I do not know what kind of credit he is talking about, that this x number of dollars came from the federal government and so that is our credit. Is he not forgetting that there is only one taxpayer in Canada? And, regardless of whether it is the federal, the provincial or the municipal government which takes it out of the taxpayer's pocket, it is still the same taxpayer that has to pay for that post-secondary education and for the hospitals. Are they trying to deceive the public by cutting the transfer payments to the provinces, making the provinces the fall guys and they are going to be the good guys saying "look how we have reduced the deficit", but not looking at the number of students who now cannot finish university or the number of people who cannot get hospital care because they have to wait and wait?

I used to enjoy the hon. member's speeches when he first arrived here, but something is happening to him and I do not like the change.

Mr. Thacker: Madam Speaker, I am delighted to respond, because in my comments I gave the answer to his question. He would have liked us to balance the budget in one year, in 1984. That is what he is saying.

The Minister of Finance was honest with Canadians. He said: "Look, we have this $38 billion deficit. There is $16 billion on the operating program and $22 billion in interest on the debt". We did not believe we could turn that around in a year, but we do have an economic recovery plan that he set out very carefully, an agenda for economic recovery that had over a period of years the solution to it. We have taken that operating deficit of $16 billion and turned it into a surplus of $12 billion. That is a major step ahead.

In another two or three fiscal years, we will have it so that we will not even have to borrow for the interest on the debt. That will be another milestone in this nation.

It is true that we will have basically a balanced budget in terms of financial requirements, but we will have a national debt perhaps even as high as $500 billion. It is only from that time that we can start to pay down the national debt.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, I keep hearing from the opposition side about cuts in the transfer payments.

I would like to hear from the member for Lethbridge if he has a list of figures to substantiate or refute the accusation of how badly we have kept to our transfer payments.

Does he have something to say, for instance, on the elderly? Does he have an idea or figures that could show from 1984 to the present time how the elderly have fared through the transfer payments? Does he have any kind of a list?

Mr. Thacker: Yes, I do, Madam Speaker.

An hon. member: A well researched manual.

Mr. Thacker: My colleague knows that I speak out on other occasions and she agrees with me that it is a good point to make.

If you listen to the opposition you would think there had been cuts to everything. When I look at the figures for 1984, compared to 1991, I do not see that at all. Look at the transfers to individuals. Elderly benefits in 1984–1985 were some $11 billion. This year it is $19 billion. That is not a cut; that is a massive increase of $8 billion.

I will move to another one: equalization. In 1984–1985 the equalization payments were $5.3 billion. This year they are $8.4 billion. That is an increase; that is not a cut. Turning to Canada Assistance, $3.7 billion then; now it is $5.6 billion.

If we look at natives, they received $1.2 billion in 1984, and this year it is $2.8. Of course it is being wisely spent.

There are now over 18,000 natives in post-secondary education. It was not anywhere near that back in 1984.

I came to town here with all of the prejudices and the myths that we learned at our grandfather's knee. One of those realities was that regional spending was not as high then. This is the transfers on regional and science, $1.4 billion. This year it is $2.6 billion. I am immensely proud when I go home to able to say to my neighbours: "Look, here is what it was in 1984 and here is what it is today". While we have increased the program spending to seniors, we have been able to decrease the federal budget, the deficit, and the national debt that will be on the heads of our children.

Turning to agriculture, which is critical for many of us including the member for Essex—Windsor, the amount the federal government spent on agriculture in 1984 was $707 million. This year it is $2.8 billion. That is not a cut; that is an increase of enormous proportions. I thank my colleague for giving me the opportunity to express that view.

The last one would be just even as a percentage of program spending. In 1984 the transfer payments to individuals were some 29 per cent. This year it is 35 per cent. So we have made some very fundamental shifts. We are transferring more federal dollars to individuals.

If I had my way, we would not spend one cent on a province. We would give all of our hospital dollars to people. We would give all of our post-secondary education dollars to students and let them make the choices as to what university they went to. That is what I would do.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, one of the things I hear the Tories talking about is that they really support medicare; they think it is a national program, but the problem is the financial position of the country.

I have heard the Liberals say that they really supported the birth of medicare. I would like to read what the Liberal resolution was when they first talked about it back in 1921. It said—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Karpoff: Listen very carefully because I cannot distinguish between what the Liberals said and the Tories say now. It said that "Insofar as may be practical, having regard for Canada's financial position—". The same argument that the Tories are now using to kill medicare is the argument that the Liberals used back in 1921. I would like the member's comments on that.

Mr. Thacker: Madam Speaker, I don't think I should get involved in this lovers' spat across the way.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to be able to rise this afternoon and speak on the budget on behalf of the New Democratic Party. Because I am the critic for health I wish this afternoon to focus mainly on medicare as it is outlined in this budget.

I think that initially we have to take our minds back to how medicare was born in Canada. First of all, of course, medicare came out of Saskatchewan with Tommy Douglas and the CCF. They fought against tremendous odds, tremendous power groups, including a doctors' strike, to bring in medicare. Without that determination and philosophical commitment to a universal, free and accessible medicare by Tommy Douglas and the CCF, we would not have medicare in Canada.

The whole question of the national medicare program was developed on the basis of a 50 per cent partnership between the federal government and the provinces. It came out of the Hall commission in 1964.

One of the things I do not understand about the Tories is that they appointed Emmett Hall. He was their person and he came across with the concept of a partnership in medicare, a partnership between the provinces and the federal government. He decided there would be a 50-50 partnership in financing, in responsibility for ensuring the health of Canadians, for innovation in terms of delivery of our health care and in research.

Medicare has been one of the national programs that has held this country together. It is based on a partnership, an equal commitment by the federal government and the provinces. That has held and has been a unifying force in this country.

What we have now is a unilateral decision by this government and by the preceding Liberal governments to dissolve the partnership, to simply say, "We are not going to meet our end of the bargain. We are not going to assume our responsibility. We are simply going to walk away from this partnership".

It is clear that Canadians realize what is happening to our medicare system. I would like to quote from the Canadian Medical Association. It said that it is alarmed at the decision to dismantle Canada's national medicare program. The Government of Canada is financially strangling medicare. This is from the same people who initially fought medicare.

We have the National Council of Welfare saying that it has grave concerns about the future of medicare. The freeze on Established Program Financing could mean the death of medicare as a national program by 1996.

What we have is a systematic erosion of our medicare system starting with the Liberals and being accelerated by the Tories since 1984, reductions of projected transfer payments in 1986, in last year's budget and now. What does this mean in terms of loss of revenue to the provinces?

The accumulated loss of revenue to the provinces is now $29.4 billion until the year 1994–95—that is $29.4 billion. It is not to the wealthy provinces alone. It is to some of the provinces that right now cannot afford to provide health care. Provinces like Newfoundland are going to lose $900 million.

British Columbia, my own home province, is going to lose $5 billion. I come from the riding of Surrey North where we have a dramatic shortage of hospital beds, one third the number that is necessary. This government has strangled our ability to develop new hospital beds.

Saskatchewan is going to lose $1.5 billion. By removing the ability to finance medicare, this cut is the strangulation, there will be an end of the cash.

The Tories have been trying to tell us for the last several months that that is not true. Last fall when I asked these questions the health minister and the finance minister denied it was going to happen. Now they are admitting it is going to happen.

It is going to happen as early as 1994 to 1995 for the large provinces. Of course, what does the Minister of Finance do in his budget? He says: "Don't worry. We will insist on national standards although the money will not be there to be transferred. We will bring in new legislation under the Fiscal Arrangements Act to ensure that the provinces comply with the Canada Health Act."

I would like to inform them that Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario receive no money under equalization payments. How are you going to insist that B.C. comply with the act when they do not? The only other large chunks of transfer money that the government has is under the Canada Assistance Plan. Can you tell me on that side that if a province is not complying with the Canada Health Act, which you have never enforced before, you are going to stand up and take away moneys for child abuse, foster care from the Canada Assistance Plan because they are not complying with the Canada Health Act?

We have a national unity crisis right now. If the government does that with one of the provinces, taking money away from children because there is no compliance with the Canada Health Act, there would be a total disintegration.

One of the real problems with this budget is that it is a budget which destroys some of the programs that hold this country together, particularly our national medicare program.

• (1450)

The federal government cannot say: "We will call the tune but we will not pay the piper". That is what this budget says: we will stop cash transfers within four to five years, but we are still going to call the tune. That is just not going to happen within the framework of Canada. I think this type of legislation which destroys our national program—that is universally looked upon as one of the best health care systems in the world—is not the way to build national unity.

What is the excuse? The excuse that Tories give is the deficit. I agree that we have a deficit problem.

Mr. Sobeski: But you want to ignore it.

Mr. Karpoff: No, I do not want to ignore it; I am not like the Tories. What we have had in ten years is a bungling Liberal administration which drove this country into one recession in 1982–83, and a bungling Conservative administration which drove this country into a recession in 1990 and 1991.

Yes, there is a deficit, and the deficit is caused by the Tories high interest rate policy, which is costing us $16 billion extra this year in interest payments alone, because our interest rate should be four percentage points lower—$16 billion because the Tories refused to tax their friends fairly. They gave tax concessions to the large multinational corporations, tax concessions to the wealthy, those people earning $100,000 or more. They will not bring in fair taxation.

Those two things have caused the deficit. They are the main reasons this country is in this position now. If they had brought in fair taxation in 1984, the day they arrived, if they had brought in proper interest rates, we would not be running a deficit of $30 billion this year.

I am beginning to wonder what is behind it. And I think it is that the Tories are philosophically against universal social programs.

An hon. member: Absolutely.

Mr. Karpoff: Absolutely. They want an Americanized system. They want this harmony with the United States that they keep talking about in the free trade deals, harmony with the American medical system, where 57 million Americans either have no medical insurance or are under insured.

Walter Cronkite has done a comparison between the two medical care systems. If you watched the program, you saw the difference. What is going to happen with this approach to our national medicare is that we are going to abandon it as a national program; instead of a blanket, we are going to get ten patchwork quilts. The provinces are going to start, under financial pressure, bringing in user fees, extra billings, a two-tiered health care system.

We already have people in British Columbia, such as the premier of B.C.—that great and fantastic thinker, and I say that a bit facetiously—who was talking about perhaps establishing private-for-pay health care for the people who can afford it. Maybe we should have the Americanization. That is what is going to happen if the federal government abandons its partnership.

In closing, Madam Speaker—I think my ten minutes are up. Are they not?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I realize now that the hon. member was expecting to speak for ten minutes. I think there was an understanding that members who wished to do that would advise the Speaker. The Speaker cannot guess at who will be sharing time.

Mr. Karpoff: Madam Speaker, I will be speaking for 20 minutes. I am glad there is a consensus in the House that I will now speak for 20 minutes.

The program that Walter Cronkite narrated was a very well documented and thoughtful program. He documented the problem of the American health care system, and some of the problems of the Canadian health medicare system. One of the things we have to realize is that there are problems within our Canadian health care system. There is no doubt we have problems we must address. They are the problems of escalating costs and a lack of distribution of health care across this country by region. There are problems that relate to access, and I want to spend a few minutes on each of those areas.

One of the things we have to start looking at is the federal government's role in looking at alternatives within our health care system.

The federal government has had a major responsibility for promotion and research in health care. It is the level of government that has supposedly been responsible for doing the research that is necessary to innovate within our health care system. It is the level of government that is supposed to be looking at health promotion, such things as anti-smoking campaigns, campaigns for promoting fitness and activity, campaigns which relate to abuse of drugs.

What has the government done in this budget? It slashed its expenditures in these areas, even in areas such as health services and promotion. Grants to voluntary health organizations have been held even, no increase. Grants to support health promotion at the community level have been cut by over 20 per cent.

This is the government's commitment to health promotion. It is the area that we need most. The government is refusing to deal with such issues as the promotion of adequate drug abuse programs, the whole promotion of the health problems of tobacco. The tobacco lobbyists are still preventing this government from bringing in realistic warning legislation dealing with smoking. It is simply because of the financial clout that some of the tobacco lobbyists have with this government.

The other area I want to address does not deal specifically with the question of medicare but with the budget is the reduction in the Canada Assistance Plan.

There is a tremendous tie-in because we in this country know that there is a dramatic correlation between poverty and demand for health care and the lack of health of individuals. We know that as the level of poverty goes down, the higher the infant mortality rate is, the higher the rate of respiratory disease, the higher the rate of hospital admissions which cost us tremendous amounts in terms of health care. One of the things that this government has to realize is that if they are going to deal with the health status of Canadians, they must deal with the question of poverty.

Yet this budget slashes expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan that are designed to deal with poverty and child welfare.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may want to use the few minutes that are left when the Houses resumes.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p. 17722).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When debate ended on Friday, March 1, the hon. member for Surrey North had eight minutes remaining in debate, plus ten minutes of questions and comments.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to resume the debate I started on Friday concerning the cutbacks in the budget.

On Friday, I spent most of my time looking at the impact of the cuts to Established Programs Financing, particularly the impact it was going to have on our medicare system, which is now under grave threat from successive budgets by this government.

Today, I want to take a few minutes to talk about the Canada Assistance Plan, which again was a partnership between the province and the federal government. It was a partnership very much like medicare, in which the province and the federal government agreed to share 50 per cent, with the object of alleviating poverty and dealing with child abuse and neglect, and the causes thereof.

In most partnerships, the agreement is that both parties must agree before there are significant changes. However, we have seen in the last two years that this government has unilaterally decided it is going to abandon the concept of partnership with Canadian provinces and abandon the kinds of goals and aims that are set out in the Canada Assistance Plan. It has said that it is going to limit the growth of funding to three provinces: Alberta, B.C. and Ontario.

I think that the Speaker and the House should be aware that this involves just under 50 per cent of the people who are in need of assistance and 50 per cent of the children who are in need of protection in this country. The government is suddenly breaking up the partnership, which affects a large percentage of those who have been assisted by the Canada Assistance Plan.

The government has indicated that the cuts may be as low as $75 million to $80 million a year. The provinces of course have calculated that the significance is going to be dramatically higher, in the area of $400 and some million this year and $600 million next year.

Part of this increase is caused by the dramatic increase in unemployment, which of course is caused by the fiscal monetary policy of the government. But the provinces are being told that they have to pick up the consequences of higher income assistance case loads and more people becoming dependent because of unemployment, and that the federal government is not going to be involved in the cost of that. It is going to dump it on the provinces; it is going to break up the partnership.

A week ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare, with great fanfare, announced his family violence program or initiative against family violence: $136 million spread over five years. There is $23.6 million this year, out of which the minister himself said only $15 million was new money. At the same time, the cost to the provinces is going to be $400 million.

What does the Canada Assistance Plan fund? It funds investigation of child abuse. It funds counselling of family problems. It funds the operation of shelters, including shelters for battered women. It funds the treatment of children who have been sexually abused. It funds alternate care for children.

• (1310)

On the one hand, with great fanfare, the minister announced a program with $15 million or $22 million in a year and at the same time takes away from the provinces $400 million that is designed to do that very thing. No wonder the provinces are beginning to ask: Where is the partnership? Where is the trust that is normally involved in a partnership?

It simply is not good enough for the government to try flimflam financing, to try this shuffle the peas concept of moving money around and announcing that it is starting new programs when in fact the very core or heart of the ability of the provinces to finance the services that would go a long way in dealing with family violence has been reduced.

The other area of this budget that impacts very much upon families is the reduction in social housing. There is another 15 per cent reduction per year in the commitment toward new social housing; $86 million for all of Canada for a year. My own riding could easily take the whole budget for social housing in Canada and still have a backlog and still have a need.

There seems to be a deliberate, two-pronged attack in this budget. One is the erosion of all social programs: social housing, medicare, and the Canada Assistance Plan. It is the type of erosion people talked about during the free trade debate, that one of the goals of this government was to Americanize our social security and health care systems, to Balkanize it, to fractionalize it, to privatize it, and to make it equal to the United States.

Most of us know that it would be disastrous for working Canadians and Canadians with limited income if the government were able to achieve its goal of harmonization with the United States.

The other goal of this government, as seen in this budget, seems simply to be to dump the problem on to the provinces. It seems simply to say: "We do not understand fair taxation. We do not understand how we can bring in and maintain our social programs. If only we had a proper monetary policy so that high interest rates were not driving up the deficit. We do not understand how we can have fair taxation for profitable corporations to pay at least a minimal tax. What we will do, because we do not understand or have no will, is we will simply dump the problem on to the provinces and let the provinces try to figure out how they are going to deal with the financial consequences".

In my own municipality of Surrey I know how the province is going to deal with it. Unfortunately, it is simply going to say that the necessary additional beds for Surrey Memorial Hospital are not there. They can no longer afford to finance them. They will not worry about the fact that we only have 1.1 acute care beds per 1,000 population, compared to the average of 3.3 beds across the province or the goal set by most organizations and medical people of about 3.4 acute care beds per 1,000 population. They will simply not be in a position to finance any additional medical facilities. They will simply dump the problem further down on the community. It is the same with post-secondary education. The cutbacks mean that the provinces are going to have less money, which simply means that they are going to say to a municipality like mine that we cannot expand Kwantlen College, that we cannot worry about the fact that there were thousands of students turned away this year; that they simply do not have the money.

In summation, this budget, particularly in the area of social services and health care, means that the federal government has abandoned its partnership with the provinces in providing services to the people of Canada.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who was just speaking was making some comments throughout his speech about health care. I note with interest lately that the newly elected premier of Ontario has realized that it is a lot harder to produce than it is to talk. Comments are already being made about the benefits of health care, that maybe there should be a type of clawback tax put in place for those who benefit from health care services in our country.

I just wonder if the member would care to comment on that. Is this his view, that a Canadian who receives the benefit of our medical services and health care services should be taxed as a taxable benefit and therefore have a clawback type tax in place? Is that the member's view?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I think the premier of Ontario is beginning to realize the financial shambles that the previous Liberal government left them in. He was told during the election that there was a $23 million surplus, and now he finds out there is a three-quarter of a billion dollar deficit. And, yes, he is having to make some hard choices.

As far as comments that there should be a clawback are concerned, the only people I have ever heard talking about a clawback are the Tories and the Liberals. Certainly the New Democratic Party has always stood against any type of fee for service, any type of two-tiered health care system, anything that prevents accessibility to our health care system.

It has been proven time and time again that if those kinds of systems are brought in, the only people who are hurt are the poor. It does nothing at all to assist in the curtailment of costs. It does nothing to rationalize properly our health care system or services. Therefore, I would certainly reject any type of clawback system in terms of health care.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague to comment on the Canadian unity aspects of this budget.

To me it is a great tragedy that this budget is a strong blow to Canadian unity, at the very time when we should be building our pride in being Canadian. It seems to me universal medicare and our social programs and our post-secondary education programs are being undermined. When we ask Canadians what makes them proud to be a Canadian, those are the very things they will mention first. This government in this budget is undermining them.

I would like to ask my colleague if he would comment again on the consequences of the federal government withdrawing financing and, in effect, withdrawing any kind of national power in the development and the ensuring of universal medicare and social programs.

Mr. Karpoff: I think there is a great threat to unity in this budget. The Conservatives feel that the whole question of how you build a nation is simply a matter of dealing and tinkering with constitutional problems. Most citizens in this country are much more concerned about the unifying forces that they understand as their rights and obligations within the country.

They are very proud of medicare. They feel it is one of the things that has held this country together, that we do have a national program, that we do have national standards, and that Canadians do not fear illness in the same way that Americans do. Americans always fear they will become totally bankrupt if they get a major illness and are under insured. Even the ones who carry insurance find that a year later they will not be reinsured in the United States.

One of the more interesting programs which I think people should watch is a documentary which Walter Cronkite did, comparing the American and Canadian health care systems, because it showed that we do have problems. Those problems are mainly not enough financing to keep up with the increase in technology. However, it did show in terms of the well-being of Canadians and their ability to cope and deal with health problems, we were far ahead.

There are many things in this budget that I am concerned about not only from the program point of view, but also their impact on unity. This is a step towards this term that my finance minister in B.C. Mr. Couvelier likes to talk about, disentanglement. What it means is that the federal government is starting to, without even negotiating, throw up their hands and say to the provinces, "We are going to get out of certain areas. We are not going to be partners in certain areas. We are not going to even wait for a constitutional conference or constitutional change. We are simply going to abandon medicare. We are simply going to abandon our obligation to social programs".

In the fundamental sense, that is probably going to have more impact on the unity in this country than any other significant matter.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a brief comment and ask the member who made, I think, some very important and reasonable comments about how this budget is going to help destroy medicare in Canada.

He had just started touching on the question I would like to put to him when he made reference to the finance minister in British Columbia, our home province and the current premier of B.C., who I believe the member has had some experience with in local governments when

Mr. Vander Zalm was a Liberal. My constituents are asking me questions and perhaps there is some good political advice I can get from the member.

Mr. Vander Zalm in B.C. on the one hand talks about how the federal government has to pull back out of health care, perhaps do away with the fledgling forestry department and cut federal spending. Yet at the same time, when the federal government does cut funding to the province of British Columbia, he is taking the federal government to court, challenging the actions of the federal government.

The question I would like to put to the member is this. What kind of political approach is this from the premier of British Columbia? Is there some kind of consistent argument we might be able to see in what Mr. Vander Zalm is saying or is it a case really where Social Credit, Conservatives and Liberals are really talking about of the same thing, and that is the destruction of much of what we have come to know as Canada?

Mr. Karpoff: I have a tendency to try to forget my experience with the premier when he was the Liberal mayor of Surrey and I was an alderman on Surrey Council. At that time he was very erratic. I guess over the years he has continued to be very erratic.

Certainly I do not really look at his statements where one day he says that the federal government should get out of medicare. The next day when the federal government starts to withdraw he says: "No, that's wrong". That type of erratic behaviour certainly does not show any consistent leadership.

I guess I am not surprised after being involved with him for 20 years, and knowing his style and his erratic approach to politics and social problems and issues that that is true. However, I am more concerned about the inconsistencies we see evolving in Canada from the government in terms of policy.

At one time the sharing of costs was 50–50. The provinces paid 50; the federal government paid 50. Now the provinces are paying 63 per cent of health care costs and the federal government 37 per cent. With the budget that was brought in last week, I am sure this figure will go down to much more like 65–35. That, of course, is the end of any equal partnership.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would really like to bring this debate back to a sense of reality rather than the sense of mythology that has been built up by my colleagues opposite from over the mountains.

In that vein I am pleased to speak on the budget presented in this House last week by the Hon. Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance. This is an important blueprint for the economic health of Canada, both over the next year and in years subsequent.

The people of Macleod have told me that they want fiscal responsibility from the federal government. We want a bright financial future for our children, not one that has been mortgaged away. Whether I am in Vulcan, Red Deer Lake, or in the Crow's Nest Pass, the message remains the same: "Let's get Canada's financial house in order".

This budget sets out an achievable plan which will meet these concerns I so often hear from fellow Albertans in southern Alberta. It puts in legislation for the first time—this is a historic moment—the requirement for government to restrain spending. It is a major milestone.

When I was first elected to this House in 1988 I brought an important message from the people of Macleod: Restrain government spending and get the deficit under control.

Thoughtful southern Albertans tell me above anything else, their biggest concern is Canada's deficit. They realize that our country has been living well beyond its means and governments have to be ready to say: "Enough is enough".

The finance minister has made it abundantly clear: "Enough is enough".

Our national debt will soon reach $400 billion. That is $15,000 for every man, woman, and child. Interest on this debt is now the single largest expense faced by the government. Interest on the debt alone will cost more than $43 billion next year. That is more money than is spent on old age security, on unemployment insurance, and family allowances combined. It will take tough, determined action to solve Canada's fundamental economic and fiscal problems.

Our government has declared all-out war on the deficit. We have listened to Canadians who have told us to use the GST as a tool to fight the deficit and just as in Alberta we used the Alberta Heritage Savings and Trust Fund for surplus funds, now at the federal level we have created and are using the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund to manage the debt.

I must give credit to my colleagues from Lethbridge, from the neighbouring riding to mine, because he has been working away on this, I know, ever since I have been in the House and I know he worked on it before. As an important means to ensure that next time there is an election, and the time there is an election after that, that spending does not become the way to go, that restraint continues to remain an important objective of this government. I give my colleague from Lethbridge full credit for determinedly pursued this question. I know other members worked with him as well.

All GST revenues will be used to bring the public debt under control. Also flowing into that fund will be revenues from the sale of Crown corporations and contributions by individuals and organizations.

The people of Macleod have made it loud and clear that they do not want the GST to be a cash cow to be milked by any government. They do not want revenues from the new tax, the replacement tax, to be used for new and expensive programs. I have been told countless times by constituents at public meetings, coffee shops and on the street that the GST should be used to fight the deficit. It is good advice, and the government has heeded that advice.

With the creation of the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund, Canadians are now reassured that GST revenues will not be used for new program creation. Legislation will be introduced with that very goal in mind. Of course, as is the case with all government accounts, this fund will be reviewed annually by the Auditor General. Revenues going into the fund will be applied first against the cost of servicing the debt, that is, the interest, and as revenues grow over time, as the economy grows, these revenues will be used to reduce outstanding debt. This is further evidence of the commitment to fight the deficit and the national debt.

To ensure that this spending track is met, the government will legislate expenditure limits on annual program spending for the next five years. Of course, some flexibility will be provided to meet a very limited set of contingencies. This will change significantly the way government manages its expenditures. While new programs to meet new needs will be possible, they will have to be funded from the total legislated spending ceiling.

This government is the first in Canada's history to legislate a ceiling on its spending. It is an historic development and a critical step which helps the House of Commons and the elected government place restraint upon and give political direction to the bureaucracies and the bureaucrats that serve the government and the people of Canada. Of course, this will be of interest to students of public policy because I believe it is a good policy.

But the achievement is also critical to those who serve as elected representatives of Canada. The people have been calling for restraint and through these measures the government of Canada, the House of Commons, is meeting those demands. Much of the nation is now facing recession and this government is going to ensure that the will of the people of Canada is reflected in the federal system. That is only appropriate and it is only fair to all Canadians.

Canadians have told us to control federal spending. We have responded. Legislation will limit growth and total federal program spending to just 3 per cent per year after 1991–92. This is proof positive of the government's commitment in its fight against the deficit.

If you were to talk to people on the street in Longview or Fort Macleod or other communities in southern Alberta within my riding, you would quickly realize that fiscal restraint is what they want. Incidentally, I might note the hon. member for Kamloops sent me a note recently, as he did to all western members, encouraging them to vote against this budget, create an election. This is the most outrageous thing I have ever heard. Well, the hon. member should grow up. He was born, in all places, in High River, Alberta. He grew up in Longview, Alberta. Both communities are in my riding, and let me tell you, the folks back home do not want an election. The folks back home do not want us to vote against this budget. They are saying get on with the business of government; get on with the business of restraining expenditures. I do not know where the member from Kamloops has been for those many years since he left Longview, Alberta, but he has wandered a long way.

Macleod residents do not want to be bought with their own money. Nothing offends them more. They do not want to see lavish government expenditures at the expense of their children. Legislated spending controls provide all Canadians a guarantee of restraint.

Now, if we are to succeed in reducing the deficit, we must practise sustained spending restraint. The government took further action in this budget to restrain program spending and spending on government operations to ensure further reduction of the deficit. The Expenditure Control Plan was announced in 1990 and has now been extended for three years.

This plan affects a wide variety of government spending, but it makes some important exemptions. Those exemptions include: income support programs for seniors, families and veterans; unemployment insurance; equalization; Canada Assistance Plan payments to lower income provinces; and Indian and Inuit programs.

These are all important programs where, quite clearly, this government is demonstrating its commitment to social programs in this country. In fact, the best social program we can provide is a strong economy, employment for Canadians, and the opportunity for Canadians to build their own future. It is through these strong measures that we provide a guarantee of a strong future for all Canadians.

The Expenditure Control Plan will restrain spending growth in a number of areas after 1991–92. For example, these include Canada Assistance Plan payments to the fiscally stronger provinces, funding for science and technology and official development assistance. Other areas of spending will be frozen, such as per capita transfers to the provinces under the Established Program Financing. Even so, total transfers continue to grow with provincial populations.

In all, programs exempt from the extension of the Expenditure Control Plan account for about 60 per cent of program spending and will grow at an annual average rate of 3.9 per cent from 1991–92 to 1995–96. All other spending will grow at an average annual rate of 1.7 per cent. These are tremendous commitments to the need for restraint.

The cost of government operations has been closely controlled since 1984. In real dollar figures, they have actually declined. We intensified this effort in December 1989 with the announcement of several new cost cutting measures.

Canadians want the burden of restraint to fall equally on everyone. My constituents often tell me that they are willing to do their part, but elected officials, civil servants and others in the public sector must be willing to do their share as well. The restraint and efficiency measures introduced to government management are proof that the government has again listened.

The Prime Minister and his cabinet will have their ministerial salaries frozen for one year. Salaries of senators and members of Parliament which currently increase at the rate of inflation minus 1 per cent will be limited to the lesser of that or the average public service settlements.

My constituents want the burden of a weaker economy shared by the civil service. Public servants have not felt the pain of this recession in the same way as do private sector employees. While many people have lost jobs in the private sector, there have been no recent job losses in the public sector, and this is an important question of fairness to all Canadians.

I agree strongly with the government's position not to contemplate civil service wage increases of over 3 per cent a year for the next three years.

I also support the salary limitations placed on executive level bureaucrats and the intention to reduce the number of senior level officials. All Canadians must share the strengths and weaknesses of our economic performance.

These measures will protect jobs, maintain service levels and aid and fight against the deficit. Over the next five years, the government will realize savings of $3.6 billion through these measures.

The government has looked at other areas to reduce its spending as well. I strongly support the government's reconsideration of several large expenditure decisions. The government has looked at a number of questions and has decided it is time to put some of these issues on the back burner and consider them down the road.

I saw newspaper reports earlier last week quoting members opposite, asking the government to increase spending substantially and to ignore the deficit. For example, the member for Essex—Windsor urged the Minister of Finance to "abandon old Tory deficit cutting policies".

The member for Windsor West said: "The priority at this point has to shift to dealing with the recession." The story goes on to say that "Mr. Gray would not specify how much of an increase in the deficit he would be willing to see".

The last time we were in a recession, the Liberal government of the day ignored the deficit. The deficit doubled from $14 billion to $28 billion per year during that period. That is truly offensive. We cannot afford to do that now. We are still paying the price of those misguided policies of the early 1980s.

The opposition seems to believe that spending more money will make the world's problems go away. It did not work in the past and it is not going to work now. Canadians are telling all politicians that they cannot continue spending that they do not have. Canadians are right.

The people of Macleod have stated clearly that they want the deficit tackled. Our deficit targets are right in line. Despite recessionary pressures, despite the tremendous difficulties of keeping the deficit to where it is now, down to $30.5 billion, there were tremendous pressures to increase that deficit. I commend the Minister of Finance for his tremendous achievement in keeping it at that level.

In 1992–93, with recovery and with lower interest rates, the deficit will fall below $25 billion for the first time in a decade. The need for new federal borrowing in financial markets, the need for us to go out and ask to borrow money from others in other parts of the world or from other Canadians, will be eliminated in 1993–94. That will be a great day for Canada.

The deficit is the government's number one priority, but we have to remain mindful, and we do remain mindful, of the current recession. The government has allocated extra money to where it is needed most. Program spending will increase by $7.5 billion in the next fiscal year.

The majority of this increase will go to three areas: $3 billion will go to the assistance of the unemployed, an important contribution in that area; $1.6 billion will go to the elderly; and $1.3 billion for farmers who face tough times.

This budget allocation for agriculture is critically important in my riding of Macleod as it is based primarily on agriculture, much of the riding. The $1.3 billion commitment in the budget is the government's recognition, yet again. We have done this year after year after year under this government, the recognition of the importance of agriculture in the Canadian economy and the social fabric of so much of rural and small-town Canada. It is good news for agriculture, it is good news for the small communities that depend on agriculture and so it is good news for the whole riding of Macleod.

Farm leaders across Canada were quick to offer their praise for the budget. Alex Graham, chairman of the Prairie Wheat Pools said: "It's a real positive sign of government's commitment to agriculture". Don Knoerr, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture said: "You obviously have to be pleased that the need of farmers, though desperate, has been recognized by the federal government". Harvey McEwen, president of the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association said: "It's an extremely good sign. The funding has bought us time to dig ourselves out of this."

There can be no doubt of the importance agriculture plays in Canada's economy. The government has recognized this in this budget and it is supported by the agricultural community. I might add that it is something that is critically important across western Canada.

As a member of Parliament from western Canada, I am heartened once again by the commitment shown and the leadership shown by the Minister of Agriculture, and to the commitment of this government to follow through, to support our farmers in the midst of this, particularly, the international trade war between the Americans and the Europeans. This has been a problem for all grain producing countries for years and we are all optimistic that through the negotiations at GATT over the next year or two that we actually will get to a point to deal with some of these issues in the international context.

In the meantime, this government stands by agriculture.

In conclusion, the 1991–92 federal budget, I think, can be best described as tough but fair. The government has confronted the deficit head on, but all Canadians will share the burden. The budget is a financial blueprint to brighter economic times and a more secure future for our children and grandchildren. More important, it is what Canadians want.

As I said earlier, the people of Macleod sent a message with me when I was elected in 1988. One of those messages was to restrain government spending and get the deficit under control. This budget reflects what my constituents have requested.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I have a question as well as a comment on some of the figures that were quoted by the hon. member for Macleod. He talked about the extra spending by the government, and I believe he mentioned a figure of $3 billion for unemployment insurance payments.

I want to make it clear to those who are listening to that statement. It sounds as if this is coming directly on behalf of the largesse of the government. It is not quite that simple. The government, as the hon. member knows—and I see him smiling over there—is not lashing out with $3 billion to the unemployment insurance fund. Indeed, I am sure the hon. member will recall, as will other members in the House, that Bill C-21 effectively took the government out of the unemployment insurance business. It was my understanding that, previous to this, the government paid about 25 per cent—in fact, I think it was 26 per cent—of all of the unemployment insurance money. In the days when the unemployment insurance fund was worth around $13 billion, the government contributed around $3 billion.

That $3 billion that it used to contribute is not the $3 billion that it is contributing that is referred to by the hon. member. Indeed, I do believe that there has been some recanting on the part of the government, or change of heart, if you like, in how that money has been collected.

The Minister of Finance in his budget speech last week said that there were no new tax increases. A tax increase comes in many forms—and I do not want to talk about the cigarette tax. But an area that really appalled me and indeed has a lot of my constituents, and I am sure Canadians all across the country, in a bit of an uproar is the bizarre increase in unemployment insurance premiums, to the tune of 24 per cent, on both the part of the employee and the employer. Taken in itself, I think that is pretty terrible. But when you add it to the percentage increase that had occurred as a result of Bill C-21, raising the unemployment insurance premiums for the individual essentially 50 per cent in about a year and a half and the same for the employers, then we have a number of things happening. We have the employees paying tax money so that they can get it back in the form of unemployment insurance; and the employers have to pay more. So, what we have is a tax increase for the individual employees, who in many cases cannot afford another cent from their pay cheques; and indeed the businesses, many of which are small businesses, have to fork over more payments as well.

This, I can assure the hon. member, may be given by the government, but it is given by the government because it is received from the government by those people who are paying the extra unemployment insurance premiums to make up in the next year or two, depending on how you count it and depending on how many we have employed, between $2 billion and $3 billion. So, that equation is about right.

I would like the hon. member, in all fairness, to clarify that.

Mr. Hughes: I thank my hon. colleague opposite for his very thoughtful intervention. But he knows as well as any other member in this House that what the government has asked for is an additional $2.70 a week. He knows as well as any other member in the House that what is required in this country is an unemployment insurance program that is going to be fully funded, that is going to be able to provide the benefits to Canadians who are unemployed. He knows that the people who are going to be able to pay for this are the Canadians who are employed, and that it is only fair that that should be the case.

I think he recognizes that the goal here is to provide for real unemployment insurance. "Insurance" is the name of the program. The burden falls fairly on Canadians who are employed, and the benefits fall fairly to those Canadians who are temporarily unemployed before they get back into the market. I think the hon. member would like to paint this from a certain perspective and that is his prerogative as a member of the House. I see him smiling. We all recognize that that is what he is trying to do.

Realistically, you have to deal with questions like this in a real world. Who is going to pay for additional money if it is just going to be going into the deficit? It is going to be the hon. member's children, my children and the children of our constituents today. You cannot continue to force the deficit off into the future where somebody down the road is going to pay. You have got to start dealing with the question now and here today.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, it is very illuminating to hear a speech from the hon. member in which he talks about the hardships, that the deficit is causing the need for cutbacks. We are ready to slash those civil servants down in Ottawa. The fact that there is the same number as there were back in 1974 is not mentioned. But when it comes to $1.3 billion for agriculture, that is okay. That is really important that we get money to those farmers.

We do not worry about spending money on job creation. After all, our children and grandchildren are going to have to pay for that because it is going to be added to the deficit. It is okay if 1.5 million Canadians are out of work. It is okay if we lose 288,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector, half of them permanently. But send that $1.3 billion out to Macleod, Alberta, because that is where we need it.

I would like to ask the hon. member what he thinks of this. This is what the present Minister of Finance had to say about governments devoting money to job creation during the last recession when the government at that time put $500 million into job creation. This is what he said, and I quote: "The minister announced a $500 million job creation program. I guess we have to say, Mr. Speaker, it is a step in the right direction. They have addressed the problem of unemployment in this budget, but it is a very small step. Five hundred million dollars sounds like a lot of money, but it is $300 per unemployed worker and amounts to some one-quarter of 1 per cent of the total size of our economy today".

Does the hon. member agree with the present Minister of Finance when he expressed the view in 1982 that governments should devote resources to job creation, or does he agree with the Minister of Finance today who says: "Let the unemployed just sit out there and stew without jobs"?

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to that interjection. I hope that my hon. colleague is around long enough to have words thrown back in his face eight or ten years after the fact as well, when times are different, when times are changed, when circumstances are different.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, times are very different between now and the way they were in the early eighties. Let me give one example. The first example is the level that interest rates achieved in the early 1980s and the difference that we have been able to achieve through restraining the supply of money in this country, through fiscal matters and monetary policy instruments. We have been able to ensure that the interest rates did not get anywhere near the levels that were achieved by the Liberal government in the early 1980s when they were so irresponsible.

My hon. friend says that we should not support agriculture.

Mr. Manley: I did not say that. I said we should be spending money on agriculture.

Mr. Hughes: He said, we should not be spending money on agriculture. Now, wait a minute. What are we doing in agriculture? What we are doing in agriculture is we are investing to ensure that we have an agricultural system left, that we have the family farm left at the end of this downturn in the international economy. We are investing in a sector that is fundamental to the social and economic health of this country.

I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, this is the most outlandish statement I have heard this member make so far, questioning what is wrong—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Ottawa South.

Mr. Manley: I think the member for Macleod, when he examines the "blues" will discover he has misquoted me. I am simply putting his comments with respect to funding for agriculture in juxtaposition to his comments on funding for other job creation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Macleod has one minute remaining.

Mr. Hughes: Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to misrepresent any suggestions the hon. member has made in the House. I simply want to assure him that I will do everything I can to ensure that farmers in western Canada are supported when we are in tough times. Clearly, it is a tough time that is going to stretch for a few years. We have been through this for three or four years already and it is probably going to last for a couple of more years.

We have taken the incredible step of having put in place a safety net for farmers across western Canada to which they contribute a very large percentage and which will help them predict in the spring how much money they are going to have in the fall. This is a tremendous example of the kinds of support we are putting place. We are not just handing money out the door. We are not just shovelling money out the door. We are putting a system in place that puts the responsibility on the farmer to take steps to protect themselves in what is a very difficult international marketplace. That is a fully justifiable system of support for agriculture.

I see my time is up.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, last year when I had the opportunity to address this House on the subject of the federal budget, I compared the Minister of Finance to the emperor who had no clothes. I said that, lurking in the budget document of one year ago, could be found a tacit admission of failure on the part of the minister.

While he was not prepared to admit until the month of October that Canada was enduring a recession, it seemed plain enough to me at the time, that the minister's empty rhetoric signalled a recession under way or about to begin, as well as the realization that past policies had not worked.

Well, the made-in-Canada recession of 1990-91 is now beginning its twelfth month. Almost 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed and unlike last year when it was necessary for the minister's deception to be pointed out, this year it is plain for all to see that this is a minister and a government that have no ideas, no vision for the future, no compassion for the unemployed and homeless and nothing to offer the people of Canada at this time.

Many Canadians now feel that they do not have much to which they can look forward and, regrettably, with the presentation of the 1991 budget, the Conservative government has, if anything, contributed to the despair and discontent that plagues Canada at this time.

[Translation]

So we have to add this to the tragic list of a record 5,991 bankruptcies recorded in January. The Tory government has no vision for the future. Theirs is a vision that will bankrupt the country. This Budget smells of despair.

[English]

In his own presentation to Parliament, the finance minister has as much as admitted that the economic crisis he brought on is now beyond his control. While the minister says that this budget is designed to give Canadians confidence, that it provides leadership and direction, his own projections quickly make it impossible to share the optimism inherent in the rhetoric. His so-called road to recovery is absolutely meaningless for the 1.5 million Canadians whom he says will stay unemployed for 1991 and 1992.

His recent conversion to concern about high interest rates provides no prospect for relief for mortgage holders and small businesses that will still be confronted, according to the minister, with interest rates around 10 per cent and real rates of about 7 per cent. These projections indicate that the Canadian dollar will remain high and, therefore, Canadian exports will continue to be at a competitive disadvantage.

Furthermore, the government treats the deficit problem in this country as strictly a numbers game with no apparent appreciation for the need to invest in people.

[Translation]

Once again, the Tories prove they don't know what they are doing. The 1991 Budget shows they are as lost as they have been for the past seven years.

[English]

In the final analysis, they have allowed Canada to drift into engagement in fierce competition in an unforgiving global economy without being equipped to meet the challenge.

Worse still, much of the current economic hardship faced by Canadians was deliberately planned by the government. In the Prime Minister's own words: "We have induced an economic slowdown".

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

HOUSING

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the shelters for the homeless across Canada are full and overflowing. The best estimate of the number of homeless is vague; somewhere between 130,000 and 250,000 people.

The recent budget has sent another crippling blow to these homeless Canadians. The government has drastically reduced the effectiveness of the federal housing program by cutting new housing initiatives.

According to the Canadian Housing Renewal Association, the 15 per cent cut will result in the loss of more than 3,000 desperately needed housing units. By extending those cuts into 1995–96, we will have lost more than $400 million from the housing budget and thousands of homes for Canadians.

When will the government recognize the problem of the homeless in this country? When will the government devote the necessary time and resources, first, to find out exactly how many Canadians are homeless and, second, take a leadership role in co–ordinating the efforts of all levels of government and the private sector to ensure that adequate housing is available to all Canadians?

CANADA GAMES

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, although they lost the Canada Games flag by one point, Quebec athletes behaved like winners at the closing ceremonies in Charlottetown yesterday. They were the first to rise to give Ontario a standing ovation when it was awarded the games flag.

Claude Hardy, who headed Quebec's delegation, said that to win the flag, they had to stay up there, and that is what they did.

Quebec athletes won 150 medals, including 63 gold, and set two new games records. Quebec finished one point behind Ontario, losing 256.5 to 257.5.

Three cheers for our Quebec athletes!

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, year after year the fishing fleets of the European community have taken more fish than they agreed to take. The word for this is theft. The Europeans are stealing from the fishing families and communities throughout Atlantic Canada. While this federal government imposes severe cuts on Canadian fishermen, it has proven itself incapable of stopping the Europeans from overfishing year in and year out.

In 1990, the Europeans took five times more fish than they agreed to take in the area beyond Canada's 200–mile limit.

From Dr. Les Harris in his report on northern cod, the Fisheries Council of Canada, fishing communities and provincial governments the call has been the same: stop foreign overfishing and extend jurisdiction.

It is time to put the Europeans on notice. It is either stop overfishing or next year find themselves fishing inside newly claimed Canadian waters.

It is time for this federal government to start protecting the interests and futures of Canadian fishing families and communities.

THE LATE HELEN HUNLEY LIEUTENANT–GOVERNOR OF ALBERTA

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this is the final week in the term of the 12th Lieutenant–Governor of the Province of Alberta. As an Albertan and as a friend of Her Honour, it is appropriate to pay tribute to Her Honour Helen Hunley.

Ms. Hunley has had an outstanding career, serving first as a lieutenant in the Canadian Women's Army Corps in World War II, a successful business person, a counsellor and mayor of Rocky Mountain House, and later a member of the Legislative Assembly of Alberta.

She served in our provincial cabinet as Solicitor General and Minister of Social Services and Community Health. She retired from active politics in 1979 but was prevailed upon to accept the position of Lieutenant-Governor of Alberta in 1985.

Her Honour tackled this position as she has everything else in her life, by committing herself completely to the role. She has done absolutely everything that could be expected of a Lieutenant-Governor and has done it well. She has fulfilled her vice-regal duties with dignity and dedication and has earned the respect and admiration of all Albertans.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, on humanitarian grounds, I call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration to issue Arthur and Helena Gras and their two children a permit to remain in Canada.

Mr. Gras, a Polish sailor, and his family are now under threat of deportation after being in Canada seeking refugee status for three years.

Humanitarian grounds are based on the fact that both children are Canadian citizens. One child suffers from a rare medical condition that doctors have verified cannot be adequately treated in Poland. Mr. Gras, if he had not been caught in the refugee backlog, would have been deemed a political refugee when he first arrived in Canada in 1988. Mr. Gras has been able to secure employment and the family has adjusted well to Canada.

I ask the minister to show compassion and common sense and stop the deportation of the Gras family.

GOVERNMENT OF CHINA

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, in June 1989 the world watched in horror as the Chinese government brutally crushed a pro-democracy movement in Tiananmen Square.

That same government has now quietly stepped up its trials and sentencing of participants of the pro-democracy movement, perhaps because the world's attention continues to be focused on the situation in the Persian Gulf.

There is almost total secrecy surrounding the trials in China. Observers from Canada and other western nations have been thwarted in their efforts to monitor this further oppression by the Chinese government.

The war in the gulf is over and, as we work for a new world order, let us not forget there are hundreds, perhaps thousand, of young people in China behind bars and facing an uncertain future, all because they wanted their government to move more quickly toward democratic reform.

We in Canada can and must stand up for the principle of free expression and oppose the use of force against unarmed demonstrators. The Chinese government must be made aware, in no uncertain terms, that Canada is watching.

UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the success of the United Nations military action against Iraq will act as a precedent and deterrent to other bullies who attack legitimate nations.

However, there is another benefit less obvious. It will no longer be necessary for countries to spend billions and billions of dollars for weapons to protect themselves from others. In short, they can now choose to spend money on economic development and social programs and rely on the United Nations to defend their legitimate borders.

I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that this is a legitimate concept for Canada to promote at the United Nations and elsewhere.

SPICER COMMISSION

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, Keith Spicer's statement that Canadians could not care less how the Spicer Commission is administered is outrageous, at a time when the government is making Canadian taxpayers pay for its own administrative incompetence.

Taxpayers do care how the Spicer Commission is administered.

Taxpayers do care about the $25 million they will have to pay for a so-called commission that has lost all credibility.

Quebecers do care about Robert Normand's statements that the Spicer Commission has trivialized Quebec issues.

Mr. Spicer has shown poor judgment and a lack of openness, both to an unacceptable degree.

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): You are right!

Mr. Rocheleau: He should resign immediately, and the government should suspend the proceedings of this commission and order an inquiry to clear up what we could already call the Spicer Commission scandal.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, during the conflict in the Persian Gulf, troops from our Canadian Forces played a major role. Canada did its fair share with all coalition countries in supporting the UN Security Council's resolutions.

During the conflict, many other members of our Forces worked long hours here in Canada to co-ordinate our activities in the Middle East.

[English]

I am sure all members of Parliament will agree with my request to have the Minister of National Defence strike a commemorative medal for our members of the Armed Forces. Such a medal would show the appreciation of all Canadians for these dedicated men and women.

[Translation]

Now is the time to show how proud we are of our troops, and I think a medal would be appropriate.

OFFICIAL RESIDENCES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this government purports to cut the deficit by saving money, by cutbacks in health, education and the environment.

As a Scots Canadian, we learned a long time ago that you can save money on little things and then you build it up so it becomes a big thing.

• (1410)

I want to suggest to the government that it can save waste in government in little things. I am not just talking about the Minister of Communications' trips and institutions, although it could save on those.

Let us take a look at the official residences: $500,000 was spent on housing in the last six months for the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. For the Leader of the Opposition, $27,000 was spent on furniture so he could move in; $17,600 to paint the place. That is a little bit more than they pay in Beauséjour. For linens, $11,000, and at 24 Sussex Drive, $629 was spent for slush matting and $1,080 for pest control.

Who is that? The Bloc Quebecois? I don't know.

My Scottish grandmother once said that if you really want to save money, you add up all the little expenditures and you get a big cut in expenditures. The government should cut this wasteful expenditure in Stornoway and 24 Sussex Drive.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the recent federal budget is right for the times.

Indeed, as the Treasury Board minister said, the present cost and complexity of government operations can no longer be justified to Canadians. Accordingly, this government will legislate mandatory program spending limits. These should have been in place 20 years ago, but it is not too late.

For the first time there will be in place a law putting ceilings on the amount that politicians can spend. Canadians concerned about GST revenues being used to fund new programs will applaud the establishment of the debt servicing and reduction fund, guaranteeing that those revenues will be solely dedicated to deficit reduction.

The Public Service wage cap, reductions in the layers of bureaucratic management, the 10 per cent cut in senior management, and cuts in grants and contributions send welcome signals to Canadians who are sick and tired of the costs of big government.

This government provides the reductions and reforms that are absolutely necessary if government is to have the funds necessary for essential safety net programs and services. It provides the impetus for lower interest rates and greater confidence essential to economic recovery for this country.

WORLD SUMMIT ON ARMS CONTROL

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, Canadians rejoiced with the announcement of the cease-fire in the gulf and the removal of Saddam Hussein's army from Kuwait.

Now that the hostilities have ended, we can focus our attention on rebuilding a safe and secure environment for all the peoples of the world, including the Middle East. Canada has shown leadership in proposing a world summit, under the auspices of the United Nations, on the control of instruments of war and weapons of mass destruction. The agenda should include conventional arms, chemical weapons, missile systems, nuclear and biological weapons.

I wish to commend the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the initiatives they have taken today in proposing a world summit on arms control. This is paramount in establishing a new world order for lasting peace.

This is the time to deal with arms control. This is the time to strengthen the United Nations.

CANADA WINTER GAMES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, Prince Edward Islanders joined with all Canadians in a celebration of sportsmanship this past Saturday in the co-hosting of the 1991 Canada Winter Games. The closing ceremonies marked the end of two weeks of healthy competition in individual and team sports.

The main theme of the 1991 Canada Winter Games was participation. This year, a record number of athletes showed up, proving that Prince Edward Island could host such an important event. Thousands of spectators, Islanders and visitors alike, came out to enjoy the sporting events.

The sporting events were complemented with the cultural festival called "The Colours of Canada".

The Canada Winter Games were made possible through the dedicated support of Prince Edward Islanders. Over 5,000 volunteers worked to make the Canada Winter Games a great success. In 1991 Prince Edward Island said: "Welcome home, Canada!". Thousands of Canadians responded with overwhelming enthusiasm, and to these people: "We hope to see you again soon".

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, whose words are these: "Governments must conduct themselves like private citizens. Borrow, if necessary, for capital assets such as a new home, but pay as you go for current expenditures, like the groceries"?

He went on to say:

> The leaders of the 60s and 70s have placed a first mortgage on the future of Canada. The leaders of the 80s and 90s are placing a second mortgage on the same asset. There is no equity left. We must once and for all put an end to the suffocating debt-load we are placing on the backs of our children.

Who spoke those words? The Minister of Finance? The Prime Minister? No, Mr. Speaker, it was the premier of the province of New Brunswick, Frank McKenna. It sounds as if he agrees with us.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA HEALTH ACT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

On December 3, the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated, and I quote: "No changes to the Canada Health Act are currently being contemplated".

Last week we learned on page 71 of the budget that medicare cutbacks have created a situation where the current Canada Health Act will no longer be able to protect universal health care. This government is already planning new legislation to withhold funds from other areas.

My question for the Prime Minister is: On December 3, did the minister of health misstate the facts, or has he only recently knuckled under to the hack and slash medicare approach of the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer that was given on December 3 still remains. The intention is not to amend the Canada Health Act but to amend other legislation which will protect the Canada Health Act.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, the Minister of National Health and Welfare accused the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs of wanting to abolish medicare and destroy our national health care system. Could the Prime Minister inform the House wether he agrees with his Minister of National Health and Welfare, or does he realize that considering the cuts at the federal level, the shoe is actually on the other foot?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my comments on Friday were made in reference to the position of the minister from Quebec that the federal government should simply transfer at least $3.6 billion to the province or $14 billion across the board to the provinces and have no say whatsoever in maintaining national standards.

My question to the hon. member for Hamilton East was: Is that the position of the federal Liberal Party of Canada, in view of the fact that she had cited the minister from Quebec as her authority on medicare and federalism.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Minister of Health and Welfare has made a very serious accusation. He has charged the minister in Quebec with destroying the national health care system.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he agrees with the statements made by his colleague in this House or whether he at least understands that it is the federal cuts of over $1 billion this year that in fact are leading to the death-knell of medicare.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, let me put the question back to my hon. friend.

Does the hon. member and does her party believe that it is appropriate the federal government should simply transfer $14 billion this year for medicare to the provinces and should have no ability whatsoever to have any voice in the use of that money in the maintenance of national standards with regard to universality, portability, public administration or any of the other standards in medicare? Does she believe that medicare would still exist as a national health insurance scheme?

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Yesterday in Montreal the Minister of Finance, after a meeting with provincial finance ministers, apparently speaking of provincial health care programs said, and I quote: "There are going to have to be some changes made".

I ask the minister: Exactly what kind of changes is the Minister of Finance talking about? Is he talking about creating user fees for health care, the shutting down of hospital beds, the elimination of certain medical treatments from coverage from medicare?

How are these kinds of changes consistent with the Canada Health Act? Why is this government trying to destroy medicare by the back door?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question should bear a consumer warning: "Caution: Listening to these statements may be hazardous to the truth".

Nothing could be further from the truth than the suggestion that the federal government wants to destroy medicare. One thing that is clear, however, is that Canadians are spending some $2,000 per citizen, per year on health care. Looked at in terms of percentage of gross domestic product, only the United States among the western industrialized countries spends a higher percentage of GDP than Canada does on health care.

The real challenge for us in protecting medicare for the future is not simply to continue to inflate the system, but rather to ask ourselves whether the dollars that we are spending are as wisely spent as could be the case.

For example, I would have hoped that the hon. member would have strongly endorsed the position that was taken by the Minister of Finance, which will reduce by probably 100,000 the number of young Canadians who are smoking and, along the way, save literally thousands of lives and tens of millions of taxpayers' dollars on medicare.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the minister has characterized as being untruthful a direct quote by the Minister of Finance which many of us heard on CBC radio this morning. I will leave it to the Minister of Finance to settle with the Minister of National Health and Welfare on this, but this is an exact quote.

The Minister of Finance laid out the blueprint for the phasing out of federal transfer payments for health care in his own budget document last week. The National Council of Welfare, the government-created advisory body to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has said, speaking about these cutbacks: "Without federal leverage, provinces could impose user fees—a backward step that would deter poor people in particular from seeking the care they need".

Why does the minister and his government want the provinces to take this kind of backward step?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I did not challenge what was said by the Minister of Finance. I challenged what was said by the hon. member for Windsor West when he suggested that the federal government's goal was to destroy medicare by the back door, a view I might mention that is not shared by Madam Begin, the former Liberal Minister of National Health and Welfare. In an article on Saturday in The Globe and Mail: "Medicare will survive," Begin says. "Former health minister says federal cuts not threat to system".

Once again we have the members of the Liberal Party being confused about the total amount of transfers being made between Ottawa and the provinces. At the very same time as they are complaining about reductions in the amount of cash being transferred, they ignore the fact that tax points, which have exactly the same net effect to the federal treasury and to the provincial treasury, are increasing and that the growth in transfers from the federal government to the provinces will be more than 1 per cent for EPF this year.

If hon. members wish to protect medicare, it is important we put the federal government's finances in place so that we can ensure the stability of Canada's social programs for the future.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Today, leading indicators continued to drop dramatically. The recession continues. However, according to the Budget, all is well, as the government says on page 52: "—consumption is projected to rebound vigorously in the second half of the year—".

How can the government expect consumption to get us out of this recession, when the Budget projects that one out of ten Canadians will be unemployed, and when the government is attacking people's salaries and the GST is taking billions of dollars out of the pockets of people across this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the indicator to which the hon. member referred does not give us any new information. I think everyone in this House was quite aware of the situation we had in December.

I agree it is a difficult situation, and that is why it is so important for us to take steps to get out of this situation. In this respect, I would say that the latest Budget brought down by my colleague, the Minister of Finance—who would have liked to be in the House but was held up by the storm, on the highway between Montreal and Ottawa—creates exactly those conditions the economy will need to recover.

Of course we must act, but we must deal with the real causes of the problem and create an economic climate that will allow interest rates to go down and be conducive to economic recovery and thus increased employment.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I say to this government; let's get real. The leading indicators continue to drop sharply right across this country. This means more people without jobs; it means more children without enough food; it means more families struggling just to make ends meet.

On Saturday the Minister of Finance said he had made mistakes in past budgets. Will this government admit that this budget this past week was a mistake? Will it help the jobless instead of hurting the jobless? Will it cut the big gap between interest rates in the United States and interest rates in Canada? In short, will it do something about this recession instead of trying to make this recession worse for people?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): If the hon. gentleman were to look at his desk he would see a dark piece of metal sticking up. This is a microphone, and through the magic of modern technology it brings his voice to me clearly. He does not need to shout.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Loiselle: This government is very concerned with job creation. As a matter of fact, in the history of Canada it is the government which has created the largest number of jobs—one million and a half—which has improved productivity. True, after seven years of record growth the economy was over-heating; bungalows worth normally $80,000 were being sold for $300,000, $400,000; the economy was thrown off course. So we needed to act to prevent inflation from making it a continued reality.

To do that, you need to bring down the inflation pressure. And, Mr. Speaker, as you all know in this House that for—I do not know how many weeks, following each other, one after the other—the interest rates have been going down—again last week.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I wonder whether the minister can hear the cries of help from the people in the food bank line-ups and the people in the unemployment insurance line-ups.

I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. His government has frozen funding for medicare for two years, now for five years, yet the cost to the provinces for medicare are increasing at double the rate of inflation.

Will the minister tell this House how he can expect anything from forthcoming provincial health budgets but hospital bed closures, lay-off of health care workers, cancellation of equipment purchases and cuts to all health services, none of which he can control by the Canada Health Act?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be aware of the fact that over the next four years transfers to the provinces across the board will be increasing by some 3.7 per cent per year. In contrast, the federal government is holding its own program expenditures to 3.2 per cent. We are asking the provinces to do nothing that we are not prepared to do even more stringently in areas under exclusive federal jurisdiction.

In terms of the amount of money involved in transfers to the provinces, the savings involved amount to about one half of 1 per cent of provincial revenues.

What I would ask the provinces to do is exactly what is being done by Ottawa; to look at priorities, to set priorities and to decide where they believe that money must most importantly be spent. Certainly health care is one of those key priorities. That is why we are committed to ensuring the existence of a national medicare program.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): My question is for the Minister of Finance.

Robert Hamilton, executive director of the Hospital Association of Prince Edward Island, said last week that the measures to cut social spending in the budget could lead to bed closures, staff lay-offs and longer waits for surgery. Mr. Hamilton went on to say that Island hospitals have no more fat left to be cut.

Is the minister not aware that his budget is going to damage the quality of our health care system, not only in Prince Edward Island, but across the country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend has to balance the pressures on our health care systems, our education systems, as well as the pressures on the total finances of the country, federal, provincial and municipal. If we do not take the appropriate steps to get our deficits and our debts under control, then it is going to lead to much more lasting damage to both the economy as well as to these important programs. That is the essential direction the government took in the budget I delivered last week.

I met last night with the provincial finance ministers from across the country and we discussed these things. There was very strong agreement it was important that this government take the necessary steps to control the deficit and the debt for the simple reasons I have just elaborated.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

I have served in Prince Edward Island as provincial Minister of Health and Social Services. I know that the responsibilities of governing require tough choices. But I have to question the judgment and the sensitivity of any government that would try to reduce the deficit on the backs of the sick.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Callbeck: Mr. Speaker, why will this minister not admit that health care will be adversely affected by the measures taken in his budget?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is not what we have done. We have simply asked the provinces to accept a lower rate of growth, but a more significant rate of growth than what we are accepting for our own programs.

I told the provinces last night that we would be spending $183 billion over the next five years on transfers to the provinces. It is up to the provinces to decide where those moneys should be spent. Whether they are spent on health care, whether they are spent on post-secondary education, whether they are spent on highways or whether they are spent on salaries and wages of the people who work for the provincial governments, that is their choice. That is their jurisdiction.

Health care is a priority of this government. It has always been a priority and continues to be one.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

Given that this House voted in favour of restoring funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, and given the need for preventive health care services for workers, how can the minister justify slashing the centre's budget by another $110,000, adding insult to the $80,000 injury he inflicted on the CCOHS just last November?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear that the hon. member for Hamilton West will be at the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety next week, since we are organizing a conference of occupational health and safety authorities, to stimulate public interest.

As far as the Budget is concerned, as the Minister of Finance just said, all federal ministers have been asked to do what they can to alleviate the enormous deficit a legacy of the government to which the hon. member belonged—and the $110,000 the Centre will be asked to cut from its overall budget of $11.5 million will, I am sure, be expertly absorbed by the centre's administrators who are competent people and who, I am sure, will find ways to continue to do their excellent work with the funds at their disposal.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his public service announcement for next week and ask the minister when the government is going to start taking responsibility for its own mistakes in policy when it comes to economics in this country.

I am not only speaking on my own here, but also for the president of the CCOHS. He is asking "that this government give us a break". That is his quote. Let us hold to the original terms of the agreement, he is asking.

This government must understand that by increasing funding and access to the centre, it will save money in the long run by promoting health care and safety for Canadian workers.

Injuries to workers costs Canada $29 billion every year. Because of the $1 billion cut to medicare, the government needs to address the issue of preventive health care.

Would the minister not agree that it would be in the best interests of Canadian workers to restore funding to the CCOHS?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the recipe of the Liberals has been tried in this country for many years. Whenever there is a problem, they throw money at it and the problem disappears. This is not the philosophy of this government.

Over the years, we have fully supported the CCOHS. Every time they have asked us for bridge financing, we have given it. This year, we have asked the CCOHS to be equal to the other departments of this government and to find ways to continue doing an excellent job with a little less of financing. We are sure they are prepared and are capable of doing so.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, thousands of forestry jobs in British Columbia and northern Ontario have been lost, due in part to the 1986 Memorandum of Understanding on the softwood lumber tariff.

Last week, the minister of trade met with B.C. Premier Vander Zalm to discuss a strategy to fight the tariff. In fact, representations are being made today in Washington, D.C. about the regressive impact that deal is having on Canada.

My question is for the Prime Minister. This tariff is a major trade irritant between Canada and the United States. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he has raised this matter with President Bush and expressed Canada's concerns over this aspect of trade between our two countries.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations that the Minister for International Trade is carrying on are ongoing, both with provinces, premiers and ministers of trade from the various provinces as well as the United States.

There has been no decision, no conclusion as yet concerning these discussions but it is high on the agenda of the Minister for International Trade. He is continuing those negotiations.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

In a news report today, for the first time the B.C. Minister of Forests is acknowledging some concern over Canada's sovereignty as it relates to forest policy.

Given these concerns about our political sovereignty, and in view of the fact that the U.S. administration has already asked and used the Memorandum of Understanding on the softwood tariff to question such internal decisions as the setting of Canadian freight rates for the transport of Canadian lumber products, will the minister advise this House what other Canadian policy decisions have been affected or questioned by United States authorities under the aegis of this Memorandum of Understanding?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): The Memorandum of Understanding was signed between the two governments and lays out very clearly the terms and conditions of that understanding.

There are areas where the United States has the right to look at certain charges and so on to make sure that the Memorandum of Understanding is being upheld. That is the same way as Canada would look at agreements with the United States and undertakings that they have taken such as questioning some of the subsidies they are providing for farmers today in the United States in competition with Canadian farmers.

We are questioning the agreement that they made with Canada. That goes on all the time. As I said earlier, the minister has this at the top of his list. He is in the process of negotiations with the provinces and will be discussing this with his counterpart in the United States in the very near future.

THE BUDGET

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Analysts with the Toronto Dominion Bank say that the Minister's Budget has an Alice in Wonderland perspective. Unfortunately, Canadians do not share the Minister of Finance's fairy-tale view of things.

Now that Statistics Canada has announced that the composite leading indicator has dropped by 0.6 per cent and that the U.S. leading indicator has dropped 0.7 per cent, why won't the Minister of Finance admit that he has lost control of his made in Canada recession and why won't he introduce measures that will put Canadians back to work?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the projections in my Budget are identical to those of the majority of economists in the private sector, i.e., the recession will end by the middle of this year and the economy will show an improvement of 3.5 per cent in the second half and also throughout next year. I think these projections are very realistic and that they are identical to those made by the majority of our economists.

• (1440)

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister forgets that the measures he took in his budget have actually changed the projections of some of the private sector economists.

But, in any event, I think Canadians want to know why the Minister of Finance seems to have a tendency to change his mind. Back in 1982, when he wanted to be Minister of Finance, he thought that the government's decision at that time during a recession to increase job creation programs by $500 million was, and I quote: "A step in the right direction, but a very small step". He clearly thought more should have been given.

In cutting $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy, the minister should explain to Canadians why he no longer feels that the government should be helping to create jobs.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is a fundamental difference between the picture that we are looking at today and what we were looking at in 1982.

In 1982 there was a significantly less burden of debt on the federal government than is the case now. As I made very, very clear in the House last week, if we were to be increasing the size of the deficit, as I have heard my friend and his colleagues, plus colleagues from the New Democratic Party all saying, spend, spend, spend, what we would see is an increase in interest rates and that increase in interest rates would do far more damage to the economy.

I should also point out to my friend that we are still very much committed on this side of the House to training and the importance of training to Canadian people, particularly to those out of a job. That is why we have transferred a considerable amount of the passive income support moneys in the unemployment insurance fund to active job training. It will amount to some $550 million in this current fiscal year, rising to about $750 million in the very near future.

So the commitment is very clearly there to help people get training.

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the administration of the national forum on Canada's future.

Last week, Mr. Robert Normand, a member of the forum, alleged that other commissioners were racking up scandalous bills for per diems and expenditures.

Now that these charges have been denied by the chairman over the weekend, will the Prime Minister, in the interest of protecting the integrity of his own forum, table immediately in the House of Commons a list of all disbursements, per diems and expenses paid to each member of the forum? If not, why not?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to inform the hon. member that tomorrow, while tabling my Supplementary Estimates (C) for last year, he will have the numbers pertaining to that particular commission.

Mr. Boudria: Each member?

Mr. Loiselle: Well, as the Prime Minister has indicated in this House before, there are procedures followed by these royal commissions. There are ways that these commissions have to be handled and need to be handled so that they maintain the autonomy that one desires them to have.

So I will be introducing that tomorrow and, of course, all of the expenditures will, in due course, be submitted to the auditor.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I assume that on the weekend, the Prime Minister was able to consider the allegations made against the Spicer Commission, and my question is this: Could he give the House the assurance that he asked for and, in fact, received assurances that no irregularities had taken place? That is what we want to know.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that the commission member who more or less started all this, if I am not mistaken, but who did so almost involuntarily—

Mr. Lapierre: He talked to his own reporter!

Mr. Loiselle: I think we should let people speak for themselves. It is very easy to make allegations, but Mr. Normand said that as far as he was concerned, he was going to stay.

In any case, there are a number of important rules, and I am sure the hon. member will realize that. When we set up a royal commission of inquiry, the government cannot start interfering and try to run the commission instead of the people who are there.

There are people on the commission like Mr. Normand and Mr. Spicer, and many other entirely responsible people, and I am sure they will see that the commission is properly run. In any case, tomorrow the amounts spent will be tabled and, at the appropriate time, the Auditor General will be able to review those expenditures and report to Parliament.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, perhaps the Prime Minister could help me with the answer to this question, since we understand he was involved pretty directly four years ago with a similar problem in Saskatchewan or on the prairies.

The Canadian agriculture ministers met in Regina on the weekend to finalize the details of the government's farm income safety net program. We understand that they also discussed the emergency interim payments to farmers, allowing them to continue farming until GRIP and NISA are in place.

Can the Prime Minister confirm that the Canadian grain farmer will in fact receive an emergency cash payment or some other form of bankable commitment from the federal government this spring before seeding, and will the Prime Minister tell us what the amounts of this emergency payment will be?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): As my colleague says, Mr. Speaker, the federal and provincial Ministers of Agriculture met in Regina on Friday and Saturday. Given the difficult agricultural situation they agreed on procedures to set up the two GRIP and NISA systems. Negotiations will continue over the next few days to finalize that part.

As to the rest, Mr. Speaker, before that long-term system can be set up to meet the needs of the farming community, the Minister of Agriculture said publicly that he would take temporary measures to help them. When the budget was tabled last week you saw that despite the difficult financial situation the government did manage to set aside an extra $1.3 billion for Canadian farmers. That is a commendable effort in these trying times and in the coming weeks we will decide how these funds are to be expended.

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question specifically was whether or not that $1.3 million in the budget would be used for the cash emergency payment or a bankable commitment to the farmers before spring work. That means now.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): As it has done over the past six years, Mr. Speaker, our government will come to the assistance of farm producers. But I would also remind my colleague that, as we did in recent years, we will see to it that the measures to be taken will have a long-term impact. As other members have pointed out, the days of carefree spending are over. Mr. Speaker, we have to be sure that program funding will solve the problem in the long term so that the neediest producers will get that money and stabilize their income for years to come. We will not be acting alone,

Mr. Speaker, for we will seek the co-operation of the provinces, as we did in the past.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Since 1989 when the government unveiled the $250 million five-year federal-provincial shared-cost program, nothing has been signed by Ottawa and Quebec City to clean up the so-called orphan sites at Joutel, Cadillac, Duparquet and others in Quebec. My question is this: Since you have been appointed we know you are prepared to sign that agreement in the interest of the people of Quebec, so is the Quebec government prepared to enter into a Canada-Quebec agreement concerning the so-called orphan contaminated sites?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): As a government, Mr. Speaker, we concluded the negotiations with Quebec at the end of last November. We have the draft of a bilateral agreement which has been approved by my provincial counterpart and which was submitted to the various committees of the Quebec cabinet for approval. We have every indication that Quebec is prepared to sign the agreement by the end of this month.

Therefore I am hopeful that the agreement will be in force within a few weeks.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

While the minister was out propagandizing and promoting her new immigration strategy program, the reality is that the English language training programs for new immigrants across Canada are being undermined and dismantled. In Manitoba, over 2,100 immigrants presently enrolled in the English language training program are now having those positions put in jeopardy by the change in federal funding and the lay-off of close to 68 teachers.

Rather than this kind of dismantling and restructuring, will the minister meet with her Manitoba colleague, the provincial minister, to restore the existing funding so that the 2,100 immigrants who are presently in language training programs will not have them jeopardized and have them ended at the end of this month.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the money we have put into language training has over time been increased. Actually, we are doing a lot more by way of settlement and teaching of language than was done by the former government, as the hon. member well knows. We will continue that commitment to make as much available as we can under the current economic conditions and by doing it in less expensive ways, moving through NGOs and other organizations which can deliver the service more effectively.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the minister well knows, if you do not have a job or if you do not presently speak the language, you do not qualify for those programs. There are thousands of new immigrants who are not eligible for the minister's new programs. They cannot learn the language, therefore, they cannot get a job. If they cannot get a job, they cannot get into the program. It is a total catch-22.

Considering how generous the minister has been in the funding of language programs in other provinces, will she not at least consider restoring the funding in the province of Manitoba so that the people who are presently getting training under those conditions can have their rights restored and can go on and become valuable members of our society?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this government does provide language training for people who are not destined for the labour force. I would remind him that we are the first government to have done so. In terms of where the dollars go across Canada, they are spent in the regions as they are required. This department and this minister have been stronger on language and settlement programs than, I think it is fair to say, any former government and, certainly, other Liberal ministers.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

While the new Terminal 3 at Pearson airport is operating, it is completely irresponsible and unacceptable for this government to continue to have a veil of secrecy surround the entire deal that this government signed with the private consortium.

I ask the minister, since every Canadian taxpayer has a full legitimate right to know every single detail about the agreement, to inform this House how much of a profit the private consortium is expected to make. What is the share of that proposed profit with the federal government? Will the Canadian taxpayer ever be expected to pick up any shortfall during the duration of this sweet agreement with the private consortium?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in February 1988, the media and all MPs, I believe, were provided with a press kit. I quote from that press kit: "There is going to be a $2 million payment to Transport Canada on signing the ground phase. A further $28 million was paid on the opening of the terminal. Transport Canada receives, on a sliding scale, 3 to 5 per cent of gross revenue for the first five years, plus $1 million minimum guarantee", and so on.

All that information was made available three years ago. I am surprised it has taken my friend this long to catch up with it.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the minister continues to stonewall. While he may be able to read a press release, he is having trouble listening to the questions that are being asked on this side of the House.

I return to the minister on a different matter concerning the same agreement. The minister has admitted that the government made a serious error in dealing away the rights of limousines and taxis to the private consortium in the agreement.

Can the minister confirm that the government has negotiated, or is currently negotiating, to buy back that particular clause; and if so, what is the expected price tag to the Canadian taxpayer for this monumental blunder made by this Minister of Transport?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I never at any time admitted that we made a blunder with respect to the taxis. When we got into taxi and limousine service, I made it very clear that I wanted every traveller passing through Pearson International Airport to get the same service at all three terminals. That is what we have decided to do, and we have renegotiated it so that that will occur. I am sure that all travellers going through Terminal 3 especially—the terminal that the Liberals do not like—will enjoy it very much.

SPICER COMMISSION

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull–Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to allegations made by Mr. Normand, editor at Le Soleil, regarding the Spicer Commission. They call for immediate action, especially after Mr. Spicer stated yesterday that the Canadian people could not care less about how the Spicer Commission is administered.

Mr. Speaker, how can the Prime Minister remain silent after such allegations were made by his friend, Mr. Normand, and after $25 million were squandered to pay the members of the commission $18,000 each per 30–day period when in fact they work only five or six days? Will the Prime Minister commit before this House to ask Mr. Spicer to resign, to adjourn the proceedings and to institute immediately an inquiry?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member just the same for his concern for this Commission and thus, I imagine, the future of this country.

Regarding the management of the Spicer Commission, Mr. Normand brought out some important finer points. I would caution the hon. member against making somewhat unfounded assertions. In any case, I will remind the House—I was taking for granted that everyone was aware—that commissions such as this one is subject to certain rules, generally Treasury Board regulations on hiring, contracts, rental. They work under what I would call soft supervision because they need to maintain some autonomy. I am sure the hon. member will be bitterly disappointed when he finds out, as the Auditor General will reveal, that everything was done properly after all.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull–Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, is the President of the Treasury Board telling this House that the Spicer Commission was given a blank cheque and that there is no concern about what is going on, at a time when an additional load is put on the Canadian people and a crippling blow is sent to the neediest as well as to smokers and when the UI premiums are going up? Is that your vision of national unity?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): That is not what I said at all. If that is what the hon. member heard, he heard wrong. Quite the contrary, I said that there are rules for managing Royal commission enquiries. We do not have a laisser-faire policy. There are rules, but they allow a measure of autonomy. That is not only necessary but desirable, as I think everyone will agree. As for the rest, the rules followed by the Spicer Commission in the adjudication of contracts across the country to respond to its needs are based on Treasury Board standards, as I am sure all this will be confirmed in due course. Tomorrow, when the Estimates (C) are presented, the last ones for the current year, that is 1990–1991, you will see what amounts are involved.

EQUALITY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

Five years ago today, his government responded to the unanimous report of the Special Committee on Equality Rights by promising to take whatever measures are necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination in all areas of federal jurisdiction. The government has failed for five years now to live up to that commitment, including a fresh commitment made by the Minister of Justice at this time last year.

Members of Parliament have received many letters on this matter, and I want to ask the Prime Minister: When the government will live up to that commitment?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member is aware that my predecessor, the then President of the Treasury Board, came forward with a very valid proposal which we consider to be fair, a proposal which was established in full consultation with Public Service unions. We feel that we stand on good ground.

This was appealed to a board. Therefore I cannot discuss its value. We will wait for the decision of this tribunal and, when it comes, we will see where we are at that time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GLEN KEALEY

Mr. Speaker: I have an application on a question of privilege from the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, of which he has very kindly given me written notice.

I point out to the hon. member who is a skilled advocate that he has indicated that this will be with respect to a certain Mr. Glen Kealey. I want to indicate to the hon. member that I want to know right at the start and very early in his submission just exactly where the question of privilege is.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I almost put it as a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, but I will put it as a question of privilege.

The question of privilege is that I have attempted to communicate as a member of Parliament with Mr. Kealey. He is now behind barriers—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Waddell: Well, he is in front of the House. Hon. members are laughing, Mr. Speaker. This is a man who has been here for two years alleging the government is corrupt, exercising his civil rights as an ordinary Canadian, and they are all laughing over there. They think it is very funny.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I indicated to the hon. member that I was going to have to be fairly definite with respect to this particular matter.

The hon. member knows that as a consequences of the hostilities there were barriers put up in order to maintain crowd control and security at the immediate doors of the buildings of Parliament.

As I understand it, and from what I have read in the paper, for whatever reason Mr. Kealey got into some difficulties with respect to those barriers.

However, there is nothing that has indicated that Mr. Kealey or anybody else cannot demonstrate on the other side of those barriers and within relatively close proximity to the buildings, but the hon. member has to persuade me—and I am afraid he is not going to be able to—that somehow whatever has happened to Mr. Kealey infringes his privileges or the privileges of other hon. members.

I think that the hon. member's complaint, whatever it may be, does fall short of privilege. The hon. member, of course, can pursue this at Question Period at another time if he wishes.

Mr. Waddell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No, I am not taking a point of order to extend the point of privilege. I think the hon. member has made his point. I have to indicate to him again that I do not see this as a question of privilege.

I think the hon. member may very well have a complaint, but there must be another way to bring it to the attention of the House.

The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Waddell: Of course I respect the Speaker's rulings completely, but I do feel that I never really had a chance to at least offer, perhaps in one or two sentences, what I thought was my point because of some loud heckling—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again. I understand perfectly well what the hon. member's point is. It is not a point of privilege. It may well be a complaint.

I do know what it is, and it was not because of any noise on the other side of the House. It is not a question of privilege. I am not hearing it further.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-98, an Act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the minister have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

VOLUNTEER FIREFIGHTERS

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to present again a petition. It is one on behalf of the volunteer firemen of Canada. As you may or may not know—and you probably do not if you live in an urban centre—rural areas depend very often on volunteer firemen.

They serve a very useful purpose. They are not paid a lot. In some cases they are not paid at all, but one way is to issue them with an income tax receipt. They get one for $400. That was raised back over 10 years ago from $300 to $400 and has not been raised since.

This petition is an appeal to the government to look at the allowance it has given for tax deduction purposes to volunteer firemen across Canada. They very often serve as the service club in the community and do a lot of useful work.

They are making another appeal to have the government look at that provision in the Income Tax Act, and I would recommend that the government do so.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): (a) Yes, expenditures under this five-year program will total approximately $5 million by the end of the program. For 1991–1992, the last year of the program, the budget is $500K.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p. 17722).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the debate was interrupted, the hon. member for Ottawa South had the floor. The hon. member has 17 minutes left, and he may now proceed.

• (1510)

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives alone are responsible for failing to control the public debt during seven years of unprecedented economic growth; for having on more than 30 occasions levied regressive taxes on taxpayers who were already strapped financially; for managing to create a made-in-Canada recession; for practically strangling employment opportunities in the manufacturing sector as a result of their policy of maintaining high interest rates and a high dollar; for introducing the GST, an expensive and very complex tax both for small business and for consumers.

[English]

Since 1984, the Conservatives have attempted to convince Canadians that only they could successfully manage the public purse. But, after almost seven years in office, during which Canada has shared with the rest of the western economies almost unprecedented economic growth and despite having resorted to over 30 different tax increases paid largely by middle and lower income Canadians, the Minister of Finance has failed in bringing the deficit under control. In fact he has managed to double the federal debt while at the economic controls.

The minister is always eager to talk about the bad old Liberals who supposedly started the problem. This is typical of a government that never seems able to take responsibility for anything. The deficit? Blame the Liberals. Interest rates? Those are the fault of those crazy consumers and their excessive credit demands. Inflation? That is caused by the Public Service wage increases. National unit? Blame that one on the Leader of the Opposition. Whatever the problem, it is someone else's fault.

When is this government going to grow up and start accepting responsibility for the problems that it has created? Surely, after seven years in office, the government now owns the deficit. The debt was below $200 billion when the Tories were elected in 1984. Soon it will exceed $400 billion. The only thing that this government has finally admitted is that Canada is now in a recession and that the recession was induced by government policy.

The Conservatives' home-made recession is no ordinary downturn in the economy. As a direct result of policies pursued by the government, job producing industries have been driven out of business and in many cases driven right out of the country, never to return. Many of the 288,000 jobs that were lost between April of 1990 and January of this year are lost for good. People in other countries are now employed in jobs that until recently provided a means of livelihood for Canadians.

To make matters worse, the imposition of the costly and administratively complex goods and services tax has taken more money directly out of people's wallets and made life more difficult for small businesses.

This budget should have offered Canadians some reason for optimism, hope and vision.

[Translation]

This Budget should have provided a sound basis for getting Canada out of its economic hornets nest and getting Canadians to work. Nowhere in the Budget is there any indication of how this government intends to help Canadians.

[English]

In the 1988 election campaign the Prime Minister claimed that to elect the Liberals would put Canada's economic growth in jeopardy. I quote:

> The damage of a Liberal win to economic activity in southern Ontario would be swift, dramatic and powerful.

He also said:

> Earlier in this decade Canadians suffered through the worst recession in post-war history. Do Canadians want to risk a return to that?

By electing a Conservative government Canadians got more than a risk of recession; they got the real thing.

But the most damning thing about this budget is the lack of hope for the million and a half jobless who, with their families, are the real victims of this recession.

Despite predictions of economic recovery in the second half of this year and strong growth in 1992, the jobless rate is not going to improve by the government's own predictions. There is nothing in the budget about job creation. There is only a cut of $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy, and there is the implicit acceptance of an unemployment rate of almost 10 per cent.

When he was in opposition, the Minister of Finance understood the importance of keeping people at work. For example, in 1982 he said:

> The government must begin to realize that it is individual people who are being hurt. It is not the political game that we are playing here in the House of Commons that is important; we must deal with the real > world. We cannot stay here in an ivory tower in Ottawa; we must deal with individual Canadians who are losing their jobs and businesses.

Further he said:

> —when people are struggling for survival, when people fear that they will lose their jobs or that their children cannot find that first job, there is not much trust and generosity. Rhetoric will not produce the harmony we all want, but a healthy economy will.

If only the Minister of Finance still believed those same principles. He has produced a budget of no jobs, a budget of no hope, and a budget of no vision.

The government in the past has talked a lot about creating the conditions for economic growth. Even in this budget, the indication is that all that needs to be done is to lower inflation and bring down the deficit and economic growth will follow. But these measures alone will not bring economic growth and prosperity.

Without a strong sense of national consensus and the force of national will, Canada's future prosperity is not ensured. The failure of the Mulroney government to promote national unity is closely linked to the severity of the problems confronting us on the economic front.

At a time when national consensus has never been more essential and possibly never harder to achieve, the government's cuts to transfer payments and Canada Assistance Plan payments will only further aggravate stresses on Canadian unity.

The Allaire report in Quebec includes an attack on the federal imposition of national standards, while simultaneously withdrawing federal financial support. Because such criticism is not unfounded, the erosion of national standards and the corresponding sense of nationhood may well result.

[Translation]

The Tories heavily penalized the provinces by reducing transfer payments, and they deceived Canadians. However, Canadians are well aware there is only one taxpayer: the Canadian taxpayer, who pays all taxes, whether they are federal, provincial or municipal.

[English]

Shifting the deficit from the federal level to the provincial level does nothing for the over-all economic well-being of the nation. If anything, it is the steady withdrawal of the national government from so many aspects of Canadian life that is causing Canadians in Quebec and other regions to begin to question whether Canada is really worth the struggle any more.

Then there is the attack on labour in general and the government's own employees in particular. The budget proposal to impose a freeze on Public Service wage budgets typifies the approach of this cynical government to try to pin the blame for inflation on a group of Canadians which the government thinks will garner little public sympathy across Canada; this after boasting that the federal government had been keeping Public Service wages below inflation in past years.

According to Labour Canada, federal government workers' wage settlements were 5.3 per cent in 1990 compared to 5.9 per cent in the private sector and 5.6 per cent in other public sectors. Where is the flexibility that the Minister of Finance himself demanded back in 1982 when he said that there should be different treatment for low income employees and those who merit some increased remuneration because of good work.

This attack on the Public Service will result, I predict, in a further deterioration of service to Canadians who rely on federal programs and services. The delivery of income supplements, the provision of air traffic control services, the processing of immigration and refugee claims and so and so on. Canadians can expect that these services will continue to deteriorate as the government induces the best of its employees to leave the Public Service and increases the work load on those that remain.

It has been said that in a democracy the people get the government they deserve. I do not believe that Canadians are getting what they deserve from this government. Canadians deserve from their government a financial plan that demonstrates a commitment to invest in our most important resource; our people. This entails not just support for post-secondary education but for continuing training and retraining for adult workers, ensuring that Canada's workforce is versatile enough to face the challenges of globalization.

This would address our growing people deficit. Instead of living up to his self-proclaimed title, "the education Prime Minister", this Prime Minister has reduced transfers to the provinces in support of post-secondary education four times since 1984.

A responsible government would have demonstrated a strategy to deal with the fact that at least 90,000 of 180,000 manufacturing jobs lost during this recession are permanently removed from the Canadian economy according to Laurent Thibault, president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Such a strategy would address our widening science and technology deficit.

A wise government would have shown Canadians that it understood the relationship between the quality of a nation's transportation and communication infrastructure and the share of the world's wealth it will possess. A caring government would have offered hope to its unemployed that they will get back to work. Instead the Conservative approach to a job strategy consists of a $100 million cut from the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

What does the Budget have to offer Canadians who lost their jobs because government policies forced their employers to move elsewhere? What does this Budget have to say about the government's role in ensuring that Canadians are competitive on world markets? What does this Budget and its predecessors have to say about the value this government sets on education, research, development, training and development? What message does this government have for entrepreneurs who have the knowhow to increase productivity but lack the capital?

[English]

Perhaps the most succinct and damaging critique of the budget of all is that contained in the budget analysis provided by the Toronto Dominion Bank. They say: "The main problem of this budget is that it addresses none of Canada's major economic problems".

Very simply in conclusion, this is a budget of no jobs, no hope, no vision, but more pain. Truly the emperor has no clothes.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened as usual with great interest to my colleague's speech.

In listening to the budget debate of members of the opposition from both parties—not only from the Liberals but from the New Democratic Party as well—I cannot help but hear a message loud and clear that the government should be spending money and spending more money and spending more money. Not once in any of the speeches do I hear that the government should live within its means.

The hon. member said there is no message in the budget. There is one very clear message in the budget; if we as a country are going to survive, if we as a country are going to continue to provide the programs that are so necessary and that the public wants, then somewhere along the line a government has to take cognizance of the expenditures and the income and the amount of money being borrowed.

Liberal members of Parliament talk a great game. They have picked programs one after another that should be supported with more money. The hon. member talks about cutting here and cutting there. This government has done that, has made it very clear that we are transferring one-third of the income of the federal government to the provinces, and we have a financial problem, they are part of that problem and they have to be part of the solution.

I want to ask the hon. member a very direct question, because he is one of the financial critics of the Liberal Party. We know what they are against. We understand fully that they want money thrown at this, that or the other thing. I have a couple of specific questions. The first is, are you concerned about the deficit of this country? Second, what would the Liberals—if they were ever elected—do about the deficit and how would they cut that deficit? I would like to hear some positive suggestions from the Liberals which, to this time in this debate, have not been forthcoming.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy these exchanges with the Minister of State for Privatization. I must say that I am pleased that there are ministers here for this debate today. It is regrettable that when the finance critic for the opposition spoke, he spoke to a Chamber devoid of ministers.

The question is an important one and I acknowledge that these are issues which need to be addressed by parties on all sides of the House. I take exception to the characterization, of course, that the minister has put both on my remarks and on the remarks of some of my colleagues because clearly, if he had been listening he would have understood my concern about the deficit and the debt.

He is well aware of what the deficit was in 1984 when he was elected and how the present Minister of Finance managed to run it up before the end of the first fiscal year in which he was in office so as to establish an extremely high base from which to then describe his later reductions. He is also aware that after seven years of growth in the Canadian economy, the annual deficit continues to be over $30 billion a year. He is aware that the Minister of Finance this weekend, in an interview with Southam News, acknowledged that he had made the wrong policy choice in 1987 when he introduced tax reductions, thereby contributing to the deficit, instead of being honest with the people of Canada and facing the deficit before the election. So he has managed to build it up into a bigger problem than it should be.

I would suggest to the minister, if he wants to seriously make some progress on this, two things. Before he looks too hard and long at what programs to cut, he needs to look at how he is building for the future. What kind of country are we going to have in the future and how are we going to meet the challenges of the future? Any good businessman knows that if he is going to meet the challenges to come sometimes he has to borrow to invest.

What this government does not make a distinction about is the difference between spending and investing. In cutting investing, they are really cutting its lifeline for the future. When it fails to meet the spending requirements for education, for infrastructure, for science and technology, it is really hurting our ability in the years to come to meet the requirements that Canada will have in order to compete in the global economy.

All of that being said, I wonder why it is that this government seems to have money to move operations of government without gaining any particular efficiency. In this budget it has decided to throw millions of dollars at moving the National Energy Board. Now, there may be good reasons for that on an operational level, but we do not know of any particular reason why at a time of recession it needs to throw that money in. We know they have almost $250 million to build a space agency in St. Hubert, when the same functions are being carried on quite well without that expenditure being made. They do not seem to be willing to cut back.

We know that they have ministers of state with limousines that sat outside here on budget night, burning gasoline. I suspect that the minister who posed the question was not included in the number of people who let his limousine sit out there idling, but others did. It is an outrage and it is a disgrace. Why not cut back the number of ministers of state? There is a suggestion for you. Why not look at the tax expenditure account and see what tax expenditures can either be reduced or, perhaps, postponed. Maybe that is too innovative an approach for the government.

Why does the government insist on a cumbersome and lengthy refugee review process to actually effect the elimination of very few false refugees from Canada? It spends close to $100 million a year in order to eliminate a couple of hundred people from Canada. Why is the government not looking at any of these suggestions?

Why is it that the level of corporate profits over the last number of years has remained at roughly the same percentage of gross domestic profit? In spite of that, why is it the contribution of corporate income tax to the government revenues has gone down? Why is it that the percentage of income in the upper income category, while remaining the same, has seen a lower burden of income tax, looked at as a percentage of GDP on one side and as government revenue on the other?

I cannot answer these questions for the government, perhaps they can.

Mr. McDermid: Well, the answer is to cut about $10 million of expenditures, as he is suggesting in his speech, for a $30 billion deficit. That was his suggestion. Also he suggests we increase the deficit because he said we should borrow more. I heard him say that. We should borrow more. We should invest in the future.

The Liberals tried that. They borrowed $16 billion in 1984 just for programs, not to service the debt or anything else, just for programs. This government now has a surplus in program spending. We collect more than we spend on programs. We have a huge deficit to service.

The hon. member talks about the deficit increasing. That is right. But all from interest payable on the huge debt that we inherited. I remember what it was when we took over. It was $200 billion. I remember it very clearly.

I want to understand the hon. member perfectly. He wants to borrow more at this particular time and increase the deficit. That is exactly what he said.

I want to ask him one other question. His leader, who I am pleased to learn is coming along well and is feeling much better and will be back with us soon, has been reported as saying he would cut the universality in social programs to save money. I wonder if that, in fact, is Liberal policy? Is it a suggestion from the Liberal Party that the new leader of the party made recently? It was reported that he is prepared to change the universality of those programs in order to cut the deficit?

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, first of all let me say that I do not think the minister is adding up my numbers very accurately, if he has only come to the number he referred to. I think I suggested to him that he could even save almost $100 million on the refugee program alone, if he were to redirect the intention of the government on that.

The point is, in listening to this government, if their financial methods were applied in private business, Robert Campeau would still be in business today, because his only problem was that he could not cover his debt charges. But these people have been in office for seven years. They have been in office longer than it took to defeat Adolf Hitler in World War II, and they are still coming out crying about the deficit after all the time they have had to confront it and fight it.

I think it is time for them to surrender and let somebody else take on the battle.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate because I want to very clearly state my position on Canada's economic future.

[Translation]

I am pleased to take part in this budget debate, Mr. Speaker, because this is a rather historic occasion. It is a time for elected officials to stand before their constituents, and the country, and declare where they stand on Canada's economic future.

[English]

I stand unequivocally behind the plan for economic recovery delivered in the House of Commons last week by my colleague the Minister of Finance. It is a blueprint for renewed prosperity and economic growth.

It recognizes that Canada must continue to sit at the table with other industrialized nations as an equal. Today, international capital travels along a fibre-optic cable seeking the best country in which to invest. The budget continues to lay the groundwork commenced in 1984 by the same Minister of Finance for making Canada an envied investment location in the international marketplace.

How exactly are these noble goals to be achieved? One, reducing the annual deficit and the national debt, two, eliminating our need to borrow on foreign markets, three, reducing inflation, and four, reducing interest rates are the keys to creating an economic environment where Canadians can prosper.

This budget, this plan for economic recovery, will do all of those things. It establishes targets for inflation. It will cast in the laws of the land limits to the government expenditure growth. It will create the Debt Serving and Reduction Fund, a tangible example to all Canadians that we are serious when we say that this deficit will be eliminated. If the government of Canada ignores the deficit, disregards the debt, and throws a bucketful of money at our problems in an effort to buy our way out of this recession, we will all be sorry.

Living beyond our means is a recipe for disaster. It will return us to an era called by a well-respected journalist "the nightmare years", the years between 1975 and 1984, when a profligate, fat and wasteful federal government spent its way into the mess Canadians currently endure. No longer can Canadians wilfully spend dollars they have not earned and expect our children and our grandchildren to pay it back.

Of crucial importance is the decision to place government finances on the road to a balanced budget. The operations of government will be restrained. The Canadian people must know that we are doing our share. We have the responsibility of leading Canada; we therefore must lead by example. In fact, a recent poll suggested that 70 per cent of Canadians recognize and support the need to reduce government spending and to reduce the deficit.

And now a bit about my own portfolio. I see that we have one veteran in the House today. My portfolio cares for a very special group of men and women: Canada's war veterans. One in three males over the age of 65 in Canada is a veteran. There are more than 38,000 female veterans. They constitute a sizeable and influential component of this country. Altogether, Canada still has almost 600,000 veterans of World Wars I and II and Korea. They have done their part for Canada, and we are now returning their favour. So, I say to all veterans today that your valuable programs are untouched by this budget. Our level of commitment to you is undiminished. Canada will continue to have the most generous and compassionate veterans' programs and benefits of any country in the world. Do not let the critics make you think otherwise.

In my portfolio, we have viewed the fiscal constraint as an opportunity, a management challenge. It provides an opportunity to improve our efficiency, to re-evaluate the way we do business, and to identify ways that we can enhance our service. In Veterans Affairs Canada we will without a doubt rise to any challenge that confronts us.

Some hon. members may have read a recent report published by the C. D. Howe Institute in Toronto that implied our department was costly and administratively inefficient. The media picked up the story and the word spread. It was a message of course in direct disagreement with the corporate culture at Veterans Affairs Canada. That report was wrong.

I cannot and will not allow such statements to circulate without challenging them, which I did. Unchallenged, these claims do a disservice to our hard working staff and are unfair to our valued clients. The President of the C. D. Howe Institute personally apologized to me and to the department. Recently in the Vancouver Sun the author admitted she was wrong.

For the record, administrative costs at the Department of Veterans Affairs are less than 10 per cent of the total cost. Ninety-one point seven per cent of our budget will be delivered in the form of economic support and health care directly to our veterans. We are surely one of the leanest operations in government.

The plan for economic recovery as laid out in the 1991 federal budget establishes the framework for government operations for years to come. It is the new reality and we are ready for it.

In addition to my portfolio responsibilities, I continue to have a strong and a passionate commitment to Atlantic Canada's regional development. For my home province of New Brunswick, the plan for economic recovery announced last week will be an important economic development tool, a stepping stone to renewed economic prosperity and growth.

I prefer to think that the Minister of Finance presented not a budget to Canadians, but a blueprint for the future.

[Translation]

I am committed to the belief that the best regional development tool is a lower deficit, a lower national debt, lower inflation and lower interest rates. A truly competitive national economy demands these things.

[English]

Lower deficit, lower interest, lower debt, lower inflation, lower interest rates, those are the items that we need for regional economic development in Canada. A truly competitive national economy creates opportunities, economic and otherwise, for all Canadians living in all regions in this country.

This new era of fiscal responsibility which we started in 1984 has an especially pronounced impact upon our relationship with the provinces. Because this debt is a national problem, it will demand national solutions. All levels of government must learn to live within their means and the tide of rising expectations of what governments at all levels are capable of doing must be tempered.

Governments must be imaginative and ingenious in how they use the resources that they do have. Just as the average Canadian must pay the bills, so must all levels of government.

The 1991 plan for economic recovery restrains the growth of transfers to the provinces. It limits this growth to an average of 3.7 per cent per year. Meanwhile federal government program spending will be limited to just 3 per cent annual growth. So you see, Mr. Speaker, we are not asking from the provinces any more than what we ask of ourselves.

In New Brunswick, my home province, this economic blueprint is most encouraging. There are no caps on transfers to my province from the Canada Assistance Plan. There are no caps on the equalization payments to the province of New Brunswick. The per capita cap in the Established Programs Financing payments to provinces was announced in last year's budget and will continue for a further three years.

Since transfer payments constitute 20 per cent of all federal program spending, it is reasonable that they too must reflect prudent constraint. Let me put this in perspective. Federal transfers to New Brunswick represent 39 per cent of that province's revenues. Transfers are expected to increase at a yearly rate of more than 4 per cent. The CAP and EPF, Established Programs Financing transfers will account for only .2 per cent, that is two-tenths of one per cent, of the provincial revenues in 1992-93 in my province of New Brunswick.

The impact upon the provinces is negligible. Any protests to the contrary are being deceitful. Any complaints that the province will be unable to afford quality health care and education is untrue. Worse, it is fearmongering. It is taking advantage of the frailties and the uncertainties of the poorest and least educated citizens.

I believe that the premier of New Brunswick is in full support of our plan for economic renewal. In a recent speech delivered in Toronto, Premier McKenna stated:

> —borrowing money on current account is a fool's game. The leader of today enjoys the popularity of dispensing bought favours. The leader of tomorrow must devote all of his or her energy and ambition to paying the bills.

Premier McKenna goes on to say:

> —the leaders of the 60s and 70s have placed a first mortgage on the future of Canada. The leaders of the 80s and 90s are placing a second mortgage on the same asset. There is no equity left. We must once and for all put an end to the suffocating debt-load we are placing on the backs of our children.

It is gratifying to see that a Liberal premier is not enamoured with the notion that government spending cures all ills. Premier McKenna is not the only Liberal premier who shares these views.

Governments at all levels must treat their financial dealings in exactly the same manner as the average Canadian citizen must do. Like any householder, we should only borrow for big ticket items like our homes or major appliances, but on a day-to-day basis we must pay as we go.

The major difficulty the Canadian government faces today is that we must pay 36 cents on every dollar that we take in just to pay the interest on money previous governments borrowed in the past. For the provinces that figure is 11 cents on the dollar. We are strangling ourselves with debt and if we continue bad financial management, governments at all levels, like ordinary citizens, will face bankruptcy.

Many Canadians fail to comprehend the serious situation we are in today because of bad spending practices in previous times. Well, Canada has a huge collective debt burden totalling almost $400 billion. As most people find difficulty in comprehending such enormous sums, let me clarify what this means in simpler terms.

It means that every man, woman and child in Canada owes as part of the federal debt about $15,000. If we add on the collective debts of all the provincial and the municipal governments, then each and every Canadian owes about $20,000 for past profligate spending by previous governments at all levels.

Truly, we have spent money we have not earned and this practice cannot continue. To do so threatens the economic and financial future of those we love so dearly, our families and, indeed, their families.

Ordinary Canadians have a difficult time comprehending what a billion dollars represents, let alone our cumulative debt of $400 billion. What we all do know is that it must be paid back just as ordinary Canadians have to pay back money they borrowed in the past.

Let me explain the enormity of the problem that 26 million Canadians face in paying off our $400 billion debt. If Canada had set aside each and every day $500,000 since the birth of Christ, we would still not have enough money to pay off our public debt.

This budget recognizes the horrendous debt problem Canada faces if it continues down the road to uncontrolled spending—an annual deficit reduction.

Opposition members and others suggest we should have more make-work projects and spend even more money we have not earned. They would have us spend our way out of the recession. Well, previous governments tried this and it simply did not work. It only compounds our deficit and debt problems by adding more debts which we will expect our children to pay.

I fully support the 1991 federal budget which will inevitably control inflation and subsequently bring what this country really needs—lower interest rates. The budget will set out clear, achievable inflation targets, reaching a low of 2 per cent by the mid-1990s. The budget will put government finances firmly on a course to a balanced budget. The budget will severely restrain the operations of our own government, as a model to be followed by provincial and municipal governments. The very best thing we can do as Canadians is to set this country on the road to economic and fiscal recovery. A strong and competitive economy means prosperity, and prosperity in Canada means wealth creation and new jobs for our people.

To fail to set Canada along this path to prosperity is to fail in our responsibilities. I have no intention of abrogating my responsibilities as a parliamentarian, and therefore I will be supporting this 1991 economic recovery plan.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I listened very intently to the hon. minister's reply to the speech on the budget. I listened as he talked about the need for us to pay our bills and to reduce the debt. I cannot say that I agree with him totally on everything he said; there are some concerns I do have in listening to him speak about one of the particular areas within the area he is responsible for.

I know and hope that the veterans of this country will not bear any burden as a result of the steps taken and those going to be taken by this budget.

I have had much correspondence in the last number of months from veterans' groups and veterans individually about Veterans Affairs Canada. One question they asked was, what is the future of it? I know the minister has spoken on the budget debate and I would like to put that question to him.

The future of the Department of Veterans Affairs has caused great concern in some areas. Rumours have been circulating, of course, for a number of years. This is nothing new.

I would like to pose the same question in a different manner than I did the other afternoon, and this is regarding the veterans of the just-concluded war in the Persian Gulf, as to their benefits. There was one area of concern to me and that is the availability of housing for these veterans. I know that veterans of other wars were able to qualify for housing. It was a great way for these people to obtain houses.

I wonder if the minister could reply as to whether the government is looking into this in any way, making these people who have served in the gulf able to qualify for these houses. I know the Veterans Land Act has been wound down in the last year, but I wonder if he could inform me and this House today, if there is a possibility that these people will be eligible and, therefore, would be able to say that, yes, these people are going to receive the same benefits as all other veterans of wars.

Mr. Merrithew: In response to the hon. member for Hillsborough, he asked two questions. I would like to address the first one; what does the future hold for Veterans Affairs Canada?

Naturally, it has been 45 years or better since the end of the second war and about 40 years or 35 years since the end of the Korean War. One might think that as our veterans pass on, and the hon. member knows that the average age is 70 years of age, that all of a sudden the work of the department would be decreasing. Quite the contrary is true.

As veterans get older the kinds of problems, the aches and pains and the hardships they endured during those times in fighting for our country have now come home to roost, if you will, and very often they are in more need, in fact they are in significantly more need, as they grow older. They need more health care. They need more home care.

Let me put that in perspective. During the month of January, and the hon. member for Hillsborough will appreciate this, my department and the Canadian Pension Commission in Charlottetown handled 2,200 cases of first decisions. That set a record in history for the number of first decisions made by the Canadian Pension Commission. I think it is an indication that while the numbers may be declining, and that is true, the problems and the health care problems that these veterans have are increasing.

Naturally, I cannot comment on the future of the department. The Prime Minister, the agency of government, the machinery of government will look at those kinds of things. Certainly I do not feel that my job, and I am sure my department does not feel that our job, is getting any easier. In fact, with the kind of new programs that we have brought in, particularly the Veterans Independence Program, and TAPS, and many of the other programs our jobs are getting even harder.

On the second point, I guess we can thank God that the war has finished in the gulf—we hope it has—and that Canadians can return home. We can take some comfort in the fact that Canada suffered no casualties in that conflict, despite the fact that we had 2,500 people there, some of whom were at the sharp point.

Let us first analyse the nature of the people who are serving. This is not like the Second World War where we had 1.1 million Canadians, basically civilians. It was a volunteer army who came out of the factories and out of the fields in Canada and formed the Canadian active service force. These people were going immediately at the cessation of war in 1945 right back into civilian life, unlike the service people who are fighting in the gulf today. They are professional servicemen and servicewomen. They will go directly back into the service and will, therefore, be assured of all the benefits and services that they get from Canada's armed forces which are very, very significant and indeed, much better than what was given to them in the Second World War and to veterans subsequently.

The hon. member asked particularly if we are going to provide the benefits. Yes, we are. We are going to provide significantly all of the benefits. The two big ones that count the most of, course, are disability pensions and treatment services for those people who might have had a disability incurred while serving in a special duty area like the gulf.

The housing aspect is quite different now than after the Second World War when previous governments wanted to do something very significant for those veterans who gave up such a big piece of their life to fight in World War II. There was a definite program to set up more veterans housing.

This time these people are coming back to their old service jobs. Of course, there will not be the need to set up special programs, but that does not mean that we do not have veterans housing. We have a lot of veterans' housing. I think in my home city of Saint John, New Brunswick, that we have the largest number of veterans' housing units in Canada. Those will continue. There are new ones being opened at various times. We just opened one in Winnipeg, one in British Columbia and, of course, there are a number of Legions and other non-profit groups that want to do things for our veterans. I think we are doing fairly well by that.

The need is not quite there like it was when our vets returned home from World War II.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important time in Parliament because it is one of those debates in which the people of Canada have an opportunity to be heard.

• (1600)

Perhaps one of the most important responsibilities of any member of Parliament is to use this budget debate as the occasion when he can express the hopes, fears, concerns, anxieties and attitudes of his own constituents. The one thing the budget does is crystallize those views and gives people a sense of what the blueprint for their lives will be for the future.

Over the last four or five days, in talking to people in my riding, this is a time when their voices have a certain common and disturbing ring to them. There is not confidence. There is not optimism. There is not a sense of hope. There is real despair.

The thing I find quite disappointing—in fact, it goes beyond disappointment; it becomes almost a question of amazement—is that a government brings in a budget and during the entire presentation and debate does not express the slightest iota of concern about the tens of thousands of people who have lost their jobs in the last four, five, six weeks. I do not know if somehow or other they live in constituencies where people are not losing jobs, but I do not hear any Conservative members talking about that problem.

The Minister of Finance, in his own paper, his own presentation, talks about a million and a half Canadians. And whenever he is questioned about that enormous figure, he says: "Well, it is not quite as bad as it was in 1981–82". But what he forgets to say is that the difference is that we are now dealing with a situation made specifically for Canada and not shared by other countries. Certainly, in 1981–82 we had a recession, but it was something that the entire world had to face. This is our own unique invention.

During the weekend in my constituency, people could not believe that with the recession now going apace, with every single statistical indicator showing a downturn, the only comfort is that the Minister of Finance says that it may get better a year from now, but there is nothing to offer any hope. Talk to the small business people, Mr. Speaker, as I am sure you have. What do they tell you? Consumer spending is down 30 per cent, 40 per cent, 50 per cent. There is no question that there has been an enormous drop in consumer confidence and reaction.

In my riding there are stores that have been stable, well running businesses for years. They now have to go to their banks for new lines of credit and they are not sure that they will make it to the end of the year. Again, the budget is silent on this issue. There is not much in the way of sympathy, response or any kind of compassion for the undermining of that backbone of our economy, particularly when you consider that it has been self–induced. We have taken our own arsenic. As the shopkeepers in my riding tell me very clearly, it is a culmination of the recession but also the GST. We know that GST is pushing the inflation rate up; we have already seen the numbers.

But what is happening is that they are also beginning to see a serious unwillingness of people to buy. The psychology of it has become a major deterrent to engaging in the normal marketplace transactions. People are just staying at home or they are going across the border. They are heading south across the border to get the deals and sales, and all the other kinds of opportunities. I forget what the figures are, but I think it is about a 40 per cent increase of purchases in the United States in the last year or so. Again, the budget was silent on that issue: no care or concern.

In the last weeks my mailbox has been filled with letters from senior citizens who all of a sudden are realizing that the combination of Bill C–69, which started the capping of our social security program, is now reaching a point where we are looking at a full scale federal pullout within a matter of five, six, seven years, depending on which province one is in. It is unacceptable for the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, each day in this House, to try to camouflage and put up a smoke screen about what the meaning of that is.

We can talk about the transfer of tax points to the provinces that took place under the original funding of the EPF, but there was never any intention under that program to eliminate federal participation. As a result, the ability to have any kind of national system of education and health care now stands in jeopardy.

The Minister of Finance said today that he was going to put $28 and some odd billion in the next five years. Add that up. Look at the figures. In 1997, no more transfers at all to Ontario and Quebec, and the rest of the provinces by the year 2000. That means any ability to continue with national standards will have to be brought about, as the minister says, by special legislation which I am sure will be challenged constitutionally and probably thrown out of the courts. They know that. They are fully aware of that.

An hon. member: I hope so.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I hope so. That is probably part of the game plan. That is part of the large devolutionist theory that we have been receiving from this government for so long.

We are not talking now about dollars and cents, we are talking about people, understanding that the very fundamental institutions on which they depended are now being dismantled.

Mr. Speaker, did you hear anywhere in the speech from the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Health and Welfare, acknowledging that this year there are over one million children living in poverty in Canada? And that we have one of the worst records of the western industrial world? I think that represents about 60 per cent of the cohort of children, compared to Norway or Sweden where it is about 5 per cent.

I just heard the Minister of Veterans Affairs say: "Hey, do not bother me with those kinds of spending programs". It is not a spending program we are talking about. We are talking about children. Close to 200,000 children go to food banks. We are talking about single parent families who are substantially dropping below the poverty line and cannot afford to maintain their rent or their housing any more.

The problem is that I do not think the Conservative government understands the basic and essential importance of a social contract in this country. We hear a lot about free enterprise and the market system from Conservative caucus members. But what they have never been quite able to understand is that the market system only works when there is an underlying base of social programs to give people some sense of security. There is a social contract in this country which we spent many years building up that underlies the operation and the entire economic system. If you begin to undermine the social contract, then you are going to undermine the market system along with it. They have never been able, in their ideology to understand that there is a clear, unmistakable integration and connection between maintaining a sense of security and stability amongst working people, seniors and young people. To allow them to participate in the market and to say: "I will take my chances and I will work around". Our whole attitude is, we turn it totally over to the private market system and then undermine the foundations upon which it is built.

That is part of the tragedy we face.

I would like to read from one of Canada's more insightful analysts, Michael Ignatieff, a brilliant writer who has looked at this question and the connection between them. He says that the whole basis, the establishment of an elaborate system of publicly supported social services, social integration and collective responsibility, becomes the hallmark of citizenship. He says that the whole idea of a social welfare state was intended to undergird formal legal rights with entitlements to social and economic security so that citizenship could become a real, as opposed to purely formal experience. Now we are seeing that basic social contract being ejected, being forgotten, in fact, deliberately being taken apart.

I suggest as a proposition, that any opportunity we have as a country to compete abroad, to deal with our problems, our interests on a national level, the kinds of stresses and strains we are facing, the lack of productivity, the increasing divergences between views from region to region, a large, contributing cause in the last six years has been the undermining of that social contract. That withering away of those rights of citizenship, the abandonment of the idea that individual citizens regardless of their money or their income or their place, could depend upon a certain basis of security.

If you take it away from them, of course they are going to react by drawing inwards, losing commitments, not being able to identify with the nation state called Canada. And it is hollow rhetoric for the Prime Minister to get up as he did a few weeks ago in his speech and say: "I am going to stand up for Canada". When, in fact, he and his government are clearly, deliberately, self–consciously taking apart the very fundamental ingredients that made this country work for many years.

Rather than building upon it, rather than recognizing that with free trade, with global competition and all the rest of it, you have to improve the social contract to give people a greater sense of security. In fact, we are taking it away.

Look what the budget does beyond that. We are now talking about further eliminations. The attack on the Public Service. I could see the cabinet sitting back and consulting with the great poll and saying oh, yes, public servants are not popular, let us go after them. Let us in effect eliminate collective bargaining in the Public Service. Let us dictate now what they will get and we will be the arbiters of what is fair or just and equal, to take away the whole notion of collective bargaining. And they say yes, people will see the screens and the angry faces and not pay attention. Again in my riding I have school teachers and nurses and social workers and air traffic controllers, public servants in Veterans Affairs. They are hard working, serious minded, contributing citizens of our country and they just had a right taken away, a fundamental right that is available to virtually everybody else. And it is done with impunity, indifference, no apology, not even saying we will try to find some way to make it fair. It just disappears. It is done with the kind of cynicism that they know. As one incumbent here says, almost to provoke a public strike if they can, as a basis of trying to improve popularity.

So once again we have a disappearance of one of those ingredients that made our society more civil, gave people a greater sense of commitment, a greater sense that they could be treated fairly.

Public servants are not the culprits in this country, they are not responsible for the problems we get into. And yet at the same time that they are pointing their fingers and saying there is only going to be a 3 per cent cap and if you are going to go up to the 3 per cent cap you have to fire people to do it, this government has the gall to spend $179 million on a refugee board populated entirely with appointments of the government, most of them former candidates or something else, at $80,000 a year and they call that fairness.

When we left government, we spent $5 million on the refugee board. Five million, not $200 million and the same problems are being addressed and they had a report from their own committee in which their own members of the Commons addressed a solution that would have made it much easier, but no they had to do it their own way and their own way now costs taxpayers $179 million. I do not see that being cut back. I do not see that being restricted. I do not see the minister of employment saying I made one helluva mistake, I am going to go back to the drawing boards because all I am doing is paying for a bunch of Tory friends to get $80,000 a year plus expenses and may be more. And yet the refugee rolls grow larger and larger, the problem gets worse and worse and taxpayers spend more and more. I do not see that being hauled out as a sign of waste or duplication or inconsistency.

Oh, no. That is fair game. No one talks about that. I have not heard a Conservative member of Parliament yet mention that travesty. Why? Maybe they are hoping that sometime in the future they will get the same kind of perk. Instead, we zero in on the public servants.

Let me also, if I might, talk for a moment about the deficit. Everybody sort of says that the reason we are doing all this is that we have to deal with the deficit. I agree. The deficit is a serious issue, as much a serious issue for Liberals as it is for Tories. But the question is how do you respond to it.

Is it written somewhere in natural law that the only way you deal with a deficit is to cut back on social programs? Is it written that the only way to sort of bring the government fiscal framework into line is to cap programs for children, or education, or health care, or whatever?

Mr. Milliken: It is in the blue book.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It may be in that little blue book that is carried around, but I will tell you. I do not hear anybody talking about the excesses of a capital gains system which gives vast amounts of money in write-offs to very, very wealthy Canadians. I do not hear them talking about the tax expenditures.

Even the Business Council on National Issues, perhaps the most devoted of Conservative friends in the country, has said openly: "Look, business gets hard to make grants and subsidies. We are giving away too much money. Cut it out".

I have seen nothing in this budget to do that, not one line of real change that is going on. But if we are talking about $6 billion or $7 billion of loopholes, of tax expenditures, surely a Minister of Finance who had some kind of imagination would have found that as an area in which to cut back, not the area of scarce social resources.

The fact of the matter is that when we look at the agenda index of countries we are in the lower percentile of industrial countries in our social spending, not in the upper percentile. But where we are sort of right up at the top is the kind of giveaways we offer. How many sort of big projects? I would say right now stop them, get rid of them, we do not need them any more. If we are looking for some answers let us look at things like real public investment in education, research, infrastructure in this country.

We do not need those kinds of major handouts any longer. I do not think they work any more. I fully expected, especially when many of the large corporate businesses are saying it is time to get rid of them, that they would have done so.

Finally, in budget terms, I want to spend just a moment talking about the fundamental issue that we have all been concerned about in this House, war and peace. Mr. Pearson once said that we prepare for war like bloated giants, and for peace like retarded pygmies. He must have had this budget in mind when he said it because we are quite prepared to substantially increase the cost of paying for a war, but when you get down to the question of whether we are prepared to pay for the damage of the war, the reconstruction in the Middle East, the environmental problems, what do we do? We cut back further on our ODA programs, make no offer of any new assistance. We know what the problems are. We know that there are billions of dollars of reconstruction. We know that the Third World countries have had to pay excessive costs. I spoke to one ambassador of an African country just last week, $800 million have been taken out of their budget simply by the increase in oil prices.

But what does Canada do with all its rhetoric about how we are going to be a new international player, how we are going to build the peace? They cut back their commitments.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, you do not have peace if you do not have social and economic justice. You do not get social and economic justice when the disparity between rich and poor grows wider and wider. You are only going to eliminate that disparity when the industrial countries start making some serious commitments in how they overcome the gaps.

But there is nothing in this budget to show it. In fact it contradicts everything the minister of external affairs or the Prime Minister have said about their hopes for the future. The Minister of Finance has the real message of what this hope is, cutbacks, restraint, limitation, no commitments.

We are prepared to lecture everybody else about what they should do but when it comes down to really helping in a very concrete real way there is nothing on the table.

Mr. Speaker, I say to you let us look at the budget and the message it has. I thank you for your time and indulgence and I say to you that it was a time that Canadians were looking for some creative, imaginative, sympathetic, responsiveness to both the problems internally and domestically and all they got was the same old Michael Wilson.

• (1620)

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I was listening with a great deal of interest to my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, talking about how the government might be able to do a better job in terms of its budgetary exercises. He mentioned a lot of what he called excesses in terms of government boards, commissions and so on.

I have a couple of questions. First of all though, I might comment that I do notice that the hon. member takes his pay cheque home every week and with it, all of the expenses and perks that are accorded to all members of Parliament. I do not hear him suggesting that his own salary be cut.

He also says, as I mentioned before, boards, commissions and other political appointees should somehow be cut back, but he does not tell us how much that would total and how that would directly affect the deficit problem we have. Would that actually reduce our deficit significantly? He does not tell us about that because I think that he knows that in fact it would not, that it is really a very insignificant amount in terms of the over–all problem that we are dealing with.

He also refers to grants to businesses and suggests that it is time that the government cuts back on grants to business. Well, if he had read the budget or listened to the budget speech he would understand and he would remember that there was a promise of a $75 million cut of grants to businesses and other interest groups this coming year and another $125 million to follow that.

I would suggest that the government appreciates the hon. member's kind advice, but it has already tackled that issue in the budget that we have just heard a week ago.

Finally, the hon. member mentions that we can somehow get social and economic justice or suggests that somehow this government is lacking in providing a road map to social and economic justice, but the hon. member does not tell us how we are going to arrive at that goal by expanding the deficit and refusing to tackle the debt.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the member for Winnipeg South was able to come in for the last 20 per cent of my speech. Too bad she missed the first 80 per cent because many of those questions were already answered.

The first question was about members' salaries and perks. The last I heard the member was a member of the governing party. If that caucus had wanted to do it, they could have told the Minister of Finance and brought it in. We are not the government. So perhaps the member should answer the question herself because she is a member of the party that makes those decisions. If she wants to do that, then I give her full rein and licence to convince her colleagues to do it, and the Minister of Finance has the full opportunity to do it.

I do not write the budget. The hon. member for Winnipeg South helps write the budget and if she wants to make those voluntary, that is okay with me. But I will say to her, if she wants to go ahead and make voluntary reductions herself, I think we would be glad to hear it, if that is what she is prepared to do.

The fundamental issue is this, it is how you go about doing it. She said that we would like to make the right cuts. The point I was making is that the only language we hear from the Conservatives is cut payments to single parents, to children, to the health care system, to education. That is the problem. I gave her an example, $179 million for the refugee board. Well, there is a $100 million cut for job training, for the Jobs Strategy Program.

I will make a proposition. She and I will go together to the Minister of Finance and say, "Look, if you want to get rid of total waste, then cut your friends off all those boards, come up with a refugee program that works, take the $100 million and put it back into job training so we can put people back to work in this country, so that we can start training people who are being thrown out on the street, so we can provide them with some real understanding of what is real public investment."

The public investment in this country is not in a bunch of people who are making $80,000 on the refugee board, the real public investment would be to put people into training programs and to give them the skills they need rather than cutting $100 million of the program.

If the hon. member for Winnipeg South wants to do that, then let her stand up on her feet and say she is prepared to support the elimination of that board and its proper restructuring and to put the money where it really belongs, on people, to help them get back to work and get the training they need. Those are the kinds of real decisions.

I will compliment the Minister of Finance totally on this. Thank God he had the sanity to stop the insanity of the Minister of Communications who was out doing institutes on cultural relations in Montreal and other places. At least someone got to him and put some sense of sanity back into his head.

But those are the kinds of extravagances, those are the kinds of excesses we are talking about and they are a legion under the Minister of Communications. We have not even begun to count up how many little pet projects he has been able to author. There is nothing wrong with the project itself if it creates something of value. If the government is really interested in helping the cultural community, recognizes its economic and social value, and puts money into it where it really works, then the artists will develop and expand their product and get their work performed. It is an important part of our society, but it is not the Taj Mahal that he wants to build. That is the problem, and those are the kinds of things that we are trying to raise.

There is a wonderful book by Sinclair Lewis called Elmer Gantry. It talks about a fundamentalist evangelical preacher who is always out—it reminds me very much of members on the other side— preaching about what is needed for salvation. Finally, someone came along and said: "That preacher is so busy telling us what is right, he forgets what is really good."

This is a government that is always preaching what is right and forgets what is really good.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member this question.

I was very intrigued to hear him speaking of excesses, extravagances and pet projects. We all know that when this member was a minister he was in that business himself in a particularly outstanding manner as it affected the community of Winnipeg.

Clearly members from Winnipeg would not want to raise this, but those of us in the rest of the west certainly were quite aware of the fact that when this member was minister he was quite deeply involved in extravagances and excesses in the city of Winnipeg. They were not particularly strong on being economically viable and they were not particularly strong on contributing to economic development. Nonetheless, I am delighted to see that the member has come around. I would just like to ask him one short question.

How many billions would you like to add to the deficit this year?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the observation of the member for Macleod just shows how this is a government that is unable to tell the difference between exaggeration and excess, like we have with the refugee board or a proper public investment as we made in Winnipeg, such as the Air Canada Computer Centre.

It provides a major technological advance for that city and provides employment for several hundred people as well as one of the most modern reservation systems in the country.

Is the member for Macleod saying that a major computer centre for an airline is an exaggeration? Is he saying that the investment in a major national research centre on industrial technology is an excess even though all westerners get to use it? It is the only way that small business in western Canada is able to undertake major improvements and innovations on industrial design.

Of course, the Tories would not think of that. No, they are much more interested in getting those old former Tory candidates on the Refugee Advisory Board. Now there is a sound investment. There is really good economics for you. Get your friends hired. That is how you really improve the economy of the country.

I want to come to the so-called simple question. The point I am making is that this government made no mention anywhere in its budget about the value of taking a look at a large number of those tax expenditures, the lack in the tax system that, for example, watches an orgy of takeovers, amalgamations and mergers because it does not tax that kind of foolish use of capital which totally undermines our economy.

It creates a paper economy which allows billions of dollars of capital to escape in this country to help buy companies in the United States or in other places and which adds no wealth to the country itself. That is the kind of real, I would hope, insight and real serious analysis that this government might some day try to make.

Frankly they will never get a chance because they will not be around that long.

The Budget

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On debate, the hon. member for Jonquière.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the Budget Speech in this House on February 26, I suspected it might not contain very good news for the Canadian people. I think that is understandable, since, with interest rates around 10 percent, a debt or savings will double within a seven year period. That is what happened to us in Canada between 1984 and 1991. While the accumulated deficit we inherited when we came to power in 1984 was roughly $200 billion, it has now reached nearly $400 billion. This means enormous amounts must be expended from our Budget to service this debt.

For the current year, 1991-1992, the debt charges will total approximately $43 billion, which translates into $118 million a day for the taxpayers.

In this context, it is clear that any responsible Finance Minister from whatever government has no choice but to do his or her best to cut expenditures and try to avoid raising inflation. To improve our economic situation and get out of the recession, it is very tempting to increase expenditures. That would make a good impression. Theoretically, we could think that by increasing quickly our expenditures, we will increase employment and put the bad times behind us.

Allow me, to illustrate this point, to quote statistics from previous governments. Interest rates in 1981 stood at 22.75 per cent. As we speak today they are down to something like 10 per cent. Inflation in 1981 peaked at 12.7 per cent compared to roughly 5 per cent now. The unemployment rate in 1983, shortly before we took office, was 14 per cent, today it has gone down to about 10.5 to 10.9 per cent.

Of course we are aware of the current recession. We know that bankruptcies are on the rise throughout Canada—over 54,000 in the last year—and we can see that some people are having a hard time getting through.

So what options did we have in such a situation? I believe the Minister of Finance is steering the proper course under these circumstances. Among other things it is clear that the decision to freeze our expenditures or freeze the growth of our expenses at about 3 per cent until 1995 is an excellent option which should enable us to get a handle on inflation.

Mr. Speaker, you know that last year we chose to levy the goods and services tax and, from a political standpoint, that is not a paying proposition. There is no political return in implementing a 7 per cent tax on goods and services. Not one single Canadian is glad about or appreciates such decisions. But they were made by a responsible government that must take action not to become more popular or gather more votes but to administer a country which is experiencing trying times. We have to manage the country in such a way as to be able to pull ourselves out of the duldrums and control the debt.

Mr. Speaker, if we can control inflation and keep it down, by the same token we will lower interest rates and pave the way for future economic growth.

I would like to draw the attention of Canadians to some of the points in the Budget that I found particularly interesting. Perhaps I should explain, Mr. Speaker, that it would be very convenient for the government to decide that it could use the additional income from the Goods and Services Tax to add new programs and take measures that are politically attractive. However, that is not what the government has done. It has decided to take the revenue from the GST and use it to reduce the deficit.

Another important point, and this is another innovation on the part of the government, is the decision to legislate spending limits. In other words, Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to set up a new program, it will have to respond to needs that did not exist before, and any programs that no longer respond to those new needs must first be removed, so that is another way in which this government has innovated and shown that it is serious about this Budget.

Of course, although I am a member of the Conservative Party, I am perfectly able to come out and say that I don't agree with everything in this Budget. It happens occasionally that members see things they do not particularly like, and for instance, as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, and right in the middle of a recession, I would have preferred to see an increase in the budget for the Canadian Job Strategy. However, the Minister of Finance decided otherwise, and the budget will be cut by $100 million.

On the face of it, this does not make sense, but we must see this as part of the general picture, as part of the unemployment insurance reform.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that this Budget provides for nearly $500 million to be used for training workers this year. That amount will be added to the job strategy. The strategy's overall budget has varied between $1.5 and 1.6 billion annually since 1984. So now we have $500 million as a result of unemployment reform that will be added to the amount I just mentioned.

On the whole, Canadians will get more out of this Budget, even if, as far as the job strategy is concerned, there will be $100 million less. This week, during the Quebec caucus, I asked the responsible minister a number of questions to ensure that the regions will not be penalized as far as the strategy is concerned. On this basis, we have been assured by the Minister of Employment and Immigration that the various regions would not be affected. We will be in a position to provide more detailed information on this over the next few days.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I refer again to the $159 billion in expenditures, including $43 billion in debt servicing and $115 billion in programs spending. In view of such major budget, we have made a decision concerning the equalization payments to the provinces as well as the Established Programs Financing.

The provinces are always seeking a bigger share of the Federal government's tax revenues. However, we have to let the provinces know that they will have to administer their finances more wisely because we are compelled to make cuts. We just cannot impose such impopular taxes as the GST and then give away the revenues to the provinces.

While dealing with equalization and transfer payments, I wish to remind the House that we are facing a Constitutional crisis and that, as such, they should be part of the forthcoming discussions with the provinces. I myself am a member of the joint committee currently visiting various parts of Canada to try and find solutions to the current Constitutional deadlock and I should like to emphasize that Constitutional problems are not likely to help putting the economy again on the right track.

We must live with that. We must try and find a way out of the deadlock. Together with my colleagues, I must find a way to remove the current Constitutional amending formula which requires unanimity. It is important, Mr. Speaker, for if we should fail, Canada would not survive. We must find a way to get rid of this straighjacket which requires unanimity, so that Quebec may get some of the basic powers it needs, such as the protection of its language and culture, the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court, etc.

Of course, I refer to that in connection with the budget because indirectly these Constitutional problems have an impact of the budget of our country and they affect our economy. We want Canadians to realize that what is forthcoming is serious. If we can get rid of that unanimity provision I sincerely believe that Quebec will be able to sit again at the table and score some very crucial points concerning the protection of its language and culture, because unanimity will no longer be necessary. The new formula may require the support of seven provinces with at least 50 per cent of the population—this will have to be determined—but this is one of the assignments we are currently working on with my colleagues and the two co-chairmen, Senator Beaudoin and Mr. Edwards.

Mr. Speaker, I will not deal any further with this budget. We must keep in mind the two important measures concerning the GST. The money is there and the revenues will be used for debt reduction purposes. We also promise to pass legislation to limit the growth of our expenses, so that subsequent governments will pay as much attention as we do to efficient management of public funds.

I wish to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to participate in this debate. In conclusion, I would like to quote a couple of paragraphs from an article written by Mr. Frédéric Wagnière, and published in La Presse. It says: "An Honest and Far-Seeing Budget. Michael Wilson tabled yesterday an honest budget which should answer many concerns expressed by Canadians. The Minister of Finance showed that the government understands how serious the economic and financial situation is in Canada and has decided to respond. The policies he is suggesting may seem simple, but that is not to say they will not be tough. You cannot hope to come out of a recession and reduce an enormous budget deficit without asking everyone to do his or her share. This Budget is simple insofar as it deals directly with problems and does not put our economic future in jeopardy."

I think this is an appropriate description of the responsible steps we have taken and will continue to take in order to control inflation and reach our goal of 2 percent by 1995. We also want interest rates to keep or going down as they have been doing since last May; they have dropped by 4 points. That is the direction we want to follow to allow our businesses to invest and our country to grow. We want to see the employment rate increase in every region in Canada and our people to do well.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member from the government side, the member for Jonquiere, for his speech on the budget. I would like to pose a few questions to him.

He indicated that the interest rate in the 1980s rose to 22 per cent and today is at 10 per cent. Yet early this afternoon the finance minister indicated that the debt was not as substantial in the 1980s as it is today. We also heard that there has been a period of good economic growth since the election of 1984.

My question is: Who made the substantial debt today? It is obvious it is this government.

Then he spoke about not having any choice today. Well, he had a choice. The government had a choice in 1988, and that was to avoid the pre-election free spending that happened only to buy the votes of Canadians.

The member indicated that the income from the GST would help reduce the deficit. We have opposed the GST, but should revenue emanate from that and reduce the deficit it will, of course, be welcome. However, I would like to say he has forgotten the deficit of people, the basic needs for housing, shelter and education among the poor. Why will he not be prepared to consider reducing the deficit of people as well?

Does the hon. member not make a distinction between deficit and investment? Deficit is when nothing comes out of it; expenditure on something that nothing good comes out of it, of course, is a deficit. But when you spend money for the future of our children, would he also call it a deficit? I would say it is an investment, to make them more competitive in the future.

He spoke about national unity. Would he agree that the strengthening and not the weakening of our social programs will be the national glue that will truly maintain the country? Also, would he agree that this budget will melt that glue?

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his comments.

My answer to that, Mr. Speaker—and I want to repeat this because he may have been out of the House for that part of my remarks—is that if you have savings in the bank earning interest at about 10 per cent your money will double in seven years. The same thing happens if you are indebted: in seven years at an annual interest rate of about 10 per cent you will owe twice as much.

That is precisely what happened in Canada since 1984 when we took over and were confronted with a debt or a deficit amounting to $200 billion. Now it stands at $400 billion. These are the $400 billion which are costing you close to $43 billion in interest this year or, to put it another way, every day you are taking $118 million out of the pockets of Canadian taxpayers for interests alone.

I would point out to my colleague that when we took office in 1984 the government was spending $1.33 for every tax dollar collected. That is like spending more than you earn. At the time the government was giving Canadians $1.33 worth of services for every dollar it was taking in.

With that in mind you can understand that one simply cannot erase the debt overnight. That is not possible. There is no way we can rise tomorrow morning and say that the $30.5 billion deficit we had the night before—as we will have for 1991-92—has been reduced to zero. What a crisis we would have on our hands! We have to act more responsibly and more reasonably just so that gradually we can manage to bring our program expenditures in line with our revenues and eventually regain control and reduce the $400-odd billion debt we are carrying now.

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, since nobody wants to seize the opportunity, I cannot let it pass.

In his reply, the hon. member said that perhaps I was not here. I never left my seat. I was listening intently and, of course, I was disappointed in his analysis. That was the problem and he has to admit that.

With respect to the question of spending of the capital and the interest, the fact remains that we have had good economic growth over the last six years and this government has not been able to decrease the deficit. Now it says "You cannot eliminate it overnight." Well, it has had six years. It is not overnight. I think he is trying to defend a defenceless position. I think he has to admit that the government has lost credibility and does not have the capability to hold on the deficit and it must resign so that we can have a new mandate and lead Canadians to greater prosperity.

• (1650)

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I think I should once again clarify my colleague's statements on the meaning of the debt charges, which amount to $43.5 billion this year. That is the combined dollar amount of the Old Age Security, Unemployment Insurance and Family Allowance Programs, which is roughly equivalent to that of our debt charges.

Also, I must point out to my colleague the change of direction that we have taken between 1984 and today. In 1984, under the Liberal government, revenues were $71 billion and program expenditures, $87 billion. It means that the government was spending $16 billion more than it collected in revenues. In 1989-1990—all right, I will go back one year—our revenues were $113 billion and our program expenditures were $103 billion, which represents a positive change of more than $13 billion, to show you the difference between the two ways of managing the country.

But once again, the debt is not being paid overnight. I mentioned to you program expenditures and revenues. But you have to add the debt interest that we have to pay every year. Where are we going to get that money? That is why our debt or our annual deficit is still there and is very difficult to bring down. We will gradually reduce our spending by 1995. Our program expenditures will not rise by an average rate of more than 3 per cent by 1995. To indicate clearly that we intend to hold our course, we want our revenues to grow as much as possible and our spending to go down to finally be able to start paying the debt.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to welcome all of those who are watching here this afternoon to what I will call "Parliamentary Pursuit". If you think you have the answer, I want you to bang the table as hard as you can, and the first one gets to answer the question.

Are we all set? Are all the Tories ready? Are all my colleagues behind me ready? Are all those Liberals over there ready?

Here is the question: Who was selected by Euromoney magazine as "The World's Worst Finance Minister"? I will give you three choices: (a) Michael Wilson of Canada; (b) Otto Stich of Switzerland; or (c) Li Peng of China?

Ms. Mitchell: Michael Wilson.

Mr. Rodriguez: I hear the name Michael Wilson. I want to tell you that if you had picked all three, you would have been correct. These are the three worst finance ministers in the world.

Poor old Li Peng has been retired for recycling, so he does not have his job any more. But Otto Stich, who led Switzerland into stagflation, is still holding on to his spot. And we still have Michael Wilson as finance minister.

What was it that qualified him for this award as the worst finance minister in the world? Look at the accomplishments. In two years, this finance minister has made projections. He made projections on the deficit, and he was wrong. He made projections on the inflation rate, and he was wrong. He made projections on the unemployment rate, and he was wrong. He made projections on the interest rates, and he was wrong. He was wrong, wrong, wrong, wrong. This is the wrong minister in the wrong government at the wrong time in the wrong country.

Look at the accomplishments. Can you believe this? This is a real accomplishment. Here we are in the middle of a recession. It was started as a made-in-Canada recession. We have a recession and we also have high inflation. So, we have an inflationary recession. This is quite an accomplishment.

The other day I saw a very interesting movie, Edward Scissorhands. After seeing that movie and reading the budget, I came to the conclusion that what we have here is Michael Scissorhands. Now, for those who have not seen this move, Michael Scissorhands is a character whose hands were all scissors. At first, Michael was loved by the community because he could cut the hedges in interesting ways, he could cut your hair in interesting ways and everybody loved him. But, there was an unfortunate thing. Even in this beauty of cutting and cutting and cutting, he inflicted some scars on himself. He cut himself.

Then something happened to Michael Scissorhands, he fell in love. Is that not marvellous. Nothing that we can attribute to our own finance minister, but Edward Scissorhands fell in love. Unfortunately he was used. The story goes on that he was used by the boyfriend of the girl he fell in love with. Then poor Michael Scissorhands, unfortunately, had to return to his castle in the sky. Have I got the story more or less right?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Rodriguez: So it was cut, cut, cut and, eventually, he went up to his fictional palace in the sky.

I look at our own finance minister and I ask: "How is Michael Scissorhands like that?" I mean, look at what he has done. He started out cutting, cutting, cutting and cutting. I would suggest that his cuts are really putting slashes on the body corporate of our country.

Tories are groaning, Mr. Speaker, but it is fact. Now, let's go through the budget. Let us take a look at what the Conservatives, under the present regime, are projecting as economic nirvana. Notice that all of these projections are going to happen after 1993. We know what is going to happen. That is an E-year, and all of these things will be in Tory heaven. If this is an example of Tory hell, can you imagine what Tory heaven is like? All of this economic nirvana will come after 1993.

Tory heaven is a place where there will be have an average of 2.2 per cent inflation, not 3 per cent and not 4 per cent, but 2.2 per cent. Tory heaven is going to be a competitive place. Tory heaven is going to be a place where people will have to become predators to survive. It will be a place where unemployment will be 10 per cent or more on average. It is a place where the federal government is going to transfer the responsibility for the erosion of social programs to the provinces. It is a place where the wages earned in this country are going to be wages of fear and insecurity. It is a place where in their struggle to keep their share of shrinking government funds, provinces are going to be pitted against provinces, workers are going to be pitted against workers. It is a place where the government's main function will be efficiency and not public service.

Michael Scissorhands, the Minister of Finance for Canada's corporate welfare state, is promising that nirvana to Canadians. It will all, he says, happen in 1993, after the election.

Under the Liberals, we saw them turn Canada, our country, into a corporate servant. These Tories are turning Canada into a corporate slave. We have seen all the tools of public policy gradually captured by Bay Street and the BCNI. Why is it that in all of this budget it is working people, it is the working poor, it is the working middle-class who are making all the contributions to the attack on the deficit? Why is Michael Scissorhands being used by his friends? That is the similarity with the Edward Scissorhands movie. He is being used by the corporate sector.

• (1700)

Look at the projections for corporate profits in 1993. Look at the corporate profits and where they are going. This minister, Michael Scissorhands, did not lay scissors on the corporate sector; not one pair of scissors was laid on the corporate sector, not one.

I think the people in my riding and the people across the country asked the question: "I do not mind making a contribution to bringing the deficit down, but why do I have to make a total sacrifice? Where is the contribution from the corporate sector which gets so much out of this economy? Why aren't they making a contribution?"

These are the new functions of Michael Scissorhands' corporate welfare state. The government's sole role shall be to enforce the laws of the marketplace as interpreted by the BCNI. They are to use the power of the budget and interest rates to implement the corporate agenda.

I think that we have been misled. This is a shell game. When we have been thinking all along that the government really was out to fight the deficit and the debt and that everybody was focused on that, I think the real agenda was to put in place what I call the corporate agenda; in fact to put in place certain processes, certain laws to remove the government from any interference in the marketplace, so that in fact this market can deal with all the problems of Canada.

While we are focusing on fighting the government on the debt and the deficit, very quietly it is putting in place the other part of the more important agenda. It is putting in place, for example, deregulation. It is putting in place privatization. It entered into a free trade agreement.

Anything that enters us into and locks us into a continental agreement, whether it is energy, whether it is trade, the fact of the matter is whatever government takes office would find it very, very difficult to extricate itself.

These stories can go to their reward knowing full well that nobody—no socialist government, no Liberal government, no whatever other government after—can interfere with the agenda that it has achieved for its friends.

What are the new functions of the corporate welfare state? Cut budget expenditures and subject the people of Canada to artificial scarcity. Michael Scissorhands sends a clear signal to financial markets that the value of their future earnings is safe.

Look at what else they tell us. We have to be competitive. In other words, we have to dampen the demand of workers for a fair share of the wealth that they produce, so workers should take a buck an hour because we have to compete with Taiwan or we have to compete with Mexico or any other country that does not offer their workers the same benefits for their labour that we offer in this country and for which many of them fought over many years to establish or to win.

I have never seen a sumo wrestler corporation having been built up by this government. I have never seen any of them out of the goodness of their heart—I have got to correct that. That is not true. The Blue Jays just gave Dave Stieb a nice big increase and he did not ask for it. Of course, there is no collective bargaining there. There is only arbitration. I have never seen it.

I ask the member from Westmount, if he has ever experience a corporation that came along and said to the workers: "Oh, you have done a great job. You have help us to become large, healthy, wealthy and wise. We are now going to give you a 10 per cent increase because you have done so". Never, Mr. Speaker. That is not the pattern.

What this government is doing is establishing certain criteria for the corporate welfare state, that is to cut wages and Canadian purchasing power.

The next thing they want to do as part of that agenda is to cut the Public Service force and replace them with Revenue Canada arm-twisters, so they can get more taxes out of them, collect more GST, and so we move away from public servants who actually serve people to ones who are going to take money out of their pockets. That is what we see. Look at the work force to collect the GST. That is expanding, that is expanding.

It seems to me that this government is changing the nature of government so that people will have a good reason to hate it. All that we have seen Michael Scissorhands do is cut, cut, cut.

Now the Tories say: "Brothers repent, salvation is at hand". What is salvation to attain Tory heaven? What is salvation to attain this Tory heaven? I hear somebody say: "What is it?" I will tell you since you asked. It says salvation will come through international trade, international trade. We have to be globally competitive. Have you not heard that? Salvation is there.

What do we have to do? The middle class and working poor in this country must go on a diet so that in fact we cut the social programs and we raise the taxes. What we have to do is we have to build those of our corporations that can compete internationally. In other words, we have to develop sumo wrestlers. No Hulk Hogans for this government; salvation rests with developing sumo wrestlers, because it is these sumo wrestlers who will provide us entry into the Tory nirvana.

But these sumo wrestlers are never satisfied. They always want more and more and more. They are always saying to their lackeys in government, the Tories, run up, run up. Doc, I have the spot here for you, right here.

What have they done? They have turned over government. They have built up the power of these international corporations that have got to go out and compete for us.

So I ask: What is inflationary and what is not? If workers get an increase beyond 3 per cent, that is inflationary. That is inflationary. Here are some figures. Why are these not inflationary? Why are these not inflationary? What about the chairman of Imperial Oil? He is treated to $1.2 million a year. That is his salary. Is that not inflationary?

Mrs. Dobbie: That is the private sector.

Mr. Rodriguez: The chairman of Magna, $1.2 million; the president of Corona, $1.7 million; the chairman of BCE, $1.2 million; the chairman of Varity, $1 million plus.

The member says: "That is the private sector". Those are the sumo wrestlers. A lot of those companies I have named have not paid one penny of income tax. They have not made one contribution, not one contribution, to help reduce the deficit of the country.

Mr. Crawford: They have.

Mr. Rodriguez: What contribution are they making? Yes, brother, they have made. Yes, they have made. I know how they have made.

Statistics Canada produced the figures, which I read recently, that showed in the recent recession who benefited from the recession. It was not the middle class. It was not the working poor. It was all those in the upper wealthy classes of this country.

Why? Because they had the money to invest to take advantage of the high interest rate. They are the ones who could afford the Treasury bills. They could afford all those kinds of certificates that returned nice interest rates.

And this Minister Scissorhands did not even put a surtax on the wealth they achieved; not even a surtax to try to get back some of the money, to let them make a little contribution, a little contribution, to reducing the deficit.

Mrs. Dobbie: There are surtaxes.

Mr. Rodriguez: There are surtaxes but given the very wealthy in this country you have to make choices. Why go back to poor people to hit them again? You are dead when you increase the unemployment insurance premiums by 25 per cent. Why not go to the people who have got money? Why is it that this Scissorhands always goes to the people who do not have money? Why go them them? Why do you go to people who do not have money? It seems to me you should go to people who have money. You know you go to the Desmarais and the people like that. You get them to pay some share of the deficit. After all the corporations have gained so much from our country.

• (1710)

Or, what is inflationary? What is not? The returns for these large sumo wrestlers, chief executive officers, or the single mother, part-time workers, cashing their $250 paycheque and struggling to make both ends meet?

Well, Mr. Speaker, I see you have given me the finger. I only accept the finger from you. You are the only person I will accept the finger from.

But I ask: What is inflationary, what is not? An over-priced Canadian dollar which boosts the price of our exports and destroys employment and resource industries? Who pushed the interest rates up? It is not the Governor of the Bank of Canada. It is not the government.

An hon. member: Who?

Mr. Rodriguez: It is Michael Scissorhands, the boss.

Mr. Speaker, I see you have given me the finger. I want to tell you that if Michael Scissorhands can make forecasts, I am looking into the crystal ball. I am looking into the crystal ball and I see a number. I see a number. It is one—one. And I see another number: it is nine. And another number: it is nine. And another number: it is three. It is 1993. Thank God salvation will come and we will remove Michael Scissorhands and send him back to his palace. God help us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of Eurofinance magazine. I think that is what the hon. member mentioned.

An hon. member: It is Eurofinance.

Mrs. Dobbie: I do not know if anybody else in this House has ever heard of this wonderful journal either, so I am not sure how much credence we can put in its particular comment.

I also want to mention to the hon. member that the sumo wrestler class in Japanese history was there to protect those who were unable to protect themselves. Perhaps the hon. member's analogy is an appropriate one because obviously if we do not have good corporate citizens to produce well we will not have the wealth we need to protect people who are less capable of looking after themselves.

I must commend the hon. member on for once in his life making a little bit of sense in his fine analogy about sumo wrestlers. We do need protection for people who cannot look after themselves in this society and the Conservative government certainly understands and recognizes that. That is why its budgetary measures have been so appropriate to the needs of the people who are underprivileged and who really do need a helping hand once in a while.

I also want to mention that we heard a lot about how the NDP would somehow turn around this problem that we have in Canada vis-à-vis our deficit. In fact, in terms of my own experience with the NDP which is a long one in the province of Manitoba, I do not see anything to support that.

For example, when the NDP was in government for many years in Manitoba they turned the province into a virtual corporate desert. There are very few of the major corporate offices still in existence in Manitoba which we at one time enjoyed because they were taxed out of existence through the very strange sort of economic policies of the NDP when they were in power.

I do not quite understand how the hon. member would suggest to us that NDP policies would somehow cure the ills of Canada, that by taxing corporations we would somehow generate more wealth to spend on the people who really do need help.

I suggest that the hon. member has a very twisted view of how economics work in this country, or in any country indeed in the world.

In fact, we know that the NDP does not believe in the deficit. It thinks that if we owe money to ourselves therefore no deficit exists and no debt exists. That is not exactly the way the rest of the world views the situation.

Also the hon. member talks about nirvana. Nirvana, he says, is something that this government strives for through using budgetary measures, which I suggest will probably have a very profound effect in getting us to nirvana if we are given enough time and opportunity to let our measures take effect.

We do know that the NDP idea of nirvana is something that you get to by spending other people's money. The NDP never understands that you have to generate wealth by doing something productive, by manufacturing things, by making a little wealth, by making a profit. That is the way to generate the kind of wealth that can then be used to create the kind of Utopian kind of society we hear about all the time from members like the hon. member opposite.

I would suggest that when hon. member talks about nirvana he has a very short-sighted idea of how to get there. He would get there by spending my money, your money, the money of the taxpayers of this country, for his ideas rather than what is really necessary and good for the corporate body of the country.

Finally, I wonder whether members of NDP would tell us where they base their wonderful projections, on what experience? Do they base it on the experience of Russia, communist Russia, socialist Russia? Perhaps they base their economic theories on the wonderful experience of communist China, socialist China. Oh, no, I am sure they are going to hold up the example of Sweden, that great social democratic society which has just introduced a goods and services type tax at 24 per cent and which is in terrible trouble.

I do not know where members of the NDP are getting their secret plans for the future of this country, but perhaps the hon. member would take a moment to share with us just on what he bases his profound conviction that they have the right economic policies and plans for the country.

He talks about recession. I do not want to take all the time here, but he suggests that somehow the rich do well out of recession. I wonder if the member would tell me just who benefits when interest rates come down. That is one the effects of recession. Perhaps he would share some of his wisdom with us.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, first of all let me say to the member that I have never lived in Manitoba. I do not know the political history and all the ramifications in Manitoba, but I can tell her of a province that I know, a province where history is unfolding, and that is the province of Ontario.

The Ontario government took over with a deficit. The Ontario government had choices to make. One of the choices it made was that it was not going to reduce any deficits on the backs of the working people of the province of Ontario. It made the choice that it was not going to cut back the services to the people of the province of Ontario. People pay for services and they are those services such as health care, education and social assistance that we cannot cut back. There are services that people are entitled to such as child care.

I used poor old Edward Scissorhands, who was a lovable character in the movie. What I tried to characterize with Edward Scissorhands is an unlovable character of Michael Scissorhands, the finance minister of this country. The sumo wrestlers in the present context certainly do not have that philosophy of protection any more. We have changed that image of sumo wrestlers, in terms of corporations being compared to them, in the fact that they want to get bigger, larger and heavier so that they could in fact compete in their class. That is the comparison.

Now we get to the corporations. If I look at the projections in the budget on page 44, I see the projections in the Table 2 of incomes. Real personal disposable income is projected in 1992 to go up 1.3 per cent. Corporate profits before taxes will go up 29.1 per cent. Already the revenues collected from corporations have been declining as compared to revenues collected from individual Canadians.

What we have been arguing with this government about is that there ought to be some fairness. If you are going to wage a war on reducing the deficit and the debt, fine, but there has to be an element of fairness. In other words, if you are asking ordinary, average, middle income Canadians and the working poor to bear the brunt of reducing the deficit, they ought to be able to look at examples of where the corporate sector is bearing its fair share of reducing the deficit.

We on this side of the House said: "Look, how do you think this deficit kept increasing?" It is because this government followed a high interest rate policy. Why? Because John Crow said there were fires of inflation.

Where were the fires of inflation? The fires of inflation were not in Alberta. They certainly were not in Atlantic Canada. They were not in northern Ontario. Those fires of inflation were in Toronto. To diffuse the fires of inflation in Toronto we followed this government.

This government followed a high interest rate policy. For every 1 per cent the interest rate went up, the deficit went up $2 billion. We kept saying to the government that it ought not be following this policy.

Many others in this country said: "You ought not be following this policy." The fact of the matter is that the government brought on this recession. We are in the middle of a recession. What do you have the government doing? Slashing and cutting. Michael Scissorhands is at work cutting and cutting. This is not the time to cut.

We should be spending money. She asked how we would deal with this. I say to the minister that we would deal with this question. Where is the money that we put into research and development? If anything at all, down the road ought to be able to put us in a competitive world position.

There is no money being spent on research and development. There are cutbacks. We are spending less than the other industrialized nations as a per cent of our GDP on research and development.

The government is cutting back on post-secondary education so what we are going to hand down to future generations of Canadians are post-secondary institutions that are falling apart. Programs have been raped and destroyed, so I say to the hon. member: You are wrong, wrong, wrong and the course you are following now is still wrong.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate the opportunity to take part in the debate this afternoon. I cannot compete with my friend across the aisle in sound, but I hope that I can present some substance today.

I think when all of us run for Parliament we have various reasons for doing it. I had some reasons, of course. I sought the nomination because I was concerned about certain things that I saw happening in our country. I was concerned about the large deficit that our country was carrying, about the enlarging debt load that we were seeing. It was strangling our country and slowly reducing our options.

Also, I was concerned about the increasing size, cost and power of the government which I felt was having very stifling effects on individual initiative and entrepreneurship. Rather than having a government and a bureaucracy that was serving the people, I found that people were more and more spending their time and their efforts in serving and paying for a government they did not necessarily want or need.

I see in this budget the beginning of initiatives which the people are loudly demanding and insisting on; hopefully, the winds of change are blowing in this country of ours.

In these very tough economic times, there is no doubt in my mind that it would have been much easier for the Minister of Finance, as he tabled his budget last Tuesday, to start spreading the money around as some of our opposition members would suggest rather than cutting where it is necessary, to say: "We will spend more and more money."

I am sure he would have loved to spend more and more money on projects in the east, west and in the centre of Canada. That is a lot more fun than producing the budget which he had to produce at this time. He did not do that, and I am very glad that he did not start spending, that he did start cutting, that he is holding the line not only for myself but for my children, my grandchildren and my great grandchildren as well as all the other young people in this great country of ours.

We all know what happened in the last recession with the previous administration. Canada's annual deficit increased from $14 billion to $28 billion. We just cannot afford to make that same mistake again.

I believe this new federal budget starts a sound, sensible course for Canada's future. It is a budget that is based on difficult choices made in very, very difficult times and with long-term goals in view. We are not putting the band-aids on. We have a long-term goal at which we are aiming.

If we were to set out on that easy path of spending money, I am sure it would eventually create disaster for our youth. Spending our way out of the recession would result in only short-term growth, no permanent jobs, no permanent investment and eventually higher unemployment. It would strictly be that band-aid solution that we were talking about.

Our plan for economic development takes a different path. Its goal is not only to end the recession but to restore strong, continuing growth that leads to renewed prosperity. This path is the more difficult one at present but I firmly believe that the finance minister has made the right choices at this time.

As the minister outlined in his budget speech, the key to recovery is lower interest rates. This will be achieved through concrete actions which he outlined for us. First, clear achievable inflation targets issued jointly by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance to reduce inflation to 2 per cent by the end of 1995. Second, government finances will be put firmly on course to a balanced budget. The existing expenditure control plan introduced last year will be extended and backed up with legislated program spending limits. All revenues from the goods and services tax and privatization will flow into the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund, something which Canadians have been crying for for a long time. Third, and very important, the operating costs of government including wages and salaries will be severely restrained.

As well, a number of recent expenditure decisions have been reconsidered, such as the previously announced contribution of $88 million to the Toronto ballet and opera house; there is the provision of financial support for the construction of concert halls in Edmonton and Montreal; and just recently the cultural research institute in Montreal. In my riding these limitations have been widely applauded at this time of severe financial restraint.

It is important also to note that we are not asking anyone else to do something which we as a government are not willing to do ourselves. We will be setting an example by reducing our own spending. Starting right at the top, the Prime Minister and the cabinet ministers will be taking a pay freeze this year. New restrictions will be put also on the members of Parliament during this coming year.

Government departments will have to absorb any wage increases within the existing budgets. The government will also be eliminating layers of bureaucratic management and reduce the number of senior managers by 10 per cent. Again, this is something which people have been asking for in Canada for a long time.

As a result of these very concrete policies, key fiscal goals will be achieved. The Canadian economy will recover in the latter half of this year. Over-all we recognize that there will be a 1 per cent shrinkage in 1991 or this year, but it will rebound next year with a 3.5 per cent growth, a tremendous improvement and certainly something that we are anticipating very much.

New federal borrowing in financial markets will be eliminated in 1993-94. This is going to be a day of great celebration for all Canadians. Program spending growth will be limited to an average of 3 per cent per year after 1991-92. The deficit will be held to $30.5 billion this year and next despite the effects of the recession in this country. In 1992-93 with recovery and lower interest rates, the deficit will fall below $25 billion for the first time in a decade, a real accomplishment with all the various programs that have been assisted and developed.

The budget will result in a better balance between fiscal and monetary policy and this will provide the lower interest rates and greater confidence essential to economic recovery. At the same time, the budget reflects sensitivity to current economic difficulties. In other words, in spite of all the number crunching, we have not forgotten the human factor, the people who have lost their jobs, the elderly, the farmers who are struggling due to problems beyond their control in the global market.

In 1991-92, we will increase program spending by 6.9 per cent. My personal preference would be to see no increase, but we recognize again, in these difficult times, that there are people out there who definitely need help. This will mean a total increase in spending of $7.5 billion, which will be spent when it is needed and, indeed, where it is needed. Of this, $3 billion will be going for assistance to the unemployed, $1.6 billion to the elderly, and $1.3 billion to help our farmers.

In addition, our defence spending was increased by $600 million to help with increased responsibilities we are all aware of in the Middle East situation. Of these four areas, these will account for 80 per cent of the increase in our program spending.

