for hours along the beaches at Dover and I was reminded of what happened there 45 years before. The principle they were fighting for was democracy and freedom. It was something people could understand. They knew why people were fighting. But try to explain to your children that Canada is at war because there is some international principle which says an aggressor must not be rewarded.

I agree an aggressor should not be rewarded. But is war the answer? Is it the answer to send out 1,000 or 2,000 sorties every day, constant bombardment? Is the answer Scud missiles landing in Israel? Is the answer the fall of King Hussein of Jordan? Is the answer Syria joining forces with the Iraqis? War is the answer Iran joining forces with the Iraqis? War is not the answer, but we are involved in the war. We are there whether we like it or not. Canadian troops are there and we pray to God that it will not be necessary for Canadian troops to be involved in a direct way in hostilities there. We pray to God that the war will end as quickly as possible, but in my view, it was so unnecessary.

In the Second World War those who were alive then, and those like myself who were not but who read about it, knew who the enemy was. We knew; they spoke about the enemy. As I was preparing for my remarks, I was asking myself who is the enemy in this particular war? As I was brought up, I was taught that usually there is an enemy that you shoot at in order to kill and destroy. Are the Iraqi people the enemy in this war? Of course they are not, but Canada is at war with Iraq. The enemy is not the people of Iraq, the innocent men and women. Perhaps the military and the army—the roughly 500,000 troops—are not the enemy. The enemy is Saddam Hussein. He is the person, the one individual who has caused all this. Should we be involved in a war that might take the lives of millions of people, that will scar the psychology, the psyche of millions of others around the world? Should we be at war? I think not, Madam Speaker. We ought not to be involved in this war.

The United States is the main combatant on the part of the allies. We know the reason why the world is at war tonight. It is not to remove Saddam Hussein from Kuwait. The reason that the world is at war is to remove Saddam Hussein period, to eliminate, to destroy Saddam Hussein in order that he no longer can be the leader of Iraq. The reason why the world is at war is to eliminate the threat that Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi threat. What are the consequences as a result? Who are the casualties? What are the casualties? We know what the devastating economic impact will be. We know that human suffering and human destruction will be immense. What about in the long term once this war is over, whether it is over in the next few days, weeks, months or the next few years? What will the world be like after the shooting stops? Will the entire problem be resolved? Will the world be safe and peaceful afterwards? Will the world be safe from other Saddam Husseins? Will there be others? I think there will be. Once the shooting stops the problems will only begin as a result of the war that we find ourselves embroiled in.

War was not the answer. Economic sanctions were not given the opportunity. Economic sanctions were working. It was not proven to us, it was not proven to the world that economic sanctions were not working. The onus was on those who wanted war to prove that economic sanctions were not working. The fact is that the evidence is overwhelming; whereas diplomacy may not have been working over the last number of weeks, over the last number of months, sanctions were in fact working.

I would like to cite a speech that was given by Senator George Mitchell just last week when the United States was debating in Congress whether or not George Bush should be given the authority to go to war. We all know that the vote was close both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. Senator Mitchell said, and I quote:

> War carries with it great costs and high risk. An unknown number of casualties and deaths; billions of dollars spent; a greatly disrupted oil supply and oil price increases; a war possibly widened to include Israel,—

• (2010)

We know that he was right.

> —Turkey or other allies; the possible long-term American occupation of Iraq; increased instability in the Persian Gulf region; long-lasting Arab enmity against the United States; a possible return to isolationism at home.
> The grave decision for war is being made prematurely.

These words were spoken before the United States embarked on its campaign, as it referred to it. He went on to document what went on in the United States in the weeks preceding the decision to go to war when Mr. Bush said these sanctions were working. Secretary of State Baker said these sanctions were working. The head of the CIA director William Webster said that sanctions were working. He pointed out that more than 90 per cent of Iraq's imports and 97 per cent of its exports had been stopped. He documented in very clear terms how sanctions were working yet they were not given an opportunity. Instead, the United States decided that war was necessary.

We do not know where this will all end. We do not know what the final result will be. I note that my time is nearly expired. I had much more to say but let me conclude by saying that and I my party support the Canadian troops that are there in the Middle East. We hope and pray that this war will end as quickly as possible and that our troops can come home to their families in a safe fashion. We also hope and pray that Canada will play a major and leading role in developing and working toward a long and lasting peace, as difficult as that will be, after the hostilities stop. We hope that our country will still be in a position to work toward a long and lasting peace in the Middle East, a recognition that there are many people who have differences there, that the Palestinians are entitled to a homeland of their own, and a recognition of their rights, that Israelis have a right as well to be safe in their nation. Answers must be found, and I am convinced that Canada can play that role in the future.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, my friend who just finished says that we should withdraw the present motion supporting the UN resolution and then goes on to say: "But we support our troops". What he is saying is that we do not support what is happening in the Middle East, that the troops should not be there, but we support them in what he would term an illegal or an unwanted act, one with which he would not agree.

I would point out that his leader said we should support the United Nations up to a certain point, but when they fire a shot then we should pull out. These people on the other side have to make up their minds; they must support the sanctions of the United Nations, of the multinational force of which our troops are a part, because if they do not support that, how can they support the troops in an action that they do not support? It does not make sense.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, there is no sense in what the hon. member said and it is very difficult to make any sense for him. The hon. member has just displayed the pettiness that we have seen day in and day out coming from that side of the House of Commons and, in particular, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Of course, we support the troops.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): I know that that member many times breaks the rules of this House. He just accused me of motives that I do not have and I did not have when I rose in this House and asked my question. I asked a question, I asked a very clear question; I asked him if he could explain that. He then impugned the motives that I was using to do this and that is against all regulations in this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It would be appreciated if nobody would impugn motives and we would answer questions and debate this very serious question without getting into unpleasant situations again. The hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: The hon. member suggests that it is inconsistent to be opposed to Canada participating in the war taking place and to support the troops after war has broken out. We know that in the United States the vote was very close in the U.S. Congress. It was very close, but once the decision was taken, once that country went to war, the entire Congress fell behind the American troops in the Middle East.

I believe that here as well in the House of Commons we had our differences in principle as to whether or not Canada should participate, whether or not war was the answer or war is the answer, but surely every last member in this House, indeed every last Canadian, should show support for the men and women in the Canadian Armed Forces who are putting their lives on the line in the Middle East as we speak here tonight. I do not believe there is anything inconsistent in those positions.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving us this account of the Middle East issue and demontrating that we are indeed—of course, that goes without saying—supportive of our troops in the present circumstances.

However, to say at the same time that if we do not approve of the sanctions, it means that we do not support our troops, that is absolutely ridiculous.

Considering that almost half of the United States Senate—and they are involved—recommended that the sanctions be exhausted before taking military action, I put this question to the hon. member: Had sanctions been workable up to the last minute, does he believe that the risk of loss of lives would have existed anyway?

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: With all the certainty I can command, I believe that if sanctions were given a chance, sanctions ultimately would work. Members of the Senate in the United States and of the House of Representatives made the case very clearly. I would like to quote just very briefly from the speech of Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts. He said, before hostilities broke out on Tuesday evening, before the United States went to war, and I quote: "Sanctions have not failed and no one can prove they have. They still have a good chance of achieving our objectives in the Gulf. Saddam Hussein is paying a heavy price for his aggression: 95 per cent to 90 per cent of his oil exports have been shut down. Iraq's economy has been cut nearly in half. Saddam has no foreign exchange to prime his war machine. A trickle of consumer goods may be slipping through, but Saddam cannot run his country or his war machine on that."

The evidence was overwhelming that if given the opportunity, sanctions would have worked. Hundreds of thousands of lives could have been saved if the United States showed the restraint that it is asking Israel today to show in order to try to contain the conflict there. If the Americans showed restraint and allowed sanctions to work, hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of lives could have been saved.

• (2020)

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I quote from Hansard January 16, 1991, page 17133:

> Nobody pushes the United Nations around, not even the United States. No one nation, especially not the United States, is able to impose marching orders on that institution.
> No, this is not an American adventure. It is a United Nations action in collective security, one of the greatest historic developments of our time—

I am quoting the former leader of his party, the former Prime Minister of Canada, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. It is amazing to me that an individual can fly in the face of a former Prime Minister, whom he supported and for whom he has all kinds of respect. It is simply amazing.

Before I finish, I do want the member to respond to that comment. There is a very important distinction between what happened in the United States House of Representatives and what is happening here. Certainly there is disagreement in this House and there is disagreement in the U.S. Congress. No one questions it because this is what this forum is all about. None of us questions it; in all sincerity, none of us.

The difference is simply this. The hon. member mentions that he is behind our troops, despite the differences we have had over this particular issue and the motion before us. He is behind the troops. The difference between that party and the individual senators and congressmen in the United States who had differing opinions is simply this: not only are they behind their troops, but also they are behind their President.

This is something on which I would like a clear distinction. I think they have a responsibility to be behind the Prime Minister, the minister of defence and the Government of Canada. That is a very clear distinction. They can hide all they wish behind that sentence or that little phrase they like to use that they are behind the troops.

I think, they have to be behind the Canadian people, the Government of Canada and, indeed, our Prime Minister.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, the member is asking the impossible. He is asking me to join the 12 per cent of Canadians who are behind the Prime Minister of Canada. It is ludicrous to suggest we ought to get behind the Prime Minister and thereby show support for our troops.

When I say showing support, I do not mean by some vague resolution that says this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait. That is not showing support.

If the hon. member wanted to show support for the Canadian troops in the Middle East, then why does he not convince his House leader and his Prime Minister to bring forward a resolution that says very specifically, "therefore be it resolved that this House of Commons fully supports the Canadian men and women in the armed services who are currently serving in the Middle East"? We would be more than happy to lend our complete and unanimous endorsation to that particular resolution.

We are not simply using rhetoric when we talk about supporting our troops. The troops should be supported in every way possible, whether it is with military equipment or whatever. What is important in our view is that there be a clear and unequivocal resolution coming from this House indicating support for them. I know he agrees with me, so he should start talking to his House leader to put forward an honest resolution in this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In resuming debate, I will be recognizing the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk. I would like to make sure that the hon. gentleman is still sharing his time with the member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): I, like many others in this House, had prepared myself for days to speak in this Chamber on behalf of the Canadians I was elected to represent, the people of Haldimand—Norfolk, on the reasons why Canada should not resort to war at this time.

But many things have changed in the last 48 hours. The allied armies have sent thousands of bombs into Iraq. Saddam Hussein has bombed Israel. Israel has shown courage and goodness in its restraint.

Our nation is now actively involved in war against Iraq. Canadians are torn between a war they did not want and a desire, now that this country has gone to war, to support our soldiers and our allies.

The decision has been made to commit Canada force, and we now know it was made long before many of the members in this House were given an opportunity to address and vote on the issue. In fact, it is safe to say that fewer than one-tenth of the members in this House were given any influence whatsoever on Canada's decision to abandon sanctions and go to war.

We in Canada are, of course, proud of our democratic traditions. We know that these democratic traditions must be respected if we are to survive. Yet this government declared war, bit by bit, although more than 90 per cent of the members of this House, and thus Canadians, had been left completely in the dark.

Canadians are alienated from the political process, and their mistrust and cynicism grow unabated. If we continue to disapprove of Saddam Hussein, the dictator, as he is so often called, then we had better remember quickly where the power comes from in our country. It comes from the people; not just the war cabinet, not just the top bureaucrats, but the people.

I spent the last several months talking with people in my riding of Haldimand—Norfolk. I have received many calls throughout the last few weeks. One was from Leon and Susan Hudecki, who are totally against troops in the gulf. They asked, "Sanctions were working, so why is war necessary?"

There was another one from Sue Stevenson of Waterford, who said, "Sanctions should be extended. Peacekeeping is okay. We do not want war. We need further negotiations. Keep negotiating, please".

Here is another one from Ron Machelli of Tillsonburg who says: yes to war. He is concerned because Hussein is close to having nuclear power.

Madam Speaker, as you can see, there are differences of opinion across this country on this issue. Among these people, there were generally three camps. There were those who felt that Saddam Hussein was a madman impervious to the reason of economic sanctions. He had rolled into the sovereign state of Kuwait. His soldiers had raped, maimed and murdered. We as Canadians had a moral obligation to join with other countries to get him out of there, and the quicker the better.

There were those who said that no circumstances justify Canadian involvement in war. I respect their view and I am saddened to have to tell them that we, the politicians of this world, have failed. We have failed to engage this new world order. The optimism that sprang from the destruction of the Berlin wall has faltered.

There were those, the greatest in number, who said that sanctions are still working. They asked why this government had done an about-face; it now has no support for sanctions and instead wants to support war.

That was a question I could not answer, because the government has yet to provide a reasonable explanation of its contention that sanctions were not good enough and that force could not wait. In fact, the evidence is to the contrary.

It may seem to some as a little too late to express regret and concern over the abandonment of sanctions and the resort to force. But I believe it is important to take a few moments and attempt to give a voice to the struggle Canadians face as to whether or not Canada should be at war.

In September, U.S. President Bush told a joint session of Congress:

> These sanctions are working. Iraq is feeling the heat. . .Iraq's leaders. . .are cut off from the world, unable to sell their oil, and only a tiny fraction of goods are getting through.

• (2030)

In October, U.S. Secretary of State Baker said that sanctions are fulfilling the role as planned. Just one month later, CIA Director William Webster said:

> All sectors of the Iraqi economy are feeling the pinch of sanctions, and many industries have shut down.

Figures put the loss to Iraqi imports at 90 per cent and the loss to Iraqi exports at 97 per cent. Sanctions have shut them down. The flow of spare parts and military supplies from the Soviet Union and France, Iraq's major suppliers, has stopped. Iraq's foreign exchange reserves have diminished drastically, rendering it virtually impossible to purchase foreign goods in defying these sanctions.

Let the government make no mistake: the Canadian public has major reservations about this war. Canadians want to be heard on this issue, and they want their elected officials to represent them in any decision of our forces in the gulf. This government has an obligation to the people of this country to consult them throughout this matter.

For eight weeks following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, this government refused to recall Parliament. It showed no interest in consulting the opposition on the formulation of an all-party position in this matter. Many people in Haldimand—Norfolk have expressed great concern and loyalty to the United Nations. I therefore think it is important that I try to correct some of the confusion surrounding its role.

I found it somewhat ironic that, despite this government's contention that it had United Nations sanction, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Javier Perez de Cuellar, knew nothing of the attack on January 16. We should remember that this is a U.S.-sanctioned war. The distinction may on surface seem to be academic, but it is not. None of the forces currently engaged in the Middle East are taking their orders from the United Nations Council, but instead from a U.S. general.

Canadians mourn the abandonment of Canada's role as a peacekeeper. Our belief in the supremacy of dialogue and our confidence in the potential for negotiation have earned us not only international respect, which far outweighs our size or our economic power, but also has given us national pride and national identity.

Now Canadians are asking themselves: Who are we? What is our role in the world and what role do we play in this conflict? Has our resort to force compromised our peacekeeping role. May it still be needed?

Many of those with whom I have spoken in my riding are now torn. I feel confident that I speak for most of them when I say that we cannot turn our backs on our troops, no matter how much we regret the order to send them to war. Our soldiers must know that we respect their dedication and loyalty, that we pray for their safety, that we will provide necessary equipment for them to fulfil their duties, and that their families have our support and our gratitude.

We must commit ourselves here in this Chamber to doing the greatest thing we can for our soldiers, which is to pursue peace, to using our international prestige to find a solution, and to rediscovering national traits we once used well in the name of peace: tolerance, the desire to listen, the ability to communicate and respect for human dignity.

The end to this war may well come from the military, but the solution can come only from diplomacy. Canada must put itself in the front lines in finding the solution.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, there are numerous references to dialogue and negotiation in my hon. colleague's speech. He feels Canada should have perservered along that line.

I want to remind him, first, that it takes at least two sides to have a dialogue and that, way back then, Saddam Hussein refused to take part in a dialogue.

Second, negotiation also calls for two sides who are willing to negotiate. Now, Saddam Hussein refused to negotiate until the last minute. He even came very close to refusing to see the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

How can he say that Canada should not have got involved in such action, that it should withdraw its support to the UN and keep negotiating, when it has been established that Saddam Hussein did not want to negociate any more?

[English]

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, what I said in my speech here tonight was that I felt, and that people on this side of the House felt, not only that negotiations were not carried on enough, but that sanctions were not given enough time to work.

I think I showed, by giving the hon. member figures in my speech tonight that sanctions were working, that Saddam Hussein was cut off, and that, in fact, if we look at the circumstances, Saddam Hussein, more than likely, did not know the resolve of the United Nations prior to making his move into Kuwait.

If we look at the history of the story, if we read what has gone on in the past, that the Americans themselves failed diplomatically, failed in all ways to inform Saddam Hussein before he went into Kuwait, we see that they would not stand for it.

The fact that the international world community formed together was a wonderful thing. It was good that Canada got involved in the forefront and sent members of the force over there to enforce these sanctions. That is the way to get people to negotiate.

I only regret that this government and these allies did not give sanctions enough time to work.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): The hon. gentleman talks about sanctions. I would just like to ask his opinion on sanctions that were discussed in a Liberal release on the Persian Gulf crisis on December 21.

I know the gentleman must be familiar with it because it is the Liberal policy. It says here: "The Liberal position is that Canada should promote sanctions, rather than the threat of war". It reads on later: "On the one hand, this would involve imposing a threat of new sanctions such as a drastic reduction in Iraq's water supply, controlled by Turkish dams, if Saddam refuses to reconsider his position. Alternatively, a refusal to consider speedy resumption of food aid to Iraq".

I am not familiar with international law, but if the hon. gentleman is promoting sanctions that would limit water and food to an opposing country, I would be shocked. Yet it is clear in this policy. I would like the hon. member to discuss it when he is indeed walking down the main street in Hagersville, talking to his constituents.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, it was his government that chose to go to war. It was his government that said sanctions were not working. It was his government that refused to give this House any proof whatsoever that sanctions were not working.

An hon. member: It's his obligation to do it.

Mr. Speller: Whether or not this war is a long war or a short war, people will die. They will die whether or not we get this over quickly or whether or not it is dragged out forever and ever.

This government made the decision for Canada to go to war. What our party wants to do now that that decision has been made, is to support our men and women over there, and to have this House debate openly and freely the issues involved around Canada's role there.

I would hope that the hon. member will take charge of his caucus and his government and make sure they present to this House a resolution that shows that this House supports our men and women who are in the Persian Gulf now.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, this is a difficult and serious debate. It may well be one of the most disturbing debates in this House since I first became a member. I don't have much time, but I would like to make a few comments.

The government tabled a motion in the House last Tuesday which reads as follows:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

I was here in Ottawa last August when the government made its decision to send Canadian troops, resources, equipment, and Canadian ships. I spoke in our party caucus, and, we supported the government's initiative, an initiative that had been launched by the United Nations to apply economic sanctions in order to convince Saddam Hussein he should free Kuwait.

Our mission then was the same mission we have today. We are still convinced Saddam Hussein should free Kuwait.

The motion before the House today is defective. It is entirely obsolete, because it ignores the fact that there have been changes in the world.

We can hardly say the Liberals were part of the decision to go to war. We were against that decision. We said many times that now was not the time to proceed with military action.

We supported the sanctions. We were convinced that over time those sanctions would have the desired effect, which would be to persuade Saddam Hussein to free Kuwait.

We didn't change the ways and means. This was done by forces independent of this caucus, of the group to which I belong, the Liberal Party.

In an amendment to the government motion that we tabled last Tuesday, we said that for the time being, we should not resort to military action. We said that for the time being, economic sanctions and diplomatic efforts should be continued, so that no one could say we had failed in our task to maintain peace in the world.

The decision was made by others. No one can blame us today and say that the Liberals changed their minds. We did not change our minds. The mission remains the same. The mission is to free Kuwait and to convince the aggressor, Saddam Hussein that he should leave Kuwait.

I listened to a number of the speeches made in this House. I listened especially to speeches by ministers to find out whether they contained a message that would have been reassuring with respect to the efforts made by this government internationally to convince the aggressor, Saddam Hussein, to give up his plans to occupy territories that are not his.

On the contrary, for months we saw no constructive action by this government. All of a sudden we were told: "We are going to war. Canada is taking part in a coalition."

And today, we are asked to approve a motion that does not say that we are going to war but that we support the United Nations in its efforts to liberate Kuwait from Iraqi oppression.

I repeat, this motion is defective and poorly drafted, so much so that I fail to understand how the government can possibly want us to believe that this motion, which is in fact obsolete, could be voted on today by this House and that we are actually taking a vote in the House on the decision to go to war and support our troops.

I do not have much time but I will one thing: we support the Canadian troops. We support the mission aimed at liberating Kuwait and, now that the decision has been made, for we have always been consistent on this issue,—we have said that we support the mission to liberate Kuwait,— we support the sanctions. Now that without consultation and without telling us first the government has decided to go to war, I think it is clear that the mission remains unchanged: to liberate Kuwait, but not to put the world and that important region of the world on a war footing, a terribly dangerous escalating process which might begin in the next few hours and likely compromise world peace for years to come.

I listened closely to the speeches of my colleagues. A moment earlier a question was directed to one of my friends, one of my colleagues, about the sanctions. It is not up to us to show that the sanctions were not working.

We think that the sanctions were working. If we are to believe the American authorities, the sanctions were working before the election. What happened all of a sudden that they no longer work?

The onus of proof rests with the government. We did not get a satisfactory response to our questions about that.

I do not have much time but there is another point I want to raise. The situation has changed over the last 24 hours. The current situation in the Middle East, with the state of war between the coalition and the Iraqis, has changed the minds of a lot of people.

A few days ago, the American Congress voted 47 to 52:47 American senators voted against the participation of American troops in the Middle East war. Yesterday, Madam Speaker, now that war has broken out, 98 American senators supported their country at war. It is a heart-felt sentiment.

I cannot stand here today and say that I do not support the men and women of our armed forces who are there to defend—in my name and under my flag, under the command of my country—the cause espoused by my government, whether I like it or not.

I do not support this government. Everybody knows that, but it made the decision. As a Canadian therefore, I have to support the decision that was made and support the Armed Forces.

The decision we will have to make, the vote we will have to take in a few days, I hope, will be an intelligent vote. I swear to you, Madam Speaker, that we will gladly rise for that vote because all of us here—Muslims, Jews, Christians—pray to the same God for peace. I hope she is listening to us!

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend said that this debate is a most difficult one. Indeed it is, definitely. Not only is it difficult, but its complexity is such that we have lost sight of our objective.

During the few minutes he has left, could my hon. friend elaborate on this and put the debate back in perspective by emphasizing the real meaning of the vote we may be called upon to take, defining what is at stake and restating what is exactly Canada's position.

• (2050)

The Canadian position is clear: Although we would have supported the use of four military forces to enforce the sanctions, we are opposed to their participation in direct military action. Now we are faced with a war.

Could my hon. colleague tell the House once more that we just cannot tell our fighting men and women that we cannot support them, for they are just a bunch of terrorists? It is inconceivable that the government should hope to convince the Canadian people of that. It is an absolute aberration. Would my hon. friend care to elaborate on that point?

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I thank my good friend, the hon. member for Saint-Denis, a man who knows how to put issues in their proper perspective, for his question which is quite relevant.

First of all, may I say that there is no shame in seeking peace. I should be delighted, as I am sure the hon. member would be, if our forces could help bring back peace.

Only God knows when a vote will be held within the next few days; I certainly do not. What I know, however, is that the three parliamentary leaders will have to agree on the proper time for this vote, for the motion or order of the House dealing with this issue grants them in this particular instance the right to decide when the vote will be held. I do not know when it will be taken. I really do not know.

What I can say, however, is the vote on this motion. It may be that the significance of the wording may have been lost for, as I said, the motion is now redundant, obsolete. We just could not put the true question before the Canadian people which would read: In view of the fact that our military forces are already fighting side by side with other armed forces in the Persian Gulf, do you support them, yes or no? That is the question.

I support our military forces. I hope and pray that they will return home as soon as possible before this confrontation escalades into a war of which everybody understands the importance and significance. Should there be a shift in the Arab coalition tomorrow, we would be faced with a very difficult situation. All we are asking, is for Mr. Saddam Hussein to regain his senses and withdraw his forces from Kuwait. We have nothing to gain in bringing him to his knees or in destroying Iraq. We have no territorial ambition or vested interest in that region, but we want to re-establish international order.

Madam Speaker, I suggest it is in Canada's interest to work for peace and, as I said earlier, there is no shame in seeking peace. In fact, that is the very objective of our military forces.

[English]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): I want to compliment my hon. colleague from Ottawa—Vanier for elucidating government members their consternation regarding how people can feel about the circumstances in which Canada finds itself, in the face of a war that no one wanted and yet a war in which we are participants.

When members of my party, had the choice not that long ago between peace and war we chose peace. Who would choose otherwise? When we had the opportunity to choose between sanctions and war, we chose sanctions. We defended the opportunity that sanctions would afford peace. We defended the opportunities that sanctions would afford level-headedness, rationality and a peaceful mode to a conflict resolution.