As well, exemptions will be continued for income support programs for seniors, for families and veterans, unemployment insurance, as well as the equalization program and the Canada Assistance Plan payments to lower income provinces.

Again, a very important point, that Indian and Inuit programs will also be exempted as will defence spending. These programs account for 60 per cent of program spending and will grow at an average rate of 3.9 per cent from 1991–92 to 1995–96.

All other program spending will grow at an average annual rate of 1.7 per cent.

This budget, of course, also contains important new tax measures to benefit the disabled. These measures constitute just one element of the government strategy to promote equal opportunities for Canadians with disabilities. They build on an impressive series of initiatives to improve the quality of life of Canadians with disabilities and remove the barriers to their full participation in our society.

For example, the government has, first of all, appointed a minister responsible for the status of disabled persons. It has passed the Employment Equity Act to promote the hiring of Canadians with disabilities. It has broadened the eligibility for the disability tax credit while increasing its value and providing for greater transferability to family members.

There have been increased Canada Pension Plan disability benefits. The new measure announced on Tuesday will have a value of $70 million a year to Canada's disabled and their families. As part of the new measures, the disability tax credit will be raised from $575 to $700 annually.

The definition of expenses eligible for the medical expense tax credit will be broadened. This will now include the cost of part-time attendants in the home. We recognize how essential it is to give families relief from the constant care of those who are severely disabled. It will also allow for specially trained service animals such as seeing eye dogs, modifications to the home, widening doorways, this type of thing, and incontinence products which, as we know, are tremendously expensive and, up until this stage, have been a severe burden on those disabled who required them.

Also, any costs that are acquired by employers in modifying their places of work to accommodate disabled persons are fully deductible in the year in which they are incurred. Allowances provided to employees for taxi fares, Para Transport and parking will no longer be considered as taxable benefits.

Having a disability is no longer a reason to be kept out of the mainstream. By assisting both the employees and the employers, these new tax measures will help ensure that disabled Canadians have equal opportunities to participate in the workforce.

As I stated at the beginning of my remarks, I believe that the measures being taken in this budget will lead our nation forward to continuing growth and renewed prosperity. We must plan for the long-term.

Many of my constituents have written to me, they have phoned me, they have stopped me on the street and very frequently they compare the nation's finances to their own household finances and they say, "You just use common sense, spend only what you can afford. Set a budget and stick with it. Do not live on credit." I firmly agree with these remarks and, I think, as a government, we are beginning to see this developing.

That is why I am pleased that future program spending will be managed tightly and expenditure limits on program spending will be imposed by legislation for the next five years. This will allow Canadians further assurance that their money is being spent wisely. These limits will be set in law to ensure that the budget's program spending track will be met. This law will be a significant and a welcome change to the way the government manages its expenditures.

I am pleased that the budget will address public concerns that revenues from the goods and services tax might be used to finance new spending instead of reducing the deficit. Time after time I have people come up and talk to me and say: "The only reason you guys want more money is so that you can spend it somewhere else." So, I am very pleased that that we can assure them that all of the revenue from the goods and services tax will be used to reduce the debt and indeed the deficit.

This will be done through legislation, to establish the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund, into which all GST revenues will flow, as well as privatization revenues and contributions from individuals and businesses. I am sure we have all had constituents who have come to us and offered money to help reduce the government debt because of their deep concern for what it is doing to their country.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read into the record a letter written in November, 1990 by Richard C. Halverson, Chaplain of the United States Senate. Mr. Halverson wrote:

> Dear Friend:
> In my ten years as Chaplain of the Senate, I cannot remember a time of greater frustration among members of Congress and their staffs, or more expressions of anger from the people.
> Several years ago, there came to my attention a quote from the book written by Alexander Fraser Tytler. Mr. Tytler lived at the end of the 18th century and the early part of the 19th. He wrote a book entitled The Decline and Fall of the Athenian Republic.
> Amazing, is it not, that the following quotation from that book, written about an ancient democracy, long before American democracy had really been tested, is so timely.
> Mr. Tytler wrote:
> A democracy cannot exist as a permanent form of government. It can only exist until the voters discover that they can vote themselves money from the Public Treasury.

And I think that is a very significant factor in our discussion today.

> From that moment on the majority always votes for the candidates promising the most benefits from the Public Treasury with a result that a democracy always collapses over loose fiscal policy followed by a dictatorship. The average of the world's great civilizations has been 200 years. These nations have progressed through the following sequence—

And I would just remind hon. members that this was written 200 years ago. The sequence is:

> From bondage to spiritual faith; from spiritual faith to great courage; from courage to liberty; from liberty to abundance; from abundance to selfishness; from selfishness to complacency; from complacency to apathy; from apathy to dependency; from dependency back into bondage.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest today that if we are to keep Canada out of bondage, if we are to keep the Canada of the future free, if our children, our grandchildren, our great grandchildren and beyond are to enjoy the freedom and the quality of life that we enjoy today, we must do the honest thing, we must do that which is right and live within our means today, rather than mortgaging and placing into bondage future generations of Canadians. I believe that this budget is just one more step in the return to fiscal responsibility demanded by thoughtful Canadians everywhere, and it is the only way to maintain the good things that we all appreciate so very much.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's speech, and I noted that he was praising, of all things, the rather silly proposal by the Minister of Finance to introduce a bill to limit future governments so that they cannot spend money that is not included in the estimates. I presume that in his over–all figure, he is going to put a cap on government expenditures by legislation.

I assume that this rather ridiculous proposal is put forward in order to constrain his colleagues, who are such spendthrifts, and have been for the last six years of mismanagement that the country has had to endure. I wonder how he thinks in the first place that this bill can restrain Parliament from passing bills that approve further expenditure. It is perfectly obvious that this Parliament can change any act that it has already passed. This particular piece of legislation strikes me as a fine piece of talking material but nothing else. I suspect the minister included it in his budget so that the members opposite could run about the country saying how they had finally done something about the debt after six years of ignoring the problem.

The second question I would like him to answer deals with a similar proposal, and that is this debt reduction fund. I am delighted that the Minister of Finance has announced that the revenues from the GST will be applied to the deficit. After all, he is finally admitting that he has got to pay the interest on the national debt on a yearly basis. In his budgets he has bleated for the last several years about how he has got an operating surplus when we all know, an operating surplus when you do not pay your interest costs is not really a surplus at all, but the minister keeps insisting that he has discovered this and that he has got one. No other business in the country that I know of claims it has an operating surplus before it pays the rent or the mortgage except the Government of Canada under this minister.

Having said that, he now says that he is going to put this money from the GST toward deficit reduction, which I am sure all Canadians would applaud. But I am sure the hon. member would admit that the creation of this fund, as it is called by the minister, and trying to establish a separate set of books for it, and all that silly nonsense is nothing more than a fraud on the taxpayers of Canada. Really what he is doing is saying: "I am only going to get $24 billion or so a year from the GST and my interest costs are $43 billion, so I am happy to apply all the money I get from the GST to the interest on the national debt".

Indeed, the hon. member for Delta knows as well as I do that he is going to have to put a good deal more than the money from the GST toward the national debt in order to balance the books. Perhaps he could tell us, and admit to the House, that these two proposals by the Minister of Finance are nothing more than window dressing designed to deceive the public.

Mr. Wilbee: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member very much for that important and probing question. I think that he is as aware as I am that Canadians have said that there is nothing that has controlled government spending in the past. As is mentioned in that letter from Mr. Halvorsen, once people learn that they can vote themselves goodies out of the public treasury, it means the loss of fiscal responsibility.

What the minister has done in this situation is try to re-establish fiscal responsibility, not only for the term of this Parliament but also in the future. Of course, the hon. member who asked the question is a constitutional expert and we respect his wisdom, but we need to recognize that any government that starts to spend as wildly as the previous administration did is going to face the wrath of the public. What we are hearing today from Canadians everywhere is to cut spending, not increase spending.

Again, I am sure that he heard as much as I did people saying: "We don't mind paying the GST as long as it is going to be used to reduce expenditures rather than starting new programs". This is exactly what the finance minister has attempted to do.

I am waiting as expectantly as the hon. member to see exactly the form of the legislation which he is proposing to bring forth. At this stage, this is what Canadians, I believe, want to hear. They do not want new programs as long as we cannot afford to pay for the ones that we already have. We need to get our finances in order so that indeed we are paying our way.

As I mentioned, we have mortgaged our children's future and many generations beyond that already. To continue on that path is complete irresponsibility. I think what the minister has done is try to tell Canadians that we are indeed a responsible government, that we have taken the right path, that we indeed are providing guidance for those who will follow us. We certainly believe that the citizens of Canada recognize that although the choices this government has made may not be popular, they are the right decisions. By the time the next election comes around and the spendthrifts would seek office again, the citizens of Canada will say: "Hey, we did not like it at the time, but these guys really knew what they were doing and they stuck to it even though people did not accept it."

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and a question. I first want to congratulate my colleague from Delta on a solid and substantial contribution, a good common sense contribution to this debate and one that was most necessary.

It is quite evident to virtually every Canadian that the problem we face today is one which built up through the 1970s and indeed, through the 1980s, as a result of consistent government failure to take in enough revenue to cover programs and the continual shortfall. The deficits added up to the national debt we have today and the requirement to service that debt, to pay interest on it, which today is consuming something in the order of 35 to 38 cents out of every revenue dollar that comes in. Well, it is quite clear that leave perhaps 65 cents or less out of every revenue dollar to provide the services and the programs that Canadians have come to expect. Small wonder they are upset.

The problem is that for a number of years, through the 1970s and the early 1980s, perhaps Canadians were getting, whether they wanted it or not, $1.20 to $1.25 worth of government largess for every dollar of tax revenue that was contributed. The difference, of course, was being funded through endless borrowing. The credit card has run out. The spending has reached its limit.

What I am hearing from opposition members by way of criticism now is that somehow government today should ignore the realities, should ignore the experiences of the 1970s and the 1980s and continue to borrow more. Somehow we are supposed to go out and borrow even more money so that even more of the government's taxation revenue will be taken up in service charges, in paying interest on government debt.

In Question Period today, an opposition member said: "Let's get real". I just heard an opposition member suggesting that the caring and compassionate provincial government in Ontario was going to, undoubtedly, run up a huge deficit, and in doing so would not be looking after the problems of today on the backs of ordinary Canadians, or words to that effect.

I would like to ask my colleague from Delta, in light of past experience, how on earth can spending more and borrowing more today, be helpful. How in the world could that attitude be helpful, given the experience of the past.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Delta, one minute.

Mr. Wilbee: I certainly agree with the hon. member's preamble about the lack of cohesion on the opposition benches. It was very interesting being home this weekend to hear the remarks of the people as they said: "What in the world are the opposition doing? I have not heard them talk favourably about reducing the deficit. They want to spend more money continually. They do not want to make any cuts anywhere. How in the world can we return to sound fiscal responsibility that is going to get our country out of this?"

I would certainly agree 100 per cent that there is no way that we can increase our spending and at the same time cut our income, reduce our taxation level, without getting deeper into the hole.

There was an interesting cartoon in one of the papers this morning of the Prime Minister on a cliff with a digger, and it said: "Dig deeper. Dig deeper". The hole represented the deficit. This is exactly what our opposition is doing, saying: "Dig deeper, dig deeper. Do not give us anything that is sound for the country".

• (1750)

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in his budget speech, the Minister of Finance, quite understandably, tried to make the case that there is no alternative to the government's economic policies. It is the government's way or the profligate spending of the opposition, just as had been suggested by the speaker who preceded me. It is this question which I wish to explore, namely, is there an alternative to the government's policy?

We, in our party, share the view of many Canadians that the federal fiscal deficit is a serious economic and political problem. Our leader notably did not make a single spending commitment in the leadership campaign last year. And I know that in the election campaign, which will come up in a year or two, he will present to Canadians a program that is fiscally responsible.

So we agree that the federal fiscal deficit is a problem. We also agree that achieving low levels of inflation is an important objective. There is no disagreement with these objectives.

The first question we must ask ourselves then is what is the government's record with respect to these objectives? The inflation rate today exceeds 7 per cent, compared with less than 4 per cent when the Conservatives first took office. The deficit is forecast to be $30.5 billion, which is $2 billion higher than the deficit forecast in last year's budget. Contrast this with the statement of the finance minister in his first budget in May 1985 that he would reduce the deficit by the end of the decade to $18 billion. He missed the mark by the small sum of $12.5 billion.

It is precisely because of the government's failure to achieve its objectives that many Canadians are having increasing doubts about the ability of the government of the Conservatives to manage the economy.

Our responsibility as an opposition is to remind Canadians that this government has failed to achieve its objectives to reduce the deficit and to control inflation and to suggest where the government may have erred.

To reduce the deficit, an appropriate balance is required between reduced expenditures, increased taxes and economic growth. It is generally recognized that the government did not do enough to cut spending in the years where the country enjoyed reasonably strong growth. On the contrary, the government relied heavily on tax increases. For example, in the April 1989 budget, of the $9 billion in deficit-reducing measures introduced for the fiscal year 1990-91, $7.2 billion or four-fifths were tax increases and only $1.9 billion or one-fifth were spending cuts. It was these very tax increases that contributed to inflation.

In its 1990 Annual Report, the Economic Council of Canada observes:

> The main source of upward momentum in the rate of inflation since mid-1989 has been regulated prices, especially in the service sector. Included in this category are prices that are directly influenced by federal, provincial and municipal policies. The largest increases since early 1989 have affected gasoline prices, vehicle registration fees, tobacco and alcohol, public transportation and water rates.

In short, by persistently raising sales taxes, the federal government has been directly responsible for much of the inflation we are experiencing today in Canada.

A further point. Doug Peters, Vice-President and Chief Economist of the Toronto-Dominion Bank has also explained how monetary policy, rather than reducing inflation, has caused fiscal policy to increase inflation. As monetary policy tightens, as interest rates rise, fiscal policy eases and the deficit rises because of increased interest payments. In sum, high interest rates contributed to inflation and, of course, high interest rates have greatly increased the debt and the deficit.

Yet, despite this abysmal record, the government, in this budget, tells Canadians that it is staying the course with the policies that have failed so miserably in the past. The finance minister proposes to keep real interest rates at the historically high levels that we have seen in recent years.

On page 52 of the budget, Mr. Speaker, and I invite you to read this, the finance minister says that in the medium term, that is through 1996, and I quote:

> The real interest rate—the nominal rate adjusted for inflation—is expected to average about 4-3/4 per cent. This is similar to the average of the 1980s and about three percentage points higher than the average of the 1960s and—1970s.

It seems obvious to me, if it is not obvious to the finance minister and to the members of the Conservative party, that with real interest rates of 4.75 per cent we will not get the deficit down. This is not only because such high real rates increase interest on the debt, but because it will be impossible for the economy to grow with interest rates that high.

We must recognize that the whole budgetary policy of the government is premised on high economic growth, led by exports. High growth is required for the government to meet its deficit targets, reduce unemployment and raise living standards.

But nothing in the budget will promote that. Have Canadian exporters not been telling us that they cannot compete with the dollar at 88 cents U.S.? Yet the government says that it will keep the dollar at 88 cents U.S. by maintaining high real interest rates. How are we going to get increased exports? How are we going to get export-led economic growth?

It is time to recognize that the government has failed to achieve the objectives it has set for itself, namely reducing the deficit and controlling inflation.

To summarize the reasons for this failure: One, it failed to cut spending when it had the opportunity to do so; two, it relied far too heavily on tax increases, which in themselves were inflationary; three, monetary policy has been too tight, which has also contributed to inflation and the growing debt; and, four, tax increases, high interest rates and the high dollar have hurt our ability to compete and strangled exports.

Is there an alternative to this approach? That was the question I asked at the outset.

In its most recent annual review, the Economic Council of Canada explains that price stability should not be the only economic objective of the Bank of Canada and the government. There should be two objectives: price stability and full employment, and three means: a monetary and fiscal policy and a labour force policy.

According to the Council, if there is a lesson to be learned from the 80's economic policies, it is that fighting inflation exclusively through the monetary policy is very costly.

The Council emphasizes the experience of a number of European countries that have succeeded for close to twenty years in defeating inflation without creating unemployment.

The Council says there is no magic formula. However, those countries have certain things in common. First, they committed themselves to full employment. Second, governments, employers and unions work hand in hand. The Council thinks it would be possible in Canada to co-ordinate better the economic policies of the federal and provincial governments and to bring employers and unions closer together. The Council's recommendations, I suggest, offer an alternative to the present policies of the Conservative government.

Mr. Speaker, it bears repeating that the Council has found in a number of European countries a commitment to full lemployment. That is particularly significant for us, Canadians. This government seems to be resigned to high unemployment. Indeed, he predicts an unemployment rate of 10 percent for this year and of 9.8 percent for next year.

I want to add a few words on the particular position of Montreal. The biggest concentration of unemployed in Canada is in Montreal, Mr. Speaker. They are 207 000 this year compared to 169 000 last year. And unemployment and poverty cannot be dissociated. Montreal has become the Canadian capital of the poor. There is more poor in Montreal than in all of the Atlantic Provinces combined, Mr. Speaker. It was recently said of Montreal, which was quite striking, that it is no longer possible to talk of it in terms of pockets of poverty but in terms of pockets of wealth since the whole city has become poor.

Mrs. Finestone: That is true.

Mr. Berger: What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that we must deal with the plague of poverty and the plague of unemployment. So let us add full employment to our economic objectives as suggested by the Economic Council of Canada. Obviously, the conservative budget completely disregards that recommendation of the Council.

[English]

In the budget, the finance minister announced that the government will "launch a national effort to build a new partnership for prosperity". He said: "As a first step, the government will release a discussion paper in the spring to help focus public debate about the problems we face and to try to develop solutions".

Mr. Speaker, you will forgive me if I say that these words ring rather hollow. It is now seven years since the Prime Minister made his commitment to double Canada's R and D effort by the end of the first mandate. He made that commitment in a speech to the Chambre de commerce in Montreal in March 1984 when he was Leader of the Opposition.

It is now seven years since that speech when, again, he committed to double Canada's R and D effort by the end of the first mandate.

As well, we remember the Prime Minister's words in his book, Where I Stand. He said: "Research and development and the resulting innovations are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country". The Prime Minister asserted that if the percentage of Gross Domestic Product allocated to research and development were increased by just 1 per cent, we would create in Canada one million jobs and $20 billion in additional sales of manufactured products.

In an effort to protect consumers, I suggest the publisher of the Prime Minister's book change the title to Where I Stood. That is because we know what has happened since 1984. The government talks a good game. It has introduced with much fanfare a number of high profile initiatives, but let us look at the other side of the ledger.

Total support for Canada's research and development efforts have actually declined, and I want to highlight a number of examples. First, the Conservative government has reduced support for research and development in industry. For example, highly successful procurement programs have been cancelled and the National Research Council's Industrial Research Assistance Program has been starved for funds.

This is the same program which is perhaps the most highly touted government program. It was even recommended by the Nielsen report for its effectiveness. It has been starved for funds.

Second, the government has cut transfer payments for post-secondary education and reduced over-all funding for vocational training.

Third, the government has decimated Canada's premier research organization, the National Research Council, and cut funding for government based research on the environment and alternative energy.

Fourth, it has cut the staff of the Science Council of Canada by half.

Fifth, with respect to university research, the government established the Centres of Excellence program but at the same time froze funding for the main sources of university research in Canada, the Federal Granting Council. It has ignored the recommendations of the Prime Minister's own blue ribbon committee, a committee which he chairs and announced with much fanfare several years ago.

He has ignored the recommendations of his own National Advisory Board on Science and Technology to double the funding to these granting councils.

Sixth, applied health care research is the last area to be cut by the Conservatives. This includes research into preventive health care, health promotion, disease prevention, workplace hazards and cancer prevention.

The government seems to have forgotten the old adage that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. They tell us that health care costs are rising too quickly. At the very same time, they cut funds for applied health care research and research into health promotion and preventive health care.

What is the bottom line of all these actions? It is the internationally recognized indicator of scientific activity that the Prime Minister referred to, namely the percentage of Gross Domestic Product allocated to research and development. Such spending in Canada has actually gone down since the government took office from close to 1.4 per cent of our Gross Domestic Product to 1.3 per cent of Gross Domestic Product.

The Prime Minister seems to have forgotten what he said in his book, Where I Stand, that just a 1 per cent increase in research and development spending would create in Canada one million jobs and $20 billion in additional sales of manufactured products. That percentage of scientific activity has gone down by 1 per cent, not gone up, not doubled as the Prime Minister promised in his speech in March 1984. This is at the same time that our major competitors continue to invest twice as much as we do in comparative terms and are increasing their spending.

An hon. member: Short-sighted promises.

Mr. Berger: We come back to the budget in which the Minister of Finance says that more needs to be done to assure our future prosperity. I quote from the minister's speech again: "We need to look hard at the quality of our investments in infrastructure, machinery and equipment, training and education, and research and technology". "There are signs," he said, "that in some areas, such as private sector spending on training and research we are not doing enough".

My reaction on reading the budget was, this is news to the Minister of Finance. For years, members of Parliament have heard from countless sources that we are falling behind in all these areas. From university teachers, university presidents, from students, from high school teachers, from business executives and workers, from union leaders, from the government's own advisory committees, the case has been made consistently and eloquently. Seven years after this government took office, it proposes to focus public debate on these issues.

Where has the government been for the past seven years? Has it not been the government's responsibility to take action in these areas, to show leadership, to do something about it? The debate the government proposes to engage Canadians now in is an admission of failure, an admission that we have lost seven years when this government should have taken steps to ensure that all Canadians receive quality education and that Canadians businesses do enough R and D. On the contrary, we have seen that all of their actions have defeated those very purposes.

On the very first page of his budget speech the Minister of Finance said:

> —we must deal with the world as it is, and not as we might wish it to be.

I have two comments to make about this. Again, it is now almost seven years since this government took office. It is responsible for the world as it is. The Canada of today is what it is in part because of the actions of this government. It is time, therefore, that the government assumed responsibility for the difficult economic circumstances we are experiencing in Canada today.

Second, when I heard the finance minister say, "We must deal with the world as it is", I could not help thinking that Bobby Kennedy put it somewhat differently. He said, as if we need to be reminded, that "Some people see things as they are and ask why. I dream things that never were and ask why not". What a contrast. When the finance minister of Canada says to Canadians is: "Don't dream, don't be ambitious, accept the world as it is with all of the calamities that this government has visited upon you".

Liberals have a different view of things. We believe that we can build a better world. We believe that we can build a better Canada. Canadians believe that collectively we can build a better world and a better Canada. This is what we should be setting our sights on doing.

• (1810)

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. friend and indeed appreciate the position that he put. I think all Canadians would wish for more funds for education, more funds for R and D, and indeed more funds for many worth-while causes. I do not think anyone would seriously quarrel with those suggestions.

What I would like to ask my hon. friend is: How can we manage to achieve these things, given the mountain of debt that we have and the requirement to pay interest on it? There is no use going back into the why and the cause of that. We know what the amount was in the spring of 1985, at the end of the last fiscal year of the previous Liberal government, and we know the effects of compound interest on that.

The fact is that interest has to be paid on it and, to the extent that it is, it takes away from the ability of any government to have the funds necessary for those other things which we would all like to have.

The hon. member refers to dreams. It is good to have those and it is good to have wishes, but we cannot simply wish away the debt and we cannot wish away the requirement to pay interest on it.

In order to fund all these things that the hon. member would like to have, what other programs would he cut out and, if he is not going to cut out any programs and reduce spending at all, what increases would he bring forward by way of taxes? What tax measures would he introduce in order to be able to find the funds necessary?

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He asks me how we would provide more funds for education and research and development, how we would find these funds.

I find it somewhat perplexing that a member of the government is asking a member of the opposition how to find more funds for education and research and development.

An hon. member: With a straight face too.

Mr. Berger: With a straight face, as my colleague reminds me. It seems to me that this government should have some ideas about how we could find funds for education and research and development or how we could stimulate the private sector to put more money into training.

While I am on it, there was the de Grandpré commission which had to look into the question of adjustment to the free trade agreement and made a whole number of recommendations which this government have ignored. If he wants to find some answers, he might look at some of the recommendations of the de Grandpré commission.

I would like to suggest to the member that he was not listening really to my speech, because in it I said that to reduce the deficit we need a balanced approach which combines spending cuts, tax increases and economic growth. This government seems to have forgotten that one way to reduce the deficit is to make the country grow. I want to put it to him that the budget tabled in this House last week by the Minister of Finance will not accomplish those objectives.

I would like to read to him from a budget analysis prepared by the Toronto-Dominion Bank, Department of Economic Research: "The main problem of this budget is that it addresses none of Canada's major economic problems. Spending cuts and major tax increases such as the 25 per cent rise in unemployment insurance premiums for both business and employees will not only prolong this recession but will themselves defeat Mr. Wilson's deficit reduction objectives".

What I am saying to the member is that it is time that he and the members of his party and the Minister of Finance owned up to their failure to achieve the objectives that they set for Canadians, namely to reduce the deficit and the debt and to control inflation.

The Budget

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker mentioned that there were three ways of dealing with the deficit: cutting spending, increasing taxes, and stimulating growth. I would not disagree with those but I think he has missed a couple of very, very critical ones. One, is stopping the tax loopholes for the large corporations, the tax concessions which are a major part of the reason we are into debt.

If the Tory government has not reduced the tax load for its friends, had not left the loopholes that the Liberals had put in place, there would be substantial reduction in the debt.

Also the member forgot to mention interest rates. My calculations are if there was a 4 per cent difference in interest rates on $400 billion that would be a saving of $16 billion right there.

I would like the member to comment on those two additional areas, the fiscal policy of this government that I think is responsible for a large percentage of the current deficit, and what steps they need to take to ensure that we are not simply compounding it with continued high interest rate policy.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, the member who I believe is a member of the New Democratic Party, if I am not mistaken—

An hon. member: Yes, he is.

Mr. Berger: —talks about stopping tax loopholes. It is really remarkable how the NDP talks out of both sides of the mouth on this question. They say that they are interested in promoting economic growth, yet rail against tax incentives which have as their purpose to encourage businesses to invest in research and development, or training of workers, or capital investments of one kind or another.

I do not think the member recognizes or remembers that this government has indeed cut out some tax incentives which stimulated economic growth. Several years ago they passed a law which, for all intents and purposes, meant that companies that invest in R and D could no longer deduct the cost of buildings in which they do their research for tax purposes.

Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? A company has got to do research and development and they have a lot of sophisticated equipment, computers, et cetera, and they cannot put them anywhere because the Income Tax Act which the Conservative government has passed does not allow them to claim an expense for the building that they have to have this equipment in.

I remember the reaction of Jean de Grandpré who, at the time, was president of Bell Canada Enterprises which is the parent company of perhaps Canada's only multinational company doing world-class research, namely Northern Telecom and Bell Northern Research. He said that this tax change initiated by the Conservative government would result in Northern Telecom doing research in the United States. This is exactly what is happening.

Is that the kind of tax loophole that the member for the NDP wants to see eliminated?

• (1820)

I get the impression from listening to the New Democratic Party that they want the Conservative government to continue cutting tax incentives which would stimulate economic growth and provide jobs to Canadians. It would seem to me that one of these days they have to fish or cut bait and tell Canadians where exactly they stand on these questions.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this budget debate. To begin with, I would like to say concerning transfer payments, that the federal government is trying to increase its control over its own program spending. It is not always easy. For instance, the Canada Assistance Plan is administered by the provinces as long as they satisfy certain conditions. The federal government has to match the provinces' contributions, and has consequently no control over these outlays.

One of the things we noticed in this year's federal budget is that Val-d'Or, in Abitibi-Témiscamingue, will be the site of a research centre called CANMET. No one has ever seen liberal members, nor the NDP, or members of the Bloc Quebecois—members from the province of Quebec—try to obtain the establishment of such a mining research center in the province of Quebec.

What has been done these last few years, especially the last two? It is with the help of economic and political representatives of our region, like the development corporation, CERDAT and the mining association of Quebec that we won the battle. I am proud of it because this project will bring 15 million to the region over 5 years, starting this year.

Mr. Speaker, the spending control plan announced in last year's budget will be extended for the next three years. The Prime Minister's salary as well as that of all Cabinet ministers will be frozen. New limits—limits only—will be imposed on the salaries of the members of Parliament and senators. As far as I am concerned, they could have been frozen as well, I would have been glad to oblige.

Mr. Speaker, we bandy about a lot of figures. In all the speeches we heard, everyone, in the government as well as in the opposition, threw in a bunch of figures on the budget. I would like to tell the Canadian people, and more particularly the Quebec people, what I have done to try and reduce my expenditures as a member of Parliament. Often, in Abitibi, we attend social functions with senior citizens or young people who tell us how we should cut expenditures in Parliament. As we know, they total about $240 million for this House and another $40 million for the other place. Tonight, my speech is directed at all members of Parliament: conservatives, liberals, NDPers and members from the Bloc Quebecois. I guess we could call it, as the members from the Bloc Quebecois would say, a non-partisan speech.

Before issuing this release following the presentation of the Estimates on February 26, 1990, I had communicated some information to the media and said that, I for one, would be ready to restrict my privileges as member of Parliament. Members of Parliament are entitled to four free householder mailings a year to their riding. I checked what could be saved by applying mainly the restrictions imposed in 1990 by the hon. Robert de Cotret on the printing of the documents for such mailings, when he was the President of the Treasury Board, but the saving was insignificant.

For example, in 1989, I mailed a 44-page calendar which cost $9,000 for printing alone. Preparation and photomechanical reproduction costed $1,000 and mailing through Canada Post, $2,500. The total cost of this householder mailing to my riding was $12,400. Following the February 20, 1990 Budget, I had told a radio announcer from Radio-Nord, in Val-d'Or, that the Minister of Finance of Canada should, among other things, cut the number of free householder mailings Federal members of Parliament are allowed to make from four to a one only a year. The savings to the Canadian people would be $8.8 million if all conservative, liberal and new-democrat members joined in this effort. Personally, as a Conservative member from a northern riding, I decided to inform my constituents that I would send only one householder a year, not because I don't feel like sending four, but I say we have to cut expenses. People are told they have to pay taxes, and the government is cutting programs. For instance, at the time they cut a program that enabled students to travel across Canada. I told my constituents I was going to cut down to one householder and that I would no longer be sending 2,000 Christmas cards every year, and there would be no more birthday cards for my constituents. My message was: The government is asking Canadians to tighten their belts. I think it is only fair that as the federal member for Abitibi, I should cut my own spending and set an example for my constituents.

In May 1990, a new directive was issued concerning our 64 points for travel in Canada. We have a points system. Instead of money, we have a certain number of points for travel to our ridings. A directive issued by a committee said that spouses would be allowed the same number of points to go anywhere in Canada. That was one of the privileges, and I immediately objected. I wrote to the Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Fraser, and he said the following:

> I understand that this new provision will help ease some of the professional and family pressures on members. In the case of large ridings without easy access, members and spouses will be able to travel more readily and more frequently within their province, while formerly such trips were designated as special travel.

That is one of the measures to which I objected. However, to show my constituents what my expenses were as a member, I told them in a statement in the House of Commons on November 22 1990, about my travel expenses in the riding of Abitibi, which is quite considerable and covers 554,000 square kilometres, from September 1984 to March 31, 1990:

> —my travelling expenses in Abitibi and elsewhere in Canada amounted to $180,804, or $32,382 a year on average.

If I had applied all 64 points within my riding, to go to the northern part of the riding, it would have cost me $2,500 each trip, or $160,000 a year. I refer also to householder mailings, how much it cost me since 1984, for 26 mailings: $155,000. And I explained how I proceeded to send my Christmas wishes to my constituents, by making a statement in the House of Commons, for a saving of $15,000.

On December 12, 1990, I wrote to the Speaker of the House of Commons asking him to change the Members' Manual of Allowances and Services. I wrote:

> There is no doubt that Canada is going through difficult economic times and it is essential to ensure good management of the expenses in the House of Commons as well as in Canada.
> We must take measures to reduce substantially the expenses (privileges) of the federal Members of Parliament in Canada and to cut by 20 per cent the estimates of the House of Commons in Ottawa for 1991–92.
> We all know that for several months budget cuts and even total cuts have been made which have affected various programs and caused difficulties to many organizations.

The example I was referring to earlier:

> (student exchange programs, women's issues, etc.)

Since the federal government is committed to spending restraint, members must do their share even if this creates some difficulties.

I know that some changes have been made already but I think sincerely that more can be done, including in allowances and services to members.

My suggestions to the Speaker of the House of Commons were the following:

> The system of the 64 travelling points allowed to members. Each member is allowed, by periods of 12 consecutive months, a total of 64 points which he or she can use as follows:

I suggested to come back to the old system and not give the 64 points at large, which means across Canada. I told the Speaker: "Let us come back to the old system and keep the 64 points directly for the return trips to constituencies."

> Allocate 15 of the 64 points to dependent children for return trips between the constituency and Ottawa.
> Allocate 9 of the 64 points to his or her staff for return trips between the constituency and Ottawa.
> 2) Special trips
> Members can use 20 of these 64 points for return trips between Ottawa and the constituency or any other destination in Canada for a direct flight with short stops to the destination city (which means that they cannot have several stopovers on their way there, except in case of emergency).
> B–DESIGNATED MEMBERS OF THE FAMILY
> Members who want that some of their relatives enjoy those travel as provided by the 64 point–system can do so by designating one of the following categories to that end: children (son, daughter), parents (mother, father)

• (1830)

And most of all, I wanted to do away with the designation of all other family members and the printing of householder mailings; I wanted to substitute the following for Chapter F–3 of the Members's Manual of Allowances and Services, that is, the printing of only four householder mailings and/or letters, foldout format brochures, postal cards, questionnaires be allowed to be mailed within the riding of the hon. member, that such four householder mailings be printed and sent at the rate of one (1) every three months for a total of four mailings a year to prevent the sending of two or three newsletters the same month.

Concerning another chapter on printing, I proposed to allow the mailing of only 10 per cent of a householder within the riding of a member.

As for Christmas and New Year greetings containing a message from Parliament, instead of allowing the printing 2,000 cards, I proposed to limit that number to 500, and that any overrun be applied against the member's budget.

In a letter to Speaker Fraser about stationary and office supplies, I said that quotas should be applied on all stationary and desk supplies, as of January 1 1991, and that once these quotas were used, any requisition for stationary or office supplies would be charged against the Main Estimates after a review by the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons (quota for the office of members of the House of Commons).

Financial reports to members: That the travel summary—64 points system—mention the travel costs for each trip and that it be cumulative. One other thing: That the funds allocated to subsidies and contributions to parliamentary associations and delegations be further reduced by 10 percent each year in 1990–91, 1991–92 and 1992–93. All members should coordinate their efforts towards such a reduction for a period of three (3) years.

I have received a response to my letter dated December 13 to Mr. Speaker, who always answers to me promptly, and here is what it says: "I want to thank you for your letter and your suggestions concerning some modifications to be made to the Members' Manual of Allowances and Services in order to reduce the House of Commons expenditures. The Board members studied your proposals and agreed to ask members of the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services to examine them and to give their comments and recommendations." That was back in December, but since that time, I did not receive anything from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It has been silent. I did not receive any letter from that committee.

I have a really important thing to say: when I started examining that matter, Mr. Speaker, what I really liked was that, immediately after Tuesday December 18, Bill C–79 was tabled before the House of Commons and one of its clauses that many of us are aware of read: Disclosure of expenditures. After thoughtful discussion, the committee recommended a more detailed disclosure of expenditures directly related to members of Parliament. Canadians are entitled to know just how elected MPs spend their tax dollars.

In a spirit of financial openness and transparency we will therefore have to tell the public what use we make of these funds. However the committee is still not sure what is the best way to proceed. What is known is that we will have to strike a proper balance between the principle of financial transparency and the principle of parliamentary independence. The information has to be sufficiently detailed, but not to the point of losing sight of the basic issue. We will also have to respect the right to privacy of the employees and the privileges of hon. members. We ought to give serious consideration to every facet of the release of these data and to the procedural aspects of the discussions.

Mr. Speaker, on January 11 of this year 1991 I held a press conference in my riding and told local media representatives that I, Guy Saint-Julien, Member of Parliament, will make public all expenses incurred in 1991 in the discharge of my parliamentary duties, including my privileges as a member.

I said that I had tabled a letter in the House of Commons, that I had told the Speaker that I would make a quarterly report to my constituents so that indeed Canadians and Quebecers would know about all my privileges, that is all the expenses for my Ottawa office and my riding offices, and all the expenses incurred for my work as a Member of Parliament such as parliamentary travels, travels as member of parliamentary associations or parliamentary and government delegations, trips paid for by Canadian or foreign promoters and all the expenses allowed by my privileges; I would disclose them every three months, four times a year to my constituents. I wanted to take these steps for the purpose of reducing the many privileges granted to hon. members, as I did last year after Michael Wilson tabled his Budget on February 20, 1990. I said in my statement:

> It is essential for him to control expenditures out of public funds, in view of the Federal Government's sustained commitment to limit its expenditures in departments, Crown corporations, programs, etc.
> Abitibi men and women have the right to know how their elected representative spends the money they give him.
> In a spirit of financial openness and transparency, following the tabling by Hon. Marcel Danis on December 18, 1990 of the Sixth Report of the Special Committee responsible for looking into Bill C–79 on the Parliament of Canada which deals for instance with the disclosure of expenditures.

That is what I had decided to do for my constituents a long time before last week's budget.

I wrote to the Speaker to know how I could find out about all my expenses both in this place and in the Senate. I asked the Speaker concerning the production of an expenditure report:

> The Comptroller of the House advises me that he is not in a position to provide such financial information as requested in your letter.
> Beside the expenses incurred directly by your offices (Ottawa and riding), the House of Commons is not responsible for keeping data about the various costs of each hon. member. Translation expenses are paid by the Secretary of State without going through the House. Likewise, most of telecommunication costs paid by the House are provided to all hon. members. It would be impossible, therefore, to provide you with the total expenses incurred by your offices, or to ensure their correctness, because organizations outside of Parliament pay some of these costs.

Then he referred to the Act of Parliament and so on and so forth. I still continue my efforts with a view to finding a way to obtain data concerning all my expenses which I want to disclose every quarterly to my Abitibi constituents.

There is another point I would like to make, Mr. Speaker which is not mentioned in the Budget. It concerns mostly one of the issues contained in bill C–79, that is, the joint services offered to both Houses.

> While examining the House of Commons administrative machinery, the committee realized that there is a lot of duplication between both Houses. Most services this House needs are also needed by the Senate. The committee believes that we could save public funds if we rationalized administrative services with a view to a better coordination. The committee however recognizes the importance of safeguarding the independence of each House. Within the scope of its proceedings, the committee will discuss the process needed to ensure consideration of these matters.

Mr. Speaker, before January 30, I wrote to the chairman of the Committee who had this to answer:

> I appreciate your interest in the proceedings of the Special Committee on the Review of the Parliament of Canada Act.

He added:

> Unfortunately, I cannot give you a list of joint services offered to both Houses. I do not know if such a list exists. For more information, I suggest you write to the Administrator of the House of Commons, Mr. Ed Riedel, or the Clerk of the Senate, Mr. Gordon L. Barnhart. Both of these gentlemen or at least one of them should be able to provide you with a complete list of these services.
> Finally, members of this Committee seem convinced that better coordination of services offered to both Houses would improve our administrative efficiency. However, our Committee did not look into this matter in detail; instead, we called upon the experience and knowledge of our members and personnel.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are telling me I have two minutes left. One more point about joint services. I went to the basement once to buy some stamps and I stopped at the wrong counter. I was at the Senate post office. As a member of this House, I do have to buy my own stamps in order to pay my bills. They would not let me buy stamps. They told me I was at the wrong counter, to go to the members post office. If we were to combine these two services in one, we would save money. Messengers of both Houses, production, publications, maintenance, cleaning, security, translation, distribution, postal service, general works, purchasing branch, transportation, nobody can produce a list, but I just did. I have given you the list. That is where we should save. We would save millions of dollars. If all those services were put together, we could save maybe $20 million between the two Houses.

I am pleased I have one minute left, Mr. Speaker. I wrote the two persons concerned and asked one thing. On February 19, I wrote the Speaker the following:

> —I ask that a joint committee be struck as soon as possible to establish a joint administration of both Houses for the services they have in common—

And so on, all the services I will mention to you.

• (1840)

Mr. Speaker, I conclude in saying that I acted that way because I felt it was important. The people of Canada, the people from my constituency are told to tighten their belts. Companies, since a few months, are cutting their expenses, and wherever they can, they are imposing quotas. My speech tonight, a non partisan speech, contained two points to remember, namely the quarterly publication of members' expenses, starting in 1991 and continuing in the following years, and then a joint committee, of the House of Commons and the Senate, to coordinate the services of these two houses, thereby allowing savings of public funds.

I hope that all the members have understood my message.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions or comments. The hon. member for Saint–Léonard.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I see that my colleague is very keen on cutting expenditures. I am sure that his suggestions will be studied by the various committees, like the Management and Members' Services Committee and the Board of Internal Economy.

However, Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the budget, because that is what we are debating today. I would like to ask my colleague from Abitibi, who is so keen on cuts, whether he did the same exercise with the government and its Estimates. The Estimates, tabled two days after the budget, show $3 billion spending for the government, including advertising, public relations and the like. Three billion dollars. At a time when we are asking Canadians to cut on health care, when we increase unemployment insurance premiums, when we cut on housing for the homeless and on education, it seems to me that we could have cut in these three billon for advertising.

So, I was wondering whether the hon. member for Abitibi also wrote to the Minister of Finance to ask him to do something about that. Mr. Speaker, rich or poor, you don't know when you are going to require health care. When you are sick, you are sick. So, if you curtail health care for the poor, you should also be able to curtail the advertising budget of the government. Millions of dollars are being spent on promoting the GST and on a number of other programs.

So, for all that, I will leave time to my colleague in order that he can answer. I know there are a few minutes left, but it is time any way, Mr. Speaker. If the government claims that cuts must be made, if it begs everybody to tighten one's belt, it must not do it at the expense of the needy, but rather begin by doing it to itself. I know the government needs advertising since it is so low in the opinion polls, but I am under the impression that even if it doubled the sum it spends on advertising, that is $6 billions instead of the $3 billions now available, it would not be better off, since the government itself is finished. So, maybe it could cut the $3 billions in advertising expenditures. That would allow it to reduce the debt of an amount of $3 billions and would leave untouched the social programs which are necessary for the poor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Abitibi has one minute and a half left.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, it will be a pleasure to respond in one minute and a half. I knew he would not ask any questions about what I said.

Mr. Prud'homme: Do all members of the Quebec caucus agree with you?

Mr. Saint-Julien: I will let you speak if you want to. About members from Quebec, I said what I had to say quite frankly. You do not even have the courage to ask me questions about what I said in my speech.

The hon. member asked me questions about cuts in publications. He should start by doing that himself in his constituency. As I said earlier, I did it in my riding: householders were cut from four to one. I want to say that I already wrote to Treasury Board about that. All members receive in their offices nice glossy brochures from Petro-Canada, nice colourful folders from government departments, et cetera. I wrote to Treasury Board to ask them to do as they do in Quebec, in two colours, with the Quebec flag and the Canadian flag. But you did not dare—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It being 6.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 84 to interrupt the proceedings and put forward every question necessary to dispose of the amendment before the House.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 49 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia.

They are very hopeful and optimistic people because they are calling upon the government to withdraw the goods and services tax. I guess they never give up, and I applaud them. They can hang in there, Mr. Speaker, and one day, who knows?

On behalf of those constituents, they are asking the government to reconsider the implementation of this tax.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present the following petition signed by constituents in Hamilton, Stoney Creek, and Burlington.

They believe that a great woman, Marie Sklodowska-Curie, be honoured for her scientific contributions to humanity. They believe that the gift of the discovery of radium to heal the sick of the world deserves to be recognized by Canada.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to honour Marie Sklodowska-Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth, November 7, 1992.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have similar petitions to that of my colleague from Hamilton. These are signed by petitioners from Toronto and the Ontario region. They too call upon Parliament to urge this government to strike a stamp in honour of Marie Sklodowska-Curie.

Many countries around the world have already issued stamps to honour Madam Curie's scientific contribution to humanity. It is time that Canada gave like recognition. If present guidelines do not allow the selection committee to recommend such a stamp, then the government should change the guidelines.

It is an honour for me to present them today in the week when we will be celebrating International Women's Day on Friday.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, once again, I am honoured to rise in the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, with a petition from constituents of my riding who are still fighting the GST.

They state that this will hit them not only with higher taxes, but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment, which has been proven out in the last few months.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition from the people of Sainte-Gertrude, in the Abitibi, who demand that the government of Canada abandons its plans to build a parking garage and a shopping concourse under the Parliament of Canada, recognizing that the environment as well as the historical character of the Hill and its buildings must be preserved.

[English]

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, with eight petitions from my constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke. The petitions have been certified correct as to form and content.

The petitioners are asking Parliament either to defeat or repeal Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, and to keep Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation acting in the best interests of all Canadians.

The petitioners come from a wide variety of communities throughout the West Kootenays: the cities of Castlegar, Nelson, Rossland, Trail; the villages of Fruitvale, Caswell, Montrose, New Denver, Salmo, Slocan and Silverton; and the communities of Blueberry, Robson, Slocan Park, Winlaw and Argenta.

There is also a small number from Penticton, British Columbia, Toronto and Ottawa.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–97, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to open this debate today on Bill C–97, an act to provide borrowing authority. I should say as a member of the cabinet that it was the borrowing authority bill which was one of my first duties in this House in 1985. I am delighted to be able to introduce this legislation again today, a very important part of government operations.

To begin, it is important to set this bill in the right context, and that is in the context of the economic policies of the government as they were set out last week in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

That Budget Speech set out a plan for economic recovery that will lead this country to further growth and renewed prosperity. The key to that recovery is lower interest rates, interest rates which will encourage economic activity.

[English]

We are going to bring about those lower rates by doing three things that were identified last week in the House by the Minister of Finance: first, we are going to set clear, achievable inflation targets; second, we will move government finances along the way towards a balanced budget; and, third, we will severely restrain government operations.

Together, these proposed measures are a commitment to effective government management and control, something which will serve Canada well for years to come and which we have followed since we were in office, following many years of neglect.

These measures will tightly control spending. Program spending will be limited to 3 per cent growth per year after 1991–92. They will hold the deficit to $30.5 billion this year and next and, in 1992–93, reduce it to below $25 billion for the first time in a decade. The measures will enable the government to eliminate new federal borrowing in financial markets in 1993–94.

In other words, as we look at the bill before us, we should keep in mind that the measures in this budget will substantially reduce the amount of borrowing authority which the government will need in the future.

The subject of government borrowing, a very important one, naturally brings to mind two things which we should consider: the public debt and the deficit. In past periods of recession, governments have typically resorted to additional spending, and suspended their concern about the government's fiscal position. Members opposite who would have us do the same thing today ignore the fact that, in those earlier times, the government was not carrying the burden it does today, a burden of 20 years of persistently high deficits and accumulating debt because Liberal governments increased spending not only in difficult times, to meet emergencies and to promote economic growth, but also in good times instead of cutting back.

I am reminded of the biblical story of the seven years of famine and the seven years of feast when one has to save for the bad times. It is worth remembering that an increase in spending above that proposed in the budget would be directly reflected in the amount of borrowing authority requested in this bill.

An hon. member: I remember the good old days.

Mrs. McDougall: Oh, yes. The good old days that led us into the trouble that we are in today.

Our public debt is forecast to reach $400 billion by mid–year. The interest cost alone will amount to more than $43 billion next year, more than is spent on old age security, unemployment insurance, and family allowances combined.

Our government has been responsible in its approach to this problem. Since coming to office in 1984, we have waged a difficult battle to reduce the deficit and increase our control over the debt. Progress has been made. We have substantially reduced the growth of the debt, and we have halved the deficit as a proportion of national income.

In 1989, the Minister of Finance set out a medium-term fiscal goal of bringing new government borrowing in financial markets to an end by 1994-95. This would be achieved by sharply reducing the deficit. This goal was reaffirmed in the 1990 Budget, which included new measures to ensure that it could be reached.

The Budget presented last week proposes further action to ensure that we reach this goal, despite the reduced revenues and higher expenditures resulting from the weak economy, and despite higher debt charges resulting from higher interest rates.

[English]

We are extending the existing expenditure control plan, because discipline and sustained restraint of program spending is the key to deficit reduction and debt control. The two-year program announced last year will be extended to a total of five years. Programs subject to this plan will grow at an average annual rate of 1.7 per cent.

There are, of course, some important programs that are exempted, as there should be, and those are the income support programs for seniors, for families and for veterans, unemployment insurance, and equalization. Other exemptions are Canada Assistance Plan payments to lower income provinces and Indian and Inuit programs. These exempt programs, accounting for 60 per cent of all program, spending will grow by an average annual rate of 3.9 per cent over the life of the plan.

Furthermore, we are reforming government management. We are intensifying the restraint that has been in place since 1984, which was so essential at that time and remains essential today, and which has reduced operating costs in real terms over the intervening period.

Salaries of MPs and ministers will be restrained, as will Public Service salaries, including those of executives, deputy ministers and heads of Crown corporations.

Layers of management, built up through inertia over the years, will be removed. The number of senior managers in the Public Service will be reduced by 10 per cent. Capital spending and non-wage operating budgets will be frozen at 1990-91 levels.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the government will be taking new steps that will compliment these restraint measures. Spending limits will be legislated to ensure that the budget's spending track will be met.

We will establish a special fund, a Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund, to ensure that all revenues from the GST are directed to reducing the deficit.

An hon. member: What happened to revenue neutral?

Mrs. McDougall: Of course you'd say "revenue neutral".

Mr. Milliken: A lot of malarkey.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, this is definitely not malarkey, this is a significant step forward. Canadians from all walks of life know that we cannot continue to mortgage our future, and they want to make sure that the money we spend will go to reducing the debt that was built up through all those profligate years that came before.

Some hon. members: Right on.

Mrs. McDougall: I am sure these measures will, of course, have the support of all members of this House and it will bring us on schedule to the point at which new borrowing will not be required. That will be a great day for all Canadians, Mr. Speaker.

These are serious measures and I am really sorry that the members opposite do not regard our fiscal situation as a serious one. They require serious attention if they are to be understood. Nowhere is this more true than in considering their impact on the programs that are offered through my department, through employment and immigration. I want to spend a few minutes talking about those programs now.

There have been a variety of claims made by hon. members opposite about the impact of this plan on unemployed Canadians. Well, I want to assure this House that we have made serious commitments to unemployed Canadians from the beginning and we continue to meet those concerns.

Members have particularly seized on one decision, and that was the reduction of $100 million in the Canadian Jobs Strategy budget. They argued, falsely of course, that the government was leaving the unemployed out in the cold. Nothing could be further from the truth.

After the election of 1984, this government reviewed the hodge-podge of job creation and training programs left by the Liberals. The result of this review was the introduction of the Canadian Jobs Strategy in 1985.

With CJS we streamlined training and employment programs. We moved away from the kind of make-work program which had left participants with no more skills and no more ability to break the unemployment cycle than they had had before.

As members on both sides of this House will know from the experience of their own constituents, CJS programs have improved on those that existed previously.

Programs such as Community Futures have enabled people to create stronger local economies. Job development programming has strongly emphasized the skills trainees can use in the private sector.

Innovative approaches to basic skill training have been developed. To meet the challenges of changing technology, we introduced the Skill Shortages and Skill Investment Programs. These programs have helped young people and women re-entering the labour force.

• (1130)

Two years ago, we had to review our support for training and adjustment programs.

[English]

We were not alone, of course, in recognizing this need to restructure the hurly-burly of programs that had grown up over the years: the Macdonald Royal commission, the Forget report, the de Grandpré report, as well as the committee report of this House from the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration in the last Parliament, all pointed in the same direction, that our facilities for the unemployed needed changing.

Canada needed an active labour market policy, and while there might have been some disagreement among all those groups on what the policy should be, there was certainly agreement that the government should lead the way in developing an active labour market policy and that, indeed, is what we have done. We have developed a program that helps workers adapt to changing demands, not one that assumed that those changes would never happen, which is what existed before.

The result of this review process was the Labour Force Development Strategy which I introduced in this House on April 11, 1989, a program which I think is a major achievement for this government and for the people of Canada. The LFDS has been designed to deal with two problems which have existed for a long time. First, Canadian workers all too often lack the skills to get and keep good jobs, that not only would make them better participants in the labour market, but also give them a more satisfying sense of participation and of looking after their families and their families' futures.

The second is Canadian employers who have jobs but who lack the skilled workers that they need in order to fill those jobs. We find consistently that there are areas where there is a mismatch between the jobs available and the skills of those available to fill them.

Our strategy is based on the idea of partnerships; partnerships with employers, with labour, with education and with provinces and territories in a way that we have not seen before. The federal government cannot shoulder the responsibility of training Canada's workers all by itself. What we can do, however, is work with others to increase the amount and quality of training that does take place to ensure that it is relevant for workers and for employers.

The latest step in developing this partnership was the announcement on January 14 of this year of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board. This body will bring together, for the first time ever in Canada, representatives of labour, business and social action groups to help us improve, among other things, not solely, the training of Canadian workers. What a breakthrough for Canada to be able to build the kind of partnership that is going to be needed in the decade ahead and that had been ignored for so long.

Clearly, a key part of the implementation of the LFDS was improving the unemployment insurance program. We wanted to see UI continue to give income to unemployed workers, but at the same time do more, and to provide active in addition to passive help. We wanted UI to be part of this active labour market program that Canadians need and want so much.

To achieve this, of course, under current circumstances, we faced a familiar choice. We could raise taxes to pay for these new programs. We could borrow the money, thereby boosting the sums authorized in bills like the one we are discussing today, Bill C-97, or we could find a better way. As usual, we chose the fiscally sound way. We expanded the active side of UI programming and we asked that employers and workers, those who benefit from unemployment insurance, should carry its cost.

Bill C-21 was finally passed into law last fall, after a year's delay by the Liberals in the other place and it provided for this expanded role in spite, of the usual opposition urgings that less was more. As a result, this year the UI program is contributing $1.4 billion for training, training allowances, and employment assistance for UI recipients, money that will be used to train 45,000 more UI recipients than were trained last year.

So what, then, is the real significance of the reduction in funds for the Canadian Jobs Strategy which the budget calls for?

If we examine expenditures on training, training allowances and employment assistance, we find that this year more, not less, will be spent on these programs.

It is important for members to realize that, as important as CJS is, it is not the only element of the federal government's training and employment programming. As can be seen in the Estimates, the government has seen to it that this year over $3 billion will be spend on training, training allowances and employment assistance; that's $500 million more than was spend last year, and $900 million more than the year before. That's more, not less, help for Canadian workers.

[English]

In the case of our decision to raise unemployment insurance premiums, we were faced with another difficult choice. As the Minister of Finance noted in the budget, labour market conditions have produced a greater demand for benefits than we could possibly have anticipated.

The expected deficit in the UI account, therefore, would have required large premium increases in 1993 and beyond to eliminate the accumulated deficit and to pay the interest which would be also accumulating inside the fund on that debt.

The more immediate impact of that deficit would be to increase the current cash flow requirements of the government. Without new premium revenues to offset the deficit, the need to borrow would once again increase, and interest on that borrowing would compound the debt problem that we already face.

This is not a time to postpone difficult decisions. UI premiums should rise now, not later. There will still be a deficit in the UI account, and I want to make it clear that the government will finance that deficit. At the end of the day after all, the government represents the taxpayers and those who pay premiums. While the government will finance that deficit, it will be nowhere near as great as it would have been had we not acted now.

In this, as always, the government has acted prudently. We recognize the many needs that government is called on to serve, but we also recognize that it is a delusion, the notion that we can forever expect future generations to be able to pay for our decisions.

The plan for economic recovery, then, makes choices that will help us to return to prosperous conditions and, at the same time, give back to government the financial health that it needs to do its job properly.

An hon. member: You are making babies cry.

Mrs. McDougall: I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when that young child grows up, Canada will be a much better place as a result of the policies which this government has introduced.

It is important that we give back to government the financial health that it needs to do its job properly. We do take that responsibility very seriously.

In the meantime, of course, significant borrowing continues to be necessary, and that is why we are here today.

The provisions of this bill are clear and straightforward. First, there is a provision for authority to cover our anticipated requirement for borrowing to meet the net financial requirements, as stated in the budget in a perfectly straight-forward manner.

The amount requested includes provisions to cover the estimated exchange account earnings and a $3 billion reserve to manage foreign exchange transactions. Together, these amount to a request for authority to borrow $26.4 billion.

I should explain, of course, to members opposite one technical point. The request for authority to cover exchange fund earnings, as in previous years, reflects the fact that these earnings reported in the Public Accounts as budgetary revenues give rise to additional Canadian dollar requirements. That is because they are retained on the account and they are not available to finance government operations.

The $3 billion reserve is the same amount as that requested in borrowing authority bills in the last four years. There is nothing unusual about it.

[Translation]

This bill provides, as usual, that at the end of the fiscal year, in this case March 31, 1992, any unused borrowing authority under this bill in excess of $3 billion will be cancelled. This provision preserves the government's non-lapsing reserve into the next year to accommodate the possibility that new borrowing authority may not be provided before the start of the next fiscal year.

• (1140)

As well, the bill cancels the similar $3 billion reserve granted in last year's borrowing authority, the cancellation being effective on the latter of March 31, 1991 or the date this bill comes into force.

I want to remind hon. members that this bill provides a borrowing authority which the government needs to meet its requirement for 1991-92. It is important that it be considered in a timely manner.

[English]

Sometimes time is of the essence when borrowing authority is involved. For example, the Government of Canada bond issue to be offered for sale March 12 will use up virtually all of the borrowing authority granted for 1990-91. Day-to-day cash flows are volatile, but we expect it will be necessary to use section 47 of the Financial Administration Act for Treasury bills to be sold in the last half of March.

[Translation]

Until Bill C-97 is in place to deal with the next fiscal year, only short-term debt instruments can be sold, and the government cannot maintain the desired balance of short and long-term debt. This balance is carefully designed to reduce the government's exposure to increases in debt service charges resulting from short-term changes in interest rates.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this bill contains no unusual provision, and the information required to understand it is set out fully in the budget documents and in the Main Estimates. I would, therefore, urge the House to proceed with it as quickly as possible so that new borrowing authority will be in place at the beginning of the new fiscal year, and so the government's regular borrowing program can proceed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is time for a change, real change. This morning's performance of the President of the Treasury Board was one good example of how we desperately need a change. Yesterday, he promised us answers on the spending of the Spicer commission; yesterday he said: " Wait until tomorrow and we will give you the facts".

Mr. Flis: We are waiting.

Ms. Copps: In fact, Mr. Speaker, the Supplementary Estimates that he has tabled today shows that almost $18 million will have been spent by this commission up to the fiscal year March 31.

It is likely that at the end of this process this will go down in history as the most expensive royal commission ever to have sat. Given the nature of the work of the commission, one would not argue that it is worth spending money to try and save this country; but when you have a president who, by his own admission, last night refused to call himself a federalist, you have to ask yourself whether, in fact, the money that the federal taxpayers are spending on the Spicer commission is not simply going down a black hole.

I would like to quote what he said because I think Canadians were shocked and horrified to hear his response when asked the simple question: "Are you—well, let me ask it anyway—are you a federalist?"

"I am a Canadian and I don't really care what the plumbing is; I really don't care. I am totally indifferent to whether we have a federal or a con-federal or a sovereignty association regime, as long as the great civilizations of this country have managed to consolidate a sensible creative alliance".

Mr. Flis: What great nations did he call?

Ms. Copps: The president of the commission appointed by this Prime Minister, the very Prime Minister who, day after day refuses to answer our questions on this issue in the House of Commons, is not even prepared to call himself a federalist.

[Translation]

The President of the Treasury Board came to the House and promised us some figures on the Spicer Commission's expenditures, but he is still Mr. See no Evil. We have hear no evil, see no evil and speak no evil. Speak no evil, Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister who never rises from his seat and is even afraid to answer our questions about Confederation. Even worse, Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the commission established by the Prime Minister to find a formula to save Canada is not even willing to call himself a federalist. He referred to the government's policy as "plumbing". Mr. Speaker, plumbing is one of those important things that make a house work. I would like to know whether he is prepared to live in a house without plumbing.

Mr. Speaker, I think that finding a formula for power sharing is important where Canada's revenues are concerned.

[English]

That is why I say that it is time for real change. Close to 1,500,000 Canadians will be on the unemployment lines as a result of the economic policies of this government. We have a Minister of Employment and Immigration who was just bragging about their wonderful record in the House of Commons—1,500,000 Canadians without hope.

An hon. member: Some record.

Ms. Copps: One in six Canadian children goes to bed hungry every night. Bankruptcies skyrocketed last month, 55,000 last year alone.

An hon. member: What a record.

Ms. Copps: When confronted with these sorts of facts, what do the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board do? They slash and cut. They slash $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy. If that Minister of Employment had any concern for the people she is supposed to be representing, she would have done the honourable thing and resigned after her Minister of Finance gutted the proposals for the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Copps: They slashed almost a billion dollars from programs to help Canada's poor and increased unemployment insurance premiums for the salaried people of this country by a whopping 24 per cent.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in his budget, the Minister of Finance announced that he was going to cut $525 million in funding for non-profit organizations over the next five years. In 1991-92, $75 million will be cut. In the Estimates tabled last Thursday by the President of the Treasury Board, it is impossible to find out which organizations will be affected. Will it be the groups that take care of women in distress?

[English]

Are they going to try and cut the women's organizations as they did in a sneaky way in the last budget?

[Translation]

Will it be the organizations that run food banks?

[English]

Are they going to cut funding to food banks?

[Translation]

The government is attacking Canadians on two fronts. It creates poverty through a recession and cutbacks in social services, and then it cuts funding to the organizations that try to help the victims of government policy. This is a total abdication of responsibility, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

R. B. Bennett gave us the dirty thirties. This Minister of Finance is giving Canadians the nasty nineties. Worst of all, it is clear that the minister and his cabinet are no longer content with merely putting medicare in intensive care. The budget makes it clear that this government wants to kill off our once proud health care system. The minister's cutbacks will reduce transfers to the provinces by $338 million next year and over the next five years provinces will have to make do with $2.3 billion less, specifically in relation to the minister's budget. These cuts signal the end of medicare and our post-secondary education system, which is also put in grave jeopardy.

In the estimates alone, the minister's own figures tell the tale of over a billion dollar cut this year alone in the insured health services program.

[Translation]

On page 19-8 of the Estimates, we see a cut of over $1 billion in the Insured Health Services Program. Altogether, Mr. Speaker, this means $2.3 billion worth of cutbacks in transfer payments, in addition to a total of nearly $5 billion representing cutbacks in health services, education, subsidized housing and welfare services. This Budget and this government have launched a premeditated attack on the weakest members of our society.

• (1150)

[English]

We find that this billion dollar cut which is part of a $2.3 billion cut specifically in relation to transfer payments and a total of $5 billion in social spending is a direct attack on those people in our society who cannot afford to help themselves

Is the Minister of Finance telling the senior citizen who is waiting to get into a hospital bed that she is going to have to pay the price?

In 1985 this minister was forced to back off a vicious attack on senior citizens' pensions. He was forced to back off when a rather sprightly woman by the name of Mme Solange Denis got her way into Parliament and confronted the Prime Minister with those telling words: "Good-bye, Charlie Brown". Well, Mr. Speaker, it is about time we tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that Canadians are going to say to those who would viciously destroy our medicare system: "Good-bye, Charlie Brown".

Not only has our medicare system long been the envy of the world, it is ironic, cruelly ironic, that at a time when the United States is moving ever closer to the establishment of a national health care system, our own government, this minister, and his cabinet colleagues are pushing us, kicking and screaming, toward an American health care system. For the sick, for the elderly, for the disabled, health care is often the difference between life and death.

What does the minister have to say to those Canadians who depend on our health care system? What does he say in his budget? I quote:

> I recognize that limiting the growth of transfers under Established Programs Financing raises concerns about the ability of the federal government to continue enforcing national medicare principles under the Canada Health Act.

These are not words of the opposition, they are not the words of the Canadian Medical Association. They are the words of the Minister of Finance who states in his own budget that national medicare principles may no longer be enforceable under the Canada Health Act. He recognizes that Canadians are concerned, but he will not do anything about it.

Thatcherism may be dead and buried in Great Britain, thank God, but it is clear that Margaret Thatcher is alive and well, and living in Canada, and she is writing the Minister of Finance's speeches.

The EPF program was established in 1982 to replace existing federal funding arrangements. We recognize that EPF is not working as well as it should. Our leader, the hon. member for Beausejour, has made this point again, again and again. Many provinces have been diverting EPF transfers into general revenue funds. We need to ensure that federal dollars transferred for education and health are spent on education and health. Restricting Canada Assistance Plan benefits is not the answer. The poor living in Edmonton, Vancouver, Montreal or Chicoutimi are every bit as deserving as the poor in Winnipeg or Halifax.

Liberals believe the way to improve the system is to ensure that money diverted for health and for education is spent for health and education. Liberals also believe that the national government has a national responsibility to continue funding health care and education so that Canadians can have a guarantee of national standards from coast to coast to coast.

Tories believe the best way to help the system is by cutting off funds for medicare and students. Liberals believe the way to save the system is to spend the money where it is most needed. Why are the minister and his government turning their backs on the sick, the elderly, the disabled and Canada's youth? I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. They do not give a damn about the sick and the elderly because they, their Prime Minister, their Minister of Finance, and the rest of their tired government are not listening to Canadians. In January and February of this year, while the government was busily dismantling anything that makes us unique as Canadians, members of the Liberal caucus were crossing the country listening to what Canadians have to say. Thirty-five hearings were conducted with more than 300 submissions. We heard from business associations, labour unions, working men and women, social action groups, municipal and provincial representatives, cultural organizations, and ordinary Canadians.

Liberals listened to what Canadians had to say, and what they had to say is this. This government has lost the trust and confidence of the Canadian people. The economic policies of this government are hurting single mothers, children, students, workers, small businesses, and the shut-ins and sick.

As our economic task force travelled the country Canadians told us that they are being hurt and hurt badly by the economic policies of this minister and his government.

This is what the New Brunswick Chamber of Commerce told Liberals: "Over the past five years federal taxes have increased by 57 per cent for individuals and 25 per cent for businesses. This, along with the new GST, continues to place an increasing burden on the backs of Canadian businesses".

This is what the London Unemployment Help Centre told Liberals: "Most distressing to many of our unemployed clients in this recession is the fact that they cannot get their old jobs back when times get better. In fact, most of these people are permanently displaced".

This is what the Confederation of National Trade Unions had to say to the Liberals:

> Continental economic restructuring is taking place at the expense of Canada's economic sovereignty and is having a serious impact on Canadian workers——and Canadian women in the labour force.

[English]

Here is what the vice-president of Hamilton Civic Hospital told us: "The cut in transfer payments from the federal government is having an impact on provincial transfers. The provincial government has had to restrict transfers to hospitals to the point where we feel the amount of money is less than the requirements to keep things going. With these cutbacks it becomes a rationing of services".

This is what the Manitoba Anti-Poverty Organization told the Liberals: "When Canadians lose their jobs they are forced to turn to unemployment insurance, but with the time limits on this benefit and the reductions in the job market, these people find themselves selling all their assets, overdrawn at the bank, and knocking on the doors of the welfare offices".

These are just some of the stories we heard directly from Canadians, and I think those stories say it all. With this budget, and with these estimates, the ministers are merely passing the buck to the provinces. The provinces will pass the buck to the municipalities, and the municipalities will pass the buck to the taxpayers.

For the minister who has introduced 33 tax increases since 1984 to say that his budget has no tax increases is nothing but black magic. When the minister cuts back on transfer payments, does he really expect us to believe that Canadians will not end up paying for this? Of course they will.

This government has rolled the dice once again with Canada's future, this time with Canada's economic future, and all Canadians are the losers.

Economists do not always agree on many things but most agree on this. This recession was made in Canada by this government, deliberately in a vicious attempt to pay off—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: —the government's debt, which has doubled since this government has come to power, on the backs of the poor, the unemployed, the sick, and those who can least help themselves.

We on this side of the House say that what we need now is more than a new budget. We, like the vast majority of Canadians, want a new economic plan to lead us out of the recession as soon as possible, and we want a new government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: Take a look at the polls. Canadians are saying in record numbers that they want more than a new economic plan. They want a new government.

So when this minister says that the budget is what Canadians need, I say prove it. Call an election and Canadians will tell you exactly what they think of the economic policies of this government. What Canadians want is not one single day more of Conservative government.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Canada is a country built by the will of its citizens, both men and women. It is a complicated country; characterized by its great diversity, it extends over a vast geography, its people speak several languages, including two official ones, and live within cultural communities scattered over many regions.

This very diversity is our strength because it allows for the expression of an open society. But it is also its weakness, because its unity is difficult to maintain. Canadian men and women have succeeded in building a great country by sharing common values, by establishing such common institutions as Medicare, by setting up a unifying infrastructure, a country with its own distinctive voice on this continent.

However, ever since they came to power in 1984, Mr. Speaker, the Tories have made every effort to destroy what unites us as Canadians.

In his very first budget, the Minister of Finance was already striking at the root of our common values. Who does not remember the battle fought in this House by our colleague, the late Jean-Claude Malépart, who, together with Mrs. Solange Denis, forced the government to back down in its attack against the least affluent people in our society. The values expressed here by the former member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie are those which hold us all together as Canadians, such values as universal access to medicare which this government is in the process of trying to jeopardize.

The minister, in 1985, withdrew his proposals under the pressure of public opinion. Now, Mr. Speaker, the minister will have to withdraw as he did in 1985, failing which he would implement his program to destroy Canada in a sneaky way.

Over the years following 1984-85, the government dismantled VIA Rail, the main physical link holding together eastern and western Canada. The government silenced Canada's distinctive voice on this continent by developing its international policy on the model of Presidents Reagan and Bush. As far as our foreign policy is concerned, Canada is no longer an independent state, for it upholds the line set in Washington. This has been another devastation since 1984.

The government has committed our country to a Free Trade Agreement which is currently threatening our social programs, including our unemployment insurance plan. The government has sold out our interests to foreign investors without any control. It has weakened the vitality of our culture by denying Radio-Canada and the CBC the resources they need.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Tories do not understand how important it is for the CBC to maintain its presence everywhere in Canada. Perhaps they do not understand the very specific role regional stations have played in holding Canada together from sea to sea.

As members of the Liberal Party, we certainly do. We are ready not only to speak out, but to support financially, morally and spiritually the institutions which keep this country together, for without them, we would be faced with economic and constitutional chaos due to this government's policy.

To mend matters following the failure of the Meech Lake Accord the Conservative government has set up the citizen's forum chaired by Mr. Keith Spicer for the purpose supposedly of consulting Canadian men and women. We learn now that this is a blank cheque which was given to Mr. Spicer and the members of his great committee who are not even willing to state that they are federalists.

Mr. Prud'homme: A bathtub without a stopper!

Ms. Copps: A bathtub without a stopper, as my colleague the hon. member for Saint-Denis puts it.

Just when we and all other Canadians desperately need realistic new solutions, just when we need rational discussions, and just when we need to regain confidence in our national institutions, the Prime Minister and his creation are deceiving us once again.

When will the Prime Minister stop his amateurish game of playing Russian roulette with the future of our country?

[English]

The Prime Minister, as usual, is rolling the dice with the lives of Canadians as he has done so many times before. This time he is rolling the dice with the president of a commission who refuses even to state that he is a federalist. Just when Canadians desperately need realistic new solutions, just when they need rational discussions, just when they need to regain confidence in their institutions, the Prime Minister and his creation are deceiving them once more.

When will the Prime Minister stop his amateurish game of playing Russian roulette with the future of our country? When will he bring forward real constitutional reform that will give Canadians hope and belief once again in a federal and a national system that many of us want to protect, cherish and build upon?

This government, by shamelessly abusing the privileges of democracy, is responsible for the fact that Canadians have lost all confidence in our political institutions. This government, by deliberately engineering a recession, has pushed millions of our fellow citizens closer to poverty. This government's economic policies have undermined our industrial base and destroyed the source of our collective wealth. And now, Mr. Speaker, it is going after one of the jewels which is the pride of Canadians in Montreal, Vancouver and Halifax—our universal health insurance program.

Let us not kid ourselves, Mr. Speaker: by gradually withdrawing from this program funding the central government will lose our capacity to set national standards for medicare.

[English]

The transfer payment cuts have wielded a vicious attack on our capacity to have a health care system which is portable, which is universally accessible, and which gives Canadians good health care whether they live in Montreal, in Vancouver, in Hamilton, or in St. John's.

[Translation]

The government reduces health care funds, slashes appropriations for education, and cuts back financial support for the environment. It may be a bizarre and ridiculous coincidence but the amount taken out of the environmental budget is exactly the same as projected defence expenditures after March 31. Everybody knows the war is over but it so happens that the government has set $600 million aside—the very amount taken from environment—claiming the money will be for war costs after March 31.

These cut-backs can only create a larger long-term deficit, a social and environmental deficit. Mr. Speaker, health, education, and environment are our assets for the future. Funds earmarked for them are investments. They are not losses, as the government sees them, they are investments.

Mr. Speaker, the deficit is a fact which confronts millions of Canadians day in and day out. One million children live below the poverty level. One and a half million Canadians are out of work. In our supposedly developed country, 25 per cent of our fellow Canadians live in poverty. That is Canada's real deficit.

The Minister of Finance justifies his budget on the basis of personal forecasts; if they prove to be accurate, he says, the country will be just fine. How are we to believe the Minister of Finance when he assures us that inflation will be down to 2 per cent next year and that the deficit will be reduced to $6.1 billion in 1995-96? How can we believe members opposite when they talk about the figures of the Conservative government?

This same Minister of Finance predicted in 1985 that this year's deficit would amount to $18 billion. Mr. Speaker, we Liberals did not double the debt over the past six years. That was done by this government. We did not say in 1985—during a mandate of the Conservative government—that this year's deficit would be $18 billion, the Minister of Finance did. His predictions have ended in failure, just where he is now headed as he is confronted with the aspirations of Canadians. Are we expected to believe the government, remembering as we do the day they told us that administering the GST would cost $325 million, yet we found out in the Estimates tabled this week that about $700 million will be more like it, including salaries?

[English]

How can we believe the predictions of this government which a mere three months ago predicted that the administration of the GST would cost us $325 million. We learned, again hidden behind the pages of chaos of the minister, that in fact the GST administration alone is going to cost Canadians more than double the original prediction. It is going to cost them $700 million; two-thirds of $1 billion, the cost for collecting.

Canadians and Liberals have been calling loud and long for a new economic plan. We want a plan based on lower interest rates and a lower dollar. We want adjustment programs.

I think we should cast ourselves back to the promise by this Prime Minister who, upon introducing the free trade agreement, guaranteed that there would be specific programs for those workers who lost their jobs as a result of the free trade displacement.

What has he produced? Not one single program to help those 1.5 million Canadians who he is predicting will be on the unemployment lines next year, and not a single program for those hundreds of thousands of people in my city, in my province, in the manufacturing heartland, in the province of Quebec and across the country who have lost their jobs as a direct result of his government's trade deal.

The Minister of National Revenue could not even convince his own brother to stay in Canada. He is moving his company down to the United States to take advantage of the marvellous deal that this government signed away with Americans. He promised the programs but he never delivered.

We have been calling for policies which would help Canada restructure and modernize its work place, and retrain its most precious resource: its workers. Liberals have been calling for a government that will not only base its policies on survival of the fittest, but rather on the survival of all Canadians, concern for the sick, for the elderly and for our young people.

We on this side want to see policies which create jobs, which bring back economic growth, and which will end the Conservative government's destruction of our competitiveness and industrial base.

Last week we heard one of the persons who is oft-quoted by the Minister of Finance, Jeffrey Simpson, say in a column that John A. Macdonald would not recognize this Conservative government's agenda, because John A. Macdonald believed that the government had to have an agenda for people, and that this government's agenda was made in one department and one department only: the Ministry of Finance. In fact, it has been on the backs of those who should be defending the poor and the defenceless.

One does not have to be a political scientist to realize that the last six years have been a race for the survival of the fittest, and that this government is run by Darwinians who believe that those of us who cannot help ourselves can take a back seat and see our medicare system destroyed, our social welfare benefits cut and our unemployment insurance pulled out from underneath us.

It has given us a made-in-Canada recession which the Prime Minister himself has admitted the government induced. It has given us record high levels of inflation vis-à-vis the inflation in the United States, and specifically the spread which is important to those who are looking at long-term small business investment. Now it has rendered a death sentence on medicare. Post-secondary education is already in jeopardy.

Canadians are fed up with the heartless policies of this government. They do not want the GST. They do not want cutbacks to medicare and post-secondary education. They do not want the gutting of VIA Rail. They do not want rural post offices to be shut down. They do not want local television programming eliminated by the CBC. They do not want rural newspapers to have their line of communication cut off specifically as a result of the policies of this minister and this government.

Canadians want our Canada back again. We want back the institutions which helped create us, which shape us, which make us different from our neighbours to the south. We want back the programs that protected our sick and our elderly. We want medicare. We want post-secondary education and we want a government with a heart.

Canadians want this government to go and they want it to go now. They want real change.

This budget is not a financial statement. It is a political indictment of six and a half years of a government that is killing Canada piece by piece by piece by piece. It is tearing us apart limb by limb, and now it is going to take the heart out of us, the heart of medicare. This budget by the Minister of Finance and these estimates are the last straw. It shows the true face of this government and this cabinet.

We are now looking across the floor at the mothers and fathers of de-Confederation, as my colleague the hon. member for Windsor West called it. The Canadian people find this government and this finance minister guilty: guilty of killing VIA Rail, guilty of killing CBC, guilty of killing post offices in rural areas, guilty of killing medicare, and now guilty of killing off the very capacity of Canada to survive as a nation.

The verdict is clear. It is time for real change and, if the Prime Minister had any real courage, he would call an election and put the question to the people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-97, which is asking for the House to approve funding for the deficit, but I want to remind the House and Canadians who are watching that of course what the government is asking for today is another cheque to fund its failed economic policies, because it is this government that has increased the debt to this nation by twice as much since it came into power in 1984.

I listened with great care last week to the budget speech of the Minister of Finance and I, like all Canadians, looked for some new ideas, some innovative thinking, a new plan to get Canadians back working and to get Canadians out of what is now a deepening recession. Sadly I did not see this.

I think it is important to remind ourselves that a budget is not just simply an economic tool, but a budget also defines the priorities of a government. It defines the kind of political ideology the government has. It also defines whose side the government is on. Clearly this budget is not on the side of working Canadians, of middle class and low income Canadians. There is only one side for this government and it is the corporate side, and all the rest of Canadians are forgotten and left out of this budget.

Rather than fighting this recession, this budget simply reinforces it. Rather than creating greater equality in our country, this government is widening the gap between the regions and between the rich and the poor. Rather than building strong national programs, the government is dismantling our nation by its economic policies, and that is unacceptable to Canadians and is not the way that Canadians want to see this country go.

Canadians want a government that is going to build the country, not sell it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Canadians deserve a government that can build this country. Sadly, this budget like those before it has simply shown, once again, that this government has no new ideas, it has no agenda to get Canada moving, to get Canada working. While words like "competitiveness" are used, what is actually done in this budget makes Canada less competitive, less able to move into the 21st century, and less able to compete in the world economy.

A budget, any budget, of course, is always predicated on the predictions and assumptions about what will happen within the economic sphere. But I want to remind this House that if we look at the government's economic record of last year and its predictions, and the inaccuracy of the predictions that were made in previous budgets as we approached this year's forecasts, we all must have a very healthy skepticism.

I want to just remind this House that last year the finance minister predicted that inflation would fall. Instead, in January, primarily related to the goods and services tax, the inflation rate was at an unprecedented 6.8 per cent, the highest since the Liberal recession of the 1980s.

The finance minister last year predicted that we would have a deficit of about $28.5 billion; instead it will be over $30 billion. Last year he predicted that short-term interest rates for 1990 would be slightly over 11 per cent; in fact they were 13 per cent and higher. And he predicted that growth would rebound strongly in 1990.

Well, the unemployed do not need to read this budget. The children in the lines of food banks do not need to read this budget. They know the reality, they know it every day.

Mr. Speaker, the current recession brings back painful memories of the recession the Liberals brought about in the early 1980s. We are now faced with record numbers of banckruptcies and farming businesses being garnished, a 10 percent rate of unemployment, a growing gap between the rich and the rest of the Canadian people as well as people queuing up at food banks and soup kitchens.

All this government managed to do, as the Liberals did, was to maintain high interest rates and impose wage controls coupled with cuts in social programs. Why are we in a recession, Mr. Speaker?

The Minister of Finance suggested it was because Canadians have been living beyond their means. Try and tell that to the mothers waiting in line at the soup kitchens or unable to go and look for a job for lack of day care.

[English]

The finance minister says our wage demands have been excessive. Tell that to the construction worker, to the nurse, to the cook, to the bank teller, to the government worker and to the millions of Canadian families who have less money in their pockets each year this government is in power.

It is the first generation where it appears that our children will have less of an opportunity to improve their economic circumstance than we did as young people. Something is very, very wrong.

This government seems intent on blaming the victim: It is the workers' fault, it is the unemployed's fault, it is the poor's fault. But let us set the record straight. Let us put an end to the myths perpetuated by this government. We are not in a recession because of Canadian families; we are not in a recession because of Canadian workers or senior citizens; we are in a recession because of a high interest rate, an over-valued dollar, the goods and services tax, the Canada-U.S. trade deal and the destruction of national programs. That is what has brought on this recession.

This has been called a made-in-Canada recession. That suggests that Canadians from coast to coast helped to make it. I want to say that this is a made-in-Ottawa recession. It is a recession made in the office of the finance minister and that is the place it should be dealt with.

The budget presented last week represents the government's response to this recession. The finance minister announced proudly that he would stay the course. Well that is a little bit like saying, as the canoe heads towards the falls, the person who is paddling the canoe says: "We are going to stay the course." Despite the reality, it is clearly an illusion of expectation over reality. So what does the steady course mean for Canadians? Well, it means more cuts to health care and post-secondary education.

In the supplementary estimates tabled this morning at 11 o'clock, we saw that $728 million less will be available in health care as we learned in the budget last week. So, in fact, it is not a $1.1 billion cut to transfers to provinces for health care, it is $1.8 billion.

Just today at 11 o'clock we learned in the Supplementary estimates that for post-secondary education there will be $301.8 million less for the training of our young people. However, at the same time we see the government's priorities; the government is going to spend $154 million more to administer the collection of the goods and services tax. Somehow this government seems to want to just keep repeating the same old mistakes.

Today a report was released about the $1.1 million spent last year to send out a flyer to tell Canadians about the goods and services tax. All the Prime Minister had to do was talk to the Canadian people about what they thought about the goods and services tax. But, no, this government wanted to spend $1.1 million to tell every Canadian what every Canadian already knew: that this tax was a regressive tax, an inflationary tax and an unfair tax for all Canadians.

The government says it is going to stay the course. Stay the course on the GST, stay the course on cutting health and education, social housing, job training, cuts to culture and cuts to the environment.

The finance minister asks Canadians for patience. A senior citizen who has worked all of his life, a veteran who has fought for this country and has the right to spend his final years with dignity and respect, every day sees the results of what is happening in this country.

How shocking it was for many of us to see the headline last year in one of Canada's major newspapers of 700 senior citizens standing in line at a food bank at 7.30 in the morning, waiting for it to open. This is the future we have given our senior citizens. Surely, young people must be asking today what their future is to be as this government stays the course.

A child who has only seen substandard housing, who only knows want and poverty, cannot wait ten years for things to get better. In fact, he or she cannot even wait for interest rates to come down. We are letting a generation of young people know only want, when many others in our society can live very well. Surely our responsibility as a country and the responsibility of a government is to say yes, we want a strong economy, a strong business community. That is important. As well, a government's role is to take care of those people who, for whatever circumstance, do not have a reasonable standard of living.

The finance minister asks for more restraint. But we already see many people in an economic straitjacket. He asks for more sacrifices, but who is asked to make the sacrifices? Well, to begin with, it is middle income Canadians. Two-income families will be paying out almost $400 more now for their unemployment insurance alone.

The increasing of those premiums also affects the small business community and the community which provides the majority of jobs in Canada. The small business community is the heart and soul of many of our communities, particularly smaller communities throughout Canada. Small businesses, many of them family run, and all families, are being hit for the first time with the goods and services tax that is costing them hundreds of extra dollars a year.

This government cannot say there are no more taxes in this budget—well, perhaps not specifically in this budget, but the economic policies out of which this budget flows clearly have made it less and less possible for average Canadian working families to own a house, to simply make ends meet from week to week.

Who else is the finance minister asking to make sacrifices? Clearly the sick—I have already noted the cutbacks to health care; to students; to the poor, to the homeless, we have cut back social housing once again by 15 per cent—to the unemployed.

I remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that during the time of the trade debates this government said that it would implement its adjustment program for workers, particularly for older workers. I have been from coast to coast in this country, and virtually nowhere is this program in place in any real way to meet that promise.

The government said that public sector workers will make sacrifices, that the provinces, the territories, and of course the municipalities will make sacrifices. But from that list—and it is a long one—there is one group that is not mentioned at all or asked to make a sacrifice, and that is the corporate sector. It is the corporate sector that is making a profit. Once again, we see that not one tax loophole has been closed, that there is not one new corporate measure to address those profit-making corporations who now still do not pay one cent in taxes. Nothing. Silence.

What about the tax loopholes such as the interest deductibility that corporations have, the business entertainment tax deduction, the $100,000 capital gains exemption, tax breaks for real estate developers? Why does the government not seriously look at bringing back some balance in the tax system by imposing a minimum corporate tax for profit-making companies? We know it used to be that individuals and corporations paid roughly the same amount in income tax, and now it is the individual taxpayer who carries by far the largest share of the burden.

If this government were really serious about sharing the burden, it would be reflected in this budget. It would close those tax loopholes. It would say that everyone was going to pay their fair share and that it is time that the rich and the powerful paid their fair share.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Ms. McLaughlin: One myth is that this government is asking everyone to make sacrifices. Another myth that prevails among Tory economic policies is that to have economic growth, we must have inequality. For the economy to be in good shape, we not only have to cut programs that benefit the most vulnerable Canadians in this country but we also must have a 10 per cent unemployment rate.

One of the most shocking aspects of this budget is that the government thinks it is necessary and beneficial to economic growth to have nearly 1.5 million Canadians out of work.

The Minister of Finance maintains that he understands the concerns of unemployed Canadians. He understands them so well that he will do nothing to prevent the loss of thousand of jobs as a result of free trade and has promised a free trade agreement with Mexico, an agreement that will lead to the loss of thousands more jobs.

He understands those concerns so well that he decided to cut funding for occupational training programs by $100 million next year.

[English]

The finance minister talks about hearing the anguish of Canadians. He has talked in the past about understanding that because he had to take a pay cut during the last recession when he was on Bay Street. Well, you do not have to go very far from Bay Street these days to see the real tragedy of the increasing gap between the rich and the poor, and two blocks from Bay Street you can see Canadians—young men, young women, older men, older women—sleeping in the streets. Millions of Canadians know the real thing; friends, neighbours, and family members looking for work.

It seems in this budget there is an implication that maybe Canadians do not want to work. But those of us who have worked in this field, who have worked in this area, know the devastation to the human mind and the human soul of not being wanted by your society, of in fact being rejected by your society. Day after day as you look for a job, you hear the same answer, the same response. You cope with feelings of worthlessness; you try to meet rent payments, mortgage payments, try to put meals on the table.

The effect of unemployment goes far beyond economic hardship. An unemployed person is not just another statistic. Every one of us in the community is affected when our neighbours, our families, are suffering from unemployment. It is not just the problem of the individual who is unemployed. All of the statistics indicate that unemployment contributes to a higher rate of family break-up, a higher rate of family violence, of substance abuse, and other social crises. There is a real human cost. There is a real human deficit.

Perhaps 1.5 million unemployed Canadians is acceptable to the Conservative government, but I say that it is not acceptable to the New Democratic Party—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: It is not acceptable to Canadians.

The finance minister would have us believe that there are no alternatives. He has no margin in which to manoeuvre. He has no choice but to pursue policies that would punish Canadians.

I want to challenge that view because the government is not powerless. There are choices, there are different ways to do things. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, a budget is not just an economic tool, it is a reflection of the ideology of a government and a political party.

Instead of giving the Senate $5.6 million—but, no, it is not $5.6 million, after the supplementary estimates it is now $8 million—instead of giving $8 million more to the Senate, instead of investing in a relic of the past, why not invest in the youth and their future.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Instead of giving $24 million more to CSIS to spy on Canadians, why not invest in aboriginal language programs and cultural programs. Listen to Canadians. There are choices; tough choices it is true, but on the one hand you have Canada's spy agency, CSIS, getting $24 million more, and you have other programs, human services, that are being cut.

I mentioned earlier that the government has now cut about $1.8 billion from medicare. It could have cut out the business lunch tax deduction and saved Canada $1 billion. That is a choice. So there are choices. Instead of cutting medicare, cut business lunches. That is where the priorities lie. It is shameful that this government has chosen to turn its back on those Canadians who are the most affected by this recession and to take the choice against those Canadians and not for the future.

If this government is interested, as it professes, in economic growth and international competitiveness and in reducing the deficit, it should be lowering interest rates, lowering the dollar and introducing fair taxes.

We know that bankruptcies have increased tremendously in the last year, but again, bankruptcies are not just a statistic. They are that small business down the street that no longer is operating, that family that has worked so hard to build something because they believed in their community, and their country that has been destroyed by one economic policy of this government, keep the interest rates high. What it has done is it has kept the bankruptcies high too, and that is not good enough for Canadians.

Any budget, any economic policy, should surely look to investing, not just in today, but in the future. Every analyst that looks at the Canadian economy makes two points, virtually without exception, that we are a country which no longer can simply live off our natural resources; that we must in order to be competitive globally develop our research and development so that we can be ahead of the game in that area. We must ensure that we have a skilled work force, a well trained work force, if we are in fact to have a modern economy to develop the kind of leadership in technology that we know Canadians can do, because it has been done by Canadians in the past. That means investing in education, not cutting education; investing in research and development, not cutting research and development; and investing in job training, not cutting out jobs.

This is not idle rhetoric. This is simply a fact. If we want to have a modern country, if we want to move forward, we must have a highly skilled work force and we must get people working. We hear a lot about productivity statistics in Canada, but what about the loss of productivity of a person who is not working? That is one of the greatest drains on our economy because after all, people who are working can pay taxes, can contribute their fair share and can assist in getting this country back on its feet.

[Translation]

A few weeks ago, the Prime Minister said in Toronto he had no intention of dismantling Canada. This is the same Prime Minister who privatized 20 Crown corporations, destroyed VIA Rail, eliminated rural post offices, destroyed communications programs for native people, dismantled the CBC and, in last week's budget, continued his attack on national social programs, especially health insurance.

[English]

Why this contradiction, Mr. Speaker, between saying two weeks before that this is a Prime Minister that stands for a united Canada, that the Prime Minister does not want to dismantle Canada. On the other hand, we see the facts that speak for themselves. I think the reason is simply that the Conservative vision of Canada is nothing more than a vision of Canada as a marketplace. The government's only role is to help the private sector flourish. If that requires that some people are poor, that some regions are poor, if that means the destruction of national programs based on fairness and equality, well that is just the way it has to be, in the political ideology of this government.

Canada has been more than that. It has not been that Conservative vision that really is just simply a corporate vision, and it is not the New Democratic Party's vision. We see a Canada with national values, with national institutions that reflect those values, and national goals that go beyond economic growth that include justice, equality and humanity. We see a federal government that works in the interest of all Canadians, a government that says, through its programs, through its financial planning, that we care about those Canadians from coast to coast to coast who cannot find a job, who need to have a better standard of housing and a better standard of living.

The New Democrats say that Canada is not just a collection of 26 million producers and consumers, we are people bound by history, by friendship, by values, and bound by the wish for a better future for our children.

The national health care system is a good example of what that is about, because it is about providing health care for our citizens, yes, but it is about equality. It says if you live in an outport in Newfoundland, in a community in the eastern Arctic, on the west coast, in central Canada, as a Canadian, we want to ensure that health care is a responsibility of the government to provide. It is not what you can afford, it is something that we will provide as a government, as a country because it is part of what makes us a country.

We say that whatever income you are entitled to or you have, you are still entitled to that kind of health care, to an education. Surely Canadians should at least feel that as a Canadian they will be able to have adequate shelter, but in many major cities this is not a reality and many of those people who do not have any shelter, the homeless, are children.

These are the kinds of quality achievements, of our national health care system, that we point to with pride. In fact, that other countries look to us and appreciate the kind of political decision it took to implement such a program.

So, when the government systematically continues to undermine and destroy the medicare system in this country, it not only threatens the poor in all regions of this country, it threatens an achievement that unites our country.

The same thing can be said about development assistance. We recognize in this country that whether you are in the maritime region, in the north, central Canada, or the west, we, as a people together, have a responsibility for each other. That is a value that unites us. It is a value that is the hallmark of the kind of compassion that, as a country, we have been able to express and, so sadly, is being quickly eroded by the corporate agenda of this government.

It defines the kind of responsibility that each individual has, but also it is what we have together that defines us as Canadians and, indeed, as world citizens.

I want to just mention that in this budget the government has not only made it far more difficult for those in this country, the middle and the lower income people, but it has found almost a billion dollars to fight a war in the Persian Gulf, and once again cut development assistance by $1.6 billion. Can we really continue in 1991 to believe that if we want to see security in the world, if we want to see peace in the world, we must assume our responsibility and ensure that people throughout the world have their basic needs of food and shelter met. We have a responsibility to do that.

It seems that we can always find money to fight a war.

If there is to be any change as we move to the 21st century, there must be money to feed people, both here and abroad.

If we are to have a strong and united Canada we need to have a government that gives us reason to be proud, that gives us something to believe in, and that gives us achievements to share. We must have a government and an economic policy that gives hope to those who are presently suffering. How can we talk about national unity if there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who feel they have no hope?

Right now, in cities like Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver there are tens of thousands of homeless. There are poor neighbourhoods where the birth weight of newborn babies is lower than in some parts of Latin America. Fifty per cent of aboriginal children in this country live in poverty. Throughout this country, there are 3.3 million Canadians living in poverty.

There is no hope for these Canadians in this budget. Surely the hallmark of our nation, of any nation, should be the ability to feed, to house, to educate and care for each and every one of our citizens.

To those who would suggest it is naive to think that we can afford to do that, I say it is naive to think that we cannot afford to, and continue to call ourselves a civilized society. To those who say that social cuts, greater inequalities, a less caring society are requirements for international growth and international competitiveness, I suggest they look at the eight strongest economies in the world. If you look at that, what you will see is that the gap between the rich and the poor is the highest in the United States. Canada comes about fourth out of eight countries. It is the lowest—that is the gap between the rich and the poor—in Japan. Japan is a country we often cite as being a successful economy.

We might do well in our society, when we talk about the economy and analyse economic policies, to remember that that gap between the rich and the poor represents how successful an economic policy has been. This economy in Canada fails that test. If we are looking at how successful economic policies have been, look at the absolutely incredible increase in food banks and shelters for the homeless. The economic policies of this government have failed on that count.

It is time to destroy the myths. You can have growth and equity. You can be caring and competitive. There is a different way. There are choices. There are alternatives

This government has simply not shown the political will to take them.

Finally, I want to say that I hope Canadians will see that we are only as strong as each of us is strong. There is tremendous work being done in this country by volunteers, by those who work in the community, by those associations that often work at a much lesser wage than other organizations, just simply to make the community better.

One of the things I find very distressing in this budget is the proposed cuts of grants to organizations, some $75 million. They are not named, but what that means is silencing the voices, as it did last year. In last year's budget it was silencing the voices of aboriginal people and of women. It was cutting out the essential services in our community that are provided by those people who do it out of compassion and out of caring.

If through cutting back on those organizations that provide much of the infrastructure in our country, that this government says it wants to see everyone share the burden, well, I would suggest to this government that it can make real choices, that there are real alternatives and that if it cares about the Canadian people and indeed if it cares about the future of Canada, the choices that are reflected in this budget and the estimates that have gone after it, and the Supplementary Estimates, must be changed. They must be changed now.

We need a government that stands for national unity, that says: "We care about equality for all Canadians and we are going to pursue that". If this government cannot do it, then I suggest it step down and allow the Canadian people to make a decision.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have just gone through a pretty tough hour.

I listened to the hon. member for Hamilton East and to the hon. member for Yukon. Both would have had Canadians believe that Canada does not have a debt problem and both took the view that what this country needs is to spend more and more.

What they set before this House and before Canadians was a long list of programs that they would advocate ought to grow and expand. Taken in isolation, viewed as programs in and out of their own merit, in many cases most Canadians and most members of the government would not disagree that those are programs of merit.

Totally lacking and utterly failing in the analysis is the question of affordability and what cost will go back to the Canadian taxpayer.

For every dollar that a Canadian today sends to Ottawa in the way of taxes, almost 40 cents goes to pay for the interest on our accumulated debt. Yet in spite of this debt that grows because the debt was there, there is a calling from the Liberals and the NDP for more spending, more growth, more ideas, and more creation of new programs and expansion of old ones without any single consideration for the utter chaos that this nation would ultimately end up in if we do not bring its debt situation under control.

Take a look at the debt of the federal government, and then add on that the debt of 10 provinces added together, the debt of all of the municipalities of Canada, and the debt of private persons across the country for mortgages for homes, businesses, cars, Visa and MasterCard.

Coupled with that is the recognition that what debt is is having today for a commitment to pay tomorrow. Those two opposition parties that express so much concern for education, the youth, the children, the sick, the poor and the elderly have, in effect, said: "Let's have today and to heck with the next generation."

That I believe Canadians everywhere will reject as an inappropriate policy that would put Canada into the same position as many Latin American countries and that would sink us in terms of a nation that is unable and unaffordable because they have talked about the capacity to add program upon program without consideration for the fact that we are in a debt situation.

I see that the Sergeant-at-Arms has approached the Mace. It is one o'clock. Perhaps I may continue after Question Period.

THE BALTIC STATES

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, March 3, the peoples of Latvia and Estonia voted overwhelmingly in favour of independence from the Soviet Union.

The tremendous response of the Latvians and Estonians to the polls on independence is indeed notable since both of those countries include a significant ethnic Russian population.

These results and the results of the poll held in Lithuania last month are proof positive of the Baltic peoples' solidarity and their strong desire for independence from the U.S.S.R.

We support the Baltic peoples in achieving their legitimate goals and call on the Soviet Union to take notice of the unequivocal message in these poll results and begin negotiations with the Baltic states immediately.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the legislation recognizing the equality of the two official language communities in New Brunswick must be entrenched in the Canadian Constitution. This is how the rights of the Acadians of New Brunswick will be best guaranteed. Otherwise, they will be vulnerable to any political change either in Canada or in the Atlantic provinces.

In the present circumstances, it is essential that the rights of the Acadians be recognized formally by entrenching Bill 88 in our Constitution.

In this time of uncertainty, when we expect dramatic and radical changes to change the face of our country forever, the entrenchment of Bill 88 would be a positive gesture toward the most dynamic francophone minority in Canada: the Acadian community of New Brunswick.

The day when Canada will be redefined is drawing nearer and nearer, Mr. Speaker, and unless the constitutional guaranties essential to the survival of Acadia are in place, it could mark the beginning of the end for us.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this Conservative government claims its budget will cut the deficit. This will reduce interest rates and thereby get economic activity moving ahead again.

This is the exact strategy followed by Margaret Thatcher in Britain. Thatcher and her Conservatives cut back the public sector and raised taxes heavily on average people in Britain.

The result did eliminate the deficit. They reached a budget surplus of over 25 billion pounds in the last three years, but instead of interest rates going down, they went up to 13.5 per cent in February. Inflation went up too, to an average rate of 9 per cent as of January, so the connection our government assumes between no deficit and lower interest rates just does not exist.

It has taken the British 11 hard years to learn that Margaret Thatcher was wrong. I hope it will take Canadians far less time to see that this government is wrong too.

GORDON TOWERS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it would be a challenge for anyone to follow Her Honour, the Lieutenant-Governor of Alberta, but an individual has been chosen who will maintain the high standards established for that office.

I am very pleased that a friend of mine, a friend of Alberta, a friend of this House, and a friend of all Canada has accepted the prestigious appointment as the Queen's representative in Alberta.

Our new Lieutenant-Governor is a former rancher, a farmer, a community worker and parliamentarian. After 16 years in this House, he chose to retire prior to the last election.

He and his wife, Doris, were honoured in December when in an outpouring of community love and respect hundreds of friends gathered to celebrate their 50th wedding anniversary.

His neighbours and his many friends applaud this selection. We all extend our sincere wishes for good health and congratulations on a well deserved and fitting appointment as Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Alberta to a former member of this House, Mr. Gordon Towers.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in communities all across the country, there are Canadians waiting for their spouses to be reunited with them. Their spouses are in countries all around the world and are caught in a web of bureaucracy and inefficiency. In not just a few, but in thousands of cases husband and wife have been separated by one or even two years, waiting for immigration authorities to approve their applications.

This government has paid lip service to the objective of family reunification but, in practice, the system is inefficient and bogged down.

Last year, a group of those waiting Canadian spouses came to Ottawa to beg the minister of immigration to help reunite them with their loved ones. The minister promised to help but now, heading into the third month of 1991, no change is evident.

I call on the minister, in the name of compassion, to ensure immediately that applications to unite husband and wife are accelerated. Families are at stake. Now is the time for action, not words.

SEXIST ADVERTISING

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, for 10 years now, February is the month when Sports Illustrated and Inside Sports publish their special "swimsuit" issues. Every year, these magazines register record sales, produce enormous profits and make male "readers" very happy.

Mr. Speaker, such publications are disparaging to men because they appeal to their animal instincts. On the pretence of showing bathing suits, more often than not barely visible, they provide men who are too shy to buy a downright pornographic magazine a modest alternative that will make them forget their sexist attitude. Most men who buy these magazines will argue vigourously that these are sports magazines. They will probably also tell you that they buy Playboy for the articles!

Mr. Speaker, while several women groups oppose these special "swimsuit" issues because of how women are portrayed in them, I think it is also important to point out how badly they portray men.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I call on the Minister of Employment and Immigration to consider the rights of the child as humanitarian and compassionate grounds for landing families in the refugee backlog.

Canada supports the UN convention on the rights of the child which applies to refugee children. The Prime Minister, as chair of the World Summit on Children, last year appealed to all countries to give children a better future with opportunities for healthy development.

I have carefully documented eight families of refugee claimants who have been in Canada two to four years. Their children have been though stress and deprivation and will suffer considerable hardship if they are deported.

A humanitarian amnesty for such children makes budgetary as well as humanitarian sense. The savings in staff can help reduce the new backlog.

NATIONAL NUTRITION MONTH

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, March is the National Nutrition Month in Canada. Every year, the Canadian Dietetic Association organizes a national public awareness campaign on the importance of nutrition and its determining impact on health and quality of life. The 1991 campaign will encourage Canadians to buy healthy food. Throughout the month of March dieteticians will encourage Canadian consumers to check the labels to determine the nutritive value of various food items.

This public awareness campaign will encourage consumers to read labels and adopt eating habits more consistent with the recommendations aimed at enhancing the health of Canadian men and women. I support this initiative of the Canadian Dietetic Association and join with all my hon. colleagues in the House in extending to members our best wishes for a successful 1991 campaign.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the budget introduced on Tuesday, February 26, has been called among other things heartless by the opposition, and yet the business community feels that we have not gone far enough in cutting government spending, although it does support the major thrust of the budget.

I believe that this budget is a well balanced plan that continues to attack the deficit and yet remains sensitive to native communities, senior citizens, veterans, low income Canadians and the disadvantaged by exempting these groups from fiscal cuts or restraints to their programs.

The key to helping people on fixed incomes is to lower inflation so that the value of their dollars will not be eroded. By remaining committed to fighting inflation and reducing the deficit, this government proves it is realistic in its approach while remaining sensitive.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship has missed the opportunity to bring back last year's cuts to heritage language education.

This minister has even failed to have the new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship Act proclaimed, leaving the law in limbo.

[Translation]

The government has also cut the funds available on average to organizations involved in race relations and intercultural understanding. Although Canadian men and women are looking forward to the new citizenship legislation, it seems rather clear that the government will not introduce it during this session.

At a time when Canadians need to be proud of their citizenship, the minister seems to sheer his responsibility.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Emperor Marcel Masse arrives as Minister of Communications with great expectations and new clothes. With his new office furniture and renovations costing in excess of $100,000, he devised great communications schemes.

When he was not accepting Oscars in Hollywood he was traipsing off to Paris and Europe instead of defending the CBC, the cultural tie that binds Canadians.

He made grandiose announcements of concert halls for Edmonton and Montreal, what appears to be a phantom ballet opera house for Toronto and an ill placed cultural institute for Montreal. But, alas, with a slash of Michael Wilson's knife, they were gone.

In the beginning there was great excitement and anticipation with the new minister who initiated in excess of $9 million worth of task forces in the cultural arena. Unfortunately most have gone virtually ignored.

Minister Masse, with pomp and circumstance, made promises of new telecommunications policy and legislation, copyright reform, cultural industries development bank, cultural products distribution policies for books, film and sound recordings, a global arts policy, and tax measures to improve the socio-economic status of Canada's artists. But, alas, still promises, no action.

It would surely seem that the Emperor has lost his clothes and in the process learned that if all the world's a stage, in the cabinet he is only a stand-in.

How sad for the development of the vitally important cultural role in Canada today.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the measures contained in the Minister of Finance's budget will make it possible for Canada to leave recession behind and start on the way to economic growth.

In addition to reducing the deficit, the budget will contribute to a reduction of interest rates and a renewal of confidence, two essential ingredients to economic recovery.

The budget's main purpose is to bring inflation down. To achieve it, we must control salaries and expenditures.

With the Minister of Finance's budget, the government is clearly demonstrating that it is perfectly aware just how serious Canada's economic and financial situations are and has decided to remedy it once and for all.

To achieve this new growth, however, provinces, municipalities and Crown corporations will have to follow the lead. The message is clear: federal civil servants and organizations cannot be expected to be the only ones to tighten their belts.

Mr. Speaker, we must work together within an extended national partnership.

MANUFACTURERS' SALES TAX

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance stated that the 5 per cent tax subsidy for manufacturing and processing is being maintained to offset a U.S. export tax subsidy.

Well, the Minister of Finance did not tell the whole story. The fact is that the U.S. government repealed its tax in 1986, and at that time Canadian manufacturers and processors argued that Canada should keep the tax credit to offset the manufacturers' sales tax.

This unfair, dastardly manufacturers' sales tax is no longer in existence and it has been replaced by the GST, but yet the manufacturing and processing sectors continue to receive this tax break.

This subsidy costs $1 billion a year. In a spirit of tax fairness, should the finance minister not have repealed this tax boondoggle?

VICTORIA CROSS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, recently the Monarchist League of Canada and others have discovered that when the Government of Canada, two decades ago, decided to Canadianize awards, honours, and decorations it also made Canadians ineligible for British awards and honours, thus excluding Canadians from awards for which they had been eligible for centuries.

With the outbreak of the war in the gulf which, thank goodness, has apparently ended without Canadian casualties, the attention of some focused on awards for valour in battle that could be won by Canadians and discovered that the legendary and prestigious Victoria Cross no longer was among those available to Canadians, as Canadians. Indeed, it has been gone for nearly 20 years, but they did not notice.

Now we are told that a proposal is before cabinet to establish a new cross of Canada to replace the Victoria Cross. This change, we are told, is part of the evolution of Canada as a nation. But surely so also is the VC a part of Canada's history and Canada's heritage, and not just the heritage of Canadians of British ancestral origin. For example, the first Nova Scotian to win the VC traced his origins to Africa, for he was a black man called William Hall.

Why not establish a Canadian award that respects and recognizes our history and heritage? Why not the Victoria Cross of Canada?

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, and I hope he will have the courage to answer. Yesterday, during an interview on the CBC English network, a reporter asked Citizen's Forum Chairman Keith Spicer if he was a federalist. I quote Mr. Spicer's answer:

> I am a Canadian and I don't care what the plumbing is. I am totally indifferent as to whether we have a federal, a confederal, or sovereignty association regime.

I ask the Prime Minister: Does he agree that the difference between federalism and sovereignty association is mere plumbing?

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the Bloc Quebecois has been seeking to undermine the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, which is designed to bring Canadians together. But I will be darned if I can figure out why the Liberals and the NDP have been attacking the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, which is designed to bring Canada together.

The implication that Keith Spicer or any of his distinguished colleagues are not 100 per cent committed to Canada is extremely unfortunate and misleading, coming from the Acting Leader of the Opposition. In difficult circumstances, they have been doing a very important job for Canada. The jury is still out, but oftentimes when the jury comes in the results are different from those anticipated by the press.

I believe that the Spicer commission will make a major contribution to the unity of Canada.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the Prime Minister would want to avoid answering the question, and he has avoided it.

I would like to ask him again, very directly: Yesterday in an interview the chairman of the citizens' forum, when asked if he was a federalist, stated:

> I'm a Canadian and I don't care what the plumbing is. I really don't care. I'm totally indifferent as to whether we have a federal or confederal or sovereignty association regime—

I ask the Prime Minister: Does he agree that the difference between federalism and sovereignty association is mere plumbing and, if he does not agree, what specific action does he intend to take?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is astonishing that the Acting Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition would not accept from the chairman, Keith Spicer, a very distinguished if somewhat controversial Canadian, in response to the question: "I am a Canadian." That is what Mr. Spicer said. That is what I am.

And why, by indirection, would the Acting Leader of the Opposition be impugning the integrity of Mr. Spicer's commitment to Canada is beyond me.

The unity of Canada is under challenge. I can understand my friend from Granby who is heckling from the backbench. I can understand why the Bloc Quebecois is seeking to undermine an instrument which is designed to preserve and protect the unity of Canada, but why the Liberals and the NDP are doing it is beyond me.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the issue is not the chairman of the commission. The issue is the Prime Minister, who has appointed and continues to keep in his place a president of a commission designed to guarantee the unity of Canada, a president who does not understand the difference between federalism and sovereignty association. This Prime Minister is the person who named Keith Spicer and this Prime Minister is the one who bears the responsibility for a commission that is costing the taxpayers $5,000 an hour, $18 a minute, $118,000 a week and we have a president who does not understand what Canada means.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister what specific action he intends to take to remove the cloud of controversy which has fallen over this commission by his decision to appoint a president who does not understand the difference between federalism and sovereignty association?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see that the Acting Leader of the Opposition has figured out somehow that the commission is costing $18 a minute. Well, I can tell her that if this commission—

Ms. Copps: And $14 a second.

Mr. Mulroney: $14 a second, she now says. Well, Canada in my judgment is worth at least $14 a second.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Distinguished people like Rick Cashin, one of Newfoundland's most distinguished union leaders; Carol Corcoran, an aboriginal attorney from British Columbia; Fil Fraser, Thomas Kierans, Robert Tassé, Susan Van de Velde, Elsie Wayne, the mayor of Saint John, New Brunswick; Helena Zukowski, Raymond Sirois, Jim Matkin from British Columbia—these are all very able and accomplished Canadians who have made sacrifices to serve Canada in trying to bring the country together. None of these people was looking for a job. None of them is seeking to profit from the public trough and the suggestion from the Leader of the Opposition that this is the case is unseemly and unworthy and should be repudiated in the interests, both of a united Canada and any fundamental order of decency.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This nation desperately needs a sense of purpose, not in six months, but now. Canadians are disengaging themselves from this, the most important national unity debate since Confederation. This nation cries for direction.

The question is, why has the Prime Minister not provided it? Why has his only response been to set up a royal commission, divided among itself and a chief commissioner who sees no wrong in sovereignty association. The Prime Minister is right. Do not defend Spicer, defend yourself, defend your own record.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting that my hon. friend from LaSalle—Émard says a sense of purpose is lacking and that the problem is that no leadership is being provided. This is exactly what he said, and the member for Hamilton East said, about the new Leader of the Opposition, when both of them were supporting Meech Lake and he scuttled it.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): I will tell you what I said, Mr. Speaker. What I said was that as a—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

Mr. Martin: I will tell you what I said a month ago. I said that I resented, as a Quebecer, that the Prime Minister for the first time in six years pronounced the word "Canada" in Quebec.

The problems of the Spicer commission are simply a reflection of the lack of direction of this government. It is not just the Constitution, it is everything this government touches. This Prime Minister is ripping the country apart. His high interest rates continue to set region against region.

Mr. Speaker, he has abandoned economic policy to the Americans, and social policy to the provinces. The question is, what happens to national purpose when the federal government becomes a eunuch?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that a distinguished Canadian and an excellent parliamentarian would make a statement that is so demonstrably misleading, where he says that for the first time a few weeks ago, the first time in six years, that I, as Prime Minister of Canada, pronounced the word "Canada" in Quebec. That statement is profoundly false. I know my hon. friend, whom I have known for a long time, will want to rise and correct it at the earliest possible opportunity.

Where he says the question of leadership, I remember well—I cannot give it to him chapter and verse but I can paraphrase—where he said not six weeks ago but six months ago, he said the greatest problem facing the Liberal party is that "we cannot get Jean Chrétien to say where he stands on anything". "Jean", you said, "come out of the high grass and for once, if you say you are going to be a leader, tell us where you stand". That is what he said then.

NATIONAL UNITY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. People everywhere are wondering about our country's future. Figures given in the budget and the estimates reveal that the government spends money on that issue: almost $18 million for the Spicer commission; over $8 million for the Task Force on National Unity; close to $7 million for the Federal-Provincial Relations Office, and almost $1 million for the parliamentary committee on the amending formula. Obviously the Prime Minister has a plan in mind. My question is this: To what will all this lead—a weekend at Meech Lake, a First Ministers' conference, or simply a position to negotiate with the provinces? Where is he going? Canadians have the right to know.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend asks where will this lead. We will have to wait for the findings of the various commissions of inquiry, the Spicer commission, the Beaudoin–Edwards commission and the various commissions appointed by Premier Rae, Premier Filmon, Premier Bourassa and others. We will have to wait. One of the complaints and one of the criticisms directed to the federal government and to all the First Ministers the last time was that the process which in 1987 gave birth to the Meech Lake Accord led to the exclusion of the ordinary Canadian—inadvertently, perhaps. So we decided we would listen to the ordinary Canadian. That is what the Spicer commission is doing. That is what the Beaudoin–Edwards commission is doing. I am surprised to see that now that the provinces and the federal government have set up a series of mechanisms to listen to the people, to ordinary Canadians, the NDP is against it.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister. My question to the Prime Minister was simply that the budget and the estimates indicate that the Prime Minister has a plan. He has funding in the budget for the commission, for a national force on unity. We are not objecting to that, we are simply saying to the Prime Minister that Canadians want to know what is happening and what the Prime Minister's plan is.

What Canadians do see, as well, are the cutbacks which the Prime Minister and his government have made to the national programs that have built a base for this country, and been important to this country.

In addition to the various commissions that have been established by the federal government, there are also in this budget indications that the government wants to negotiate new fiscal arrangements with the provinces.

My question to the Prime Minister is simply this. Canadians have a right to know what is on the table, and we would like the Prime Minister to simply answer that question.

• (1430)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend cannot have it both ways. On the one hand the implication of criticism is there, that the government is spending public funds on commissions of inquiry such as the Spicer commission, and the Beaudoin–Edwards commission in respect of the amending formula. On the other hand there was the earlier criticism that the government did not listen to people. Now we have commissions that are going out to listen to tens of thousands of Canadians, to get their opinions on how this position can be devised, and we are being reproached for this by the NDP.

What we are trying to do is involve the greatest number of Canadians possible, both in the process and the ultimate decision. The general belief is that if we are able to do that successfully, without carping and cheap criticism, Canadians will come forward and provide their own dimension of leadership, which will be very beneficial to the finding of an ultimate result.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister refuses simply to say what his plan is for Canadian unity. It is not a question. I was simply pointing out that in the government's own budget there obviously is a plan, a financial plan for the future of this country. I was asking the Prime Minister to explain that. However, he does not choose to do that.

On February 12 the Prime Minister said that it was his values, the values that brought Canadians the goods and services tax, the trade agreement with the United States, and privatization, that he was going to apply those values to the Constitution. In short, the Prime Minister obviously favours a corporate constitution.

If the Spicer commission comes back and reports that the Canadian people do not want his corporate vision of Canada, will the Prime Minister listen to the people of Canada, abandon his Dow Jones version of federalism and start reflecting what Canadians want?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I really did not hear much of a question there, the premise of the question, of course, being inaccurate and misleading. I said no such thing.

The Spicer commission is being sent out without any government direction to seek opinions.

The NDP says: "Name a royal commission and let it be free to do its work with the people." When we do that, it says that we should rein them in, berate the chief commissioner, impugn his integrity and tell them what to do.

We will not do that. The independence of this royal commission is designed to serve Canada by getting the opinions of ordinary Canadians. Putting that in a mix, we think that is a contribution to Canadian unity.

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the supplementary estimates tabled this morning make clear that the Spicer commission is costing the country $119,000 per day or $14 per second. The chairman of that commission said last night, when asked if he was a federalist, that he was totally indifferent as to whether we have a federal, confederal or sovereignty association regime.

The Acting Leader of the Opposition has asked the Prime Minister whether he thinks it is important that the chairman of a commission on national unity distinguish between a federal or sovereignty association regime. The Prime Minister has refused to answer.

As the author of this commission, the one who named it and of course the one who picked the chairman, does the Prime Minister not think it is important that the chairman of a national unity task force distinguish between federalism and sovereignty association?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is the new whip, or whatever he is, of the party opposite.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: My apologies to the whip in waiting. My hon. friend raises questions about an answer that was given. I have not seen the full exchange between the journalist and the chairman of the commission. I would have to examine the context, but they are members of a body that from time to time claims it would rather the construction be placed perfectly on its words to avoid any misinterpretation. I think, in fairness, that same privilege should be granted to the chairman of the forum on Canadian unity. Surely there can be no doubt whatsoever about the commitment of Keith Spicer to the unity and well-being of this country. The sinister questions impugning his integrity by the Liberals is unworthy of their role as the Official Opposition.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, we want to make it perfectly clear it is not Mr. Spicer's integrity we are interested in, it is his opinion of Canada and whether or not he is able to distinguish between sovereignty association and federalism that we are interested in.

Canadians who are paying $3,592,000 a month or almost $18 million over five months for this commission are entitled to know on what basis the Prime Minister selected this chairman to chair this commission. Did the Prime Minister assure himself that the chairman had a view of Canada and the renewal of Canada consistent with that which has been traditionally espoused by members of all the national parties in this House?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in French we would call this "un procès d'intention", with Mr. Spicer on the receiving end.

The hon. member asked why and on what basis we selected Mr. Spicer as chairman of this important commission on Canada's future.

[English]

In response to my hon. friend, I can tell him that when we considered various candidates for this difficult and exacting job, and we knew it was going to be tough and we knew as well that there would probably be more criticism than displays of gratitude along the way, we were looking for someone who recognized that and, notwithstanding that, was ready to leave a very important job as chairman of the CRTC and its security to accept this particular job.

Why, because we looked at his background. He had experience as a professor and as a journalist. He had lived in western Canada in British Columbia and in Ontario. He had made himself impeccably bilingual, which is a fundamental characteristic of this nation, and he had performed in an exceptional manner as commissioner of official languages for Canada. He had become editor of one of the most distinguished newspapers in this country. He had all of the qualities to serve Canada well in the future as he did in the past.

If my hon. friend is not satisfied with those credentials, he should look at his own.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance about something else that is fundamental to keeping this country together.

The finance minister keeps saying there is going to be an economic recovery in the spring. Just yesterday, Philip Cross, an analyst with Statistics Canada, the government's own statistical agency said, speaking about the eleventh straight drop in economic indicators: "There is no sign of a turnaround".

Why is the government persisting with a budget that is so out of touch with reality? Why will the government not make changes to that budget and bring in programs that will create jobs and get the economy moving forward right now? Why the delay?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, who has had some experience in the financial field, knows full well that most independent forecasters agree with the assessment of the Minister of Finance, including most of the leading chartered banks in Canada, that the economic turnaround will begin in the summer, will be well under way in the autumn and will produce economic growth of 3.5 per cent next year and 4 per cent in successive years. This would cause Canada to rank again behind Japan as the second most substantial leader in terms of economic growth of the G–7 and the OECD countries. My hon. friend knows that. He also knows that our recovery must be predicated on driving interest rates down so as to encourage investor confidence. We are seeing that in abundance because of the strength of the dollar, which is attracting international support on a regular and daily basis.

No one can foresee the future perfectly, but I think there is general agreement that to the extent that anybody can predict months ahead, the Minister of Finance has accurately laid out a very sound game plan that will bring about prosperity and growth and jobs for Canadians.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has just contradicted the Minister of Finance, admitting that it is his view that the recovery will not come until this summer when the Minister of Finance assured us in his budget it was going to come as early as this spring.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): It is too bad the Prime Minister did not say what he said today about interest rates last spring. We would be in a much better situation right now.

The Prime Minister is interested in outside experts. Why will he not listen to Marie Quinn, vice–president of the national employment agency, Manpower Temporary Services. Speaking of Toronto where, if the Minister of Finance is right, we should be seeing some signs of economic recovery right now, she said, and I quote: "We are not seeing anything out there suggesting things are picking up".

I ask the Prime Minister: Why has the government introduced a budget based on economic recovery this spring, when that is just not happening? Why is the government so blindly obstinate? Why is the government refusing to respond when it comes to the real needs of Canadians for jobs and growth right now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow my hon. friend to open that kind of a breach between the Minister of Finance and myself. I meant early summer and the minister meant late spring.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that interest rates have come down some 408 basis points since their high of last spring; all indications are now, after 14 or 15 consecutive weeks, that the bank rate will continue to drop. All signs cause us to believe that the recovery will be sound and solid, and it will indeed be predicated upon non–inflationary growth based on lower interest rates.

My hon. friend knows, because he was involved in 1980 in an exchange with someone on a television program, Morty Shulman, who asked him: "What happens if the Liberals get back in in this election in February and interest rates go up, because you have guaranteed they go down," and the member for Windsor West said: "If interest rates go up, I will resign on the spot". They went up 15 points almost over that period of time and he is still here.

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. National medicare was originally a 50–50 partnership between the federal gov– ernment and the provinces. This partnership was broken by the Liberals with the introduction of block funding and unilateral cuts.

In August 1983 in Nova Scotia, the Prime Minister personally pledged to restore the 50–50 partnership. I quote: "A pumped up federal contribution is a priority item for us".

My question for the Prime Minister is: Why has his government not honoured this pledge for a 50–50 partnership and why has the federal share dropped below 37 per cent with this budget?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, indeed the federal commitment to these programs continues to grow on a regular basis, as the minister of health pointed out yesterday.

Some $14 billion is transferred from the federal government every year to the provinces. There is in the neighbourhood of $28 billion to $30 billion that is being transferred on an over-all basis, second only to the payments we make on the size of the debt.

While some provinces such as British Columbia have debt servicing charges of 5 or 6 cents on the dollar, and even a have-not province like New Brunswick has some 16 cents, the federal government inherited a situation where 35 cents on every dollar must go to pay the interest on the debt. What we must do to maintain the integrity of the programs, and make sure that the federal government can continue to do this, is get back eventually to a situation that prevailed when the Liberals first came to power in 1968 when they were only spending 12 cents per dollar on debt servicing.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my second question is also for the Prime Minister.

In 1983, the Prime Minister stated that federal medicare shares in certain cases will have to reach even higher than 50 per cent in such areas as northern B.C., New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

The reality today is that these provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and B.C. are being forced to cut medical services and consider user fees because of the cuts by the federal government.

What happened to the commitment for at least 50 per cent funding on medicare? In particular, what happened to it in this budget in 1991?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has consistently honoured its commitments to the provinces by granting increased amounts of money every year.

For example, in the forthcoming year, our contributions to the provinces will increase in the neighbourhood of 3.7 per cent, while we will be keeping our own expenditures in the neighbourhood of 3.2 or 3.3 per cent.

We are giving more to the provinces than we are spending on other government programs. One of the problems that has taken place in regard to the question raised by my hon. friend is the manner in which some provinces have treated the moneys that they have received.

The provinces are in a healthier fiscal situation than the federal government. It is up to them as well to make sure that Canadians are provided with first class services. The Government of Canada contributes more than its share to this kind of program.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

OGILVY RENAULT

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

Will the Prime Minister tell the House why his old law firm in Montreal has received the right to act for his government on the privatization of Petro-Canada, based in Calgary? Is that not, in reality, a fresh application of the abuse of office principles at work in his government's awarding of the CF-18 contract as well?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the kindest interpretation that can be put on the hon. member's question is that it reflects the complete ignorance of the structure of complex commercial transactions.

The hon. member's question is not only insulting, but it is false and misleading. Perhaps I could enlighten him by advising him that first of all Petro-Canada based in Calgary has its own counsel. It has always had its own counsel.

The Minister of State for Privatization, in drafting the legislation to allow the privatization of Petro-Canada, retained the firm of Ogilvy Renault to advise the government. That firm has been retained to advise the Government of Canada on the ongoing process of privatization.

The hon. member should be aware that that legal work is far from a major part of legal work involved in the privatization of Petro-Canada.

The major part of the work will relate to the public offering of shares of Petro-Canada. That work will be contracted by the consortium which will offer the shares of Petro-Canada. This government urges that consortium to retain Alberta legal counsel in performing that work.

• (1450)

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, having worked in the minister's Department of Justice previously, I know how her department awards counsel. I would remind her that there have been 50 privatizations in British Columbia alone from her own seatmates, and so there are lawyers in Vancouver that know something about privatization. There are 12,000 practising lawyers in western Canada, many of whom know a lot about privatization in oil and gas.

My supplementary is to the Prime Minister. Oil and gas is one of the few industries based in western Canada. Will the Prime Minister or his agent reconsider this act of blatant patronage? Why does it have to go to Montreal? Why does it have to go to the Prime Minister's old law firm?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, politics certainly does make strange bedfellows.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is always a wondrous sight to see any Liberal rise in this House to raise a question with respect to the energy industry in Alberta. It is particularly remarkable to see that member who appears to have adopted his party's position with the zeal of a convert.

I would remind the hon. member that we on this side of the House are very aware of the fact that the energy industry is centred in Alberta.

An hon. member: It has been for a long time.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): We are not the party of the National Energy Program—

An hon. member: Certainly not.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): —the program which not only devastated the energy industry in Alberta, but dealt a body blow to the legal profession in Alberta which supports that industry. It is this government, in fact, in recognition of the fact that the energy industry is centred in Alberta that has made the decision to move the National Energy Board to Alberta.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Employment and Immigration).

Socio-economic agencies in eastern Quebec have sounded the alarm in a manner unprecedented since the Depression in the thirties. We have a disastrous economic situation, unemployment and now, sections 28 and 30 of the present Unemployment Insurance Act, which are unrealistic and penalize the unemployed.

Does the minister not realize that changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act are badly needed?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, need I remind the House that the purpose of unemployment insurance reform was to deal with the high levels of unemployment that exist in the regions to which the hon. member referred?

We changed the system of economic regions, something which had not been done for 12 years, so that the legislation would better reflect community needs. Speaking for the government, I repeat that we are firmly resolved to continue to work with the communities. Our budgets have been maintained, and the answer is to make things work and bring together our budgets and the initiatives of our communities.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not realize these agencies represent the people of that area? My Quebec colleagues and I spoke to these agencies who are begging the government to amend sections 28 and 30.

Considering the needs and fears that exist in this particular group, does the minister think it is time to at least consider the possibility of changing measures that are damaging the social fabric of our society?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to a region I know very well, and to past social conditions with which I was also very familiar, even before 1984, when I was trying to help restore the economy of eastern Quebec and peripheral regions.

I am convinced that our present CJS and the programs that draw on community resources, are a success. That is the approach we must continue to take, and this applies to all communities and to municipal, provincial and federal governments as well.

OGILVY RENAULT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

In avoiding the questions of the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast, the minister said that the hon. member displayed—and I believe I have this, Mr. Speaker—"complete ignorance of the complex structure of financial relations".

I understand that the minister, who is deemed to have a very high IQ, has doubtless a very fine grasp of these matters. I wonder if she can explain, other than its ties with the PMO, what arcane and wonderful qualifications Ogilvy Renault enjoys that cannot be found among the major law firms of Alberta?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): I believe what I said was "ignorance of the structure of complex commercial transactions". Perhaps the hon. member wants to correct that.

The retention of Ogilvy Renault as one of many firms which will be working in this area is not to cast aspersions on other firms. It has experience. It has advised the Government of Canada on the drafting of the legislation, and its expertise on securities, intellectual property, real estate, labour and pension law, are very appropriate to the Government of Canada's interests in this particular transaction.

I wish to assure the hon. member that in fact there will be enormous quantities of work for the law firms in Alberta as this process unfolds. I would also point out that there is a very important principle in the practise of law of conflict where a firm may only act for one party or transaction. Since most of the purchasers of interest in Petro-Canada will be in Alberta, many of the Alberta law firms will also be retained to act for those parties.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, building on the minister's enthusiasm for Alberta firms, might I ask the Prime Minister if he would be so kind as to direct the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs to direct Dominion Securities to include any available and competent Alberta brokers in its sales effort and to list the issue on the Alberta Stock Exchange for the duration of the privatization?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the minister pointed out, the question and the newspaper story that was leaked last night by my hon. friend for Edmonton Southeast is completely, totally, wrong and misleading. I point out to my hon. friend that the only thing wrong with his question is that inasmuch as the Government of Canada has already instructed the consortium that will be selling the shares to use Alberta counsel, we have also instructed the consortium to use Alberta brokers.

HOUSING

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing.

Recently, we learned that the NDP government in Ontario will not keep its promise to deliver 20,000 affordable housing units in the province. With close to 250,000 homeless Canadians, over-crowded shelters, and thousands of people on the waiting lists for housing, can the minister tell Canadians how he can justify a 15 per cent cut to the new housing initiative budget and what plans he has in mind to reverse his government's decision and give some help to the homeless of Canada?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the thrust of the budget is to get interest rates down, to get Canadians back to work, and to get the housing industry moving again so that we can provide housing for all of those people who need it so desperately. Also, as the hon. member I am sure is aware, because of the economies that the federal housing department has been able to accomplish, we will be able to produce exactly the same number of housing units as we did last year in the coming year, notwithstanding the fact that we will have less money.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the minister is not suggesting that they have in fact accommodated the housing sector's demands.

As the minister is no doubt aware, the establishment of a federal housing department reflects some federal responsibility in that area. How does the minister hope to fulfill this responsibility with a 15 per cent cut in the budget of his new housing initiative? Did he urge the government not to renege on its commitment to the poor in Canada or does he think it is better not to raise the issue claiming that no one will listen anyway?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, certainly we will be fulfilling our commitment to the poor of Canada this year. As the hon. member is aware, right now we support some 640,000 homes across the country and we spend close to $2 billion of federal taxpayers' money to carry out that support.

This year we will be able to assist an additional 40,000 homes. All of that will be done, even though we are spending less money, because Canadians want their government to do things better, to do it more efficiently, and to be able to produce more or the same amount with less money. That is exactly what we are going to be doing this year in housing.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1991–92

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–97, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the adjournment of the House at 1 p.m., the hon. member for Crowfoot had the floor. He has 16 minutes left.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, when I concluded at one o'clock, prior to lunch, I had just undergone two speeches in this House, which in the name of lowering interest rates gave a litany of things they would like to spend money on. I want to summarize that part of my comments very quickly and then move on to another subject.

Surely every Canadian everywhere has to ask the question: If the debt is to grow without end, is health care more secure? Is education more likely? Is housing more probable? Is job training more certain? Surely, the more the provinces, the municipalities, the federal government and citizens themselves extend what we have today into tomorrow by borrowing and borrowing so that some future generation has to pay, clearly the weaker becomes our social safety net; not stronger but weaker.

While the aspirations of those of the Liberal and the NDP are laudable aspirations to be commended and congratulated, surely they must come face to face at some point with the reality that we cannot just wish for these aspects of life; we have to earn our way to be able to afford them.

I believe that a former member of this House, who represented a Toronto riding and then became the leader of the New Democratic Party for the province of Ontario, is going right through that exercise at this very moment. He went into an election campaign for the province of Ontario, promising that there would be no increase in university tuition fees. He went through an election campaign in which he said that he would offer, as was revealed today in Question Period, 20,000 new housing units.

The only reason he is changing his mind is not because these aspects of life have become negative. It is because the new premier of Ontario came face to face with reality. He came face to face with the recognition that we cannot just wish for things, but rather have to put in place the building blocks that will allow the economy to be able to afford.

What separates the government party from those of the two opposition parties? It is not the recognition of what might be good for citizens. It really comes down to the simple difference that what the NDP in particular would like us to do is to wish for a greater redistribution of wealth, without ever putting in place at all any capacity for the creation of wealth. If we cannot create wealth in this nation, we cannot have the aspirations satisfied that so many citizens want.

I would like for a few moments to turn to a very different subject—one that showed up in the budget—dealing with the use of tobacco and the taxes that apply to it, and to give my reflections on why I believe the government has approached this issue in the right way.

The use of tobacco in this country, in all countries, in every country, among every person of every age group, is something that brings harm to our health, that costs us in lost time on the job and that costs us severely in terms of our medical costs. It is the only product on the Canadian market today that is harmful to a person's health when used according to the manufacturer's intentions. It is a product for which there is no safe level of use. Many people point to other products and say these are also harmful. Those other products usually are harmful if abused, but for the tobacco product there is no safe level of use.

Therefore, I think it was appropriate when the Minister of Finance was drawing up a budget that he would add three cents tax per cigarette.

I want to extract from that what else he might have done that he did not do. Because of the involvement of Canadians in defending freedom in the gulf region, because of the involvement of Canadians to ensure that the citizens of Kuwait would be able to retain and to have their homeland, this budget was one that had to find enough capacity to pay for that expense.

It would have been possible for a six cent per litre increase in gasoline to raise the same amount of revenue without increasing income tax. Clearly such a move would have been inflationary and it would have hit hard on trains, boats and airplanes: all modes of transportation. In a country like Canada, so large in its geography, such an impact would have been very serious.

We could have raised the same amount of money, had we added a two-cent per cigarette tax and a two-cent per litre tax on gasoline. But what is important is that a one-cent tax on cigarettes is equal to two cents of tax on a litre of gasoline, in terms of its net to the Government of Canada, and that even includes the projections for those Canadians who will quit smoking as a result of the higher price.

One approach would have been inflationary, whereas the other one has an impact on a habit that is harmful, that is damaging, and that is threatening to the health of Canadians everywhere.

When we take a look at what is happening in our country in terms of tobacco use, one observation that can be made is this: very few Canadians older than 22 or 23 years of age begin to smoke. If they have got to that point in their life without smoking, in all probability they will remain non-smokers for the rest of their lives.

What happens from the early twenties throughout the rest of one's life is that education is increasingly having an impact on the smoking habit. However, between approximately 10 years of age and 17, 18 or 19 years of age, but particularly in the early teen years, price is very much related to whether or not young people will start the habit of smoking.

To put a tax of three cents per cigarette on manufactured tobacco products and tobacco has a very positive impact on keeping young people from smoking.

I think it is very much a case that we have to put in place the kinds of policies which tend to decrease the amount of use of tobacco in this country for all of the harmful reasons we all know are there in terms of health costs.

This can be said of a tobacco company: A tobacco company is nobody's friend and it is everybody's enemy. After making that comment, I also want to take a moment to say that I recognize and I am fully aware and very cognizant of the fact that there are persons who make their living from the tobacco industry. In particular, I address my comments to those producers who grow tobacco and make their money from that product.

While it is the case we are in a society that is becoming increasingly more sensitized to good health and good environment, one cannot debate this issue and not have compassion for and even bear the obligation of having to go further to put in place the kinds of research that will seek out alternative crops, to seek out alternative opportunities and to put in place safety nets, because these persons are now having their incomes jeopardized for reasons not of their own causing.

While on the one hand I am very strongly committed that the more we can do to reduce tobacco use in this country, the better off our whole nation will be. We are able to generate tax revenues for our country without inflationary pressures. At the same time we bear a burden to those who earn their income from such ways where they need other options in order to maintain good family life on what is good agricultural lands and they need to have some kind of protection.

The dangers of tobacco are not confined to direct users of cigarettes. While 35,000 Canadians every year, year after year, each year will die from the use of tobacco, an additional 3,500 die from side-stream smoke or from being in the environment of heavy smoking. Persons who work in certain bars or in certain confined areas where smoking is a heavy, habitual habit, just by their presence in those rooms are obtaining lung diseases and heart diseases that are causing them to suffer the pangs of what happens from the tobacco industry, which has grown on the basis of providing poor health for citizens everywhere.

What I find sinister about the tobacco industry is that prior to the 1940s and 1950s the major users of tobacco were males. Somewhere about that time we were becoming as a North American society more cognizant of good physical fitness. Men throughout North America began to reduce tobacco consumption, and advertising was put in place to direct and to influence more females to take on the use of tobacco. The product Virginia Slims and the insulting slogan of "You've come a long way, baby" were used in advertisement to try to attract women to the habit of smoking.

As that stabilized, what then became the next market of the tobacco industry was to focus on young people, up until such time as governments put in place the restrictions on advertising that disallowed not only the use of tight jeans and the kind of lifestyle advertising that made young people think that smoking was a chic thing to do, but banned it altogether so it was not even an influence within the Canadian market at all.

What the tobacco industry is doing today by going into the Third World nations, selling high tar tobacco, not even processed or refined to what we think of as an acceptable standard in North America, and trying to perpetuate the use of tobacco among these relatively uninformed, unsuspecting Third World citizens is a fact of business policy that simply cannot be tolerated or accepted.

They somehow need to diversify and get out of their industry not only for the sake of the health of Canadians, not only for the sake of the fact that they have been involved in a product that is morally wrong because it kills so many people. They have also to bear a burden that they as a company, not just government, owe something to the farmers who produce their product and that they as major tobacco companies need to get involved in the rediversification and the ability of these producers to be able to raise new products without having to have their livelihoods stripped away.

This product, which is as addictive as cocaine and heroin and has been established and researched in some 50 nations by more than 3,000 creditable studies has been proven time in and time out to be harmful to one's health, dangerous to those who are in the presence of smokers. It is highly addictive. It is causing one of the major costs of our society in terms of lost time and health damage. I think the time has come when clearly we as Canadians everywhere have to send the signal that the habit of smoking is unacceptable. It is intolerable but, most of all, we should commend those in the budget process who used that process to stop at least another 10,000 to 15,000 young people from developing the habit.

Hopefully next year there will be another increase in the tax on tobacco. I hope the companies will bear a major burden in helping provincial governments and the federal government to re-establish new possibilities for those in the tobacco growing regions, because they bear the burden of doing something humanitarian rather than simply going from men, to women, to children, to the Third World, perpetually trying to sell a product that should not be on the market in the first place.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the comments and the speech of the hon. member. I was amazed that he went on for 20 minutes about the budget and in fact about one particular aspect of the budget: the evils of tobacco.

I want to ask him a very simple question. If what the hon. member says is true, and if there was the commitment of the Minister of Finance to the points that the hon. member raised, surely the way to effect that change would have been to put perhaps a 10 or 15 cents per cigarette tax on cigarettes. Surely this is all just window dressing to try to dress up a disaster of a budget.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, generally the member who made the speech takes the opportunity to respond to a question or comment. This was not done in this case.

I think it is not just a question of getting into a bidding war as to who could demonstrate the sincerity of their opposition to the evils of tobacco by the severity of the tax, whether it be three cents a cigarette or fifteen cents a cigarette. I think that the hon. member who spoke for the government is undoubtedly sincere in his concern about the effects of smoking and about the extent to which nicotine addiction is every bit as strong as that of cocaine or heroin.

On the other hand, although I do not oppose the tax in the budget, no one has every suggested that the solution to heroin addiction is to up the price of heroin, or to up the price of cocaine, because many of these problems are much more deep rooted than simply the price of the particular product. I would caution the hon. member against any sort of simplistic correlation between price and the ability to break oneself of the habit. In fact, if anything, trying to solve these problems through taxation tends to punish poorer addicts over wealthy addicts. If you are one of those people who unfortunately cannot break the habit of smoking, if you happen to be affluent, you are going to continue to pay the price. If you are poor and you cannot pay that price, but you must continue to pay it because you cannot find your way out of the addiction, then other things are going to suffer—it might be the kids, it might be other things.

I would certainly encourage the government, if it is serious about trying to break Canadians of nicotine addiction to look not only to the tax system, but to look for other ways to help people shake what admittedly is a very difficult habit to break completely and utterly, as I know from my own experience and from the experience of so many other people.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I never responded to the first member because I was waiting for a question and there was none. Since the hon. member for Winnipeg Strathcona wants me to—

Mr. Blaikie: Transcona not Strathcona.

Mr. Malone: Yes, and I could appreciate why you would want that distinction.

What the hon. member raises is certainly a legitimate question. Why are we treating cocaine and heroin differently from tobacco? The answer, I think, is fairly straightforward and it is that we have gone through several generations where tobacco was, and is today, legal.

If tobacco use were discovered today, if Sir Walter Raleigh popped up today and said: "Guess what I have found, this stuff that you can chew, put in your nose, and smoke in paper," and if we knew the research that we know today about it, I virtually would guarantee that this product would be illegal. Its addiction is equal to that of heroin and cocaine, and its health hazards are such that no matter how you use it, it is harmful, even being in its presence.

But cocaine and heroin came on the scene when we knew their damage and they were illegal and they are illegal at the present time.

Then the hon. member says: "Well, what about this question of price?" I thought I had answered that in my formal comments. Persons above the age of 20 who have not yet smoked do not develop the habit. With very rare exception they do not develop the habit. What research has established is that in those years from age 10 through to the end of the teens, the single most impacting factor to decrease tobacco use is price.

We could make it illegal, but then we come face to face with the question of what purpose would it be to make a product illegal with a portion of our society so strongly addicted. They would find it virtually impossible to quit. They would perform all kinds of inappropriate social behaviour to try and put in place the continuation of a habit to satisfy an addiction.

By implication, though, I think that that inference might have been made. The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona says that he did not intend that, and I take him at his word.

I think that price has been established to be effective in keeping young people from smoking. When we look at the other options that a government might have had for raising the funds—very clearly one it might have gone to is a tax on fuel—there would have been an inflationary impact. I think this is a commendable way to go to raise funds without being inflationary and, at the same time, put a real, significant damper on a bad habit around the world wherever it may be used.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I also want, in the context of the budget, to suggest to the member that the government is willing to consider punitive taxes in order to eradicate bad habits, which is what we have here in the form of the tobacco tax and the argument being made by the hon. member. I wish it would have considered suggestions made by members of my party and members of the environmental community, about looking at what we might call "green taxes" or "eco taxes" or "environmental taxes", that is, taxes which would discourage the use of products which are harmful, not just to the individual environment of a smoker's lungs, but to the global or shared environment of the planet earth.

There was a lot of talk, for instance, about a carbon tax. In the same way that smoke pollutes the human body, the greenhouse effect and various other things which go into the atmosphere are having a long-term deleterious effect on the global environment. It seems to me that at some point governments are going to have to come to the view that they ought to use the tax system, among other things, because I would go back to my other argument that the tax system itself is not the only way to deal with this, but to see the tax system as one weapon in the arsenal, so to speak—forgive the military analogies—that the government has to deal with environmental problems. Therefore, you could look to taxes which would discourage the use of certain kinds of products.

I wonder if the member has given any thought to that kind of strategy when it comes to the environment, given the premise he has already accepted with respect to the tax and the pollution that tobacco represents.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In one minute, the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, with only one minute, I want to be very clear and very short. I would never accept a carbon tax. I would accept an energy tax, if that were the wisdom of a government at some future date. It would have to be on all energy, because I think pointing a finger at the petrochemical industry and talking about carbons, we fail to see what the hydro industry and methane gas does to our environment. To single out a region and an area of the country and place a tax upon it would be unfair, first of all.

When it comes to the question of taxing bad habits, that might be appropriate. It was not a thought I had considered. But if we do go that distance, then we would also in Question Period want to find a system of taxing preambles, argumentative questions and those that are repetitive, such as today's Question Period was, where we had the same question being asked many times over. Clearly, according to the rules of the House, those are very bad habits and ought to be subject to taxation.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to stand in the House today to discuss with members Bill C-97, which will borrow in excess of $26 billion and which members know is part of the government's budget.

[Translation]

What I intend to do is to ask four questions. First, what are this budget and this bill doing for the economy, the economic development of Canada and this government-made recession we have in Canada? Second, what will this budget and this bill do for national unity? Will they make things better or worse? Third, how will this Budget affect education? I raised that question in this House last Wednesday. Finally, once those facts are established, I would like to ask a last question: how much hope and confidence should we, Canadians, put in this government, based on the decisions made in this budget and this bill?

• (1530)

[English]

Members know we are working within an ideological framework that goes something like this. There is a high dollar, high interest approach to economic development. Basically what is supposed to happen is that inflation should be controlled. Supposedly that should fuel the economy and create jobs.

We need to admit—and I believe this is quite true—that what we have received this year is not terribly different from what was presented in previous years. It may vary somewhat in degree, but for all intents and purposes it is extremely similar. What have been the government's successes to date? Let us review those quickly.

Many members will recall the victims of the government's policies. I am referring to VIA Rail, with 2,700 Canadians no longer working. I am referring to CN, where there has been an announcement to the effect that 2,900 Canadians will lose their jobs. I am referring to the Air Canada privatization, where another 2,900 Canadians are without jobs, many of them extremely skilled people. There are pilots who have devoted much of their lives to gaining the skills required, and many others in a number of other professions.

Some members will recall the Route Canada fiasco where this company was sold and where 1,900 Canadians paid and continue to pay because some of them have not received wages or pension benefits or severance benefits. I could go on.

What about the CBC cuts? This year alone they are over 1,100. Last year there were 500–odd. These are the kinds of situations in which Canadians have been placed. They are the victims of this made–in–Canada recession, of these government decisions, including this latest budget.

What else has occurred? We have been told and it has been documented that bankruptcies are at a record high. The poor in this country, which is a relatively rich one, total nearly five million, most of whom are women and over one million of whom are children. In Canada this year almost two million people will go to food banks. I am informed that perhaps as many as 40 per cent will be children and that is roughly 500,000 people per month.

There are in this country today five million to seven million functionally illiterate Canadians, which costs the Canadian economy in excess of $10 billion. There are over 1.3 million unemployed, and that could be going up to 1.5 million. There have been cutbacks to health, to education, to social assistance programs, to regions, to various groups—some have been mentioned today—and 33 tax increases including the goods and services tax.

What happens as a result of all of this? Quite apart from the difficulties that Canadians are suffering, the ones I have mentioned and many, many others, well, the deficit is in excess of $30 billion, $30.5 billion. And the debt will be over $400 billion.

I know that my colleagues across the way love to say that is the Liberals' fault. But I have from the Minister of Finance a signed document which says that at the end of fiscal year 1984, the debt was $168 billion. When the interest rates from that day up until now are factored in one finds, interestingly enough, that the debt should have been much less than what it is today. So it really does not add up.

We have to look at that within the global context because do hon. members know what revenues were in 1984? They were around $70 billion. Do you know what they are going to be at the end of the fiscal year? They will be almost $130 billion. That is very close to twice as much. That is a pretty good increase in revenue. So the question is, what has happened to your money and to mine?

Mr. Speaker, there has been little success. The model that is being used by the government is based on a number of assumptions and those assumptions are false. They are not working. Not deliberately so. It just so happens that the model is not operating appropriately.

Let's look at some of those assumptions. The interest rate was predicted to be 11 per cent in 1990–91. But we all know that it averaged 13 per cent. Inflation was predicted to be, I think, in the neighbourhood of 4 per cent, or a little lower. Of course, that is not so; the most recent figure of 6.8 per cent really throws the figures out. The deficit was predicted to be $28.5 billion this year; as I mentioned, it will be $30.5 billion. As you know, in 1985 the same Minister of Finance predicted that the deficit would be $18 billion. That is a far cry from the $30.5 billion that it is.

What about taxes? Personal income taxes were supposed to increase by 9 per cent. But lo and behold, your taxes and mine happened to increase by 15 per cent. What about corporate taxes? They were supposed to decrease by 2 per cent. But what happened? Lo and behold, they were reduced by 10 per cent. And the 1988 corporate tax rate of 34 per cent is now down to 28 per cent.

Economic growth was predicted to be 1.3 per cent in 1990. Well, it is going to be a little more than one-half of that, .8 per cent, apparently. And for 1991 the prediction was 3 per cent in growth, and we expect the economy to shrink by 1 per cent this year.

What were the predictions for employment? It was predicted for 1990–91 that there would be 1.2 per cent growth. But what has really happened is that it will shrink by roughly 1.5 per cent.

Perhaps they have done better with unemployment. The prediction for 1991 was 8.5 per cent unemployment, and now we expect it to be, according to the most recent budget, 10 per cent, or perhaps even slightly more.

With all due respect to the finance minister, his forecasts cannot be trusted and, I hasten to add, not because he is deliberately trying to be misleading but I think simply because he is unable to predict accurately what is happening in this country, and to deal with it appropriately.

The second question that I want to address is: What does this budget and Bill C–97 do for national unity? You know, I know, we all know that the institutions which bind this country together are being systematically destroyed one by one. I have mentioned the CBC, the CBC that spoke to the nation from one coast to the other; and VIA Rail, where we could travel at an affordable price; what about the privatization of Air Canada? What about the cuts to health, education, and social assistance programs? I could go on and identify even more reductions to programs that held this nation together, that gave it a sense of purpose, that gave it direction. But they are being dismantled, and they are being dismantled in such a way that people are losing faith in government. They are losing faith in government, and they are starting to believe that this country can no longer stay together.

This budget has been defined as a separatist dream and a federalist nightmare. Why is that? We know that the federal government has been unable to respond in a sensible and sensitive way to the needs of the regions, to the needs of the people in the provinces and in the territories. What is happening is that gradually, bit by bit, they feel as if they are being blocked out. They feel as if they do not matter any more. They feel that it does not matter what they say or do; they do not count. And when that happens, the country suffers and national unity suffers.

A federal government, it seems to me and to many colleagues, ought to be able to ensure that the essential services, such as health, education, social assistance, transportation, and communications are in fact available to all Canadians, no matter where they come from, no matter what their status in life. It should be there. That is our main and most essential purpose. And that is where this government has failed miserably.

It is unfortunate because, as I mentioned before, Canadians throughout the land are feeling as if it is not working together. The great fear that I have, and that many other Canadians have, is that once you start thinking that way, it may become a fait accompli.

[Translation]

My third question regards education. What impact does this budget have on education? The government made more cuts in this field. After promising there would be no changes, in 1986, it brought in a 2 per cent cut. Again in 1989–1990, it cut a further 1 per cent. In 1990–1991, it imposed a freeze. Now, it has extended the freeze. The figures involved here are astronomical.

Between 1986 and 1995, the health and education enveloppes will have shrunk by approximately $33 billion. So, there will be about a third less money for education, that is to say $11 billion. That is a lot of money, an enormous amount of money!

What was done in terms of training and retraining? Where are the outstanding programs we were promised? In previous years, the amounts allocated were more or less the same without taking inflation into account though. This year, there is a $100 million cut. What was done in terms of student assistance? Nothing. While the eligibility criteria were not changed since 1984 in spite of the fact that the cost of living increased tremendously, nothing was done.

For litteracy, $4.50 a year is granted for each of the five to seven million Canadians who need help. You cannot even buy a hamburger and a glass of milk for that price nowadays. As for research and development, a ceiling was put on that too, as you know. Research and development are most important to ensure that we remain at the leading edge of things on the economic, technological, social, cultural, and political front. So, what do we do? We set a ceiling.

What does all this lead to? As you no doubt are aware, the student debt is skyrocketing. I have here—I could quote, but I think my colleagues will take my word for it—information to the effect that it increased quite substantially over the past ten years. This means that there are more students today who, on a scale from $0 to $5,000, $5,000 to $10,000, $10,000 to $15,000 and $15,000 to $20,000, are getting $15,000 to $20,000 deeper into debt every year than there were in the past. So, what do they do? They are afraid, they quit school, and fewer and fewer of them will get a post-secondary education. We will be the big loosers.

On admission fees, did you know, Mr. Speaker, that they increased by 300 per cent in some provinces and by 200 per cent in others? One hundred per cent increases are not uncommon for admission fees. What will that do? I can assure you that if we add up the 2 per cent ceiling on student job creation, the impending closure of employment centers in colleges and universities, the impact of the GST and the 3 per cent administrative fee added on to student loans, it is no wonder that Canadian students feel crushed. This at a stage of this country's development when we are realizing that our most important resource is the Canadian men and women, educated men and women who are truly committed to the economic, social and cultural development of the country.

[English]

I have a quote here, and it is a bit embarrassing because it says: "Conservative revolution takes big leap forward." It shows that while the government continues to talk about the need for competitiveness on the world markets and globalization, it ceaselessly strangles the nation's colleges and universities. We are all people who believe in the importance of education, but we must go beyond believing in its importance. We need to ensure that it has the support that it requires to do the job that needs to be done.

Let me just quote a few passages very quickly about the importance of education:

> Education is about far more than the exercise of federal spending powers; it goes to the heart of the factors that bind Canada together as a country. In a country as vast and diverse as ours nationhood is often a tenuous proposition. What better place to start nation building than in our schools, our universities and colleges, and educational programs which take place outside of our institutions.
> The challenges that face Canada are very real and immediate. We must begin to equip our nation with the human resources it needs to confront economic globalization and domestic economic restructuring—
> Increasingly, major industrialized countries are recognizing the importance of improving labour productivity through training as a means of ensuring competitiveness.

This is from the Ontario Report of the Premier's Council Industrial Policy Studies, volume III, 1986. I could go on. The Canada Royal Commission on the Arts, Letters, and Sciences stated:

> The universities also serve the national cause in so many ways, direct and indirect, that theirs must regarded as the finest of contributions to national strength and unity.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there are several other quotes, but I must launch upon the last point now.

[English]

What kind of trust, what kind of confidence can we have in government as a result of this analysis that I have done? We know that the promises have not been kept and I would not be nearly as upset as I am if they had returned and told us why. But they kept on going without even the simple courtesy of explaining.

I pointed out that the assumptions of inflation, interest rates, et cetera, are wrong, absolutely wrong. What upsets me is the minister last week would not admit that he had cut health and education, and he has almost—$1 billion, and half a billion in education. When is a cut a cut? We know that the government's policies have had very, very little success, that the revenues increased from $70 billion to $130 billion with a deficit that is in excess of $30 billion, a debt that will go over $400 billion. Yet it continues: the unemployed almost $1.5 billion; the food banks, almost 2 million people will go there this year.

We know that there has been unfair taxation where the poor get poorer and the middle class is getting hammered and hammered and they are becoming poor.

I am pleased that my party has put a task force on taxation together and they it will look at progressive taxation. It will look at proposals from my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, as well as Professor Brooks from the University of Toronto. It wants to ensure that this country's taxation is as sensitive and sensible as it could be.

This budget has attacked the regions and its people. The government was wrong in 1984–85. It was wrong in 1985–86, 1987–88, 1989–90 and it is wrong this year as well. The Minister of Finance wants us to believe him. We really tried. We found that we could not. We cannot and we will not.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I listened closely to the clearly expressed views of my colleague the hon. member for St. Boniface, and I commend him for that. Still in his remarks he raised a number of issues which have me wondering. I know he is an expert in the education field and that he held senior positions in his province. However, Mr. Speaker, I was surprised a few times when the hon. member for St. Boniface referred to the money spent on education throughout Canada and told us that in a few weeks or months we will be witnessing the complete collapse of our national education system in the ten provinces and the two territories.

Sure enough, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government can no longer afford to invest as much money as we would like in education, research and development. But most people know that money does not solve everything. Back home, in my city of Shawinigan, we have a general and vocational college which this year has the best budget ever. But in concrete terms, for instance, last weekend the local newspapers reported that 70 per cent of the students at the Shawinigan CEGEP cannot pass a quality elementary test in French. Yet the government spends a fortune on that institution of learning.

Unless I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, the member for St. Boniface is convinced that we will solve our problems by spending more money for education and more money for the health care system in Canada. I do not share his views. I would suggest that the provinces have a significant role to play when it comes to allocating the funds they have for educational purposes.

If we examine what is going on in Quebec—and I imagine it is the same thing in other provinces—we see that, owing to labour agreements, a physical education teacher will teach mathematics next year and religion or ethics four years down the road before returning to physical education, without the benefit of a refresher course. We have reason to believe that a lot of money has been spent, but because of a major flaw in the collective agreements between the province and the teachers, it would seem that all that money has been badly expended.

Oftentimes we hear about a man who stands accused of neglecting his children, so he will attempt to buy the love of his children with money. He does not solve his problems.

Here is my question to the hon. member for St. Boniface: Does he really believe that we will solve our problem in Canada by investing billions of extra dollars—as he suggests—in research and development, in literacy, new funds to increase our annual budget which already totals $157 billion?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's comments and his question. I do not think I said that it would be the end of the world if no new funds were injected but I did say, and I quote:

[English]

> The present government made an election commitment in 1984 to double the percentage of national income for research and development.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister made that commitment. The fact that he did not return to explain why he did not honour this commitment saddens me.