We continued to do that, right up until that very last moment, not 48 hours ago. We understood the risks of waiting our time, of biding our time. We took the government to task on the fact that it was beginning to act unilaterally without consulting with this Parliament, without consulting the people of Canada. It acted unilaterally and changed the usual role, the normal role that Canada had played on the world stage as a peacekeeper that the minister identified as one that co-ordinated conflict. We changed from peacekeeping to peacemaking. Overnight, without consultation in Parliament, we became policemen of societies throughout the world. In the minister's words, we have become the policemen of the new democratic order.

We found ourselves in a position where we were objecting to a government that had unilaterally decided to involve Canada in an adventure. Such as it was, this last summer, an adventure in the Middle East, an adventure which threatened to destabilize the very precarious stability, the very fragile balance of power that existed prior to August 2. We could find absolutely no reasons other than supporting sanctions, for doing anything other than looking for the vehicle that we were participants in establishing in the United Nations as a focus point in a medium for seeking solutions.

As of the other day the choice is no longer between sanctions and war. It is between war and war. It is not a choice that we would like. It is not a choice that Canadians want. It is not a choice that any rational human being would relish making. It is difficult for all Canadians to be faced with such a choice. Other colleagues before this House have pointed to the difficulties, the attrocities and the sacrifices in humankind, in material, in resources, in lost opportunities, in genius and human talent that go wasted because of this type of conflict resolution.

But we face it, Madam Speaker, and because we face it, all Canadians now have a choice of a long war or a war which is to be completed as expeditiously as possible with minimum damage to our own international reputation, to our domestic reputation, and most importantly to the men and women we have sent into a theatre of war without seeking the consent of Parliament. We are in war and so it is not illogic that those of us who represent the will of the people throughout this land would seek to indicate to each and every one of them that it is not theirs, the responsibility for waging this war without the approval of Canada is not theirs. That responsibility lies with the government opposite.

We, on this side of the House, support our men and women. The objectives they have to achieve are objectives which we can identify despite the government's obfuscation of them. We have entered into a theatre of war without knowing the reasons why. The government and through its members over the course of this debate has sought to depict the situation as one in which the world order is pitted against the machinations of one evil, diabolical individual. I would buy that. I do not think there is anyone in Canada—perhaps no one in the Western World—who has not been convinced that we are dealing with a type of individual who should not be the leader of Iraq, let alone any other country in the world. We have an obligation to deal with the threats that Saddam Hussein poses not only to the Middle East, but to us on an international basis. We find ourselves being unwilling combatants in a war that no one wants. But, as combatants and as representatives of the public we have the obligation to ask this government for what purposes these combatants sacrifice themselves and about the emotions and the contributions of all Canadians.

Is it simply to remove the dictator from Kuwait? I remind government members opposite that the road to Kuwait taken by the allied forces runs through Baghdad. I remind government members that allied war machinery is raining havoc, death, and destruction on millions of people in Baghdad. I remind government members opposite that those same tools of death and destruction are going to be aimed at our own men and women, just as they have been aimed at victims in the Middle East.

We witnessed yesterday, much to the shock and horror of all people around the world, a senseless attack on Israel, but a Machiavellian one nonetheless. Although I do not know whether as a peace loving Canadian I would be able to resist this kind of provocation, we are asking Israel to ignore the infractions of its national interests, its national security, and the menace of death to its citizens in order to allow the allied forces to secure the kind of peace that we could all participate in.

When we take a look at the objectives for which we are engaged in war, can we stop simply at ousting the dictator from Kuwait? The answer to that has to be a resounding no.

How can we do it most effectively? How can we do it most efficiently? How can we do it so that we produce the most long-lasting result?

Hon. colleagues, at least on this side of the House, recognize the moment that we entered the theatre of war we were committed to doing a variety of things. One of them was the liberation of Kuwait, not necessarily to replace its feudal government with another feudal government, but perhaps to give another system of government a greater opportunity to exist.

We recognize as well that in order to maintain stability, we have to make some commitments to ensuring that the integrity of Kuwait outlives the withdrawal of the allied forces from the theatre of war as surely as it witnessed their entry.

I have been listening to the debate from the government side as to how this is going to be accomplished or whether in fact this is an objective. I have heard not one indication so far that we will have to destroy the military threat that Iraq poses to all of its neighbours.

We have witnessed it in the past. We have seen it in operation against Iran for eight years. We have seen it recently in operation against Kuwait. We saw if just yesterday in operation against the State of Israel, which is not a belligerent nor a combatant nor a participant in any of the conflict. We saw it just recently used against other ethnic minorities in the State of Iraq, the Kurds and others on the Turkish border.

An objective has to be the destruction of that military machine. Another objective has to be the re-establishment of some stability.

Is it the government's intention to destroy Iraq and then to leave a power vacuum that will be filled willy-nilly by other powers in the area that have demonstrated a predatory bent in the past?

We know already of Syria's history into Lebanon. We know already of Saudi Arabia's movements in the area. We know in that that Saudi Arabia increased its military potential with the purchases of $22 billion worth of arms only last August.

Can anyone on that side of the House reasonably expect that that increase in armament potential is going to re-establish a very fragile balance of power in the Middle East? Can we forget the national security interests of Israel? I think not. All members in this House have indicated that that has to be crucial to any kind of balance of power.

In addition, what are we going to do once we have destroyed the leadership of Iraq, once we have destroyed the internal domestic political structure? Are we prepared to leave a large peacekeeping contingent in order to restore domestic order? Are we willing or are we being asked by the government to put in place an authority to have an allied army of occupation and administration not only in Iraq, not only in Kuwait, but also in Saudi Arabia?

The government is very short in some of the questions and objectives that it says in which we will participate, but the government has already committed Canada to involvement in the war without declaring war. Surely, as in 1918 when we participated in the First World War, our presence in the conflict would give us an opportunity to sit at the peace table and to work out part of a peace plan that should be long lasting.

What are those objectives? What are those plans? Does not the Canadian public deserve the right now to know for what we are committing enormous political military potential, for which we are committing, as well, domestic national strife? We are pitting Canadian public opinion against Canadian public opinion on the question of war and war in the Middle East.

If we are to be true and serious participants in this activity for collective security, we will have to define what we mean in terms of collective security and long-term peace. As I said at the outset, the question is no longer one simply of sanctions versus war. We are never going to be able to resolve that argument. We have not given ourselves the opportunity to find out whether sanctions will work. We are never going to be able to afford ourselves the opportunity to see whether any other peace mechanisms would have produced the desired result.

Keep in mind, government members as well as opposition members, that we had the same objectives whether through sanctions or through war: the ousting of a dictator, the liberation of an occupied territory, the destruction of a war material, and the re-establishment of a fragile balance of power in the Middle East. The fragility of such a balance of power is to be seen in the kind of threats that a friend of Canada is witnessing on a day-to-day basis. As we speak, we know that the Israelis whose a nation is about the size of Prince Edward Island are facing imminent dangers of missile attack and armed invasion. We are asking them, and we should ask ourselves as well, if they are to make the sacrifice for peace what will be our sacrifice. Well, we are not going to make very many and I hope not, but at least truth should not be one of them.

Canadians can make a contribution in the Middle East. One of my colleagues, an expert in military matters, said that there is a variety of contributions. There are naval contributions, aviation, land troops, support contribution, and the humanitarian side.

Members from my caucus—and I see it has been replicated in the NDP caucus as well—feel that the humanitarian support that Canada can provide would be of long-term value, not only for the people in the area, but for Canada's reputation world-wide.

We have already seen the enormous dislocation and difficulties that the conflict has created. We saw it at the very beginning when over 60,000 refugees fled through Jordan. We are seeing it again. We know, through the bombardments that are taking place on both sides, that we are going to have in access of 750,000 more refugees. Some estimates point the number of refugees at 1.5 million. How will we restore order if we cannot take advantage of the opportunity to provide humanitarian needs at a time of great crisis. That would be in keeping with many of our roles in the UN.

George F. Kennan, a former U.S. ambassador to Moscow, dean of American foreign policy and the author of the containment policy, said just shortly after World War II when Europe was witnessing or living through the experience of post World War II economic, political and social destruction: "Against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos, governments would seek to perpetuate human misery in order to profit from it politically or otherwise would encounter the opposition of—" and I could add there the United Nations and Canadians everywhere.

To do something less would be to shame the objectives which we say we applaud when we involve ourselves in this conflict. Our government owes it to all Canadians to indicate to what extent we are participating in a long-term peace plan, much as the allied powers in World War II at Quebec, Casablanca and Yalta already began to prepare for peace. We have not been given an indication of that, other than to say that we will establish a military might beyond any contest in the Middle East.

But that is going to be very short lived, and we cannot cast forward surreptitious suggestions about peace. We have already made efforts to sacrifice virtually everything on behalf of peace. For example, I know my colleagues to my left have often alluded to an international peace conference with a set agenda and objectives to ensure a set end of results.

When we got to the point where we were willing to sacrifice national security interests of Israel in order to secure peace and were not able to obtain it, we knew that vehicle was no longer a viable option for us. But we must to have something in place.

Will the government come forward to tell the Canadian people what that plan is? It cannot be that we are simply going to leave our troops in the Middle East. It cannot be that we will give to them the policing authority in a land where co-operation and harmony has been disrupted over the course of the last 50 years by the economic dislocations of rationality that oil brings, both with its wealth and with its jealousies.

In closing, I can only add the ominous words of a letter sent to me by the Canadian Arab Federation just recently: "There is no such thing as a military solution to the Middle East conflict. War would only poison relations between the west and 200 million Arabs and one billion Muslims for decades. An international disaster would result. Indeed the new world order we speak of and hope for would likely be lost".

Our search for peace has to be one that is rooted in long-lasting profound initiatives. Our party on this side of the House is asking the government through this resolution to stop hiding behind obfuscation and to come forward with a peace plan that all of us can vote one.

I know that all Canadians following this debate would agree that no one wants war. Now that our government has put us in a war, we want a plan for eliminating the need for war as quickly as possible. If there is war, I know all members here on our side of the House, all members of the Liberal caucus, would say to our friends and to our sons and daughters in battle right now that we would be the first to volunteer in order to be with them and to bring them back home safely.

Mr. Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I will be sharing my time with the member for Timmins–Chapleau.

Madam Speaker, we are here tonight to discuss a moot question and an irrelevant resolution. We are talking about a war that is proceeding as we speak in the House of Commons, and some Members will be speaking until three or four o'clock this morning.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I'm sorry, I meant to catch the attention of the House before the Honourable Member started.

I wonder if we could have the consent of the House to allow the pages to call it a night. I am sure they are tired. They have been working long hours this week and many of them have school to attend.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, we fully agree that these young men and women should go home to bed while we continue working. See you Monday.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think it is an excellent suggestion. They have given us yeoman service day–after–day; a brilliant insight and enthusiastic support from us.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the generous comments that have been made, and that of course will be ordered. However, I should point out to the House that arrangements had been made, with which they had cheerfully complied, to serve us as long as the debate continues. I think the generous comments that have been made are an indication of the gratitude and the esteem with which this House holds the pages who serve not only the House but our country.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I totally agree with what has been said, but I want to take this moment to state that there are so many other House of Commons employees who obviously will not be able to go home. Perhaps we can use this occasion to tell them that if we could allow them the same privilege, we undoubtedly would. People such as the Clerk, the stenographers and others who are helping us should at least be recognized for their help.

I take the liberty of saying that as a former House employee. I want to congratulate them for their dedication.

Mr. Speaker: As a former House employee, the hon. member probably remembers moments when if the Members had gone home, he could have gone home.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, you might mention the translators.

Mr. Speaker: I think there is a general mood in the House to thank all those who serve this place and in so doing, serve our country.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, while I have the Parliamentary Secretary in the House, I would like to ask him a question dealing with the business of the House on Monday. It is a very important question, given that we do not have at this time an idea of what the House is going to be dealing with on Monday and since we will probably be sitting late tonight and tomorrow.

I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary has had a chance to talk to his House Leader and could apprise the House of what order of business this House will be taking up on Monday and, if possible, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of next week.

Mr. Speaker: I must point out that this may be unusual but the parliamentary secretary is rising to answer.

Mr. Cooper: I would indicate to the hon. member that at this point it would appear as though we will be calling Bill C–88, Bill C–91 and Bill C–93, three bills which are presently on the Order Paper.

Of course, we are facing a unique situation and circumstances may change, so I obviously have to put that caveat forward. But, at this point it is certainly our intention to call those three bills. We will talk about order with the other members of the House and provide all the co–operation that we can.