Here is another quote:

[English]

> Canada has fallen behind its competitors on most measures of research and development activity and leads in none.

As you can see, that is there too. It really saddens me to see that they refuse to face reality.

As to what I said, may I reply with an analogy. Let us imagine that the gentleman and I share a brick house. In 1986, although he promised that he would not, he started removing a few bricks here and there in an hap hazard fashion. In 1989-90, he removes a few bricks. In 1990-91, he removes some more, and again in 1992 until 1995. What will happen? My friend, the house will collapse. That is what is happening. When some harm is done to an institution, whether a college or university, it does not show right away, but only later on. The harm gradually increases and, finally, it is too late. That was my message.

Another message just as important is that money does not solve every problem. I wish we could have looked at what could be done to make us more competitive, when the government decided it was necessary to cut back every year in payments for education, and especially this year in the training and retraining of workers. I find this extremely sad.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for St. Boniface, a neighbouring riding.

I have two matters. He is obviously concerned about cutbacks in education and rightly so, but I wonder if he would comment on a good example of what I think are inappropriate cutbacks in education that have occurred in Winnipeg in the last week or so where a great many English as a second language teachers have had their jobs threatened as a result of cutbacks in education. This is a good example of the short-sightedness of cutbacks in education, whereby new Canadians, for whom it is an advantage to learn English—an advantage not only to them but to everyone else, to society as a whole—are being deprived of this opportunity as a result of cutbacks in education funding. It seems to me that we need to see education funding, not just as spending, in the negative sense of what we mean by spending, but as the building up of infrastructure, whether that is human infrastructure through the development of skills and research, et cetera, or other forms of infrastructure.

It seems to me that this is the insight that is lacking in the generalized attack on things like education.

We may want to debate with each other about what is the best investment in terms of infrastructure—in this case human resources—but I think this insight is generally lacking on the government side.

Second, I wonder why it is—although the member made a fleeting reference to the need for fair taxation—that in Liberal speech after Liberal speech after Liberal speech we find so little attention paid to the money that could have been raised by this government if it did not want to cut back on spending or if it wanted to raise revenue, by closing many of the tax loopholes that now exist. I wonder if the reason for that is that most of the tax loopholes which should have been closed in this budget were loopholes that were put there in the first place by Liberal governments. Perhaps that explains the silence of the Liberal Party when it comes to closing those tax loopholes.

Mr. Duhamel: When he got up, my colleague said that he was from a neighbouring constituency and I thought he was going to treat me like a neighbour. He started that way, and then, I do not know, some force grabbed him and made him deviate.

With respect to the latter, I suspect that my hon. colleague has not been here all of the time—none of us can be—but my colleagues have, in fact, mentioned that that could have been changed and should have been changed. There is no party in the world—not my party nor his—let me finish—

Mr. Blaikie: Name a loophole that should have been changed.

Mr. Duhamel: —that could not go back in its history and change some of the things it has done.

Name a loophole? I think the "meals loophole" is one good one. You thought that perhaps I did not know.

The second point that I want to make—and I would like him to continue to treat me like a neighbour—is this: if he wants to look at sins, let us look at the NDP government in Ontario. In their manifesto they say "no tuition fees". Now, what do they do? They "stick it" to the students and add 8 per cent this year.

With respect to the question of English as a second language, he is quite right. That was the best point he made; there is a national problem. The government has increased the number of immigrants and it has not increased the language training program. On that one issue my friend and I stand side by side. On the others, we are going to have some other discussions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the hon. member for Rosedale, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona—Lithuania; the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James—Justice; the hon. member for Drummond—Housing.

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, like other hon. members, I rise to take part in the debate on the borrowing bill, Bill C-97, which of course goes to the heart of the recent budget and goes to the heart of the present economic problems that are being faced by this country.

I listened with some interest to both the recent debates that have taken place and the discussions that have occurred over the past several weeks. It strikes me that only occasionally do people speak to what surely are the essential issues in the matters that are presently before us.

Surely we are addressing the economic health of the country and the degree to which the federal government, in the way that it can control the expenditures and revenues of the country, can contribute to the improvement of that economic health.

• (1600)

As we think about matters related to the debt and the deficit, I think there is a danger of looking only at the narrow economic issues, whether it is the regular growth of the debt, which is in many ways overwhelming, if not suffocating, or looking at the annual deficit charges which are still enormous. In fact, if one looks at the amount that will have to be paid on the interest alone on the debt that currently exists, it is such a monumental figure of some $43 billion that it almost overwhelms almost the totality of all our annual social expenditures.

This is not an easy issue to resolve. If it was, we would certainly not be debating it here and we would not have had a succession of budgets and economic measures seeking to contain it.

I would like to begin by looking beyond the immediate problems that affect the debt and the deficit. Those of high interest rates, high dollar, perhaps less than adequate productivity, threatening inflation and, of course, at the moment very large and unacceptably high unemployment. I want to look at the context of the country itself and what we are faced with.

In Question Period today and in many Question Periods, there was debate about how we are resolving our constitutional difficulties. Again, the danger is that we look at these in the context of the kind of legalisms or to extend it a bit, the packages of rights and privileges that extend to various jurisdictions: the provinces, the federal jurisdiction, or beyond the provinces to the municipalities.

It would be important for just a moment to think about the totality of all of this, of the very country of which we are a part. It is a fascinating if not, at times, a frustrating country to understand.

I had the opportunity last year to serve on the special committee of the House of Commons, the Charest committee, which attempted to break the logjam with respect to the Meech Lake agreement. I do not want to regurgitate all of the arguments that went pro and con around that issue. But I want to look at the perceptions that affected that consideration and the perceptions that I suspect very much affect both the Spicer commission and the joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate. Here is where I think we engage ourselves in considerable difficulty.

What strikes me, as someone who has been in and out of public life now for a quarter of a century, is that there seems to be greater and greater difficulty for Canadians generally to see the country in its totality. It has become much easier, one might almost say seductive, to look at the country through a particular microscope, in a particular locality and with an almost singular set of characteristics. While it is true that each one of us makes our home in a specific community, accompanied by specific family, neighbours and friends, the sustenance of that local community is a much larger reality. One that is even larger than Canada itself and Canada is, to say the least, uncomfortably large.

The old saw of an earlier Prime Minister, Mackenzie King, that most countries have too much history and this country has too much geography seems to be particularly true in the experiences of the last decade.

In the debate affecting the borrowing bill, a certain amount of attention has been focused, certainly from this side, about the degree to which in the final years of the Trudeau government expenditures far outran revenues, something like 30 per cent or more and there was a rapid accumulation and an augmentation of the debt.

That same period of the early 1980s also saw an attempt to resolve the national sense in the elaboration of the Constitution in 1982 and 1983. I believe that in a sense by attempting to resolve something, that may have been much more difficult to resolve than we realized, we opened a kind of Pandora's box and created a kind of expectation, if not a desire, for people to try and satisfy and resolve all their local anxieties within some kind of new national context and not really being sure of what that might be.

Those questions are still out there. In some ways they may have been further enlarged upon or touched upon in terms of our renegotiated economic understanding at least with the United States through the free trade agreement. If there are two things that affect the character of Canada and Canadians it is our sense of what it means to be united as a country and in relationship to the United States.

All of this could be cast, and has been cast by some, as a kind of negative experience but I want to suggest here today that it also has the seeds within it of a positive opportunity. While Canada is very big and its problems for those of us who are Canadians may seem very large, the world of which we are increasingly aware is even larger, tougher, and more difficult. We only have to reflect on the experiences of the last few months and in particular the experience with the gulf crisis to realize how abundantly true that is.

I was not that closely involved with all of the detailed aspects of either the gulf crisis or the gulf war, but just before hostilities occurred in mid-January, along with colleagues from both sides of this House, I visited two countries that certainly were heavily impacted by the effect of the gulf crisis.

Even today as I stand here the people of the Sudan who have unfortunately been bled by a government that chose in a rash moment to support the actions of Iraq have paid a rather heavy price in terms of finding limited access to desperately needed foreign assistance at a time of a major internal famine threat and crisis.

Many of us are deeply troubled by the fact that as many as perhaps seven million to nine million people at the moment are suffering the risk of famine in a situation which far too few people know anything about but which, all too sadly I suspect, as the news and interest related to the gulf subsides they will become painfully aware.

This is only one example of the world which Canada is a part of. A few months ago I attended an international meeting concerned with matters of security, not security in the way we have traditionally thought of it in terms of military expertise and systems of national defence. This is security of a kind that raises fundamental questions about the health of the planet to survive the rapidly deteriorating situation and ecological breakdown that is occurring in hot spots of the world, such as parts of Africa, but is already showing signs of threatening even the protected parts of North America.

I see my colleague here from Saskatchewan. He could speak feelingly about the recurrence of very threatening drought in the 1980s in the province of Saskatchewan and in parts of the United States.

We have major environmental challenges. When we talk of security in the 1990s and beyond, I believe we will be spending much more time thinking about ecological security and resources in the same kind of mind set, the same kind of magnitude as countries have been prepared to devote to systems of national military defence.

These are a few examples of the world in which Canada exists, and here I want to raise a very strange problem.

When I travel with others to parts of Africa or Asia to discuss with them their particular needs, how Canadian volunteer organizations, institutions, churches, universities, labour unions, businesses and others can be helpful, there is an automatic willingness to engage in conversations with Canadians because we have a record of being helpful in a disinterested way that does not carry with it a great hidden agenda of some kind of exploitation or unfair advantage.

We do hope for improved and beneficial relations, but in a way that is acceptable to both partners. I can still recall a few months ago being with a number of friends in Ethiopia discussing with them some of the acute challenges and problems that are faced by one of the poorest countries of the world, with a population twice the size of Canada.

During the conversation, as we had spent much time discussing this project or that, it suddenly turned to Canada and I was asked to give an indication of what was important that was going on in Canada.

As I began to describe some of the matters which seem to preoccupy so much of our time and attention, I saw people's eyes glaze over because they could not understand how these problems, which from their point of view seem so infinitesimally small, could so dominate our national agenda and our national attention.

There is a strange paradox or contradiction in this. I think that Canadians, our political parties and our institutions have to rediscover what are the real priorities for this country in the world of the 1990s.

A starting point has to be where we live, and that is the purpose of the bill that is before us today. That we get our own economic house in order. There can be no satisfactory health to us in any other kind of terms if the management of our own resources and economic well-being is not being responsibly looked after.

A great Canadian, a man who had tremendous insight into the fundamental differences between Americans and Canadians, once said: "The real difference in business terms between Americans and Canadians is that Americans like to make money and Canadians like to count it". That was Northrop Frye.

I think it says a lot about a certain sense of responsibility that we have. I believe there is a good deal of discomfort among members of all parties in the fact that we have not been as effective as we should be in restoring the economic health that we need for this country.

While I have heard a fair bit of criticism about this particular program activity, expenditure, reduction or another, I have heard very little about how we can in a sense take the direction that the Minister of Finance, the President of the Treasury Board and others have outlined by way of suggesting a safe, sure and secure path out of the economic strangulation that exists with spending still far too much of our revenue resources to meet an unacceptably high deficit and a national debt. Surely the challenge to all of us is to work together on that proposition.

The other day I was at a meeting with the president of the Economic Council who raised a problem that I had never thought of in economic terms. She said that one of the fundamental weaknesses in the Canadian economy is that we may be too affected by an adversarial situation.

Of course it goes without saying that the parliamentary tradition that we are all a part of is based on a certain level of adversarial activities. It is the constant testing of governments that ensures that they are doing what is responsible and that also indicates that the opposition are keeping governments on their toes.

I think she was meaning more than that, that within the Canadian experience of acting responsibly in an economic sense there is a need to work together to work our way out of what I regard as an extremely dangerous and difficult situation. None of us can be happy by the fact that the deficit at $30 billion is still far higher than it should be.

I would like to challenge all members of this House, and I suppose particularly those who are in the opposition, to contribute to this debate and others in a way that would suggest how we can make further and effective reductions in that, because, ultimately, the most important thing we can do in achieving economic recovery, and with that, environmental and social recovery, is in raising the confidence level of the Canadian economy. I fundamentally believe that that will not happen unless we can prove that we are serious about getting our own economic house in order and reducing, in a significant way, the sure strangulation that the continuing debt and deficit have effected on the Canadian economy and on our people.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed much of the content of the remarks of the hon. member for Rosedale. Just as he was speaking, I was at my desk replying to a letter from a Scarborough group using the name The Agincourt Ecumenical Ministries, a number of Christian churches. One of the questions I was attempting to answer, just as he spoke, was what more should Canada be doing to assist the famines around the world and to help the hungry and the dying out there right as we speak. One of the items they mentioned was the delivery by Canada of the UN exhorted .7 per cent GNP contribution to world aid. I know we are not there yet.

I agree that the Canadian debt is going to have to be better managed. We have to have the money in our hand before we spend it, but one thing that appears to be missing, and it may not be missing but I have not seen it, is the commitment from government to move our foreign aid up to a level that is more commensurate with the needs of the world.

As I ask the hon. member that, I also would recall for him the events of Sunday night where he and I were at a dinner where a magician who had come from China moved a coin from my hand into the hon. member's pocket about 15 feet away. I still do not know how the magician did it, but I will do that right now and ask the hon. member to comment on that.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Scarborough for the comment and the question.

As he will recall from Sunday night, the coin that was briefly resting in my pocket went right back to the magician and, of course, that seems to be often the case.

What I am concerned about in terms of the major point that he raised affecting Canada's commitment to international development is that we not, in an attempt on a short-term basis to maintain some kind of, I guess I would call it, if I can use some theological terms, some cheap grace, satisfy a situation that will ultimately make it even more difficult for us to play what I think is a major and significant role in international development.

It is true we have made a commitment to go to .7 per cent, and we got very close to .48 per cent or .49 per cent on a GNP basis. We have slipped back a bit, although quite frankly, in the last several budgets, the ODA budget has not taken as large a cut as other parts of federal expenditure. If you compare our contributions on a percentage basis with most of the countries that are involved in international development in a serious way, we are still a major contributor and have held our own better than a number, certainly much better than our friends in the United States, who have seen a very dramatic reduction in their ODA budget.

There is no easy answer. One cannot isolate either the international development expenditures or any other part from the over-all economic management that is going on. However, I do think that we can use our contributions more effectively and efficiently, in view of some of the recent announcements that were made over the past year or two, in dealing with the poorest of the poor. I believe that, fundamentally, we should be using our aid to assist in those situations where in fact not large amounts of money but small amounts of money used on people-intensive areas can be very important. We have learned over the last few years that spending large amounts of money is not the key; it is enabling people to help themselves.

One of the best projects that I managed when I was Ambassador to Ethiopia and Sudan was the Canada Fund, which allowed us to put money into small groups, self-help organizations, which achieved a great deal.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by complimenting the hon. member for Rosedale on his remarks. His presence in this House, in my judgment, contributes tremendously to the wisdom that is here, given his extensive experience not only over many years in this place but also in serving Canada abroad in the Third World.

I come here each day and listen to the debate back and forth, and I particularly listen to remarks from the other side of this Chamber, which are always of a highly negative nature respecting the state of affairs in this country. I know we are all concerned about the state of the national debt. I listened earlier with great interest to my hon. friend from St. Boniface who criticized the government for raising taxes, criticized the government for reducing expenditures, and then criticized the government because we had a debt. So I am not sure how this works.

I would like to put a question to my hon. friend, in view of his experience and his time in all parts of the world. It seems to me rather unusual that the severest and most frequent critics of this country are the people who fail to recognize how fortunate we are to live here. I wonder if he would be kind enough to comment, notwithstanding the difficulties that we have with our national debt and the need for a borrowing bill such as we have before us, on what he has observed of the attitudes that peoples of different parts of the world have towards this country of ours.

Mr. MacDonald (Rosedale): Sometimes I think our greatest problem is that we do not have the opportunity to see ourselves as others see us. That is not easy to achieve, Mr. Speaker, because we are very much in a cocoon, if I can put it that way, of North America, and in particular with perceptions of ourselves that are somewhat our own and somewhat not our own. If I can talk about the way in which we see ourselves through the eyes of the United States, it is fascinating. It has always intrigued me, as one who is interested in communications and culture, how this is a country that basically understands itself on the basis of how other people treat us. And for most of us, it is how the United States treats us.

I see my friend from Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte here, who, along with myself and several others, travelled early on to the Ethiopian famine. I think we will never be able to quite overcome the kind of welcome we had. I have an image in my head that I want to share with members, because it involves the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. We visited at the height of the famine one of the worst famine camps in Mak'ale, in northern Ethiopia. For people who have not been there, even the thought of it must be almost appalling. But the image I have is not an appalling one. It is of about 30 or 40 children who found in the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte a soulmate. They began to sing and dance in that famine camp in a way that recognized that even though they did not know our names, they did not know quite where we came from, they knew we were there to help and that we were friends. A bond of friendship and acceptance was established that said something very important, both for the hon. member and for the Canadians he represented.

We need to have a strong sense of that, I think, and if we are able to gain it, it will be very important in dealing with many of what we see to be very tough economic, constitutional or environmental problems that we face. It is getting that kind of an understanding that I believe is quite important.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to this opportunity to participate in the discussion on the borrowing bill. Let me say to my hon. colleague who has just sat down that I too remember very well—I think it was December 1984, just a few weeks before Christmas—the visit that he, as the then famine ambassador for Canada, and I, together with the member from Edmonton Southeast and Lynn McDonald took to Ethiopia. Certainly I could not agree with him more that that kind of experience will not leave any of us because it was at the height of the famine and it was early on. What we saw, in particular having seen it just before Christmas, just before coming home for that great spiritual but commercial celebration here at home, was quite a startling contrast.

I have to say to the hon. member that when I remember those scenes, when I remember those people, nothing in my experience has ever affected me as much or for so long a period of time, then I become one of those representing one of Canada's poorest provinces, Newfoundland, one of the highest areas of unemployment in Canada in the riding now named Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte when its name changed, I become one of those who has no hesitation defending even in times of restraint Canada's foreign aid spending development assistance.

I know I speak with absolute assurance on behalf of the people of my riding, that even though they live in the poorest province in one of the poorest constituencies of the 295 in Canada, the people of my constituency would not want to see the books balanced on the backs of the very poorest of the poor in the world. I hope the government will bear that in mind and will not feel some political obligation to make cuts.

I hope that if we are involved, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said, in the reconstruction of Kuwait and Iraq that those funds will not be diverted from existing aid programs, that we will not deny those who live in the sub-Sahara so we can do reconstruction in Kuwait or Iraq. That too would not be proper.

I want to say a few words about this government's spending program and its request for borrowings and the budget. The reality of a borrowing bill and the reality of a budget is that it is far more than just an economic statement. A budget is far more than an economic blueprint for the government. It is far more than a ledger of assets versus liabilities. As well, a budget is and must be a political statement. The budget reflects, after all, the priorities, the problems but also the potential of a nation. A budget is the reflection of the choices that a government makes in determining its spending program. Ultimately, a budget tells us something about the values of a society.

I have no hesitation in saying that I have a great many problems, a profound disagreement with this borrowing bill and this budget. It is not a disagreement founded on how much is raised and how much is spent. It is not a fundamental disagreement with the notion of practising a measure of frugality. It is not a disagreement with the Minister of Finance's seven year old objective of getting the deficit under control. He has been telling us every year since 1984 that that is his primary objective. However, the national debt has more than doubled in those seven years and the deficit has not been reduced by very much. So I do not disagree with those objectives, although they have been missed. No. My objection to the borrowing bill and to the budget is the kind of vision it paints of this country.

The member who spoke before me talked about values. I know that member is genuine when he talks about values. I know he feels things very deeply. I have never asked him directly, but I sense this. If you spend time with someone in a place like Ethiopia, a form of osmosis begins to happen. You begin to take the measure of people. I know that when it comes to values, the perception of the continued meltdown as is assuredly going to happen as forecast in the budget, the assured meltdown of medicare in this country; the assured meltdown in the ability of Canadian youth to have access to post-secondary education in this country, that evolution, as is foreshadowed by this budget, causes members of vision, I would suspect, a great deal of trouble.

If Canada is allowed to continue with the kind of spending program, the kind of priorities as outlined by the Minister of Finance, we are not going to recognize this country in a very short period of time. We are not talking about 30 years, or 20 or 15 or even 10 years from now. We are talking about three or four years from now.

Do Canadians realize that this budget puts in place cuts for health, education and social assistance to the tune of $5 billion over the next five years and that within five years we are going to have as many as four of the ten provinces getting no transfers from Ottawa for health care. What does it mean when four of ten provinces get no transfers from Ottawa for health care because of these cutbacks? It means we can no longer talk about a national standard of medicare in Canada, because the national government cannot dictate a national standard if it has not put its money where its mouth is.

What does that mean? It means if you come from Ontario, which has some fiscal capability and there is a cut in health dollars, the provincial government makes up the difference and hopefully, you maintain the quality of the health care. But if you come from Newfoundland, where there has been a cut in federal dollars, and the provincial government has no ability to make up the difference, then health care goes down.

It means we are building a Canadian society where the notion of being a Canadian used to mean that in some fundamental ways, we are all equal whether we come from P.E.I. or Rosedale, or Newfoundland or British Columbia. We used to be equal in terms of our health care across this country. We all knew that if we got sick, God forbid anything else that went wrong, we would be looked after. We used to know that if we were totally down and out and had no other means, at least under the Canada Assistance Program we would be looked after. We always knew that if we were unemployed, we had our unemployment insurance. We knew that in our retirement, we could retire with the dignity of a Canada pension. All of these things, health care, access to quality education, unemployment insurance, and I suspect in the minds of people my age we are wondering whether there will be at this rate an old age pension, the security of an old age pension cheque.

All of those things are not about dollars and sense. They are reflections of the values of a nation. Do we as a nation value the notion that whether you come from east or west, north or south, rich or poor, you are entitled to quality health care? Is that not a Canadian value? Can it be traded away against the bottom line of a budget estimate? Do we not in this nation believe that the brains of this country, the youth of this country, whether they are born north or south, east or west, rich or poor, Catholic, Protestant, Jew, Muslim, that every one of them ought to have an opportunity to develop the potential of their grey matter and that university ought not to be the privilege of the rich?

Mr. Speaker, every time we see another cut for post-secondary education, the post-secondary institutions raise the tuitions, and every time they raise the tuitions the universities become more and more a place for only those who have dollars in their pockets. That says something about the common values of being a Canadian that are being traded away in this budget.

I said a moment ago that I am from Newfoundland. In this country for the last 30 years we have had another concept that is being traded away in this budget. It was the concept of regional development, not a concept or a guarantee that every region would be equal because they will never all be equal, not a guarantee that every citizen would be equal. There can never be such a guarantee.

We always strived in this country whether we were Liberal governments and traditionally Tory governments to at least provide an opportunity for equality, the chance to succeed. When you play with medicare, and when you play with access to quality education, when you play with the basic sustenance of life, you deny that opportunity for equality of opportunity.

In the budget just brought down we again see cuts in training programs. The Minister of Finance announces forecasts that unemployment, which is now 1.3 million, is going to go up to 1.5 million—one million five hundred thousand Canadians unemployed, without a job, with no income, without the dignity of a pay cheque—one and a half million, the minister's forecast.

In the next breath he says: "By the way, I am cutting $100 million from our training budget". Is investing in training, giving skills, developing skills for Canadians an expense or is that an investment? Is that money wasted and thrown away or is that building on the most primary form of raw material of the country, the primary raw resource of the country, our people?

I suggest a $100 million cut to the Canadian Jobs Strategy is not in my judgment a wise investment. It is not a wise investment and would not be perceived as such in any of the constituencies of this country, whether we are talking low unemployment areas or high unemployment areas. But that cut has been made by the Minister of Finance and we on this side have asked the Minister of Finance, we have asked the government, to reconsider that cut. These are training dollars.

In Ontario, the great province of Ontario, they are really feeling as they have never felt the negative impact of this recession. Southern Ontario is taking a vicious beating. It is being de-industrialized.

The factories are closing, the workers are being sent home, but that is not the bad news. The bad news is that the factories are not reopening. They are relocating. They have gone south.

When the government brought in free trade, the Prime Minister at one point promised the most massive adjustment program that the world had ever seen. We did not get adjustment for those factory workers. Some of them who live in southern Ontario come from my province. They are now unemployed. They are coming back home again because they lost their jobs in southern Ontario.

We did not get an adjustment program in this budget. We got a $100 million cut in training funds. This budget smacks of a set of values that fly in the face of the institutional memory of government in this nation.

They are not Liberal values, New Democratic Party values or Conservative values. They are Canadian values that have evolved since 1867. They have come from the hearts, minds and souls of Canadians who distinguish themselves from that great neighbour to the south, the United States. We do not believe it is every man, woman and child for him or herself.

This is not a dog-eat-dog society. We do believe in caring and sharing. We do believe that no matter where you live, what your circumstances are, what your income is, there are some things we have in common. We are Canadians.

This budget has been written as if the Minister of Finance expected the applause that would normally be generated in the United States of America by the brutal values that are expressed in it.

Let those who have tried to suggest that this budget is really not a big deal—this budget has no big tax increase—remember that there has been a 24 per cent increase in UI premiums. It is going to raise billions. That is a tax increase.

There has been a $5 billion cut in the transfers to the provinces and so the provinces are now going to have to do what the federal government did not have the courage to do: cut programs and raise taxes.

Let those who will spend the next few months balling up their fists in anger at their provincial governments because they have cut their post-secondary programs, because they have raised tuition fees, because they have closed hospital beds remember that the source of that misery is not in the province. It is here in Ottawa.

The Minister of Finance is not fighting the deficit. He is transferring it onto the backs of the provinces. That transfer of the deficit onto the backs of the province is going to create a Canada where we have a multi-class society. Those who reside in provinces with the financial wherewithal to make up the shortfall will have one standard. Those who come from the poorer provinces will have another degree of Canadian citizenship.

This budget turns its back on Canadian history and on every Prime Minister, starting with John A. Macdonald who built the railway not because it made sense, not because it was economically viable but because he wanted to hold a nation together. He bound it together with bonds of steel.

He understood the notion of nation-building. He understood and dreamed about what kind of country this could be. This government, in six short years, most symbolized by this pathetic budget has squandered Macdonald's dream.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the questions and comments to my hon. friend, but there has been discussion among the parties in the House.

I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

Government Orders

That upon the completion of proceedings on the adjournment motion today the House continue to sit, and revert to consideration of Bill C-97, the borrowing bill, and so continue until 10 p.m. today, with no superseding motions or quorum calls to be receivable during that extended sitting, and that the House adjourn at 10 p.m.; and

That on Wednesday, March 6, 1991, the House continue to sit until 10 p.m. to consider Bill C-97, under the same provisions as for Tuesday, March 5, 1991, save for the adjournment proceedings, and that any requested recorded division be deferred until 3 p.m. on Thursday March 7, 1991; and

That following adoption of this order the order for second reading and and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-97 be changed to second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say something on this.

We are agreeable to co-operate with the government in this way, to facilitate it in dealing with this matter. We have a lot of speakers who would like to speak on the important debate on the borrowing bill. We recognize it is effectively a part of the budget debate that we have been carrying on with for the last four days, and I may say that after the speech of the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, all speakers on this side of the House when they are recognized will be speaking for 10 minutes, followed by five minutes of questions and comments, if that is satisfactory to the House.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate first of all our appreciation to the House for the co-operation on this matter and, second, to indicate that should the parties wish to split their times, we on this side are very happy to co-operate in that and would in fact encourage it to make sure that all members who want to speak have that opportunity.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In order to make sure that hon. members understand, may I ask whether it pleases the House to adopt the motion moved by the Parliamentary Secretary to the House Leader of the Government?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree also that hon. members should devide their times into ten minute periods?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would appreciate if hon. members when they rise, would indicate to the Chair whether they will speak for 10 or 20 minutes. It would be helpful, I have not yet heard the position of the New Democratic Party. Therefore I should like hon. members to do that in order to help the Chair keep track of the time.

Question and comment period. The hon. member for Souris—Moose Mountain has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment, particularly after the presentation here by the hon. member for Rosedale and the first part of the comments by the hon. member for Humber—Saint-Barbe—Baie Verte, that the level of debate in this House had risen considerably.

I was very, very pleased to hear some of the positive comments, particularly about the important values of Canada and the important things such as medicare and the programs that we as Canadians value.

I wanted to make a comment about something former premier Tommy Douglas from Saskatchewan said about medicare. And you know, in Saskatchewan, if you are a Conservative, John Diefenbaker was the founder of medicare. If you are an NDPer Tommy Douglas was. Be that as it may, in reality that is where medicare had its beginning. It was in Saskatchewan. But Tommy Douglas made the statement that if we were going to maintain medicare, and if Canadians were going to enjoy it, we had to beware of the some of the abuses and some of the costs of it.

Certainly that is what this budget embodies, dealing with some of the important things in the budget and in spending that are necessary to maintain the areas that are so important to all Canadians.

The other part of the debate this afternoon that I was very encouraged about was the level of debate with respect to the unity of the country. I would just make a statement, and I think I speak on behalf of farmers in western Canada, particularly in Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Rosedale made reference to the difficult times we have been through.

• (1650)

I want to refer to it in terms of the importance of this country working together and staying united. I believe the Minister of Agriculture indicated that about $22 billion has been paid into agriculture in the last six years.

As a farmer, we in western Canada, especially those of us in the drought area, appreciated that. Really, without the unity of Canada that would not have been possible, because that kind of money could not have come from Saskatchewan, which has been in very difficult times.

The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte mentioned the problems in Newfoundland. The unity of this country, as the member for Rosedale said at the beginning of his speech, is so important to the future, not only to the economic development, but to the understanding of how we see Canada and how we believe it to be. Certainly, dealing with the deficit and dealing with financial and economic matters is so important.

We have a wonderful country, but it is most important that we pay our way, that we deal with the deficit, that we deal with it in a way that will maintain medicare and the universal programs that we cherish, and that we deal with it in terms of dealing with a deficit that could destroy us.

I really do appreciate the debate this afternoon having a little different level to it than at other times.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I will take advantage of this to make a short response to the comments by the member from Saskatchewan, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister.

The parliamentary secretary, I believe, made a comment that we ought to reflect upon when he talked about the fact that $22 billion—I think he said—had gone into the farm community in this country. I cannot think of a group of people collectively more deserving of the support of their fellow citizens. Because the $22 billion we talk about is not money that is buried in a vault in Ottawa; it is printed here, but literally it is a share of the wealth of the country that has been transferred to a particular group because the country believes there is value in supporting farmers who for many decades, along with other primary producers, have provided the cash to keep all the rest of us going.

So that is the nature of a country, Mr. Speaker. I would simply say to the hon. member that I agree with him about those great primary producers, farmers; that they ought to be supported in difficult times, just as fishermen, primary producers who harvest the sea, ought to be supported in difficult times.

If we understand that concept of making an investment in something that has value, collectively, for the whole nation, so, too, should we commit ourselves not to a pure, bottom line, immediate, this moment, set of criteria dealing with medicare and education, but we ought to defend the integrity of medicare.

I suggest with great respect, we do not do that when we produce a budget that forecasts within a number of years some of our Canadian provinces, as many as four, will get no funding from Ottawa for medicare. The day that happens we have no national standard, and, God forbid, we may have no program.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest, as I always do, to my friends' comments with respect to the budget, and particularly with respect to medicare. I note as well that in The Ottawa Citizen of today there were some other comments with respect to medicare by well-known columnist, Marjorie Nichols. I would like to just quote a few of the comments of Marjorie Nichols of today.

In an article entitled "Medicare Furore is Fear-Mongering" Marjorie Nichols refers to comments by the former Liberal minister of health, from 1977 to 1984, who was the minister responsible for the legislation banning extra billing by the provinces, the Hon. Monique Bégin. She states that Monique Bégin over this past weekend, I believe, stated the following. Her advice to the medicare hand-wringers is to stay calm. "Medicare", she says, "is not under threat in Canada despite what the fearmongers may maintain". Marjorie Nichols goes on to say: "There is absolutely no evidence whatsoever to support allegations that the federal ceiling of 3.7 per cent on health and education transfer payments increases for the next four years"—by the way that is a ceiling on increases—"will bankrupt provinces or jeopardize health care. On the contrary, the evidence is that the provinces have not been shouldering their fair share of increased social costs or exercising proper fiscal prudence. The share of provincial budgets that's spent on health care hasn't increased in 20 years".

The hon. member indicated that he supports the concept of deficit and debt reduction. I have yet to hear him indicate support for one measure either in expenditure reduction or in taxation increase which would support that goal that he says he has. I would like him to advise me of one measure of deficit reduction that he would support.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte has one minute.

Mr. Tobin: I hope the Speaker will allow me an appropriate time to respond to a question that was two or three minutes.

The first answer to the hon. minister's question: how should the deficit be cut? We could start by getting rid of the 40 ministries that is in the current cabinet which makes this the most bloated cabinet in Canadian history. The cabinet previous to this one was 26 ministries.

The hon. member who was a great spokesman as a backbencher for housing problems—in fact, I am convinced they put him in the cabinet to keep him quiet—has presided over and now almost has the title, and I hope he will take this in good humour, the minister of homelessness. He was a great spokesman for housing as a backbencher but he has presided over consistent cuts in the housing department, $400 million in this cut for housing for poor people in this country.

I would have thought the minister would have been preoccupied with fighting for those people for whom he was such a valiant articulate spokesperson before he got the chauffeur and limousine.

With respect to Marjorie Nichols, I think her problem is that she resides in Ottawa and not in St. Anthony; that she resides in Ottawa and not in Prince Rupert; that she resides in Ottawa and not in Rimouski; that she resides in Ottawa and not in Corner Brook. If she was out there in the real world, may I say—I reside in Ottawa too sometimes—away from the splendour of these stained glass windows and these fine, well-appointed benches that they provide for both members and for journalist, she would understand that people are hurting. The system is already bloated; it is already swollen; it barely works in some places already and people are not getting the health care they deserve.

These last cuts are just killing cuts, destroying medicare in this country.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I see by the clock I do not have a great deal of time but I would certainly be pleased to begin because I think it is an important debate. Perhaps I will use the one minute to talk about why we are here to debate.

This Bill C-97 is before the House under the Financial Administration Act, section 43, which says in essence that no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament.

I think reflecting on the events of the last year it is important for us to remember that it is this body here, consistent with hundreds of years of tradition that has the responsibility to raise money to be spent on behalf of the Canadian people. That is what this bill does. It authorizes the government to borrow up to $26.4 billion to do the affairs of the nation as set forth in the budgetary plans of the government.

What this bill is about, of course, is debt. We have some talk about debt, though I must confess I am left somewhat confused by the remarks of some of my hon. friends opposite who seem to feel that the government should spend, spend, spend and then not raise any taxes to cover the expenditures. I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it has always been my impression that in order to balance the books, which is the proper way to handle affairs, not only as an individual, but the affairs of a nation, you must raise revenues and balance them with expenditures and have them come together.

Curiously enough, Mr. Speaker—did you wish to call the time or may I continue. Very well, I will continue later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast) moved that Bill C-343, an Act to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act (government employment), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by thanking the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for seconding this motion. Since the hon. member sits on the Committee on Privileges and Elections, his support is a clear indication he did not vote against this motion a few weeks ago.

Mr. Gauthier: Explain!

Mr. Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Of course. The hon. member would like some explanations. You may know, Mr. Speaker, that this bill went before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I made a few representations at that time. Finally, it seems the committee voted against this bill. I was not present because this took place behind closed doors. I hope this bill will find solid support.

[English]

Perhaps it will surprise you to know, Mr. Speaker, that I will not speak very long. I will be as brief as I can so that other members can speak. I urge, which will not surprise you, other members, particularly those on the government side, not to be standing at six o'clock when the debate ends because, if they do, lest anyone have any doubts, they will of course be in effect burying this bill, and it is a bill that I do not believe should be buried.

Let me, though, make the point in starting that apparently there have been some concerns expressed that not only would this bill prevent double-dipping, which of course is when MPs retire after six years, they can take jobs as judges or all sorts of other federal jobs and can continue to draw their MP pensions. At the same time they are drawing in many cases high salaries as federal officials. There is concern that the reference to 60 years of age in the bill means that somebody after 60 can double-dip but not before.

I did not wish to mix up these two principles, namely that you should not be able to draw a pension at 60 because you have been an MP and the question of double-dipping. If anybody is considering either talking the bill out or voting against it, should it come to a vote because of the 60 years provision in it, I hope they will take it to committee and we will simply take out the 60 years there, if that is what is on his or her mind. If the bill goes to committee, it can be dealt with in that respect in committee.

According to Robert Brown, president of the Canadian Institute of Actuaries, when referring to the federal MPs' plan:

> If a private company's pension plan was in such terrible shape as the federal, it would go out of business.

The terrible shape that—

An hon. member: Are you doing that?

Mr. Kilgour: I think I remember that member. Was he not in committee the day they did not want to make this a votable matter?

The terrible shape that Brown referred to was the $144 million deficit of the MP pension fund which ultimately will be carried by our fellow citizens, 26 million of them, the Canadian taxpayer.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I seem to have touched a sensitive nerve with that member. I wonder why.

Mr. Bjornson: I just want him to explain what he means.

Mr. Kilgour: The member will have a chance afterward. I wonder if he will be the brave one to be standing at six o'clock when you, Sir, say the debate is finished. If he is, I think his constituents will be very interested in seeing his face on television at six o'clock.

An MP with a minimum of six years service in this House upon retirement, quitting politics or being defeated in an election—and I suggest there are a lot of members on that side of the House who will fall into that category after the next election— is now able to collect his or her pension for life immediately, whether he or she is 22, 32, 42 or whatever.

In addition, these pensions are fully indexed to the cost of living for those more than 60 years of age by an amendment in 1973. Who was in office then? I know who was in office then. It was not those opposite.

An hon. member: It was the Liberals.

Mr. Kilgour: He got the joke, Mr. Speaker. He got the joke.

The pensions are more generous than the maximum legal level in the private sector plan, as was recently noted by David Somerville, president of the National Citizens Coalition.

Mr. Bjornson: Another expert.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, to the Conservative member opposite, at least he pays for his own pension plan. They are income subsidies for people who retire or get fired by the electorates. In the private sector, a tax-paying citizen cannot collect his or her pension until the age of 65, or in some cases 60, as I am sure you know, Sir. On the other hand, former MPs do not have any age limit.

Last year the Canadian government paid out $7.6 million in the pensions of MPs. It has been estimated that the present plan, unless changed, will cost between $500,000 to $5 million per MP from the time they collect the pension until age 75. That MP opposite seems strangely silent.

This benefit will be paid to an MP even though he or she is still on the government payroll. To Conservative members opposite, do they remember the $400 billion debt we got? Their finance minister, the man to whom they give standing ovations when he coughs, is the one who has added more red ink and more debt to this country than all other finance ministers in Canadian history.

A good number of former MPs are appointed federal judges or to a host of other positions in the national government. Let me use the name of Mark MacGuigan, because he used to be my professor, an hon. member who is now a judge of the Federal Court or Ed Broadbent—

Ms. Mitchell: A Liberal.

Mr. Kilgour: Is Ed Broadbent a Liberal now, to the member for Vancouver East? Should they be permitted to draw MP pensions while being paid high salaries in federal jobs?

To the member for Kamloops, what does Mr. Broadbent earn these days?

Mr. Riis: He is not a turncoat like somebody else I know.

Mr. Kilgour: To the member for Kamloops, that is a red herring.

An hon. member: So they agree that those pensions should be paid. The NDP agrees. I cannot believe it.

Mr. Kilgour: They will have the chance to get up in a few minutes. We will see if they have the courage to be standing at six o'clock.

For this pension, an MP is required to contribute only 11 per cent of his or her salary, whereas Canadian taxpayers pay the rest. My understanding is that the share for the taxpayer of our pension plan is currently in the 70 per cent range.

At a time when the government is reducing social, educational, and hospital spending and continuing to talk restraint for others, not walking its talk but talking its talk—

Mr. Riis: Can you say that again?

Mr. Kilgour: Walking its talk. I can only say it twice for the member for Kamloops, because then I become boring to the other members.

When it comes to benefits for politicians, leadership requires more than talk. Example is what is needed and what better place to start than on MP pensions. It is argued that a good pension and a decent salary are necessary to attract men and women into sacrificing private careers to gamble on ones in elected public service. This argument is valid to a certain point, but one needs to define what is a healthy pension and what is a decent salary.

The average income for Canadians, according to Statistics Canada, was $23,709 per person. Out of this income they have to pay taxes—32 additional taxes since 1984, I believe—keep up their homes and meet other living expenses. As of January 1 they must, of course, pay the unfortunate 7 per cent GST for many goods and services. Few can receive their pensions before the age of 65. The base salary of an MP is $62,100 per year, with a $20,000 tax-free allowance, and recently a further $6,000 in housing and other expense allowance. You have to claim on that and you have to provide receipts.

Additional privileges such as 64 first-class return air fares—

Mr. Bjornson: First-class.

Mr. Kilgour: Take my word for it, it is 64 passes, first-class passes. I mention that to the member for Orillia.

Mrs. Anderson: I am not from Orillia either.

Mr. Kilgour: Barrie, Barrie.

Free VIA Rail passes for spouses and dependent children, subsidized meals at parliamentary restaurants, happily getting less so, and the early pension benefit already mentioned.

The gap between MPs and other Canadians is wide and getting wider. It explains in part the wide-spread view that MPs only look to serve their own interests.

I saw a poll recently that, I think, showed about 65 per cent of Canadians think that MPs are mostly interested in money. The sentiment is further strengthened when those decisions are made by a private committee, an all-party Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services which meets in secret, keeps no record of votes—if I am wrong on that I hope the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands will correct me—and does not publish any minutes or reports.

It is true that an MP's career is an insecure one, especially these days, and the average is tenure now between five and seven years. Moreover, as all members know, an MP's life includes pressures and burdens such as travel, family separation, loss of privacy, handling parliamentary and constituency responsibilities, and so on. Yet, it is a calling that all of us have chosen freely. As far as I know none of us was forced to run for office—all of us chose to run for office—an opportunity that is not afforded to all of our fellow citizens. No one was ever forced to run for Parliament.

Is it not therefore appropriate to pay us pensions that will add as of now $144 million to the national debt?

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I just feel it is necessary to intervene again to ask the member to please, even though he is quoting, to clarify the language. We do have female members of Parliament in this place.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I should know better. The member and I were on a panel together recently in Vancouver and I hope I did not make that mistake there, especially having three daughters—and one son.

In conclusion, I propose Bill C-43 because it would reduce the deficit in the pension fund. Equally important, it puts MPs' pension benefits to be collected at an appropriate age with the law applied as with every other Canadian citizen with their pension.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate. I must say I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast and the concern that he is showing, quite sincerely I am sure, with the public purse and propriety.

I cannot help but wonder, since he has some concern about the collecting of pensions after people leave Parliament and whether or not it is the proper thing for them to collect funds on the basis set forth in the current plan, and I noticed when he chose to abandon the party under whose banner he was elected, and it was suggested that possibly it would be appropriate, indeed principled, if he were to—

Mr. Kilgour: The member forgets, Mr. Speaker. I did not abandon the party. I was expelled from the party.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, when you seek public office under a certain banner, under a certain set of policies, and then choose to abandon those policies because they seem momentarily unpopular with the public, it seems to me you have abandoned the party and the banner under which you ran and, indeed, were elected.

Nevertheless, if my hon. friend is so certain that the position he puts forward is correct, I wonder why he did not accept the invitation given to him by so many people to put his money where his mouth is, to resign his seat and re-offer it, be it as an Independent or now as a Liberal candidate.

However, I will not make those points as tempted as I am to raise them at this time. What I really want to talk about is the bill that he brings forward, again something that would seem to play to that which on the surface is very popular with the public.

There is no question if somebody happens to get elected to this House at a very young age, unlike myself I might say, and serves here for a period of time, they do have the potential of drawing a very generous and ample pension for the rest of their lives. Perhaps that is something that should be looked at. However, I think the principle being put forward here is a very simplistic one. Let us very seriously look at the issue before us.

Do we wish to attract capable men and women to stand for public office in this country? What are the bases upon which it is not only attractive but, on a more practical level, possible for people to seek public office?

If the only requirement is that you be rich, then it is no problem. Then it does not even matter whether they pay you or not, and it does not matter whether there is a pension plan.

But I ask: What about the mid-stream professional? Most people do not come to this place in their twenties or indeed in their thirties. Most people come to this place later on in their lives. One need only look around the room and note the sprinkling of grey hair here and there to note that most people come here either mid-way in their professions or indeed later on. If they come later on, then the problem which my hon. friend is trying to solve by his bill simply does not exist. However, if they come here in mid-stream, what are the sacrifices they have to make on behalf of their families?

He quite rightly points out that nobody forces us to come, but they sure urge us to. They come forward, and we want good people to stand. There are questions as to viability. For example, somebody may have been 17, 18, 19 years in their profession and in their mid-forties or late forties. Maybe they have paid for 17 or 18 years into a pension scheme, and they have to abandon that to come to Parliament and start all over again.

Are we going to attract people to come here, if in fact to come here means to throw their family's financial security on a trash heap? That is really the implication of what is being suggested, it seems to me, if we look at the majority of people who stand for public office in this country.

I do not think Parliament should be abandoned to simply the rich people. We look at the desirable aspects of MPs' pension schemes and one is tempted to say: "Boy, you fellows really have a good deal". But, then, let us look at the nature of the employment.

I served for 17 years in my profession, education, in my own province of Nova Scotia. When I came here, I had 17 years in my teacher's pension plan. Of course in order to draw a pension I have to go back and work for a few more years, and I know my hon. friends opposite will do their best to see that I have that opportunity at the next election.

But there are other elements of employment in other places, the most principal of which is security of tenure. One can reasonably anticipate, on embarking in a career, that one can stay there until retirement, until one is qualified to earn a pension. Let us face it: there is not that kind of security here, and the practical realities sometime interfere.

My hon. friend talks about the amount of money that the public pays for MPs' pensions. He then proceeds to talk about all the other things that MPs are paid. I would challenge him to name any other pension scheme in this country where the participant in the scheme pays 10 per cent. I know that in my old profession in education, six to seven per cent was the normal range of contribution that was paid.

I guess what I am saying is that I am not sure one can compare apples and oranges and then draw simplistic conclusions such as his friends in the National Citizens Coalition like to do.

What I would like to see, not only for MPs but for all Canadians, is a portable pension attached to the individual so that people do not become the captives of their employers as so often they do.

• (1720)

Over the years when I worked for teachers in Nova Scotia, I would have teachers come in and see me who would be burnt out, who would be tired of the profession, who would be ready for a job change, and they would say: "I have been in teaching for 21 years. I am 47 years old and I am burnt out. I want to do something else, but I cannot leave because of the pension. I am locked in for life; I have to stay here".

Why do we not look ahead in pension reform and look to the notion where every Canadian, on birth, is in effect registered for a pension. Throughout the course of their career, whether they are employed or whether they are self-employed, as they achieve earnings they make contributions to their personal pension scheme. That leaves them in a situation where down the line they have an opportunity to make their own decisions about their own pensions. If they want to retire early, they have an option to do that. If they wish certain options with respect to how they draw their pension back, that opportunity exists. It is a system, for example, that is used in the province of Saskatchewan. The teachers in Saskatchewan have an individual purchase pension scheme.

What I am talking about here is the concept that you have a pension that is attached to you. If you choose to move from vocation to vocation, from employer to employer, you have your own pension and your pension serves your particular interests and indeed ultimately serves your particular needs. Along the way, your employers would contribute, just as they do with pension schemes now. If you are self-employed, you would have the option to increase the amount you put in. Indeed, people could put in varying amounts, although I believe there should be a minimum. Otherwise, some people would say that they do not need it and then later on in life they would find out that they did, but that they had not been very wise financial planners. Perhaps we should be looking in a more comprehensive way, not just at MP's pensions, but at the pension needs of all Canadians.

The particular bill before us does have some specific problems, and I will briefly mention them, Mr. Speaker, before allowing somebody else an opportunity to participate.

First, it deals with only one aspect of the pension scheme as it affects members of Parliament. Indeed, it seems to me that you have to look at the whole package. I would commend to my hon. friend from Edmonton Southeast, who in trying to solve this problem has brought this piece of legislation forward, that perhaps a more appropriate time to deal with MP's pensions along with others is when the President of the Treasury Board brings forward the Comprehensive Public Sector Pension Reform bill which he is going to be bringing before this House. It seems to me that that would be the appropriate context in which to examine MPs' pensions as well.

There are also technical problems with this bill, problems relating to the lack of transitional arrangements. If this is not remedied, the provisions of the bill could, for example, be applied retroactively to former members, and so on. There are some missing elements with respect to the inadequacy of definitions of such things as "part-time" and "public service".

In conclusion, I would like to say that I think pensions are an appropriate thing for members of Parliament to talk about. But I think for them just to talk about pensions that affect themselves is not really a constructive and valuable use of Parliament's time. We should be concerning ourselves with pensions as they affect all Canadians. One of the things that provides for an appropriate social safety net is a pension scheme that accommodates and looks after the needs of all Canadians. And that is what I think Parliament should devote its time to.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words regarding this private member's initiative, Bill C-343, introduced by the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

I think for people watching this debate, I simply want to take a moment to read the critical clause in this legislation. It refers, of course, to the act regarding members of Parliament retiring allowances. This particular bill says:

> Notwithstanding other provisions in this or any other Act of Parliament, no allowance payable under this Act shall be paid to a former member where the member is employed in the public service of Canada on a full or part-time basis and is less than sixty years old.

This is a very interesting suggestion on behalf of the hon. member and obviously reflects the concerns of a number of people. I submit that it actually only reflects part of a set of concerns. I know that the member himself went to some length to point out a whole set of areas of concern and I think most of us are familiar with them. I have to, with all due respect—and Mr. Speaker, you know that I mean this—have to ask how serious the hon. member is in his wish to actually advance this private member's bill or is it simply his intention to make a public statement.

He has been around here longer than I have. He knows that if the legislation is drawn in the regular draw for Private Members' Business, be it a motion or a bill, the first obligation one has is to convince the appropriate committee that this ought to be a motion where a specific vote is eventually taken. That takes a good deal of discussion, formal and informal, perhaps to use the too often quoted term, lobbying members on the committee to point out the value of a vote. Obviously my hon. colleague was unable to convince his colleagues that this was an appropriate measure to vote on, which I think was the first reason I kind of questioned the sincerity of this initiative.

Second, once one fails there, as we have often seen, then it is up to members of Parliament to discuss with their colleagues here in the House of Commons, in a sense, two alternatives: that we do have an understanding among ourselves that this is an issue that ought to be put to a vote and consequently members keep their comments to a minimum and we eventually get to a vote.

I notice with interest that the member for Edmonton Southeast spoke for most of his time, which was almost twice what was allowed us.

Mr. Milliken: No, no, much less.

Mr. Riis: Concerning this intervention by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, I was watching and while it was not the entire 20 minutes, it was nearly that. Again, I wonder about the purpose of this initiative.

Second, we have on many occasions, and my hon. friends opposite will know this because they are always part of the serious deliberations, where we among ourselves arrange to send the content of the bill to the appropriate committee for consideration and study. That is another alternative.

Neither of these has been done. There have been no informal discussions, no formal discussions, no chats, no lobbying. In other words, again I have to simply assume that this is a public relations exercise and the hon. member's motives and intentions quite frankly are simply not there. Otherwise these discussions would have taken place as they do on a regular basis.

An hon. member: Stay to the point.

Mr. Riis: I am just trying to explain to my hon. friend that it is not as though the member for Edmonton Southeast is a new member and consequently does not understand how this place operates. He knows only too well how it operates, having been a very, if you like, proficient member when it comes to procedural arguments. I know he understands well how you move legislation through this institution.

Let us say that the point that my hon. friend from Edmonton Southeast makes is a very interesting one. It is a concern shared by many Canadians. It is a concern that is discussed among the members of various caucuses and I, quite frankly, agree that this is worthy of some consideration; that the matter of these pensions ought to be reviewed as in so many other areas. He has actually mentioned a few of them in his opening remarks.

Let us face it, this essentially deals only with double-dipping. Double-dipping is something that concerns most Canadians who have studied this issue but there are a lot of other related issues. I notice his colleague, an elected member, never comes to this place and I suspect collects his pay cheque regularly, week after week, month after month and I have not seen him here more than probably—well, I have not seen him for months, quite frankly, with one exception when he made one speech.

The point is, there are a whole host of areas where we have to ask: Are members of Parliament doing the job that was intended of them? Are they being compensated in a fair way in relation primarily to other public institutions and the private sector? These are questions that are more than legitimate to ask.

Mr. Kilgour: We can only deal with one at a time.

Mr. Riis: My hon. friend says that we can only deal with one at a time. I beg to differ. I am quite capable of dealing with two or three issues at once. I do not need it piecemeal.

• (1730)

I do not question, I suppose, the importance of this at all, but I do question whether or not, if we are talking about changes to the pension plan and the pension program as it affects members of Parliament, we want to take it simply piece by piece—the whole matter not ought to be considered and reviewed appropriately—my experience has been that that is the best way to approach most items as opposed to ad hoc, piecemeal process.

I listened with interest to my colleague who spoke most recently and I have to say that I think he is dead on when he says: "Yes, the whole matter of pensions must be reviewed". If there was a sense that—

Mrs. Gaffney: So isn't this a step in the right direction?

Mr. Riis: Do I hear echoes in here? "Isn't this a step in the right direction?"

I suppose I can say that this is a step in the right direction, but why take a tiny, minute step? If we are serious about the whole thing, let's just deal with this in a comprehensive, upfront, on-the-table, full discussion as opposed to a tiny step in the right direction. This is the way we handle too many things.

My hon. friend opposite makes the point—I think he is very close to the truth—when he says: "Listen, this ought to take place not in isolation, but let us talk about the pension system generally".

If you want to move beyond this, what are the concerns that people have about the portability of pensions generally? The fact is that there are people with good pensions, others with no pensions, and a whole lot of people with inadequate pensions.

Therefore, why not as a Parliament say that this is a number one priority, carry out a comprehensive pension analysis and examine the members of Parliament pensions, the Public Service pensions, a whole variety of private pension plans and the way they approach it provincially and federally as well in one context.

Then we can evaluate seriously one from another. I say I generally support that initiative. I support my hon. colleague when he says that consideration and review of this whole area is an appropriate matter.

Mr. Kilgour: I'm for everything.

Mr. Riis: My hon. friend says that he is for everything. He may be for everything. I am not for everything. There are a whole number of areas that I may say I don't support, but in terms of the kind of discussion we are having today, I find it most fruitful.

In closing, I want to say one concern.

Mr. Milliken: Tell us if you support the bill.

Mr. Riis: I believe that a review is more than appropriate, but I say to my hon. friend with all sincerity that if he was serious, why would he not have spoken to the different caucuses to move this legislation through? There have been no discussions, no conversations and he has been here long enough to know that that is how you move legislation.

If he simply wants to make a statement of self-adulation in terms of representing an issue, this is the way to do it because you know it will not be advanced. However, I leave that for people to judge on their own. Certainly, it would not be for me to impugn the motives of my hon. friend.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, can I simply draw attention to the one clause that the member for Edmonton Southeast referred to, and that is, the whole matter of the age limit of 60. I do believe that when we get to committee this ought to be something that we look at very seriously because, let us face it, based on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms I am not certain that we want to put those kinds of elements into the bill.

There may be an argument. I have not heard it, but I am certain it will be open to consideration.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. There have been some discussions between the parties. I think you will find the disposition in the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North that he split his time with the hon. member for Nepean, each getting five minutes maximum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Winnipeg North for five minutes.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill introduced by my colleague, the member for Edmonton Southeast.

I am sure that later, my colleague from St. Boniface would join me in support as well as other colleagues on this side of the House.

Before I proceed further, I would just like to reiterate two basic questions as posed by the 1989 Commission to Review Allowances of Members of Parliament. And I will give my answers.

First, do we as Canadians want to have the most qualified people governing the country? The answer is, yes.

Second, are we prepared to compensate them adequately for the responsibility we ask them to assume? The answer is, yes.

Mr. Bjornson: Is that part of the Reform Party platform?"

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, if the member from Selkirk would be polite enough perhaps he would like to listen to some pearls of wisdom.

Let me state the purpose of this bill as stated by the sponsor. It is to "prevent a former member of the Senate or the House of Commons from receiving a retirement allowance while the member is employed on a full or part-time basis and is not 60 years of age". This bill, an act to amend the Members of Parliament Retirement Allowances Act, is numbered C-343.

Bill C-343 is a bill about fairness. Is it fair for politicians to raise themselves above the people they serve, ignoring the rules of the private sector, to award themselves pensions of the type that now exist?

The MP pension plan flaunts at least two principles accepted in the private sector from my way of thinking. The first is the 10-year rule. MPs need work only six years before receiving a pension. Everyone else must work 10 years at least. The second principle is waiting until one is 60 years of age before receiving pensions. The average citizens, whom we are sworn to serve, do not have another option. They must wait. MPs bypass this waiting period, accessing their pensions immediately after they lose their seat or decide to leave it.

The spouse of a member receives that member's pension after death, no matter how young or successful or otherwise wealthy that widow or widower may be.

I submit that these pensions are pensions of privilege. The Parliament pension funds collect more than twice as fast as the rate allowed for pensions in the private sector, giving former members of Parliament a much greater amount to retire on than a private citizen who has worked the same amount of time. This is something I find objectionable. There should be uniformity in the system. Our pensions should not be the pensions of privilege. What kind of example does that offer to Canadians?

Most of us were middle-class working men and women before our term here in Parliament. Before being elected in 1988, I was a doctor in practice and a professor in the faculty of medicine. If I were to leave politics and return to this work should I decide or the electorate decide, I feel it would be wrong for me to ask Canadians to pay me a pension-salary when I would no longer be working on their behalf. There is no reason why I should not have to wait until I am 60 at least, around the same age as most citizens before they receive their pensions.

At this time, members of Parliament are adequately paid for their services. We receive a base salary of $62,100 per year and other expense allowances. Some may argue politicians leave high-paying jobs in the private sector to work for the public. Maybe so, but those people weigh their decision carefully and set their priorities in order. It should not be the burden of the people to overly compensate these politicians or any other politicians in the years after they leave Parliament Hill.

In conclusion, this bill asks us simply to make pensions less generous than they are now, to send a clear message to Canadians that we members of Parliament genuinely recognize that our country faces serious economic problems and that we sincerely care to address them.

I support this bill to send a clear and correct signal to all our constituents and to all Canadians in the interest of fairness.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am also very pleased to speak in support of my colleague from Edmonton Southeast on Bill C-343 which is an act to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

I probably will not use my five minutes, but I feel that it is terribly important to recognize that this bill, although maybe general in nature, it is the principle and the intent of the bill that is so important to us as members of Parliament and to Canadians in general, and I support that.

• (1740)

I find it hypocritical that someone in the private sector who might get laid off from their job, or might get transferred to another company within the private sector in another area of Canada, does not have the same privileges as we do as members of Parliament under the present legislation.

If you think back to anyone holding municipal government office, they are not allowed to collect that pension until they reach 60 years of age. After 10 years their pension is locked in and they may not withdraw it after that 10-year period, nor may they claim it until they reach 60 years of age, and I think that is appropriate.

I think of members of the armed services who might retire at, say, 50 years of age and are still obviously able to work. If they work for the federal government, it is my understanding that they are not allowed to collect that pension from National Defence as long as they are an employee of the federal government. So there seems to be a double standard here. We mentioned former leader of the New Democratic Party, Mr. Ed Broadbent who was a member of Parliament for a good many years. Mr. Broadbent is receiving a very large pension and is now working for the federal government as the chair of a major commission and collecting a very large salary.

We have widowers and widows who are living on very limited income. We have a country whose economy is very tight today. We have people who are unemployed, and I think we as members of Parliament must show some compassion and some consideration. I think this bill, although it perhaps does not go as far as it should go, is a step in the right direction and we, as members of Parliament, have got to show that responsibility and move forward.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, we are now discussing Bill C-343 which raises the question whether a former member of Parliament may continue to receive pension payments if he has joined the ranks of the federal Public Service.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, at the present time, members of the House of Commons can receive a retirement allowance under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, according to which an allowance is payable upon retirement to members who have contributed to the Retiring Allowances Account for at least six years.

The amount of the allowance is based on the number of years of pensionable service. Under the existing Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, members who have served at least six years in the House of Commons are entitled to a retirement allowance as soon as they cease to be a member, i.e. on the day they resign, the day of their decease or when they go down to defeat in an election. The surviving spouse and children of a deceased member are entitled to receive the allowance.

Perhaps I may recall, Mr. Speaker, and I think this is very important, that during our years of service, each one of us must contribute to the Retiring Allowances Account an amount equivalent to 10 per cent of our sessional indemnity. These contributions are deducted at source on each paycheque.

Those members who have supplementary indemnities as a result of additional duties—ministers, for instance—may elect to pay a contribution equal to more than 10 per cent of this indemnity. This is an important point, because we contribute directly to our pension fund during our term of office.

Everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, that an MP's work is very demanding, both professionally and personally. Many left far more lucrative jobs to come and spend some time working on building up and improving the living conditions of Canadians. We do so by conviction, to defend the ideas which we believe in and which we feel are in the best interests of all our fellow citizens.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that members of Parliament are a long way off from job security.

It does not matter what government level an individual chooses to get involved in, he never knows when he will find himself without a job. Such is democracy and I for one can only say that I agree with the system. It is up to the people to pick their representatives under the provisions of the electoral process and in light of their priorities at the time. The principle of democracy is basic and nondebatable, as far as I am concerned, and I sincerely hope that some day all human beings will be able to live under a system where each man's and each woman's right to an opinion is respected. The principle underlying the electoral process is the very foundation of the citizen's democratic choice, and that is as it should be.

But political life does create a number of difficulties, such as separation from one's family, extremely long hours, and a heavy workload, just to mention a few. All those who are or have been active in politics know that, as do others who have been closely associated with someone in this field. Throughout our mandate we have to forget all about our personal life. Ninety five per cent of our time, thoughts and activities are centred on our parliamentary duties, be it in our ridings or here in Ottawa.

Ours are exacting responsibilities, but seldom do we have an opportunity to talk about this kind of personal considerations which are unknown to the public at large.

Regardless of our political affiliation, all members carry a heavy burden which calls for big sacrifices. I suggest this must be said as we are debating the matter of parliamentary privileges. But that is the choice we make when we decide to enter politics, and we must live up to our responsibilities.

A moment ago I alluded to the fact that we have no job security. I have more to say about it because I think it is an important aspect of today's debate.

Indeed the enduring financial insecurity which comes with the iffy nature of our occupation is part and parcel of political life. I refer to this because it is an essential issue for all citizens, men and women alike and regardless of financial standing, if ever they should choose to run for elected office.

Given the precarious nature of our profession, we ought not to withdraw the few privileges which are attached to the position and which make it possible for any man or woman in Canada to enter the political arena. We might discourage from running some excellent prospects who already know that they would be deprived of the benefits they enjoy in their current occupation or, conversely, make it possible only for the affluent to run. We would be yielding to a financial elite who could afford the luxury of going into politics, which is certainly not what we want or wish. If they so desire, all citizens should have the opportunity to seek votes, thereby ensuring that Quebecers and Canadians continue to be represented by their peers from all walks of life.

I shall never accept for instance that a small businessman who could make a major contribution to our society be prevented from doing so, for he would have everything to lose as far as his future is concerned. Likewise, I shall never accept either that a person who is not financially secure should renounce his or her ambition of sitting in this House because he or she lacks the wherewithal in view of the insufficient salaries or retirement benefits associated with the job to represent people of the same social standing.

This would be absolutely unfair and unacceptable. Far from contributing to the progress of our society, we would cause it to lose ground by depriving ourselves of the talent of these men and women with so much to contribute to our society. While trying to increase the number of women in politics, I am afraid we would be excluding them altogether because it is a well-known fact that women are often less affluent than men. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this is a consideration we should really ponder upon.

There is another point in the bill introduced by my honourable friend which puzzles me. Why indeed should a former member of Parliament who went on to work for the Public Service of Canada not receive this retirement allowance before turning 60 years old, when the same rule would not apply to former members working in the provincial Public Service or in the private sector?

It seems to me that to pass this bill would be a serious breach of the equal opportunities principle. I think that the members of this House should ponder on this. I wonder if it would not be against the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which guarantees, as a fundamental principle, the right to equality.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Louis-Hébert has one minute left.

Mrs. Duplessis: Good, thank you.

Looking at the intent of the bill and its potential impact, I also wonder whether it is advisable, Mr. Speaker, to legislate only on the eligibility of a former parliamentarian to pension benefits when he or she has joined the Public Service of Canada. Is this the most urgent issue we have to address regarding all the pension plans in the Public Service of Canada, plans which were introduced by the Parliament?

All members of this House know full well that there are many other aspects of the plans provided under the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, and of our own plan under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. Considering the wide variety of current problems and the complexity of the existing plans, I would tend to agree that we should avoid looking into changing any element of a plan taken individually. It would certainly be wiser, Mr. Speaker, to consider each element of the plans as part of a whole set of changes designed to update and modernize pension plans throughout the Public Service of Canada.

Assuming we firmly believed that an issue so urgent and important exists that it should take precedence over any other, would it be fair to devote only the little time we have to the situation Bill C-343 attempts to address? What is most urgently needed? To deal with the complaints of those who dread to see a handfull of parliamentarians receive allowances once they have become federal public servants?

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the minister will table in the near future his bill containing all the changes he intends to make to pension plans.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to be able to support this particular bill which will bring I believe, if it were to be enacted, a sense of fairness in the whole scheme of pensions. I am delighted to join my colleague from Nepean, my colleague from Winnipeg North and I am told that my colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon, as well as my colleague from Winnipeg St. James, support this bill in principle.

There is in fact a double standard. We also make our own decisions with respect to our funding, our salaries and benefits and frankly, that could be and should be questioned.

It is when government is slashing health, education and social programs that people are really getting very, very upset. We can understand that. They see this kind of cutting back and they see us with fairly lucrative salaries, benefits and pensions and they become increasingly angry.

I will give a couple of examples. I hate examples because they tend to exaggerate and suggest that they go to the whole. I want to make that point very, very clear. This is not the case. There are some people who are not nearly as well off as others because of their circumstances. For example, and I am not picking on the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but he happens to be my example. He came in rather young. If he were to retire today and if he were to live to be 75 years old, and I suspect as cranky as he can get every once in a while he will go away beyond that, he would be paid over $5 million in pension.

Many of you will know for example that it takes us only 10 years to get 50 per cent of our salary, but it takes the other Canadians 25 years to attain 50 per cent of their salaries. Most Canadians do not like that one little bit. You know as well that our cap is 75 per cent of our salary, Mr. Speaker, while for other Canadians it is 70 per cent, and there is no happiness there.

With respect to retirement before 60, there is a 2 to 3 per cent penalty per year for other Canadians and none for us and that does not seem to be fair at all. Many of you have heard about "double-dipping" even today. I do not want to pick on anyone in particular but I have to use examples. Former cabinet minister Erik Nielsen retired a few years ago and got 75 per cent of his pension at that time, indexed since retirement until now, and $133,000 as president of the National Transportation Agency.

That is a lot of money, particularly when you think of the 5 million Canadians out there. There is a double standard, and I am not sure that we ought to be doing this all by ourselves.

What should we do? Let's consider an independent third party to address questions of salary, pensions, allowances, and other remuneration. Why not account for expenditures if it is going to make Canadians feel a lot better? With respect to future increases, looking at what is happening in the private and public sectors, there ought to be things that we are doing.

I believe that we need to do something like that. We need to look at questions of transferability of our own pensions to the private sector as opposed to having a separate one. We need to look at the possibility of continuing our own pension plans when we come here.

I could have spoken a lot longer, Mr. Speaker, but I notice that you are giving me the signal. I simply want to say that—

—yes, there is a double standard, and we should not be the ones to make decisions regarding our own salaries and benefits. I think that should be someone else's responsibility.

[English]

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak very briefly on this. I appreciate the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast bringing forward Bill C-343. I know that it is certainly not popular on many of the benches in this Chamber because it is a very touchy situation.

Having said that, I realize how important it is for this place, which seems so isolated from the rest of the country, to get together and to not just have something in the budget that looks good on paper, but to send a signal to the Canadian public that we are not above and beyond the rest of the Canadian public.

I want to speak very briefly about my friend from Louis-Hebert and what she said about our putting in a certain percentage of our wages into the pension plan. If we are looking at real dollars, I just got my T-4 and I put about $7,000, very roughly, as a new member of Parliament into my pension plan. If I am looking at that $7,000 per year and then I am entitled to a pension after six years of being in office, I have actually put $42,000 into that account.

In my particular instance, I would be eligible for a pension at age 42. If I multiply that all out, at roughly $18,000 or $20,000 that I would get on pension, that would mean that in two and a half years the actual money that I have put into my pension plan would have been used up and then I would be on the public purse, as it were, after that. Although this life is taking its toll on all of us as members of Parliament, I expect that I would live a little longer than two and a half years.

I would go one step further with my friend for Edmonton Southeast and indicate that my friend from Louis-Hebert made a very good comment, that being that somebody getting into the private sector would not be qualified for their pension under this bill. Someone working in the public sector would be penalized. I think the member for Edmonton Southeast would go along quite happily, as with one of his other private member's bills, were I to suggest that we go one step further and defer pensions for members of Parliament to age 60, whether they are working in the private or the public sector. I think that would bring it much more in line, and we would not be held in such contempt by the Canadian public.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I like other members of this House have a right and responsibility to speak on bills which are before the House. I would note in doing so that the hon. member who moved the bill took, as my friend the House leader of the New Democratic Party has said, almost 15 minutes in addressing this bill. If he had been really anxious that all members of this House should have an opportunity to participate and to express their views on a very important matter, then I think he would have spoken more briefly, which would have provided more members of Parliament with an opportunity to speak with respect to the bill.

I would suggest that I would have no difficulty in supporting this bill, with perhaps one or two changes. I would indicate to the hon. member that he might want to suggest that the bill refer only to full-time employment in the government service, because there are many people who have part-time jobs, perhaps earning $400, $500 or $1,000 a year, and they should not be penalized unduly for that.

I also think that he should address the question of the salaries which are going to be earned by members of Parliament—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 96, this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You are not in your seat, so the Chair cannot recognize you.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, since there seems to be a great deal of interest in this bill, I wonder whether there might be unanimous consent for continuing this debate. Could you put the question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but this item has now been dealt with. We are now on the adjournment motion, and I have recognized the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pursue with the government the question that I asked with respect to Lithuania sometime ago. Of course some members will know that I asked a number of questions about the situation in Lithuania and in the other Baltic States, Latvia and Estonia, over the last little while, ever since returning from there just over a year ago where I had the opportunity to observe the elections in Lithuania which brought the Sajudis movement to power.

Since then, of course, there have been other elections in Latvia and Estonia. Democratically elected governments have come to power in those republics. There have been declarations of independence. Now, just in the most recent weeks, and indeed in recent days, we have seen a series of referendas in those three republics, beginning of course with Lithuania where they had a referendum on independence and on Sunday, March 3, in Latvia and Estonia.

I think what is significant is not just the overwhelming majority which voted for independence in Lithuania where the Lithuanians, ethnically speaking, still form 80 per cent of the population, but the significant vote which independence received in Latvia and Estonia. Both of these republics have within them large Russian ethnic populations. It seems clear at this point that it is not just the ethnic Balts but others who envision the prospect of independent Baltic republics as a positive option.

I want to say that I am as glad as I am sure many others are that the central power in the Soviet Union, that is to say President Gorbachev and the Soviet Union per se, permitted these referenda to take place. These referenda have taken place in a thoroughly legal and constitutional way, but there was a time some weeks ago when it appeared because of the tragic actions of troops in Riga and Vilnius that there might have been a move afoot to undermine and even overthrow the democratically elected governments of these republics.

I hope I am not just being over-confident in saying that it appears that is not now the case and that these governments are continuing, as indeed they have demonstrated by being able to hold the referendas which have been held.

I think it is now incumbent upon the Soviet Union and upon President Gorbachev, given the unambiguous results of these referenda, to negotiate meaningfully and in good faith with the Baltic republics a way in which their special case, as opposed to other republics, can be recognized. When I say their special case, I mean of course the fact that they were incorporated by force into the Soviet Union as a result of the Molotov-Ribbentrop agreement or the Hitler-Stalin pact of 1938-39 and that this is a factor which has to be taken into account by Moscow when it is dealing with the Baltic republics.

Given the result of the referendas, I think it is now incumbent on Moscow, as I said before, to get serious about finding a solution to the aspirations for independence of the Baltic peoples, one that can be worked out and that is a positive alternative to both the real and implied threat of force should the Baltic republics continue to pursue the goal of independence.

It seems to me that much could be gained by Moscow, if indeed it were to allow the special case of the Baltics to be recognized and to permit the negotiation, albeit a tough negotiation, of Baltic independence.

There will be very difficult economic questions to address, given the many long years of economic integration and many future years of economic integration, I am sure. There will be security questions. There will be questions of minority rights in the Baltic republics, concerns which many non-Balts legitimately have.

There are many things to be worked out, but they can only be worked out after and when the Soviet Union finally admits that it has a problem here that cannot be solved by force or intimidation and that has to be dealt with by negotiations in good faith.

I call on the Canadian government to do its part, now that these referendums are over, by seeking ways to persuade—not to force or anything like that—the Soviet Union that the time has come to deal with this.

I think one of the ways that that can be done is to signal an intention on the part of the Canadian government that at every opportunity, in every appropriate international forum, the question of the Baltic states will be raised, whether it is at the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe or at the United Nations. Wherever opportunities present themselves, Canada should be in the forefront of saying to the Soviet Union in the appropriate international arenas: "Look, you guys, you have got to deal with this question. It is not just a matter of the internal affairs of the Soviet Union. It is a question which belongs in the international arena, given the former independence of these republics. We want you to negotiate with them in good faith, and we want you to respect the long-standing de jure view of the international community that these are indeed independent republics and should become so in fact as quickly as possible".

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to say just a few words in response to the concerns raised by my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

As all members of this House know, Canada recognizes the de jure independence of the Baltic states. We have never accepted their enforced annexation. We believe that their peoples have a right to determine their own future. In fact, Canada has clearly demonstrated its uncompromising support for the Baltic states on several different occasions during the course of the past year.

The right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister himself have both met with past leaders of Lithuania and Latvia and in some cases with the present leadership. In all cases, during the course of those meetings, I think Canada has taken the opportunity to demonstrate its commitment to the Baltic peoples who are continuing to strive for their right of self-determination.

In addition, the concerns of Canada and the concerns of this House have been conveyed to the appropriate Russian officials, to former Soviet Minister Shevardnadze, seeking assurance that there would not be a crackdown on the Baltic states. Unfortunately, as we all know, those assurances were not forthcoming.

In fact, we were among the first to react to the unwarranted military force used against the peoples and democratically elected governments of Lithuania and Latvia.

The Soviet Ambassador to Canada was called in on three different occasions during the month of January. Our ambassador in Moscow conveyed Canada's very strong concerns to the appropriate officials in that country. In communications with President Gorbachev on January 13, the Prime Minister of Canada expressly linked further offers of Canadian assistance to the continuation of reform.

• (1810)

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs welcomed the debate which occurred in this House on January 21. I can assure you that we will continue to exert the same kind of influence and pressure on the Soviet Union in the future that we have been doing in the past.

We will also continue to work with the Baltic peoples in Canada. There is consideration at the moment in the establishment of a Baltic information centre which I think would be of some value.

In conclusion, I believe that Soviet authorities are in no doubt as to the position of Canada on this matter. In fact, a member of the Official Opposition who has just visited the region recently reported that the influence and the activities of the Canadian government are well recognized there. They are also much respected there.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to pursue questions relating to the David Milgaard case.

First of all, I will state a few facts. David Milgaard is Canada's longest serving prisoner. He is serving a life term for the murder of a Saskatoon nurse, which occurred in 1969. He says he did not commit the crime. He has denied himself parole because he will not confess to that particular murder.

Much evidence has come forward casting doubt on his conviction. He applied to have his case reopened more than two years ago, and just a few days ago the Minister of Justice said "no" to the reopening of that case.

This case has attracted the attention of a nation. It has attracted attention of people who are concerned about justice. I am sorry, though, that I cannot say the same for the justice minister.

I believe that the hallmark of her handling of this case can be summed up in one word: indifference. She has not shown interest in this case. She has not shown a deep concern.

I am also concerned that the justice department approached this case with a closed mind. There is evidence that the Department of Justice was not impartial.

Take for example a report, Mr. Speaker, in The Globe and Mail of last August 1. In that report, a senior justice official, Mr. Bill Corbett, likened people who believe in Milgaard's innocence to those who believe that Elvis Presley is alive. To me, this reflects a damaging bias certainly to Mr. Milgaard's case, and I do not think it promises a fair hearing.

Bias also showed up in other ways. The prosecuting attorney in the case 21 years ago, Mr. Bob Caldwell, was asked to collaborate in the investigation of the case in the last few months.

We must remember who Mr. Caldwell is. Mr. Caldwell was the man who asked for Milgaard's conviction. I ask: Would he provide evidence that would reflect poorly on himself? I doubt it. Yes, let's have Mr. Caldwell's evidence under oath. Treat him like any other witness, I say. Anything less than that is contrary to natural justice.

We also have to wonder when the Department of Justice sends an investigator accompanied by the RCMP to interview a witness who testified at the trial 20 years ago. The witness was asked to visit a police station for interrogation without benefit of counsel. This occurred after arrangements were made to hold the interview at the lawyer's office, that is the lawyer of the witness.

Was this some kind of scare tactic? I have to ask the question. Was this an example of impartial, unbiased treatment? It does not seem likely. These are questions that concern me.

The Milgaard family along with their counsel have worked long and hard to uncover new evidence. The justice minister has more or less said a few days ago that this new evidence that was uncovered really would not have made any difference at the trial, that is if the evidence had been made available at that time. In effect, she was saying that the verdict would have been the same.

The victim in this case was raped and then murdered with a paring knife. Before that murder there were similar incidents of rape enforced with a paring knife, but the jurors were never told that. Had they known about these other incidents, would their verdict have been different? It is very possible. I think the minister's indifference to that is shocking.

The minister also pointed out in her statement of some days ago that a former judge from British Columbia was retained to look at the Milgaard case. That is fine in itself, but what were the terms of reference for the learned judge. We were never told. What evidence was the learned judge given to examine? We were never told. What was the judge's opinion? We never heard his opinion. We never heard about his judgment. We only heard from the justice minister what her opinion was.

If this were not bad enough, the judge's work was done behind closed door and Milgaard's counsel was not a party to any of it. This is not intended as any reflection on the judge. I am simply commenting on the process.

Finally, we must ask whether the justice department itself is in a conflict of interest. We must remember that in a case like this the justice department is asked to investigate itself. Is that a conflict of interest? Certainly on the surface it is.

We wonder about the justice minister herself. Remember, she is both the Attorney General of Canada and the Minister of Justice of Canada. Are those conflicting roles? Perhaps, especially in a situation of this kind, and we have to ask the question if we are really concerned about justice. In closing I want to say that we cannot, in all good conscience, accept the way the hon. Minister of Justice has handled the Milgaard case. I am talking about her handling of the case going back to day one, that is day one when she was asked or her predecessor was asked to look at this case and possibly re-open it. We cannot, in good conscience, accept her refusal to re-open the case. There are just too many questions and justice, natural justice, demands answers to those questions.

This issue is not going to fade away. It is not going to disappear. The justice minister might want it, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it will not fade away. The questions are far too serious and, besides, we must remember this: David Milgaard who has been behind bars for 21 years might be an innocent man.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the section 690 procedure of the Criminal Code allows for ministerial review of cases where new evidence or information provides a reasonable basis to believe that a miscarriage of justice likely occurred when the case was before the courts. An applicant may only resort to section 690 when all judicial remedies have been exhausted.

In the Milgaard case, an impartial jury found him guilty of murder; an impartial court of appeal dismissed his appeal; and the Supreme Court of Canada refused his application for leave to appeal in 1971. Having exhausted the judicial process, Milgaard's counsel wrote to the Minister of Justice on December 28, 1988, and applied on Milgaard's behalf for relief under section 690.

Two grounds were initially raised in the Milgaard application. To assess them properly, the department requested additional information which the applicant provided in May and August, 1989. Those grounds were investigated and a preliminary report was prepared in December, 1989.

While that report was being reviewed by senior justice officials, the applicant raised additional grounds which required investigation. First, a new suspect was introduced in February, 1990. Second, further forensic results were supplied in June, 1990. Third, additional statements from trial witnesses and others were supplied in June, 1990. Fourth, a "new witness" surfaced in July, 1990.

Each of these grounds was investigated by the Department of Justice with the aid of the RCMP. Since a number of new matters were added to the initial application the department at the request of the applicant's counsel received counsel's oral submissions in person on October 1, 1990.

The departmental report was completed and an independent legal opinion was obtained. The report, the opinion, and the applicant's submissions were all submitted to the minister who devoted a considerable amount of time reviewing the application, the facts, and the issues before the minister rendered a decision on February 27, 1991.

The proper exercise of the serious and important responsibility conferred upon the Minister of Justice requires a thorough review because the remedy is one of last resort. Accordingly the scientific issues raised in this case were referred to specialists in those disciplines for their evaluation and the authors of those reports were interviewed.

During the investigation of all the issues in the application over 36 witnesses were interviewed by the RCMP and departmental counsel. Some were questioned under oath and their answers were transcribed. The trial and appellate court record were also examined and reviewed.

During the minister's review of the case there was a careful consideration of the facts obtained from all sources and from counsel's submissions, in determining whether a miscarriage of justice likely occurred.

The minister concluded there was no body of new evidence or information which constituted as reasonable basis for believing that a miscarriage of justice likely occurred in this case.

HOUSING

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to discuss a matter that I raised on December 11 with the Minister of State (Housing), regarding the Quebec government's dissatisfaction with federal social housing policies.

Articles published in the press gave the impression that the province of Ontario had benefited from federal assistance for social housing, at the expense of Quebec. Created a few years ago, the Ministry of State (Housing) has introduced a number of initiatives designed to provide more help for Canadians who need it most.

Thanks to improved and sustained federal-provincial co-operation and a joint planning process for social housing, resources are now being put to better use and are better adjusted to regional needs. Umbrella agreements have eliminated administrative overlap and guarantee continuity of the planning process. In fact, these agreements direct social housing assistance to the neediest in this country, especially those who must spend more than 30 per cent of their income on housing. About 615,000 households benefit each year.

I was delighted to hear last December that the Co-operative Housing Program will be extended. Originally set up on an experimental basis, the program has helped low-and middle-income families, senior citizens, women, native people and disabled persons to find housing. The program will therefore continue to offer housing to households on modest incomes. New criteria for future residents of co-operative housing will ensure that federal funds are paid to lower-and middle-income households that cannot afford to become homeowners.

The program also provides that half the co-operative housing units will go to the neediest. The government also helps elderly Canadians in need through its social housing program. Those who do not require direct government assistance are offered a range of housing options that enable the elderly to maintain their physical and financial independence.

Since 1988, the federal government has provided for the construction of 8,811 senior citizens homes in Canada. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, in my own riding, since 1985, federal commitments to social housing have been very impressive. As part of the non-profit housing and rural housing programs, the federal government has helped increase investment in the riding of Drummond to the tune of $14 million.

Furthermore, under the non-profit housing program, six residences totalling 175 housing units have been built which will require an annual subsidy estimated at $717,000, to be paid for thirty-five years. The capital cost represents $25 million for the riding.

Under the rural housing program, four buildings containing a total of 40 housing units were built. This represents an annual subsidy of $207,276 for the next twenty-five years. The cost is evaluated at $5,200,000.

Two buildings erected under the federal Co-operative Housing Program will receive annual grants of the order of $51,003 over a 30-year period. These costs will amount to $1,530,000.

As well, government commitments with respect to rent supplement applicable to social housing constitute annual grants of $138,348 over the next 35 years, a total of $4,800,000.

Finally, under the provisions of the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program the federal government approved repairs in 839 housing units in the riding of Drummond, an expenditure of $4,702,649.

As to rent supplement, $138,348 in annual grants over the next 35 years will account for $4,800,000.

Mr. Speaker, the last Wilson budget has earmarked $1,000,739,690 for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a considerable amount.

However, despite the many commitments of the government in the social field, it would appear that the federal-provincial agreement benefits Ontario at the expense of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I always thought that federal government funds for housing poor people should be equitably distributed.

But on the contrary the articles to which I referred indicate that Ontario residents got more than their fair share. In fact the author of the article claims that the minister is more interested in looking after the housing needs of Torontonians that those of other Canadians. Mr. Speaker, it has also been suggested that these inequities date back to a number of years. If that be so, it is not time to set things straight?

Back in 1988 in Regina the federal government, the provinces and the two territories signed an agreement which was supposed to correct the situation. Now it would seem that the agreement has failed and that Quebec continues to be penalized.

I know that before our government took office the province of Quebec had decided that federal housing funds would not be invested in major construction projects. Instead the government favoured programs which did not entail long-term grants. As an example, the administration at the time saw fit to spend the federal money on home and apartment repairs rather than build new social housing units.

This decision was a blessing for thousands of people living in units badly in need of major repairs to be safer and more comfortable. This program in fact was a big help to thousands of households throughout the province in both urban and rural regions. One thing for sure however is that once the work was done there was no need for long-term grants.

In Ontario and elsewhere in Canada the need for new housing was more urgent than repair work, with the result that there were more construction projects spead over a number of years and subsidized over a longer period of time.

To be honest, Mr. Speaker, I know as well that Ontario got directly involved in shared-cost programs some ten years before Quebec did.

I would like to ask—I see the minister is in the House today, so this is a good opportunity for me because I have known him as a colleague since I first came here in 1984—whether that is the reason why more federal dollars went to that province rather than to Quebec, and can the minister tell the House why Quebecers who pay their fair share of taxes do not get as many benefits as some other regions of the country?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his question. It provides me with an opportunity to clarify the formula used by the government of Canada for the distribution of federal social housing funds among the provinces and territories to respond to the housing needs of Canadians across the country.

[English]

The objective of the federal government in social housing is to help low-income Canadians find adequate and affordable housing no matter where they live in the country. To that end, in 1985 we entered into negotiations and an agreement called the Regina Accord, with all of the provinces of Canada including Quebec, which developed a formula for the distribution of federal social housing funds.

Under that formula, which Quebec signed and agreed to, Quebec's share of federal housing funds was set at 24.75 per cent of all of the units available. In fact, in the years between 1986 and 1989, Quebec received more than that share which it had agreed to in the formula and in fact, received 25.4 per cent of all of the units available.

• (1830)

In 1987, the provinces started to object to the formula. We tried to develop a new formula which all would agree to. We did agree to the fact that no matter where people lived in this country, they should all have access to assisted housing and, in effect, we agreed to national standards for housing across this country.

Unfortunately, there was no final agreement on all of the terms of the new formula. In 1990 I decided as a temporary measure only, without agreement of all parties, that we would put into effect the new formula. Under that new formula, we would respect the fundamental principles of needs and access for all Canadians, national standards.

Under that Quebec received in 1990, actually a larger share than it had before. Quebec now receives 25.65 per cent of all national housing units. In fact, that amounts to an increase in funding for Quebec for federal social housing dollars. In 1989, Quebec received some 18.31 per cent of the allocation, but in 1990 it received 5 per cent more, some 23.20 per cent, whereas Ontario which had received some 41 per cent of all of the federal social housing dollars in 1989, went down to some 35 per cent of social housing dollars in 1990.

I am the national minister of housing. As such, I have special responsibilities. Canada is a rich and civilized country. We must guarantee the quality of life of all our fellow citizens. We must ensure that their basic needs are met. As you know, food and housing are basic needs. I am firmly committed to helping the poor. I cannot let the administrative or political priorities of the various levels of government divert me from this responsibility and from the principle of equality which should motivate the actions of a national government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order adopted earlier today, the motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been withdrawn.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C–97, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate at five o'clock, the hon. member for South Shore had the floor. He has 17 minutes left.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to resume the debate begun earlier.

I had started by making reference to the fact that what we are here to debate, of course, is the borrowing bill which is, in effect, an element of the budget though, in fact, it is something that exists under the Financial Administration Act.

Borrowing is about debt and it is about deficit. I hear all sorts of things said and played with about debt and deficit in this country. I think it is important to review the realities of the situation, to find out why it is necessary for the government to borrow money. A lot of people operate on the principle that the best way to run your affairs, whether they be government affairs or personal affairs, is to pay your bills as you go along. I am sure that is what most people want to do and that is certainly what any responsible government wants to do.

On the other hand, that is not what has been going on in Canada for the last decade or so. Consequently we are faced today with a staggering national debt, a debt that unfortunately is the legacy of our forebears. We are fortunate, however, in that for the past six and a half years, the country has benefited from a Minister of Finance who has made as his number one principle, his cardinal principle, fiscal responsibility and the coming to grips with the massive deficit he inherited.

When this government came into office in 1984, the annual deficit of this country had risen to $38 billion. That is a staggering amount of money. What is even more shocking, when one reflects on that, is that this deficit was not just interest payments, that in fact it included an $11 billion deficit in program spending. The government of the day was spending $11 billion more than it was taking in in revenues. On top of that, this government and this Minister of Finance inherited $27 billion in interest charges every year.

My hon. friends opposite like to say: "Look at the way the national debt has grown under this government and under this minister." But it is a lot easier to say: "Get rid of the national deficit" than it is to do it. My hon. friends opposite are forever imploring this government to spend more. Every time there is a cost-cutting measure, we hear anguish and howling from the other side: "Why don't you spend more here?" We heard it in this debate during the course of today's session. On the other hand, any time the government takes a revenue-increasing measure—which of course is a lovely way of increasing the taxation load of Canadians, which is, in my opinion, too great—they say: "No, you cannot raise taxes either." So, you cannot raise taxes to deal with the deficit and you cannot reduce expenditures to deal with the deficit.

Then what do my hon. friends opposite do then? They turn around and criticize the government because we have a big deficit and a big debt.

How do you achieve rationality out of that? It is very simple. Canadians recognized some years ago that the only way to have rationality was to get a government that had a sense of fiscal responsibility, that had a recognition of the fact that you have to pay your bills in this world, and that recognized that ultimately down the road there is no such thing as a free lunch, that ultimately somebody is going to pay. And that is the government we have in power today.

When my hon. friends opposite suggest that we should not cut expenditures here or we should not raise taxes there, they never come up with a solution to the problem. Goodness knows what the shape of the deficit and the national debt would be in this country if my hon. friends opposite had continued the spendthrift ways that existed in this country from 1974 to 1984, when the average growth in program spending by the Government of Canada of the day—a government, I might say, not of my political persuasion—was 13.8 per cent. Since this government has been in power, that rate has been reduced to 3.6 per cent, a remarkable improvement, which is below the level of inflation.

I believe that is a correct statement. I would not want to mislead the House.

The bottom line is that we have experienced fiscal responsibility.

When people say "cut", what do they mean? I go around my constituency and my province and people are always saying: "The government has to cut more spending." My impression of what people usually mean when they say to cut spending is to cut the programs that they are not interested in. Or if they say that you have to raise taxes, what they really mean is: "Raise the taxes that other people pay; don't raise the ones that I pay."

Fiscal responsibility means cutting the cloth according to the pattern in order that you can pay your bills. And that has been the hallmark of Mr. Wilson's period as Minister of Finance. The country's finances are in sufficiently good shape that we stand here debating a borrowing bill giving the government authority to borrow $26.4 billion. As the minister said to me the other day: "How do you figure out what $26 billion is? I cannot relate to that." He said: "I found out that they built the dome in Toronto for $500 million; that is half a billion. So, what I think of is 53 domes."

I hope the day will come when we do not need 53 domes or the money to purchase them.

The bottom line, Mr. Speaker, is that the progress that this government is making is such that we see a commitment that by 1994-95 we will have no further need for new borrowing by the Government of Canada. And that will be a very happy day for all Canadians.

The borrowing authority is in fact part of the government's budgetary plans. Let's take a look at those plans and see how they are put in place in such a way as to deal with this debt problem that the country has. What we saw in the budget the other night—and I must say that I thought it was an excellent budget brought forward by the Minister of Finance—is a budget that presents a clear plan for recovery and economic growth and renewal in this country. It will ultimately lead to lower interest rates which is going to be a benefit to all Canadians, I believe. It establishes clear and attainable inflation targets and sets a clear path to a balanced budget, something we have not seen for many, many years in this country.

I want to say a word about interest rates. We used to hear members opposite, during the course of the last year, say: "ah, the government should arbitrarily lower interest rates". Well, you know, that was a politically popular thing to do. The government said: "Hey, if we just do that we get ourselves in a situation where we will simply fuel inflation, and that is not going to be for the benefit of Canadians". Inflation, in the final analysis, is the killer. We need investment in this country. Investment is attracted by people who have confidence in the economy.

The keys to the recovery and economic growth and development and fiscally responsible approach that this government is taking are several. First and foremost is control of government expenditures. This government has done this, as I said before, by getting a handle on those expenditures.

I mentioned that when Mr. Wilson became finance minister we had an $11 billion operating deficit in this country. That has been turned around to the point where it is now a $12.5 billion operating surplus. The reason in 1994–95 we are not going to need new government borrowing authority is because by then that operating surplus will be up to $22 billion. So we are making remarkable progress.

Now expenditure control may be responsible, but it is not always easy and it is not always popular. In the budget this year we have a freeze on program spending and a 3 per cent growth permissible thereafter in government spending. That is tough because we all know that costs are rising, so that if you are going to pull 3 per cent out it means you have got to find it from things that are there and that hurts.

I heard one of the hon. members opposite earlier today saying: "oh, it is terrible that we have had reductions here and reductions there". The fact of the matter is, given the interest rates from last year, in order to control inflation which is something clearly we are successfully doing, we had higher interest rates than we would have liked and the result was, of course, an increase in the interest pressure on the government debt charges. That meant that we would have had a deficit of $35 billion this year. Instead, through the restraint program, we have brought that down to $30.5 billion and the finances of the country are in much better shape.

I think it is important symbolically as well as substantively that the government is not leading by saying this is what you should do, but leading by example. We are obviously not going to save a great deal of money in terms of the deficit by freezing cabinet ministers' salaries or by capping members, of Parliament salaries, but it sends the message that we, too, are prepared to share the burden. Similarly, with respect to the Public Service.

Now we have heard a tremendous amount of anguish expressed by leaders of the public service unions about the proposal in the budget that there be no increase in the budgetary allotment for salaries in the public service. That the government is not prepared to enter into a contractual arrangement in excess of 3 per cent and that if we go to the 3 per cent that is going to mean a comparable reduction in employees in order to make up the difference.

Well that is not a very happy circumstance, but the fact of the matter is that the government cannot preach to private industry, it cannot preach to the provinces unless it is prepared to set the example itself.

I heard a member opposite the other day lamenting the fact that salaries in the Public Service were barely an average of $30,000 a year. Well I would like to say that there are an awful lot of fish plant workers in the South Shore constituency, there are an awful lot of Christmas tree harvesters in the South Shore constituency who would be more than pleased to try to get along on $30,000 a year. So I think things sometimes have to be put into perspective.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are telling me that my time is almost up and I am barely getting warmed up, but I do want to mention one thing before I conclude and that is with respect to the subject of grants and contributions where there is to be a $75 million reduction in expenditures.

I think non-governmental organizations play an important role in Canada. I am not always convinced that we have to give out, as government, all the grants that we do, but I think there are certain principles that should be followed in determining where these cuts should be made. First of all, it is fashionable to say cut core funding and just fund projects. Well, having been president of a national NGO for three years I can tell you that if they will not provide you with core funding then you spend all your time trying to stay alive and cannot get on with the work you are put there to do.

Secondly, we have to look at which NGOs have the potential to fund-raise. Some do, some do not. That is a principle we should look at.

Finally we should look at the federal mandate and policy objectives and make sure we support objectives which Canadians feel to be desirable.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are giving me the sign so I guess I must adjourn. If I may just mention in closing that it is extremely important that this bill pass expeditiously because borrowing authority extends to March 31 from last year's bill. If we do not get a new borrowing authority bill we are then faced with short-term financing which will cost the taxpayers of Canada a lot of money that we need not spend. Therefore, I commend the bill to all members and urge their support of it.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, if it was not so laughable I would let it go, but the hon. member for South Shore says and I quote him: "The debt is the legacy of our forebears". Well, when is this member and the member who said "right" and, in fact, this government going to start taking responsibility for their own economic and fiscal mismanagement.

This government was elected in 1984. It has been almost seven years in power, holding the reins of power for almost seven years, seven of our almost most prosperous years in this country where we had jobs, where we had the money. Did this government during those seven prosperous years sock away any money for the rainy day? No. In fact, they spent like drunken fools.

Before 1984 we only had about 26 ministers in the Liberal government. Today they have almost doubled the number of ministers, doubled the number of ministers.

Mrs. Marleau: Limousines.

Mr. Keyes: And with all that doubling, as my hon. friend from Sudbury says, come all the expenses—

Mrs. Marleau: Big offices.

Mr. Keyes: Bigger offices, big expansions, chauffeurs, limousines, extra perks, extra expenses. That is a lot of money. Did any of those ministries get cut back in this budget? No, I would not think so. Instead the government continues to play this cruel and vicious game of cost-cutting.

I want to ask the member would he not admit that given the opportunity of the last six to seven years you could have done something, you could have socked away some money for the rainy day? Instead, you have brought forward a budget with its viciousness and its cruelness at the worst possible times.

For example, I go to my own riding of Hamilton West. I talked with the department of social services there. Total spending for mandatory welfare programs in the Hamilton—Wentworth region last year budgeted $52.4 million. They had to spend $64.1 million, and he tells me that they expect a significant increase again this year. But they are cutting back.

Want to talk cases? Let us talk welfare cases. There were 7,195 welfare cases a year ago January. Last January that number increased from 7,195 to over 10,000 cases in Hamilton alone. But they want to cut back on welfare assistance. Does this make sense to the hon. member? When times are tough? When the need is there? Not when the going is good but at the worst possible time they decide to cut back and implement their cruel and vicious cost-cutting measures.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my hon. friend who has just provided a marvellous illustration of precisely the point that I made. He chastises this government for reducing the expenditures on the one hand and then calls for more expenditures and criticizes us for the debt situation at the same time.

My hon. friend should understand that when you inherit a $38 billion deficit, the only way you can keep the national debt from growing is to go from a $38 billion deficit to a zero deficit in one year. If you are faced with inheriting incredible interest charges, which as I said during my remarks which I know my hon. friend listened to with great attentiveness, included inheriting $27 billion worth of interest charges, that is what we inherited, along with an $11 billion deficit in program and operations, you will understand the magnitude of the task.

When you realize that an $11 billion deficit has been turned around to a $12.5 billion surplus on budget, you will see a $25 billion difference or approaching it, so we have made remarkable progress. Regrettably when you inherit that deficit, even if you cut it down, whatever is left, you are still adding on to the debt year after year after year. That is the crippling load.

My hon. friend says: "You should be able to wipe that out". We have just heard him chastise this government for the cuts it has made. I presume by implication he is saying: "Cut a few ministers and cut out a few ministers' cars". With any luck you might save $1 million that way. Where are you going to get the other $11 billion that is there.

I invite him to look at a little publication called Where Your Tax Dollars Go that will clearly illustrate for his benefit and help him decide where we should cut the $27 billion. Does he want it cut out of the transfers to persons receiving the old age pension, does he want it taken out of veterans allowances, does he want it out of family allowances? We have put a cap on the growth of EPF for health and education and they are screaming over there. They say we have destroyed health services and medicare. I guess they do not want us to take it out of there.

We cannot take it out of the interest charges. Where are we going to take it from? We know they did not want to send troops to the Persian Gulf. Maybe they would like to abolish the Department of National Defence. Surely they abandoned it for many, many years when they were in power.

I think there is an incumbency on the other side to recognize as Canadians do, as they did in 1984, and in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, as they did in 1988 that fiscal responsibility comes from the crowd on this side of the House, comes from having a government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments, the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, when I listen to the hon. member, as I observe the government, I have a vision of a single party somehow having a struggle with itself. The government has the government by the neck. It has got the government on its knees, with its knees on its chest, choking, fighting and carrying on. That is the vision I have of this government. The hon. member leaves as I am posing a question to him. Look at the question of the deficit. I am not talking about social expenditures or anything of the sort. I am talking about what this government is doing on its own ground.

It ought to be at least understandable to the hon. member for South Shore that ultimately the deficit is going to be dealt with only if there is consistent economic growth in this country. Yet in this budget not only is there not a clear-cut economic policy based on the necessary steps that almost everyone agrees have to be taken, in fact there has been an attack on all of those things that we all know must be funded, must be strengthened if in fact we are going to have the kind of economy that will not plunge us into further deficits and deeper deficits in the future.

I am talking about research and development, post-secondary education, training and infrastructure which are not there at all. On the other hand, a good deal of that deficit is attributable to high interest rates which have been engineered by this government.

An hon. member: Right on.

Mr. McCurdy: In fact, it says that it is struggling with inflation. It says it has to keep wages down in the Public Service I suppose, as a message, to other workers. Yet, if you look at the increase in inflation that this country has experienced, a good deal of it is due to high interest rates. A good deal of it is due to the increased costs of regulated services. A good deal of it is due to higher taxes. A good deal of it is due to the GST.

An hon. member: Right on.

Mr. McCurdy: Now, if that is responsible financial management, I would sure hate to live in the house you are running on that basis.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I will just briefly respond. I take it from the hon. member's remarks that he does not endorse the budget put forward by this government. Nevertheless, I notice, as well, that he, like my hon. friend from Hamilton, has suggested ways in which the government could spend more money without offering constructive suggestions as to how we do deal with the deficit that faces all Canadians and, indeed, has led to the high rate of inflation that in turn has fueled the high interest rates which have caused so much difficulty to Canadians from coast to coast. It is only because the government took a strong stand in accordance with sound economic policies that we have apparently got inflation under control and that is why we have seen a 3.5 per cent drop in interest rates in the last year.

If my hon. friends opposite would take the time to carefully read the budget, they would see that we have clearly established targets. We are looking ahead to 2 per cent inflation, to 6 per cent and 7 per cent interest rates and we are going to be looking—I hate to tell my hon. friends opposite—at a booming economy just in time for the next election.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for South Shore indicated, this is a debate on Bill C-97, the borrowing bill, which may be considered to be a part of the budget.

I hesitate to be a participant in what is, according to this government, increased borrowing power, as the House will almost surely decide in the final analysis. This government is already deeply enough in debt on borrowed time. If this government wanted to serve the people of this country, what it would do is resign right now.

I listened to the Prime Minister deliver his constitutional talk to the Empire and Canadian Clubs in Toronto and I listened to his vision for dealing with the question of Canadian unity, of its future Constitution, and his solution to the problems that are plaguing the country and causing such great concern to Canadians. I want to read a portion of this speech because I think it is important for Canadians to understand what he is up to, what he has been up to, and what he will be up to.

He set out I think seven characteristics that would govern constitutional change in this country. He said that the first benchmark of that future reconstitution of this nation would be to build the kind of prosperous Canada that his government has been in the process of building.

Let us understand specifically what that means because I think it is going to frighten Canadians when they understand what he considers to be fundamental to any constitutional change. That is that those gains that have been achieved by the free trade agreement, privatization and fiscal changes such as the goods and services tax are the first prerequisite in this man's vision of the future of Canada.

Evidently, he is completely immune to the fact that what he has already been engaged in, in terms of that economic policy, lies at the very basis of the constitutional crisis in this country, because every Canadian has the presumption that he has been involved in the destruction of this nation. That is why we have a constitutional crisis.

Let us look at the record of this economic policy. First of all, that economic policy has been marked with a closer identification with American values. This is in some respects exemplified in the free trade agreement, the specific intent of which is to bring a greater degree of harmonization between our two nations. It really is a reflection of the Prime Minister's personal identification with a philosophy that is exclusively market-driven. It is a point of view that leads Canada to be the lap-dog of American foreign policy, as well as its economic mimic.

Someone said that when the Prime Minister went to New York when he was first elected Prime Minister of this country he came, he saw, he concurred.

An important part of this Americanization of Canada, the hurtful part of this Americanization of Canada, has been the attack on those institutions and programs which to the Canadian mind has kept this country together with a sense of community. It is a nation that extends across the vast geographic area, that consists of any number of different populations requiring certain kinds of institutions to keep them together such as the CBC, VIA Rail, the post office. All of these things have been under attack.

Social programs have been under attack. Medicare is under attack. Even in Quebec, even among those who are not sure of the future relationship that Quebec should have with Canada, the attack on medicare has been regarded, even there, as an attack on the Confederation of Canada.

Then we have the strange approach to economic growth, which in fact is completely contradictory to everything that they have said about improving Canada's competitiveness in the world.

The deficit has been the determinate of just about everything this government has done. It has undermined growth in the economy and, as a consequence, it almost surely means over the long run that, unless there are other factors that change, the deficit will become larger.

After all, the deficit reflects the ability of the country to produce wealth and therefore to what degree taxes are collected and in what amounts. It reflects the payments that have to be made to those who are not working. It is clear that the deficit is not just a fiscal measure. It must reflect economic measures as well, but this government has failed to choose those appropriate measures that will address the economy and, over the long run, address the deficit.

The budget, with its attack and preoccupation with the deficit, is a reflection of a mentality: the bookkeeper's mentality, the economists mentality, the bottom line mentality. If I wanted to compare what the Minister of Finance has done, I think what I would want to cite is the example of the automobile industry 10 years ago, in which accountants like the finance minister and others on that side were so preoccupied with the bottom line and circumstances when they could get away with it that they started getting rid of their engineers, their scientists, their designers, their creative people. Yes, they are still getting a profit, but across the Pacific Ocean the designers, the engineers and the scientists—the people who do creative work, not the accountants—were producing cars that created a field of competition that required change. They had to look at the roles of creativity, of innovation, of knowledge, and of technology in the automobile industry.

We can extend that analogy to this nation. This has become a bottom-line nation in a world of knowledge, technology, creativity and ability to produce value added combined to produce wealth. This country is falling increasingly far behind and has been doing so ever since this government came into office. The strange and bizarre thing is that the Prime Minister seemed to recognize back in 1983 the necessity of doing something about Canada's utter failure in the areas of research, development, technology and innovation.

This budget continues the tack that has not only failed to meet the measure of improvement, but the Prime Minister's promise has still further eroded our ability as a nation to create the kind of value-added economy we are going to need to have to compete.

What are the dimensions of this? Specifically, we must have increased investment in research and development. We must have more scientists, more engineers and a more highly-trained work force. We must have, therefore, improvements and not a deterioration in post-secondary education. We must have improvements and not a deterioration of the levels of training, and we must make investments in infrastructure.

Yes, what has happened? It goes on. If we look at research and development, for example, the National Research Council will get an increase of roughly 3 per cent. It is kind of difficult to calculate with any precision, but roughly 3 per cent. In fact, before the budget was released the National Research Council received a message from the finance minister that it could be assured of an increase in funding of $50 million over the next five years.

This is the same NRC that this government cut back in 1985-86. This is the same NRC that has had its scientific complement cut over the last year by about 100. This is the same NRC that submitted a proposed five-year plan last spring in which it asked for $125 million over five years for IRAP alone, that is the Industrial Research Assistance Program. Let us look at the comparison: $50 million over five years of which the 3 per cent increase received in the budget is applied. For the entire NRC, as compared to $125 million asked for over five years for IRAP, the most successful job producing program the government finances anywhere at $15,000 a job.

Yet, the government did not see fit to take money for its advertising of the GST and all those other wasteful expenditures and put it where the proper priorities would have had it.

Similarly, NSERC, which is responsible for funding research in the universities, received an increase of 3.7 per cent. The National Advisory Board for Science and Technology and the House committee on industry, science and technology, on which you might realize, Mr. Speaker, there are a couple of government members, agreed that the funding for the granting councils which support basic research in universities should be doubled over a three-year period. This year they got an increase of 3.7 per cent. The impact of this is tremendous. Given the way they are going to spend money, it is true that slightly more researchers and slightly more graduate students are going to receive grants. However, they will all receive less.

The impact of this kind of approach to basic research in the universities is documented right in the estimates. It says that equipment currently used in research laboratories is generally in worse condition than in use in 1981 when the NSERC first made its report on the status of research equipment in universities.

It is important to have up-to-date equipment both for competitiveness and forefront research and for training graduate students. There, in the government's own document, is the clear statement that what this government is doing is an attacking. It is an attack on research and development in this country, an attack on our ability to produce trained scientists and engineers.

Similarly, the Medical Research Council received 2.4 per cent in increased funding.

In the present budget in education they have cut Established Programs Financing by virtue of Bill C-96 as they have done practically since this government was elected. The cuts for 1990 together with the cuts for 1991 are going to cut $3.8 billion from universities alone. That amounts to roughly $1,000 for each student in the college and university system. That is just heaped upon an over-all cut in federal funding to the universities of almost $10 billion that was engineered by the Liberals at the beginning of the 1980s and continues now with the Conservatives at the beginning of a new decade.

It is not just scientists and engineers that we need; it is also trained workers that we need. But they have cut $100 million from Canadian Jobs Strategy. By the way, this is after they had already cut training programs, job creation programs, from $2.4 billion to $1.3 billion and after they had cut the Canadian Jobs Strategy summer program for students from $200 million to $140 million.

In education, in training, and in research and development this government is attacking this country's ability to grow.

Finally, with respect to infrastructure, we find that this government has failed utterly to recognize the importance in our municipalities, our provinces and our regions of infrastructure for the success of future economic development in this country.

Robert Reich has described two kinds of approaches to an economy. You can have a vicious cycle that is based on the premise that you can achieve economic development by offering a good business environment. That is kind of familiar, meaning low wages, few regulations and low taxes especially for the rich. You can have a virtuous cycle, he says, of economic development if you adopt the premise that you are going to educate your workers and you are going to encourage creativity. Because you have education and training and you have creativity, it grows; it gets greater.

But once you start the kind of policy that this government has adopted of attacking the workers by trying to suppress wages, by redistributing wealth so it goes up instead of down, then you are on your way to a vicious cycle in which you will have no alternative but to offer still lower wages and still poorer conditions for everyone.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I regret having to interrupt the hon. member. Questions and comments. The hon. member for London—Middlesex.

[English]

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to respond to the diatribe we heard from Windsor, Ontario. I am sure the hon. member is speaking with a great deal of compassion but I really do not think a great deal of fact, and certainly no understanding at all about what this government has done since 1984.

I want to rebut a couple of the points. For example, in economic reform he questioned the basics of our policy on GST and free trade. In fact he made the statement that we are succumbing to American values. I say that is not true at all. They are Conservative values. I am sure it sounds very foreign to the member, but clearly that is what they are.

He questioned world access at a time when the whole world is responding and wanting world access for their markets. Countries of the world, in increasing numbers, realize that an inter-linked economy is the economy of the future. I think the member has missed the fact that this government has already seen that since 1984 and has been directing activity and putting policies in place so that Canada can respond to an inter-linked global economy and be a key player. Clearly he did not follow the GATT proposals and the debates. These countries are all dedicated to a market economy and closer and closer toward free trade, words that are foreign to that party's policy of course.

The accountant's mentality that we are charged with, why not? Why not have some bottom-line thoughtfulness here? Why duplicate services? I think the clear signal in this budget was just that, the fact that we have to find ways. The signal in the budget of the Minister of Finance was to the provinces and to the municipalities was that we could no longer duplicate or triplicate services, that we had to find ways of bringing this economy into common sense and bringing it together. Clearly the Prime Minister has recognized that by asking the Economic Council of Canada to do a review of the whole subject.

Research and development was another key point. Clearly this government knows about this, knows that we are going to be 30,000 engineers short by the end of the decade. I am sure the member knows this. He has a university in his town, like I have in mine. The University of Western Ontario has grabbed on to our new program in science, engineering and technology and has become part of the scholarship program of $200 million to produce these new students, these new leaders in this particular field.

I think the member has forgotten this program. We are committed to research and development. The private sector should get the signal that it is going to have to pay more. That goes along with training as well.

The member does not understand that good training, the stuff that is going to be real for the work force in Canada, is the kind of programs designed by people in the work force and people in management who are trying to make this country competitive in an increasingly competitive global market. With the $800 million we save with the UIC changes we are dedicating money to the training and retraining of Canadians to fit the competitiveness of the global economy.

There has in fact been a national board established to develop these programs from the grassroots. We finally want to get programs that work for Canadians so that Canadians can hold their head up and compete with anyone in the world. This country can do it. The member has just got to listen and follow our lead.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member called my speech a tirade, which I gather means that he did not approve it. Then he followed by demonstrating that he did not understand any of it.

It is not a question of being aware that there has to be a budget and that the budget should adhere to certain reasonable notions of what we can afford, and all of that. That is not the issue. The question is what goes on inside that budget.

If the hon. member thinks that this government has done anything significant with respect to research and development, then he does not know what he is talking about. The level of expenditures for research and development for this government has not increased a penny since 1984. If you call attention to the role of industry, the fact is that industry has increased its share while the government has decreased its share. What it has put in new has been a pittance and has not come anywhere near matching inflationary requirements.

With respect to training it has utterly failed up until now to produce anything but promises, including this vaunted panel which is right now paralyzed because Quebec will not participate.

Consistently over the period from 1984 to 1991 this government has shown a distinct lack of leadership in respect to post-secondary education as well and if he does not believe that he does not have to trust what I say. Read the report of the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology. Read the report that was produced by a majority of his own members on the committee on industry, science and technology. Listen to the provincial ministers of education. Listen to what is being said by industrial organizations. Listen to what is said at the science forum organized by this government itself.

What you will read, what you will see, what you will hear is that: this government has failed to do what is necessary to be done to make this country a competitive nation. All it has done is adopt the free trade agreement that makes it impossible to use most of the tools we ought to be able to use and the government has failed to use what tools are left.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I must agree with many of the comments made by my colleague, the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair. This Conservative government has really failed to invest in training. A dollar spent today is worth ten dollars five years from now.

The Conservative government always claims that business must become more involved in training and retraining and that is a very laudable approach except that it appears that the businesses and the corporations are fleeing our country. How can we ask these businesses and corporations to be retraining the future generation of people who must bring wealth to this country? First, perhaps this government should consider changing some of its policies and we may be able to attract these companies who might in future retrain.

One of the other problems, and I will ask you to comment on this, is that in the cutbacks on Established Program Financing that we are seeing, this government has gone on to say how they would bring forward legislation to penalize provinces who do not keep up standards or keep up universality in the health care system. What they have neglected to consider is that if these provinces comply and maintain the same level of spending in health then it needs to cut back in education. Again, who is going to be hurt the most? It is our country, our economy, and our future because there will be no investment in that future generation.

I would like your comments as to this point.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I quite agree. In fact, when the Liberal government in 1977 cancelled the fifty-fifty split with respect to EPF that is when the trouble began. Since then the portion of EPF transfer payments that goes to universities has deteriorated to about 37 per cent.

You are quite right. If the government tries to enact legislation that would tie the provinces to meet the standards of medicare, and standards with respect to post-secondary education, that is going to impose a rather severe burden on those provinces if there are no transfer payments accompanying that responsibility.

However, I personally have quite considerable difficulty understanding how mechanically, or constitutionally, the government will be able to pull that off, especially given that for the last six years whenever the issue has arisen with respect to specifying a portion of EPF for universities and requiring matching funds from the provinces in order that the provinces meet their responsibilities with respect to post-secondary education, the government has always said that goes too far, that we should not be imposing anything on the provinces.

This seems to me to be a wild contradiction from this government. This government contradicts itself.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make a few comments in respect of Bill C-97, the borrowing bill, which obviously relates directly to the budget recently brought down by the Minister of Finance.

Also, it relates directly to my own responsibilities, my own portfolio, and the impact that this bill and the budget has on housing, on our national housing programs and on the federal housing agency, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

You and I well know, Mr. Speaker, the difficult problem that faced the Minister of Finance in trying to address the economic situation in a budget this year. On the one hand, there was an enormous deficit situation, a situation which had grown more severe in this past year, on top of a very substantial national debt.

Balancing that situation were economic difficulties in the country which have to be addressed as well. Somehow or other, the Minister of Finance had to meet the debt problem and, at the same time, meet the economic difficulties we have in the country.

I believe that he has managed to do that in a way that has not hurt or damaged those who are the poor and the disadvantaged people in this country, particularly as that applies to housing. It was not an easy task. I have to congratulate him for the job he did with respect to dealing with the housing budget and with people who need help in housing.

In fact, the bottom line of the budget is that in spite of a continuing 15 per cent reduction in ongoing increases in social housing spending—a reduction that was put into place in last year's budget, through this year and on for the fiscal framework of the next five years—this year the actual amount of money the federal government will be spending on social housing is going up by $116 million.

That is added to the amounts that were spent last year and in previous years. This extra amount includes an inflationary increase which will go into effect and will allow us to continue to maintain the existing assisted housing program across our country. That inflationary increase to help existing housing programs amounts to some $30 million of additional money.

Added to that is an additional $86 million which will allow the federal government, through the federal housing agency, CMHC, to help to assist even more people who need housing and help with housing in this country in the coming year.

I trust that all members of the House are aware that currently across the country the federal government is assisting almost 650,000 needy households. These are people who fall into the categories of senior citizens and single parent families, the majority of whom are women-led single parent families. They fall into the categories of disabled people, low income single women, families with low incomes, single people with low incomes, disabled people with low incomes and natives with low incomes.

It is interesting to note that this help is directed towards Canadians who this year will have an average annual income of around $11,000 a year only. Therefore, this sum is being spent to assist people like that. It is certainly very needed and certainly very helpful.

Again, I think the Minister of Finance is to be congratulated for making sure that this budget does not impact on those people any more severely than it has in the past, and in fact will be helping over 40,000 more needy households this year than were helped last year.

It is important to recognize as well that the budget is going to allow for the continuation of all of our national housing programs, and, in particular, will allow for the continuation of some housing programs which we hope to improve this year.

One of those is what is known as our RRAP program, our Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. It helps natives living on reserves, it helps low-income homeowners and it helps people with disabilities who are homeowners as well.

In 1990, the federal government was able to assist some 25,000 households under this program. This was done through a forgivable loan program which involved some $105 million and which allowed people whose housing had fallen below standard to upgrade their homes and to continue to live in those homes. This program helps very dramatically, very inexpensively and cost effectively Canadians who own homes but who need help to maintain them. If they do not get that help, they are going to have to move into other assisted housing that some government would have to build from scratch.

This is a very cost-effective program. It is one we have been reviewing over the last few years and I expect we will be coming forward with some new suggestions in the coming year. Perhaps there will be a suggestion that I know my colleagues in the House from the province of Quebec are most interested in and that is helping low-income people who rent. Our past program, which was discontinued two years ago, the rental RAP program, is being looked at to see if there is some way that we could provide some help in this area. That help will go to needy people and not to investors or people who can afford to make these repairs on their own.

Another program we hope we will be making some additions to this year is our rural and native housing program. This program has been targeted to natives living off reserve and to people in remote and rural areas of the country. Some 50 per cent of all of the funds under that program have been targeted over the last few years to natives. We again expect that in the coming year, after completing a consultation process and an evaluation process of those programs that we will be coming forward with some new suggestions as to how we can improve that program as well.

One of the programs we have already improved is one that I announced a week ago yesterday, and that was a new and augmented initiative in the area of housing for the victims of family violence. This, of course, includes the women and the children who are victims of family violence. It also includes senior citizens. It also includes disabled people who, as you know, are these days the subject of family violence, something which all of us feel very deeply is completely and totally unacceptable in our society. As a result, not only must we try to prevent family violence from occurring, we must deal with the effects, the impact of family violence. We have to provide some housing, whether it is emergency shelters for the victims of family violence or whether it is longer term housing after they have had a short stay in an emergency shelter.

The government already has in place a program called Project Haven, which started in 1988 and should conclude in 1992. Over that time we should be able to put in place another 450 emergency shelter units to help the victims of family violence.

A week ago yesterday I announced in Edmonton an augmentation of that program whereby we would provide a further $4 million for shelters and a further $16 million for second-stage housing for the victims of family violence. We estimate that the program, once it is in effect, combined with Project Haven with its 450 units of emergency shelters is going to be able to help some 27,000 victims of violence, whether they be women and children or whether they be senior citizens or disabled people who are suffering as a result of those abuses.

At the same time, the second stage housing I announced a week ago will be able to assist some 2,100 victims of family violence each and every year.

I do not think I have to say that housing is one of the very basic concerns Canadians have. It is what I refer to as one of the fundamentals, one of the cornerstones of Canadian society. As such, I believe very deeply that it is necessary for us to maintain into the future, as we now have, national standards in housing. We have to make sure that we allow people to become homeowners, because that is one of the deep-felt yearnings that binds us together as Canadians, that feeling that we want to be able to own our own home. Many people came to this country because they wanted to be homeowners.

In addition, we have to make sure that those who cannot afford to be homeowners, those who cannot afford to look after all of their housing needs, have decent and affordable housing wherever they live in this country, whether it is in urban areas, whether it is in rural areas, or in the remote north. Every needy Canadian who just cannot afford to provide decent, affordable housing for themselves has that opportunity. That is why we need to have national standards in housing.

In the debate on national unity which is under way right now and as we examine the question of the division of powers between the federal Parliament and provincial legislatures, one of the things we must bear in mind in this debate is the need for national standards in housing that apply right across this country.

One of the important aspects of the budget which ties in with the bill we are debating this evening, is the fact that all of the items in the budget are aimed at trying to bring down interest rates. It is obviously a very essential part of helping housing in this country.

It is interesting to note that a drop of 1 per cent in interest rates allows approximately 100,000 more Canadians to become homeowners. It makes housing affordable for 100,000 more Canadians with the drop of 1 percentage point in interest rates. In fact, over the last few months, I think it was about June or July of this year, you will have noted that mortgage interest rates had reached some 14.25 per cent. Now that is still far below the 22 per cent to 23 per cent that mortgage interest rates reached in the early 1980s, but at the same time, there has been a drop since June and July from a 14.25 per cent mortgage interest rate to an 11 per cent mortgage interest rate today. That has meant a very substantial difference in the affordability of housing. In fact, it means that the average person buying a house and paying mortgage payments on a $100,000 mortgage is in fact paying about $250 a month less than they were paying a few short months ago.

All of this is extremely important in encouraging housing and, of course, the building of housing and the improvement of the real estate market. All of that, of course, is what the budget is aimed at and, I think, aimed at quite successfully.

We are going to be doing some other things in this coming year as well and I would just like to comment on two of those very briefly. One of them is that I hope to be bringing forward some amendments to the National Housing Act which will allow the mortgage insurance fund of CMHC to ensure shared-equity home purchases. I hope, as well, that it will allow for the insurance of reverse annuity mortgages for senior citizens.

I expect, and very shortly will be announcing, the creation of a Canadian housing partnership centre which will take the initiative and act as a catalyst in developing public-private housing partnerships so that we can do more with the funds that we have available in providing badly needed assisted housing for Canadians.

At the same time, in this coming year we are going to be putting into effect some cost efficiencies and cost reductions which will allow us to continue to do and to help another 40,000 more Canadians next year much more than we are helping at the present time.

In conclusion, I just want to say that I believe that the budget that has been brought down by the Minister of Finance has created a delicate balance here, and, quite successfully, one which is going to lower interest rates, lower inflation, lower the deficit, increase economic confidence and, in doing so, it is going to give a boost to housing.

As you know, housing means strong families, strong communities, a strong economy and a strong nation.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, as always, the Minister of Housing presents a persuasive argument.

I want to begin my comments by congratulating him for the announcements that he made, of the shelters to help battered families. I applaud that, but I note in passing that, of course, the minister represents a riding in metropolitan Toronto as I do and he knows that the Toronto Homebuilders Association has been on the Hill many times and has spoken to many members of Parliament about the situation of housing in the Metropolitan Toronto area.

Of course, the minister knows as well as I, probably better, what Homebuilders of Toronto said. As I understand it, they said that the situation with respect to housing in the most populous city in this country is a disaster. Housing starts are virtually nil in the largest city in the country. Not only are housing starts virtually nil, but the housing industry is complaining about something which is very prominently mentioned in the budget, upon which the bill that we are debating is predicated, and that is the unfair treatment that builders have with respect to existing inventory under the GST and the artificial deadlines that have been imposed on the building industry with respect to existing inventories.

The minister has said that this budget is going to do great things. The minister has said that he is committed—and I believe it—to increased housing. He has also said that a 1 per cent drop in interest rates creates another 100,000 homes. But then he falls into the Tory trap; and that is to try and bring us back to ancient history and blame everything in the world on the Liberal government. And he dared to say that interest rates in the early 1980s, if you please, were in the 22 per cent to 23 per cent range. The minister knows perfectly well that that is an exaggeration, that they were there for a temporary time based on a world-wide recession.

My question for the minister of Housing is this: When are we going to see some meaningful drops in the interest rates so that we can see increased housing? What are we going to do about the GST anomaly with respect to the building industry in Toronto? When are we going to see something more than words? When are we going to see houses starting to be built in metropolitan Toronto and the rest of this country?

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to respond to my friend. I have to say that it was not I who drew attention to the problems with respect to the former Liberal government; I merely referred to the early 1980s. But my hon. friend has certainly pinned it down.

I, too, obviously have had a great many discussions with the Toronto Homebuilders and the Canadian Homebuilders as to what they believe should be done in order to deal with the difficulties that they are having. The first thing that they tell me is not to start meddling in the housing market with some sort of stimulated program. Stay out of that and let the market do its own thing, except bring down interest rates. I found in my post-budget discussions with homebuilders that they have been delighted at the thrust of the budget and the fact that it is aimed at bringing down interest rates; that that is the whole basis on which the budget is built, the recognition that interest rates have to come down.

I have found that the homebuilders are actually delighted with this budget and believe it is going to be extremely stimulative. I might just say that my sense—and I suspect the hon. member's sense as well—in talking to real estate people in metropolitan Toronto is that the low-end housing, the affordable housing end of the market, is starting to move again. In fact, they can't get enough listings at the low end of the market. So hopefully once the builders get the interest rates lower, they are going to start building housing that is affordable, not these monstrosities for half a million dollars or a million dollars. That certainly will help the GST problem they have too.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): First of all, I would like to congratulate the minister for coming up to my region, Keewatin. He is one of the few ministers of this government to come up and see for himself how high the prices are up north.

On another issue, I would like to ask the minister a question regarding his comments about how much more they would like to do for the aboriginal housing, native housing, on and off reserve. The minister will note an article in The Globe and Mail this morning—and it has been running for the past number of days—about a particular community. This community I think can be used as an example of a lot of communities in reserves. It is the Osnaburgh community, about which it was quoted that about 50 per cent of the housing is without electricity and 50 per cent is without water. Right next to it is Pickle Lake, which has all the good things.

The minister mentioned the programs that they are planning, and again, I reiterate the term "average reserve communities across Canada".

• (1950)

I would like to ask the minister what more can he do to ensure that these communities are brought up to standards. He mentioned putting in legislation to ensure that there are national standards in housing all across the country.

I would like to ask him what more he can do for the average reserves across the country in terms of housing.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his kind words. I certainly enjoyed visiting his constituency which was a learning experience for me, as I have over the last year on two occasions. I have had the opportunity to see first-hand some of the great difficulties and the great problems in the far north of Canada, Arctic Canada.

At the same time, as the hon. member has pointed out, there are problems both on and off reserve in northern Canada, some not as far north as the hon. member's constituency, but we have got to deal with all of these problems.

Last summer I had the opportunity as well to visit native communities both on and off reserve in northern Saskatchewan and northern Manitoba. I visited some 22 communities in the space of about a week and I, too, saw very dramatic differences from one community to another. When I returned from that trip I was convinced that what we needed in particular was much more co-ordination between the two federal departments that deal with native housing. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as the hon. member knows, deals with housing, for the most part, on reserve. We do have a modest role there in co-operation with DIAND but our basic role has been to assist natives off reserve.

I think we have been making great strides that way, although there is much more to be done. There is no question about that.

I believe, however, that through the consultation process, the evaluation process that we have carried out on off-reserve housing under the Rural and Native Program will be bringing forth some improvements and some good ideas that can help.

The hon. member will know that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has recently brought forth a consultation paper as well for housing on reserve. We are going to be working very closely with DIAND, and I would expect that out of that will come improvements and help for communities like Osnaburgh and others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Liberals will now split their time in two. The hon. member for Kent.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak about this bill, with particular reference to the budget's affect on my riding of Kent, and southern Ontario as a whole.

Southern Ontario is the economic engine of Canada; in fact, southwestern Ontario alone is responsible for 60 per cent of the province's gross domestic product.

This is no ordinary recession. The government's economic policies are hitting southern Ontario hard. Plants are closing down and jobs are lost forever. It is a far cry from the temporary examples of the last recession of 1981 and 1982.

We know that an economy, like an engine, cannot keep revving at high RPMs forever. You cannot sustain a hundred miles an hour. But with proper upkeep and good maintenance the engine will be ready to fire again. But this government is a group of very poor mechanics. Its policies are putting up roadblocks and southern Ontario is seizing up with the twin-engine killers of high interest rates and a high dollar.

For those who say that this recession may be bad but it definitely is better than the last one, they are dead wrong. The welfare rates in Kent County are up 400 per cent from 1981 levels. The city of Chatham has a 30 per cent unemployment rate in the automotive sector. Companies such as Motor Wheel Corporation are closing their doors. That plant has been in Chatham ever since I was a young child, and we have been through tough times before. The Hunt-Wesson tomato canning plant in Tilbury closed down last year after being in operation for over 25 years. That plant and its workers made it through the last recession but not this one.

The blame lies in the high interest, high dollar, and free trade policy of this government.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that it is not me who says that. It is not the unions who say that. It was Hunt-Wesson's president who said that. Those jobs are going to California and to Ohio, with tomato farmers in my riding left holding their baskets.

Before, Canada was armed for the wars of recession, but with free trade our guns are checked at the border and we now have no protection from the gunslingers of big corporate America.

A fact that should not be overlooked as well is that in the 1982 recession only 24 per cent of the layoffs involved total or partial plant closings. But in 1990 these accounted for 64 per cent of the job cuts.

This is not the same as 1981-1982. The impact of the recession is hitting everywhere.

In Dresden, population 2,500, two of its most major employers are closing their doors, over 100 jobs eliminated. Think of the ripple effect on the local economy.

In Chatham, at truck builder Navistar nearly one-quarter of its 800 strong workforce is laid off. Seimens, a world-class company with more than 1,000 employees now has nearly a third on lay-off.

But the biggest blow is the impending closure of Motor Wheel where only 250 remain of a workforce that once totalled over 600. The plant is shutting its doors in May.

About a third of Chatham's workforce is in the auto parts industry so it would follow that the city would suffer similar setbacks as other auto towns such as Windsor and Oshawa. But Chatham is smaller with a population of only 42,000 and when a plant lays off the result devastates and disrupts the entire local economy.

The lay-offs have had a dramatic effect on the city. Real estate sales are down 50 per cent. Bankruptcies handled by just one office of Peat Marwick Thorne in Chatham are up 50 per cent from last year.

Kent County is home of the Ontario tax revolt and it can only balloon after this budget. To compensate for the loss of federal transfer support the provinces and municipalities are either going to increase taxes or cut services.

Federal inaction could result in more bed closings at hospitals, even longer waiting lists for surgery, a poorer education system, and less money for roads and infrastructure.

The finance minister has actually suggested that provincial road budgets should be reduced. He must not do much driving on the 401 highway.

Modern highways and transportation routes are absolutely crucial to southern Ontario with their "just in time" industries. Improved routes to help our industries should be a priority not an afterthought.

This is no ordinary recession. The town of Dresden, ever since I can remember, always had about four or five farm implement dealers. Those small businessmen made it through 1981-1982, but not this time. Now there are none left—zero.

The working people see federal tax revenues up 70 per cent since 1984.

This is the stuff of which tax revolts are made. Canadian households will pay a total of $11.1 billion more in federal taxes, net of transfers, than they would if the 1984 tax system were still in place. An average Canadian family is paying about $1,000 more through this government's policies.

This is a government that promised in its first budget an $18 billion deficit this year. After six years of tax increases, program cutbacks and global economic growth, the government is having great difficulty explaining why the deficit is still increasing and the public debt is out of control.

In 1981 Canada followed the rest of the world into recession. This time we plunged into recession fully eight months before the U.S., creating the first "made in Canada" recession. The recession is cutting deeper into the economic foundation of southwestern Ontario.

The finance minister calls his budget a prosperity challenge. For most Canadians it is going to be a survival challenge. The years ahead will see the fiercest competition the world has ever known but we need the tools to do it. The government's actions are taking us in the other direction. We are witnessing the terrible deindustrialization of Canada. We have lost 229,000 jobs or 11 per cent of all manufacturing jobs since free trade.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has shown that the ability of Canada to compete with its major trading partners is only 85 per cent of what it was in 1980. We have lost 20 per cent of our share of the world markets during the last five years.

The trade balance with our major trading partner, the U.S., has dropped $6 billion since 1984. Further, our current account balance with our neighbours to the south has been ripped from a positive balance of $6.7 billion in 1984 to a $2.7 billion deficit in 1989.

These are certainly not the results that government is looking for, after saying we should be competitive.

As our industrial sectors are being sacked and pillaged through free trade and a sad economy, the Tory government has offered no adjustment programs to deal with the restructuring.

Canada is facing a serious long-term competitive crisis, and it is no more apparent than in southwestern Ontario. Southern Ontario, Canada's manufacturing heartland, is suffering from hardening of the arteries. As the winds of change blow away our economic structures and erode southern Ontario's foundation, the government is standing back and watching. Any good farmer knows that you do not just stand back and watch your soil erode and blow away. You set up windbreaks.

Our manufacturing sector is the soil by which Canada's economy grows and prospers. The Tory government is letting it erode.

Recession is not just a word in the dictionary. If affects your neighbour across the backyard fence, the farmer down the road, and the local coffee shop where everyone gathers at six in the morning. It affects your kid's hockey and baseball coach. Recession hits families.

To conclude, this is no ordinary recession. There is a tax revolt in Kent County as the Conservatives, through this budget, place more of the burden on the provinces and municipalities. Welfare rates in Kent Country are zooming, burdened by the weight of the recession.

No, this is no ordinary recession. The economic engine of southwestern Ontario is seizing up. The budget presented last week offers no tune-up, no answers, just more of the same. Our economic foundation is being wrenched away. Plants are closing down. Jobs are lost forever.

We need a government that is sensitive to the changes going on around us, one that will stick up for the little guy and will lend a helping hand to workers and their families.

Mr. Wappel: We need a Liberal government.

Mr. Crawford: Right.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. member for Kent on the sincerity of his presentation, although I must confess he did leave me a little bit bewildered with some of the things he said.

At one point during his remarks, I noticed he said that his constituency was the source of a tax revolt and that people felt they were paying too many taxes already in his constituency. I believe that is the thrust of what he said. Then, only moments later, he was complaining that we may have a cut, as he refers to it, in EPF payments affecting education, health and welfare.

As I have listened with great interest to this debate today, time and time again I cannot help but be bewildered by my hon. friends opposite who on the one hand say: "We have too many taxes. Taxes are going up too high". That is revenue. On the other hand they say: "You cannot cut". That is expenditures.

Taxes cover expenditures. How do we increase expenditures if we do not want to increase taxes to pay for them? Maybe that is why my hon. friends opposite, when they were in power, got this country into such a horrendous deficit situation in the first place. I do not know.

I would like to raise a question with my hon. friend. I notice that like his friends further to his left he seems mired in anti-Americanism. He believes that Canadian consumers should not benefit from the best possible price and that we should build tariff walls around this country regardless of what it costs to produce consumer goods so that the Canadian consumer is gouged again and again.

Does he not have any consumers in his constituency? Perhaps my hon. friend would like to comment on those two issues.

Mr. Crawford: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for posing the questions.

I will start with the last one: Do we have any consumers left in my riding? At the present time it is getting very shallow. We are losing consumers in our ridings through lay-offs with factories closing. We also happen to be on the American border. We are losing people who are shopping in the United States.

I know the minister spoke about cigarettes, which is great.

Mr. McCreath: You are losing to the United States because the prices are cheaper.

Mr. Crawford: Yes.

Mr. McCreath: If you had a competitive marketplace, then our consumers would get competitive prices.

Mr. Crawford: How are you going to do that? By lowering the wages of the poor working man who is paying over 50 per cent of his wages now? How do you expect him to pay the taxes?

In our riding of Kent, as I mentioned earlier, where the tax revolt has started, programs that the provincial government put on to the municipalities—

Mr. McCreath: Where are you going to get the money?

Mr. Bjornson: How are you going to support the farmers?

Mr. Crawford: We are going to support them a hell of a lot better than you have. The provincial government put programs on to the municipalities and then walked away. I know. I have been a municipal politician for approximately 14 years and had to put up with what Ottawa does and what the province does. They put programs into your municipality that you did not want and spend money beyond reason. We always said in the municipality: "We will do the job for x number of dollars. Give it to the province and they will do it for x and y; give it to the federal government and they will do it for x, y and z". That is what happens to cost.

In answer to the member's question, the other day I asked the Minister of the Environment where he got his $3 billion budget for the environment from. I am not disagreeing with the $3 billion. I am not saying it is too low or too high. I can agree with him. I wanted to know where he got the figure.

In municipal politics one starts at cent one and works up. In federal government one starts at the top and works down. The answer he gave me is quite simple: we needed $3 billion; it is there. But I cannot see where it started at penny one, $10,000 for a project here, $100,000 for one here, $125 million for another one. I have never seen those figures.

We started at penny one if it was $100,000. Our municipality is a lot smaller than the federal so I can use $100,000 instead of $100 billion. Once we reached that, we had no more money. Here there seems to be overruns. I sat on three government committees. There are overruns on every one of them: "Don't worry about the money; we can spend it". Contracts go out, and when contracts go out in a municipality one wants to know what the bottom dollar is, the last dollar to be spent on that project, and no one goes one penny over it. Yet, federally it seems the programs can run 20 per cent, 30 per cent, 40 per cent over, or they hold a project up for five years, or study it for five years.

I have seen projects on the environment that were to cast for approximately $150,000, but over the last five years there has been $800,000 spent on studies and they still have not been done.

You are asking me where the money is being wasted—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please, the hon. member's time is over.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on the government's borrowing bill and to raise certain economic issues of concern to northern Canada.

With this bill, Parliament is being asked to spend and to approve the government's spending plan. Parliament is being asked to approve an awful lot of money with this bill but very little of the government's proposed expenditures, as we learn in this budget, will address the most pressing social and economic needs of the aboriginal and northern people.

When the Minister of Finance tabled his budget a week ago, he announced that Inuit and Indian programs would be exempt from the extension of the government's expenditure control plan, which sounds very good on the surface, but we still do not know the extent of that exemption. The Minister of Finance neglected to tell this House and the people of Canada that the Indian and Inuit programs were capped for two years in last year's budget. There were some exemptions for health, education, social assistance and claims, but these programs were not exempted out of the goodness of the federal government's heart.

The federal government has a legal obligation to provide health, education, social assistance, and claims funding to aboriginal people. The question we have is: Does the extension of the exemption apply only to these programs which the federal government is legally obliged to provide? The answer is not clear. Even the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was not sure last week.

As I said earlier, last year's budget cap on Indian and Inuit programs was for two years. The cap on Indian and Inuit programs is in effect this year as it was last year. This fact, the Minister of Finance neglected to mention in his speech.

I will remind the house that this cap on Indian and Inuit programs means the loss of $100 million to Indian and Inuit programs. The minister's own budget documents from last year display these figures in black and white. Last year $50 million was lost, and this year another $50 million is being cut.

The government is not restoring this lost $100 million. As I said earlier, we do not yet know how much the recently announced exemption covers.

Last year's budget strangled aboriginal organizations and aboriginal communications. The pattern continues this year.

Last year the core operating funding for the aboriginal organizations in this country was cut severely. This year it has been cut again.

The government's borrowing bill does not restore any funding to aboriginal organizations or aboriginal communications. Government's borrowing bill does not provide any additional funding to Canada Post for the food mail program.

Since the fall we have been waiting for a report from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on this issue, and we have yet to see it. When are we going to see this report?

The territorial government has had its transfer payments cut back by this government. The Yukon government will receive about $80 million less over a five-year period than it would otherwise have received from the federal government. The Northwest Territories will receive about $100 million less over the same time period. In 1991–1992, there is a loss of about $30 million in federal transfer payments to the Government of the Northwest Territories.

It has become abundantly clear that this federal government does not have an economic plan for the north. The government does not recognize the unique social and economic development needs of the north. Investing in the north is not a priority of this government.

The government produced a document in 1988 called A Northern Political and Economic Framework, but nothing is happening under this framework that is improving the daily lives of people in the north. Instead, the north has seen only cutbacks and federal policies which discriminate against the north.

For example, we have seen in the past few years cutbacks in the funding formula for transfers to the territories, a tightening in the unemployment insurance program, a substantial weakening of the tax benefits provided to mining by the elimination of flow-through shares, previous increases in the sales tax burden on air transportation and telecommunication services, the imposition of the GST and others.

The 1991 federal budget is just the latest example of this federal government's anti-northern bias. The budget makes cuts to the environment, to the Canadian Jobs Strategy; to housing and to aboriginal organizations. It provides no help, no hope and no relief.

Instead, northerners are being told that they will have to continue to suffer. We have serious housing problems in the Northwest Territories. We have homelessness. We have overcrowding. We have social problems and health problems as a result, but the budget does nothing to alleviate these problems. Instead, it cuts back on the spending for social housing.

We have serious unemployment problems in the north, especially among our youth. This budget does nothing to help the unemployed. Instead, it cuts back on job training funds.

The north desperately needs regionally appropriate and culturally appropriate education and training programs. Forty per cent of the population of the Northwest Territories is under the age of 19. Where is the help for these young people? There are no jobs. Where is the forward thinking that would see our youth as our future? Why has this federal government not invested in our youth?

Last April, this House unanimously approved to support my private member's motion on aboriginal youth. The government has not acted on my motion even though, as I said, it was unanimously approved.

Our aboriginal youth have the highest suicide rate in this country. There are serious social problems, but there is little or no help from the federal government. The government has no vision for the north. It does not listen to the people of the north.

When this government makes economic policy, northern Canada and northern Canadians are left out. Our geography places us far away from the centre of Canada. Our population is small compared to southern Canada, but our geography and population are not reason to leave us on the fringe of federal, political, and economic decision-making. Not only are we on the fringe of this government's decision-making; we do not even get the fringe benefits that normally flow from being a Canadian.

There is a significant gap in the levels of services in the north compared to the rest of Canada. The borrowing bill and the budget will not reduce these gaps, and these gaps will likely increase.

Infrastructural needs in the north have barely been addressed. Yet, basic infrastructure is a necessary precondition to the development of a self-sustaining northern economy. We lack transportation infrastructures. There are no roads linking communities in my constituency. We cannot reduce our high cost of living and our business operating costs without basic infrastructure. Our community infrastructure needs expansion and upgrading.

Substantial catch-up funding is also required to bring standards of some educational and health facilities in line with those of the average Canadian. There are seven communities in the Keewatin region and no hospitals. There are nine communities in the Kitikmeot region and no hospital. There are 14 communities in the Baffin region and one hospital.

Our unemployment rates are staggering. The Government of the Northwest Territories is projecting an over-all unemployment rate of 24 per cent and a native unemployment rate of 40 per cent by the year 2000. Yet, there are only two Canada employment and immigration offices in a constituency serving 36 communities. The Keewatin region has one, the Baffin region has one. The Kitikmeot region has none. I want to use this opportunity, on behalf of the residents of the Kitikmeot region, to urge the federal government to establish a Canada employment office there.

Where is the Arctic environmental strategy? In December, when the government tabled its green plan, the Arctic environmental strategy was missing. Last week, the Minister of Finance cut $125 million from the green plan by stretching its planned spending from five to six years. Major elements of the Arctic environmental strategy are supposed to deal with Arctic contaminants and waste clean-up. The green plan itself recognized that it was most urgent to protect the Arctic ecosystem.

In conclusion, we need action now. The federal government must make a commitment to the sustainable development of northern Canada.

A few weeks ago, several of my colleagues in the Official Opposition spent some time in the north with me listening to northerners about the economic situation. The government's policies and its latest budget are contributing to the creation of an Arctic ghetto.

I urge this government to reverse this course before it is too late.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the words of wisdom and instruction from my hon. colleague. He speaks very lovingly about his part of the country, and any members who have been up there will understand why. It is truly a very unique and special part of this great nation.

However, something struck me when I was up there and I listen to him and his colleague from the Western Arctic talk about the unique and special needs of Canada's aboriginal peoples and of the needs of the frontier that we call our north.

It strikes me as odd that when this country was making money, when the economy was doing so well in the last number of years and we had all kinds of revenue coming in, that this government did not practise the principle that you share the gain.

The government decides following its own fiscal mismanagement, after being at the stewardship of this country for seven years, and after it has raised taxes at an unprecedented level, that when times are tough, places like the Northwest Territories have to disproportionately share the pain.

If there is ever a part of this country that shares the greatest possibility of a new economic renewal in this country, I believe it is the north. My colleague has said quite correctly that this government absolutely has refused consistently over the last seven years to recognize the great resource that is the north, to recognize the great resource that is our aboriginal peoples, particularly in the north.

Now, when it comes time for budgets to be cut back, it turns a blind eye altogether to that great potential and once again our aboriginal peoples, in the north in particular, are suffering disproportionately. I am making a comment here, so I want to leave my colleague with almost a saving grace. I am from Atlantic Canada, and many times even my colleagues on the other side of the House, if they were not in their partisan roles, would agree with me that the regions of this country have suffered pain disproportionately, but we do not proportionately get the gain when things are good.

I want my hon. colleague perhaps to comment on this. This government has done something that I never thought was possible. There used to be have and have not provinces in this country. Ontario used to be a have province.

An hon. member: Not anymore.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): The north, the Atlantic and the west were have nots. It has done, what nobody ever thought any government could do and that is make Ontario, particularly rural Ontario and southwestern and eastern Ontario, a have not province as well.

I want to ask my colleague: Now that it has wreaked economic devastation even on the economic heartland of this country, what does he believe that will do for the real needs of the north and of the people of the north which this government even in good times has not addressed?

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from the maritimes for his comments and question.

One of the things we have always been proud of as northerners was that we were able to get along without much assistance in the past. And we have. We have existed in the north for thousands of years without any federal government assistance.

Since the early 1950s, without being asked, we started having houses brought in. We had Hudson's Bay come in and start buying our furs and so we had to start existing on other things which previously we had not been using. That created rich employment, which I have no problem with, but it also created a demand for southern goods such as groceries, such as dry goods, all the things that we are using today.

Those matters were addressed through some programs in the past, such as the Canada postal rate assistance for groceries so that communities in the north were able to buy groceries at a level that was almost affordable for the northerners, even though they were still about 50 per cent higher than in the more southerly regions. I just want to make one comment. The government started cutting back and even higher prices started coming in. This government, through its cutback of programs is creating an Arctic ghetto. Northerners cannot afford to buy groceries, any more, the very fundamentals of life such as vegetables. It is a treat to get an apple up north. It is a treat to get a banana up north. It is a treat to get oranges up north.

I just wanted to press that point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Manicouagan. Could the hon. member tell me if he intends to use the full ten minutes alloted or less?

Mr. Langlois: I will take ten minutes, Mr. Speaker, for my comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I gather you are sharing time with a colleague from your party.

Mr. Langlois: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The floor is yours then.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, before getting into the main thrust of my remarks tonight, I would like to respond to a number of comments made by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq when he painted a rather bleak picture of life in his region, in the North.

I would like to point out to the hon. member that in my riding there are native communities all along the north shore of the Saint-Lawrence. These communities, Mr. Speaker, achieved a lot in the past few years. They got involved in their economic development, their housing development, as well as their development in the fields of health and education. They created organizations to achieve the objectives they have set and to improve substantially their living conditions.

I also had the privilege of visiting a few northern localities of my riding, along the Bay of Ungava. There too, Mr. Speaker, great strides were made. Since 1984, this government pumped considerable amounts into the development of the communities and institutions of the northerners.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I would like to revert to the main thrust of my speech and tell you that this opportunity to speak on Bill C-97 will allow me to reflect tonight on certain very important aspects of the budget presented by the Minister of Finance. The borrowing authority requested is anticipating on the financial needs of the governement, needs that in turn depend in part on the efficiency of the measures which the government is going to take to control expenditures.

Since it came to power in 1984, this government has recognized that its first financial responsibilities lay with its own operations. Its operating expenditures have been severely restricted and even reduced in real terms.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians expect that the government and its civil servants also be subjected to restrictions in hard times. But most important, federal politicians and civil servants are requested to accept wage restraints in order to set an example during these difficult times. Wage settlements in the public sector should not increase inflationary pressures upon the economy. That is why the government shows moderation in its wage settlements while maintaining the principles of collective bargaining.

In fact, since 1987, wage settlements within the federal administration have been lower than those of the provincial, municipal, or private sectors, Mr. Speaker. In this period of recession, other restraints are necessary. The 1991 budget announced new spending cuts and measures to improve efficiency. The Prime Minister's remuneration as well as his cabinet members' salaries have been frozen for a year while the hon. members' wages are subjected to stringent limitations. The wage budgets of departments will not be adjusted for any increases in costs arising out of new collective agreements.

The government is not prepared either, Mr. Speaker, over the next three years, to consider wage increases beyond 3 per cent at an annual rate. Rates of salary increase for senior civil servants, deputy ministers, and Crown corporation managers will be limited to a level not exceeding the average of negotiated settlements in the federal public service.

We will eliminate layers of management and reduce by 10 per cent the number of senior managers in the public service. Finally, next year capital spending and new-wage operating budgets will be frozen at their 1990-91 levels and subsequently we will strictly control their growth. This reduction program will allow savings of $3.6 billion over the next five years.

• (2030)

Mr. Speaker, all government levels must assume their responsibilities in that area, because we are all serving the same taxpayer. Moreover, we will all benefit from the alleviation of inflationary pressures under the form of lower interest rates, more vigorous growth, and greater job creation. Wage restrictions are particularly important at the provincial and municipal levels, more so in education and health care because the wage settlements increased at a faster rate than inflation in those sectors.

Wage settlements concluded in the private sector have also contributed to inflationary tensions. The reduction of those tensions will help in lowering interest rates, down, reducing costs, and improving competitiveness. There will follow a more rapid growth, new jobs and higher revenue.

Mr. Speaker, we must remember that the more dynamic economy that is the goal of those measures will allow the government to move faster towards deficit reduction and debt control. The spontaneous reaction to the request of $26 billion that is made in Bill C-97 is one of consternation, but the legislation only reflects the reality of government finances at this time. I prefer to take a positive approach to the issue, remembering that without the budget, a much greater amount would have been required.

Mr. Speaker, we should also remember that the last budget contained legislative measures that restricted government expenditures. This is the first time for a government to introduce such measures in a budget. It is an extremely important measure which will force all governments, present and future, to limit by an act of law the growth of expenditures.

Certain members also said, Mr. Speaker, these last few days, that transfer payments to provinces will not increase. This is not true, Mr. Speaker. Transfer payments will indeed increase, but at a slower rate than expected. Nevertheless, these increases represent 3.7 per cent or at last 3 per cent to 4 per cent of the amounts projected for the transfer payments to provinces.

These are measures which must be mentioned. These are positive aspects, and it is not right to say that this year's budget is completely negative for the economy. On the contrary, it is a budget designed to stimulate the economy. It is a budget which proposes spending cuts. It is a budget which is extremely selective in the additional charges it imposes on Canadian taxpayers. I believe it is a budget which will be approved by all Canadians and economic sectors, because it reflects accurately Canada's economic state.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that my colleagues approve this bill without delay. We must let the committee go to work right now and study the bill in order that it can be adopted as fast as possible. This is necessary to ensure the smooth operation of public finances and to keep control over the government's borrowing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minutes for questions and comments. The hon. member for Sudbury.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Manicouagan. I am a little surprised that he seems to blame inflation, I mean inflationary pressures, in part on wage increases in the public sector. I have always heard, especially lately, that these increases did not make up for inflation. By and large, public servants are a little behind. Their wages never caught up with inflation. So, I find it hard to understand that inflation could be blamed on the public sector. As far as I am concerned, it was caused to a large extent, especially recently, by the GST, which has undoubtedly pushed the inflation rate way up, as well as the various taxes introduced over the past few years.

It seems a little unfair to blame the public sector, the governmental sector, for those problems. I understand that expenditures must be controlled, but we are not to blame a group of men and women who in fact have a hard task to fulfil.. Not all of them earn a lot. There are many secretaries and other small wage-earners among them.

Not only does the member blame them for the inflationary pressures, but the government decides to impose this 3 per cent ceiling and tells them: "Turn against each other now". Even for a modest wage increase, you are up against your neighbour, your brother, or your colleagues.

Do you think it is reasonable to do such a thing to the very people who implement the government programs?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sudbury is reading far too much into my comments. My point was that some collective bargaining agreements, some wage settlements in various sectors, including the municipal sector and government corporations, have gone as high as 8 per cent. Perhaps she will recall the latest settlement at Ontario Hydro, with 7.8 per cent the first year and 8 per cent the second year, a settlement that in itself will help create or activitate inflation.

There have also been collective agreements in the public transit sector that were clearly higher than agreements negotiated in the federal and provincial public service. Those are the points I wanted to make. Furthermore, during the past two years, Mr. Speaker, there has been a tendency to accelerate or increase wage settlements in the private sector.

To control inflation, we must take the appropriate steps, which will include ensuring that wage increases in collective agreements are not part of the inflationary curve and rise completely out of sight.

It was just that particular situation, that I wanted to highlight in my comments. I did not put the blame on anyone. I simply gave the facts and reminded the House and the Canadian public that we must be extremely careful not to lose control of inflation, because if we do, we will get right back to the problems we had at the end of the 1970s and the early 1980s, when inflation simply got away from us, with the result that interest rates soared and the economic situation became extremely difficult.

That was what I was trying to say, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Saint-Maurice, for a ten-minute speech.

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to speak to Bill C-97 and follow up on the excellent speech just delivered by my colleague from Manicouagan, a businessman who was in a good position to know how the public sector operates and who can convey his opinion clearly, correctly, and concisely.

You know, Mr. Speaker, we have to learn to make choices in life. Some are easier to make than others. In my case, for example, it would be a lot easier today to say that public sector employees ought to get pay raises somewhat higher than what the government has provided in the budget. I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. It stands to reason because in my riding of Saint-Maurice the federal government is by far the main employer, with the taxation data centre in Shawinigan South, the National Park of La Mauricie and a number of other federal government agencies.

How much easier it would be for me to walk in here and say quite simply that the government is wrong. That would make me more popular among public sector employees. Strangely enough, Mr. Speaker, after the federal budget was tabled I had an opportunity to meet with a number of public sector workers in Shawinigan. Of course they were disappointed, and that is understandable under the circumstances. Still I noticed something very different in the attitude of some of the union leaders who represent them and other employees at the Shawinigan South taxation data centre. They told me: We are not particularly pleased, but then we appreciate the current situation. We understand that the Government of Canada has to set its financial house in order, and we are aware that these past few years some people around us in Shawinigan lost their jobs, people who now have a hard time finding a new employer.

Public service workers back home understand that they have to make a special effort. Of course they did not feel like giving a standing ovation when they heard Mr. Wilson's budget address. I should think that nobody wants to applaud when kinds of measures are unveiled.

You know, we had a similar debate when the goods and services tax was introduced, and people were saying that it was one tax too many. Opposition members kept repeating they were against that tax, yet they did not suggest any alternative. Well, Mr. Speaker, if you were to walk down the street tonight here in Ottawa or in Sudbury in the riding of my colleague who had the floor a few minutes earlier, and asked the residents of Sudbury or of Grand'Mère in my riding or again the people of Sept-Îles: "Are you in favour of a tax on gas; are you in favour of a tax on alcohol?" They would all say: "No, we are against any and all kinds of taxes." To my mind that it a perfectly normal reaction on their part, and I am not a bit surprised to hear every single Canadian say that he or she is against any kind of taxation.

Still, Mr. Speaker, we in this House have the serious and major responsibility to manage public affairs. Managing public affairs in our case means that this year we have to administer a budget of $156 billion. For most Canadian men and women who are listening to us and who are interested in politics, this amount is absolutely extraordinary, beyond comprehension. Very few people can grasp its true significance. Many people are telling us: "It just does not make sense that you should have quite so much money to administer". For a great many people in Canada, it is very difficult to understand the operation of the Canadian government. They are quite surprised when they learn that the federal government must pay as much as $36 billion every year in transfer payments to the provinces. For ordinary mortals, this amount is absolutely fabulous.

Mr. Speaker, I know that you would not allow me to say that the members of the Bloc Quebecois are absent, that they are not here in the House, and that they are almost never here. I know that such a statement would not be allowed. However, when they informed Quebecers of the budget's content, the member's of the Bloc Quebecois tried again to create a superparanoia by saying that Mr. Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance, had attempted again to favour the citizens of the other provinces at the expense of Quebecers. Whenever a budget is presented, we expect the members of the Bloc Quebecois to come out with the same identical recorded message; they have almost no staff in Ottawa and are almost always absent from Parliament Hill. Of course, I do not mention the House of Commons, for you would not permit it.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, there is a reality which Quebecers should be aware of. I should like to denounce the narrowminded and biased attitude of some of the Bloc quebecois members. One of them voted with the government while the others voted against it.