Mr. Nunziata: On the same point, Mr. Speaker, I assume from the discussion between the House leaders that it is accepted that the debate will be allowed to collapse; that, at some future point to be determined by the three House leaders, a vote will be taken; and that there will be no amendment to the order of the House that we are presently operating under.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for all House leaders so one would want to reserve all of one's options, but we are co-operating. We have had an excellent spirit in the House of Commons this evening, and I am sure that will continue.

• (2120)

Mr. Butland: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that all those interventions did not detract from my time.

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that I have kept track of all those interventions. They will not detract from your time.

Mr. Butland: Thank you very much Mr. Speaker. As I was saying this debate is about war. We are talking until three or four o'clock in the morning because the government did not call us back at the appropriate time. The Congress of the United States saw fit to get the job done and passed a resolution. Spoke to a resolution that was appropriate. We are not doing that. We were brought back nearly on the eve of war to discuss a resolution that was already nearly outdated. I am not an historian nor have I ever been in the Middle East, so I think that is a disadvantage for those of us who have not experienced the actual setting or the theatre of war. Some of my constituents have told me that just, maybe, if George Bush and the Prime Minister of Canada and more politicians were in the theatre of war, there would be less war declared.

The Prime Minister has quoted Lester B. Pearson on several occasions. I suggest that it has been selective quoting and I would also like to quote that the right hon. Prime Minister. In 1957, when he received the Nobel Peace Prize he said: "We prepare for war like precocious giants but for peace like retarded pygmies". I think that quote more aptly raps up what the Prime Minister meant at that time and what our party also stands for we are really treading on a tight rope between utopia and cremation. Just six months ago, the Berlin Wall was brought down, the cold war was over, the satellite countries of the U.S.S.R. were seeking independence, there was detente between the United States and the U.S.S.R. Now we have problems in Lithuania and the other satellite countries. We have this conflagration in the Middle East. The turn of events has been so dramatic, going from the very positive to the very negative. Indeed, we are on a tight rope and we could go either way.

We have been consistent in saying that this war is unnecessary and unjust. It is a war about power, about money and about oil. A journalist, and I think a wise journalist, said that if Kuwait were full of coconut palms or date palms, certainly we would not be trying to drive Saddam Hussein out of that country. We invaded Kuwait. We would like to get him.

The young people and the senior citizens of this country, the young people who have not experienced war, who have not been sullied by war, in one united voice say no, war is not the solution. At the opposite end of the spectrum, visiting the legion in my community, the veterans who have experienced war said war is no solution. It will not solve anything. And just this evening, it was very timely, dated January 15, One Voice, the Seniors Network spoke against this war. "We want to see Canada playing a more active and independent peacekeeping role in its support of the United Nations. We can enforce sanctions and take part in diplomatic negotiations but we must not be aggressors in this conflict", say the seniors, the veterans who have experienced war and the young people of this country. I had occasion to receive some letters from students in a school in my community and, to a person, to an individual, they say war will not solve anything.

If we can cure so many of the diseases, surely we can resolve our differences. One student said if he could go to Iraq, he is sure if he spoke to Saddam Hussein, he could convince him that this war is wrong. It is ironic that just several years ago, the United States was propping up Saddam Hussein in Iraq. It was giving him arms. He was a hero at that time. Now, all of a sudden he is a diabolical murderer. He is a jackal. He is a barbarian. Has he changed: No, he has not changed. He is the same individual. He was a barbarian then and he is a barbarian now.

Everyone says in their speeches that Saddam Hussein is evil incarnate! Yes, of course, he is an evil individual, but we are wreaking havoc upon millions of people. Have we declared war as well on the Iraqi children, the Arab countries of this world, the Israelis? That has been the domino effect, the spillover. The war, as we have said, will not solve the problem. It will merely be a conflagration of all sorts of nations. There is no solution in war.

I read an article by Richard Gwynne and I think we have given it short shrift. Saddam Hussein wanted a war. We are going to create a martyr. If he is martyred, what will be the end result of that? It will not solve any of our problems. It will create myriad more problems that probably will be unsolvable. While we are unable to solve those problems, how many hundreds of thousands of people will be killed?

Turning to the concept of sanctions, do they work or do they not work? Would they work or would they not work? We get conflicting stories as to whether they were or were not. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said there were undetected products getting through and that is a paradox if I ever heard one. If they are undetected, how do they know they were getting through? Some say sanctions are effective and some say they are not.

This time, we cannot wait. Saddam Hussein will take the food from the children and the women and give it to his soldiers. We are saying that is not acceptable to us. Our alternative is a bomb. Send a thousand sorties a day and decimate the country.

I am sure if the young children in this country had the choice between being hungry and facing the devastation of these bombings, the choice would be obvious. Sanctions should have been given more and more and more time to work. Saddam Hussein wanted this war and we gave it to him. We played into his hands and the solution will not be there. This country, as long as this leader was present, would be a pariah state and other countries would not deal with him.

As I speak Jordan is perhaps to become involved. We knew Hussein would attack Israel, he said so. The Israelis expected it, so it is no surprise, but that does not make it good. This could be genocide. This could wipe out an entire nation.

The cost will be $2 billion a day. It could cost $86 billion. You say: "well money is insignificant, it is irrelevant," but surely in this day and age, with people starving, dying of malnutrition, that money is important. The money could be put to a much better use than this war.

The question is: why are we at war? Can we answer that question? That question that will have to be answered later on when the war is over. Why did we go? To get the aggressor out of Kuwait? To protect our life-style? The President of the United States said to protect our way of life, to protect jobs. That is far-fetched. It did not work.

• (2130)

Finally we said we had to get rid of the aggressor. Yes, we must get rid of the aggressor, but is this the way? It is the least desired of ways or alternatives that we should have followed. But now we are into it, and once we have it started, how will we be able to get out of it? Who will be there to pick up the pieces when this is all over?

As for negotiations, negotiations took place, we think. At just about the last negotiation James Baker said: "We are going to try a new spin on an old approach. The carrot is that if they pull out of Kuwait we will not use the big stick". That is negotiating, to use the big stick. Indeed, we are using the big stick. There is bomb after bomb after bomb after bomb.

Winston Churchill, who got much of his fame while being involved in conflict, said: "Jaw, jaw, jaw is better than war, war, war". We accept that and we are against this war. We are consistently speaking out against it. We rally around our troops, and our motives are constantly questioned regarding whether or not we support the troops. That is almost dishonourable. It is despicable to even to suggest that we do not. These people would rather see us rally around the guns.

I will close by asking whether it is the right thing to do, if you are bearing arms and attempting to be a part of an aggression. I cannot help but think of the medics and the padres during wartime. Who could be considered braver than these individuals who went into the front, for the most part totally weaponless?

Please let us not get into saying we do not support our troops. Nothing could be further from the truth. We are against this war. We are against aggression. We believe, unfortunately, that it is now out of hand and that there is no turning back. In view of the way it is escalating, what will it be tomorrow and the next day and two weeks from now? Let us hope it ends as soon as possible.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the conviction with which the hon. member spoke. I have just a few comments and possibly a question.

No one questions the distaste for war; none of us does that. It is certainly an option that no one would prefer. I think one of the issues that was brought forward by the member is somewhat confusing in the minds of the Canadian people; something I guess he did not bring out. It is simply the fact that Saddam Hussein has inflicted severe punishment upon his own people, for hundreds of thousands of his own people have died over the years. In fact, thousands of his own people have died this year. Hundreds of thousands reportedly have died in the country of Kuwait, which he has taken over, and continue to die at this very moment.

The unanswered question of this whole equation is: How many of those people would have continued to die at his hands if the United Nations had not acted as decisively as it has and collectively on behalf of the world to rid the country of Iraq of this individual? Peace at what price? This is really the question I am asking the hon. member.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the sincerity of the question.

My answer is that violence indeed begets violence. Yes, I suggested that Hussein is a barbarian, a jackal and all those terms that people have defined him as being. Anybody who would turn upon his own people and use poison gases and all these deadly weapons upon his own kind is all those things. I have also read the horrors in Kuwait, unspeakable horrors, things that when you read them you say are just unbelievable and repulsive.

The government's answer appears to be: "Well, our solution is to go in there and decimate. And rather than allowing maybe 10,000, 15,000 or 20,000 to die abominable deaths, torturous deaths, let us do it quickly. Let us get in there. Let us bomb. Let us have a blitzkrieg. Let us see how many and how fast we can get in there to do the job." I understand from the very graphic pictures on television that these weapons are so technical they can actually pinpoint and hit a bunker. These are the kinds of weapons we are using.

The answer cannot be to wipe out a nation although that is possible. We have heard of 150,000, we have heard of 350,000 people killed. I do not know. Nothing has been verified. One wonders what will happen. In a small incident like Panama it was suggested that very few people were killed. It was later evidenced, however, that hundreds were killed. Hundreds of thousands of people, perhaps a million people, if the conflagration continues, will die. That is not the solution.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Portneuf, very briefly please.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I have a question for my hon. colleague. He sides with those who claim that we should have continued to negotiate with Mr. Hussein, a man who had just ended an eight–year war with his neighbour. We had assumed, he and I together with most world leaders, that the war was over in the Middle East and that there would be peace. Hardly a few months later, this same Mr. Hussein invaded a small country. The collective realization of world leaders of countries that are UN members was that Mr. Hussein had not abandoned his military ambitions, but that he wanted an extension of the war in the Middle East in an attempt to take over a number of countries. He certainly did not prove world leaders wrong yesterday when he attacked Israel, a country which so far had not been directly involved in this war against Iraq. I wish the hon. member could explain to me how much further the United Nations could negotiate with this man, when admittedly every possible effort had been made. In other words, to use the hon. member's own words, at one point should one decide to use the big stick to make someone understand that enough is enough?

[English]

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question and I also accept the fact that it is a difficult question. It is like sanctions. How long do you negotiate, how long do you allow sanctions to work? I do not know. I do not have the answer. I do know, however, that this solution is wrong. It is not a solution to have a travesty upon the world. It will reverberate across the world next month, next year, next decade, and perhaps next century. We may never recover from this.

• (2140)

To answer as to what time, I have no concept. Sanctions may have taken a year and a half. They say that it is too expensive. It is too slow. Compare that cost with the $86 billion to $100 billion cost and the million lives or whatever. I do not think there is any comparison.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to take part in debate on this very serious issue we have before us. I think one of the things that should be made very clear at the onset is that I firmly believe there is no one in this House, no one, who supports war. We made it very clear that we all oppose war, but the way in which we try to express ourselves in that opposition differs.

The main thing that we are discussing is the motion we have before us. When I read it, I was a little confused.

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

I support that. But what I do not support is the fact that the United Nations, as a peacekeeper, as a body of nations that supports peace, has decided to go to war in its Resolution 678.

If my understanding is correct, under section 42 of the United Nations charter, there must be evidence and there must be proof that all other methods have been exhausted prior to going to and calling for war.

I am not convinced, and I have not been convinced in this House by the members on the other side—that all options have been exhausted. I do not think that sanctions were given enough time to work. I know it has been said, many times: "How long? When do you call a stop to this? When is enough enough?" I do not think that losing one's life is worth all the oil and all the money that is going to be spent in this war.

On the question of sanctions, I would like to quote the rt. hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs on January 16, 1991 on page 17112 of Hansard. In response to a question put to him by our leader, He said:

> What I am telling here is that we have the most airtight system of sanctions the world has known and yet even with the most effective network of sanctions we have known, there are strategic imports getting into Iraq.

It seems to me that if we have the most airtight form of sanctions in the world, we have a bushel basket that does not hold water. That is not, in my opinion, a sanction that is functioning.

So what does it mean? It means that we do not have the most airtight sanctions in the world, in my opinion. I find this statement rather silly, quite frankly.

If there were chemicals and machinery coming through the back door or coming into the country somehow, we should have stepped up our patrols, we should have stepped up our sanctions.

There is no evidence I have heard in this House that tells me sanctions did work. I think we jumped the gun so to speak. I think we acted too quickly. I think if we, as parliamentarians, and it has already been said, but it is worth repeating, if we were made to enter the field of battle we would not be so quick to say: "let's go to war". We say that Saddam Hussein is a maniac, he is not too stable, we do not know what he is going to do next, that he is willing to kill his own people to achieve his goal.

When we drop those bombs on Iraq, we are killing civilians. We are not killing the military. I have a letter from the Canadian Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War. They were the Nobel Peace Prize winners in 1985. In the fifth paragraph of this letter it says: "The vast majority of casualties and deaths would be suffered by the civilian population. In wars since 1980, 84 per cent of all war dead have been civilians. Forty-five per cent of the population of Iraq and Kuwait are children under the age of 15. Medical facilities there are inadequate even for peace time. But they would be paralysed by war".