Just the same, when we check the real figures, we realize that the federal government's transfer payments program is not such a bad deal for Quebec. From 1961 to 1990, Quebec received from the federal government, not $91 million, but $91 billion, in transfer payments, while the provinces deemed affluent, including Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia had to pay approximately $100 billion in order to help Quebec, the Maritimes, and a number of Western provinces.

So perhaps I should ask the members of the Bloc Quebecois whether they can deny this money is there, in addition to the tax revenue. And that is very important, Mr. Speaker. The money was not paid by Quebecers. It was paid to Quebecers by other Canadians, because we live in a federal system which tries to equalize revenues to help the poorer provinces. And this budget contains concrete evidence to that effect, Mr. Speaker.

The latest budget brought down by the Minister of Finance provides for transfers of $960 per capita in Ontario and $1,500 per capita in Quebec. The Bloc quebecois cannot deny those figures. They are right there in the Public Accounts of Canada.

I wonder why the hon. member for Shefford always forgets to mention this fact, since he kept bringing it up only a few months ago when he was still sitting on the Liberal side. Unfortunately, the hon. member was not pleased with the new leader of his party, so he decided to change his allegiance. The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer, one of the greatest federalists in this Chamber, Mr. Speaker, did not like Jean Chrétien as Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, so first he sulked, and then he became a sovereignist. It's a little like the hon. member for Chambly in the New Democratic Party. This is a rather unique case. The hon. member for Chambly had developed an approach I never saw before in this House. When he isn't in his riding, he is a sovereignist and indépendantiste. When he comes to Ottawa with his car, "his lemon", as soon as he crosses the Quebec border, he turns into a federalist. That is the ultimate irony the New Democratic Party has brought to this Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, it is crystal clear that the federal government must make sacrifices. The Liberals can say, like the hon. member for Hamilton West, that the government has been in place for seven years, which is entirely true. However, when you inherit a rotten apple, thanks to the tender loving care of MacEachen, Lalonde, Chrétien and associates, Mr. Speaker, it becomes very difficult to deal with the national deficit. We have taken brave, sometimes unpopular measures, but in the end they will ensure that Canadians have a healthier, more balanced government administration.

Today, it would be easy for the federal government to announce a 20 per cent increase in old age pensions, a 20 per cent increase in family allowances, and a 20 per cent increase in salaries for all public service employees. The government would probably become very popular in the short-term, and would be number one in the polls, but is that any way to run a country?

Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House for only two years and a few months, and if I were to add up all the requests from Liberal members and especially the NDP members, we would need an annual budget of not $156 billion but 400 or 500 billion dollars. The requests we get are absolutely phenomenal! They show an utter lack of fiscal responsibility at a time when we have a budget to manage.

Mr. Speaker, there is a lot more I would like to say, but I know you will not let me refer to the absence of Bloc Quebecois members. I will get back to this some other day, when I have an opportunity to highlight other aspects of this bill and the budget brought down recently by the Minister of Finance. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the member's speech, I noticed him talking about the rotten apple that he had inherited as a member of the government referring to the deficit problem.

I think the people of Canada would like to know a little bit more about the deficit and I refer him to the budget speech. In the budget speech, the minister talked about the plan for economic recovery and the debt servicing and reduction fund, saying that all GST revenues will be allocated solely to the effort to bring the public debt under control.

If he looks at page 78, under the debt servicing and reduction fund, he sees there that:

> The Prime Minister has given a commitment that any above-projected revenues from the GST will make a contribution to deficit reduction—

In the next paragraph it says that the fund:

> —will be credited net GST revenues and from which will be debited public debt charges.

I think the people of Canada would like to know what is under the shells that we are seeing here. Certainly I, as a member of Parliament, would like to know. It is implied that the money from the GST, approximately $16.5 billion after taking off administration charges and rebates, would be going to pay down the national debt.

Can this member tell me whether in fact that money will be going to pay off the national debt or whether this government is playing with people and in fact the money is going into general revenues toward the deficit, which is the year-to-year expenditures of this government? Can the member tell the people of Canada that, please?

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from the New Democratic Party for his question, because it is the very first time in my two and a half years in this House as member for Saint-Maurice that I hear a member from the New Democratic Party show a genuine interest in reducing the deficit. I want to congratulate him because this is out of character for the NDP.

You know what, Mr. Speaker? The hon. member should spread the good word and explain to his colleagues in the New Democratic Party that it is extremely important to fight and reduce the deficit. I listened carefully to the hon. member and, on that precise subject, I would like to quote, if I may, Mr. Speaker, words that were heard not so long ago in my riding when the member for Beauséjour happened to come and meet my constituents. He told them this: "Don't worry about the national debt, people of Shawinigan. It is not important". That is the message he had to give the people.

I must say that such an attitude is totally irresponsible, Mr. Speaker. With all due respect, it is unbelievable, in 1991, that the hon. member for Beauséjour would say something like: "Do not worry about the national debt. We will look after that later". This is parallel to his famous line on the way to resolve the constitutional crisis: "When the car is in the ditch, you go back and forth and back and, eventually, you get it out". Except that some people manage to drive the car right off the road. It was probably something like the solution he had in mind during the Oka crisis when he suggested: "Let the Warriors go and arrest them later.

It was probably something like the solution he advocated to settle the Persian Gulf crisis not so long ago when he said: "Well, it is not all that bad, we ought to give Saddam Hussein a chance to save face.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the kind of contradictory statements we hear. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have been quite clear about the extra revenue the GST will bring in as compared with the manufacturers' sales tax. When the current leader of the Liberal Party was representing my riding, that tax cost hundreds and hundreds of jobs because the industries in Shawinigan and Grand'Mère were no longer competitive.

We did away with that tax, Mr. Speaker, and replaced it by a modern tax which is in force in socialist countries like Sweden and France. I was in Belgium recently and people there were telling me: "We cannot understand what is going on. We in Belgium have a GST, a value-added tax similar to yours and we fail to understand why some parliamentarians in Canada are against a sensible, modern and future-oriented tax." I am strongly in favour of rebuilding our country, Canada, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, this is the finance minister's seventh budget and the first delivered during a recession, although looking at the minister's previous budgets it can be said that each one has contributed directly to the conditions under which we now find ourselves. The projections of the Minister of Finance and Treasury Board are completely out of whack with reality. The budget offers no solutions to Canada's poor, sick, unemployed, and homeless.

The good news, yes, there is even one bit of good news in this budget, is that it may be the Minister of Finance's last budget, and that is where it ends.

Some of the minister's promoters say that this budget is intended to be the cornerstone of his legacy as Minister of Finance, but, for the life of me, I cannot see why. This budget is only the latest in a litany of measures that have not worked, have been painful for Canadians and have resulted in Canadians losing their homes, their jobs, and their sense of national pride in terms of what Canada means to them in institutions, in symbols and in universality. Like all of his budgets, this one erodes that vision and that philosophy of Canada even more.

Among other things, this is a budget that continues the government's assault on health care and education in Canada. By freezing contributions to the provinces and capping other transfers, the government is altering the balance in this country which seeks to provide equality for the provinces and equality for Canadian citizens no matter where they live, no matter where they work, no matter what their income, and no matter what their status is in life.

Through all seven Conservative budgets, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have attempted to show us that they are competent and that they care about the institutions of this country and are prepared to put a caring feeling into the fiscal policies. However, Canadians have realized that this budget is the same as all the others before. They can see that behind the rhetoric of the strong economic policies and the catch-all phrases like stability, a positive environment, and economic strength, there is nothing. These phrases are meant to convey an image which is false.

I like to refer to it as a hologram budget, an image of economic make-believe which Canadians can walk and see right through. In this light, I can agree with the minister's supporters that the budget is an icon for future Ministers of Finance to follow. It will be a legacy carved in stone, a testament to economic mismanagement that unfortunately is something his disciples here on the other side will have to wrestle with.

The Conservative government propped itself up on the belief that it could provide strong economic policies to ensure Canada's competitiveness the world over. It claimed that by getting government out of their lives, out of the lives of Canadians, in effect deregulating government, it would save a pile of money and that Canadians would be better off, although it never said exactly how nor when this would happen.

In spite of these claims, as a former journalist, I can say that such claims must be weighed against the evidence in order to verify the truth. This deregulation is not the panacea it is hailed to be. The Conservative government thought that all it had to do was point to the United States in order to see the benefits of this practice. There, deregulation had another name; Reaganomics.

In his new book about the legacy of the Reagan years entitled Within Our Means—The Struggle for Economic Recovery After a Reckless Decade, Alfred Malabre concludes that: "Most of the problems that festered under Reagan grew worse from the pile-up of the debt to the deteriorization of health care and to the decay of the infrastructure. New problems arose".

Sound familiar, Mr. Speaker? Canada's national debt piled up to over $400 billion dollars, doubled since the Conservatives took office in 1984. The deteriorization of health care is also upon us, courtesy of the minister's latest budget, and the decay in our country's infrastructure can be seen in the gaping holes of Canada's social safety net.

Deregulation in Canada was taken by the Conservatives to mean that it was okay to deregulate the federal government, okay to deregulate our national institutions, okay to deregulate our social safety net, because that is exactly what the Conservative government has done over the last six and a half years of being here in office.

I asked the member for South Shore to give us an explanation, of which he could not, and I will say again that it is about time that this government took responsibility for its own economic and fiscal mismanagement, without excuses, for the national debt that has to have been allowed to double under this government. This government experienced over six years of the most prosperous years in Canada in recent times and it could not control the national debt nor the deficit.

The Minister of Finance predicted in his first budget of 1985 that by the fiscal year 1991–1992 the deficit would have been brought down to $18 billion. In the budget of 1991–1992 the minister instead predicted a deficit of $30.5 billion. Even in his latest attempt at diversion, the Minister of Finance says that things should not be as bad within the next few years because inflation will come down to 2 per cent.

What hat did the minister pull that figure out of? Even in the best of times—and I think the minister hopes things will get a little better—inflation just cannot get that low. The minister had predicted that the inflation rate would only rise slightly once the GST came into effect. But what happened? The inflation rate jumped to an incredible 6.8 per cent.

The minister had based the current budget projections over the next five years on the belief that inflation would go down to 2 per cent. All I can say is that he should bring in a new budget which reflects reality.

Suddenly the Minister of Finance announces in his budget that under the new legislation government departmental budgets will be spelled out in black ink, and that the GST revenues would be allocated solely to reducing the deficit. That is contrary to the minister's statement that the GST would be revenue neutral. Remember we all heard that. Of course that was misleading. After ranting about the deficit for six and a half years when his government could have actually done something about lowering the deficit, this announcement is absolutely unbelievable. I can hardly wait for the minister's legislation.

Where did the minister's projections go wrong? Why is he so far off? Because the minister and his government have failed to understand that the deficit problem is not simply solved by cutting away at programs, by cutting away at institutions, but by promoting growth and investment which is something they have failed to do. Perhaps it is because of his high interest rate policies. Perhaps it is those high dollar policies.

It is not so easy for the minister to say that the current recession is not as bad as the recession of 1981–1982, which is like comparing apples and oranges. Canadians know the recession of 1981–1982 was an international recession, not as the New Democratic Party Leader alleged today a Liberal recession, but one emanating from international problems which affected the major industrialized nations. This recession on our hands today, however, we all know is a made-in-Canada recession.

I want to examine some of the features included in the budget and Main Estimates for which this government must get the authority to borrow. The Canadian Jobs Strategy, the government's so-called retraining program, will have its funding slashed by $100 million. It is outrageous.

Since the minister acknowledged in this House that he expects the national unemployment rate to rise above 10 per cent this year, it means that an additional 200,000 jobs will be added to the 1.3 million people who are already out of work in this country. For those Canadians with jobs, the Conservative government has raised unemployment insurance. We warned them about Bill C-21. Premiums are up.

I would like to go on with all the examples that I have in this budget. There have been job cuts. In Hamilton West and environs I will give a few examples of companies. I imagine the member for South Shore will be quite familiar with job losses down Lockport way: Camco, Dare Foods, Stelco, Greening Donald, Canada Wire and Cable, Nabisco, Ball Packaging, just to name a few.

A year ago January we had an unemployment rate in Hamilton of 4.7 per cent. Just last January, one year later, it climbed to 8.8 per cent. In fact, we have had an increase in welfare roles of 46 per cent, but the government wants to cut back.

Let me conclude. Obviously we realize the scope and nature of occupational health and the importance of it in this country. I have been pushing day after day in this House about the CCOHS in Hamilton West. In fact, this House approved re-instituting funding to that organization. It has fallen on deaf ears with the minister.

Instead of investing in preventive health care, this government is divesting itself of universal health care. Under the guise of providing for tomorrow, this government is methodically dismantling our yesterday, the foundation on which this country was built.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member for Hamilton West indicated that he would welcome a response from me. I certainly welcome the opportunity.

I must compliment him on his remarks. They sound remarkably familiar to the thrust of what many of his colleagues had been saying earlier in the evening, although I must say he said them with somewhat more polish and I enjoyed them immensely.

However, I am greatly concerned that he has been here for much of the debate and I find it amazing that he has not benefited from so much of the wisdom that has been shared with the members of this House over the course of the evening. And he has not listened in terms of things like debt.

But, first of all he made reference to job losses and he made references to the community of Lockport which I have the honour to represent in this House. I must say that I should advise my hon. friend that, yes, we have dealt with job losses in Lockport, as we have in other coastal Atlantic communities. The reason we have of course is because of the decline in the fishery. My hon. friend surely is not going to blame the Minister of Finance for the fact that we do not have as many groundfish in the ocean as we might like to have at this time.

But I will say this: I am very grateful for the fact that we do have a government in power today and a minister of fisheries and a minister of regional development who have responded to those problems that we have had in providing community development funding for a town like Lockport to help them get over the difficult times.

I am really grateful that we have the Labour Force Development Strategy and the Canadian Jobs Strategy which are providing temporary relief for those communities as well as opportunities for adjustment.

I was really delighted that a little over a year ago the Minister of Employment and Immigration awarded a Community Futures Program to Shelburne County, Nova Scotia, which has benefited from it tremendously. That futures program is up and running and doing a tremendous job creating all sorts of employment opportunities through economic diversification for the people of Shelburne County.

My hon. friend, in his remarks, made reference to the $100 million reduction in the Canadian Jobs Strategy program, and yet I can recall just about a year and a half ago being a member of the committee on Bill C–21 that travelled from coast to coast in this country and was going to put $800 million into that program, and my hon. friends opposite said: "These things are a waste of time. It is no good anyway."

When we talk about $100 million reduction, we should recognize that it is a $100 million reduction from $800 million that never really got there because his friends in the other place never provided an opportunity for that bill to pass so the money would be there.

There is going to be more money in the Canadian Jobs Strategy than there has ever been before. Perhaps he could explain to me why today his colleagues are so concerned about that Canadian Jobs Strategy money, when only a year ago they were decrying the whole thing as useless.

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. The first dealt with wisdom. Wisdom must first be spoken before it can be understood.

Then I move to his second question on jobs. Peter C. Newman reported in McLean's magazine just last month, and I quote: "As a member of the G–7, Canada still qualifies as one of the world's leading industrial states. But the reality is disturbingly different. The accelerating pace of de–industrialization which the Canadian economy has suffered in the past five years threatens to turn us into a Third World economy by the end of this decade. Unless current trends are reversed, the number of Canadian factory jobs will follow the downward curve of agriculture, so that by 1999 fewer than 10 per cent of working Canadians will be employed in manufacturing. The Science Council of Japan dubbed Canada a Third World country with an artificially high standard of living in 1986, and every available indicator since has continued to point downward."

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, this debate on the borrowing bill which flows directly from the budget of the Minister of Finance is a very timely debate. I say that because Canadians are very conscious of some of the economic indicators, indicators like the fact that our bankruptcies are up sharply. In the month of January alone they rose in this country 69 per cent. At this time we have about 1.3 million Canadians unemployed and that figure, according to the Minister of Finance will rise shortly to about 1.5 million people. That is a tragedy on a monumental scale.

Since the free trade agreement came into effect we have lost maybe 250,000 manufacturing jobs. That is like a scorched earth policy of a kind. Plants closed. Since Christmas, since the imposition of the GST, retail sales in this country have gone flat. In fact they have gone more than flat; they have gone straight down the tube. Of course, we have inflation shooting up as well and that is attributable also to the GST.

I have one more economic indicator. There are over 180,000 Canadians lining up at food banks in the last year. Something which I find traumatic is that one in six Canadian children is going to bed hungry every night. It is hard to believe that this is Canada when we cite those numbers.

Then under this government and according to this very religious right wing agenda which is pursued with alacrity and enthusiasm, we have seen a diminution of our institutions, be it the CBC, VIA Rail or Canada Post and of course medicare, which I will talk about in a few moments.

Perhaps the most overriding concern, perhaps the major concern in this country and the major preoccupation of Canadians, is how to get rid of this Prime Minister. Really the major questions Canadians ask themselves are: How do we get rid of this Prime Minister? How do we get rid of this government? How do we get rid of a Prime Minister who construes that a five–year mandate given to him through an election of a Parliament as a dictatorship. He can do whatever his little heart desires. Whatever his little old heart desires, he will have. He will not listen because, after all, he has been given this five–year mandate.

Mr. Speaker, when was the last time that you or that gentleman over there, or the other gentleman over there, was asked how to impeach a Prime Minister? Is there a way of impeaching a Prime Minister of Canada? Unfortunately I have to say that I know of no way we can impeach a Prime Minister. There is a way of getting rid of a Prime Minister. There is the old–fashioned political process, but I do not know of a way to impeach a Prime Minister. Yet, if I have been asked that question once, I have been asked that question a thousand times: How do you impeach a Prime Minister?

Canadians are perplexed by our system. I will tell you why. They look across the pond over to Great Britain and they see how easy it was to get rid of a Prime Minister who had served beyond her time. There was a time when Margaret Thatcher was riding high, particularly after the Falklands War. She was untouchable, she was unbeatable, but the Iron Lady had served her time. They had a very simple way of getting rid of that Prime Minister. It was almost painless.

I think Canadians ask themselves: Why don't we have something like that? Why do we have to live with this monstrosity that hangs around our neck? Why do we have to live with a Prime Minister who has absolutely no moral authority to govern, a man who has been sitting in the polls at 14, 15 and 16 per cent?

Here is a man who says: "I will do whatever I want, regardless of public opinion and regardless of what Canadians want". Be it Meech Lake, the GST or the war in the gulf, it does not matter. This Prime Minister absolutely refuses to comply or to heed for one moment what Canadians are saying.

That is why Canadians are perplexed. They ask themselves about something as unpopular as the GST. There were 80 to 85 per cent of Canadians who did not want that tax. How many Tories said: "We will vote against this government and we will vote against the tax"? None, except two who were expelled from the caucus.

Canadians asked themselves: Why, when there is such an unpopular tax measure, can we not get backbenchers on the government side to stand up and vote according to their conscience? It is very simple: Because they know that under our system if they vote down the government, they vote down themselves; if they kill the government, they kill their own political careers.

So they stay like good little boys and girls, because they do not want to lose their political careers. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, Canadians are absolutely fed up with it. The party system or the party discipline has gone too far. Particularly on the government side of the House, an MP is a mere puppet.

The cabinet does not have to earn its legislation. Once the cabinet stands up and says "this is the way it is going to be", what do the government MPs do? They are just like seals and puppets. All they say is: "Yes, sir; no, sir."

Canadians are absolutely fed up with it, right up to the teeth, and they will not put up with any more. Mark my words: there are going to be many Tory MPs who will pay the ultimate price because they would not represent their constituents.

I do not think I have any time left, but let me say something that relates directly to the budget. The finance minister and in fact all cabinet ministers go around and say: "We are not touching medicare, this crown jewel of social programs in this country". They are not touching it, despite the fact that they are going to take $2.3 million out of EPF, that is out of transfer payments to the provinces.

The estimates show clearly in black and white that the reduction in medicare payments will be in excess of $1 billion. Yet, these people have the unmitigated gall to say: "Oh, no, we are not touching medicare. Don't worry about it. Everything is fine and dandy".

The fact of the matter is that in just a handful of years there will be no more cash payments from the federal Treasury to the provinces for medicare. Yet, they have the gall to say: "Don't worry, we are not hurting medicare".

Once the government moves away from financial support for medicare, it is dead in the water, especially from the point of view that it will no longer be a national program. It will be the rich provinces that will have medicare. The poorer provinces will have a poorer kind of medicare.

I could go on about the slash in job creation programs. I could go on about the 24 per cent increase in UI premiums, which will have a devastating effect on small business. I could tell you, Mr. Speaker, if I had the time that there is absolutely nothing in this budget for rural Canada.

There is $1.3 million for the agricultural community, and I am very thankful for that. However, let me point out that $1.3 billion is supposed to cover the farm safety-net programs, GRIP and NISA, but that does not cover $300 to $900 million for the deficit of the Canadian Wheat Board. It does not cover the $450 million which is the shortfall in payments under the Western Grain Stabilization Act, and it does not cover payments that will be made to the farmers some time this spring.

• (2120)

This budget is a failure. It is a failure. It is a Tory budget. You had better believe it. It is a Tory budget and it is a failure and Canadians understand that very well.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments period of five minutes duration. The Hon. Member for South Shore has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is with some regret that I rise because I think that the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James does little credit to himself, little credit to his party, and little credit to this Chamber, to speak in the manner which he has here tonight about the Prime Minister of Canada—but more important than that about the man whom Canadians elected as their Prime Minister with two back-to-back majority governments, the first time that has been done in 40 years in this country.

He says that we have a dictatorship. He says: "How do you impeach a Prime Minister?" Well, let me tell him if he wants to know about dictatorship. Dictatorship is where those who are elected do not get to govern. We have a democratic country where those who are elected govern and they govern for the term of office for which they are elected, unlike what seems to prevail among his caucus colleagues in the other place who chose to put democracy second and who were defeated two elections in a row and yet took upon themselves, as if it were their right, to turn down the will of the elected majority in this House who were elected and given a mandate by the people of Canada.

It is very simple to answer the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James. If a majority of the members of this House lose confidence in this government and this Prime Minister they can be gone tomorrow just as quickly as they were in the United Kingdom earlier this fall.

But I want to tell the hon. member something. As he pointed out some have left, some did not agree with this government, just as people have left his own party during the last 12 months and sat elsewhere. But let me tell him that those of us who sit here sit here because we are proud to serve under a leader who has the courage to do what is right for Canada, who has the courage to be on the side of right even though it may mean unpopularity from time to time.

I think of the recent events in this world. Where did his party stand? Did they stand by the right, or did they stand by the polls. I would like to say to him that the people of Canada, when the next election comes, will ask the question: "Who stood by what was right for Canada, and who stood wherever the polls said this week they ought to stand?"

In closing, I met a friend who is an NDPer and he said: "The one thing you Tories got going for you that the rest of them don't have, you have a leader, a real leader, and in the next election Canadians will see him again as they did in 1984 and 1988".

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for South Shore. He has a leader—he has a rotten leader.

An hon. member: A dictator.

Mr. Harvard: Canadians realize the kind of man that they put in charge of this government for the last seven years and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, Canadians are not stupid. As we say back at home: "We didn't come down the river on a bale of hay".

I can assure you that Canadians will make that correction in the next election.

He talks about leadership. Let me ask you this, Mr. Speaker. Is it leadership to refuse any amendments to the most unpopular tax measure that was ever foisted on the Canadian people? How many amendments did we introduce in the House? How many amendments were introduced in the Senate? Not one single amendment was adopted, not one.

Remember the wonderful Meech Lake Accord? Seamless web, seamless web, concocted in the dark, concocted some time after midnight by 11 men.

What does the Prime Minister say? He says that this is a seamless web, you cannot touch it. We might have a little debate out in the country, but you are not going to change it. He talks about the Prime Minister being a leader. Is that a leader? It seems to me that smacks of dictatorship. That smacks of a man who has no commitment whatsoever to the democratic process.

Yes, I agree they have a leader. He is a rotten leader and the Canadian people will make absolutely sure at the next election that he is gone.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–97, which proposes borrowing another $26.4 billion, is one of a long series of government bills doing this. It is number nine since this particular party became the government in Canada. By this means they have borrowed something in excess of $200 billion, almost one–half of what the total debt of the country is at the present time.

The money is needed. We do not question that it will be needed by the time its authority under this bill runs out, due to the mismanagement of the government in office. For that reason alone, if for no other reason, we will have to vote against it as our expression of just how we feel about the mismanagement of this government.

I had the opportunity to watch the presentation of the budget in the House and made notes of a few things that I would question or that I would have liked to see changed. Of course, one does not get the opportunity to change them, but certainly one does get an opportunity to question.

The Minister of Finance talked throughout his budget about our inability to compete internationally. Well, whose fault is that? It was this minister, in co–operation with the Governor of the Bank of Canada who produced what the Conference Board of Canada called the first made–in–Canada depression, I mean recession. I better use the word recession, I suppose, it is the one they use.

The minister knew how it was accomplished. He kept saying over and over that he had to cool off the over–heated economy in southern Ontario. He did that by increasing interest rates and by increasing the price of the Canadian dollar. It was very simple. He knew exactly what he was doing. He boasted about it. It was the way he was going to do it. And surprise, surprise, it worked. At least that time he was right.

If it works so well to create a recession, then why not use the medicine in reverse to create growth of the economy, prosperity? But he is not ready to do that. He increased interest rates to cool off the economy and instead of bringing them down steadily and more rapidly, he is threatening to stop because he wants to control the growth of inflation. He wants to get the inflation growth down to 2 per cent. Well, when is he going to start turning the screws again? When are the interest rates going to start going up because we are nowhere near 2 per cent now.

He knows how to do it, but he is not prepared to do it because to him it is far more important to get inflation down to 2 per cent than it is to put Canadian people back to work. It is just that simple.

Was or was not the Canadian dollar part of the free trade deal? A former member of the cabinet of the Conservative government said that it was included in the agreement, not in the documents we read, but that it was part of the deal that our Prime Minister made with the President of the U.S. It would then be easier for the U.S. to export into Canada and make us more of a branch plant economy than we had been then and are now. This government is continuing that process of increasing the Canadian dollar to make it even more difficult for us to compete internationally.

And that is what it was all about. After all, it was the Americans that had a tremendous trade deficit with Canada and it was their desire to turn that around and our desire to co–operate totally with everything that Uncle Sam wanted.

He wants to get the deficit down to $28.5 billion. Well, at least he is consistent. I have heard that same figure every year that I have been here, and I know from previous experience that it was close to that every year before that. So it is always the target, but it is not going to be this year, it is not going to be next year. Two years from now it is going to be $28.5 billion. As I say, he gets full marks for being consistent.

When it comes to pay increases, they are going to be limited. But the part I liked, the part I just had to chuckle at, is that the increases for executives, deputy ministers, heads of Crown corporations, the people who are all at the top of the salary scale now, are going to be limited to the same rate as the rate bargained for with employees subject to bargaining. If they get 3 per cent, for example, then the Governor of the Bank of Canada, who got a 30 per cent increase last year, is going to get 3 per cent on top of whatever he is getting this time. The increase alone will be something like three times what the highest person in the bargaining sector gets as his total salary.

That is fairness, according to our Minister of Finance: the same rate. Is that restraint?

The restraint package of this budget adds up to $1.1 billion. The Auditor General told the minister how he could recover more than that in a year, but he chose not to accept the advice. Remember the proposal to impose a new tax on banks because they had not been paying taxes? A favourite story is that a teller in the Royal Bank was paying more taxes than was the Royal Bank. The Minister of Finance was going to get after them and was going to raise $2.5 billion from that one source alone. However, he came into the House two years ago and said that it proved to be too difficult, so we are going to let the banks get away with it; we will not tax them the $2.5 billion they could well afford to pay.

The Auditor General said that over a period of 10 years of the manufacturers' sales tax, the government had forgone $2.4 billion in revenue by not having enough people checking up on the corporations which were paying it. So once again, because it is too difficult to watch the corporations, we will let them get away with that $2.4 billion.

He said also that hiring one more tax auditor at a cost of, say, $40,000, on the basis of the figures he had within the Ministry of Finance, would bring in from $300,000 to $900,000 in extra revenue. For an expenditure of $40,000 there could be additional revenue of $300,000 to $900,000. He said there were hundreds of millions of dollars out there waiting to be picked up that way.

He warned us when we went into the GST program that because we did not have the auditors, because we were not ready to examine the inventories, for example—there were different ways, but one of them was to check the inventories on which the government was going to be paying GST tax credits for manufacturers' sales tax that they would have paid previously—we were possibly losing hundreds of millions of dollars there as well.

The government had the opportunities to go after the corporations and to go after the high income taxpayers; the Auditor General told it where some of them were and it knew where the others were. But it chose to go after the little fellow, as it is doing in limiting the wage increases to the lowest wage earners in the government sector, limiting them and letting off the people at the top, the high salary earners, the big corporations, the ones with the inventories that are going to make money on the GST when it opens up, because it is difficult to go after the big boys.

Mr. Speaker, he never explained to us why it was difficult to go after the banks for $2.5 billion. The government has never tried to deal with the Auditor General's concern about what should be done to tighten up on controls so that the corporations would not get away with claiming excessive GST credits on inventories; no explanation at all, no attempt to explain any of that, to the best of my knowledge.

The GST is going into a fund to deal with the deficit. I can remember in the legislature in B.C. when I was there four years ago, the Minister of Finance brought in a new fund. He called it "The Budget Stabilization Fund". At the time it was thought that it was somebody within his own department who used a name that could be shortened to "BS", because they knew that was exactly what it was and they wanted to reveal it to the world.

This is another "BS" fund. We are going to put the GST revenue of approximately $20 billion, $22 billion, into this new fund and out of it we are going to pay all of the debt servicing costs and get out of debt. The Minister of Finance said that in the year coming up, debt servicing costs—interest—is going to be in the neighbourhood of $45 billion. Up to now, he has always understated it. Let's hope he is high enough this time. But there is going to be half enough money in that fund in the first year at least to meet the carrying costs of the government debt. This is the way he is going to control debt. This is the way he is going to show the Canadian public that he is determined to keep expenditures under control and to get us to the point where there will not be any new borrowing.

This is another fund, such as the one in B.C. that was labelled quite appropriately as the "BS" fund.

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member with great interest. One of the things that I am not hearing from the third party, the party of the NDP, is their platform. One of their members stood up today and said, "Well, the Liberals have no platform", the Liberals this and the Liberals that.

We from Ontario have first-hand experience with what the NDP government of that province is doing. It went around and wooed all the ethnic vote. "Minorities, vote for us". We will do this for you, we will do that for you. Just last week, the provincial wing of their party held a convention. You would figure, that their mandate is what the grassroots and the delegates say, that this is what they are going to do. The leader of that party stood up and said, "No, just a minute now. This is not what we are going to do". He started sounding more and more like the Conservatives.

I am wondering what is the difference between the third party and the Conservatives. If the thirty party wants to do anything, it is like running a dictatorship. We know that the Conservatives have a dictator and he says, "My way or no way".

An hon. member: What have you been drinking tonight?

Mr. Karygiannis: I am not drinking. I don't touch the stuff. I am pretty sound and I am listening to my constituents. I am listening to the minorities.

Did you know, Mr. Speaker, that 450,000 of all small businesses in Canada are mom and pop operations, owned by first and second generation citizens? I have not heard the NDP say anything about this.

Will the gentleman of the third party finally stand up and tell us what they are going to do. Or will it be a song and dance like the provincial leader, "We are going to do this and then I am going to do the quick step and I am not going to do this". Is this what the hon. member is going to do? Is this how he is trying to woo the voters?

We are not doing a quick step. We know where we are going. I am wondering if the hon. member knows where he is going or is he talking from two sides of his mouth? He is thinking, "Oh, we smell power. We are going to talk from two sides of our mouths". Have some guts NDP and come clean because you are certainly not winning the popularity contest.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, he did not leave much time for an answer to all those questions.

Mr. Karygiannis: Well, get to it.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, I will address my remarks to you, not to him, and if he cares to listen, that is his choice. He might have been listening when the NDP was talking about our alternatives to the GST, but he was listening as usual with his mouth open and his ears closed unfortunately.

We gave our alternatives then. Among the things mentioned was to bring back the graduated level of income tax for the people at the top so that the ones making the highest incomes will be paying higher rates of income taxes as well as more total income tax.

We said we would reverse the procedure concerning corporations, and we are not talking about the mom and pop operations. When we were in government in B.C. we had two rates of tax. The smaller corporation paid a lower rate and it was the only province in Canada to do that. We are talking about going after the big corporations.

We would not find it too difficult to get that extra $2.5 billion out of the chartered banks. We would not find it too difficult to increase the percentage—to bring back the proportion of taxes paid by the large corporations so that it compares with what it was. Even when the Liberals were in office the corporations were paying almost twice as much in proportion to ordinary taxpayers as they are today. It is the Conservatives—

Mr. Karygiannis: You are worse than the Tories. You're hypocrites.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I remind all hon. members that some people watch TV and watch how the procedure works. The hon. member has one minute left.

• (2140)

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your intervention.

I told you, we go after high income earners and the big corporations. We cut back on some of the grants. There are hundreds of millions of dollars in here. The one area where they did not cut back was the hundreds of millions of dollars given to the large corporations. The largest corporations are the ones that get the most.

An hon. member: At least we have a policy.

Mr. Stupich: They give more to the Liberal Party than the others do, and they watch that. It is a matter of getting more taxes from those people who should be paying those taxes, cutting back on the revenue expenditures and on the expenditures to the large corporations, making them pay their own way fairly. It is a matter of bringing it back to the proportion it was when the Liberals left office. There are ways of dealing with it fairly, and that is the thing.

We would bring in a fair taxation system. That is the answer. We would not need the GST.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on this borrowing bill.

First of all, I find it amazing to hear the Liberals and the Tories and the hon. member from Toronto who has such a big mouth he is going to swallow himself whole if he is not careful.

Mr. Karygiannis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if the hon. member was referring to me I wish he would withdraw his remarks. If I have a big mouth, that is why my constituents put me here. It is none of your bloody business. My constituents voted for me.

Mr. Laporte: If my hon. friend was not so arrogant, he would sit and listen to remarks. He asked a question of my hon. friend here who probably knows more about how to deal with people and understands the politics of this country than he will ever know. He asked a question and he refused to listen to the answer.

He sat there for five minutes and screamed at the hon. member, and he did not listen to his answer. Now, he is going to rise on points of order.

If the hon. member would care to know what the NDP position was, he could simply look at the record of the New Democratic Party in the province of Saskatchewan. He is still talking. He does not want to hear, because he knows full well the history of the Saskatchewan New Democratic Party which went in in 1971. It was there until 1982.

We had a balanced budget in Saskatchewan for 11 years, and we left office with $142 million surplus. That is one heck of a lot more than the Devine government which now has a $5 billion deficit.

In fact, when Grant Devine was elected premier of Saskatchewan in 1982, he went around the province saying: "We can afford to completely mismanage the province and still break even." He has not had a balanced budget in eight years.

If the hon. member wants to look at the record of the NDP and the CCF before in Saskatchewan, he would find that it is a very good record. He would also find that the record of Dave Barrett who was premier of British Columbia back in the 1970s was a very good record.

Now, Bob Rae is premier of Ontario. I hope he would ask that question two or three years from now, after the Ontario government has had a chance to deal with the mess that Premier Peterson left in the government. They went into the election saying that they had a surplus in the budget. It turned out there was a $2.5 billion deficit. There are thousands of people unemployed. Bankruptcies have gone crazy.

He talks about small business people. Small business people in Ontario are suffering, just like small business people in Saskatchewan are suffering.

That gets me to the point in this budget which I planned to speak on in the first place. Coming to my riding of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, it is made up of small business people, workers, farmers and seniors. That is my riding.

There is nothing in this budget to help those people. In my riding, I have many constituents who have come to me who are saying: "I am working hard. I am trying to get ahead, but every time I turn around, this government has added more taxes. It is adding a situation which is intolerable and I cannot survive." That is what they are saying to me.

This budget is the same thing. The minister has said there has been no increase in taxes. There has not been because he introduced it on January 1 with the GST. It is the old shell game, as they say, that the Tories played.

They had a GST which was going to be revenue neutral back in 1988. It was going to replace the manufacturers' sales tax. It was not going to increase taxes. We had an indication back in December 1990 that in fact it is going to be an extra $5 billion and now maybe as high as an extra $10 billion. That is a massive tax increase. That is something that small business people in Saskatchewan do not like.

How has the Tory government in Saskatchewan responded? It has added a provincial sales tax to it now. We have a provincial GST on everything that the federal GST covers, starting April 1. That means that people buying meals in restaurants are going to pay 14 per cent extra, where they did not pay it before. It means that people who hire the plumber or the mechanic or so on, are paying 14 per cent more, which they did not pay before. That is not good for small business. That is not good for the working people in my riding.

The government has an unemployment insurance bill which the Minister of Employment—unemployment I guess is a better word—said is going to allow for putting more money into job creation. It is going to make a better system for the unemployment insurance in this country so that people will be better protected. All it has done is raised premiums, lowered benefits and now it has taken $100 million out of job creation. On top of that, the premiums that were supposed to stay the same have now been increased as well.

Workers in Moose Jaw, like the workers across this country, are now going to pay $100 a year extra this year for unemployment insurance and $150 next year. The small business people are up around $140. That is another $140 they have to come up with, which is just one more item that brings down their ability to survive.

They say that they did not increase taxes, but they have in an indirect fashion with their off-loading. Their transfer payments are going to be down something like $4.5 billion over the next five years. The simple fact is that it is going to mean the provinces are either going to lower services or pass it on to municipalities. In Saskatchewan they have done both. The city of Moose Jaw is facing a huge increase because of this off-loading and the prospects are not going to get better. Other municipalities are saying they are simply going to cut services. Either way, average Canadians are losing out in this budget.

People in my riding are wondering where this government is. This is a government that is supposed to be good mangers of the economy and like the Liberals before them, they have made a complete mess of it. It is not the New Democratic Party that has raised a $400 billion deficit in this country. It is not the New Democratic Party in Saskatchewan that has a $5 billion operating deficit. It is the managers, the people who supposedly can manage the economy—the Tories, and they have made a mess of it.

In fact, back in 1982, Premier Blakeney was regarded by many business people across this country as a person who knew how to handle an economy. He was a New Democratic premier, a premier who knew how to have fair social programs and provide a fair opportunity for business. That is what this country needs.

They have put aside $1.3 billion for farm aid. Well, we are not clear where this $1.3 billion is going to go. One thing though, I will bet, is that it is not going to go to help keep rural Canada alive. It is not going to help keep farming families around. It is going to be a nice little attractive program which will look good for a year or two or maybe three. It will help to try to keep Grant Devine in office. Of course it is going to fail. It is going to be designed to help keep this government in office, which I believe is going to fail as well.

We have out of this budget, Canadians, workers who are frustrated, small business people who are discouraged and seniors who are simply upset. It is a government that has simply ignored their needs. It simply has not paid attention to them. That is what this government has done. It has not addressed the needs of my riding and it certainly has not addressed the needs of the rest of Canada.

My colleagues months ago asked the minister in the House to lower interest rates. Why does he not lower interest rates 2 per cent to help small business, to help workers, to help people with mortgages and so on? The Minister of Finance said: "All you New Democrats do is complain. We have just had seven good years of economic growth and now it is time to tighten your belts and you are complaining". What a joke. What an insult.

That minister should go to Saskatchewan and tell people in Saskatchewan they have had seven good years of economic growth and tell them to tighten their belts because those people are just barely surviving. They find it quite insulting. It may have been seven good years for Conrad Black or others of that description, but it sure has not been seven good years in Saskatchewan, nor has it been seven good years in most of the country.

This budget debate simply is a continuation of the philosophy of this government that has succeeded in completely dismantling the whole infrastructure that we have through a transportation deregulation, now with open-skies policy that is coming, the potential deregulation in communications, post office cuts and VIA Rail cuts. The list goes on and on and on. The free trade agreement has had a very negative influence.

Just in conclusion, as I say, I cannot help it, but listening to this debate I have to laugh at the way that the Liberals and the Tories have been throwing barbs back and forth and making comments and it is them who have been the ones who have dismantled this country and put us in the shape and the position that we are in right now.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I want to address the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, as well as the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. I want to make sure they both hear these comments. From the former, we were getting a recipe, I guess, on how to control the deficit, in fact reducing and dismissing the deficit of Canada. I find that a little odd because I think that the member was in a former government of the province of British Columbia which turned a $100 million-plus into a $100 million-negative in a very few months. I do not know what kind of recipe he is going to be able to offer the Canadian public on how to handle the deficit.

I think it is very clear that this government has made a strong commitment and is a corner piece of what it is doing in economic renewal to remove this deficit which they see is the main part of the malaise of our economy and our future.

The member talked about the GST. He did not talk about any of the positive impacts, the fact that it was set up so that Canada could compete in the global economy, that it could export, that our manufacturing would not be hamstrung. We have access to the world now, certainly through the North America free trade agreement. Now, with the negotiations at GATT, in order to compete, clearly our manufacturing sector had to have the manufacturers' sales tax removed.

The member did not talk about the benefits of that and he did not congratulate his own province on the fact that by unifying the taxes, it has simplified the system and made it far more efficient. I congratulate the province of Saskatchewan for doing that. I am sorry that the member from Saskatchewan could not see fit to do that.

He talked about unemployment insurance, the changes that we made, but he did not talk about the retraining now that is possible with the private sector to become involved with the $800 million in funding now available so that our private sector gets a chance to reinvigorate its workers so the workers of Canada can finally have a chance to take part in this global interlinked economy, which is facing virtually every Canadian today.

He talked about service changes and the off-loading between provinces and municipalities. I think clearly that is the message we want home to Saskatchewan, Ontario and everywhere else, that it is time, by the lead set by the Minister of Finance's budget, that the other provincial agencies and municipal agencies looked at what they are doing with taxes and stop duplicating and triplicating things. Let us make it simple for Canadians. We have set the tone with the federal government budget for the future.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has asked a lot of questions or made a lot of comments.

First of all, if he wants to congratulate Grant Devine, I would invite him to come on out. I will set up a meeting for him and he can come out and congratulate my constituents and that will be great.

As far as the British Columbia government goes, it never ran a deficit budget under the Barrett government. In fact, it took a $550 million debt, which it had inherited, and turned it into a $250 million debt. It reduced it as well as balancing the budget. That is a pretty good record.

As far as job creation and so on, this government has talked a lot. But it has taken a $100 million cut in job creation. And if you talk to people in the CEC—they do not talk publicly, but if you get them in a small room somewhere, they will go on about the problems that this government is creating with job creation. They say they are being hamstrung; they are not being allowed to be proactive so that they can deal with some of the unemployment problems in this country. It is this government that has done it, and it has built it on a foundation from the Liberal government which preceded it. It is a situation that I find very funny.

Finally, with respect to the free trade bill, big business is now saying that the only way it is going to be able to compete in Canada is if it can have some harmonization, meaning we have to lower some of the social standards and we have to lower the taxes. That is the only way it can compete or unfortunately it will be forced to go to the United States and do its business there and ship the goods back.

That is what we have inherited from this Tory government; that is what it has given us.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, before I begin, if you check I think you will find that there is unanimous consent for us not to see the clock so that I might complete my debate and that we will probably not have question and answer period.

Mr. Angus: There have been consultations, and the member did indicate that he would be giving a ten-minute speech with no questions or comments, so that although we would not see the clock we would not be past ten o'clock by more than six, seven, or eight minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House give its unanimous consent to the suggestion of the hon. member?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): For ten minutes.

Mr. Angus: Only because he is a gentleman.

Mr. Volpe: I thank the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker, I find it a little ironic that here we are being asked by the government to pass estimates when its budget, in essence, asked the House to withdraw its mindset from the reality of today. The government is ignoring a reality that is staring every single Canadian man and woman in the face. Everyone in the country has recognized that we are in an economic recession. All economic indicators for 11 months in succession have indicated that the economy and the country is on the skids, and yet the government says that what we must do is we must cut back. We have to raise taxes because we have a big concern with the deficit and the debt. No one disagrees.

In fact, Canadians and all members of this House have been more than patient as they saw, for example—and I will read some statistics—that in 1985 as compared to 1984, the government increased income taxes as a share of government revenues by 4.6 per cent. The following year it increased it by a further 4.03 per cent, and again in 1987 by a further .18 per cent, and again in 1988 by 1.47 per cent. In total, over the course of the last six years, the government increased its revenue share of income taxes by 9.03 per cent. That is a 66 per cent increase over the amount collected in 1984. In absolute nominal dollars, 66 per cent represented an increase of $25,457 million collected more in 1990 than in 1984 from personal income.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Volpe: And I might add, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians went along with that kind of record. They said that this has to serve some sort of purpose. The government went ahead and said that Canadians are generous. So in terms of excise taxes over the same period, we found it was an increase of 58 per cent of excise taxes. In nominal dollars, that represented an additional $12.447 billion collected from Canadian taxpayers, for a grand total, Mr. Speaker, of $37,904 million over the course of the last six years.

Canadians have a right to ask: What have you done with our money?

An hon. member: Down the toilet.

Mr. Volpe: If today you come before this House and say that you need more money because we have to address the problem of the debt and the deficit, because we have to make Canadian companies more competitive, we have to make the Canadian economy more competitive in a global market, we still have the right to ask: What did you do with that $37,904 billion?

• (2200)

In fact, the total revenue share for direct taxes increased by 51.8 per cent between 1984 and 1989, and a further 57.06 per cent from indirect taxes.

We still have a right to ask this government what it has done with that money and what it proposes to do.

There is only one conclusion that one can draw on the face of some of the suggestions that the Minister of Finance has proposed to this House, and that is that either the government did not know what it was doing over the course of the last six years—

Mr. Wappell: That sounds right.

Mr. Volpe: —or that it is grossly incompetent.

We have heard on this side of the House on many occasions that we must ensure that our Canadian manufacturers, that our corporate sector, that our industrial sector be more competitive. Well, from 1984 to 1985 the government decreased the share of revenue from corporate taxes by 6 per cent. The following year, in 1986, it decreased it by a further 19.1 per cent. It changed its heart in 1987 and went up just slightly, by 3.5 per cent. But then in the following two years dropped it again by 8.5 and 8.3 percentage points.

In terms of government revenues—remember, this is a government that wants to address the problem of deficit and the public debt—it allowed corporations to decrease their share of contributions to the public revenue by 34 per cent, at the same time that it was increasing personal income tax revenues by more than 9 per cent.

Well, you say that perhaps we put that money to good use. Did we put it to good use? Well, the interest on the public debt increased by a grand total over that period by only 6.9 per cent, or, if you prefer, in absolute dollars, by $16,439 million. That represents a net shortfall of some $13 billion.

Well, Canadians are still asking: what did you do with that money? Did you, for example, take into consideration some of the concerns on international trade? Did we improve our competitiveness there? Did we improve the competitiveness of our manufacturing sector? On the side of international trade, for example, it might be instructive for some of the government members to know that what happened is that we had a 61 per cent decrease in our net balance of payments on the international trade side. We dropped $12.2 billion in the hands of the great administration of this government.

If we are going to continue to give money to this kind of administration, we want to see what we are getting in return.

What are we getting in return? We got an increase in the value of the dollar. That decreased the competitiveness of our manufacturing sector, of our export markets, by 10.6 per cent.

The Minister of Finance can come before this House and say what we need to do is we need to raise our revenues in order to decrease the debt and the deficit. One looks at the figures that the government issues and says well, something does not jive. Well, if it does not jive, with what gall can you come before this House and say that we have to cut back expenditures some more at a time of recession, at a time when people need some attention?

What did the government do with the money that we gave it? When it cut corporate taxes, when it increased income taxes, did it increase the competitiveness of our manufacturing sector? The manufacturing sector is collapsing all over Canada, most especially in Ontario.

Did it address the problem of unemployment? Unemployment increased just over last year when we had the last budget. It increased by 34.2 per cent.

Good heavens above, Mr. Speaker, how can any Canadian in his or her right mind say that we must contribute more to government revenues when we get nothing for that money?

What did we do, for example, on the question of Canadian Jobs Strategy? We are supposed to be developing a skilled labour force. But we cut 12.5 per cent from the moneys allocated for Canadian Jobs Strategy.

If Canadians cannot use the money for the purposes of stimulating their trade, for stimulating their industries, for developing their employment, for what in heaven's sake are we asking this money? Are we aware that last year we increased premiums on unemployment by 17 per cent, and we have upped that by a further 24 per cent this year? Where are we going to put this money if we are not going to put it at the disposal of Canadians?

We do not have to go much further than the construction industry which is virtually non-existent in all of Canada and most especially in Ontario. We have an unemployment rate of 85 per cent in the construction industry in Toronto alone, 85 per cent, and in certain sectors of that skilled labour market we have got even higher. For example, we have 99 per cent unemployment among carpenters, 88 per cent among electricians, 87 per cent among drywall workers.

Even more important than that is this engine of economy in southern Ontario also drives the wealth of service industries that are related: for example, insurance brokers and their staffs, lawyers and their staffs, accountants and their staffs. The real estate industry itself has collapsed completely.

Does this budget address that reality? No. It does absolutely nothing. Does it take into consideration that this is the time for the government to be pro-active rather than reactive? It does not do that either. Yet we have seen the generosity of Canadians as shown by the statistics that I gave you, Mr. Speaker, over the course of the last six years, and for that kind of generosity Canadians get nothing but the back of the hand of this government.

There must be another reason for the government's withdrawing from the economic sector, from the social sector, from the political sector. Can it be that perhaps it no longer believes in this country? Are we seeing the devolution of financial jurisdiction to be followed soon by political devolution in this country?

The only thing I can think of is that what we needed to do in this budget was to save enough money to send a shuttle back up into outer space so we could bring the finance minister back down to earth. What it seems like, quite frankly, with these cutbacks in expenditures and the increasing of taxes is that the finance minister is filing his nails while the country is collapsing around him. We need a budget that reacts to the needs of every man and woman of this country. This is not it.

CANADA WINTER GAMES

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, following the closing of the Canada Games in Charlottetown, I feel honoured and proud to stand in the House and recognize all Canadian athletes who participated in the Canada Winter Games, 1991.

I am especially proud of our Prince Edward Island athletes for their fine performance. Prince Edward Island secured one gold medal in boxing, won by Mark Docherty, and three bronze medals, two won in boxing by Gerry Ryan and Trevor McAdam, and one bronze medal won in curling by the Sean Matheson foursome.

I wish to applaud all the organizers of the Canada Games, the thousands and thousands of volunteers who have established themselves as some of the most exceptional people in Canada.

I would also like to thank the Government of Prince Edward Island, the federal government, and specifically the Ministry of Youth, Fitness and Amateur Sport, for their efforts and support for the games.

Finally, I would like personally to commend each and every athlete who came, who participated, and who made this cultural and athletic event truly Canadian.

Yes, Canada, our youth are great. Yes, Canada, our athletes are competitive. Yes, Canada, we are a great nation.

TOURISM

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, as you know, tourism is Ontario's second largest industry. This sector of the economy has suffered significant losses in the last two years. I therefore welcome the announcement by the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism that there will be an allocation of $4 million toward the promotion of southern Ontario as a tourist destination.

The southern Ontario advertising fund will be used to help tourist operators and other attractions throughout the region reach the American market in a way that will attract the most visitors. Instead of advertising against each other, they will be encouraged to co–operate and sell southern Ontario as a package.

In order for this plan to work, there must be co–operation and financial commitment from the province and the private sector. It is incumbent upon the province to make certain that it will commit the necessary funds toward revitalizing this important industry and take an active part in this effort.

I call upon the Government of Ontario and the region's private sector to give their enthusiastic support to this program in order that more tourists will view our region as an attractive destination.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, Earl Pratt and Ivan Morgan of Jamaica have been victims of violations of articles 14 and 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Amnesty International and I appeal to the Human Rights Division at External Affairs to intervene on their behalf.

Pratt and Morgan are scheduled for execution tomorrow morning in Jamaica. It is Canada's obligation to uphold and strengthen human rights instruments and decisions.

Would the minister for the human rights branch of External Affairs move immediately and appeal to the Jamaican Minister of Foreign Affairs to prevent this execution?

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the Great Lakes pollution prevention initiative announced yesterday by the environment minister is a major step in the revitalization of the Great Lakes. As a member of Parliament representing Canadians living and working along Lake Erie, I am pleased that every sector will have input in developing strategies needed to achieve major reductions of toxic substances that are polluting the Great Lakes.

I am also pleased that funding will be available to assist industry in introducing pollution technologies into its operations. Prevention of pollution is the key for a cleaner environment for all Canadians.

WAGE SETTLEMENTS

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, before the Empire Club and the Canadian Club in Toronto, the Minister of Finance said that "what we", the government, "are trying to do is break a cycle of wage and salary settlements that are 2 and 3 per cent—sometimes more—higher than inflation".

Last year the inflation rate was 5 per cent. I wondered what sector of the Canadian work force was receiving average annual wage increases of 7 per cent or 8 per cent.

Labour Canada says that private sector workers averaged a 5.7 per cent wage increase, public sector workers 5.9 per cent, and federal workers averaged only 5.3 per cent.

So who was getting 7 per cent or 8 per cent? Canada's executives, that is who: 7.8 per cent in Toronto, 7.3 per cent on average. A typical chief executive officer earns $450,000 a year.

The Minister of Finance would be better to target his friends on Bay Street, rather than to blame the workers on the shop floor for our current recession.

I hope the Minister of Finance sends a copy of his comments to the Governor of the Bank of Canada, whose salary has increased by as much as 21 per cent for each of the last three years.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I was profoundly disappointed and very frustrated by the press release the Quebec government issued yesterday afternoon on a joint decontamination program for abandoned sites presenting a high environmental risk.

Imagine my surprise, Mr. Speaker, when I noticed not one of the five sites proposed by Quebec was in the Abitibi-Témiscamingue region, where most contaminated sites are found. For instance, the Duparquet site was deemed a threat to the environment and a high risk site by the Quebec government.

Today, I made my profound displeasure known to Minister Pierre Paradis and to the hon. Robert de Cotret and I urged them to give priority, and the sooner the better, to the abandoned and dangerous contaminated sites in my region.

GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, consumers in Sudbury and Ottawa who filed numerous complaints with the Competition Bureau of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs over gasoline prices, cautiously welcome the news that the department has finally decided to take action and launch an investigation into possible gasoline price fixing in these two cities.

For several months, consumers from all across Canada have been suspicious of gas prices and the variety of reasons given for vast price differences throughout the country. The government, however, only promised to monitor the situation.

This investigation should have started earlier. Canadians deserve protection from being taken at the pumps. They want the government to assure them that gas prices are indeed fair. It remains to be seen if this government can give such assurances.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on November 2, 1989, the Quebec Department of the Environment wrote the federal member of Parliament for Témiscamingue, Mr. Gabriel Desjardins, concerning contaminated sites called high risk abandoned sites. This letter mentioned sites in Arntfield, two in Duparquet, two more in Cadillac and one in Joutel.

Yesterday, the Quebec Minister of the Environment, Mr. Pierre Paradis, approved a federal-provincial decontamination agreement concerning high risk sites in Quebec which did not include these dangerous sites. And the sites covered under this agreement were those designated by Quebec!

Mr. Speaker, once again the Quebec Minister of the Environment forgot Northern Quebec in his prayer, and the people of Abitibi-Témiscamingue will end up in paradise, or in hell, because of these dangerous contaminated sites.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister's latest budget is like 19th century literature: you have to read between the lines to understand its true meaning, for it is not what it says that is significant but, rather, what it does not.

Many communities in northern Ontario rely on either mining or lumber for their well-being. This government's high interest rate and high dollar policies have crippled these industries.

How is this budget going to help? By cutting back transfer payments and shifting an even greater burden to municipalities that have already been brutalized by the recession that the government created.

The Minister of Finance is forecasting an unemployment rate of 10 per cent. For most northern communities the current rate is nearly twice that and is only expected to increase. How will this budget help the unemployed? By cutting $100 million from job retraining, by cutting social housing, health, and welfare. What does the budget say? Absolutely nothing.

For northern Ontario last year's budget, with its debilitating cutbacks, represented a Stephen King style massacre. This year's budget with its cryptic, silent approach is more along the lines of an Alfred Hitchcock terror; it just leaves one hanging.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance made interesting choices in his budget. For example, he chose to continue the business and entertainment tax deduction which cost $1.1 billion. In fact he made the deduction even better by extending the write-off to include the new goods and services tax. The Minister of Finance also chose to cut the federal contributions for health services by the same $1.1 billion.

Yet, here is what the Prime Minister said about health care in August 1983:

> The Progressive Conservative Party is in favour of quality medicare, universal medicare delivered to our citizens. Problems have arisen because of a unilateral and arbitrary cutback by the federal government to the provinces who are charged with footing the bill. That's the problem.

Today Canadians want to know why the problem of 1983 has been greatly accelerated by the Prime Minister's own government. They want to know about the government's choices: the choice to attack medicare in order to protect the big businesses.

ACID RAIN ACCORD

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, President George Bush will be visiting Ottawa on March 13 and March 14 to sign the Canada-U.S. bilateral acid rain accord.

This accord commits both countries to permanently decrease acid rain-causing emissions to a level that will no longer threaten the Canadian environment.

The signing of the agreement on air quality between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America marks the culmination of a long history of this government's efforts to find a solution to the problem of acid rain.

The air quality accord, plus the measures contained in the Canadian acid rain control program and the U.S. Clean Air Act, will control the acid rain problem and provide a means to resolve other transboundary air quality concerns such as urban smog and air toxics.

MINING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, yesterday it was announced that another 400 mining jobs would be lost in Elliot Lake within the next few months. This will raise the total number of mine jobs lost since last summer to nearly 3,000.

The resulting impact on local small business, the municipal government, school boards, and the community at large will be extensive, resulting in estimated job losses of 5,100 which is over 60 per cent of the labour force.

Elliot Lake and the neighbouring north shore communities are making the tremendous economic adjustments needed to continue as a thriving community.

However, the federal government must respond immediately in the following way: by approving the $6.3 million Community Futures budget, by providing a CMHC loan guarantee to ensure the viability of the retirement living project, by approving the funding for improved navigational aids at the Elliot Lake Airport, and by decentralizing federal government departments and agencies to Elliot Lake.

Elliot Lake has the spirit to survive this crisis, but the support of the federal government is crucial to its success.

TRANSPORTATION OF GOODS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to take this opportunity to express my concern about a matter that may have a serious impact on CN workers in Jonquière. Let me explain, Mr. Speaker. For several months, CN and Roberval Saguenay have been discussing the possibility of letting Roberval Saguenay take charge of the transportation of goods in the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean area. In itself, this may be a good deal for both parties. What worries me however, is that Roberval Saguenay, which is anxious to get a good deal, will come down heavily on CN workers. I have enough information to believe that the deal between CN and Roberval Saguenay would put about 30 CN workers out of work in our area.

Mr. Speaker, if the deal is closed on that basis, it would be entirely unacceptable. Roberval Saguenay must reject that option. I want to appeal to the directors of Roberval Saguenay and CN to inform our workers and our communities of the real tenor of current discussions, the various options considered and the real impact this will have on jobs.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying that if you have a glass that is half full, all the pessimist sees is a glass that is half empty. Well, if the glass contained 18,200 pounds of chlorine, federal transport regulations see a completely empty glass.

That is the lesson from an investigation into a derailment in February 1990 in Brampton, Ontario. At the time CN officials told local authorities that one of the cars, a damaged tanker, was empty, containing only the residue of a chlorine shipment that had already been removed. It was not until they began loading the tanker on to a flat-bed car that they found out it contained nine tonnes of deadly chlorine.

The investigation blames contradictory federal regulations. The resulting confusion could have been fatal both for railway and emergency workers and adjacent residents.

It is absolutely clear that the government has to move immediately to clear up this confusion. We cannot tolerate slipshod relations when the safety of Canadian workers and residents is at stake.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the Spicer Commission's total loss of credibility.

As we are nearing the debate on the Allaire report that will take place this weekend and the tabling of the Bélanger–Campeau report, and at a time when several provinces have established parliamentary committees to examine the division of powers, why doesn't the Special Joint Committee of the Parliament of Canada have the right to examine the division of powers? Why is everybody across Canada examining this issue, except the Parliament of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Official Opposition in the Parliament of Canada has every right to advise us of its opinions in that respect. We have the Spicer Commission and we have the Beaudoin–Edwards Special Joint Committee which is now sitting. I am sure the various commissions and committees would be glad to receive the comments and recommendations of the Official Opposition.

If, at a given time, it appears appropriate for this House to create a parliamentary committee to examine the positions of the Official Opposition and other political groups, we will of course take steps to initiate this process.

However, as far as the negative comments on the Spicer Commission are concerned, I may remind the Leader of the Opposition that the Liberal Member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, Mr. Assad said a few days ago that this was no time to complain about the Spicer Commission because they hadn't had a chance to do anything yet. So, listen to your member before complaining about the Spicer Commission.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I think the public will be the judge of the credibility of the Spicer commission. I am concerned about the role of Parliament.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Ms. Copps: I am very concerned about the limited role of Parliament at this crucial time in our country's history.

Many provinces are looking at the issue of division of powers, but the Prime Minister has tied the hands of the parliamentary committee when it comes to a full public examination of this issue.

However, the Prime Minister has set up a committee of deputy ministers in secret to study and overhaul the federal powers. Why are deputy ministers meeting, again behind closed doors, to review the division of powers but the public parliamentary committee is not allowed to look at the same issues?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says there is a limited opportunity for Parliament to examine this matter. I would be happy to hear from my hon. friend in regard to any suggestion that is reasonable and appropriate. I would be happy, as I have indicated, to undertake a dialogue which would give rise to a constructive discussion. I think the greater the input, the greater opportunity Canada will have to deal with this matter.

Perhaps my hon. friend could begin with the fact that the Official Opposition has nine Opposition Days in the House. Perhaps a good way to begin and to help the country might be for the opposition to take one of those days and set out with some clarity and some precision its ideas on how this might be accomplished.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are painfully aware that secret meetings and rolling the dice have cost us dearly.

What we want to know now from the Prime Minister of Canada is this: Is he prepared today to announce an expanded mandate for the parliamentary committee to look at the specific issue of division of powers so that the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada can have some say on this crucial issue as it is being examined by provinces across the country? Will I get an answer?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated in the past, the government leader in the House of Commons is ready to meet with the representatives of my hon. friend at any time, or with members of the NDP, to examine this possibility. If it is constructive and helpful, we would be happy to proceed with an instrument that could be of benefit to Canada.

My hon. friend refers to a comment I made in regard to rolling the dice, thereby attacking me.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Perhaps I could refer to a comment she made on June 4, quoted in The Toronto Star. "Said Copps: "Jean Chrétien, you have not understood Quebec and you are gambling dangerously with the survival of Canada. One does not find the future, Jean, by looking in a rear view mirror".

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister wants Canadians to believe they are being listened to in advance of the national government taking any position on renewed federalism. If that is the case, why has the Prime Minister instructed a powerful committee of deputy ministers, operating in secret, behind closed doors, to draft proposals on renewed federalism?

I ask the Prime Minister, is the Spicer commission a genuine public consultation or a public diversion while the Prime Minister, once again, orchestrates matters behind closed doors?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend cannot have it both ways. On the one hand, he asks for public participation and when we bring forward the Spicer commission, he leads the attack to undermine and denigrate the commission.

The Spicer Commission is functioning with a view to receiving as many opinions from Canadians as is possible. I think all members of the Spicer commission look upon their responsibilities very seriously. They are earnestly seeking out as many opinions as they can to be helpful to Canada. The Edwards–Beaudoin committee will be sitting the next seven or eight days through western Canada, inviting submissions from Canadians in regard to the amending formula, which is very important. They will then go to Atlantic Canada, throughout Ontario and then throughout the Province of Quebec.

It is our hope that the substance of the Spicer commission, along with the procedural improvements that hopefully can be made as a result of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, will help all parliamentarians along as we put together a formula and a matter of substance that Canadians will view with favour as contributing an important building block to Canadian unity and the building of a new Canada of which all Canadians will be proud.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I hope all Canadians have noted that the Prime Minister has twice refused to deal directly with a question about the secret committee of deputy ministers operating behind closed doors. The Prime Minister is playing his cards pretty close to his vest, but it will not hide the fact that, once again, he is playing poker with the future of Canada.

Is the Prime Minister prepared to tell members of this House and, through this House, all Canadians precisely what is the mandate of this committee of deputy ministers and when is the Prime Minister prepared to share that mandate and their findings with all Canadians? Is he going to do it now so that Canadians can comment, or is he only going to unveil this master plan later when the so–called public consultation is all finished?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a serious problem with this nefarious committee. If it is secret, how does the hon. member know about it?

Let me put the anxieties of my hon. friend to rest. There is no secret committee; but I can tell him that if there was one, I would ask him to join.

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The finance minister stated in his budget that he is discussing new fiscal arrangements with provincial and territorial counterparts. There is a growing concern that these new fiscal arrangements will fundamentally impact on national unity and on the future relationship of the federal government with the provinces and the territories.

I asked the Prime Minister yesterday and I ask him again today: In these discussions on "new fiscal arrangements", what is going to be on the table? Are health care, regional development and social programs going to be on the table? Are these fiscal negotiations, in truth, in reality, constitutional negotiations by another name?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, these are not "constitutional negotiations by another name", to pick up my hon. friend's words. We have been having a number of discussions with the provinces over the past year or so on the question of equalization, a program which must be renewed in 1992, with the major transfers of Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan, as to what the structure of those two programs should be, as well as on the question of the tax collection agreements. These discussions will continue at least over the course of the next few months.

What I was announcing in the budget was a broadening of that process, to invite some public dialogue on the question of how these transfers should be structured and what the tax collection agreements might be revised to.

But I should underscore the point that the discussions do not involve any discussion of the medicare program, of post-secondary education, of highways development, where the moneys might be used by the provinces. Those are not within our jurisdiction; those are within the provincial jurisdictions.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

The finance minister included in his budget speech that he was going to be talking about these new fiscal arrangements. Everyone knows that fiscal arrangements are a key part of the constitutional make-up of this country, and they do affect health care, social programs and regional development.

• (1430)

It does seem that the government is seeking to change some of these arrangements, which is simply different men at a different table, similar to what we saw in the Meech Lake discussions.

I want to ask the Prime Minister again: Is he trying to have his government and his finance minister negotiate new fiscal arrangements which are really a discussion for constitutional arrangements? Is the Prime Minister allowing the finance minister to negotiate fundamental changes to Canadian federalism before the people of Canada have been heard?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is, of course, no.

I am quite surprised by the almost pejorative allusion that the leader of the NDP makes to both Meech Lake and the process. Meech Lake was widely supported and indeed applauded by her predecessor as leader of the NDP and almost every member of Parliament.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister, and it is quite straighforward. Does this government intend to negotiate fiscal arrangements which actually concern the Constitution more than anything else? Are those social programs, those national health programs on the table? The Prime Minister must be honest with Canadians. What is on the table?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same in English and in French. I just gave the answer in English. There are no negotiations on fiscal arrangements or social programs. It was clear in English and it is clear in French.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, for seven budgets the Minister of Finance has promised us that the Canadian economy would be more competitive.

In just two short years, Canada has lost 229,000 or 11 per cent of all our manufacturing jobs. This government is presiding over the deindustrialization of Canada.

Today, 1,300,000 Canadians have no jobs and the minister has promised that another 200,000 Canadians will lose their jobs. Just how far is this government prepared to go in deindustrializing Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, in his most cataclysmic tones, deplores the fact as we do that 211,000 jobs have been lost during the recession.

In this morning's Financial Post a result of a study by the Canada West Foundation, indicates that in the last recession when my hon. friend was a member of the government, 300,000 jobs were lost in the same sector.

My hon. friend never once rose to protest that fact against the government of which he was a member.

An hon. member: There were lay-offs.

Mr. Mulroney: "There were lay-offs", he says. When you lose your job when the Liberals are in office, it is a lay-off.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend knows full well that the recession is a serious one, that indeed there were 140,000 jobs lost in the last two months in the private sector in Canada, but interest rates have come down some 408 basis points since their high of last spring.

Investment intentions appear to be strong. Confidence is returning to the country as interest rates continue to drop, and the Minister of Finance has laid out a program for growth and economic prosperity which we believe will begin to bite in the middle of this summer. It will bring great advantages to all parts of the country.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister is saying that the loss of all of these manufacturing jobs is justified by something that happened many years ago, then this is what we are seeing from this government.

You cannot build an economic future for Canada on empty rhetoric.

This was a Prime Minister who promised Canadians jobs, jobs, jobs—but he delivered them to the Americans.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, when will this government realize that we will not be able to compete tomorrow unless we invest today in our young Canadians, in science and technology, and in research and development? Will the government commit today to make these critical investments in our future so that the jobs and the hopes of a generation of young Canadians will stop moving south?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right when he talks about the need for greater competitiveness and the availability of better jobs. This is why some of the difficult structural changes that we have introduced, that have met with ferocious opposition from some of the protectionist corners of Canada—like the goods and services tax and the free trade agreement—are bringing about and will restructure the Canadian economy and render it much more competitive, and thereby bring benefits to Canadians.

For example, in the report to which I have referred, prepared by the Canada West Foundation, since the free trade agreement was introduced—and I quote directly from the report this morning— "Canada increased high-tech exports by $4 billion since the deal, while such imports from the United States fell by $600 million."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: "In most sectors, bilateral trade levels were unchanged but Canadians exported more electrical machinery, aerospace, railway rolling stock, scientific professional instruments, special trade transactions, zinc and zinc products, precision metals and stones, et cetera to the United States. This indicates that a structural reform such as the free trade agreement is improving our competitiveness, enhancing our productivity—"

Mr. Peterson: We have lost 229,000 manufacturing jobs.

Mr. Mulroney: —which is still not appropriate, but we are going the right way and we will pick up those job losses as we come out of the recession.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Minister of the Environment told us that yesterday's announcement on the clean-up of the Great Lakes was in line with his Green Plan. Unfortunately, he was right: it was merely an exercise in public relations. For the clean-up plan to work, it must be carried out in consultation with the municipalities and provinces involved. My question is this: Is this another green balloon? Why did he make his announcement before finalizing the plan or consulting with the provinces and municipalities involved?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I find the hon. member's question incredible. Yesterday, the Minister of the Environment announced a substantial clean-up plan for the Great Lakes, a plan that provides $25 million for the development of a strategy and for setting up a centre to fight pollution. The plan will be implemented with the co-operation of the industry and other levels of government. Therefore, I think the hon. member should rise to show his support for this government.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the parliamentary secretary. Now I know why we have not had any meetings on C-78. The plan contained no targets. It had no programs.

• (1440)

At 10 o'clock yesterday morning the minister stated unequivocally that the goal of zero discharge, which every environmentalist wants to see and which is crucial if the plan is going to succeed, was absolutely scientifically impossible to attain. Subsequently, after lunch, and after a great deal of pressure on that, he suddenly reversed his position and said that the government's goal was zero discharge.

Will the parliamentary secretary please share with this House the scientific breakthroughs that occurred in those two hours?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, what I can share with this House is the fact that the issue of virtual elimination or zero discharge is far more complex than the hon. member would suggest in his question. I can indicate to the House that this government has a plan in place which includes a provision for zero discharge for eight chemicals which have already been identified. In other words, in the case of mirex and several other chemicals, the manufacturing, the use, the importation and the exportation is not allowed, in short it is zero discharge.

I would also note in the new pulp and paper regulations which are coming into place that there will be the virtual elimination of dioxins and furans, as I think all members of this House would wish.

In the third case, the example in the mining industry, heavy metals such as in liquid effluents like copper and nickel, are being controlled to a level that is sufficient to protect the environment.

This strategy is consistent with the green plan. It is consistent with the kind of feedback that we got from Canadians in the largest consultation process that ever occurred in the history of this country. It is indeed the kind of strategy which will ensure that the environment for our children and our grandchildren will be protected, unlike any kind of policy which that party had in place when it was in power.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, I put my question to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister of the Environment doled out the next instalment of the green plan slush fund by announcing a $25 million public relations Great Lakes fund.

Canada agreed 13 years ago to a zero discharge of toxics into the Great Lakes. Under Canada's Environmental Protection Act the government has the power to act.

Will the government announce today a federally enforced ban on all toxic substances going into the Great Lakes?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, what I can do is read to the hon. member and to interested members the list of those substances which already are banned for which there is indeed zero discharge: mirex, polybrominated biphenyls, polychlorinated terphenyls, alachlor, leptophos, phosphamidon—there are times like this when I wish I was a chemist rather than an historian—cyhexatin and 2, 3, 4, 5-bis (2-butylene) tetrahydro-2-furfural. Those are all at present under the zero discharge regulations to which the hon. member referred.

Let me also include, Mr. Speaker, a statement from the agreement to which the hon. member refers, which is the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of November 1987, in which it states under Article 2, Purposes, Part A: "The discharge of toxic substances and toxic amounts be prohibited and the discharge of any or all persistent toxic substances be virtually eliminated".

That is the same terminology which the minister used yesterday.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. In December, the green plan promised to almost double funding for energy conservation and alternatives. But last week the energy, mines and resources estimates cut funding for energy efficiency and alternatives for the seventh year in a row.

My question to the Prime Minister is: How does the government plan to restore the promised funding and thus avoid the impression of deceitful opportunism?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if you are a socialist in this country, you spend. If you want to deal with the reality, you work in co–operation with the industry, with the provinces and with the federal government. This is what this government is doing.

We are doing our utmost to co–operate and work with all on a future energy policy that will be unique for all Canadians.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

For the last four years, we have all witnessed rampant sawmill closures, causing thousands and thousands of layoffs across Canada. The Canadian Lumbermen's Association puts the blame for this squarely on the softwood lumber export tax. The Canadian high dollar also serves to aggravate the situation. Lumber exports to the U.S. are practically nil.

Will the Prime Minister, in his meeting with President Bush next week, indicate to him that Canada is planning to cancel the softwood lumber agreement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman should know if he reads the papers, we have been busy for a number of months in preparing our position so that we can approach the United States in order to discuss and, hopefully, have some action taken in connection with the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber entered into in 1986. Conditions since then have changed excessively.

Our position is not made any easier, of course, by the fact that the province of Ontario has never taken any replacement measures in connection with that memorandum of understanding, but rather continues to allow a 15 per cent tax to be imposed in connection with lumber exports from Ontario.

We have met with the Government of Ontario, the Government of British Columbia and other governments and we will be pursuing this matter in the coming months. It may well be, at some time, we will be calling on our Prime Minister who, because of his excellent relationship with the United States, I have no doubt will be very helpful in this matter.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, indeed, I do read the newspapers. In the March 4 edition of a national newspaper, the reporter wrote: "Mr. Crosbie is not hopeful he can persuade Washington that changes are needed."

Will the minister finally realize and acknowledge the dramatic extent of the damage done to the softwood lumber industry and when will he finally stand up to the Americans and cancel the agreement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member has ever thought about this situation: What would our chances be if we had in power today or in the near future, members made up of his own party who have made their career on anti–Americanism and in trying to aggravate and irritate our next door neighbours? Luckily, he has in power a government which has a chance of success in this matter. There would be no chance if his own party was in power.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

One of the many aspects of the recent budget which has not been explained is the legislated limits on government spending of 3 per cent over the next five years.

Presumably this legislation can be repealed at any time during those five years. Can the minister explain what will prevent the government from simply altering its own legislation in the future? What does the government seek by these legislative spending limits that it could not equally achieve by its own budgetary measures?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have been able to demonstrate, over the past six and a half years, a spending discipline by holding our spending to a rate of growth of 3.7 per cent.

I think it is important for the Canadian people to have confidence that the spending record can continue and that is why we believe it is important to give Canadians that confidence by legislating the spending limits. In that way, they can be assured we can get our deficit down, we can take the pressure off interest rates and we can help the growth in this economy.

My friend asks what is going to stop another government in the future from changing these legislated limits? What will stop governments from changing these legislative limits is if the Canadian people put a priority on maintaining those limits and indicating clearly to their members of Parliament the importance they attach to that because we have seen from the past that excessive spending has resulted in increased taxes. What we want to do with this law is avoid that in the future.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister is introducing legislated limits at the very time the United States is giving up such broad measures. It is another part of the budget that has been unsubstantiated by any backup material.

Let me ask this. The minister has said in his budget that he will keep interest rates at an average of 9.5 per cent this year, almost exactly what they are today. This means that Canadian interest rates will continue to be much higher than those in the United States. How then does the minister believe that the Canadian dollar will decline to more realistic levels? How can the minister promise export-led growth when the Canadian dollar will remain at inflated levels?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my friend has talked about the Gramm-Rudman targets in the United States. There is a fundamental difference between the approach that we are taking in Canada and the approach that they took under Gramm-Rudman. In Gramm-Rudman the targeted deficit objectives were based on assumptions of growth and interest rates. Our spending targets are based on precise numbers. So there is a fundamental difference in the discipline that will be applied to government spending.

My hon. friend asks about the interest rate projections. As he pointed out it is 9.5 per cent for this year. We are at about 10 per cent now in the commercial paper interest rate. I believe that we can achieve that 9.5 per cent, as do I believe most other people in the financial markets who have commented on that projection. That will allow us to generate the growth, generate the possibility as well for achieving the 9 per cent interest rates for next year and that will allow a continuation of that growth. It is on that basis that we can see a good recovery starting in the middle of this year.

HEALTH

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In the recent budget there was a cut in the federal government's share of medical care spending for next year in the amount of $1.1 billion, which is exactly the amount it cost the federal treasury for letting business executives write off their free martini lunches and entertainment.

The minister had a choice. Will he stand up and tell Canadians why he, Michael Scissorhands, chose to keep the executive tax deduction?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have been called a lot of things.

Mr. Mulroney: That is one of the nicer ones.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps, the hon. minister could answer the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thought you were going to call me Fidel, after the long speech.

In response to the hon. member's question, I have given this response to him on a number of occasions in the past. We have a tax system in Canada that we must maintain in a competitive way with those of other countries, in particular, the United States. This particular element of our tax system is directly comparable to that in the United States. It is done that way to ensure that the people who are generating business in Canada, salesmen who are generating business in Canada, are not going to be put at a disadvantage in relation to their counterparts in the United States, who are also trying to generate business. They want to create jobs in the United States and we want to create the jobs in Canada.

An hon. member: You could create jobs by spending that $1.1 billion on health care, as well.

An hon. member: Right on.

SALES TAX REBATES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue, who will be aware of allegations about a tax scam made by CBC Winnipeg to the effect that a little-known 1986 ruling by his department is allowing businesses to keep rebates of overpayments of the federal sales tax instead of passing them on to customers.

People who have come to know about this rule are alleged to have been taking great advantage of it. A 1986 letter by the Minister of Finance, also quoted in the report, said that such rebates would be an unacceptable windfall for these companies if they did not pass on the rebates to their customers.

What is the government policy with respect to these rebates? If the policy is that these companies be allowed to keep such windfalls, what on earth is the rationale for this, and will the same danger be allowed to obtain with respect to overpayment of GST?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first of all the passing on of the profits is between the business and their clients, but I am delighted to have the opportunity to respond to this question.

As the hon. member knows, the federal manufacturers' sales tax had not one loophole or exemption of this sort but had in fact 22,000 exemptions and loopholes. It is for that reason that this government chose, instead of trying to fix one or two of those loopholes, to eliminate all of the 22,000 and replace them with a fairer tax like the GST.

SPICER COMMISSION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, who today is quite content to let Commissioner Spicer squander $25 million in our daycare centres, is the same guy who in 1984 condemned as "scandalous" the abuse at the Canadian Unity Information Office. He said a Tory would never do that. Today, in 1991, the same Prime Minister, with the approval of the President of the Treasury Board and the Fred Flintstone of Canadian politics, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, is busy setting up the same Canadian Unity Information Office he himself condemned and abolished in 1984. I want to ask the Prime Minister: What is the difference between a red scandal and a blue scandal?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the hon. member's comments, because he started off by saying the Spicer Commission squandered $25 million in our daycare centres. I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend has a problem. Even when he has an excellent point to make, he exaggerates his case to the extent that no one can believe or understand him. Because $25 million in our daycare centres is entirely false. His statement that there is another commission on Canadian unity is false as well. And add to this his negative remarks about the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, a real Quebecer, whose courage and dignity are admirable a truly great Canadian!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford, on a very short supplementary.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, if his big proud Canadian says he is right, it is probably because he is counting on the impact of advertising and propaganda. Consequently, I want to ask the Prime Minister this: Will the Prime Minister say before this House, since his party recognizes Quebec's right to self-determination, whether he is prepared to let his government abide by Quebec's referendum legislation?

Mr. Blais: Where were you in 1980?

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the minister there disturbed the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member asked his question. The Prime Minister has the floor.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had trouble following the hon. member's agitated train of thought. If the hon. member is asking whether the government and the Parliament of Canada will take appropriate action with respect to any attack on or threat to Canada's unity, the answer is of course yes. We are all Canadian citizens. Your yourself are, fortunately for your sake. You enjoy the legacy of an extraordinary country. You are a Canadian Citizen. Are we going to defend the integrity and unity of Canada? This is one of the most spectacular countries in the world, and anyone with any sense at all would see it as his duty and privilege to defend such a magnificent country!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CORE AREA INITIATIVE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Western Diversification.

With the announcement this week that the core area initiative, a very vital economic development agreement for the province of Manitoba, will only be extended for one year without any further funding, it appears the government has given in to the troglodytes in its caucus who have been calling for the extermination—

Mr. Speaker: I would say to the hon. member that given the time I am doing the best I can. I asked for a short question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Will the minister say today that he is prepared to reject this kind of negativism and have the federal government once again participate in this very important development?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member uses some pretty strong language when he talks about extermination. Any of the discussions we have been holding with the various parties have been very rational, very lucid and very helpful.

I want to suggest to the hon. member that he stop using such extreme language, because we are in consultation, as I said, with the parties involved, trying to work out something that makes sense from all points of view to continue supporting that area of Winnipeg in a manner that makes sense for future needs, and that he stay away from this extreme language. It doesn't help any.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg St. James on a straight question, very short.

AIR CANADA

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): My question is for the Minister of Transport.

Air Canada confirmed with my office today that 64 non-unionized jobs will be wiped out in Winnipeg. Some 45 have already gone; 19 more will go next year.

I want to remind the minister of the commitment that was made by the government two years ago with respect to privatization of Air Canada.

Some hon. members: Question, question.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Harvard: The question is: Why won't the government stand by its commitments?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Air Canada is now a private corporation and has to operate in the accordance with the revenues it gets in and the expenditures it must make.

Before it was privatized it had the benefit of being a Crown corporation. Taxpayers are no longer supporting the company. It is expected to make a profit and therefore, as my hon. friend knows, has to operate on that basis.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering if the Chair could perhaps be somewhat helpful.

Has the Chair contemplated, for the foreseeable future, that it might provide some guidelines with regard to Standing Order 31, and particularly Question Period vis-à-vis the number of questions which have been allotted to the Official Opposition, the New Democratic Party, and of course the Independent members in this House, as well as the timing of the answers which are being given by ministers opposite?

I do not wish to belabour the point in terms of a lengthy debate today, but I am wondering if you would perhaps reflect upon that suggestion and either we could pursue it on the floor of the House of Commons with all members participating or, again, we might have an opportunity to discuss this in detail with the respective House leaders.

There is some frustration by members, which I am sure you can appreciate, and I think it would be important to have this matter very clear so that all will understand and be able to abide by your rulings.

Mr. Speaker: In response to the hon. member from Cape Breton—East Richmond, of course I am prepared to discuss these matters at any time with members of the House.

The hon. member raises the suggestion that perhaps some discussions could take place among all members of the House, and I of course would be very pleased to attempt to facilitate that.

I have to say to hon. members that there is only 45 minutes in the Question Period. There is more competition for questions than perhaps there ever has been in the history of the country.

It is not an easy task to deal with these matters every day as evenly as one would like. One hopes that over a number of days they work as evenly as is fair.

However, I certainly will accept the hon. member's comments. I would hope that he would begin some discussions immediately with some of his counterparts, and then of course I would be very pleased to meet with members.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition with respect to the cutbacks in VIA Rail service.

The petitioners in this particular case state that the rail services carried on by VIA Rail are an essential means of transportation for many Canadians and that the cuts the government has made in the subsidy to VIA Rail will result in serious reduction in rail passenger service in Canada.

Among other things, they are asking Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network; to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment; and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have the responsibility and the privilege to present a petition under Standing Order 36.

This petition is signed by 600 employees of the Sudbury Taxation Data Centre. These employees object to the fee for parking at the Taxation Data Centre.

In their petition, they point out that many of the employees live outside the city of Sudbury, that there is no public transportation to bring them into the city, and that they have to use their own cars.

The petitioners point to the lack of any day care facilities at the Taxation Data Centre. They also point out that the practice in the immediate area of private sector employers is not to charge for parking.

They therefore ask Parliament to instruct Treasury Board to exempt the Sudbury Taxation Data Centre from its paid to park policy.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to table petitions from petitioners from Brampton, Mississauga, and the Toronto region.

The petitioners believe that Marie Sklodowska Curie's discovery of radium, being twice awarded the Nobel Prize and being the first woman to win a place in the history of science, deserves to be recognized by Canada.

We further believe Marie Sklodowska Curie, a great woman, must be honoured for her scientific contribution to humanity and that the gift of discovery of radium to heal the sick of the world deserves to be recognized by Canada by issuing a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth, November 7, 1992.

FOOD AND DRUG REGULATIONS

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure to present two petitions today.

The first is from quite a number of constituents in and around the greater Toronto area. They are concerned that there are many citizens who are affected by various food allergies. They also cite that restaurants and food packages are not required to disclose the contents within food.

The petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to enact legislation amending food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in prepackaged foods in place of general classification now permitted. Further, require restaurants and food retailers to provide, on demand to customers a list of all food ingredients and additives in prepared food.

SENATE OF CANADA

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is again from a number of constituents.

In this case the petition concerns the Senate of Canada and it reads that the Senate now performs no useful function, is completely partisan and has proven after many efforts to be impossible to reform.

The undersigned request that Parliament abolish the Senate. I submit these two petitions.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition from residents of Rivière-Heva, Amos, Malartic, Val-d'Or, all in Abitibi, who insist that the Government of Canada drop its plans for the development of Parliament Hill, which would cost $68 million and involve building a parking garage and shopping centre under the Parliament Buildings, and that the government acknowledge the need for preserving the natural environment and historical character of the Parliament Buildings and Parliament Hill in Ottawa.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the attached petition is certified correct as to form and content by the clerk of petitions.

It is signed by approximately 600 residents of the communities of Kenora, Upsala, Thunder Bay, Kaministikwia and Keewatin, Ontario, all of which lost VIA Rail services well over a year ago.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the NDP plan to restore VIA Rail services cut on January 15, 1990; to maintain and, where appropriate, upgrade remote services on which many Canadians rely; to provide a legislative mandate for VIA Rail; and to make available to VIA the resources which it needs to become a modern passenger rail system in a class with those throughout the rest of the western world.

I might add that this campaign was endorsed resoundingly by 1,800 delegates to the Ontario NDP Convention this past weekend.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a delight to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

In their very optimistic way they point out that in spite of the fact that the GST is a reality they feel it is an inappropriate tax and a very unfair tax, and they are asking the government to reconsider it.

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-97, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the second time and referred to Standing Committee on Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When we ended debate last evening, the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence had finished his 10-minute speech, plus his five-minute questions and comment period.

I will now go to the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me this opportunity to make the comments on not only the budget that was presented last week in this House, but also the expenditures that are before us.

I spent the weekend in the riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon conversing with many groups concerned about the progress and the direction that this country is facing. Some of the groups that I met with—and they were diverse—were from the ethnic communities, particularly the Lithuanians who were celebrating a particular event of freedom on Sunday. I spoke with some university students who were concerned about the direction that this country is taking. I also spoke at one of the municipal conferences with a very important segment of our community today, that is, the mayors and reeves representing all of northern Ontario.

I said to those mayors and reeves that they may be the politicians who are most vulnerable in this next period of time. What we are seeing in Canada is a transfer of responsibility for all the obligations that most Canadians have come to expect. We are seeing this government transferring its responsibility from the federal government to the provincial governments and, I am sure, in turn to the reeves and mayors of the municipalities not only in northern Ontario, but throughout this country.

The crux of this is going to be that the municipal politicians, who deserve a great deal of respect for the work they do within their individual communities, are going to be the ones who are faced with the very hard decisions which I suggest this government should have taken. It should have taken the onus of responsibility off those municipal councillors.

What I heard from all of these different sources with respect to how the affairs of this country are being administered was: How can we possibly keep spending more than we take in? Other comments were: How can we run this government by continuing to go into a deficit, into a deficit, into a deficit, without ever having an accounting and without ever having to say to the Canadian people that it is time to catch up?

Other words I heard were: How can we continue to mortgage, not only first mortgage but second and third mortgage, the future of this country to our children and to our grandchildren, when there are absolutely no assets left in this country to mortgage at this time?

The fact of the matter is simply this: since 1984, since this government took office, the debt in this country was $140 billion. That is nothing to be proud of, but it was $140 billion and it was in serviceable and manageable proportions.

We were told and the Canadian people were told that this government which was elected was going to be able to cope not only with the debt, to bring the debt under control and to reduce the debt, but it was going to take into account the annual deficit. At that time it was around $34 billion. It was going to take the annual deficit, reduce it accordingly, and get the financial affairs of this country under some kind of control.

• (1520)

Let us just look and see what happened in the last seven years. The debt is no longer $140 billion, it is now just a little over $400 billion, an increase of $260 billion in seven years. To service that debt in 1984 took about 12 per cent of the federal budget. Now it will be demanding at least 40 per cent of all the money taken in by the federal government.

We were also told in 1984 and again in 1988 that we have to bring our deficit under some kind of control. As we all know, the deficit in those years had been running at approximately $30 billion. What is the budget and what is the deficit that is presented to this House of Commons in the last period?

The deficit has not been reduced one iota. If anything, it has increased, in spite of the fact that this country has experienced seven years of the greatest industrial economic growth that any country in the world has seen. We have increased our taxes at least 17 times. We have almost doubled the amount of revenue brought into the federal treasury and yet we still end up with a deficit of over $30 billion. That is not responsible government and that is not fiscal management.

I am sure that the people of Canada will respond to that at the appropriate time.

Let us talk about some of the details of the budget. The word that I think is so important and the word that really hurts is that the government has brought this country into a recession and the correlative function of a recession, and that is the corresponding unemployment that all Canadians will be experiencing.

This government says freely that it is willing to live with unemployment figures in excess of 10 per cent. This is not acceptable. What it has failed to do, and the operative word which I think is lacking in this budget, is a word that we have heard so much about in the last little while on the international scene and that is linkage. What this government fails to do is link that employment statistic with not how are we going to treat those who are unemployed because of the recession that it has created, but how we are going to correct the problem of unemployment in this country.

The government has failed to link the means to create jobs in this country. I mean simply this. Since 1989, every job that was created in Canada was created by a small business venture. In 1990, that fact presented itself again and, in 1990, every job that was created in this country was created by a small business venture.

What has this government done with respect to small business and the linkage that I talked about? It has not helped small business in this budget. It has done nothing to assist the small businessman so that he could go out in the marketplace and create those jobs that are so vital to the future of this country.

What this government has failed to do is link the problem of unemployment with the problem of how to eliminate that 10 per cent or 11 per cent of unemployment, that linkage that is so necessary. Not only has the government failed to address the linkage, but it has also added to the problem of the small businessman by adding to his expenses, by adding another 24 per cent to his costs of operation, so that it is not only unfair, but it is really and truly an added expense the small businessman can no longer tolerate.

It is unconscionable how the government has avoided the responsibility of helping small business in this country.

I would like to enlarge a bit on larger businesses and some facts which I think are very important and which this government absolutely fails to realize. I hope in every response that I am able to give in this House, I will be able to bring the strongest message I can to the Canadian people and to this government. They are facts which I think we should always bear in mind, and it is perhaps one of Canada's best kept secrets, that forestry is the largest single industry in Canada. It is larger than the automobile and the petroleum sectors combined.

Forestry provides employment to 8 per cent of our Canadian labour force. It supports 900,000 forestry manufacturing and service jobs. One out of every seven manufacturing dollars in Canada is related directly to the forestry industry. It contributes more than $17 billion to Canada's net trade balance, which exceeds that trade balance created by agriculture, fisheries and mining combined.

Forestry accounts for close to $2.5 billion in trade within our country alone. Despite these impressive figures, they do not for one minute reflect what this government thinks about the forestry industry. It has absolutely forgotten that the forestry industry exists.

Proof of that point is the 15 per cent export tax which is killing, not only the industries I represent, but industries my friends here represent in the softwood lumber industry. It is also starting to have an effect on those industries in British Columbia, in Alberta and our friends in the province of Quebec.

A reduction or elimination of the 15 per cent export tax, if this government was serious about helping Canadians, would not cost the taxpayers of the country one cent to eliminate. The government could eliminate that 15 per cent export tax simply by negotiating its way out of it with our friends in the United States and saying that it is no longer going to be operative.

The memorandum of understanding would be eliminated and section 9 would be invoked 30 days from now. It would give the forestry industry, at least, the opportunity to compete, not only within Canada, but in the United States on an equal playing field so that our forestry, our sawmills and all of those industries that are so important in this country at least have the fair opportunity to compete and be part of this economy.

I appreciate the opportunity of speaking on certain issues that this budget fails to address. I think it is important to address some of the issues that the budget did not address as issues that it did address.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the hon. member on a very sincere and factual speech and ask him a question pertaining to welfare in his riding.

He mentioned that he had been meeting and talking with the mayors and reeves. Being a past reeve and very interested in what is happening to different areas concerning welfare, I was wondering if he had any figures. At the present time in my riding of Kent, the county will have to raise the taxes 24 per cent to cover the welfare payments.

I was wondering if the hon. member could give me any figures from his riding of the situation since the transfers.

Mr. Comuzzi: I thank my colleague from Kent for asking that question. I will say at the outset that I do not have the actual figures as to the increase in the welfare payments that are necessary for all the communities in this country.

Having listened at that particular session in northern Ontario to all of the mayors and the reeves, they were absolutely and totally incensed that senior levels of government, both provincial and federal, would insist and persist in passing legislation that imposed the responsibility for payment on the municipality.

I have no problems with the social welfare system. But you cannot dictate the social welfare system in this country unless you are willing to contribute to its payment. To say how you are going to administer the welfare payment, hospitalization or aid to education or aid to post-secondary education without contributing any funds toward it is not being a responsible government.

I appreciate my friend's question. What I heard was that we can no longer legislate responsibility and leave the responsibility for paying for these programs to the municipality, to the real property owner, to the lowest level of government in this country in order to look after the needs we say are necessary. In my best judgment we have to have the responsibility and the integrity to say no, we cannot afford that program, and it should be done at this level of the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the hon. member for Delta. Is the hon. member for Delta going to take the 20 minutes plus 10?

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Yes, Sir. Mr. Speaker, I certainly enjoyed listening to my colleague across the aisle as he was telling us his views. Yet I am surprised that he can come up with these figures when you consider the source of this debt we are dealing with today. I must confess I am unhappy about standing up and talking about borrowing money. It is contrary to anything that I believe in and I believe that most Canadians feel that way; that we have to borrow money in order to pay our bills in this country that is so rich in resources, rich in manpower. We have so many things going for us to see the situation that we are in.

Basically what this bill is doing is asking permission to borrow for this year $26.4 billion for the 1991-1992 fiscal year. This amount is equal to the borrowing requirements of $23.4 billion comprised of financial requirements estimated for 1991-1992 of $21.6 billion in exchange fund account earnings of $1.8 billion and a $3 billion non-lapsing reserve to cover contingencies.

This is essentially the same type of thing that we have been borrowing for the last three or four years.

The previous speaker talked about the size of the debt when our government took over. We need to recognize that at the present time 80 per cent of the present debt is due to compounded interest on the debt which we acquired from the previous government.

My comments today are going to be primarily concerned with the government's plan to control that further debt, to control the deficit, and to look at the long-term financial interests of our country.

Since coming to office in 1984 this government has indeed waged a war against the deficit and attempted to restore the health of Canada's finances. Yet, I have not heard at any time any assistance offered by the opposition to cut our spending. Discussion of increasing taxes was immediately said to be wrong, that we could not do it. Any change in our assistance to business such as free trade was decried as something that was disastrous to the country.

I think that this government has been alone in the country in itself in assuming a responsible position. Many people know that last fall I had some problems with my own party and one of the major reasons was that I felt that we were not being tough enough in our financial situation.

When this budget came out I was delighted to see that we were not only dealing with the present situation but also that we were looking forward to the future. I have children, I have grandchildren, and I certainly hope that I will see my great-grandchildren, but I am concerned—and one of the reasons I went into politics was because of the financial situation that our country was facing. The best thing that any government in Canada can do at the present time is stop the debt from dragging down the economy. That means dealing with our annual deficit and getting our spending under control so that we are paying for what we are buying.

Any of our deficit reductions, any of our programs that will balance our budget, will certainly have my support.

I think all Canadians recognize the seriousness of the debt. They recognize that each one of us has to play our own part in solving this problem. It is not something which government can do alone. I think that Canadians want to know that government is doing its part to control expenditures and that each Canadian is getting a fair shake. What the government has done in this budget is to present a program in which everyone is carrying their fair share. In the 1989 budget, I believe the government presented a medium term fiscal plan. What I think we have done this year in the 1990-91 budget is start to look at the long term. I think we are reaffirming the things that we started back in 1984.

If we do have a fault, it is that we did not do more sooner. I would certainly have liked to have seen us take a better grip on that deficit so that our debt today would not be what it is at the present time.

We recognize too at the present time there are people in Canada who are in trouble. We recognize that our western farmers need aid. We recognize also that because of the temporary recession that those who are unemployed need assistance at this time, so the government has seen fit to increase expenditures in these areas of the budget. Also, the disabled are going to receive more benefits. There are going to be tax breaks for employers who make it easier for the disabled to work and to take part in Canadian life.

This country has been living beyond its means for the last two decades. We have been spending more than we have been taking in. In 1984 when this government took over the government was spending $1.33 for every $1 that it was taking in in taxes. In other words, every year we were spending 33 cents more on each $1. We recognize in our own budgets at home that there was no way that this could carry on and we are now reaping the adverse effects of that.

My friends opposite say: "You should have cut the deficit sooner". Yet we recognize that while they were in power that the size of the civil service was growing at 12 to 15 per cent a year. The budgets were growing at the same rate. It takes time to turn that around.

We are all aware of a great ocean liner or an air ship that you cannot just all of a sudden reverse these things and expect them to go in the opposite direction. I think that this is also true of government where programs and initiatives have been introduced, that you cannot just abruptly stop them without dislocating the economy. What we have been doing and we will continue to do, and I think at an even greater rate, is to solve these problems to turn the economy around and bring our country back to prosperity.

My friend across the way mentioned that the debt was $400 billion now. The fact is that it is not quite that bad but at some time during the year indeed it is going to reach the level of $400 billion or interpreted in another way, $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. The interest alone on this debt, $43 billion, is unavailable for good programs and services in Canada. It is more than we spend on old age security, unemployment insurance and family allowances combined. We recognize what a crippling effect this has on the welfare of our country.

In this budget also the government is asking Canadians to share the burden. We as politicians are being asked. The Prime Minister's budget is being frozen. Cabinet ministers' budgets are being frozen. Senior civil servants are being reduced in number. This is not a particular group of Canadians that is being singled out but indeed all Canadians. As we mentioned earlier, there are exceptions. Those in need, those in times of need have been exempted from this program and we commend the government for that very human attitude.

If the government does not take these steps of fiscal responsibility of limiting expenditures, of limiting transfers to provinces where they can spend federal funds without any responsibility, if we do not do these things then that deficit is going to increase more and more as it has in the past.

We recognize that this government has reduced the deficit by about $10 billion. This year the deficit will be $30.5 billion. They say that this was far above the predictions of finance minister. He could not always predict the problems that western farmers have had, the $2.5 billion which was required to assist them. We just could not see those western farmers left alone. We could not foresee the funds that were required to assist our troops in the Middle East and to assist our allies and to make sure that Canada took its fair share of that responsibility. Also, the unemployment insurance fund has required more funding than we had expected.

All of these problems have helped to increase that deficit which all of us are sorry about. We recognize that in the next year it will be similar, but after that we will soon start to see the deficit being reduced. This is what we are looking for, so that in the following year the deficit will be down to $25 billion and in 1994–95, in that area, the government will no longer have to bring forward these borrowing bills. We will be able to pay our way and that will be a day of great rejoicing for Canadians everywhere. I am sure they will recognize responsible government when they see it.

One significant thing the government has done is to control the growth in program spending which will be held to an average of no more than 3 per cent annually in the years after 1991–92, owing to an extension of the two–year expenditure control plan.

Also, the government will continue to limit the transfers of payments to provinces, the wealthy provinces, whereas those in need, the poorer provinces, will continue to receive the present amounts.

As I mentioned earlier, after 1993–94, the federal government will be able to stay out of the financial markets. This will allow interest rates in this country to come down. There will be less competition for the funds available and our own companies and industry will be able to borrow at cheaper rates. They will be able to produce more jobs, more manufactured goods, more services to supply Canadians.

I believe that this government does have a very good plan for economic recovery. I think we are going to continue on with that, to control spending that will help put government finances firmly on a course to a balanced budget.

Also in this present 1991 budget, there are certain other things this government has done. For example, it is going to change the way it manages expenditures. Very shortly the government will be releasing legislation which will impose mandatory limits on annual program spending for the next five years.

The other night one of my colleagues asked the question: What type of legislation is this going to be? I told him at that time that I do not know just what that legislation would be, but it will be constitutional because the budget program spending track will indeed be enforced by law. Flexibility will be confined to a very limited set of contingencies set out in the legislation. It will not preclude new programs to meet new needs. In other words, if something comes up unexpectedly, the legislation will certainly allow the government to meet these needs.

The government is going to have to fund these new programs, but within a total legislated budget. In other words, if we acquire a new program, something else will have to be changed or altered to deal with that.

The other nice thing about this budget that I like and has to do with our deficit is the fact that any revenues from the GST above those projected will make a contribution to deficit reduction rather than provide the leeway for an expansion in discretionary government spending. During the GST debate we heard that the GST is nothing but a cash cow and after another election it will be raised 1 or 2 per cent. This legislation is designed to ensure Canadians that any revenue that comes in from the GST is going to go directly to debt reduction.

Many, many people, many businessmen, many senior citizens, many people on the street said to me: "If we were assured, if you could guarantee that the GST will not be used for further programs and frivolous giveaways, then we will accept and we will be happy to contribute to it".

One of the very positive things in this budget is the concept that any proceeds from the GST will be used for this purpose as well as the proceeds from privatization.

We hope that this program continues so that any funding from these sources will also be used to pay the deficit and the debt.

Also, I have been surprised at the number of people who have come forward with individual cheques and cheques from businesses and said: "We want to contribute to the reduction of the debt." So, this is a possibility where citizens themselves can take those funds and help to reduce Canada's debt.

First of all, of course, these funds would be used to service the debt. It would be nice if we could pay off the interest, but that is not the way finances work. We will service the debt and then as the income grows and as the deficit reduces, we will be able to reduce the debt per se.

In the combination of this program with the proposed annual spending limits, this fund provides assurance that all revenues from the GST will be used to service and reduce the debt and not to fund new program spending. As I say, the people in my riding have said that this is the type of program that they want.

Another factor that was brought out in this budget which shows the clear goal of the government at this time is to set a very realistic limit on inflation.

The Minister of Finance together with the Governor of the Bank of Canada have set the goal of a 2 per cent inflation rate by 1995. This is certainly a very commendable and achievable goal.

In many years during my medical practice, I have lived and worked with older people. Many people had retired with what they thought was a perfectly adequate pension. It was not long before they were finding that they were no longer able to meet their needs.

As a matter of fact, just last night I was talking to a former patient who had phoned. She was concerned about the effects of the GST on her income. She got a rebate of $72 quarterly, so we know what income level she was in. Her furnace had gone on the hummer, and the washing machine and the fridge had problems. She had had to get these repaired, and the GST on top of the service bill was distressing her a great deal.

As we talked, we talked about her municipal taxes. She said that when she moved into the particular home, her taxes were $1,300. At the present time, they were $3,500. We talked about the price of groceries and the price of everything. She began to realize that it was not the GST that was hurting her, but it was the total cost of living.

In other words, the inflation rate, which had been only 4 or 5 per cent in the past, had been increased by the previous administration up to 20 per cent at times. Was it 15 per cent?

Even 5 or 6 per cent for people on fixed incomes is a disaster. I think this goal of the finance minister and the Governor of the Bank of Canada of 2 per cent is highly commendable. It allows businesses and individuals to plan for the future. I think that that is critical in this very unstable world in which we live.

I believe that we, as Canadians, can certainly look forward to that.

This budget is a plan for economic recovery. I believe that the government is taking the action to establish fiscal responsibility and to strengthen confidence in Canada's future. I think that is something which we all need to know.

By reducing the deficit and controlling the public debt, the plan will help to set the stage for improved economic performance and increasing prosperity. It is something that we can pass on to our children in a country in which they can live, grow and prosper.

We can look forward in the hope that within a few years this borrowing authority such as we have to ask for today will no longer be required, or perhaps be substantially smaller than it is in Bill C-79.

I believe that this is just a small indication of the very positive direction being taken by this government and the benefits of the economy in the budget presented on February 26.

• (1550)

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member's debate on the merits of this budget and the merits of this bill, I wondered whether in fact he had listened to all of the other interventions by other members. One of us last night indicated that perhaps what we needed was a shuttle to go back to outer space and bring the finance minister down to earth because the situation is not nearly as he depicts it.

Quite frankly, we have given indications in interventions over the course of the day, and in the course of the debate over the last couple of days, that the circumstances that the Minister of Finance is describing may be true, but it is equally true that over the course of the last six years, under the administration of both that finance minister and that government, what we have had is an increase in personal income taxes to the tune of 9.03 per cent. We have also had a decrease of some 34 per cent in revenues raised from corporations.

No one on this side of the House is suggesting that that was a problem. What is a problem is the fact that the finance minister is unwilling to acknowledge that perhaps that kind of largess contributed in any way to the competitiveness of our manufacturers, our corporate sector. Clearly, that has not been the case, because our corporate sector, if we take a look at the bankruptcies and the manufacturers that are moving down south as an indication, is clearly not as competitive as we would want it.

What do we have for that 34 per cent reduction in taxes in the corporate sector? What do we have in terms of a government strategy to make our corporations much more competitive? What do we have in return from the government with respect to making our manufacturers much more competitive on the international trade side?

As a bit of a digression, I remind the hon. member that what has happened over the course of the last six years, under the able administration of this government, is that there has been a 60 per cent reduction in balance of payments and international trade. If in fact Canadians have been asked—and they have been asked—and they have been willingly contributing to the government revenues in order to decrease the deficit and the public debt, then we have a right to ask the hon. member and, through him, the finance minister just how they have been managing our moneys.

I remind him that the interest payments on the public debt have increased by only 6.09 per cent over the course of the last six years. That is a grand total, in absolute dollars, of just over $16 billion. But from increased taxation, both from direct and indirect taxes, there has been a net windfall of some $37 billion.

Canadians have a right to ask: What have you done with that money? How can you, with unmitigated gall, come back before this House and ask us once again to contribute more in taxation and to cut back on programs that are vital to the structure of this country all, always, in the name of saying that we must reduce the deficit and the debt? What have you done with the money that you have taken from us in the last six years? And how can you expect us to believe that you are going to do anything worth while with it now?

Mr. Wilbee: The short answer to the last part of the question, Mr. Speaker, is that we are paying the debts that they left behind them when they left office in 1984.

Mr. Simmons: Its not the honest answer, though.

Mr. Wilbee: My mind goes back about six months when I asked the hon. member a question after he had made a similar speech. I asked him to give me a specific way in which his party had helped to reduce the deficit, one measure that they had supported to reduce the deficit, or one tax change which they had supported in any way.

He never did answer the question, in spite of two attempts at pinning him down.

He asked the question about the reduction in corporation taxes. I think if he talks to any of his friends in business, if he talks to any businessmen, he will very quickly learn that businessmen and businesses are paying more taxes than they ever have before. This is one of the real problems that Canadian businesses have, namely, competing with those across the line where they have more beneficial tax structures. Rather than us giving away something and the poor Canadians having to fill in, we hear the opposite side of the story, that by closing the loopholes such as automobiles and cutting down on the luncheon expenses that we heard about earlier, and this type of thing, that indeed these people are spending more and more money in taxes.

If companies are going out of business, it means they are not making any money, and if a business is not profitable it is going to go out, and you cannot tax a company that is going out of business. Therefore, the important thing for Canada is to provide an environment that will encourage business, that will encourage investment, that will encourage the production of jobs which we need.

Somebody said earlier that 90 per cent of the jobs in Canada are from small business. They talk about one or two of the large businesses and the critical thing to me, for Canada's future and prosperity is that small businessman. These are the ones that are going to benefit from the lower interest rates that this budget is going to produce. Canadian business needs to have at the present time the ability to forecast, the ability to predict what next year's needs are going to be, and the ability to have a stable labour force.

It is true that we have increased income taxes, but again, as I say, we had to pay bills, and we still have a deficit in spite of those increased taxes. Therefore, the important thing is to stimulate, to broaden that tax base so that there are more people who are contributing to the economy. Rather than expecting just a few people and a few businesses to pay the whole shot for the rest of the country, we all have to take our part.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in this debate on Bill C-97. I also want to express some thoughts and concerns that I have on this government's budget.

I believe that Canadians are increasingly worried about the outlook for their future standard of living. This government's budget has not tackled the problems regarding the finances of this country. The budget is a hollow document. Deficit reduction methods used by the government have been, and continue to be, failures.

The economy is in a recession. The government's deficits and debt levels have ballooned so large that they are growing out of control. The Minister of Finance in this budget, just like his last budget, is continuing on course in passing the buck to the provinces. The federal government has simply transferred the federal fiscal problem to smaller governments. The freeze on the Established Programs Financing will substantially reduced funds available to the provinces and by freezing these transfers to the provinces, the government is most definitely destroying Canada's health care and post-secondary educational systems.

Provinces cannot pay for these without federal support. The cumulative effects of the cuts in the EPF transfers to the provinces is estimated at $28.3 billion by 1995-96. Cutbacks in resources of this magnitude are unprecedented in the history of federal-provincial fiscal relations.

Let me be clear. The loss of federal support to the provinces and the municipalities is going to force them either to increase taxes or cut services. I feel strongly that the credibility of the finance minister's plans to bring the federal finances into a balanced situation, continues to be an annual failure.

• (1600)

I want to speak for a moment in my critic's role. The estimates for the Department of Veterans Affairs start with a 29 per cent increase in departmental administration, an unbelievable $8.94 million. Following this healthy increase in administration come cuts in transfer payments to the veterans affairs programs. Grants to health care treatments and related allowances suffered a 28 per cent reduction and economic support programs were reduced as well. War veterans allowances and civilian war allowances were reduced by 12 per cent.

We must be aware that a freeze should still allow for the annual inflation rate, but instead specific programs were denied this necessary increase and will suffer. Some of these programs are: assistance in accordance with provisions of the Assist and Fund Regulations, the Army Benevolent Fund, the Royal Canadian Legion, Canadian Veterans Association—United Kingdom, Education Assistance to Children of War Dead, University and Vocational Training, Veterans Insurance, and Management of Property Contracts.

Why do these programs not have the standard 5.6 per cent inflation increase?

While veterans' programs are being cut, the departmental administration is on the defensive. The government, in fact, has effectively declared war on its own employees. It has started the scare tactics of labour unrest as each 1 per cent increase in wage settlements could lead to a loss of 2000 jobs.

The government has forced Prince Edward Islanders and other Canadians to fight to maintain a standard of living during this recession. The effects of contracting out and privatizing have eliminated and continue to eliminate federal government positions in the country.

Allow me to provide a clear picture of what is happening in my constituency. The loss of purchasing power due to wage controls will not only add to the unemployment rate of 16 per cent, but as Public Service employees lose purchasing power to rising inflation, their spending will plunge rapidly and small businesses in my constituency, my community will suffer.

The government has now cut the Canadian Jobs Strategy program. The promise of job retraining no longer exists. In a recent survey, 68 per cent of Prince Edward Islanders said they believe unemployment to be the most pressing problem in that province. Only five per cent say the deficit is the most important and another five per cent say the overall economy is the most serious problem.

Clearly, these statistics speak for themselves—jobs, jobs, jobs.

I strongly feel that this budget will not help our country in any economic way. Between April of 1990 and January of this year Canada lost 288,000 jobs, and since the famous free trade deal, in the manufacturing sector Canadians lost 229,000 jobs, and the unemployment rate keeps climbing.

In terms of trade with the United States: after two years of the free trade deal shipments to Canada are up by three to five per cent while Canadian shipments to the U.S. are only up two per cent. Once again, the scales between Canada and the United States are tipped in the United States' favour.

In terms of bankruptcies for the year 1990: a record total of 11,642 businesses and 42,782 individuals filed for bankruptcy; up 47 per cent from the previous year. In January of this year there were 5,999 businesses in personal bankruptcy, this is up 69 per cent from the same time last year.

In terms of the deficit: in spite of six years of economic growth, which the Minister of Finance himself has called extraordinary, and in spite of 33 separate tax increases, the accumulated public debt has more than doubled from $166 billion in 1984 to $351 billion in 1990, and is expected to climb to $389 billion this year. The people are paying the price.

My colleagues and I constantly talk of the reasons why our country is in a decline. It is declining because this government does not believe in its own people. Government cuts to Established Programs Financing in 1986, 1989 and 1990 will reduce transfer payments to the provinces for education by $8.94 billion between 1986–87 and 1994–95.

Again, the people are paying the price. The promises of training and adjustment to free trade have not yet been put in place. The government has cut all of its $2.8 billion contribution to the unemployment insurance program and has cut back its training programs from $2.2 billion in 1984 to $1.5 billion in 1989. Once again, I say, the people are paying the price.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. friend opposite as I always do. I wish to raise a question to him regarding veterans, which I know he has a tremendous interest in. He has speculated on the future of veterans affairs. Certainly, he raised the question, in particular, with regards to a decrease in the budget for veterans allowances. He seemed to suggest that this was an inappropriate thing.

It could not help but remind me of the days 35 years ago, during the time of the government of Mr. St. Laurent, when they had horses on the payroll. In this government we do not believe in having horses on the payroll and indeed, we do not believe in having people on the payroll who are not there to receive it.

I think it is obvious, and I am sure my hon. friend would recognize that it is logical, that we should have an annual reduction in its budget simply because a number of those veterans are passing way.

We have in Canada over 600,000 veterans from the three conflicts in which Canada has been involved: World War I and II and Korea. Over 38,000 of those are women. We pay very generous benefits to our veterans, more so than any other country in the world. One in three men in this country over 65 is a veteran.

I think the commitment made by the minister the other day when he, if I may quote from page 17914 of Hansard, said at that time:

> —I say to all veterans today that your valuable programs are untouched by this budget. Our level of commitment to you is undiminished. Canada will continue to have the most generous and compassionate veterans' programs and benefits of any country in the world. Do not let the critics make you think otherwise.

My question to the hon. member is: Since he has raised some reservations with respect to the commitment of this government, which I think has been demonstrated to be very positive, I would ask him to bring forth at this time any indication or any evidence he has to suggest that the commitment of this government to our veterans is any less than it should be?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member opposite for his questions and for his comments. Even though the number of veterans are becoming fewer and fewer I believe, as do many people connected with veterans, that the amount of the pensions, that the amount of money put forth by the government and by governments is never enough. I believe there are many more areas the government could be involved in, with benefit to not only veterans but the children of veterans and the wives of veterans who have not been able to qualify for certain things, and that many more programs should be brought about.

I also am concerned, as I spoke of the other day, about the future of this department. I have had many questions from veterans in my constituency and across the country as to what is the future of this department. I was assured by the minister the other day that nothing is going to happen to it in the near future. I certainly hope that is the case.

I do believe that we provide very good programs for our veterans, but we must continue to do this and improve upon it anywhere we can. We must improve for the veterans' families, their children, and their wives and husbands. We have to continue even though the numbers may be decreasing. We must expand the programs and make more money available to them any time we have a chance.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to say a few things about Bill C–97. This bill would enable the government to borrow $26.5 billion. I believe before we allow it to go to the House or take a vote on it, we ought to hear from a number of members around this Chamber about how we feel about the government's budget. I rise in that particular spirit, because I have some fairly strong feelings on the budget of the government this year.

I regret that the gentleman from Delta is not in sight, but I am sure he is within earshot. In responding to my colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence he mentioned that the short answer, in his words, to the question put to him had to do with the legacy of debt, as he characterized it, left by the previous administration.

I am sure that for him, conveniently, that is the short answer. I think he would be the first to agree that it is not the honest answer though, because the honest answer is that the public debt that we are now dealing with is just over twice as much as it was in 1984 when this administration took over.

At some point it seems to me that the government, after six-plus years in office, six and a half years in office, ought to begin taking some responsibility for its mismanagement, for its inaccurate projections, for its wrong guesses.

These are just not words of mine. Let me give you the words of the Minister of Finance, the gentleman who indeed has been the Minister of Finance for this long tiresome, stretch since September, 1984. He has now brought down his seventh budget. Let us have a look at some of his other budgets before we take at face value all the things he tells us with respect to this budget.

For example, in last year's budget, the Minister of Finance forecast that interest rates for last year, 1990, would be 11 per cent. We all know, of course, that he was way off the mark. They were not 11 per cent at all; they were 13 per cent.

Last year, the minister told us that the deficit would fall to $28.5 billion this year. That was his projection just a year ago, that the deficit right now would be $28.5 billion. It is actually $30.5 billion, two billion dollars more.

Let us go back a little further to his second budget, back in 1985. At that time, the minister told us that the deficit for this current year would be $18 billion and, as I just said, of course it is not $18 billion but $30.5 billion. That is a long way off the mark.

You might say that with that kind of lapse in time you can expect some changes. Of course you can. It is not I but the minister who undertook to project in the first place, and he projected five years before the fact what things would be like five years down the road.

We are now down the road that five years, and he is off by a tune of $12.5 billion. That is a fair error. That is a pretty large mistake to make.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, and tell you about some of the other things that he forecast in previous budgets. Last year, for example, he said that personal income taxes would rise by $4.7 billion. Now he tells us they are going to rise by $7.9 billion.

There is an entire litany here of examples where the minister has said one thing by way of forecast and the reality has proven him to be entirely wrong.

If the minister were wrong only in terms of his ability to predict the future, you could not completely hold that against him. You would, I guess, score him for being so foolhardy as to try and make such precise predictions in the first place but, having made them, he ought to be able to stick by them.

That alone is not his cardinal sin, because we all make some errors when it comes to projecting, predicting, calling the shots on times down the road. But where I believe he is really out in left field, where he has done something that is completely unforgivable, is in the area of making commitments on behalf of the government and then reneging on those commitments. In so far as my own constituency of Burin—St. George's is concerned, with its 158 communities stretched along 1,800 miles of coast line along the south coast of Newfoundland and up around the western corner, the minister will never, I say to him, ever be forgiven for what he and his colleagues did with respect to unemployment insurance; not only the changes, but the wrecking of the whole concept. He will know what I am talking about.

I am referring, in particular, to the commitment undertaken in this House. I challenge anybody opposite to get up and say this commitment was not made. I can point to the pages and the days in Hansard when it was made. It was made over and over again. The commitment to which I refer is the commitment at the time when the government wanted to keep its own troops in line to get Bill C-21, the UI bill, through this House last year. The commitment was made and repeated many times, that the benefactors of this program, the recipients of the UI, would not be asked to bear an unconscionably high increase in rates.

Indeed, there was a commitment made that there would be no appreciable increase in rates over the two or three years. The commitment was also made that in bad economic times the government would kick in. The statement was made again and again, that the fact the government was withdrawing its $2.8 million did not mean the government was out once and for all. In bad economic times, we were told, the government would ante up the difference.

That was the rhetoric last year when they were trying to ram the bill through and when they conned people on the Tory backbench over there into voting for something on the basis of a promise that the government obviously had no intention of keeping, the promise that the government would avoid having UI premiums escalate too quickly, particularly over the next two or three years.

Now we hear the Minister of Finance, less than a year later, say that in conscience they could not allow the fund to be underfunded, so the government had to make this dramatic increase in premiums. I say to the Minister of Finance and his colleagues, that is a classic example of duplicity, a classic example of where the government made a commitment as late as last fall it clearly had no intention of keeping.

When you have in power people who practise that kind of wilful deceit, it is difficult for the electorate to believe a word they say, whether it is about projections of budget deficits or any other matter.

Mr. Speaker, I realize from your signal that my time has just about run out. In specific terms, the government decided to cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy program at a time when the fishery is in collapse in much of my riding, both inshore and offshore, and at a time when people were depending on this program to keep the bread and butter on the table, to help them over the short term. For the government to cut $100 million from this program is absolutely and completely callous and unconscionable. I cannot understand where they are coming from in this particular respect.

Let me deal with the area of the Established Programs Financing, the medicare expenditures, the medicare votes to the provinces. I am thinking of my own province of Newfoundland. That is going to cause real problems for Newfoundland. Over the 10-year period since this government first began tampering with Established Programs Financing, and I am talking from about the 1985-1986 budget through until 1995-1996, this government's tampering with medicare will cost the Newfoundland provincial government treasury, $845 million. There will be a shortfall of nearly $1 billion.

It is actually $845 million over that 10-year period which, of course, is going to decrease and constrain considerably the capacity of the Newfoundland government to provide post-secondary schooling and medical care to the half million people who make up my province.

There are so many other things that I would like to say, but I see that my time is up.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened as I always do, with great interest to my hon. friend from Burin—St. George's.

I could not help but be somewhat confused by what seemed to be a somewhat contradictory aspect to his remarks. He referred to the growth in the public debt in this country during the last six years. I believe what he referred to was the fact that the debt has doubled during the last six years, which indeed is regrettable.

When this government and this Minister of Finance came into office, they inherited a $38 billion deficit, $11 billion of which was on program and operating and $27 billion was on interest charges.

That $11 billion operating deficit has now been turned into—I see in the budget—a $12.7 billion surplus. It is an improvement of $23 billion to $24 billion. My hon. friend says that that is not good enough and that the problem is that the debt has increased.

Mr. Speaker, when you inherit a $38 billion deficit and reduce it to $30.5, that is a tremendous bit of progress. You are still adding $30.5 billion to the debt every year.

The only way that this government could have prevented any growth in the public debt, as my hon. friend seems to suggest it should have done, would have been to wipe out a $38 billion deficit within months of coming into office.

In fact, what the government has done—I think to its credit—is gradually reduce that deficit to the point, as I said before, where an $11 billion operating deficit has become a $12.7 billion operating surplus. My hon. friend says that that is not good enough.

I wonder if he could share with the House how he would have, had he been Minister of Finance in 1984-85, got rid of the $38 billion deficit in one budget.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, my friend from South Shore is always a delight to listen to.

In his previous intervention, he reached way back into his bag of tricks to a former Prime Minister, Mr. St. Laurent, and talked about horses being on the bureaucratic payroll.

My well-known kindness prevents me from saying, of course, that they are no longer on the bureaucratic payroll, they are obviously on the House of Commons payroll, at least half of them.

He says that reducing the debt could not be done. Perhaps he ought not to wait until I am minister of finance. I hope he is better at predicting than his colleague, the present Minister of Finance.

Maybe he can do himself the favour of not waiting until I am the minister of finance, but he should get the job himself. He said something a moment ago that is very significant. He told us something that in all fairness he should have told the Minister of Finance five years ago. He tells us it could not be done.

The Minister of Finance did not know that five years ago when he was predicting that it could be done, when he was predicting that it was going to come down to $18 billion. That poor Minister of Finance, with this brain on the backbench, not having the benefit of his knowledge, keeping it to himself, holding the information when the Minister of Finance could have been made to look much more plausible had only the member for South Shore told him what he obviously knew. It could not be done.

Make up your minds, fellows. Is it the Minister of Finance who is right or is it the newly-minted parliamentary secretary. I congratulate him. I knew with all the bellowing he was doing in the House it was a matter of time before it would pay off. I congratulate him on becoming the latest parliamentary secretary.

If he could only become the Minister of Finance and bring the kind of knowledge he just displayed to the front bench. He asks what I would do. I will tell him one thing I would do. I will tell him one thing I would not have done.

I would not have put the public treasury and more to the point, the people of Canada who have mortgages, through those unconscionably high interest rates over the past year or so. Just look at what that has done to keeping up the public debt.

Now, months after we stood here, day in and day out, and argued that high interest rates were not the way to go, lo and behold they have discovered the pages of our book. Listen to the Minister of Finance these days talk about how we have to keep the interest rates down because that is what will cure inflation.

A few months ago the argument was the reverse, we cannot let them come down because that will cause great inflation. Now, fellas, which is it?

What would I do? I would not have allowed John Crow and the crowd over at the Bank of Canada to take over the Government of Canada in terms of fiscal policy and keep jacking those rates up. They would have come down, our public debt would have been down and our deficit would have been down considerably. That is just one for starters, but there are many others. I would not have had 33 tax increases over the last six years. Does the member want me to go on?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Before I recognize the hon. member for Edmonton—Strathcona, a point of order, the hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations of the usual manner involving the three parties as well as the independents, including the member for Beaver River, accommodating her interest to speak in the debate. I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion I will put.

> That, notwithstanding the Order of this House made March 5, 1991, upon completion of consideration of Bill C-97, the borrowing bill, on Wednesday, March 6, 1991, a recorded division be deemed requested and deemed deferred until 3 p.m. on Thursday, March 7, 1991.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of great co-operation that we seem to be enjoying here in the House, I would like to say that we concur with this motion.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, the order, as read, complies with the agreement that was made and we agree.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am appreciative of the opportunity to speak on Bill C-97, the borrowing authority legislation. This legislation flows from the budget speech which was delivered last week by the hon. Minister of Finance.

The budget's priority is action to create the essential conditions for recovery. We have chosen not to increase government spending. History shows that that approach has not worked. The key to recovery is lower interest rates. The plan for economic recovery will lead us to lower interest rates through a number of key actions.

First of all, we are setting out clear inflation targets. The result of lower inflation and lower expectations, which is very important, people's expectations of inflation, will result in lower interest rates.

Second, we are putting government finances firmly on the course to a balanced budget. We are removing the build-up of public debt as a source of inflationary concern.

The expenditure control plan announced in the 1990 budget is being extended for three years to 1994–95. The government is legislating mandatory program spending limits. We are establishing a Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund solely dedicated to offsetting the costs of public debt. This is something of which I am personally very appreciative.

My constituents, over the past year, have said that they would not mind paying the GST, that they are not adverse to paying taxes if they know the taxes are going to pay the deficit and the debt. People know that we must pay our own way. They know that spending more money than you have coming in creates inflation and inflation hurts everyone. The revenues from the goods and services tax and from privatization will go into this fund.

Third, we are strongly restraining the operations of government. As we all know, government operations are about $16 billion to $16.5 billion, which is about 18 per cent of the program budget. Most of the money that we spend in the Government of Canada is for statutory programs. But, nevertheless, we are severely restraining the operations of government. Operating budgets are being frozen at current levels and the wages and salaries of cabinet ministers, MPs, all Order in Council appointments and all federal public servants are being tightly restrained.

These measures show a fundamental commitment to strong, effective government management and control. This approach will serve Canadians well for years to come.

• (1630)

One other thing we are doing under government operations is moving the National Energy Board to Calgary. This move, I believe, will result in greater efficiencies. Ninety per cent of the business of the National Energy Board is with the oil and gas sector, and its clientele is in Calgary. So, the NEB will be able to interact and regulate the oil and gas industry much more effectively with lower cost to both the people of Canada and to the oil industry. For 15 or 16 years the oil and gas industry has had to bear the costs of travel and accommodation expenses when they have come to Ottawa in order to do business and to follow the regulations of the National Energy Board.

The Government of Canada will eliminate new federal borrowing in financial markets after 1993–94. I would like to quote from an article written by Jeffrey Simpson last week, entitled "Mr. Wilson chips away at the debt left over from the nightmare years".

> Ottawa became a fiscal cripple in the years 1975 to 1984, when the federal government accumulated nearly $200-billion of debt. Compounded interest on that accumulated debt cost another $120-billion by 1989–90. So the total bill for these 10 nightmare years of economic mismanagement, 1975 to 1984, is in the vicinity of $320-billion.

This is an impartial commentator, Jeffrey Simpson, from The Globe and Mail. He continues:

> It was obvious by the time the Tories took power in 1984 that, having spent a decade getting into an utterly untenable fiscal situation, Canada would need more than a decade to extricate itself from trouble.

And that is precisely my point. Our borrowing in the financial markets will cease after 1993–94 and by 1995 we will have achieved a balanced budget, roughly ten years after this government assumed office.

He also says in the same article:

> Indeed, the entire budget might be described as a treadmill: Higher interest rates make deficit reduction more difficult, large debts make deficit reduction more difficult, recession makes deficit reduction more difficult. Hence, more of the same.
> But the fundamental problem remains the size of the debt, close to $400-billion. If the debt were modest in size, say $150-billion, Ottawa's interest payments would be about $16-billion instead of about $42-billion, even at these high rates of interest.

I would like to conclude with this last quote from him:

> The cost of paying the interest on this mountain of debt—let alone writing down the principal—would be the grim task of any federal government.

The member from Burin—St. George's decried the fact that we were spending a little less on retraining, and other members have decried the fact that we have been spending less on this program, this program, and this program. Well, the fact remains that even if they were in power—and they will not be because they have flip-flopped on so many issues that Canadians know they are being unrealistic; they know the situation that we are in—they would have to deal with the same sort of debt that we have to deal with. And that necessitates taking hard decisions.

I would like to quote from an editorial in The Globe and Mail of last Saturday, entitled "Ottawa's deficit, in relative terms".

> The yardstick by which his progress should be measured is the level the deficit would have risen to if he had followed the free-spending ways of his predecessors.

And that is speaking of Michael Wilson.

It goes on to say that:

> The Finance Department estimates that, if the parameters of the 1984-85 budget still prevailed—

And I would like to point out that the members opposite would like those parameters to prevail, because they do not want to make any cuts; they do not want to take the hard decisions.

> —the deficit would by now be $70-billion a year.

That is double what we now forecast, and $10 billion extra. I shudder to think of such a scenario.

It says that: "Mr. Wilson's current deficit is a considerably tamer beast than the one he inherited". The current deficit is 4.5 per cent of the gross domestic product, the best measure of the total volume of goods and services produced by Canadians.

In 1984-1985 the deficit was 8.7 per cent of the GNP. So, in relative terms of the deficit to the gross domestic product, we have cut that in half. That is a tremendous accomplishment.

It says also: "Nor is the beast as hungry as it once was. In the current fiscal year, Ottawa must turn to the public financial markets for only 15.7 per cent of its cash needs, compared with 27.3 per cent in 1984-1985."

That is a significant accomplishment. Once again, it shows progress. We have almost turned the corner to reducing our deficit markedly. The economy is more productive and in a couple of years our need for cash from the public financial markets will be reduced to zero.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the editorial says; "In real terms, with the effects of inflation factored out, federal program expenditures have shrunk at an average rate of 0.7 per cent during his stewardship. This compares with a real annual growth rate of 5.6 per cent for the previous 15 years—"

This next phrase is significant: "—a period in which the keys to the vault were in the hands of Finance Ministers appointed by Pierre Trudeau". And the Leader of the Opposition was one of those finance ministers.

Those figures are, of course, with inflation factored out.

That has meant that we have had to restrain expenditures in the program area because the costs of servicing the debt have been growing and have been so enormous. Just think what would happen, how much better off Canadians would be if we had no debt. We would have $16 billion extra a year to make the economy that much more efficient or to provide things like day care or training, or to address some of the structural programs in research and development where an investment might be necessary.

This choice was made by the Liberals in previous years. Because of the debt we have had to use whatever money that has been accrued to the government because of increases in productivity, and so on, we have had to apply that to the deficit and not spend it where it is necessary.

I would like to touch upon the productivity of the Canadian economy. We have seen a lot of productive growth, and this has been very good for us as Canadians. There are three ways in which one can reduce a debt; one is increase taxes, the second is to cut spending; but the third way, and that is the way we have chosen to go in most cases, to increase productivity.

That is what the free trade agreement is all about. That is what the goods and services tax is all about. The goods and services tax will add about $9 billion of productivity to our gross domestic product. That is a lot of income to the government to pay down the debt and in future years perhaps make investments in science and technology and other areas where we deem it necessary.

Our productivity is not as good as it could be. Our productivity performance, the measure of how efficiently we produce and services, has been deteriorating in the manufacturing sector. From 1974 to 1989, over-all productivity growth fell to a quarter of its average level in the previous 20 years. In the first half of the 1980s it did not grow at all. Over the past 15 years, Canada has fallen to fifth from second place among the Group of Seven industrial nations in manufacturing and labour productivity. In fact, over the past six years Canadian manufacturing productivity growth was the poorest among the G-7 countries, despite strong economic growth across other sectors in our industrial economy. Competitors such as West Germany, Italy and France have caught up to and surpassed our productivity levels.

• (1640)

In the 1970s and 1980s Canada's policies were undermining its long-term productivity performance and needed to change course. The 1984 agenda for economic renewal outlined the competitive challenge facing Canada and subsequent actions helped to provide a better framework for restoring productivity growth. Today, as we well know, Canadians are increasingly concerned about their ability to compete. These concerns range from macroeconomic issues, such as inflation, interest rates and the exchange rate to structural problems with our productivity performance, effectiveness of investments, the burden of government and the business climate.

We, as government, have a responsibility to create an environment that encourages the growth of competitive enterprise. The 1991 budget announced actions to restore fiscal balance and to move toward price stability. This will lead to a stable macroeconomic environment, increased confidence in the Canadian economy and will strengthen our ability to compete in a tough economic world.

In working to develop shared approaches to basic economic issues, the federal and provincial ministers of finance are looking at the rising costs of government and at overlap and duplication.

I would like to quote another article from Diane Francis in this week's Maclean's magazine. She states:

> Fortunately, Michael Wilson's budget last week continues the Tories' attack on the debt problem, curtailing program spending to less than the rate of inflation and taking aim at civil-service salaries and transfer payments. The hated GST is a godsend, a money machine whose windfall profits will be legislatively earmarked towards paying the debt. Still, an inability to control interest rates or other government spending plagues Ottawa, with the result that both debts and interest rates are higher than they should be.

It is significant that the provinces in aggregate have a greater share of the economy than the federal government. So what we have done through this budget is we have said we must take a leadership role and we are encouraging the provinces to restrain their spending to 3 per cent a year.

Diane Francis goes on to say, and this is one of the best descriptions of the debt that I have read:

> The debt is frightening. One hour from now, we will all be $3.5 million deeper in debt. By tomorrow, add another $84 million. Ottawa's debt now tallies $388.5 billion, or $15,000 for each man, woman and child, up from $2,591 per head in 1976. This year, it will hit $400 billion. The collective provincial-municipal debt is more than $100 billion, or roughly another $3,850 per person, giving Canadians the dubious distinction of being among the world's most indebted citizens. Hopefully within one year, the deficit, interest rates and unemployment will be much lower, as the recession and the Gulf War end and the GST plus fiscal restraints yield a pay off in the billions.

I am hopeful that that will happen too, that our debt will recede, the recession will lift this summer, and by all means it should, and our policies that we have been putting in place for the last five and six years to make our economy that much more productive will take hold.

It is significant to note that the manufacturing sector shrunk during the 1981-82 recession by 5.5 per cent. During this recession it has shrunk only by about 2.5 per cent. The opposition says all the time: "This factory is shut down due to free trade". These are normal adjustments that happen in every recession and should not be attributed to free trade.

But free trade certainly will help us rationalize our manufacturing and increase our economies of scale and be that much more productive. There will be greater division and specialization of labour, which is very, very important.

So we have been doing the right things. We need to borrow this money to continue on the road which we have set out. We are managing the economy but yet we are looking out for those less fortunate. Most of the increases in this year's program expenditures, 6.9 per cent, which is a high percentage increase in program expenditures, will go to the elderly and to other sectors of society and the economy that need that help, people who have to weather out the recession.

I would like to close by saying that we are doing the right things. We are on a course of recovery. The recession will lift. This budget is a good one. We have learned the lessons from the past, that you cannot spend, spend and spend because that will increase inflation and hurt everyone and drive the economy down to negative economic growth, and that is something we do not want to see.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval–Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech of my good friend. He says that his constituents are quite willing to pay taxes as long as they know the money is well used.

To achieve his goals, the minister said the other day that a special fund has been created for the GST. Can my colleague explain in a little more detail just how this fund is going to be administered and what moneys it will contain?

Mr. Thorkelson: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his question. It is a good one. I, and I am sure he and many other members of the House, will be explaining to Canadians how this fund will work.

The fund will be a separate fund, a national fund, accounting fund to demonstrate to Canadians and to make a commitment to Canadians that revenues from the GST will be put toward the deficit. Revenues from privatization and individual donations that Canadians will make toward debt reduction, will be applied to the deficit.

Also, there is a commitment that this money from the GST is not going to finance more program expenditures which would then necessitate an increase in the GST. People are willing to make the structural change to replace the federal sales tax with the GST because they know it will increase productivity and because they know we are in a terrible deficit situation. They do not want inflation, they do not want negative or low economic growth because of what high deficits and high inflation do.

I remember one of my first town hall meetings after the last budget. A woman came up to me and she presented me with $100 and she said she wanted me to take this to Michael Wilson to apply against the deficit. This is someone that was very, very concerned about the deficit, that was willing to reach into her pocket. This is someone who is a single mother and had a couple of children, divorced from her husband, a teacher struggling to make it on her own; but she was willing to pay $100 toward the debt. I in turn handed that over to the Minister of Finance.

Now there is a place where Canadians can direct any money they want to apply to the deficit, with the assurance that it will go toward paying the deficit.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, just a comment here. I heard my colleague say that we have to stop spending, spending, spending. I am quite surprised, because if there is any government that has been spending, spending, spending, it has been this government. I can give him examples of what I call the credibility gap as far as the question of spending is concerned. We can take a look at our beautiful Senate where senators are paid $153 a day just for showing up. It is this government that has actually said: "Go ahead, we will give you the spending"—here is the key word—"increases that you need". It is just probably a paltry sum for the other side; $6 million or $7 million, but for our impoverished senators it is approximately $153 per day when they decide to show up.

• (1650)

It is a coincidence, but I believe I met the same lady in Chambly who met my colleague. She too gave me $100 for my election in order to get this government out of office.

I think it is important that we realize that this government has a credibility gap when it comes to what we would normally call austerity. I remember the night the finance minister was presenting his budget. I walked from the Confederation Building up to the Hill, and I had to weave my way through limousines. We had wall to wall limousines. We still have them, and I do not see any cutbacks at all in the limousine fleet. It is $6 million or $7 million for the Senate and $27 million for the Spicer commission. I know when the Prime Minister is asked, he says $27 million to save Canada is a small sum. Well, I think it is a large sum and I think it is a question of having money well spent. I would certainly welcome an investigation into the Spicer commission.

This is the last point I want to make. This government spent $40 million to make videos of such importance as "Meet your Minister of Defence, Mr. McKnight", which cost $15,000 as well as a video for our troops in Germany on how to drive, another $10,000. This government does not know how to stop spending. This government will only learn how to stop spending when the Canadian public kicks it out of office.

Mr. Thorkelson: Mr. Speaker, I am just sorry that my hon. friend from Chambly was not here to hear me say that the Minister of Finance increased program expenditures at a rate of .7 per cent during his stewardship. This compares with a rate of 5.6 per cent for the previous 15 years. So we have hardly increased program expenditures.

Yes, you can if you want, pick across the range of $110 billion of expenditures every year. You can pick out little things where we have made mistakes or where we could tighten up expenditures.

An hon. member: That is the problem. It is all little things.

Mr. Thorkelson: You talk about limousines as if they were stretch black Cadillacs. They are not. They are ordinary black Chevrolet cars with black wall tires. You get a big kick out of this, but it is a very, very small portion of the budget.

An hon. member: Look what you gave to Ed Broadbent.

Mr. Thorkelson: It is a very small portion of the broad range of government expenditures.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to the government's request to borrow $26.5 billion and on the budget tabled by the finance minister February 20 this year, and at the same time address some of my personal concerns about the economic future of Canada.

These are not easy times, Mr. Speaker, as you know. In the northwestern parts of Saskatchewan where I come from, the urban and the rural population are feeling the pressures of the recession unlike most in this country.

Throughout the area that I come from, small business people who are still in business tell me that they have never seen things this bad. Consumer spending is way down in all areas. The retail stores, the service sectors and even our small but very important manufacturing sector are all looking for a way out of this economic dilemma.

Our problem in Saskatchewan is the same one that affects the economy in the rest of Canada. It is not a regional problem that requires a regional solution. It is a national problem that only actions by the federal government can correct.

The recession in Canada has been brought on by the high interest rates, the artificially high dollar and high unemployment, each of which exists because of decisions taken by this government under this finance minister.

During this past weekend while I was in my home constituency, I did a lot of thinking about the recession, the local economy and the minister's solution. I also read the newspapers. They provided me with quite a bit of information over the weekend. Perhaps this government has not taken the time to look over some of this important information.

I read The Western Producer among many other farm and rural newspapers. Despite the fact that this government does not understand the value of these farm and rural newspapers and is placing unfair and unreal postal demands on them, these newspapers are going to continue to provide rural people with valuable information. The government would do well to read them regularly.

Last week in the February 28 issue of The Western Producer, we learned that the Saskatchewan and Manitoba economies will fare the worst of all provincial economies in Canada this year.

Quoting from the Conference Board of Canada, The Western Producer said the poorer economies are the result of the general recession and poor grain prices. Again, I remind the government that even with all the diversification in the world, we are still an agricultural economy. To survive, we need improved and stabilized agricultural incomes.

The real decline in provincial output is projected at 0.8 per cent in Manitoba and 0.7 per cent in Saskatchewan. From my reading of the finance minister's budget, there is nothing here that even begins to address the deepening crisis on the prairies. Yes, there is a $1.3 billion tag for agriculture, but as I speak there is still no disclosure of what it is tagged for.

Certainly, the government spending estimates tabled Thursday did not give us any idea of the new priorities and neither did the agricultural ministers' announcement Saturday, following their meeting in Saskatchewan. In fact, the more we examine the announcements, it seems that the federal government's so-called new money is tied up in the GRIP and NISA programs, neither of which is expected to have any impact on the early part of this year's farm income picture.

My remarks on GRIP and NISA will have to wait for another day when the enabling legislation is reviewed and debated in this House.

Let me say this, my biggest criticism to date is that the federal government, with the help of Saskatchewan Premier Grant Devine, is selling GRIP and NISA throughout the west aggressively but without detail, without agreement and without legislative approval.

Before the legislation was introduced earlier this week providing the federal government authority to enter into negotiations with the provinces, the Saskatchewan government had already held some 40 information meetings across the province to discuss a package that they had not even agreed upon.

There is not a farmer in Saskatchewan as I speak who can tell you what GRIP will cost him or her in the coming year. Therefore, I ask: How can the farm person properly assess the short and long term effects of this very important program?

On top of this, Premier Grant Devine was quoted in Monday's Saskatoon Star–Phoenix. He was trying to blackmail farmers into signing up for the program. The lead in that Star–Phoenix newspaper story reads: "If farmers expect Ottawa to help them out this spring they'd better sign up for GRIP, says Premier Grant Devine." The is the lead of the story on the front page of Monday's Saskatoon Star–Phoenix.

Here we are trying to assess whether a very important and expensive federal government agriculture and economic initiative is as good as we are being told it is, and the two levels of government are forcing farmers to buy into it without details being announced and even before the legislation is introduced into this Chamber.

We cannot help but be sceptical in all of this. The snow is starting to melt on the prairies and in the near future the crops will be seeded for another year. The farm community has been let down by these governments, many times in the recent past by this government, and now with a Saskatchewan provincial election imminent the farm community is very much concerned.

Remember last year, Mr. Speaker, this federal government told Canadian farmers that they did not need the interest–free cash advance any longer. The government did their studies and they provided evidence to this Chamber to prove that the interest–free cash advance program should go. Amid sound and reasoned articulate arguments to the contrary from this side of the House and from agricultural organizations the government decided to pass the legislation in any case, and they did away with the program.

Only they were wrong. The program was needed. It was essential and the government had to reinstate it later this fall. Low prices, low sales, and congested elevators, all those things that existed when the program was created in the first place forced the reinstatement of the program. There was a need.

It was not that long ago that the Western Grain Stabilization Program was tampered with by this government. Announcements were made about big pay–outs, and then there were premium increases foist upon the farmers, and the cheques went out and the farmers paid their bills, only to find out that Ottawa had overpaid the producers and that Ottawa was sending out bills of their own for collection on the overpayments. When it was all over the farmers who thought they were getting a stabilization payment and used it to pay their bills found themselves owing even more money to the federal government.

The new agriculture programs GRIP and NISA may indeed help the producer, but we should not as a nation be committing ourselves to it until we understand it in all its parts. The programs are too important not to be reviewed and all their faults debated, reviewed, and corrected without pressure or deadlines.

If a long–term program cannot be agreed upon short–term financing and debt moratoria can bridge the gap until agreements can be reached on a proper and adequate program.

As for this years bridge, the finance minister's budget does not tell us anything, but we as prairie representatives want him to know and understand that we need almost all of that budgeted $1.3 billion for spring seeding this year, regardless of what happens to GRIP and NISA in the future.

Farm organizations such as the prairie pools and the National Farmers' Union are asking that the seeding payment be the equivalent of the loss in net income sustained by grains and oilseed farmers in 1990. This should mean by itself a payment in excess of $1 billion. A substantial program is necessary to carry farm financing through until the much-needed farm safety net program is in place.

The farm population has come through nearly seven years of inadequate grain prices and have had to battle other rising costs, high interest rates, and decreasing government support.

Despite the fact that this government throws out huge numbers to woo farm voters, the reality is that the direct government support for farmers last year fell to as five-year low and caused the first national decline in farm cash receipts in five years.

Of course on the prairies, and in particular Saskatchewan, we had income declines for several years.

From 1989 through 1990 payments on the prairies for crop insurance stabilization and ad hoc programs dropped a whopping $1.1 billion, according to figures published by Statistics Canada in the last week of February. The decline in payments led to a drop of nearly 10 per cent in farm cash receipts in Saskatchewan. Crop insurance payments were down 38 per cent. Stabilization payments were down 70 per cent and ad hoc support program financing was down 34 per cent. Good crops, reasonable sales, low prices, and the loss of support programs have hurt.

As long as Canada values its food supply industry and as long as the marketplace refuses to support price levels sufficient to meet production costs, the federal government has an obligation to ensure farm viability and that means price supports in the short and the long term.

The finance minister has produced seven budgets and presided over a national economy that has experienced much growth, but the people are poorer as a result.

The deficit and the debt are increasing, and regional disparities have grown. As long as we live in a country that allows personal income taxes to increase while corporate taxes decline, as long as personal tax bills increase but tens of thousands of profitable corporations continue to escape all taxes, we will continue to have economic problems, and that means greater social problems as well.

The finance minister has let us down. He has failed to address the real problems in Canada. He has ignored our needs and aspirations, and Canadians are the poorer as a result. There are alternatives. The federal finance minister would be well advised to accept them.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My colleague spoke for 10 minutes and I will use the other 10 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, but first there are questions or comments.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my voice to the speech of the hon. member. I heard him speaking about his beautiful riding, and we want to do the same thing.

[Translation]

In my riding, Mr. Speaker, this budget was well received because it was reasonable. I was listening to my friend opposite speak on agriculture, and I could not help but think that he should give us the whole picture. What bothers me most with socialists, is that, when quoting figures, they are very selective and, with amounts of money, they quote only total amounts, without specifying whether it will be spread over three or four years.

My colleague here, the hon. member for Champlain, was parliamentary secretary to Agriculture at one time and I asked him a few questions during his speech. One thing is sure, this government has no lesson to take from socialists from anywhere in the country, considering all the income supplementation provided and the fact that the net farming income for 1987 totalled $4.4 billion. The federal and provincial governments provided some $6.5 billion in assistance, and those are small amounts.

Mr. Speaker, I have a full list of figures here that I could give my hon. friend. Exposed to crossfire in the trade war between the US and the EEC, Saskatchewan, the province he is from, is concerned directly by this. The Canadian government increased direct income supplementation by $2.2 billion each year from 1985 to 1989. And they want to come and make speeches and tell us what to do—Socialists are in no position to teach anybody a lesson on how to spend money.

I have been elected to this House in 1984. In those days, my NDP counterpart was Mr. Agnaieff, the national vice-president of the NDP and president of the Quebec branch. We both travelled by train, but, while I travelled coach, the NDP, the socialists, were travelling first class. That is NDP politics for you—

[English]

First class, that is NDP politics: help the poor and kill enterprise so that they have no more jobs. What you are saying is too easy; say the truth.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Come off it.

Mr. Della Noce: Billions of dollars—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is only one minute for the hon. member to reply.

Mr. Taylor: I sorry that I only have one minute to answer the member. There are lots of numbers out there, and you know the old adage about what you can use figures for and how figures can be used, Mr. Speaker. I will not go over that matter.

The member can throw out all kinds of figures, but where I come from the grain is stacked on the ground and the people are being forced off the land. The amount of money that has come from this government has been inadequate to meet the needs of the farm population on the prairies. It was inadequate under all of those circumstances, and the present programs are less funds than have been provided in the past. The decreases have existed, and more and more Saskatchewan farmers are being pushed off the land. They are being moved into the larger communities to unemployment and a different quality of life, and our food production in this country is declining as a result.

This government is also foisting upon the rural population increases in costs for RCMP services, mailing privileges for small community newspapers which allow for communications to exist between these communities, and emergency vehicle licence fees that allow for fire departments, police services, and ambulances to operate within the rural areas. Additional costs are being applied from this government on to those communities, and as a result they are not in any better shape than they have ever been.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief remarks I would like to add to those that have already been presented here this afternoon on the borrowing authority, the $26.5 billion bill that the government needs in order to make up its revenue shortfall.

As well, I would like to make one or two comments in relation to the budget, because the two go hand-in-hand as we know.

First of all, I want to tell the House that I represent a constituency, the federal riding of Brant, that for the second time in 10 years—first under the Liberals and now under the Conservatives—is suffering terribly as a result of this government's fiscal, monetary and economic policies. We are going through one of the worst recessions in our history. Unemployment is mounting by the day. But, unlike 1981-82, 50 per cent of those jobs are gone forever; whereas 10 years ago at least most of them were called back after the recession was over.

The member opposite said: "What about all the money on job creation?" That is one of my points. In this budget the government is taking $100 million out of the Canadian Jobs Strategy program, at the very time, regardless of political persuasion, we all agree that retraining and teaching new skills out there in the work force is absolutely paramount if this country is going to be able to compete globally, as the Conservative government is always reminding us day in and day out.

Let me also say at the outset that there is nothing in the budget, and almost nothing in the borrowing authority that I can find, that will improve our research and development programs in this country in both the public and private sectors.

Recessions come and recessions go. People get hurt, other people do not get touched at all. If there is one thing that is clear today in terms of economic health in this country, it is that if we are to survive as a first world nation, if I can use that expression, we are going to have to pump hundreds of millions of dollars and a lot of sincere effort into improving the research and technology and scientific development, on the one hand, in our industries and, on the other hand, we have got to train a work force that can not only withstand recessions but can rise to the new challenges of that technology.

If this government does not do it, the next one will, because in another 10 years the money just will not be there and in another 10 years we will not be able to generate that capital.

The other devastating aspect to both the budget and the borrowing authority itself is the fact that, wittingly or unwittingly, this government is only adding to the divisiveness within the country by capping transfer payments, year after year. Incidentally, it began with the Liberals. I am not blaming the Conservatives for originating this heinous idea. It began with the Liberals, but by strait-jacketing the provinces and by capping transfer payments the provinces are having to restrict the outflow of their funds to the municipalities.

I do not for a moment believe that the property owner or the average Canadian out there—the ordinary Quebeckers, francophone and anglophone, the ordinary Ontarians, westerners, west coasters, wherever one lives in this country—thoroughly understands and appreciates what is going to happen to his property tax base in the next decade if this government continues its economic policies as they are enunciated at this time. We are going to be paying $5,000 or maybe $10,000 a year in property taxes, where we are paying about $2,500 now. Or, we can go the American route and keep our property taxes down but have our police departments falling apart, our fire departments falling apart, our streets full of potholes, our public school systems going to the dogs, and the criminals taking over the streets.

Those are the options that we have in order to prevent what is happening to the rotting inner cores of American cities. It is about time we took European countries as our model and not that blessed country to the south of us that does not know how to treat its people in the social envelope, does not know how to spend money on behalf of the public good.

If you take a look at the budget, who are the people who get off scot-free in the budget? Well, I will tell you who they are. They are friends, the big corporations, who came to the rescue during the free trade debate during the last election, and the free trade of course as we know has cost us a lot of jobs in this country.

This budget, for example, does not eliminate one single tax break for the rich. The rich, as a result of this, have access to other kinds of tax deferral programs that the poor do not have. The government has not touched the windfall of an average of $1,175 in tax cuts that Tory "tax reform" has given people earning in excess of $100,000 a year.

The government has left the dividend tax credit intact. The government has left in place a subsidy of 5 per cent federal sales tax credit, the subsidy for business lobbying and other political activities, and the subsidy for Canadian multinationals investing overseas. There is no minimum corporation tax. There is no wealth tax. There is no succession duties. Real estate developers in particular can relax and continue to enjoy all the tax breaks that enabled so many of them to become millionaires at our expense, the expense of ordinary Canadians, back in the 1980s and before then.

But who are the people who are hurt? On whom are we trying to force a recovery? On whose backs are we doing it? We are doing it on the unemployed. We have cut $100 million out of the jobs strategy program. We are raising unemployment insurance premiums—they are going to hurt both those who still have jobs and the small business community.

We have cut back, and continue to cut back, on public housing, social housing, not one cent increase in a desperately needed social problem area within our country. In my own city of Brantford unemployment is now running at 15 per cent. The official rate is 9.7 per cent. Last month 7,068 people were receiving unemployment insurance benefits, 46 per cent higher than last year, and they take a look at a budget and a borrowing authority bill like this and they wonder what kind of insensitive government do we have here in Ottawa. There is absolutely no help whatever in either direct job creation or in upgrading the education and the work skills of our workforce.

Is there anything more stupid than to say to a person who is on unemployment insurance that that person cannot go back to school to improve himself, he cannot go out—unless he is chosen through the jobs strategy program—to learn a new skill at a community college or a high school because, why? Because he is on unemployment insurance.

Well, for God's sake, that is the time he should be back retraining. That is the time he should be improving his skills. That is the time he should be going back to school, and being able to collect unemployment insurance at the same time because in all likelihood he is married and has two or three children.

This government's priorities are all backward. Yes, we have to fight that national debt and the deficit and, quite frankly, I am not opposed to say 50 per cent of the GST—although I am opposed to that tax in principle—going toward retiring the deficit. But why not the other 50 per cent going toward job creation, or toward skill training, or educational upgrading?

Both the borrowing bill and, indeed, the budget itself were an absolute disaster for the vast majority of people in my constituency and I deplore it. I know that my time is up, but I sincerely hope that as this recession continues the government realizes that the Herbert Hoover approach and the R. B. Bennett approach of the early 1930s is not going to lift us out of recession. In fact it is going to make the recession even worse.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I am a great admirer of the Socialists, so much so that I sometimes wonder whether they are not leading us straight down the path to Communism. Earlier, the hon. member told us not to imitate our neighbours to the south, the Americans. That is what he said: Don't imitate the Americans.

• (1720)

[English]

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): I thought the Soviet Union was an ally now. Where have you been for the last couple of years? Have you been on another planet?

Mr. Della Noce: Wait, do not get excited. It is coming. I will get to your planet, soon.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when he says we should not imitate countries like the United States, when that country has an economic output of $7 trillion, does the hon. member mean we should imitate developing countries in Eastern Europe? Are we supposed to go and see how they manage? I will let the hon. member answer that!

[English]

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, now that the eastern European countries have shed communism and have decided to become democratic, I see absolutely no reason why we should not co–operate with Poland, with Czechoslovakia, with Hungary, in their efforts to improve their economies. I think it is an excellent idea.

I am just wondering why the hon. member is so reticent to assist countries that are desperately trying to turn their economies around and, during the last two years, have replaced communist dictatorships.

I do not know where he is coming from. I do not think he has been here for the last couple of years, or at least he has not read a newspaper.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the national debt and the deficit are central to the debate on borrowing authority legislation. It is equally clear that as a government, we cannot afford to simply spend our way out of the current recession. This simple solution, recommended by followers of Keynesian economics, simply will not work when we have already had 20 consecutive years of deficits. It would be tantamount to piling debt on top of debt, and frankly, Mr. Speaker, we have had enough. We cannot continue on this path of progressive indebtedness because it is literally the road to ruin.

The Budget tabled by my colleague, the hon. Michael Wilson, opts for another route that leads to economic recovery and prosperity, thanks to measures designed to lower interest rates. At the same time, however, we must substantially reduce federal borrowing and spending if the drop in interest rates is to be more than just passing phase.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should recall at this point that the consultations that preceded the drafting of this Budget included business groups, labour unions and other groups. Generally, they strongly recommended taking steps to lower interest rates in order to stimulate the economy and help the government improve its financial situation. That is exactly what we are doing now.

Interest rates and deficits are directly related to that metaphorical ball and chain we call the national debt. Consider, if you will, the national debt, Mr. Speaker.

By the summer of 1991, our national debt will be $400 billion. Some people will say: What is a billion? Let me give you a simple example to illustrate what one billion means. If a person had put $1,000 a day in a plate, every day of every year, starting with the year one of our present calendar, by December 31, 1991, that person would have accumulated less than three quarters of one billion dollars. That same person would have to keep setting aside $1,000 a day, every year, for another 746 years, in other words, until the end of 2739, before reaching the one billion mark. As they say in French, a billion is not exactly a small beer. Our anglophone colleagues would say: It's certainly ain't peanuts.

This year, the national debt works out to the equivalent of a personal debt of $15,000 for each man, woman and child living in Canada.

Just imagine, every time a baby is born is this country, it is saddled with a debt of $15,000. Assuming that interest rates remain at a steady level of 12 per cent annually, this means that when that baby is six, his debt will have increased to $30,000 and by the time he is twelve it will be $60,000. When as a student, he finishes high school, he will have a debt of $120,000 without ever having borrowed a cent.

[English]

That is the happy result of compound interest on the lending side, but it is the sad and brutal reality of compound interest if you must borrow money. It helps explain why our national debt, which was at the $200 billion level when our government took office in 1984, will reach double that figure this year.

More than 80 per cent of that increase can be attached to the compounding interest on the original $200 billion. It is also the main reason why the annual deficit is still at $30 billion in spite of the reduction in spending, and the increased revenue actions taken over the past six years. The interest costs alone on the accumulated debt this coming fiscal year will be $43 billion. That is $1,650 out of the pockets and purses of every Canadian.

It means there is that much less money available for medicare, research and development, job creation and many other programs that would be so helpful to Canadians. We must get off the treadmill of debt. That means reducing the burden of rapidly growing interest payments.

To do this we must deal firmly with the greatest single threat to economic progress: high inflation. Lowering inflation enables interest rates to come down. Low interest rates allow existing businesses and new businesses to create more jobs, help our country to be more competitive, and contribute to increase our over–all prosperity.

That is the path chosen in the budget for bringing about a recovery of the economy, a recovery that will be sustainable over the long term.

[Translation]

Lower inflation, lower interest rates and lower annual deficits are each others complement and are all factors that tend to stimulate strong economic recovery.

Ever since we inherited this unyielding deficit in 1984, our government has made an incredible effort to reduce operating expenditures.

Spending on all government programs and services has been maintained at levels well below the growth rate of the economy and the rate of inflation.

We have reduced operating costs of government services despite an increased workload. The number of public servants has been reduced considerably. Budgets for travel by elected representatives and public servants have been cut. A number of government agencies have been wound up, and we have privatized several Crown corporations.

In the years to come we intend to continue our unceasing struggle against inefficiency and irresponsible spending.

When we took over the government of this country, the previous federal government was spending $16 billion more on operating expenditures than it received in revenue. As a result, we had to collect $130 in taxes to provide $100 worth of government services, and Canada had an operating deficit.

At the end of the last financial year, this operating deficit had turned into a $9 billion surplus. This means that during the first five years the Progressive Conservative government was in power, we managed to bring about a complete reversal of this situation to the tune $25 billion. Our government has engineered a basic structural change by restoring a stabler balance between expenditures and revenues.

• (1730)

Mr. Speaker, the debt load will become lighter as the national debt takes less and less government revenues. But despite the positive measures that have been adopted we must admit that our priority objective—reducing the debt—remains beyond range unless we impose further restraints. The 1970s and early 1980s were highlighted by a carefree approach based on precarious abundance. This and the next decade will bring us back to stark reality.

If the servicing of the national debt continues to take an ever larger portion of the government expenditure budget, there will of course be less and less money available to maintain the programs which Canadians want because soon they will no longer be able to afford them.

Mr. Speaker, time has come for each of us to assume our collective responsibilities. There can be no reduction in our annual deficit and in our national debt unless we have a flourishing economy. Prosperity can only flown from lower interest and inflation rates. The best way to achieve this goal is to draw inspiration from the example of a government like ours which controls its own operating expenditures. Since a significant part of government outlays is accounted for by public service wages, we have decided to set strict limits on wage increases.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members should note that, generally speaking since 1984, federal government wage increases have been under the inflation rate and less generous than in the private sector.

The budget tabled recently by my colleague Michael Wilson re-affirms our government commitment to continue along that line by indicating just where the line has to be drawn.

As a result there will be no increase in the salary budgets of the departments for the next fiscal year, and raises will be limited to 3 per cent the two years after that. In addition the number of senior officials in the Public Service will be reduced by 10 per cent.

As hon. members already know, Mr. Speaker, the rate of salary increases for the Prime Minister, Cabinet ministers and all MPs has also been limited one way or another.

We are going to innovate by adopting legislation to limit the annual growth of government expenditures at 3 per cent beginning with the fiscal year 1991–92 until the end of 1995–96. This legislation will also indicate that any new spending program will have to be funded by reducing appropriations for existing programs.

The second major budget innovation is the creation of a special debt reduction fund made up of net GST revenues and monies from the privatization of Crown corporations.

In the budget the government indicates that it will cut the annual deficit down to $6.5 billion by the end of 1996 and do away altogether with the need to borrow on the financial markets by 1994.

Thanks to this so ably targeted action plan we can expect that, by 1995–96, the deficit will be down to less than 1 per cent of the gross national product compared to 4 per cent in 1990 and 9 per cent in 1984 when we inherited the disastrous results of the extravagances of the previous government members who seemed bent on spending as if money was going out of style.

When I talk about targeted action, Mr. Speaker, I am referring of course to the agreement between our Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada to bring the inflation rate down to 3 per cent by the end of 1992 and 2 per cent by 1995.

[English]

Let me remind all hon. members why we are taking these strong restraint measures. We are acting now in order to secure a better, more prosperous future. The key to improved living standards is continued increases in productivity. By restraining and reducing government's demand for borrowing, we can bring down interest rates and inflation. Lower interest rates encourage investment which in turn, will enhance our national productivity.

I want to comment on what my hon. colleague, the Minister of Finance, has called "the prosperity challenge". Countries all over the world, and Canada is no exception, are being forced to face up to rapid changes in the global economy, largely brought about by technological change. No country can afford to isolate itself from the global marketplace which is developing so quickly. To cut oneself off would clearly bring a terrible drop in a nation's standard of living. But to participate in the global market successfully, requires that a nation's economy must be as productive and as effective as the best in the world.

For Canada, as for all countries, this means making many changes and adjustments so that we get the most out of our national assets and advantages. And the Canadian labour force is, I believe, the most important among all our national resources.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from Chapter 7 of the budget document tabled in the House last Tuesday. It is entitled "Securing Canada's Prosperity: Building an Agenda for Long-term Growth in Living Standards". Under the heading "Better labour-management interaction" we can read this: "Even with the best technology and workforce skills in the world, our productivity performance would still depend fundamentally on how these are integrated in the work place. And that depends on management and workers".

Mr. Speaker, this essential fact must be appreciated at its real value. It stands to reason that we cannot achieve increased prosperity for every Canadian man and woman simply by implementing macro-economic policies designed to control inflation and keep interest rates down. We must also be concerned about the way we can work in association with others and the way we consult one another with respect to the definition of our economic goals.

Unfortunately the way human beings behave in their relations with others does not change as quickly as technology. In fact the attitudes, the human perceptions and the ways to communicate are probably the most difficult aspects to change for any one individual. Yet the significance and nature of these changes are vital.

As I see it, Mr. Speaker, the fact that we can work efficiently together and especially the fact that private sector workers and employers do manage to co-operate in harmony is the most essential aspect of our quest for future prosperity.

As a government our first task is to convince all Canadians that it has become imperative to control the deficit and to prove to them that all our energies and all our decisions will be aimed at that goal. I may have said this before, Mr. Speaker, but I want to emphasize the fact that this government must take whatever radical measures are required to lower interest rates, inflation and the national debt.

• (1740)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I invite all Canadians to read the guidelines of this historical Budget, that marks the beginning of a new era for us, our children, and our grand-children, because, first of all, as we have shown since we were first elected in 1984, we have never sheened our responsibilities, knowing full well that in the immediate future some of our decisions would not be very popular.

Secondly, the Expenditure Control Plan included in the Budget, and which freezes at current levels the wages and salaries of the Prime Minister, Members of Parliament, senior executives and all federal public servants, as well as the operating budgets, is an example all public and private executives throughout Canada should follow.

Thirdly, all the hard work our government has been doing to get rid of the annual operating deficit and reduce the national debt will generate the lower interest rate and inflation rate essential to our economic recovery and general prosperity.

Fourthly, greater harmony between employees and employers is essential if we are to increase our labour productivity, which will give everyone the opportunity to benefit from our renewed prosperity.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, this Budget marks out very carefully the way for our economic future. It clearly indicates what traps to avoid and what goals to achieve.

We are on the right track, and all Canadians will benefit from this new Budget.

The Acting Speaker (M. Paproski): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, thank you for your endless patience and courtesy.

I have a question for the minister who, as anyone familiar with the government's and the Conservative Party's organization chart, and especially the government's, would know, has the additional responsibility of being the minister responsible for a substantial part of Quebec. Of course, being a member and a minister from East Montreal does, I imagine, entail certain responsibilities. In addition to being minister of this and that and the other, one is the minister responsible for East Montreal. Not West Montreal but East Montreal.

Could he perhaps inform the House whether he has any specific plans for dealing with the appalling situation so well described by the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount in his speech on the Budget, when he said that there were more people unemployed in our city—because it is yours and mine, and also that of my good friend, my very good friend from Laval-Est who, I may say, did an excellent job in Rome. You see, all members have their non-partisan moments. He did a great job in Rome in connection with the return of Alitalia. I was there, so I can hardly say otherwise. It's true.

However, to get back to our subject, I want to ask you whether you have any specific plans for the economic recovery of this particular area which concerns us as members from East Montreal, where the situation is extremely bad, and I am referring to unemployment, housing, welfare and umemployment insurance? My office can't keep up with all the requests. I have never had this many, and I have been a member for 27 years.

Could the minister, besides talking about generalities and how important it is to control the deficit—we realize that is important—I know he is going to answer that the deficit was made by other people. Well, if it was, those people were judged by Canadians in 1984 and 1988. I think we should stop talking about that. The people passed judgment and said: You guys did the wrong thing so we are kicking you out. Go and do your homework. However, what I would like to know is whether you, as the minister responsible for East Montreal in this government, have any specific recovery plans so that once again Montrealers will feel proud of being part of a truly modern city?

Jean Marchand, a man who was such a wonderful example of what it meant to be a Quebecer in Ottawa, often said that Montreal was the economic heart of Quebec, unlike Ontario which has several industrial centres. However, in Quebec, if the engine is in trouble, the whole province suffers. So what can you tell us, what can you tell all those people who keep blaming you? I am afraid I must say that much of the blame is being laid at the right door. So I want to give you a chance to tell us what wonderful projects you have in store to encourage Montrealers who have always taken great pride in their city. I realize you are from Ville d'Anjou, but to all intents and purposes, that is Montreal, it is greater Montreal. When we talk about Montreal, that includes everyone, I imagine. Is there anything specific? We don't see anything. We are not very optimistic. We have to answer people when they ask us, and I don't like to tell people who call: Why don't you call Mr. Corbeil at number so and so. Call Mr. Weiner. I have tried to answer, but I have no answers. I say: Listen, you felt we weren't good enough to govern, so go and see them. Ask them. If you get a good answer, come and see me, but they haven't come back yet.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. minister has two minutes to reply to all of those wonderful questions.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis for his question. The hon. member for Saint-Denis is well known for his witty and spirited eloquence. I must tell him that I am extremely proud to be part of this government which has taken concrete measures over the past seven years,—ever since it came to office in 1984—to strenghten the economy of Montreal-East.

Mr. Speaker, mention should be made that between 1980 and 1984, the four year period before the Conservative Progressive Party came to office the Island of Montreal had recorded net job losses of 4,000. Since the Progressive Conservative Party came to power, several tens of thousands of jobs have been created. We shall continue in that direction by creating an economic climate attractive to businesses and conducive to economic prosperity. However, Montrealers can be sure that our party will never behave the way the hon. member for Saint-Denis' party did when it squandered money away and caused the situation which exists today. I understand that he just cannot stand hearing about the aggregate deficit for which his party is responsible. If we are compelled today to take such stringent measures, it is because of the situation we inherited when Canadians removed them from power in 1984.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Before I recognize the hon. member for Cochrane—Superior, I must advise the House that under Standing Order 74, we have completed the two hours and twenty-five minutes. All further speeches will be 10 minutes maximum with no questions or comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this budget and the estimates. I wish the Minister of Finance had presented last week a somewhat less stringent budget, especially in this time of recession. I suggest the moment was not right to present such a budget, the more so because Canada had experienced a very high rate of economic growth over the past five or six years. We could have then expected the Minister of Finance to present such a budget, but certainly not now.

In view of this high rate of economic growth and also the 33 tax increases, we must wonder where those dollars went? This recession which is due to the government's high interest rate policy is really hurting Canadians. I need only mention the number of bankruptcies which reached 54,000 last year, compared with 34,000 in 1982.

Let us talk also about unemployment. According to the Minister of Finance unemployment will reach 10 per cent in 1991 and 9.8 per cent in 1992.

Does this mean it will take another 18 months to get out of this terrible recession? We hope not.

Before he brought down his Budget, the Minister of Finance implied it would contain measures to help small businesses. We saw nothing of the kind in the Budget. I hoped to see the flow-through shares program renewed, since mining operations are down to 15 per cent of what they were five years ago. Just think, Mr. Speaker: It takes about eight years to develop a mine, from the day it is discovered to the day it becomes operational. Needless to say, in Northern Ontario we are very concerned about what will happen during the next 10 or 20 years.

Mr. Speaker, I also noticed that the Minister of Finance did not raise taxes for corporations, big companies and individuals with high salaries. When this government came to power, corporate taxes were at 13.5 per cent, while today, they are down to 9 per cent, which does not make sense, Mr. Speaker.

And let's talk for awhile about transfer payments to the provinces. During the next few years, we will be seeing cutbacks totalling $2.3 billion in transfer payments to the provinces, which will cause quite a stir in health care and education across Canada.

If people expect to get the same services they had before, they can also expect tax increases, both provincial and municipal. This means that the government has abdicated its responsibility, and that in the final instance, the taxpayer pays just the same.

I mentioned unemployment earlier. Unemployment insurance premiums will go up by 24 per cent next year, which means an additional $2.4 billion in revenue. At the same time, the Minister of Finance has cut $100 million in the budget for occupational training. I find it hard to see the logic in all this.

Occupational training is very important for Northern Ontario, because during the past 10 or 15 years, our young people have been leaving Northern Ontario in a steady stream towards the south, due to a lack of jobs. And what about our unemployed worker, 13 or 14 per cent, who would have liked to train for another job or go back to school or simply upgrade their skills. This $100 million cutback will affect us quite severely, and we find this extremely hard to take.

As far as housing is concerned, the government also intends to cut $35 million in programs for people on low incomes or people living very close to the poverty line. This cutback affects the neediest in our society, and I find it incredible that in a country as rich as Canada, there are still people who have to live in cabins without plumbing, and because of these cutbacks, when people ask for government assistance, they won't get it.

[English]

There is nothing in this budget to remedy the awful economic situation in northern Ontario. There are two main culprits: First, the export surtax on softwood lumber is killing the sawmill industry very dramatically. Second, mining exploration is down to 15 per cent in comparison to what it was five years ago. One only has to remember that it takes eight years to develop a mine, from the day of its discovery to its first day of exploitation. Northern Ontarians do have reasons to be afraid for the future.

There is no program either for the industrial development of the infrastructure in order to attract businesses to northern Ontario.

To conclude, I could not finish my remarks without making reference to the natives who have to live in despicable living conditions. Housing is badly needed, and even then there are budget cuts. In some First Nation communities I have seen houses where there are 17 persons living there. In view of the fact that Indian self-government is in the works, there is nothing in this budget to spur economic development on reserves.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, Canada is now in a recession. Although there are already indications that the recession is going to be deeper than was expected initially, all Canadians hope that this recession is indeed short.

Periods of recession should be the time to increase spending, in order to help those who are unemployed and suffering hardships, as well as to prepare the country for recovery. However, because of the lack of progress which the government has made in its seven years in office, there is very little room to manoeuvre without doing more harm to the economy.

It is, however, extremely unwise to consider the two events, that is, first the recession, and second our fiscal difficulties to be wholly unrelated. In my last year's budget critique, it will be remembered that I questioned the wisdom of using interest rates and monetary policy to combat inflation without co-ordinating them with fiscal policy.

I have repeatedly asked the finance minister to present information on the inflationary impact of his budget policies. The finance minister's failure to ensure that the government's fiscal policies are co-ordinated with its monetary policies, is incompetent at best.

The facts are evident, as I predicted last year. The use of monetary policy on its own was the equivalent of throwing water on the entire country to put out a fire, a fire which in part the government was itself stoking. In fact, the finance minister finally acknowledged this fact just this past weekend, saying that his tax reform proposals, while intended to make voters happy before an election, also fuelled inflation.

This year's budget attempts to lay the blame for the recession on inflation. However, inflation is not the big problem, which the government keeps saying it is. The big problem, as I stated last year, is that it is economically dangerous to deal with Canada's fiscal, monetary, interest rate, dollar trade and social policies as though they could be looked upon as mutually exclusive.

All of Canada's policies must be co-ordinated, to ensure that there is a coherent plan and that all government policies are working toward the same goal of strengthening Canada's economy.

During this government's term there have been changes to help ensure that Canada has the required economic vitality to enter the 21st century. At the same time, the government's policies of high levels of taxation, spending and borrowing, and the failure to deal with the long-run effects of borrowing approximately $30 billion annually, have affected domestic interest rates and the value of the Canadian dollar. These policies are working in fact at cross-purposes to our trade policies.

It is unfortunate that Canadians are seeing the negative and damaging effects of thinking that the government has a free trade policy, a social safety net policy, a fiscal and a monetary policy and that somehow each of these can be thought of and dealt with independently. The fact is that these policies are inter-related and trying to deal with them independently has helped to produce what has been called the first made-in-Canada recession.

The failure to get our fiscal house in order is seriously putting our economic strength, our international competitiveness, and even Canada's cherished social safety net programs at risk. Certainly a prime example of the lack of integration in government policy can be seen in its UI reforms under Bill C-21. We see that premiums are up 24.4 per cent this year to fund the increased payouts due to the recession. The increase in taxation will no doubt further hurt the competitiveness of employers whose cash flow and profitability are already hurt by the recession.

Of course the bottom line in this budget, even as we hear about the great cuts, even with $7 billion worth of additional revenues and $1.1 billion worth of cuts, the government is just managing to keep the lid on the deficit. Certainly the government has made steps in reducing the deficit. However, these steps needed to be taken much earlier.

I see, in fact, some of the initiatives announced in the budget are mirrored in Reform Party policy and my own statements. But even a mirror is only a reflection and certainly not the real thing.

For instance, I am glad to see the government has indicated its willingness to create a debt servicing and debt reduction fund, and also set legislative spending limits on itself. Several months ago I asked the government to set up a deficit and debt retirement fund when I announced my pay cut in September 1990.

These proposals are good initial steps to address the wish of the tax paying public that their tax dollars will be used to reduce the deficit and not to pay for new government programs prior to the next election.

However, now that the government has indicated its willingness to take these initial steps, I challenge the government to demonstrate its own sincere commitment by amending the Auditor General Act to require him to report on the impact of all new spending, including the incremental interest costs on the deficit. This will help to demonstrate that the government is willing to abide by its own spending commitments and not produce any new commitments.

The temptation to use any excess revenues for a good news agenda may well be tempting. I know already from my constituents that the remittances of the GST are improving the government's cash flow at the taxpayers' expense. Let that be enough of a benefit for the government.

Canada cannot afford another spending spree before the next election. Last year the finance minister predicted a $26.8 billion deficit for fiscal 1992. In 1989 the minister predicted a deficit of some $23 billion for this year, and in 1984, his first budget while in office, he predicted a deficit of approximately $10 billion by fiscal 1992. So we have a difference, a mistake or a discrepancy of $20 billion, and the debt is many billions of dollars higher than that.

I believe it to be self-evident that the government has for too long deviated from its course and should not again forget its way.

As I have said previously, the government should begin cutting at the top. However, a one year freeze in cabinet salaries and a cap on the growth in MPs' and senators' salaries is hardly a start or a major sacrifice, indeed not even a symbol.

Previously, I have called for cuts to the public service, in particular to the thick layers of middle management. When the Reform Party of Canada suggested a 10 to 15 per cent cut in this area, the government said it could not be done. The government had "cut to the bone already", it said. But now it is possible to cut 10 per cent in this budget. People would ask why.

Because, as with each time the government cuts—whether it is to sell the GST at seven per cent in December 1989, find $350 million to fight the war in the gulf in the fall of 1990, or now in the winter of 1991 to try to regain its supporters and credibility at home and abroad—it is not to reduce unnecessary and wasteful spending, but rather to meet the current crisis facing the country and the government.

That is the key to understanding this government's record on deficit reduction. Unfortunately, it has much more to do with crisis than with commitment.

I want to point out that a dollar that could have been cut in 1984, but which the government did not feel compelled to cut back then, has added approximately $10.40 to our national debt. That is $7 in principal and $3.40 in interest. That is the result of not taking the deficit and unnecessary spending seriously and the effect of not acting sooner. This fact, no doubt, inspired the Prime Minister to admit recently before a group of students, and I quote:

> I do not want to suggest we could not have done more, because we could have done more—Had we done more earlier, our problems would be less, there is no doubt about it.

Commitment would have reduced the deficit in 1984; crisis reduces it now. Why has it taken seven years for government backbenchers to demand that their government cut wasteful spending?

Finally, I have concerns about the government further cutting conditional transfers to the provinces. The government maintains its own pet programs instead of cutting them and saving money, while it passes taxation on to the provinces. But, by cutting back funding to the provinces while indicating that the federal government will not only continue, but increase legislating in areas of provincial jurisdiction, the government is heading toward a constitutional crisis which clearly neither the government nor the country can afford.

The government may claim that its current unpopularity is the result of making tough decisions. I claim, however, that for the most part the government has not planned these tough decisions, but rather they were thrust upon them by economic events dictating change, the result of having no long-term economic plan for Canada beyond the last election.

A journalist asked me recently how I would rate this budget on a scale of one to ten. I thought for a moment and said that I would give it a five. My snap judgement appeared to be right.

This budget is average. But unfortunately, an average budget is exactly what the government has given Canada for far too long.

For this reason, this budget critique is a eulogy for a government which has waited too long and only done the bare minimum in once again just holding the line. It has done that for seven years; held the line at about a $30 billion deficit. This was hardly enough, and we see the consequences of it now. The country and the government have only to ask what went wrong for seven years. Perhaps five years ago it would have been a good budget, but not now.

Unfortunately, it is too little because it is too late.

In conclusion, this is a budget which tries to win back to a government its supporters in the domestic and international communities and to raise its sagging popularity with the Canadian people. Canadians are looking at it and feeling a great sense of remorse and a feeling of eulogizing for this government.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to comment on the government's recent economic initiatives. The budget of the finance minister is an incredible disappointment to all those in Canada who had hoped that he would deal with the real substance of the issue of Canadian competitiveness.

The minister has at last acknowledged that the deficit is a problem, and it is indeed when our national debt exceeds $400 billion. But what has he offered us? He has offered us simply the promise that in the future he will be able to deal with it. But Canadians realize that we are not going to be able to tax our way out of the deficit; we are already overtaxed. And we are not going to be able simply to cut our way out of the deficit. The government has already slashed all sorts of programs and we have seen that it has had no impact on the deficit. It is still far above levels that he predicted years ago, levels he predicted even one year ago.

We cannot tax our way out of the deficit. We cannot cut our way out of the deficit. There is only one solution: we have to earn our way out.

The problem we face is that in his last budget the minister has denied to Canadian industry some of the tools that they used to have in terms of dealing with competitiveness. This is a government that has cut transfers for educational training, has put a cap on funding for export development and promotion, and has put a cap on science and technology. This government is denying to our industries some of the tools which they need to be competitive. As a result, in the last two years, the two years since free trade, Canada has lost 229,000, or fully 11 per cent, of all of our manufacturing jobs. This is a government that is presiding over the deindustrialization of Canada.

At the heart of this problem is a government which is not prepared to assume its proper role in the wealth creation process in Canada. At the heart of our economic dilemma we find a paradox, the paradox being a government that is not prepared to act like a government. It is a government that refuses to play the role that only governments can play, and which is played by every one of our major competitors, in terms of helping industries and working with industries to make them globally competitive.

I am not calling for a government imposed strategy. Rather, what is critical is that the government assume its proper role and bring to the wealth creation process the tools which only governments can bring.

It is easy to criticize this government for its record on many accounts, but I leave that up to others today. Rather, I seek to suggest to this House that there are positive ways in which we can proceed to get around the problem of competitiveness, a problem of declining competitiveness, which our finance minister has recognized but which he has refused to deal with in any fundamental way. Let me suggest what some of these routes might be.

• (1810)

First, we need an entirely new spirit of co–operation in Canada. It is a long time gone. When we could have management fighting labour, fighting educators, fighting financiers, we are going to need the co–operation of all sectors of our economy working in harmony and working in harmony toward common goals.

Second, and I know this is going to sound anathema to some of my Conservative colleagues in this House, we are going to have to plan for our economic future.

Government must be able to bring the key players to the table to discuss what our future can be in five, ten and twenty–five years down the road and to plan for that future. If we do not plan for it, surely it is the ultimate naivety and surely it will not come about. Our competitors plan and even businesses plan for their long–term futures.

Third, I suggest that we cannot be the best at everything in the world because no nation is. We are going to have to build on the strengths that we have already in Canada. I suggest this involves industry such as transportation, communications, and a number of others which we all know, making abundant use of our primary resources, because it is such a squandering of our given wealth to sell those goods away to other countries without adding value to them here in Canada and creating the jobs here rather than having the jobs exported to other nations.

We are going to have to look at some of the industries of the future: biotechnology, specialty metals, many of these.

Fourth, we are going to have to concentrate on our human resources. We cannot have a strong economic future without having the best trained and best educated people. We need more scientists, more engineers, and fewer lawyers.

Fifth is research and development, science and technology. Under this government, R and D spending has fallen from 1.42 per cent to 1.28 per cent of our GDP. It is going in the wrong direction. This can be reversed. Why did they cap science and technology spending in this budget?

Sixth is foreign control. As long as more and more of our Canadian industries fall into foreign hands, we are not going to enjoy the benefits in Canada or the repatriation of profits of the R and D being done here, of the best jobs being in Canada. Besides, we are losing control over our own economic destiny.

Seventh is the monetary policy. Surely we cannot trust a finance minister who has promised us for many years that he will get interest rates down, that he will curb inflation, that he will get the deficit down, and rely on those promises that he is going to do it in the future. He has destroyed all his credibility. I hope he can do it, but for this year alone in his budget he has promised us interest rates just slightly below what they are today, 9.5 per cent. The Americans, against whom we are competing, have interest rates which are almost four points lower than Canada. We have got to get our dollar down to a level that reflects our labour productivity in manufacturing.

Eighth, in terms of infrastructure, for over a century and a quarter that Canada has benefited from its unique mix of public sector—private sector involvement in our economy. The building of canals, of railroads, of the Trans–Canada Highway, of the CBC, of national airlines and of aerospace industries has not come about by market forces or chance.

In summary, whether we like it or not, our competitiveness and our ability to create wealth in the future is dependent upon a government with a philosophy which says that we have a critical role to play in the wealth creation process in Canada.

We have a key role, the role of bringing the players together, of helping set plans, of producing the infrastructure, the educated, trained people, the research and development, the science and technology culture.

I am afraid that if the government does not learn to assume its proper role in the economy of the future that economy will not be ours.

As more and more jobs leave Canada and move south of the border so do the hopes of a whole generation of young Canadians. The bright light at the end of the tunnel is that there is another and better way to deal with our economic challenges but it requires a government prepared to assume its proper role.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Chambly that we are now in the period of 10-minute debate with no questions or comments. The hon. member for Ontario has the floor for debate.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate this opportunity to participate in this debate and I do have to commend the hon. member for Willowdale for what I think are some very appropriate comments. Maybe later on in my speech I will try to respond to some of those because I think he made some very valuable suggestions that maybe I can respond to in due course.

But before I do I would like to make some other comments on this borrowing bill, the fact that we need to borrow money, and I think the place to start is probably by an article that I read in The Globe and Mail on February 28. It relates to a speech that the premier of New Brunswick gave while he was in Toronto on a government mission. I would like to quote a paragraph from it: "Governments must conduct themselves like private citizens, borrow if necessary for capital assets such as a new home, but pay as you go for current expenditures like the groceries".

That was from Premier McKenna of New Brunswick. Further on in the article he went on to say: "The leaders of the 1960s and 1970s have placed a first mortgage on the future of Canada. The leaders of the 1980s and 1990s are placing a second mortgage on the same asset. There is no equity left. We must once and for all put an end to the suffocating debt load we are placing on the backs of our children".

Very interesting comments from a Liberal premier in this country because it certainly reflects a different view than we have heard in this House during the debates that we are presently involved in dealing with this budget and the borrowing requirements that emanate from it.

The reason I am pleased to participate in this debate is because of the very clear things that the Government of Canada is doing in trying to deal with the problems of debt and the circumstances that come from it.

I would like to explain why. I happen to represent the riding of Ontario. In my constituency, as I am sure happens in many other parts of Canada, the question is "what are we getting for all this money that we are paying and for all this money that we are spending".

I can understand fully why my constituents feel that they are not getting value for money. When they know the government is spending 35 cents of every dollar on interest, they know full well they are not getting a dollar's worth of value for the dollar in taxes they are paying.

For example I have here the most recent statistics that relate to income tax paid by my constituents. This is personal income tax. In the town of Pickering in 1987 my constituents paid $213 million in federal income tax. In 1988 they paid $248 million in federal income tax. And they can say: "What did we get for that $35 million more in income tax that we paid?"

One thing we know we did get—we got a debt that went up. We got a deficit that did not come down, and we did not get very many new programs, but we did get an awful lot of people screaming about the fact that some of the programs they wanted were being cut, et cetera.

I can tell you that the people of Pickering object to paying an extra $35 million. The people of Whitby increased the taxes they pay from $181 million in 1987 to $217 million in 1988. Obviously with inflation that number went up again in 1989 and in 1990. So the people of Whitby can say; well, what did we get for that extra $39 million? They have every right to ask that question, and have every right to be disappointed when they can say that all they got for it was an increase in the debt, no reduction in the deficit, with those appropriate spending increases.

Similarly, in the town of Ajax the same scenario happened, where they paid an extra $23 million in income tax, and yet all they got for it was an increase in the national debt.

So, this budget deals very clearly with an issue that is important to us all. The issue is, as Mr. McKenna rightfully points out, that we cannot leave this debt to our children to pay.

So, how have we decided to address it? Certainly in this budget one of the very clear things we have done is we have put a cap on spending. I happened to listen to the member from Beaver River a little while back who was saying that this budget rates a five out of ten, and she was very critical of the fact that there were cuts made today that should have been made maybe three or four years ago. Well, like her, I am a reasonably new member of Parliament and I like to participate in what I think are appropriate cuts. I listened to her speech and all I heard her say was that we did not cut enough. Last year when I listened to her I heard her say that we did not cut enough but she did not have suggestions of what should be cut; but she did complain about some of the things that were cut in her part of Canada that she did not agree with.

We all have to look at it now. We have to come up with some very concrete suggestions, we also have to come up with methods of getting ourselves off this debt treadmill. Very clearly, because of the way the government spends money, the best way to get ourselves off this debt treadmill is to increase the over-all revenues—not by increasing the tax rate, as our friends in the NDP would have us do, not by spending more money, as our friends in both the NDP and the Liberal Party would have us do, but by increasing the wealth of Canada.

That is why I was kind of pleased to see the member for Willowdale talk about how we could increase the wealth of Canada.

I understand we are in a recession today. My riding, like every other riding in Canada, is experiencing that. It is not very comfortable when you talk to people who have, for one reason or another, been laid off or lost their job; these are difficult times. But so that there should be no doubt about the fact that spending does not solve the problem, if we go back to 1981–82, the Liberal Party, the government of the day, spent, spent, spent, and raised the deficit tremendously.

If spending is the cure, then in Ontario we should today be riding the biggest boom that could possibly exist in Canada, because for the last five years the Government of Ontario has done a bigger job of spending than the federal government did when they were last in government with the Liberal Party in 1981–82. The fact of the matter is that we suffer the recession in Ontario, even though we have the biggest spending government that ever existed in Canada, right in the province of Ontario—and we have not even got a budget from the NDP yet.

So, we will certainly see how to spend money, and it is certainly proven that that is not the answer.

The answer is to create wealth by reducing the inflation rate, by reducing the over-all impact of government in the economy, and by making sure that the money the governments gets in its revenue is put towards the debt and the deficit.

In our budget we have done that. We have established an expenditure control program to control how government spends money; we have put in place a mandatory spending limit on the government so that it cannot create new and wonderful programs; and third, we have made sure that all the revenue from GST goes to reducing the debt, exactly what Canadians want and ask for.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague with great interest. However, what our colleague the Minister of Labour said in support of the federal budget seems of greater interest as former mayor of Ville d'Anjou, and as a Quebecer. I find that the budget the hon. Minister of Finance tabled is one that can be described as full of inconsistencies, thoughtless and showing incompetence. Those are not my words, mind you. They are from Le Devoir.

I find rather incredible to hear the Minister of Labour, a Quebecer, speak in support of a budget which, based on the information I have here and with the freeze on the transfer payments to the provinces, will affect mostly Quebec, particularly in the fields of health and postsecondary education. According to the Quebec Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, it is $732 million that we will loose over the next three years.

I hope that the Minister of Labour heard me, because he was suggesting that a budget stealing— I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but that is the right word, "stealing" $732 million from the province of Quebec, and we have a Quebecer defending this Budget. I find that hard to take. I find that very hard to take, even if they don't agree, all these people on the other side, the Tory defenders of the rights of Quebecers: the right to be poor!

Another interesting point is that according to the same Minister of Finance, the Wilson Budget will cut about $153 million for the 1992–93 fiscal year alone. And who is that going to affect?

An hon. member: Not the NDP?

Mr. Edmonston: No. It is going to affect everybody. Oh, sure, the NDP too. How? But the NDP represents everybody! We represent Quebecers, we represent the people from western Canada and the people from Ontario. Even the Ontario Government will be affected. I am going to try and get the attention of the former Minister of Labour, because I find it very interesting that a former mayor of Ville d'Anjou would agree with Mr. Wilson's Budget, when he knows perfectly well that every single municipality in Quebec will have to pay the bill, because the federal bill is being sent to the province and the province is going to send it to the municipalities. And all the mayors of Quebec's municipalities are up in arms. They are mad as hell at the government. And I don't blame them. I don't blame Marcel Dulude, the mayor of Saint-Bruno, who complained about these cutbacks which mean he will have to spend more and more money on public transit.

So if we can't pay the federal bill and we can't pay the provincial bill, we can't put all this right on the backs of the taxpayers, but that is what is happening.

I would like to talk about this Budget in connection with the Minister of Labour, because in fact, I can't see how, as Minister of Labour, he can defend a budget that caps wage increases in the public sector at 3 per cent. I would like to quote from an editorial in Le Devoir which says that Ottawa's fight against the astronomical deficit and inflation means that all governments must co-operate very closely. Co-operation, not the confrontation we have today.

We heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who said: Come on, we are not going to kill health insurance. We are not going to do that. And then we heard the Quebec Minister of Health, Mr. Côté, who said: It most certainly will kill health care— So I fail to understand how a Minister of Labour can say that wages of public servants should be capped, when he knows perfectly well that as mayor of Ville d'Anjou he would never have dared to freeze his employees' salaries at 3 per cent. But he is a minister now, so he can preach what he never practiced. I think that is incredible. Especially at a time when we have a government in Quebec that will never take the advice of the Tory government, which is saying: Now listen, we capped at 3 per cent so you do the same in Quebec. Come on! We have a little more compassion. We can't let the Public Service bear the brunt of the recession. That is just not right! I can understand that the Minister of Labour has to stand by the government, but I was expecting him to display a touch more courage.

In closing, Mr. Speaker—I will conclude quickly, believe it or not, because time is running out—I was looking for the best way to illustrate tonight the iniquities and ill effects of the Wilson budget. What would the best illustration be?

Mr. Ricard: This is the best Budget!

Mr. Edmonston: Let me explain.

I have some change here in my hand. In 1950, the taxpayers share of each tax dollar—the taxpayer, that is you and me, Mr. Speaker—was 49 cents. The corporations were paying the other 51 cents. That was pretty good, 49 versus 51!

Today, I have to pay as a taxpayer 25, 50, 75 and 85 cents on each dollar collected by the federal government, while corporations are paying only 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15 cents.

Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that that ratio is now 85 cents for the taxpayers versus 15 cents for the corporations.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I don't want to interrupt my colleague because he seems to be making a good speech, but is it permitted under the parliamentary rules to use objects in order to illustrate one's remarks?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I cannot see from this distance whether he is using money or he was just saying it. If he is, I wish he would not do it. The hon. member for Chambly.

[Translation]

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I will put my money away before the Governement takes it, since it needs money. I will put my money back in my pocket, because I know that as long as Parliament sits, it won't be safe. So I take it that my colleague wanted to remind me that it could be dangerous to show my money, here, in the House of Commons. I promise that I won't do it again, because I understand the Government is hungry and that I could induce a kind of feeding frenzy. I don't want to tempt it this way.

More seriously, to conclude, I believe that these people must really have a lot of nerves to tell us such nonsense. They tell us it is the best budget for us, Quebecers. When I hear that, Mr. Speaker, and coming from peoples who told us: "You should elect us Conservatives in Quebec for it is we who will defend your interests", I think it is really going too far.

[English]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to rise and participate in the debate on Bill C–97, the borrowing authority legislation. This bill is before the House as part of the legislation flowing from the budget speech delivered last week by my esteemed colleague, the Hon. Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance.

Before I delve into the main part of my presentation, I would briefly like to cover the main highlights of the budget.

All the money from the GST will be used to reduce the deficit and then to pay down the federal debt: no new taxes for new spending for five years, ceilings will be put on federal spending and guaranteed by a new law. this is a first. Wages of MPs, cabinet ministers, the Prime Minister and civil servants are being tightly constrained and I am quite sure that the Canadian public will jump for joy at that particular item in the budget.

Transfer payments to the provinces will be limited. There will be no federal money for the ballet opera house in Toronto, a saving of some $88 million.

There will be no money now for the proposed $45 million cultural centre in Montreal, and I know that will be widely acclaimed by most Canadians. There will be spending cuts of $15 billion spread over the next five years.

Hundreds of millions of dollars in grants and contributions to special interest groups and businesses are being cut. Inflation and interest rates will fall. The deficit this year and next year will be $30.5 billion, dropping to $6.5 billion by 1994. There will be new assistance for the disabled.

Civil servant wage increases are being capped at 3 per cent, and there will be a possible elimination of 6,000 more public servant jobs. There will be a 10 per cent cut in the number of executives in the government.

The government will attempt to create a partnership of all levels of government to deal with the rising costs of governments and attack unnecessary overlap and duplication.

The budget's priority is action to create the essential conditions for economic recovery. As a responsible government, we have chosen not to increase spending. Frankly, history has shown that throwing money at a problem or situation does not work.

My hon. friends across the floor on the Liberal benches would be more aware of that fact than any of us. After all, successive Liberal governments measured problem solving by how many of the taxpayers' dollars could be expended at any given time.

It was a practice that burdened the Canadian people with a $38.4 billion deficit in the last year of the Liberal regime in 1984, just before we came into office and formed the government. It is a practice that the February 26 budget is designed to remedy once and for all. In fact, for the first time in Canadian history, Ottawa is actually going to pass a law which puts ceilings on how much politicians can spend.

However, it should be noted that regardless of what the opposition parties tell the people, we are not a heartless government. Spending for the unemployed in the budget has been increased by $3 billion, by $1.6 billion for senior citizens, $1.3 billion for farmers in difficulty and another $600 million for our Department of National Defence.

Since being elected in 1984, our government has waged a long and determined battle to restore health to Canada's finances and stop the debt from dragging down the economy. In the 1990 budget, the government set out a medium–term fiscal plan to sharply reduce the deficit and curtail new government borrowing in financial markets by 1994 and 1995. The February 26 budget reaffirms the plan and introduces a program of expenditure control.

We have seen how living beyond our country's means can lead to a growing burden of public debt. In 1984, the federal government was handing out $1.33 in programs and services for every dollar it collected. That was certainly no bargain.

Today, our public debt is forecast to reach the staggering sum of $400 billion by mid-year, about $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. The interest alone on the debt will eat up more than $43 million next year, more than we spend on Old Age Security, unemployment insurance and family allowances combined.

• (1840)

In the February 26 budget the government has asked Canadians to share the burden of further fiscal restraint. As a government we recognize the sacrifices that many Canadians have already made in the name of restraint. We know there is reluctance to accept the necessity for more of the same. But as bitter as the pill seems, if we took no steps to deal with this worsening fiscal situation, the deficit would be much higher than forecast over the next five years and an additional $25 billion would be added to the public debt.

I do not believe for one minute that Canadians really want to continue on a path which not only mortgages their future, but the future of subsequent generations. In the budget the government has taken the tough responsible decisions necessary to ensure Canada's finances become healthy again.

The government's plan for economic recovery seeks to ensure spending control that will help put government finances firmly on the course to a balanced budget. In fact, the 1991 budget includes measures providing Canadians with added assurance that these targets will be met. In a significant change that alters the way government manages its expenditures, it is my understanding that draft legislation will be released shortly which will impose mandatory limits on annual program spending for the next five years. The budget's program spending control measures will be enforced by law. Flexibility will be confined to a very limited set of contingencies set out in the legislation. Although the legislation will not preclude new programs to meet new needs, the government will fund new programs from within the total legislated spending ceiling of roughly 3 per cent per year.

The government will also introduce legislation to set up a debt servicing and reduction fund. The fund will receive the net revenues from the goods and services tax, net proceeds from privatization and earmarked contributions for debt reductions from individuals or businesses. These revenues will be applied first against the cost of servicing the debt and as they grow over time they will be used to reduce the outstanding debt.

In combination with the proposed annual spending limits, this fund will provide assurance that all revenues from the GST will be used to service and reduce the debt and not to fund new program spending. The effort to reduce spending and the deficit is being reinforced by the government's decision to set clear inflation targets. These targets will serve as realistic goals to encourage lower inflationary expectations by all sectors of our economy: consumers, business, labour, investors and all levels of government. This will help us work together to better control the price and wage pressures that push inflation higher for us all.

There can be no denying the direct link between inflation and interest rates. Our economic history proves it. During the 1950s and 1960s, when inflation was low, averaging less than 3 per cent a year, interest rates were low also. When inflation surged in the 1970s interest rates also soared.

The rewards of lower inflation are clear and concrete. Interest rates will drop, economic productivity and competitiveness will increase, our standard of living will rise, and social fairness will be enhanced. The result will be a strong, more prosperous country that can ensure its place as an economic world leader.

Through the plan for economic recovery contained in the budget, the federal government is taking action to establish fiscal stability and strengthen confidence in Canada's future. By reducing the deficit and controlling the public debt, the plan will help set the stage for improved economic performance and increased prosperity. I believe the plan will result in a better balance between fiscal and monetary policy, and will provide the lower interest rates and greater confidence that will fuel our economic recovery.

With all this in mind, let me mention that Bill C-97 requests borrowing authority in the amount of $28.4 billion. While this is a very large amount, it is important to remember that without the strong measures contained in the budget, it would be some $4 billion to $5 billion larger.

I am pleased to support this bill on behalf of the government.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, we are in a full—need I emphasize it—made in Canada recession, which is a world first. As a rule, we are dependent on the United States. The main motor of this recession is the same minister who presented this Budget, a budget detrimental to Quebec. Let us talk about the whole interest rate policy which is geared to Ontario.

In 1988–89, Ontario's inflation rate increased at nearly twice that of Quebec, 1.1 per cent compared with 0.5 per cent. The hourly rate of pay fell by 0.8 per cent in Quebec while it increased by 1 per cent in Ontario. Because of this horse remedy, Quebec lost 126,000 jobs and the level of employment returned to what it was in 1988. At 14.1 per cent, the City of Montreal has an employment rate higher than St. John's, Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that economically, Quebec is paying very dearly for belonging to Canada. And what are we told now? Against all expectations in this period of recession, we are faced with tax increases; an increase of 24.5 per cent in the premiums employees and employers will have to pay to the Unemployment Insurance Fund from which the federal government withdrew its contribution; $1.4 billion in new taxes on tobacco, that is, 75 cents on every pack.

In my own riding, the main employer is Macdonald, so that this tax may very well result in a great many job losses. This is a regressive tax which attacks rich and poor equally as though they had the same incomes, which is preposterous.

These cuts will also affect social housing programs. The 15 per cent cut in 1991–92 will mean a $32 million reduction this year, a $71 million reduction in 1992–93 and, all in all, some $411 million over the next five years. As far as the sharing of resources is concerned, if Quebec received some 23 per cent of the budget for social housing, this would mean a loss of $94.5 million over five years. In other words, a loss of 7,480 housing units by 1995.

This is the kind of thing this government is doing, while it can afford to spend for the effort $950 million. There will be also a $100 million cut in the Canadian Jobs Strategy. It is unbelievable! Cuts in Unemployment Insurance Benefits; cuts in the variable entrance requirements; cuts in the number of paid weeks, under the pretense of spending that money on job training. But there are cuts there too!

Furthermore, we should remember that some agreements signed with Quebec which come to an end on March 31 have not yet been renewed. This is important, for in Quebec, everybody agrees, including the Conseil du Patronat, the unions, the municipalities, the Quebec government, the cooperative movement unanimously agree that the Federal Government not only does not spend enough in job training, but that the friends being paid are mismanaged and that all these powers should go to Qubec. There is a consensus on that.

On top of that, Mr. Wilson will ask civil servants for additional sacrifices. Their salary increases will be frozen at 3 per cent but nothing was done to the 100 000 $ capital gains tax exemption. The Minister of Finance would not want to hurt his friends.

In conclusion, I feel that Quebec should get out of this system. This year, the Federal system will increase Quebecers's debt by $7.6 billion. The Quebec Minister of Finance said there will be a $732 million shortfall over the next three years. Not only is this system ruining us, Mr. Speaker, but it even uses our money to promote Canadian unity, spending $27.5 million to support the Spicer Commission's efforts to indoctrinate elementary school children. As a Quebec woman put it this morning on a television program: Only nurseries and cemeteries are left. Not for long, I would say with such people as the Minister of Finance and the incomparable Benoît Bouchard.

The Centre for Canadian Unity promises us the same thing. Although Mr. Mulroney had promised never to do this kind of thing again, he is doing exactly what Mr. Trudeau had done in the past.

I conclude by saying that this government of irresponsible and incompet people will spend between $400,000 and $500,000 tomorrow to satisfy the whims of some nincompoops who want to move to another office. Imagine, the government will spend nearly half a million dollars to please them while at the same time, cutting back on many social programs.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest this is a fairly good picture of this government. When the time comes, Quebec men and women will make a decision not only on the federal system, but also on these people who are here supposedly to defend Quebec's interests but who in fact are but the lackeys of anglophone ministers and are no longer of any use to Quebec men and women, or anybody else in Canada for that matter!

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and have an opportunity to speak in the debate this evening.

I think it is fair to say that Canadians recognize and realize that we have to grapple with the deficit, and that they realize that we have to grapple and renegotiate a new social contract with all Canadians. The problem is that Canadians have lost faith in this government and have lost faith in the ability of the government to handle the deficit. They are concerned because of the government's blatant politicizing of fundamental matters related to this country.

Make no mistake, this is more than a budget or a financial statement; it is a political statement of this government's view of Canada.

It is interesting to note some of the comments that have been made over the last four or five years by the Minister of Finance. In the budget for 1985–86, the Minister of Finance forecast that the deficit for 1990–91 would be $18 billion. Even last year he forecast that it would be $28.5 billion. We all know that it is going to be $30.5 billion. Last year the Minister of Finance forecast employment growth at 1.2 per cent, and now he tells us that it will shrink by 1.5 per cent. He forecast that unemployment rates would be at 8.5 per cent, and now he expects unemployment to be at 10 per cent.

This government promises jobs, jobs, jobs, with more than 1.3 million Canadians unemployed as I stand here in the House tonight. Is it any wonder that people become cynical when they hear these numbers.

In my own province, more than one out of every ten New Brunswickers is unemployed, and they are upset, for obvious reasons. To make things worse were the comments of the Minister of Fisheries in recent articles in The Telegraph Journal that, as far as he was concerned, the province of New Brunswick owed the federal government $52 million. Then he turned around two days later and said that he had made a mistake, that the province really did not owe any money at all, and took back his comments.

But The Telegraph Journal really captured the minister's callous attitude in its editorial, which I will quote.

"But there was also a perception that the federal Minister"—that is the Minister of Fisheries—"was all but rubbing his hands in glee at the problem a $52 million debt would cause Mr. Maher"—the Minister of Finance for the Province of New Brunswick.

The problem, of course, would not have been so much for Mr. Maher, but more seriously for the people of New Brunswick.

That is the attitude of this government. Because it is implicit in the minister's statement and in the conduct of this government that it is all right to pass the burden on to the provinces; it is all right to create different classes of Canadians; it is all right to have different educational standards for Canadian children; it is all right to have different levels of opportunities for Canadians.

Well, it may be all right for the Minister of Finance and it may be all right for the Minister of Fisheries, and it may be all right for the government, but it is certainly not all right for Canadians.

This budget will create different levels of health care in the country. It will create different levels of post-secondary education. It will make our universities and hospitals handicapped institutions as they try to grapple with the new medical and educational crises and opportunities that they will face.

The regions that can pay will have better health and education systems, and the regions that cannot pay will have to do without.

The budget has divided up federal powers. We are seeing a view of Canada in this budget, and it is something like the Allaire report coming out of Quebec. We can now see where the government places its burdens and responsibilities and, quite frankly, the burden has been passed to the provinces which is going to create regional government rather than a strong central government.

It is a sneaky budget, too. When people are waiting for a hospital bed, sitting in the out-patients department, waiting to get into university, or any of those sorts of things, they are not going to blame the federal government, they are going to blame the hospital, or the institution, or the provincial government, or a municipal government. That is why there is a sneaky side to this particular budget; it is a transfer of power, it is a transfer of responsibility, and it is a transfer, in some cases, to provinces that can ill afford and do not have the resources to handle what will be handed to them.

The government says that the budget addresses two major issues or crises, the recession and national unity. Well, I would go one step further and say that the budget exacerbates the recession and contributes to the divisions within the country.

The cuts to education, training, research and development, hit the nation at a time when we must compete and create economic growth in the disadvantaged regions of this country. Those regions that are disadvantaged are trying to pull themselves up by their bootstraps and now they are not going to have the opportunities that other parts of the country have.

Moncton, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, all those communities and provinces, want to be "have" provinces, want to invest in education, want to invest in their children, want to see positive things happen in their communities. This budget will eliminate, or at least curtail, those opportunities to citizens in the less advantaged regions.

The changes to unemployment insurance is another area where an added burden is going to be placed on the businessman, the small businessman at that, as well as the employee. The increase is upward of 15 to 24 per cent, as far as premium costs are concerned, and this will place additional pressures on the small business concerns in disadvantaged areas like the maritime provinces or the west.

The final hypocrisy, in my view, is to claim that a 20 per cent cut in the environmental budget is not a cut at all. We know full well that it is a cut and that it is a savaging of the environment budget. This makes it difficult for the environmental programs to function properly do the job that we all want to see done with respect to the environment.

In conclusion this budget is a sneaky budget. It passes on to the other levels of government the Mulroney government's failure to deal with its economic problems and its failure to come to grips with the deficit. In a time when we had such great success and rapid economic growth over the last five or six years, a time when this government could have done something, it squandered away that opportunity and now we are faced with even further problems.

• (1900)

The government's solution is to say: "Hey, it is not our fault. We are going to wipe our hands clean, and we are going to pass this responsibility on to the provinces and on to the poorer regions of this country". The Conservatives made this made–in–Canada recession and they are adding to the suffering of many Canadians, particularly in the Atlantic region. Now they are going to add even more. It is a sneaky budget. It is a bad budget, and it should be a defeated budget.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint–Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, we are witnessing an economic disaster in Canada. The Minister of Finance has declared war to the provinces and it will be fought on the backs of the people. The minister keeps passing the federal fiscal problems on to the provinces instead of dealing with them, and all the Canadian people will have to pay for that.

[English]

This budget continues the Conservative's shameful dismantling of national symbols and programs. Once again the Tories have slashed transfer payments to the provinces in real dollars through a freeze on EPF.

Many people are not clear on how cuts in transfer payments will affect them. They are confused on the linkage between federal money to provinces and essential services such as education and health care. People must realize that when the Conservatives cut transfer payments, they cut beds from hospitals in Montreal. When they cut transfer payments, they lower the standard of education in our universities. Let us not be fooled by this government and this minister again.

The public has a right to know how this will affect their everyday lives. They have a right to know how this government has abandoned any notion of fairness and equity and has abandoned any hope of a compassionate and caring Canada.

[Translation]

The Mulroney government is ruining the Canadian health care system. Transfert payments for health and education were cut by $2.3 billion. Unless the provinces can manage to pay the costs, all the Minister of Finance has to offer is weakened and therefore inappropriate health care services. Again, we are faced with broken promises. We are witnessing the destruction of the most basic of things, things which characterize us as a nation and enable us to grow.

The Quebec Minister of Finance, Mr. Gérard-D. Levesque, said that the federal budget puts a heavy load on the government of Quebec by increasing its loss of revenues by $732 million for the next three years. And who will pay for that? The Minister of Finance and his friend the Prime Minister perhaps? How will the Mulroney government create jobs while, at the same time, cutting $100 million in the Canadian Job Strategy program?

Based on the government's own figures, the rate of unemployment will exceed 10 per cent nationally this year. Can the minister tell us how and when these unemployed can hope to go back to work if he is not seriously considering creating new jobs and strenghtening the economy?

I wonder if the minister could explain what strategy he has in mind for Quebec, where the unemployment rate is presently 12 per cent?

Mr. Speaker, another big promise made by this government was to increase Canada's competitiveness in the global environment. Did they keep their promise and, more importantly, do they intend to keep it?

If the Mulroney government wants Canada to grow and become world-class, it must give the country the tools to achieve this objective and not deprive it of its capacities as soon as the costs rise. Development requires investment.

Mr. Speaker, if I do not sound very optimistic, blame it on this less than encouraging budget.

[English]

At this point I would like to quote a few Canadians who do not necessarily approve of this new budget. So the message to the minister just might sink in. I quote:

> The federal government capping transfer payments doesn't change people's needs.

Don Storch, Catholic School Service in Edmonton. I quote again:

> The government clearly does not want to take responsibility for their own made-in-Canada recession.

Gordon Wilson, President, Ontario Federation of Labour.

It seems that wherever we go, whomever we ask, the response is always the same: this budget is only a hurting budget, penalizing the middle and low classes of our society.

How can this government seriously say it wants to build unity in this country when it keeps creating tensions by cutting jobs, thus helping in the escalation of intolerance and racism?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, government members could answer that on the contrary they are working for harmony in this country. Three bills have been shelved since the fall of 1990, namely an Act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, an Act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, and an Act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

In the years to come, Mr. Speaker, literacy and harmony in racial relations will be corner stones of the consolidation of this country, Canada. If we sincerely believe that together we must build a better world, the Mulroney government has to promise that it will not dismantle tomorrow what it is building today.

[English]

If the present budget seems fairly good for multiculturalism, one must not overlook the fact that it is not overly generous. While the amount of money may have increased over all, so has the number of groups asking for help. Everyone will end up with less, making it much harder to survive.

This may really be this government's hidden agenda. I have questioned its commitment to multiculturalism in the past. Just a few days ago, the Minister of National Revenue was quoted in a newspaper in Scarborough, Ontario as saying that he was against multiculturalism. What does this mean? Is this the government's new stance on multi?

The Minister of Finance has, if we look more closely at the figures, cut in funds to be distributed to groups and organizations working toward race relations and cross-cultural understanding.

The minister could tell us there are now funds for the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and he would be right, but the grass root groups should not be penalized because of the creation of a new foundation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we must keep a close watch on this government, for it seems to have a tendency to rob Paul to pay Peter. We must make sure that Canadian multiculturalism becomes a reality with which Canadian men and women from coast to coast can live in harmony. We will never achieve that through cut-backs. And all we can see now is the tip of the iceberg.

When will this government understand that this is not the way to keep the country united?

Mr. Speaker, the people have had enough listening to the same promises which are invariably forgotten the minute they have been made. They are tired of paying for the mistakes of others. The country is in the midst of a crisis and this budget does not do a thing to improve the situation.

As Le Soleil reporter Jean-Jacques Samson put it last February 27, "In so doing the federal government strikes a low blow against its partners, the provinces".

[English]

It is indecent that Canadians have had to support 33 increases in taxes. It is a miracle that Canadians have not revolted yet, or maybe they have. Maybe this is one more reason for Quebec to question this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Mulroney government advocates Canadian unity—yes, advocates—while at the same time it slashes into everything that is essential to achieve that unity and throws another 1.4 million people out of work. It increases unemployment insurance contributions but not the benefits, then it cuts $411 million off the social housing program. Again I repeat that in so doing the federal government strikes a low blow against its partners, the provinces.

• (1910)

[English]

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, congratulations to my colleague from the Liberal Party because I concur with just about everything she has said.

We are speaking to the borrowing authority and we do not argue that the government has to borrow money with which to run the country, but we certainly disagree with the direction in which this government is taking us.

I read a very appropriate comment today from the Minister of Finance suggesting that he appreciates or feels for the people on welfare in Ontario, but he has no idea how the government is going to deal with those people. I suggest it is almost a Pontius Pilate kind of an attitude: We wash our hands; it is not our responsibility; we pass it to the province, and the province in turn will probably have to pass much of that load on to the municipalities and neither of which can really control or handle these financial responsibilities at this time in the midst of a recession.

This government has continually come out with budgets without any creativity, no positive initiatives whatsoever. It is a litany after litany of cuts. And what does a country want in a time of recession? It wants some optimism. It wants assistance from the government, some hope for the future. Instead the government says: "No, I can't help you. We can't help you". It is an abdication of all responsibility to the people of this country. It provides no direction except the direction which brings us into an ever deepening recession.

They say if it hurts now, wait until we bring in the budget. They have brought it in and it shall hurt ever so much more.

What is the role of the government in difficult times? Well, people look for this hope, for this encouragement, for optimism. This government is bankrupting us not only financially, but they are bankrupt in any concept of positive ideas. They have no imagination.

May I suggest—and I am not ashamed to be political at this point in time to say that the Ontario government has taken a different approach to the recession in Ontario—they have responded positively. They are spending $700 million in job initiatives in the province and in my community of Sault Ste. Marie which is suffering. The largest employer in our community has a six-month reprieve and we hope that through the actions of everyone, including the federal government, that Algoma Steel will have a long and prosperous future.

But there are two concepts here. The New Democrats in Ontario are saying: "We are willing to offer you some help. We will create some jobs for you". This government says: "We can't. We cannot do anything for you in the difficult times".

I will tell you one thing they did do. They increased the unemployment insurance premiums by 20 per cent which people in my community will truly appreciate after having been on strike for 16 weeks and still almost having to go to the Supreme Court. In fact it was the Supreme Court ruling that eventually freed up three weeks unemployment insurance for those people who had been on strike for 16 weeks. So what is the government's answer to unemployment insurance? We will jack up the premiums. We will make it ever more difficult for you to get unemployment, but we will also increase the premiums at the same time.

How about tackling unemployment. The government's suggestion is: "We will attack unemployment by reducing $100 million in the Canadian Jobs Strategy". That is a bizarre way of handling unemployment. How about putting a 5 per cent cap on the have provinces, the have provinces of which Ontario is supposedly one? For a long time we probably were but right now we are suffering more probably than any province.

If we take a look at the statistics of welfare in Metro Toronto in January, there were 73,846 cases of general welfare in Metro, representing 117,000 men, women and children. That is an 11 per cent increase over December and an 83 per cent increase over a year ago. Thank God we are one of the have provinces and not one of the have-nots.

This government suggested that we are going to take this revenue neutral revenue from the GST, the revenue neutral tax, and we are going to put it toward deficit reduction.

A lot of my constituents have suggested that is a reasonable idea. It is probably quite acceptable, but we say: "Why not take the moneys realized at this point in time and tackle the recession to give people some hope?"

This government has done nothing but make us feel guilty. We are not competitive. We make too much money. We are not skilled. We are not efficient enough. We just cannot compete.

Is the answer for us all these negative initiatives by the government, instead of introducing anything positive? What have they offered in the way of hope? What have they offered in the way of help? An absolute zilch.

I like to turn to Tommy Douglas in every speech. I think he always had an appropriate comment, and this one I think is most appropriate at this point in time: "Surely if we can produce in such abundance in order to destroy our enemies, we can produce in equal abundance in order to provide food, clothing and shelter for our children. If we keep people employed for the purpose of destroying human life, surely we can keep them employed for the purpose of enriching and enhancing human life".

We spend $600 million in a war, but we cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy. I do not think Canadians have any reason to apologize, to be abused or to be frightened about tomorrow's security. We are rich. We are proud. We did control our resources. We have our doubts now. We have lost much of what we had because of this government. This budget has in no way offered any assistance to any Canadians.

If we talk about the profligate waste of taxpayers' money, this government could not even put together a commission on unity in the country, despite the fact it is going to spend $27 million. Imagine forming a forum, a commission on unity that falls apart unto itself after having spent or will have spent $27 million.

This government talks about fiscal responsibility. That is total hogwash. It is total hypocrisy and it is not acceptable to anyone in this country.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate tonight on the government's borrowing bill and the general economic policy.

This year's budget comes a very critical time in our nation's history. Today Canada's national government is confronted not only with serious economic issues, but also with grave political considerations about the future of our country itself.

Whether it is a question of Canada's deficit or of Canada's destiny, the people of this country are turning to Ottawa for leadership.

The government's budget is probably the best indication of what this government has in mind for the country. The Prime Minister can make all the speeches he likes. He can talk about national unity. He can talk about educational excellence and about the environment, but the real test is what the government offers Canadians in a 200–page document called the budget.

Since taking office in 1984, the government's speeches and its budgets have not squared. The Prime Minister talks about national unity while the finance minister makes cuts to CBC, VIA Rail and closes rural post offices across this country. The Prime Minister talks about putting people first while his finance minister cuts job training programs and provincial transfers for education. The Prime Minister talks about leaving a clean environment for the next generation while the finance minister makes cuts to the green plan by $600 million in the next five years.

When Canadians hear the Prime Minister talk about his vision of the future of our country, they need look no further than last Tuesday's budget.

• (1920)

This budget speaks louder than any opposition member of Parliament could ever speak about how this government is failing to deal with the problems that confront Canada today.

I want to state right now, for the record, that I certainly recognize the need for the government to achieve lower budget deficit, lower interest rates and a lower dollar. I agree completely with these aims.

What I cannot accept is the government throwing up its hands in the air, passing the problems onto the provinces, the sick, the unemployed, the homeless or the students who are in charge of our future.

Not only have Canadians been asked to make sacrifices, they cannot even be sure that the sacrifices this government is asking them to make will actually do as much good as the government claims.

There is plenty of evidence, in previous budgets for example, to suggest that this budget's projections for the deficit and the interest rate for inflation are a way off base. This lack of credibility makes it very hard for Canadians to accept the medicine that this government is forcing on them.

During January and February, the Liberal task force on the economy held hearings all across this country. We held hearings because we wanted to hear, firsthand, what Canadians had to say about the state of the economy, about their own particular situation and we wanted to listen to any suggestions they had.

We went to approximately 35 communities across this country from North River, Prince Edward Island to northern Ontario, from London, Ontario to Vancouver, British Columbia. We listened, we took notes, and we will use that material from these hearings as we develop our own economic policies.

The input this task force received on Prince Edward Island was extremely useful, providing what might be called a yardstick against which this government's budget may be compared.

This 1991 federal budget cuts across a wide variety of interests, from students to small business, from low income housing to the environment. The largest cut to my province of Prince Edward Island, in terms of dollars, was obviously in the transfer payments for education and health.

To give a little bit of background, the previous Liberal government in 1977 concluded an agreement with the provinces, whether they would pay each province so much per capita based on how the economy was growing.

Not long after taking office, this government decided that it would change that, so it limited transfers to the provinces at first by a couple of percentage points. Then, it froze the transfers of cash altogether. That freeze continues to this day and it will continue according to this budget until 1996.

This latest budget wipes out over $2 billion in support for provincial health and education. In terms of Prince Edward Island, the 1991 budget trims approximately $17 million of Prince Edward Island's potential budget for education and health for the next three years alone.

This lost revenue from Ottawa has to be picked up somewhere. The province has to do that either by increasing taxes, or by reducing services. It has to get the money somewhere. Maybe, it will mean that the universities will have to increase tuition fees.

More important than the money is what reduced spending on education will mean to the future of the province and the country. How important is education? I want to quote a well-known politician:

> People are Canada's most important resource. That is why we are going to focus more and more of our attention and resources on long-term investment in people, education, literacy and the upgrading of skills.

That is a quote from Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, speaking in Calgary, April 5, 1990.

I know that my time is getting short. I just want to end by saying that Canadians are looking to their national government for leadership and especially during times like this; times of recession and especially when our national future is at stake, this need becomes even greater. But what this government has shown again in the budget, is that it is unable to provide that leadership.

Canadians expect better. Canadian deserves better. After the next election and the swearing in of a new Liberal government, Canadians will receive better.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to join the debate this evening on the budget.

This budget is a continuation of all the previous budgets introduced by this Minister of Finance and the government. I am afraid he was wrong when he first introduced a budget after being elected to the government in 1984, as he is wrong today. It is a wrong attitude; it is a wrong philosophy; it is a wrong direction. I think the results of each of the budgets have indicated how wrong the direction of the government is.

Rather than reducing deficits, we have seen our deficits grow until now, in terms of our accumulated deficit, it is well over $400 billion. We have seen our taxes increase, particularly the taxes of ordinary Canadian men and women. We have seen government services, public services being drastically reduced, budget after budget after budget. It is a downscaling of government. A tremendous redistribution of wealth is occurring, because it means that ordinary working people are paying more and getting less.

As a New Democrat, I have no objection to fighting the deficit. As a New Democrat, I see the interest payments we pay every year as a redistribution of wealth to the more well-to-do. Because it is only the banks, financial institutions and those individuals who hold bonds that benefit from our deficit. We see a distribution of billions of dollars every year from the public coffers to those individuals. So fighting the deficit is no problem for me.

To be sure, it is a problem that was created by the Liberal regime, particularly when Mr. Turner was the Minister of Finance. They thought they would have the quick fix by allowing all sorts of tax deductions for large corporations, assuming that the extra wealth the corporations would get would be reinvested and create more jobs, expand plants and create more wealth.

We knew back then it did not work quite that way. Unfortunately, the Tories are even more so committed to the notion of the trickle-down theory, of giving special tax breaks and concessions to the wealthy and to the large corporations while fighting the deficit on the backs of the elderly, the young, working men and women, farmers and fishermen of this country.

It is wrong. It is morally wrong and it is economically wrong. It makes no sense whatsoever.

The Minister of Finance has charged that New Democrats just bicker and we do not have any solutions. Well, we do have solutions. I was on the finance committee when we went through the process of tax reform and, out of that process, the New Democratic Party presented a report on tax reform, which is our solutions to the problems.

• (1930)

At that time I also stated, both in committee and publicly, that if we are going to have genuine tax reform in this country, we must also have a measure of political reform. If we are going to have genuine tax reform it should be done by including all of the political parties, working together to come up with a tax scheme that would be fair and effective.

The Minister of Finance rejected our proposals, as he rejected the many excellent proposals of the finance committee itself. This Minister of Finance, in his stubbornness, his Department of Finance with the bureaucrats in their stubbornness, insisted that the proposals they had laid forward in tax reform were it or nothing else. In that proposal they made many projections.

I remember how the Minister of Finance assured us in committee that he had plugged up the loopholes that resulted in not one major life insurance company in this country paying a cent of tax for over a decade. He assured us that he had plugged up the loopholes that saw, for example, in a case in 1983 of one bank where a teller at that bank paid more actual dollars and cents in taxes than the bank did, even though the bank had over $300–some million in profits.

However, when the figures came in and the real world was discovered, the insurance companies and the banks had found other ways in and around his regulations and they were no good. He had to finally back down and accept some of the proposals that were made by the finance committee.

Had the Minister of Finance heeded the advice, and had we, on the finance committee, been able to come forward with a package of genuine tax reform, including the reform of the sales tax and the corporate tax as well as the income tax, it would not have been a package that all the Conservatives, all the Liberals and all the New Democrats would have been happy with, but it would have been a package that would have had the political commitment of all the political parties behind it and it would have been a package that would have ensured fairness in our tax system.

Instead, tax reform has been a dismal failure of this government. Rather than plugging up those loopholes, we see the amount of taxes being paid by the corporate sector, but particularly certain segments of the corporate sector, i.e. the financial institutions and the real estate developers still not paying their fair share of taxes.

Let me come back to the point I mentioned earlier. I have no problem fighting the deficit; indeed, we have to reduce the deficit. But let us reduce the deficit in a fair and equitable manner. The record of this government is its unfairness as it tackles the problem of the deficit.

We see in this budget a further erosion of medicare and further cutbacks which will affect our post–secondary education. These are investments in the country. These are investments in the future, particularly post–secondary education. It means that our youngsters will have less of an opportunity in the future. It means what this Minister of Finance calls down–scaling, passing on the burden to the provinces. The provinces in turn will cut back and pass the burden on to municipalities.

This country has developed marvellous social programs in health and education over the years. Often it was this party forcing the Liberals when they were in the minority situation to enact certain progressive steps. But the aim of this government is to destroy all of that. And for what? What are we to be left with? We have a country in ruin. We have political dissent and economic chaos. We have people unemployed. There is no sense of confidence in the economy of this country. Our infrastructure is being depleted. Our education system, our post–secondary education institutions are crumbling. There is no sense of hope and future and confidence by Canadians. That is the result of the budgets of the Minister of Finance.

For heaven's sake, Minister of Finance, for the sake of Canadians, for the sake of the future, resign.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be here on this very nice night.

I want to speak to this borrowing bill which fits into this government's whole economic agenda. It is an agenda that is leading us down the road to deconfederation.

At the same time that peace in the Persian Gulf is around the corner, if it is not actually here already, this Conservative government has decided to declare war on Canada and the people of Canada, the unemployed and the regions of Canada that are really very hard hit by this recession.

This Conservative government has allowed Canada to drift. Not only has it allowed it to drift, but it has actually admitted to causing this first made–in–Canada recession, and this budget does absolutely nothing to help our economy back on track.

We understand that the deficit is a very serious problem and the debt is a very serious problem. We have no problem in dealing with that. But what we are worried about is how can one deal with that kind of a deficit and a debt when there are no jobs, when corporations, especially small businesses are all losing their shirts, they are not paying any tax and, therefore, the deficit will grow even larger.

This government has practically strangled employment opportunities as a result of maintaining high interest rates and a high dollar. This government has introduced the GST, an expensive and very complex tax which is also very regressive, especially for the regions of the country. It increases inflation. As a matter of fact, in January we had a very massive increase in inflation.

Now that this government has brought us into this recession—by its own admission, they tell us it was a planned recession— it has turned its back on us. At a time when the government predicts that unemployment will rise to 10 per cent, the government has cut spending on job creation and has increased unemployment insurance premiums. If there was one area in which I would have liked to have seen some government interference it would have been in job creation projects.

I come from the riding of Sudbury. In the early 1980s when this country went through a very serious recession, we probably were the hardest hit of all the regions of the country. We had unemployment rates in excess of 28 to 30 per cent of our population. I was a business person in the community at that time. They were terrible, terrible times. But I must say that the government intervened; government helped us out. Today, Sudbury is a very viable community; actually, we are probably one of the bright spots of the country.

I would say to the people on the government side that that is because the government invested dollars, and the dollars invested at that time have now produced tremendous benefits. We are now paying our own way now and we are very happy to do so. The thing that bothers us is that we see this government turning its back on other areas that might need it very much.

Ultimately, it is the Canadian taxpayer who will pay for the Conservative mismanagement of our economy. Canadian employees and businesses are being made to pay more in unemployment insurance premiums now that the government no longer contributes to the unemployment insurance program.

• (1940)

In addition, the provinces and municipalities will either pass on the pain to their taxpayers or they will drastically reduce services that the federal government is now refusing to pay for.

The Minister of Finance now expects Canadians to trust his budget and his fiscal policies to bring Canada out of the economic doldrums and into prosperity. After almost seven years in office during which Canada shared with the rest of the western economies almost unprecedented economic growth and despite having resorted to 30, 32 or 33 different tax increases, paid largely by the middle and lower income Canadians, the Minister of Finance has failed in bringing the deficit under control. In fact, he has managed to double the federal debt while at the economic control.

This is the same Minister of Finance who told Canadians in 1985 that the deficit in 1991 would be $18 billion. Last week, he announced that he was really doing a good job because he was going to hold it at $30.5 billion over the next couple of years. How can we believe his prediction? He says one thing, but the next year he revises all the time.

This is also the same Minister of Finance who told us the GST would have a minimal impact on inflation. Inflation in January jumped to 6.8 per cent, the largest increase in inflation in 33 years. Now he expects Canadians to believe that inflation will be at 3.2 per cent in 1992 and he predicts interest rates at 9 per cent. How, pray tell, can he have inflation at 3.2 per cent if interest rates are still that high?

The Minister of Finance continues to insist that his fiscal policies are necessary to ensure Canada's competitiveness in international markets. How can Canadian businesses compete under this Minister of Finance's high interest rate, high dollar economic policies? What happened to the Prime Minister's pledge to invest in Canada's future?

Canada's future lies in research and development, and in the education of our young people. How can we compete when the government is cutting funding for post-secondary education, and research and development? The Tories have attacked the bonds that hold us together as a nation. Our social programs are among the only things that bind us together now from coast to coast.

At a time when the government should be strengthening national unity, it is weakening what is considered to be one of the best national social safety nets in the world.

It has made drastic cuts to national institutions such as the CBC, and now the Prime Minister seems prepared to give away more and more of the federal government's powers to the province.

Let me get back to the CBC. The government always tells us that it is cutting these things to save money. Now, we have just heard with the Supplementary Estimates that it is going to cost $48 million because of the cuts that it made last time around. It is not really saving any money. It is just destroying the country, because everything it does seems to cost a lot more than it predicts.

The only thing that this budget has succeeded in doing is to pit public servants and Canadians in general one against the other. Someone once said that the true moral test of government is how it treats those in the dawn of life, the children. There is nothing in this budget for the children. In fact, it will increase their poverty. There is no day care. There is absolutely no consideration to these people in our community.

The true moral test of government is how it treats those who are in the twilight of life, the aged. This government has clawed back on old age pensions. Name it. It would do much worse if the Canadian people had let it. Because of one lady in particular who said: "No more, Charlie Brown. No way, Charlie Brown," it decided to change its mind. It is still continuing when we think of medicare. That will really hurt those who most need it.

The true moral test of government is how it treats those who are in the shadow of life; the sick, the needy, the disadvantaged. Just think in terms of what this government is doing to things like welfare programs. It may not be doing it directly, but it is asking the provinces to do its dirty work for them.

It is asking the civil servants to turn against their own co-workers, to decide whether they should have an increase in their wages. Heaven help us. We are all faced with the same increases; they are also. They have to choose between giving themselves an increase or firing their brother. What kind of a government is so heartless that it would ask someone to do that, instead of doing and making the decisions itself. I would think that this government would have the guts to stand up and say that it perhaps does not need this particular department. If that is what it wants to do, then do it.

This government has 46 ministries. Why does any government in Canada need 46 ministries, or 43 ministries, or whatever the number is? In the United States they have 10 or 15 ministries and they have a population that so far outranks ours that it is unbelievable. If they can do it with 10 or 15 ministers, why can't we? Let's practise what we preach and let's do something for Canadians and not just the idea of what Conservatives can do for themselves.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to speak for a short time on the borrowing bill. What I would like to do is to attack this from the perspective of a number of other speeches that I have made in the just over two years that I have been a member of this House; and that is from the angle of what is happening to our country, what I have seen happening to the country, and what the people that I have spoken to across the country have told me is happening to the country, in their minds.

Let me quote from the budget speech, starting where the Finance Ministers tells us right off the bat that:

> —this is a strong budget—a budget for economic recovery.

He then goes on to say that:

> Our Plan for Economic Recovery is different from those in previous recessions.

And he finally concludes by saying:

> We all wish to see a strong, united and prosperous Canada. Our Plan for Economic Recovery will help us achieve that goal.

It saddens me to have to say that what I have seen in this budget is a continuation of those policies that have ripped the guts out of everything in Canada that all of us have grown to love and cherish.

I would like to read some sections from an article in The Globe and Mail, written by Geoffrey York. In that, the Roman Catholic bishops warn that:

> An economic transformation is turning Canada into a "deeply fragmented and polarized society" whose people are divided against themselves.

I will come back to that statement in a couple of minutes. They further say that:

> The shift to low-paying, part-time jobs is transforming Canada into a society polarized "between rich and poor, urban and rural, women and men, older and younger workers, white and non-white".

They further say that:

> This is worsening the phenomenon of the gap between the rich and the poor.

And finally, Tony Clarke, director of the social affairs department of the Catholic bishops, said:

> —ordinary Canadians have felt one blow after another. This week's federal budget will probably worsen the situation for working people in Canada."
> They said the government has "largely abandoned job creation efforts, while cutting social programs and reducing transfer payments for health, education and social assistance."

The bishops in that are dead on the mark. That is exactly what we have seen in the three budgets that I have debated in this House. It is the policies that started with the Conservatives taking power in 1984 and have continued, where the policies of this government are established by the wealthy, the 5 per cent of the wealthy, the poor get poorer and the middle class, as has been shown by StatsCanada in a recent study by the Fraser Institute, are paying more and more in taxation. Their actual after-tax income is dropping substantially. Everything points to the widening of that gap.

I said that I would return to the shift to low-paying part-time jobs. What we have seen, and we talk of job creation when we come to this place, we hear the government constantly telling us how many jobs they have created, and what seems to be happening is more and more of the industrial jobs seem to be either drying up or moving south of the border. More and more we are getting into the service-oriented jobs, the "McJobs", the jobs that are lower paying. The incomes are falling. The young people with families are having a harder time getting employment that is able to keep their family to any type of a standard of living. Some of these younger families are forced to have two jobs, three jobs, and four jobs just trying to keep up with their every day and day-to-day expenses.

What this government has done is heap upon them the goods and services tax. Now in this budget after getting hit with that we have increases in unemployment insurance, cutbacks in the Canada Assistance Plan, capping of that particular plan, the Established Programs Financing. All of these filter down, part of what has been or appears to be the plan, and has been the plan I would suggest, for the six years that this government has been in power.

What happens when the unemployment insurance rates go up? What happens when there is capped funding on the Canada Assistance Plan or the Established Programs Financing? Well, we either cut back on the programs or we force the provinces and the municipalities to increase their taxes.

Once again, who gets hit by those taxes? Who does not have tax breaks? Well it is the middle-income and the lower-income people. If the province passes these on to the municipalities then it is the property owners who end up paying once again.

Interestingly enough, the unemployment insurance increases hit directly at those property owners and renters in all municipalities across Canada and particularly in rural Canada. The biggest employers in small towns such as Osoyoos, Oliver, Okanagan Falls, Penticton, Summerland; places in my riding, Grand Forks, Princeton, Merritt, are the hospitals, the school districts, and the municipalities.

They have to get their money. They cannot deficit finance as the federal government has done. They have to have their money up front and they have to get their money through property taxation. Who foots the bill for the property taxes in rural Canada? Well, it is usually the middle-income and lower-income people through rent and through property taxes, once again whittling that away.

Also getting hit in this is the small business community and I think as we all know, as has been said time and again in the House and by others, 80 per cent of the employment over the last 10 years has been created by the small business community.

And what has happened to them in this budget? Once again, falling to them will be increases in unemployment insurance. The GST has hit them and hit them strong and hard.

In my riding tourism is a major industry. We know that tourism has already started to fall off and will fall continuously. In the area next to the border the perception that is out there of the added cost is forcing people down below the borders to shop, again hurting the small business retailers in the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, all through the Okanagan as a matter of fact, and I would suggest all across Canada within 100 miles of the border at least.

One thing that hits hard and hits hard at all of us is cuts in Canadian Jobs Strategy. These are programs that we have used well in rural Canada. They have helped us at times of high unemployment. In my riding the unemployment rate is approximately 17 per cent adjusted, unadjusted substantially higher than that. But we use these programs and use them very effectively to assist people in retraining, to re-enter the job market. That is being cut, and being cut substantially.

What we have seen in this budget is more pie in the sky. Our Minister of Finance tells us: "We are going to get inflation down. We are going to fight inflation. We want to see a strong and united Canada". Well, what we have here is a formula for failure. A formula for failure politically. A formula for failure economically and a formula for failure socially.

We will continue to speak out, present alternatives and speak out very strongly against this government's attack on the middle-income, low-income earners and on the poor.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate this opportunity to address the borrowing authority bill before the House. It really is a mechanism that begins the process of implementing this government's policy, this government's budget policy and this government's expression and vision for the future. In a sense, when you see and read this budget, it expresses the narrow ideological, market-driven agenda of this government. It does not in any way, even pretend to respond to the real needs of the ordinary people out there in the countryside; the woman who is concerned about child care, the women who is on the job market and worried about whether she is going to still have a job, the man in his mid-forties to early fifties who has built a career and now finds that his job is gone and he is out of sync with the needs and qualifications called for in the marketplace. That is the ordinary bread and butter issue. Can I pay my mortgage rates? Can I meet my car payment? Have I enough money, if I am in a different bracket, to pay for my RRSP? All the ordinary things that ordinary people think about and worry about and we often forget about, standing here talking in this House of Commons.

At some point, in the few minutes that I have, I want to address some of the issues around the cultural sector. I just wanted to bring to the attention of the House that it is unfortunate, but this is not a budget of hope. It is not a budget delivered at the right time with the right message. It is a budget that tries to put the brakes on an economy that is already in a tailspin. It is a budget that steps backward in many, many areas, and fails to address, as I say, the ordinary needs of the people of this country in a balanced way and deal with the social inequities that have come about through a number of issues; whether it was the free trade agreement that has not given us a level playing field, whether it is the made-in-Canada recession or whether it is a very poor tax policy that has increased taxes unconscionably on middle income earners, pushing them down towards the lower-income level.

When you have a policy that has a high interest rate and has kept our dollar ridiculously high and then expect to have our people compete, both nationally and internationally, and do not give people the skills they require, I ask: What is expected and what kind of a message is this government sending to the country?

The lack of investment in Canadian research and development, the lack of any kind of commitment to transfer of technology when we deal with countries which come in here to do business, without any commitment to put back into this wonderful society that this government inherited, is a pretty sad lack of vision and condemnation of the lack of foresight of the leadership across this floor.

How are we supposed to be dealing with these social inequities in this budget? The last seven years have been really nice, healthy growing years for the economy and for business. People have done well. Yet, during this time of prosperity, we have not been able to work down our national deficit and accumulated debt. When we were not able to do this in the fat years, if I may call them that, and now we want to try and do it during the lean years, it seems to me that there is a peculiar mental block in this government about figuring out the priorities at the right time and in the right way.

If the government could not address the social inequities at a time of prosperity, do you think this is the time to do it? If it did not address them then, when will it?

The budget was the opportune moment to right some of the wrongs this government committed. I fear that the moment has been lost. It has not in any way indicated any desire to rebuild the infrastructure that it has cut to pieces—VIA Rail, Air Canada, Petro-Canada, all those things that linked this country—or the CBC, which it has systematically destroyed over the last seven years.

Then we move to the GST, a tax that the Canadian people did not want. They said it time and time again; every Gallup Poll showed they did not want this tax. It was not the idea of taxes. People understand that to have social programs, to have social contracts, to do certain things in arts and culture, they have to pay taxes, that the money has to come from somewhere.

To have the money come from imposing a tax that is so regressive, that is so hurtful, that brought about increased inflation, that is ridiculous in some of its in and out administration, that put 3,000 new people in there and has caught the eyes and ears of the world, how on earth can Canadians have any confidence in a finance minister and a government that plan in this way?

I say to you it has imposed a tax that is unconscionable. In supplementary spending estimates there is a requirement for $180 million to complete the implementation of this tax. In fact, if you look at the $559 million extra in supplementary spending that was just tabled by the minister, you will see that the biggest chunk of new money is for the GST.

The Department of National Revenue receives an extra $153.5 million for planning and administering the tax, while the Department of Public Works receives an additional $24.5 million to provide GST related office space, and the Department of Finance receives an extra $2.3 million for GST inquiries and communications. Add that to the $365.8 million in GST related spending in the Supplementary Estimates last November, and yesterday's estimates bring the cost of planning and implementing the GST and the related tax credit for low income Canadians in 1990 to a total of $546.1 million. That is more than double the estimate of $260 million in GST administration costs that were included in the February 1990 budget. I think it is absolutely scandalous.

What do we have from the seven-year term of this Conservative government, as reflected in this budget, but a national debt that has now doubled, as I already talked about, and very high inflation.

This government said that it, when it took power, would make the economy more competitive. But we have slipped dramatically in the OECD ratings and lost hundreds of thousands of manufacturing jobs, including hundreds, maybe thousands in my own riding.

There is nothing new in this budget to give people who are hurting any hope. The food banks are busier than ever, people are losing homes and businesses, and families are struggling to make ends meet; and this government has the nerve to tell us that Canadians ought to toughen up, stay the course, tighten their belts. It makes me wonder what world the government is living in.

I had wanted to address the government's cut of $100 million to the Canadian Jobs Strategy program, to talk about its watering down of the funding for the green plan—so much for environmental commitment, which is the concern for tomorrow. I wanted to talk about the 15 per cent cut in social housing, which I consider heartless, and the increase of UI premiums again—that is a tax increase. I think it is up 24 per cent, although that could be an inaccurate figure.

To top it all off, this has followed six years of prosperity. All in all, I would suggest to our young people looking to go into the marketplace that there is not much hope at this moment. We have cut money in all those areas and we have cut investment in research and development. This budget dashes hopes for many, many thousands of Canadians.

Let us look at the cultural dossier for a couple of minutes. Looking at it you can really become heartsick. Canadians deserve better. The culture of a country defines it on the international map, on the global world stage.

The cultural community is in the forefront of the development of all nations, this nation no more and no less than any other nation. It is an area for innovation, creativity and resourcefulness. I suggest to you that this is what is lacking in terms of the vision this country should have, that this budget should have for cultural development.

I am not going to talk about the savaging of the CBC. It goes without saying. There is $45 million in the budget to help with the severance pay. Telefilm, which allows us to see ourselves on film, has been cut to the tune of $28 million over the next five years. Canada Council is frozen, and they have lost close to $20 million over the last four or five years. The ballet-opera house lost the federal government's promise of $88 million. The Edmonton concert hall, and the Montreal concert hall, those have also been cut.

I am not the least bit sorry about the $45 million in the cultural research institute because that could have gone another way.

Other budget items have been of serious concern to all of us. That $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy is unconscionable at this time.

The last point I want to make is the fact that prior to the budget of the Minister of Finance the federal government had earmarked $50 million for training in the cultural sector. What is happening? What does that mean for our arts and our cultural institutions? I think that it is very sad.

I would just quote Jay Stone of The Ottawa Citizen who said: "You can tell a lot about a government by how it spends it money. In fact you can tell everything. Just follow the dollar signs to the heart of policy and a dark heart it is for those of us with some passing interest in culture, dark and mysterious, and with a slight, little murmur that might be the faraway sounds of public opinion dropping gently on the ground". It is a sad day for Canada.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, this is not a budget. This is a political indictment against the aspirations of working men and women in Canada. It is an attack on the very foundations of this country and an assault on the pillars of our Canadian way of life. This budget attacks our system of universal health care, it attacks the foundations of our post-secondary educational institutions and it attacks our whole system of income assistance.

The Minister of Finance when he announced the budget said there were no new taxes. But this budget itself is a hidden tax on all working Canadians because it is a pass the buck budget. It passes it over to the provinces and it lets the provinces and the taxpayers of those individual provinces deal with the difficulties that this budget has caused. The government, through this budget, is relinquishing its own authority, almost through default, by passing its responsibility to the provinces.

With respect to unemployment insurance, last year the government announced that it was getting out of the unemployment insurance program. It passed over the responsibility of funding that program to the small business community and to the workers. When it passed the buck to the businesses and to the workers last year, the minister promised that should there be future shortfalls in the funding the government would make up the difference. But this budget puts the lie to that promise because the workers and the business community now find that they are going to have to make up that extra cost.

One hundred million dollars out of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, which is a program that works well. As my colleague from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt was saying earlier, it creates a lot of job opportunities in areas like the interior of British Columbia, and it is a program whose funding, the minister last year assured this House, was secure. Another broken promise.

There is a lot of big talk by this government about the need to be competitive. Yet at the same time it neglects the job training skills and funding for job upgrading that will allow our workers and our young people to get the kind of training they need to be competitive in this global marketplace.

• (2010)

The capping of the extended program funding will force the provinces again to make up the difference. The financial assistance to the provinces for health care services and for post-secondary education was traditionally provided by the federal government. This program has been attacked time and time again in a succession of Tory budgets. In B.C. alone over the next five years we are going to lose $911 million out of post-secondary and health care funding because of the continual erosion.

The finance minister has said that a steady declining federal contribution will greatly exaggerate and aggravate the provincial problem of funding these programs.

Extending the Canada Assistance Plan 5 per cent ceiling is again passing the buck over to the provinces, forcing the provinces to make up the difference.

Some $600 million was stolen out of the green plan initiative, an initiative heralded by this government as being its commitment to environmental integrity in Canada. Now it is watering it down once again, with another $600 million being taken out of it.

There seems to be no bottom line with this government when it comes to expenditures for war, but there is certainly a bottom line for everything else. That $600 million, I understand, is going to fund the cost of the Department of National Defence in both the Oka crisis and the gulf war crisis. But why did it have to come out of the environmental initiatives?

The only sector in this country that has not been asked to make a sacrifice on the altar of restraint is the corporate sector. Not one tax break has been discontinued. Not one loophole has been closed. Not one initiative has been taken to get the corporate elite of Canada to pay its fair share.

If we had simply disallowed the deduction for business lunches, the three martini lunches, we could have saved over a billion dollars in revenue for this government. Introducing a minimum corporate tax could have reclaimed billions more.

In 1987—and these are Statistics Canada figures—93,000 profitable corporations in this country paid no taxes whatsoever on combined profits of some $27 billion, with a capital b, no tax. The government continues to be oblivious of the need for real tax reform. It does not care that the burden has been shifted to the shoulders of ordinary working men and women in Canada.

I want to point out that in 1950 individuals and corporations across this land contributed equal amounts, 50/50, to the taxes, toward Canada's coffers. Since that time the corporate share of taxation in this country has dropped to 14 per cent, whereas the tax burden for working men and women in Canada has increased to over 84 per cent.

When this government's friends in Canada's corporate community demand a reduction in the deficit, they never talk about shouldering more of this tax burden that they have been relieved of since 1950. No, they talk about the need to cut social spending, the need to trim health care, income assistance and unemployment insurance. The Tory government, time and time again, falls over itself in attempts to accommodate them.

Cuts to health care, cuts to unemployment insurance, cuts to post-secondary education, cuts to job training, cuts to income assistance, cuts to environmental initiatives, cuts, cuts, cuts, but never one corporate loophole closed. It is a Tory corporate agenda to harmonize our social and political system by taking it down to the market driven level of our U.S. neighbour.

When a business gets public money or a corporate bailout is needed to save another megacorporation, they call that a vital incentive, but when a single mother gets public money to help feed a child, that is a welfare frill.

Last year alone, over 160,000 jobs vanished in our manufacturing industry. Trident Limited, an auto parts manufacturer, accepted a $2 million giveaway, a grant from the federal government to help create Canadian jobs. Then what did it do? It flitted down to Tennessee and thumbed its nose at Canada in light of the free trade agreement.

From 1970 to 1975 corporate profits in this country grew 100 per cent. They more than doubled again from 1975 to 1980, and they grew by half again from 1980 to 1985. In the decade between 1975 and 1985 corporate profits in Canada totalled over $305 billion. Now they shoulder only 12 per cent or 13 per cent of the total tax burden.

What happens at the first whiff of a recession? Profits are transferred to foreign parent companies and are paid as dividends to foreign shareholders. This increased by 150 per cent the last time the economy took a tailspin. Canada is being bled by the haemorrhaging of our tax dollars to foreign investment firms.

I know my time is limited. I just want to say that there is no question at all that we have a serious debt problem in Canada. There is no question that we have to deal with it, but who caused the debt?

Since Confederation to 1980, our total debt was $77 billion. Four years later, under the Liberal administration, that debt had grown to $187 billion. In the last six years alone, that debt has more than doubled to almost $400 billion. There is no argument that serious efforts have to be made in debt reduction, but this government has decided in order to make that debt reduction to ram it down the throats of ordinary working men and women in Canada. Canada to this government, just in summarizing, has become a marketplace; nothing more and nothing less.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise in the House this very day to speak to matters of the economy of particular importance to my constituents.

As always, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak, particularly on not just matters that are of concern to my constituents, but to all Canadians.

When the budget was tabled over a week ago, I thought of how the government has mismanaged the economy for seven consecutive years. Today, the standard of living in Canada has subsequently declined dramatically.

I sent a communiqué to my constituents on February 26 shortly after the Minister of Finance presented the budget, and I told my constituents that the budget had no surprises. Indeed, services will be decreased, programs will be cut, Canadians will be paying more in taxes, and the majority of the responsibility will be placed on the provincial, territorial and municipal governments, on small businesses, on consumers and on individual Canadians least able to pay for the federal government's mistakes. The government was spending out of control during the good years when the economy was expanding and is cutting back at the worst possible time, in the midst of a deep recession.

We still have that huge deficit. None of that jiggery-pokery, the so-called high falutin fiscal policy this government has put forward, has worked. It is a shame. Even this severe Conservative agenda has not worked.

I spent the week before the budget was presented in the west and in the north, in both the Northwest Territories and in Yukon, meeting with people as part of the Liberal task force on the recession and the economy. I am privileged to have shared first-hand the concerns and struggles which Canadians are having in their effort to survive another Tory budget. It is this information that I want to share with members in this House tonight. I will put that information in perspective with this seventh consecutive budget of no hope. I feel this especially in the north since we have the highest cost of living and no initiative to boost the economy of the north.

I would like the Minister of Finance to explain to Canadians why the deficit is still increasing and public debt is now out of control. All this government spending has produced nothing in new initiatives. There is no National Energy Strategy, no areas for job creation which would help to stimulate the economy, the environmental green plan is being delayed—this will have a detrimental impact on the north—there is no child care strategy—a promise Canadians have been waiting for since 1984, there is no regional development plan, and no money for training, nor research and development.

There are wage controls at a time when the cost of living is at a record high. This will be hard on northern workers. Trade unions will be threatened with job losses. The Arctic environment strategy will be delayed as may be the Canadian Polar Commission. Social housing and CMHC programs are reduced which will directly affect aboriginal people across Canada. Health programs and welfare and post-secondary education moneys are reduced. As usual, the poor people, the aboriginal people, and those unable to afford these reductions will be punished.

The budget does nothing to tackle the recession or to stimulate economic growth, and it does nothing for northerners. There is no recognition of the potential that the Arctic can contribute. The desperate need for northern infrastructure and the excessively high cost of living in the north have been ignored by the Mulroney government for the seventh budget in succession.

In the north the north engineering sustainable economic development in small northern communities is an enormous problem. Last night my colleague from Nu-natsiaq delivered his debate on the budget and described the monumental economic problems that northerners are confronting on a daily basis, really as a way of life.

My riding is the largest in North America, second only to my colleague from Nunatsiaq. In mid-February we travelled together from the small community on the Beaufort coast where I lived for many years, Tuktoyaktuk, in the Nunatsiaq riding, and then to a nearby town in the Mackenzie Delta, Inuvik.

In Tuktoyaktuk the people told us their town was broke. There were no jobs.

We went next to Inuvik which is in the Western Arctic riding, my riding. We then travelled on to Whitehorse and met with business people, miners, and trappers. From Yukon's capital we went to the capital of the Northwest Territories, Yellowknife, and finally to the southeast corner of my riding, a town at the beginning of the Mackenzie River, Hay River.

All told, the two territories encompass an area of 3.9 million square miles covering 40 per cent of Canada. The two territories are home to 79,000 Canadians living in some 100 communities.

I want to take a few minutes to quote from some of the northerners who made presentations to us about the state of the northern economy. In my mind no one says it as well as the people out there who are carrying the burden of a failing Canadian economy and particularly burdensome in the northern part of Canada where there is an extremely high cost of operating if you are in business, an extremely high cost of living if you are trying to eke out an existence in the rather remote parts of the north.

First of all in the town of Inuvik, Mr. Dick Hill of the Inuvik Chamber of Commerce said:

> There is a need for additional northern research support for responsible northern government and organizations so they can collect data and make creative decisions on projects with potential benefits. Effective environmental quality standards need to be set and enforced rather than setting up new commissions to fight projects. Arctic College should be involved to provide objective information collection and analysis. The federal creation of a Polar Commission staffed and based in the south does not make sense to polar residents.

The Hon. Gordon Wray, Minister of Economic Development and Tourism in Yellowknife, said:

> There remains a significant requirement, however, for federal investment in infrastructure to ensure the north can realize its vast potential.

Three, the Union of Northern Workers, Jim Evoy, stated:

> It is reported that Michael Wilson is considering wage controls in the Federal Public Service. We call on the Liberal Party to oppose such legislation. Wage controls in any sector is exactly the wrong policy to fight the recession and serve only to camouflage the problem. The working people of Canada will not stand idly by and accept the erosion of their income.

In the town of Inuvik, Mayor John Hill stated in regard to grants in lieu of taxes:

> If you take a million dollars out of an operation of our size, and yes, that could create bankruptcy. Or it could create a situation where we can't manage our affairs properly. It is unseemly that the federal government should be so irresponsible.

In the community of Hay River, Chris Brodeur stated:

> There's no land available for people that want to develop agriculture that requires land, chicken farms require relatively small pieces of land. And we need quotas. And those are two areas directly in the federal government's lap.

He also indicated: "We want the Canadian Coast Guard operations for the western Arctic located in Hay River and not in British Columbia."

Shirley McGrath of the Chamber of Commerce in Yellowknife indicated:

> What do we need? Government spending policies that will be supportive of local business without eliminating the competitive element; leadership in actively developing the economy of not only Yellowknife, but of the whole of the NWT; support for self-sustaining industries; opportunities to invest in the north and to keep our money here.

The Dene nation president, Bill Erasmus, said:

> My particular membership feels that within our treaty the federal government has a fiduciary responsibility to continue protecting that economy because our people are under the impression that government made the deal with us to continue our way of life.

Last but not least, the Association of Municipalities and the city of Yellowknife under Mayor Pat McMahon indicated:

> The Minister of Communications has unilaterally cancelled the public sector rate for municipal radio licences. Simply put, on that day, the federal government decided to levy a massive tax on health and public safety.

A local businessman in Yellowknife, Ron Williams, concluded by saying: "The land claim issue must be resolved so development can take place".

These are the things that northerners have indicated to us during our travels into various parts of the north.

There are many issues that northerners feel strongly about; the 24 per cent increase in premiums for unemployment, the cut to the Canadian Jobs Strategy. There is unemployment in the north that reaches the levels of 40 per cent to 60 per cent in some communities.

In relationship to that, we have a subsistence economy of hunting and trapping which has gone down the tubes because the animal rights activists have taken a grip on the whole situation and have turned it into a very brutal public relations campaign against the trappers of Canada. This has had a very detrimental effect.

Any kind of cut in the north, including the Land Use Planning Commission which hurts communities has really been detrimental on the north.

These are the concerns which northerners have. I wish I had more time because there is much more to discuss.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on the recent budget presented by the Conservative government.

I come from the riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam which is in the beginning of the Fraser Valley in British Columbia. It is a beautiful area. It starts, really, in the suburbs of Vancouver and extends out into the Fraser Valley. It includes the municipalities of Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam, Port Moody, Anmore and Belcarra; five municipalities in whole.

There is not a recession in my area quite as much as there is in Ontario. It is just beginning. I am afraid, and that scares me a lot. I am very concerned about that.

I want to speak on the budget therefore on behalf of what I think my constituents would say if they could be here in the House of Commons. My constituents are concerned about the environment and education. They have a strong view of Canada. They believe, as I do, that Canada is greater than the sum of its provinces and they worry in these times of a constitutional debate that there is no one really speaking for Canada.

• (2030)

One of my friends from the Okanagan asked, "What has happened to Canada?" I think Canada is falling apart. We need a new Prime Minister in this country badly. It is too bad we cannot impeach the one that we have already got. We need a new government and we need a new Minister of Finance.

I am told that there was an award recently given by a distinguished European financial magazine for the three worst ministers of finance in the world and of the three worst ministers there was one from China, one from Switzerland who has succeeded in taking a strong economy and turning it down, and the Minister of Finance from Canada, who the magazine said had succeeded, or rather failed, but he has managed to get stagnation in Canada and inflation at the same time with high interest rates that are really hurting. My constituents who have to pay mortgages every month are paying high rates on their mortgages.

The government says, "We have this huge deficit. How can we do anything, we have this huge deficit?" What is their solution in this budget? Put the deficit into the provinces. It seems to me that we are talking about the same people, the same taxpayer.

Lest my constituents and other middle class Canadians think that they are spared by this budget, which I have heard people say, they should look a little bit more closely at it. Rather than raising taxes directly, the Minister of Finance boosted unemployment insurance premiums. So for a worker earning $40,000 a year, this means an increase of $204 a year. For a government it means extra revenues of $2 billion this year and $2.4 billion next year.

In effect, that is a tax increase of $2 billion or the year after $2.4 billion. It is a tax increase because they are asking every worker to pay $204 a year extra, not on their income taxes, but on unemployment insurance contributions. So people have been hit by tax increases in this budget.

Second, rather than asking taxpayers to keep pouring funds into social services, what the Minister of Finance did is shift part of the load on the provinces. He did that by cutting back on Ottawa's contribution to health care, post-secondary education and welfare, and he forced the provinces to pick up more of the tab.

Eventually these provinces will have to turn to the only source of funds they have, the citizens of the province, my constituents. So my constituents still get it in the ear. I asked people to look at this matter very carefully. The question is the deficit that I raised before. People say, "Where are we going to get the money?"

I remember Tommy Douglas, who was a great member of this House for many years, telling me when I first came to the House, he said he was in the House during the Second World War and there was a depression before the war. And the government said, "We can't do anything. We do not have any money". Suddenly the war came and they had to do something. They sure raised the money fast enough. They brought in a fair system of taxation and raised the money.

I am also concerned that we are not looking at bringing in a fair system of taxation. It seems to me that is the way of tackling the deficit. I am afraid that the worst is yet to come. We saw a free trade deal with the United States which is hurting Canadian industry and some Canadian industry is moving south of the border. This is happening in the lower mainland of British Columbia. We are losing some of our manufacturing industry, the little bit that we had.

We are now going to sign a free trade deal with Mexico. That means our workers are going to have to compete with workers who are making $1.25 an hour. You cannot compete with that. So we are going to have more industry moving to the States for cheap labour, where there are bad environmental standards, cheap labour, and exploitation of working people. The government says that there will be better jobs in Canada for Canadians. The problem is that there will be more high-skilled jobs in Canada for which you will have to have more high-skilled people. So what does this budget do? It cuts $100 million out of the Canadian Jobs Strategy program.

Mr. Speaker, I think that is a mistake.

I have heard the Liberal Party in this House be critical of the government, as I have been tonight. But the Liberal Party is a divided party. They always have two positions on every issue. I am proud that in the New Democratic Party we have been very consistent in our attack on the government and in the positions that we have put forward.

So I want to put forward some very positive solutions as to the way I think the government should have acted in the budget.

The first thing we need is a fair system of taxation. Why should a bank teller pay more in taxes than the bank? We still have not cleared that system up. We need a fair system of taxation.

Second, I think we should set goals. We should set goals for deficit reduction. I would like to see it become crystal clear that all of the GST, the Goods and Services Tax, be put into deficit reduction.

There should be no more frivolous expenditures. I stood up in the House of Commons the other day and asked a question of the Minister of Communications. I asked him why he would put $45 million into a cultural study institute in Montreal. What a waste of money when when no one wanted it. And I am pleased to see that the government eventually backed down. It is this kind of expenditure that is making the government look bad and is so wasteful.

Third, we have to clean up our constitutional position in this country, the stalemate. Let's get this over. Let's make a decision: either Quebec stays or goes. We get a new constitutional position in shape and we tackle what really matters to this country, and that is the future.

Finally, I think that a smart government would invest in education, would invest in health, would invest in the environment. These are the great investments. Common sense dictates that. The people in my area have a lot of common sense, and if they were here tonight in the House of Commons that is what they would be telling the government. And I am pleased to do that on their behalf.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, tonight we are here to debate Bill C-97, which is an Act to provide borrowing authority. Of course, Bill C-97 is inexorably intertwined with the budget, as has been so often said by so many speakers.

Bill C-97 asks this House to allow the government to borrow $26.4 billion. Where does that figure come from? The Finance Minister and the government have come up with that figure based on certain assumptions. Those assumptions are stated in the budget, and they are assumed to be correct.

The Tories take delight in reviewing history whenever they talk about the Liberal Party and in reminding us about their revisionist view of what the Liberals did. Well, this is dreamland. I want to talk about facts. So, I am going to ask us to go back factually and examine how the Finance Minister's assumptions have fared—factually, not fancifully.

Let's go back to November 8, 1984 when the Finance Minister delivered an economic statement. At that time he promised "to put our fiscal house in order so that we can reverse the massive build-up in public debt".

Mr. Speaker, he was wrong. The debt has ballooned from $168 billion to almost $400 billion in the six years that he has been Finance Minister. He predicted then that in the 1984–85 fiscal year the deficit would be $34.5 billion. He was wrong.

• (2040)

Seven months after that prediction, which was wrong, he admitted it was wrong. He announced in the budget of May 23, 1985, his first budget, that the deficit would be, not $34.6 billion, but rather $36 billion. Speaking of where to find additional revenue, he said, and I quote:

> Ultimately, we would be forced to find money through drastic cuts in government services and major tax increases. Many government programs would be in jeopardy. This is also unacceptable.

Mr. Speaker, can you believe it? This is the finance minister saying on May 23, 1985, that it is unacceptable to him to have drastic cuts in government services and major tax increases. Yet, what did he do? In fact, he cut government services. The government is now out of the unemployment insurance plan. He cut VIA. He gutted the CBC and he has imposed the most massive tax grab in Canadian history, the GST.

February 26, 1986, along came the second budget, and what does he say? I quote:

> This budget will reduce the deficit to $29.8 billion in the coming fiscal year and by the end of the decade it will be cut to $22 billion.

He was wrong, because last week he said, not $22 billion but $30.5 billion.

He said, and I quote:

> Our national debt will no longer be growing faster than the economy.

He was wrong.

The federal debt as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product has risen from a debt equalling 46.4 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product to a debt equalling 57.3 per cent of the GDP in 1990–1991. This is an astounding 10.9 per cent increase and while doing this 10.9 per cent increase, totally contrary to his predictions, he has driven us into a made-in-Ottawa recession. He said, and I quote:

> The amount we must borrow each year to pay the bills will be cut from 28.3 billion in 1985–1986 to $17.9 billion in 1987–1988.

He was wrong. Today we are talking about Bill C-97 where he is asking us to borrow, not $17.9 billion, but $26.4 billion.

February 18, 1987, his third budget, and I quote:

> I am also announcing today that in our third year we will get the deficit down to $29.3 billion.

He was wrong.

In his seventh year as finance minister, it is not $29.3 billion. No. It is $30.5 billion.

February 10, 1988, the fourth budget, and I quote:

> For the current fiscal year, I said we would cut the deficit to $29.3 billion. We will meet that target.

Current—he is talking about 1988–1989. He was wrong. He repeated the same thing two years in a row, and both years he was wrong and he is still wrong today.

April 27, 1989, the fifth budget, speaking about the debt, and I quote:

> It is now more than $320 billion.

This was a rise of $152 billion more than when he gave his economic statement back in 1984. In five years, there was a $152 billion increase in the national debt. The government is not reducing the debt. It continues to balloon.

Speaking of the deficit, he predicted that he would, and I quote:

> —reduce the annual deficit to $30.5 billion. Next year, it will be reduced to $28 billion.

He was wrong. Do not forget that in his second budget in 1986, he predicted that the deficit would be $22 billion. In his fifth budget, he revised it to $30.5 billion and he was wrong. He then said that the year after it would be $28 billion. We know he was wrong.

February 20, 1990, the sixth budget of this finance minister. What did he say? I quote:

> We will reduce the deficit to $28.5 billion this fiscal year. We will cut it in half to $14 billion in three more years. And we will reduce it further to $10 billion in the year after that.

He was wrong. Today, by his own admission, it is $30.5 billion. It will not be $14 billion in 1993, as he predicted because he knows he was wrong. In his present budget, he predicts it is going to be $25 billion.

In that sixth budget, he said the following, and I quote:

> —the debt is still growing faster than the economy—faster than our ability to pay.

This surely is proof of his inability, since in all his previous budgets he assured Canadians that he would reduce growth of debt to less than the growth of the economy. Yet, he admitted the debt was growing faster than the economy.

We turn to the seventh budget. He has been consistently wrong for one economic statement and six budgets. Quite an unimpressive track record. This is despite 33 separate tax increases, despite imposing the GST, despite the fact, or perhaps because of the fact that wealthy Canadians are paying less tax than in 1984 while middle and lower income Canadians are paying more tax.

With this type of record, only two things are certain. First, the minister's budgetary predictions will be wrong again. Second, lower and middle income Canadians will continue to pay higher taxes to a government that has been consistently wrong in its fiscal and economic projections.

Finally, a Minister of Finance who has had seven chances and has consistently failed to achieve his objectives should do the honourable thing: resign.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take the opportunity today to be able to speak on Bill C-97, the borrowing authority bill.

This bill flows directly from the Minister of Finance's budget delivered on February 26 of this year. The government's budget, the seventh of this administration, is yet another crystal-ball budget with the Minister of Finance as the fortune-teller for Canada.

This budget and the past six budgets make future promises and blames current failures on previous governments, but neglects to reflect on past budget deficiencies, of which there have been many, many, many.

How does this occur? Well, let us review. Let us reflect upon the promises and predictions of the past. In 1985, the Minister of Finance predicted an $18 billion deficit in 1991. Now, it is $30.5 billion. He predicted $18.5 billion, he delivered $30 billion more deficit.

In 1984, the Prime Minister promised jobs, jobs, jobs. Today, 1.3 million Canadians are unemployed and soon, by government figures, 1.5 million or 10 per cent of our work force will be unemployed.

Last year, the finance minister forecast 11 per cent interest rates, but the rates still remained at 13 per cent. When first elected this government set certain priorities. The debt, the deficit and the economy were the highest priorities of this government. Today the deficit is still $30 billion annually. The debt has well over doubled to $400 billion and the economy is in a recession. Boy, have they delivered on their highest priorities in their years in government. So much for reflections of the past.

• (2050)

Let us say today what are the priorities in this country. I think anyone who is looking at Canada certainly realizes the recession has to be number one. We all realize national unity is certainly among the top priorities. And the problem the government has struggled with for so many years, the debt is twice as bad as it was when they came in.

But does this budget deal with those priorities in any substantial way? Has it done anything to help the farmers, the business people, the people that I see daily in southwestern Ontario? I do not see anything there. Does it do much to help national unity? We have heard person after person rise in this House and talk about the difficulties, the cutting of all of our programs, freezing, restraining, shifting burdens to the provinces, cutting Canadian Jobs Strategy, cutting social housing. We have heard that, one after the other, after the other.

This government is shifting a financial burden from itself to the provinces and municipalities. What is the reasoning it uses? Very clearly it said: "They don't owe as much as we do, therefore they should pick up a bigger portion". I think that is pretty weak logic when you stop and consider the builders of the debt and deficit were the Tories. They doubled it. They promised, and promised, and promised a reduced deficit but delivered a deficit of $30 billion consistently for seven years. They have not been innovative. Their policies are hampering the national government in dealing with national issues, dealing with national institutions, such as health care, education, training, safety nets.

We are being criticized by many in this country who are saying possibly programs should be delivered at the provincial level. We are splitting in this country over some of these values and yet our federal government in this last budget is negating its responsibility for many of the programs which hold our nation together.

We must look to what is happening, not put our heads in the sand and say: "We'll reduce the debt. A crystal ball will make that happen for us". This government continues to blame past governments for its failures. Seven years of putting budgets together should bring IT to the reality that the problems are its own. This government has caused this recession. This government has caused high interest rates. This government has caused the negative effects of the high Canadian dollar and has caused today's dilemmas.

We heard not six months ago the Minister of Finance bragging about how he kept the dollar rate up to fight inflation. He was warned at that time he would drive us to a recession but he did not heed the warnings. He put us in a recession. He said he was cooling the economy off. We said he was driving us to a recession. His crystal ball is broken.

The government has made predictions for the future. Are they to be believed? Their past track record says no. Yet, the government wants Canadians to believe in these facts, in 2 per cent inflation in this country. We almost did that 2 per cent in one month of this year and yet it is predicting 2 per cent inflation shortly down the line.

They want us to believe that we will lower our interest rates. Well, we have followed very clearly the lowering of interest rates in the United States. Canada has not independently moved beyond that. Canada has only followed the U.S. and the difference in interest rates remains very steady, 4 per cent to 5 per cent difference between Canada and the United States.

The government has said job creation is a high priority and yet it has cut, cut, cut. It said we would have a good economy, but look what it has done to our economy at this point. The businesses that are leaving Canada today will not be returning. Canadians' memories are not that short. Canadians will remember that these are the same things the finance minister has said for seven years: all good things will come; the economy will improve; the deficit will be lowered. Consistently saying it.

Canadians now realize he did not have workable plans. He could not see into the future and he certainly led us down a terrible pathway. The scenario that the Conservative governments are better managers than other governments is totally unacceptable. Every year we are told the next year will be better. Every year we hear the next year the deficit will come down. The fact is, the next years have come and gone and the predictions never come true.

In 1984 the government revenue was $70.9 billion. Today it is $128 billion, an increase in taxes of $57 billion or 81.2 per cent. Yet the deficit still remains at $30 billion. Annually the government revenues have increased more than inflation. Still we have a huge deficit, a huge debt, doubled. The public debt as a percentage of the gross national product is growing. The interest charges on the debt have grown slower than the increases in revenues. No matter how you calculate it, seven years of growth, 81 per cent higher income taxes, yet more than double the debt from $168 billion in the second half of 1984, to its point today, $411 billion. It has not dealt with the major issues in this country. I think every Canadian deserves a better role than has been issued to them today.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, just a couple of words. I certainly will not require 10 minutes in the closing moments of this debate on the borrowing authority.

I would like to point out two things relating to the borrowing authority and the federal budget, two points that have not been made by anybody, have not been mentioned by the news media and certainly not mentioned by the Government of Canada.

The first point is a rather technical point. I was looking a few moments ago at the fiscal equalization payments for this year. Mr. Speaker, I noticed that your province will be getting a big zero in fiscal equalization because, of course, your province does not receive any funding. The people of British Columbia do not receive any money. Ontario also receives zero. That is to be expected because the formula is based upon the ability of a province to raise revenues through taxation, as you know.

Then when I looked at the other provinces, I looked at Saskatchewan and it is up to over $500 million. Manitoba, coming east, is up to over $900 million. It is increasing this year coming up. And then I looked at Quebec and it is increasing by $53.7 million, up to $3.886 billion.

• (2100)

Then I came to what we regard as being the poorer provinces of Canada, and I noticed that New Brunswick was up $26 million. That is interesting, just $26 million. I noticed that Nova Scotia is up $22.1 million, a little bit less. I noticed that Prince Edward Island is up $4.2 million. Now we are really getting down, are we not, to zero? Then we come to the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that it is receiving—and these are the official figures from the Department of Finance—less $16.9 million less than it received last year.

We hear speakers in this Chamber, the Minister of Finance, the President of the Treasury Board, the Prime Minister and other members say: "Well, there wasn't really a cut. There was a less than normal increase in these equalization payments". I do not want to give the impression that they were telling fibs, because in fact they were not.

When I look a little bit closer I discover that the federal government is subtracting moneys that are owed by these provinces, it claims, from three years ago. In fact the federal government, according to its audit which was done in January, said that those governments received more money than they should have received back in 1987, 1988 and 1989.

I make this point simply because in our estimates of expenditure we forgive moneys that are owed by foreign banks to the Government of Canada. We forgive moneys that are owed by foreign nations to the Government of Canada. But this government will not forgive money owed by our developing provinces of Canada.

The Newfoundland government is presenting a budget tomorrow afternoon at three o'clock. You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, the attention on that budget tomorrow with these equalization payments to the Government of Newfoundland actually decreasing over last year. Imagine, tomorrow the attention of Newfoundlanders will be riveted on one channel to the budget and probably on the other channel to the Brier in Hamilton, because we have an excellent team there headed by a young fellow, John Boland, who I think is going to become victorious on the weekend.

Between our learned premier, our excellent premier, and our excellent John Boland curling team, we will probably hear a not so excellent budget in the background, delivered by Dr. Kitchen, Ph.D. Next to him is Dr. Gibbons, Ph.D. Next to him is Dr. Warren, Ph.D. I think we have more Ph.D.s in the Newfoundland government than in any provincial government in the history of Canada.

But no matter how learned you are or what a great economist you are, you cannot create something out of negative figures. That is point number one. Point number two is this: I examined the cuts to the departments and I found one interesting thing. We are all politicians in this Chamber, but sometimes—and I looked for this specifically and I found it this morning—I wonder where were the politics in these cuts. I went through the figures and I verified them after with the Department of Finance.

I saw every major development fund cut in this country. ACOA is cut in eastern Canada. The Western Canadian Diversification Fund is cut in western Canada, but the Quebec Development Fund is up $20 million.

The minister in charge of that is of course the minister of industry and it is his decision to make. But I challenge the minister to explain to the Canadian public tomorrow why that fund went up $20 million and every single other development fund in this country actually went down by more than that figure.

Those are two points in government reductions. I can guarantee that that does not do anything for Canadian unity. That does nothing for Canadian unity.

I notice that the press did not pick it up and members did not pick it up. Maybe nothing else will be said of it. But I am going to ask the minister tomorrow to take this transcript and to say something to the members of the House of Commons as to why he used his ministerial authority to override Treasury Board and to transplant an enormous increase into the one major fund and cut the other two major funds in this country.

I say that it is not all as clear as it seems, as it is presented by the Government of Canada. Sometimes we have to look between the lines and we have to ask a lot of questions. And we discover that the Government of Canada has not been forthright. It has not come forward and presented what it has done.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is up. I trust that these few words were interesting to you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being no further members rising in debate, pursuant to the order made earlier this day, the question is deemed put on the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) and recorded division is deemed demanded and deemed deferred until three o'clock p.m., Thursday, March 7, 1991.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today, on the eve of International Women's Day, and join with Canadians to mark the gains that women have made toward achieving equality both here in Canada and around the world.

International Women's Day encourages us to reflect on the position of women in our society today and to consider their aspirations for the future. Women in Canada have much to celebrate. We have made great strides in achieving equality in all spheres of society. It has become increasingly clear, indeed, that women's issues are becoming society's issues.

But these gains have not come easily. They are the result of hard work and co-operation. They are the result of women forming effective partnerships to promote ideas and initiate action.

Tomorrow, on International Women's Day, we will honour the spirit of co-operation through this year's theme: "Together Towards Equality".

Partnerships play a critical role in advancing women's equality. Business, labour and government must work closely with women's groups and organizations to make Canada a more understanding and tolerant society. Women must continue to work together, women from all walks of life, including those in the labour force, those working at home, women of colour, elderly women, disabled women, and immigrant women.

As Canada's Minister responsible for the Status of Women, I am proud to co-ordinate our government's initiatives on behalf of Canadian women.

Canada also has a proud tradition of actively supporting and promoting equality for women in major international forums. Within the United Nations, we have worked steadfastly to advance the role of women through our long-standing membership on the Commission of the Status of Women currently in session in Vienna. At this session, Canada has pressed for concerted action to address the priority issues of violence against women, education, the environment, and population.

Last October, I had the honour of chairing the meeting of Commonwealth Women's Affairs Ministers here in Ottawa. This meeting provided our Commonwealth friends with an opportunity to exchange views and share in a vision of a world in which gender equality is the norm and not the exception.

Here in Canada, I have met with more than 130 women's groups and many more women individually over the past year to learn first-hand about the issues that concern them. A meeting with representatives of women's centres last year confirmed my belief of the vital role that these centres play in Canadian women's lives.

I was delighted to join with the Secretary of State in January in announcing the continuation of funding for these centres on an ongoing basis.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, much progress has been made since the early years of this century, but although barriers to full participation by women in society have been eliminated, discriminatory attitudes, values and behaviour still exist. However, when the Canadian government started its first term, it made a commitment to gradually eliminate these societal problems and has acted accordingly.

[English]

Collaborative action among government and non-government sectors has resulted in many substantial gains for women in the past 12 months.

• (1110)

Among these key achievements are the increased parental benefits under the unemployment insurance program. The decision by the Supreme Court of Canada that recognized the battered wife syndrome is a justifiable defence. The initiative taken by the Canadian Judicial Centre to establish an education program for judges on the subject of gender equality, and the announcement of the closure of the Kingston Prison for Women and its replacement with five regional facilities, including a healing lodge for aboriginal women.

Most significantly the government's renewed family violence initiative provided $136 million to the prevention, education and support for projects to counter violence against women and children, representing more than twice the level of funding committed since 1986.

As well, a parliamentary subcommittee is currently examining these issues as they relate to violence against women and the government's role in dealing with this problem.

Canadian women have much to celebrate, but we also must recognize the challenges they have had. Violence against women must continue to be a major priority. Women must be actively involved in decisions regarding the future shape of Canada and national unity. Women must play an important role in international affairs, bringing their perspective to achieve lasting peace and ensuring women's equality around the world.

Our government is fully committed to promoting the rights of women in Canada. We are committed to creating conditions that will enable women to achieve full and equal participation in our society. We are committed to being active members in a strong, dynamic and productive partnership with women to achieve these goals.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by thanking the minister for her comments. I am aware of her interest and her commitment. Indeed it has been shown in the time that she has held this portfolio. But I fear that the actions of this government do not reflect a similar commitment on the part of cabinet, the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance.

While I do not deny that we have made strides, particularly over the last 20 years, I am afraid it is somewhat like saying: "Well, at least we are still not wearing slave collars".

The unfortunate truth is that in the six and a half years since this government has taken office, the economic status of women has not improved. Indeed, over six and a half years the economic picture has at best remained static and, if it has remained static in the face of increases in the cost of living and in other matters, then we know that the lot of women is worse than it was in 1984.

Women, if we count in professional women—and this is a small percentage—still make 64 cents for every dollar that men make. If we remove professional women from this equation, women make 50 cents for every dollar men make, and this is the vast majority of working women. These statistics have basically remained unchanged since the 1940s.

We know that women are still locked into low paying, pink collar ghetto jobs. They still face systemic discrimination, sexual harassment, glass ceilings, and an over-all attitude that tends to trivialize the work that women do, even when it is paid. When it is unpaid as in the home and in the volunteer sector, it is virtually ignored.

Women work in conditions that most men would not put up with. Like it or not, immigrant women in this country are still left to the mercy of exploiting employers and virtual slave wages. They are locked into a situation that they cannot escape because of a lack of access to English and French as second language training.

It is a sad fact but the ambitions of the average 18-year old man with a high school education can and will be realized, whereas the ambitions of a 20-year old woman with a university degree will put her into a lower salary scale than that young man with only a high school education.

We sit in a country today where one million children go without pre-school and after school care. Latchkey children are one of the disgraces of our society. Six years ago Judge Rosalie Abella in her royal commission report on employment equity said that child care was the bridge to employment equity.

That is no less true, indeed it is more true today than it was six years ago. Still we wait and the women and children of Canada wait for a meaningful national child care program that will bring us accessibility and quality child care across this country.

Over all hangs the spectre of violence against women, of injury and of death. In my own province of Nova Scotia, a small little province where we think of ourselves as fairly civilized as opposed to the rest of the people in the flesh-pots of central Canada—

An hon. member: That is sexist.

Ms. Clancy: I am not being sexist; I am being geographicalist.

To return to a much more serious point, in Nova Scotia where we tend to think of ourselves as more civilized, we have been proven wrong in this past year because six women have been brutally murdered in the Province of Nova Scotia in the past year. Just last week, the body of a 17-year old girl was found in a garbage dumpster, brutally murdered, in my own metropolitan area of Halifax—Dartmouth. And the statistics go on and on.

[Translation]

Daily life is very difficult for some women in this country. They get no help from the government. They deserve a lot more, and they deserve to get it now.

[English]

We need in this country action today. We need a royal commission on violence against women. We need to shine the light in the dark corners to prevent more women and their children being brutalized and killed. We all sat back in horror at the events in Montreal of a year ago last December. But in that same year, 119 women died at the hands of men in this country, and nobody thought to mention those statistics.

In 1970, a royal commission was called on the status of women. It was the catalyst for the women's movement and those very real improvements over the last 20 years, which the minister mentioned in her statement. The time has come to do it again, to look at the problem that is the most crucial, the most urgent, for all of us in our society—the question violence.

I ask this so that those victims in 10 years' time will not have increased and we will not still be crying in the wilderness.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be in the House today and to respond to the minister's statement on the eve of International Women's Day. As the minister said and as the spokesperson for the Liberal Party in the House said, women today do have a number of things to celebrate.

We can celebrate the defeat of this government's bill to recriminalize abortion for women in this country; we can celebrate the end of war in the Persian Gulf; and we can celebrate the reinstatement of funding that this government cut to women's centres. These were all defeats, reversals or terminations of government policy.

The Minister responsible for the Status of Women often speaks of partnerships. Her government is creating a partnership between women in this country and poverty. In the middle of a recession it has extended the spending limits on social assistance. It has created a GST, a goods and services tax, an additional tax that no one can afford, least of all single women and lower income women. It has cut spending for health and for education services in our country.

Single mothers and other poor families will find it even more difficult now to feed and clothe their children as a direct result of this government's policies.

The Tories turn their backs on women victims of violence by underfunding programs; by limiting the Canada Assistance Plan, which funds shelters for battered women; by refusing to move on mandatory equality training for judges in a criminal justice system; by allowing violence pornography to continue in our society; by limiting economic options for women; and by cutting affordable housing.

• (1120)

They are adding to the hardships of victims of violence and the hardships of women in our society. They are in fact a part of the problem, not a part of the solution.

By continuing to stall on the enactment of a clause in the Canadian Human Rights Act barring discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, they are further discriminating against a particular sector of women and men in our society.

The Tories are in partnership with employers who in fact exploit immigrant women in our society. They continue to refuse to give immigrant women the same access to language training that is given to male immigrants.

The government has shelved its own gun control legislation. The government is not in partnership with women who are shot and killed with guns that have been legally obtained, and with ammunition that has been legally obtained. It is not in partnership with the families of these victims of violence.

The Tories are not in partnership with families who have a desperate need for child care and in fact have been promised a child care program in two successive elections, in many speeches by government members on that side of the House. We still have no child care program in Canada.

The government is not in partnership with aboriginal women, aboriginal women who are still tied up in the bureaucracy with Bill C–31.

The Tories are not in partnership with older women living in poverty, unable to have access to their pensions because discrimination still exists in federal pension legislation. In fact, the Conservative government is not in partnership with women at all in this country.

I read the minister's press release. It made me angry, Mr. Speaker, because she talked about moving together towards equality; equality with women's groups whose funding has been cut; with education, which has also been cut; with all levels of government which are choked by federal cuts in transfer payments; with labour, which it has tried to destroy and continues to try; with concerned citizens to whom it never appears to listen. The minister also talked of many challenges to come, and I have listed many of them in my speech today.

If the government does not have the political will to call for a royal commission on violence against women—we must have a royal commission; the reasons are clear—then step aside and allow Audrey McLaughlin and the New Democratic Party to form a real partnership with the women of this country to work towards economic and social justice in our society.

BILL C–98

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion that I would like to move. I have discussed it with the other two parties, and I am sure you will find consent.

I move:

That Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose, not be referred to a legislative committee but be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

GASOLINE ADDITIVES

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present more petitions signed by constituents of my region of southwestern Ontario to add to the 4,000 names already tabled in the House.

These constituents are upset the government is dragging its heels on the use of alternative fuels. They are upset no incentives were contained in the budget last week which encourage the use of ethanol blended fuels that have been labelled as being environmentally friendly.

Rather it continues to allow the use of MMT in Canada, a substance which has been banned in the United States since 1978. Increasing evidence points out that MMT may be a worse health hazard than was the lead it replaced.

These people want action now, because this insidious substance accumulates in the body. It is irresponsible to wait.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present this morning on behalf of the great citizens of Kamloops.

One is a take-off on the old water torture technique. The petitioners are still calling on the government to withdraw the goods and services tax. I guess they feel if they keep raising this matter, eventually it will actually happen. They are calling upon the government to reconsider the GST.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, another petition, again on behalf of a number of people from Kamloops, points out again the way the federal government has approached the massive cuts to VIA Rail.

The petitioners are simply making a case of why it would be a good idea, for passenger transportation and also for environmental reasons, to reinstate VIA as a first class rail transport system for passengers.

WAGE DISCRIMINATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners, not only from Kamloops but other British Columbia centres, point out that whereas progress towards true equality for Canadian women continues to be slow in that equal pay for work of equal value is required by law under the Canadian Human Rights Act, they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to implement the results of the equal pay study to end wage discrimination in the federal public service.

Coming on the eve of International Women's Day, certainly this is something we are urging the government to consider with haste.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 17 minutes during the lunch hour.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to present to the House today Bill C-98 for consideration.

Bill C-98 is an act to provide for enabling legislation to allow provinces and the federal government to engage in the development of programs necessary to support and stabilize agricultural farm income. The short title of the bill is the Farm Income Protection Act.

This enabling legislation will go some distance in providing long-term stability to the agricultural industry. What is significant is that it is the first concrete result in one of the most comprehensive reviews of agricultural policy ever undertaken in this country. It will provide a new system of safety nets for Canadian farmers which will deliver programs and assistance equitably to farmers in all regions of the country. At the same time it will encourage sound farming and business practices, thus ensuring there is a clear response to the market signals of not only the country but, indeed, of the world.

It is important to note in that connection that the principles enshrined in section 4 clearly outline the basis on which agreements with the provinces can be negotiated. It is very important to consider the four principles.

Any agreements which are negotiated must be production or market neutral; second, they must take into account the regional diversity of this country; third, they must be sensitive and compatible to international obligations; and, finally, they must provide and encourage environmental and economic sustainability.

This enabling legislation will provide for the following programs: Gross Revenue Insurance Plan; the Net Income Stabilization Account; the Crop Insurance Program and Revenue Insurance Program; as well as the provision for the establishment of special measures.

This new legislation is built upon the provisions of the existing Crop Insurance Act and that part of the Agricultural Stabilization Act which deals with tripartite price stabilization. With the passage of this bill, the Crop Insurance Act, the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act will be repealed and all agricultural products will be protected under this one comprehensive act.

Farmers will be able to choose crop insurance, revenue insurance, or both. They will also be able to set aside money in the NISA accounts which the governments will match.

It is important to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the two programs are clearly compatible and complementary with each other. If we are to have long-term stability, confidence and security for the future, it is important that both the GRIP concept—namely, the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan—and the Net Income Stabilization Account be implemented together.

I will have a little more to say about that. As it now stands, the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan will provide assistance to producers in the short to medium-term. There is some less degree of urgency in terms of the implementation of the NISA concept. I think if we were to consider the deliberations of the task force that designed these programs they outline the importance of having the two programs working hand in hand.

What is really significant about the legislation that we are introducing today, Mr. Speaker, is the way in which this legislation has been developed. It clearly outlines a first in the development of public policy, and in this case agricultural policy. It is fair to say that this program through the means of this legislation was designed from the ground up by farmers, by provinces and the federal government working together as a result of the policy review process.

This is really the product of the agriculture policy review which was launched in 1989 to take stock of where we are at, to look at our industry, to look into the future and try to implement the kinds of policy and structural changes that may be necessary to provide that kind of security and stability for the 1990s and beyond.

In the course of this we have had the support and the co-operation of many groups, many parties, including the provincial governments. Both federal and provincial governments called for this policy review at the regular meeting of the federal and provincial ministers which was held in Prince Albert in August of 1989. That became the turning point in our attempts to lay a new foundation for a solid, responsive, competitive, diverse and vibrant agricultural industry. It is an important milestone. It is a new approach and it is a comprehensive approach. I hope that as a result of this more comprehensive approach in dealing with the problems of agriculture, we can establish long-term policies and rely to a lesser degree on ad hoc policies.

Colleagues will know that in November 1989 we published the discussion paper Growing Together to set out the course of this review. Literally everyone who had a stake in agriculture became a part of that review process. Growing Together is based upon four pillars: more market responsiveness, greater self-reliance within the agrifood sector, a national policy which recognizes the regional diversity of this country, and increased environmental sustainability.

In December 1989 Agriculture Canada hosted a huge national agrifood policy conference where just under 2,000 delegates from all across the country, reflecting both levels of government and the industry, and all of those involved in the agrifood industry, to come together to talk about a number of issues. We dealt at that time with issues such as food quality and safety, supply management systems, farm finance and management, marketing and trade development, transportation, sustainable agriculture and safety nets.

Following this conference, 11 task forces were established to examine in detail various aspects of agrifood policy. Because of the very serious problems facing the grains and oilseeds sector at that time, it was decided that the committee studying safety nets would be put on the fast track in anticipation of developing a safety net mechanism that would serve the grains and oilseeds but would also be applicable to other commodities.

The federal-provincial industry committee, which I referred to, was formed in January 1990. In May 1990 it presented its preliminary report, which recommended the dual concept of the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan and the Net Income Stabilization Account. I should say that this task force committee reported on a regular basis to the federal and provincial ministers of agriculture. They brought forward their progress reports along with their recommendations. We considered those at that time and gave the recommendations our particular blessing and encouraged them to continue.

They worked on this and a second report was presented in August 1990. Again, the federal and provincial ministers examined the work and the recommendation. In November, when meeting in Winnipeg, we agreed to the principles of the two new programs and attempted at that time to set in place the motions and the mechanisms to implement these two programs.

I want to take this opportunity to express on behalf of not only the federal government, but I am sure provincial governments as well, and I am sure many farmers, to thank all of those who participated in this exercise. They gave of their time and their talents at considerable expense and inconvenience to themselves to come together in an attempt to devise a program that would not only serve the short-term and medium-term problems, but hopefully to provide a policy framework that would allow us to strengthen our industry and provide some predictability and some stability for the future.

It is important to remember that this committee was comprised of some 33 members. They were not bureaucrats working in isolation. They were not politicians working in isolation. The exercise was open. It was transparent. Of the 33 members of this committee, 19 of them were farmers, along with eight provincial and six federal government officials.

The committee studied eight different proposals before it came up with this recommendation. These proposals and various ideas and thoughts were advanced by industry organizations, by academics, by governments, so what we really have here is a bit of a compromise, because in that sort of an environment there is a fair amount of give and take. But I think what we have here is a consensus that reflects to a large extent a program which producers really want.

• (1140)

I think it is fair to say that we have here a program that was designed from the ground up by farmers. The provinces and the federal government worked with them in the development of this initiative, and I am very pleased about the way in which it has developed. The process, as I said, was transparent. All approaches and ideas were considered and again I say, as I have said on so many other occasions, I do believe that this reflects a unique approach to public policy-making in this country, and I think together we have designed a landmark program which should minimize the need for ad hoc assistance.

If this program does work—and I think it will—I think we will clearly establish and demonstrate that in an era of co-operation we can bring diverse points of view together and we can come together as a very diverse nation to develop a policy that is national in scope but that at the same time, takes account of the regional strengths and the regional diversities of this great land.

We have tried to work toward the development of a national agrifood policy. It was started by my predecessor when the national agricultural strategy was first announced, and since that time we have tried to build upon the principles that were agreed to by the federal and provincial governments.

Since I have been Minister of Agriculture, I have had eight different formal meetings with my counterparts, the provincial ministers of agriculture. We have had many, many bilateral meetings with individual ministers and groups of ministers. When you couple that with the tremendous number of meetings that we have with farm organizations, commodity groups and individual farmers, it clearly has opened up the process. I think we have an environment and a mood out there, while we are facing some very serious difficulties. I do not think that we approached the problem with the idea that any one group, any one political party or any one political administration or government has all the right answers, has all the perfect solutions.

We are trying to labour together in looking at the problems and examining what we are doing and trying to determine what we can do better, in an attempt to provide a better future for Canadian agriculture.

The new safety net will deliver assistance equitably to farmers in all regions while at the same time encouraging good management practices based upon long-term market trends. The two components of this new safety net, as I have said before, the gross revenue insurance plan and the net income stabilization account will give farmers the kind of program they really need for the long term and the kind of program that they, the farmers, have been asking for.

It is quite obvious as we have gone through the last four or five years that the existing safety net and stabilization programs that we have had in place were inadequate to deal with the very serious difficulties that we have faced in agriculture. Hence, we were required to come up from time to time with various ad hoc programs which had to be designed to meet a certain problem that occurred, a problem that was not covered by the existing legislation or programs that we have had in place.

Indeed, the federal government, under the leadership of our Prime Minister over the past few years has provided unprecedented assistance to our farmers. This kind of assistance was designed to meet a specific need. But whenever you design a program after the fact, there are always inequities. First of all, these kinds of programs are not easy to design, not easy to administer and not easy to distribute effectively and equitably.

We have had to do this and I think that all farmers, governments and literally everyone involved in agriculture, wanted us to look at ways and means of providing a more stable future, improved programs that would allow farmers to plan on the basis of their market intelligence, their managerial expertise, plus the known support that would be there under the government programs. The various programs we have had to come up with have covered an array of situations. For example, the Special Canadian Grains Program, the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program, the Special Income Assistance Program, the Cash Flow Enhancement Program, the Livestock Drought Program. We have had programs for grasshoppers. We have had programs for floods. We have had programs for the fruit industry.

We have gone through a period, and I know colleagues will share this with me, that in many respects, has been worse than the dirty thirties in terms of drought conditions and in terms of price.

Just today, we are working out an eradication and a compensation program for the potato industry, particularly, in the province of Prince Edward Island, which has been devastated by a virus that has affected that industry. We have learned very, very quickly in dealing with this process, if wheat is important to Saskatchewan, potatoes are as important to the province of Prince Edward Island. We recognize that and we are dealing with it, again in a co-operative fashion.

Yes, there has been some political grandstanding and some political finger pointing. The fact of the matter is that the job we must do is rid ourselves of the virus, eradicate it and get on with the job of restoring normal production and normal trading patterns, and that is precisely what we are doing.

In the budget of last week, an additional $1.3 billion of new money has been set aside for producers in difficulty. I think this demonstrates another clear example of this government's commitment to the agriculture industry and, particularly, to the farmers.

The long-term programs like the Western Grain Stabilization and Agricultural Stabilization Act, which have been in place for some time, while they have provided some stability and some support for our producers, obviously were unable to deal with the catastrophic and prolonged situation that our industry faced in the last half of the 1980s and the early 1990s.

The Western Grain Stabilization Act was established in 1976 to provide income stability for grain farmers in western Canada. The program was created to counteract the wide swings in cash receipts that are an all too important feature of the grains and oilseeds sector. The fluctuations in cash flow can have a serious effect, as we all know, on a prairie economy, and particularly on the grains and oilseeds sector. So, it is important to have these kinds of mechanisms in place.

What the Western Grain Stabilization Act provides to the grains and oilseeds sector, the Agricultural Stabilization Act does for producers of a wide variety of commodities outside those grains produced under the aegis of the Canadian Wheat Board. And while, as I said, these programs have provided valuable support to farmers across the country, they have been unable to cushion farmers against the low international prices and reduced yields of the 1980s.

What is more disturbing about it is that we are not precisely sure how long this condition will continue. So, it is important for us to look at this, not only in the immediate term, but in the long term.

As we know, the first indication of the problems we now face emerged in 1985 when the European Community and the United States began a struggle over their respective market shares of the world grain and oilseeds market. They fought their battle in the marketplace with the backing of their treasuries and Canada and other mid-sized grain exporters watched as grain prices tumbled. We are the victims of the $245 billion a year subsidy war that is going on right now, as I speak.

The price of wheat dropped from $222 a tonne in 1980–81 to $120 a tonne in 1986–87. This downward price spiral was reflected in the Canadian Wheat Board initial prices for the 1986–87 crop year. It was clear that the excessive use of trade distorting export subsidies by the European Community and retaliation by the United States would translate into a major loss of income for our grains and oilseeds producer, a loss which went well beyond the scope of the WGSA and the ASA programs.

So, we were faced with responding to these concerns. We got together with farm groups to see what could be done. We analysed the scope of the problem and determined that producers would need a billion dollars in support from them for the effects of falling prices. In October 1986, the Prime Minister made a commitment to provide that kind of support.

This was duplicated through the special Canadian Grains Program wherein another $1.1 billion was committed in the following year.

In 1988, prices strengthened somewhat so there was no need for another special grains program. However, that spring in many parts of the country, including the prairies, parts of southern Ontario and Quebec, suffered a very severe drought which devastated yields.

Again, farmers faced financial difficulty and again the federal government stepped in. In November 1988, after a thorough examination of the extent of the losses, we announced the $850 million Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program.

The amounts of moneys that have been provided by the federal government in support of agriculture between the periods 1985 to 1989 total just under $22 billion, and almost $12 billion provided to the grains and oilseeds producers.

Now the need for help to the farm sector continues today. International grains and oilseeds prices are down and our Canadian producers are suffering. This again is largely because of the continuation of the trade war between the United States and the European Community.

I wish to give some idea of the magnitude, which I am sure most colleagues in this House who follow agriculture are very much aware of, but it is important to state it for the record. For example, the European Community wheat export rebates went from $44 a tonne in July 1989 to $116 in July 1990 and reached approximately $200 a tonne in January 1991. In the same period, United States export enhancement bonuses went from an average of just under $19 a tonne in 1989 to $28 a tonne in 1990, and we now have topped the $50 mark, $50 to $55 a tonne.

Last year the European Community spent $4.3 billion in export subsidies on cereals, and last month the U.S. administration asked Congress to increase its cap on the Export Enhancement Program from $425 million U.S. to $900 million. We now have wheat selling in the neighbourhood of $100 a tonne, although there was some encouraging news last week that wheat prices have strengthened somewhat and let us hope that that trend continues.

Last year this government implemented two new programs to help farmers cope with this situation. Last March we announced a $500 million special assistance program and this was in response to the problems stemming from the international situation, successive years of drought, lingering debt load and high input costs.

We also at that time indicated our intention to continue to continue and expand the Canadian Rural Transition Program which has provided assistance to some 3,500 farmers. We enhanced the Farm Debt Review Board process which has provided assistance to some 11,000 farmers and we brought in place an Equity Leasing Program which, heretofore, has assisted some 400 to 500 producers in re-establishing themselves on the farm.

In October of last year, after we witnessed the second largest crop in the history of Canada, some 60 million tonnes, we announced, with obviously a clogged system and deliveries not running up to par, a cash flow enhancement program to provide interest rate relief to farmers for their unsold crops. This program will provide some $1.5 billion of interest-free cash to the farm economy. It will cost the federal government somewhere in the order of $100 million.

In dealing with the problems and the response, and the uncertainty about what kind of program and when a program would be designed to meet a specific condition, farmers continue to ask for predictable safety-net programs, that would provide equity to producers in all regions of the country. They also ask for programs that would help them manage their farms on their own and they wanted us to deal with this issue on an individual whole-farm approach. In other words, they wanted a safety net program brought in that could be used as a management and financial tool.

I think that the programs that we are trying to legislate today will help meet these needs.

The Gross Revenue Insurance Program will provide farmers with revenue protection. It builds upon conventional crop insurance by offering farmers price support as well as yield protection. For the 1991-1992 crop year GRIP will deliver similar benefits across the country although there very well may be some differences in program design from province to province. We have allowed for that flexibility to gain some experience and to try to adapt as close as possible without undermining the integrity of the principles. We tried to ensure that there would be similarity yet sufficient flexibility to address the unique characteristics of the industry in each specific province.

In under-current market conditions we expect that GRIP will trigger a pay-out something in the order of $2.7 billion for the 1991-92 crop year.

Farmers will be able to buy this price protection through crop insurance. They will continue to be able to buy their yield protection through crop insurance and price protection through the revenue insurance program.

I might add that the crop insurance program is working very well because this House had the opportunity of improving the crop insurance legislation which was passed last year.

Nothing will really change in the manner of how farmers sign up. They will go in and still continue to buy their crop insurance as they have done in other years but they will have an added feature which will be the revenue protection component and by enrolling in both crop insurance and the new revenue insurance plan farmers will guarantee their income per acre for each crop seeded.

Crop insurance premiums will continue to be shared 50 per cent by producers and 25 per cent by each of the federal and provincial governments.

With respect to the revenue insurance program, farmers will pay one-third of the revenue insurance premium. The province will pay 25 per cent and the federal government will pay the remaining 41 and two-thirds per cent.

The advantage of GRIP is that the farmers will be able to calculate their guaranteed total returns early in the spring and this is a bankable commodity. They will be able to take it to their lenders and assist them in making their credit arrangements for this year. This indeed was borne out by the chairman of the Royal Bank, Allan Taylor, who said: "From a lender's standpoint, it's a very positive move—.When your clients have that sort of protection against a crop—a guaranteed price—you've got something much better to work with than the risk-taking that goes without that sort of protection".

There again even without this bill being passed we have sent out a very positive signal to the lenders on whom producers rely and I think that is a good signal.

In addition GRIP offers predictable equitable support across all commodities and regions, and it provides coverage for farm-fed grain—something that the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act have never done.

The program targets assistance to the individual and is therefore a more efficient way, we believe, of providing assistance, and support is based on long-term market trends which encourage sound management decisions.

If there is anything that we could say in reviewing some of the programs that we have tried to design as best we could I think we would find that under this program the assistance will be targeted more specifically to the areas of need.

• (1200)

It will be much more cost effective in providing the kind of support that the producing community will need.

We expect the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan to go into deficit for the first few years of operation but, as in any insurance program, there will be times both of surplus and deficit. But, one of the objectives of the task force was to design a program that was actuarially sound. Provinces have been cognizant of that, we have been cognizant of that, and the producers have been cognizant of that.

When we are looking at this program over the long term we expect it to be actuarially sound. Obviously, over a five-year period that would not be the case, but we are in this for the long haul and will continue to add refinements and improvements as the experience gained from the program would dictate that we should do.

NISA, the Net Income Stabilization Account, would let farmers set aside money in individual accounts with matching contributions from the federal and provincial governments. Farmers can take money out of their individual accounts when their margins fall below the level of the previous five years or when taxable income falls below $10,000. For the 1990 tax year the program is likely to trigger withdrawals of about $225 million, again aimed at those farmers who need it most.

That may be an over optimistic figure because, as I said earlier, I am somewhat disappointed that more provinces have not come on board the NISA program. That is not to say they have rejected it. They are considering it very seriously and I think we will have a fairly comprehensive coverage of the NISA program for the next year.

These programs which we are implementing here today, the GRIP and NISA concept, while it is applied specifically today to the grains and oilseeds, can be expanded to other programs. In fact, there is keen interest in the horticultural sector. We are engaged at this very moment in discussing how to bring the horticultural sector into the GRIP and NISA program.

We recognize that there are some concerns about the program, about its design and how it will influence farmers' decisions. But, this program is not an insurance policy to ensure against bad management decisions. It is really designed to reflect a producer's individual performance and we think that is good. If a farmer grows crops that are not suited to his region or suited to his capabilities, his coverage through crop insurance will be reduced and his premiums will increase over time.

We certainly have our share of critics, some genuine, some armchair. Some say it is too rich. Some say the program is not rich enough. I note that the cattlemen say they are going to choke on GRIP. I find that strange because they have been involved in the development of the program. I think it is fair to say that we have tried to cure the grains and oilseeds problem and not transfer it to the livestock sector. In the livestock sector, the Red Meat Tripartite Stabilization Program is one that is in existence, and I think it has been well accepted.

We have received other criticisms that suggest the program is not market neutral, that it masks markets signals. Economists, and this I find rather interesting, have lashed out at the program in the last couple of weeks. The development of this program has been under consideration for the last 12 months and we have invited literally everyone to come forth with their ideas and their suggestions. The economists are saying that this program is going to destroy our soil. They say it might destroy incentive. They say that farmers are going to farm the program.

It is something to make those allegations and not really substantiate them.

We are going to have our share of critics, particularly arm-chair quarterbacks. When it comes to examining those criticisms as against the opinion of producers, those of us who are interested in preserving the welfare of and creating a better climate for our agricultural industry will have a tendency to listen to our producers rather than economists. I have nothing against economists; we need them as well.

It is fair to criticize this program in a constructive way, but it would be kind of nice, if one has that criticism, to come up with some positive alternatives and constructive proposals which will help improve.

We claim no ownership of this particular policy. It is certainly under our name. It is one that was designed co-operatively. It was designed by producers themselves, with the support of this government and the support of other provincial governments. It is a program that has been designed to meet a specific need and to build a stronger future for Canadian agriculture.

There are always some simplistic approaches. I notice that the president of the National Farmers Union took exception to the program and said that we should really join it because it is the only thing we have, but he said that it does not meet the need because "we need a policy which pays producers at the farm gate".

I only say to him welcome. He should get engaged in the wonderful world of reality. Those of us who have been close to the agriculture scene know that you do not have somebody come knocking on your gate to seek out an agricultural product that you produce. You have to produce a product that is wholesome, nutritious, in demand, and is sold at the right price. We live in a day and age where the consumer is the king.

While I mentioned some negative comments, there have also been some very positive comments from various quarters: The Globe and Mail headline, "Farmers' new safety net will offer much-needed security"; Western Producer, "Safety nets pull farm income up from disaster"; another headline, "GRIP 'exactly what lenders need'"; the Saskatoon Phoenix and the Kindersley Clarion, "Farmers like new programs"; Kindersley Clarion, "New farm 'Safety Net' programs get good reception", "New farm aid worth up to $3 billion", "GRIP should be good for everyone"; from letters to the editor, "Farm safety nets worth $1 billion", "Safety net meeting draws large crowd", "GRIP offers better protection", "Farm program is better than expected", "Safety net to provide stable effective coverage", "It's tough, but programs will help"; the Alberta Wheat Pool Budget, "Pool pleased with safety net deal"; The Leader Post of Regina, "No longer must Prairie farmers nurture without a net"; the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, "Farm aid welcome in West"; and I could go on.

I guess it is balanced. I am sure that members of the House will have some views on it, but I do not think this bill comes as a surprise because the program is not a surprise. It has been developed and it has evolved in a clearly transparent fashion.

The program is not perfect. It is laced with all the human frailties that each and every one of us has, but it is an attempt in a very broad way to try to wrestle with a very difficult problem. I think it is also fair to say that even with this mechanism in place farmers will have the primary responsibility of managing their own risk and using their own talents and their own judgment calls. This is what we refer to as the first line of defence.

Safety net programs that this legislation will allow us to design is the second line of defence which will provide that stabilization, some security and predictability for the future.

On occasions, there will be the necessity of a third line of defence. That is something that we are addressing right now. That is why we have announced the creation of the third line defence committee. The first task of this committee will be to examine the third line defence options, which will provide a bridge and a transition to the new safety net program and allow us to adjust it to the longer term realities of our industry.

They will be looking at debt problems, diversification and adjustment. We will also be looking at options and ways in which we can use the scarce resources in the most effective way possible.

I should say that this bill also provides for the establishment of a special measures committee. It establishes the criteria under which the third line defence programs will be designed, again to try to put some order, some principles and criteria into the system.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my time has expired. I simply want to present this legislation to the House today for colleagues' consideration in the open fashion in which it was developed and in which I tried to present it.

Given the circumstances and the need for this kind of framework legislation, I hope we can proceed with it as quickly as we possibly can. It is expected out there by the producers. It is an important first. It is a program design that has taken place within the open public policy domain, one that I believe can provide a greater security for the future, one that I believe will provide confidence for the future, and one that will restore the kind of vibrant industry that we know our agricultural industry to be.

Going through this period of difficulty, a legislative measure like this one can provide hope for our young farmers. It can also provide the kind of stability and confidence those who have had some very difficult times in the last four or five years will welcome. It will provide something firm and predictable. When they decide to plant their crops for this year, they will have this mechanism at their disposal to assist and guide them in making those very difficult decisions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak to Bill C–98, the Farm Income Protection Act, which the minister has outlined before the House today.

This bill provides for the most massive farm support programs, GRIP and NISA, which have ever been proposed to Canadian farmers. Obviously the government has very skilfully managed this program, putting it before Canadian farmers in such a way that the legislation before the House today provides a framework for the federal government to make agreements with the provinces and with producers.

This legislation does not spell out what the premiums will be for producers who want to make a contribution and participate in the program. It does not say what the benefits will be. In some ways, that is the program that farmers have before them. They know the general outline, but they do not know specifically the premiums they will pay or the benefits they will receive, even though the program is well down the road toward contributions.

Clearly GRIP and NISA have a number of aspects about it which are very appealing. The pay–outs are made, for instance, on farm fed grains. There is no requirement to sell grain within a particular crop year to be eligible for a payment. The range of eligible crops compared to the western grain stabilization fund has been expanded and the pay–outs are predictable. The period over which the estimates are being made have been expanded from five years to fifteen years.

For many producers in western Canada there is a great deal of uncertainty because of the massive sales program which has been taking place this winter. Really, the sizzle is being sold but the actual details are not there. When this bill is being studied in the committee stage, technically we will not have the details of GRIP or NISA program before us even there because we are talking about just a framework legislation for signing agreements.

There is no provision in this legislation, for instance, for the GRIP and NISA agreements, which are being put together between the provincial governments that want to participate, to come before the House for members of Parliament to debate or amend them. It is kind of an executive federalism where a deal is put together between the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture and the premiers, but not by members of the House themselves.

Clearly the need is tremendous. The government during the last three years has reduced government support programs by $1.8 billion. The minister spoke about the payments which were made in 1987 and 1988—and they were promised in 1988—of $1 billion, $1.8 billion, $1.1 billion, and $850 million. Clearly those payments were needed then, but they were needed this year too. They were needed last year. Yet there were massive cutbacks: $500 million in 1989 budget. There was no special grains program this crop year or last year.

If we look at the government's own estimates of support programs, we see a decline from the 1988 to 1991 estimates involving a reduction of $1.8 billion, even though in this crop year grain prices are clearly the lowest in history. Sales of wheat of less than $100 in real terms are clearly the lowest in history.

In the budget estimates last week which the Minister of Finance brought down, he suggested there was going to be $1.3 billion. The prairie pools and farm groups have suggested that there should be a deficiency payment of at least $1 billion, perhaps even $1.3 billion.

Even the minister's own advisory committee has estimated that in this crop year there needs to be a deficiency payment of that magnitude. Yet, when the budget announcement was made, it is not clear exactly what that $1.3 billion will be used for. It is suggested in the minister's press release that it may be used for the Canadian Wheat Board shortfall. That has been variously estimated at $750 million to $1 billion. It might be used for the federal government premiums in the GRIP and NISA programs. It might be used for a deficiency payment this year. Clearly, his own advisory group is telling him that there is a need, as a straight deficiency payment of that amount. So, it is obviously being kept in reserve in case it is needed. If there is a provincial election in Saskatchewan, there can be a deficiency payment made there.

There is a concern that politics is almost as important here to the government as a long-term stable support program for Canadian agriculture. That is what concerns western agricultural producers and to some extent, in other areas of the country as well, that we are really dealing so much with a sizzle here, that we have to be careful that we do not create a program that is not nearly as workable as it should be.

For instance, the minister has outlined the criticisms of the program by agricultural economists and other groups. But I think we would have felt better if he had gone into some detail as to what mechanisms there were in the program. We are not dealing with that program here, we are dealing with enabling legislation. But clearly, this enabling legislation provides for those agreements. Those are the kinds of questions that everybody wants to see answered.

There is a great concern as well, that this legislation essentially is an off-loading kind of legislation. We have seen that the government's support programs have dropped by $1.8 billion during the last three years. This bill seems to move from programs like the Special Grains Program, like the ASA, like the drought assistance, which essentially were totally funded by the federal government, or in the case of Western Grain Stabilization Fund, 60 per cent by the federal government, to off-load onto the provinces and the producers.