I have numerous letters from students in my riding who have written to me saying that this war is stupid. "We do not want war; we want peace. There has to be another way. When you fight with somebody else, that is violence and violence does not create anything but more violence." These are 10, 11, 12 year old kids telling us this. And here we have the Nobel Peace Prize winners saying we value the lives of our Canadian men and women serving in the Persian Gulf to enforce United Nations sanctions on Iraq. We join with their families in praying for a resolution, through the United Nations without war. That is the same thing as the kids are saying.

It does not take a genius to figure out that this war is wrong. It was wrong from the beginning. We did not support it and we do not support it now.

I have a communique from the staff of the Enterprise, a local newspaper in my riding in Iroquais Falls and it says: "Dear Cid, give peace a chance. Please act on our behalf here in Iroquais Falls to do whatever you can to avert a war in the gulf area that could mean the loss of many lives and a world-wide tragedy."

Nobody wanted this war. It is a war that is based on greed not need. It is based on the need for money. Why does Saddam Hussein need Kuwait? He needs it because he is broke. He just came out of a an eight-year war with Iran. He needed the money and this is what this is all about. He wants the oil. He wants the money.

"What is the price of peace", we were asked a little earlier. What is the price of a life? Is a life worth all this? Would losing one life—what if it was yours—be worth it? I do not think so.

There are many things that can be said here this evening. There are many things that have already been said. Our troops are in the gulf. My position and my Party's position is very clear. Our troops are there. There is no question about that. What are they going to do there? Are they going to become part of the aggressive forces? In my opinion they should be used in the role that was designed through the United Nations, that is to pursue the role as peacekeepers. We should be assisting with medical needs, humanitarian needs. We should be offering escorts to the hospital ships. Our CF-18s should be offering protection for those hospital ships. They have a role to play, but that role should not be an aggressive role. It is to be a humanitarian role for the protection and the continuation and pursuit of peace. Once we become aggressors, we are on the same level as Saddam Hussein. We are not above him; we are below him, because we have now become the aggressors.

• (2150)

In the pursuit of peace, our troops do have a role to play. I do not suggest for a moment that they should withdraw and come home and forget all about it. I think they should be there. I think they should be serving the needs of the civilians, of the refugees and not become the aggressors. On that note, I will end my comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau on a remarkable speech and I sincerely believe him when he says that each and every member of this House wants for peace.

On Remembrance Day less than two years ago, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and I were in Normandy where we visited the huge cemeteries covered with thousands upon thousands of crosses and tombstones with inscriptions listing the ages of the people buried there: 17, 18, 19, 20 and 22. As we left these cemeteries, we could not help but appreciate the beautiful landscape and the happy people and reflect that such was the price these young heroes had to pay to secure this peace.

In the various villages where memorials were being erected to honour Canadian war dead, we spoke to young people, young parents, who said: "We are doing this today because we want for our children to remember those who years ago paid this peace with their lives." Canada remembers. For nearly 45 years—I am sure my hon. friend will agree—it has expended a lot of effort working for the cause of peace.

Yet, there comes a time, once war has been declared, when it is necessary to stand up and be counted. As a union leader, he certainly realizes that people can negotiate for a year or two. Then out of frustration, the parties will start hurling verbal abuse at each other which may turn very quickly into physical confrontations. Society, however, has developed laws and rules of behaviour: The parties may go to court and ask for a ruling.

On the other hand, when the leader of a country decides not to resort to diplomacy and negotiations and even the occasional slap on the wrist, but rather to chemical weapons, tanks and aircrafts to destroy entire areas, how do we stop him? I should like the hon. member to explain to me tonight how, at the international level a judge could enforce international law? Here it is always possible to call the police and say: "Listen, you have to enforce the law". It is possible to put people away in jail, but it is not possible to put a whole country behind bars. Therefore I would like him to explain to me how in the future, we could find a way out of these dead end situations; is not by waging war.

Mr. Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): First I want to thank my colleague for his question, a very serious and sincere question, I believe.

It is true that we spent some time in Normandy about two years ago, and it is true as well that as I walked around the tombstones I was heartbroken to realize that all these young people had died because of the war. This is why today I speak so strongly in favour of successful peace negotiations. I also believe that it is not good enough to say that a time comes when war is the only option. In this instance the negotiating process was not carried through to the end, all avenues were not explored.

As to the sanctions, I feel that they were not given sufficient time to give results. I should like to quote from a statement I have here, but unfortunately I have only the English version.

[English]

Retired U.S. Admiral, William J. Crow, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, stated in testimony before the U.S. Senate Armed Services Committee:

> If in fact the sanctions will work in 12 to 18 months, instead of 6 months, the trade-off of avoiding war with its attendant sacrifices and uncertainties would in my view be worth it.

[Translation]

I quite agree with that statement. I do not think and I was never convinced that enough time was given for the sanctions to take effect.

Specifically concerning the question of my friend, I am tempted to quote a letter, also in English.

[English]

We ask that all governments work to make the sanctions even more effective and that every effort be made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to negotiate the withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait. We are convinced that this is the turning point in world history when we can choose to act as an international community to develop a world order that does not rely on war to settle conflicts.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker. I participate in this debate tonight with a definite sense of futility in view of the unfolding events in the Arabian Gulf beyond the control of this House and even well beyond the control of Canada. The debate has become futile in the sense that it does not lead to any meaningful or effective decision by this Parliament, since war is already under way and Canada is there. Many members of this House, including myself, regret this very deeply and would like to have had the opportunity before war started to make some of the arguments that are now moot.

In the present circumstances, I rather regret the extent to which this debate has gone and the fact that it continues to be partisan. I do not believe that this is an appropriate time nor an appropriate issue for the scoring of what may be regarded by our people as somewhat petty political points since Canada is now involved in a war and we are all first and foremost Canadians. I believe that we in this House enjoy substantial agreement on many points. I want to emphasize these points of agreement before I explain, for the benefit of the people of Canada why I believe this matter could and should have been conducted differently.

The resolution before the House would affirm the support of this House for the "United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait". The objective of the UN in this matter is something on which I believe we all are in agreement, that is the removal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the restoration of the legitimate Government of Kuwait. Where we have differed in this House is on the question of the appropriate means for the world community to pursue in order to achieve this objective. We on this side believe that economic sanctions should have been given adequate time to effect this objective in parallel with ongoing diplomatic efforts. The government believed that the time for war had arrived. It and the Prime Minister bear a heavy responsibility for the consequences of this decision.

While I deplore the fact that we are at war, I support whole-heartedly the objectives which our forces are pursuing. In that sense, I now find myself in support of the resolution before the House.

The holiday season this year was made gloomier by anxiety and haunted by fear. The world was at a crossroads, but we could tell that the situation was bound to worsen. For sure, the over-all Canadian agenda was not rosy. I was particularly struck by the televised messages from our troops to their families and friends here in Canada. The Canadian soldiers on foreign soil or cruising over distant waters were not posted abroad as peacekeepers, but indeed they were very close to getting involved in deadly combat.

[English]

How could so much have gone wrong so fast? How could it be that we were contemplating the imminent engagement of Canadian forces in battle, not in Europe but in a far-off desert? I suppose all of us wonder why we are really there. Is this really about oil? Is it really a case of the United States somehow co-opting the world community to assist it in its first post-cold war effort to assert its influence in a new and threatening way? If there were no oil in Kuwait, would we even care about the subjugation of this small nation by the Iraqis? Would we have objected if the Iraqis had succeeded in defeating Khomeini and had perhaps occupied the Iranian oil fields?

These questions are to me very unsettling and very disturbing as I contemplate the situation that confronts the world in the gulf. But they do little to help address the issues that have confronted Canada as a member of the world community and that may perplex the world for years to come. There remains little room for debate now that the President of the United States has taken and acted upon the decision to attack Iraq. That decision was made in Washington alone, and this is not the way the world should work in 1991.

I speak in this House of Commons to appeal to our government not to abandon the pursuit of peace even in the face of war. Despite the commitment our nation has made to engage in this action, we must not fail to search for avenues of peace to stop the destruction as soon as possible. Even in war, let us counsel restraint in the world community.

There should be no dispute about why we are in this situation. The massive, unprovoked and brutal assault launched on August 2 by Iraq against the nation of Kuwait and the subsequent purported annexation of Kuwait as a province of Iraq cannot be tolerated by any civilized nation. Iraq openly and defiantly violated international law and ignored the charter of the United Nations. The world community reacted with remarkable speed and consensus. Canada was right to support the UN resolutions condemning Iraq and demanding its withdrawal from Kuwait, as well as imposing economic sanctions.

There have been some who have equivocated, either because they claim to see some legitimacy in Iraq's alleged grievances, or by citing a double standard lurking in the world reaction to past wrongs of a similar nature. I do not agree with these objections.

[Translation]

The matter of the Iraqi's grievance concerning the artificial boundaries imposed by Britain, their claim to part of Kuwait's territory or their recriminations about the Kuwaitian leaders are nothing more than a smokescreen to throw everybody off balance. Frontiers may well have been cavalierly delineated, but they were accepted by the states of the region and in fact became legitimate. No other state in that region went to war over a boundary issue. Besides, Saddam Hussein was as happy as could be to acknowledge the legitimacy of the Kuwaitian leaders when he sought billions of dollars for his war with Iran.

[English]

It is true that there is a strong odour of hypocrisy in the air as the world community unites to condemn Iraq. So many times the world community has stood by and failed to condemn, let alone take meaningful action against, aggressors. Even now the Soviet Union seeks to intimidate the people of Lithuania through brutal means while the world does little more than gush empty rhetoric.

This is an argument that should be turned inside out. If a double standard has been practised, it surely means that the world community needs more experience in collective action. I suppose that if clean hands and a single standard were necessary prerequisites for world community action, there could never be such action at all.

Frankly I am less troubled by the supposed hypocrisy of the United States than I am by the logical conclusion of the argument upon which it is based, namely that the world community cannot act in accordance with the United Nations charter pursuant to resolutions of the Security Council, if the force required to implement these resolutions is primarily provided by the United States. To conclude thus is to ensure that the United Nations will become totally irrelevant and, further, that the United States will act unilaterally in future, when it believes its interests are threatened.

Then there is the cynical belief, to which I alluded previously, that all of this is motivated only by oil. Of course, it is indisputable that had this aggression occurred in some resource-poor region not so strategically located, the response would have been much different. I suppose this is part of the harsh reality of international politics, but it is surely not an argument against international action.

Of course we should not sacrifice human life for oil, but I fail to understand why the powerful economic reasons for ensuring access to important oil reserves should be the basis for undermining the legitimacy of international co-operation against aggression. Oil, whether we like it or not, is vital to the world economy. While this is especially true of the industrialized economies, it is also true that oil is vital to the struggling developing economies. The fact that oil is at stake in this crisis makes its outcome crucially important to the world economy, but it cannot be said that this fact should somehow impede the moral legitimacy of world action against Saddam Hussein.

It is almost too much to contemplate the potential disaster for the world economy and the human suffering that would ensue if Saddam were able to interrupt the supply of oil from the gulf region. I am convinced that none of the hand-wringing and equivocation I have heard is sufficient argument against an international effort, based upon economic sanctions, to turn back Saddam Hussein.

While the cold war period was one of unrelenting tension, it must be said that it was a period free from major international conflict. Regional conflicts were not permitted to get out of hand because of the threat of escalation to a superpower confrontation and all that such confrontation could mean.

In the post-cold war world, peace will no longer be built on mutual deterrents, and the balance of power will be replaced by the preponderance of power. If the United States and the Soviet Union no longer see their interests as being in contradiction, or if the Soviet Union is in fact in the process of decline as a superpower, then some new and very important questions must be asked. Examples are: What counterweight or other external limitation will there be to U.S. power? What protection does the world have against violations of international law if there are no international policemen? What mechanisms can exist at a multilateral level to ensure that international law is applied even-handedly in situations where force is required?

In the absence of mutual deterrents of superpowers to impose restraint on international aggression, it seems to me that the emerging post-cold war order can follow one of two patterns. Either the international community evolves an effective method of responding to breaches of international law, or there will develop an ad hoc unilateral response to situations deemed by one or another superpower or indeed lesser power to be vital to its interests, probably with little or no consultation with international organizations.

The invasion of Kuwait by Iraq provided the international community with its first clear post-cold war test. It is a clear test, because there is no justification in international law for Iraq's action against Kuwait. After August 2, there were not many choices available to the world community. I could think of three.

The invasion could have been ignored or treated as an Arab problem in need of an Arab solution. This overlooks the fact that no Arab state possessed the military strength to enforce an Arab solution against Saddam Hussein.

Second, the international response could have been to move into the gulf to prevent further aggression but, perhaps after a period of sanctions, to accept reluctantly his annexation of Kuwait as one of those unfortunate things that happen in the world. This option makes the statement that observance of international law is strictly voluntary and acknowledges the inability of the international community to enforce observance of norms, which are surely essential to long-term peace and security.

The final choice, one would have hoped, was to apply the provisions of chapter VII of the United Nations charter, which in itself includes the use of force "as requested by the Security Council of the United Nations". Unfortunately, in this first test of the post-cold war period, the Security Council was not used to bring the pressure of the world community to bear on Saddam Hussein through genuine collective action. Rather, it was used to rubber stamp unilateral superpower intervention in a manner that seemed to meet none of the tests of prudence and sobriety that ought to accompany the decision to destroy the lives and property of hundreds of thousands of people.

I want to take pains to ensure that my remarks are not misinterpreted. I wish in no way to appear to sanction, accept or condone the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait. We must not forget the fear and loss suffered by many innocent individuals, including Canadians, who were held hostage by the Iraqis in strategic locations, in complete violation of international law and all norms of human rights. The hostage taking was made even more outrageous by the introduction on August 25 of the death penalty for Kuwaitis found to be harbouring foreign nationals.

In addition to the plight of the hostages, the occupation of Kuwait by the Iraqi forces will doubtless be remembered as one of the most brutal and vicious events of modern history. The 82-page report issued by Amnesty International verifies this completely. If the territorial imperialism of Iraq were not enough, the report of Amnesty International, which other members have referred to, would compel me to the conclusion that international action against Iraq was necessary.

But this is not the essential question. The question rather is: What action is appropriate? By whom should it be taken? The further question we should be asking is: What should Canada's role have been?

I believe that the taking of offensive action by the international force in the gulf against Iraq was the wrong action at the wrong time by the wrong force.

[Translation]

Although force is never rejected outright and might eventually become necessary, it would be a tragic mistake to resort to that option now. We did not give the sanctions enough time for them to be effective.

[English]

It does need to be said that the decision to abandon economic sanctions in favour of offensive action will result in unknown but quite possibly horrific consequences. Not only is the conflict certain to result in massive numbers of dead and widespread destruction, but the outcome can never be certain. For that matter, if the alliance of forces does prevail, what then? There is the potential that Saddam will achieve martyrdom, that his defeat will further inflame the Arab dislike for the west and will undermine the governments of Arab states that have supported the alliance and been friendly to the west.

There is the potential need to send occupation forces into Iraq after the war. There is the possibility that neighbouring states will attempt to take advantage of Iraq's defeat by seeking to take Iraqi territory. Perhaps Iran from the east, Syria from the west, and possibly Turkey from the north. There is further the possibility that the spread of the war to Israel will split the alliance against Iraq and possibly bring other Arab nations into the conflict.

But by no means the least importance, there is the risk of a serious ecological catastrophe.

Finally, what should Canada's role be in this terrible situation? Canada has built itself a marvellous reputation in international affairs. Canada's influence has greatly exceeded its might for half this century. With that history in mind, it is all the more embarrassing that in this crisis our government could find nothing innovative or original to contribute until the Prime Minister sent a letter to the Secretary-General of the United Nations last week.

I know, that my time is nearly over. I would like to conclude by saying that I believe, the failure to follow the steps outlined in the charter of the United Nations, chapter VII, establishes a very worrisome precedent.

The end of the cold war does not mean the end of the need for collective security based upon international co-operation. However, just as Neville Chamberlain gave appeasement a bad name and thereby influenced countless foreign policy decisions since, this precipitous action in the Gulf may give collective or co-operative security a bad name as well.

We have all watched our television screens during the last days and witnessed the horrors of war. It struck me how capricious life is. Why is it that I was born in Canada and can witness these horrible events safe in the knowledge that the bombs will not fall on me while someone just like me is hiding in a shelter, his family clutched to him in another country wondering why fate has dealt him this card?

Until the leaders of this world find a means of ending the madness of war, we must not rest. We must never tire for working for peace among all peoples.

May God protect our men and women serving for us in the Gulf. May God protect the people, both civilian and military, from all countries who face such grave danger at this time, and may God forgive us all.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the hon. member, It was for the most part, a very thoughtful argument through the course of debate. But there are a couple of points that I wanted to make to which the member could possibly respond.

I think I will begin by quoting our former Prime Minister and leader the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, when on Wednesday, January 16, 1991, he pointed out so clearly:

> No, this is not an American Adventure. It is a United Nations action in collective security, one of the greatest historic developments of our time,

He went on to say: "certainly in my lifetime".

I mention that only in the sense that I think we are disillusioning the Canadian people when we think that the UN Security Council members rubberstamp the views of any member. Is he telling us, for example, that the U.S.S.R., France, Great Britain and China have rubber stamped the actions of the United Nations?

• (2220)

Further, I think that he has to look beyond articles 41 and 42 of chapter VII and take a very strong look at chapter VII. If he does, I think he would again understand the reasoning so behind this and that the UN was clearly living within its original charter and certainly within chapter VII. I think, again, that he has to look beyond sections 41 and 42 exclusively.

Mr. Manley: I appreciate the question, Mr. Speaker, because it does give me an opportunity to explain that point which I unfortunately had to omit for lack of time.

I believe that the United Nations was not asked to fulfil its mandate under chapter VII. In lieu thereof, it was asked to write a blank cheque to the United States to launch offensive military action against Iraq. I regret that Canada went along for the ride without even so much as questioning the timing as far as we know.

Chapter VII, as the hon. member knows, of the UN Charter provides a clear framework for international collective action in the face of a renegade state. Chapter VII includes the establishment of a military staff committee and requires, in article 42, a determination by the Security Council whether economic sanctions "have proved to be inadequate".

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, whom I think is very familiar with the problems of former leaders standing up and contradicting current leaders, as Mr. Diefenbaker often liked to do, perhaps rhetorically asked the opposition in this Parliament to prove that sanctions were working. What a ridiculous proposition for him to make.

First, this is a matter which the Security Council must decide. It never applied its collective judgment to the issue of whether economic sanctions were working. That procedure was totally short-circuited.

Second, surely the burden of proof must be on those who say the economic sanctions are inadequate. Is this not the argument that the Prime Minister of Canada has been so proud of making in the context of the G-7 nations to Margaret Thatcher? When she argued that sanctions were not going to work against South Africa our Prime Minister said: "Yes, sanctions are the way to go". Yet he seems to be willing to accept on very little evidence, as far as we can see, that sanctions were not working.

My concern is not that this is a question of approving the United Nations engagement in the battle in the Persian Gulf: Rather it is a matter of saying Canada should have stood back and said that the procedures in chapter VII are vitally important. They have only worked once in the history of the United Nations and that was because the Soviet Union chose to absent itself on Korea. Now we have an historic opportunity to see whether genuine, collective and co-operative action can work to enforce peace and security throughout the world. Why not use those procedures? Why short-circuit them and turn that right over to a superpower to make the sole determination of whether it is time to take military action.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this second opportunity to respond.

Just one point that I want to emphasize clearly is the fact that, again under artcile VII, there is no sequence of events, or there are no specific steps that have to be followed with regard to sanctions. There is no pronouncement that has to be made with regard to whether or not sanctions are effective.

If we go beyond the very narrow interpretation of Articles 41 and 42, and look at chapter VII, with the clearness and the intensity of chapter VII, I believe the member would find that we have clearly operated and performed as required under chapter VII.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this is merely a matter for legal interpretation. For what it is worth—and I am not an international lawyer—I read the provisions of article 42, which say: "should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in article 41, namely the sanctions, would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, then it may take such action", and so on. It seems to me that in the absence of such a determination being made, the following provisions of article 42 should not have been taken. That is the legal argument.

I think the more important argument is this: As we move on into the post cold-war era, as I tried to say in my original speech, we really have two choices in terms of how international peace and security is enforced in the world. Either we have a collective security approach, which engages the determination of multiple nations, preferably the United Nations, or we relegate it to an enforcement by a superpower or even medium power in a regional dispute, that can enforce the peace or the action that it seems to think is desirable.

What I think is lacking in this case is an evident desire on the part of the nations that sat and made this decision to carry through to its logical conclusion the collective security concept, which would have engaged the minds of all those members of the Security Council in the decision to take offensive military action against the renegade country Iraq.

Rather than doing that, the procedure was short-circuited and simply delegated to the President of the United States to make on his own. As I said in my speech, I do not think that is the way the world should work in 1991. If we are going to ensure that we do have continuing peace and security and are not subject simply to the whims of a superpower, we must hope that the world determines mechanisms that can ensure, first, that action is taken when it is necessary; but, second, by doing that we establish, a series of precedents to demonstrate that there should not be a double standard and to prevent the need for collective security from arising. That can only happen when we really do have a clear system in international law that has proven to be effective and workable. And I think we have lost that.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): During the time that I have been in this House, I have felt uneasy about being a Canadian on a number of occasions, particularly with the passing of the free trade agreement, uneasy about Canada's loss of its independent economic objectives, with the slashing of social programs, with what that has done to the caring and compassionate society that Canada has a reputation for. But never have I felt so uneasy about being a Canadian as I have over these last few days at witnessing the outbreak of war against Iraq and this government's actions. I know that many Canadians share that unease. I will mention the extent to which my constituents have voiced their concerns to me in a moment.

Canadians know that this House is debating whether or not going to war against Iraq in pursuit of efforts to get Iraqi troops out of Kuwait was right or wrong. It has taken place, but that is what we are debating now, as to whether or not it was right or wrong.

Let me at the outset make my position perfectly clear. Along with millions of Canadians, I am firmly opposed to this government's decision to support war. I am opposed to this government's decision to deploy Canada's young men and women in an offensive military role. I am opposed to this government's decision to involve Canada in an unnecessary and deadly war.

• (2230)

The decision to attack Iraq was and remains a morally unacceptable one. War in all its forms is madness. It seems incredible that the lessons of the past have not been learned. Have we learned nothing over the years? What will it take for this government and for President Bush to realize that the military offensive will solve nothing?

We all have a moral responsibility to stop this madness, to stop the carnage, to stop the killing of tens of thousands of people who just happen to have been born in Iraq, people who have no responsibility for the actions of Saddam Hussein. This war will have and is having severe political, economic, environmental and human costs, costs that could have been avoided if this government, the U.S. government and other governments had been as committed to peace as they have been to war.

This war is madness. Church groups the world over have pointed out that the unspeakable loss of innocent civilian lives is unacceptable on moral grounds. There can be no getting away from that. Those who support this military offensive have no choice but to accept some responsibility for the so many innocent people who have been killed and who will be killed as a result of this military offensive against Iraq. That is my position and that is as clearly as I can state it. But let me also make it clear that I share the world's revulsion at the actions of Saddam Hussein. It is reprehensible and immoral, and there can be no getting away from that.

Let me also say that I wish for all Canadians involved in this war a safe and speedy return home.

I have wondered why over time this government appears to forget that people actually suffer from its practices, principles and legislation, from its attack, for example, on this country's social policies; that children actually go hungry because of its policies and by its refusal to put justice ahead of big business interests; that over 40,000 children die every day on this planet because Canada and other so-called civilized countries pursue the international policies they pursue, such as selling Iraq and other dictators around the world the arms that they use to destroy innocent women, men and children.

As has been so clear over the last few days, war cannot resolve long-standing conflicts. It will only explode them wider and deeper. This war will not stop aggression but rather will accelerate the cycle of violence and revenge, and this may not be restricted just to the Middle East.

After this madness is over, then what? The killing of thousands of innocent Iraqis, Israelis, Saudis, Kuwaitis, and soldiers of the so-called allies, and injuring so many more, could well make it impossible for post-war diplomatic efforts to overcome. This massive attack on Iraq is no basis on which to build a new stable order in the region or in the world. Most likely, it will lead to years, if not decades, of vengeance and make it impossible to bring about reconciliation.

The NDP has a long and distinguished record in arguing that peaceful solutions must be sought to resolve disputes. That has not always made the New Democratic Party popular. But we and many before us have maintained these positions because we have been confident that they were, are and will remain morally right. Nothing made me so proud than to stand with my colleagues in the NDP in this House earlier this week when we alone of all members of this House voted for peace against war.

That resolution read that we support the sanctions and other activities of the United Nations, but that such support should exclude the involvement by Canada in a military attack on Iraq or Iraqi forces in Kuwait. Only the members of the New Democratic Party supported that resolution. Only the members of the New Democratic Party chose peace over war.