Many people in Saskatchewan wonder, for instance, whether a program that is going to cost the producers and the provincial government something like 60 or 65 per cent by those groups, whether payments of $400, $500 or $600 million a year in that province can be sustained, when programs in the past were substantially funded by the federal government. Many people make the argument that if the low prices are due to international grain wars, then the federal government has a responsibility to fund a great deal, just as they have in the past under the Special Grains Program or as the United States government does under its program. Whereas, under this GRIP and NISA program, there is essentially something like 60 per cent or 65 per cent being funded by the producers and the provincial governments.

That calls into question whether this will really be a national program. Under ASA and the Western Grain Stabilization Fund, between those two programs, there was a so-called national arrangement for support. It is not to say that those programs are adequate. Clearly, the Western Grain Stabilization Fund to fight a grain war, an international trade war, was simply not capable of doing that.

At the same time we wonder about the amount of the deficit in the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. It has been variously estimated at $750 million to over a billion dollars. Whether or not that is going to be rolled into the GRIP program and whether it will have to be covered and paid for by the provinces and the producers paying, essentially, 60 per cent of the costs.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of uncertainty and concern. Clearly, there is a desperate need for support, and we want to see that support. Unfortunately, it is my impression that very little, if anything, will be paid out under the GRIP program in this calendar year, 1991. There could be an initial payment later this fall and there could be interim payments sometime, but the kind of massive deficiency payment which the prairie pools, the NFU, and other groups are talking about for this calendar year will not be provided by the GRIP program. In fact, there is no guarantee that any of it will be provided until the fall of 1992, which, under the GRIP program, as I understand it, that would only become due and payable. I think there is great concern as to whether this will be used as a political tool for a fall election in 1992 or used in 1993.

There is great concern and uncertainty: What is the pay-out going to be? When is it going to be made? What are the premiums going to be?

Farmers who worked on the committee, the safety nets program, were working towards a program where the premium would be about 18 per cent of the dollar coverage, with the farmer putting up 6 per cent, and a possible increase of 2 per cent, bringing it up to 8 per cent. I am told by farmers in Saskatchewan that the premium may be as high as 12.5 per cent, with an additional cost of a possible 2 per cent if the deficits are too high in the first year or so and there is provision. The farmer effectively is locked in for four years. He is locked in for the initial year when he signs up and for three additional years. The premiums which the safety net committee had talked about could be doubled from what they had initially started dealing with. So, there is great uncertainty in that regard.

Because farmers desperately need a deficiency payment for the 1990–91 crop year, I believe there is great uncertainty as to whether or not they will have to sign up for GRIP and NISA in order to be eligible for that deficiency payment. I hope that the minister will be able to clarify today, that farmers will not have to sign up for the GRIP program in order to be eligible for a deficiency payment in the crop year 1990–91. It is essential for the minister to clarify that particular arrangement, because it clearly would be most unfair to farmers who do not know what the premium is going to be, what the situation will turn out to be, to be forced to sign up for this to be eligible for a deficiency payment in this crop year.

Those are some of the concerns and uncertainties. Perhaps the government has answers to these questions; if they have, that will be great. We want to see support provided to farmers and we want to see it provided very soon. There has to be support in this particular crop year, with grain prices below $100 a tonne for wheat.

The minister talked about the criticisms of the bill. I wish he had taken some time to deal with those criticisms which have been made by various groups, because I think it is very important to know what mechanisms there are in the proposed GRIP program to prevent abuses such as those which have been signalled by some groups or claimed by some groups.

• (1230)

Section 4 of the bill sets out the need for regional diversity of agriculture, marketing signals, and sustainable agriculture, but the program is not countervailable under the existing GATT rules. It is important that the government respond to those criticisms and explain how market signals are going to be maintained. If there is anything that people do not want in the long run it is a program where farmers farm the system rather than farming, in an efficient and effective way, the land.

I have spoken, for instance, to one seed grower—a seed plant in Canada would, in a normal year, sell to one producer 8,000 pounds of canola seed to seed perhaps 1,000 acres—this year, the farmer is planning to put in all wheat. Looking at the agriculture trends you see why that would be. For instance, the pay-out per acre for red spring wheat is estimated at $44.72 a tonne, whereas for canola it is something like $19.28 a tonne.

It is important that the government explain how the system will work, with all the benefits that should be provided, without masking market signals, without having people farm the GRIP program rather than farming the land. It is essential that the government explain what mechanisms there will be in this program to prevent that, because otherwise we will have a gross distortion in production, we could have a gross misuse of the land, and move to a system which is not desirable.

I hope that the minister and officials will be able to explain how those market forces are going to be allowed to operate and signals maintained, how there will not be abuses with regard to sustainable agriculture, and how the revenue guarantee will not be subject to a GATT countervail.

We have had enough problems with the United States alone on pork and other commodities; we do not want a countervail on our wheat—our most important agriculture export.

Those are some of the concerns which we hope will be dealt with when we go to a committee stage of this bill and, hopefully, in the debate that takes place during the next few days.

It was interesting that when the minister spoke he provided an estimate of the amount of the benefits of $2.6 billion. The documentation put out by his own department in December showed $2.4 billion. I would be interested to know if the government could provide the changes that have taken place with regard to the amount of the benefits.

We think this is a very important bill. It sweeps away the crop insurance legislation which we spent so much time on last year and essentially just provides an arrangement for agreements with very little of the specificity that was in the previous bill that we passed only a year ago. It will be interesting because it gives a very broad range of arrangements that could take place under crop insurance, quite different from the legislation that was passed only a year ago.

The minister mentioned as well reinstating interest free cash advances. We are amazed that he fought so hard to get rid of interest free cash advances only a year ago and then five or six months later the government reinstated them with larger amounts. We are hopeful that the massive cutbacks that farmers have sustained over the last year or so will be done away with as well.

I think we need to have some arrangement in this legislation for Parliament to have an input into these agreements that are reached with provincial governments. Otherwise, we essentially have an arrangement where the House passes enabling legislation, the government puts together a program with the provinces which will provide benefits of $2.6 billion—according to the Minister of Agriculture—and the members of the House of Commons have no input into that agreement except through the umbrella arrangement—which does not get into specifics, as it did with the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. I think that is very important.

I think serious questions have been raised, both by the minister and by prairie pools and other groups, as to how the legislation will ensure environmental arrangements, market forces, and farm practices. We need to have those questions answered as well. How will the gross revenue guarantee not be subject to a countervail, especially that portion not the crop insurance.

We need to know at this stage, or very soon, what the premium is going to be. The task force that worked on this recommended a 6 per cent premium, now we are hearing estimates as high as a 12.5 per cent premium for the full GRIP program. Can farmers on a $100,000 worth of gross farm income afford a premium of $14,500? Can provincial governments sustain the massive percentage which they will be required to provide? Bearing in mind that in the Western Grain Stabilization Fund, under the previous crop insurance arrangement, under the Special Grains Program, they did not have to make a contribution.

We should not be asked, as members of Parliament, to give a blank cheque for the government to go ahead and cut any kind of a deal that is to the political advantage of individual premiers for their election campaigns. We all remember in 1986 when the premier of Saskatchewan phoned in the middle of the night the former Minister of Justice to demand that the Prime Minister make a payment of a billion dollars to ensure his election.

Surely if GRIP and NISA are ultimately enacted under the authority of this bill there are long-term ramifications. We want to know if there is just going to be a big pay-out in 1992 and 1993 when there is likely to be a federal election? Or, is there going to be an ongoing arrangement where there is going to be a benefit to farmers? I am sure the government has the facts but it certainly has not made them clear to producers or to members of Parliament, and under this legislation there is no provision for that. It is just a framework legislation where the government can cut any deal it wants and so there should be an arrangement where the agreements that are reached with the provinces come back to be approved by the Parliament of Canada. Otherwise the Parliament of Canada becomes almost irrelevant in this whole situation.

Under the Western Grain Stabilization fund there was a provision that it was covered by the Parliament of Canada. We made the arrangement, members of Parliament if they wished actually debated and amended the legislation, the premium arrangements, the triggering mechanisms, and the pay-out. Under this legislation there is no such provision.

We feel that this is important legislation. It requires a great deal of explanation to members. We want to see it go forward. We want answers to the the questions which we have raised, and which the minister himself has raised. We want to see what provisions there are to prevent abuses and ensure the long-term viability and benefit to Canadian farmers. We believe there should be no coercion by the minister, or by this legislation, to force farmers into GRIP and NISA arrangements in order to qualify for assistance in this crop year.

Clearly the grain industry is facing the worst possible situation. The government has chopped back support programs during the last three years by $1.8 billion—that is $1.8 billion. The world price of grain as a result of the export enhancement program and support programs by the EEC has been driven down below $100 a tonne for wheat. That whole arrangement makes the whole industry unviable without support programs. We want to see a predictable support program put in place that is going to be to the long-term benefit, that is not going to be used as a political mechanism but is going to be there to sustain and support agriculture over the long haul, of what is in my opinion our most important industry.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, we are here today to discuss Bill C-98, a bill which integrates a number of programs in the agricultural area that have been in existence for some time. It will integrate the Western Grain Stabilization Act, the Crop Insurance Act, the Agricultural Stabilization Act under this new legislation.

This is a continuation of a trend we have seen in the last number of years on the parliamentary level where governments are introducing umbrella legislation that effectively asks Parliament to give them the power to do almost anything they like by executive fiat.

This legislation is no different. It follows that scheme. It allows the federal government to make deals with the provinces and with farmers, through the provinces, to come to agreements on Gross Revenue Insurance Program, a Net Income Stabilization Account, and revenue insurance programs.

In brief what is contemplated as near as we can understand is that a Gross Revenue Insurance Program will be put into place in most of the grain and oilseeds areas this spring.

This would provide certain guarantees based on a 15 year index moving average price for each of the 18 covered commodities, which would have the effect of covering wheat at something over $4 or $4.15—in that range—with the percentage of coverage varying slightly from province to province.

On the prairies, it is conceived that the program would be 70 per cent of the index moving average price for those 18 commodities times the average yield as shown in crop insurance in those three prairie provinces. When we get into other parts of the country, there are some other options open. It is possible to use a system of price setting other than the index moving average price, to do a production expenditures model which may prove useful to provinces like British Columbia or Quebec, which are already using a cost of production type model to provide their stabilization programs. They may find that option of interest.

The program also permits the Net Income Stabilization Account which still seems to be in a certain amount of flux. The idea there that seems to be public is that the farmers would pay half of this. The federal and provincial governments would split the other half of the cost.

Frankly, I am not up to date on what the Department of Finance has ruled. The origin of this was to make a self-insurance kind of program which would be attractive to those areas that do not suffer huge fluctuations in production.

The farmer would be permitted to put some money aside, in the original concept, in his own self-insurance fund which would be considered an expense for income tax purposes.

My latest information is that that whole concept has been turned on its head by the Department of Finance. When we get to the committee stage, we are hopeful of getting some of the Department of Finance officials in to explain what they have in mind and what they see it as, compared to the original intent.

The revenue insurance plan program part of this legislation will be a receptacle for the old Agriculture Stabilization Act commodities that have tripartite plans in place. They will now come under the aegis of this program. The scheme for integration is set out in this bill.

When all is said and done, it is a concept which attempts—I think properly—to make some more predictable long term kind of agricultural program. It is not so ad hoc as some of the programs that we have had in the past five to eight years. There is still quite a lot of confusion and argument among the farmers, the farm press and the public as to just what is being seen here.

It is a little bit like the old poem that was in our readers when I was in school a long time ago of the seven blind men and the elephant. The seven blind men approached the elephant, and each one found a different part of the elephant to touch. They came to quite wrong conclusions as to what it was in front of them.

Some running into the belly thought it was a wall. Another feeling the tail thought it was like a rope. Another grasping a leg felt the elephant was like a tree. Another feeling its ear thought that the elephant was very like a fan, et cetera.

I suppose, to a certain extent, that is what has happened with the reaction from the various farm organization and the various analysts around the country.

We have a publication from United Grain Growers which does an analysis on GRIP, as it is understood in western Canada at the moment. It concludes that GRIP will produce more acres of crop with lower yields due to fewer inputs being bought, because there is an incentive under GRIP with the current levels of pay-out guarantees to try one's best to hit an average yield. Do not go overboard to try to get yields, because it will only reduce the amount of income that you have. There is a real disincentive to try for higher yields according to their analysis.

• (1250)

They also point out that there is potential, if there are no changes in the current proposals, to make a mess out of the specialty crops, to use their words. What they have said in their report is: "Even a glut of lentils would not prevent farmers from growing more lentils the following year. The support levels in GRIP are fairly static, declining slightly over time". That is because of it being an index moving average over 15 years even though the price this year might drop considerably because a glut of lentils would not show up; it would only be one-fifteenth of the value of the price in the coming year. There are some concerns expressed by some of the groups who have done their analysis on it up to this point.

They point out also that farmers will react not to market forces any more but the new reality will be that they will react to new incentives created by GRIP and these reactions will be to alter acres and to change production decisions.

As well, we have a report from a group of agricultural economists in Manitoba and Saskatchewan: Kraft, Furtan, Rosaasen, Gray and Weisensel. They conclude that the way the program is written now, the way that the agreements that are in the works, federal-provincial, tend in their opinion to favour wheat because it is the safest crop with a fairly high price guarantee. They provide two proposals in their discussion paper which would have the effect of giving all crops equal or similar advantage by using their wheat acreage base as a form of coverage, so it would not matter. The pay-out would be based on an acreage, so to speak, and the farmer could grow whichever crop he thought he would get the maximum return from the market as a result.

Alternatively to that, they provide a rather complex basket per acre approach which would tie in all of the crops that are generally grown in a region and make that the base coverage model. As well, the group of agricultural economists have concerns about the possibility of very large pay-outs because the program does not seem to have any upper limits. They point out that it is very realistically within the realm of possibility that someone who seeds 5,000 acres could be taking home $.25 million of government funds having put in $16,000 to $32,000 in this particular year, or not more than $50,000 in this particular year as his share of payments. There are some concerns about that.

We have a paper submitted by the National Farmers' Union concerned about the long-term shifts that this program may create to rural communities. They are pointing out that there is a very real off-loading of federal responsibilities and costs on to the provinces and on to farmers. This is particularly difficult for those provinces and regions of the country that are basically rural, particularly costly to the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island where the farm output is very high and the population that is non-farming is relatively low compared to the rest of the country.

They express some concern for the regional sustainability of these very important regions of our country, especially since metropolitan areas require the food that these rural areas produce but are being allowed under this program to opt out of paying so much for the program and leaving those costs up to the rural areas themselves to raise. That concern is echoed somewhat by the Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, the hon. Glen Findlay who says:

> If grain prices continue the way they are there could be very significant debt.

He is talking about debt to his province. He goes on to say:

> I think Manitoba has taken a more responsible approach because we want to know the exact fiscal responsibility to our taxpayers.

So, Manitoba is bargaining very hard-headedly as to the sharing of the program as far as it applies to GRIP and particularly to NISA.

All of this discussion, of course, has raised the attention of the political columnists, and we have a number of those who have given opinions on GRIP and NISA. I have one here from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. Les McPherson is a columnist there and I hope he is talking tongue in cheek. He presents his solution to the farm problem thus: "Money could be collected in the cities, loaded into grain cars and hauled by railway to rural elevators. Then, whenever a farmer needed more money he would only have to drive his grain truck to the nearest elevator and load her up. Back on the farm he would simply use his auger to unload his money from his truck into a granary. The beauty of this approach is that it is self-limiting. When a farmer's granary is filled with money he simply would not qualify for any more subsidies."

Now that may be a bit tongue in cheek, but it also does, unfortunately, reflect a growing opinion in those parts of Canada that are not farming and are not more directly dependent on farming, as to what the whole idea is behind transfers of tax dollars to cover expenditures that farmers have to make in order to produce food.

That goes beyond just Les McPherson. Dale Eisler of the Leader-Post, who is considered to be a serious political columnist, did an analysis on the Net Income Stabilization Account, NISA, in which he argued fairly strongly that NISA is a special consideration that non-farmers should say no to.

So there is some growing concern from some of the press at least that these programs are very expensive and that taxpayers should not be concerned about continuing the very large pay-outs and large pay-outs are of concern.

I think it would be particularly difficult to explain and sustain the kind of pay-out that Furtan and Kraft look at in their proposal when they say that there should probably be a cap on this because there were caps on WGSA and on the ASA programs that this program supplants. It is hard to explain $250,000 of government funds going into one producer, even though I understand why that producer is probably going to need most of that money.

We have not had much discussion, though the minister did refer to it, as to what the third line of defence is going to be. Even in the country, we are only aware that there are a number of subcommittees working on the so-called third line of defence which was originally perceived to be an established program that would take care of disasters, whether they were international price disasters or weather disasters that were quite beyond the normal ability of these long-term programs, like GRIP and NISA, to look after.

What we are seeing is that the third line of defence is much broader than that. We have subcommittees looking into soil saving programs for regrassing and reforestation. We are not sure whether the third line of this defence also includes encouragement or assistance to have social shifts out of agriculture, but some comments in the realm of third line of defence make it sound as if that might be part of the program. Some third line of defence programs are looking at development of alternative employment in rural areas to diversify into something either related to agriculture or completely unrelated, as long as it provides jobs.

Some of the third line discussions seem to be looking at assistance with diversification and breaking the grain dependence of some areas in Canada.

Over all, the bill before us is broad enough and vague enough that is is very difficult to be opposed to it. There is nothing there to oppose. There is very little there to support either. It is quite nebulous. It is quite wraith-like in its presentation. It will take form as federal—provincial agreements are signed and as those are made public. We presume that they will eventually be made public. Until that happens, it is almost anything one wants it to be. That is a problem we have with legislation. But, as I said at the outset, that is the new style of government of this particular government: to achieve from the House of Commons the power to do anything it wants and then go on from there to run the country.

We are prepared to allow it to go quite quickly to the agriculture committee for review. In the committee we can seek answers, clarifications and perhaps discuss amendments and some of the merits of amendments that have already been proposed by some of the groups I quoted earlier in my remarks. We can perhaps get the Department of Finance in to explain what it has done to NISA and why it thinks it should not be a self-insurance program but instead a kind of farmers' RRSP or a special retirement fund or whatever it will be used for under what I understand are the current rulings with regard to it.

We will have to look at questions of choice. I was pleased to hear the minister say that no one has one perfect solution. That is particularly reassuring to my ears, because when I hear GRIP and NISA being discussed in my province of Saskatchewan I get the impression that the year after next we will have basically two choices. We can either participate in GRIP and NISA or we can opt out and, if we opt out, we will not be eligible any more for any other kind of government assistance.

It is no longer clear that one can take either GRIP or NISA. Apparently one will not be able to continue with crop insurance and NISA, which is an option a lot of people in the more stable production areas find to be a useful and viable alternative.

I see the member from Assiniboia looking very puzzled. Perhaps he has not done all of the calculations.

Mr. Gustafson: You meant GRIP, not NISA.

Mr. Althouse: Crop insurance and GRIP. The word we are getting so far is that crop insurance will exist under GRIP in two years and that it will not be possible to have a NISA plus crop insurance after two years. That restricts choice considerably, because once he does the economics of it he would find, as my preliminary discussions have discovered, that once outside the more drought ridden parts of the prairies there is not a lot to be gained from joining GRIP. Yet, we are not particularly keen to get out of crop insurance for the odd year when we have hail or frost.

Unfortunately, a lot of the decisions on these programs are being dominated by King Wheat in the southern prairies without reference to the rest of the country, and the rest of the country produces a lot of farm goods as well.

If there are going to be choices, I hope that in the committee we will be able to convince the government and the contracting parties that they should be recognizing that there are more farmers than just wheat farmers.

The questions of cost are also high on farmers' minds, as well as ministers of agriculture. I already quoted the hon. Glen Findlay from Manitoba, but I have been getting calls from farmers in the western part of the province saying that this could be a very costly program for them, that they have no choice but to be in or out. One woman said that this could cost her farm $60,000 to $80,000 in annual premiums and, perhaps better uses could be found for that money.

They want a clear understanding of what the cost is, what they might get out of it. They are quite cognizant that they might get nothing. This coming year, even though I expect, along with most grains analysts, a very low price for wheat, probably about $2.50 or perhaps even lower, and given that GRIP covers $4.15 you would think that it would be a sure thing for a pay-out. But this is a gross revenue insurance program, so it is price times yield.

Even though the price may be one-half what the target price is, if the yield is double a normal crop, you would have produced yourself out of a pay-out. You may not be able to sell it, but that does not matter to this program. You would simply be sitting there with bins full of grain and no money, and probably complaining and yelling for the kind of solution that Les MacPherson in the Star Phoenix was offering: to shovel out money and send car loads to the rest of the bins. Now, because they are already full, there would not be room, I suppose.

Anyhow, those are some of the questions that are being asked. At committee I want to find out more about the assumptions that are being used to achieve what are described as actuarially sound premiums, because some of the premium prices I have been hearing sound as if the government is going to have great difficulty in keeping the fund out of deep debt for a long time.

I am concerned about that because this legislation appears to be intending to integrate the debt that is already there in the western grain stabilization fund account which, on February 1, was approximately $1.1 billion. I think the new act will also probably be required to absorb—though it is up to the cabinet to decide in both cases—the reinsurance fund debt which exists under crop insurance legislation. That is $471 million of debt as well. It is not expected to get itself out of trouble for at least six years, and under this program it may take quite a lot longer than that.

I want to know more about what sorts of arrangements are being made, whether the government is using a 15-year cycle, a 30-year cycle, or whether it is trying to keep program actuarially sound over 10 or 15 years.

There are going to be questions in committee about the cost. Also there will be the question of equity to smaller agriculturally dependent provinces, the shifting and offloading of the cost of food on to the areas that produce the food. Essentially what we are doing when we shift the cost of these programs, which have traditionally in this country been mainly federal in order to sustain prices and look after export problems because there are many metropolitan areas in this country that have a larger income and tax base, and need this food.

This program and this government are proposing—the program does not force them to; it is the kind of deals it is getting into—to make provinces like Saskatchewan carry a very high per capita debt each year in order to get GRIP; to make Manitoba carry a very high per capita debt each year in order to get GRIP and NISA. The same will apply to Prince Edward Island if the program is expanded to include potatoes.

These are questions that have to be dealt with.

Also, we have questions about GATT conformity. We were told by the minister—and I tend to concur—that the legislation itself is not breaking any GATT rules, but the agreements that have been talked about, I believe, are. I believe those are, as they say, "GATTable". Some of our products will be subject to countervail and dumping actions as a result, particularly if we continue with the program as it is now where, as some analysts have pointed out, it has a wheat bias. If we do not take that wheat bias out, our wheat could very well be countervailed.

We have to know fairly soon, whether in committee or in this House. Somewhere the government is going to have to address the very real problem of the one-year GATT payments. Even if GRIP and NISA come into play, the programs will not be putting very much money into farmers' pockets until some time in 1992.

The last government payment to help us fight, sustain, and live through the American-European grain war occurred in July to September across the country, and there will be over a year's lapse in assistance. That gap has to be filled, and this government has to decide very quickly how that is going to be done and when it is going to be done.

Finally, there are questions of sustainability for rural communities, not just sustainable in the economic sense and not just sustainable in the environmental sense. But, if we are going to talk about sustainability in the environmental sense, let's remember that people are part of the environment too. The communities that those people are trying to sustain in those rural areas are also part of their environment; not only their ecological environment but their social environment. These programs that are being developed have to reflect that.

In conclusion, I am prepared to let this go fairly quickly to committee so that the vague assertions of this legislation can be clarified. Hopefully, the agreements that are arrived at between now and the end of the legislation will be made public, and then perhaps the committee will have a better idea of how this dream and this myth can become a reality. Until then, nobody can be particularly helpful with their criticism of this legislation. I hope we can find those answers in committee and that the government is willing to listen to proposed amendments, not only from our side of the House but also as proposed by farm groups, academics and individuals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 1:17 p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1:17 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, while the western world, northern nations of the world, concerned themselves with the crisis and ensuing war in the Middle East, Third World nations, southern nations, have become more and more convinced that the world has passed them by. Already crippled by the financing burdens of their international debts, the gulf war has created calamitous conditions in dozens of Third World countries as a result of increased oil prices and the loss of wage earnings from their expatriate workers in the gulf region.

For the third year in a row, the Canadian government budget has cut Official Development Assistance to Third World countries. Here in Canada families in poverty, including one in six of Canada's children, waited in vain for a sign of concern. Instead of programs to lift our Canadian poor into productive, dignified, secure futures, the already fragile social safety nets were further weakened by this government's last budget.

Neglect of the priority needs of both developing Canadian citizens, our children and youth, and developing nations is to threaten the well-being and security of Canada's future as surely as is the neglect of our national debt.

What we criticize today is not the government's focus upon the need to eliminate our debt, but the inappropriate and short-sighted priorities of the government in achieving its objectives. Two plus more wrongs do not make a right.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the latest budget has revealed that while Canada's cultural sector is reeling from $18 million in cuts, the Department of Communications has awarded itself an increase of over $41 million, the lion's share of which goes into operating expenses.

Using $41 million for operating expenses while starving Canadian culture is tantamount to a slap in the face for all the dedicated and talented artists in Canada who continue to live well below the poverty line.

The minister should re-examine his priorities. When stalwarts of Canadian culture like the CBC are slashed $108 million and funding for Canada Council is frozen since 1986, how can the minister justify a 13 per cent increase to his department's bureaucracy?

The minister promised last fall to go to cabinet for more funds for Canada's cultural community, but what he neglected to explain was that he would use this money to pump up his own bureaucracy and lavish lifestyle, and not to the benefit of Canada's cultural community.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, it is my sincere wish that all members of Parliament will support the rapid passage of Bill C-98, the Farm Income Protection Act. This legislation provides a basic framework under which GRIP and NISA will function.

In western Canada, 70 to 80 per cent of all agricultural receipts are from export trade, 75 to 85 per cent of Canadian wheat is exported, as is 60 to 70 per cent of Canadian canola.

As we all know, the international agricultural subsidy war is having a disastrous impact on the economy of Canadian agriculture. There is no question that the fate of Canada's most efficient and effective industry, that is Canadian agriculture, is beyond the control of the producers. A more stable agricultural sector provides for more viability in our cities, towns and communities. Hence this stability of utmost importance to our small business sector as well.

In Saskatchewan there are critics who claim this process is too complex and too time consuming. These same critics are short of alternatives, short of logical alternatives that must encompass Canada's entire agricultural sector and be responsible to all Canadian taxpayers.

Those critics and the media that pay heed to shallow criticisms do nothing to solve this problem that must be addressed by all Canadians.

SPRINGHILL, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to read into the parliamentary record the following resolution of the town of Springhill, Nova Scotia.

> Whereas the Town of Springhill citizenry, during past major conflicts, participated at the highest level of enrolment in the Armed Forces per capita in Canada—be it resolved the Town of Springhill citizenry support the role the Government of Canada has taken in support of the United Nations war effort in the Persian Gulf, and be it further resolved the Town of Springhill adopts the ships' companies of the HMCS Protecteur, the HMCS Athabaskan and the HMCS Terra Nova as honorary citizens of the Town of Springhill.

All three ships' personnel, military and civilian, will be adopted by the town of Springhill and will receive a certificate to commemorate the occasion.

Springhill has certainly found a unique way to show the pride and appreciation of all Canadians for a job extremely well done by our Armed Forces in the Persian Gulf.

SOVIET JEWRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, last year, 183,732 Soviet Jews were allowed to leave the Soviet Union to go to Israel. Over the next two years we expect that there will be one million Soviet Jews going to Israel.

The problem is one of absorption and housing in Israel itself. The war destroyed between 3,300 and 7,000 housing units in Israel.

The U.S. and European community are providing aid of over $1.3 billion to Israel. Canada is providing aid to Jordan, Egypt, and Iraq. We have to help the Soviet Jews.

There are disturbing trends in the Soviet Union: new examples of anti-Semitism, new examples of a hard line being taken. How long do we know the door will be open? We have to do the best we can, otherwise the plight of the Soviet Jews might be forever on the conscience of Canadians.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow women throughout the world will stop to consider and celebrate the progress they have made on the road to equality.

International Woman's Day is unique in the history of women's struggle equality. It was celebrated for the first time in 1911, to commemorate a strike started by garment workers in New York to protest exploitation and intolerable working conditions.

In Canada, Quebec women have celebrated International Woman's Day since the early seventies. In 1978, women in the rest of Canada joined them, demonstrating their solidarity.

Mr. Speaker, this government wants to celebrate the efforts of women who are dedicated to the cause of equality in our society, and we remain firmly committed to promoting women's participation in the constitutional process and Canada's future.

THE CONSTITUTION

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, less than a year after his major constitutional initiative died, the Prime Minister has stated his intention to re-enter the constitutional fray because of the Allaire report, saying that he and his government speak for all Canadians in negotiations to formulate a new Canada, re-Confederated, rebuilt, and reborn.

However, if this Prime Minister wishes to speak for all of Canada, then I urge him to seek a mandate on this issue for he has, unfortunately, no mandate and no credibility to lead any further constitutional negotiations. From Meech to Spicer, his road is one of failure.

Reformers would prefer Quebec to remain part of Canada. However, if the goals and aspirations of the people of Quebec are irreconcilable, then it is clear that Quebec and Canada must consider a mutually agreeable and more separate relationship.

The Reform Party of Canada will continue to communicate, to promote its view of a new Canada and to participate in any negotiations openly and honestly. Threats, bullying, and a failure to make a commitment to Canada beyond a mere economic commitment cannot long unite a country. They simply delay the inevitable.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, over the weekend the Minister of National Revenue stated before a public forum in Scarborough that he did not believe in multiculturalism. He added that he felt multiculturalism should eventually be phased out.

[Translation]

How can we believe a minister who says, in no uncertain terms, that he does not believe in multiculturalism? How can we assume he will know the standards set by this legislation and will apply them in his own department? How can we expect this government's commitment to be genuine, when there is dissension on this point in cabinet?

[English]

The Prime Minister must tell Canadians whose vision he shares: that of the Minister of National Revenue or that of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

As Canadians are trying to understand where this country is going, they need a clear message. The Minister of National Revenue must resign.

CANON CANADA

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, too often industry gets a bad rap for being the polluters of our environment. It is time to take another look, because the world is changing and industry is proving that technology and the environment can operate in harmony.

Last month, Canon Canada, a business in Mississauga West, launched its clean earth campaign. Under this program, Canon will collect and recycle toner cartridges used in the company's laser beam printers and personal copiers. In Canada, it is estimated that 1.4 million cartridges will be eligible for recycling in 1991, which should help alleviate the land-fill problem.

This is a significant initiative, but Canon's commitment does not stop there. For every cartridge returned, the company will donate $1 to be shared by the World Wildlife Fund (Canada) and the Nature Conservancy of Canada.

• (1410)

My congratulations to the people at Canon for their vision and commitment to the environment, and for finding a new r word to go with reduce, reuse and recycle. Yes, remanufacturing may well be the way of the future.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister talks about restrictions on federal spending, but now, less than a year and a half before the next election, he has just authorized 30 Tory members to move to new offices.

One move may cost as much as $10,000, Mr. Speaker. This means it will cost the House of Commons nearly $300,000 to let 30 members play a new version of musical chairs.

How can the government justify this kind of frivolous spending in the face of budgetary cutbacks, when it has just asked its own employees and all Canadians to tighten their belts?

I urge the Prime Minister to set an example to Canadians and postpone these moves until after the next election.

An office does not the member make, and I think the Prime Minister, the President of the Treasury Board and the Conservative Party whip should put a stop to this foolishness immediately.

GEOGRAPHIC HERITAGE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it has been said that this government lacks a vision of Canada. As it enters into free trade negotiations and agreements with nations to our south, it has ignored our own future. It completely ignores Canada's north.

The budget, the government's estimates and its legislative program indicate a sad lack of knowledge and understanding of the vast potential within our borders.

Where is the northern vision of John Diefenbaker? Why have the goals and dreams of those who explored and settled our nation disappeared? Why is the idea of developing northern ports like Churchill simply ignored? Why have we not trained people to live and work profitably in the vast majority of Canada? Why have we looked at our geography and simply shrugged? Why has this lack of vision prevented Canada from including our native population in developing the north?

Is it any wonder why this nation struggles so much with finding its soul, when it has managed to ignore the very nature of our geographic heritage?

S. O. 31

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is International Women's Day. Women in Canada have little cause to celebrate, particularly in Parliament.

Participation in the subcommittee looking at violence against women is ample evidence of the indifference of male MPs to this issue.

Indeed, many members of Parliament feel that the ability to blow apart rabbits rapidly is a higher priority than the need to reduce the carnage by guns from which women suffer disproportionately across this country.

Systemic sexual discrimination and harassment are rampant. Women are under-represented on key committees. Many parliamentary association executives, for example NATO, are private men's clubs. Signs and titles such as chairman identify this as a male place.

In a country where one in four women are sexually assaulted and 90 per cent of women experience sexual harassment in the work place, we as parliamentarians must act as a united force to combat this problem.

OGILVY RENAULT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, friends in greed are friends indeed.

Claude Fontaine sits on the Board of Directors of Petro-Canada.

Claude Fontaine is a senior partner of Ogilvy Renault, barristers and solicitors.

Ogilvy Renault has been retained by the Government of Canada to assist in the privatization of, guess what, Petro-Canada.

Bernard Roy, appointed principal secretary to the Prime Minister in the past, now works for Ogilvy Renault. What another happy coincidence.

The Prime Minister, before becoming Prime Minister by way of Iron Ore, also practised law at Ogilvy Renault.

The Prime Minister and Bernard Roy were roommates at university.

Friends will be friends. Greed will be greed. Tories are always the same.

ISRAEL

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, today over 200 students from across Canada representing the Jewish Students' Network and NAHON are in Ottawa for their annual lobby day.

The group led by Joey Felsen, Batia Tobin and Marla Silverberg are meeting with members of the House of Commons. Today, there is an urgent call for action due to the housing crisis already facing Israel and the large amount of damage caused by the Scud missile attacks.

The Government of Canada just recently confirmed its intention to extend humanitarian aid to Iraq. In a similar spirit the government should extend such aid to Israel, which has been an innocent victim throughout this war.

The Government of Canada has always supported the cause of Soviet Jewry and, as chairman of the Canadian Parliamentary Group for Soviet Jewry, along with all members of the House, we urge the Government of Canada to aid the people of Israel in rebuilding homes destroyed by the unprovoked attack by Iraq and, in addition, to build additional housing for the newly arrived Soviet Jews.

FISHERIES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has published a booklet entitled Sustainable Development and the Northwest Atlantic Fishery.

The Law of the Sea is invoked to argue the case for restraint in catches. The Law of the Sea was designed to avoid crises in fisheries by affirming the responsibility of all nations to co-operate in conserving and managing fishery resources in the high seas.

The government hopes that the principles of the Law of the Sea will become "ingrained in the strategies of the world's fishing industries" so that ultimately "destructive overfishing will become as rare as it is unconscionable".

This is a great statement, but it is hollow because this government has not yet ratified the Law of the Sea. If the government wishes to be taken seriously on environmental issues, it should at last ratify the Law of the Sea and make sure that Canada does not become the laughing stock of the international community.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Prime Minister denied that there is a private committee of senior bureaucrats working on constitutional change behind closed doors.

Does he deny a front-page story in The Globe and Mail of January 31, and I quote: "Teams of Deputy Ministers Work on new plan for Canada"?

Does he also deny the statement of his own minister of federal-provincial relations, Senator Lowell Murray, who said: "We're working in the federal government on our own constitutional program"?

Does he deny this statement of his own minister?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend began by saying that I denied the existence of a private committee. I did no such thing. I denied the existence of a secret committee.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: There is no secret committee. The best evidence of that is the newspaper quotes that my hon. friend has just cited It is not secret. It is public—

Ms. Copps: It is a private committee.

Mr. Mulroney: —and it is legitimate work being done by the Government of Canada to—

An hon. member: Bravo.

Mrs. Marleau: Unbelievable.

Mr. Mulroney: Only a Liberal would want deputy ministers not to work. We put them to work in the interests of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the Prime Minister has learned nothing about the lessons from the death of Meech.

[Translation]

I wish the Prime Minister would explain what Senator Lowell Murray meant when he said that the government was working on a new plan for Canada. We are worried that once again, the Prime Minister may be working behind closed doors and setting us up for a new constitutional disaster.

Will the Prime Minister inform the House today what the exact terms of reference are of this committee? Will he identify the people on the committee? And finally, will he provide for public consultation on the Constitution? Public, not private and not secret.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons told us yesterday that the opposition parties have 9 full days, at their discretion, for debate on a subject they may select.

In the circumstances it would be quite normal, indeed appropriate and quite useful, if the Liberal party, with its present apparent concern for constitutional matters, were to initiate a debate on the Canadian Constitution and, perhaps for the first time, make known their perspective and positions regarding the reform or renewal of Canada. I think that would be a very constructive approach.

As far as the government is concerned, we have started a series of consultations across the country, through the Special Joint Beaudoin–Edwards Committee and the Spicer Commission. Committees at the provincial level are doing their job in this respect and, of course, a number of officials have been asked to consider these issues on behalf of the Canadian government. I think all this is quite normal. We have a responsibility, considering developments in other provinces, and I am thinking first of all of Quebec, to prepare a dossier or a series of dossiers that, in due time, will help parliamentarians make considered decisions to promote Canadian unity.

• (1420)

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the NDP falsely stated on national television last night that Parliament had voted on December 13 on a motion to expand the mandate of a parliamentary committee studying the amending formula. She also falsely stated that the Liberal Party had voted against it.

I am sure that the hon. leader of the NDP or her party at three o'clock will take the opportunity to correct the record. Unfortunately, no such vote ever took place either on December 13 or at any other time.

Therefore, my question to the Prime Minister is this. Given his reference in the previous question to the work of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee, will he put a motion before the House of Commons today to expand the mandate of the Beaudoin–Edwards committee beyond the mere study of the amending formula? Will he put that motion today and show some leadership so that Parliament can have a public process, not a Prime Minister's process behind closed doors?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, indeed as the country knows, I have a great deal of time for the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, but any lover's quarrels she has with the NDP should be resolved privately, not here on the floor of the House of Commons.

My friend says that the Beaudoin–Edwards committee is involved in mere study of the amending process. Nothing could be more important. It is inaccurate to suggest that this should be cast aside as mere study of the amending process.

My friend refers to the difficulties we had at Meech Lake; indeed we did. I was grateful then for her support and the support of her leader at the time, Mr. Turner, and grateful for the support of the NDP as well. On two occasions we managed to get the signatures of 10 provincial premiers on side to endorse the concepts contained in the Meech Lake Accord in 1987 and in 1990.

Ms. Copps: Will you expand the committee?

Mr. Mulroney: Subsequent to achieving those signatures, we had unanimity for the first time in constitutional history in Canada. We achieved unanimity, but we then had difficulty in respect of its ratification by a provincial legislature. I will acknowledge that. I also acknowledge that failure to ratify has brought about some very serious difficulties. But that was not the first failure that we have had constitutionally.

In 1982 the Constitution was repatriated without the endorsement of the province of Quebec and that too has brought about very serious difficulties which this government and this Parliament are trying to prevent.

Mr. Speaker: I want to observe that there has been on the part of the opposition some determination to keep the questions shorter and I hope that will be kept under consideration by all sides of the House.

TRADE

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. The government has not been open with the Canadian people about what it hopes to achieve in the trade negotiations involving Canada, the United States and Mexico. The minister says he seeks a single comprehensive agreement, not two or three agreements, but a single comprehensive agreement.

What will be in that single agreement? In the existing Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, energy is in. But both the Mexicans and the Americans have said that in a trilateral agreement, energy will be out. How can the government negotiate a single comprehensive agreement when Canada says that energy is in and Mexico says energy is out?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it must have taken a lot of energy to come up with that question.

Canada has not said energy is out or that anything is out in the proposed negotiations between Canada, the U.S. and Mexico. There will be no negotiation until and unless the U.S. Congress approves the fast-track authority that President Bush has asked them for. So it is not anticipated that negotiations could begin until the end of May or early June.

Mexico has not said that energy is out or whether energy is in. But we all know that Mexico has a very sensitive concern about the ownership of oil. They have said that discussions about the ownership of oil are out because the Mexican Constitution is in. We have said that we are not going to negotiate the terms of the Mexican Constitution.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the minister continues to obscure the discussions and the Canadian people are no wiser from his answer than they were five minutes ago about what it is they expect.

Yesterday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stated that the remaining limits of foreign investment in the energy industry should be removed. The Minister for International Trade has said repeatedly that the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement does not need to be reopened. The Mexicans say that energy is not in. Canada now says that the remaining provisions in the energy section, Chapter 19 of the free trade agreement, should be reopened.

Will the Minister for International Trade state, once and for all, what it is that Canada seeks in these negotiations and will energy be on the table or not?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, any proper subject for the negotiations on trade will be on the table to be discussed. Whether Canada, Mexico or the U.S. agrees to any particular side of an issue will have to be decided when the issue arises. We will agree to anything that is in the national interests of Canada, but we will not agree to anything that is not.

With respect to investment, I am glad to report that investment in Canada has increased greatly as a result of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and we would anticipate this would be even more so under a North American free trade agreement.

I am glad to see that my hon. colleague agrees with me, that foreign investment is good for Canada. It creates jobs and we have been able to get Canada going again as a result of our attitude towards foreign investment.

TAXATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Minister of Finance said that we needed the executive tax deduction, and I will quote the minister: "We have a tax system in Canada that we must maintain in a competitive way with those of other countries, in particular, the United States."

Does the Prime Minister agree with this absurd excuse? Do we have to cut health care so that executives can have a free lunch while hospital waiting lists are getting longer and longer?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I also congratulate the hon. member. I believe that yesterday, the Minister of Finance was talking about tax shelters. I think that was one of the answers he gave to questions on that subject. In fact, the Canadian government has eliminated an impressive number of tax shelters which, in the past, tended to stew the equity of our tax system and the government has turned it into a much fairer national instrument, especially as far as the neediest in our society are concerned. That was the purpose of tax reform, and the minister mentioned a number of examples that are in fact quite the reverse of the point raised by the hon. member from Winnipeg.

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister will check the record, he will see that what was raised yesterday was the business and entertainment tax deduction. The Minister of Finance justified it on the basis that we had to be in step with the Americans on this, as we have to be on so many other things. It appears that the only differences we can have in our tax system is that we are allowed to be more regressive than they are with things like the GST, but we are not allowed to be more progressive than they are.

So, I ask the Prime Minister, is this not the first fruits of the free trade agreement? On top of that, why do we see the obscenity made known today that 42 chief executive officers were given a 4.2 per cent increase the day before the government announced a 3 per cent cap on Public Service wages? Why is that? How does the Prime Minister justify that in light of the rhetoric of the government about everybody doing their fair share?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I think this, Mr. Speaker, is much ado about nothing. The information provided by the hon. member may be interesting, but it is wrong.

I would like to remind the hon. member that for the heads of Crown corporations for the calendar year 1990, we received some months ago from an independent commission a recommendation to give them increases in excess of 6 per cent. We looked at that, not for the coming year, but for the calendar year 1990, and we decided that they would get the same as deputy ministers for the past year, 4.2 per cent. For the next three years, I can assure the hon. member that all Crown corporation heads will get 3 per cent like everybody else.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the 1,400 railroaders in my riding who just learned that they will be laid off for three months this summer because of a downturn in revenues at CNR will be very impressed with that answer, that the government has managed to finesse a 4.2 per cent increase for the head of CN while they have to go on the street.

I go back to the Prime Minister. I have asked this of the Minister of Finance and he refuses to answer, so I ask the Prime Minister. On behalf of the government, would he please tell us why the Business Council on National Issues and all the corporations they represent were not asked to contribute one single penny to deficit reduction? What is the answer to that question? Is it because they donate so much money to the Conservative Party or what?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that as a result of the closing of these tax loopholes—

Mr. Blaikie: What closing of loopholes? Not one.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure hon. members would want to hear the response of the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: As a result of the closing of tax loopholes, there are, as the minister has pointed out, thousands of corporations today paying income tax that had never paid corporate income tax in the past in Canada, or paid it on a lesser scale. For example, the chartered banks of Canada, the insurance companies and others who were able to take advantage of various fiscal breaks, no longer can do so. And, for the first time in many, many years, if not decades, they are paying their fair share of taxes.

My hon. friend is scandalized by some statistics that he raises. Someone showed me—and I will get it for my hon. friend—a statistic about a group of employees working for one of the Public Service unions, because unions have employees themselves. They went on strike some months ago for a month asking for a 5 per cent increase. The union management said it was too high, you must settle for 3 per cent.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In answering questions from the member for Hamilton East, the Prime Minister today acknowledged the presence and operation of a senior committee of officials dealing with the question of renewed federalism.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he would fully answer the question put by the member for Hamilton East.

An hon. member: In secret.

Mr. Tobin: Yes, in secret, operating behind closed doors, reporting to the Prime Minister.

Will the Prime Minister tell the House today when this committee is scheduled to report to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister also tell the House whether the report of the committee, the recommendations of the committee, will be made public so that the public will truly have an opportunity to participate in the constitution making process this time around.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are now going through a new phase. It is one of decreasing expectations. When my hon. friend began with this question two days ago, the committee was secret, then it declined to private, and today it is senior. He refers today to a senior committee of deputies. There is one, indeed there are probably many committees of deputy ministers doing various things throughout the Government of Canada. I hope they are.

Ms. Clancy: You mean you do not know? You better find out.

Mr. Mulroney: You can never be sure, Mary.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: If my hon. friend is suggesting that a senior group of officials cannot meet and advise the government of their point of view, this would be a unique burden to be placing on officials of any government. Normally, officers of a government are allowed to come together, pursuant to instructions from a minister and to meet outside of the television cameras and provide advice to their ministers, which is then rejected or accepted. It is the ministerial responsibility to accept the criticism or reject it on the floor of the House of Commons. That is entirely appropriate.

I do not think my hon. friend should be scandalized by the fact that indeed there are many committees of senior deputies at work on various aspects of Canada's ongoing problems. It is entirely normal and prudent that we do that and that they function the way they traditionally have for 123 years and then give advice to the ministers, who accept criticism on the floor of the House.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are not scandalized at the prospect of the deputy ministers meeting or their working or that they are giving advice to the Prime Minister.

What they are scandalized by is the notion that even as the Prime Minister tells the people of Canada that this time they will be involved in the Spicer commision, they are part of the public process, in back rooms behind closed doors, in private, in secret, a commission meets and there is no provision to involve Canadians in that process. That is what they are scandalized by.

Will the Prime Minister give a straight commitment to the people of Canada today that this time they will be involved, that the recommendations of this committee, the government's plan held in its hip pocket, for a change will be shared with the people of Canada.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by giving, of course, the assurance to my hon. friend that there will be ample opportunity for the public and members' involvement in the evolution, not only of the constitutional provisions on the procedural side, not only with the Spicer commission, but in other ways where we will have an opportunity to consult.

My hon. friend, however, raises an interesting question, and that is the question of any aspect of secrecy. He is asking me whether I would be ready to throw open the doors of these public servants' meetings to the television cameras. My answer to that is yes, if the Liberal caucus will open its doors when they discuss the Constitution and let us all see what goes on.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. The Canada–Mexico free trade proposal will have a tremendous impact on the environment. In the Canada–US agreement the minister failed to stress the environment. He must not make the same mistake twice. Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Can the minister give the House the assurance that he will insist that Mexican industry observes the same environmental criteria that will be, or are supposed to be, applied to Canadian industry?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member fails to recognize that these are different negotiations with the United States. We had a U.S–Canada trade negotiation which resulted in the brilliant U.S.–Canada free trade agreement that has been so productive and so beneficial to Canada.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Crosbie: Why do you not read the Canada West Foundation report, the Royal Bank report? You people do not read.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure hon. members would want the hon. minister to complete his answer.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, at the same time, there was a negotiation on environmental matters, led by the Prime Minister, which resulted in the clean air agreement that has in a sense been entered into by our two countries.

We have an environmental protocol with Mexico at the present time. If I have the chance, I will research that and pass on additional details to the hon. gentleman.

If there is any need of a negotiation or a treaty on the environment between Canada and Mexico, then we will do it as a separate negotiation, and with the same kind of success the Prime Minister had with President Bush and the United States.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about reading. It is pretty clear that he has not read the green plan.

In the absence of the Minister of the Environment who occasionally thinks about it, let me ask my the question of the Prime Minister.

Quoting from the green plan, the federal government requires environmental impact assessments for all proposals coming before cabinet for decision. A statement of the environmental implications of new policies will be made public at the time that the cabinet initiative is announced.

The Mexican initiative has been announced. The issue is: Will the Prime Minister force his reasonably bumptious and antique colleague to come out of the back room? Did the government make the environmental impact assessments that are called for in the green plan? Will the Prime Minister table the implications now, as he is honour bound to do?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is correct in his view of what the law is, then we are indeed in very significant difficulty because we are negotiating with 102 countries in the GATT on trade matters, and we have not made an environmental assessment of those 102 countries.

I guess we are doomed by the hon. member to a great deal of additional criticism in that connection. It is a trade negotiation. If we need an environmental negotiation, we will enter into an environmental negotiation with far greater success than the hon. gentleman's predecessor's ever had.

PAY EQUITY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, during a nationally televised debate at the time of the last federal election, the Prime Minister made a commitment and said that he had already set aside money for pay equity for women in the Public Service.

After what we heard in the budget last week, I want to ask the Prime Minister: In spite of the warnings in the budget, does he intend to keep that commitment to the women in the Public Service? Will he fulfil that commitment to women of Canada? Yes or no?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Yes, Mr. Speaker, without any hesitation, I can repeat the commitment of the government to pay equity.

As you know, we did something that former governments did not do. We settled for a very generous, honest and fair package. It is being contested. We will see where we are, but this is more than the Liberals did over I do not know how many years or decades of government.

We have committed ourselves to this. We have set aside in the budget the money necessary to continue that, and I can vouch that we will continue to proceed in this direction. It is the only good one in any case.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, today we learned that friends of the government, appointees of the government, get raises of tens of thousands of dollars while women, who are at the bottom of the economic system in this country, are told in the federal service that they get 3 per cent or they lose thousands of jobs.

An hon. member: And they lose thousands of jobs.

Ms. Black: Can the Prime Minister assure this House that he will not compound this injustice to women in the federal civil service? Will he assure us that the job losses will not be women's jobs at the bottom of the economic order? Will he assure us that women will get pay equity and be fairly treated by this government, finally?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I can only repeat that this government has not only spoken about these things but has acted. I would like to repeat that one of the central issues that we have to be concerned with is that we cannot afford not to allow women to bring their full share not only to the federal civil service but to the whole society. I can assure the hon. member that the performance of the managers will be judged on their capacity to deal with these very important issues. We are committed to pay equity and it will be seen that we are, over the months.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Words are wonderful. Nearly seven years ago this Prime Minister, on national television, committed his government to economic equality for Canadian women. Today, those women still make 67 cents for every dollar made by men.

I want to know from this Prime Minister what became of this commitment. Is the Prime Minister satisfied with these statistics, and when will he keep his promise and act to seriously improve the economic status of Canadian women?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I always feel badly when all a member can say is negative about the status of women in Canada as opposed to talking about the positive things. I am sure my hon. colleague is aware that there are today 900,000 more women working in this country and that there has been a 77 per cent increase in jobs in administration, management and professional jobs. In fact, there has been more than double the number of women working in those jobs. Fifty per cent of the students now in our colleges and universities are women.

Through the financial initiatives of this government—there are economic initiatives—indeed, the status of women is improving, and we should be encouraging our young women of this country to take advantage of the opportunities which exist for them out in the workplace.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Those advantages, Mr. Speaker, may exist somewhere, but one of the places they do not exist is the Public Service of Canada, unless either the minister or her Prime Minister is unfamiliar with the report of the public service, "Beneath The Veneer". In that report we are told that women who work in this Public Service are daily and constant victims of systemic discrimination. There is no glass ceiling for men.

When is the Prime Minister—and I apologize for being negative—going to act meaningfully to end discrimination for women in his Public Service here in this country and fulfil his commitment?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for a very important question. I know that, as someone very committed to the cause of the promotion of women, she will be very interested to know that the day I was sworn in as Prime Minister, there were three women Deputy Ministers in Canada; there are today 21. There were two women serving as ambassadors; there are now 16. There were 37 women in the federal judiciary; there are now 79. The number of women serving on agencies, boards and commissions—the highest Order in Council appointments of the Government of Canada—has, in the space of six years, after 16 years of Liberal government, been increased by 107 per cent.

CULTURE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in the Canada–U.S.–Mexico trade talks, Canadian culture will again be under attack.

American negotiator, Carla Hills, assured U.S. congressmen that they will get Canadian cultural industries this time, that giving a cultural exemption to Canada in the last round was a big mistake.

Will the Minister of International Trade assure Canadians that in any future trade talks that protection for Canadian cultural industries will be strengthened, and will not be weakened as suggested by the U.S. negotiator, Carla Hills?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the members of the House already know from the provisions of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement that this government is well capable of preserving the strength of Canadian culture and Canadian cultural agencies.

Mrs. Hills is simply expressing on behalf of the U.S. government its chagrin at having failed in the U.S.–Canada free trade negotiations in having got anywhere with reference to the Canadian cultural industry.

I can assure the hon. member that the Mexicans have exhibited no desire to make an assault upon Canadian culture, and as long as I am the trade minister she can depend upon it. Canadian culture is safe.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): I know that beer is safer than Canadian culture and I know that we got strangled with clause 2005, so do not tell me what the condition of Canadian culture is, based on what the minister has to say. With the so-called cultural protections that this government has given us, and the minister knows this, our creators, our film makers, our magazines and newspapers and our book publishers are all at risk.

So my question to the Prime Minister, seeing as how he will not let his minister of culture do it—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would put her question.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I would kindly ask the Prime Minister to give serious consideration to reinstating a proper film distribution policy, to reinstate the postal subsidies for our magazines and our books, and to enforce Canadian control of the minister's famous Baie Comeau policy. Or, I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if he needs Carla Hills' permission.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. member the assurance that the government's responsibility for cultural industries in general and this one in particular is being taken very seriously, that policies have been initiated, and that compared with the situation under the previous Liberal government, Canada's cultural industries are now in far better shape.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ARMS EXPORTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice.

Will the minister confirm that a consortium of companies, including General Motors of Canada and Diemaco, has recently signed a contract to export light armoured vehicles. The House saw those types of vehicles in the Oka crisis. They have machine guns on top of them. The contract is with Saudi Arabia and it is worth hundreds of millions of dollars.

We should confirm that the contract appears to stand in violation of Canadian law.

Is the government considering an amendment to the Criminal Code of Canada and the Export and Import Act to allow this deal to go through?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I told the House on December 20 in answer to a question from the hon. member for Kitchener in whose district the firm of Diemaco is located, the government is considering such an amendment. Diemaco is the manufacturer of automatic weapons and as a result of a technical problem in the Criminal Code, its business is interfered with. It has about 500 employees, I believe, in Kitchener and if that firm is to continue operating and supplying automatic weapons to the Canadian Armed Forces, it has to be able to enter into contracts with others outside Canada who pass the intense scrutiny and control that is given to this matter by the Department of External Affairs.

So, yes, that is under consideration as it has been for some time, as I explained in the House on December 20.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplemental question for the Prime Minister on this matter. His Secretary of State for External Affairs said the other day: "If there is one priority, one lesson which the world must learn from this war, it is that an unrestricted arms trade in this region, the Middle East, is no longer acceptable and constitutes a threat to the security of all members of the UN". I could also quote his letter to Perez de Cuellar on the matter of arms sales.

Instead, I want to ask the Prime Minister: Is this the time for Canada to be making a record arms sale to the Middle East and indeed, changing our existing gun control and export laws to do it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there are arms and then there are arms. We are discussing automatic weapons, that is rifles and other small arms of that nature, machine guns and the like which are necessary for armies, police forces and civil authorities to have if they are to be in a position to keep order in their own countries. We are not discussing other offensive or horrendous weapons of war.

If hon. members will look at the report I tabled yesterday on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, they will see the small amount of arms exports that Canada does have and the careful system of controls there is. I can assure hon. members that the Secretary of State for External Affairs keeps a very close personal eye on this.

MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In light of the statement made last evening by President Bush putting forward a Middle East program, where he underlined the necessity of having a resolution of the Arab–Israeli dispute, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he agrees with the statement that was made yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Jordan, where he said that the PLO must have an important role in any Arab–Israeli peace negotiations.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we were very pleased with the statement last night by President Bush because it in many ways supported very actively the positions that this government set out in a letter to Perez de Cuellar and then again on March 4 in regard to the position of the Government of Canada.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday, when you read the full remarks, was actually quite careful in respect of this sensitive matter, where he said there obviously has to be a representation by Palestinians and it will be Palestinians themselves who are best placed to determine who their representative should be. Then he went on to say that "In respect of the PLO, its authority I think there has been diminished by this war". I personally believe that the authority of the—

Mr. Speaker: I hope hon. members will remember that yesterday a matter of order was raised as to the difficulty in many members not being able to get to the floor through Question Period. We are in the last few minutes, the Prime Minister is replying and I know that hon. members would want him to continue and conclude his answer as soon as possible, so that perhaps I can recognize another member.

Mr. Mulroney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Obviously any durable resolution of this matter will require discussion between Israel and the Palestinians on the one hand, and Israel and its Arab neighbours on the other. The Palestinian people, as I have indicated in the past, will choose their leaders and their organizations in regard to any participation.

• (1500)

But I must say on behalf of the government that anyone who has looked at the position of the current leadership of the PLO, particularly in its support of Saddam Hussein and its cheering of Scud missiles as they rained on Israel, would have to conclude that the PLO and its leader, Mr. Arafat, have been substantially if not completely discredited as a result of their own actions.

Our strong dissatisfaction with the PLO position and statements on the gulf crisis has been stressed over recent months during official contacts in this regard. We acknowledge that there is an important role for the Palestinians to choose their own leadership, but our enthusiasm for the present PLO leadership is zero.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, whether the Prime Minister or the government is enthusiastic is not my question.

I was asking: Does he agree with the sentiments expressed yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the PLO must have a role in helping to negotiate that?

It is a very important issue that is raised at this very sensitive time in trying to develop a peace resolution in the Middle East.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have just given the answer on behalf of the Government of Canada—

Mr. Simmons: No, you haven't.

An hon. member: It is an important issue.

Mr. Simmons: Explain that to Joe.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: If my hon. friend cares to examine it, he will see that there is nothing at all inconsistent in the principles that I have set out with the full context of the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

This has been the position of the Government of Canada and it remains the position of the Government of Canada.

All parliamentarians, those who supported the deployment of Canadian troops to the gulf and those who opposed, will agree that the conduct of the organization purporting to represent the Palestinians has by its very own actions, in my judgment, discredited itself over the course of these very difficult last number of weeks.

I am telling my hon. friend that this is the position of the Government of Canada. We are looking for peace, a durable peace. That peace must respect the security of Israel and it must also accommodate the legitimate rights of Palestinians. This is the way a peaceful solution can be brought about and Canada is committed to that process.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS OF LEADER OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice earlier today with regard to a question of privilege concerning the comments made by the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, which we believe has misrepresented the proceedings of this House with regard to the debate on Motion No. 25, on television last night.

From time to time mistakes in point of fact can be made but the—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond is rising on a question of privilege which involves the leader of the New Democratic Party.

As he well knows as an experienced parliamentarian and as other members know, in a matter of this sort we usually try to make some effort to have both of the parties in the Chamber.

I wonder if the hon. member for Kamloops could give me some indication as to whether it would be appropriate to continue at this time, or whether he would ask that we arrange an appropriate time for this matter to be raised when the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party can be here. I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops on that point.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I might say I was a little disappointed in my hon. friend, the Liberal House leader, for not having the courtesy of informing us that this—

Mr. Speaker: I know that the hon. member for Kamloops will forgive me for saying that I did not want to start a debate. This is a request from the Speaker to the New Democratic Party, and I would like to know what its view is at the moment.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, our view is simply that we ought to proceed as we always do on these kinds of issues and that they are raised and debated when the members involved are in the House.

I would like to say that the leader of the New Democratic Party will be in the House on Monday, and perhaps we can revisit this issue at that point.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I will abide by your advice and your ruling. The point is clear with regard to a misrepresentation of fact. I am sure, if I were given the opportunity, that the House leader for the New Democratic Party would want to avail himself of the opportunity to make a simple apology.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, a simple apology? First, all I can say is that we have a long-standing tradition that if you are going to raise an issue about a member, you wait until he or she is in the House. On top of that, you would have the courtesy of informing the person with whom you are going to discuss some aspect, ahead of time.

We always do that. It is a tradition of this House. I am a little disappointed in my hon. friend that he did not make that effort.

Mr. Speaker: I should point out that the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has indicated his complete co-operation with the tradition which we have followed.

I take it, then, that we will hear this matter at the earliest convenience on Monday, and we will hear the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond further on that matter on Monday.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, we fully intend to comply with the wishes of the Chair with regard to to this particular matter and would want to co-operate in any way possible, in order to give our friends to the left an opportunity to make a full and complete apology when necessary.

Mr. Speaker: I look forward, with anticipation, to Monday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the government House leader, perhaps the parliamentary secretary could indicate to the House the business for tomorrow and for next week.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it would be our intention today to complete second reading of the agricultural bill which is before the House. Should that not be completed by this evening, it would be our hope that it would be completed tomorrow, as well as Bill C-91 for tomorrow.

At this moment we would be looking at an Opposition Day on Monday. We are having ongoing discussions with the House leadership of the other parties. We will continue those discussions, and I think through that information we will be able to inform all members of the House.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I will also direct my remarks to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House. As he knows, last week in the House I asked the government when it would be introducing legislation on the northern tax benefit.

I have subsequently checked with our House leader, and it is not in the government's legislative program for the next couple of weeks to introduce that legislation.

I have also been informed that the Senate is going on a break. I would like to know what the government's plans are, in that a number of Canadians in communities across northern Canada want to fill in their income tax. They do not have the legislation passed by this House. Even if they fill in their income tax, there is no way the government is going to pay back any rebates owing to them.

We have been sitting here for a couple of weeks now. The Minister of Finance gave the press the wording of the legislation prior to the House coming back. Why has that legislation not been introduced in the House? Why has it not been put through the House by this time? Why has it not been done prior to the Senate taking another holiday?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for raising a very important issue, a question that of course is near and dear to my own heart.

If this is a representation from him and an indication that we would have a quick and speedy passage of that legislation through the House, I would be more than happy to bring that to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

Perhaps we could make a very quick decision in the House and look after those people in northern and isolated communities.

Mr. Murphy: On the same point and just to reassure the parliamentary secretary, we made that obvious to the Minister of Finance weeks ago and we made it obvious in the House last week. I would suggest that it is the government that is stalling on its own legislation.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his confirmation of rapid and speedy delivery of this legislation. I will have a discussion with the Minister of Finance and will bring that information back to the House as quickly as possible.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to thank my hon. colleagues opposite who gave me this particular time space to make my speech, as I have a commitment at 4.30 p.m. that I cannot break. I want to thank my hon. colleagues. I appreciate that very much.

This bill is very important to all our friends in the agricultural community in Canada. It is very important to all Canadians. It is safe to say that we cannot have a strong Canada if we do not have a strong agricultural community. We are painfully aware of the plight of farmers. It is unacceptable to all of us in this House, and it is especially unacceptable to the farmers of Canada.

The farmers of Canada are a very proud people. They do not like the situation. They do not want to feel that they are somehow dependent on all of us. If there is any group in this country that wants to be self-sufficient, that wants to be totally independent and free to do its thing on its own without relying on anyone, it is the farmers of Canada. They are a very proud people and I can assure you that I am very proud of them.

• (1540)

As I said, this bill is very important and I can assure my colleagues opposite that there will be no obstruction and no unnecessary delay from this side of the House. We want to see this bill go as quickly as possible to committee.

However, we do have our parliamentary duty and our democratic obligation to debate the bill before it goes to committee. But it will go to committee as quickly as possible as far as we are concerned.

We are all aware that this Bill, C-98, is really enabling legislation. It is legislation which is going to provide, at least in the first instance, two farm safety net programs: the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, known by its acronym GRIP, and the other program, the Net Income Stabilization Account, known by its acronym NISA.

Right now, most farmers are riveted on GRIP. There are some very positive aspects to the GRIP program. Let me just point out some of them, and we agree with our hon. colleagues from the other side. GRIP, for example, will have pay-outs that are made on farm-fed grains. There will not be a requirement to sell grain within a particular crop year to be eligible for a pay-out; that is positive.

The range of available crops has been expanded; that is positive. The pay-outs are more predictable and that is the one thing that farmers, right across this country, have been asking for. They want some predictability brought into the system. When the grain farmers go out on the land in the spring, they want to know what they are getting into. It does not have to be completely detailed, but they must have a strong idea of what their return is going to be come the fall, come harvest. I think that is very reasonable.

Also, and this is another positive aspect of GRIP, the 15-year moving average of prices provides more support during long periods of low prices compared to a five year average of prices.

I want to point out those positive aspects of the bill.

As you might expect, we have spoken in recent weeks and months to a lot of farmers. There are concerns out there. There are concerns of the producers and, of course, there are concerns of our own.

Let me point out one as a parliamentarian. It really has to do with this legislation which, in effect, side-steps Parliament. It really makes Parliament irrelevant because this is enabling legislation, the kind of umbrella legislation which gives the powerful Minister of Agriculture—and I would hope that his successor will be powerful as well—or, if you will, the Government of Canada, great leeway, power to bring about agreements with the provinces and bring about agreements with producers. We in this Chamber are pretty well reduced to nothing.

In effect, what we are doing with this legislation—and we are going to have to discuss this further—is giving the government of the day a blank cheque, an open cheque. Here is the legislation, do with it whatever you will and you can consummate an agreement with one province, two provinces or three provinces and you do not even have to come back. That is a concern to us and it is a concern that has to be brought up at this time because we feel this sense of responsibility as parliamentarians.

There is another concern that we have, because under this bill, the government is trying to get away with murder. It is trying to get away with murder by off-loading huge costs on to the provinces and on to the producers.

I think that as we look at these agreements, there is going to be an unbearable strain put on some taxpayers and some producers. Let's take a look at an example with respect to the GRIP agreement as it applies to the province of Saskatchewan.

Federal premiums will be increased only 8 per cent. Farmers' premiums will be increased 35 per cent. However, the provincial premium will go up a whopping 355 per cent. That is a lot of money. That is an enormous strain to be put on taxpayers in the province of Saskatchewan.

I was talking to a gentleman just today—and this is a man who knows a lot about GRIP, a lot about NISA, and about farm safety net programs—who feels that there is no way that the province of Saskatchewan could sustain this kind of premium, sustain this kind of agreement, for very long. So that is a concern of ours.

When we say that there is going to be a strain on the province of Saskatchewan—which there will be—I doubt whether that is going to be of any great concern to Mr. Devine, the premier there. That is something that he wants and he wants it badly, because there is going to be an election in the wheat province this year. Not only is he using GRIP as a way of advancing his political interests in the province of Saskatchewan, but he is also looking for some kind of deficiency payment. I would think that he will be getting his deficiency payment some time just before the provincial election in Saskatchewan. How much it will be, I don't know.

When I look at the budget, I notice a provision there for approximately $1.3 billion for agriculture. It is not going to be enough. We have GRIP, NISA, the third line of defence, the deficiency payment, which will have to come some time this spring; we have a deficit in the Wheat Board account; we have a deficit exceeding $1.1 billion in the WGSA. I don't know where the government is going to get all the money. When I look at the budget, when I look at the accounts, there is not enough there.

Another concern we have is that there appears to be an effort on the part of the government to hold a stick over the heads of producers, and the stick really says this: You sign up for GRIP or you are not going to get a deficiency payment. At least, that is the threat. I think that is unfortunate. I would hope that farmers would feel free, that they would feel as unfettered as possible to make decisions with respect to either getting into GRIP or staying out of GRIP.

While I am on this matter of costs, there is something else I want to raise. Many months ago when GRIP and NISA were being envisaged—and I will speak now only of GRIP—there was talk that the premiums for the three parties—that is, the provincial governments, the federal government and the producers—would run at about 18 per cent, that is 18 per cent of return. That 18 per cent would be split evenly, 6 per cent each way.

However, it is not working out that way. In fact, if you look at Saskatchewan alone, Saskatchewan premiums are going to run at about 12 per cent, 12.5 per cent. That is about 100 per cent more; in other words, double the provincial premium that was envisaged just a few months ago. That is a concern to us.

You have to ask yourself the questions: Are those kinds of increases sustainable? Are those kinds of premiums sustainable? If you can have that kind of premium going up 100 per cent even before the program starts, what is it going to be like a year from now? What is it going to be like two years from now, or three years from now? Those are questions that we have to raise now and, in particular, we have to raise those questions at committee.

While we are at it we might as well raise questions about the deficit. The hon. Minister of Agriculture pointed out in his speech this morning that at the outset, at the beginning of GRIP, there will be a deficit.

The hon. minister says that the program is actuarially sound and the time will come when everything will even out, that there will not be a terrible deficit. I hope he is right, but there are some people around who say that the way it is set up, the way it is currently constituted it cannot fly. It just cannot fly. Those are questions that we are going to have to raise at committee.

Remember one thing, despite all these concerns we do look at GRIP and NISA as a lifeline for farmers. I think that we have a responsibility, an obligation to farmers to throw out to them a lifeline, to help them over the hump, and to help them through this very troubled period. Farmers have been devastated by what has been going on in world markets. This world trade war is crazy. It is an abomination. I think we have an obligation to help farmers through. Farm safety programs are not the ultimate panacea but we have to help farmers through this difficult period.

In the first year of GRIP the estimated pay-out is $2.4 billion. That is a lot of money and the government certainly has gone out of its way to emphasize the amount of money, $2.4 billion. Let us put this thing in perspective. In just the last couple of years, this government has slashed $1.8 billion from agricultural support programs.

In effect, on one hand the government is saying: "Look at how great we are. We have arranged a program that will pay out $2.4 billion". Yet on the other hand, I think it is responsible on our part to remind people of the serious cuts that took place in agricultural support programs in just the last couple of years.

Forgive me, Mr. Speaker, but I must at least for a moment succumb to a moderate bout of cynicism. My cynicism relates to the GRIP payments. It does not take a genius to notice that the GRIP payments more or less will come on stream in 1992 and there will be perhaps another major GRIP payment in early 1993. What is so significant about 1992 and what is so significant about 1993? Look at the parliamentary calendar. My reading of the parliamentary calendar tells me that we might have a federal election in 1992 or early 1993. Would it not be very propitious for our good friends across the way to be sending off, through Canada Post, some big fat cheques to producers at just about the time they are asking themselves: "Who should we vote for". It would be very propitious.

I am sure that did not dawn on my good friend, the agricultural minister. If it did come to him, it must have come to him second hand. In any event, I took note of that.

If you think that this cynicism that I am exhibiting is just pulled out of the sky, it is not. We saw this happen back in 1987 and 1988. Under the Special Grains Program we saw huge dollops of money being handed out to farmers. What happened in 1988? We had a federal election.

Forgive me for my cynicism, but I think it is important to get these things into perspective.

Now, I want to list, since I have only four or five more minutes, some other concerns that will have to be dealt with at committee. This leads to some technical questions. But let me just touch on a few.

There is a concern, a worry on the part of some producers that GRIP is going to be a nightmare to administer. Here is a quote from one Saskatchewan farmer by the name of Jim Coghlin: "When I look at the plan I see a glaring opportunity for abuse; given the times morals can fall out of our pockets pretty fast". That is what the gentleman from Saskatchewan said.

There is a concern about GRIP distorting the market. There have been many questions raised by certain agricultural experts, particularly in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. One of the worries they have is that GRIP will distort the market. In effect, what they are saying is this: take wheat, for example, the wheat market around the world says: don't grow wheat, please don't grow wheat, the price is terrible, you can do better elsewhere. But what does GRIP say? More or less GRIP says: grow wheat, please grow wheat, you can make more money growing wheat. And that does not come as any great surprise.

So, there could be some serious distortion in the marketplace as a result of that. We are going to have to pursue this in committee.

There is also the concern that there will be an expanded acreage of specialty crops which could produce—and I underline the word "could"— a glut on the market of these specialty crops. If that happens that would only lower the prices of the specialty crops, and at the same time would raise the costs of the farm safety program.

There is also the worry that the program may discourage good farming practices. I want to mention something that was said by an organization called Agri Decision Research and Consulting of Winnipeg. It points out that a farmer would get the same revenue for a 20 bushel an acre crop as for a 35 bushel an acre crop. The reasoning goes, according to this organization, that if the farmer has to spend money, for example, on fertilizer to get the larger yield, would the farmer do it? Or is he just, in his opinion, throwing money away under the GRIP program?

I think it is a legitimate concern, something that is going to have to be dealt with at some length when the bill goes to committee.

There is also the concern that GRIP discourages diversification, that bankers will be telling producers "stay with the tried and the proven; stay with the conventional cropping, because that is where the lower risks lie; don't try anything too new; don't diversify". It is a concern that we have.

There is also the concern that GRIP will not result in conservation, that at least some farmers will rush out and tear up marginal land, like hay land, to maximize their acreage, to in effect maximize their yield.

While we support the principle of this bill, because we have an obligation to take care of our farmers, they are going through tough times. There are questions about this program, as there would be questions about any program. I think the hon. Minister of Agriculture pointed out in his speech this morning that in anything like this there will be differences of opinion.

• (1600)

If we were bringing in a program something like this, there would be questions. The same applies to this program being brought in by the Minister of Agriculture.

We want it to go to committee as quickly as possible where we can look at this bill in much more detail.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. I appreciate very much the very constructive and positive tone of his speech. Some of the points that he did raise obviously need to be addressed.

Having regard to the fact that we have gone through a five or six year period where we had disastrous price levels and other natural disasters that have had a very devastating impact upon the agricultural community, particularly grains and oilseeds, perhaps they would have been out of business had it not been for the generosity of the people of Canada and the support that the federal government directed.

I would like to ask him whether in his view this kind of an enabling legislative approach, which outlines certain principles and objectives that bring the provinces into the fold and bring the producers into the fold, may very well constitute a more effective policy measure than simply trying to design a program after the fact, as we have been forced to do, because the existing stabilization and safety net programs were not adequate enough to cover the very severe losses that were incurred.

Does he not agree that this approach would cover all bases in a more effective manner?

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. Minister of Agriculture for his question.

I think all of us on both sides of the House, and certainly those out in the farming community, were fed up with what is called ad hockery. The system that we had, where we sort of react to crises, react to the latest events, just did not work, and mainly because farmers never knew where in the world they stood. They did not know how the government of the day, be it Conservative, be it Liberal, might respond.

As I said in my speech earlier, the element of predictability is a very positive one, and this in my opinion is a step toward predictability. I want the farmers to get some better sense of where they stand. When they go out to the land in the spring, they should have some idea of what is in place, what they can expect in the way of a monetary return when they have worked hard all spring, all summer and through the fall.

Yes, I agree with the hon. Minister of Agriculture. I want a framework like this, but at the same time I am concerned that we as parliamentarians or this House are being somewhat side-stepped.

We have seen examples of so-called executive federalism in the last few years. Sometimes it works; sometimes it does not work very well. As one parliamentarian, a backbencher on the opposite side, I am a little concerned when I see ministers of the federal Crown and premiers or ministers of the provincial legislatures getting together and doing their thing as if the House of Commons was not important at all.

But, yes, if the minister were also suggesting wide consultation, I am all in favour of that and I am very glad that farmers in the last number of months have had an opportunity to say their piece. When I look at this bill, I can see farmer written into it, without a doubt, and that I appreciate.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, not to prolong the debate, but I find it very intriguing. I share his view. I am as much a House of Commons man as the hon. member. I appreciate the significance of the institution and the importance of it.

What we have tried to do here is seek a balance. If we have a legislative measure that has rigidity built into it, as we have had, it is very difficult for any government to respond to these kinds of circumstances. What we have been trying to do in the process of the enabling legislation is to build in certain principles and establish flexibility, so that we can respond in a way that provides some predictable nature in the programs we are establishing. I guess it is that balance we have tried to achieve.

The opposite to that is legislative framework that is far too rigid and that does not give the flexibility to respond to these kinds of things.

I am glad that the hon. member did make the point that producers had been involved. What I find very fascinating and intriguing about this whole process is that I firmly believe—and it may very well set the stage for a new era of public policy making—that while this might take a little longer and our patience has to be a little more controlled, in the final analysis we can get a better piece of legislation and hopefully a better program with the broad based consultation we have tried to engage in.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, again I thank the hon. Minister of Agriculture for his comments.

Let me just make two points. I am hoping that through this process in the House we can improve the bill. When it goes to committee, I would hope that the minister and the government would entertain some amendments. We humbly suggest that it can be improved in some areas.

Another thing I want to point out is that the hon. minister talks about balance. I want to see balance as well. I want to see a balance that is fair to the federal government, a balance that is fair to the provinces, and a balance that is fair to producers, but I am not absolutely sure whether the balance we all want has been arrived at.

As I pointed out before, the premiums come pretty hard on the provinces. I cite the example of the province of Saskatchewan, where premiums are going to be horrendous for them. The burden on the provincial taxpayer in Saskatchewan is going to be nearly unbearable.

I remind the House of what someone told me just today, that he does not think in the case of Saskatchewan—and we might even throw Manitoba into this—that Saskatchewan can afford this program. The taxpayer in Saskatchewan cannot afford it. The day will come; probably not until Grant Devine is gone or at least until after the next provincial election, but some change is going to have to be arranged because it is simply too burdensome on the provincial taxpayer in Saskatchewan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Before I recognize the next speaker let me say the following:

[Translation]

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Glengarrry—Prescott—Russell—Unemployment; the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt—The Lumber Industry; the hon. member for St. Boniface—The Budget.

[English]

I will recognize the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, then I will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to take part in this debate on the farm safety net program with which the minister has led off this debate today.

• (1610)

I speak with apprehension, but I do want to say that I recognize the need for a safety net program. I only wish this safety net was a little higher off the ground. Let us look at what is happening across the border in the U.S. in terms of its wheat target price this year which is $4.60 a bushel. Ours will work out to about $4.25 a bushel. I am talking Canadian funds here in both instances.

Then I look at our input costs which are about 25 per cent higher in Canada than they are in the U.S. I updated these just two weeks ago. I wonder how we as Canadians are going to produce in competition.

I should just take a moment to point out that the wheat prices are the lowest in history at the present time. Yet, when I look at the farmer's share of wheat that goes into a loaf of bread, it is only worth 6 cents per loaf. The one-pound package of sugar cookies contains 2 cents worth of wheat. Spaghetti, in a package that costs $1.19 there is 24 cents worth of wheat. In a 40-ounce bottle of rye whiskey, there is 1 cent worth of grain. In a bottle of beer, there is 1 cent worth of barley.

Everybody else in society has had their return from the marketplace, except the producers. Their returns are being forced lower and lower every year, to the point where it is going to be very difficult for the farmers of this nation to survive.

The minister mentioned earlier that this program had to be revenue neutral. I attended a producers' meeting here just about three weeks ago where one of the officials there from the commodity organization warned the producers not to go out and bid up the price of land because this program will not pay off the mortgage.

I want to make that point very clear at the outset. It will not pay off the mortgage or the debt. It may sustain the farm at the current level, if in fact there is a reasonable interest rate on the mortgage.

In response to the comments by the minister that it had to be market responsive, I ask: What does he mean by being market responsive? The price setting mechanism in the marketplace for the last number of years is simply not working, nor is it being allowed to work.

I want to point out two or three things things here. Perhaps I should say that the February 1991 issue of the World Grain Situation and Outlook points out that the grain reserves are the lowest since the 1970s. In fact, the United States' supplies are about one third the level that they were in the early 1970s. They are the lowest since the early 1900s.

Consequently, if the market is going to respond, then those prices should have been a lot higher than they are right now. The farmers should never have been forced into the position they are.

Let us recall some witnesses we had before the agriculture committee of this House last spring. It has been further documented since that time that the Chicago Board of Trade is being influenced by very large infusions of money and by very large corporations.

Two or three years ago, 68 people were indicted in that Chicago Board of Trade. Eight of those immediately pleaded guilty. We recall last summer, the last Friday of July and the last Monday of July, when the price of barley at the Winnipeg Grain Exchange dropped to the limit on those two consecutive trading days.

There is a lot of speculation of what has happened, but I just have to suggest that perhaps the ongoing investigation for several years has more work ahead of it.

The market system is not responding to supplies, and yet the farmers are being forced to accept lower prices as the supplies fall into fewer hands in the grain trading nations. The U.S. Acreage Set Aside Program also has an impact on prices because they start out in the early part of the year and establish their various target prices for the farmers, and that is referring to the $4.60 pay-out which I mentioned earlier.

They also calculate what they think the market price will be. Then of course the difference between their calculated market price and their target price is their deficiency payment. So why would any grain company pay more than what the forecast market price is going to be?

Of course on top of that we have the Export Enhancement Programs that are having a direct influence and we saw that at various times last year and again this year when the U.S. export enhancement payments ranged from $19 per tonne up to $52 this year. If you figure that back to the farm gate, in Canadian terms, it works out to about $27 per tonne for our wheat at the farm gate.

The marketplace is not working. It is not reflecting the world supplies. Neither is it reflecting the free marketplace system.

I would have to suggest that while this bill will go a long way to resolving a problem if these low prices continue—and we have no evidence at this point that they will not continue—there is going to be a terrible financial burden placed, not only on the shoulders of the farmers of this nation, but also on both levels of government.

There is no substitute for getting your returns from the marketplace. The farmers' returns which I quoted earlier for a loaf of bread, which costs approximately $1, are very low from that, and of course the other items I mentioned are equally as important.

I look at what is happening on those world markets and I have to quote from a publication from the state of Michigan which I picked up two weeks ago. It reads: "The current local farm price for corn has been about $2.23 a bushel. The release price for corn in the farmer owned reserve is $3.25 per bushel. The Secretary of Agriculture could keep this corn off the market until the market price reaches $3.25."

You would think he would at least hold it until the market price reaches $2.75 a bushel. However, it is being released on to the marketplace at the present time to further depress our markets here in Canada. A lot of that is Commodity Credit Corporation corn that may be several years old and which is coming into our markets to be blended with higher quality corn and having a disastrous price impact on our own markets.

The prices have edged up a little bit the last week or so, but were off a bit yesterday.

So it does not reflect at all what is happening in the marketplace. It is interesting that when the U.S. released, or sold, an additional 1.5 million tonnes to China on the export enhancement program, they paid their export enhancement subsidies in the form of other commodities. This is a real sweetheart deal for the big grain companies because these subsidies are charged to farm programs and the cost is paid by the farmers.

How does it work? A net exporter sells grain to a foreign market and the export enhancement programs allow the grain exporter to capture the sale by offering grain at or below the world market price and the subsidy will cover the difference between what the exporter paid for grain and the sale price, plus his profit margin.

As I said earlier this is not paid for in money. It is paid for with a commodity certificate for the specific number of dollars. These certificates are paid for in Commodity Credit Corporation grain.

This action in turn continues to depress the price of corn. Cheap corn in turn is great for the six or eight big companies who not only export most of our grain but are also the biggest processors of grain and beans. These same corporations over there feed cattle, hogs, and chickens; they operate meat packing plants, crush soybeans, manufacture cereals, flour mills and own restaurants. They are the benefactors really of that program and the low prices that are involved.

• (1620)

I have to wonder, when we look at the free trade agreement and all the hoopla that came with it, just why—with all those export enhancement subsidies being paid by the United States, export enhancement subsidies that are allowing them into the marketplaces of other countries of the world—under the free trade agreement this government has not taken action to ask for consultations. It is very clear under Article 701.4 of the free trade agreement that the U.S. is to take into account the effects of its export subsidies to other nations on Canada to ensure they do not prejudice our exports.

In view of what I have said to this point, I call on the government now to ask for those consultations to increase the price of world grains and to make the United States live up to their agreements and stop taking our markets that are depressing our prices, necessitating the need for a program that is going to cost a lot of money to our wheat and corn farmers across this nation.

It is interesting that the government can withdraw from this program with just two years' notice. Yet if a farmer wants to withdraw, that requires four years' notice. What is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. Consequently, I want to see something done to ensure that there is an opportunity in that legislation for consultation. If the government can withdraw in two years because the program is no good or it is putting undue financial hardship on the farmers or the provinces, farmers should have a similar accommodation under this bill.

Nobody knows what is going to happen with this bill in terms of the costs. We are already hearing some of the provinces complain about the high costs involved with their involvement. We have to recognize that this whole area has been a transfer of responsibility not only to the provinces, but also to the farmers involved.

When I see that the level of premiums for corn is somewhere around $12.50 an acre; for soybeans $13.91 an acre; and for wheat probably about $15 an acre in Ontario, I have to wonder how the farmers are going to come up with that level of money if these prices do not improve over the next three or four years, unless there is a dramatic turnaround in world prices. Certainly I do not see that coming unless there is a natural disaster, and let us hope there is not one.

I think that the government should be working more strenuously to make sure that the marketplace reflects the world supplies and the producers themselves can get their returns from the marketplace, and have a return that is commensurate with that of the rest of society. It makes no sense to me at all that we have the involvement of our government in a program form which the producer gets such a small amount of return.

I also call on the government to establish a two-price system for wheat and other commodities that are used here in Canada, such as we had a few years back, because you can bet your bottom dollar that is exactly what the U.S. target prices reflect, a two-price system in the United States.

As I said earlier, I will be supporting this legislation but it does not go nearly far enough. There has to be a lot more thought put into this. I hope the government will be open to suggestions when this comes into the agriculture committee for more study.

The other thing that I am very concerned about is the fact that we have not seen these agreements. We do not know whether the agreement with the prairie provinces will be the same as that with Ontario, or the Ontario agreement will be similar to that with Quebec. What will those pay-out prices be per bushel? Will one province have a lot higher pay-out than another one? Will that in turn affect the comparative advantage of production, that we could have crops moving from one section of the country to the other?

We should have these answers available to us and we should certainly have access to the agreements that are being hammered out at the present time so that we can study them to make sure that all producers in Canada are used on an equitable basis.

We have to be very careful when entering into long-term agreements and, if at all possible, try to have the agreements for wheat apply to all prairie provinces or, for corn, applied equally to Ontario and Quebec.

The whole concept of a safety net would be more acceptable to the farmers in Canada if, in fact, we had the regular ups and downs and regular cycles in the marketplace.

As I indicated earlier, these marketplace fluctuations appear to be influenced by outside factors other than those of supply and demand. I have to wonder just what consideration was given to these fluctuations, the fact that the marketplace is not being allowed to respond because of outside influences. I have to wonder what the government is doing to put us back on a level playing field.

Looking at the southern United States where they can grow two or three crops a year, we are dreaming in Technicolor if we think that we can compete—with a bill such as we have here today—with two crops a year that have their targeted prices and deficiency payments.

The livestock industry in the United States is moving south, particularly the dairy industry which is moving south into Florida and into Texas. With up to 7,000 animals per herd, I have to wonder what lies ahead for us here in Canada.

It is time this government examined how to compete in such situations like that. How do we compete, for example, when 50 per cent of the United States' agriculture efficiency is cheap labour, most of it in the southern states where Mexican labour is available for $1 an hour with no benefits. In fact, 3,000 hours of labour per worker per year is considered to be labour not fully utilized in that part of this North American continent. Most of these people work 9.6 hours per day, six days a week. On an average Michigan dairy farm the workers work 2,700 hours per year versus 2,000 hours per year in industry.

There are a lot of things involved with this bill, a lot of things to consider. Are we simply pouring money into a program like this trying to follow a supposedly free world market that is so heavily subsidized by other countries? Are we simply pouring money into a bill that is going to be detrimental not only to our country, but will instil a sense of false hope among our farmers that they will be able to pay off their mortgages and have a living commensurate with that of the rest of society?

I hope the government reconsiders some of these issues I have raised when it goes into committee. While I support the bill in principle, there are a lot of loopholes and a lot that has to be examined in detail. I trust the government will be responsive to our concerns.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, of the members who have spoken on this so far, the hon. member for Mackenzie said: "It is difficult to criticize the details of legislation when the details really are not in it", and it would be equally difficult to praise it, I would think.

The hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James said it would be easy to be cynical about the timing of the payments coming as they do when one might expect a federal election and, I suppose, it is easy. I do not intend to dwell on that.

The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex said that it is difficult to talk about agreements when none of the agreements have been seen. I suppose if I were entering into such an agreement with the federal government, on behalf of a provincial government or even on behalf of an individual, I would think carefully about what the federal government has done with respect to agreements for cost sharing between the province and the federal government and the changes that have been made in those.

I am sure all that will be covered. As the hon. member for Mackenzie and others have said, when we get into committee we can deal with the details and hope to improve the legislation and make something more of it.

I intend to talk about my own experience in the few minutes that I have. I can recall when I first stood in the legislature in the province of British Columbia. I am going to digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to recognize the presence in the House of the hon. Minister of Agriculture. I know in the jobs he has, there are many things he could be doing other than sitting here listening to this debate. But I am aware also that he has been here as much as he possibly can. I want to recognize that and thank him for attending in the way that he has.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stupich: As I started to say, when I first spoke in the legislature in B.C. 27 years ago concerning agriculture, one of the Socred cabinet ministers interjected and said that the NDP must have fallen to a pretty low level when they were calling on a chartered accountant to lead off the agriculture debate. The leader of the opposition at that time, Bob Strachan, replied to the effect that I was the only member in the House with a degree in agriculture. I had been raised on a small farm and had operated my own poultry farm for several years, so I had something more going for me than a degree in agriculture when I spoke.

Since then, I have added to that experience by having been minister of agriculture the whole time the New Democrats were in office in British Columbia. It is about that experience that I would like to talk briefly.

First, may I say that with respect to this legislation, the long title of the bill tells it the way I like to see it. The long name of the Farm Income Protection Act best spells out the government's intent. It is:

> An Act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose.

I wish this kind of enabling legislation had been in effect when I was minister of agriculture in the province of British Columbia.

The legislation talks about the goals, the guiding principles of the legislation itself. There is a comment about that from some representatives of the departments of agriculture and economics in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, to the effect that GRIP, while the legislation says that it should be market responsive, is not market responsive. The legislation says that GRIP should encourage self-reliance, and the economists say that it does not encourage self-reliance as the pay-out from the program is more important than the level of output, when talking about grain. The legislation says that it should recognize regional diversity; the professors say that it does not so recognize. The legislation says that it should be environmentally sound, and they say that it is not.

I will leave all that to the discussions in committee. I am sure there will be representatives there from the Minister of Agriculture to deal with those comments.

There is a quotation that I used in the second report of the B.C. Agricultural Land Commission that tells it the way I see it, and I think it is worth repeating at this time. It comes from a book by William Jennings Bryan, entitled Cross of Gold. It reads:

> Burn down your cities and leave our farms, and your cities will spring up again as if by magic; but destroy our farms and the grass will grow in the streets of every city in the country.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to maintain the rural areas, but you cannot maintain the areas unless you have people there and you cannot have people there unless it is economically sensible for them to be there. We have a responsibility as a society to make sure that farmers can make a living farming.

It used to be that in the province of British Columbia, and I suppose in every other province, farmers looked forward to making their living or at least their retirement income by selling their farmland for a great price. One of the first things that I was able to do as Minister of Agriculture in B.C. was to bring in legislation freezing the development of agricultural land. We wanted to make sure that that land would be there for the future when it might be needed to produce food, where people could see farmers in action, farmers producing, where youngsters could go from school and see that milk does not come from cans or out of a bag of powdered milk but that food is produced by people working the land. I felt it was important to do that and important to maintain the rural areas.

Another of my experiences was five years in the air force during the war. During two years of that I was teaching at a school for flying instructors. In my experience, those students who came from farming areas anywhere in the British Commonwealth—this was the Commonwealth Air Training Plan—the ones who came from farms as opposed to those who came from cities, had learned to be reliable working on their farms. They had learned to be self-reliant, since you cannot stop your farm operation because something breaks down. You have to haywire it together somehow and keep it working. They turned out to be the best air crew personnel, certainly the best pilots. That was the experience of all those working in the Commonwealth Air Training plan.

As I said, the first step of our program in British Columbia, was to save the land. It was not easy. There were demonstrations and hot meetings. One particular demonstration, was led by leaders of the B.C. Federation of Agriculture on the Parliament Buildings grounds. The premier came out and spoke to them. He was not listened to, but he spoke. But he was listened to when he invited the leaders of that demonstration to come into his office and talk about what they wanted, not in opposition to farmland program, but to make it possible for farmers to make a living farming the land, rather than selling it, exploiting it, developing it.

They came into his office and he offered to match anything they wanted to spend for consultants, or whatever, up to $50,000, dollar for dollar, so they could bring in their programs. The select standing committee of agriculture at the time was instructed, or authorized if you like, to travel around and listen to farmers all over the province of B.C., much in the same way this minister listened to the farmers and farm organizations. We did the same thing.

In addition to that, my own department, as I am sure was the minister's department, was working on its program and we came up with a program that provided for a safety net. This is not unusual. But it was so widely complained about.

People talk about subsidies, and I was never more in agreement with the Minister of Agriculture of the day, Eugene Whelan, when he said at meeting after meeting: "It is not farmers who are being subsidized, it is the consumers, and it because governments are not prepared to pass on to consumers the total cost of producing food". Politically unpopular. So consumers are subsidized. Sure, it is handed through farmers on occasion, but not all the time. It is because we are competing with other nations with substantial subsidies paid either to farmers or to the community that we have to do the same thing. There is no way out. We are subsidizing the price of food so that consumers will not have to pay the full cost.

But in society outside of that, the unemployment insurance program is a safety net for a significant body of our population. There is no question about that. Professionals of many kinds, for example, doctors enter into contracts in every provincial government in Canada. They enter into contracts which provide them with a very nice safety net.

Farmers had one safety net for a long time, several decades I suppose by now, and they still have it—the Crop Insurance Program. It has been a good program. It has helped to protect them from disaster arising from what we call natural causes. We have just had a snowfall in British Columbia that started on March 1 or 2. I do not know if that is natural or not, but it is certainly nature, if not natural.

But they never have had one program that would deal with all of the problems. This, as I see it, is what Bill C-98 is trying to do: bring under one umbrella all of the programs. That is certainly the direction I wanted to go, and had I carried on as minister of agriculture after the election, then that would have been the direction I would have wanted to go, to bring everything under one program.

As I mentioned earlier, I agree totally with the principles as listed on page 3. They were the same principles that guided me in bringing in the farm income insurance program we brought in in B.C., with another one added, I think. I will come to that just a little later.

To arrive at our farm income insurance program, and again I might compare it to what the minister did, we entered first into negotiations with the B.C. Federation of Agriculture as the organization which represented the most farmers in B.C. In B.C. the National Farmers' Union was a factor only in the grain growing northeast part of the province. It was not a factor even in the Creston area, where grain was grown as well. But in the northeast corner of the prairies, that part in B.C., they were a factor and we were prepared to deal with them, but never got that done during my tenure in office. We arrived at a master contract, a cost of production contract. That is the way we looked at it. We settled the details that would apply in general to farming as a whole. After that, it was up to each commodity group to come to us and say whether they wanted to be a party to it or not. That was their choice. They came one by one and said they wanted to get into the program. There was the master contract that had been negotiated, and really it was tough negotiations, with the Federation of Agriculture on behalf of everyone, and then with the representatives. The first to come on board were the dairy farmers and I think the next were the fruit growers. The dairy farmers came in before we actually got the program organized.

• (1640)

One of the things the minister said was that he did not want to move too fast and then make mistakes. He would rather move into it more slowly. I would certainly recommend that to him because we got into the dairy first because of an emergency situation. They are since out of it and I think everybody is happy about it now.

We got into it with the fruit growers secondly after the commodity group representatives had made their agreement with us based on the master plan. It was then up to individual farmers to choose whether or not they wanted to belong. I notice in this legislation there is reference to that as well, that it is still the individual choice.

I notice the minister saying something to the effect that the cattlemen are saying that they are going to choke on GRIP. GRIP was not used in those days, but I heard much the same response from the B.C. cattlemen's organization in B.C. when we brought in our agricultural insurance program. However, it was not very long before the cattlemen's organization out-voted the big people in their own industry and wanted to become part of the farming insurance program in B.C., and did.

Individuals signed on; they had that choice. They had to sign a five-year contract. I have heard some of the details that have been talked about concerning the legislation, talking about contracts for a certain period, not necessarily five years but certain periods of notice before they can get out.

A cap on the volume of production was used for most commodity groups. That is, the program was effective up to a certain number of cows for cow-calf operations, up to a certain number of poultry for egg laying and that kind of thing. It was not to provide an umbrella for the largest operators. It was to provide an umbrella significant enough that anybody could maintain themselves. If they were bigger than that they could still get coverage up to that limit, but that was it.

There was no cap in production with respect to the fruit growers because as you can understand, Mr. Speaker, it takes so much longer to start producing tree fruits; once you cut the trees down it would take a long time to get back into business. So it was not practical to put a cap on the production for the fruit growers and we did not.

The premium was a three-way split. I said earlier that I wished that this legislation had been on the books of Canada when I was Minister of Agriculture. In making it a three-way premium split, it was our expectation that the federal government would move, and I know the federal minister wanted to, but he could not get the Liberal government of the day to go along with him. He told me on many occasions he would like to be co-operating and he did to the best of his ability, but he could not get this kind of a program operating. We hoped that the producers would pay one-third, that the provincial government would pay one-third and that the federal government would pay one-third.

The government was paying in the same way it used to share the UI program, in the same way that it shared other programs because in my belief the community as a whole had some responsibility for maintaining agricultural land in production or not in production, but at least maintaining it so it would be available for food production if and when it was needed. It was important, we felt, that the community should share in the responsibility for financing this program.

By the end of the program, at least by the end of the first five-year period, each commodity group was operated as a separate fund. By the end of the five-year period for each one of them, they were all in balance within dollars of a slight surplus or slight deficit, except one, and that was the fruit growers. Of course the government paid two-thirds hoping that the federal government would come along with its share later on.

Nevertheless, there were years when the pay-out was much larger than the fund and the government put up the money to fund it until it could recover it. It did that with most of the programs, because they were hurting when the commodity groups asked to get in. If they were doing very well, they would not have asked, so there was a deficit, initially, in all of them.

As I say, four of them paid off the deficit by the end of their five-year term, and the fifth one, the fruit growers, I suppose never did. The fruit growers is a tough one to deal with.

We participated. We saved the farmland in the province of British Columbia, but not on the backs of the farmers. It was the community that accepted the responsibility for making sure that the program would work and that it was possible to make a living farming rather than developing and selling off farmland. Even if that would work, not everyone can sell his farm to a developer. It is just on the fringes.

The B.C. Federation of Agriculture, before I appeared on the scene, had said that if there was to be any program for helping farmers stay on the land, it should take no recognition at all of the development value of land. That is what land should be worth for development as opposed to what it should be used for farming. That should not be recognized at all.

May I say in determining the cost of production, it was negotiated step by step, but the one thing that we said would not be in it was the quotas. As a government, we were not prepared to participate in financing the purchase of quota. Everything else we recognized as a true cost of production, we included it all in the formula, we shared the premium and, of course, if there was a deficit, then the premium was raised enough to cover the deficit.

The farmers were encouraged by the calculations to get as much as they could out of the marketplace. I noticed that some members have talked about the importance and desirability of getting everything on to the marketplace. I agree totally. Some of the farmers have their own organizations, and some of them sell as individuals.

You were not reimbursed for the full cost of production. If there was a shortfall, then the formula generally was that the farmer would recover 75 per cent of the shortfall. The closer the producer was able to get to the calculated cost of production, the better. If he got more than that, he was so much better off.

The closest he was able to get up to it, the more revenue he ended up with. I notice one of the criticisms of this GRIP program is that the producers are not encouraged to get the maximum out of the marketplace.

Ours was designed very deliberately to do that. It was not always possible to do it, but certainly the pressure was on producers to maximize their return from the marketplace.

The program worked in the province of British Columbia. The leader of the demonstration against us when we first introduced the agricultural land legislation at the time was the president of the Fruit Growers Association. Shortly after that, it was the president of the B.C. Federation of Agriculture. He was the leader against us.

When we were in the election campaign, he asked if he could go on TV and tell the people of the province what what it thought about our programs in agriculture. We agreed because we need not use them if we did not want to use them. He was ready to go on an advertisement.

What he said was totally positive. He said it was the first time in the history of his total experience in agriculture and in politics in the province of British Columbia that any government had lived up to its promises to farmers.

Some concern has been raised as to whether or not this government will really live up to the promises. I like the principles. I like the way the minister presented it, and I am going to go on hoping until somebody convinces me otherwise that the minister does intend to deliver on this program.

Out of it will come a program that will make it possible for Canadian farmers to produce and make a living out of farming, rather than hoping that they are going to sell off.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I just want to ask our colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan a question. He and I go back some 18 or 19 years ago when we developed some federal-provincial agreements that are still in place to this day, except for some special allowances that were made to Atlantic Canada because of the lack of opportunity there that we recognize from across the rest of Canada.

We made some concessions for them to assist them in their poultry operations, but all provinces other than those few were used alike.

• (1650)

I know that about two and a half years later we had to bring in a supplementary agreement to fine-tune the programs, but those programs and those agreements broke new ground and they are still in effect today.

I would like to ask the member, in his experience, will this legislation that we have before us today achieve its objective if each province has a different agreement and different level of support?

For example, if one province is to get, $3.38 a bushel for its corn and another one gets $4.38, a dollar difference in the agreements between provinces, will this work? In your opinion does this reflect the comparative advantage to production? And will this cause a shift to production between provinces in this country?

Mr. Stupich: The National Farm Products Marketing Board allows for some differences in the return to the producers of various commodities on the basis of the difference in the cost of production in different provinces. I think that is a principle that has stood the test of time and that the federal minister would want to include in this program.

Apart from that, the federal government under the Liberals would never allow any topping up—that is, if there was a federal-provincial program in agriculture. If the province was prepared to go one step further because of a particular situation in that province, then the federal government would withdraw its support by the same amount. So it was not possible for a provincial government to top up programs.

I am not using that as a criticism of the Liberals. After all, these things are evolving.

I gather from the legislation before us now—at least from what I have heard and from what I have read, I understand this is the case—that if this particular legislation and this program goes ahead, then the federal government will allow topping up by provincial governments if they are so inclined.

If that is the case, well then I think that is the way it should be.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to have the opportunity this afternoon to say a few words to the legislation before us, Bill C-98, the Farm Income Protection Act.

I would like to say from the outset that I am certainly not an expert in farming and agricultural practises here in Canada, as some of my colleagues in the House are. But I have listened to the minister speak to this bill today and I would like to say from the outset that in general I support this legislation that has been presented today.

But, in particular, what I support is the process that the minister has used to bring about the legislation that we have before us today. I would wish that all of the legislation that we had before this House had the same level of input from all levels in this country—the grassroots, in this case the farm producers, the provincial government, federal officials, and the minister himself.

However, in speaking to the bill it is also, I believe, important for me to say just how concerned I am about the well-being of agriculture in our country, because I believe that it is a sector of our society that we in this House know is crucial to the economy of this country at this point in time. Yet, I believe that Canadian citizens as a whole depreciate the value of agriculture to not only our Canadian economy but to our individual well-being as Canadians.

I do not believe that Canadians understand that they do not really pay the real price of the food they eat, when they go shopping, and when they prepare their meals at home. I do not think they realize how little of the cash they pay at the grocery store counter actually goes into the pockets of our hard-working farmers. I believe that very often—and I see this in my own riding of Northumberland— those hard-working farmers often work in isolation and perhaps are not the best people in the world for joining to lobby together for improved circumstances for themselves.

In my own riding I often have farmers come to me individually, farmers who have worked extremely hard, often to the point of losing their health, but who in the end find themselves in economic circumstances that they simply cannot withstand any longer and are at the point of bankruptcy, which in many cases has resulted in further deterioration of the physical and mental health of our farmers.

Having worked abroad, before I came to this House, in developing nations and having assisted in many programs of agricultural development, I cannot repeat too many times how important I feel it is that we focus and concentrate on the value of agricultural production. I believe that agriculture is a security issue for every country around the world. I think it is a security issue for us here in Canada, but I think it is an issue which is not understood in that context. I feel that day by day, month by month, year by year we are losing our capacity in this country to produce the food that we require for ourselves as Canadians on a daily basis, on a monthly basis, on a yearly basis.

If and when we become dependent upon other nations to provide us with our daily bread then we are in serious trouble as a nation.

I think it is very important that with this Bill C-98, we have a new program in place to provide necessary financial insurance and assistance that stabilizes production for farmers to some extent. I also understand that this legislation involves considerable realignment of already existing programs. Although the existing programs will essentially remain the same, there is a realignment of programs, plus new programs to assist farmers. This is a substantial change.

One of the areas that does concern me about the legislation, and I only have a few minutes left, is the proposal to set up a special measures committee. I understand, from what the minister was saying today, that already there has been discussion about setting something up. But the legislation reads that 'where the minister is of the opinion that exceptional circumstances exist that require that action be taken outside of the scope of the program established under this agreement, the minister may implement such procedures or other special measures as the minister considers necessary to determine the appropriate action to be taken", et cetera, under those circumstances.

I am also concerned, as one of my colleagues mentioned, that we really have an executive legislative type of authority envisaged by this particular measure in the legislation. I would hope that when this legislation goes to committee it can look at the nature and scope of this special measures committee and consider whether or not it is necessary right now, in fact, rather than waiting for the minister, at some distant point in time or now, to look at exceptional circumstances. Whether we should have a committee composed of those very people and groups involved in the creation of this proposed legislation that we have before us today; whether a committee comprised of those people should not, on an ongoing basis, from this point in time, be looking at this legislation and making recommendations to the ministry on particular changes to the legislation simply because the legislation is such a change.

I am sure that when the regulations are put in place and when the program is itself in operation that, no doubt, there will be some problems and glitches in the legislation that a committee should be looking at on a consistent, regular basis.

I feel strongly about this because I feel that it is a program, as I said at the beginning, that is in support of one of the most important facets of Canadian life and the Canadian economy and if it is a good program—and it appears to be substantially a good program—we want to ensure that nothing goes awry with the program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 14 minutes left, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

PRECAUTIONARY WITHDRAWAL FROM WORK FOR PREGNANT WOMEN IN FEDERALLY REGULATED BUSINESSES

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the gouvernmet should consider including in the Canada Labour Code a provision for precautionary withdrawal from work for pregnant women working in federally-regulated businesses in Quebec and Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to address a matter of vital importance to pregnant workers in Canada and Quebec.

This particular issue caught my interest when members of my staff from Val d'Or and Senneterre received a complaint from a worker from Val d'Or who had applied to the Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail—better known as the CSST—in Quebec. The rèply from the Rouyn-Noranda CSST was that the relevant Quebec legislation did not apply to federally regulated businesses.

My assistant, Ms. Françoise Lamarche from Senneterre who knows all the social cases in my riding, told me that the Canada Labour Code had a preventive function only. The Labour Code has no equivalent of precautionary withdrawal. The woman in question could only be granted leave without pay.

When I reached my office Saturday morning and read the file, I realized that this pregnant worker was employed by a federally regulated bus company, and that as part of her day's work, she would lift parcels that might be as heavy as 70 pounds each. I immediately wrote to several ministers, including the Minister of Labour and the Attorney General of Canada, to find out what the situation was and why there was no provision in the Canada Labour Code for paid leave for pregnant workers on the basis of precautionary withdrawal, a provision that does exist in Quebec.

On January 17, I received a fairly quick answer to my letter of December 12, sent just before the holidays. The Minister of Labour, Mr. Jean Corbeil, wrote: "I am aware of the apparent discrepancy with respect to pregnant workers who are employed by federally regulated businesses in Quebec, who are denied compensation for precautionary withdrawal by the Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail". The minister also said: "Part III of the Canada Labour Code contains certain provisions to protect pregnant workers employed by federal businesses. The Code protects them against termination of employment or other disciplinary measures on the grounds of absence due to parental leave or illness. The employer must continue payment of the usual social premiums during parental leave or absence due to illness. However, if a pregnant employee is no longer able to perform the essential duties of her position and no other appropriate position is available, the employer may order her to take maternity leave. I can assure you that the issue of precautionary withdrawal of pregnant workers will be considered as part of a review of the Canada Labour Code".

I also received a letter from the Attorney General of Canada, the Hon. Kim Campbell, who said: "I will keep you informed of any changes in this respect when the Code is reviewed".

As the elected representative of the people of the vast riding of Abitibi, I never take any chances on an issue that is so important to the women in our area. On May 17, I tabled a petition in the House of Commons, with 35 signatures, which reads as follows: "The Canada Labour Code must observe the principle set forth in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and is thus supposed to protect the rights of women. The regulations on compensation for pregnant women do not consider all the demands of the workplace. The option of preventive withdrawal from the workplace for pregnant women is one that is both desirable and necessary for women working outside the home." The petitioners, from Senneterre and Val d'Or, humbly prayed and called upon Parliament to give serious consideration to the shortcomings of the legislation when the Canada Labour Code was reviewed and to recognize the need for including provisions in the Code concerning the preventive withdrawal of pregnant women from the workplace.

A petition always gets an answer from the minister. That is a very important point. Some members forget to present a petition, and it just stays there on the table or on the shelf. However, every petition tabled by a member of Parliament gets an answer from the minister—it is his duty—within a reasonable period of time. In his reply, Hon. Jean Corbeil stated:

> The protection of pregnant women against the hazards in the workplace is assured, to a certain extent, by the general terms and holidays provided under Parts II and III of the Canada Labour Code.
> As far as the reassignment of pregnant women and their preventive removal from the workplace is concerned, it is an issue which will be examined and dealt with alongside several others, within the framework of any legislative review of the Code, with both the representatives of the employers and employees under federal jurisdiction being present.

On or about May 22nd, I informed the media and constituents in my riding in a press release which reads as follows:

> When a woman is expecting, the least of her worries should be the security of her job, just the same, in spite of a specific federal legislation dealing with maternity leave, she can only obtain leave without pay if she is compelled to ask for preventive removal.

And further:

> I suggest that the Labour Code should not violate the principles in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and it is therefore supposed to protect women's rights. The rules dealing with pregnant women's compensation do not take into account all the requirements of the labour market and the possibility of preventive removal for pregnant women is a desirable and necessary option for women in the labour force.

Following that, I informed Conservative members. Gilles Bernier, the hon. member for Beauce, wrote me a letter on June 1, 1990, which pleased me very much. When I met him in person, he repeated again: "Guy, in my own riding, several pregnant women working at the radio station, in Saint-Georges-de-Beauce, called me to tell me of their grievances under the Labour Code". He added:

> I agree with you when you say that the Canada Labour Code should include some standard for the preventive removal of pregnant women with pay, just as the Quebec Labour Standards legislation does.

In July, as I continued my efforts I received a letter from Hon. Robert de Cotret, President of the Treasury Board. Meanwhile, on May 17, 1990, I had moved the very motion M-655 that we are dealing with today. He wrote:

> I should like to inform you that even if there is no federal legislation dealing with this issue, the policy concerning federal civil servants makes it a responsibility of Deputy Ministers to find other jobs, as the case may be, to pregnant women who are concerned about the possible effects of carrying out their assignments during their pregnancy.

And so on. He added that each case had to be looked into. I appreciated receiving his letter.

And, at the same time, around November, I modified all the unions in my riding. I wrote:

> In November 1989, an Abitibi woman in the labour force told me of the problems she had to face when, pregnant, she asked to be compensated for preventive removal.

You know the story. I said everything there was to say. But last June I came across an article concerning precautionary withdrawal in the June 1990 issue of the magazine Le Travail. The title was "Pregnant women at work, insist that your rights be respected". It was the first time I read an article in that magazine. Here is a quotation from it: "A mother first in the eyes of everybody". A woman called Danielle said: "At work there are men and women who will not admit that pregnancy does slow you down some. Surely a pregnant women should be allowed to stay home when she does not feel well, said Danielle, who had a difficult pregnancy. Of course there are a few things we cannot do as quickly, like walking or carrying heavy loads. How often did I hear those words! It is not my fault if she is pregnant. That is not an excuse not to work. And these are the people who complain about the low birth rate in Quebec".

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that in Quebec precautionary withdrawal is a CSST-paid leave so that women working in a job which does not accommodate the normal evolutioon of pregnancy may stay off work during that time. I want to say to all members of the House that the government should consider including in the Canada Labour Code a provision for precautionary withdrawal from work for pregnant women in federally-regulated businesses in Quebec and in the rest of Canada, with pay.

Mr. Speaker, I hope all members and all ministers in the House will support this motion in favour of pregnant workers in Canada and in Quebec.

• (1710)

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Abitibi for his consideration, abilities, and foresight to understand the needs of working women in Canada and his hope that he will bring it to the attention of the government of the day through his motion.

I would like to read the private member's motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider including in the Canada Labour Code a provision for precautionary withdrawal from work for pregnant women working in federally-regulated businesses in Quebec and Canada.

I say first of all to the member in a general sense and in principle that I think the Liberal Party itself can obviously agree with something as important as this is to working women. There are some loopholes and problems with the Canada Labour Code in this regard.

Perhaps the member could inform the House down the road, as we get into this matter a little further, just what are the nuts and bolts of the particular motion or, if we are to change the Canada Labour Code, what he means and to what extent the provision for precautionary withdrawal would take effect.

Is the meaning in that regard that the moment a woman is pregnant, that is at the very early stages of pregnancy, it is within the realm of the Canada Labour Code to allow for that woman to go on sick leave from that moment on for the whole period? Or, are there going to be criteria and some safeguards of the public purse in that regard and to the bottom line as relates to the business we are discussing?

Those are the areas that I mention to the member because I think that when we are discussing legislation there are always the negative aspects as well.

I say to the member that this is something which we on this side of the House feel should be addressed and addressed soon. As members are aware, at the moment there are more and more women working in the work force every day. They are having difficulties working outside the home. At the same time trying to make a living is becoming more difficult.

I say that because, lo and behold, not too long ago in the budget of the Minister of Finance there were some major caps and wage restraints to the Public Service, and probably to all workers in Canada as we struggle to put in place the process that will hopefully, through time, allow this government to get a handle on its deficit.

On the one hand, this government would like to have us believe that wage caps and freezes will improve our bottom line as a country but, on the other hand, members such as the member for Abitibi are looking to improve the Canada Labour Code. Also, even though he did not say so, in this motion he is suggesting that there be some dollar cost. I know that when we put forward motions in Private Members' Business we are not to use that aspect of it, because it is not within our rules to charge dollars to the present day government but to suggest ways of doing it without costing money.

I am suggesting to him and to members that this particular initiative by the member would obviously cost us some dollars. That is not to say that I do not agree with it. I think it is a very important endeavour. I just would like to caution all members that there always is the down side to it.

I would like to reiterate something that happened to me. When I was not too long ago heavily involved in the labour movement, as a union member I represented 6,000 employees. Out of those employees there were 30 women. It was not too long ago in the railway that there was no such thing as a woman conductor, brakeman or engineer.

Lo and behold, we woke up to the modern age and realized that in most cases women made better engineers, conductors and trainmen than some men. However, when that took place, we found something out that we were not aware of before: that there were no washrooms, there were no special rooms for women in the bunkhouses; these private areas that, as men, we never even considered until this hit us square in the face.

Something else took place and I relate it to the member because I think it has merit to what we are talking about today. One of our members who I was representing became pregnant. When you work on the railroad there are some physical difficulties in being a conductor, a trainman or an engineer: you have to get off and on moving equipment; in a lot of cases you have to be very physically fit. This particular woman came to me one day and said that she felt she should be able to take a leave of absence during a certain period of her pregnancy and in her estimation—and also in mine—be able to get paid for it. The railroad at the time—this is not too many years ago; we are just talking about five years ago—said that she could not do that, that if she wanted to become pregnant that was her own business.

It has now changed somewhat in the railroad industry. There was a ruling by the Human Rights Commission relating to pregnant women, to the effect that should they become sick during their pregnancy—such as morning sickness, for example—they should be allowed to take time off work for that. And, through that process, we were able to get this particular young lady on sick benefits under the unemployment insurance program.

However, what people should know is that under that particular program, those weeks of sick benefits went against the weeks that she would automatically have been able to take off as maternity leave. It did not rectify the problem, but it did at least bring home the argument we are having today in the House, and what the member for Abitibi is bringing forward, that there are some unique problems for women in the work force when pregnancy occurs.

I hope I speak for all members of the Liberal Party when I say that it is long overdue that we take a good look at the Labour Code, in particular at the areas that seem to be silent as they relate to women. It seems to me not too long ago that women were not considered to be people who would be in the work force for their whole career, as men are. Now we have come full circle and realize that this indeed is the case.

If we could take a look more specifically at what the member for Abitibi is asking and see whether he could outline to the members of both the Liberal Party and the NDP how this would be structured, we would be more than willing to participate in looking at some improvements to the Canada Labour Code.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by thanking my colleague, the hon. member for Abitibi, for his initiative in putting forward this important motion. I can assure him, and the House, that I fully support the spirit in which it is proposed.

As we all know, in recent years women have entered the work force in ever increasing numbers. Their contribution to society and to the economy has certainly been enormous. At the same time, we cannot neglect their contribution made as mothers of the next generation. Women's responsibilities to their families are just as important as their responsibilities to their employers.

• (1720)

Many recent initiatives of Labour Canada are intended to help workers, both men and women, balance their responsibilities at work and in the home. Most notable, perhaps, are the 1986 amendments to the Canada Labour Code which, among other things, extended the periods of leave for maternity and for child care. A further example of the study recently prepared by the Women's Bureau of Labour Canada, concerning leave for employees with family responsibilities. Another study by the women's bureau deals with workplace day care centres.

So Labour Canada is continually seeking ways to support workers in fulfilling their family responsibilities while continuing to contribute to the national economy at work.

Much has been done, but as my colleague has pointed out, more remains to be done. The Canada Labour Code currently provides a number of projections for pregnant workers. But further improvements may well be introduced in the future. I know the minister is open to suggestions and the current motion is an example of the kind of suggestion that he welcomes.

As we all know, many women go on working well into their pregnancies and return to work soon after giving birth. Not so many years ago, it was common for employers, as was mentioned by my hon. colleague across the way, to lay off workers who became pregnant, or forced them to take unpaid leave. For some reason it was considered inappropriate to have pregnant workers in the workplace. Of course, this situation caused needless hardship for women who lost their pay cheques just at the time they needed to save and have money. It also caused undue stress for women who felt forced to hide their condition from their employers in order to avoid losing their jobs.

For these reasons the Canada Labour Code prohibits the arbitrary lay–off of workers simply because they are pregnant. The law upholds a pregnant woman's right to continue working unless her employer can demonstrate that she is unable to perform an essential function of her job.

Pregnancy is not an illness. In most cases it does not affect a woman's ability to continue doing her job right up until the time that she decides she is ready to take maternity leave. The Canada Labour Code protects the rights of the majority of pregnant workers to decide when to take their leave.

Moreover, the law provides for the continuation of job benefits for women on maternity leave who have completed six months' service with their employer. Pension and health benefits continue on the same basis as when the worker was on the job. Seniority continues to accumulate. In addition, the worker has a right to receive notice of job and training opportunities that arise during her absence. She is entitled to return to the same job, or at least a comparable job at the same level, upon completion of her leave.

I should add that these same provisions apply to workers, both men and women, who take parental leave to take care of a newborn child, or a newly adopted child. A further provision enables these workers to receive income replacement through the unemployment insurance program. Many employers, recognizing the value to their organization of productive workers, voluntarily supplement these unemployment insurance payments, so that their employees do not suffer financially from taking maternity or parental leave.

I can say with pride that the present law provides very well for the majority of pregnant workers who wish to remain in the labour force and who can do so without any great difficulty.

However, the law is not written only for the majority. We must also remember and make allowance for, the group of pregnant workers who, for whatever reason, encounter problems that make it difficult for them to continue working at their normal job.

Such difficulties may arise from medical complications of pregnancy. For although pregnancy is not in itself an illness, as I have said, women are susceptible to certain conditions requiring medical treatment as a result of their pregnancy. In this case, the existing provisions for sick leave certainly would apply.

A second kind of difficulty that pregnant women may encounter arises from conditions within the workplace; conditions which, though a normal part of the job, may cause concern because the pregnant woman is especially susceptible.

It is precisely this kind of situation that my colleague's motion is intended to address. I agree that the legislation should be examined to see if there are ways to strengthen and clarify the protection afforded to pregnant workers.

After all, federal legislation prohibits the discrimination on the basis of sex. I think we all agree that it would be discriminatory not to make allowances for a woman's pregnancy.

To this end, the minister has directed Labour Canada officials to consider changes to the Canada Labour Code that would guarantee a pregnant worker's right to be reassigned to more appropriate work for the duration of her pregnancy. If a reassignment is not possible, the worker should have the option of taking precautionary leave, during which time her job would be protected and her benefits would be continued.

Labour Canada is currently consulting with federally regulated employee and employer groups regarding the fairest and most practical way to achieve this objective.

I cannot over-emphasize the importance of the process of consultation with the representatives of labour and industry, which is now under way. For some time now, consultation has been the key ingredient in the development of all new laws and regulations in the federal labour jurisdiction.

It has been our experience that the legislation with the best chance of being accepted by everyone concerned is that which has been developed with co-operation of both employers and employees. Especially in these times when productivity is of the essence, we seek an atmosphere of co-operation rather than confrontation in the workplace.

No one else has a better understanding of the actualities of the work place than those responsible for its maintenance and those who spend every working day in it. As legislators, we have much to learn from the workers and employers in our jurisdiction, and I know that Labour Canada is committed to listening and learning.

Therefore, to ensure that our legislation proposals on this matter are workable and acceptable to those most affected, we will give full consideration to the viewpoints expressed by labour and industry in drafting any amendments.

My friend may rest assured that his concerns are indeed under consideration. Amendments, when they are introduced in the House, will take account of the whole range of issues that are involved.

Again, we thank the member for Abitibi for bringing this important issue to the attention of the ministry and of the government.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable pleasure that I rise today to support the initiative in the motion brought forward by the member for Abitibi. To read it again briefly:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider including in the Canada Labour Code a provision for precautionary withdrawal from work for pregnant women working in federally regulated businesses in Quebec and Canada.

The motion is timely, not only in regard to the remarks of the last speaker who indicated, as I was aware, that the government is in the process of some broad consultations on the subject matter at the moment, but also in coming into the House for debate the day before International Women's Day. That in itself makes it seem doubly appropriate that we should be dealing with a question of this nature at this time.

My own experience is in blue collar industry in particular. My riding is not dissimilar to that of the member for Abitibi, although we are at opposite poles geographically. We are largely employed in the forest industry and the mining and smelting industry, particularly lead and zinc.

There are many areas, particularly in Cominco in the lead industry, where women of child-bearing age are totally precluded from working. We are hopeful that with the current modernization program taking place, we will get rid of that problem and women may be able to work safely, both for themselves and for their children in all areas of that industry.

While we are generally supportive of this proposal, we understand some of its limitations and what it does not say is due to the limitations imposed by the rules of the House.

I would like to take the opportunity to point out, perhaps, what cannot be stated within the motion itself. Of course, the motion does not go far enough because of those limitations. It does not go far enough to protect the health and safety of pregnant women in the workplace.

• (1730)

What is needed are specific changes to the Canada Labour Code to ensure the safety of the woman and the foetus during pregnancy, as well as the health of both the woman and child after birth.

Amendments need to be brought forward to address the health and safety needs of women while they are pregnant, as well as while they are nursing. What the government needs to bring forward are amendments to the Labour Code in Parts II and III, to improve the rights and benefits of women workers, before and after the birth of a child.

While the purpose of the present Part II of the Canada Labour Code is to ensure a safe and healthy workplace, at present Part II provides virtually no protection for pregnant and nursing workers.

The right of a worker to refuse work does not cover situations where the danger is inherent to the work or where the risk is considered a normal condition of employment. These limitations have the effect of excluding pregnant and breast-feeding workers from full workplace health and safety protection.

Not only are pregnant and nursing workers not protected by the health and safety part of the Code, but under Part III of the Code, a pregnant worker can be forced to take an unpaid leave of absence from employment if the employee is unable to perform an essential function of her job and no appropriate alternate job is available.

I do not think it really needs to be pointed out, but I would stress, in any case, that this comes at a time when the expectant mother and the family most need the income from her work, because they are looking forward to an expanded family.

It is this situation which simply enforces the existing barriers to pregnant and nursing workers. The Code not only does nothing to remove these barriers, it enforces this discrimination as it currently stands.

Pregnant and nursing workers should not be penalized for workplace hazards and risks. Employers should be required to find suitable alternate employment, or measures need to be put in place to provide for full replacement wages if the worker is forced to leave the workplace.

Part II of the Code needs to be amended to require that the employer must ensure that pregnant or nursing workers are protected from workplace risks, specific to the condition of a pregnant or nursing mother. These risks should be defined to include psychological and stress related conditions.

Workplace risks should not be restricted to physical conditions. The psychological effects of working with video display terminals, VDTs, for example, could be greater than the physical dangers in the workplace and could cause abortion or other equally serious trauma.

When a pregnant or nursing worker presents a medical certificate indicating a risk, or if the action is initiated by the employer, then the employer should be obliged to either modify the work environment or reassign the worker to another job. If these alternatives cannot be met, the employee must then be entitled to appropriate fully paid leave.

There also has to be a mechanism in place to allow for a complaint to be filed with Labour Canada, in the instance where an employer refuses to accommodate the legitimate health needs of the workers. This would be handled much like other Part II complaints and subject to appeal to the Canada Labour Relations Board.

Finally, measures need to be adopted to ensure that paid leave is available to all pregnant or nursing workers. Further, parental and child care leave should be increased from the current 24 week maximum to 52 weeks.

I would just say, before wrapping up, that I would be remiss if I did not take this opportunity to urge that both this and other health and safety protections be extended to parliamentary employees. In June 1986, the Parliamentary Employment and Staff Relations Act was passed by this House, in which Parts II and III incorporated Parts III and IV of the Canada Labour Code for the protection of parliamentary employees. But those provisions still have not been proclaimed, almost five years later.

I would urge the member who introduced this motion to assist those of us on this side of the House who have been pressing the government again and again to proclaim those sections so that these improvements, when they come into place, will impact upon employees of this place and on Parliament Hill, as they would impact upon other Canadians.

Finally, since tomorrow is International Women's Day, the New Democratic Party and myself would urge the government to move soon and perhaps they might even announce tomorrow a very clear intention to pursue the objectives of the motion introduced by the member for Abitibi.

I can think of no better time than today to begin to ensure fair and non-discriminatory treatment for pregnant women in the work force and to safeguard them and their children from the impacts of workplace induced accident and disease.

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion tabled by the hon. member for Abitibi. We seldom have an opportunity to take a position on an issue that is so directly related to child bearing, and we have that opportunity today.

The hon. member's motion is aimed at helping women reconcile the demands of the workplace with their family obligations. Many of us are very familiar with this problem. In fact, most of us have to deal with this problem every day.

Canada is a country of families, Mr. Speaker. It is also a country of workers. Statistics Canada reports that more than half of the women with young children also have jobs, and their numbers are steadily increasing. This trend is due to a number of factors. First, today's women are better educated. They have qualifications they want to put to good use. Thanks to changing attitudes to the type of employment considered suitable for women, they now have access to jobs that are more interesting and more satisfying than those generally offered to previous generations. It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that today's women should wish to pursue their careers after starting a family.

This is not simply due to the fact that women want to "have it all", as some magazine articles would have us believe. And not only highly educated women keep on working when they are pregnant and go back to their jobs a few months after the birth of their child. It is a pattern that is followed by women from all classes in our society. For many young mothers, it is not a matter of choice but of necessity.

We all know how much Canadian families have changed in the past 30 years. The typical family in the fifties, consisting of two children, the father and family breadwinner and the mother, at home full time, is no longer the norm today.

In fact, in the nineties, only one family out of six resembles this model. There are far more families where both parents have to work, either full time or part time, to make ends meet. Furthermore, many Canadian families are single-parent families, most of which are headed by women.

Most women with children cannot choose to go to work or stay home. They must work to support their families.

Over the years, the present government has passed legislation to help working mothers. Provisions concerning maternity leave have been amended to extend this leave, to provide for greater flexibility in selecting the period during which maternity leave may be taken and to reduce eligible periods.

A woman with six months of continuous employment may now take maternity leave for a maximum of 17 weeks, at the time she feels is appropriate. She may start her leave up to 11 weeks before the expected date of confinement. However, she may work up to the day her child is born, unless her employer can prove she is unable to perform an essential function of her position.

This means that maternity leave may last as long as 17 weeks after the birth of a child.

In addition to maternity leave, either parent (father or mother) is entitled to a maximum of 24 weeks' leave to care for a newborn or adopted child.

Although the maternity leave and parental leave provided under the Canada Code are leave without pay, eligible employees can receive unemployment insurance benefits during those periodes, which relieves the financial burden somewhat.

• (1740)

The most important aspects of the maternity and parental leave provisions may be the safeguards concerning employment and fringe benefits. Seniority is not affected by the time spent on maternity or parental leave and entitlement to pension and health plans, for instance, are maintained, provided the employee keeps paying her premiums.

The employee also has the right to be advised of any training or promotion opportunities during her leave, so she will not miss career advancement opportunities simply because she is away. Upon her return to work, she has to be reinstated in her former position, or at least in an equivalent position, and in the same workplace.

Mr. Speaker, these provisions of the Canadian Labour Code give working women the assurance that they will not have to give up their careers to start a family. Knowing this helps reduce the stress which inevitably surrounds the birth of a child. With this weight off their mind, the employees can pay more attention to their jobs during the time they are at work.

The legislation is also beneficial for the employer, because with the assurance of having their jobs back upon returning from maternity leave, employees are likely to be more consciencious and more productive. Recognizing the value of these employees, many employers keep paying their employee's UI premiums for the duration of the leave so that they incur no financial loss because of their pregnancy.

All these provisions serve the objective of assisting women who want to go back to work after giving birth, as long as medical problems and reactions to conditions existing in the workplace do not cause complications when they are pregnant. The motion put forward by my colleague from Abitibi is intended only to extend the same benefits to a few women who would encounter medical problems during pregnancy. That sounds only fair.

At the present time, a woman who has health problems during the first six months of pregnancy is entitled to a maximum of 12 weeks of sick leave without loosing seniority or benefit entitlements. But if her problems keep up and it remains impossible for her to work after that period, she usually has no other choice but to take her maternity leave earlier than she would have liked, which gives her less time after the birth of her child to devote herself to that extremely important task of taking care of her newborn.

It seems there is also a floating period of two weeks between the end of the six months of pregnancy and the beginning of the eleventh week before delivery; the employee may then have no recourse but the goodwill of her employer.

I think we have an excellent system of assistance to pregnant employees, but the motion points out one of its few shortcomings. It would be appropriate, in the name of fairness, to eliminate that deficiency.

Mr. Eugene Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate and thank my colleague from Abitibi for moving a motion amending the Canadian Labour Code and seeking to protect the pregnant worker. We know very well that, pregnant workers are often single parents with very limited financial means. They often have different needs: financial needs, social needs, the need to be encouraged.

Maternity is something extremely sacred. We should respect the pregnant worker and encourage her. We know fully well that presently maternity leave and parental leave are legally protected. But, as was saying the member who just spoke, there are flaws in the Canadian Labour Code, and the pregnant worker should get some protection when, during her pregnancy, which can be difficult at times, she is forced to take some days off. This person could have a sympathetic employer, but she could also have one who is far from being sympathetic. She could suddenly find herself without a job if an employer was not sympathetic towards her.

So, in Canada, we must have an act to protect the worker who is in such a situation.

[English]

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak today on this motion which touches on two issues I care deeply about: human rights and economic productivity.

First, this is a human rights matter because the added support for pregnant workers that the motion proposes would have the effect of defending women's right to equal opportunity at work. Our Charter of Rights and Freedoms and other human rights legislation have established that special benefits for pregnant women do not constitute unequal treatment. In fact, such special benefits may be necessary to ensure that women are not discriminated against, even unintentionally, because they are pregnant.

Second, this motion, if acted upon, helps to remove some of the stresses on pregnant workers that would otherwise interfere with their productivity at work. I hardly need to remind the House how important worker productivity is to the economic health of Canada in an age of increasing competitive global markets.

One of Canada's great advantages in those competitive markets is its well-educated, healthy, highly motivated work force. As we will know, a significant and growing part of that work force consists of women of childbearing age.

Women now represent 44 per cent of the country's labour force. That means that virtually every Canadian industry, office, hospital and assembly line depend on women to get the job done. Increasingly, women occupy responsible, essential positions in management, the trades and in the professions. Gone are the days when a woman could simply be sent home if she became pregnant.

Labour unions have led the way through collective bargaining in winning protection for their members from such arbitrary treatment. Today, the Canadian Labour Code provides for maternity and child care leave as basic labour standards available throughout the federal jurisdiction.

Nowadays, enlightened employers value the women who work for them and do whatever is necessary to retain them as productive employees. If this means offering generous benefit packages, including maternity leave and extended child care leave, most employers recognize that the cost of such benefits is small compared with the economic benefits they bring.

The additional leave provisions envisioned by this motion could easily be accommodated at very little expense to the economy. As I have said, the result would be the full recognition of an important human right: the right to equality of opportunity in the workplace.

A provision allowing for precautionary withdrawal for pregnant workers would, in the first place, apply only to the relatively few cases where a woman experiences medical complications during pregnancy or where a normal condition of her work causes abnormal difficulties for risks.

The latter condition might arise in a number of professions. A pregnant worker might be concerned about the effect of heavy lifting or the effect of prolonged standing. A laboratory technician may be concerned in her especially vulnerable condition that normal occupational exposures might pose an unusual risk to her or her child. In any one of these cases some form of precautionary withdrawal, either reassignment or leave, would go a long way toward relieving a woman's concerns.

• (1750)

I do not wish in any way to prejudge the results of the consultations with employer and employee groups, which as the parliamentary secretary has said, are currently under way. Here is one way I think the matter could be dealt with through an amendment to the Labour Standards section of the Canada Labour Code.

An amendment might be introduced that would mirror the already existing provision in Part III of the Code which allows an employer to require a pregnant employee to take leave or be reassigned if she is unable to do an essential function of her job. But the new provision would allow the worker to initiate such an action by presenting a doctor's certificate that states there is a medical reason for concern.

Upon presentation of this medical certificate the employer would be obliged, if possible, either to modify the work environment to eliminate the risk or to reassign the pregnant worker to another job. The employee would be entitled to leave with full job protection and continued benefits until the required modification or reassignment was arranged. If a suitable reassignment job or a job modification were not possible or practicable, then the employee would be entitled to leave for as long as the medical concerns related to her pregnancy persist.

Of course, the usual means of dispute resolution already existing under Part III of the Canada Labour Code would apply. The worker would have to give her employer fair notice of when she intended to return to work or to her usual job if she had been reassigned.

This approach seems eminently fair since its effect would be to give pregnant employees exactly the same rights to request reassignment or leave as a precaution that employers already have when a pregnant worker is judged unable to continue doing her job. The principles and mechanisms are already in place. As I have said, the provisions would affect relatively few workers and involve relatively little cost.

Thus, through an amendment to the Canada Labour Code, we could ensure that the important human rights to equality in the workplace is extended. Women workers are extremely valuable to the Canadian economy and their continuing commitment to the labour force should be recognized and encouraged.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Abitibi who tabled this motion in the House. The hon. member is in fact suggesting that the Canada Labour Code should contain certain provisions that would enable pregnant workers in federally regulated businesses in Canada to claim certain rights with respect to precautionary withdrawal. The motion says: "—federally regulated businesses in Quebec and Canada". I am not so sure about the wording at this point, because so far, Quebec is still part of Canada, and I hope it will remain so. But in any case, this is a minor detail. I think that basically, what the hon. member is trying to do is to make these privileges available to pregnant women.

I wholeheartedly support this initiative, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I think not enough is being done, and this is an understatement, to encourage pregnant women who can work to stay in the labour market. Unfortunately, some people still have this attitude that as soon as a woman is pregnant, she should get out of the labour force as soon as possible. Of course, that is just not true. If a woman decides to work throughout her pregnancy, why not, and I think we should ensure that at least in federally regulated areas, the opportunity should be there for pregnant woman to stay on the job if they want to.

Mr. Speaker, I also think that if we adopted this motion today, it would be a clear message to the women of this country. Lest we forget, this is Women's rights Week, and tomorrow is International Women's Day.

So I think adopting this motion would be good news for Canadian women. The motion does not oblige, it only says "that the government should consider—". Of course if the government decides to adopt this motion today, I imagine there will an amendment to the Canada Labour Code. Subsequently, the amendment will be considered in the House, voted on, considered in committee and go through all other stages. In any case, I think this would be an excellent message for us to send today, especially if the vote is unanimous.

[English]

It has happened in the past in this House that some government members are instructed or asked to talk a bill out and speak in favour of it until the bill dies in the House of Commons. I hope that will not be the case today. We are on the eve of women's day. This is women's week. This would be an excellent initiative to adopt. I think it would send the signal that we care about working women and that we want to do something to help them.

If that is the case, which I trust it is, now that we are only a few minutes before six o'clock, I hope that the House will permit this bill to come to a vote and that the motion will not be talked out. If the motion is talked out then let the message be clear that those who talk it out, even if they are speaking for it when they are talking it out, are really against the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues explained—and I am quite aware of the situation— working women in federally-regulated businesses enjoy some benefits like maternity leave and parental leave. What our colleague, the hon. member for Abitibi, proposes would be a very minor improvement but nevertheless rather important for the pregnant women involved. The amendment he proposes would fill one of the remaining void in the legislation and help a growing number of working Canadian women who try to strike a delicate balance between their responsibilities at work and at home.

My only concern, Mr. Speaker, is that as legislators we must resist the temptation to change legislation piecemeal and to fall prey to sensationalism. On the contrary, we should favour a co-ordinated approach, which would take into consideration the whole of the employment standards as well as their enforcement provisions. We must be, Mr. Speaker, more of a good legislator than a popular one.

Several concerns of workers who must juggle their work and family responsibilities are dealt with in the federal employment standards. This is the case, for example, with bereavement leave, sick leave and, as my colleagues were saying, maternity leave and parental leave.

Striking a balance between family responsibilities and work obligations is something every Canadian must do, including politicians, and I must—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the hon. member.

[English]

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, a while back, I asked the Conservative government a question about unemployment in Eastern Ontario.

[English]

I enumerated at the time, on November 8, 1990, the series of plant closures in my riding. That list included 1,100 jobs lost in Cornwall, 1,600 in Renfrew, 250 in Hawkesbury, 325 in Alexandria, and I even included at the time a lay-off of 100 people at the Consultex Textile plants in Alexandria.

Little did I know then that things would not get better. In fact they would get worse.

I asked for government help at the time to help the unemployed of my constituency. What did the government say?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Boudria: It says: "No one likes plant closures," and the minister for science says: "If the hon. member is going to talk about plant closures then I think it is important to talk about those that have closed in recent months. If he strings off a list of plant closures over the last three or four years that is not fair in terms of this economic problem. We acknowledge that we have a problem and we are going to try to resolve it".

They have done nothing.

First of all that answer was most inadequate. Now we have the minister of state for small business who is with us this afternoon and I am particularly pleased that he is here because he knows of the unemployment in the riding that I represent and I hope that we can get some assistance from that minister because I know that he has taken this issue seriously.

In the last 24 hours another blow has hit the community of Hawkesbury. This one is not exactly the fault of the federal government, but I think it needs to be raised just about now. The Community Initiatives Fund of the Community Futures Committee in Hawkesbury, Ontario, in my riding had recommended in favour of a large federal government contribution toward la Cité collégiale, one of the new post-secondary colleges of the province of Ontario that was proposed to have been located in Hawkesbury. We now hear as of yesterday that the government of Ontario is planning to withdraw those funds and to put them elsewhere.

I hope that the minister who is here today will be able to convince Evelyn Gigantes, the provincial minister responsible for eastern Ontario, and others, that the college in Hawkesbury and the one in Cornwall both have to stay.

I wanted to make those points and I continue with other layoffs that have occurred since I raised this issue last fall. Two weeks ago a plant in L'Orignal, Ontario, the Ivaco steel mill, laid off an additional 150 people. In Hawkesbury the Canadian Pacific Forest Products Research lab closed down two weeks ago, 63 jobs. And now there is another textile mill which is threatening to sell its machinery and to lock its doors because of a recent change in tariff policy on the part of this government. That announcement was made to me yesterday.

That community of 10,000 people has seen hundreds and hundreds of lay-offs in the last six months.

I ask the minister who is here, and I know the parliamentary secretaries are usually assigned to answer these questions, to please give a ray of hope to the people of Hawkesbury and elsewhere in eastern Ontario. We need help. We need it badly.

Other regions of the country have federal-provincial agreements or other kinds of tools to assist them in their development. I am thinking of the new agreement in Quebec for $80 million or something for infrastructure. That is fine. I like it.

I hear of the FEDNOR agency for northern Ontario. It is similar. I like it too.

But I think that eastern Ontario is depicted as if we were all living in the city of Ottawa, and I think the minister knows that Cornwall is not Ottawa, and Hawkesbury and L'Orignal and Pembroke and Renfrew are not Ottawa. They have problems that are very serious. Unemployment is 15.5 per cent in Hawkesbury, close to 20 per cent in Cornwall. Hawkesbury is 60 miles from here. Cornwall is 150 miles from here. We do not even think that that is possible in the almost shadow of the Peace Tower. But it is the sad reality of this situation.

I am inviting the government again to respond to the question I raised last fall and particularly to respond to the situation that has become seriously worse since.

Finally, I ask the minister if he could commit himself to contact the provincial Government of Ontario and at the very least ask it not to scrap the plan for La Cité collégiale in Hawkesbury and that of Cornwall.

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I certainly can relate to the hon. member, coming from western Quebec, where I think we have the same situation.

The federal government is very active in eastern Ontario and in western Quebec with a wide range of program support. For example, Industry, Science and Technology is providing a broad range of ongoing programs and services which help companies improve their international competitiveness and marketing efforts. These include programs related to research and development in strategic technologies, as well as diagnostic programs related to technology transfer and development.

I am sure the hon. member is aware of these; if not, he should become aware of them. I would be happy to sit down with him and with the minister to explain these different programs that are available to areas such as eastern Ontario and western Quebec.

These targeted programs and a wide range of business services are aimed at enhancing the international competitiveness of Canadian industry. They are complemented by the international market development programs and services at External Affairs and International Trade Canada, which are also delivered through the ISTC Ontario Regional Office.

In addition, the Industrial Research Assistance Program of the National Research Council provides financial assistance and technological advice in support of increased industrial competitiveness and is delivered through the NRC's offices in Ottawa and Kingston.

However, it is the Community Futures Program, with its core objective of helping designated communities and areas adjust to structural and economic change, that is the key federal mechanism for supporting communities and areas facing economic difficulty.

I can tell the hon. member that I have three Community Futures in my riding, Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle. These are the key to the development of areas such as ours. The federal government has decided that it is not somebody sitting in Ottawa or Quebec City in an ivory tower who is going to decide the future of our communities, but the local people who will deliver the programs and know the programs. They have to deal with the people there, and they know what the problems and the solutions are.

I might add that eastern Ontario has a very broad Community Futures coverage.

Mr. Boudria: I have four.

Mr. Moore: That is right. The designated areas include Renfrew County, Stormont—Dundas—Glengarry, Hawkesbury, Prescott—Russell, Land O'Lakes, Smiths Falls, the St. Regis Reserve, and extends as far west as Prince Edward County. You are well covered, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that the hon. member will be using these tools in the future.

Mr. Boudria: Oh, I have.

Mr. Moore: These areas have well established Community Futures Committees, comprised of local members from the private and public sectors. Their role is to assess local problems and opportunities and to develop a strategy to address them. With a strategy in place, the community can seek funding from the community initiatives fund for the establishment of a business development centre, for self-employment incentives, for direct purchase of institutional training, and for other specific projects.

Under the program, some 13 business development centres have been established through eastern Ontario—and I am not counting those in western Quebec—providing a wide range of information and counselling services to local small businesses, as well as loans of up to $75,000 for business establishment and expansion through each centre's $1.5 million investment fund.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

THE LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the question I rise on arises out of a question asked back on February 15, 1990.

However, the question is relevant in that it deals with the forest industry and it deals with not only how it has been hit through the goods and service tax but through the memorandum of understanding and the 15 per cent export tax when it exports to the United States.

• (1810)

The importance of the forest industry to Canada goes without saying. However, I should remind the House of some of that importance.

For instance, 79 per cent of the land mass of Canada within the 10 provinces and territories is covered with forest land, with 60 per cent, or 243.7 million hectares in forest production—in other words, productive land. The value of that production is $43 billion and accounts for 16 per cent of Canada's exports and 21 per cent of all world trade in forest products.

It also employs directly or indirectly approximately 770,000 people as of 1989. However, it appears that that is falling off. From 1985 to the present, the jobs have gone down from approximately 840,000 jobs in 1985 to 770,000 in 1989. I would suggest that it is probably down substantially from there.

In British Columbia, for instance, the forest industry accounts for 20 per cent of the labour force, and 45 per cent of all manufacturing shipments in the province. In my riding alone, Mr. Speaker, I have mills or part of the forest industry in every area of the boundary country: mills in Grand Forks and Midway, in Penticton I have a major mill, in Princeton and in Merritt.

These jobs are directly affected by the policies of this government, whether it be by the goods and services tax, the memorandum of understanding, the 15 per cent export, by cuts in unemployment insurance, or by cuts in the forest resource development agreement. Mr. Speaker, my area hurts.

The Okanagan region, in the last figures I saw, had an unemployment rate adjusted of 16.7 per cent. That region is not the highest region of unemployment within my area. The Nicola Valley has at times gone almost double that and is at present well over that rate.

We depend on the forest industry. In Merritt alone there are five mills which deal with forest products. Any time there is a policy that is brought out that hurts the forest industry, it hurts Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt directly, but also it hurts the province and the rest of Canada.

I have given the context of how important forestry is in this little recitation so that people will understand that any policy that is developed where it cuts back on anything that goes into the forest region is going to hurt, and hurt drastically, a major sector of Canada.

The Forest Resource Development Agreement that has just been negotiated with the province of British Columbia cuts the funds in those areas from $300 million in the first five years, as a joint agreement, to $200 million in the next five years, a cut of $100 million. The Forest Resource Development Agreement helped in many ways; not only did it create employment but also it cut back on the not sufficient restocked areas, it assisted in spacing and fertilization of overgrowth and new areas of development within the forest area, as well as silviculture and replanting.

A major area also in my riding is silviculture. In Oliver, British Columbia, for instance, we have a major silviculture establishment that depends on that Forest Resource Development Agreement progressing substantially. So it is rather unfortunate that that has been cut back.

In the goods and services tax area, Mr. Speaker, the government tells us that the goods and services tax will be good for the area. Yet the industry tells us that it is not helping; in fact, it is hurting them in many different areas, including the taxation on their fuels is increased.

A recent initiative by this government with respect to marine user fees came under attack by the Council of Forest Industries of British Columbia in a recent letter of February 25.

They point out the folly to the industry in this user-fee area and they advise that users should not have to fund insufficient services, that there is no accountability to the users of the marine or air facilities that they will be charged for. Once again, an added cost to the forest industry.

One of the major areas that sticks in the craw of the foresters in my region and across Canada, of course, is the memorandum of understanding between Canada and the United States. It appears that this understanding restricts our own management of our forests. The documents show that the United States must approve many of the changes in Canadian forest policy. At present we know that the United States has sent at least 64 directives to Canada since the memorandum of understanding was signed.

All of these things, whether it be FRDA, the goods and services tax, the social housing costs, the increase in unemployment insurance, whether it be the initiatives to have users pay in the marine area, or whether it be the cuts in the Canada Assistance Plan or Established Programs Financing. All of these things filter down to the forest industry through taxation and property taxes.

The forest industry is important to Canada. We must properly look after that industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, our producers and distributors in the lumber industry certainly depend on their capacity to sell their products on export markets. The GST will put them in a better position to compete efficiently on the world markets. Also, it will increase their competitiveness on our domestic market.

The multi-stage GST will totally replace the export tax. Like any other business, exporters will recover all tax paid on their purchases. That will decrease their operating costs in Canada and improve the performance on export markets.

The GST also helps the Canadian lumber industry save a lot. It does not create any problem to our lumber producers and distributors. It really gives them the opportunity to expand their business and create more jobs in Canada.

Early in 1990, Mr. Speaker, some lumber wholesalers expressed concerns about their cash-flow situation, because of the tax they were paying on the wood purchased to resale on the international market. Our government listened to them, as we always do, Mr. Speaker.

Nowadays, registered exporters can buy zero-rated lumber in Canada to sell on foreign markets, which should satisfy the needs of the industry.

If my hon. colleague ever wanted more details on this subject, I would recommend that helook at the Interpretation Bulletin B-044 of February 1, 1991, issued by Revenue Canada.

One of the main flaws of the previous federal sales tax scheme was that it charged a large hidden tax on our exports. That situation increased costs and made our exporters less competitive than it would have been the case otherwise. The hidden tax on exports accounted on average for nearly 1 per cent of the export price or, more than 10 per cent of many exporters' profit margins.

By removing the tax on inputs, the GST is doing away with this disadvantage and reducing operating costs in Canada. The direct result of that will be an increase of about $9 billion, or 1.4 per cent of our gross domestic product, i.e. the amount of products and services generally produced by our economy. Increased growth means increased investments and job creation for Canadians.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): By coming to this House this evening and being rather angry at the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, I am going to let my colleagues in this House and Canadians decide whether or not I have cause to be in this state.

A week ago yesterday I asked a rather simple question in the House of Commons, and I will quote it in order to make sure that I do not mislead anyone. A little over a year ago the Prime Minister stated, and I quote the Prime Minister: "In our second mandate we are going to focus more and more of our attention and resources and the fundamental building blocks of a competitive society on long-term investment in people, skills training, education, research and development."

• (1820)

I went on to say: "yesterday's continued freeze"—because it was the day after the budget—"of transfer payments for education as well as the $100 million cut for training constituted a flagrant contradiction of what the Prime Minister said."

What answer am I given? What stands out most of all? "They are not frozen". I did not say that. I said that there was a continued freeze of what had been. I pointed out that according to the minister's own budgetary figures, $100 million had been reduced or cut—call it what you will—for training.

After the Minister of Finance makes his statement, there is in Hansard documentation that the Prime Minister said: "They are not frozen." Supposedly they have been increased by 3.7 per cent. Why does the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance not tell Canadians what that 3.7 per cent means? It means a transfer of tax points, but that is very different from cash. The cash is drying up. The Prime Minister knows it. The Minister of Finance knows it, and I am disappointed.

When is a cut a cut? We have in the estimates dealing with post-secondary education a reduction, a change of $485.8 million, almost $500 million. How large does it have to be? When is a cut a cut? Why this doubletalk? When will the minister stop using gobbledegook? Will the minister or his parliamentary secretary stand up in this House today and tell Canadians, admit to them that he has cut post-secondary education, thereby threatening our nation's competitiveness?

[Translation]

Last year, the Canadian University and College Association as well as the Canadian Federation of Students had predicted, in light of last year's budget, that the cash payments would stop in some provinces—if I remember well and I think I do—in 1997 in Quebec, in 1999 in Ontario and at about the same time in the other provinces. That was before another freeze was brought in. The situation is getting worse. Why is the federal government withdrawing completely from the cash payments program? Why is the minister penalizing the poorer regions? Why does the government persist in attacking programs that bring us together as a nation?

[English]

On October 23, 1990, I had also asked the minister a question with respect to the goods and services tax and the impact it would have on students. I suggested, according to a study it received, that it would cost students between $340 and $750 more per year.

Again, it was gobbledegook. It was inconsistent. It was illogical. It was not precise. This continued freeze will cost students another $1,000 between now and 1995. We know that the tuition fees are going up at an astronomical rate. I mentioned that at one college in British Columbia the rates were up over 300 per cent. There are tuition fee increases of 200 per cent, over 100 per cent.

The student debt is skyrocketing out of sight. I met a young woman two days ago from my constituency who said to me: "I have just graduated. It was from a very prestigious university, but I cannot find a job. What am I to do? How am I going to repay that $10,000 debt?" I really do not know. During the last week, I have been talking to constituents, people from Diamond, St. Germain, River Park South, St. Vital and in my own area where I live, Windsor Park, Niakwa. I have been talking to people from Norwood and from St. Boniface.

They have been saying a lot of interesting things. Interestingly enough, they match some points made by Carol Goar in The Toronto Star today. First of all, she identified the major culprit in the increase of inflation, the very element that the minister is trying to control, as the minister himself. Why? Because of the increases in taxes. The minister is the major culprit. She goes on to say that between 1986 and 1990, income has gone up since 1986 by 32 per cent. But the federal tax load has gone up by 35 per cent, and that is not even counting the astronomical increases in provincial and municipal taxes.

Ms. Goar goes on to point out that beating the inflation rate down is one way of proceeding but it has high costs, severe unemployment. We know that. It is almost 10 per cent. It is predicted to go up to 10 per cent. So people are frightened.

One more point that she makes and my constituents have made is: "In order for Canada to enjoy an new golden era, it will have to find its niche in a world of fiercely competitive trading blocs where the environment must be respected and brains count more than natural resources".

That is the issue. That is what the government has not understood, that we have to invest in our people in order to be competitive. Cutting the transfer payments, cutting the grants for training and retraining, capping research and development, science and technology is not going to achieve that goal.

[Translation]

M. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if you knew how fed up I am to hear the Opposition say foolish things. Education, first of all, comes under provincial jurisdiction. The federal government makes a substantial contribution to this sector under Established Programs Financing. It will contribute $20 billion this year and this amount will continue to increase in the following years.

Total federal transfers to the provinces, Mr. Speaker, will reach $36 billion this year. It means that 22 per cent of the federal government total Estimates, 22 per cent of the revenues collected from Canadian taxpayers will go directly to the provinces, to provincial organizations, and these payments are in cash. Furthermore, the government gives financial support to the provinces under various other programs.

And you know, Mr. Speaker, since 1984, an attempt was made to reduce the inherited debt. My colleague from the Opposition does not like it to hear this, but it is a fact. We have to try to reduce the debt which we inherited from his party, from his government.

Mr. Duhamel: Tell the truth!

Mr. Vincent: You see, Mr. Speaker! I let him speak. He could be polite and return the courtesy.

Mr. Duhamel: Tell the truth!

Mr. Vincent: I am telling the truth. Allow me to speak, I was polite with you.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague referred to a $100 million cut-back in the employment development program. Again this is not true. It is not a cut-back but a reduction of the projected increase. There is quite a difference between a decrease in salary—the people of Trois-Rivières know all about that—and a decrease in the rate of increase of my salary. That difference has to be made.

As my colleague pointed out, at the 1989 conference of provincial premiers the Prime Minister was the one who raised the issue of education in Canada, and he has already done an excellent job to find solutions to the national problem of education. It was the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, who did that with his provincial colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is running out. In conclusion I should like to say that the budget of the Minister of Finance relies on the private sector so that our policy will produce dividends for all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.29 p.m.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, March 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, it is certainly a pleasure to rise in the House this morning to speak on Bill C-98, the Farm Income Protection Act.

At the outset I want to point out to the House and to make very clear and understandable to Canadians, to those who will be reading the proceedings and to those who are watching this morning, that even though there has been a lot of talk about a farm safety net program being implemented in Canada basically for the immediate use of the primary producers, and therefore hopefully of some benefit to the whole agrifood industry, this bill is only an enabling piece of legislation. I know that is the case with many bills that we pass in the House of Commons or that are brought forth.

When we read through this bill, we have to understand that it really does not say very much in terms of answering the questions of the agricultural industry. This bill is going to allow the government and the minister to go province to province throughout this country and make the deal that is most suitable, hopefully, to the individual province. There are pluses and minuses to that. There is the plus that it can recognize regional diversity and regional differences, but there is the minus that it allows the deals to be made. That part of is tends to make some of us nervous.

I have other concerns that I would like to raise this morning, but first of all I would like to compliment the department on the manner in which it went through the process of getting this piece of legislation in place. I also want to remind the government not to get too excited about that, because in recent days I have talked to some people who were involved in that process, in what was referred to as the implementation committee which started to meet last fall, a cross-section of the industry, including many farmers. It is interesting that the members of the implementation committee did not get a copy of this legislation until about 48 hours ago. In speaking to some of them, they were absolutely appalled that much of what is in this piece of legislation was not discussed by the implementation committee, was not debated with them and, contrary to the comments of the minister in the House yesterday, they will not and cannot take ownership.

I noted with interest yesterday that the minister said that he takes no ownership. I believe his comments were: "We claim no ownership of this particular policy." That is a beautiful way of putting it. He went on further to comment yesterday that he hopes it works. Politicians being what they sometimes are accused of, if it works I am sure the minister naturally will take claim.

I am concerned with the fact that there are clauses in that bill which the implementation committee was not expecting to see, does not understand why they are there and, rightfully I think, needs an explanation of what is there. I am sure that those points, when the bill goes to committee, will be raised by all parties and hopefully can be cleared up at that time.

As I said before, I compliment the department on the over-all view that it accepted and took part in from the different sectors of the industry.

There is no question that something needs to be done. The agricultural industry is in dire straits mainly at the primary producer level. I have seen figures over the years that every dollar received at the farm gate by primary producers, before it is through the system in our society, is multiplied seven times. We must keep that in mind. That emphasizes a saying that many of us have said for many years: "As goes agriculture, so goes the strength of any economy".