We alone among Canada's political parties stood with the majority of Canadians who demanded an end to the violence as a means of resolving disputes, who called for an end to the build-up to war, who called for an end to the madness, who called for peace.

We lost that point, but so did Canada and Canadians. In spite of their opposition to war and their call for peace, Canadians were dragged into war by this government. We in this House had the opportunity to speak out against Canadian forces being used to attack Iraq, and only the New Democratic Party stood with Canadians in voting for peace and against a military attack on Iraq.

While we have been urged by this government to fight for freedom and democracy in the Persian Gulf, we must remember that war is the very negation of both freedom and democracy.

The U.S. and its allies, including Canada, might win this war but only by adopting the self same tactics which we all condemn in Iraq. Canadians are appealing to this government to stop this resort to brute force and to work constructively for peace. The people of Saskatoon–Clark's Crossing, the part of Canada which I am proud to represent in this House, have been telling me to speak out against military intervention. They have told me about their conception that this war is madness, and how sad and betrayed they feel as Canadians at having their government commit our young men and women in the gulf to attack Iraq.

The people of Saskatoon–Clark's Crossing have spoken out with only a few exceptions against this war. My riding has a significant population of Canadians of Mennonite heritage. They have a fine tradition of not only speaking for peace but of acting for peace, and acting in a peaceable manner. Their ancestors suffered because of their commitment to non-violent dispute resolution and I have heard from a large number of them. They have spoken out for peace and with disappointment at this government's decision to take Canada into a war.

I am reminded of the Cuban missile crisis when then Prime Minister Diefenbaker refused to be drawn into a potential war with Cuba, which the U.S. threatened to do. And that was in our own backyard, so to speak. Mr. Diefenbaker stood for an independent military role for Canada and we all were, and are, thankful for that. This government had the opportunity to stand for the same thing and refused.

As many experts point out, it seems that a so-called victory against Iraq will only lead to greater instability, greater hostility and greater conflict in the Middle East. It will not, it cannot solve anything. There will still need to be diplomacy and peacekeeping efforts after this war is all over.

Where once Canada would have had the international credibility to participate actively in these critical and creative activities it has, by its declaration of war against Iraq, forfeited any credibility in this dispute and perhaps in disputes to come. Canada cannot expect to be an enemy one minute and an impartial arbitrator the next. For many Canadians this is the saddest part of this whole episode. Canada's reputation as a peaceable, peaceful and peacekeeping country has been seriously compromised. It is tragic indeed that one of the first results of the end of the cold war is a war. Have we really learned nothing?

Let us not forget the advice of so many experts, including the head of the CIA, William Webster, and United States Admiral Crowe, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that sanctions were working and, given enough time, would have worked to get Iraq out of Kuwait. Impatience and suffering do not justify war and even greater suffering.

In terms of support for the United Nations, we in the New Democratic Party and I personally, have supported every United Nations resolution which advocated a peaceful resolution to the crisis. We supported 11 out of the 12 Security Council resolutions. However, we did not support UN Security Council resolution 678 which imposed the January 15 deadline for Iraqi withdrawal and which authorized the use of force after this date. We oppose that resolution and we will continue to oppose that resolution. The United Nations Association in Canada is also concerned about the role that the United Nations played in this conflict.

I think that we will find over time that the United Nations has been irretrievably harmed by its actions over the last few months. Canada still has a role in resolving and stopping this war. Canada should work with all its energies towards diplomatic efforts to stop this war. It should press for an international conference aimed at resolving the situation in the whole Middle East region. It should argue for effective measures to resolve conflicts in the region, including solutions to border disputes. It should provide any and all humanitarian aid it can.

It should work as hard for peace as some have worked for war. Canada can offer so much, could have done so much, and can continue to do so much for world peace. It really is tragic for all of us that instead Canada chose war.

In closing, if the Prime Minister wants a fight, if there is a fight, I will fight with him. If there is a war, I will fight with him the war against poverty in this country and around the world, the war against hunger, the war against homelessness, the war against violence and racism, the war against unemployment and the abuse of women and children, the war against illiteracy, a war in favour of saving our planet and protecting our environment, and a war in favour of ensuring dignity for all Canadians. I will fight that war with him, but he needs to get his priorities straightened out. Money was available for war but not available for hungry children.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, when you unleash the dogs of war, you never know on whom they will turn.

[Translation]

That is my message to the aggressors of this world.

[English]

On August 2, Saddam Hussein invaded a smaller neighbouring country. At that point, our government did not see fit to recall Parliament. However, the United Nations Security Council deplored this act and unanimously imposed economic sanctions on August 6. Still, no recall of Parliament, until the very end of September.

During the fall session, little information was given to Parliament. Sanctions were not given enough time. No report was given to Parliament regarding sanctions. The government decided that it would be best just to meet in cabinet—

[Translation]

. . .secretly, never providing any information. The government always kept Parliament in the dark.

[English]

The government refused to have Parliament meet at the end of December and waited until January 15, a very infamous date. Prior to the Christmas season and after, it preferred committing our military to the gulf without proper debate and without giving sanctions the proper amount of time. That I deplore greatly, because it does not inform the full Parliament, it does not provide for unity in Canada when we are faced with a major horrific catastrophe in the world.

Did the sanctions work? Never has the committee of the United Nations ever reported on it. Our government did not report to Parliament. We have heard that it was 40 per cent effective and becoming more and more effective. This is what we understood.

[Translation]

But it was always information received indirectly, from outside sources.

Was enough time allowed for the sanctions to work? We don't know. Our party was in favour of negotiations and peace. Our party wanted sanctions but at the same time insisted on peace negotiations. That is the whole philosophy of the Liberal Party.

I heard the Prime Minister and members of cabinet mention Mr. Pearson's name several times. It was Pearson here and Pearson there, but always to justify their position, their philosophy, their approach. I noticed they always took what Mr. Pearson said out of context, to justify their own decisions. What I find really sickening is the way they suddenly changed Canada. This country used to be a proponent of peacekeeping.

[English]

Canada used to be a world renoun peacekeeper until our present government changed this.

How will we ever become neutral peacekeepers from now on? This is really a very important question. This is really a turnaround in Canadian policy. We did not give sanctions, in my estimation, enough time.

If the government finds that this is incorrect, then I would add that it did not give Parliament enough information to know whether or not sanctions had been given enough time. All this time the Prime Minister made arbitrary decisions.

I made a survey in Carleton—Gloucester prior to the infamous date of January 15. We discovered that people wanted a negotiated peace and preferred sanctions.

[Translation]

On January 15, I met a group of students from a school in Orléans, the École élémentaire Reine-des-Bois, accompanied by their school principal, Mr. Ouellet. The students arrived with a huge sign, a petition signed by all the students and asking the government and Parliament to discuss peace and only peace.

Phone calls and letters I received from my constituents in Carleton—Gloucester were about peace, not war. Parliament was not reconvened until January 15. I was here every day during the holidays, except for Christmas, and I noticed several members of the opposition were here as well. We still hoped the government would be called back. Unfortunately, our Prime Minister preferred to act as though the British parliamentary system did not exist. Under this system, Parliament must sit so there can be dialogue and debate and the opinions of all parties can be heard. That did not happen. The only thing we saw was the Prime Minister acting like a company director.

[English]

—the Board of Directors to make decisions and then only to inform the shareholders.

[Translation]

In the motion that was presented and which I will quote in my speech, the government moved, on January 15 of all days:

[English]

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

[Translation]

My conclusion is that this kind of motion is fuzzy, unspecific, and full of interpretations.

[Translation]

The Liberal amendment moved that day was worded as follows:

[English]

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression of Iraq against Kuwait through the continued use of economic sanctions, such support to exclude offensive military action by Canada at this time.

That is le quinze janvier. There was no military offensive, autre mots, at this time. This was voted on, may I point out, prior to the 6.45 p.m. announcement of war; the hostilities had taken place.

The NDP amendment read:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait through the continued use of economic sanctions, such support to exclude the involvement by Canada in a military attack on Iraq or Iraqi forces in Kuwait.

That meant, autre mots, no military offensive ever.

[Translation]

And that is still the NDP's policy: Never defend yourself. However, at 6.45 p.m. on that fateful day after the motion was presented, the attack started and war was effectively declared.

• (2250)

At this point I would like to quote a letter sent to the Prime Minister by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops on January 18, 1991. I will quote only the most important part—and this is from the Canadian bishops—which reads as follows: "We maintain this war should never have started. Economic sanctions and diplomatic mechanisms were not given enough time to be successful". The letter was signed by Robert Lebel, Bishop of Valleyfield, President of the Conference.

Hostilities started at 6.45 p.m. on January 16.

[English]

The motion by the government then became in my mind absolutely redundant. The government agenda is really the question here. What was its political agenda? Was it double-tracking with military the agenda of another country or countries? What did our government know?

[Translation]

What did it not share with all members of Parliament? I say the Prime Minister did not share that information. We all heard on television about the President of the U.S.S.R.

[English]

The President of U.S.S.R. apparently was informed one hour prior to the invasion. It is a well-known fact that when hostilities of this nature occur, especially when the United Nations is involved, the major country involved informs colleagues, friends, especially allies, and most especially those with whom it is going to fight shoulder to shoulder.

I suspect strongly that the Prime Minister knew before 6.45 p.m.—and he knew when he tabled that motion—that war was to take place the very same day he convened Parliament. He knew and did not inform Parliament. I do not find that proper in a parliamentary system.

The government motion, in my mind, is now irrelevant; it is redundant.

Saddam Hussein then decided the next day, January 16, to attack Israel.

[Translation]

I think Saddam Hussein is a devil and a madman. We should put in his place right away. We now have another ally to defend, in this case Israel.

[English]

I must congratulate Israel for the restraint it has presented to date.

[Translation]

It has been attacked constantly. It knows how to defend themselves, and I admire Israel for holding back now. I condemn Saddam Hussein for attacking a country that was at peace, a country that did not attack first. We must protect our allies. We must protect the other countries.

We know that 6.45 p.m. is now history. Hostilities have started. There is a war on. I think this whole debate has become redundant. I fail to understand why the government is so anxious to have members debating all day and all night, non-stop. We should take advantage of this moment to unite.

Look at Israel, for instance. Are the parties in Israel's Parliament at each other's throats, launching accusations, making stupid remarks and contradicting each other? No, they are united. That is what we should be today. Now that hostilities have started, now that a war is on and Israel, a country that was at peace, is being attacked, we must realize everything has changed. The Parliament of Canada, the government, the opposition and independent members should stand together, because our common objective is peace.

[English]

We must stand together. We must support our Armed Forces in the gulf. Presently their activities are in sweep and escort operations que j'appuis. I have one compliment to give to our government, and that is its decision to provide a field hospital.

[Translation]

I am sure that all Canadians will agree, whatever their political affiliation, that providing a field hospital is a positive gesture, entirely in line with the philosophy of Lester B. Pearson.

[English]

That was a proper decision, if there was one. This country must support the United Nations. This country must be united. Parliament must be united. The allies must be united. We must be united in all our actions to secure peace.

[Translation]

I have to say this, and I am not ashamed, that every night before I go to sleep, I pray for our forces and for peace. I would urge everyone who is not actively involved in activities in the gulf, other than talking, dialoguing and trying to find a way to bring peace, to find time during the day to say a prayer for peace, for mankind, for the men and women involved, whether they are on active duty in the Persian Gulf or happen to be parents in Canada, the United States or Europe, throughout the world. Our main purpose in life should always be peace and happiness for ourselves and others during our short lives on this earth.

[English]

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have an observation, a comment on the member's speech. One of the things that I wanted to clear up for the record is the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs did report to the Standing Committee of External Affairs and International Trade on December 10. On that day he went through the use of sanctions and the effects of sanctions on Iraq. I just wanted to bring that to the member's attention.

In summation on December 10, 1990, the minister said that sanctions were necessary but not sufficient to meet our declared objectives: the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait and the restoration of its sovereignty and legitimate government.

I wanted to bring that to the member's attention. I do not think it is a whole lot different from the conclusion of his former leader on Wednesday in this House. The member handed out a compliment to our government. I will hand out a compliment to the member in exchange. Although the member disagreed with his former leader on Wednesday, I do give him credit for sitting here, on camera, throughout that speech. I think that tells us something about the member in question.

• (2300)

[Translation]

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Carleton—Charlotte for his compliments. I always admired his sincerity.

I want to tell my colleague who made these comments in response to my speech, if I may, that it is in fact up to cabinet to give proof of the effect of the sanctions, whether they worked or not. We should not have to play guessing games and government backbenchers should not have to make comments. I suggest the burden of the proof lies with the ministers.