I would like to read clause 4(2)(a) of the bill and then raise some concerns that I have.

Clause 4(2)(a) reads as follows:

> The program should not unduly influence the decision of producers of agricultural products with respect to production or marketing, and should encourage adjustments with respect to production or marketing so as to improve the effectiveness of the responses of producers to market opportunities.

As well, the bill is to address production or market neutrality, equity, consistency within international obligations and encouragement of long-term environmental sustainability and responsibility.

I have some concerns there. I can tell this House that unfortunately—and I mean that sincerely—GRIP is being farmed by producers. I know there will be people who argue that that cannot happen, but unfortunately it is. If there is one thing we do not need in the agricultural industry, it is something to change the decisions that producers make and not pay as much attention to market indications, to market prices and to market returns as they should.

I recognize fully that it is extremely difficult and maybe impossible to put a program in place which does not have that use made of it. In talking to individuals from different parts of Canada in the last number of weeks, the decisions on what they plant this year in many cases are going to depend on what they see in the short run being returned to them from the GRIP payments.

One can say that should not happen and, if they are looking at the long-term good of agriculture, they should not be doing that. I agree. What has happened in the short term in agriculture, especially at the primary producer level in the last number of years, is that even though farmers know what is the long run proper thing to do as far as environmental conservation and long run investments are concerned, for example, they unfortunately and realistically have to survive in the short term. They have to satisfy the needs of their banker for the next 12 months, as well as their personal needs, the needs of their family and their social needs in the next 12 months. They may very well be forced into looking at what is sustainable economically, and economically only, for them in the short term and therefore have to neglect what would be best not only for their own individual operation in business, but collectively for the over-all good of the farmers and producers in the long run in order to get through until next year. We will worry about next year when next year comes.

I have some grave concerns that in the short term these programs may and I know are influencing cropping practices for this year and the direction of the crops.

In the same light, it is definitely going to encourage thoughts and actions toward cropping practices that are not the best for agriculture and for the good of all of us as Canadians as far as environmental sustainability is concerned.

There is encouragement with this and I know there are some safeguards that are being put in place. I advise the minister and hope it will take it under advisement that safeguards must be watched with this to prohibit what will likely occur in many cases. That is what we refer to in the primary producer sector as planting fence row to fence row.

One of the problems we have in Canadian agriculture at the present time is that we are planting crops on marginal land. Because they do not yield and because of the many attempts to get a decent yield, input costs are high. The yields are just not available from that type of property or land resource, therefore when the yields are obtained they have a high cost of production.

As far as adding something constructive, I wish there were something we could do. I hope that we are looking at it. I know that many of us are looking at a certain type of program.

• (1020)

I think we should consider—and it will have a short-term cost but I think it will have a long-term benefit—taking some of the marginal land in this country, which programs like this encourage farming, out of production and using it for something else. This means that the land that is being farmed can be used at a more profitable and realistic level, and we will all be better off environmentally.

The other concern I have is whether this program is going to be accepted as it should be in international trading circles. The question that many of us ask is, is it "GATTable"? In other words, is it acceptable at GATT? I have to have confidence that this is being looked at.

But when I look at some programs that we have had in the past in Canada, programs we thought were safe, we thought were untouchable as far as other countries were concerned, were not. Some of those which we have been able to protect effectively, and I refer to the on-going saga of countervail duties on live pork and fresh chilled and frozen pork, we have had those to GATT panels, we have had them to free trade panels, and we win one day and lose a few days later.

Our trading partner to the south is very effective because, as they have a different way of funding these disputes than we have here in Canada, as soon as the producers convince the government, it funds all of the court cases. The United States is successful in keeping the cases in the courts, in the dispute panels or the GATT panels, until a lot of damage is done.

I have a lot of concerns. And I only hope that because this program is theoretically offered right across the country, to all producers, that this will be acceptable to them.

The other concern I have is about what will happen to the GRIP program, in particular, as far as the premiums are concerned. As I said from the outset, this is an enabling legislation and producers are out there now buying the sizzle to this legislation and I do not blame them. In the short-term, quite frankly, they cannot afford not to. The banking industry is saying, yes, we want you to join. It is giving the producer something that is bankable, no question of that, in the short term. But I am also hearing many, many producers asking, where is this going to leave us in the long term? What is going to happen to our premiums in the long term?

The base prices that are being used are at a percentage of a 15-year average. And we all know what can happen to 15-year averages, especially in the case of some crops and some products when the peaks in those prices drop off. Every year we have to remember that one year drops off at the beginning of that period and another one adds on at the end. If those peaks drop off, and especially with what has been happening in many crops in the last few years where prices have been low and there is nothing in the foreseeable future to make us think that we are going to have any major increases in prices—especially in the grain situation—and we know that just is not going to happen. Probably the prices we have now are far closer to normal than they have been for some time, and they will likely stay around that range.

So, what is going to happen to those average prices? I will tell you what is going to happen to those average prices, they will go down. Unfortunately, reality enters the picture and the cost of production goes up.

The minister said yesterday, and it is understandable, that in the short term the GRIP program will go into deficit. Once any program is in deficit when the premiums are examined in the future they will be examined with the hope that the deficit can be recovered by the premiums.

The concern I have and the concern of many producers is that as the long-term benefits of this type of program are looked at in the future, the guaranteed gross revenue per acre is going to come down. The cost of production is going to go up and probably the premiums are going to go up as well. Because of the type of program that it is, the bill cannot allow—and I agree—individuals to get in and out whenever they want, but when a producer signs up he is in for four years. If it just does not pencil out into black ink down the road in three, four or five years, the producer is caught and has to stay in the program. There is a lot of concern about that. I suggest that must be examined.

Another concern I have is there is nothing in the legislation, that I can see, that says there will be a national supervisory committee. The legislation says that the results of this legislation will have to be reviewed, I believe by April 1, 1996, which is basically five years, and every five years after that. But there is nothing in the legislation that says there must be and there is an ongoing committee to review this legislation all through next year and each year as we go on. I think it is important that that be done.

I see my time is running out. The other program basically, and there are others, is NISA, the Net Income Stabilization Account. Not a lot of provinces have agreed to take that on. I agree, it is an excellent program as far as individual farmers are concerned. It is costly as far as governments are concerned.

I have some long-term concerns on that program as well. Can we, in the agricultural industry—and I hope we can—justify those types of expenditures to the rest of Canadians? It is a registered retirement type of fund. Unfortunately, it is not going to help those who are struggling in agriculture because they will not be able to put money in it. They simply will not have the dollars to deposit.

The bill is an honest and good attempt and a bill that I can support. It is going to create a situation that I know is going to require a lot of monitoring. It will require some discussion at the committee level. It disappoints me that again we have an agricultural bill brought into the House on a Monday and the government says we have to get it through in a hurry. We have done this with several other bills. I wish there was not always the urgency. This concern and this requirement has been there for some time. I wish there was not always the urgency when this comes forward.

I am hearing more and more, in the last couple of days, of individuals and groups that want to discuss this bill with the committee and I hope the government will allow the time. I know it will be encouraged to allow the time to listen to them. There is more to discuss. It is better than what we have at the present time, but it needs monitoring. It can be improved and I look forward to all of us doing that for the agrifood industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, before I direct my comments and questions to the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings, I would like to say that on occasion, and probably unintentionally, the hon. member has referred to a member's being absent from the House. However, to be fair, this morning I would nevertheless like to take this opportunity to refer to the presence of the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister responsible for Agriculture. His presence is to be commended. It shows he is interested in agriculture and also has great respect for the House and its members.

[English]

Now, to my colleague from Prince Edward—Hastings, I share his support, in principle, for the bill. I think he raised some very real concerns and we do hope that they will be addressed in committee.

• (1030)

Members in the House familiar with the member from Prince Edward—Hastings are only too familiar with his knowledge and particularly his commitment to agriculture.

I would like to ask my colleague how this legislation is being perceived and received by agriculture industry groups across Canada.

Mr. Vanclief: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question. I think in all honesty that in general it is being received quite well. However, what concerns me is that as time goes on nervousness is increasing.

I echo the sentiments of my colleague that the minister has been here for this debate and I appreciate that. But there are concerns. Probably the province that is promoting this legislation and has been for three or four months, more quickly and with more energy and enthusiasm than anyone else, is Saskatchewan and its premier. Those that follow politics know the reason for that. Mr. Devine has some problems and concerns, not only financially but otherwise. In a lighter vein, in the last 24 hours I see he does not even know what a riding is. There is some question on who represents where in the province.

I noted that one of the premier's ministers, the Minister for Rural Development in Saskatchewan, said, "farmers are not getting enough time to make an informed decision on this. The cattlemen have some concerns."

When the minister made his statement yesterday and he read that "cattlemen say that they choke on GRIP," I wondered to myself, why? Their concern points out the concern I raised a few minutes ago that this program is probably going to redistribute the cropping acreage throughout Canada. Looking at the figures, it is evident that it encourages production of some crops more than others. The beef industry is a major user, especially in the west, of barley. The beef industry is concerned that the program may redistribute the acreage, for example, to crops other than barley, therefore creating a shortage in barley, increasing the price of barley on the open market, and thereby increasing the cost of their production.

Forage seed growers have concerns as well. There is no question, as I said before, that the banking industry is happy, and rightfully so. I can tell you from experience that this program serves a very worth-while purpose because an individual can go to a bank manager and say, "Madam, or sir, I can guarantee you that this is what my returns will be per acre." That has not been possible for farm producers, for agriculture producers in the past. That part of it is good.

My real concern, and I am sincere on this, is about what we are going to do with this type of program in the long run. We are all sincere, we are all trying to do our best. I am not sure that enough study has been given and time has been taken to look at the long term. It is going to do the job this year and next year. The government has said it will put money into the program. I hate to say this, but the government will put money into the program, especially in the next couple of years before there is another federal election, but that is not what is going to dictate the action. The markets are going to dictate it; the uncertainty about what is happening in GATT; the impossibility at the present time of settling things at GATT.

The discussions for a GATT settlement that we hoped would happen by December 1, 1990 may go on for another couple of years. If it does go on for another couple of years, we know the trade games and the subsidy games that are going to be played between those two big treasuries that we cannot compete with, the European Community and the United States. As a country, we just cannot play in that game. If we cannot play in that game, it will depress prices and on and on, which means these types of programs are going to have higher than ever pay-outs. We are going to have to make those. They are going to be needed. It is going to keep us going in the short term, there is no question about that.

Unfortunately, what has always been and may always be throughout the world is that the primary producers are kind of "next-year" people. Hopefully, this can be the beginning of a type of program or a combination of programs that can be worked on, monitored, pushed and poked over the next number of years so that producers can get more out of their products, so that they are not just living hand to mouth for 12 months, hoping to get through until the next year.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I would just like to have the hon. member make a comment or two.

He spoke briefly about the moral hazard of the program. Farmers will be making decisions as a result of the program, switching acreage, and probably bringing marginal land into production. Is that not a self-defeating purpose? I do not believe that farmers look at the program that way. They are looking for a bankable program, with long-term objectives in mind. Any program has the risk of moral hazard. Is the hon. member saying that the programs are being funded with too much money and that the programs are too rich, allowing this to happen?

Mr. Vanclief: Madam Speaker, I want to remind my colleague that I said I did not like to see that type of thing happen, but in reality that is what, according to what I am being told on the concessions, is happening. Because of the financial situations that individual farmers may very well be in and their sector of the industry may very well be in, they have to look, as any business person has to, at what is the best and easiest way to come up with the biggest figure in the bottom right hand corner of the balance sheet for this year. In reality, that is what is happening. Even though, as I said, and I hope I made it very clear, that is not what they should be doing. They know they should not be looking at it that way, but they are forced into doing that.

As far as investment in the program, I am not saying and I did not say, that there are too many dollars going into the program. What I am saying and what I did say, is that the dollars that will go in there have to be monitored. We have to be able to explain to all Canadians why they are needed and we have to justify—as anyone does, as any government does, as any parliamentarian does—the actions. I think we have to do a better job, as a department, as a government, as opposition members, as players in the industry, of explaining to Canadians why it is there.

I was very upset, and I have been upset more than once, when a certain kind of question went to a member of the cabinet and the cabinet member stood up and said: "This is another example of x millions of dollars this government has given to farmers". I get very annoyed at that. That is an excellent opportunity for the minister to explain to Canadians why that is a good investment.

As I said, as goes agriculture, so goes the industry, so goes the economy of any country. It is money well spent, as long as it is well monitored.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate regarding Bill C-98. This piece of legislation has been promised to the Canadian public and to the Canadian producers for some time. In fact, it was back in 1985 that the former Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Wise, promised a long-term, permanent program for agriculture. I am glad, and I am sure most people are glad to see that it is finally arriving.

There are some good aspects to this bill. The fact that there has been more consultation than usual is of value. The fact that there is a mechanism for a review every five years is a plus and that there will be an annual report on the programs to the House is also important. Those are important factors.

• (1040)

The one thing I think we must keep in mind, especially for those who are watching this debate or happen to read it in Hansard is that this bill does not outline the details of the particular agricultural programs. What it is instead is enabling legislation. It is legislation that is going to provide a framework which will allow the government to enter into programs. That is all that does. We have no details on exactly what form GRIP or NISA will take, the full details of premiums and so on. They do not exist in this legislation. It is simply a framework.

I think in looking at that framework perhaps the key clause section in the whole bill is the clause which sets out the statement of principles, clause 4(2). This clause outlines four basic principles which the government shall follow in establishing any programs. I would like to go through them, if I could, because I think they are important.

The first one states that the program should not unduly influence the decisions of producers of agricultural products with respect to production or marketing and should encourage adjustments with respect to production or marketing so as to improve the effectiveness of the responses of producers to market opportunities. In other words, the program will not unduly influence the market. That is fine. That is a good principle. It is important for farmers to be able to react to the market and not be forced through government programs or government regulations to skew either way. That is a good principle and it will be a good test for the program.

The second principle talks about the fact that the money shall be fairly distributed through the program; that the level of protection to be provided by and relative share of government contributions to be provided to the program in relation to particular agricultural products or classes should be reasonably consistent with all other agreements. In other words, the money should be evenly distributed. That is an important principle because what we need and what this government and past governments have failed to do time and again is to develop national programs that respect and represent this country as a whole. We often have piecemeal legislation. That also is an important principle.

The other two principles—that it shall meet international obligations and that the program shall be environmentally sound—are also very important principles.

The fact that the principles are in the legislation is important. The next question is: will they be followed? That is a question that cannot be answered today and will only be answered in time as the programs are introduced, developed, followed and reviewed.

I think another question that we would ask as social democrats is: Could we fit a strong social democratic program into this framework? The answer is, yes we could. We could follow these principles and put in a very sound social democratic program that is market responsive; that does allow producers to follow their inclinations and act with the market; that is environmentally sound; and is meeting Canada's international obligations. We could put in there a very good social democratic program.

The question is whether this government will. I guess the issue is: exactly what type of stability is being sought under this bill and for whom? One thing that concerns me, and I know it concerns a lot of my colleagues and other people across the country, is that under these principles there are some missing; primarily one that sets out and commits the government to maintain viable farm families. If we are going to maintain a viable world community in this country in areas where agriculture is the economic base, we have to maintain farm families.

This bill says nothing about that. To me, that is a major omission and a major problem. Although you could fit in a good social democratic program, as New Democrats we are very concerned with the future of farm families, we are very concerned with the future of rural communities, in putting in a program. You can also put in a program which that does not recognize or deal with the future of farm families. I say that because the record of this government has been the dismantling of farming families and in fact the dismantling of rural Canada. We have had a number of examples over the last few years. To outline some of them, we have certainly had changes in advance payments which have not kept in mind farming families and average size farms. That is not the principle behind the change to advance payments. The Canadian Wheat Board is being dismantled and certainly in the removal of oats there was absolutely no meaningful consultation in that change. Many producers want canola but the government has and continues to refuse to allow farmers and wheat board permit book holders to make a decision on their own wheat board.

I see red flags when we have a bill that on the one hand sets out some nice principles but on the other hand, when you compare it to the actions of this government, makes you wonder if in fact this government is really committed to the principle. Why does it not act with respect to the Canadian Wheat Board and allow producers to make their own decisions on the future of the Canadian Wheat Board?

The free trade act has also wreaked havoc with the Canadian Wheat Board and with the grain trade in this country. This spring it is expected that American grain will be allowed to come freely across the border. That is going to cause further problems and will drive down the price. The Canadian Wheat Board has already said it is going to make sure it is very competitive with American grain which simply means the Canadian farmer is going to be receiving less for his or her grain.

Two-price wheat is gone. The whole future rationalization of the transportation system in this country has not been proceeded with keeping rural families in mind. When those types of actions are taken without keeping in mind these fundamental principles, who is to say what sort of program we are going to have under this particular bill?

In my opinion, it would much improve this legislation and much improve the confidence of Canadians in this government if there were some commitment to developing a program or programs that in fact have the objective of maintaining viable rural communities. That applies not only to this legislation but certainly to the rural Canada that depends on forestry, on fisheries, et cetera.

There are no details with respect to the actual programs but there are some concerns. We are hearing all kinds of rumours on GRIP and NISA and certainly the Saskatchewan government has been going all over the province, in fact claiming that it is its own program basically. There are some concerns about the GRIP; that it is not based on the cost of production, that there is no cap in the actual legislation. There is on the program. We have not seen those details. We do not know exactly what is going to be coming out when the program is announced. Certainly the words and comments we are hearing do not bode well for viable rural communities in the future.

The bill needs some fundamental change with respect to the principles that it sets out.

I think it is also important to state that while this bill deals with incomes, there is another aspect that goes hand in hand with incomes that this government has yet to talk about and that is farm financing. The rural communities and farmers in those areas have been trying to survive but they have been suffering because they have not got a steady, reliable income, and the financing aspect has really hurt them, along with input costs going up.

While it is very important to have a stable income program, and it is yet to be seen in fact if we will have one, it is just as important to have a strong finance program as well. We have seen time and time again, in Saskatchewan and right across the country, foreclosures are up, quit claims are up, people are having a very difficult time. It is very disappointing, I have found that the minister introduced this bill knowing full well that they were coming for some time and has not put a moratorium on foreclosures, at least until this bill takes effect. In fact, this government would do a great service to rural Canada if it would stand up today and announce that all farm foreclosures will not be proceeded with until such time as this program had a chance to take effect, to allow farmers to keep their land.

There are many farmers who are simply hanging on, literally by their fingernails. It is important that they have a stable income.

Another aspect with farm financing is, of course, interest rates: We in the farming communities need stable interest rates. It is very difficult for many farmers. There are many senior farmers and there are numerous farmers who would like to retire from the land, who would like to leave the land, those who are getting close to retirement age, and many who are past retirement age. I run into farmers all the time who are well into their seventies who say they would like to get off the land but who really have no mechanism, no way of getting off the land. They cannot get rid of their land. Nobody can afford to buy it; the interest rates are too high.

We need a mechanism to set in a whole new generation of farmers so that in 20 years we are going to have a viable farming community. Therefore, we need a mechanism that is going to allow senior farmers to get off the land and allow younger farmers to get on the land.

That has not been addressed. There has been no indication of changes by this government with respect to that objective. It is not that we are short of alternatives; in fact even Jim Hewitt, the chairman of FCC, has made some very valuable contributions with respect to that matter.

Along with a strong incomes program, which I hope this bill will allow, we also need a strong national finance policy. it has to be a program that takes into account rural Canada—that is the key factor, that is the important factor that we have to take into account.

I would say this in concluding; we need a national policy, both with respect to income and farm finance, that recognizes the ultimate importance of a healthy industry to rural communities right across this country. Policies and programs must be available to assist farmers in realizing a return on their investment and labour comparable to that of other industries, so that an industry based on family control and family-operated farms can be maintained. That is the key element, that is the underlying issue. Certainly on this side of the House we will be calling for some changes to this legislation that are going to set out those principles and commit the government to moving toward developing programs that have that as a fundamental objective.

This bill allows for such an income program to be put in place. The question is, will the government achieve that desirable objective? That is the question that has to be dealt with and that is the question to which we await, with great anticipation, an answer.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I would like to say just a few words about this legislation presently before the Chamber.

Of course, we are debating the principle of the bill; in other words, the principle of income stabilization in the primary industry of agriculture.

The question has been put in many different ways concerning our primary producers because, of course, everybody realizes that they are perhaps the most important economic element in our society that keeps our balance of payments in the right order. They contribute more than other sectors of our economy because what they are producing is food, a most important commodity in today's world.

In thinking about the principle of this legislation, we have seen various attempts by governments over the years to stabilize incomes of farmers, fishermen and other primary producers. However, these attempts to stabilize incomes through measures such as crop insurance or, in the case of the fishing industry, the Fisheries Prices Support Board, all have one major drawback.

An assessment is made of the year and then the Government of Canada, through the mechanism of legislation, enables those primary producers to receive some compensation. The compensation is given after the fact. It does not profit somebody very much, for example, if they are about to lose their home and their property, and they are told by the legislators that what they passed was something that says: "We are going to assess the damage at the end of the year and then we are going to discuss it between the governments. Perhaps sometime next year, you will get some money. You will get some money but we cannot tell you exactly how much money you are going to get."

I suppose that is better than nothing, but it does not do anything for the man or woman who is facing the seizure of property by our financial institutions. It appears to be the thing these days for financial institutions in this country to analyse the economy and to say all of a sudden: "Perhaps those primary producers are not really a good investment because either the industry is down generally or because of some external factors, external even to this country of Canada."

What happens is that our chartered banks deal with producers who need a line of credit almost on a daily basis. Because you are in a business like that where you are selling a commodity, you first of all have to produce the commodity and even after you have sold it, you sometimes have to wait for your money. It always was the tradition of our banking system to say: "We will allow you a certain overdraft at the bank because of your particular circumstance". You could go in and say: "I have definitely sold this amount of farm produce," or, "I have sold this amount of fish. Definitely, I have the contract. It is here."

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize, but I have to interrupt the hon. member at this time.

It being 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 35, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Madam Speaker, my constituents are saying, loud and clear: enough is enough! After seeing their parishes and CBC station shut down, and after the cuts in VIA Rail services, now they are going to lose their traditional post offices, which will also mean more unemployment.

Madam Speaker, my constituents Petite-Matane and Rédemption are very upset about the fact that their post office will be closed, and they are asking the government's help in obliging Canada Post to rethink its policy, in communities where the post office is the only symbol of their ties to the rest of Canada.

Madam Speaker, the people in these small villages are not asking for the improved services they were promised. They just want to keep the services they have.

Why, in a region where the poverty rate is the highest in the country, this attempt makes matters even worse? Do they want to close down the Gaspé?

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, today, International Women's Day, is set aside as a time to celebrate women and our achievements as we work to take our rightful place as equal partners in society.

Violence against women is perhaps the most persistent yet intolerable situation in the struggle. Documented evidence shows that violence against women has not abated.

Amnesty International reports indicate that, and I quote: "the list of gross violations around the world against women is endless—Many are targeted because they are strong, because they are political activists, community organizers, or persist in demanding that their rights or those of their relatives are respected. Others are targeted because they are seen as vulnerable young women who can easily be sexually abused or humiliated, pregnant women fearful for their unborn babies, or refugee women who are isolated and vulnerable in unfamiliar surroundings."

I implore all members of this House to take a moment and think about what this means and how it feels.

The Liberal Party is strongly committed to moving quickly to make women true equals. This government, on the other hand, is longer on rhetoric than it is on its record.

S. O. 31

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S WEEK

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Madam Speaker, Monday brought the beginning of a special week of celebration throughout the world, International Women's Week. All across the country this week has been marked by numerous activities involving both women and men, including panel discussions, receptions, films, and rallies.

I invite hon. members to join me in congratulating the women of Canada for their significant contribution to Canadian society. No area of Canadian life, be it economic, social, cultural or political, has been left untouched by the talent and achievement of Canadian women.

In both the traditional and non-traditional sectors, women of every background are making their impact felt and bringing the sometimes elusive dream of true equality that much closer to reality.

SEED POTATO INDUSTRY

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, the Prince Edward Island seed potato industry has been dealt a devastating blow. Potatoes are to P.E.I. what grain is to Saskatchewan, the engine of the provincial economy.

Potatoes have been responsible for 50 per cent of total farm gate receipts the last two years, $125 million per year.

The entrepreneurial spirit of our producers, dealers and exporters has put P.E.I. in the forefront of world potato production. P.E.I. is responsible for making Canada second only to Holland in seed potato exports.

The industry has reached this position because of 75 years of effort by both producers and government which has resulted in the establishment of a world-wide reputation for quality in seed, table and processing potatoes.

That reputation is now in jeopardy because of the PVY-N virus in our seed stock and an embargo by the United States, Canada and Mexico. This is the first time an entire province has been quarantined.

What P.E.I. needs today is a strict eradication plan in order to restore quickly our reputation in the marketplace and generous compensation to prevent wholesale bankruptcies.

P.E.I. potato farmers appreciate the attention—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member's time is expired.

CANADA COUNCIL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, today we celebrate International Women's Day and, with this in mind, I would like to remind this House that the Canada Council is the chief means for the federal government to impact and support arts in Canada. Yet the board of the Canada Council has never been graced with a member of a visible minority.

At this time, when the need for a visible minority representative is greatest, a woman with talent and dedication has stepped forward.

Carol Geddes, who currently is a member on the Native Committee of Canada Council and was a member of the Northern Jury of the Council is a candidate for the board.

With the growing racial tensions in this land, it would seem that the time is at hand for such a woman who represents native peoples to participate in the important decisions that the Canada Council makes.

I would like to take this opportunity to support Ms. Geddes' bid fully, in light of her substantial achievements, and I would like to urge that this House do the same.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Barry Moore (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, recently, the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec announced that under the Canada-Quebec subsidiary agreement on the regional economic development of Quebec, three new programs will be implemented to help reinforce the economic infrastructure in Quebec's resource regions, including the ridings of Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle and Abitibi—Témiscamingue.

Both levels of government have agreed to budget $80 million, to be allocated over three different programs.

Madam Speaker, both governments realize that unfortunately, some regions in Quebec, including my own riding, have a very high unemployment rate and are experiencing serious economic problems. These initiatives will stimulate the economy in these regions by helping them carry out major projects, which will give these communities renewed economic vigour.

CROP ASSISTANCE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, farmers from all parts of Canada are in desperate need of assistance this spring in order to get their crops in the ground.

Total net farm income has dropped by over 50 per cent. The federal government has promised a so-called third line defence payment but yet, to this day, it has not said when the payment will be made, how much it will be worth, or even who is eligible.

I wish to stress to the government that western grain producers are in desperate need of this cash, but so are producers in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes; not only grain and oilseeds producers but horticultural producers as well.

The current income crisis is shared by all farmers, and I ask the government to take this into account when the payment is made.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Madam Speaker, today I think it would be very appropriate to read a poem by Janet Foster called "A day of rest".

> Some women say God is a woman—
>
> Everybody knows that's not true—
>
> He worked six days and rested on the seventh;
>
> If God had been a woman, he wouldn't have stopped;
>
> After 85 hours of board meetings, working outside the home, making beds, doing the laundry, shopping, taking the kids to the doctor and the dentist, ordering groceries, nursing sick kids, spending Saturdays ironing and dusting and Sundays preparing meals, women don't know what the word weekend means.
>
> If God had been a woman, as so many people seem to think, he wouldn't have needed Sunday to rest.
>
> Since the beginning of time, women have known that only children, men and God need a rest.

Madam Speaker, I have this to say: Men, stop being selfish and help women achieved equality!

ATHLETES ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, the denial of full funding under the Athletes Assistance Program to Canada's female athletes because they become pregnant is a violation of their human rights. It is gender discrimination. The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport promised to remove this barrier to equality last October. He has repeatedly stated in the media that this policy will be changed.

On the occasion of International Women's Day, I ask the minister to take this opportunity to announce today that the Athletes Assistance Program will be immediately amended so that female carded athletes who become pregnant will be eligible to obtain full funding.

I ask the minister to correct this injustice to Canada's female athletes.

RURAL WOMEN

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, today, on International Women's Day, I rise to recognize the contribution of rural women across Canada.

Rural women and their families are under a tremendous amount of stress. They are overworked, underpaid, and their contribution often goes unrecognized.

The lack of support services and programs in rural areas is a major problem for rural women.

S. O. 31

Rural families lack accessible, affordable and flexible child care and stress counselling services. Battered women have no where to turn for help.

The farm financial situation has created a greater need for social support services. This has placed an even greater stress on the inadequate level of services currently provided. Yet the Conservative government and the Liberals before them have ignored the urgent needs of rural women.

In fact the recent federal budget cut financial support for transition houses, abuse counselling, child care, education and medicare. These cuts come at a time when rural women need these services the most.

• (1110)

I call on this government to provide adequate and stable funding to ensure rural women and their families have the support they need. I call on this government to treat rural women with the respect they deserve.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Madam Speaker, today thousands of women the world over are celebrating International Women's Day.

I wish to emphasize the commitment of our government to promoting women's equality in our society. The Department of the Secretary of State, which is responsible for women's issues, provides annual funding for more than 800 volunteer organizations whose activities are aimed at improving living conditions for women. A host of projects to counter family violence have been initiated. Each project helps bring women another step closer to economic, social and legal equality.

To ensure that Canadian women have the full equal status to which they are entitled, we must continue to work in partnership with provincial, territorial and municipal governments, women's groups, community organizations, the private sector and the labour unions.

I would like to stress the exceptional work done by Canadian women who, by their efforts, are helping to promote the status of women.

Today, March 8, I would ask you all to join me in congratulating the women of Canada and their sisters throughout the world.

CSIS

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I was disappointed to see the government cave in to CSIS by not adopting any of the parliamentary review committee's major recommendations.

All Canadians know is that CSIS will spend $213 million. They do not know if it is on people, cars, airplanes or tape recorders. Parliamentary oversight would have provided the necessary controls over expenditures, as well as the secret operations of CSIS.

Ron Atkey, a Conservative and former chairman of the Security Intelligence Review Committee said:

> It also seems clear that the government wanted to avoid at any cost a commitment to introduce legislative changes.
> How convenient for CSIS which never really wanted to limit itself to investigating terrorism and espionage. And wasn't this just super for the communications security establishment, that huge vacuum cleaner in the sky which has the frightening capacity to invade the privacy of Canadians in a variety of ways, but which has no legal mandate and which is not accountable to anyone—

This government must explain to Canadians "why".

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Does International Women's Day mean anything more this year than it did 12 months ago, Madam Speaker? Absolutely.

Over those 12 months vocal protest halted this government's attempt to recriminalize abortion services and to sap the support of women's centres across Canada. Women celebrate those victories today.

Over the same 12 months, however, our Prime Minister refused to remember the Montreal massacre officially or to answer calls for a royal commission on violence against women.

The justice minister sidelined her own gun control bill. The status of women minister said that her government will not strengthen the toothless Employment Equity Act. The health minister, with his superficial family violence initiative, returned a mere drop to the bucket of social programs that his government has emptied.

Over the same 12 months some Liberals felt no shame about—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

BILL C–85

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, the government's bill to privatize airports weakens the government's committed policy on bilingualism.

In 1988, Parliament passed a new Official Languages Act which applied bilingualism to airports. Bill C–85 to privatize airports restricts the application of the 1988 Official Languages Act. It does not deal with concessionaires, equitable participation and the language of work.

When Air Canada was privatized, all the obligations of the Official Languages Act were applied to the privatized airline.

Why is it different for airports? Yesterday, the Commissioner of Official Languages recommended amendments to Bill C–85 to make it consistent with the Official Languages Act.

I urge the government to listen to the commissioner and support full bilingualism at our airports.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, the theme for International Women's Day is "Together towards Equality". This theme stresses partnerships between all levels of government, non–government organizations, women's groups, the business world, schools and universities, unions and concerned individuals.

We agree that many problems remain to be overcome if women are to achieve true equality in all spheres of society.

Congratulations, Madam Speaker!

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Just one week after the so–called recovery budget the job verdict is in, and it is a disaster. There are 222,000 people in the city of Montreal looking for work, 194,000 people in the city of Toronto looking for work, and 84,000 people in the city of Vancouver looking for work.

Isn't this human job loss an example of how this government's economic policies are a disaster?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I do not think anyone in this House enjoyed reading the statistics that came out this morning on unemployment. We more than anyone else want to see people back to work.

That is exactly why the Minister of Finance brought in a recovery budget. The recovery budget will lead us out of the economic problems we are experiencing today and lead us back to economic growth in the middle of this year.

There are some signs already that the economy is starting to turn around. The markets are extremely active, and they traditionally lead us out of a recessionary period by four or five months. Interest rates are down by some 4 per cent. In the hon. member's city, the city that she lives in, if she were reading her local paper lately, it is shown that the real estate activity has increased there, as in other areas of the country.

There are signs that we are seeing things turn around, and we will in fact later this year see a recovery.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, if the member wants to talk about the city I live in, I would like to have him speak to those 30,000 people this month who are looking for work on the streets of Hamilton. I would like to see him pick up this morning's paper and read that the steel industry's predictions for 1991 are worse than they were for 1990. We are witnessing the deindustrialization of Canada.

I want to ask this minister and this Acting Prime Minister: What specific policies do they intend to introduce to reverse their disastrous economic policies and start putting Canadians back to work?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, it is very obvious that the solution that the Liberals tried of throwing money at the problems did not work. The secret is to get interest rates down, to get inflation down, and to keep them down so that we can have permanent jobs. That is what the budget is designed to do.

I find it rather surprising that the acting Leader of the Opposition would in fact blame a budget of one week ago for the employment statistics that came out today for last month. That is Liberal figuring.

The hon. member also made mention that manufacturing is disappearing. I might point out to her a report from the Royal Bank which said that at the end of 1990 our manufacturing base in the Canadian economy was 9.5 per cent above where it was at the end of 1982. She should get her facts right.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I am referring to this government's poor economic management which started six budgets ago. In Montreal alone, 222,000 Canadians are living proof that your economic policies have failed. That is more than in any city in Canada, including Newfoundland.

I would therefore like to put the following question to the Acting Prime Minister: What specific policies will he introduce, starting today, to reverse the bankrupt policies of this government?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I can inform the Acting Leader of the Opposition that the government has, in recent years, introduced several policies to stimulate the economy in Montreal.

Mr. Gagliano: What policies?

Mr. Danis: I will tell you what policies. For instance, we had the policy initiated by the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, who invested $112 million in southwest Montreal to stimulate the economy. And there are others. For instance, we have the Space Agency on Montreal's south shore, where a total of $300 million will be invested. And if you want another example, we have the petrochemical industry. Where, following the Prime Minister's personal intervention, the federal government invested $55 million. We also have the Minister of Employment who created a training centre for workers in the petrochemical industry.

And now for another example: Since we came to power in 1984, we created 83,000 new jobs while between 1980–1984, your government registered a net loss of 5,000 jobs.

• (1120)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the answer of the Minister of State should be displayed in the "museum of jokes" the government is setting up in Montreal.

[English]

Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The brutality, the cruelty of this government's economic policies have been demonstrated once again by today's unemployment numbers. In Ontario alone, the unemployment rate has gone up some 79 per cent over the past year. These are not just numbers on a page, they represent the lives of tens of thousands of Canadians this government is throwing on the economic scrap heap.

Why will the Deputy Prime Minister not admit that the unemployment numbers that came out today show that last week's budget is the wrong budget, at the wrong time, and is making things worse, not better, for hundreds of thousands of Canadians.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, just the opposite. It was the right budget for this time. There is no question about that.

Those who looked critically at the budget in a very fair and honest way support the Minister of Finance in his attempt to lead us back to recovery of the economy.

I might remind the hon. member, who rants and raves in the House all the time about figures, that today there are 1,283,000 more people working in Canada than there were when we took power in 1984. That is the number one figure. The number two figure is that unemployment is about 1.5 points less than it was when we took power in 1984. That was after the recession. This is in the middle of a recession. We are starting to come out of it. We are on the road to recovery and we are going to make it by the middle of the year. We will not make it with negative comments from the hon. member, but by positive hard work by Canadians.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the unemployment rate announced today is already higher than the unemployment rate forecast in the budget. The decline in interest rates the government has been talking about has stalled. Interest rates went up yesterday. The minister's answer is a slap in the face of the tens of thousands of Canadians looking for work in the towns and cities of this country; a slap in the face. In my own city of Windsor, there are now 17,000 people out of work, an unemployment rate of 13.6 per cent, an increase of close to 25 per cent over the past year.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this question. Why has this government no plans in the budget to create jobs except to cut $100 million from job creation funds? Is this the way the government intends to help Canadian workers? No wonder their plans are nothing more than a cruel slap in the face for Canadians and their communities.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member stands up here and talks about interest rates. They have dropped over 4 percentage points, over 400 basis points. Yesterday they went up one one-hundredth of a point. Interest rates did not move at all on mortgages, on consumer loans or anything else. So the hon. member is really a little misleading when he is giving that kind of figure in this House of Commons.

I might also point out that he is talking about Ontario. Ontario today has 485,000 more people working today than it did in 1984 when we took power from the Liberals, and more people are working in Ontario in more meaningful and full-time jobs. There are announcements in the papers every day of plant expansions, of growth in the economy—

An hon. member: Where, where?

Mr. McDermid: Where? I am glad the hon. member asked where; in Winnipeg, I.E. Aerospace Canada; in Mississauga, General Electric; in Thunder Bay, Earnway Industries, Trans-Alta Resources Corporation in Malton; Abitibi-Price in Manitoba; Journal Printing of Sudbury. I could go on and on. Thanks for asking.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, on this International Women's Day the Prime Minister has a responsibility to provide Canadian women with some answers, and some jobs. Figures released this morning show that the unemployment rate has jumped dramatically. It is an absolute disgrace.

Even more disgraceful is that we have seen the finance minister gloating with the big business community about his budget, the same budget that is forcing ever more women into part-time work or right out of the labour force altogether. This is happening because women have no choices.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister give Canadian women an economic break today? Will he enact the necessary training programs which he promised when his unemployment insurance cuts ensured the unemployment of Canadians?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I find it astonishing how the member can misrepresent the reality of the situation for women in this country today. The reality is that unemployment rates for women are significantly less than for men. Not that one is that happy about it, but unemployment rates for women over-all are about 9.5 per cent. In fact, the rates for adult women are only about 8.8 per cent.

There are, in fact, 900,000 more women working in this country since this government took office. Sixty per cent of those jobs are in administration, professional and managerial areas. It is the financial policies of this government and the budget which will put us on the path to economic recovery. More and more women will be going into these increasingly important jobs and achieving economic equality for women in this country.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The fact of the matter is that this government has forced more and more women into part-time work and forced more and more women right out of the labour force altogether. That is the reality.

Madam Speaker, this government also cut $1.1 billion from medicare. These cuts will leave many Canadian women without choices for their own health care. This government did have a choice; it chose to retain tax loopholes that allow the business community to entertain their friends to the tune of the same $1.1 billion a year.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member has a question.

Ms. Black: I ask the Deputy Prime Minister to rise from his seat, look me in the eye, and explain why happy hour for the corporate elite means more to this government than the health of Canadian women and their children.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I will look the hon. member in the eye and I will tell her that that is not a tax loophole at all. As a matter of fact, if she had joined with some of her colleagues the other night to visit the Canadian Hotel Association and the Canadian Restaurant Association meetings, they would have told her that this is a very important part of our tourism industry, attracting tourists to this country, and which employs, I might say, hundreds and thousands of people in this country.

Ms. Black: Women?

Mr. McDermid: And women. Exactly, women in the tourist industry.

If she is advocating that we wipe out all those things that help employment in this country, so be it; have her stand up and say that. But at the same time also suffer the consequences, if we do that, where we will have less employment in that particular sector.

If you check with the tourism industry, which the NDP says they support, then you would not be advocating such a foolish move.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, it appears that the hypocrisy of this government knows no bounds.

• (1130)

Two weeks ago, this government announced a family violence initiative that would put a meagre $1.5 million towards stopping violence against women in our society and a week later slashed the Canada Assistance Plan which was the process for funding women's shelters, and for funding child care and services for children.

This government gave women a drop in the bucket on a Thursday and emptied the bucket on the following Tuesday. When will this government announce a royal commission on violence against women? This is something that women in Canada from coast to coast to coast are demanding from this government. We want a royal commission. Will it be announced on International Women's Day?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I listened with some disbelief to the hon. member suggesting that the government had announced $1.5 million for family violence in Canada, which is nonsense. We announced a $136 million family violence program. This represents a more than doubling of the commitments that have been made in the past of fighting family violence and child sexual abuse.

The hon. member says that we should be studying the issues related to family violence. I do not think we should be studying them. I think we should be acting on them.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

None of the government's words will disguise the fact that 185,000 unemployed men and women are now living on the prairies; 162,000 unemployed Canadians in British Columbia; 142,000 unemployed men and women in Atlantic Canada and over 900,000 in Quebec and Ontario.

Just 10 days ago, the government forecast an unemployment rate in the months ahead of 10 per cent. Within 10 days, that forecast has been shattered. It now stands at well over 10 per cent. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: What is the government's new unemployment forecast for Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, again Liberal logic is to take one month's unemployment as a year's average which goes to the spring, March 31, 1992.

I think that the hon. member is about a year ahead of himself, and one month before the budget takes effect on April 1. I find that rather amusing.

The hon. member would have a reason to attack the government by March 31, 1992 if, in fact, that goal had not been set, but let's wait for 12 months before he attacks that. That is silly.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, only a puffed up minister of this government would tell 1.4 million unemployed men and women in Canada to wait a year before we say we are going to act.

I ask this minister who is not cold-hearted but who is heartless whether the government, in the face of these new unemployment stats that shatter the projections of the minister only 10 days ago will restore the $100 million cut to the Canadian Job Strategy Program.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, when we talk about the Job Strategy Program, I think all the members of this House should remember that when this government brought in Bill C-21, which allowed the government to put a lot more money into job training which was one of the essential things that Canadians need, the opposition blocked it. The Liberal opposition blocked it. The Senate blocked it.

As a result of that, we did not have access to moneys for practically a full year. Now that the bill has been passed, the money spent on job training in Canada during the coming year will be over $3 billion. That is an increase of $500 million over last year, and an increase of $900 million over two years ago. I think the government is doing something about it.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Deputy Prime Minister.

In the province of Ontario, a traditional tower of economic strength for our country, 500,000 people are now out of work, 72,000 Ontarians having lost their jobs in February alone.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this question. Will his government now admit that its economic policies are wrong, or will he simply let the other minister do as he has done all the time this morning, evade the legitimate questions being asked on behalf of Canadians who are looking for work?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that there are 485,000 more people in Ontario working today than there were in 1984 when this government came to power. So there are a lot more people working in Ontario.

That does not minimize the situation of those who are out of work. We feel badly about that, but we also believe, and believe most sincerely, that we have produced a budget and are setting an example for industries and other governments. Last night Newfoundland accepted the challenge. With its budget it knows that it has to trim and keep wage increases down, and keep expenditures down. It is setting a good example and we hope the other provinces will as well.

We will be coming out of this period of economic difficulty by mid-year and we will start to grow, create more jobs, meaningful jobs, full-time jobs, on into the foreseeable future.

That is what this budget is all about. What this budget will do is lead us to recovery in this country.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, the Tory version of modern math will not find jobs for my constituents.

[Translation]

I should like to direct a supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister. Last year Ontario lost 153,000 manufacturing jobs as a result of high interest rates, the value of our dollar, and other mistaken policies of the Conservative government. When will the government launch an economic recovery program for Ontario regions in dire need of assistance, like the eastern Ontario riding I represent? The regions of Ontario need help. When will the government implement that kind of program?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has every reason to say that we have problems. This is why we must come up with the right solutions for the unemployed. Again the hon. member is suggesting the goverment should spend money that it does not have and that taxpayers are not prepared to contribute so as to create artificially a situation which in the end will be worse for everybody concerned. As he said, we know that interest rates must come down. This is precisely why we are taking measures to create the kind of conditions that will ease inflationary pressures and keep pushing interest rates down. The government is doing its best to achieve that and make sure the unemployment rate declines rapidly.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, rising unemployment shows that the recession is far from over. We lost 420,000 jobs last year. My question to the government is this: It often talks about national unity, so why does the budget fail to address directly the unemployment issue, particularly when we know that in Montreal, for example, another 60,000 men and women joined the ranks of the unemployed this month?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I can only repeat the remarks of my colleague the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization. We are concerned about the recession. Still I would remind hon. members that for a year and a half or two years now we have been saying that the Canadian economy is weak; that Canadians go on overspending despite the inflationary pressures on the economy; that they are jeopardizing their own jobs; and that interest rates are there to reduce that pressure. Yet opposition members said: No, no, artificially bring down the interest rates, increase the monetary mass, inflation and unemployment.

In an attempt to correct the situation we had to make decisions that should have been made in 1980–81. Interest rates have been going down over the past four months and the situation in Canada has been gradually improving so that industries—they, not the government, create jobs—will find that conditions are ripe for the recovery we are all waiting for.

• (1140)

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the minister talks about the problems this government has tried to deal with. It says that inflation was a problem. It is a problem which this government has made worse with the GST. That is what the last statistics on the cost of living show us.

They said interest rates were falling and that would get us out of this problem. Yesterday they rose. They said jobs would be helped. Today they have given us the biggest jump in unemployment since 1985.

Will this government admit that its budget last week was a mistake? Will it admit that it has failed people, that it has listened to big business instead of caring about the ordinary person. Will it turn direction and put this country back on—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member has put his question.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, that is the same member who stood up in this House just a few months ago and demanded that interest rates drop 2 per cent. That is exactly what they asked for. They have dropped 4 per cent. The gap in interest rates has narrowed between the United States and Canada, rather dramatically. He is wrong in his figures again.

If the hon. member wants to get his act together, why does he not stand up and thank the government for lowering interest rates 4 per cent? He asked for 2 per cent and we doubled it.

KUWAIT

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, on a daily basis we observe in the news media the destruction that has taken place in the Persian Gulf, particularly in the country of Kuwait because of the war. That presents a tremendous opportunity for Canadians, as it does for many people around the world, to create the jobs that are possible through economic activity.

Can the Minister for International Trade advise us what the Government of Canada is doing it assist Canadian business to make sure that Canada gets a portion of the work available in Kuwait.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, on July 16, the Minister of Finance of Kuwait visited Ottawa and met with me and with the Prime Minister. He assured us that we would have a prominent and valuable part in the reconstruction of Kuwait.

At the present time, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is visiting Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. He has with him a senior business delegation from Canada. We have a task force on Kuwait reconstruction established in our department to provide advice to exporters and to register the interest of companies.

The Canadian Commercial Corporation has established a Kuwait reconstruction desk. I am announcing today the creation of a private sector liaison group on Kuwait reconstruction. I have in my hands a message from Riyadh from Mr. Craig Dobbin, a prominent Canadian businessman, saying: "It is a real feather in our government's hat, in that our group, the Canadian Businessmen, will be the first commercial visitors to Kuwait City after the war". This is from Riyadh, Saudi Arabia.

We are making Herculean efforts to see that we take advantage of the opportunities that are open to Canada and to others in Kuwait. We will do all we can to help in the reconstruction.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. The Minister is well aware that the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Peoples is hearing witnesses concerning the events of last Summer in Kahnawake and Kanesatake. Almost all the testimonies insist on the number of civil rights violations. How can a significant response be found if the provincial authorities do not testify and if the committee does not visit either Kahnawake or Kanesatake? And why does the Minister refuse to set up an of inquiry to thoroughly examine the situation?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I congragulate my hon. friend on the quality of his French which may be superior to mine.

The hon. member is well aware that all decisions made by a Parliamentary committee concerning its business are its own. The government has nothing to do with them. Moreover, questions concerning commissions of inquiry should not be directed to the Minister of Justice, but to the proper ministers involved in these matters. My colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development may have his own views about such an inquiry concerning the Oka events which, by the way, are outside my purview. Although I have nothing to do with the business of the committee, I share the hon. member's interest in it.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, the precedent was created as early as 1923 when the government instituted a royal commission to examine the army moving into settle a strike in Sydney, Nova Scotia. I think the minister will realize that the situation remains tense and is becoming perhaps more tense. If the question is not dealt with frankly and openly by all concerned parties, the situation and the problems are going to augment.

I want to know why the minister and the government will not appoint a judicial committee. We do not want to see another situation where the military is brought in to deal with a political situation.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, perhaps I should defer to my colleague in Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but I think it is important for the hon. member to understand that the causes that led up to the situation in Oka last summer are multi-discipline in terms of the government. They involve the Department of Indian Affairs, the concerns of the Solicitor General and the Department of Justice.

We are actively considering those circumstances and the best government policy to do that. Whether in fact a royal commission or a commission of inquiry is the appropriate way to go, I cannot say, and I am not sure that would not simply delay the ability of government to respond constructively.

I think there is also a problem, and it is a problem that arises in my own province as well, with respect to issues related to native people. There are a number of initiatives we are taking in the government to try to provide positive steps which we hope will deal with the underlying causes. My colleague in Indian Affairs can talk about those.

In the area of justice, I might say that I will be jointly chairing with the Minister of Justice in the Yukon a federal-provincial territorial conference on aboriginal justice this fall which I hope will provide some positive suggestions to deal with the underlying causes, which I think we all agree have to be addressed to avoid similar circumstances.

AGRICULTURE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. The economy of Prince Edward Island is not a large one, so when the province is faced with a crisis in a major industry, such as the potato industry is experiencing right now, the whole economy is affected.

Will the minister advise the House if the potato farmers of Prince Edward Island will receive full compensation for the losses that they are incurring as a result of the PVYn virus?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I recognize the importance of the potato industry to Prince Edward Island. In that regard I and officials of our department have been working very closely with the producers and the Government of Prince Edward Island and indeed, the Government of New Brunswick which has been involved as well in an eradication plan which would be also tied to some form of compensation.

We have said all along, and I think that this finds agreement with the Government of Prince Edward Island, that any compensation plan has to be tied to an eradication program. I believe we are at the stage where that has been fairly well developed. I will be meeting with representatives of the P.E.I. and New Brunswick potato marketing board this afternoon. We will be outlining the details and trying to conclude this in a satisfactory manner.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, this is a very critical situation. The very livelihood of some Prince Edward Island potato farmers is at stake. The entire economy of my province is affected by this. Farmers need to plan now for this year's crop.

When will the minister announce the precise compensation package and let farmers know where they stand?

• (1150)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I recognize that farmers want to plan for the future, but I think they also want to have the assurance from the two levels of government that an effective eradication program is in fact put in place, and to attempt to restore normal production and normal trading patterns.

I have to tell the hon. member that this issue is all encompassing and I also have to consider other things, i.e. the recent Auditor General's report that was brought down on Prince Edward Island. It outlined some very serious deficiencies in terms of the administration of the potato disease control program, the inspection and, indeed, the enforcement of laws. I have to assure myself, and I am sure the producers will want to be assured, that the very major deficiencies that were identified in the Prince Edward Island Auditor General's report have to be identified and corrected. That is also part of the eradication program.

So there is certainly a joint responsibility here and we owe it to ourselves and to the producers that those deficiencies be corrected and those deficiencies are the responsibility of the provincial Government of Prince Edward Island.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, we are now seeing the impact of last week's budget. Last month, the Minister of Finance had a message for Newfoundland; $280 million in cuts from federal transfers for post-secondary education and health care.

Now, Premier Wells and his Liberals have chosen to take the path the federal government called for in its budget. They have slashed 2,600 public sector jobs and 360 hospital beds will be closed.

I want to ask the Minister of State for Finance if he will finally admit that the result of this budget is that thousands of Newfoundlanders will lose their jobs and that health care and post-secondary education will be cut in that province and, indeed, that the result of the budget will be that job losses and cuts to health care and post-secondary education will be the case across this country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the facts do not support the hon. member's comment.

In 1990–91, Newfoundland, in transfers to the province, received $1,000,376,000, about 44 per cent of its total budget by the way.

In 1991–92, it is going to receive $1,434,000,000. That is an increase, not a decrease. I do not know where the hon. member is getting this decrease from.

It was interesting to read the comments of the premier of the province of Newfoundland and the finance minister. I might say the minister of finance congratulated the Minister of Finance for Canada for the budget that he brought in.

Newfoundland is getting more money next year than this year. I am not sure what figures the member is looking at, but he had better get a new researcher.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is to the real boss, the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada.

As a fellow westerner, I am sure he has noticed now that the recession is real in western Canada, with pockets of unemployment of up to 15 per cent or 20 per cent. The city of Saskatoon has a rate now of 11.8 per cent.

What I want to ask him, as the Deputy Prime Minister of this country, is the following. Does he have the courage to phone up the Governor of the Bank of Canada, John Crow, and instruct the governor to roll back interest rates in this country so that they are more in line with the bank rates in the United States? There is now a 4 per cent gap and that gap should not be more than 2 per cent. Does he have the courage, as the Deputy Prime Minister, to phone John Crow and say, roll back the interest rates so we can export more from the west and create jobs for western Canadians?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): One of the good news stories, if you can find it in the employment figures today, Madam Speaker, is that employment actually rose in Alberta last month. So there is some growth in employment in the west.

There are other areas, and the hon. member is right, there are pockets of high unemployment out west and we are very concerned about that, there is no question about that. But as to just automatically rolling back interest rates, it just does not work that way. The hon. member was another one who was on his feet demanding a 2 per cent roll back and now they have been rolled back 4 per cent.

The hon. member should know full well that we have lowered interest rates to get the economy going again.

The hon. member talks about gaps. Let us just take a look at those gaps because he has got to get his statistics right.

The prime rate in the United States is 9 per cent; in Canada it is 11–1/4 per cent. That is a 2–1/4 per cent difference in the prime rate, which is not too bad.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. minister has answered the question. We will go on and let as many members as possible have the floor.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam speaker, yesterday we learned that an air traffic controller at Halifax International Airport had to shut down the tower to take a nap. Today, I have learned that five air traffic positions at Pearson International Airport in Toronto are being cut to save money in overtime.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, the father of deregulation in the transportation sector in this country: Why is his government prepared to put human life at risk to save a buck?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's allegation is a distortion of the facts. I am not aware of all the circumstances surrounding the incident in Halifax. If the hon. member is aware of them, then perhaps he might want to give us the facts.

There are two points to the question. Insofar as the Halifax incident is concerned, the Minister of Transport is in fact investigating this. Obviously, if the air traffic controller was not fit to be on duty, he did the proper thing. But the facts would have to be recognized.

Insofar as his allegation that the Government of Canada, the Department of Transport, is simply laying off people and putting human lives at risk, that is absolutely false.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, this government has been warned by the Canadian Air Pilots Association, this government has been warned by the Air Traffic Controllers Association, this government has been warned by the Official Opposition that overworked controllers at understaffed airports put at risk the safety of the air travelling public.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister not realize that the spectacle of an exhausted, overtired air traffic controller anywhere in this country may be the last signal before we witness a disaster at a Canadian airport?

Will the minister now promise to go back to the drawingboard to review the planned cuts at Pearson and the critical shortage of air traffic controllers in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that on previous occasions when this issue was raised in the House, the Minister of Transport did indicate that steps were being taken to deal with this particular issue, including the acceleration of the training of air traffic controllers. Obviously, I will ensure that this matter is brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport, and I am sure he will get back to the hon. member and provide him with detailed answers. I hope that he accepts the answer and reads it.

SECURITY INTELLIGENCE REVIEW COMMITTEE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

Ron Atkey, a Conservative and former chairman of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, speaking on why this government turned down parliamentary oversight of the CSIS operation and budget said:

> The Solicitor General and CSIS tried to slip one past us. The government turned thumbs down on reforms designed to protect the rights of Canadians—

When most advanced nations in the world have parliamentary oversight of its security institutions, why is this minister too frightened to provide similar protection for Canadians?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): This minister is not frightened with respect to what the hon. member has just said. I think if the hon. member takes the time to read the comprehensive response to the committee's report, he will perhaps realize that some of the recommendations have been agreed to. The government is going to put in place some measures in order to guarantee what the hon. member is referring to.

The 117 recommendations per se have not all been accepted, and the hon. member knows why. He could read the report. I believe that SIRC has served its purpose before and will continue to serve its purpose. Mr. Atkey, who is a former SIRC member, should know what that is all about.

WAGE INCREASES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board.

• (1200)

Does the minister not believe that the pay raises that the senior executives got the day before the budget was announced were indecent, that it was hypocritical for the very people who are calling for others to lose their jobs to get pay increases above those of all the other government employees?

Does he not believe that those people, whether we call it retroactive or not, who are calling for sacrifices by others should lead the way by taking sacrifices themselves?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member that the heads of Crown corporations will be treated exactly the same as all other government employees.

He refers to numbers pertaining to last year, calendar year 1990. We are in 1991. What I announced last week was for the coming fiscal year, next April, and for the coming fiscal year the heads of Crown corporations will not be entitled to increases beyond 3 per cent not only for next year, but for the next three years.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DESIGNATION OF ALLOTTED DAY

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I would like to designate next Monday, March 11, as an opposition day or allotted day for the purpose of supply.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, since the government House leader has finally announced what he is going to do Monday, would he also be able to indicate to this House whether he intends to proceed with any government legislation next week?

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the House leaders of the respective parties have been in discussion and looking at a calendar for next week and so on. It was the intention to use a number of the allotted days which are required under the rules.

I believe his House leader, if not him, has in his hand now a proposal for a calendar, as does the Official Opposition, and we are ready to discuss that and work on an agenda so we may all know as much in advance as possible the business of this House.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, again to the government House leader, I noticed on that calendar there is no reference whatsoever to taxation with regard to the northern tax benefit. There are a number of Canadians right across northern Canada who cannot get their tax rebate unless that legislation is introduced into the House of Commons. It has not been introduced whatsoever, and I would like to know when the government plans to introduce that legislation.

Mr. Andre: I am not sure that it is appropriate that we keep this negotiation on the floor of the House of Commons. There have been discussions with his House leader—

Mr. Murphy: It is not on the list.

Mr. Andre: We had discussions with his House leader. He keeps interrupting.

We have had discussions with his House leader. There is a willingness on our side, if there is on his side and in the Official Opposition, to pass that legislation very quickly if we can get co-operation. That is under active discussion. If he would consult with his House leader, I am sure he would find out about that.

POINT OF ORDER

COST OF MOVING MEMBERS' OFFICES

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I think that the hon. member for Richelieu may have been off track when he spoke in this House yesterday. Perhaps he was daydreaming. At any rate, the plan is for four new offices for government members, not 30. Only 13 members will be involved in the move, and the costs incurred for each of them will be approximately $100. Those are the facts.

[English]

ESTIMATES

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I would like to rise on a point of order relating to the Supplementary Estimates and the estimates pertaining to next year's budget as tabled in the House by the President of the Treasury Board.

In the estimates as tabled there are included estimates for the Senate of Canada, in particular in the supplementary, as well as in section 21 of the regular estimates for next year.

In these estimates, particularly the Supplementary Estimates under vote 2c, there is an amount of $1 million. In the 1991-1992 estimates in section 21 under vote 5, there is an amount of $1,150,000 included for new allowances for senators. It is based on the $153 per day they are paid to attend meetings of the Senate.

I would like to quote from the Minutes of Proceedings in the Senate of June 5, 1990 which describe exactly how this money is to be paid to individual members, and then I will relate that to the point of order that applies. I would quote from page 1080 of June 5:

> "In addition to any other allowance otherwise provided, there shall be paid to each member of the Senate in this and future sessions of Parliament a tax-free living allowance at the rate of one hundred and fifty-three dollars for each day the member is in attendance at a meeting of the Senate, one of its committees or subcommittees, or a joint committee of both Houses, calculated as of the date of the adoption of this Report by the Senate and payable, after Parliament appropriates the necessary funds, on application by the member."

That was approved, and that is the rule under which the Senate has established that the funds are available.

Members of Parliament and senators are paid under the statutes of the Parliament of Canada Act, which I have referred to, and I would now like to reference in detail my point of order. in the Parliament of Canada Act, Part IV, section 55(1), the sessional allowance of MPs and senators is clearly prescribed.

In section 55(3) of the same act the annual rate of change to this allowance is also very clearly prescribed.

In section 55(5) the rate of change that did not prescribe to the rate established in section 55(3) was included very specifically as a unique consideration.

In section 55(7), when again the automatic provisions for salary adjustments were overridden, an amendment to this legislation was enacted to change the rate of pay.

Section 57 of the Parliament of Canada Act deals with the deductions for non-attendance by members to the House and the Senate. I would also emphasize it deals with deductions, not increases or extra payments.

In section 59 both Houses are empowered to set stricter rules that relate to attendance.

Section 63 of the Parliament of Canada Act authorizes either House to pay certain expenses incurred by members. Specifically, section 63(3) establishes an allowance for expenses for members, and particularly section 63(3)(a) sets the allowance for senators.

Further, section 67(1) establishes how members' allowances can be adjusted annually by a very clear process.

Section 68(1) requires the Governor in Council subsequent to each election to appoint commissioners to review the adequacy of the allowances provided to members and to report their findings and recommendations within six months.

The government did in fact appoint that commission and its submissions were received in this House.

I would like to submit, Mr. Speaker, that the inclusion of the $153 allowance does not meet any of the preceding requirements. Further, in the absence of any indication of legislative amendments to the Parliament of Canada Act, I would request that you rule the senators' new allowance as it appears in the spending estimates out of order.

The reason I would do that, I would now like to indicate, is that there have been similar attempts to use the spending estimates to change legislation. The Speaker in the past has been asked to rule on similar type attempts. I would now like to cite a couple of examples which I hope Your Honour would include in your considerations on my point of order.

Back on March 25 of 1981, Madam Speaker at the time had been asked by the hon. member for Calgary Centre to address a similar occurrence, where in fact the statutes were not being amended but appropriations appeared in the spending estimates.

I would like to quote from page 8600 of the March 25, 1981 Commons Debates:

In 1971 hon. members commenced to take exception to those items in Supplementary Estimates which in effect were amending statutes other than appropriation acts. The hon. member mentioned those occasions commencing with the ruling of March 10, 1971 leading to the ruling of December 7, 1977, on a point of order which the hon. member himself had raised on that occasion. Because it was a new point in 1971, the Speaker disallowed only some of the items objected to on the ground that they were obvious amendments to statutes other than appropriation acts while permitting, with a warning, less obvious items to remain in the estimates.

• (1210)

Further, on June 12, 1981 the Speaker ruled on a similar point made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. It is a rather lengthy ruling. I would like to quote some comments from it, but I would certainly refer it to Your Honour for consideration. As reported on pages 10546 and 10547 of the Commons Debates for June 12, 1981, it reads:

—history shows that during the past 10 years, members have objected that in one way or another the estimates that have been submitted from time to time by the government have attempted to do more than set out the spending requirements of the government for the next fiscal year. This is of course supposed to be the acknowledged purpose of estimates and appropriation acts.

In 1971 the Chair ruled that items in the estimates that attempt to amend existing statutes are out of order. This was confirmed by most subsequent rulings.

In 1974 and 1976 the Chair went further and dealt with the question of matters of substance being put in the estimates. The Speaker, in effect, ruled that the Appropriation Act is not the place to seek authority to do something such as to establish a program. Rather, the > Appropriation Act should only seek authority to spend the money for a program that has been previously authorized by a statute.

It continues:

> In March of that year the Speaker said:
> The government receives from Parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by Parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item in my opinion ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation—

There are considerable other points raised in the ruling of June 12, 1981, but I think the final point I would like to refer to in the ruling made on that day relates very clearly to a specific appropriation in the spending estimates. I would like to quote again from the June 12 Hansard, which reads:

> Accordingly, consistent with earlier rulings, Energy, Mines and Resources votes 35, 40 and 45 are out of order. I note that in his remarks last June 1, the President of the Treasury Board confirmed this view when he addressed the question of the receivability of these items by saying, "Of course, legislation will be introduced with respect to those programs". By asking for money now, he would be putting the cart before the horse.

I would like to conclude on the basis that it is my opinion the spending estimates, as submitted, clearly are outside the statutes as they are printed in the Parliament of Canada Act. I would therefore request your ruling to rule out of order the allowance included in those estimates for the Senate of Canada.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I was not given notice of the point of order by my colleague opposite.

Since he is not arguing with regard to whether the measure is appropriate—he is arguing I believe with regard to the procedural aspects as to how it has been introduced here in the House—I am wondering if the Chair, who I would think would want to ascertain interventions from other members of the House, might wish to defer any decision until sometime next week when we have had an opportunity to review the particular point of order and to make a submission to the Chair.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to add further argument on this particular issue next week when we have had a chance to examine it. I think that the member for Ontario has made a very interesting point.

If that is the case, it would look like the entire bill should not be in front of this House, and that the estimates themselves are not properly placed before the House of Commons. That would be a very interesting thing, I think, for the Speaker to look into.

When you and perhaps other members are having an chance to review this matter you could take a look at the vote 2c itself where it refers to this authorization of $1 million being for the current and subsequent fiscal year. Of course, the current year is the year that ends March 31, 1991 and presumably the subsequent fiscal year is next year.

It is my understanding that the estimates before us can only refer to this year, not to a subsequent year, so what indeed the Senate has asked for is $1 million for the present fiscal year; in other words, $9,000 for each of the senators.

Unless my understanding of the act and the estimates is incorrect, the information that is being put to the House is inaccurate and is certainly misleading.

I do believe this is a very serious matter. I have problems with the $153 a day the senators are asking for for merely showing up for work, but that is a side issue as far as this debate is concerned. I think we have a real question as to whether or not the Senate, in preparing its estimates, is misleading the House of Commons and whether in fact the government has properly put the estimates before this House.

It is a matter that we should look at further, and I would request that the Speaker spend sometime looking at this whole matter.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, just in case I did not hear quite correctly, the estimates that come from the House of Commons or the Senate come through the mechanism specified in the Parliament of Canada Act. They are not government estimates. I think the suggestion was that all estimates might not be appropriate. Government estimates, I think, have a different origin and a different sense of responsibility for the government and for the Chamber. I simply wanted to make that point at this time in case there might be some confusion out in the general public.

Under the Parliament of Canada Act, estimates related to the Senate come through the conduit of the President of the Treasury Board, but the President of the Treasury Board is not at liberty to change them; they are simply conveyed according to the statute law.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member for Ontario is an important one. I thank the hon. member for his presentation. It was very clear and well thought out. I thank the hon. member for Calgary West for his point of clarification.

I do not think it would be appropriate, given the significance of the point, to proceed when the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has indicated on behalf of the Official Opposition that he would like sometime to consider this matter before argument was concluded.

I take it the hon. member for Churchill is supporting that position. The hon. member for Churchill has given me some indication of how he may pursue the argument at another time.

I think the request for an adjournment for the continuation of the argument in the coming week is appropriate. I am certainly going to accept that suggestion. I wonder if at some appropriate time later on this afternoon members might contact me to indicate when they would be prepared to proceed with the argument. I might say I do not think it is appropriate for a very long delay, but I certainly will co–operate.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): I rise on a different point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Earlier in the week I had raised with you and with other members in the Chamber the prospect of obtaining your guidance in terms of deliberations at Question Period.

We had a number of incidents today, although you were not in the chair, that made it obvious to members on this side of the House that perhaps the answers although not very forthcoming were a bit verbose and a bit long in responding to the succinct questions put by members of the Official Opposition.

I am wondering if there has been any reflection by yourself, other than what you had stated earlier in the week, to try to bring a little bit more cohesion and succinctness from the other side in responding to various questions that we pose. As you can appreciate, there are a number of members of Parliament on this side, who for whatever reasons, believe they have good questions, but because of the timeframe are not having an opportunity to proceed.

• (1220)

I am just wondering, now that the Government House Leader has entered the Chamber, if he would like to make a submission on my intervention, or whether you would like to share with us any further views you might have on this particular subject.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. House Leader intervenes, and I certainly will hear him, I think I should point out that, yes, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond raised this matter a few days ago. As he knows, I have contacted his office but we have not been able to have a discussion. I also made suggestions at that time that it might be a matter that should be discussed with members in the Chamber and then with myself.

I would like to hear from the hon. Government House Leader.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, let me say that having spent many, many years on that side of the House, I understand the frustrations of the newly appointed House leader of the Official Opposition in that each and every day there is a long list of people who desire to ask questions, quite understandably. Tough choices have to be made and it is frustrating if, in fact, that is unable to occur because time runs out.

I must say that from our perspective we have some frustrations as well in terms of Question Period. Very frequently, if not in the overwhelming majority of cases, questions become mini–speeches, with a number of accusations and suggestions made of impropriety, malice, incompetence, et cetera. It is not surprising that when these accusations are made by way of preamble, the recipient of those accusations, the accused, feels it necessary to give an adequate response so the record does not show an accusation not responded to. That is part of the nature of our adversarial system. It is the nature of our adversarial system that I felt for some time, and I say this in all honesty, even when I was on that side of the House.

I am not sure that we serve the public altogether well in that context because of how it appears to those in the galleries or those watching television. We have this interchange and then sometimes wonder out loud why it is that politicians are held in disrepute and disrespect, when it is a small wonder, given the kind of exchanges we too frequently have.

That being said, I am certainly more than prepared and anxious to engage in discussions with colleagues on the other side of the House to see if, in fact, we could not arrange some ad hoc rules, instructions, suggestions that we might put to the Chair in terms of how we might manage Question Period in a way that meets the understandable and appropriate desires of the opposition: to have the time and ability for their members to stand up and question members of the government on their respective responsibility, and to recognize the equally legitimate concerns, from the government's perspective, of the ability to defend oneself, if you will.

I do not know how these discussions might come out and I do not want to prejudge them. If it were to come out to a circumstance where the Chair received generalized instructions from both sides of the House to cut off those who abuse the preamble or the set-up to a question and, equally, to cut of those government ministers who respond with too much verbosity, frankly, I would not quarrel with that at all.

Let me repeat that I understand the frustration of the House Leader of the Official Opposition, and I am more than willing to engage in discussions to see if we cannot find some satisfactory resolution.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, we are all, of course, moved with compassion for the concerns that the minister has for slights made against him during Question Period, but I have one or two brief points to add.

It is the New Democratic Party, and sometimes the Independents, who often feel the brunt of too much time being taken by others in Question Period. I just want to point out that concern. However, it is clearly everyone's responsibility to be as succinct as we can, both in questions and in answers, and I would like to contribute whatever my party can to the discussions which will achieve that.

I would also like to thank the Deputy Speaker, who today found the opportunity to give a fourth question to the New Democratic Party, and that sometimes gets us through Question Period satisfactorily. It is a difficult question but it is important for all of us to participate.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the non-cabinet members of my party, I would like to join in this discussion.

I heard the NDP spokesperson say that it was his party that suffered when preambles were long. Let me tell him that it is government members who frequently get no questions even though they represent the majority of members in this Chamber. If we could indeed come to some collective agreement that would enable us to shorten the preamble and shorten the responses, that would enable us to increase the number of questioners and questions asked in Question Period, that would be strongly supported by my members in the anticipation that they would have somewhat of an increased opportunity to participate in that process, as well. They would like it; they have a hunger for it; and brevity is the route to the solution. I am pleased to see so much accord, and I am sure our caucus would unanimously support that kind of a move.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I will not be long in my intervention.

I guess we are talking, to a certain extent, with regard to the purposes of Question Period. Of course, the purpose of Question Period for the Official Opposition has always been to elicit information from government members. It is not to score cheap political points, as alluded to by the member opposite. He must be referring to some third party or independent members, but he certainly cannot attribute that to the Official Opposition.

I hope that as we proceed in the coming days and weeks, perhaps the Chair, through his able assistants, will be able to provide us with some statistical information about the timing of the questions and the timing of the responses. I think this will be helpful to any discussion that we might have.

However, I wish to point out to the Government House Leader that we are prepared to examine some of the suggestions that he has made. But I cannot let it be said by the chief government Whip that it has the largest body of members of Parliament who do not have an opportunity to ask questions. The purpose of Question Period is to elicit information. Surely, government members can elicit information in their weekly caucuses. Caucus, which is the rock of democracy, can provide government members with the necessary information they need.

That argument does not hold much water. Nevertheless, we wish to proceed, but we would like to have those statistics that I have referred to.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West, who probably cannot resist responding.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, we are negotiating on the floor of the Chamber. I would like to signal to the Liberal House leader that we would be glad to send some of our cabinet ministers to their caucus, provided that we could take the hour and spend it on Government Orders. We would be happy to make that change.

Mr. Speaker: As your Speaker, I want to express my appreciation for the assistance extended to me this morning in this brief discussion.

I want to say to the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond that I spent a great deal of time in opposition, and of course I was always a model of decorum. Perhaps times have changed, but I have to confess to hon. members that there were times when I was on my feet knowing perfectly well what the information was; my object was more to point out that information on behalf of my constituents and in the public interest of my country.

• (1230)

However, I am very intrigued at the suggestion of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond that Question Period is to elicit information, and I think that we might be able to discuss that matter among all of the members.

I think perhaps it might be helpful if the initiative which has been taken by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond were to be pursued through perhaps an initial discussion with the House leaders, and perhaps others, on the question—which is a very, very sensible request—of statistics. I want to say to the hon. member that I believe that would be helpful. The Table will make that information available.

Quite frankly, I welcome the initiative taken by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond because, as hon. members know and as I remarked the other day, there is a lot of competition in this House now for questions. More, perhaps, than there ever has been, partly because there are more members but there are also other reasons.

We want to do what is in the public interest and we want to do what is right for all members of the House. I accept what the hon. member for Calgary West has pointed out, that there are a lot of private members on the government side who often feel that they do not have an adequate chance to put questions in Question Period.

Again I remind hon. members that those of us who spent quite a long time in opposition do have an understanding of the difficulties to which the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and others have alluded.

I want to thank the hon. members. I thank the hon. member for Cape Breton—Richmond and the others who have intervened. I would hope that an initial meeting could be held as soon as possible, and I certainly would be prepared to co–operate in every way to answer the needs of all the hon. members. I suppose it will not come as any surprise if I indicated that I, too, have some views as to how we could make Question Period more effective.

I thank the hon. members.

PETITIONS

CANADA POST

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a petition with respect to post offices. It is a petition with over 300 signatories from Nova Scotia who are concerned that this government's attitude towards post offices is strictly profit–motivated. While this government has made well over $150 million in profits, it has continued to close post offices, both rural and urban. They are particularly concerned about one post office at 7183 Quinpool Road in Halifax.

The petitioners call upon this government to improve the service of Canada Post and to instruct the government to abandon its policy of closing rural post offices and urban post office stations throughout this country.

CANADA POST

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, it gives me particular pleasure today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present this petition. It arrived at the right time, as we are celebrating International Women's Day.

The petitioners have the following to say: We believe that a great woman, Marie Sklodowska Curie, must be honoured for her scientific contributions to humanity. We believe that the gift of the discovery of radium to heal the sick of the world deserves to be recognized by Canada. We believe that she deserves to be recognized because this discovery of radium, for which she was twice awarded the Nobel Prize, has brought relief to millions of people around the world, including Canadians. She was the first woman to win a place in the history of science.

Therefore, the petitioners feel that this Polish woman, Marie Sklodowska Curie, who was a servant of humankind and has been honoured by so many different countries of the world, should be honoured by Canada. They call upon this House to issue a commemorative stamp on the occasion of the 125th anniversary of her birth, November 7, 1992.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I have the sense that the population out there is ongoing in its concern for the tax on books, magazines and literature. I had thought, after all these months of depositing these petitions, it would be the end.

Since I have come back after the break, I have, for your interest and for this House, the request that the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations be reviewed once again so that magazines and books will no longer be taxed at the tax level that they are suffering because it is a very serious matter.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the House will recall in December that I and other members tabled a number of petitions from people in the Windsor—Essex community which protested, in effect, the cutbacks of the government which closed down our only television station CBET.

Over 50,000 names were tabled at one time, having been gathered just over the space of a few days. We continue to receive these same kinds of petitions and I am very pleased, on behalf of the people of my community, to table a number of petitions which call upon Parliament to take all necessary measures to preserve local CBC television broadcasting in Windsor and in other areas, deprived of such service by Mulroney government cutbacks and by the decisions of CBC management.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the opposition to the GST continues. As evidence of this, I have a large number of petitions from people across the country who strongly oppose the goods and services tax on the grounds that the tax is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher interest rates, but with higher inflation, higher taxes and higher unemployment.

These petitions have been duly certified by the clerk and I am very pleased to present them to this House.

CANADA POST

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present to the House today a petition signed by thousands of residents in the Halifax area.

These individuals are very concerned about the decision by Canada Post Corporation to close the postal facilities in Halifax. They are petitioning this government and call upon this Parliament to make improved service the highest priority of Canada Post Corporation, and also to instruct the government to abandon its policy of closing rural post offices and urban postal stations.

I submit this to the House at this time.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on International Women's Day to present a petition that has been signed by Canadians, both women and men, from every region of this country.

The petition says that whereas violence against women in our society is a serious problem, whereas 14 women were brutally killed at the University of Montreal because they were women, and whereas our society must recognize the misogynist aspects of our society and never forget these kinds of action, they call upon this Parliament to declare December 6 a national day of remembrance in honour of those 14 young women who were massacred in Montreal, a national day of remembrance and action on the issues around violence against women.

• (1240)

CANADA POST

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of 191 residents from Halifax, Nova Scotia, who are opposing the closure of post offices. These residents feel that with a profit of over $149 million there is no reason for this government to continue destroying Canada Post as we know it.

The petitioners are calling on Parliament to instruct the government to stop this massive destruction of this very important facility that helps to unite Canadians and they would like to see the facility in particular at Halifax Main, at 713 Bedford Row in Halifax, remain open.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege today to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition that deals with postal issues in the Halifax area. Hundreds of petitioners suggest that with a profit of $149 million, Canada Post should not be cutting back service at the expense of Canadians.

The petitioners are particularly concerned about Canada Post's intention to close the postal facility at 1526 Dresden Row in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and call upon Parliament to instruct the government to make improved service the highest priority of Canada Post Corporation and to instruct the government to abandon the policy of closing rural post offices and urban postal stations.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitioners here today who continue to protest quite vigorously the implementation of the goods and services tax. These are Canadians from across the country who have joined together in a petition of several hundred names, suggesting that the goods and services tax is not appropriate for the Canadian economy at this time, that it will cause grave and serious hardship to small business across this country and will unduly affect middle-income Canadians, as well as those on fixed incomes across this country.

The petitioners call upon the Government of Canada that notwithstanding its implementation of this very regressive tax that it would reconsider its decision of months ago and do away with the goods and services tax.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Worthy: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Boudria: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, in relation to answers to written questions. I must bring a matter to the attention of the House and that is the fact that on February 25 the government answered question No. 411 on the Order Paper in my name. The only answer that the government provided was the fact that it had refused to answer the question.

I do not know of any provision under our rules that permit the government to refuse to answer an Order Paper question or to state as an answer that it is refusing to answer. Could I perhaps ask the Chair to look at this question.

It is a very simple question. I asked the Government of Canada how many golf club memberships had been purchased for the executives of the Canada Post Corporation. Those same people are shutting down the rural post offices in my riding. I want to know how much was spent and on whom in buying them golf club memberships. The government simply told me that it would only share this information with the employees in question.

I bring this to the attention of the House, on a point of order, and to your attention, Madam Speaker, hoping for your guidance. I would ask you to take it under advisement and to respond at an appropriate time.

Mr. Worthy: Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to deal with that particular question. I have no knowledge on it, but I will look into it with the appropriate people. The government should be in a position to respond to the hon. member at the earliest possible time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin and the Chair as well will look into the situation.

Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Orders of the Day.

POINT OF ORDER

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. There has been some preliminary discussion, and I am not fully aware that my colleague to the left has been apprised, but we are presently debating Bill C-98, second reading, to be followed thereafter by the disposition, if you will, of Bill C-91, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

There is agreement on this side to proceed with Bill C-91 at this time if, in fact, there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): No to that suggestion, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have heard that the hon. member is not giving consent, but I cannot see that consent is required at this time.

The government is allowed, after Question Period, to call whatever piece of legislation the government wishes to see in front of the House at this time.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I did not hear the government call Bill C-91.

Mr. Dingwall: I am just making a suggestion, Madam Speaker, that perhaps if the government decided to call date back to Erskine May and includes Beauchesne that it can call Bill C–91.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, the Table was informed some time ago, as were all parties, that the first item of business after Question Period would be Bill C–91.

The normal practice is for the table officers to rise and announce that. It was interrupted with a point of order.

When the point of order is completed, I would anticipate that the table officers would rise and make that announcement.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 26, consideration of motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C–91, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House is ready for the question. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When debate stopped for Question Period at 11 a.m., the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls had the floor. There are 15 minutes left in his speech.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Madam Speaker, I will not use my entire time period. However, I would just like to make a couple of remarks regarding this legislation.

The legislation is, as the bill says, the Farm Income Protection Act. Perhaps, that should be changed to read: "Some farm income protection for some farmers act".

One would get the impression from looking at the title that the bill would cover all farmers in Canada and that there would be income protection for all of the farmers of Canada.

Such is not the case, unfortunately. I will read, just to put on the record, what the government says is in the legislation. It says the legislation provides for the Net Income Stabilization Account, called NISA; the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, called GRIP; the revenue insurance program, called RIP; and the crop insurance program, called CIP.

• (1250)

All of these things are incorporated into this bill to provide protection for farmers.

Really, in the bill for the year coming up, 1991–1992, the main component called GRIP will only grip the grain and oilseed farmers. Now how well, in my limited knowledge of the farming community, will it grip the farmers?

Some of the contributions to the program come from the federal government; it has contributed some 41 per cent. Where do the rest come from? Oh, they come from the farmers; 33 per cent. And then the provincial governments, if they so wish, will have to put up 25 per cent each.

So it is not such an all–encompassing program and the NISA section—and I am not saying there is anything wrong with it— all it really is, is that you can put money into a bank account to save for a rainy day.

As I read the legislation you can only withdraw—and as I say I have very limited knowledge of the farming community, that is those who produce grain and oilseed—if your income drops below $10,000 for the year.

The legislation before us today is really not what some people would have you believe it is; a safety net program for farmers. It is not a safety net program for farmers. There is nothing wrong with the legislation, as I said before. It goes further, I suppose, than legislation has in the past because this is really a consolidation of all of those income support programs that were in existence in the federal and provincial laws in some of the western Canadian provinces. However, it is certainly not the all-encompassing program that it was made out to be by the Government of Canada.

That brings me back to the principle of the legislation because that is what we are debating today, the principle of the legislation, the principle of guaranteeing an income to a farmer, or guaranteeing an income to a primary producer.

It should be made clear and put on the record that to guarantee an income to a primary producer, apart from our social welfare safety net, is perhaps more important in economic terms than guaranteeing the income of perhaps any other group of people in our society.

I say that because economically speaking on the balance sheet, it helps our balance of payments. It helps the respect for our dollar on the international money market if we are exporting products from this country. In fact, we could not survive if we did not have something in the books that said our dollars were being used in exchange on the international money market.

I realize there are various ways that you can have a healthy financial situation vis-à-vis the United States or any other nation in the world on your balance of payments. You could be exporting tourism. That is true. Americans could come into Canada and spend dollars here, and that is an export on your financial ledger when you judge the value of that commodity in a country like Canada. You could have investment from foreign nations. That is another help on your balance of payments, because dollars are being spent here and foreign money is being exchanged for Canadian products. The export commodities of our primary producers, of our farmers, loggers, miners and fishermen and other primary producers in our society are perhaps more important than any of the other commodities, because when you talk about farming or fishing, you are talking about food. You are talking about food, which is indispensable.

You cannot judge in economic terms, the value of a computer chip versus food. There is just no comparison in real terms. There might be in the mind of an accountant or an economist. Certainly, in reality, we should be paying more attention to our primary producers in this country.

I make the point: Why not have guaranteed income programs for all of our primary producers in this country? Why not have a guaranteed income or a stablizing of income for our loggers in this country and for those people who work in our paper mills? Why not have a guaranteed income for our fishermen and our fish plant workers? Why set them adrift? There is not one income support program in existence in the Statutes of Canada. There is not one legislative measure that was ever brought in to give income support to our primary producers in the fishing industry or in the logging industry. Not one.

Members could point toward the prices support boards we have. But that is after the fact. That is much after the fact, after the individual has either been driven into bankruptcy or has sold off all of his possessions because of the nature of the work.

These professions are at the mercy of weather conditions and international markets. That is why they need the support of the Government of Canada.

I would say, as I mentioned before, the intent and the principle of the legislation is good. But I do not think it measures up to what a real farm income protection act should be. Perhaps the Government of Canada can build on this and perhaps it can come up with an act that will not be dependent upon how much money a farmer has or whether a provincial government decides to cost share on this particular program.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for what clearly was a remarkable degree of knowledge on a bill relating to an area on which I know he would have had to do a great deal of research to understand. It would not come to him naturally because only a few of his constituents would be involved in this sort of business.

An hon. member: Particularly the primary ones.

Mr. Hughes: Particularly the primary producers. I know that he has demonstrated some knowledge of primary producers, at least, in the broader definition.

Perhaps, the hon. member could elaborate just a touch more on what he sees as being the real farm protection act he thinks this government should bring forward.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, I must admit that my knowledge is a bit limited as far as the books of some of our farmers are concerned because I have not really dealt with them on a personal basis as constituents.

• (1300)

I can assure the hon. gentleman that without those farmers we are talking about today, we in Newfoundland would not be able to have our porridge every morning and our cream of wheat—the most nutritious foods that we can eat—and even our corn flakes and so on.

To get right to the point, what income support program do I visualize should be in place for farmers, fishermen, loggers, and other primary producers? I think it should be done this way, Madam Speaker. Just let me give you the illustration. All support programs, guaranteed income schemes that have been talked about, talk about giving money at the end of a financial year. They talk about giving money at the end of a season.

It can be seen in our social welfare legislation with the child tax credit. The government has tried to change it a bit by giving an advance. I realize that, but a true income support program would mean that a farmer, a fisherman, or a logger, to me the way it should operate, would be able to draw on a fund, compliments of the taxpayers of all of Canada, when he needs the money.

In other words, it does not mean that he will be to able to draw on the fund on March 31, if the financial year ends at that time, or December 31, if it ends then. He should not have to wait until that period is up.

The hon. gentleman asked me what I visualize as an income support program. The programs that are being devised are just bail-out programs, and hopefully the producer is not into bankruptcy by the time he is bailed out. There should be a system—and it deals with philosophy—that if you believe your primary producer is of the utmost importance to the economy and the people of Canada, then it is quite easy to devise a system which says that his income will be stabilized.

In other words, when he hits the point where he is getting absolutely no income and does not know if he is going to get any income, that is when he should be given the money. That is when he should be able to draw on that income.

What do we have in Canada today? Sitting right across from me is the chairman of the fisheries committee who can testify to us here today that he has argued and complained for years that fishermen have absolutely no income after the month of May, when there could be ice on his territory. He makes the argument—and other members have also made it—that an income support program would deliver the money when the primary producer needs it to put food on the table.

We appear to have the philosophy in this country that the primary producers are all right because they grow food; they have loads of food in the cellar so they really do not need any money; and that the fisherman has fish in the deep freeze, he can go out and shoot a moose every now and then, so he does not need any income. These people are like everybody else. They have children going to school, children going to university. These are real people who need income at certain moments of the month, not of the year.

I bet I could draw up the ideal income support program in a couple of days, at least the general principle of it. All we have to do is believe that we really need it in Canada today, and we do.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, I was wondering if the member for Gander—Grand Falls would care to comment on whether the philosophy of this particular bill can be reconciled with Canada's concepts of supply management as it concurs with the GATT or otherwise, and as it relates to the devastation wreaked upon the Canadian food processing industry by the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Baker: No, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I want to start by complimenting the member for Gander—Grand Falls on his eloquent presentation today on Bill C-98.

I guess there are not quite as many farmers in Gander—Grand Falls as there are in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has a large number of dairy farmers, as the Secretary of State will likely know. He drives through my constituency going back and forth to his own riding in Montreal. By the way, I hope he stops often and spends a lot of money my riding. The economy sure needs it. All the ministers who drive through my riding are invited to spend some of the hard-earned tax dollars they receive for doing their job. As I said, my constituents would benefit greatly.

I also should say that the minister is welcome to my constituency, even if it is not to spend hard-earned tax dollars. We would always be pleased to receive him, and I say that sincerely.

The bill that we have before us is one to establish the GRIP and NISA programs. The constituency I represent, as I indicated previously, has no less than 1,000 dairy farmers, in addition to others in cash crops and other areas of endeavour in food production.

[Translation]

The past few years have not been easy for Canadian farm producers, Madam Speaker. They saw their incomes fall in a very drastic and serious fashion. At any rate, those who are not involved in supply management were hit even harder because of a major reduction in food prices. Prince Edward Island potato producers had to deal with special problems in addition to the common natural disasters such as drought which all other farm producers had to contend with.

[English]

I see that as I am making these brief remarks my distinguished colleague from Prince Edward Island is seated immediately beside me. She brought forward very eloquently in the House this morning the problems suffered by Prince Edward Island potato producers. In this particular case, the problems are twofold. First, the prices have not been all that great. The sad reality is that is almost not new for potato producers. It is something they have had to deal with for some time. In addition, there is the infestation of their crops that they have had to deal with. That again will take its toll on those particular producers. I want to take this opportunity to compliment her for her usual quite forthright and apropos remarks in assisting the producers in her part of the country.

At the same time, she also speaks of producers from my own riding, perhaps not knowingly. I do have a number of potato producers in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell as well. In one community named Pendleton, Ontario potatoes are still grown. There is only a handful of producers now, but only a few years ago there were several more. There has been consolidations and in some cases farms have been transferred to other crops, again for the reason that the price of potatoes was not all that good in our area.

Coming back to the bill at hand, I would like to speak first in favour of the legislation.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, this is a two part program. At first, we could deal with the support part designated as the GRIP in English and the CSRN in French.

• (1310)

The purpose of this program is to provide a crop insurance plan, an insurance plan that will cover most if not all products, once agreements have been concluded with the provinces and the groups representing our farmers.

What we are discussing today is the framework of the bill, not the whole program, because there will be negotiations with the provinces and producers on the specific programs, the premiums for each product, and so forth. On the whole, however, on the basis of the information we have today, I believe this initiative deserves the support of this House, Mr. Speaker.

Some of the merits of this bill include the fact that, unlike other crop insurance programs, under the NISA program it will no longer be necessary to sell the grain in order to be eligible for insurance payments. This is a matter often raised in our area, because farm producers who grow their own feed grain are often unable to collect stabilization or other payments, because they don't sell the grain since it is consumed on the farm. This was a very serious problem under the previous stabilization programs.

I am glad to see, that according to what we have been told, the problem will no longer exist under Bill C-98. In other words, feed grains used on the farm will be eligible under the Agricultural Stabilization Program on the same basis as grains sold on the market. It was high time this kind of coverage was available.

Mr. Speaker, there are still concerns, however, and I must say we wonder how some provinces will be able to pay their share of the premiums. For instance, a grain producing province like Saskatchewan might easily have to pay provincial premiums totalling as much as 400, 500 or 600 million dollars annually. Anyone familiar with the economy of Saskatchewan can see that would create a very serious problem for the provincial treasury. So there are some potential problems.

Another problem is timing, Mr. Speaker. I must say that introducing a bill of this kind at a time when the plan is expected to go into deficit is a problem in itself. The answer is of course that if all were well in the agricultural sector, we might not need these programs so none would be introduced. Unfortunately, there is some truth in that. If we set up a stabilization program when times are good, automatically, funds will be deposited in the plan that will stay there, to be used during the lean years. The trouble is that when we start a program of this kind during the lean years, then either we have a plan that goes into deficit from the word go, or otherwise, we have premiums that are far too high because we are right in the middle of those lean years.

I realize it is rather difficult to get around this problem, and there are people who suggest waiting until things improve before setting up a program of this kind. However, that line of reasoning would be pretty hard to sell, and I don't intend to try, but my point was that we do have this problem right now, when we are about to start up these programs.

[English]

The government is telling us of the tremendous contribution that it is making to agriculture generally. I know that you, Mr. Speaker, being the non-partisan person that you are, know far better than that, because the Speaker is a totally objective person and is able to see through the kind of government rhetoric that some of us are subjected to from time to time.

The government has cut some $1.8 billion of expenditures and funding toward agricultural support programs during 1987 and 1988: $1.1 billion in 1987 and approximately $850 million in 1988. We cannot believe everything that the government says, and I know, Mr. Speaker, that you are so objective that you have already detected that in your non-partisan position in the chair where you now sit.

The government has included certain sums in this year's budget, but you will obviously recognize that agriculture is still at a net loss, if you calculate the amount that was put in this year's budget and subtract that from the cutbacks of the previous years. You can see that all is not well in the area of agriculture in terms of the help that it is getting from the federal government.

We have just finished talking briefly about GRIP. The other one is the NISA program. That particular program is not nearly as universally acclaimed as the first one that I have just described. As a matter of fact, I had occasion lately to travel to different parts of the country as part of the famous Liberal task force on the economy. I am sure you have heard of it, Mr. Speaker, because it did such excellent work throughout Canada. This Liberal task force heard representations from various groups.

[Translation]

On of these briefs was presented to us by Quebec farmers. And they argued that as far as they were concerned, the NISA program, RARB in French, was nothing more that a Registered Retirement Savings Plan for higher income farmers. Such was the view expressed by a few farmers group. While I do not agree entirely with them, I do think that we should listen to their gievances and complains because it is obvious that farmers want fair programs which will be sufficiently supported to serve the needs of the Canadian population.

In any case, during the hearings held by the liberal caucus task force, a few weeks ago, in Montréal and in Quebec City, farming groups of that province aired negative criticisms about the NISA program while commending the other program, the CSRN or the GRIP as it is better known in English.

[English]

A number of Canadians have spoken in favour of this general program. Again I state that it is a general program. It is an outline, if you wish, because there are specific agreements that have to be signed in the future.

I will describe what has been said in a few newspapers, just to give you an example of the fact that the agricultural community is certainly not looking at this in a negative way. It is looking at it in very much a positive light, hoping that this will work out.

• (1320)

For instance, in a Globe and Mail article of January 26, entitled "Farmers' new safety net will offer much-needed security", the following is stated:

> Western Canadian grain farmers have been looking for five years for an income stabilization program that did not depend on Grant Devine's electoral needs.

That is a very apropos remark because too often we have seen programs in the past really geared to the urgent political necessity rather than the urgent farm income situation. This program, of course, if it develops the way we are all hoping it will, will not have Grant Devine's electoral needs as the system by which pay-outs are made.

The Winnipeg Free Press carries this headline: "Income protection for farmers is patently unfair." It states the following:

> —the political debate has centred exclusively on GRIP. One argument is whether farmers' 33 per cent share of the premium is too much. Another hinges on the insured price based on a 15-year rolling average that some say will mean the guaranteed price will collapse once the high price years of the late 1970s are out of the formula.

That gets back to the point that I raised a little while ago about starting a program in difficult times, as opposed to starting it in times when things are better. Others say GRIP amounts to major off-loading of support for agriculture from the federal to the provincial governments. There is some merit to that argument as well, because in some cases the federal government has attempted in the past to shift a burden of responsibility on the provinces.

Under crop insurance and certain other stabilization programs, there has been both federal and provincial contributions. So to that extent, certainly in my own province of Ontario, the situation is different than perhaps it is in other regions of the country.

I would just read another comment which I think should be brought to your attention, and it is with respect to banking institutions. This particular article is entitled "Royal Bank Likes Program". It is from the Western Producer of February 14. It quotes the chief executive officer of the Royal Bank, Allan Taylor, as saying:

> The worry that the bank would grab hold of this, grab all the money for the debt, and leave nothing else so it becomes a wonderful thing for lenders and not so good for the farmers, that wouldn't happen I don't think, because—we've got to try and keep the farmers on the farm.

A number of us think that perhaps there should be legislation, to ensure that in fact that happens. However, perhaps we should consider having legislation to ensure that the banks do not grab hold of everything. Second, any kind of a good insurance program that will bring stability to the agricultural system, is bound to assist in alleviating some of the difficulties in obtaining farm financing that are encountered right now. I say to you that is of equal concern as any of the other issues in terms of obtaining financing for the continuing operation of farms. Anything that would bring that stability would be tremendously welcome, and perhaps this would.

In conclusion, then, I want to reiterate my support for the general outline that is announced in this bill, and hope that the specifics of the program as they develop in the future will be such that the optimism that we have today will be realized.

Perhaps some of that is a little bit Utopian, but nevertheless, because with the way things are in agriculture we have to give some benefit of the doubt right now and hope that things will improve very soon.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say, before I begin my remarks today, that I would like to split my 20-minute time with the member for Essex—Windsor. I will speak for 10 minutes and then accept five minutes of questions. So will the member for Essex—Windsor, if that meets with your approval.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Hughes): Of course, the Speaker is in the hands of the House. I believe that there is general agreement.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today and speak on Bill C-98, the legislation which provides authority to the federal government to enter into negotiations with the provinces and reach an agreement with agriculture support programs.

The programs, GRIP and NISA, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account are becoming well known throughout the farm community and come at a time when a long-term income stability program is desperately needed.

The farm income forecasts for 1991 are not very positive. In fact, Statistics Canada reported in the last week of February that the Manitoba and Saskatchewan economies will fare the worst of all provincial economies in 1991 because of the recession and low grain prices.

In Saskatchewan, information meetings on the new support programs, GRIP and NISA, are well attended as producers are anxious to get information that might give them hope of improved income and some stability in the industry in the future.

A long-term income stability program is necessary when governments control products and price, but not inputs and expenses. Problems develop, and it is important to find solutions to those problems.

The agriculture debt across Canada is more than $22 billion, and the price paid to farmers for grains and oilseeds is inadequate to meet production and financing costs. Obviously, something has to happen. If the marketplace is not able to provide an adequate price, then the federal government has an obligation to sustain Canada's food industry until the price is adequate unless we, as a nation, are prepared to lose that industry. Then, we have no choice.

The ability of Canadian farmers to compete internationally is beyond their individual control. We are well aware that the price paid for farm products and the amount sold is determined away from the farm gate.

The only control a farmer has is over the inputs, not the price but the amount he puts into his operation. The costs of those inputs, of course, are determined by the marketplace and are certainly much higher than the income available to the producer to pay for them.

Competing against other governments is absolutely out of the individual's control. Take the U.S. Export Enhancement Program as an example. The Western Producer in late February reported that the United States recently sold a bushel of feed wheat to a Norwegian fish farm for $1.50.

The subsidization on that sale was a contribution from the United States taxpayer of $1.42. The United States sold 917,000 bushels with this $1.42 subsidy on a $1.50 selling price, further contributing to the decreasing price for feed grain.

That deal was outrageous and disastrous for producers around the world, including those in the United States. It guarantees the price for grain will stay down. The only real winners in that deal were the fish on the Norwegian farm that were getting that soft winter red wheat for feed.

The losers, in addition to Canada and U.S. producers are the U.S. taxpayers whose money is feeding those Norwegian fish. The Saskatchewan farmer obviously cannot compete against this kind of nonsense no matter how hard he or she works.

The legislation in front of us today starts to address Canada's internal problems in the face of these international problems. It recognizes that financial support is necessary and commits federal participation in the process.

There are problems, some of which I will address in a moment but because there are problems, I want to urge the government to take a long, hard look at these programs when the legislation goes to committee for study and be prepared to make changes. Changes are important because these programs are designed to stay in place for a long period of time. The farm sector and the people who survive on the farm depend on the success of these programs for their future viability.

• (1330)

Producers, particularly grain producers on the prairies, know that GRIP and NISA become the only support they have, they want only the best that can be designed. If, for any reason, GRIP and NISA are not the best that they can be, we may be dooming an entire generation of farmers.

Unfortunately, one generation of farmers has almost already been sacrificed. There are very few young farmers on the prairies and that represents a problem in itself but a problem that will have to be addressed on another day.

Last week I was visiting a number of farm families south of the Battlefords and we discussed GRIP and NISA at some length. There were a number of opinions within each family. The government would be well advised to consider some of their thoughts.

The huge debt loads on these farm families and their concern for the future would likely be shared by most in their situation. How they look at the future depends on their age. Older farmers, especially those who have survived recessions and droughts, are skeptical about the new GRIP initiative because they see the moving average, this 15-year term, as simply a guarantee that the prices will remain low. Many are not considering signing up for the program, but rather hope to see a continuation of deficiency payments until prices rise on their own sufficiently to cover the production costs on the farm.

Younger farmers are more likely to accept the GRIP program because they are so desperate for cash that any program that will get them through one more bad year can't be all bad. They are more concerned about the immediate than the future. I am somewhat surprised at that basic response from the younger farmers, who tell me that they are prepared to sign on to the GRIP program for the first few years when the financial return is expected to be high, but are likely to drop out after a year or two when the return is predicted to be much lower.

If GRIP is to be at all successful, this callous approach must be addressed and the problem corrected, because the entire program will collapse with a huge deficit and little ongoing on-farm support if participation of the young farmers is not maintained.

This is just one of the matters that the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture will have to look at when it gets this legislation to study next week.

There is also the question of whether the program will cause farmers to plant more acres of wheat in a year when prices are at rock bottom and when wheat is needed the least. The question was raised in late February by analysts with Ag Decision, a research group, which says that GRIP will dramatically change the way farmers will operate, and may influence the type of crops grown and the amount of land seeded. The analysts report they had expected a decrease of about 8 per cent in wheat acreage in 1991-92 but now expect it to increase by about 3 per cent. That concerns me because of my personal concern for the environment and the unfortunate but at this time necessary use of marginal land for crop production in the northern part of Saskatchewan.

I am also concerned with the process which is bringing us GRIP and changing the face of agriculture support payments forever. The legislation in front of us today is enabling legislation. It is not the GRIP or the NISA programs, the details both of which are contained not in this legislation but in agreements which have yet to be signed by a number of the provinces, and in regulations which we may not see yet for another few months.

Details of the program are being sold to farmers across the west and are available, but not the fine print. We do not know if the programs will work; we do not know what they will cost, and we do not know if they indeed answer the problems that face us in the long term.

The federal government, using its marketplace-oriented master plan, outlined in its paper Growing Together, initiated the discussions and they consulted widely with the farm and industry groups.

However, Bill C-98 and the programs it established is scheduled to go into effect on April 1, less than three weeks away. Agreements are being signed with the provinces, farmers are being signed up, and Parliament has yet to give the authority to even enter into these negotiations. I fear the mistakes of the past are being repeated and that GRIP and NISA may turn out simply to be four letter versions of the GST, programs that are flawed and faulty but cannot be changed because the government has committed too much to them before the final assessment is in. GRIP in many ways parallels the New Democrats agriculture policy unveiled during the 1988 federal election campaign. We recognized then the need for a long-term stabilization policy that would protect farmers against losses caused by price declines of any kind and natural disasters which can strike farmers individually or collectively at any time.

In developing our policy, however, we differed from the government's current program in that we thought then and still do today that support for farmers should be based on cost of production and not on a 15-year moving average.

Our program would provide basic price guarantees for part of each year's sales that are consumed domestically or about 8,000 bushels.

I think the idea of a long-term income stabilization plan is good and that these programs are necessary. I only hope that the government is prepared to make the necessary changes before April 1, changes that will secure, not deter, the future of farming in Canada.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): It is an unusual pleasure I have to say, Madam Speaker, to stand and offer some compliments to this government. I must say it is with some hesitation that I do so but in this case it has set up a process involving farmers across the country, which will permit those farmers to pull together some long-term responses to the continuing cost pressures and price pressures which farmers have been facing.

I have had a chance to talk with farmers in my constituency at a series of community meetings about both the programs on which we now have some detail, GRIP and NISA. I have to say that most farmers in my constituency do recognize that this is an important step forward.

They have some concerns, however, and so what I will be presenting in my brief comments today is their sense of acceptance of an approach combined with their sense of concern about some of the details of that approach. I hope very much as we support this legislation to go to the agricultural committee, it will be possible within that committee to deal with some of the inadequacies in the legislation as it now stands and the inadequacies in the proposals which, as my colleague has noted, are not actually in the legislation but in the details which have been provided to us up to this stage.

The two key programs on which we have some detail are first, GRIP, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, which for eastern farmers is something slightly different in its implications than for western farmers. For western farmers this, of course, replaces the Western Grain Stabilization Act. For eastern farmers it replaces crop insurance programs which have been much more of a patchwork quilt than in the case of the farmers in the western part of Canada. One of the things which I am pleased about with the legislation is that we finally do have something of a common approach being taken to farm problems across the country. Certainly we in our part of Canada have felt considerable grievance at the fact that much agricultural policy, especially coming from this government, has tended to be aimed at western farmers, not recognizing that farmers from Ontario and, indeed, farmers from Quebec have faced many of the same problems.

With respect to eastern Canada, the crops which will be covered by GRIP are corn, soybeans, canola, oats, barley and winter and spring wheat. For our particular part of Ontario in Essex County, this is a reasonably good selection of crops. The inclusion of soybeans, for instance, of which I had some concerns is an important step forward on the part of the government.

There are, however, for my particular part of Canada some crops which are missing. We look particularly for the specialized vegetable crops. We look indeed for the less spcialized vegetable crops like tomatoes, which are very important right across Essex County. We do not see them covered by this legislation and, frankly, that is unfortunate.

The legislation has some other problems associated with it which I want to stress as the debate moves on to the agriculture committee. We have considerable concern about the decision to base support on a 15-year moving average of prices. Most farmers whom that I have talked to have said to me: "When we look at how these averages will work out over the next few years, this is a program which makes a great deal of sense for us for the first two or three years, but makes much less sense for the future". Many farmers talk quite openly, as my colleague noted, about the probability that they would enter the program and then leave it after two or three years. That is not the basis of a satisfactory program.

For ourselves, we would like to see this 15-year moving price average replaced by a cost of production formula which would give to farmers some sense of security, one where the cost of production is taken on an average basis across farmers so that you are not covering the least efficient farmers with their complete cost of production, but instead trying to encourage efficiency but nevertheless recognizing that it is the difference between cost of production and price which is the crucial issue. Our farmers are very concerned to see that take place.

We are also very anxious to see an emphasis in the resulting legislation which recognizes the importance of providing support for fallow crops, crops which help to regenerate the capacity of the soil, if we are to move to a sustainable agriculture for the future. We need a program like this to support not just these common cash crops which are grown in Essex County but also crops such as beans, for instance, which help to regenerate the soil and provide the basis for future sustainability in our agricultural activities.

We are also concerned about the reality, as it appears so far that there will be different levels of support provided to farmers in different parts of the country. Ontario, for instance, under the new NDP government, has committed itself to a 90 per cent coverage, whereas other provinces have said that they believe they will not be able to cover more than 70 per cent.

I think that this kind of differential is not going to be something that will make this a long-term solution to our agricultural problems in the country. So, I look for that to be corrected in the future.

Finally, I think that while this step is important in solving some of the long-term problems which farmers face in this country, there is a short-term problem, a short-term cash crisis which farmers face which also must be covered.

Farmers in my community have called for a bridge payment to help producers seed their crops this spring. I call on the government to see to it that this Farm Protection Act provides such a filling of the gap for farmers across this country because, frankly, if we do not respond now to the concerns of family farmers across Canada, we will not have a viable family farm sector to deal with in the future. That is what we, as a country, I think, have found to be very successful in the past for us in farming and will find to be very successful in the future if we provide the support that is necessary.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Keyes: Madam Speaker, I seek unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion:

That notwithstanding any Standing Order, on Monday, March 11, the House meet at one o'clock and proceed to business of supply.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, as long as we have the knowledge that this bill is going to be completed at this present time, we would give our consent to that motion, but only if assurance is given.

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, certainly from our perspective, we would agree with the suggestion made by the Official Opposition and we would certainly be prepared to indicate that we have no more speakers on this bill, unless the Liberals do. I assume, therefore, the assurances can be given.

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, with regard to the comment raised by my colleague opposite, we have no more speakers at this time on Bill C-98 on second reading. I know the member would not want to mislead the House in thinking that the bill would be passed in all stages today, but we would be happy to accommodate in passing this bill on second reading today.

Of course, if you concur with the motion as put by my colleague, opposition day would start at one o'clock on Monday since there is no Private Members' hour on that particular day.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, with that assurance, we would give our concurrence to the motion. Certainly, we did not expect all stages of the bill to be passed today, only second reading.

Motion agreed to

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

EMPLOYMENT

FEDERALLY FUNDED TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of requiring that employers who benefit from federally-funded training programs provide long-term employment to trainees.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is particularly fortuitous that this piece of private members' legislation should be coming before the House on the day that the latest unemployment statistics for the country have been released.

These unemployment statistics represent, I would have to say, a serious shock since they have taken unemployment to a level of 10.2 per cent in the country, a level which is the highest we have seen in Canada since 1985. Perhaps what is most disturbing is that when one looks at these unemployment statistics, some of the details are particularly difficult, particularly hard to accept.

One sees, for instance, that the loss in permanent jobs has been especially dramatic. Comparing the figures for February of last year with the figures for February of this year which have just come out, there is a total job loss of 420,000 permanent jobs. That is a staggering figure. It is a statistic, but of course it represents hundreds of thousands of people across this country and hundreds of thousands of families who have seen their prospects which they thought were secure for themselves and their children destroyed in the past year.

We have talked, in the course of the New Democratic economic recovery tour that has been going across the country, with a number of groups in many different cities in the country. I recall one statement especially, which struck home in a very powerful way. It was a statement from somebody in Cambridge, Ontario who said to me that in the 1981-1982 recession when a lot of people were out of work it was nevertheless the case that their factories remained. Those factories, people expected, would eventually get back to work and the jobs that had been lost would return.

What has happened in this recession—and it is this which is so tragic—is that people see the factories in which they have worked, the shops in which they have worked, the companies for which they have worked, in very many cases closing up. We have a bankruptcy rate which is even greater than in 1981-1982. We have a great many companies shifting out of the country as a result of the United States free trade deal, moving activities to the United States.

There are other companies that are making decisions to shift to Mexico, to the Maquiladora section of northern Mexico, where they feel they will be able to serve the American market, and eventually if free trade with Mexico goes through the Canadian market, from that extremely low wage part of North America. The jobs have not just disappeared for a time as these people see it, but the jobs have disappeared as they see it permanently. There sense of despair, a sense of tremendous frustration and a sense of tremendous anger which we have heard as a consequence.

I hope that this transfer of plants to the United States, this transfer of economic activity south, is not something which will have permanently eliminated the jobs that have been lost. I believe that there are things that we could be doing as a country to get these jobs back and to stop more jobs from disappearing.

Unfortunately the recent government budget does not seem to have reflected some of those changes which in my view were necessary. One such change, it seems to me, has to be in the area of training.

I believe we have to adopt a philosophy to move this country ahead through what I would call investment in the future. That can include a vast number of things. It can include investment in research and development, investment in the basic education system of the country, and investment in the infrastructure.

It must, I believe above all, involve investment in skill training for the future, Our capacity to be successful as an economy down the road depends very much on having the skilled people to be able to work in what one might call a high value added society. That is a society where we are not producing basic, easily produced commodities which lead us inevitably into competition with Third World countries, but which leads us into new product areas, into new and sophisticated production techniques by which we are able to produce products with particularly highly technical specifications and particular specialized uses throughout the world economy.

To achieve that, we must have the skilled work force to be able to run the machines, to work on the shop floor, and to work in the office buildings throughout this country which give us the vast increases in productivity and human capital essential to a country if it is to survive successfully in the 21st century in the face of competition from many low wage countries that can increasingly and quite rightly compete with us in the traditional areas of activity in which we are engaged in our manufacturing sectors.

How do we succeed in building that emphasis on training for the future? I think that we have first to recognize that in this country the situation seems to be one in which the support for training programs is not increasing but rather decreasing. If we take the period from 1985 to 1991 and the Canada Jobs Strategy, for instance, the funds which were provided for training through CJS started with a total of $1.4 billion allocated in 1985.

Less than $1 billion of that, actually, is for training. Some of it is for other programs as well. That increased in 1986–87 and was increased in 1990. It was then decreased in 1991. As of 1991 the total amount available to CJS is $1.4 billion, precisely the same amount as in 1985, despite the much greater cost of training in 1991 compared to 1985.

We have seen some increases take place through the unemployment insurance system, but really it is extremely difficult to see a sufficient increase in any way to offset the increased costs which exist for training programs and which are not being covered by increased expenditures.

I do not want to pretend that the way to solve these problems is simply to spend more money. That has been part of the problem of the past. It has often been the view of especially the Liberal Party when it was in government that simply increasing expenditure was somehow the way to solve the problem. I think that it does make the situation considerably more difficult when training functions are being squeezed for resources at a time when we desperately need more training to be taking place in the country.

Nevertheless, the key things that we believe need to be done threefold. First, we think it is extremely important that large scale corporations in the country start to recognize that they have a responsibility to undertake training. What we find in my constituency, for instance, is that most of the training, most of the serious apprenticeship programs which exist throughout the Windsor and Essex county area, are undertaken by the medium and small scale firms. Once people are trained, the large scale companies will then steal these people away at much higher wages and manage to fulfil their need for skilled workers without ever having to put into place training programs designed to increase the pool of such skilled workers.

We suggested a number of different approaches to try to deal with this problem. We suggested, for instance, that it would make a good deal of sense to have a training levy for all companies over a certain size within our economy. It would be possible for any such company to use up the money which it would otherwise owe the government in that training levy by undertaking training programs itself. If it did so, it would not have to pay the training levy.

In fact, if it over-expended, if it spent more than the training levy amount, it would be possible for such companies to receive government support for their training programs coming from the payment of those training levies on the part of companies that do not undertake such training.

In other words, we have some kind of a redistribution process within the company sector that sees to it that companies that take their training responsibilities seriously receive incentives and support to do so. That is one thing that we should set in place.

A second thing that we should set in place is a recognition that effective training is going to have to be training on the job. In part a training levy approach would encourage that, but I think we also need to say to provincial governments throughout this country that we are prepared as a federal level of government to provide support to the provinces for training activities but those training activities, undertaken for instance through various community colleges, must involve a very serious element of on the job training.

In the case of community colleges in Ontario, I would hope very much that a co-operative arrangement could be worked out through the new Ontario government and the federal government so that more money would be provided for training and that those community colleges and the training programs supported by the provincial and federal governments would commit themselves to see to it that at least half the period of the training program was spent on the job. That would give people graduating from those programs a sense of experience and, frankly, it would give them considerably better training.

Finally, I think that it is also useful to put into effect regulations through the federal and provincial training programs which I hope will become increasingly important in the future. Companies that benefit from having people working on the job or are supported through a training levy system should make a commitment to the people who are trained with what is in effect such federal-provincial government support. Such companies should see to it that the people involved would have a preferential chance at jobs within those companies.

That is what this particular motion which I have moved today sets out as a philosophy. Employers who benefit from federally funded training programs should see to it that long-term training is something which also leads to employment within those companies.

I think if that happens, if we start to take training seriously in this country, five years from now we should not have to look at such grim unemployment statistics as those which have been released today by Statistics Canada.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the matter before us poses a new meaning to the phrase job training.

• (1420)

Job training normally means acquiring the skills to do a particular kind of work. But the hon. member's motion asks us in effect to guarantee every job trainee a job. If the federal government's training program did not lead to jobs we might indeed be forced to consider this or some other similarly radical proposal to overhaul our strategy; but long-term employment is the essence of our training programs. By far the great majority of our training projects lead directly to full employment lasting a year or more for most participants.

If a training project fails to meet its objective, if the trainees who participated end up having difficulty finding a job that meets our standards; in other words they cannot find jobs that are full-time, satisfying and well-paying, then we cease funding that project. It is that straightforward and simple.

As for the suggestion that participating employers be forcefully required to hire job trainees, surely the hon. member is not seriously implying that the government scrap its newly created approach to job training based on consultation and co-operation, and not compulsion. We all know that if an employee takes training he cannot be compelled to stay where he works. He may, for various reasons, not want to stay there. I am referring to the creation of the 22-member Canadian Job Labour Force Development Board announced by the Minister of Employment and Immigration just recently.

But let me return to the motion for the moment. If you decide to compel employers to do something, it is because you have tried everything without success; so you simply require them to do it, you do not consult with them. In other words, you demand compliance only after consultation and negotiation have totally failed.

But our new approach to job training has only just started. The Canadian Labour Force Development Board has only just been created. And, as the hon. member's alma mater, the Toronto Star, phrased it in its lead editorial on January 16, "The new federal approach is truly an attempt to co-ordinate our training programs and solve problems from the bottom up instead of the top down".

Mr. Boudria: Great newspaper.

Mr. Kempling: Surely with the promise of grassroots consultation ahead of us we should be giving this new venture a chance instead of marching in with a top-down requirement like the one urged in his motion.

Furthermore, the motion seems to cast government and employers as labour-market combatants. But, in fact, Canada has many economic players: business, labour, government, social action groups, educators, as well as the trainees themselves. Marshalling their insights on the training issue has been the federal government's main intent since setting out to design the Labour Force Development Strategy two years ago.

Ours is the consultative approach. Rather than addressing the training issue by saying, okay, what is the problem and how do we solve it, the government has asked: who do we want around the table to help define the problems and seek the solutions?

A policy paper entitled Success In the Works which the minister tabled in April 1989 helped define the problem. According to this paper, if present trends were to continue, the 1990s would see Canada's work force become less and less competitive. Now, with the creation of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board, we have made a start on the solution. Not the gently dictatorial solution proposed in the hon. member's motion, but a rather modern consultative strategy which has the strong support and the approval of all players. The federal government needs that support, for training is everyone's concern.

It will take a virtual army of trained and skilled workers to ensure the strength of Canada's economy. Through formation of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board we have recruited the key players who will begin to work out the major issues.

These issues are to ensure that the private sector plays an active role in the decisions affecting skills training in Canada; only one in four businesses provide formal training to their workers; a dwindling labour force growth rate, now only 60 per cent of what it was in the 1970s; a mismatch in some regions between skills and people who have the skills that are needed.

You can see right away that simply requiring employers to retain trainees on staff would not go very far towards solving any of these issues. Yet the motion is right in one sense, job training and skill development are central to meeting the challenge of ensuring that Canadian workers achieve their full potential.

Training is the central issue faced by the members of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board. In fact, labour, industry and government, both at the federal and provincial levels, agree that a Canada-wide training effort is essential for the future prosperity of our country.

All interests are represented: eight from employer groups, eight from labour, two from training providers, four from social action groups representing women, persons with disabilities, visible minorities and aboriginal groups. The board should be in operation by the end of March.

The establishment of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board is a major step in the advancement of Canadian labour-market training programs. Major technological advances in industries around the world demand the growth of new methods and skills here at home. Canadian workers need to acquire the new skills required to keep them working.

As much as this is a key initiative for business, labour and other stakeholders involved with skills development, the Canadian Labour Force Development Board is even more important in these economically troubled times. It is clear proof of people's willingness to work together for the betterment of all Canadians.

We applaud these pioneers who have come with common purpose to the table to consult on job training, something which, to quote The Toronto Star editorial once more, is both right and a necessity.

By all means, let us have federally funded job training programs that lead to full-time jobs. Let us impress upon employers who benefit from our programs that they play a pivotal role in the training and retraining of our work force.

With the creation of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board, the federal government has the means of developing a true consensus in Canada about what is needed to train or retrain our youth, our unemployed and workers of all ages who are being displaced in a more competitive and fundamentally restructured economy.

I just want to conclude by saying that I have been through this whole phase in my own business many years ago. I know what the member is talking about, the problem of training employees and seeing them scooped away by a large industry. But I think, with that experience behind me and looking at this Labour Force Development Board and knowing the program behind it,

I am quite confident that we are going to do a good job down the road and this program will help employ any person in Canada who really wants a job.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, may I start my comments by congratulating the member for describing, so eloquently, the words written in that valiant newspaper The Toronto Star. Some of us appreciate and have appreciated that paper for a long time and I am glad to see this new-found appreciation on the part of Conservative members for the The Toronto Star. It is nice to see that conversion on the part of government members. I will remind other Conservatives when they criticize The Toronto Star that it has been extensively quoted by one of their own colleagues today in the House of Commons.

Getting back to the serious issue before us, I have read this motion and I have listened to the speech of the hon. member presenting it and although I am sure it is well-intentioned, I do have some problems with it. I will describe them to you in the following way.

I have had experience in my constituency of some programs, particularly those of job entry and job re-entry.

Both of those programs are very successful in the riding that I represent. What they have done is taken women who had not been in the work force for many years, some of them had actually never participated in the traditional work force—not to demean, of course, their contribution at home—but in the paid work force, if we can call it that, they had not contributed for many years or perhaps not at all. Through this program they were able to integrate into the work force.

• (1430)

That is not always easy for a person who has small children at home, or even where the children are grown, and they live outside a village or town and need transportation into town to go through the training. In some cases, as a component of job re-entry, day care is provided for the children. That has been very effective and it has worked well in my constituency. The Prescott-Russell Separate School Board and the Board of Education have done a tremendous job in making that work. They are the people who have provided the training.

How in blazes am I supposed to expect those people to hire them? They provide the training, but they do not keep those people, Madam Speaker. They are not supposed to; they are a school. This is part of the alternative education program. That is just about the only training that goes on in my riding.

If we were to force the Prescott-Russell Board of Education to hire everyone it trains, we would have more teachers than students at the end of the program. That could not possibly work, at least in the area I represent.

I would imagine that the motion, knowing where the member comes from, is designed to target large industries particularly that perhaps have a tendency to go to small industries and rob them of their best employees with a few extra dollars rather than train their own. Then the small businesses have to train employees only to see them stolen later by the larger employers.

I think the parliamentary secretary, a former businessman himself, was describing that kind of situation as having perhaps happened to himself in the past.

If we are to consider what our colleague from Essex—Windsor proposes in the motion, the motion is going to have to be reworded extensively in order not to have penalties imposed upon people whose job it is—and who do it very successfully—to train others for re-employment using federal government programs.

In my constituency, I wish we had more participation in training by employers. We have had some but, to a large measure, the training has been done, as I said previously, by the alternative education program of both our Separate School Board and Board of Education.

I would not want us to adopt a motion that would suggest outright that employers who benefit—and the employer here is the Board of Education; it benefits by giving the jobs to their teachers to train those people—should be saddled with the burden of those people. The net result would obviously be that it would cease to train these people, largely women, who have received this very valuable training over the last three or four years. This is one sector of the Canadian Jobs Strategy that I must compliment the government on.

That might surprise you, Madam Speaker, complimenting the government is not something I do very often in this House. And I can tell, notwithstanding your impartial usual objectivity, that there is a tendency on the part of perhaps the Speaker, or at least other members, to smile when I say that.

That part of Canadian Jobs Strategy has worked; namely, job entry and job re-entry. It has done well in my area. I think the program is good, but I also think that the people who have made it work in my area have done a very good job. They have had success rates of something like 90 per cent in placements when dealing with so-called ordinary clients; and when dealing with social assistance-type recipients they have trained—we call those SAR in the short-form language that Employment and Immigration Canada uses—they have had success rates of something like 75 per cent.

That is pretty good, as far as I am concerned. When you find jobs for three out of every four, particularly given the unemployment that is in the constituency that I represent, those programs have been successful. This is a good opportunity for me to state that and to compliment those who have made the program work in my constituency.

[Translation]

But I would certainly not want us to pass a motion forcing the school boards I just mentioned to hire the very people they trained. That would kill the programs in no time, Madam Speaker, for lack of participation, if the school boards had to keep, to retain, to hire every person they provided with this kind of training.

So, I want to tell my colleague from Essex-Windsor that, while there is no doubt good points in his proposal, there are flaws in the formulation of his motion, and I have already indicated a few to the House. There may be others as well, as we might find out from other speakers who will describe what the situation is in their ridings as part of this debate.

It might be worth exploring the subject further though. Perhaps the hon. member would agree to withdraw his motion and refer the issue to a parliamentary committee so that could be considered the whole problem described by the parliamentary secretary when he told us, for instance, that some industries, rather than training their own employees, prefer to go and lift some from smaller employers who cannot afford to pay them as well. That is not unusual in the industry.

[English]

Madam Speaker, another thing we should look at as well is this whole business of how seniority and wage structure in some industries is developing at the present time. I bring this problem to your attention so that if we are to study the subject matter, I would hope that we would also study the difficulty within industry whereby, for instance, trainees and particularly apprentices are paid much less than, for instance, a janitor.

Let me set out that proposition. If you are a janitor in a plant and you make a certain salary, and you would like to train to be a machinist of some sort, or a skilled worker, you often have to take a cut in salary in order to become an apprentice. That is a big problem that we should study, should we decide to withdraw that motion and refer the subject matter.

I have enumerated some of the problems that I see that need to be studied further, but I think that the motion as presently worded does offer, perhaps, more problems than it does solutions.

[Translation]

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, this is a historic event. One of my colleagues, our friend, the hon. member for Burlington quoted the Toronto Star positively. Another one, a founding member of the rat pack actually congratulated the government. This is a truly memorable day, Madam Speaker!

Madam Deputy Speaker: I could not agree more with the hon. member. This is, of course, International Women's Day.

[English]

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I am happy to rise on this motion. Like my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, I had some of the same difficulties with reading the face of the motion. I listened, therefore, with interest to the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, who has been a friend of mine. We were at college together, so I listen with great care to what he says because he often has useful things to say, as he did here today.

My dilemma is that I agreed with about two-thirds of what he said that had nothing to do with the motion that is before us, but what he said with regard to the motion that is before us I am afraid I must disagree with him. Therefore, I rise.

He made the point, I thought eloquently, of the need for a better blueprint for training our workers for a prescription for the future where we were going to have high-tech needs and the need to be more competitive in the global economy. He was, in fact, almost directly citing every single bank report one reads today. To get that from the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, it was gratifying to hear that understanding of the reality we face, but the motion goes the wrong way.

If you have spent time in your constituency, and I know the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has in his, talking to businesses that are already in the enormous difficulties that recessions pose, about trying to find the funds to do the things that need to be done to get more people back to work and on payrolls, any suggestion at the moment that one was going to add to the capacity to access training of an obligation—whether that worker has worked out or not—or any other sense of an excuse for a business to say no because there was a perception that what was coming was the heavy hand of government in an audit way thereafter, saying that if you have used and accessed training funds you must now provide long-term employment simply because government has come along and said you have to do it.

My sense of it from my own business experience, and I know the hon. member for Burlington would agree, is that that will not encourage people to put our people back to work. It will discourage them. I know that in my heart and in his heart that that is not the purpose that the hon. member for Essex—Windsor had when he brought this proposal to the House.

I appreciate, as I am sure we all do, the hon. member's desire to protect employment for Canadian workers. I understand and I respect the concern expressed, therefore, in his motion. I think I understand the good intentions that lie behind the motion, the sense that we have to find more ways to encourage our businesses and use government moneys in better, more targeted and more useful ways to make sure that those people who need retraining get it, and that in fact businesses participate in that program.

I can assure the hon. member that all of us want our investment in Canadian men and women to produce timely dividends. Perhaps we need to remind ourselves that we can best secure positive labour market results by supplying people with the training programs they need to pursue appropriate careers and to assist businesses in making sure that those desires are encouraged. That is not done by putting obstacles in the path of business in the training programs.

That is why this government has been so intent on providing training and retraining opportunities for Canadian workers. That is why we have developed the programs to encourage the private sector, including business and labour representative and professional trainers to enter into training partnerships with us of the kind, among other things, mentioned by the hon. member previously.

That is why the comprehensive strategy was developed, the Labour Force Development Strategy, to serve the needs of employers and workers alike. I think everybody in this House wants Canadian men and women to realize their full potential. We want them to participate successfully in the global economy that, whether we like it or not, is coming.

It is only through the education and training of our labour force that we can build a strong and competitive future and that we can compete in that new world that is coming.

Maybe it would be worth while to put on the record the record of this government with regard to these matters because I know the hon. member for Essex—Windsor had the view that somehow the government is reducing its interest in training. The government has, in fact, increased over time the investment in the training and the retraining of workers in programs offered since 1985 through the Canadian Jobs Strategy and, since this last fall, the new programs in the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

The government has always maintained that the failure to preserve a competitive work force would have dire consequences not only for individuals who lose their jobs, but for Canada's general economic prospects. We are aware that a training gap between our workers and those in other countries would have serious consequences for our economic health.

It would make our labour force and our industries less and less competitive. For those who sometimes accuse the free trade agreement of being the reason that many of our manufacturers have left this country, a closer examination of the decisions by those who have left should be made. It is more often from those who have gone because they believe the business environment, certainly in the province of Ontario where I come from, is driven by the costs imposed on business by the province of Ontario and not by the free trade agreement. This has been the chief reason that they have felt the competitive economy that they need to work in is not going to be here at least as that economy is being developed by the governments they see.

Consequently, this government has dedicated more dollars to job training and skill enhancement than any previous government in Canada. This year, over $3 billion will be spent by the government on the UI fund, on training allowances and on employment programming. The investment was not made hastily, and the ideas behind it were thought out and developed through consultations with everybody the government could think of: experts, organizations, groups including the Advisory Council on Adjustment.

In March 1989, that council delivered the report Adjusting to Win, an analysis of the constantly evolving work place, on how our workers and businesses can best exploit the world that is coming through the free trade agreement.

The advisory council observed that the major portion of Canadian labour market expenditures were directed to income maintenance, unemployment insurance—the safety net which we all know so well—and that a much smaller percentage of our resources went into employment promotion. The council specifically recommended that governments should shift that balance.

While ensuring that unemployment insurance would continue to provide temporary income protection to unemployed Canadians, it was recommended that more resources should be directed toward upgrading the skills of the Canadian labour force. Canadians would then better project themselves into the volatile labour market of the 1990s. No one who has witnessed the host of changes brought about by something as tiny as a microchip could deny that today's labour force is in a state of dramatic transition. All of us here are familiar with the important challenges posed by technological change, expanding international trade and competition as well as changes in the work force itself. That is why the labour force development strategy places such a major emphasis on skill development and employment training and I could not agree more with the hon. member for Essex—Windsor about the need to make sure that our work force is given the skills it will need.

The federal government is determined to provide leadership in helping Canadians prepare for that labour market that is coming. The task will never be ours alone. Our primary role will, in effect, to be to incorporate the efforts and co-operation of business and labour. We are now enlisting the resources of both business and labour in our training and upgrading efforts.

I suggest the hon. member also ignores the successes to date. His recommendation would in fact, in my view, put a damper on the developments we have achieved. The experience of other countries confirms that business must continually upgrade their workers' skills to remain competitive. For example, on a per employee basis Canadian business expends about one-half of the amount U.S. firms spend on training their workers. That is why we have committed so much of our resources to the training and retraining of workers, and that is the motivation behind the strategy.

All the research done indicates that the Canadian Jobs Strategy has had an excellent over-all record in helping those on the margins of the labour force and those who are most in need. We are planning and designing new programs, building and expanding on the strengths and successes of the Canadian Jobs Strategy program. This year we will spend $500 million more on these programs this year than was spent last year, $900 million more than the year before that.

Indeed, surveys of the national impact of a series of CJS initiatives shows a success rate after 12 months of over 71 per cent.

The hon. member's motion suggests that employers are failing to provide work for the people they train. The statistics suggest exactly the opposite, that the vast majority of those who receive training are permanently on the job, thanks to the skills they acquire. I do not think from my own experience there is a single employer in the country who would go through the exercise of training a worker and who would then want to lose a worker who was useful to him. The idea that you need to force somebody to keep somebody who is good for him and good for his business makes absolutely no sense to me. The world does not work like that. People who have been trained on a job in a business are the most likely people to get the permanent jobs that that company may be able to create in a growth economy.

More than 86 per cent of those who receive combined training and work experience have said they would keep their present job or, in their view, obtain a better one because of the training they have received.

We will continue to move further and further away from passive support programs and into skill development and relevant career training because we are determined to help young Canadians in particular realize their potential and become full participants in Canadian economic life.

We have committed $296.4 million to the five-year initiative to convince young Canadians to stay in school. Drop-outs become increasingly marginalized in the new and high-tech economy and we therefore have to keep more of our young people in the mainstream of economic life.

All of these programs, particularly the programs aimed at young people, have been expanded. We continue to direct more resources into co-operative education, work orientation workshops, Canada Career Week, and counselling services, and we are doing our best to mobilize business, labour, and the provinces in our stay-in-school efforts.

Madam Speaker, I know my speaking time is about to expire and I would therefore simply close with this: If one assumes that the hon. member for Essex—Windsor's long-term objective, and I think it probably is, is to get more Canadians who are out of work back to work, then somewhere in his thinking I think that he would understand that while we may have a different philosophical approach about how we believe business will get back to being able to create work in this country, we believe it will come through lower interest rates and less government intervention and more opportunities for business with government's assistance.

That is the philosophy we choose to adopt and I can assure him as I am sure you know, Madam Speaker, that we all want to put as many people back into real productive work as we possibly can.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Madam Speaker, many important developments have occurred since this motion was introduced, a long time ago.

Since it came to power, this government constantly improved, with the advice and assistance of other government levels and the private sector, the training and job programs it offers. In January, we announced a historical initiative calling for a government-private sector partnership. Because the concept was all new, we set up the Canadian Labour Force Commission.

One of the most important things we learned up to now is that the training and employment needs are very different from what they were a few years ago.

• (1450)

To set the context of these spectacular changes, we should perhaps look back a few years. When the government started looking into the problem of the labour force in Canada, we drew a number of conclusions which were grouped together in the policy statement entitled "Success in the Works" which was tabled in the House of Commons in April 1989.

The Labour force Development Strategy set out in "Success in the Works" predicted that, in the 1990s, the labour force would be confronted with new realities. The main one is that the level of training offered throughout the country no longer meets the requirements of the new decade.

We are going through rough times economically. The training and employment programs we are developping take into account these new realities, one of which is that Canada must invest more money and effort to train a more highly specialized manpower. We are also coming up against another reality, that of the globalization of the market, which will put us in competition with the rest of the world to sell our goods and services. As the international market gets more and more accessible, opportunities will become plentiful, but only for those of us who have acquired the appropriate skills.

It was stated in "Success in the Works" that, unless the trend reversed, there would be a loss of competitivity in the Canadian labour force in the 1990s. Such changes are much more than projections now, they are occurring. Overall changes are needed in our way of conducting business.

After the Labour Force Development Strategy was announced, the government invited the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre to undertake consultations to learn about the points of view and concerns of both major labour market components—unions and businesses.

Seven task forces were formed. Each was asked to consider an area in particular: apprenticeship, the training of older workers, the training of unemployment insurance claimants, the training of welfare recipients, and human resources planning.

The task forces have provided us with an entirely new outlook and made a number of recommendations. That is what the government intends to do. We are working in close co-operation with the private sector to take advantage of new opportunities that are open to Canadians. We are rethinking completely our training programs and we are restructuring them according to the recommendations of the working groups.

At the present time, Canada urgently needs a labour force capable of adjusting itself to a changing work environment. Our country depends on trade. Technological and demographic changes are occurring so rapidly that traditional methods are no longer bringing results. Canada is already lagging behind many other countries in the area of worker's skills and training.

Our workers will need to acquire new skills and upgrade those they already have. Meanwhile, the rest of world is making progress. Our competitors are reajusting and restructuring in order to meet the challenges of the 1990s and beyond.

To be able to compete against the rest of the world, we need a highly skilled, highly motivated labour force, flexible enough to adapt to any new situation. Our economic survival depends on the way we will educate and train our people. One way or another, almost every single Canadian will be affected. This is why we should be redirecting our efforts towards skill development.

This also means that employers will have to get involved more with training. To achieve this, the government introduced Bill C-21 to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act which was finally adopted last October. This legislative measure makes it possible to use part of the Unemployment Insurance Fund money for job retraining.

We wish also to support more and more the training offered by private enterprise. Even if Canadian corporations complain that workers lack the required skills, only 25 per cent of them are providing their employees with training opportunities.

On a per capita basis, Madam Speaker, Canadian corporations spend approximately half as much money to train their workers as their American counterparts. In Japan, employers spend three times as much money to train their employees as we do in Canada.

With the amended legislation following the adoption of Bill C-21, the private sector in Canada should be able to at least double—I repeat double—its training effort. On the other hand, as a result of the new measures we can allocate more funds to training programs for Canadians.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must regretfully interrupt the hon. member. The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale) moved:

That this House condemn the government for:

(1) maintaining a high interest/high dollar policy that gives foreigners a continuing competitive advantage over Canadian producers;

(2) cutting support for export promotion, science and technology and research and development, thereby accelerating Canada's slide into non-competitiveness; and

(3) its economic mismanagement that has caused record bankruptcies, put 1.4 million Canadians out of work and brought about the deindustrialization of Canada, especially Ontario.

He said: Several days ago in my riding of Willowdale I had an experience which I know members from all sides of this House have had. It is not a unique experience for me in terms of my experience in my riding of Willowdale. A gentleman who is 51 years of age, has a university education and has worked every day of his life, is an expert on computers, came into my office and said: "Mr. Peterson, I have been out of work now for six months. I cannot find a job. No one is hiring. Everyone is laying off people. What can you do to help me?"

Mr. Speaker, all of us have experienced this tragic event, tragic in terms of the human questions involved. This individual had a house, three children who are going to school—two of them in university—he had a mortgage to pay, he had a car loan to pay. He had to give up the payments on his car; he did not know how much longer he was going to be able to continue carrying his mortgage.

This is one of the great tragedies which occurs when we have a downturn in our economy. This is why we, as members of this House, realize that we have a beholden duty to our constituents to try to do everything possible to maintain jobs and the strength of our economy in Canada.

We have seen first-hand, all of us, the devastation that can be wreaked on individuals, on families, on municipalities, caused by unemployment and the present downturn in our economy.

This gentleman said to me: "Mr. Peterson, what can we do, what are the answers?" Our economic circumstances are extremely complicated, but I believe this government has made choices since it has come into office. We on this side of the House want to hold the government accountable to every Canadian for the choices it has made.

• (1310)

Let us look at the facts of what the Tories have accomplished in their seven years of running this economy. In 1984 our current account balance had a $2.7 billion surplus. Last year this had fallen to a $16 billion deficit. In terms of our trade with other countries, and Canada is a trading nation, in 1984 we had a surplus of $19.8 billion. Last year it had fallen to $10.8 billion.

What has happened? Why have we degenerated in terms of our ability to compete on the world markets? I give the Minister of Finance credit for recognizing our declining world competitiveness, having mentioned it in his last budget.

In February 1986, about the time that this government was entering into free trade discussions with the United States, the Canadian dollar was at a low of 69.13 cents vis-à-vis the American dollar. In August of last year the dollar reached 88.58 cents. That is more than a 28 per cent increase in five short years in the value of our dollar. Every one of our Canadian producers, especially our exporters, will confirm that the most devastating difficulty they have had in competing in export markets is the fact that our dollar has given a 28 per cent advantage to the Americans over the last five years.

In addition to that, we have had a high interest rate policy whereby our interest rates have climbed more than 5 percentage points higher than those paid by our American competitors. This has meant that Canadian business has been very hard pressed to modernize and to pay for the cost of money in order to carry on their ordinary business affairs. When you put the interest rate differential and the increase in our dollar on the backs of Canadians producers, is it any wonder that we are into a made-in-Canada recession, that our people have not been able to compete and that we have had a record number of business bankruptcies. Along with those business bankruptcies come the personal tragedies of which I spoke earlier, the personal bankruptcies as people cannot pay their bills.

This has been accomplished for us by the Minister of Finance on the basis that he was going to control the deficit. Over that period of time, our national debt has more than doubled. If interest rates had been kept lower, it would have saved us a monumental amount of money. For every percentage point the minister could have lowered the interest rates, it would have saved us $1.6 billion in the first year alone on our national debt. For every percentage point that he drove up the interest rates and thereby brought the dollar up, for every cent our dollar went up against the Americans it cost us $1.3 billion in lost exports.

We have seen the devastation that Canada is suffering today: 1.4 million Canadians are without work. That is 10.2 per cent of our workforce. The minister has predicted that this number is going to go up at least to 1.5 million Canadians without jobs.

Let us look at what has happened in Ontario, Canada's industrial heartland. In just 12 months, unemployment has increased fully 83 per cent. There are 215,000 more people in Ontario today who do not have jobs than there was a year ago.

When we look at this devastation in terms of the broader issue of how Canada is going to be able to compete, let us look at what has happened to the manufacturing sector.

In the short 26 months since free trade came into effect, 277,000 or fully 13 per cent of Canada's manufacturing jobs have been lost. In Ontario, 145,000 key manufacturing jobs have been lost. Why do I stress manufacturing? Because that is where we take our raw resources. We give them the value added. We sell them abroad. Manufacturing jobs pay about 30 per cent more than comparable jobs in the service industries.

Given those devastating facts, what did the Minister of Finance give us in his budget? Any recognition that by acting in a contracyclical manner he might be able to alleviate some of the hardships and reduce the duration of this made-in-Canada recession? Did he make any attempt to deal with the issue that he raised of international competitiveness? Absolutely not, on both counts.

What did he do to help our businesses? He cut funding for export promotion. He cut support for businesses on all fronts. He cut the Canadian Jobs Strategy program by $100 million. He cut transfers for education and training. He cut science and technology expenditures and he increased by $2 billion the costs that business and employees must pay for unemployment insurance.

I said we were going to hold this government accountable for the choices it made. I believe it is critical and it is only responsible that we should present to this House and to Canadians the alternatives that we believe we have to look at in order to deal with this recession, our declining competitiveness and the enormous job losses which have amounted to the deindustrialization of Ontario.

We have a very different philosophy from the government. If someone was to ask me if I would have increased the deficit in order to make some of the expenditures which are critical to our economic future, I would have said that unless we make some of these investments in our economic future, we will not have an economic future. This is the simple reality.

As we continue to lose more and more jobs, as those jobs go south of the border, as they fold up their plants, never to come back even at the end of a recession, how can we deal with creating the income levels and the tax levels in Canada which we have used in the past to develop a humane society? You just cannot do it, and as this government has shown, we are not going to be able to cut our way out of the deficit, we are not going to be able to tax our way out of the deficit. The Minister of Justice has been trying this. There have been 33 tax increases since he took office, and still he has doubled our national debt.

There is only one way we will get out of this terrible situation we are in and that is by earning our way out of it. In order to earn our way out of it, we have to make the critical investments. We have to make the investments which our competitors are making. No business can compete unless it has world class machinery, unless it has world class talent and employees. And this involves an investment. You do not become more competitive when you are in business by cutting your highly qualified employees, your well-trained employees and throwing them out the door just because they are paid more than the others; or shutting down your machinery. You have to compete, and business understands this. You borrow because you are going to get a higher return on the dollars that you are putting out.

• (1320)

When I say that we do not just want to be critical of the government, that we want to propose to the government some new approaches, I would like to put forward, for your consideration, some of the general areas where we have to consider changes.

The first is the role of government itself. Part of our economic dilemma in Canada today is a paradox. The paradox is a government which does not believe in government. In no other country in the world that is successful economically is the government giving up its essential role in the wealth creation process.

The government is critical to developing a new spirit of co-operation, which is the first thing we are going to have to do to get Canada moving again. This is the spirit of co-operation among all of the key players who are critical to building a strong economy: our entrepreneurs and business persons, our labour groups, our educators, our financiers and, yes, government.

Government has the critical role of bringing these players together to develop, on a concerted basis, the plans that are necessary for our long-term economic future. That is going to require some co-ordination and planning, after all businesses set five and ten year plans.

Japan set long-term goals for its economy and develops strategies and the government played a strong role through low interest rates, through protecting a domestic market and through keeping the Yen low so that Japanese products could take over foreign markets.

Canada is good in certain areas and we are going to have to concentrate on the areas where we have a demonstrated success and where we have a strong chance for success in the future. We must recognize that we are not going to be able to be the best at everything. The key to our future growth is going to be our human resources.

In the 1930s, Argentina had the fourth highest standard of living in the world and, today, it is in the mid-30's. Argentina was then a resource-based economy. It is now going downhill.

Canada has been, for too many years, largely a resource-based economy. We have squandered that heritage given to us by shipping it wholesale out of Canada and not adding a value in our own nation. We are going to have to emphasize the human content and this is why we have to invest in our young people in terms of training, in terms of education and in terms of retraining. There is no better investment we can make to ensure our economic future than Canada's workers and Canada's young people. They are going to have to have the latest technologies to work with; research and development.

In 1984, the Prime Minister recognized the need to double Canada's research and development efforts. He made that his election commitment. He has since preached actively on that issue for many, many years. He has given up lately. Why? When his Conservative government took over, research and development in Canada was at 1.42 per cent of our GDP. It has steadily fallen to the abysmal level of 1.28 per cent. Without a monumental national will and commitment to doubling that research and development level so we are approaching even the levels of our foreign competitors, we are doomed to becoming more and more hewers of wood and drawers of water.

Another area where it is critical that we exercise some leadership is in terms of the high degree of foreign control over our economy. This government has always said that we need foreign investment. Well, maybe we need foreign investment to buy some of our debt instruments, but even that decreases our ability to control our own economic future.

There are over $350 billion in Canada in tax-helped savings. This is an area that we could tap much more creatively to deal with Canadian debt and the need for venture capital. Foreign control over our economy is the highest of any developed country in the world, and it continues to mount. Since the government replaced FIRA with Investment Canada, it has looked at over 850 applications for foreign takeovers.

How many have they turned down, Mr. Speaker? Zero.

With more and more foreign control, more and more of the good jobs, more and more of the research and development, more and more of the tax planning, more and more of the dividend flows, more and more of the inter-company purchases go back to the foreign head office. This is the reality of the multinational corporation. Unless we have our fair share of Canadian-based multinationals, Canadians do not have a hope of competing in the global economy. This is an area where we can improve so much.

I have already talked about monetary policy. There are many other roles that government has to assume in our economy—the infrastructure, a telecommunications system, transportation—all of these areas where government has a key role and where our leading competitors have taken the edge off us and are causing us to de-industrialize, particularly in Ontario. The present situation is bleak indeed, and if the government persists on the course it is adopting, more and more jobs will go south and with them the hopes of a generation of young Canadians. There is another way, but in order to achieve this other way we will need a government that is prepared to assume its true responsibility, to act as only a government can, and to fight for the future of Canada.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to say to my colleague from Toronto that I thought that was an extremely well put and clearly heartfelt message of concern about the reality which those of us as members of Parliament for Ontario, particularly, see around us in our communities.

However, I do want to raise a question. As my constituents see it and indeed as many constituents that we have talked to throughout Ontario as part of our NDP economic recovery tour see it, they have seen many of these plant closings, they have seen many of the shifts to the United States and many of the shifts to Mexico as a direct consequence of the free trade deal with the United States. They have seen it as a precursor of what is likely to happen with any sort of three-way trade agreement with the United States and with Mexico.

I suspect that the the member from Willowdale probably shares with me some of the concerns about both the existing free trade deal with the United States and the devastation which it is causing across our province and probably shares with me some of the concerns about what will happen if a trade deal with Mexico is added to that mix. I have not heard from the leadership of the Liberal Party a commitment to get us out of the free trade deal, if the Liberal party is in a position to implement such a commitment after the next election.

I want to ask my colleague, whose views I share on many of these concerns about industrial policy for the future, if he is prepared to make a very clear commitment on behalf of his party that the Liberal Party, if it is in the position to do so after the next election, will implement the six-month clause in the free trade agreement and get us out of that agreement which has hurt so many hundreds of thousands of people across our province?

I recognize that these are hypothetical questions I enter into now. But if we have moved into an arrangement with Mexico, could I also get a commitment from him that that arrangement with Mexico would not be part of his party's policy, but instead we would go about building a position for ourselves in the world as a country which gives us independence, which gives us trade relations with other countries in the world through GATT and which gives us a counter to this destructive set of dependent trade ties which the United States has entered into with this government.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, we have seen the reality that even without a free trade agreement with Mexico, Canadian jobs have moved to Mexico. We are going to continue to see many of our jobs from the industrial north go to the low-wage areas of the southern United States and moving right to Mexico, whether we have free trade or not.

This is one of the realities we have to deal with. This is why you cannot take a dogmatic approach. We in the Liberal Party believe much of the damage done to Canada's industrial heartland, much of the de-industrialization is part of the free trade deal with the United States. but only part of it. They gave us free trade with the promise of more exports and greater access to the American market. Well, we did not get the secure access.

As I indicated in my opening remarks, at the same time this government increased the value of our dollar by 28 per cent. It gave the Americans a 28 per cent advantage in selling into our market and not buying from us. Then it put our interest rates up to a record, more than 5 percentage points higher than the Americans. Well, how can we compete under free trade with that? The whole problem is not just the free trade. Some of it is going to take place anyway.

We, in our party, have committed ourselves to undoing some of the harm of the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement. In particular, we do not believe that the Americans should have a pre-emptive right to buy all Canadian resources at world prices, even if there is a shortage in Canada. We believe that Canada should have the right, in certain cases, to help its suppliers by giving Canadians less than world prices in order to create jobs here. We want to be able to further manufacture our primary resources in Canada and create the high paying jobs here. I am not prepared to accept the provisions in the free trade agreement that deal with the unlimited right of Americans to further take over Canada's economy.

These are areas which I want to see renegotiated. I am not sure that exercising the six-month clause is the best way to do it. The reality is our government, like it or not, is taking us to the table of the Canada-U.S.-Mexico free trade deal. We as a party do not have our head in the sand like the NDP. We believe we have to be there in order to protect our interests. What we do not think is that this government that gave us the same deal with the United States is competent to give us a good deal with Mexico.

While we recognize the global realities, the globalization of our world marketplaces and our world economies, we are not naive, as the NDP often is, about the solutions to some of these things. The answers are very complex. It is not just free trade or no free trade, it is a question of being there to work out the best deal for Canada over the longer term.

This is our commitment and this is how we would approach any of the trade deals.

I want to thank the member from Windsor who has given many thoughtful comments to this House, who has presented many good ideas in terms of how to bolster the strength of Canada's economy, and we look forward to hearing in detail his remarks at a later moment.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS OF LEADER OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to address an issue that was raised last Thursday when I was not in the House by the deputy leader of the Liberal Party concerning remarks I had made on the previous Wednesday about an amendment to the amending formula on the Constitution.

I welcome this opportunity to clarify very briefly my remarks.

I accept the correction made by the deputy leader of the Liberal Party that I was incorrect in saying that the—

Mr. Marchi: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know that the hon. member, the leader of the New Democratic Party would like to respond as we hope she will to the question she raised. I would ask her if she would be indulgent enough perhaps to do it following Question Period and allow us to complete the debate at least until two o'clock on this opposition day motion.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I have to remind the hon. member for Yukon that the question and comment period was over and that it was on that understanding that I recognized her.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I was here last Friday when the Liberal House leader rose on this issue. At that time, it was agreed that questions of privilege should be discussed in the presence of the members concerned. In this case, the hon. member who was not there on Friday is here today, but I notice that my House leader is not right now. He will be this afternoon.

Let me ask you this: Is it not fair to rule that the members involved should be present when the question is discussed in the House?

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, a very brief point of order to suggest that since in fact this question was first raised by the Liberal Party at a time when our leader was not in the House, surely it is now inappropriate for the Liberals to suggest that a response should not be permitted at the earliest possible opportunity, which is what we are availing ourselves of in this case.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, the logic made sense Friday. The logic makes sense today, the logic being that a member who is alleged to have infringed the principles of equity and may have caused harm to another person in this House should be in the House when he or she is being questioned.

I just put it that the House leader of the NDP on Friday, here in this House—I was here—said: "Let's put this off to another time when all members of the House who are being affected by this point of privilege are here".

• (1340)

I put it to the NDP: Let's be fair. The House leader of the Liberals who raised the question accepted on Friday, on the recommendation of the House leader of the NDP, that the whole question be put off until later this week.

For the sake of argument, for logic and for fairness we should maintain that position and wait for the House leader of the Liberal Party to be here to discuss this matter with the leader of the NDP.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am no procedure expert, but the point made by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier seems logical and reasonnable to me. Besides, I would have liked to hear the full clarification the hon. member for Yukon had to offer. Under these circumstances, I am ready to recognize the hon. member for Yukon.

[English]

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, certainly it is not a good use of the time of this House to infringe on the time of the Opposition Day of the Liberals who are discussing a very important subject that really does concern Canadians.

Let me simply say, in completing my point of order, that I accept the correction of the deputy leader of the Liberal Party. When I made reference to the fact that the Liberal Party did not accept an amendment we put forward, I was incorrect. In fact that amendment had been ruled out of order by the Speaker.

My point was simply to clarify that, as I said I would do at the earliest possible convenience. That is what I have come to do today.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Peterson (p. 18259).

Mr. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the opposition motion to which I am speaking today combines a credible concern with improving the long-term economic health of Canada with a wrong-headed approach to getting the job done.

I sat and listened with great interest to my hon. friend for Willowdale who has been known from time to time to speak out on these issues. He made some pretty blatant statements this morning that everybody was laying off and industries and so on were going to hell in a hand basket, which really is not factually correct. There are industries that are hiring. There are very positive results from the free trade agreement.

One of the things that the opposition failed to recognize was that the free trade agreement is a long-term agreement which goes over a 10-year period. We are well into our third year now of the free trade agreement. We have completed two years of the free trade agreement, and some of the results are very good. We are very pleased with them.

For example, Canada increased high-tech exports by $4 billion since the deal, while such imports from the United States fell by $600 million. Obviously in the high-tech area, the area that the hon. member talks about or the value added area, we are doing much better. Resource exports declined during that period of time.

It says here: "During the first 22 months of free trade Canada not only posted slightly better numbers than the United States, but made its gains in high-tech and capital intensive industries rather than selling off resources." That was a research study done by the Canada West Foundation, a non-partisan and federalist organization.

Ever time a report comes out that does not agree with the opposition, obviously it is suspect. If it agrees with with opposition, it is wonderful. I see my hon. friend from Willowdale over there chuckling to himself, but he knows that is very true.

I am very optimistic about the free trade agreement. I think back to when the auto pact was signed by a Liberal government of the day.

I can remember the New Democratic Party at that time flailing away at it, together with the auto unions, saying that it was one of the worst pieces of negotiation that had ever gone on, that we had sold out the Canadian auto industry, and so on and so forth.

Two and a half years into it and we are calling for it to be completely amended or wiped out. Today the same group protects the auto pact most vehemently. That is fair ball.

I am sure that when the free trade agreement is fully implemented, when the second round of acceleration of tariffs is announced in the not too distant future, it will be very obvious that we will have some great advantages in the free trade agreement. Restructuring is going on, and that is exactly what we expect to go on in this country. It is a very positive thing. It is going to assure Canada that it will have its rightful place in world trade; not just trade with the United States and down into South American but world trade. The restructuring that is going on is very important.

I think my hon. friend from Willowdale would agree with that. He has not totally annihilated the free trade agreement like the New Democratic Party would. He said that there were some areas they would like to look at perhaps to renegotiate, and that is fair ball. I can understand that. In any negotiations you win some and you lose some. That is the way negotiations go on.

The New Democratic Party however would wipe out the free trade agreement. It would go back to the old protectionist days of putting up tariff barriers—

Mr. Brewin: Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. McDermid: Sir John A. was back 125 years ago. Are you telling me that the New Democratic Party is going back 125 years? I say: "Yes, it is". That is the problem with the New Democratic Party. It cannot get in step with what is going on in the modern world. That is exactly why it is behind the eight ball. That is exactly why it will never form a federal government. It wants to go back to the old ways, put up the tariff barriers, put up high tariffs on everything, and protect this little island called Canada. Never mind that we trade 35 per cent of what we produce, never mind that; the hon. member wants to go back to the old ways, the old high tariffs. That is what he wants.

That is what New Democrats are talking about over there. I am not sure that his friend from Windsor would agree with that. The hon. member should maybe get together with him. Maybe he wants to wipe out the free trade agreement and go back to the old tariff walls and so on, but I do not think he does. I really do not think he does. I sat with him throughout the free trade debate, and I think he found a lot of positive things within that as well. Am I not correct?

Mr. Langdon: Is that a question?

Mr. McDermid: Certainly. He is smiling and nodding his head.

Mr. Langdon: The answer is no.

An hon. member: He said no.

Mr. McDermid: Certainly he found some very positive things in the free trade agreement. I am sure he will find more as time goes on.

The February 28 budget lays down the—

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the minister's flights of fancy here, but it should be made very clear that this party continues to oppose the free trade deal and that I said so from my seat when he threw this ridiculous question at me.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I will recognize again the Minister of State for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, that was very important and added a great deal to the debate.

My hon. friend, who has now left the House but whose debate this is, was pointing out that the trade surplus had dropped somewhat in Canada. I think he said $10 billion. It is around $13 billion. I had dropped. One of the things he forgot to mention, though, in his speech was the increase in trade. There has been a huge increase in international trade from Canada in that time period.

Of course, trade is two way; we import as well as export. The amount of increase in trade has been very interesting in the free trade period. Seven of ten provinces posted trade increases to the United States since the free trade agreement. He did not mention that. I am not sure why, but I guess it did not really support his argument that he was trying to give. That is probably why he did not do it.

Of the three provinces that are down, British Columbia is one where the export of wood products is down rather dramatically because of the lack of house building in the United States. We know that that is down. We know that the province of Saskatchewan is down about 3 per cent. That has to do with prices for the product that it produces out there. New Brunswick was down somewhat.

• (1350)

In the time left, I want to talk a little bit about our plans to correct some of the economic problems we are experiencing in this country and in fact for economic renewal. In doing so, I believe the budget of February 26 addresses the overriding issue, that is getting Canada out of the current recession and back to renewed growth and job creation.

However, it is a budget also that makes a crucial watershed choice about how renewed prosperity must be achieved and sustained. The plan for economic recovery aims at nothing less than a fundamental change in the political culture of budget making and government spending, and in attitudes and behaviour of Canadians regarding inflation.

Yes, we need to change political culture, political attitudes and expectations. This is because the key to economic recovery now and stable sustained growth in coming years lies in establishing the basic conditions for lower interest rates.

We have heard the message loud and clear during pre-budget consultations with all sectors of society. I met with a number of them, including senior citizens, arts groups, and women's groups in this country. Loud and clear, consistent from every single group that we met in pre-budget consultations, was the message: lower interest rates are the fuel to boost consumer spending, to reignite the construction industry and create affordable housing, to assist farmers in times of uncertainty, and to help business invest in the new equipment research and training that Canadians need to succeed in this fiercely competitive global market that I referred to earlier.

The plan for economic recovery is a clear message for Canadians in turn. Market forces are the real and final arbiters of interest rates, not governments and not the Bank of Canada. The only economically sound foundation for lower interest rates is a substantial reduction in inflation and, I might add, in Canadians' inflationary expectations. That is why the plan for economic recovery takes innovative action through setting realistic public inflation targets to help make this happen.

Just as important, the plan directly supports and reinforces these targets through rigorous new discipline in three key areas: government spending control, deficit and debt reduction, and wage restraint. Better financial management by government is a vital element of the economic framework Canada must put in place to achieve recovery and sustain prosperity.

Such management will restore public confidence that our prospects for lower inflation and interest rates and for real gains in productivity and individual prosperity will not be swallowed up in the quagmire of government deficits and debts and in the higher taxation that these demands cause.

Better government control of its finances will help to motivate people in how they act and think, in setting prices, in making wage demands, and in the ways they want government to use its finite resources.

It is these changed expectations and behaviour that will make possible the most significant reductions in inflation and interest rates. We know this because we have not forgotten our history. In designing our plan for economic recovery we have drawn on important lessons from the past.

For nearly 25 years, from 1950 through 1973, Canadians enjoyed an outstanding record of economic growth and personal prosperity. Our standard of living virtually doubled in that period of time.

This growth was not accidental or automatic. It resulted from sound economic policies. Inflation was less than 3 per cent during that period of time. This kept interest rates down. Annual federal deficits were small or non-existent. Boy, talk about the old days. Business investment grew strongly and we became more productive and wealthier.

Then along came that 1974 to 1984 period. Governments let inflation soar. They forgot about the lessons between 1950 and 1973. They just let inflation take off. They spent much more than they received in taxes. We were living beyond our means. The deficit jumped to $38 billion annually and the national debt surged from $27 billion to more than $200 billion. It was no wonder then that the 1974 to 1984 period saw economic growth and productivity fall as business was battered on two sides, by increasing government intervention, taxation and debt, and by growing global competition from foreign industry. A declining Canadian dollar was not able to counter these problems.

As we heard today, while that may be part of the problem today, it is not entirely the whole story. We still suffer the consequences: interest payments on that 1984 debt, just the interest, not for programs, not for senior citizens, not for health care or for secondary education, 80 per cent of our subsequent deficits, pushing our debt to nearly $400 billion a day. It has all been interest, 80 per cent interest.

Since 1984 we have worked to rebuild the underlying conditions for economic prosperity and we have made some progress, especially considering where we started from. The growth of the debt has been slowed. The deficit is still too high. I am the first one to admit that and we all are. The deficit is a way too high. It has been cut in half since we came to office as a share of our national income. Inflation has been held in check to about half of what it was between 1974 and 1984.

We have implemented historical, structural reform to boost efficiency and growth potential. Of course I refer to the deregulation of the energy and transportation sectors; tax reforms such as the GST makes Canadian firms more competitive both home and abroad; and the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, which I touched on earlier, giving us secure access to the world's largest market.

To help Canada overcome its current problems and to lay deeper foundations for lasting prosperity, more needs to be done. The plan for economic recovery takes these fundamental, decisive steps. They include restraining wage increases for the federal Public Service and members of Parliament over the next four years, extending the expenditure control program to 1994-95, making it a law that all revenues from the goods and services tax are used only to bring the public debt under control and are not spent on other things, and passing legislation that sets absolute limits on government program spending for the next five years.

These actions will produce concrete results. The deficit for 1991-92 during this recession period will be held to $30.5 billion despite the problems we are experiencing. By 1995-96 it will have dropped to just $6.5 billion. That is the lowest deficit in nearly 20 years.

As well, the need for new government borrowing on financial markets will be eliminated even sooner, by 1994-95, and this is the goal that we set out in our 1989 budget. That will represent, for the first time in 25 years, that no such borrowing is needed.

To deliver these results the budget was tough, but it is also sensitive to the real hardships currently facing many Canadians. That is why expenditures will grow substantially more in 1991-92 than in the years following: 6.9 per cent compared to an average of only 3 per cent for the entire five-year period.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it two o'clock and conclude my remarks immediately following Question Period?

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Donohue intends to rebuild, at a cost of $8.7 million, its crosscutting and debarking plant in Comtois, in the Abitibi, which was damaged as a result of a fire last December. Work will start on the plant this April and is expected to be completed by the end of August. It will be one of the most modern plants in Eastern Canada. Rebuilding the plant will help stabilize 400 jobs, including forestry workers.

Donohue wants its plant to be ready for the economic recovery anticipated in the second half of this year. This is very good news for forestry workers in Comtois, Lebel-sur-Quévillon, Senneterre, Barraute and the Abitibi. Mr. Speaker, I personally would like to thank Donohue management for this excellent decision.

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on February 28, the government tabled a budget estimate of $17.9 million to pay for the expenses for this fiscal year of the Citizen's Forum on Canada's Future. This House immediately referred the matter for scrutiny to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

Our rules impose a deadline for the study, and by March 21, the committee must report or Parliament will have failed in its duty to examine how public funds are spent.

This committee has not met since last September when its chairman resigned. The government has repeatedly refused to reconvene the committee. It is high time the members of Parliament examine carefully this expenditure of taxpayers' money. The government must make sure that this committee meets within the next few days.

Mr. Speaker, there are ten days left before the deadline. I, for one, believe that the Spicer commission can make an important contribution to the ongoing debate on this country's future, but the atmosphere has to be improved. Parliament must be involved. This House must make a thorough and serious examination of the commission's budget. To fail to do so would be a serious breach of the trust placed in Parliament by Canadians. This commission must be given a chance.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, tonight it will be safe to walk the streets in rural communities across Canada, but how safe will it be after March 31 if they lose their visible police force?

Funding for the RCMP had already been hacked by $19.4 million last year by this government. For the division that polices communities in British Columbia, that has meant a $4.1 million reduction in funds. Services like detachments in rural communities, training, and patrols have been slashed in order to cope with these budget cuts. Rural communities across this country like those in my riding, communities like Enderby, Falkland and Lumby, risk losing their visible police force presence as services are rationalized and reduced.

The choice for the provinces and the municipalities is clear: either pick up the tab or close detachments and leave communities without an effective and visible police force.

I urge the Solicitor General to reconsider his actions. Our embattled country cannot afford to lose yet another national symbol. Our small communities merit the level of protection that they have enjoyed.

NATIONAL SOCIAL WORK WEEK

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, from March 11 to 16, the Canadian Association of Social Workers will be celebrating the first annual National Social Work Week in Canada.

Social work is a profession with a long history of commitment to improving the well-being of people in society, particularly those people with special needs. Today's social workers are employed in family agencies, hospitals, seniors' programs, and child protection services. They may work directly with individuals, groups, and communities, or on their behalf through research, social policy, or planning groups.

The 11,000 members of the Canadian Association of Social Workers should be recognized for their valuable contribution to the betterment of society. We wish them every success in the celebration of National Social Work Week.

REGIONAL AIR SERVICE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, Transport Canada's cost recovery proposals threaten the economic and social well-being of regional air service.

In Atlantic Canada, Air Nova and Air Atlantic, under these new proposals, would face as much as $1 million in extra costs for this year alone. Traffic losses as a result of the fare increases that would follow these operating cost increases could be as high as 30 per cent on prop-jet services.

The cost recovery proposals of Transport Canada will most likely mean that services to smaller communities will be reduced and employment in the commercial aviation industry will decline. Thus, these proposals will alienate our smaller communities even more.

We cannot afford any more job losses and we cannot afford to isolate regions of the country, especially at a time when the future of our country is at stake. We need policies that bind our country together. The smaller regions of this country have just as much of a right to quality air service as the larger centres of Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver.

SALON DE LA FEMME

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, at the twenty-first Salon de la femme in Quebec City, 14 Quebec women received special honours.

They are: Claire Bonenfant of the Fédération des femmes du Québec; Mary Lamontagne, S.O.S. grossesse; Francine Roberge, Fédération des infirmières; Élisabeth Laliberté, Viol-Secours; Louise Clément-Tessier, Association des femmes d'affaires du Québec; Yolande Dumontier, Carrefour familles monoparentales de Charlesbourg; Agathe Léveillé, Alliance professionnelle des infirmiers et infirmières; Céline Dubé, Association des religieuses pour la promotion de la femme; Hughette Labrecque-Marcoux, AFEAS; Thérèse Légaré, Centre femmes d'aujourd'hui; Jacqueline Dumont-Robitaille, Cercle de l'amitié de Saint-Romuald; Noëlla Huot, Cercle des fermières du Québec; Cécilia Gaudet, Réseau national d'action éducation-femmes; and Denise Perreault, Parents uniques.

Each in their own way, these women have given freely of their time and energy to help other women make better lives for themselves, and I think they deserve our thanks and congratulations.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the shortage of air traffic controllers in Canada has caused them to take desperate actions in these desperate time. Witness last Wednesday when an air traffic controller had to shut down operations in Halifax due to chronic overwork.

Regrettably, the situation faced by our control tower operators is not an isolated or a regional one, but one of national implications. To make matters worse, the federal budget recently cut the air navigation system by $48 million, further reduced it by 20 person years and also decreased the expansion of air traffic controllers by 43 per cent.

In terms of public safety, these cutbacks are absolutely absurd. I call upon the Minister of Transport to do three things. First, conduct an immediate and open public investigation into the Halifax occurrence; second, ensure that the full complement of air traffic controllers are hired as soon as possible; third, that the Minister of Finance reverse these budget cuts very quickly.

Given the recent developments, it is the Minister of Transport who is asleep on the job, not Canada's air traffic controllers.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, today is Commonwealth Day. I would like to read two short paragraphs from the message from Her Majesty the Queen, the head of the Commonwealth.

> Each year, the Commonwealth Day celebrations draw attention to the multi-nation, multi-race and multi-faith nature of this unique organisation. But we should also be looking at ways to make practical use of these advantages. I therefore welcome the idea that this year the theme of the celebrations should be "Science in the Commonwealth"—
>
> The Commonwealth, with its many well tried channels of communication and consultation, is uniquely placed not only to enable member countries to keep abreast of scientific advances, but also to help them benefit from their practical applications. I believe that the Commonwealth tradition of quiet co-operation and its advantage of common language can make a special contribution to the practical application of science wherever it is most needed for the sake of human welfare as well as for the long-term health of our planet.

NATIONAL SOCIAL WORK WEEK

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Association of Social Workers will be celebrating its National Social Work Week in Canada from March 11 to March 16.

Social work as a profession has always been involved in working with disadvantaged people, in attempting to improve their well-being and their position in society. Social workers work with abused children, frail elderly, families in difficulty, the unemployed, the mentally ill and disadvantaged communities.

Social workers not only attempt to assist individuals and groups who are disadvantaged, but have also been leaders in social action movements aimed at bringing about basic social and economic reforms. Social workers are now in the front line, helping people that have been savaged by this government's economic and social policies.

The Canadian Association of Social Workers represent social workers right across Canada. This House recognizes their contribution to the well-being of Canadians and to the improvement of Canadian society.

PROMOTIONAL FLYERS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, March 9, while women across the country and around the world rallied to mark International Women's Day, in the Byward Market, just a five-minute walk from Parliament Hill, Zap Dance Bar distributed disgusting, sexist promotional flyers on hundreds of cars.

In language and in visuals the message was clear, and I quote: "Buck-a-shot, where a dollar buys you more than you think." The accompanying caricature of a scantily clad woman with a smoking gun and a hand full of cash, is offensive not only to women but to all people concerned about the dangers of sexism.

• (1410)

I call upon the Zap Dance Bar in Hull, just down the street from the Lido, which this government knows well, to withdraw immediately this advertising. I challenge them to use the profits they have made from this disgusting and damaging exploitation of women to make a contribution to a women's shelter in Ottawa-Hull.

We may have marked how far women have progressed on International Women's day, but this kind of trash reminds us we have taken only small steps along a long road to a decent society.

CANADA WINTER GAMES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, just over a week ago the Canada Winter Games came to a close in Charlottetown, and I would like to commend all Islanders for an outstanding job.

The Canada Games are a testimony to the partnership of the public, private and voluntary sectors of our society. The Government of Canada contributed about $18 million to this celebration of sport and youth. The legacy of capital facilities, together with the wonderful memories and friendships that were generated, will live on to serve well the children and grandchildren of Prince Edward Island.

1995 will see a significant milestone in the history of the Canada Winter Games. Grande Prairie, the largest community in my riding of Peace River, will serve as host city, the most northern host city of any Canada Winter Games. In thanking P.E.I. for their wonderful hospitality during this year's games, I invite Islanders and all Canadians to Grande Prairie in 1995. Come and experience northern Alberta hospitality.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I call upon the Minister of Transport to act immediately to investigate the situation at the Halifax International Airport and to assign more air traffic controllers to that airport at once.

Last week, the under-staffed control tower was shut down for two hours by a controller exhausted from two 16-hour shifts in less than two days. The unidentified controller worked the extended shifts for a sick co-worker.

The controller on duty at Halifax is not to be blamed. He acted wisely and responsibly. As he was working his second 16-hour shift in two days, he understandably became tired. It was the proper course of action in the best interests of safety to turn his responsibilities over to Moncton. Nevertheless, one wonders what would have happened had an emergency situation developed at Halifax and what will happen in the future while under-staffing remains a problem.

One wonders if it may not be the government's intention to see if Moncton's flight service centre should handle Halifax's much busier airport. Nova Scotians, however, are not prepared to accept that there is a suitable substitute for on site staff control facilities.

The controllers are an essential part of aviation safety and they must be located at all major airports handling passenger flights. The cutbacks to air traffic controllers, begun in the middle 1980s and continued in the most recent cuts are—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has exceeded her time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the Public Service Alliance of Canada and its president, Daryl Bean, have been intemperate in their response to the recent federal budget, which restricts public service wage increases to 3 per cent per year over the next three years.

"Absolutely insane" rants Mr. Bean, while threatening a strike and suggesting that public service members defy any possible back-to-work legislation.

Can this be the same Public Service Alliance of Canada which has imposed a 3 per cent wage settlements on hundreds of its own employees? Is this the same Public Service Alliance which last year endured a strike from its own secretarial and administrative workers in order to arrive at a 3 per cent wage settlement?

Is this the same pretentious Daryl Bean who says it is okay for PSAC to give its employees 3 per cent and yet, in the same breath, says it is "absolutely insane" for the Government of Canada to do the same thing?

What sanctimony, Mr. Speaker, what utter hypocrisy. It is time the PSAC sought credible, responsible and consistent leadership.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, over 100 members of the Canadian Armed Forces arrived today at CFB Shearwater in Halifax County. I am sure all members want to join in welcoming these proud Canadians back to their home and native land.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crosby: It is time parliamentarians looked beyond the very moment of the day to the role played by our military forces in Canada and beyond. Paraphrasing the words of Sir Winston Churchill: "If we do not give them the tools, we cannot expect them to do the job".

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the B.C. Supreme Court Chief Justice brought down his decision in the Gitksan-Wet'suwet'en land claims case.

In a decision that has set back many important previous decisions, the Chief Justice ruled that the Gitksan-Wet'suwet'en have no aboriginal claim to the area they have lived in for years.

The Chief Justice said this was "a political trial". Indeed, the reason for the case was because the provincial government had refused to negotiate land claims in the first place.

This ruling, which may be appealed, should not be used by either the B.C. government or the federal government to avoid negotiating and resolving the land claims issue.

Both governments have an opportunity and an obligation to show leadership by ending years of discrimination and mistreatment of aboriginal people in Canada by taking the questions of self-government and land claims seriously.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. We live in the freest, most democratic and most varied country in the world. Hundreds of millions of people would like to live in Canada. Frustrations certainly run deep, but then opportunities are unlimited. As members of the Parliament of Canada we are duty-bound to take every means necessary to renew the federal system. In addition to what is already being done, Parliament must advocate specific propositions on all aspects of constitutional reform. With that in mind, when will the Prime Minister finally widen the mandate of the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I should think that all members of the House agree with the preliminary remarks of my colleague concerning the importance of Canada and how hundreds of thousands if not millions of people in the rest of the world would like to live here and continue to build this country as we would all like Canada to be. With respect to the specific question of my colleague, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said on many occasions that indeed he had struck appropriate committees to examine the issue and urge all participants to come up with a constitutional amendment which would meet the expectations of all Canadians. I am sure all people will strive to achieve that goal.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, from time to time, all members of this House have honest differences, but there is one thing upon which most of us can agree and that is that we have a great country. It is worth saving.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: Clearly, in saving this country there is a role for the federal Parliament to play in examining the specific issues of division of power.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister in place of the Prime Minister: When will the government allow the Parliament of Canada to have a real say in the constitutional issues that are facing our country at this critical time?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I said in French a few minutes ago, I think every member of this House would agree with the preamble of my hon. colleague with respect to the importance and greatness of this country and how so many people outside would like to be part of it.

With regard to the specific question, the Prime Minister has answered that question on many occasions. He has indicated that he has set up various commissions or committees in order to look at the constitutional question and to find, particularly, a better amending formula.

Parliament, as usual, will take its part in the debate. As suggested by the Prime Minister last week I believe, if the hon. member wants to use an Opposition Day to discuss this question, she is welcome to it.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about the approach of an all-party parliamentary committee to examine all the issues relating to the Constitution, not merely the amending formula.

For the Prime Minister or representatives of his government to suggest that the deed could be done on a single Opposition Day is simply senseless. I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister once again. The constitutional clock is ticking. The best chance that we have for a national consensus to save this country must emanate from a public parliamentary process.

• (1420)

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister when he and his government will be prepared to table in this House the public parliamentary process that will lead to real constitutional reform.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Again, Mr. Speaker, as was addressed by the Prime Minister on a number of occasions, it is important to have a public forum in order to discuss these very important issues because that is one of the things that Canadians had against the Meech Lake process. That is exactly what the Spicer commission is all about. I invite all Canadians to make their views known to that particular commission, and I am sure that in due time all parliamentarians here will have the occasion to participate in an appropriate debate.

BANK OF CANADA

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister will agree that if his own budget projections are going to be achieved, Canadians must become convinced that inflation will come down.

Does the minister still believe that the Bank of Canada and its governor have the credibility to reduce inflationary expectations of Canadians when the bank's annual report reveals that wages at the bank itself rose by 9 per cent last year and the governor's own wage increased by about 4.2 per cent?

Does the minister condone these increases, or is he willing to ask the bank to set the example he expects Canadians to follow?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. friend is aware of some of the details of the figures that he is talking about, but I would like to get these on the record for the House.

The increase in the salary bill last year for the Bank of Canada is based, first and foremost, on a 4 per cent basic structural increase for employees at the Bank of Canada. In addition to that there was a 1.2 per cent effective increase as the bank upgraded the quality of its staff by laying off people who were replacing people who were in low-income areas with people who were more highly qualified and therefore people who would be paid more money.

The final point is that there is an element of increase based on the performance pay that employees of the staff were getting.

As far as the salary of the governor is concerned, we found that there were a small number of senior officers of Crown corporations who had not received an increase for the last year. All the deputy ministers and a number of other senior members of Crown corporations had received a salary increase, so we thought it was only fair and appropriate to give the limited number who were still left the same increase.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I believe Canadians will be incredulous to hear that the governor of the Bank of Canada and his employees got a performance pay increase for what they have done to Canada in the last couple of years.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Manley: In the last 10 days the minister admitted that his pre-1980 election tax reform was the wrong policy for the time. Now the governor has admitted that his monetary policy of the same time was wrong. Who is going to pay the performance penalty for the recession that those policies have brought on? How about the minister and the governor?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is all very well for my hon. friend to make these statements, but he was one of the ones standing here in the House saying: "Don't increase interest rates because that would be the wrong thing to do".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What we have found and what the Governor of the Bank of Canada said in his statement was that the economy was going very strongly in that period and that possibly if anything interest rates might have been a little higher. That would have been the opposite of what my friend is saying now so he is trying to get on both sides of the issue once again.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. We heard over the weekend the premier of Quebec say he only wanted to have negotiations on a bilateral basis with the federal government. We know from last week that the finance minister is planning to negotiate and discuss new fiscal arrangements with the provinces and we have a number of committees and commissions that are now studying the constitutional issue.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister is simply this. Will he commit today, on behalf of this government, that there will be no negotiations with any one province or any group of provinces until the Canadian people have been heard and until all of the commissions and committees have reported?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there will be no such commitment. The government will carry on in the normal way dealing with the provinces of Canada with respect to fiscal matters as well as others. The fiscal agreements that the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party is referring to are not routine exactly, but matters of regular government business. A five-year term of the equalization agreement expires next year and there are going to be a series of discussions and negotiations with the provinces on fiscal agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces, that is from a fiscal point of view, rather than a constitutional point of view.

No one is suggesting any change in jurisdiction. This is a matter of a transfer of funds from the Government of Canada to the provinces. We will be continuing to carry out the business of Canada in the normal manner, as the people of Canada expect.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that the government assure Canadians that there are no negotiations that are going on on a bilateral basis that will affect future constitutional talks. I would also in the same aspect like to raise another matter.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister said that the deputy ministers meet to advise the government on national unity. Will the Prime Minister or the government immediately table in the House the terms of reference given the deputy ministers? Can he also give us the assurance that the final product will be tabled in the House and made available to all Canadians?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing unusual in that the procedure that has been adopted with respect to advice to the government on constitutional matters. Deputy ministers of the government are there to administer government departments and to give the government advice.

The Prime Minister has sought the advice of certain or all of the deputy ministers of the government in connection with possible constitutional negotiations and they will give the government their advice when they have completed their work.

There are no terms of reference that can be tabled here today. The results of the advice given to the government will be used by the Prime Minister and members of the government insofar as they think the advice is the kind that should be followed by the government. As events proceed, we will see what advice the government is acting upon.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I think if anything is clear from ongoing constitutional negotiations in Canada, it is that this has to be a constitutional round for all Canadians. The court ruling by the B.C. Supreme Court last week against the Gitksan–Wet'suwet'en raised a lot of questions again for people about aboriginal title and aboriginal rights, particularly in that ruling suggesting they do not apply in B.C.

I think what this means is that this government must give a commitment to all Canadians indeed in this round of constitutional talks we have an urgency to deal with outstanding aboriginal issues and it must be done in this round. This must be a round for all Canadians.

Can the Acting Prime Minister assure this House that aboriginal issues will be a substantial part of this constitutional round of talks?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this constitutional round, it is agreed I believe on all sides, is for all Canadians, all provinces, all issues and all of those who have an interest, including the aboriginal groups in Canada. Aboriginal interests and issues will certainly be a part of the discussions that take place in this constitutional round. That has been made clear.

• (1430)

We are trying to involve the people of Canada as widely as possible in this discussion, as are a number of the provinces. That is the purpose of the function of the Spicer commission that was set up by the government and which commission was attacked last week in such a deplorable manner in this House of Commons.

We are trying to involve the people of this country as much as we can in the discussions and get their views. Certainly aboriginal issues will be an important part of the matters to be discussed, and hopefully settled.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance.

A week ago last Wednesday the Minister of Finance would not admit in this House that he had indeed cut funding to post-secondary education. I want to quote from the tabled estimate documents, which read: Secretary of State, EPF post-secondary education payments—that is referring to transfer payments—changed. There is a minus in front of the $485.8 million.

When is a cut a cut? Why this double-talk? Will the minister stand up in the House today and admit to Canadians that he has indeed cut cash payments to provinces for education, thereby threatening Canada's competitiveness and our nation's quality of life?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the opposition member has finally used the right word. I have never said that the cash payments were not cut. What I did say is that the total payment, the cash plus tax transfers, will be increasing by the population growth, and that is a continuation of what we did starting in the 1990 budget.

I should point out to my hon. friend—and this might be unusual for me, Mr. Speaker—a quote from Leonard Shifrin. "The blinkered Liberal and NDP rhetoric is not on the mark." He went on to say: "Scoffing at its plan to amend the Fiscal Arrangements Act so medicare standards can continue to be enforced is downright dangerous; what they should be doing is pushing the government to deliver on the measure."

We are committed to delivering on this measure. But the point that I want to make is that the total transfer, the tax and cash transfer, is not being cut. The hon. member would be well advised to look at the substance of it.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): The minister's source does not understand any better than he does.

[Translation]

Last year, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the Canadian Federation of Students predicted that cash payments would be cut in Quebec in 1997, in Ontario in 1999 and in the other provinces soon afterwards. The freeze the government has just put on these payments has made the situation worse. The federal government is withdrawing completely from cash payments. Why is the minister taking away from the poor and the poorest regions? Why does the government insist on attacking the programs that unite us as a country?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): The total amount of the major transfers that the federal government will be making to the provinces in the next five years is $183 billion. That is a significant amount of money and the provinces can use that in support of medicare or post-secondary education or other forms of education or highways, whatever they want to do.

The point is that the tax transfer is a substantial amount of money, and it will continue to grow.

My hon. friend made the comment that we were penalizing the lower income parts of the country. On the contrary, we have designed this so that the total transfers will increase at 3.7 per cent per annum over that five-year period. For the Atlantic provinces it will grow in excess of 4 per cent, and for the non-equalization receiving provinces of Ontario, Alberta and B.C., it will be about 2.5 per cent.

So, we have structured this in a way so that there is greater growth in those regions of the country which need the help the most.

[Translation]

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Conservative policies have lead to 150 layoffs at Black & Decker, 150 at Marconi and 2,000 at CN, which makes a total of more than 7,000 layoffs in Montreal in a matter of months. Today in Montreal, one person out of four is living below the poverty line. Montreal now has the highest poverty rate in this country. There are more than 222,000 unemployed workers in Montreal. My question is directed to the Minister of Finance: When does he intend to table in this House, before Canadians, an economic policy that will create jobs for the people of Montreal?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member speaks of the lay-offs in his region of Quebec. The government is sympathetic and understands the enormity of change in certain ridings in the industrial structure in Quebec. However, I remind the hon. member that we have 1,280,000 more people at work today than in 1984. I remind him as well that the manufacturing base of Canada, according to the Royal Bank in its report of December 19, 1990, is almost 10 per cent above what it was at the end of 1982.

The strength of the Canadian economy is still there, but if it will be matched by further declining interest rates and further declining inflation, I am sure that we will see a real amelioration of the economy in his region as well as across Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. So many people are unemployed in Montreal today because of his high interest rate policy. When will the Minister of Finance realize, once and for all, that his economic policies are disastrous for Canada and especially for Quebec? And when will he announce an economic recovery program for Montreal? What about the Picard report, which has been on the shelf for two years?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the budget is designed to generate economic renewal in the country, not just in the city of Montreal or the province of Quebec, but in all parts of the country by getting interest rates down.

My hon. friend is going back to his roots when he says the only way we can get the economy going again is to sprinkle money around in different parts of the country. That keeps interest rates up and that is what this budget is designed not to do. We want to get interest rates down because that will be felt by every business person or every person in Montreal who wants to buy a new home or a new car or whatever.

The old way, certain people have the advantage of it. This way, our way, everybody gets the advantage of lower interest rates.

BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who, last week, told Toronto business people that high wage increases were hurting Canada. Yet, the Bank of Canada has now reported 9 per cent salary increases and John Crow himself has seen his salary range jump by $103,000 since 1986.

I want to ask this government how it can keep any credibility when it sets these big income gains at the top and then freezes the incomes of low-income secretaries throughout this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is very well aware that last year the senior members of the Public Service, deputy ministers and senior executives in Crown corporations, had an increase of 4.2 per cent. That compares with an average for federal public servants of, I believe 5 per cent, which was the average, and a good deal higher for those in the private sector.

We have demonstrated a good deal of restraint in government. We have also committed that with the wage policy that will proceed from here. Senior members of the Public Service will get no more than the average of the public sector settlements by the federal Public Service.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, how is it possible to describe a $103,000 increase in five years as restraint? It is not just salaries, either, at the bank that have gone up, travel has gone up 25 per cent and staff expenses over 11 per cent.

• (1440)

How can the government justify this rich life for those very Bank of Canada people who are telling the rest of this country to pull in their belts?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I described to the hon. member, in response to a previous question, the specifics of the Bank of Canada situation last year.

The basic salary increase was 4 per cent over there. The salary increases for senior public servants, including the senior officers of the Bank of Canada, from here forward will be exactly the same as for deputy ministers, including the ministers on this side who will be taking a freeze of their ministerial pay. In this range of ways we are demonstrating restraint.

I would expect that we would get a little bit more support from the hon. member for this restraint policy, because it will help the companies that he is concerned about in Windsor, the same companies that he stands up and complains about their difficulties in meeting the competition from across the border—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Algoma.

MINING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. She knows that this Friday over 1,000 miners will be laid off at Denison Mines in Elliot Lake. This will bring the total to over 3,300 lay-offs or 80 per cent of the mining jobs there since last July.

I want to tell the minister that these miners are being told that it will take seven or eight weeks for them to get UIC benefits. I wonder if the minister, in spite of the fact that they have only had little over a week's notice of the lay-off, could step into this situation, take action and ensure that these payments are made in a prompt way, and not have these miners and their families wait seven or eight weeks for the benefits from their UIC.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his ongoing concern in this area.

We have of course continued to pay special attention to this part of Ontario that has been hit very hard with some job cuts. All I can assure the hon. member is that I will look into the processing times. Clearly we want to provide our services as efficiently as possible there as elsewhere.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Over two months ago the minister had put before her department a program for industrial adjustment under the Community Futures Program of $6.3 million. I wonder, in view of the importance of training, retraining and upgrading programs to these miners who are being laid off and additional ones, if the minister can approve immediately that budget.

I ask this question because I am concerned about the $100 million cutback in the budget by the Minister of Finance and want to ensure that miners who lose their jobs and other Canadians are not going to be affected adversely when it comes to industrial adjustment, training and manpower programs.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that, thanks to the passage of Bill C-21, of course we do have additional funding for training, training allowances, Community Futures and so on. There is actually a net increase in the amount of money that will be available over all rather than a cut.

I would also like to point out that actually the funding that has gone into this region in the last year has been close to $9 million. We will continue to watch events as they arise.

We are of course concerned about other parts of northern Ontario as well. They have benefited from our industrial adjustment service and from Community Futures, as has the region the hon. member represents.

RESEARCH

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

I have here a letter from the president of the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, who wrote recently to the presidents of Canadian universities to inform them, and I quote: "That budget cutbacks may oblige the Council to reduce the number of researchers subsidized by the federal government".

In his Budget, the Minister of Finance claimed that to increase productivity, we must invest in training and developing the skills of Canadians. Could the minister explain to the House how a reduction in the number of researchers financed by the federal government will help meet the objectives set in his Budget?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council for the year we are just moving into is receiving a total increase of something like 4.8 per cent. Under the existing circumstances I think that is a reasonable amount.

In talking to the president of NSERC, my understanding is that it is going to put more and more of that money into the operating and scholarship components of its operation and less into some other parts, which in essence is what the member is asking for.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, again, I have a letter here from the president of the council which states that given the budgetary constraints facing NSERC one of the likely effects of these changes will be a reduction in the number of researchers supported. This is a letter written just recently to presidents of universities across Canada.

I would remind the minister that two years ago the Prime Minister's own blue ribbon committee recommended doubling the budgets for university research in Canada. I want to ask the minister a question.

Given that such an investment would lead to increased productivity, increased growth, and a lower deficit, will the minister on behalf of the government at last commit to providing the urgently needed funding for university research and the training of researchers right across this country?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite apparent to most Canadians that if we do not get this national debt under control, if we do not get interest rates down and subsequently get the dollar down, it will not matter much what you are going to put into the NSERC or the MRCs. There will be no base funding for the universities, and that is really the issue.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister on the important issue of the future of the country in the constitutional sense.

Given discussions in Montreal about the Allaire committee over the weekend, the fact that Belanger-Campeau will report very soon, and the fact that we have a committee of federal deputy ministers studying things such as the division of powers, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether or not the time has now arrived when members of this House—his party, my party and the Liberal Party—should be looking at substantive constitutional issues such as aboriginal rights and the division of powers.

Given the fact that the committee on the amending formula will start travelling and will have public hearings next week, would he not consider expanding the mandate of the committee to deal not just with the amending formula, which is important, but to allow Canadians to speak about national unity regardless of its process or content?

Have we not arrived at that time?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing preventing members of this House looking at substantive issues in connection with our constitutional future. In fact I would think that many of them are doing just that.

As a matter of fact, in the Conservative caucus we have a committee on constitutional issues which is devoting a lot of time to considering these issues.

You do not need the government to organize for the opposition that it should form caucus committees or whatever to consider these issues. The process at the present time is that we are attempting to get the views of the Canadian people through the Spicer commission. We have our own Commons–Senate committee on the process of amending the Constitution. We have six or eight provincial inquiries under way.

When the Prime Minister and the government feel the time is right, we will make a decision as to what the next step should be. In the meantime we are doing our homework and we hope that other members will as well.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I think the time is right now to deal with both process and content of constitutional change.

In light of the fact that some $8 million has been allocated for the national unity task force in the next year, could the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether any of this money has been spent or will be spent on special interest groups to study national unity, groups such as the Business Council on National Issues, the Chamber of Commerce, or any other groups? Has money been spent or has it been allocated to those groups on that important issue?

• (1450)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the money involved that the hon. member is referring to is to be used by the government in order to prepare and to study all of the options that should be looked at in connection with possible future constitutional arrangements in Canada. It would include meeting the expenses of constitutional experts and people with experience who are called upon.

I cannot tell him here today as to how much has been spent to date or on what particular subject. This is the kind of use that this funding will be put to.

When we have seen what the full range of views of the Canadian public is and when we have seen this year what are the considered views of the various bodies organized by the provinces that are looking at this question, the Government of Canada will come forward with what it thinks is a solution to these problems. We will then invite a debate not just in this House—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nepean.

CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

In May 1990 the United Nations General Assembly adopted the convention on the rights of the child. On September, after adoption by 20 nations, it entered into force. Canada was not one of those 20 nations.

In spite of what the finance minister says, this government has cut millions of dollars from health care and education budgets, areas where the United Nations convention outlines minimum standards.

Could the Acting Prime Minister explain when Canada will ratify its commitment to this agreement and what measures will be taken to ensure that Canada is able to live up to the terms of this convention on the rights of the child?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the Prime Minister is very concerned with the rights of children in this country. That is why he chaired the summit last year at the United Nations.

My colleague from the opposition has many premises in the question, one of them being that our social programs are in danger. She should know that 35 cents of every dollar goes to pay for the debt.

The best way that we can take care of the children of this country and the health programs of this country is with the budget the Minister of Finance has introduced. That is how we will do it. That is how we will succeed.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister were really serious about the convention on the rights of the child, why has Canada not ratified our agreement?

Surely, the Acting Prime Minister will realize that because of the division of powers between the provinces and the federal government, the only mechanism that he has to guarantee compliance with the convention is the funding that he transfers to the provinces.

Now that his government has drastically cut the provincial funding, I ask the Acting Prime Minister to ensure that Canada can meet its commitments to the convention on the rights of the child.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend should know that transfer payments to the provinces with regard to children have not been cut. They have increased by 3.7 per cent, while at the same time the federal government is increasing its programs by 3.4 per cent.

We are doing our share and we should hope that the provinces will do theirs.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Justice.

I would like to ask the minister what policy direction the federal government is willing to take to ensure the protection of aboriginal rights as enshrined in the Constitution, in light of the B.C. court decision with respect to the Gitksan–Wet'suwet'en case.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague knows, a very lengthy judgment was rendered on Friday in the particular case to which she is referring.

The Department of Justice, as others I am sure, is looking into that particular judgment right now, which obviously is subject to appeal. The appeal delays have not expired yet.

With respect to the question of aboriginal title, that particular decision was with respect to aboriginal title to land. The decision, I am informed, is on that particular subject with respect to a specific area in British Columbia and should not affect aboriginal titles or rights elsewhere in Canada.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the aboriginal people across Canada felt the blow of the decision of the B.C. Supreme Court regarding their aboriginal title and the questions they have about that.

What specific and immediate steps are being taken by the federal government with regard to policy regarding aboriginal rights? How would they specifically deal with the fall-out of this decision which has deeply impacted the spirit of the aboriginal community in Canada?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I said a few minutes ago, that decision is very lengthy. If I am not mistaken it is somewhere around 390 pages. The case took four years. It is a very complicated case. I am sure that all legal experts on both sides of the issue are looking into the decision right now.

With respect to the specific question of aboriginal title to land claims, et cetera, the Government of Canada has a very specific policy on that, in that the Government of Canada is interested in settling land claims at the negotiating table and therefore invites the Gitskan and other Indian groups to come to the negotiating table, which I must say has been done. The Government of Canada again requests the presence of the Government of British Columbia to the same table.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister speaking on behalf of the minister of health.

On Thursday, the Newfoundland Liberal government announced it was closing 360 acute care hospital beds, laying off medical personnel, reducing hours of operation in community health centres, and removing eye testing from medical coverage, as well as freezing the medicare budget at last year's level.

Yet, on Friday, the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization stated that he felt Newfoundland was setting a good example that he hoped other provinces would follow.

Does the minister agree with the minister of state that these cutbacks are the example he wants provinces to follow in medicare? If so, how do such cuts maintain national medicare standards?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned a few minutes ago, our transfer payments to the provinces in the areas of health care and post-secondary education, the global area, have increased by 3.7 per cent. This year alone, the federal government will spend $14 billion on medicare and health care.

We know that the provinces are experiencing difficult situations. We are experiencing difficult financial situations. It is as a result of the budget proposed by the Minister of Finance that we will put the economy back in good shape so that our children will have a good medicare and health care system for the future.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

This government has said that it will enforce national medicare standards. Yet the Newfoundland government has withdrawn a basic health service, namely, eye examinations.

Will the minister use his authority under the Canada Health Act to force the reinstatement of this basic medical service in Newfoundland?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is committed to ensuring that the Canada Health Act is complied with. That is what we intend to do.

PORTS CANADA

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Just prior to last Christmas, some 20 leaseholders in the Prescott area of my riding received a notice from Ports Canada that their current leases on cottage lots were cancelled and that new leases would be issued. The new leases showed increases of over 700 per cent in three years. This was done with very little or no dialogue with the leaseholders, some of whom have been leaseholders for 35 years and more.

Will the Minister of Transport give me and these citizens some assurance that he will intervene; that, if increases are warranted, they will be tempered with reason: and that he will not allow his department to impose increases which in any other facet of Canadian life would be illegal?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to our attention.

I am not personally acquainted with what he is referring to, but I will bring it to the minister's attention and have it looked at for him.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, since free trade, Canada has lost 277,000 or 13 per cent of all our manufacturing jobs.

This wholesale deindustrialization of Canada is going to have a devastating impact on Canada's economic future. Will the Minister of Finance tell us how, with this deindustrialization, does he think Canada can compete in the future? How can we compete if we have nothing left to compete with?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, with reference to these canards about the free trade agreement, the hon. member seeks to emulate the Canadian Labour Congress which listed a figure like that and then listed all the jobs that have been lost, which included Air Canada, which included government agencies, which included auto parts companies, none of which were included in the free trade agreement.

I refer the member to a speech by Frederick Telmer in Kelowna, British Columbia: "The persistent assault on the FTA manifests a flight from reality."

I refer him to: "Free trade gets ringing endorsement from the Canada West Foundation."

I refer him to: "Trade deal benefits Manitoba", and so it goes across the country.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I, and several other of my colleagues, heard the chief government Whip refer directly to comments made by the hon. member for Willowdale as being untrue.

I believe the word he used was "liar". He repeated the word on a number of occasions.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Boudria: Of all people in this House, the chief government Whip should know that such language is unparliamentary according our rules and according to the citations of Beauchesne. I would urge the hon. government Whip to withdraw the comments he made, which of course are contrary to citations 319 and 320 of Beauchesne.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember the hon. member who has just spoken being on his feet.

If I offended anybody in the Chamber with my use of the word, I would be happy to withdraw it. If some member, in particular, felt that their honour had been impugned, I would appreciate it if they would rise in the Chamber and complain. Then we could be a little more specific.

In the future, if we do insult one another, I think we have the responsibility to stand in the Chamber and indicate that we feel insulted.

COMMONWEALTH DAY

SIXTIETH ANNIVERSARY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, 60 years ago the Commonwealth was born.

In 1931, under the Statute of Westminster, Canada and the other dominions, which included at that time Newfoundland, gained full independence as members of the Commonwealth of Nations "equal in status and in no way subordinate to one another though united by a common allegiance to the Crown".

Today, Monday, March 11, we take pride in the accomplishments of a much expanded, multi-racial Commonwealth as we mark the 15th annual observance of Commonwealth Day across Canada and in 49 other member countries embracing over one-quarter of the earth's population.

The Commonwealth has been central to the growth of Canada's role in the world and remains a key element of its external political, trade, and aid relations. Through a common language and shared heritage and loyalty to common ideals, it has enriched our partnership in many countries in Africa and Asia and has reinforced our historic ties with the Caribbean. It has also provided inspiration for shaping that other great language family to which Canada can claim a birthright—the francophone community of states.

The Commonwealth is dedicated not only to a basic set of values—democracy, the rule of law, fundamental human rights and equality for women—but has given moral and practical leadership in some of the major issues of the day: condemning racism, dealing with debt, the environment and drugs, promoting the security of small states.

With strong Canadian support, programs such as the Commonwealth Fund for Technical Co-operation, the Commonwealth Scholarship and Fellowship Plan and the Vancouver based distance education facility. The Commonwealth of Learning, have immeasurably broadened opportunities and promoted interchanges among their people.

The past eventful year brought the welcome admission of the Commonwealth's 50th member, Namibia, after that country with steadfast Commonwealth support won its independence from South Africa on March 21, 1990. Sustained Commonwealth pressure, including the work of the Commonwealth Committee of Foreign Ministers, chaired by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has been instrumental in the historic progress registered in the last year toward the dismantling of apartheid in South Africa.

It has been a year of progress in other sectors as well. My colleague, the Hon. Mary Collins, played host last October in Ottawa to a major conference of Commonwealth ministers responsible for women's affairs, which called for full equality for women and their full integration in the development process.

As we start the countdown to the 1994 Commonwealth Games in Victoria, a Commonwealth working party, chaired by Mr. Roy McMurtry, has proposed an ambitious scheme of amateur sport development in member countries.

A Commonwealth election observer mission, which included a Canadian observer, Mr. Barry Turner, has just two weeks ago travelled to Bangladesh to monitor the recent elections held in that country.

The real strength of the Commonwealth is that it is pragmatically oriented and people driven. It links societies and thousands of individuals in a vast international network of professional, service, cultural and sport organizations. These form the real lifeblood of the Commonwealth and ensure its continuing vitality. One which we in this House know well is the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

The coming year will be full of challenge for the Commonwealth. Under its new Secretary-General, Emeka Anyaoku, who has our full support and confidence, it must adapt to meet tomorrow's needs and particularly those of its youth. A blue ribbon panel of leaders, including Prime Minister Mulroney, is examining the role of the Commonwealth in the 1990s and beyond, and will make its recommendations to the next Heads of Government meeting in Harare, Zimbabwe this coming October.

Somewhat contrary to the view that states in their external relations have only cold-blooded interests, it is a pleasure to pay tribute to an international association whose virtue is to maintain friendly contacts and fruitful dialogue among states of great diversity. It is this capacity for building bridges which gives the Commonwealth its special importance and potential, and which will make it even more indispensable in the future.

I am sure members will join me in congratulating the Commonwealth, which was born 60 years ago today.

• (1510)

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is with pride and pleasure that I rise today on behalf of the Official Opposition, together with my colleague who just spoke, to mark Commonwealth Day 1991.

Now when the move among nations is toward broader economic and political alliances, we can look at our 60-year history as one of the 50 members of the Commonwealth, a multilateral organization in its best form.

The Commonwealth has since its adoption been a leader in the global commonwealth toward democracy. It has assisted smaller member countries like Namibia, Maldives, and has by virtue of its existence as a multi-racial, multinational and multi-faith organization—to use Her Majesty's words from her Commonwealth message today—being true to the principles of equality between all, regardless of sex or economic status, and has been a leader in the development of democracy.

The evolution is continuing and today we have the opportunity to prove the continuing vitality of the Commonwealth by declaring specific and current objectives.

This year will be the celebration of science in the Commonwealth. We will have the opportunity to expand on the work done by member countries. Here in Canada in 1987 we were in the vanguard of world opinion when the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development was tabled. This was part of an ongoing contribution to overcome threats to the global environment. Now we can apply the same collective spirit and education to the world of science and see our world continue to improve.

I was hoping that the hon. minister would have spent a little more time on how Canada would be contributing in this theme of science in the Commonwealth but he did not.

In South Africa, sanctions have worked and we are witnessing the break-up of apartheid, something many of us thought we would never see. We must keep up that pressure and ensure that all the members of our commonwealth countries have the same rights to freedom and democracy that we enjoy right here in Canada.

There are other contributions the Commonwealth can make to the world. It includes almost one-quarter of the world's population and enough geography to have a real impact on ending the flow of illegal drugs internationally.

Through Official Development Assistance money we can ensure more education and health care for the other members of our family in the Commonwealth, though the recent budget cuts in that funding are weakening where we should be strengthening.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Northumberland for reminding the government that you do not cut back on the backs of the poor.

We are concerned about north-south relations. We must never forget our obligations as part of a large extended family. When one member of a family needs a hand, the other members must rally around and support the individual in order to support the whole family.

Today the world is looking for peace, good will, understanding and democracy. The people of the world want to live in health, wealth and security. We are part of the best role model in existence and have much experience to share internationally.

I hope we will continue to take our role internationally very seriously and will consistently work towards the betterment of the world and its people.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of our party, including my colleague from Saskatoon—Dundurn, to put forward greetings and join with those of the other parties in this House on the occasion of Commonwealth Day 1991.

As has been noted, 60 years ago today the Statute of Westminster came into force and the British Commonwealth of Nations, as it was then called, came into existence.

The Commonwealth replaced, of course, the British Empire, the empire on which, it was said, the sun never set. The empire is, of course, at this stage of the review of history, somewhat maligned. But it should be understood that through that empire both hope as well as exploitation passed. The Commonwealth, as the empire before it, expanded the horizons of people around the world, not only at its centre but at its outer reaches.

Now, the Commonwealth, of course, is no longer British. In fact, in recent years, thanks to the lack of leadership of the British government under Margaret Thatcher, the active leadership of the Commonwealth passed from the United Kingdom to other countries.

The Commonwealth draws together people from 50 countries around the world. As much as has been said today by the minister on behalf of the government of the shared values of the Commonwealth, I suspect that that is somewhat exaggerated rhetoric when one looks at the reality of the Commonwealth. What is shared, simply, is a history. The values of the Commonwealth are not shared as well as they ought to be.

We see, for example, in the response to apartheid in South Africa, governments such as that of the United Kingdom failing to share the overwhelming consensus of other governments and people in the Commonwealth on how to deal with the evils of apartheid.

The Commonwealth itself suffers from deep divisions of wealth. Millions within the Commonwealth still live in abject poverty. Democratic freedoms are an illusion to too many within the Commonwealth. But it must be acknowledged that the Commonwealth, through the Commonwealth, has passed much of the genius of the British people; Shakespeare, the concept of parliamentary government, the rule of law, the beauty and openness of the Anglican form of the Christian religion and, in reverse, in recent years, the devotion of the Muslim religion, the discipline of the Hindu religion and the honour of the Sikh religion. We have all learned from our association with the Commonwealth that we are part of a larger world, that we share a history with the people of Bombay, Papua New Guinea and Barbados.

As has already been said, if this institution is to survive another 60 years, we must strengthen official development assistance. The Commonwealth must be far more effective than it has been as the voice of the poor and the dispossessed. To do that we must strengthen programs of public education and interchange.

In that regard, and before I close, let me make reference to the Commonwealth Games, coming as I do from Victoria. We have a special interest in the 1994 Commonwealth Games. We are very proud we have been chosen to host those games. The Commonwealth Games are the friendly games. They draw together people from this great institution. If they are to be in keeping with the true value that is said to be that of the Commonwealth, we must do what we can to see that the occasion is used to bring people together, to learn the realities of people's lives, to see that they are not just the best ever games for Canadian athletes, but the best ever games for athletes in every country of the Commonwealth.

As has been noted, the Canadian government and the Commonwealth have provided some leadership in trying to expand the vision not just of the Commonwealth Games, but of the Commonwealth itself through the establishment of a working group chaired by Roy McMurtry. I suggest to the government that it must look carefully at the requests that come for funding from that organization for programs recommended unanimously by that group. The government has been generous in its funding of the francophonie games and the work leading up to it. It must have the same approach to that of the Commonwealth Games.

We join with all parties in urging that all peoples of the Commonwealth give this day the honour it deserves.

PETITIONS

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition from residents of Vassan who insist that the Government of Canada drop its plans for the development of Parliament Hill, which would cost $68 million and involve building a parking garage and shopping centre under the Parliament Buildings, and that the government acknowledge the need for preserving the natural environment and historical character of the Parliament Buildings and Parliament Hill in Ottawa.

CANADIAN MILITARY INTERVENTION IN THE PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition with more than 275 signatures, mainly from residents of Daveluyville who emphasize Canada's reputation as a peacekeeper. They ask that Canada put a stop to its military intervention in the Persian Gulf and are in favour of a negotiated settlement including the Palestinian question.

[English]

THE SENATE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have two petitions I would like to present today. The first petition, signed by quite a number of constituents from my riding, is concerned with the Senate. The petitioners comment as follows. Knowing that the Senate was established in 1867 for the purposes of representation of the regions of Canada and providing a medium for sober second thought, and that the Senate now performs no useful function, is completely partisan and has proven after many efforts to be impossible to reform, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to abolish the Senate outright.

FOOD AND DRUG REGULATIONS

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the second petition, signed by again many of my constituents including many from the east end of the city of Toronto, are concerned about the impact of various contents of food on those people with allergies. The petitioners say that restaurants and food packagers are not required to disclose all food contents. Members of Parliament and others have brought forward Private Members' Bills and issues on the same subject.

The petitioners therefore request Parliament to enact blegislation amending food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in pre-packaged foods in place of general classifications now permitted and further to require restaurants and food retailers to provide on demand to customers a list of all food ingredients and additives in prepared foods.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Peterson (p. 18259).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 15 minutes.

[Translation]

When the debate was interrupted at 2 p.m, the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization) had the floor.

[English]

The hon. member had only one minute left.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): But, Mr. Speaker, it is going to be a wonderful minute.

In the one minute that is left to me, I want to say that before we broke for Question Period we were talking about economic recovery. The plan for economic recovery sets us on a path where growth, investment and confidence can be sustained and flourish in the years to come.

In doing this, our plan is going to contribute directly to preserving the bonds that link us as a nation. One of the best things we can do to strengthen the unity of our country is to strengthen the economic union and the fiscal condition. This will give us the resources and the regional confidence we need to resolve the other issues and aspirations that challenge us.

Canada has come a long way in 123 years. We should not be selling ourselves short. We have forged a country that is the envy of the world, a tolerant and open society with a superior standard of living.

This prosperity was put at risk by abandoning the traditional Canadian value of paying our way.

Hon. members, I believe that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's time is up, unless the House agrees to extend.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): It is very difficult to take the minister seriously, considering the gravity of the motion and the way that he has dealt with it. His last remarks are particularly offensive because by suggesting that we have to pay our way, the government, by implication, has decided that Canada should improve its financial condition by fighting it on the back of 10.2 per cent of unemployed Canadians, the highest percentage in a long time.

Mr. Speaker, you will agree that that is very poor thinking displayed by the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization. He hinged his argument during his rather lengthy intervention on four arguments. The first one was on the fact that, in his opinion, we are doing much better in high technology exports.

I would like to ask him whether he could explain, if we are doing so much better, why in the past 12 months Northern Telecom in Kingston had to lay off 60 people; why Honeywell Bull had to close in various provinces in the computer manufacturing section, 100 people; why Comterm in Montreal had to lay off 176 people in computer manufacturing; why Northern Telecom in Saint John had to lay off 120 people in telecommunications equipment; why STM Systems Corp. had to lay off 125 people in computer services; why Jonal and Ericson in Don Valley, Ontario, had to lay off 280 people last August in computer software; why Unisys in St. Laurent, Quebec, had to lay off 230 people in computer equipment?

And the list is far from being complete.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the first of my four questions.

The second question has to do with the great advantages of the free trade agreement to which the minister referred in his speech.

We would like to know on this side of the House where the 500,000 jobs are which were promised by this government at the time of the signing of the free trade agreement. I hope that in replying to this question, the minister will refrain from including hamburger-stand jobs.

Third, the minister on various occasions in his recovery speech made reference to market forces and the greatness of the market forces in which he believes.

Perhaps the minister might like to enlighten us as to why the market forces are not being applied in labour relations when it comes to the civil servants of the federal government.

Finally, the fourth question stemming from the minister's intervention is this: What is needed, according to the enlightened Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, is a substantial reduction in inflation and in Canadian inflationary expectations. These are his very own words.

This seems to me a rather sick joke, if the minister is implying that inflation is to be fought on the back of 10.2 per cent of unemployed Canadians today. Perhaps he might enlighten us on some of those points.

Mr. McDermid: First of all, the hon. member knows full well that his last statement was facetious and does not need any more comment than that. This government of course is not cutting back on the back of the 10.2 per cent who are unemployed today. We on this side feel as badly about it as anyone does. We have made that very clear, and that is why one of our largest expenditure increases in this fiscal year is unemployment insurance, to ensure that the safety net is there until the economy is back growing again.

• (1530)

The hon. member knows full well about that. He talked about lay-offs. Yes, there have been lay-offs. There is no question that there have been lay-offs, and we do not take satisfaction in that either.

He rhymed off a number of companies that had lay-offs. I want to point out two things to him. I am going to rhyme off a number of companies that are increasing employment starting with I.E. Aerospace Canada in Winnipeg; in Mississauga, General Electric; in Thunder Bay, Earnway Industries; Trans-Alta Resources Corporation in Malton; Abitibi-Price in Manitoba; and Journal Printing of Sudbury.

I want to refer him to the study that was done by the Canada-West Foundation that said: "Canada increased high-tech's exports by $4 billion since the deal while such imports from the United States fell by $600 million". The study is there. It is an independent study. It is not a government study. It is an independent study.

I saw an article in the paper just the other day for McDonnell Douglas in our area, close to the area that he represents and close to the area that I represent. There was a request for 500 employees at McDonnell Douglas in Malton the other day. Of course, there are employment opportunities out there. There is no question about that.

One of the problems is that individuals like my hon. friend from Davenport have nothing positive to say about anything. All he does is stand up here, criticize and knock and put the country down. We support Canada. We work for Canada. We do not knock it down. We praise it and will continue to do so. I suggest the hon. member do the same.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I have a very simple question for the minister, Mr. Speaker.

It comes out of his last statement that suggested that the member for Davenport could do nothing but knock this government and, therefore, that was putting this country down.

I want to ask the minister when this government and its ministers started to identify themselves as "this country". Across this country, there are millions of Canadians who would like nothing better than to affirm their country by kicking this government out as fast as possible.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the question is there, but I will tell you that there are more millions across this country who will not vote for the NDP in the next election. That is for sure.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, in the one minute, I have a very serious question for the minister.

The minister knows my riding of Parkdale—High Park. He knows that Stelco, which manufactures nuts and bolts, is closing and all the workers will be unemployed.

The John Inglis plant that used to employ a lot of my constituents has closed, but I do not think we are into an argument here why the plants are closing, et cetera.

What I would like to ask the minister very sincerely is: What help can I give my constituents who come to me during appointments, produce 30 or 40 letters that they get from companies where they have applied for jobs, including McDonnell Douglas, and get refusals.

They then go to the CEC for retraining. They come back to me and say: "The earliest I can get retraining will be in a year or in a year and a half".

These people want to work. They show me letters of how they tried to get jobs. They have gone to the Canada Employment Commission, and they cannot get them. I am sincerely looking for assistance for these unemployed, not only in Parkdale—High Park. I am sure he has them. We have them across Canada.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing enjoyable at all about being unemployed. I have been. I know exactly what it is like. It is extremely difficult. When I was out of a job in the early 1960s, all I did was start knocking on doors. I just kept knocking and knocking. I got turned down an awful lot of times, but finally one opened. It was not a job that I really wanted to take, but it was the only thing available at the time. I took it. I eventually got back into my profession, the job that I was trained to do. I eventually got back to it.

All I can say to people is to keep trying, to keep trying and keep plugging. I have the same problem in my constituency in Brampton, where people come to me and ask for advice. And that is all I can tell them, to keep plugging and to keep trying.

We cannot train every single unemployed person, unfortunately. We do not have that kind of money and the hon. member knows that. That is why there are line-ups waiting for retraining today. We are putting more and more money into retraining. Through the unemployment insurance program now there are going to be hundreds of thousands of additional dollars for training. We are doing as best we can, as much as we can afford.

But the Canadian people are also telling us: don't raise our taxes, don't increase the deficit, and for heaven's sake toe the line. So, there has to be a balance there, and I believe the Minister of Finance has found that balance.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I want to say first that this motion which has been put forward today by the Liberal Party is a motion which we will support. We will not support it because it covers what we feel to be a complete approach to dealing with the problems of this economy. We noticed, for instance, that many of the tax measures which we think have to be made fairer in this country, which come out of years of both Liberal and Conservative budgets, are not talked about in the Liberal motion.

We notice too that there are problems with the lack of commitment on the part of the Liberal Party to get us out of the free trade deal, which is hurting so many people across this country. We will not in any sense be endorsing the motion that is in front of us as a solution to the recession, but we do think that it expresses the lack of confidence that Canadians across this country feel in this government. It is a lack of confidence which emerges with tremendous force as you talk to people in city after city across this land, as our economic recovery group in the New Democratic Party has been doing.

The number of people who say that they want to impeach the Prime Minister defies description. The number of people who come up to us and say: "We voted Conservative last time. Never again." defies description.

An hon. member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Langdon: There is in this country a tremendous, devastating absence of confidence in our national government at a time when we face an economic crisis of increasing magnitude. I have to say as a member of Parliament that that is something I feel very sad about.

I wish that this government in this budget that it brought down just two weeks ago had given to Canadians a budget of hope, a budget which would have given Canadians a sense that this government had finally started to listen to the Canadian people and had started to say: yes, we must deal with the recession. Yes, we must deal with the unemployed. Yes, we must deal with the tremendous sense of deprivation which many farmers are feeling across this country. Yes, we must deal with the tremendous sense of unfairness that many aboriginal Canadians feel. Yes, we must deal with the problems of unity which are there in our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think it is very difficult to understand a Budget that talks about national unity but, when it comes down to it, does nothing for the unemployed in the province of Quebec. We can read the Budget from cover to cover, trying to find something for the unemployed, but there is nothing. There is no response to the economic needs of the province of Quebec.

• (1540)

Mr. Speaker, I think this is very sad when we consider the threat to the unity of this country.

[English]

We saw on Friday the realities of the recession brought very much to light for people across this country with the release of the unemployment statistics for February. When the government brought in its budget on February 26, it claimed that it was responding and that it saw ahead the chances of recovery. Yet the unemployment figures for February is the first sign of what is happening to the economy in the month of February. It is the first sign that has come out.

Those unemployment figures were devastating: an increase in unemployment from 9.7 per cent to 10.2 per cent, a jump of one-half a percentage point. That is thousands and thousands of people; 77,000 people across this country have lost their jobs. In the last year, 430,000 permanent jobs were lost in this country as a result of the policies of this government. That kind of tragedy is especially grim in my own province of Ontario, my own city of Windsor, where in my constituency we have seen unemployment go well above 13 per cent and 14 per cent.

What is tragic is that it is not just something that is hitting the manufacturing sector of Ontario, as perhaps this motion by the Liberal Party might suggest. This is instead a devastating attack on unemployed people, on workers, on fishermen, on farmers. We can see across the country unemployment figures that just leave us close to tears.

We can see in St. John's, Newfoundland 12.5 per cent unemployed. In the province of Newfoundland itself a total of 18.2 per cent unemployed; in the province of Quebec, 12.1 per cent unemployed; and in the province of British Columbia, 9.9 per cent unemployed. That compared to Ontario where it is 9.5 per cent unemployed.

Those are just statistics, but we have met some of the people behind those statistics as we have gone across the country. There is a sense of despair, a sense that hope is disappearing. For the life of me I just cannot understand why this government has not been prepared to bring in a budget that says: here is the human problem and we are going to try to do something about it.

The minister who spoke just before me suggested that the government was increasing its expenditure on the unemployed. He was not correct. Because so many more people are unemployed, the government is having to spend more unemployment insurance money, but each and every single penny of that money will be paid back by the unemployed. It will be paid back by workers. It will be paid back by small businesses. The only thing that dealt with the unemployed in this budget was a $100 million cut to the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

We could talk about other parts of the budget too. We could talk about the transfers for post-secondary education, for instance, something so important to the future of our country. Because of the freeze which has been put into effect until 1994-95—and these are not figures that I have generated or that the NDP research has generated, but come from the Canadian Association of University Teachers—$3.8 billion, will be lost in transfers to our post-secondary institutions. That is $3.8 billion which should be going to help develop the future of our young people, the future of our work force.

It is not just those of us in the opposition who have looked at this budget and expressed serious concern for what is going to happen to our economy as a result. Some of the economic forecasters have looked very carefully at the budget. I want to quote a few of these. I want to quote first from Informetrica, which is based here in Ottawa and is again an independent institution which in fact does a number of contracts for the government. It is not as if they have a in-built bias against this government in any sense. Yet they point out that the result of this budget, according to their detailed calculations, will be that over the next two years there will be 122,000 jobs lost.

They go on to make some points with respect to the budget, and I quote:

> In the midst of a recession, the most powerful automatic stabilizer in the Canadian fiscal system has been "turned off", with a dramatic increase (24.4 per cent) in unemployment insurance contributions.

In the midst of a recession, this government has reached out and forced Canadians to pay more for their unemployment insurance coverage. Informetrica also states:

> After persistent "lectures" from the government about the problems of inflation, indirect taxes have been increased—and labour costs increased. These two items will add about 0.4 per cent to the CPI in 1991, and another 0.2 per cent in 1992.

• (1550)

In other words, it is a budget which will increase inflation despite the fact that the government talks in its budget about the importance of dealing with inflation.

Let us take another group, the Conference Board of Canada, which is usually on the government's side. What do it say? It says in its assessment of the budget which just came out this past Friday: "The budget risks extending the recession and making it deeper". It also says that this budget will "cut GDP growth, income growth in 1991, compared with what it otherwise would have been". It goes on to say there is no fiscal policy stimulus whatever in the budget to help get the economy through the current recession.

In other words, this business financed group is saying precisely the same thing that the New Democratic Party is saying, that there is nothing in this budget to help with the recession. It goes even further and says: "The recovery during the second quarter is now somewhat more at risk than before the budget because this budget takes purchasing power out of the hands of consumers".

It goes on to attack the believeability of the government's inflation targets. It concludes by saying that it expects at least 67,000 jobs lost as a result of this budget, not quite as tough an analysis as Informetrica but completely similar in what it anticipates will happen.

The question is: Was there a choice? Could we have done something different? I want to use the last part of my comments to suggest that yes, there was a choice. We could have taken a different path. We could first have cut the interest rate gap between ourselves and the United States which historically has been 1 per cent, maybe 1.5 per cent. If we had done that, we would have reduced interest rates dramatically in this country. We would also have brought the value of the Canadian dollar down, which would have been a big help to our exporters and would have meant thousands of jobs across this country.

Also, the reduction in interest rates would have meant a reduction of about $6 billion in the expenditure that had to be made to pay interest on our national debt. We could have taken that $6 billion and invested it in the future. We did not have to increase the deficit. We could have taken the money saved from reducing interest rates, invested it in education for our young people in the future, in research and development so our companies would be more effective in world markets in the future and in training.

The minister has just said we do not have enough money for training. That is a tragic admission to have to make when there are over 1.4 million people out of work in this country.

We could have invested in better infrastructure for the future. We could have spent some of that $6 billion on that. We could have spent the rest of that $6 billion on emergency help for the unemployed. It should not be necessary for an unemployed person who has worked for years for a company in this country to have to turn to welfare to keep his or her family fed. That should not be possible as his or her only outlet in Canada in 1991.

We could have put a fair tax system into place and replaced the GST by doing that. If the large corporations in this country and those who are wealthy paid their fair share of taxes, we would not need the GST. Across this country individual consumers and small business people would not be suffering the economic consequences of the GST.

There was the basis for a budget of hope. There was the basis for a different direction, for a new approach, an approach that would have shown it cared about people. I just wish this government had taken that approach instead of the mean and counterproductive approach which its budget demonstrates.

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member who, in his questions to other speakers and at the beginning of his own speech, launched a fairly wide-ranging attack against free trade. I would like to draw his attention to an article in the Financial Post, published on March 5 under the heading: Free trade not cause of recession. This was an analysis by the Royal Bank, the second in as many years to examine the results of the free trade agreement.

The first caveat was, that before the agreement came into force, already two-thirds of our trade in goods was free between our two countries. The agreement will be effective for a period of ten years, so that what has already been implemented over the past two years does not reflect the full impact of free trade.

In a survey conducted by the Royal Bank, the main problem in the current recession was identified as high labour costs.

What also struck me in this article, Mr. Speaker, was a short paragraph which says:

[English]

The principal objective of the free trade agreement was to secure access to the U.S. market and to provide incentive for Canadian industry to restructure, to take advantage of activities in which we have a comparative advantage.

[Translation]

I like their conclusion, Mr. Speaker, when they say:

[English]

As long as wage increases exceed productivity and continue to fuel inflation, interest rates and the Canadian dollar will remain high in Canada. We will lose trade centres and jobs to the U.S.

In last week's budget, the federal government tried to remove one reason for high wage increases by targeting low inflation rates. Ottawa is also trying to set an example by announcing caps on wage increases for federal civil servants. The provinces should do the same.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the hon. member whether in a period like the one we are experiencing today in Canada, Mr. Speaker, he doesn't think it would be better to try and identify together the solutions to the problems facing this country? Should we not make a joint effort to build a stronger and more productive Canada that will be in a better position to deal with all the social problems we are experiencing?

Personally, I think we need the help of governments, the private sector and the labour unions. I think Canadians as a whole can be realistic and, instead of looking for a single solution, are able to imagine a range of solutions that would make good use of the full potential of our Canadian workers.

• (1600)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I agree that we as members of Parliament must work together to find solutions, if we can, but we must also be prepared to debate and discuss and clarify our various positions as parties and as members of this House. For instance, if we consider inflation, we can say yes, that is a problem. We must deal with this problem. The Economic Council of Canada suggested an approach to deal with inflation. It suggests that all groups in our society meet to examine the issue of inflation and set goals to control it. What did this government do? The government ignored that suggestion. The government decided to set its own goals, with the Bank of Canada.

[English]

That is not the way to establish co-operation. That is not the way to get people to work together in this country, if we are to work together as a society, as has happened in Quebec. One of the things I have admired in the province of Quebec is the pulling together of the different economic actors to talk about economic policy and where it should head in the future. This has taken place both under the Péquiste government and under the Liberal government in Quebec. It is not an approach which is being taken by this government.

Instead, this government says: "We will set the inflation targets", despite the fact that its own Economic Council of Canada said the opposite. It said: "If these targets are to work, everybody has to be involved in setting them."

[Translation]

The hon. member mentioned the subject of free trade. I admit it is a complex issue. We cannot say that all jobs were lost because of free trade but it is a fact that many jobs were lost for that reason.

[English]

In my constituency, for instance, we have seen 40 plants shut in this past year. These plants have transferred to the United States. They have transferred in part because of the rationalization that free trade meant had to take place. They have transferred because the value of the dollar was so high. And the value of the dollar was as high as it was, I believe, because that was part of the free trade bargain. A former Conservative cabinet minister has said precisely the same thing, someone who I think the member who spoke used to be a parliamentary secretary to, if I am not mistaken—though I do not remember for certain.

So, we have to recognize—

[Translation]

Our factories are under a lot of pressure as a result of free trade. We see this throughout Ontario, and I imagine the same applies to Quebec. The hon. member mentioned the Royal Bank, and other members mentioned the Can-West Foundation. All these groups supported free trade before the decision was made, so it is not surprising to see the same groups support free trade now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, before I start my speech, I would like to beg the indulgence of this House. In view of the fact that within our party we have a large number of members of Parliament who wish to address this question, it would be appreciated if you would allow us to split our time so that our speeches can be of 10 minutes duration with a five-minute question and comment period, if you would agree to that.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree with the opposition's request that its speakers share their speaking time, so that we will have 10 minute periods, followed by 5 minutes of questions and comments?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would appreciate it if all hon. members would make this clear at the beginning of their speech, so that it is easier to keep on track.

[English]

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, I will be speaking for 10 minutes and sharing my time with my colleague, the member for Ottawa—Vanier.

I am addressing this motion which we have brought forward condemning this government, essentially for its very poor economic management which, in effect, is bringing about the deindustrialization of Canada, especially in Ontario and the industrial manufacturing sector in southern Ontario.

I would like to bring a very personal view to this discussion. I want to explain that we in northern Ontario, who come from resource based towns, understand what it means when you lack that industrial and manufacturing infrastructure.

I was born in the town of Kirkland Lake, which is very much a one industry town. From the time I was very young I knew, because we had no other infrastructure, no other diversification, that when the demand for the mineral produced in our town declined, jobs would be lost and there would be no other jobs. Eventually, when the minerals ran out, most people had to move away from this town. As a result, people of my age group, people I went to school with, no longer live in the area. They migrated south, east and west.

We are again seeing the same phenomenon across northern Ontario, where our young children, my children perhaps and children who are starting to come into the work force, have a great deal of difficulty in finding employment in any of the towns in northern Ontario because many of these towns lack the kinds of infrastructure and diversification necessary.

I then moved to Sudbury, which as you know was at one time also very dependent, and still is somewhat dependent, on mines that produced base metals.

In the early eighties during the severe recession which this country was subjected to Sudbury was especially hit very hard indeed.

• (1610)

Our unemployment rates rose to 28 per cent and 30 per cent. So, I can understand, firsthand, what it means to be living under these conditions.

During these very difficult times, we had in place some very caring governments, all levels of government, which got together and brought forward policies to continue to help the area diversify. I believe that today Sudbury is in a very good economic position as compared to many other areas of this country because the dollars that were spent then created the diversification which we now enjoy.

What bothers me about what is happening throughout the country, and especially in southern Ontario, is I see the loss of good manufacturing jobs. The statistics show us that in the 1981–82 recession, for every five jobs lost, one of them was lost forever.

Today, in the same vein, for every two jobs lost, one will never return. What, pray tell, can we tell these people? Where will they go for employment? What kinds of opportunities await them?

There are absolutely no government programs in place to help this sector.

I listened to my colleague, the Minister of State for Privatization, say that there were some jobs being created and there have been some. He mentioned, in particular, jobs created in Sudbury within Journal Printing. There were, I believe, four or five jobs created in that industry in Sudbury, but let me also remind the minister that those jobs were created as a direct result of a government grant which came to that company from FEDNOR. So it does pay to have government intervention in the sector.

What this government has done, though, in a lot of other areas, is totally cut back in job creation, such as $100 million from the Canada Jobs Strategy. Can you imagine how much good that would do if it were left in place?

It is absolutely essential that this government starts listening to Canadians. Perhaps the worst fact of all is that Canadians feel this government is not listening, is not caring and is putting together an economic policy in some backroom somewhere with someone who is not affected. It is extremely frightening for the people of Canada.

What I would ask is that this government please—and we are all willing to co-operate—let us have some realistic job creation goals and realistic programs. We are all aware that we have a problem with the debt, but we are also all aware that if we do not invest today in our young people, we will not compete in the future, and that if we do not invest those dollars today there will be no jobs there in the future.

It is extremely frightening that this government keeps insisting on this high interest, high dollar policy which, in itself, has created much of the problems we face.

Now some of the members opposite have said: "Well, it is not necessarily free trade that created all of the job losses". I really do not care what has created it, I just want to see it end. Somehow we are in a recession and I do not see this government's policies bringing an end to this recession whatsoever.

There are ways around what is happening now and one of them is, perhaps, in a concentrated effort at job creation. Perhaps it could be a building infrastructure in transportation. With good infrastructure and good transportation our economy can thrive. We live in a vast country and we need the kind of government intervention that can help the transportation problems.

We also need research, development and training. Rather than cutbacks in transfer payments to the provinces which will again put pressure on the university sectors and on the education sectors, we need some co-operative venture between the provinces and the federal government to allow training and re-training at a faster pace. What is happening now is that one government, the federal government, is acting on its own and it is getting out of the business of governing and putting the onus on a province which is further and further taxed.

The welfare rolls have increased in the province of Ontario by, I believe, 100 per cent. That is twice the number of people on welfare today than a year ago. That is not reflected in the unemployment statistics, but it is a very real problem within the province of Ontario and within most other areas of the country as well. One cannot turn one's back on these people. People do not go on the welfare rolls because they wish to be supported by the state. They go on welfare because they have no other means of support.

I would beg this government to do everything in its power to create the kinds of infrastructures, the kinds of job strategies that would enhance employment opportunities in our country.

The other problem we see happening within our country is the foreign control of many of our industries, yet the Conservative government has removed almost all of the barriers to more takeovers. With these takeovers, in many cases the companies are shut down or the profits are siphoned out to another country, and we are left with very little. We must control our own destiny. It is especially important. I beg this government to do everything in its power to bring about some turnaround in this economic fiasco facing Ontario.

Look not only at the unemployed people, but at, for example, a taxi driver. I spoke to a taxi driver while I was in Toronto the other day. He is losing his home because he is getting only half the fares he used to because business people are no longer travelling. He is faced with the loss of his home. He found it very difficult to believe this government was not trying to do something to enhance business in this country, to enhance jobs, because for every job lost, someone else makes less money.

The spin-off effect, the problems that are spread from one end of the country to the other are something this government must address.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. A five-minute period, starting with the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier. You have two and a half minutes.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Two and a half minutes. Very well, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

First I want to congratulate the hon. member on her well put speech.

I just received the report of the National Consortium of Scientific and Educational Societies and I would like to ask my colleague to comment on some of its recommendations. The consortium recommended that the Minister of Finance stop reducing the transfer payment to the provinces for post-secondary education until the first ministers agree on an alternative arrangement to fund Canada's universities adequately and reliably.

The National Consortium relies on a comment made by the Prime Minister of Canada when he stated: "In our second mandate we will concentrate on long-term investment in peoples' skills training, education, and strategic technologies.

Today I received another release, this time from the Canadian Association of University Teachers. They are quite alarmed. In fact Bob Kerr, the president, stated that Canada's system of post-secondary education is hovering on the brink of bankruptcy.

In the release which is also signed by the Canadian Federation of Students there is another quote by Professor Kerr: "What the government does not seem to understand is that universities play a vital role in the national economy, in the present and the future".

• (1620)

I would like to ask my colleague to comment on this particular statement. In her area of Sudbury, has she heard from students and teachers at universities like we have been hearing here in the national capital region?

Mrs. Marleau: Thank you for a well-put question. The post-secondary level of education in this country has been severely taxed and severely hit in the past. The people in the education field in my area are extremely concerned with the cutbacks that have already occurred within the system, and they are wondering how they can withstand more serious cutbacks as they see them coming.

The biggest issue is that if we do not train our young people today, how can we have the competitiveness that we need? Our human resources are key. We have the natural resources, but we must train our young people to add value to these resources so that we are the ones who are manufacturing and selling our exports to the other countries and not shipping these resources out to those countries where the labour is cheap and perhaps the training is not very good. If our training is very good, we can afford to pay ourselves some decent wages because we can produce goods that are of higher quality and we can sell them for better value. We will have done the training of our young people and we will also at the same time have done the research and development that needs to be done in order to come up with newer, more innovative techniques in the manufacturing sector. It is absolutely essential.

These are areas within our country that have made our country great in the past. We must not slacken our efforts in that area.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I commend the member of Parliament for Sudbury for a well-articulated display of economic wisdom. However, I am wondering whether she knows that in Ontario of some 31,000 people who were recently laid off, almost 20,000 of those individuals came as a result of complete shut-downs of plants and closures, and therefore they are of the permanent variety.

I wonder whether she might draw the House's attention to the fact that these are not just lost in a temporary short-term sense but that they are long-term and permanent. It tells us that we have to make severe and serious structural changes.

Mrs. Marleau: I would like to add to that comment. Shame to this government for doing the kinds of things that it has done. It is unconscionable that it would continue in closing its ears and shutting its eyes when we see this total deindustrialization, the loss of these long-term jobs. Has it no care for what happens in Canada?

I see the member across from me shaking his head. I do not believe that this is a laughing matter, hon. colleague. I do not foresee any greatness for our country when a government chooses to continue in its policies of total devastation within our economy.

I would ask the member across the way to please go back to his leader and convey the message which we are trying to bring forth.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On debate. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has the floor for 10 minutes.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I will be sharing that time with the hon. member for Sudbury.

The motion before us takes stock of the disastrous consequences the Conservative government's policies have had on the Canadian economy. There are three points in that motion. First, it proposes:

> That this House condemn the Government for:
> (1) maintaining a high interest/high dollar policy that gives foreigners a continuing competitive advantage over Canadian producers;

It is a fact as well as the truth. The current recession, which was largely made in Canada by this government, is fuelled by a conservative policy of high interests and an over-valued dollar.

[English]

In the past year the Ontario economy has borne much of the burden. Between January 1990 and February, Ontario lost 56,000 jobs,1 most of them in the manufacturing sector, half of them by experts who will be difficult to replace. Ontario's industrial base has been eroded and much of the damage will be, as I said, permanent.

The blame for this economic mess can only be placed on the insensitivity of this Tory government, which has purposely engineered a recession and thousands—I say, thousands—of personal and business bankruptcies. The pain being felt throughout Ontario and within my riding of Ottawa—Vanier is terrible.

[Translation]

Businesses in my riding and throughout Ontario paid a high price because of the unsound policies of the Conservative government. Several went bankrupt. I will quote some statistics on that. Others had to lay off employees. Some could not afford expanding and modernizing and others are struggling to survive. Did the government forget that the vitality of the Canadian economy depends to a large extent on the small business? I am asking the question, Mr. Speaker. A large part of Canadian jobs are created by the small business.

[English]

The cost of Tory government policies is staggering. One has to spend a couple of days researching a speech to find out that there is untold evidence to support this statement.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association says high interest rates are the primary cause of the fall in the volume of manufacturing shipments and will cost manufacturers in Canada about $3.2 billion more in interest charges in 1990 compared to 1987. The picture is bleak.

[Translation]

Second, under number two, the motion before us calls for this:

> That this House condemn the Government for:
> [—]
> (2) cutting support for export promotion, science and technology and research and development, thereby accelerating Canada's slide into non-competitiveness; —

Mr. Speaker, in the very important field of high technology, this government's policies were definitely a step backwards. The government-made recession has put through hell the high technology businesses established in the Ottawa area for example.

Over the past year, we witnessed the closure of Leigh Instruments, one of the oldest and most popular company in the area, with 750 jobs lost. Mitel Corporation had to make temporary lay-offs and cut jobs. Newbridge Networks, a telecommunications company, had to shut down its plant and lay people off. Gandalf Data laid off 70 employees. And it goes on, Mr. Speaker; my list is quite long.

[English]

In The Ottawa Citizen of March 7, high-tech consultant Denzil Doyle estimated that Ottawa had lost at least 15 per cent of its high-tech industry last year and perhaps as many as 4,000 employees. Doyle says there isn't any sign of new companies to rejuvenate the industry. That is bad news. There are problems in the high-tech sector. The recession is probably the main problem. It has produced the worst business climate for the high-tech sector in a decade. It has made the selling of corporate equity very difficult for them. It has put even more pressure on already thin research and development budgets.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, nearly half of the jobs in Canada involve the use of computer technology. Yet, almost 90 per cent of this technology is imported. In 1984, this government was saying, and I quote:

> The State should do its share (to strenghten the field of technology in Canada) by creating a favorable climate and encouraging the entrepreneurship required to foster innovation on a large scale.

[English]

We have been going down in research and development. We are doing less today than we were doing six years ago. Yet, this government promised it would do something about it.

In 1987 Canada's proportionate spending on R and D was only half that of Germany, Japan and the United States, and was less than smaller countries such as Switzerland, Sweden and the Netherlands.

[Translation]

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the motion before us states:

> That this House condemn the Government for:
> [—]
> (3) its economic mismanagement that has caused record bankruptcies, put 1.4 million Canadians out of work and brought about the de-industrialization of Canada, especially Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, unemployment in Ottawa, the national Capital, rose to 7.8 per cent in February, a 21 per cent increase over the preceeding month.

We now have 5,000 more people out of work than the 33,000 we had in January.

The number of bankruptcies among consumers in Ottawa rose from 527 in 1984 to 1,214 in 1990, a 130 per cent increase.

Over the same period, business banckruptcies increased by 80 per cent, from 174 in 1984 to 314 in 1990.

[English]

The Tories have already hit their predicted unemployment high rate for 1991 at 10 per cent. We got that news last Thursday. As a matter of fact they have exceeded 10 per cent. Ontario has its highest unemployment rate since August 1983, at 9.5 per cent. Canadian employers and employees will pay an extra $2 billion over the next year in unemployment insurance premiums to pay for Tory mismanagement.

Who knows what is in store for the next few months? It is true that the Tories have no desire to stay in office because they are trying to destroy not only the economy of this country but many other things. Under Tory management, productivity in Canadian manufacturing is declining. Between 1985 and 1988 the level deteriorated compared to other leading industrial countries. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, no friends of ours, estimates that 180,000 manufacturing jobs will be lost by the time this recession hits bottom. It estimates that half of these jobs will be permanently lost.

The quality of Canada's job training will be another important ingredient in our future prosperity. The Tory government has chosen to make a $100 million cut in the Canadian Jobs Strategy, designed to help Canadians retrain and adjust to a changing labour market. A recent Coopers and Lybrand study stated, and I quote: "Canada suffers from a shortage of skilled trades workers. Furthermore the lack of a universal system for trades training and certification in our education system has produced a work force whose skills sets do not match the technology needs of today". These are some of the problems.

Statistics Canada found on apprenticeship programs that almost half the participants dropped out in Ontario. Toronto Star, March 6, 1991, a few days ago states: "Drop-out rate across Canada is 40.6 per cent or 49,620 dropped out in 1986–87". In Ontario, my province, the rate rose to 42.3 per cent or 60,320 people quit training, abandoned. The main reason given was dissatisfaction with the program.

This is totally unacceptable from a government. In 1985, the Ontario government, a Liberal government, in a discussion paper noted crucial steps Canada must take to improve its job training system: one, design and support a comprehensive world class training system that matches our competitors; two, make training an unequivocal and integral part of our industrial development objectives; three, ensure fair and equal access to quality training for individuals in the cross regions and businesses. The paper concludes: "The government should take the lead in developing socially appropriate and industrial superior training and that the real level of federal financial support must be sustained and enhanced".

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that you indicate my time is over. Mr. Speaker, a nation that abandons training and development of its youth abandons its future. I suppose that these Tories over there do not care, but we do on this side and the quicker they get out of there, the quicker this country will get back on its feet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minute question and comments period.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I just want to correct some of the impressions left by my hon. friend concerning science and technology in Canada. Since 1984–85 we have increased spending on science and technology from $4.1 billion to $5.5 billion in the current year, a real increase of 8 per cent.

My hon. colleague again mentions financing of R and D in Canada.

I think he should be wise enough to know exactly where the difficulty is. If he looks at public sector spending—presumably, that is what he was concerned about and criticizing—he will see that in the latest figures I have, 1987, Sweden spent .73 GDP; Switzerland, .51; Japan, .6; Germany, 8.2; U.S., .45; the U.K., .46; Canada, .56; and Italy, .60. We do not do too badly in terms of public sector spending here.

The real problem comes if you look at the industrial component. Let me just rhyme off a few of those for his edification, Mr. Speaker. The industrial spending as a percentage of GDP: Sweden, 1.82; Switzerland, 2.27; Japan, 1.97; Germany, 1.82; U.S., 1.27; Canada, .57.

It seems to me that one of the reasons the private sector is having difficulty is that it had to struggle for years without the proper incentives or, indeed, without the proper programs to promote science and technology, and research and development, something this government has set about correcting.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the minister in the House taking me to task.

One of the points that I wanted to make in my speech but that time did not allow was that this government has even shattered the dreams of Canada's top scientists in the matters of research and development.

The Ottawa Citizen noted on December 15 that few of the promises the Prime Minister made when he phoned the National Advisory Board for Science and Technology for which the minister was responsible in 1987 have been met. While the board urged the Prime Minister to increase the percentage of GNP spent on research and development from 1.4 per cent in 1987, it has fallen to 1.28 per cent, less than any other industrialized nation.

Here is the Minister of Science and Technology. Maybe he will get up and defend that record. In research and development terms, Canada is a third world country. What kind of future can the people of Canada expect with a Prime Minister who does not keep his promise? He failed to keep his promise to the scientific community and also fails to keep up with research and development so essential to developing the jobs in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I am from Montreal, and in Montreal, as you know, we have 14 per cent more unemployment. If I have time to speak in this debate, I will tell you how disastrous the situation is. In fact, there are more unemployed workers in Montreal than in all four Atlantic provinces.

I listened to a description of the situation in Ontario, and I wonder whether the hon. member could tell us about these three points—he told us he had three points he intended to make—so I would like to hear about the third one, because this is, of course, an opportunity to find out a little more about what is happening in other provinces. My speech, if we have time, will be about the situation in Montreal, but I wish the hon. member would tell me what the last point was he wanted to raise in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier has one minute to answer.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis.

I would have liked to talk about training. I started talking about that but I didn't really have time to elaborate. I would have liked to talk about education. We have a problem in Ontario, Mr. Speaker, at the secondary and postsecondary levels. The drop-out rate among our students is disturbing. Health care and housing are some of the concerns of the people in my own riding and of people throughout the province.

They also want a strong, central government. And I know that the hon. member for Saint-Denis and Montreal is in favour of a strong, central government. The Conservatives are leaving us a government that is tax hungry. The Minister of Finance has refused to say anything about tax reform. Just imagine, where we are heading. We have the Minister of Finance who will not tell us what lies at the heart of this so-called tax reform.

As far as Ontario is concerned, I would have liked to talk about all that, but I am running out of time. I will get back to that later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate.

• (1640)

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should revert to the last intervention of my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier who referred to drop-outs and housing problems. If he thinks these problems are peculiar to Ontario I can tell him that we have them in Quebec as well. I would remind him that even though the federal government is not responsible for education, it has made concerted efforts—vocational guidance sessions, among other things—which I think are one way of indirectly helping people who would otherwise drop out of the school system.

That being said, I would suggest that the motion before us today deals with the priority objectives of government economic policy. The first two parts of the motion relate to a very important issue: competitiveness in our economy.

Enhancing Canada's competitiveness has been one of the government's foremost concern since 1984. The budget tabled by the Minister of Finance last February 26 made us look at the matter from a new vantage point. I want to debate that aspect of the motion in light of the budget and the strategy of the economic policy which the government has been steadfastly pursuing.

The 1991 budget responds to the twofold competitiveness and prosperity challenge facing Canada. We Canadians enjoy one of the world's highest standards of living and an unprecedented quality of life, but we have no guarantee that these conditions will remain unchanged. No longer can we rely on such factors as may have accounted for past successes if we want to continue to better our living conditions and our quality of life.

We have to get back on the road to economic recovery, but we must go one step further and achieve economic prosperity. To this end, Canadians are expected to co-operate more efficiently in a prosperity partnership which will seek to face up to our competitors' challenges.

As the world economy grew ever more competitive, Canada lost some ground as our trade partners became more aggressive on international markets. Trends in productivity remain one of the most telling indication of what Canada can expect in terms of economic challenges. Productivity growth spells higher standards of living for Canadians. Unfortunately we are not as productive as we once were, a fact to which my colleague in the opposition referred to a moment ago. To put it another way, we are finding out today that Canadians are less and less efficient at producing goods and services.

From 1974 to 1989, over-all productivity growth slipped to 25 per cent of the average level for the 20 preceding years. It did not go up at all during the first half of the 80s. With respect to labour competitiveness in the manufacturing sector, in the last 15 years Canada dropped from second to fifth among the industrialized countries of the Group of Seven.

In fact, Canada is the G7 country which recorded the lowest productivity growth over the last six years. My other colleague said earlier this is because we have gone down. No! We managed to improve our productivity in the manufacturing industry less than other countries and this, in spite of our strong economic growth. Such competitors as West Germany, Italy and France have not only equalled but exceeded our level of productivity.

Policies implemented in Canada in the 1970s and 1980s, have undermined its long-term productivity. A change of direction was necessary. The 1984 economic Recovery Plan described the economic challenges which Canada had to meet and the steps taken later on have helped create a framework much conducive to productivity enhancement. The Economic Recovery Plan stems from the wise realization of a need for basic recovery aimed at bringing about sustained growth and productive employment. Before laying out the solid foundations necessary for this renewal, the Canadians and their government joined forces to develop and implement an action plan to eliminate the many obstacles to economic growth. This action plan started off with energy and determination in two major closely connected directions.

First of all, federal program policies had to be changed to make it possible for the private sector to become the motor of economic recovery in an increasingly competitive international market. To support growth in the private sector, Canadians had to focus on change and progressively adopt a new positive approach towards entrepreneurship and adjustment to new market realities.

In some cases, this resulted in less regulation and government intervention. In other cases, it resulted in a reduction of subsidies and other government expenditures which were detrimental to a wise allocation of our limited resources. In others still, it resulted in a redirection and reinforcement of government activities necessary to support growth and adjustment. This was especially required in the areas of research and development, exports and investments, especially in the case of small-and medium-sized businesses.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, we had to address the federal deficit in order to control the constant increase of a federal debt resulting from past squanderings. In order to reduce the deficit, it was necessary to systematically and consistently limit the increase in federal spending. We had to carry out a thorough examination of federal spending in all sectors, including economic and regional development, social programs, federal-provincial transfer payments, public assistance to development and defence. All this in order to develop a system plan for slowing down government expenditures, while modifying the composition of the latter to reduce to a minimum the negative impact of budget cuts on the economy.

This action plan had to be fair, and it was. Some of the changes necessary for economic recovery represented a form of shock treatment. The pill may have been difficult to swallow in some cases, but it remained at least palatable when all economic groups or regions accepted to carry their fair share of the burden.

As early as 1984, it became clear that the refusal to change was no longer possible in Canada. If Canadians were adverse to the very notion of change, they were nevertheless aware that their refusal would prevent Canada from seeking solutions for renewal. If all Canadians wanted to avail themselves of the benefits, they all had to share in the effort.

It feels good and reassuring to see that Canadians were able to meet the challenge issued to them in the Agenda for Economic Recover and that their support spearheaded the crucial changes and innovations that have been and still are implemented by our government.

Also ensuring Canada's competitiveness are our vocational training and education programs which are well-suited to our economic situation and which considerably contribute to our prosperity.

A highly educated and trained work force adapts rapidly to new situations, thrives on working with new technologies, and is capable of becoming more directly involved in promoting the success of the firm. A highly skilled work force will naturally develop a more direct stake in its own productivity performance. In recognition, Mr. Speaker, of the growing importance of a skilled labour force, the government has been shifting its training focus, through the Canadian Jobs Strategy and unemployment insurance reforms to achieve a better balance between passive support and active training for the unemployed. In April 1989, the government launched a major new initiative to increase its effort in the field of training. However, it will take time before the benefits of the Labour Force Development Strategy become apparent. Particular attention is being given to apprentice training for the young, which varies widely in quality across the country.

The competitiveness of a nation's tax system, which also plays a major part in the overall competitivity of a country, should be judged according to two fundamental criteria: the effectiveness of the system in raising revenues to fund the provision by government of important goods and services and to support a sound macroeconomic environment; and the ability of the system to raise revenues in ways that minimize interference with private decisions and the efficient operation of markets.

• (1650)

Judging by these criteria, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian tax system, such as it was in the mid 1980s, was an obstacle to our competitiveness. The high level of nominal tax rates and the narrowness of the tax base were the results of the many tax incentives granted during the previous 15 years. However, these incentives turned out to be inefficient instruments of public policy. They caused a major drop in public revenues, without a parrallel increase in economic activity.

The tax reform initiated by this government has brought income tax more in line with that of other countries and enhanced the overall structure of the tax system. Structural changes have broadened the tax base, lowered the nominal tax rates and reduced to a minimum the number of distortion-creating incentives.

The replacement of the manufacturers sales tax—an obsolete tax, harmful to the economy—by the goods and services tax was another important structural change in our tax system. The former tax increased the cost of goods produced in Canada and thus favoured imports. Having eliminated these problems, the GST is playing a key role in improving our competitiveness.

Right now, Canadians are more and more concerned with their ability to compete. Their fears are being fueled by macro-economic issues like inflation, interest rates and exchange rate, or by structural problems like investment efficiency, overegulation, and business climate.

It is incumbent upon governments to devise a framework conducive to the development of competitive companies. The 1991 Budget contains measures meant to restore fiscal balance and to move towards price stability. This will lead to a stable macro-economic climate, a renewed confidence in the Canadian economy and a strengthening of the Canadian capacity to compete in a merciless economic world.

By collaborating to devise a common approach to fundamental economic problems, the federal and provincial Ministers of Finance are currently studying the growing cost of government as well as the various overlappings and duplications. Furthermore, at the request of the Prime Minister, the Economic Council of Canada is carrying out a major study of the impact of governments on Canadian competitiveness.

During tax reform, a number of incentives that enhanced the overall competitiveness of the economy were retained. It will be necessary to continue to review the operation and targeting of these incentives and consider possible improvements.

In particular, the government will be examining whether modifications to the R & D tax credit could ease its administration for taxpayers. It will also examine whether the tax system can be changed to remove potential impediments to the operation of capital markets in Canada. In this Budget, the government is proposing measures to remove the tax-induced bias against pension funds investing in common equities in Canada. This will stimulate share purchase, which would make Canadian businesses more competitive.

More will have to be done, however, to ensure Canada's future prosperity. We need to look hard at the quality of our investments in infrastructure, machinery and equipment, training, education, and research and technology; at private sector spending on training and research; and at other areas, such as education, where our level of spending compares well with international standards but our performance appears to be falling behind.

This is not an issue only for business, labour and government. All Canadians have an enormous stake in strengthening Canada's competitive ability by identifying the problems and developing solutions.

The government will launch a national effort to build a new partnership for prosperity that draws fully on the talents and efforts of Canadians in every sector of economic life. A discussion paper will be released in the spring to help focus public debate toward the building of a broader consensus on the problems Canada faces and the development of solutions.

Through structural initiatives implemented by the government, combined with selective measures that reflect real will to get in tune with a changing economic situation, I am convinced the economic recovery is close at hand. The continuous decrease in interest rates over the last few months combined with the end of the conflict in the Persian Gulf, which will bring oil prices down and rebuild consumer confidence, will be the engine that starts recovery. We have every reason to believe that, spurred by those incentives, growth will be vigorous once again before mid-year.

The February 26 budget of the Minister of Finance is a major step toward the realization of competitiveness and prosperity objectives. It is a watershed budget, that institutionalizes the key elements that will ensure financial stability for years to come. It will make the country stronger and more prosperous, able to assume its proper leadership role on the international economic scene in the best interest of all Canadians from coast to coast, of all children and generations to come.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Ten minute question and comment period.

Resuming the debate with the hon. member for Davenport for a ten minute period.

[English]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to listen to the learned interventions of colleagues on the government side who inevitably, one by one, have concluded their interventions by expressing positive thinking as being the solution to our economic ills. It is reminiscent of some religious movements whereby if one believes it firmly enough and intensively enough a miracle will happen.

I am not sure whether this is the way to reduce the unemployment rate in Canada today nor whether this is the manner in which the role of government ought to be developed on behalf of Canadians. The reality unfortunately is not one that we can write home and gloat about.

We know from Statistics Canada and from independent sources, which are not partisan in nature, that between December 1988 and September 1990 some 108,000 jobs in Canada have been lost in manufacturing. We know that by contrast the jobs promised as a result of the free trade agreement were 500,000, in the opinion of the Prime Minister.

We know that while the tax burden on corporations in the last five years has gone up 28 per cent, the tax burden on individual Canadians has gone up 62 per cent. Evidently, this has an effect on the ability of Canadians to spend, to consume and to keep the economic wheel turning. This is a remarkable differential in tax burden that has to be brought to Your Honour's attention.

Among industrialized nations we find that our standard living has gone from second place to eighth place. We find that between 1986 and 1990 in terms of sheer competitiveness, which is the latest political expression or the latest political concern when we want to describe our ability to function properly on international markets and on our domestic markets in relation to imports, we have fallen from ninth place in 1986 to sixteenth place in 1990.

This is a very serious slippage, if not a very serious drop, that must be highlighted; evidently something is going wrong. In an attempt at least to interpret the causes of unemployment, we must identify the roots, and this is one of them, obviously.

If you do not want to look at competitiveness, Mr. Speaker, I would urge you to look at research and development efforts. In that case, you will find that from the 10th place in which we were among the industrialized nations in 1984 we are now, in 1990, in 17th place. Here again something is not functioning properly. Should we blame the government for that?

I see the former minister in charge of science in the Chamber. Perhaps he may have some thoughts as to why we have gone from 10th to 17th place. If the public sector has been cut consistently and repetitively by seven consecutive Conservative budgets, then it would be interesting to know whether that slippage has been picked up in the private sector; and if so, where?

However, according to total accounts, nation by nation, in combining private and public, we seem to have performed very badly. We have gone from 10th to 17th place. One has to ask oneself, in light of 10.2 per cent of the Canadian workforce presently unemployed, what is it that makes this happen? We have to conclude that the strategy of this government is not working.

We heard earlier from the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization about his profound belief in the marketplace. When I asked him, since he so profoundly believes in the marketplace and its wonders, to explain why in this latest budget the government has removed the instrument of collective agreements, which is a marketplace instrument, from negotiations between the government and federal employees, he did not answer that question. So there are contradictions within the government's attitude to let the marketplace do it.

Second, in our reliance on investment, we have increasingly relied on foreign investments.

Third, in removing trade barriers, we have exposed jobs and companies to competitive forces which are stronger than their ability to deal with them.

Fourth, we have seen over the last six years an intensification of the belief that government should be doing what big business tells it to do. This has come across in a variety of ways, and we witnessed that particularly intensively during the last election when it came to the free trade debate and the role of the BCNI, the Business Council on National Issues.

We also have to bring into this ever-enlarging equation the fact that since the government took over in 1984, there have been over 4,000 foreign takeovers and not one single application has been rejected. In other words, Canadians and Canadian capital are increasingly losing control of the Canadian economy, because control of the Canadians economy is the result of the foreign investment policy of this government, which is more and more in the hands of foreign investors.

In some cases we have seen also the irony of Canadian taxpayers having to pay for some takeovers, such as occurred when Boeing bought de Havilland and subsidies had to be paid to Boeing in order to make the takeover more attractive.

We have to take into account the fact that unemployment insurance, as a result of Bill C-21 has been privatized. It is no longer an institution in the hands of the government as far as its funding is concerned. We have to conclude, regretfully, that the regional transfer funds have been reduced, that the training for the unemployed, as projected, has been reduced by $100 million at a time when unemployment has exceeded 10 per cent.

The government has on a variety of fronts attempted to diminish the universality of several important social programs. As I said earlier, the 500,000 jobs promised by the Prime Minister flowing from the free trade deal have not materialized.

I will conclude by making this point. In the first year of the free trade agreement operations, 179 Canadian corporations were taken over. Obviously, when a Canadian corporation is owned by a foreign company in difficult economic times, what does it do? The first thing that happens is the parent company closes down the subsidiaries abroad. This is in part what is happening in Canada in the over-all picture.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague on a very good speech. We on this side realize very well that this government is not paying attention, that it says one thing and always does another.

I want to remind my colleague of the promises made during the 1988 debate on the effects of the free trade agreement and the promises of adjustment funds and job creation initiatives on the part of the government to help ease the transition. Perhaps my colleague would like to add comments concerning these questions.

Mr. Caccia: I thank my hon. colleague from Sudbury. I have also been looking around for the instruments the government would be looking to in order to make unemployed people employable, provided they have a skill, by way of improved education and training skills of our work force.

Today, unfortunately, we have to conclude—and on the basis again of international studies—that Canada is less well-equipped than it was six years ago to meet the challenges of the future, because of budget cuts, which are really made and invoked in the name of a financial deficit, without taking into account the human deficit these cuts are causing, because of people remaining idle and unable to be productive, to maintain themselves and their families. Thus, the losses that are, in human terms, inflicted upon people because of an enormous preoccupation with an illusive deficit cut which this government has not been able to come to grips with, while at the same time allowing a human deficit to expand and to increase enormously day by day and month by month, as a result of such narrow-minded policies.

• (1710)

The Report on Business from The Globe and Mail cannot be cited as a revolutionary source of data. In the March issue, on page 30 is the lay-off list expected by The Globe and Mail business magazine for Canada over the next while, and the figures are astonishingly depressing.

Between the big three automakers, there is a projected lay-off of 14,000; in the steel industry, an estimated 3,000 to 4,000; Air Canada, 3,000; Canadian National Railways, 2,200; Rio Algom, 1,700; Pratt and Whitney Canada Inc., 1,200; Sears Canada, Shell Canada, Imperial Oil, forest products, you name it, a phenomenal number of projected lay-offs which will occur in our economy, as predicted by an organization which has its feet solidly on the ground.

Evidently the solution would have to come from the proposal just outlined by the member from Sudbury. We are waiting for the evidence on the part of the government to prove to us that it intends to proceed along those lines.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): It will only take me a minute, Mr. Speaker.

I just cannot help but comment on what an interesting reversal we have; all these comments from our colleagues on the Liberal side talking about training, et cetera. I cannot help but remind them that they were the group that held up Bill C-21, they were the group that patted their Liberal colleagues on the back, they were all such a grand bunch of ladies and gentlemen down there, holding up Bill C-21; $800 million worth of training funds held up by them because they were so concerned about training and education.

This is the same group that in 1977—and I say this to my colleague from Sudbury—gave away the Government of Canada's right to direct where EPF was going to go, gave it away as a block so the provinces could use it on highways or on anything they wanted. This is the same bunch now moaning all these marvellous things about training and education.

There is a word I cannot say in this Chamber, but, oh my, it does reek a little.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, This is perhaps one of the most important resolutions to be put before this House this year, because it deals with not only the recession that we are facing due to the government's policy, but the actual deindustrialization of our nation. There is no area of the country more affected by this deindustrialization than the province of Ontario.

Clearly, the important groups right across the country have talked in terms of 229,000 manufacturing jobs lost as a result of free trade and the government's policy. We do not say that all of these jobs are lost because of the free trade deal itself, but because of the general economic policy of the country.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada has taken it upon himself to decide that Canada's inflation rate is going to be zero, or 2 per cent. Surely the industrial policy of the Government of Canada should not be decided solely by the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Clearly the government's economic policy, its monetary policy, its fiscal policy and the free trade agreement, during the period since 1989 when it came into effect, have resulted in the most drastic and dramatic loss of jobs of any period in our history.

Members of our caucus from northern Ontario had a series of hearings throughout northern Ontario in the past couple of weeks. We heard from groups all over the north from some eight different communities during a five-day period in which they talked about the absolute ravaging of the manufacturing industry for softwood lumber. That is all part of the free trade deal.

The imposition of an export tax of 15 per cent is bad enough, but when the dollar rose from 74 cents—whatever it was—in 1986 to 87 cents in this past couple of years, the impact is not a reduction of 15 per cent but one of 30 per cent.

A report arrived just today on members' desks which outlined the levels of the export tax which have been imposed on this industry during the past year. I believe the figure is something like $18 million in the province of Ontario alone.

Its impact is that practically every part of the softwood manufacturing industry in northern Ontario is either shut down today or is on very slow turns of work. That area has been deindustrialized. One of the largest producers, the Buchanan group in Thunder Bay which has 3,200 forest products workers of the 6,000 in the softwood lumber section, told us that if many of these plants do not reopen by April, they will never reopen. They are one of the largest manufacturers. We see how that whole area has been ravaged.

As well, I want to talk about the mining industry and how the government has effectively removed all its support programs for exploration and development so that we see communities like Elliot Lake or Timiskaming which have lost several thousand jobs in the last two years. There will be no new mines coming on stream in the years ahead because there is no exploration and development taking place in those areas of northeastern Ontario.

The numbers involved are very large. We are talking about 15 per cent of all the mining jobs that have been lost in the last two years in northeastern Ontario and northwestern Quebec, something approaching 4,000 at least.

I was very concerned in the budget because the government has cut back by some $100 million in the new training budget at a time when literally tens of thousands of Canadians are being laid off from industries that have been obliterated or destroyed by the free trade deal.

What we need to be doing is retraining those workers to take on new jobs, new tasks and new opportunities. In my own community of Elliot Lake, we lost some 2,250 direct mining jobs last summer and probably another 1,500 or 2,000 in the service sector.

At the present time, we have 500 people on UIC benefits. We have another 700 on training, either pre-vocation or vocational kinds of training. Last week, we were notified that we would have another 1,000 people laid off this Friday for a six-week period, to be repeated again by a seven-week period this summer with 400 being permanently laid off.

We are talking of an industry losing some 3,300 jobs against a total workforce of 3,900 a year ago or 80 per cent. This for a community of 13,000 or 14,000 is simply a desperation situation. It is desperate.

I ask the minister today if she can give a commitment that the payments would be made within a couple of weeks of when people qualified for the UI, because they are being told by their UIC office in Elliot Lake that they have got to wait a minimum of six, seven or eight weeks.

Surely, that is unreasonable for 1,000 employees who have had little over a week's notice of the lay-off.

Equally important is the question of funding for training and retraining, job search, mobility and community adjustment because the impact is not only on those industrial workers but equally on those people in the service sector.

• (1720)

We are facing the most cataclysmic turnaround in industrial job unemployment that I can recall. I think it is worse than the 1981-82 recession. Clearly, we are coming at it from a much lower base in terms of job situations. In the 1981-82 period, of the 83 megaprojects across Canada, five of those were located in my constituency at that time. We have no megaprojects, we only have lay-offs and a desperate situation. The same situation applies in Sault Ste. Marie where we have had very significant lay-offs. We have a steel industry there which, as the whole steel industry in this country, is in a very desperate, sick situation.

Much of that is due to the government's economic and fiscal policy. You simply cannot compete in the United States market with the level of interest rates 5 per cent above the United States and a dollar at 87 or 86 cents. On top of that, in the free trade deal the people in the steel industry in Canada, whether it is Dofasco or Stelco or Algoma, all believe that they would be relieved of the threat and the problems of countervail. In fact, that has not happened.

Since 1989, we have had countervail imposed on steel rails. We have had countervail duties imposed on seamless tube pipes. It has made them unsaleable in the United States and that, combined with the high dollar, has just had a devastating impact on that industry. The entire industry is facing collapse, certainly at Algoma. This is mostly due to the government's policy and the broken promises of the FTA.

This resolution today really pin-points the folly of the government's policies: the fiscal, monetary, trade and tax policies. It is having a drastic and devastating impact on our industry and business in this country, but, most important, on the workers of this nation, the 1.4 million who are facing unemployment, loss of jobs and no retraining programs.

I think it is a desperate situation. It is one that requires action by this government and one which the budget does not address. It simply exacerbates the situation because it calls on provincial governments and municipal governments to pay higher taxes, increasing the adverse economic impact on the entire nation.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I compliment my colleague from Algoma for bringing to the attention of this House the dilemma in which all of us in northern Ontario find ourselves.

I have sat on several committees with my colleague over the last several months where we have discussed those areas of the economy in Ontario that are truly affected, especially the area from which he comes. What I am talking about in particular is the softwood lumber industry. He has had several mills close in that area, as he has relayed in his speech to the House.

I would ask the member to relate what he saw happening, firsthand: the anguish and pain of individuals in the community, because of the families involved, the lack of work and without the proper training to go to another job even if there was another job to go to, in the softwood lumber industry. Could he tell us also about the terrible anguish that the community of Sault Ste. Marie is now facing because of the potential closure of its largest employer, something that would destroy not only 8,000 primary jobs in an industry that has been so vital to the future in the community of Sault Ste. Marie. Could he relate to us, in this House, the personal anguish and the personal pain that each family is experiencing because of this terrible economic policy that is affecting all of us in the north but, particularly, in Sault Ste. Marie and the district of Algoma of which we look upon in Thunder Bay—Nipigon as being part of our area.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend and colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon for his question regarding the softwood lumber industry. It is an area that is common to both of us, although clearly in his community they have one of the largest softwood conglomerates in the entire area of northern Ontario.

The presentation that was made to our task force on the northern Ontario economy in Thunder Bay by a representative of the Buchanan Group perhaps was one of the most poignant. It is a case of representatives of the industry not knowing which way to turn. They know they are not viable the way they are. They do not understand why the government is willing to leave the export tax in place. They do not understand why the government has continued to push the dollar so high. There is a lack of confidence that there will be any out for this. At the same time the bankers and lending institutions are coming by to examine the books of these companies to see if the whole thing is viable.

When we get to the point of putting the question to the Minister for International Trade as to whether he is going to go to Washington and make a decision to abrogate this agreement or to negotiate out of it, it all turns to mush. There is just no decision to do that.

At the same time communities are crumbling. There are lay-offs that take place and people have to wait for six or seven weeks for their unemployment insurance benefits. They do not know how long this is going to take place.

It is the same for the laid-off workers at Algoma Steel in Sault Ste. Marie. They say: "Well, we are getting UI initially, at least, but we have no confidence in the future as to whether the industry is going to continue to operate". I think that is true throughout the north for the softwood lumber industry. Will the industry be there? Will the shut-down that is supposed to last for a couple of months last all summer, last all fall? They do not discern any commitment by the government to come to grips with the problem. They know that the companies are strapped. They have no borrowing power. Their line of credit is right up to the limit. So it is a directionless situation. Do they jump and try and get—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time for question and comments is over. Resuming debate.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Sciences and Technology, I am pleased to rise on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Willowdale. I am happy to do so because we all know that Canada's economic competitiveness and future prosperity are an excellent discussion topic requiring the involvement and the knowledge of every hon. member and every Canadian.

But most of all, I know that that debate will provide me and my colleagues with the opportunity to show how much we care for the Canadian competitiveness. In spite of all false contentions, Mr. Speaker, the government's commitment to make a strong and prosperous Canada during the 1990s and beyond is unprecedented.

Sciences and technology are crucial to increasing Canada's competitive edge and economic prosperity. Technological research and development are the great factors of growth in a world economy characterized by innovation and the spreading of knowledge.

The key to innovation is the skills and knowledge of our people. Benefits will accrue to men and women who will make the best of their kowledge and their skills to design, develop and create new or improved products, processes and services as well as to open up new markets.

• (1730)

Mr. Speaker, our government believes that Canada's prosperity is based on five pillars: access to international markets, effective management of our human ressources, a better corporate financial situation, a corporate culture characterized by competitiveness, and a climate enabling us to benefit from science and technology.

In each of these sectors, Canada has a challenge to face. Most of these challenges are not exclusive to Canada. They are universal, created by rapidly changing international markets and an unprecedented pace in technological development.

We, as a government, are determined, to do what must be done to place Canada—that is, its industries, its scientific and research institutions, as well as all its citizens— in a position to transform these challenges into prospects for the future. We are doing so by using the best possible strategy. We have all learned the hard lessons of our predecessors' approach. They tried to fix everything with grants, but we have seen that such an approach leads nowhere.

We have followed a complete and judicious set of priorities, established to promote excellence in the field of science and technology, and to help Canadian corporations become more innovative and competitive.

Our priorities, Mr. Speaker, are to preserve and to increase, as far as possible, the ability of Canada to undertake pure research studies, to heighten its capacity to carry out applied research, particularly through the pooling of government, industry and university resources, and, maybe still more important, to noticeably step up research and development from sea to sea. Each one of these priorities is based on our commitment to an education of international standard; in other words, to the creation and preservation of a pool of highly qualified men and women which our country will need to be a winner.

As I have just said, Mr. Speaker, I am happy that this debate gives us the opportunity to clarify some misconceptions, some myths. With your permission I should like to consider for a few minutes one of the latter, which is particularly common, that is the myth that government support to science and technology is inadequate.

Quite frankly our level of support to civilian research compares with that of all other major industrialized countries.

Mr. Speaker, government expenditures in science and technology have been steadely increasing, from 4.1 billion dollars in 1984–1985 to about 5.4 billion dollars in the current fiscal year, an increase of more than 33 per cent. Looking at this science and technology envelope, we see that research and development expenditure went from $2.4 billion to $3.2 billion an increase of 30 per cent. Such increases exceed the 25 per cent growth in total program spending which clearly indicates that science and technology, as well as research and development, are an absolute priority for the federal government.

This increase in research and development spending went mostly to industries and universities. Federal spending in industrial research and development went from $422 million to $776 million, an increase of 85 per cent.

Our university research and development expenses increased by 34 per cent, from $538 to $721 million. Mr. Speaker, would any government do that if it refused to make commitments?

This trend will continue because research and development will remain one of our priorities. The recent budget provides that grants and contributions for science and technology will increase by 3 per cent annually starting in fiscal year 1992–93. Over a period of 4 years, this increase will result in a financial support of some $1.5 billion more thant present expenses for new or improved initiatives in science and technology.

You should consider all of this and the fact that the Conference Board of Canada acknowledges that the financial support we provide for research and development through our tax system is one of the most generous in the world. Yet, misconceptions continue to spread around. I am really puzzled. I think our critics are just badly short–sighted or lack good faith.

I will forget about monetary matters if I may and concentrate on the approach of our government to research and development promotion.

A very good example is the centres of excellence program. This program which includes participation by over 500 researchers from 35 universities and 37 major corporations, provided a total of $244 million in federal funds available to 15 networks.

It should be emphasized also that the purpose of these networks is not only to encourage research and development but also to ensure that our capacities in this area are used to foster such economic and social objectives in Canada as reinforcing our industries' competitiveness and promoting a better quality of life for Canadians.

These networks were set up less than a year ago, but their potential is already evident. Consider for instance the important position the fishing industry has in Canada and be advised that there exists an Ocean Production Enhancement Network which could offer new possibilities for the future and make it possible for this industry to remain competitive, in spite of necessary quota reductions.

The network concerned with pest control could improve considerably the level of productivity of both agriculture and forestry while pursuing environmental objectives.

Two other networks will make it possible for Canada to confirm the reputation of excellence it has gained in the areas of space research and communications. Finally, another network devoted to research in the area of heriditary conditions and another one on nerve regeneration and functional rehabilitation will make it possible for Canada to remain among the leaders in these two important health research sectors.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, we announced that we would allocate $35 million over a five-year period for the construction in Ontario of the Sudbury Neutrino Observatory valued at $61 million. This Canadian program international in scope will open a new vista on the universe and will make Canada a world leader in the research area of particle physics and astrophysics. In addition to encouraging scientific excellence and greater knowledge, this project will result in major economic fallouts for Northern Ontario.

• (1740)

Besides, Mr. Speaker, the Green Plan that was announced last December is very scientific and technological in nature. Three billion dollars will be used to fund a variety of initiatives related to the improvement of the environment, particularly the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River Action Plan. A major part of these funds will be used for the development and application of scientific and technological solutions to environmental problems.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back to the education and training theme. The Prime Minister and this government work hard so that Canadian education standards reach the highest levels possible.

The Canada Scholarships Program, which is very successful, shows our unfailing commitment in this regard. We established this program three years ago to encourage a greater number of young Canadians and particularly women, to pursue graduate studies in sciences and engineering. The program has presently more than 6 200 scholarhip recipients and is successful beyond all our expectations.

If universities play a leading role in the promotion of the program, industry also began to play an active role this past year. Thirteen businesses are sponsoring the program and their number should increase during next year. This contribution from industry helps increase the quality and the expansion of the Canada Scholarships Program, which benefits all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the councils which fund university research also provide a vital contribution to the country's future by encouraging and supporting academic research and training. The programs and activities of the National Sciences and Engineering Research Council are a good example. They are among the key elements of the national strategy for promoting co-operation between industry and universities. The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada also funds in various ways research in the field of competitiveness.

Mr. Speaker, being committed to science and technology, the government is doing everything in terms of public awareness to promote a strong science culture in Canada. With this in mind we are conducting a national public awareness campaign to urge Canadians, especially young Canadians, to become more interested in science and technology and consider careers in these disciplines; to make science and technology an increasingly important issue for the public; and to raise the level of general science knowledge of all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the cornerstone of our campaign is National Science and Technology Week, organized in co-operation with the provinces, the territories and various groups in the scientific and technical community. Last October was the first time we focussed the attention of the entire country on science and technology. That experience was an unqualified success. More than 600 events were organized across the country, and we expect even more next October.

Mr. Speaker, I think the present government's achievements in this area are self-evident. However, although my colleagues and I draw great satisfaction from what we have accomplished, we are aware much remains to be done.

We cannot deny private sector investment in research and development falls far short of the standard in major industrialized countries.

Although Canada has a broad resource-based industry, most Canadian businesses are small. Nevertheless, a number of large industrial sectors in this country do far less research and development than their foreign competitors. It is clear that this in turn hurts productivity.

However, technological innovations are not limited to research and development activities as such. For example, a country can ensure the spreading or the improvement of production technologies, through licence agreements, joint ventures, employee transfers within multinational corporations, or foreign machinery and equipment purchases. Canadian businesses have seemed slower to adopt new technologies than their counterparts in other industrialized countries. We must recognize the need to promote the spreading of technology in Canada, if we are to become more efficient.

Mr. Speaker, no wonder why the efforts of the present government, in science and technology, have mainly aimed at supporting, promoting, implementing, and stimulating the private sector into making more room for innovation.

We developed programs that will help industries and scientists to work together and join their capital and resources in research and development undertakings.

Under their new mandates, government laboratories, NRC included, must now work in close cooperation with Canadian industry.

Some programs will help industry to acquire new technologies abroad and we set up new initiatives to help whole industrial sectors to overcome some of the obstacles they encounter in trying to become more competitive.

In conclusion, Mr Speaker, allow me to quote one of our relatively modest programs: the Manufacturing Visits Program. This initiative is aimed at giving companies the opportunity to visit some of our most important manufacturing centers and observe their operatious. Our Spring program can handle 150 companies. Mr. Speaker, 127 companies in only two days have already registered in that program!

I therefore conclude, that the industry is beginning to move and that it is taking up the competitivity challenge. I also conclude this government is paving the way for a competitive and prosperous Canada.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate my hon. colleague on his presentation. However, in order to clarify the situation, because he has just indicated that Canada is spending enough in the areas of research and development, I have here the annual report of the National Consortium on Scientific and Educational Societies which finally represents over 30 different national organizations, including the Canadian Association of University Research Administrators, l'Association canadienne des écoles de titre supérieur, the Canadian Association of Physicists. This report, of which my hon. friend must certainly have received a copy, compares the situation in Canada and other industrialized nations.

For my hon. friend's information, it deals here with Gross Domestic Expenditures in research and development expressed as a percentage of the Gross Domestic Product. Here are some the comparative data: Japan, 2.92 per cent; Germany, 2.85 per cent; the United States, 2.8 per cent; France, 2.3 per cent; Norway, 1.87 per cent; Finland, 1.8 per cent; Austria, 1.3 per cent and Canada, less than 1.3 per cent. If we compare Canada's performance with these other individual countries, my hon. colleague will certainly agree with me that we have not yet reached their level. Even if we spent a little money here and there, it is not enough as an investment for the future.

Yesterday, or the day before, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology was reported as saying that the private sector was not investing in the area of science and technology. I wish to reply to that by saying that the federal government's share in research and development financing compared to that of the private sector, according to this report, decreased from 35 per cent between 1981–85 to 31 per cent between 1986–90. If we also consider the levels of public investment in those fields, we see a constant decrease and no increase at all.

• (1750)

So, instead of saying that we do enough, why is my friend not asking his colleagues in caucus to invest a little more in sciences and technology so to set a good example for the private sector? I would like to hear his comment on that, to know if he agrees with the report or not.

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, my first words are to thank my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier and to tell him that I did not have the opportunity to read this report. Still I want to recall some of the remarks I just made in the House and say to him that our government's expenditures for science and technology have been steadily increasing, from $1.4 billion in 1984–85 to roughly $5.4 billion this year.

Mr. Speaker, I pointed out as well that industries and universities benefited from the lion's share of higher research and development expenditures. You know, before I came here in 1984 I was in the industrial sector in the riding of Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup which I represent in the House of Commons. I was one of the shareholders of three companies.

Mr. Speaker, you know that before 1984 the regions in eastern Quebec—as others far removed from major centres—had government programs in research and development or science and technology. When I was working for my company and acting as President of the Chamber of Commerce we always had recommendations to make to the central government: Listen, we said, tell us more about existing programs.

Being active in a small business I had to fight to get information on existing programs. Why? Because government representatives and federal employees did not bother to visit us to tell us about the opportunities that were available. I can say, and I say it to my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier, that I made it my duty, since 1984, as representative of the riding of Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup and former industrialist, to make people from my constituency aware that this federal government, through its Department of Industry, Science and Technology, has programs that can help them in the area of research and development and that allow them to go and see what is going on elsewhere in Canada or in the world.

I can tell you today, Mr. Speaker, and I say it also to my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier, whom I invite to come and visit eastern Quebec so I can prove what I am saying, that in the peat industry, for example, a primary industry in my area, a lot of research and development is done, but only since 1984. There was no R&D before that because people were not aware of government programs. The Liberals did not publicize them.

Today, that firm called Tourbière Premier or Tourbière Berger or whatever works with the universities, Laval University, the Centre de biomasse du Québec, the Quebec CRIQ. Thus, research and development is still done in that sector, as in the timber industry, in the private woodwork sector thanks to the programs that exist, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I would like to explore the words of the hon. member a little further.

Is he seriously arguing that because he noticed there was some R and D going on in his area that is a reflection of the government's involvement and its investment in research and development? Isn't that a very small sample or a very tiny basis on which to make a generalization?

In any case, that is not the question I rose to ask. The member indicated, as did the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, that government expenditures have gone from $4 billion when this government came to office to $5 billion now. I would ask this member whether he has thought about that at all.

That constitutes a 25 per cent increase. If we look at it most generously, let us say that is a 25 per cent increase over five years or closer to five and one-half years.

Would he work out the percentage change over that period of time, reflect on its significance in real dollars, and tell me whether he really thinks, given that the inflation rate for scientific equipment, just as an example, run at about 15 per cent per annum, that this is a great development in expenditures on research and development by this government? Or, would he agree with any rational observer and recognize that that amounts to bloody little change?

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, first of all, in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Windsor—St-Clair, I would like to refer him to my speech, where I said: "—the Conference Board of Canada acknowledges that the financial support we provide for research and development through our tax system is one of the most generous in the world. And yet, misconceptions continue to spread around."

I appreciate the fact, Mr. Speaker, that in opposition you can make figures say anything. But in his speech this afternoon the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier mentioned how awful the unemployment rate has been since 1984. He talked about the bankruptcy rates since 1984, the high interest rates since 1984, the high inflation rates since 1984, but never did he mention the inflation, interest, bankruptcy and unemployment rates we had before 1984, when his party was in office. But let me tell you something, as an entrepreneur, during 1980, 1981, 1982, and I am also saying this for the benefit of our NDP colleague, interest rates reached 20 per cent, 21 per cent, and 22 per cent. And because of those high interest rates, I saw people in my own constituency who had to give up their homes. If we had bankruptcies in those years, it was all because of the Liberal Party.

So you have to be careful when you compare cabbage to carrots. As far as I am concerned, I would rather look for carrots where I can find rabbits.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members on this side and those on that side who are neither deaf nor blind will know that my question to the hon. member was rather specific. It cited increased expenditures by this government on science from $4 billion when it came into office to $5 billion now. I asked him to do what I do not really think is the impossible, namely to do a little mathematics: divide those figures appropriately and what he would come out with is an annual rate of increase of roughly 5 per cent. The hon. member has already said, because he said it specifically, that inflation would have eaten up that increase.

In fact there has not been any significant real dollar increase in expenditures for research and development by this government and, as has been cited by almost everyone, the percentage of the gross expenditures for research and development attributable to the government has fallen from roughly 25 per cent when this government came into office to roughly 19 per cent now, while the industrial rate of expenditures has increased to around 50 per cent from 47 per cent formerly.

The hon. member, as enthusiastic as he may be, has not paid very much attention to the facts.

This debate, generally speaking, is about this government's economic policy. It addresses such issues as the high interest and the high dollar policy and it looks at support for export promotion in science and technology, and research and development as significant elements in any economic policy and condemns in effect the government for its failure in these areas.

• (1800)

I hope I will have time to say something about the area which is of most interest to me within the context of this debate, but I think it would be useful to consider the impact of this government's policy on one single city in the country: Windsor. Windsor of course is a community highly dependent on the automobile industry. It is a part of those three or four cities that have a very large measure of impact on the entire Canadian economy. In fact, if one wanted to anticipate the results of this government's economic policies, one should have looked at Windsor a year ago.

What is the situation now? Using the February figures we obtained from the Canada Employment Centre, the unemployment rate in Windsor was 17.6 per cent. In other words, one person in five was unemployed. If we take into account those people who were unemployed due to so-called temporary lay-offs which amounts to about 4,000, there being about 24,000 people unemployed, we still have an unemployment rate of 14.1 per cent.

These unemployed people are going to the unemployment insurance office where there are not enough public servants to serve their needs. A consequence of that is that they are waiting around to get their benefits and meanwhile social assistance in Windsor has to pay the cost. It issues the cheques and runs back and pays it back and all kinds of rigmarole. We should also point out of course that since those people who are unemployed do not collect benefits for as long as they used to, that is another imposition on the welfare load. Of course the city is going to encounter a number of additional expenses, but let us put it down in simple terms.

The city of Windsor will realize another $1 million in welfare costs as a direct result of this government's policies. That is, January over January, 1990. The welfare cost to the municipalities in the province will rise from $5 billion to over $15 billion.

That is a reflection of what is happening to the automobile industry which is partly due to the recession this government so carefully caused because of its wrong-headed economic policy. Even beyond that, even before this recession hit, thousands of jobs were lost in the auto parts industry because the plants are moving down to Missouri and to Mexico.

That is not all. If one looks at the situation as projected by the government's own Department of Industry, Science and Technology, one finds that yet more parts manufacturers are going to go down for the same reason that others have gone down: a dollar that has gone from 72 cents in American money to up to nearly 86 cents now, has made the auto parts industry so uncompetitive that they are having a difficult time making profit margins. Roughly half are in prospect of losing out altogether.

The high dollar—not high interest rates in the Windsor area in the parts industry because they borrow the money in the United States—means that there is no research going on in an industry that only does one-tenth the amount of research done in competitive nations. This government says therefore: "competitiveness", the kind of competitiveness that has this government sending out a message to all workers that the inflation they caused by high wage demands is responsible for a loss of our competitiveness. Therefore, we have to put the cap on the Public Service as a message to all other workers that competitiveness is going to be based on low wages, because of the idiotic, economic policies of this government, that is the only way we can compete with Mexico.

Let us take another look at Windsor. Windsor had an active tourist trade. An awful lot of Americans came over to buy in our retail stores and in our restaurants. The number of Americans coming to Windsor has dropped by half. The number of Americans coming to shop in our stores and eat in our restaurants has dropped by half; a direct consequence of the high dollar. One-third of our downtown retail stores and restaurants have closed as a result.

On the other hand, with this nice new economic growth-oriented GST, Canadians are going to Detroit in droves. The number going over there to buy has almost doubled. These are the economic policies: The high dollar, high interest rates, the GST, free trade. These are the elements the Prime Minister says must be the basis for any future constitutional change. My God, I think almost anybody in Windsor would say: "Putting the Prime Minister in charge of constitutional change on that basis, is like putting Nero in the position of chief of the fire department".

Earlier I listened to the minister of science and technology, and when I think of some of the things he said, I get awfully thirsty. He made the same claim as the previous government member made earlier; that this government has done tremendous things for research and development. Really the fault lies with industry.

Well, that is true to an extent. I indicated earlier the percentage of the gross expenditures in research and development attributable to industry has in fact increased by about 5 per cent. This means, since our over-all national expenditures for research and development—that is gross expenditures at the national level for R and D—has gone, since this government was in office, from 1.4 per cent of GDP to 1.28 per cent now.

There you see it, Mr. Speaker. I can see it in your eyes. You got it immediately. If the over-all percentage of GDP that we spend on R and D has dropped since this government came into office and the percentage that was expended by industry has gone up, only one conclusion is possible. The government's expenditures have gone down.

Before the members of the Official Opposition hasten to applaud with vigour what I am saying because I am condemning the government, when the former Prime Minister under the Liberals came to office in the 1960s, we were also then spending 1.4 per cent of our gross domestic product on R and D and it quickly fell down to 0.9 per cent.

So, this is a kind of a death-bed reformation, as it were, of the Liberal Party, but I congratulate it. We have been working on the Liberal Party so that it understands the problem. It understands its sins for the past and today wants to make up for it by supporting our argument with respect to research and development and I welcome that. What the hon. minister of science and technology did not say is what the National Advisory Board for Science and Technology said, what the Association for Advanced Technology said, what the consortium said, what everybody who has looked at the issue has said, that one of the significant problems with our level of research and development supported by industry is the high level of foreign ownership.

• (1810)

The high level of foreign ownership in our industrial sector is probably the single most important reason for our low industrial expenditure for research and development. Yet this is the government that gave us Investment Canada. "Get more foreign ownership. —do not do anything to ensure that research and development is done by them in this country".

Moments ago the hon. member said that Canada had the most generous tax arrangements to encourage research and development in the world. Oh, yes, we do. We give it to American companies. We give it to foreign companies. They take the money and go home with it.

Yet this government has installed a system for the review of foreign acquisition of Canadian businesses that has utterly failed since its introduction to refuse a single acquisition in all that time.

An hon. member: Not even one?

Mr. McCurdy: Not even one. Not even one.

If it wants to do something about our level of research and development, surely one of the things it might do is find ways of targeting those tax incentives a little more carefully, to be a little more careful about what Canadian businesses are acquired. We cannot afford any more de Havillands, or any more Lumonics, any more Connaughts, any more of the hundreds of examples that could be cited of high intensity technological industries in this country being acquired by foreigners.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most valued institutions for research and development in this country is the National Research Council. The National Research Council submitted a preliminary draft of its five-year plan. This draft was submitted by a president who was hand-picked to go in there and impose the government's priorities on the NRC. He went in with an axe and he axed, and he axed, until around 250 scientists had been lost to the NRC, in a crude and hard attack on those who had devoted many years of their lives to science in this country.

But that same president, that hand-picked axeman of the government, asked because he thought it was sensible to do so, minimally sensible to do so, in that five-year plan, for $250 million spread over five years so that NRC could adequately fulfil its mission.

They told him after the cabinet sat: "Oh, my God man, you have to cut that back". So that $250 million proposal never saw the light of day except by virtue of some good hard-working reporters-researchers who found it out. Oh, probably there was a brown envelope there someplace.

What they got after the NRC rewrote its five-year plan was $50 million spread over five years.

Mr. Speaker, I see you have that incisive look in your eyes again. You got it immediately. That will hardly keep up with inflation. In fact, if one considers what the impact is on IRAP, then you begin to get the message.

The Industrial Research Assistance Program has supported research in small and medium-size companies. It has been the single most valuable government program for the encouragement of industrial research and development.

The president of NRC said it should be funded at a level of $125 million over five years, that is to say half of all that was originally asked for. It got $50 million for the entirety of the NRC.

For those people who are interested in jobs and how jobs can be produced efficiently, it should be noted that IRAP is the most efficient job producing program the government has. It is $15,000 a job.

I would like to see that compared to Hibernia, the program under which the government just gave the multinationals $1 billion to play with. What was the cost of a single job there?

If there is any kind of consensus in this country and respect for our industrial need, it is that Canada must develop the capacity to produce value added through trade by the investment of knowledge and skills of our people.

We must become a research and development intensive country, and we must have a highly educated and trained work force. We are not doing it. This government thought that all it had to do was open up the country to free trade with the United States together with some embellishments that limit our capacity to undertake the industrial restructuring that we require, such as the ownership rules and so on.

This government has failed to do, as this resolution identifies, what is necessary to encourage industrial research and development. It is steadily eroding its own capacity to do research and development. It has launched an attack on the universities by its cutbacks in EPF. It has incapacitated the universities' capacity to do basic research. It has made it more difficult for students to afford to go to university in a variety of ways, and it has the gall to cut $100 million from training programs.

This has been a pattern of a consistent policy of attacking those very measures and tools and institutions that are necessary in economic development.

As Peter C. Newman, the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, the consortium and as every commentator knows, this government, rather than improving our competitiveness, is presiding over the deindustrialization of Canada. This is not a government that the Canadian people want to continue. We ask it to resign.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of enthusiasm to some of the comments that my colleague from Windsor—St. Clair mentioned.

Because he and I represent neighbouring areas of this country in southwestern Ontario, we have very similar concerns. Without a doubt, when we start looking at the situation that has occurred in Windsor, in Essex county and in Chatham and Kent counties, we have seen unlimited devastation. We have seen thousands and thousands of job losses in a very short time.

As a matter of fact since the free trade agreement came in, we have seen 4,800 jobs lost in the manufacturing sector alone. When we talk to the farm community, it is very clearly stating that this goes beyond the farm community to the financial experts who are looking at what is happening. The banks and the finance companies are saying, straight out, one-third of the area farmers in Essex and Kent County are in serious financial difficulties.

• (1820)

I listened to the Federation of Agriculture in Kent County and the Federation of Agriculture in Essex County just a month and a month and a half ago, in January. Their greatest concern was to have enough dollars in order to plant crops this year. They are not talking about difficulties. I heard statements such as a lack of direction in this government, despair, dire straits, we are under attack. These were statements that were made time and time again, not only by the agricultural community, but by the work force, the municipalities involved, the social service groups that came forward, by everyone who seemed to be there. It was a consistent bit of testimony.

Another interesting point to our region was the fact that we heard: We are cut off from Canada. This government does not care about southwestern Ontario. We are cut off from Canada by its monetary policies, its CBC cuts, the VIA Rail reductions. We see, time and time again, that not only has the monetary policy been very devastating, but communications has been reduced drastically. Now we are faced with rural newspapers, small newspapers in this country, under attack as well.

It is a fact that the agricultural community is under attack, and it is voicing that very clearly. When one-third of the farmers in the most prosperous area in Canada in farming—and may I point out that in the two counties of Kent and Essex they produced in the 1988-89 crop year $450 million worth of agricultural produce—we are looking at figures like that and saying in two counties, one-third of the farm community is really not going to make it.

Things have to be done in order to improve that situation.

We also clearly heard, and again it relates very strongly to my colleague's area, the very dire concerns about what is happening to the work force. The work force in Kent and Essex county, as I mentioned just a moment ago, lost some 5,000 jobs basically. If we look at Windsor, Windsor has suffered 36 per cent job losses, and my colleague from Windsor—St. Clair can confirm that point.

Mr. de Jong: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I understand that after a member's address there are 10 minutes allowed for questions and answers. I am interested in the hon. member's remarks but I noted that his question, in fact, is several sheets of paper already typed out. So he must have anticipated the question before the speech.

I wonder if the hon. member can get to the question so that some other members might also be able to pose some questions to my colleague.

Mr. Pickard: It is a shame but this time is called question and comment. Maybe this member is not aware of what this time period really is. Question and comment allows me to prepare in advance, as all Liberals do. Possibly you do not. There are comments that I have heard from you that were not prepared in advance—but we will not get into that. However, I would like to continue with my points here.

It is very clear, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. de Jong: It is not an opportunity for you to make a 10-minute speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I suggest that the hon. member end his remarks because other members want to make comments or questions.

Mr. Pickard: The point I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker, and I am certain that my colleague from Windsor-St. Clair has the same viewpoints because we did go through Essex and Kent counties listening to the drastic concerns that are there, heard the welfare people suggest strongly that there is absolutely no question that the federal government has dumped upon the communities with regard to Bill C-21, with the welfare rolls doubling in one year, with job losses dramatically increasing—

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate my colleague for giving such insightful reinforcement to what I had already said. He said, I think, that there has been considerable job loss. There has been considerable job loss in Windsor, but what he did not say was that the status of research and development in Ottawa is of significance even in Windsor.

I just wanted the Speaker to know, because I think he would want to be informed, as I am sure my hon. colleague on the Liberal side would want to know, that I received information just today with respect to NRC that 400 scientists have applied for early retirement, the deadline being tomorrow.

Now what you have got to understand is that that is 400 out of only 3,000, roughly 15 per cent of the scientists at NRC. What that means is that this government has caused such a deterioration of morale at NRC that it has become a sinking ship and its crew are trying to get life-jackets as fast as they possibly can, and that is a reflection of this government's policy with respect to research and development.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): A very short question, Mr. Speaker. In the New Democratic Party we do not need to deliver 10-minute speeches in order to get to the question.

The question I would like to pose to the hon. member concerns as well the Liberal record because he did point out in his speech some of the omissions and sins of the previous regime. I think it is important to point these out, not in terms of any sense of forgiveness of what this government has done, but certainly the hon. member will remember the scientific research tax credit scheme that the Liberals introduced in their dying days.

I wonder if my colleague could comment on that type of expenditure of where the government, under Mr. Lalonde at that time, threw these vast amounts of money supposedly at research and development but, of course, it ended up in the pockets of lawyers and in the pockets of accountants and very little of it actually did occur in actual research.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to that. I mentioned that when Pierre Trudeau took office in 1968, the GERD: GDP ratio was 1.4 per cent and it then plunged to .9 per cent.

It is important to note that the Lamontagne report, quite some time ago in the 1970s, suggested then that a GERD target of 2.5 per cent be established and accomplished. It is worth noting, for example, that between 1970 and 1977, Liberal science spending fell from $980 million to just a little over $900 million.

It was in 1977 that the Liberal government abandoned the 50/50 split for transfers to fund universities. It is notable that they were responsible for the six and five arrangement, having cost the system about $2 billion by its own action.

It is also useful to point out that some of the economic policies that the Liberals implemented during the 1970s, if the money had been used as investment for research and development and industrial technological development, we probably would not be in the situation we are in now.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in this particular debate today.

I note that it is moved by the hon. member for Willowdale. I happened to be in Willowdale about 10 days ago and if I presented the motion to the people that I talked to, a group of people concerned about the economics, et cetera, of the country, they would wonder where this member came up with this idea because it certainly does not reflect their opinion, and all the people I talked to were his constituents.

• (1830)

I find it somewhat interesting that he can reflect this position. In fact, many of them were critical of the job his brother did in ruining the province of Ontario.

I notice that he makes that comment in here. He says in the resolution: "It is economic mismanagement that has caused record bankruptcies, put 1.4 million Canadians out of work, and brought about the deindustrialization of Canada, especially Ontario."

It is a pity the member was not in Toronto the day I was to listen to a phone-in show on CFRB radio. It is one of the most widely listened to shows in the Toronto area. The subject matter was: What has gone wrong with the economy? What is causing the concerns of the business community, of the consuming public?

In spite of the best efforts of the radio talk show host to encourage the discussion to criticize the federal government, he was unsuccessful in the space of an hour in eliciting one negative call about the federal government. But he certainly was successful, in spite of his efforts, in putting calls on criticizing the provincial government of Ontario for the way it has taxed small business. It was in fact those callers who specifically criticized the provincial government's interference in the Ontario economy, the massive skill with which it interfered in the last five years, as being the brunt of the problem that they in fact were experiencing.

I am not prepared to simply accept that. I appreciate that there are some problems today in the Ontario economy, and I am also prepared to accept that there are problems throughout the entire Canadian economy. We cannot just throw these things away in isolation and say that there is nothing happening or that there are no attempts to improve the situation. I would like to talk about some of those things.

I have just listened to two speakers—and they were rather eloquent—comment on how desperate things are in their parts of Ontario. I represent a riding in Ontario as well, and perhaps my riding is the real Ontario. They must live in a different part of the world. I appreciate that Windsor has a large automotive industry and that they are claiming that the automotive industry is destitute. I understand that. Of course, my riding in Ontario has right beside it the great city of Oshawa, which is known for its automotive participation as well.

I do not know where these members live, but in the town of Whitby, which is in my constituency, in the last two years there has been a tremendous influx of automotive parts manufacturers. They moved to Whitby. They may have come from the United States or they may have come from Japan, but having listened to the two speakers just now , I believe they probably came from their ridings because they thought they would get better representation on the other side of Toronto. Maybe that is where they came from.

I am not sure where they came from, but I can tell you that all is not dead and done in the car industry, by any stretch of the imagination. Yes, there is a slowdown today, but the reason for the slowdown is simply one of when you don't sell it, you don't produce it. That is the problem they have. It has nothing to do with any economic free trade agreement or any of these other heresies that one hears on occasion. It is simply a function of economics: when consumers stop spending, they obviously stop producing.

Mr. Wappel: Why does he stop spending, Rene? That is the question.

Mr. Soetens: What happens in this scenario is that we have to carry on and govern. There are things we have to deal with. We have to deal with them in the long term, not the short term. We have tried the short-term solution. In fact, we tried it rather extensively in Ontario in the last five years and proved that it did not work. In the previous five years we tried it here in Ottawa with another Liberal government, which simply thought that we could spend our way out of the scenario that we are in. That obviously did not work. We went through the greatest recession in a long time, back in 1981-82. Spending government money is not the solution, because the government only has one place to find its money; it really does not have any of its own. It comes from the taxpayers of Canada. When you take it from the taxpayers of Canada, they are the ones who object and they are the ones who then do not have it to spend.

I would like to carry on a little further because a number of members have also referenced the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement as part of their problem. I note that one of the two speakers comes from and in fact mentioned the great agricultural area of Canada he represents, and it is. I have no doubt that it is probably one of the more attractive areas for farming and for the farming community. It can produce some of the best crops. It has probably the greatest variety of ability to grow crops in Canada. All in all I think it has the position to which the member I think rightfully referred, that it is probably at the forefront of Canadian agricultural development.

Of course, he carries on about how desperate things are in the farm community. Yes, there are some desperations. Part of the desperation I am sure relates specifically to some very high costs of borrowing money. The Government of Canada is trying to deal with that. It is trying to bring those interest rates down, but bringing down interest rates artificially only helps for one year.

The government tried that in the late seventies only to have rates go much higher and an awful lot more farm bankruptcies took place when interest rates were at 18 and 20 per cent than did in the last year. They talk about the impact of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and I guess I have to talk about that, because I would not want the opposition members to believe their rhetoric that says that free trade has been bad for the agricultural community.

In fact, in the two–way trade in agriculture, there is a trade of about $8 billion per year that takes place between Canada and the United States. In the first full year of that particular agreement, which would be 1989, Canada's trade in agrifood products with the U.S. increased some 13 per cent, while Canada's imports decreased. We can see that there was a positive situation in that scenario.

The 1990 figures show Canada's trade in agricultural products is up 20 per cent over 1989 which is a 13 per cent increase again over 1988. If whisky and alcoholic beverages are included, the figures are increased even further.

For the first time ever, in 1990 Canadian exports to the U.S. in agriculture were over $4 billion. Canadian exports of grain and oilseeds totalled some $687 million in the first 11 months of 1990, which is up over the numbers for 1989.

There is a whole series of statistics which goes on here to talk about the changes. I think the most important area we can talk about is not just the export of raw agricultural products, I think we have to talk about the impact on the Canadian food processing industry, because there are a lot of jobs which are a direct result of agricultural production and those jobs result from food processing.

Here are just some of the impacts. Investment in the food processing sector increased in 1989 by more than 15 per cent, by 40 per cent in the baking industry and by 73 per cent in the red meat industry. Fifty new plants have opened in Canada, 24 in 1990 alone. That does not sound like it is a disaster in the food processing industry because of free trade.

There have been 54 additional plant expansions, 27 of those in 1990. There have been 26 new investments and then some additional mergers as well. All are examples of restructuring, but restructuring that has been healthy for the industry.

When I listen to the members from the Windsor area talk about the negatives of the free trade agreement on their industry, we all know the automotive industry was not affected by the free trade agreement and now we have the food sector showing some very positive signs with regard to its over–all health. I am not sure if those members travel in their ridings, but from the statistics I see it is certainly different than what they are espousing as they speak here in this debate.

I would like to expand on the recession to a degree because, yes, it is having an impact. It is having an impact in my riding. It is having an impact across Canada. There are people losing their jobs and they are losing them for a whole series of reasons. One of the things that is certainly there is the issue of competitiveness and how we deal with the Canadian competitive society. There have been a number of ways of addressing it and certainly some of them relate to proper research and development, some of them relate to investment decisions.

• (1840)

It is interesting that members, particularly in the NDP, have tremendous examples which they espouse every week of companies that pay no taxes because they have taken advantage of certain investment incentives in research and development. They criticize and say that there is not enough research and development going on. Then they criticize when the government in fact creates incentives for business to do that research and development to create jobs.

Another area they seem to ignore is this whole issue of inflation and the bank rate. It may be difficult to ask people to take less, to cut their salaries in order to make the Canadian economy more competitive, but let me just give a couple of examples which I think are very relevant on the issue of Canadian competitiveness. They are examples that exist in my particular riding, in my particular area of Ontario.

When you are concerned about Canada's ability to compete with a 2 per cent or 3 per cent inflation rate, let me give some examples of what is going on in order to help you understand that if we do not do something the problem gets worse.

Lear Siegler, a company in my riding, just negotiated a union contract. I do not fault the company and I do not fault the union. That is free enterprise. They can negotiate as they please and they can draw their own results. They settled for a 39 per cent increase.

The union president publicly boasted about the fact that they now have a starting salary at the end of the contract of $20.68 an hour. Great, I am glad they were able to do it, but do they have no sense that when one starts at $20.68 an hour in Whitby, Ontario, when one starts at $15 an hour in some other community in Canada or when one starts at $5 an hour somewhere else in the world, they are uncompetitive.

They do not seem to be concerned about that. I have made note of that particular company for one reason. I have no doubt that six months from now or a year from now, the NDP is going to be in this particular chamber yelling: "There is another company that closed because of free trade. It had nothing to do with the fact that the union demanded and got a 39 per cent salary increase".

What happens to that 39 per cent? Clearly people in my constituency look at that and they say: "My goodness, we want a share of that".

Let me give you another example. The teachers in my riding just negotiated a 14 per cent salary increase. Fine, it is the free process of negotiation. If they can negotiate a 14 per cent salary increase, I give them full marks. However, what is not included in that 14 per cent is that they also negotiated a reduction in the number of students in the class. This means the school board also has to hire more teachers. Now we have the school board saying that it needs a 15 per cent tax increase in the municipality.

That works through to the bottom line some place. In Ontario now we also have the story out that the nurses have settled for a 29 per cent salary increase. It is still rumour and I am not sure of the exact number, but it seems that rumour is being substantiated in a number of areas. Great, that is the bargaining process and I respect that.

The only thing I am trying to lead up to is that when we have an inflation rate of 5 per cent and we are negotiating 13 per cent and 14 per cent wage increases, we have to understand that all the other people who live in the area start to look at those dollars and say they want the same thing. If they all get the same thing, then they eventually become uncompetitive.

Therefore, in my riding, houses that used to sell for $100,000 now sell for $250,000. Tell me how the worker was better off. How is the worker better off having doubled his salary, when the cost of housing has gone up two and one-half times. I do not know. I am not saying which is the cause of the other. I am not sure which came first.

I can say one thing. As we collectively demand a lot more and get a lot more, there are others even here in Canada, even in Ontario, who will work for less. They will be competitive and they will be the ones that get the jobs, and those jobs will move from town to town unless we collectively accept that we are in this challenge together.

That is why the government has very clearly put forward this competitive strategy. It is a good strategy. In the case that I mentioned, the Lear Siegler workers who managed to get a 39 per cent salary increase, full marks to them.

If at the same time they upped their output by 39 per cent, that would be tremendous. That is called competitiveness. The net effect to the consumer is marginal, because they are producing an awful lot more. The net effect to the bottom line of the company is marginal because in fact they are selling a lot more, and yet it has been beneficial to the worker in the plant.

What I am suggesting by my comment is that if we are all in this thing together, if we recognize this problem, there is nothing wrong with large increases in pay as long as there is some offsetting factor to increase the over-all competitiveness of the company. Whether that is by allowing the company to put in new modern equipment, which is being done by many companies, or whether it is done on the basis of encouraging additional investment in new plans, all those things are appropriate as long as we respect that we have to work together in what is considered a competitive environment.

The issue of interest rates of course is raised. Imagine having a $250,000 mortgage or a $200,000 mortgage, assuming you made a down payment on that house in my riding, and now you are going to have to make payments on it. It is a lot easier to make payments at 12 per cent. It is a lot easier to make payments at 11 per cent, and it is much easier to make them at 10.75 per cent where there are some mortgages available at that rate right now.

Of course the reason I made reference to this is because when the Liberals were in office their attitude was: let it go to 18 per cent, let it go to 20 per cent, let it go to 21 per cent. I know it happened. My mortgage went to those levels. I can comfortably stand here today and say because of actions we took, yes, it hurt when it went to 12 per cent. Yes, it hurt when it went to 14 per cent, but it sure never went to 21 per cent because we took the steps we had to take at the appropriate time to keep that inflation rate from going high, to keep the interest rate from going through the roof, which is the attitude members opposite would have.

I know they are not too concerned about the people out there who have mortgage payments. However, in my riding it is easier to justify 11 per cent mortgages than it ever was for the Liberal member of Parliament at the time when there were 21 per cent mortgages in the area.

That all works into competitiveness. When you do not have to make those huge mortgage payments, the end result of that whole situation is that you need less money to make payments. You can therefore presume to live on an income. It is a little easier than if you had large payments. That whole scenario reflects itself along the line.

That is just another example of how the competitiveness situation fits into it. There are additional examples I could give on the impact on the Canadian economy. Maybe I will follow through with one final area relating to economic development.

The motion that is presented suggests that we are really not involved in that process. It is true that in my riding there is limited access for people to be involved in economic development programs. We certainly do support some of the things we have going through the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, western diversification and even such things as assistance for the farm community.

I have talked about some of the agricultural situations with the information I have. Those are all very positive steps my constituents can support. If the over-all economy of Canada is healthy, not just one little corner, not just the Toronto centre region or the Vancouver centre region, all of us benefit. If the people of Nova Scotia are better consumers because they have more money to spend, hopefully they will be consuming more Canadian products.

That is the process we are involved in. I am convinced the government is on the right track, absolutely contrary to the resolution before the House today.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I represent a riding the eastern Ontario riding of Stormont—Dundas, which is a mix of urban and agriculture. I do not want to delay the comments. I want to get right to the nuts and bolts of the debate. However, I cannot neglect mentioning that Cornwall, for instance, has an unemployment rate of 15.5 per cent. Over 3,400 people are unemployed. We will not go over the reasons. I understand that it gets repetitious at the end of a debate, and the day is drawing to an end, but I would like to reflect a moment on the member's comments and a very sensitive point with regard to the deficit, as well as the government's ability in terms of what resources it has available to it and what it may want to do to stimulate the economy.

• (1850)

I want to make it abundantly clear to all members of the House that the example I am going to use is that an agreement between the province and the federal government in no way, shape or form should be misconstrued as being a reflection on this one province. It is a good example of what the government has accomplished most recently in a subsidiary agreement between the province of Quebec and the federal government in the area of economic development, an $80 million package of which $41 million will be put into the program by the province of Quebec. The other $39 million will be put in by the federal government.

I congratulate the government on this initiative, along with the province of Quebec, because it is the type of initiative that is needed in other areas of the country I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the member.

I would just like to go back to last Friday and what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism said in the House regarding this particular subsidiary agreement between Canada and Quebec. I would like to quote his words. They begin with: "Help reinforce the economic infrastructures in Quebec". The member went on to say: "Both governments realize that some regions in Quebec have a very high unemployment rate and are experiencing serious economic problems. These initiatives will stimulate the economy in these regions by helping them carry out major projects which will give these communities renewed economic vigour".

I fully understand how the parliamentary secretary felt. He must have felt as proud, and rightfully so, as the government should of this initiative. However, I would submit to the member and to his party that this type of initiative could address itself to a region like mine in eastern Ontario.

For months, through the efforts of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing,—Pembroke, myself and others have undertaken and asked the Minister for Industry, Science and Technology if in fact we could not undertake this type of initiative, which is similar to FEDNOR and now similar to this most recent one, the subsidiary agreement. It is a tremendous example.

I wonder if the member would care to comment on whether this type of initiative could be undertaken in other regions of the country like eastern Ontario, and maybe there are others.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention or the comments of the member. I am not fully conversant with the program which he referred to that took place in Quebec, other than I presume it is an ERDA-type agreement that creates economic activity. I guess I would suggest that is happening in parts of Ontario through FEDNOR in one sense already.

The question is: Should there be more of that? Should particular parts of Ontario be included in those kinds of programs? If we did not have a $30 billion deficit, it would be nice, wouldn't it? I guess at this point in time my comment would be that we have a certain budget set aside for economic activity and development. We would like to have more, but within the constraints we have it would be impossible for us to grant every request for every subsidy and for every economic idea that comes along.

In my riding I have all kinds of people who are quite prepared to come forward with ideas to create jobs if somebody else will put up the money. It would be nice if we had it, but we do not have it. I guess under our current budget constraints the money we have will have to do and will have to be spent as far and as wide as we can.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member from upstairs in my office, and I thought I must hasten down here to put him straight.

First of all, he said that the free trade agreement was not changed. He should reread the deal and read of the change to 50 per cent North American content.

Second, there is another element of this free trade agreement that someone else and I have cited in this House, that is a dollar which has hit 86 cents instead of 73 cents. That is a result of the free trade agreement. When we have jobs moving to Maquiladora, Missouri, Kentucky and so on, it is a consequence, at least in part, of the free trade agreement.

Shortly after he alleged that since we are insistent on identifying the corporate welfare bums we are opposed to any kinds of incentives for research and development. That is not true.

What we oppose is billion dollar giveaways to multinational oil corporations to do what they are going to do any way to make a profit. We are opposed to the luxurious dispensation of the taxpayers' money for business lunches that accomplish nothing. We are opposed to a capital gains tax exemption for investment in the United States. We are opposed to incentives for investment in real estate that never depreciates even though the value goes up.

There is a difference between just giving money away and targeting that money for a specific purpose.

Finally, he gives us the usual discourse on competitiveness that identifies the fault with labour. I find it strange that he did not cite the fact that the real income of ordinary Canadians has gone down since the middle of the seventies, but meanwhile the incomes of good Tory executives have consistently gone up during all that time. Moreover, those high interest rates somehow find their way into the pockets of the same people whose salaries are going up.

Why does Mr. Crow not represent the same model of tolerance of a salary kept at a zero increase so he can fight inflation too? When he does that, I think Canadian workers will maybe begin to listen.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, is it not amazing that a member who represents an area of the automotive industry can cry foul that the automotive industry is being ravaged by the free trade agreement? It is interesting that in my riding and adjacent to it in that same two-year period the automotive industry has spent in excess of $3 billion in creating new jobs, new investment. Maybe the problem is in his riding, not in Canada. I can only suggest that.

Another thing I would add is that obviously the gentleman who has just spoken does not really have much to do with the business community. I came from the business community and that lunch he criticizes, that lunch that I used in promoting business in New York City, he would deny the company access to it. It is funny he did not complain when I created through that business promotion lunch $60 million worth of trade for Canada in the United States. He thinks that is an unjust expense. Little does he know about the business community and the methods under which it operates.

Business promotion is important. Part of the business promotion aspect is to make sure customers know who you are, where you are, and what the products are that you have to sell. He does not know that, and that is why he would make those negative comments about that particular area.

I should also like to add that last year in one town in my riding, an area that is supposedly being ravaged by the free trade agreement, there were 68 new companies which built new facilities. They were all small businesses. None of them were these large corporate conglomerates he is talking about. They created 360 new jobs in one town in one part of my riding.

The hon. member can carry on about all the negatives that go on in this country. He ought to travel to some part of Canada where there are some positives which means: just leave his riding and he will see it everywhere.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being seven o'clock p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply, pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I thought that perhaps in the spirit of co-operation the government House leader and the Minister of Finance might want to give consideration to the following motion:

> That the remaining question necessary to dispose of the budget debate, Ways and Means Proceeding No. 18, be put and divided on immediately and that the two days that remain in the budget debate be added to the number of allotted days in the present supply period.

That is to indicate the co-operation of the Official Opposition.

Mr. Andre: I think that opening position has some basis for future negotiation, which I will be glad to engage in with the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: It being seven-thirty o'clock p.m., this House stands adjourned until Tuesday, at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7:28 p.m.