Before closing, I must remind the hon. member that a UN committee was to report on the sanctions. As far as I know, there has been no such report yet, unless the hon. member or the Prime Minister are once more withholding information from members of this House.

[English]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as you have probably noticed, today the focus of the debate is rapidly shifting, if not by the hour, certainly by the day. When we started debating the deadline for the sanctions, diplomatic initiatives came to mind. There was still hope and still some time left. We have gradually moved from that analysis in our debate to a discussion of the role of the armed forces on escalation, to bringing hostilities to an end, and to rebuilding peace on the ruins caused by this war.

Parliament was recalled when the clock was almost striking midnight. It was at the very last minute that Parliament was recalled and it certainly did not give parliamentarians a sense that our debate and our vote was meaningful in relations to the events outside this building and away from the Hill. Unfortunately, that was not an isolated case. There is a pattern.

I would like to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that in August of last year Canadian ships were committed by the Prime Minister after he met President Bush and two weeks before the United Nations Security Council approved the sanctions on August 25.

In September, Canadian CF-18 aircraft were committed 10 days before the recall of Parliament.

I must also bring to your attention the fact that Canadian ships had to delay their arrival in Suez in September in order to circumvent the legal requirements that Parliament be recalled within 10 days of a warship going on active service.

I do not need to remind you that in November, when the Security Council set the deadline of January 15, the Secretary of State for External Affairs downplayed the deadline by calling it artificial. Well, events have shown us how artificial that deadline was.

In January, Parliament was given 13 hours this week before the deadline came into effect to start the debate. When the bombs began to fall on Baghdad, we found ourselves in the midst of this debate.

Evidently, there is something wrong in the consultation process on the part of the Prime Minister with his own Cabinet and on the part of the Prime Minister with his own Parliament.

The people of Canada, of whom Parliament is a reflection, have not had much to say in this debate. Canada went to war before Parliament could complete this debate. The decision of course was made some time ago, long before Canadian CF-18 pilots would escort bombing runs over Iraq and Kuwait, and long before KC-135 tanker planes would refuel U.S. bombers in the gulf region. This lack of participation on the part of the Canadian people through its parliamentary system is only one of several disturbing facets of what has happened in recent weeks and months.

At this stage, as we are concluding this debate tonight, we realize that the demands of the war machine are virtually insatiable. There will be demands for more Canadian participation. There will be demands for ground troops, for combat troops and the like. We do not really know where Canadians stand on this matter. Maybe it would be fair to assume that the Canadian public is as divided on this matter as this Parliament is. It is legitimate to ask whether Canadians want war to resolve the Kuwait problem. Do Canadians want to see Canada participate in a U.S.-led war, mandated by a Security Council consisting of only 15 nations, albeit very powerful ones? Do we, as parliamentarians, really know what lies ahead?

There are several dangers that must be outlined and put on record, as we can see them today, on behalf of the Canadian people who expect us to make a decision and cast a vote with the best of our ability to look into the future.

The first danger that might face us very soon is that this war might become a confrontation between the West and the Muslim world. It is an horrendous prospect. If this were to happen, it would turn the clock back, not a decade, or a century, but several centuries. It is something that must not happen, but it is a very possible danger.

Another danger that comes to mind is that of a complete dissipation of Canada's international reputation as a referee, as a peacemaker, and as a nation that does not take sides in a war, but does attempt to resolve conflict and has the confidence of the parties involved. This is a role that Canada has increasingly enjoyed in the world. This is an asset that is very important abroad because it has an enormous amount of positive benefits.

This dissipation, is something that is of profound concern to many of us. It is a dissipation on the international scene which we are witnessing at home in a more tangible manner. We see it in institutions that bind east with west and north with south, institutions such as the CBC or Via Rail. Dissipation has also taken place in the last six years in federal–provincial relations.

A third area of danger has to do with the environment. This is not the time to go into greater depth in this matter. Scientists have elaborated and made some rather disturbing forecasts as to what could be the damage to the environment by the production of dangerous gases should an oil field take fire as a result of war activities.

Fourth, there is danger in the presence in Muslin countries of foreign aid projects which are run by western volunteers. Those initiatives have a profound significance in a variety of ways, particularly in Asia and in some parts of Africa, and they might be in danger if there were a serious backlash on the part of Muslin communities to the presence of western volunteers.

What must we do? We cannot stop at outlining dangers. We we also have to look at the future and explore, where we can, what Canada's role could be during these hostilities and after the conclusion of the war. I will just dwell on one of these two topics very briefly. That is the role of our Armed Forces which my colleague from Ottawa South has touched upon. It has a particular significance and could be of importance to our future.

I refer to the fact that we have fewer than 2,000 men and women involved in these hostilities less. In relation to the 500,000 Armed Forces personnel involved in that theatre as members of the U.S. led force, our participation is marginal. It represents probably less than 1 per cent of the total forces.

Our participation during this war, of course, can be of two kinds, one offensive and the other defensive, and we have a choice. We can make a choice between either of these two roles. We can make a decision and make a shift because the numbers involved are not so large.

I submit that instead of being involved in offensive exercises, such as air raids, fighting on the ground, attacking installations, and any other offensive activities of a military nature, we could expand and reinforce and become fully involved in medical services, support services in field hospitals, in the care of the wounded, in the protection of those involved in the provision of these services, and the like, in other words, in a humanitarian defensive role within a military context. I think that Canada would have enormous respect if it were to perform such a role. It would then not be seen as being part of an attacking offensive contingent with destructive motivations.

As I said, our forces are small and therefore it should be reasonably easy to shift our presence from the offensive to the defensive. It would also be a role that would be readily identifiable and permit us to build confidence in Canada in the Muslim regions of the world where these events are being watched very carefully and very closely.

When the war is over, hopefully very soon, the building of peace in the Middle East will have to start. We will be looking at the ruins and devastation, both in human and material terms. Confidence will have to be restored and it will have to replace confrontation. We will have to build confidence and we will have to build on confidence. It is during these hostilities that Canada can lay the foundation for confidence building for the period following the war.

Therefore, the role of Canada's Armed Forces is of great importance from the point of view of Canada's particular interest and Canada's particular role internationally. There is an interest that we might look for.

We are a middle power. We will want to develop we will have to develop, new relations in this part of the world which by then will be war torn and in shambles.

In conclusion, at the same time we will have to look at a United Nations, its role, and the way it functions. In so doing, we will have to look at the charter under which it operates and at the Security Council which is its main engine and executive centre.

At this point in history, the charter is 45 years old. Obviously it needs to be re-examined and reshaped. It needs to reflect the new face of the world community, the family of nations, because today it has over 150 member nations, compared to the 60 or 70 it had in San Francisco in 1945.

If we do that—and I would urge that we should do that—the question of the veto power has to be examined. The veto power is given to the five most powerful nations, and they can determine the direction of the world at times by just saying no. We should be asking some difficult questions, including: Why should any of these five nations be given the power to say no? Is this power still relevant? Does it serve the interest of the world community? If it does not, then we should ask ourselves whether this power, which may have had historical meaning and been a necessity in 1945, ought to be removed so as to place all members of the Security Council on a equal footing.

This concept has emerged in recent decades in many other institutions where fewer and fewer privilege powers are assigned to a limited number of individuals. That concept has also to reach within the walls of the United Nations Security Council, I submit.

These and other questions must be tackled soon if the world community is to be truly reflected and represented through the decisions of the Security Council. As the charter is written now, I doubt that it is the case. I do not need to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the decision of setting the deadline for the sanctions made by the Security Council has set history in a direction which we, on this side of the House believe to be the wrong direction for humanity to take.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have just a short comment on some of the opening remarks of the hon. member in relation to public opinion and whether or not we are doing the right thing.

It is up to the people of Canada to determine whether the government in fact is doing the right thing, but I would like to quote some numbers. I know it depends on whose figures you are looking at and whether they are right or wrong. They are from January 17.

The majority of Canadians, 71 per cent, approve of Canada's actions to date in the gulf. This represents a change from January 15 when it was about 58 per cent. The majority of Canadians, 77 per cent, favour maintaining or increasing our military commitment. An interesting statistic is that only 11 per cent favour withdrawing all forces from the region. Of course, withdrawing all forces from the region was a position that the Leader of the Opposition took just four short days ago.

In response to public opinion, no one knows whether they are right or wrong, and I don't think any politician should put his faith in public opinions. For what it is worth, I just wanted to pass that on to the hon. member.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I suppose that implicit in that information on the part of the member is the question of whether or not I concur with his findings. As he quite rightly pointed out, it is a well-known fact that one selects statistics very carefully in order to make one's point, and I am sure the hon. member has chosen those statistics very carefully.

The hon. member also knows that Gallup polls change considerably and that the very same data could dramatically change almost overnight if casualties were to begin to happen. That was demonstrated by a poll taken in the United States where the support of American public opinion would decline very rapidly as the number of possible casualties increased. In a way, that is a sad statement because it would seem that we assign a price to life that depends on the number of victims and it determines whether or not we are in favour of the use of force, depending on the number of lives that would be lost as a result of that activity.

I would point out to the hon. member that according to him 11 per cent of Canadians were in favour of withdrawing from the region. Withdrawing from the region is not such a bad idea if we start with the premise that we do not believe in using force in resolving the situation in Kuwait.

For Canada to perform a role as a peacemaker or referee in this matter, maintaining its reputation, would not have been such a bad idea, withdrawing once the hostilities had started. It would have shown a high degree of sensitivity on our part for the solution for which we are all searching, a solution other than the use of war.

I would not be surprised if, in the weeks and months ahead, Canadian public opinion were to shift in a direction much less supportive of the war initiative than it is now. That process of declining support is already in place, in my understanding of the polls.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Briefly, Mr. Speaker. I have a question for the hon. member for Davenport. The member and most of his colleagues referred to various types of sanctions and suggested the sanctions against Iraq should have been intensified.

I would like to know if he agrees with the official position taken by his party on December 21, 1980. On page 4 of this statement, we read that it is the position of the Liberal Party that Canada should ask Turkey to cut off water supply and to restrict food supply. In other words, should we starve and deprive of water the civilian population of Iraq to retaliate to Saddam Hussein's aggression on Kuwait? Is that an acceptable position for a country like ours to refuse to implement the fundamental principles set out in the UN's Charter of rights which states that it is illegal to cut off water supply and deprive people of food, especially civilians?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to my colleague that our party's position is clearly stated in the first part of our release.

We explained why we agreed with the government on one point, taking up what I consider to be a very positive stand. We also discussed the points on which we were at variance regarding the sanctions the hon. member referred to. The validity of that measure may be debatable, but our position should not be rejected on the basis of a detail regarding the implementation of the sanctions. We must take a global approach. It is true that, from an ideological point of view, we are taking two different stands. There is the position of the hon. member's party that war is the answer, and there is ours that sanctions are the answer.

We need more time to prove that political and economic pressures are the key to finding the appropriate solution. If my colleague wishes to go into the merits of this proposal, I am prepared to examine them with him. I am convinced that together we could come to an agreement.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap rising with a question or comments?

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on debate.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should indicate that there has been some discussion with the Chair as to the appropriate next speaker. I think I indicated to the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie that he might be next.

There is some concern about proportionate representation of speakers and I wonder if hon. members would just give me a moment to consider it. I want to be very fair here.

I want to say to the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie that I have had some discussion. Keeping in mind the number of members, the number of members of parties, and the number of Independents and members of the bloc who have taken part in the debate—and I know the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie would co-operate with the Chair—I am going to call the member for Okanagan—Shuswap, followed by the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie. We will then move over to a Liberal member.

The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap, and then the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your judicious judgment this evening.

It goes without saying that the last few days have indeed been difficult days for every member of this House, and I speak in a very non-partisan manner on this. This issue has faced Parliament over the last few days. When we initiated the debate on this resolution, we were in fact not yet in a situation of war. Since then, the situation in the world has preceded the debate in the House of Commons. Suffice it to say that the issue was whether or not Parliament should in fact be sending Canada's young men and women into battle and now the extension of the debate is to decide just what the extent of that commitment should be.

It is a very deep personal and moral issue that every member of the House has been struggling with over the the past week. That is why the New Democratic Party, in its wisdom, with regard to members voting on this resolution before the House, had decided to free its members to speak their own conscience and to vote freely as they felt personally. We were disappointed that the government did not see the merits of a free and unhindered vote on such an issue of personal conviction.

As we have debated over the last few days, profound changes have taken place in the world around us. There has been a failure to secure a peaceful and diplomatic solution to the crisis in the Middle East. With this failure, the 28-nation coalition of the United Nations has seen to exercise its final and tragic option. The world is once again at war.
